THE SECOND HISTORICAL PART

Antoninus of Florence

Summary of the Second Volume of the Historical Part of the Lord Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence

Title IX: Concerning Constantine the Great, Emperor

The second volume of this historical part, which is called a recollectory or ant, contains the deeds of nine hundred years, namely, from Constantine the Great, emperor, and Pope Sylvester, who were in the year of the Lord 320, as far as Frederick II, emperor, and Pope Innocent III, together with the moral sayings of the better-known doctors who flourished in those times.

The ninth title concerns Constantine the Great. He began to rule alone as emperor in the year of the Lord 309, but from the beginning of the world in the year 4,272 according to the Hebrews, and in the year 5,508 according to the Seventy and Eusebius. He ruled from the death of his father for thirty-one years. He governed the empire very well, triumphed over his enemies who reigned together with him, and subjected many nations.

Chapter I

- Constantine begins. Folio 1.
- Concerning the deeds of blessed Sylvester, in which is contained the conversion of Constantine from the vision made to him of the apostles Peter and Paul. Folio 1.

- Concerning the rules of living which Pachomius gave from a revelation of an angel. Folio 205.
- Concerning a notable saying of the same hermit. Folio 205 at the end and the following folio.
- Concerning Saint Evagrius. Folio 206.
- Concerning a certain perfect man who was vehemently tempted for a long time. Folio 206.

Chapter XII

- The twelfth chapter concerns the moral sentences of diverse holy fathers and begins, "Instructions." First, concerning the sentences of Sisois, Agathon, Arsenius, and certain others. Folio 206.
- An example concerning diverse states, two penitents, and certain other notable matters. Folio 206 at the end.
- Concerning other brief notable sayings of diverse persons. Folio 207.
- An example against presumption and boasting. Folio 207 at the end.
- An example against rash judgment and against temptations of the flesh. Folio 208.
- Concerning a certain solitary who burned the fingers of his hand to overcome temptation of the flesh, who raised a lascivious woman to life, and concerning certain other examples. Folio 208.
- After many Greek and Latin religious doctors or founders of religious orders, the history then proceeds to holy religious who flourished in the West. First, concerning Saint Benedict. Folio 208.

Chapter XIII

- The thirteenth chapter concerns blessed Benedict and begins, "There was a man." First, how he abandoned the world, remained a solitary for three years, and was visited at Easter by a priest through a revelation from the Lord. Folio 209.
- Concerning his grave temptation of the flesh and victory; how, when he was elected abbot, the monks tried to kill him with poison, on account of which he relinquished their care. Folio 209.
- That he constructed several monasteries and corrected a wandering monk by discipline; and that Florentius the priest, who persecuted him, perished by an evil death. Folio 209.
- That through preaching he converted many; that he suffered attacks from the devil; and that he raised a dead man. Folio 210.
- That he was illustrious through the spirit of prophecy, knew many hidden things, and foretold them to others. Folio 210.
- Concerning his miracles, and especially a dead man raised, Maurus walking upon the waters, a vessel of oil cast down but not spilled, and his other miracles. Folio 211.
- Concerning his sister Saint Scholastica, whose soul he saw ascending to heaven through her merits, and likewise the soul of Germanus, bishop of Capua. Folio 211.

- Concerning his happy passing and the vision of his glory. Folio 211.
- Concerning his Rule and the five degrees of humility which he sets forth in that Rule. Folio 212.

Chapter XIV

- The fourteenth chapter concerns Saint Maurus, his disciple, and begins, "After Benedict." First, that he was sent by Benedict with four men into Francia to construct a monastery, and concerning the miracles which he performed on the way. Folio 212.
- That Florus, a great man and friend of the king, gave him a place to construct a monastery; concerning the miracles which he performed, even raising a dead man; and that Florus became a monk there. Folio 212 at the end and the following folio.
- That he gathered there one hundred fifty monks, of whom one hundred sixteen died within a short time, and he himself after them. Folio 213.
- Concerning Saint Placidus, disciple of Benedict: first, concerning his noble lineage, the offering made of him, and the donation made by Tertullus his father. Folio 213.

- Concerning his arrival in Sicily, his holy morals, and his miracles. Folio 214.
- Concerning the visit of Placidus's siblings, the persecution of the Saracens, and his martyrdom and that of others. Folio 214.

Chapter XV

- The fifteenth chapter concerns Saint Romuald, who instituted the Camaldolese Order, and begins, "The saint." First, that Peter Damian described his life. Folio 215.
- That he was from Ravenna and saw Saint Apollinaris in a spiritual vision; that he became a monk; and that, because his companions sought to kill him, he departed and went to Marinus the hermit. Folio 215.
- Concerning the austerity of his life. Folio 215 at the end and the following folio.
- His father became a monk; he pretended to be a fool; and demons beat him. Folio 216.
- That Emperor Otto visited him; he was established as abbot and, when his subjects complained about his severity, he relinquished them; and he procured peace for the people of Tibur. Folio 216.
- Concerning Saint Boniface, his disciple, through whose passing through fire without injury many were converted to the faith. Folio 216 at the end and the following folio.
- That two of his disciples were sent to King Buscanus on account of the faith, and that he himself foretold death to Emperor Otto. Folio 217.
- Concerning the morals and devotion of Romuald and the wisdom infused into him. Folio 217 and the following folio.
- Concerning the many persecutions inflicted upon him, even by monks, his marvelous abstinence, and his death. Folio 218.

Chapter XVI

- The sixteenth chapter concerns Odo, who instituted the Cluniac Order, and begins, "There was in the year." First, concerning his learning and holiness; blessed Gregory also exhorted him in a vision to reduce the Moralia under a compendium into one volume. Folio 218.
- That he was established as abbot of the monastery of Cluny, governed the monks with great rigor, and concerning his miracles. Folio 219.
- Concerning certain marvelous works and certain examples introduced by him to induce monks to regular observance, and concerning Odilo his successor. Folio 219 and the following folio.
- How he was made bishop and concerning his morals in the episcopate. Folio 220.
- Concerning his miracles. Folio 220.
- Concerning a certain vision in which it was shown that many were delivered from punishments in the other life on account of the prayers and merits of the Cluniacs, whom Odilo governed after Odo; Odilo also published elegant festal sermons. Folio 220 near the end.

- That after Odilo, Hugh succeeded in the government of the Cluniac Order. He was a man of great virtues. When he visited Pope Stephen, who was lying ill at Florence, the devil departed from the room when Hugh entered and returned when Hugh went out. Hugh was also held in great veneration among kings and pontiffs. He recognized that the character of the material of a book accorded with a vision, and that the book, full of obscenities and rites of the Gentiles, was unworthy to be laid there. Folio 221.
- Concerning a certain bishop who, after he had died, revealed that he was in punishments because he used amusing words too frequently; and concerning the aforesaid Hugh, who saw the Virgin Mother with her Son on the feast of the Lord's Nativity; and concerning his death. Folio 221.

Chapter XVII

The seventeenth chapter concerns blessed John Gualbert, who founded the Order of Vallombrosa in the year of the Lord 1040, and begins, "About the same time."

- First, that he was born of noble parents, was a military man, and was a Florentine. When he encountered an enemy and spared him for love of the Crucified One, and afterward prayed in a church, the Crucified One inclined himself toward him. Being thereby pierced with compunction, he became a monk. Folio 222.
- That, when the abbot of that monastery, namely, of Saint Minias, had been appointed through simony committed with the bishop of Florence, John, on the counsel of a certain hermit, publicly disclosed the vice that had been perpetrated; and that he founded a monastery and an order. Folio 222.
- Concerning his poverty, humility, and miracles. Folio 222.
- That he was illustrious through the spirit of prophecy. Folio 223.
- Concerning his liberality and mercy toward the poor. Folio 223.
- Concerning the many miracles performed by him. Folio 223.
- Concerning the very great persecution that he and his monks endured because he publicly called the bishop of Florence a simoniac, which he also proved through fire; and concerning his death. Folio 223 at the end and the following folio.

Chapter XVIII

The eighteenth chapter concerns the Order of the Cistercians, which Stephen founded in the year of the Lord 1908, but which blessed Bernard marvelously enlarged. It begins, "The order."

- First, it treats how the said order had its beginning in a place called Cistellae in Burgundy, and concerning the holiness and vigor of the said Stephen. Folio 224.
- Concerning the ordinances of the said order. Folio 224 near the end.

Chapter XIX

The nineteenth chapter concerns the Premonstratensian Order, whose founder was Norbert in the year of the Lord 1220. It begins, "In the year." The chapter itself treats his life and holiness. Folio 225.

Chapter XX

The twentieth chapter concerns the order of the Templar soldiery, who are called those of Saint John of Jerusalem and are commonly named brothers, which began in the year of the Lord 1220. It begins, "At this time also."

- First, it contains the purpose for which such a religious order was established, its praises by blessed Bernard, and a censure of their evil morals. Folio 225.
- Concerning the relaxation of religious discipline in general. Folio 225.

Chapter XXI

The twenty-first chapter concerns the Order of Grandmont, founded by Stephen in the year of the Lord 1076, and begins, "In the year of the Lord."

- First, concerning the morals and austerity of the said Stephen. Folio 225.
- That, when the aforesaid saint had died and had been translated to another place, and many miracles were being performed through his merits, his successor commanded him not to perform those marvels any longer, or else he would cast his bones into the river. Folio 226.

Chapter XXII

The twenty-second chapter concerns the Carthusian Order, which Bruno the Teuton founded with certain companions in the year of the Lord 1086. It begins, "In the year of the Lord."

- First, concerning Hugh the bishop, the promoter of that order, and his holiness, and concerning Bruno himself. Folio 226.
- Concerning the astonishing miracle of a certain dead doctor who rose upon his bier and said that he was damned, which was the occasion for this religious order. Folio 227.
- Concerning a certain deceased brother of the said order who performed miracles, whom the prior commanded to desist from those miracles. Folio 227.

Chapter XXIII

The twenty-third chapter concerns the Order of the Humiliati, which had its beginning in the year of the Lord 1017. It begins, "In the year."

- First, how it had its beginning and concerning their morals. Folio 227.
- How all the aforesaid monastic religious orders had become relaxed, but around the year of the Lord 1400 they were reformed to some degree. Folio 227 near the end and the following folio.
- Concerning the Order of Saint Bridget, instituted under double monasteries, and concerning others. Folio 228.
- The mendicants, however, who began around the year of the Lord 1200, will be discussed in the last title of this work.

Title XVI

After the narrative in the preceding title concerning the religious orders and holy monks who lived from the year of the Lord 300 until the year 1100, this title resumes the history of the supreme pontiffs, who numbered forty within so great a period, and of the emperors who lived from the year of the Lord 823 until the year 1110, and thus through three hundred years, and so forth; and of the doctors of that time and certain saints; and of the acquisition of the Holy Land by Christians.

Chapter I

The first chapter treats the supreme pontiffs and begins, "From the continuation of the history."

- First, it treats Pope Leo, who crowned Charlemagne emperor, and certain sayings of his. Folio 228.
- Concerning Pope Stephen IV, who went into Francia to Emperor Louis for the affairs of the Church. Folio 229.
- Concerning Pope Paschal I, to whom the body of blessed Cecilia was revealed, and to whom Emperor Louis swore fidelity. Folio 229.
- That he established the celebration of the octave of the Assumption of blessed Mary, repelled the Saracens who entered Italy, and that many bodies of saints were found, exalted, and venerated. Folio 229.
- Concerning Pope Paschal II and certain sayings of his in the Decretals. Folio 229.
- Concerning Pope Eugene II, who, having been blinded by the Romans, was crowned with martyrdom. Folio 229.
- Concerning Pope Valentine, who sat for forty days and, because of the shortness of the time, is omitted by certain writers. Folio 229.
- Concerning Gregory IV, in whose time the Saracens, summoned by certain Romans, entered Italy, but were defeated with the aid of the Lombards and Gauls. Folio 229.
- Concerning Pope Sergius II, under whom it was established that one elected pope should change his name. Folio 230.
- Concerning Pope Leo IV, who was devout and holy. Folio 230.
- Concerning John the Englishman, who nevertheless was a woman, but was detected through her giving birth. Folio 230.
- Concerning Pope Benedict III. When he had been elected, he asked that he not be raised to that dignity. Folio 230 at the end.
- Concerning Pope Nicholas I, in whose time the Bulgars were converted to the faith and the body of Saint Clement was translated at Rome. He excommunicated Lothair, king of Francia, because of adultery. In his time the Greeks divided themselves from the Roman Church through the activity of Pontius [read: Photius], who usurped the patriarchate of Constantinople for himself. And concerning many sayings of Nicholas. Folio 231.

- Concerning his epistles written to diverse persons. Folio 231.
- Concerning Pope Adrian II and his alms. He also assembled a council at Constantinople and, after sending his legates, quieted the schism that had arisen between the Roman and Constantinopolitan churches, Ignatius having been restored and Fortinus [read: Photius] deposed. Folio 232.
- Concerning Pope John VIII, under whom Anastasius, chancellor of the Roman Church, flourished. He was most skilled in both languages, Greek and Latin, and translated the books of Dionysius from Greek into Latin. And concerning several decrees of Pope John himself. Folio 232 near the end.
- Concerning Pope Martin II, in whose time Rollo, duke of the Normans, received the faith together with the Normans. Folio 233.
- Concerning Pope Stephen V and two others who are not commonly placed in the catalogue of pontiffs. Folio 233.
- Concerning Pope Formosus, his expulsion and restoration to his see, and the great scandals that followed therefrom. Folio 233.
- Concerning Pope Boniface VI. Folio 233.
- Concerning Pope Stephen VI, who caused the body of Pope Formosus to be taken from the tomb and, in a council, after it had been clothed in pontifical garb, to be stripped, degraded, and cast into the Tiber. Folio 233.
- Concerning a pope named Romanus. Folio 233.
- Concerning Pope Theodore, who reconciled those ordained by Formosus. Folio 233.
- Concerning Pope John IX, who assembled a council to confirm the ordinations of Formosus and caused the acts of the synod that Stephen had assembled for the condemnation of Formosus to be burned. Folio 233.
- Concerning Pope Benedict IV. Folio 233.
- Concerning Pope Leo V, who was imprisoned by his priest Christopher. Christopher intruded himself into the papacy and, after he had been cast out, was made a monk. Folio 233.
- Concerning Pope Sergius III, who rebuilt the Lateran church after it had been wholly destroyed. Some writers state that the ignominious things against Formosus were done through this Sergius, and add that, when Formosus's body had been found by fishermen and carried upon a bier into the church of Saint Peter, certain images of saints appeared to adore it. Folio 233.
- Concerning Anastasius III. Folio 233.
- Concerning Pope Lando. Folio 233.
- Concerning Pope John X, in whose time the Saracens who entered Italy were defeated, and the Hungarians who entered Italy laid waste Tuscany. John himself was strangled. Folio 233 at the end.
- Concerning Pope Leo VI. Folio 234.
- Concerning Pope Stephen VII. Folio 234.
- Concerning Pope John XI, in whose time a fountain of blood flowed at Genoa, perhaps as a portent, because in that year the Saracens captured the city and despoiled it of its people and treasures. Folio 234.
- Concerning Pope Leo VII. Folio 234.
- Concerning Pope Stephen VIII, who was mutilated by the Romans. Folio 234.
- Concerning Pope Martin III. Folio 234.
- Concerning Pope Agapitus II. Folio 234.
- Concerning John XII, a most wicked man, who became pope by entreaties, gifts, and threats. Reproved by the emperor for notorious unchastity, he fled from the city and was therefore deposed. But, returning to the city by violence, he sought the see again, and at last, while committing adultery, was killed by the devil. Folio 234.
- Concerning Leo VIII, whom the Romans rejected, electing a certain Benedict; but the emperor restored Leo to the see and banished Benedict. Folio 234.
- Concerning John XIII, who was imprisoned by the Romans but was freed by Otto, who severely punished those who had imprisoned him. Folio 234.
- Concerning Benedict VI, in whose time the nation of the Danes was converted. Benedict was captured and strangled. Folio 234.

- Concerning Pope Boniface VI; but according to some writers, Pope Donus is placed before him. While Boniface governed the Roman Church, the Romans made another man pope, called John XIV, who was imprisoned and killed by Boniface. Folio 234 at the end.
- Concerning Pope John XV, a learned man and one experienced in affairs, whom the emperor restored to the see after he had been expelled from the city. Folio 235.
- Concerning Pope Gregory V, whom the Romans cast out, electing another, namely John XVI. But the emperor, after blinding that man, restored Gregory. Folio 235.
- Concerning Pope Sylvester II, a magician and conjurer of demons, who was deceived by the devil in a prediction of the duration of his life, but repented at his death. Folio 235.
- Concerning Pope John XVIII and his successor John XIX, whom certain writers nevertheless do not include, but after Sylvester designate Sergius IV. Folio 235.
- Concerning Pope Benedict VIII. After he had been cast out, a certain man called John XX was made pope. Benedict, however, appeared in punishments after his death because of money wickedly received and asked for the aid of alms. Folio 235.
- Concerning John XX, in whose time the Hungarians, who were idolaters, were converted. Folio 235.
- Concerning Pope Benedict IX. After he had been cast out of the papacy, a certain Sylvester III was made antipope; Sylvester was deposed, and Benedict recovered the papacy. After his death Benedict appeared in the form of a monstrous beast because he had lived bestially. Folio 235 at the end.
- Concerning Gregory VI. Finding the ecclesiastical state greatly oppressed by the robberies of the Romans, he recovered the things taken away, using censures and arms; from this followed the killings of many. When he had fallen ill and the cardinals doubted whether to bury him after death in a church, Gregory, knowing this beforehand, assembled them and showed that he had done it from zeal for justice, which they would be able to perceive from a sign to be manifested at his burial. Folio 236.
- Concerning Pope Clement II, made through force. When he died shortly afterward, Damasus II succeeded him, himself also invading the Apostolic See, but dying within a month. And concerning Leo IX, who succeeded canonically. At his enthronement voices of angels were heard saying, "I think thoughts of peace." Proceeding with a zeal of charity, but not according to knowledge, to war with Teutons against the Normans who occupied Apulia, he was captured with his men, although otherwise he was a holy man. Folio 236.
- Concerning Pope Victor II, who celebrated a universal council at Florence and deposed many bishops because of fornication and simony. Folio 236.
- Concerning Pope Stephen IX, who died within a year and was buried at Florence. After him Benedict X intruded himself through violence; when Benedict yielded the papacy, Nicholas II, who was then bishop of Florence, was canonically appointed. Nicholas celebrated a council at Rome in which Berengar, renowned in holiness and knowledge, abjured his heresy concerning the sacrament of the Eucharist. Folio 237.
- Concerning Alexander II, bishop of Lucca, under whom a schism was made by the bishops of Lombardy, an antipope named Candalus having been appointed; the schism was removed through a council celebrated at Mantua. And concerning Countess Matilda making a donation of her lands to the Church. Folio 237.
- Concerning Gregory VII, his zeal, and his decrees against simoniacs; that, having been imprisoned by the son of the prefect, he was afterward freed; and that he excommunicated Emperor Henry and the bishop of Mainz because of a schism that they were undertaking, and absolved the emperor after he had humbled himself. Folio 237 at the end and the following folio.
- That the same Gregory again excommunicated the emperor because of rights of the Church usurped by him; and concerning the scandal that arose because of the decree against concubinaries. Folio 238.
- Concerning the schism procured by Henry against Gregory, in which a certain Clement was made antipope. On account of this the pope deposed the emperor and made another, namely Rudolf, who was killed by Henry's army. Folio 238.
- Concerning Henry besieging Rome, where Gregory was in the castle of Saint Angelo with the cardinals; Robert, duke of Apulia, freed Gregory. Folio 238.
- Concerning several decrees of Gregory himself on diverse matters in the Decretals. Folio 239.
- Concerning Pope Victor III, poisoned in the Blood of Christ, and the translated body of Saint Nicholas. Folio 239.
- Concerning Pope Urban II, who was made pope from a monk. Henry IV persecuted him, and Urban excommunicated him and also the king of Francia. And concerning a general council first celebrated at Piacenza and afterward at Clermont, where he also caused the Cross to be preached for the recovery of the Holy Land. Folio 239 near the end and the following folio.
- Concerning the decrees of this Urban II. Folio 240.

Chapter II

The second chapter concerns the emperors of the aforesaid period and begins, "After the history of the supreme [pontiffs]."

- First, that Louis I, son of Charlemagne, began to rule the empire in the year of the Lord 814. He had three sons: Lothair, Pippin, and Louis. He was very devout and diligent in divine worship. His sons rose against him and deposed him from the empire, but he was afterward restored. And concerning the great prodigies that then occurred. Folio 241.
- Concerning his firstborn son Lothair, who ruled as emperor after him and divided the kingdom of Francia with his brothers; the dukes of the Bohemians were baptized, and the king of England subjected his kingdom to the Roman Church by tribute. At last Emperor Lothair became a monk. Folio 242.
- Concerning Louis II, son of Lothair, who assumed the empire after his father had died; and Lothair, Louis's brother, committed adultery, because of which he was excommunicated; Basil ruled as emperor in Greece; and Charles, king of Francia, deprived his apostate son of his eyes. Folio 241.
- Concerning the marvels that occurred at that time, namely, thunderbolts, rains of blood, marvelous locusts consuming everything, the harshest cold, and assaults of demons. Folio 242.
- Concerning Charles II, called the Bald, who assumed the empire; the appearance of a comet; inundations of waters; many wars waged by the Franks; and John Scotus, who flourished at that time. Folio 242 near the end and the following folio.
- Concerning Charles III, son of Louis, called the Fat, ruling as emperor, while Basil ruled in Greece. At that time Hubald, skilled in many sciences, flourished. And concerning the body of blessed Martin carried to diverse places, with many miracles. Folio 243.
- Concerning the studies and virtuous acts of the king of England, and how he divided the time of the day: one third, namely eight hours, in reading, writing, and praying; a third in dispatching the affairs of the kingdom; and a third in the care of the body. And concerning his alms. Folio 243.
- Concerning Charles IV, son of Louis, ruling as emperor and crowned by Pope John. In his time the Normans devastated Gaul, and Hugh, son of King Lothair, who sought to reign, was deprived of his eyes and made a monk. Folio 243.
- Concerning the aforesaid King and Emperor Charles IV, seen in punishments with many of his blood relatives, and concerning the punishments of princes in the other life because of evil counsels. Folio 244.
- That the aforesaid Charles was rejected from the empire, and Arnulf, son of King Carloman and his cousin, was raised to the empire; and Gaul was gravely attacked by the Normans, by whom Archbishop Sinderold was martyred. At last the Normans themselves were conquered and became Christians. Folio 244 through the end.
- Concerning Louis IV, who succeeded his father Arnulf in the empire in the year of the Lord 903; Conrad succeeded Louis in the empire. In that time the Saracens, departing from Gaul, occupied Calabria, Apulia, Benevento, and the kingdom of the Romans, and most grievously oppressed Italy; and in the aforesaid Louis the empire in Francia came to an end. Folio 245.
- Concerning Henry I, ruling as emperor in the year of the Lord 920. In his time the Hungarians who were laying waste Francia were killed; the Africans who invaded Italy were defeated; Berengar usurped the kingdom of Italy; and concerning certain portents. Folio 245.
- Concerning Athelstan, king of England, his virtues, and a miracle against perjurers. Folio 245.

Chapter III

The third chapter concerns the three Ottos who ruled successively as emperors and begins with the first Otto.

- First, it contains that under this Otto I the empire was transferred from the Franks to the Germans in the year of the Lord 938, and it has continued until the present year, namely 1471. In his time a holy man, the prince of Bohemia, was killed by Boleslaus, because of which Otto waged war against him for fourteen years. Concerning the heresy of the Anthropomorphites; that in the East Constantine ruled as emperor with his son Romanus; and that Otto freed the king of Francia and obtained many victories. Folio 245 at the end and the following folio.
- That Otto I, emperor, subjected Lotharingia to himself; and concerning a horrible eclipse of the sun. Folio 246.
- Concerning Romanus II, emperor of the Greeks, and his capture, together with many provinces, by the prince of the Persians and Assyrians, who subjected many provinces of the Christians to themselves. Folio 246.
- That Henry, Otto's brother, rebelled against him and was besieged by him in the city of Merseburg; submitting himself to Otto, he sought pardon. The Hungarians entered Italy and received from Berengar, king of Italy, ten modii of coins for their return or departure. Edwy, a most wicked man, reigned in England. Folio 246 at the end.

- That Emperor Otto entered Italy, liberated it from the hands of tyrants, and was crowned at Rome. Pope John XII, being incorrigible because of his crimes, was deposed. Otto, coming again into Italy, punished those who had imprisoned Pope John—not the aforesaid John, but another. Folio 247.
- Concerning the justice observed by Emperor Otto. Entering Italy again, he caused all who had rebelled to be slaughtered at a banquet. He gave four castles to a certain widow whose husband he had caused to be killed on the false allegation of his wife; after the falsehood had been discovered, he caused his wife to be burned. Folio 247.
- Concerning Otto II, son of the first Otto, ruling as emperor. He sought to subject Apulia and Calabria, which belonged to the Greeks, to the Roman Empire, but was defeated. And concerning Saint Medericus. Folio 247 near the end.
- Concerning Otto III, son of the second Otto, ruling as emperor, and concerning Hugh, surnamed Capet, who performed many great deeds. This Otto III caused a certain magician and conjurer of demons named Gilbert to be consecrated pope as Sylvester. Otto himself at last perished by poison. Folio 248.

Chapter IV

The fourth chapter concerns the emperors who were created through election, and first Henry II, duke of Saxony. Under him emperors began to be assumed not through hereditary succession as before, but through election. Seven persons take part in that election: three archbishops who are chancellors, namely the archbishop of Mainz, chancellor of Germany; the archbishop of Trier, chancellor of Gaul; and the archbishop of Cologne, chancellor of Italy; and also four secular princes, namely the king of Bohemia, the duke of Saxony, the margrave of Brandenburg, and the count palatine. It begins, "After Otto."

- First, concerning these electors, by whom this Henry was elected. He and his wife preserved virginity. Under him the nation of the Hungarians was converted to the faith, and a comet appeared, which was followed by famine and universal pestilence. Folio 248 near the end.
- Concerning a certain great miracle against persons dancing in a sacred place; and concerning the common ordeal to which Henry compelled his wife, falsely suspecting her; and concerning the death of Henry himself. Folio 249.
- That the empire was vacant for two years, after which Conrad II was elected. The king of Bohemia wished to rebel against him but could not, and Poland was made tributary to the empire. Rebels in Lombardy were punished by Conrad. Folio 249.
- That Rudolf, king of Burgundy, bequeathed that kingdom to Henry II; and that a certain novel observance concerning certain illicit acts, upon the performance of which peace would follow, was suggested by the devil. Guido of Arezzo was illustrious in music. Folio 249.
- Concerning Emperor Henry III, whose wife, accused of adultery, proved her innocence through the duel of a certain man. Afterward she left her husband and entered the religious life, and her husband married another. On the feast of Pentecost a great quarrel and killing occurred between the members of the emperor's household and the servants of the prelates of the Church, as they contended over the more honorable place in the seating.
- Concerning the great anguish that this emperor experienced when he was ill because he had given a bishopric to a certain man in return for a silver pipe that the man had given him in childhood. Folio 249 at the end.
- That this Henry subjugated the unbelieving Vindelici and led them to the faith. And concerning Robert Guiscard and his virtues, and the body of Pallas found with a burning lamp that was, as it were, inextinguishable. Folio 250.
- Concerning the rebuilding of Jerusalem after its second destruction. Folio 250.
- Concerning the Turks, whence they had their origin, and how they made a king for themselves. Folio 250 at the end and the following folio.

Chapter V

The fifth chapter concerns Emperor Henry IV, established after his father Henry III. He began to rule as emperor in the year of the Lord 1057. It begins, "Henry."

- First, concerning his prosperity in wars, in which he fought sixty-two times. Seduced by evil counsels, he inflicted many persecutions upon the Church and introduced a schism. Folio 251.
- Concerning William, duke of the Normans and son of Robert, who became king of England, and his virtues. Folio 251.
- That Emperor Henry was excommunicated by Gregory VII and deposed from the empire, another emperor having been appointed by the pope. Folio 251 at the end and the following folio.
- That Robert sought to capture Constantinople with a fleet; Nicephorus, emperor of Constantinople, resisted him through Duke Alexius, but Alexius afterward usurped the empire for himself. Folio 252.

- That Emperor Alexius, together with the Greeks, was defeated by Robert. Folio 252.
- Concerning Emperor Henry, who was again excommunicated by Pope Urban because of the investitures of churches; that he twice besieged Florence because it favored the rights of the Church; and concerning marvelous occurrences such as an earthquake, famine, and pestilence. Folio 252 near the end and the following folio.

Chapter VI

The sixth chapter concerns holy bishops and certain kings of England and begins, "Concerning Saint Dunstan."

- First, concerning his marvelous infancy and his morals, and his expulsion from the court of England. Folio 253.
- That, having become a religious, he was tempted but overcame the devil, and afterward became an abbot. Folio 253 through the end.
- That, when called to the episcopate, he refused, but afterward, having been admonished by God, consented. Folio 254.
- Concerning Edwy, king of England, who was deprived of the kingdom because of his crimes; his brother Edgar was made king, and Dunstan delivered the soul of the deceased Edwy from hell. Folio 254.
- That Dunstan, at the insistence of the king of England, who procured this from the pope, was translated from the bishopric of Winchester to the archbishopric of Canterbury. He sharply rebuked that king of England because the king had carnally known, against her will, a girl clothed in the habit of a holy nun. When the king sought pardon, Dunstan imposed upon him as penance that for seven years he should not wear the crown of the kingdom, should fast twice each week, should distribute his treasures to the poor, and should build a monastery of virgins, together with many other things. He humbly performed them all, and otherwise ruled very well. Folio 254.
- Concerning the virtues of the aforesaid King Edgar: that in every year of his reign he built a new monastery; that he compelled five kings assembled at his court to bind themselves to him by a perpetual oath; and that he had a vision concerning things that would occur in England. Folio 254.
- Concerning the constancy of Archbishop Dunstan. He excommunicated a certain earl who had married his own kinswoman and was unwilling to correct himself, and he would not absolve him at the entreaties either of the king or of the pope. He refused to celebrate on the feast of Pentecost unless three counterfeiters of money first had their hands cut off. During that Mass a dove was seen above him. When several magnates wished to retract his sentence against certain clerics whom he had deprived because of crimes, the upper chamber beneath their feet fell and crushed them. Folio 255.
- Concerning Dunstan's prophecy against the royal house; concerning Elfrida, who caused Edward, the son of Edgar, to be killed so that her own son might reign; and concerning Ethelred, an evil king of England who was consumed by lice. Folio 255.
- Concerning Dunstan's passing, his admonition to the people, and his miracles. Folio 255 at the end and the following folio.

Chapter VII

The seventh chapter concerns Elphege, archbishop of Canterbury, and begins, "He flourished."

- First, concerning his noble lineage, his abstinence, and his solitude. He was made bishop of Winchester by a revelation of blessed Andrew the Apostle. Folio 256.
- Concerning his virtues and alms. Going to Rome, he suffered an injury on the journey with the utmost patience. Folio 256.
- Concerning his constancy, the persecution of the Danes, the siege of his city, and the slaughter of human beings, amid which he comforted the people; and concerning his martyrdom and miracles. Folio 256 at the end and the following folio.
- Concerning Ethelred, king of England, and a great intemperance of the air in drought and moisture. Folio 257 near the end.
- Concerning another king of England named Canute; also concerning Edward, king of England; and concerning a marvelous vision of a certain sorceress. Folio 258.
- Concerning certain martyrs, a little child who was martyred, Edmund the king and martyr, and certain holy women. Folio 258.
- Concerning certain marvels of that time: the revealed burning of a certain city, a certain man flying through the air with wings, a monstrous birth, and an appearing comet. Folio 258 at the end and the following folio.

Chapter VIII

The eighth chapter concerns Peter Damian, an Italian distinguished in life and learning, and begins, "In the year of the Lord."

- First, that he composed elegant sermons and certain little works; that he renounced the episcopate, and why; concerning the very harsh penance of a certain Dominicus, who said twelve Psalters within a day and a night while beating himself; concerning saints who renounced the episcopate; and concerning a bishop of Florence punished because of the game of chess. Folio 259.
- Concerning certain marvelous cases narrated by Peter. Folio 259.
- Concerning certain other examples against vices, namely against theft and against neglecting vows and promises. Folio 259 at the end and the following folio.
- Concerning certain other examples of Peter himself. Folio 260.
- Terrifying examples against monks who eat meat, and concerning certain other matters. Folio 260.

Chapter IX

The ninth chapter concerns Hildebert, bishop of Le Mans, and begins, "He flourished."

- First, concerning the tribulations and imprisonment that he endured. Folio 260 near the end.
- Concerning his sentences in verse. Folio 261.
- Concerning the seven acts of the soul, likewise in verse. Folio 261.
- Concerning his devout prayer to the Holy Trinity. Folio 261 near the end.
- Concerning his prayer to Christ, likewise, and concerning the conditions of the city above. Folio 262.

Chapter X

The tenth chapter concerns Lanfranc, prior of the monastery of Bec, and begins, "In the year of the Lord."

- First, that he was originally from Pavia and imbued with every secular science, and that through tribulations he became a monk. Folio 262.
- From being an abbot he became archbishop of Canterbury; when suspected of heresy, he cleared himself. Folio 262.
- Concerning certain deeds of his and how God helped him in a case unjustly brought against him. Folio 262 near the end.

Chapter XI

The eleventh chapter concerns Saint Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, and begins, "Concerning the saint."

- First, how, when he proposed to leave the world, he was tempted by the devil lest he become a monk; and concerning a certain vision of his. Folio 262 at the end and the following folio.
- Concerning certain notable deeds performed by him; how he conducted himself toward his rival; and how children are to be chastised moderately. Folio 263.
- Concerning the books published by him and the likeness of a sinner detained by the devil as a sparrow is detained by a boy. Folio 263.
- Concerning the misery of the human fall and his exhortation to consideration. Folio 263 at the end.
- Concerning the inquiry into the divine power, mercy, and justice of God. Folio 264.
- Concerning the inquiry into the goodness, truth, and eternity of God. Folio 264.
- Concerning the inquiry into the supreme good and full joy according to Anselm himself. Folio 264.
- Concerning a lamentation over the misery of the present life and the future judgment. Folio 264 at the end and the following folio.
- Concerning the invocation of the Son of God and the remembrance of the Passion. Folio 265.
- Concerning a lament over his own fall and future punishment. Folio 265.

Chapter XII

The twelfth chapter concerns Peter Alphonsi, converted from Judaism, who refutes the errors of the Jews through arguments. It begins, "Around the year of the Lord."

- First, concerning the cause of his conversion and the little book composed by him against the errors of the Jews. Folio 265 at the end and the following folio.
- Concerning the errors of the Jews about the simplicity of the Deity, which he refutes through arguments. Folio 266.

- Concerning their error that asserts that God is born and weeps for the Jews, and its refutation. Folio 266 near the end.
- That corporeal things are said of God topically [read: tropically] or figuratively. Folio 266 at the end and the following folio.
- That he proves by physical arguments that God exists and that God created the world in time. Folio 267.
- Concerning the error of the philosophers who say that prime matter has a soul, and concerning the manner of the creation of the planets, elements, animals, and plants. Folio 267.
- Concerning the fables, or rather follies, of the Jews from the book of the Talmud. Folio 267 at the end and the following folio.
- That the cause of the last captivity of the Jews was the Passion of Christ and the obstinacy of their unbelief; because modern Jews imitate that unbelief, they too are punished. They have not been wholly destroyed, so that they may bear witness to the truth of the faith. Folio 267.
- Concerning the final resurrection of the dead from the prophecy of Ezekiel, concerning which the Jews err. Folio 268.
- A refutation of their error by which they assert that those raised must assemble in the Promised Land for temporal uses. Folio 269.
- That the Jews transgress the law in manifold ways; concerning their many errors; and concerning the law of Mohammed, which is most wicked. Folio 269.

Chapter XIII

The thirteenth chapter concerns how Jerusalem was captured by the worshipers of Christ and wrested from the hands of the Turks. It begins, "In the year."

- First, that Godfrey, duke of Lotharingia, captured it with his forces of Christians and was made king of Jerusalem. For three years previously the preparation of the faithful for its capture had been made. For accomplishing this, temporal lords, nobles and ignobles, bishops, monks, clerics, old men, young men, and children set out, coming from Spain, Provence, the Province, Aquitaine, Britain, Scotland, England, Normandy, Francia, Burgundy, Germany, Lombardy, Apulia, and other kingdoms, marked with the sign of the Cross. Their number was estimated at six million. Folio 269 near the end and the following folio.
- A certain Peter the Hermit also came with an army of forty thousand armed men collected from various nations. In their first battle, once and again, one part of them was defeated and killed by the Turks because of their stubbornness and lack of order. Folio 270.
- That discord occurred between the emperor of the Greeks and his men and Godfrey with the forces of the pilgrims, but at last they were reconciled. Folio 270.
- That the army of pilgrims was found to contain six hundred thousand foot soldiers and one hundred thousand mailed horsemen. Besieging Nicaea, a very populous city, they captured it, its Turkish lord having been defeated and put to flight. They then captured Tarsus, the metropolis of the province of Cilicia, expelled the Turks, subjected the whole adjacent region to themselves, and captured the city of Edessa. Folio 270 at the end and the following folio.
- After these cities they captured Antioch, expelling the Turks, and certain other cities. Folio 271.
- How Antioch was captured after a siege of nine months and found empty of people and provisions. In it they found so much gold, silver, and precious stones that those who had previously begged became wealthy. Folio 271 near the end and the following folio.
- That the emperor of the Greeks and his men maliciously signified to armies of the faithful who were coming to their aid that the forces of the Christians had been defeated and scattered, so that he might draw them back from pursuing their journey. Folio 271.
- That the faithful, after many labors, distresses, and a scarcity of provisions, were strengthened by God and, entering battle with the Turks, killed many, put the Turks to flight, and took from them great riches of gold, silver, and precious stones. Folio 272.
- That, when a pestilence came upon the Christian people, nearly fifty thousand failed from disease within a few days. The armies of the Christians set out; before they approached the holy city of Jerusalem, the Turks dwelling there expelled the faithful who were within it from the city after despoiling them. Folio 272.
- That they captured the city of Jerusalem in a very great battle joined with the Turks, strengthened by a sign from heaven. For upon the Mount of Olives a certain soldier, girded with shining arms, appeared to the army of the faithful, which was already weary and, as it were, yielding to the adversaries. The soldier, who afterward did not appear, gave them a sign and exhorted them to return and repeat the assault anew. Strengthened for this, they received victory within the space of one hour; Godfrey was the first to enter. Folio 272 at the end.
- That, when the city of Jerusalem had been captured, the people of the faithful visited the holy places with the greatest joy and pious tears. Godfrey was made king there; and concerning his holy morals and alms. Folio 273.

- That, while Godfrey reigned there, the prince of the Egyptians called the caliph sent a great army against him to drive him out, which Godfrey defeated, many having been killed. When Godfrey himself died, his brother Baldwin succeeded him in the kingdom; and concerning Baldwin's virtues. Folio 273.
- That the western princes sent many forces to aid the faithful who were fighting in the Holy Land. Emperor Alexius of Constantinople, envying the successes of the Latins, sought to draw them back from their journey by falsely reporting their defeat. And concerning the many victories that King Baldwin obtained against the unbelievers. Folio 273.

The fourteenth chapter concerns certain marvelous occurrences and begins, "Around the years."

- First, concerning a certain dead man who appeared to a companion and showed the immensity of the punishments of hell that he suffered in the other life because of the negligence in preaching and in the care of souls that he had exercised. Folio 274.
- Concerning a certain woman who killed her son-in-law because suspicion concerning him had arisen against her. The priest who heard the confession of the penitent woman and revealed it was the cause of her capture and condemnation to the fire; but she was miraculously delivered. Folio 274 near the end.
- Concerning a certain disease of fire that consumed human flesh, from which certain persons died. Folio 275.
- Concerning a certain eleven-year-old boy, a keeper of sheep, who was afflicted with the aforesaid fiery disease; concerning the marvelous vision that he had and his knowledge of the whole of history from the beginning of the world; and that he recited the text of the Gospel rhythmically, as if he were reading in a book. Folio 275.

Title XVII

The seventeenth title contains the deeds of the supreme pontiffs and emperors through one hundred years or thereabouts: namely, from Urban II exclusively, who died around the year of the Lord 1110, until Innocent III, who lived around the year 1200. Within this period there were sixteen supreme pontiffs, several schismatics, and five emperors. The histories of certain saints of that time are also contained, as are the wars waged in the Holy Land.

The first chapter concerns the supreme pontiffs and begins, "Urban II."

- First, it treats Paschal II and the schism in which three antipopes were successively created. This Paschal celebrated a general council at Florence. And concerning Henry's persecution against the Church because of the investitures of prelates. Folio 275.
- That, after the pope had been imprisoned and compelled to concede the investitures of prelates to the emperor, he annulled the concession when he had been freed; and concerning the emperor's undue coronation. Folio 275 near the end and the following folio.
- Concerning Pope Gelasius II, who was imprisoned with many others and, fleeing to Gaeta, was crowned, a certain antipope having been made at Rome. Folio 276.
- Concerning Pope Calixtus II and the antipope Burdinus. Folio 276.
- Concerning the decrees of Calixtus. Folio 276 near the end and the following folio.
- Concerning miracles of blessed James the Apostle, about which Calixtus composed a little book. Folio 277.
- Concerning Pope Honorius II, the illumination of a certain blind man, and an illusion of the devil who appeared in the form of someone having three heads under the appearance of the Trinity. Folio 277.
- Concerning the beginning of the order of the Templar soldiery and miracles performed when relics were brought forth. Folio 277 near the end and the following folio.
- Concerning Pope Innocent II and the schism that occurred through Peter Leonis, the antipope called Anacletus. Folio 278.
- Concerning blessed Bernard showing through miracles the justice of Innocent, and concerning the decrees of Innocent himself. Folio 278.
- Concerning Pope Celestine II and Peter Abelard, a heretic convicted by blessed Bernard. Folio 279 at the beginning.
- Concerning Pope Lucius II, Saint Hildegard, and a vision of hell and paradise received by a certain man. Folio 279.
- Concerning Pope Eugene III, abbot of Saint Anastasius outside Rome, who was elected pope and, when harassed by the Romans, went into Gaul, where he celebrated a council at Reims. And concerning Gilbert of Poitiers, who was convicted as a heretic by blessed Bernard. Folio 279 at the end and the following folio.

- Concerning Pope Anastasius; and concerning Saint Peter, bishop of Tarentaise, and his virtues, especially the manifestation of a certain malicious deed. Folio 280.
- Concerning Pope Adrian and his sayings that declare the misery of the papacy. He excommunicated the king of Sicily. In his time three suns appeared in the western region. Folio 280 through the end.
- Concerning Pope Alexander III and four other antipopes successively created in the schism; the canonization of blessed Bernard; and Saint Thomas of Canterbury setting forth arguments for the right of the Church before the pope. Folio 281 at the beginning.
- Concerning the arguments that Thomas assigns against the customs existing in England contrary to the liberty of the Church, because of which the king persecuted him; and concerning the Venetians, in defense of Alexander, defeating Emperor Frederick in a naval battle. Folio 281.
- Concerning Lucius III, miracles involving the sacrament of the Body of Christ, and Saint Alpais. Folio 281 at the end.
- Concerning Urban III, Abbot Joachim, and his teaching; he prophesied concerning the mendicant orders. Folio 282.
- Concerning Gregory VIII urging the princes to aid the Holy Land; and concerning blessed Peter, abbot of Clairvaux, and his virtues. Folio 282.
- Concerning Clement III, Hugh the Cistercian abbot, and examples concerning confession. Folio 283.
- Concerning Pope Celestine III. Folio 283.

Chapter II

The second chapter concerns Saint Malachy, archbishop, whose life blessed Bernard describes, and begins, "In the time."

- First, a certain proem of Bernard and the legend of Malachy himself. Folio 283.
- Concerning his origin, because he was from Ireland; his ordination as a priest; and his deceased brother's liberation from punishments. Folio 283 near the end.
- Concerning his solicitude in the prelacy and for his native land. Folio 284.
- Concerning his elevation to the archiepiscopate and the intrusion of Maurice into that episcopate against him for five years. Folio 284.
- That Malachy, metropolitan of Ireland, traveled through the regions teaching the peoples. The intruder died miserably. Malachy, possessing the archiepiscopal dignity, went to Rome seeking permission to resign it. Folio 284 through the end.
- Concerning his holy manner of life and preaching. Folio 285.
- Concerning his miracles, and especially the raising of a dead man. Folio 285.
- That he knew the hidden sin of a deacon. Folio 285.
- That he foretold his own death and, returning from the Curia, fell ill in the monastery of Clairvaux and departed to the Lord. Folio 285.

Chapter III

The third chapter concerns Saint Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, and begins, "The saint."

- First, how he was made archbishop of Canterbury and concerning his holiness; and that, when the king of England asked him to observe the customs of that church which were evil, that is, contrary to the liberty of the Church, he consented on the advice of others in order to avoid scandal, but, repenting, revoked his consent. Folio 285 at the end and the following folio.
- That the king of England persecuted him on account of this; he endured exile with his companions for seven years and was at last crowned with martyrdom. Folio 286.
- Concerning his miracles after death. Folio 286.

Chapter IV

The fourth chapter concerns the vision of Tundal concerning hell and paradise and begins, "He relates."

- First, concerning his lineage and condition; good and evil angels appeared to him. Folio 286.
- Concerning the very narrow bridge over which he had to pass and the diverse vices punished in the hell that he saw. Folio 287.
- Concerning the places of glory that he saw. Folio 287.

- A clarification of certain doubts concerning the said vision. Folio 287.

Chapter V

The fifth chapter concerns Saint Bernard and begins, "Blessed."

- First, concerning his origin and parents. While still a layman, on the night of the Nativity he saw a vision of the child Jesus as though then being born from the Virgin; and concerning his temptations in the world. Folio 287.
- Concerning his entrance into the Cistercian religious life. Folio 287.
- That he became an abbot, and concerning his perfection and mortification of the senses. Folio 288.
- Concerning his admonitions and patience in losses, insults, and beatings, and his sister converted by him. Folio 288.
- Concerning his temptation by despair and vainglory, and the rapture of his mind. Folio 288.
- Concerning several notable deeds performed by him. Folio 288.
- Concerning his illness and a rustic servant providing for him. Folio 289.
- Concerning his affliction and infirmity of the stomach. Folio 289.
- Concerning his many miracles, because of which his brother, a religious, rebuked him. Folio 289 near the end and the following folio.
- That blessed Bernard labored greatly by traveling about for the removal of the schism in the time of Innocent II; that the determination and declaration of which man was the true pope was committed to Bernard by the bishops, the king of Apulia, and the king of England; that he recalled the emperor from the schism and rebuked him when he sought the rights of the Church. Folio 290.
- Bernard disputed before the king of Apulia, showing that Innocent was the true pope; Peter of Pisa, who disputed on behalf of the antipope, assented to Bernard's statements. Folio 290 around the end and the following folio.
- Concerning certain notable deeds performed by him, especially that he caused 160 monasteries of his order to be constructed. Folio 291.

Chapter VI

The sixth chapter concerns the emperors and begins, "Now concerning the emperors."

- First, concerning Emperor Henry V, who captured his father, deprived him of the empire, and imprisoned the pope. Folio 291.
- That he returned from Germany into Italy to persecute the pope; his address to the Romans and the response of the Church to Henry. Folio 291 near the end and the following folio.
- War was waged by the Latins against the Greeks in the Holy Land; Tripoli and the city of Sidon were captured by the Christians; the Turks defeated the Christians and were afterward defeated by them; and Baldwin II, king of Jerusalem, died. Folio 292.
- Concerning marvels of that time, namely earthquakes, a rain of blood, an opening of the earth, lightning, whirlwinds, fires, and fiery battle-lines appearing in the sky. Folio 292.
- Under Baldwin II, Alexius, emperor of the Greeks and persecutor of the Latins, died. The unbelievers defeated the worshipers of Christ and killed many. Folio 292.
- King Baldwin was captured and imprisoned. Folio 293.
- That a prince of the Egyptians, coming against the worshipers of Christ, was defeated by them, many having been killed. Folio 293.
- That the duke of the Venetians, proceeding into Syria with a fleet, destroyed an innumerable multitude of unbelievers, captured ten ships laden with the riches of the East, and captured the most noble city of Tyre. King Baldwin was freed from prison, and the Turks were defeated. Folio 293.
- A certain false hermit pretended that he was Emperor Henry, but was discovered. Folio 293.

Chapter VII

The seventh chapter concerns Emperor Lothair and begins, "When he had died."

- First, that the emperor, after he had been elected, proceeded against the rebellious Bohemians and, through treachery, suffered a great slaughter of his men. After restoring Pope Innocent to the city, he died at Verona. Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, also died. Folio 293 at the end.

- Fulk became the fourth king of Jerusalem. He made provision for Antioch, which lacked a lord, and caused a great slaughter of the Turks. Folio 294.
- That Sanguin, prince of the unbelievers, defeated the Christians; that the emperor of Constantinople besieged Antioch but could not obtain it; and that, when the king of England died, great dissension followed in that kingdom. Folio 294 near the end and the following folio.

Chapter VIII

The eighth chapter concerns Emperor Conrad and begins, "After Lothair."

- First, Henry, duke of Bavaria, rebelled against him but was reduced to nothing; and Roger the Sicilian, often repulsed, at last became king of Sicily. Innocent II, proceeding against Roger with forces, was captured by him and reconciled to him. And concerning whence they were called Guelphs. Folio 295.
- That the emperor of Constantinople, proceeding into Syria with forces, died by his own arrow; Baldwin III became king of Jerusalem; and Edessa was captured by the Turks. Folio 295.
- That Eugene III caused the Cross to be preached against the unbelievers by Bernard and others. Emperor Conrad and Louis, king of Francia, taking the Cross, proceeded into Syria; the Greeks deceitfully led them by a bad road, whence the army of the faithful was laid low. Folio 295.
- Concerning the victory of the Franks against the unbelievers. They were afterward defeated through lack of caution, so that the king of Francia scarcely escaped. Folio 296 through the end.
- That the emperor, the king of Francia, and the king of Jerusalem began a war against Damascus, in which certain of the faithful gave treacherous counsel; making no progress, they returned to their own lands. Folio 297.
- That Noradinus [i.e., Nur ad-Din], prince of the unbelievers, proceeded against the worshipers of Christ with an infinite multitude and defeated them, many having been killed. The king of Jerusalem defeated the Turks who came against him. Louis, king of Francia, was captured by the Greeks but was freed; and Emperor Conrad died. Folio 297.

Chapter IX

The ninth chapter concerns Emperor Frederick I and begins, "After the death."

- First, it is said that he descended into Italy with a great multitude and was crowned by Pope Adrian. Thereupon grave enmities arose between Adrian and William, king of Sicily, and Adrian excommunicated William. After a siege of seven years Frederick destroyed Milan, reducing it to the ground; he then translated the bodies of the Magi to Cologne and initiated war against Pope Alexander. Folio 297 at the end and the following folio.
- That Baldwin became the fifth king of Jerusalem; Nur ad-Din, prince of the unbelievers, captured Damascus; and Ascalon was recovered by the Christians. Folio 298.
- Concerning the rashness of the brothers of Saint John of Jerusalem, who quarreled with the patriarch of Jerusalem; and whence the said house of Saint John had its beginning. Folio 298.
- Reynald, prince of Antioch, captured the island of Cyprus; Baldwin, the fifth king of Jerusalem, defeated the unbelievers and afterward perished by poison; and Reynald was captured. Folio 298 near the end and the following folio.
- Amalric became the sixth king of Jerusalem, and the sultan of the unbelievers was defeated and killed. Folio 299.
- Nur ad-Din was defeated together with the Turks, but afterward he defeated and killed the Christians. Folio 299.
- Alexandria was besieged, and the emperor of the Greeks sought to obtain Egypt. Folio 299.
- That the king of Jerusalem freed Cairo, a city of the unbelievers, from a siege after receiving money. Shiracon killed the sultan, and Saladin killed the caliph and made himself lord of Egypt. Folio 300.
- That the emperor of the Greeks crossed into Syria, and there was an earthquake in the eastern regions such as is never read to have occurred; among other cities, it utterly laid Antioch low. Folio 300.
- That the king of Jerusalem went to Constantinople for aid; and concerning a certain nation in Syria called the Assassins, who, when they sought to come to the faith, were prevented by the brothers of the Templar soldiery, their messenger having been killed. Folio 300 near the end and the following folio.
- That Philip was crowned king of Francia and attacked tyrants who oppressed churches; and that, when the Jews in Francia perpetrated enormities against the faithful, they were compelled either to receive baptism or to leave the kingdom after relinquishing their goods. Folio 301.

- That, after Manuel, emperor of the Greeks and friend of the Christians, had died, Andronicus usurped the empire for himself and killed as many Latins as he could, certain of them escaping by galleys. Folio 301 through the end.
- That Baldwin IV, the seventh king of Jerusalem, became a leper; proceeding against the unbelievers, he defeated them. Folio 302 at the beginning.
- That the king of Jerusalem defeated the forces of Saladin but was afterward defeated; and concerning the Maronite heretics converted to the faith. Folio 302.
- Saladin, prince of the unbelievers, after subjecting Mesopotamia to himself, captured the city of Aleppo. The princes of the Christians set out against him, but because dissension arose among them they accomplished little or nothing. Concerning the death of Baldwin, the seventh king of Jerusalem. Folio 302.
- Concerning the wars between the king of Francia and the king of England; and that Emperor Frederick set his son Henry over Italy. Folio 302 at the end and the following folio.
- Saladin, having assembled an infinite multitude of Turks and Saracens, proceeded against the worshipers of Christ, who were defeated by them. In that conflict the bishop of Acre, who carried the Lord's Cross in battle, was gravely wounded. When another man had taken it, he was captured with it, very many having been killed and captured. Folio 303.
- Saladin captured the city of Acre and then Jerusalem in the year 1187. After entering, the Saracens did many shameful things in the churches, but the Turks displayed marvelous veneration toward the Temple of the Lord. Folio 303.
- That the faithful departed from Jerusalem, while Syrians, Maronites, Armenians, and Georgians remained there under tribute. Thereafter the unbelievers captured Ascalon, and Pope Urban III died from grief over this loss. Folio 303 near the end and the following folio.
- The kings of Francia and England, after making peace, prepared themselves for the recovery of the Holy Land, taking the Cross with many others. Emperor Frederick also took the Cross, and Tancred became king of Sicily. The aforesaid emperor and kings therefore undertook the journey to liberate the holy city with many people from diverse nations, especially from Italy with ships and galleys. Among them the Pisans, with a furnished fleet, set out almost first with their archbishop. But when great discord arose between the kings of Francia and England, the work of the journey was delayed. Folio 304.
- Guy, king of Jerusalem, proceeded to battle against Saladin and his men. Although at the beginning they resisted manfully, they were at last defeated and killed by the Saracens. Folio 304.
- Frederick, emperor of the Romans, proceeding against the Saracens in battle, wrought an unheard-of slaughter upon them. After the victory, when on a certain day he was burning with the force of the heat and had gone down to a certain river for the sake of bathing, he was drowned in it, to the irreparable loss of all Christendom. The Germans in those regions were very disorderly in food; finding an abundance of provisions and of all things, while they poured themselves out in feasts they incurred a pestilence through intemperance, so that few remained. Folio 304 near the end.
- That Guy contended with certain persons concerning the kingdom of Jerusalem, asserting that he had been justly and solemnly anointed at Jerusalem and crowned king, and that he ought not to be deposed from the throne of the kingdom. At last he remained king. Folio 305.
- Philip, king of the Franks, desiring to hasten to the aid of the Holy Land, entrusted custody of the kingdom to his mother and to the archbishop of Reims, his maternal uncle, and piously ordained many things to be done during his absence. He undertook the journey and entered the sea; the king of England followed him. While these kings were at the siege of Acre, there was an eclipse of the sun; after a long siege they captured the city. Folio 305.
- When the princes of the Christians deliberated among themselves whether it would be more useful to proceed against Egypt or to recover the city of Jerusalem—to which opinion the greater part assented—the enemy of the human race impeded the undertaking. For he renewed the former discords between the kings of the Franks and English. Because of this, holding one another in suspicion, they returned to their own lands. Folio 305.
- When the city of Acre was captured by the Christians, one of the sultan's admirals, a man of great prudence, counsel, and cunning, was captured among the Saracens. When asked how and by what device the kingdom of Jerusalem might be obtained with less difficulty and preserved in peace, he replied that it was expedient to capture Egypt and, in order to accomplish this, to impede the ships that carry goods to Quadrum and Babylon. Folio 306.
- Before Frederick I set out into Syria, he passed through Florence. Because the Florentines, who held with the Church, did not favor him, he took from them the county as far as the walls. At that time a fire was kindled in Florence which, aided by the wind, burned several buildings; the Old Bridge collapsed because of an inundation of waters. And concerning the civil wars and those waged with their neighbors. Folio 306.
- After Frederick had died, his son Henry VI was created emperor. Having been crowned, he gave the Romans permission and power to destroy Tusculanella utterly. Henry himself entered Apulia in order to subject it to himself but, when a pestilence arose, was compelled to withdraw. At the instigation of the devil, a great war began between the king of Francia and the king of England. Emperor Henry took the kingdom of Sicily by force. Folio 306.

- That Philip, king of the Franks, expelled the Jews from his kingdom because of the reproaches that they committed to the dishonor of the Christian religion, whence many were burned. Folio 307.
- Concerning seven thousand Contarelli who were killed; the dissension that arose between the king of Aragon and the count of Saint-Gilles; the dissension made between the king of the Franks and the count of Flanders; and a certain dead man raised to life. Folio 307.
- Concerning the divorce made between the king of Francia and his wife, and the wars between the king of Francia and the king of England. Folio 307.
- Concerning the efficacious preaching of certain persons, whence great goods followed, and concerning certain marvels. Folio 308.
- King Philip brought the Jews back to Paris and grievously persecuted the churches of God, because of which he suffered great losses in war. A certain cardinal legate, in a certain case, notwithstanding the appeal of the king, to whom he did not defer, after some days commanded that the sentence of excommunication already rendered be published and placed an interdict upon the whole kingdom. Angered by this, the king cast bishops and clerics out of his land and confiscated their goods. He made peace, however, with the king of the English. Folio 308.
- Two cardinal legates were sent into Francia to the king to judge concerning the divorce that had been made, since the king, after dismissing his first wife, had married another. When many and various disputations were held concerning this, the king took Ingeborg, his first wife, with him and departed without greeting the prelates. While King Philip was waging war with the English king, a legate sent by the pope commanded them to make peace, with the justice of each being preserved, and to restore destroyed abbeys and churches to their former state. The king of Francia appealed from his sentence, and the king of Aragon offered his kingdom to the pope. Folio 308.
- Emperor Henry, after he had caused his son Frederick to be elected king of Germany, returned with him to the kingdom of Sicily, where at Messina he closed his final day; his wife, the Empress Constance, remained. Folio 309.

The end. Praise be to God.

Title IX: On Constantine the Great, Emperor

Chapter I

The reign of Constantine

Constantine, therefore, when his father Constantius had died, began to reign in the year of the Lord 309; from the beginning of the world, however, in the year 4,272 according to the lesser computation, but according to the greater computation in the year 5,508. He reigned for 31 years from the death of his father. For he reigned in Gaul for seven years before he cast Maxentius down from the imperial power.

Constantine, moreover, as Jacobus de col. relates, was during the first period of his reign comparable to the best princes. For there were in him innumerable gifts and virtues of mind and body. He was exceedingly desirous of military glory; his fortune in wars was always prosperous, yet in such a way that it did not surpass his industry. He was devoted to civil arts and liberal studies and, besides this, was a seeker after a righteous love, which he sought for himself both by liberality and by affability. And just as he was doubtful in the case of some friends, so in the case of the rest he was excellent, omitting no opportunity by which he might render them wealthier and more illustrious.

Therefore, while Constantine, beloved by all and formidable, was ruling in Gaul, the Roman senate and people, being unable to endure any longer the impiety and crimes of Maxentius, summoned Constantine by messengers so that, mindful of his father, he might come to the aid of the Roman commonwealth and rescue his citizens from the power of so monstrous a beast. Great in spirit, striving to accomplish everything he had resolved in his mind, and at the same time aspiring to the principate of the whole world, he determined to undertake this civil war against Maxentius together with his colleague Licinius, who was then ruling in the regions of Spain. In this encounter, when the sign of the cross had been shown to him, by which he would conquer Maxentius, he defeated [Maxentius] together with his army; Maxentius was drowned in the river at the Milvian Bridge, as was said above.

When Constantine entered the city, he was received by everyone with great glory, and an arch was erected for him. And although he was still an idolater and not yet regenerated in Christ through baptism, after affairs in the city had been settled with Licinius, they together decreed a law in which they extolled the God of the Christians with the fullest praises. They judged him to be the author of all virtue and of the whole undertaking, and [judged] that he had granted the victory over the tyrant Maxentius; and therefore they held that veneration and worship ought to be rendered to him by everyone.

Then, as was said above, Maximinus, who ruled in the East, came against Licinius and was defeated and overcome by Licinius. After Constantine's conversion and baptism, however, Licinius, moved by the passion of envy against Constantine, went to war against him. Licinius was defeated several times and was at last captured and beheaded. Licinius having been cast down, and every remembrance of tyrannical dominion having been removed, Constantine alone obtained firm possession of the Roman realm. He had three sons: Constantius, Constans, and Constantine. He also had a daughter named Constantia.

At that time, indeed, the condition of the commonwealth was maintained with even moderation and with discipline most worthy of the Roman name. It has been recorded with what great devotion on the part of the religious emperor the glory of the churches increased beyond belief, and how great his care was even for the maintenance of the needy. The goodness and tranquillity of present circumstances prevailed to such an extent that they produced forgetfulness of former evils. For by frequent edicts posted in every place, he had not only driven away the tyrannical laws against the Christians, but had also bestowed many privileges upon the churches and the highest honors upon the priests, being greatly beloved by God and men. And the more humbly he subjected himself to God, the more fully God subjected all things to his wishes.

Thus, trusting in divine aid, he attacked the Sarmatians and Goths, barbarian peoples, and with marvelous valor subdued them after they had been conquered in many battles. He then crushed unto destruction, in a single battle, the tyrant Calaterus, who was attempting revolution in Cyprus. Moreover, by divine power he also restrained the Scythians, Gallicanus, a most valiant man, being the commander of his army. For this most savage nation, pouring itself into Roman soil, had invaded with slaughter, plunder, and fire not only the provinces of the Romans but had also besieged the Roman army after it had been driven back, together with Gallicanus, who was then a gentile. But at the urging of Saints John and Paul, who were with him, he made a vow that he would become a Christian if he returned victorious to the emperor with his army unharmed. So great a change suddenly occurred that the barbarians, who excelled both in valor and in number and were superior in the battle, contrary to everyone's expectation subjected themselves and their possessions to Gallicanus, while an angel who had appeared accompanied him. Returning with victory, he received baptism with the greatest devotion.

§ I. Gelasius on the deeds of Blessed Sylvester

Fol. Ir–Iv (PDF pp. 25–26)

Pope Gelasius speaks as follows concerning the deeds of Pope Sylvester, in Distinction XV, Sancta Romana: “Although we do not know the name of the person who wrote the Acts of Blessed Sylvester, Prelate of the Apostolic See, we nevertheless know that it is read by many in the city of Rome, and many churches imitate this in accordance with ancient usage.”

Sylvester was born of a mother who was Justa both in fact and in name. He was instructed by the priest Cirinus and practiced hospitality with the greatest diligence. A certain Christian named Timothy, who was being avoided by others because of the persecution, was received by him as a guest. After a year, Timothy obtained the crown of martyrdom while he was preaching the faith of Christ with the greatest constancy. The prefect Tarquinus, thinking that Timothy had abounded in great riches, demanded them from Sylvester, threatening him with death. But when he discovered that Timothy had not in fact possessed riches of this kind, he ordered Sylvester to sacrifice to the idols; otherwise, on the next day, he would undergo various kinds of torments.

Sylvester said to him: “Fool, this night you will die and receive everlasting torments; whether you wish it or not, you will recognize that the God whom we worship is the true God.” Sylvester was therefore handed over to prison, while Tarquinus was invited to a meal. As he was eating, a fish bone became so lodged in his throat that by no means could he cast it out or swallow it. Thus, having died at midnight, he was carried to the tomb with mourning, while Sylvester was released from prison with rejoicing. Sylvester was loved with marvelous affection not only by Christians but also by pagans. For he was angelic in appearance, polished in speech, whole in body, holy in deed, great in counsel, catholic in faith, most patient in hope, and abounding in charity.

Therefore, when Melchiades, bishop of the city of Rome, had died, Sylvester—resisting exceedingly—was elected supreme pontiff by all the people. He had the names of all orphans, widows, and poor persons written in a register and provided necessities for them all. He established that the fourth and sixth days and the Sabbath were to be observed with fasts, but that the fifth day was to be celebrated as though it were the Lord's Day.

When the Greek Christians said that the Sabbath ought rather to be observed on the fifth day, he replied that this ought not to be done, both because this was a matter of apostolic tradition and because [the Sabbath] was due to the Lord's burial. The Greeks, however, said that there was one Sabbath of the burial, on which a fast was to be observed once in the year. Sylvester said to them: “Just as every Lord's Day is adorned with the glory of the resurrection, so every Sabbath is adorned with the Lord's burial.” They therefore acquiesced concerning the Sabbath, but contended vehemently concerning the fifth day, asserting that it ought not to be associated with Christian solemnities.

Sylvester chiefly demonstrated its dignity in three things: because on this day the Lord ascended into heaven; he instituted the sacrament of his body and blood; and the Church consecrates the sacred chrism. Everyone therefore acquiesced in his arguments.

§ II. Constantine's leprosy, vision, and baptism

Fol. Iv–IIr (PDF pp. 26–27)

While Constantine was persecuting the Christians—or rather, while his officials were doing so—Sylvester departed from the city and remained with his clerics upon a certain mountain. Constantine himself, however, fell under the incurable affliction of leprosy. At length, on the advice of the priests of the idols, 3,000 boys were brought together so that he might have them killed and bathe himself in their fresh and warm blood.

As he was going out to the place where the bath was to be prepared, the mothers of the boys came to meet him, wailing pitiably with their hair let down. Constantine wept, ordered the chariot to stop, raised himself up, and said: “Hear me, companions, fellow soldiers, and all you people who stand here. The dignity of the Roman Empire is born from the fountain of piety, which also gave this law: that whoever killed an infant in war should be subjected to a capital sentence. How great, therefore, will be the cruelty if we do to our own sons what we forbid to be done to those of others? What profit is it to have overcome barbarians if we are overcome by cruelty? For to have overcome foreign nations is the valor of peoples who wage war, but to overcome vices and sins is moral virtue. In those battles, therefore, we proved stronger than they; in these, however, we are stronger than our own selves.

“For whoever has been overcome in this contest obtains victory in being overcome. For the victor is conquered after his triumph if piety is overcome by impiety. Therefore let piety conquer in this encounter. For we shall indeed be able to be victors over all adversaries if we are conquered by piety alone. He proves himself to be lord of all who has shown himself to be the servant of piety. It is therefore better to die while the lives of the innocent remain safe than to recover a cruel life through their destruction. Yet it is uncertain whether that life would be recovered, while it is certain that a life recovered in this manner is cruel.”

He therefore ordered that the boys be returned to their mothers and that very many gifts and innumerable vehicles be provided to them, so that those who had come weeping into a foreign country might return with joy to their own places. The emperor himself then returned to his palace.

On the following night, Peter and Paul appeared to him, saying: “Because you recoiled from the shedding of innocent blood, the Lord Jesus Christ has sent us to give you counsel for the recovery of your health. Therefore summon Bishop Sylvester, who lies hidden near Mount Siraptus. He will show you a pool in which, when you have been immersed three times, you will be cured of every affliction of leprosy. You, in turn, are to make this return to Christ: destroy the temples of the idols, restore the churches of Christ, and henceforth become his worshiper.”

Constantine awoke and immediately sent soldiers to Sylvester. When Sylvester saw the soldiers, he believed that he was being summoned to the palm of martyrdom. Commending himself to God and exhorting his companions to come with him, he was presented fearlessly before Constantine. Constantine rose to meet him and said, “Let us rejoice that you have come well.” After Sylvester had returned his greeting, Constantine related to him in order the vision of his dream.

When Constantine asked who the gods were who had appeared to him, Sylvester answered that they were apostles of Christ and not gods. Then, at the emperor's request, Sylvester ordered images of the apostles to be brought to him. As soon as the emperor saw them, he exclaimed that these were the ones who had appeared to him. Sylvester therefore made him a catechumen, imposed upon him a fast of one week, and directed that the prisons be opened. When Constantine descended into the water of baptism, a marvelous splendor of light flashed forth for him. Thus he emerged from it clean and asserted that he had seen Christ.

On the first day after his baptism, he issued this law: that Christ should be worshiped by the city of Rome as the true God. The second: that anyone who blasphemed Christ should be punished. The third: that whoever did an injury to a Christian should be deprived of half of his goods. The fourth: that just as the emperor was the head at Rome, so the Roman pontiff should be regarded as the head by all the bishops. The fifth: that whoever fled for refuge into a church should be kept immune from everyone. The sixth: that no one should build a church within the walls of any city except with the permission of his bishop. The seventh: that the tithes of the royal possessions should be granted for the building of churches.

The emperor then came to the church of Saint Peter and sorrowfully accused himself of his offenses. Afterward, taking up a two-pronged mattock, he was the first to break ground for the foundation of the basilica that was to be built, and he carried twelve baskets of earth outside upon his own shoulders.

§ III. Helena and the disputation with the twelve Jewish teachers

Fol. IIr–IIIr (PDF pp. 27–29)

When Helena, mother of Constantine Augustus, residing in Bethany, heard these things, she praised her son by letter because he had renounced the images of the idols, but harshly reproached him because, having abandoned the God of the Jews, he worshiped a crucified man as God. Augustus wrote back to his mother that she should bring the teachers of the Jews with her, while he would bring forward the teachers of the Christians, so that the true faith might thus become apparent from their mutual disputation.

Saint Helena therefore brought 141 most learned teachers of the Jews. Among them were twelve who shone above the others in wisdom and eloquence. When Sylvester with his clerics and the aforesaid Jews had assembled together to dispute before the emperor, by common consent they appointed two most wise and approved gentile judges, named Craton and Cenophilus [i.e., Zenophilus], to whom the judgment concerning the things said would belong. This rule was established among them: while one person was standing and putting his question, the other was not to speak.

The first of those twelve, named Abiathar, therefore began and said: “Since these men speak of three gods—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit—it is manifest that they act against the Law, which says, ‘See that I am alone, and let there be no other God besides me.’ Finally, if they say that Christ is God because he performed many signs, in our Law also there were many who performed very many miracles and who nevertheless never dared on that account to claim the name of divinity for themselves, as did that Jesus whom these men adore.”

To this Sylvester replied: “We worship one God, but we do not say that he exists in such solitude that he possesses no joy of a Son. Moreover, from your own books we are able to proclaim to you the Trinity of persons. For we speak of the Father, concerning whom the prophet says, ‘He shall call upon me: You are my Father.’ We speak of the Son, concerning whom the same prophet says, ‘You are my Son,’ and so forth. We speak of the Holy Spirit, concerning whom the same prophet says, ‘By the spirit of his mouth is all their power.’ And that which he also said—‘Let us make man according to our image and likeness’—plainly demonstrates both the plurality of persons and the unity of divinity. Although there are three persons, nevertheless there is one God, which we can demonstrate to some extent by a visible example.”

He took the emperor's purple cloth and made three folds in it, saying: “Behold, you see three folds.” Unfolding it, he said: “Behold, although there are three folds, there is one cloth; so the three persons are one God.”

“Concerning what was said—that one ought not to believe someone to be God on account of miracles, since many saints performed miracles but did not call themselves gods, whereas our Christ wished by this means to assert that he was God—certainly God never allowed those who exalted themselves against him to pass without the most bitter punishment, as is apparent in Dathan and Abiron and in very many others. How, therefore, could he have lied and called himself what he was not, when no punishment followed him for calling himself God, but the effective power of mighty works accompanied him?”

Then the judges said: “It is evident that Abiathar has been overcome by Sylvester. For an argument of this kind also teaches that, if he were not God and had called himself God, he would not have been able to confer life upon the dead.”

When he had been removed, the second, who was also called Jonas, approached the contest and said: “Abraham was justified when he received circumcision from God, and all the sons of Abraham were justified through circumcision. Therefore, he who has not been circumcised will not be justified.”

Sylvester replied: “It is evident that Abraham pleased God before circumcision and was called the friend of God. Therefore, circumcision did not sanctify him; rather, faith and righteousness caused him to please God. He therefore received circumcision not for sanctification but for distinction.”

When he had been overcome, the third, who was also called Godolias, approached and said: “How can your Christ be God, since you assert that he was born, tempted, betrayed, stripped, given gall to drink, bound, and buried, when none of these things can exist in God?”

To this Sylvester replied: “From your books we prove that all these things were foretold concerning Christ. For Isaiah said concerning his birth: ‘Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and his name shall be called Emmanuel,’ and so forth. Concerning his temptation, Zechariah said: ‘I saw Christ, the great priest, standing before the angel, and Satan stood at his right hand,’ and so forth. Concerning his betrayal, the Psalmist said: ‘He who ate my breads magnified supplantation against me.’ Concerning his being stripped, the same said: ‘They divided my garments among themselves.’ Concerning his drink of gall, the same said: ‘They gave me gall for my food,’ and so forth. Concerning his binding, Ezra said: ‘You bound me, not as the father who freed you from the land of Egypt, crying out before the tribunal of the judge.’ Concerning his crucifixion, the same said: ‘You humbled me, hanging me upon the wood; you betrayed me.’ Concerning his burial, Jeremiah said: ‘In his burial the dead come back to life.’” Since Godolias had nothing with which to answer, judgment was given and he was removed.

The fourth, called Annas, approached and said: “This Sylvester affirms that those things which were said concerning others were foretold concerning his own Christ. It therefore remains for him to prove that these things were said concerning his Christ.”

Sylvester answered: “Will you therefore produce another whom a virgin conceived; who was fed with gall, crowned with thorns, crucified, killed, and buried; and who rose and ascended into heaven?” Constantine then said: “If he does not produce another, let him know that he has been overcome.” Since he could not do this, he was removed.

A certain fifth man, Occhi, was brought forward. He said: “If Christ was born from the seed of David, and by being born was made the Son of God because he was born sanctified, he ought not to have been baptized so that he might be sanctified a second time.”

Sylvester replied: “Just as circumcision received its end in Christ's circumcision, so our baptism received the beginning of its sanctification in Christ's baptism. He was therefore baptized not so that he might be sanctified, but so that he might sanctify.” When Occhi remained silent in this way, Constantine said: “Occhi would not remain silent if he had contrary arguments to bring forward.”

Then the sixth, who was also called Cusi, said: “We would like this Sylvester to explain to us the reasons for this virginal birth.”

Sylvester replied: “The earth from which Adam was formed was incorrupt and virginal, because it had not yet opened itself to drink human blood, had not received the curse of thorns, had not held the burial of a dead man, and had not been given to the serpent for food. It was therefore fitting that a new Adam should be made from the Virgin Mary, so that, just as the serpent had overcome one born from a virgin, conversely it might be overcome by one born from a virgin. He who proved the victor over Adam in paradise was himself made the tempter of God in the desert, so that he who had overcome Adam when he ate might be overcome by God when he fasted.”

When this man had been overcome, the seventh, Benjamin, said: “How can your Christ be the Son of God when he could be tempted by the devil, so that at one moment in hunger he was urged to make bread from stones, at another he was raised to the height of the Temple, and at another he was brought to the point of worshiping the devil himself?”

Sylvester replied: “If the devil conquered because he was heeded by Adam when he ate, it is evident that he was overcome because he was despised by Christ when he fasted. We acknowledge that Christ was tempted not insofar as he is God, but insofar as he is man. He was tempted in three ways so that he might shut out all temptations from us and give us a pattern of conquering. For in a man, the temptation of human glory often follows a victory of abstinence; and the appetite for dominion and eminence accompanies the temptation of human glory. Therefore, he is defeated by Christ in these things, so that a pattern of conquering may be given to us."

When this man had been overcome, the eighth, who was also called Acel, said: "It is evident that God is supremely perfect and needs nothing. What need, therefore, did he have to be born in Christ? How, moreover, do you call Christ the Word? This also is evident: before God had a Son, he could not be called Father. Therefore, if he was afterward called the Father of Christ, he was made mutable."

To this Sylvester replied: "Before all times, the Son was begotten from the Father so that he might make the things that did not exist; and in time he was born so that he might restore the things that had perished. Although he could have restored them by his word alone, he could not redeem them through suffering unless he became man, because in his divinity he was not capable of suffering. Nor was the man [a man] of imperfection but of perfection, if he was not passible in his divinity. Moreover, the Son is the Word of God. This is apparent because the prophet said: 'My heart has uttered a good word.' God also was always Father because his Son always existed. For the Son is his Word, his Wisdom, and his Power. The Word was always in the Father, according to the saying, 'My heart has uttered a good word'; Wisdom always [was in him], according to the saying, 'I came forth from the mouth of the Most High, the firstborn before every creature'; Power always [was in him], according to the saying, 'Before all the hills I was brought forth, when the fountains of waters had not yet broken forth,' and so forth. Since, therefore, the Father was never without the Word, Wisdom, and Power, how do you suppose that this name came to him in time?"

When this man had been removed, the ninth, Jubal, said: "It is evident that God does not condemn marriages and did not curse them. Why, therefore, do you deny that the one whom you worship was born from marriage, unless you seek to cast a shadow upon marriages? Again, how is one who is powerful tempted, one who is Power made to suffer, and one who is Life made to die? Finally, you are driven to say that there are two sons: one whom the Father begot and another whom the virgin bore. Again, how can it happen that the man who was assumed suffers without injury to the one by whom he was assumed?"

To these things Sylvester replied: "We do not say that Christ was born from a virgin in order to condemn marriages; rather, we receive on rational grounds the reasons for the virginal birth. Nor are marriages obscured by this assertion; instead, they are adorned, because the virgin who bore Christ was born from a marriage. Christ is tempted so that he might overcome all the temptations of the devil. He suffers so that he might subjugate all passions. He dies so that he might subjugate the dominion of death. Moreover, the Son of God is one: just as he is truly the invisible Son of God, so he is the visible Christ. He is therefore invisible in that he is God, and he is visible in that he is man.

"An example can teach that the assumed man was able to suffer without suffering on the part of the one who assumed him. For—to employ as an example the purple cloth of the king who is present—it was wool, and blood applied to this wool supplied the purple color. When, therefore, it was held by the fingers and twisted into thread, what was being twisted: that which is the color of royal dignity, or that which was wool before it became purple? Man is therefore likened to the wool and God to the purple color; [God] was together with [the man] in the Passion while he suffered upon the cross, but was in no respect subject to suffering."

The tenth, who was also called Thara, said: "That example does not please me, because the color is twisted together with the wool." When everyone contradicted him, Sylvester said: "Then receive another example. When a tree which holds within itself the brightness of the sun is cut, the brightness remains unharmed by the cutting through which the tree receives the blow. Thus, when the man suffered, the divinity was subject to no suffering."

The eleventh, who was also called Sileon, said: "If the prophets foretold these things concerning your Christ, we would like to know the reasons for so great a mockery, suffering, and death."

Sylvester replied: "Christ hungered so that he might restore us. He thirsted for our dryness so that he might minister such cups. He was tempted so that he might free us from temptations. He was seized so that he might release us from the captivity of demons. He was mocked so that he might free us from the mockery of demons. He was bound so that he might loose us from the knot. He was stripped so that his indulgence might cover the nakedness of the first transgression. He received the crown of thorns so that he might restore the lost flowers of paradise. He was suspended upon the wood so that he might condemn the concupiscence engendered at the wood. He was given gall and vinegar to drink so that he might bring man, who was flowing down toward the earth, into [the land of] milk and honey, and might open honey-flowing fountains for us. He assumed mortality so that he might give us his immortality. He was buried so that he might bless the burial of the saints. He rose so that he might restore life to the dead. He ascended into heaven so that he might open the gate of heaven. He sits at the right hand of God so that he might hear the prayers of believers." As Sylvester continued with these things, everyone—the emperor, the judges, and the Jews alike—burst out with one accord in praise of Sylvester.

Then the twelfth, who was also called Zambri, became angry and said with great indignation: "I marvel that you, most wise judges, believe circumlocutions of words and think that the omnipotence of God can be comprehended by human reason. But now let words cease, and let us come to deeds. For those who worship one who was crucified are most foolish. Since I know the name of almighty God—whose power rocks cannot endure and which no creature is able to hear—let a most ferocious bull be brought to me so that you may prove that I speak the truth. When that name has sounded in its ear, the bull will immediately die."

Sylvester said to him: "And how did you learn this name by hearing it?" Zambri said: "It is not for you to know this mystery, since you are an enemy of the Jews." A most ferocious bull was therefore brought forward, dragged with difficulty by 100 very strong men. But when Zambri uttered the word in its ear, the bull immediately bellowed, rolled out its eyes, and expired. All the Jews therefore shouted vehemently and insulted Sylvester, the man of God.

Sylvester said to them: "He did not utter the name of God, but named the worst of demons. For my God, Jesus Christ, not only does not put the living to death but even gives life to the dead. For to be able to kill but not to give life belongs to lions, serpents, and wild beasts. Therefore, if he wishes me to believe that it was not the name of a demon, let him speak it again and give life to what he killed. For it is written concerning [God], 'I shall kill, and I shall make alive.' If he cannot do this, without doubt he named a demon, which can kill a living thing but cannot give life to a dead one."

When Zambri was pressed by the judges to raise the bull, he said: "Let Sylvester raise it, and we shall all believe in him. For even if it could fly with wings, that would nevertheless not avail very much." All the Jews therefore promised that they would believe in Sylvester if he raised it.

Then Sylvester prayed, placed himself close to the bull's ear, and said: "O name of curse and death, come forth at the command of our God Jesus Christ, in whose name it is said to you: Bull, arise and return tamely to your herd." The bull immediately arose and departed with all tameness. Then the queen, the Jews, the judges, and all the others were converted to the faith.

The dragon and the death of Blessed Sylvester

Fol. IIIr (PDF p. 29)

After several days, the priests of the idols came to the emperor and said: "Most sacred emperor, since you received the faith of Christ, that dragon which is in the pit has killed more than 300 people every day with its breath." When Sylvester was consulted about this, he replied: "By the power of Christ, I shall cause it to cease from every injury." The priests promised that they would believe if he did this.

While Sylvester was praying, Saint Peter appeared to him and said: "Descend without fear to the dragon, you and the two priests who are with you. When you come to it, you shall address it in this manner: 'Our Lord Jesus Christ, born of a virgin, crucified and buried, who rose and sits at the right hand of the Father, is to come here to judge the living and the dead. You also, Satan, await him in this place until he comes.' You shall bind its mouth with a cord and seal it from above with a ring bearing the sign of the cross. Afterward, you will come to me safe and unharmed and will eat the bread that I shall prepare for you."

Accordingly, Sylvester descended into the pit with two priests by 150 steps, carrying two lanterns with him. He then spoke the aforesaid words to the dragon and, as he had been commanded, bound its mouth while it gnashed and hissed. He ascended and found two magicians who had followed him to see whether he would descend all the way to the dragon. They were almost dead from the dragon's stench, but he brought them back with him unharmed and well. They were immediately converted together with an innumerable multitude. Thus the Roman people were freed from a twofold death: namely, from the worship of the demon and from the dragon's poison.

At length, as Blessed Sylvester approached death, he admonished the clergy concerning three things: namely, that they should have charity among themselves, govern their churches more diligently, and guard the flock from the bites of wolves. After this, he fell happily asleep in God around the year of the Lord 320.

Fol. IIIr (PDF p. 29)

Rufinus relates the finding of the Holy Cross in this manner in the Ecclesiastical History. During the same time, Helena, the mother of Constantine—a woman of incomparable faith, religious disposition, and singular magnificence, whose son Constantine indeed was—was admonished by divine visions and went to Jerusalem. There she inquired of the inhabitants concerning the place in which the most sacred body of Christ, affixed to the gibbet, had hung. This place was difficult to find because the ancient persecutors had fixed an image of Venus upon it, so that if any Christian wished to worship in that place, he would appear to worship Venus. For this reason, the place had become unfrequented and had almost been given over to oblivion.

But when, as we said above, the religious woman had hastened to the place designated for her by a heavenly judgment, she removed everything profane and polluted from it, cleared away the rubble to a great depth, and found three crosses lying in confused order. But uncertainty over the distinctive identity of each cross disturbed the joy produced by the gift that had been found. The inscription that had been written by Pilate in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew letters was indeed also present, but even it did not demonstrate with sufficient clarity the identifying marks of the Lord's gibbet. At this point the uncertainty of human doubt demanded divine testimony.

It happened that in the same city a certain leading woman of that place lay half-dead, exhausted by a grave illness. At that time Macharius was bishop of that church. When he saw the queen hesitating, together with everyone else who was present, he said: “Bring here all the crosses that have been found, and God will now reveal to us which is the one that bore the Lord.” Entering with the queen and the people to the woman who was lying ill, he knelt down and poured forth to the Lord a prayer of this kind:

“You, O Lord, who through your only-begotten Son deigned to confer salvation upon the human race through the Passion of the cross, and who now in these last times have inspired within the heart of your handmaid the search for the blessed wood upon which our salvation hung: show plainly which of these three crosses was for the Lord's glory and which were for the punishment of slaves, so that this woman who lies half-alive may, as soon as the saving wood touches her, be recalled from the gate of death to life.”

When he had said these things, he first applied one of the three crosses, and it brought no benefit. He applied the second, and not even then was anything accomplished. But when he took the third, the woman suddenly opened her eyes and rose. The firmness of her strength having been restored, she began to run throughout the whole house and magnify the power of the Lord, much more joyful than she had been while healthy.

Thus, by this evident judgment, the queen obtained the fulfillment of her vow. With royal magnificence, she constructed a marvelous church in the place where she had found the cross. She carried to her son the nails with which the Lord's body had been fastened. From some of them he made bits for bridles which he would use in war, and from others he is likewise said to have furnished a helmet suitable for the purposes of war. She delivered a portion of the saving wood itself to her son; another portion, enclosed in silver cases, she left in that place, where it is preserved even now in solicitous veneration as a memorial.

The venerable queen also left this token of her religious disposition: she is said to have invited to a meal the virgins consecrated to God whom she found there, and to have attended upon them with such devotion that she thought it unworthy to employ the services of servants. Instead, clothed in the short-girded dress of a maidservant, she herself placed food before them with her own hands, offered them the cup, poured water upon their hands, and—though queen of the world and mother of the empire—accounted herself a handmaid of the handmaids of Christ. These things, indeed, were done at Jerusalem.

Title IX: On Constantine the Great, Emperor

Chapter II: The Supreme Pontiffs from Constantine to Arcadius and Honorius

Chapter heading and Sylvester

The supreme pontiffs who presided over the Roman Church from the time of Constantine the Great down to the times of Arcadius and Honorius—that is, for 100 years or thereabouts, from the year of the Lord 309 down to the year 413—were those written below.

Pope Sylvester, of whom an account has been given, had succeeded Melchiades. This Sylvester occupied the chair of Peter for 24 years, ten months, and eleven days. Sylvester instituted the solemn consecrations of churches and altars, and he is said to have consecrated the churches of the apostles Peter and Paul. This appears much more strongly in the case of the church of Saint John Lateran, which is the patriarchal and principal church of the whole world.

For he established that the celebration should take place upon a clean sindon, a linen cloth—that is, a pall or corporal. In a synod he also decreed the following, as is contained in Distinction 93, A subdiacono: “From the subdeacon down to the lector, let all be subject to the cardinal deacon, a most reverend man, showing him honor in the church. Moreover, in every place, whether in public or in the bosom of the Church, let the priest show obedience to the pontiff; the deacon to the priest; the subdeacon to the deacon; the acolyte to the subdeacon; the exorcist to the acolyte; the lector to the exorcist; the doorkeeper to the lector; the abbot to the doorkeeper; and the monk to the abbot.”

Marcus

Pope Marcus, a Roman by nation, succeeded Sylvester. He established that the Roman pontiff should be consecrated by the bishop of Ostia and that the bishop of Ostia himself should use the pallium. He sat for two years and eight months, a holy man.

Julius

After him Julius, a Roman by nation, ascended the chair of Peter. According to Damasus, he sat for eleven years, but according to Jerome, for sixteen years and four months. In his time the Nicene synod is said to have been celebrated, although others say that it was under Sylvester. After enduring many contests and exile at the hands of the Arians for the catholic faith, he migrated to Christ in the twelfth year of the reign of Constantius.

In his decrees he says as follows: “The aforesaid privileges were granted by God to this holy see, both concerning the convocation of councils, judgments, and the restoration of bishops, and concerning the greatest affairs of the churches, so that all who are oppressed may receive assistance from it, and even those justly condemned may receive restoration.” II, Question VI, Adeo. The same author, in the same Question: “He who knows that he has been placed over others has believed that his deputies ought to be granted to the churches, so that they may be called to a share of the solicitude, not to the fullness of power.”

The same author, writing to the eastern bishops in Distinction XVII, says: “Your rule has no force and will not be able to have any, because this council was neither celebrated by orthodox bishops nor attended by a legate of the Roman Church, while the canons command that councils ought not to be held without its authority.”

The same Julius, II, Question VII: “It was established in the holy Nicene synod that no one who has been anathematized should be received as our accuser, nor those who wish to receive us as their accused, since we know that we have been appointed by the Lord over them, and not they over us. And just as a greater cannot be judged by a lesser, neither can he be made a colleague [read: bound] by one, because everything that is great is rare. We bear the burdens of all who are oppressed; indeed, Blessed Peter, whose office we discharge, bears these things in us.”

Liberius and Felix

When Julius had now entered upon the way of all flesh, Liberius, a Roman by nation, was created high priest. He presided over the Church for ten years, six months, and four days. He was sent into exile by the emperor Constantius because he refused to assent to the Arians and favor that heresy. Having assembled the clergy, on their advice he either, together with the others, elected the venerable priest Felix and proclaimed him pontiff, or appointed Felix himself as his general vicar.

While Liberius was in exile, Felix, inflamed with zeal for the faith, assembled a council of forty bishops and condemned the priests Ursatius and Valens, who favored Constantius in the Arian heresy. He also excommunicated the emperor Constantius himself as a heretic and one rebaptized. Constantius, angered for this reason, assembled a conventicle of many persons from the dregs of the Arians, caused Liberius to be recalled from exile, and caused Felix to be cast from the pontifical chair. Shortly after he had been expelled, Felix was crowned with martyrdom by Constantius's command.

Liberius therefore returned, worn down by the exile in which he had spent three years, and at the demand of Constantius subscribed by consenting to the heretical depravity of the Arians. Afterward, he occupied the chair of Peter for seven years. During his time there was a great persecution by the Arians against the true catholics in the city of Rome.

This Liberius established as follows, XXIV, Question I: “Those who are against the peace of the Church, if they possess a dignity or the belt of military service, are to be stripped of them. If they are private persons and are noble, let them suffer the confiscation of their property. If they are of low birth, let them not only be beaten in body but also punished with perpetual exile.”

Damasus

When Liberius had died, Damasus, a Spaniard by nation, a holy man and very learned in the Scriptures, undertook the government of the Church of God. He occupied the chair of Peter for seventeen years, seven months, and ten days. At that time, a certain Roman called Ursinus was improperly elected pope by some persons. But as an intruder he was expelled from the city by the supporters of Damasus, who had been canonically appointed; and by the will of Damasus he was made bishop of Naples.

Damasus diligently sought out many bodies of martyrs and buried them honorably. He himself was also accused of adultery by some persons out of envious zeal, as Jerome relates. But before his adversaries he cleared himself with forty-two bishops and showed himself innocent, as is contained in II, Question VII, Si quis super his, in the preceding paragraph. For this reason, the fathers expelled his accusers Concordius and Calixtus from the Church and condemned them.

As Sigibertus relates, at Jerome's request Damasus established that at the end of a psalm in church there should be said: “Glory to the Father. As it was,” and so forth. He also instituted the singing of psalms in church by night and day.

Among other things, in his decrees he established the following, IV, Question IV, Nullus: “Let accusers and judges not be the same persons. Rather, let the accusers, judges, witnesses, and accused each be distinct, every person in his own order. Let a formal written accusation always be made so that the calumniator may receive the law of retaliation, because before a formal accusation no one ought to be judged or condemned, since the secular laws also maintain this.”

The same author established as follows in V, Question II, Relatum: “The secular laws require accusers to be present, and not absent persons [appearing] through writings. Hence the canonical ordinances of the fathers proclaim, not once but very often, that no one can bring forward accusations or testimony through writings. Nor may anyone give testimony concerning other affairs except those which are known to have been transacted in their presence. Likewise, one who chooses to accuse another must be present and accuse in person, not through another, after first submitting the formal accusation. Nor may anyone ever be judged until he has his accusers present and receives an opportunity to defend himself in order to clear away the charges.” These are his words.

The same author says in XXIV, Question I, Violatores: “Those who, not compelled by necessity but willingly—that is, out of contempt—either act insolently in some matter against the sacred canons, presume to speak, or freely consent to those wishing to do such a thing, appear not unfittingly to blaspheme the Holy Spirit. For such presumption is one kind of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, because it acts against him by whose impulse and grace [the canons] were issued.”

In the time of this Damasus, and in the time of the emperor Theodosius, a universal synod of 350 bishops was celebrated. In it the heresy of Macedonius, which denied that the Holy Spirit is God, was condemned.

Siricius

After Damasus migrated to the Lord, Siricius, a Roman by nation, was raised to the summit of the supreme pontificate. He held it for fifteen years, eleven months, and twenty-five days. He banished the Manichaean heretics into exile and commanded that the faithful should not have communion with them.

He also imposed continence upon deacons and those married clerics above them—that is, with respect to the use of a marriage contracted before ordination—and this upon those in the West; for the Eastern Church did not receive that constitution, as in Distinction LXXXII, Plurimos. He also established the intervals to be observed in receiving orders, Distinction LXXVII, Quicumque, although these are not observed today. He likewise established that the following should be said in the Mass: “Communicating and venerating the memory,” and so forth, as I have found in De consecratione, Distinction I.

Anastasius

When Siricius died, Anastasius, a Roman by nation, was created bishop of the city and of the world, occupying the see for three years and twenty-five days. He made the following decree, saying in De consecratione, Distinction I: “By apostolic authority we command that, while the holy Gospel readings are read in church, the priests and everyone else—not sitting, but reverently bowed and standing in the presence of the Gospel—should listen attentively to the words of the Lord and faithfully adore them.”

Innocent I

After Anastasius, Innocent I, Alban by birth [i.e., from Albano], held the papacy for fifteen years, two months, and twenty days. He condemned the heresiarch Pelagius, who asserted that human beings could be saved without grace through their own merits and works, together with his accomplices and followers Celestinus [read: Caelestius] and Julianus.

This Innocent also excommunicated the emperor Arcadius because he consented to and ordained that John Chrysostom should be driven from his see of Constantinople by a council of bishops. You have a full account of this below, in the following title.

Innocent established that a fast should be observed on Saturday because on that day the Lord Jesus lay in the tomb and the apostles are believed to have fasted, De consecratione, Distinction III, Sabbato. At present, however, this is a counsel and not a precept. He also decreed that the kiss of peace should be given in the Mass. He likewise confirmed Pope Siricius's constitution concerning the continence of clerics, Distinction LXXXII, chapter Proposuisti. “Let no one presume to ordain a cleric from another church unless that cleric's bishop, having been entreated with prayers, is willing to grant permission,” Distinction LXXI.

Zosimus I

Zosimus I succeeded Innocent and sat for two years, eight months, and twenty-five days. He established that the candle should be blessed in church on Holy Saturday, that a slave should not be ordained, and that a cleric should not minister in a tavern.

He reproved the ordination of unsuitable and inexperienced men into the clergy, saying: “The excessive laxity of our fellow priests causes this. They seek the display of a multitude and suppose that from this crowd some dignity is acquired for themselves. Hence a numerous plurality is found everywhere, even in those places where there is solitude, because they desire to extend parishes or lavish divine honors upon those to whom they can furnish nothing else. It is necessary that this always be a matter of strict judgment. For everything that is great is rare.” Distinction LIX, chapter II.

Title IX: On Constantine the Great, Emperor

Chapter III: On the Nicene Council Convened under Constantine against the Heresy Introduced by Arius

Arius and the convocation of the council

On the Nicene council convened under Constantine against the heresy introduced by Arius.

When Alexander had assumed the episcopal office at Alexandria after Achillas, who had succeeded Peter the martyr, as was said above, prosperity was disturbed by domestic contention, because there was peace and rest from persecutions for our people and the Church was rejoicing in the merits of the confessors. For, as Rufinus says in book X of the Ecclesiastical History, a certain priest at Alexandria named Arius, religious indeed in appearance but wickedly desirous of glory, praise, and novelty, began to put forward certain perverse things concerning the faith of Christ and to separate the Son from the substance of the Father. For he preached, as Hugh of Fleury says, that the Son of God was a creature and that the Holy Spirit was created by him, adding also: "There was [a time] when he was not." And when Arius made these distinctions between the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, Alexander, bishop of the same city, resisted him. But when he could not recall him from his deadly error, he expelled him from the holy Church. Arius, however, stirred up sedition against him.

When the pious prince Constantine heard this, he caused a holy synod to be assembled at Nicaea, a city of Bithynia, in the year of the Lord's incarnation 316. Three hundred and eighteen bishops assembled there. And this is the first universal synod. Sylvester, however, had already died, and Marcus had succeeded him. Julius had in turn succeeded Marcus, and at that time he occupied the apostolic see. Nevertheless, Julius himself did not attend this council because of the frailty of old age; but Vitus and Vincentius, priests of the Roman Church, attended in his place. Macarius of Jerusalem, Eustachius of Antioch, and Alexander of Alexandria, honorable patriarchs from the apostolic sees, also attended. Thus far he.

But Vincent adds in book XIV of the Historical Mirror that Sylvester is found elsewhere to have attended the said council. For in the Book of the Pontiffs it is read as follows: "In the time of Sylvester a council was held by his command at Nicaea in Bithynia. Three hundred and eighteen bishops were assembled, who set forth the integral catholic faith and condemned Arius, Fotinus, and Sabellius. But in the city of Rome Sylvester himself, with the counsel of the Augustus, assembled 277 bishops, and they again condemned Calixtus and the aforesaid heretics." The same Eusebius asserts in his chronicle that Pope Sylvester, by the counsel of Constantine, assembled 277 bishops in the city, in which council the same heresy was condemned. But some wonder that Damasus should assert in his chronicle-that is, the chronicle of the pontiffs-that the synod at Nicaea was assembled under blessed Pope Sylvester. And in Distinction XV, chapter X, it is said from the words of Isidore, Gregory, and Gelasius that the said Nicene council was celebrated under Constantine. But nothing is said about under which pope it was held, except that Bede, in the book On Times, says that the Nicene synod was celebrated in the time of Pope Julius, Distinction XVI, Sextam. But in the following paragraph, which begins Prima, it is said to have been in the time of Sylvester.

The Nicene profession of faith and the danger of Arianism

Therefore, as Rufinus says in the place cited above, when the fathers had assembled in council and the assertions of Arius had been examined, after a long and extensive discussion it pleased them all, and it was decreed as if by the single mouth and heart of everyone, that homousion ought to be written-that is, that the Son ought to be confessed as being of the same substance as the Father. It is said that at that time there were only seventeen to whom the faith of Arius was more pleasing. Of these, only six allowed themselves to be expelled with Arius; the remaining eleven, having taken counsel among themselves, consented to subscribe with their hands but not with their minds. The principal author of this dissimulation was Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia.

The form of the profession of faith of those who were catholic there is as follows: "We believe in one God, the Father almighty, maker of all things visible and invisible. And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the only-begotten born from the Father-that is, from the substance of the Father; God from God, light from light, true God from true God; begotten, not made; homousion with the Father-that is, of the same substance as the Father; through whom all things were made; who for us and for our salvation descended from heaven and was incarnate, having been made man," and so forth. "But those who say, 'There was once [a time] when he was not,' and, 'Before he was born, he was not,' and those who say that he was made from no existing substances, or that he is from another subsistence or substance, or that the Son of God is convertible or mutable, the catholic and apostolic Church anathematizes."

Here it must be noted that this Arian heresy was more dangerous, more universal, and almost more enduring than the others. It was more dangerous because it concerned the mystery of the Trinity, concerning which Augustine says in the book On the Trinity that nothing more difficult is investigated, nowhere is error more dangerous, and nothing more fruitful is found. It was more universal because it involved many bishops and priests, and Pope Liberius himself, as will appear below; emperors, such as Constantius and Valens; kings, such as Theodoric and the king of the Goths; and it was diffused throughout almost the whole world. Hence Jerome says: “Arius was one spark”-that is, of error-“in Alexandria; and because it was not quickly extinguished, its flame laid waste the whole world,” XXIV, Question III, Resecandae. It was indeed more enduring because it flourished through many periods. But the said heresy was refuted and destroyed by the doctors, not only through very many authorities of Scripture and through the opinions and reasonings of very many doctors, but also through many miracles, which are not found to have been performed by any of the Arians.

And as for the statement that this Nicene synod was the first general synod, it is true not absolutely-because other councils had also been celebrated earlier, as is evident above-but in a qualified respect: that is, because it was more universal than the other synods, because many more persons came together there, with the emperor consulting and urging and the pope giving authority. And there some things were added to the shorter creed, which is said to have been issued by the apostles. These things were not contrary to what was in it, but declared it more explicitly against the heresies arising concerning those articles. Such was the phrase “Creator of heaven and earth, of things visible and invisible,” against the error of Manichaeus, who taught that God was the creator of invisible things and the devil the creator of visible things. And the phrase “born from the Father”-namely, the Son-“before all ages, God from God,” and so forth, “begotten, not made, consubstantial with the Father, through whom all things were made,” was added against the error of that accursed Arius, who asserted that the Son of God was a creature made by the Father, neither eternal nor consubstantial with the Father, but of a substance different from the Father and less than the Father. And he said the same concerning the Holy Spirit.

How much harm the Arian pest itself brought upon the Church was shown not only to Peter, bishop of Alexandria and martyr, concerning whom it was shown above in a vision and prophetic revelation, but also by blessed Antony. Antony, placed like a burning and shining lamp upon the lampstand of the Church, lived in the time of this Constantine, from whom he-that is, Antony-received letters commending Constantine himself and his sons to Antony's prayers. Antony himself gave the emperor most gracious and venerable letters in reply, admonishing him to preserve humility and to execute justice in all things.

For once, while he was working with the brothers, he looked up into heaven and saw a sorrowful vision. Therefore, prostrating himself before God, he prayed that God would avert the crime to come. While all who stood by trembled and asked him to explain the vision, he, hindered by sobs and tears, told them that a great wickedness, unheard of in the ages, was imminent. “I saw,” he said, “the altar of God surrounded by a multitude of mules, which were scattering everything with their hoofs; and that by this great whirlwind the catholic faith would be overthrown, and men like beasts of burden would plunder the sacred things of Christ. This is the cause of my groans.” When these things had been heard, a voice came from heaven, saying: “My altar will be made abominable.” And so it happened. For after two years, when the Arians burst forth, the Church was subjected to so great a devastation that virgins and married women and the baptistery itself were defiled, and true Christians were slaughtered like sheep before the altar.

Section I: Moral decrees of the Nicene council

In addition to the rule of faith handed down, certain moral decrees or constitutions, chiefly concerning the clergy, were issued in the said Nicene council. For, as Rufinus says in the place cited above, they established that it was to be observed in the churches that no one among those who cut themselves because of an inability to endure lust should enter the clergy, Distinction LV, Si quis. Likewise, no one newly taken from a gentile life or manner of living, after receiving baptism, should become a cleric before he is examined more carefully, Distinction XLVIII, chapter Quoniam. Likewise, no bishop or other cleric should live with women unrelated to him, except with a mother, sister, or grandmother, or persons who are relations of this kind, Distinction XXXII, Interdixit. Likewise, a bishop, if it can be done, should be ordained by the bishops of the entire province; and if this is difficult, by no fewer than three, but in such a way that above all the presence or authority of the metropolitan bishop is secured, Distinction LXVI, Porro, and Distinction LXIV, Illud.

Likewise, if one bishop has expelled someone from the Church, whether a cleric or a layman, another bishop is not to receive him. But lest there be no remedy if this was done unjustly because of some anger or contention, as is wont to happen, they decree that each year in the individual provinces councils ought to be held for a second time by all the provincial bishops and affairs of this kind ought to be adjudicated, so that if perhaps something was done unjustly by one, it may be corrected by the others; if it was done rightly, it may be confirmed by all, Distinction XVIII, Habeatur. Likewise, no cleric who, having abandoned his church when no reasonable cause exists, wanders and strays about should be received into communion by other churches. Likewise, no one, surreptitiously taking a man who belongs to another, is to ordain him as a cleric in his own church without the consent of the one to whom he belongs, Distinction LXXI, Si quis.

Likewise, deacons are not to be preferred to bishops, nor are they to sit in the assembly of the priests or distribute the Eucharist while priests are present, but are only to minister while the priests perform [the rite]. If, however, no priest is present, then they are permitted also to distribute it, Distinction XCIII, Pervenit. Likewise, as is contained in Distinction XLVII, Quoniam, it is established from the Nicene council that a cleric who is found taking usury is to be cast out of the clergy. Likewise, in On Consecration, Distinction III, it is said from the Nicene council: “It was resolved that all churches should fast except on Sundays.” Likewise, consecrated churches are not to be consecrated again, just as one who has been baptized is not to be baptized again, provided that those who consecrated or baptized held the faith of the Holy Trinity, Distinction LXVIII, Ecclesiis-that is, provided that they observed the required form. Hence the Arians, who said, “I baptize you in the name of the greater Father and the lesser Son,” and so forth, did not baptize.

It must also be known that seventy chapters of constitutions were issued at the Nicene synod, as Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, says in Distinction XVI, Septuaginta. But only twenty remained in the Roman Church, as is said in the following paragraph and chapter. The other chapters either passed out of use through neglect or were incorporated or renewed in the council of Antioch or another council.

Likewise, what is contained in the Tripartite History and is placed in Distinction XXXI must be noted with great care: “The Nicene synod, wishing to correct the life of persons dwelling in the churches, established laws which we call canons. In the discussion of these, it seemed good to some to introduce a law that bishops, priests, deacons, and subdeacons should not sleep with the wives whom they had married before consecration. But the confessor Pannutius rose and spoke against it, confessing marriage to be honorable and saying that lying with one's own wife was chastity. He urged the council not to establish such a law, asserting that the matter was burdensome and would become an occasion of fornication either for the men themselves or for their spouses. Pannutius set forth these things although he himself was inexperienced in marriage. The synod praised his opinion and established nothing in this respect, but left it to the will of each person.” Thus far there.

But for a fuller explanation of this matter-namely, concerning the continence of clerics with respect to marriage-the gloss upon the chapter Diaconi in Distinction XXVIII must be considered carefully. There it is said that, in both the Eastern and Western Church, marriage is lawfully contracted by those established in the minor orders, as in Distinction XXXII, Si quis eorum. But it was never lawful for those established in the higher orders-that is, the subdiaconate and above-to contract marriage, even from the time of the apostles; and if they contract one, it is not a marriage. This is evident from the seventh synod, which was celebrated in the East and handed down the rule to them, as in Distinction XXXII, Si quis eorum.

There is therefore a difference between Easterners established in sacred orders and Westerners. If Easterners contracted marriage before receiving a sacred order, they can lawfully make use of the marriage already contracted; but they cannot contract another marriage afterward if that wife should die. Westerners, however, even if they contracted marriage before receiving a sacred order, cannot make use of such a marriage. This has been so from the time of Popes Innocent and Siricius, who imposed continence in this respect upon deacons and those above them, as in Distinction LXXXII, Proposuisti, and chapter Plurimos. Before that, Westerners, like Easterners, could make use of a marriage already contracted before ordination to sacred orders. But Pope Gregory imposed continence in like manner upon subdeacons-that is, with respect to the use of a marriage contracted earlier, namely, that they should abstain from their wives-as is evident in Distinction XXXI, Ante triennium.

Hence Pope Stephen says in the same Distinction: “The tradition of the Eastern churches conducts itself in one way, and that of this holy Roman Church in another. For their priests, deacons, and subdeacons are joined in marriage; but in this Church and among Westerners, none of the clergy, from subdeacon up to bishop, has permission to enter into marriage.” Thus far there. The text is obscure, but the gloss explains it, and explains it well. For when it says concerning the Easterners, “they are joined in marriage,” it means that they make use of a marriage already joined; and when it says that Westerners do not have permission to enter into marriage, it means that they may not even make use of one already contracted. For with respect to contracting marriage there is no difference between Easterners and Westerners established in sacred orders, because none of them can contract one, as has been said.

Section II: On Constantine's reverence toward those assembled in the council

On Constantine's reverence toward those assembled in the council. As Zozomen [read: Sozomen] says in the Tripartite History, when the bishops had entered the place prepared for the council at Nicaea, the prince Constantine entered the assembly last, accompanied by a few persons, with a seat lower than the bishops' placed for him in the middle. Nor did he sit down until, at the bishops' command, he sought permission for this to be granted to him.

And when bishops assembled from almost every place, as Rufinus says in the place cited above, had brought forward certain disputes among themselves arising from various causes, they repeatedly appealed to him, and written petitions were offered by each one. But Constantine, seeing that the cause of the highest business would be frustrated by disputes of this kind, appointed a certain day on which each of the bishops should bring forward whatever complaint he appeared to have. And when he had taken his seat, he received written petitions from each of them. Holding them all together in the fold of his garment and not disclosing what was contained in them, he said to the bishops: “God established you as priests and gave you power to judge even concerning us; therefore we are rightly judged by you. But you, who have been given to us by God as gods, cannot be judged by human beings, because it is not fitting that a human being should judge gods. Rather, await among yourselves the judgment of God alone, concerning which it is written: ‘God stood in the assembly of the gods,’” and so forth. “Therefore, setting aside these disputes, distinguish the things that pertain to the faith of God without any contention of souls." And when he had said these things, he ordered all the written complaints to be burned together, lest the enmity of the priests should become known to any person. Gregory also relates these things in XI, Question I, Sacerdotibus, a notable text.

Pope Nicholas also says, writing to Louis in Distinction XCVI: "It is related in the writings that the emperor Constantine said: 'Truly, if I had seen with my own eyes a priest of God, or one of those who are wrapped about in the monastic habit, committing sin, I would unfold my cloak and cover him so that he might not be seen by anyone whose mind could be disturbed by his example.'"

Section III: On the philosopher defeated and converted by a simple man

On the philosopher defeated and converted by a simple man. Because, according to the Apostle, God chose the foolish things of this world to confound the wise-that is, those wise according to the world-as Vincent relates after Rufinus and Hugh of Fleury, when for many days the question was being debated among the 318 bishops sitting in council, philosophers and the most highly reputed dialecticians also assembled, moved by the report. Among them there was a certain distinguished man who every day engaged our bishops learned in dialectic in a conflict of the highest contention, and he could not be refuted or constrained by anyone. For he met the questions put to him with such skill in speaking that, precisely when he was thought to have been most tightly bound, he slipped away like a slippery snake.

But in order that God might show that the kingdom of God is not in speech but in power, a certain man among the confessors, a simple man who knew nothing other than Jesus Christ and him crucified, seeing the philosopher insulting our men, asked everyone for leave to address the philosopher. But our men, who knew the man's simplicity and his lack of skill in speech, began to be afraid and to suffer something like shame, lest holy simplicity perhaps be made an object of ridicule among clever men. Nevertheless, the elder persisted and began his address to the philosopher: "In the name of Jesus Christ," he said, "hear, philosopher, the things that are true. There is one God, who by the power of his Word completed and created all the things that are seen, and confirmed them by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit. This Word, whom we call the Son, taking pity upon human errors, is born from the Virgin and by his death delivered us from everlasting death. We now await him, raised from the dead, who will come as judge of all the things we have done. Do you believe that this is so, philosopher?"

But the philosopher, as though he had never learned any argument of contradiction, was so stupefied by the power of these words and mute before everything that he was able to answer this alone: that it seemed so to him, and that nothing other than what the elder had said was true. Then the elder said: "If you have believed that this is so, arise and follow me, and receive the seal of this faith." But the philosopher, turning to his disciples or to those who had assembled for the sake of hearing, said: "Hear, learned men. As long as the contest with me was conducted by words, I opposed words with words and overthrew what was said by the art of speaking. But when power, in place of words, proceeded from the mouth of the speaker, words could not resist power, nor could a human being oppose God. Therefore, if any one of you has been able to perceive in the things that were said what I perceived, let him believe in Christ and follow this elder in whom God has spoken." And so the philosopher, having become a Christian, at last rejoiced that he had been defeated.

Cassiodorus also bears witness in the Tripartite History that, when certain philosophers wished to dispute with Alexander, bishop of Constantinople, the emperor commanded him to undertake the contest. Although Alexander was a simple man, he accepted and ordered all the philosophers except one to keep silence. To that one he said: "In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, I command you first of all not to speak." He was immediately made mute.

Section IV: Holy men present at the Nicene council

At the same council there were also many holy men from different parts of the world. But among the others, as Rufinus writes in the place cited above, was Athanasius, a deacon at Alexandria of the Alexandrian bishop, who very greatly assisted the elder Alexander himself with his counsels. A fuller account of Athanasius will be given when the doctors of that time are treated.

Panutius [i.e., Pannutius] was also there, a man of God, a bishop from the regions of Egypt, and one of those confessors whom Maximinus condemned to the mines after their right eyes had been dug out and their left thumbs cut off. But so great a grace of powers was present in him that signs were performed through him no less than through the apostles. For he put demons to flight by a word alone and healed the sick by prayer alone. He is also said to have restored sight to the blind and to have recalled paralytics to bodily stability. Constantine held him in such veneration and affection that he very often summoned him into the palace and embraced him, and caressed with eager kisses the eye that had been torn out in the confession of the faith.

Spiridion, a Cypriot bishop, is also said to have been among their number. Even after he had been placed in the episcopate, he remained a shepherd of sheep. One night, when robbers had come to the sheepfolds and stretched out their wicked hands to make a way for leading out the sheep, they were restrained by certain invisible bonds and remained until daylight as though they had been handed over to torturers. And when the elder made his way early in the morning to lead the sheep to pasture, he saw the young men hanging bound at the sheepfolds without human chains. When, therefore, he had learned the cause of their offense, he released by a word those whom he had bound by his merits. And lest their nocturnal occupation come to nothing for them, he said: “Young men, take one ram for yourselves, lest you appear to have come without cause-a ram which it would have been better for you to seek by entreaty than by theft.”

This holy man had a daughter named Hirene, who died after ministering well to him. Then a certain woman came, saying that she had entrusted a particular deposit to his daughter. The father, however, knew nothing of what had been done. But moved by the woman's tears, when what she sought had been searched for throughout the whole house and not found, he hastened to his daughter's tomb and called her by name. Then she answered from the tomb: “What do you wish, father?” He said: “Where did you put that woman's entrusted property?” But she, indicating the place, said: “You will find it buried there.” Therefore, returning to the house, he found the property as she had answered and handed it to the woman who reclaimed it.

James, bishop of Nisibis, also attended the Nicene council. When Sapor, king of the Persians, besieged this city of Nisibis, for seventy days he held back the force of the river Migdomius, making both banks higher. When he saw that they had filled, he suddenly released the waters against the city wall, which fell because it could not bear the weight of the water. He rested on that day so that the river might clear and it might be possible to walk through it. But Bishop James armed the soldiers and the people together by prayer, and they immediately restored the wall with its defensive works, which greatly terrified Sapor. Moreover, when Sapor saw [someone] standing above the wall in the likeness of the emperor, he thought it was Constantine. But when he heard that Constantine was staying at Antioch, he said that God was fighting for the Romans. In anger he shot an arrow into the air as though intending to strike God.

But the deacon Ephrem begged the bishop to come to the wall and curse the Persians. Ascending the wall, the bishop prayed to God that gnats and mosquitoes would come. These immediately filled the elephants' hollow trunks and the ears and nostrils of the horses and beasts of burden. The animals threw off their riders and, throwing the broken battle lines into confusion and abandoning the army, fled with the greatest violence. Seeing this, Sapor withdrew in confusion. These things are from the Tripartite History.

Vincent further relates in book XIV, chapter LXVII, of the Historical Mirror that, as is found in the true history of the Greeks, Saint Nicholas, bishop of the city of Mirrea, is also read to have been present at the Nicene synod, already an old man and surviving afterward for a few days. Concerning him the Church sings in the collect that God adorned the blessed pontiff Nicholas with innumerable miracles; and this is treated in the following section.

Section V: Saint Nicholas

Saint Nicholas, as is contained in his deeds, was born from an illustrious lineage and was a citizen of the city of Patara, which was once most noble in the province of Lycia but afterward, because sins required it, was reduced to the likeness of a very small town. The parents of blessed Nicholas, exceedingly wealthy and honored, sought the glory of heavenly dignity more than earthly dignity. And in a wondrous manner, when in the earliest flower of youth they had begotten this one son, they renounced all pleasures; and amid their frequent prayers they asked that this one son should survive them and should be heir not so much of their riches as also of their character. Looking down from on high upon their prayers, God showed at the very beginning of the boy's birth what sort of person he would be. For while he was being nourished with his mother's milk, he began twice in the week-that is, on Wednesday and Friday-to suck the breasts only once, and, content with this occasion, he thus remained throughout the whole day.

After passing his earlier years innocently at home, when he began to be a young man of good disposition, he did not embrace the wantonness of the world, as that age is accustomed to do. Rather, now with his parents and now alone, he frequented the thresholds of the church, and whatever he apprehended from the Scriptures he entrusted to his mind. But when he was orphaned of his parents, considering what Christ says in the Gospel-“Unless someone renounces all the things he possesses, he cannot be my disciple”-he considered how to fulfill it in such a way that the breeze of human favor would not strike him.

It happened that a certain neighbor of his, previously exceedingly wealthy, came to such poverty that he not only could not give his three marriageable virgin daughters in marriage, but had resolved to prostitute them, intending to sustain his unhappy life from their shameful commerce. When the holy man learned this, he had compassion upon the most wretched man. Therefore, having marked an hour of the night at which he would be seen by no one, he took a considerable amount of gold, bound it in a cloth, went to the man's house, secretly threw it inside through the window, and secretly departed. When the man arose in the morning and found the gold, he gave thanks to God and gave his first daughter in marriage.

Not much later Nicholas did the same thing, and so the man also gave his second daughter in marriage. Thereafter the nobleman resolved to keep watch more attentively so that he might be able to know who was providing so generously for his poverty. For the third time, however, Nicholas did this with twice as much, throwing the gold into the man's house so that from one part he might have a dowry for the third daughter and from the remainder might provide a livelihood for himself. But the man, hearing the sound from the fall of the gold into the upper room, immediately went out of the house and pursued the fugitive. Recognizing Nicholas, he strove to kiss his feet. Nicholas refused this and required him to keep the matter secret.

When the bishop of the city of the Mirreans had been taken from this life, the bishops of the province assembled with the clerics to provide a suitable prelate for the widowed church. Among them was one pontiff of great authority, upon whose judgment the opinion of all depended. He admonished them all to persist in fasts and prayers for this matter. While this was being done, it was revealed to that pontiff that the man who came first to the church at the morning hour was to be placed over it as prelate, and it was added that he would be called Nicholas. Therefore, that pontiff kept watch with the others. When Nicholas was the first of all to approach the door in the morning and, having been asked his name, replied, “Nicholas, the servant of Your Holiness,” he was elevated to the episcopal chair by the common consent of all, although he resisted exceedingly.

Preserving humility in all things, he was eager in exhorting, severe in correcting, affable toward the poor, and showed authority toward the rich and powerful, while abhorring familiarity with women and private conversations. And because he shone with the power of all spiritual gifts and attributed nothing to himself but everything to the grace of God, he began so to shine with miracles that not only his own people but even strangers, when oppressed by any distress, immediately felt relief when his name was invoked.

That he was suddenly elected bishop while still a layman, although this is prohibited by law, was by the special prompting and revelation of the Holy Spirit, as is said in Distinction LXI, section Ex his omnibus, in the gloss.

This Nicholas also, as Jacobus de Columna relates, being kindled with zeal for the faith, struck Arius with a slap before the fathers assembled in council when Arius was uttering blasphemy against the most holy Trinity-namely, that the Father was greater than both the Son and the Holy Spirit. Hence, as the Greeks say, he was deprived of the episcopal mitre for a time. And they say that from this it came about that Nicholas is depicted among the Greeks without the episcopal mitre.

His other miracles are sufficiently well known; I shall relate only this one in full. When a certain people in Phrygia had revolted from the empire of Constantine, three commanders of soldiers were sent by the Augustus to subdue the rebels. While they were ploughing the sea of Lycia, a storm arose. Having cast anchors, they steadied their fleet and reached the desired shores of the sea. Some young men began to walk here and there and, approaching the place of the market for the sake of commerce, began to commit robberies. When the entire crowd of inhabitants rushed upon them and resisted, and while they were fighting, a sudden tumult was reported to the city of Patara. When the whole city rushed together to ward off the violence of the disturbance, the man of God, moved by this commotion, hastened to the aforesaid harbor. Finding the commanders there, after performing the office of greeting them, he admonished them to restrain their soldiers from this disturbance and, as they proceeded to the city, to deign to enjoy his blessing.

When these things had therefore been calmed, it was reported to him that the citizens had greatly lamented his absence, because the consul, blinded by a bribe, had consented to the unjust death of three soldiers. When he heard this, the man of God, inflamed with the fire of piety, asked the aforesaid commanders to hasten with him at a furious pace. When they had entered the city, he asked whether those who were to receive the capital sentence were still alive. Hearing that they had been carried to the place where the condemned were customarily punished, although wearied by so great a journey, he ran to the place. He found them with knees bent and faces veiled, while the executioner's sword was already brandished above their outstretched necks. Not terrified by the blade, he boldly threw his whole body upon the executioner and, knocking the sword from his hand, did not depart until he had freed them from their bonds and led them back with him, repeating: “Take me, I say, in place of these men innocently condemned; I am prepared to surrender myself to death.”

Supported, therefore, by the favor of the people, he approached the consul's praetorium. The consul hurried to meet him and greeted him. But because proven virtue reproves the foolish, the saint, spurning him, said: “Enemy of God, transgressor of the law, whose mouth has drunk the blood of the innocent more sweetly than honey, with what rashness have you presumed, conscious of so great a guilt, to behold our face? Most bloodthirsty man, why did you not heed the command of the Lord, which daily thunders: ‘You shall not kill the innocent and the just’? Desire for gold and silver enticed you to consent to the commission of so great a crime. Believe my wickedness: your rule, by which you govern-or rather plunder-this country, will be brought to the pious ears of the Augustus, who will repay your deeds with fitting justice.”

At last, the aforesaid military commanders came forward and pleaded with him to grant pardon to the consul, who was suffused with intense shame. The man of God received their petition mercifully and, before everyone, humbly sought to soothe the ruler whom he had defamed before everyone. After a banquet had been celebrated and the said commanders had received the pontiff's blessing, they undertook the journey they had begun and reached Phrygia by sea. Having removed the promoters of the sedition and reduced the region beneath the law of the empire, they returned to Constantinople. The people and a multitude of nobles came joyfully to meet them, and the emperor received them triumphantly in his palace.

Afterward certain deceitful persons approached the eparch, the prefect, and accused the commanders to him on many charges, striving especially to represent them as conspirators against the Augustus. They began to entice the man's mind with gifts so that they might arm him for the destruction of the innocent men. Corrupted immediately, he went in to the Augustus to report this to him as true and virtually certain. The Augustus, believing his falsehoods because he was his prefect, angrily commanded that they be seized and thrust into prison, and eventually that they be killed without consideration of an inquiry.

When the prison guard, having compassion upon them, announced that the sentence had now gone forth from the Augustus that they should perish on the following night, he urged them to make arrangements concerning their affairs. While they, greatly and for a long time terrified, were groaning, one of them remembered how blessed Nicholas had miraculously freed the three innocent young men. Sighing again and again, he at last poured forth this prayer: “God, exalted king, by the merits of your servant Nicholas come to the aid of the wretched men who are about to die.” His companions likewise supplicated, and together they cried out with one voice: “Saint Nicholas, help us. Although absent, intercede for us, so that, rescued from the present slaughter, we may deserve devotedly to see your face.”

Therefore, on the following night, when they were to be punished and the Augustus had given himself to sleep, a certain likeness of Saint Nicholas appeared to him, saying: “Constantine, why have you assigned those commanders to death without a crime? Arise and order them to be released as swiftly as possible. If you refuse, I shall beseech the heavenly king to permit war to rise against you in your obstinacy; and when you have been killed in it, your flesh will become food for beasts and birds.” The Augustus said to him: “Who are you, or of what authority are you, that, having entered my palace at this hour, you dare to say such things?” He replied: “I am Nicholas the sinner, bishop of the metropolis of Mirrea.” Saying this, he disappeared. He also threatened the eparch with a similar vision and terror.

In the morning, when the emperor had summoned his magnates and the eparch, the prefect, and they had compared their visions with one another, he caused those commanders to be presented to him. As they stood before him, he addressed them with a grim appearance: “What magical arts do you know, that you mock us with such great phantoms and harass us in dreams?” While they stood astonished and gave no answer, the Augustus said again: “Tell us what your sorceries are.” One of them answered him in a trembling voice: “Far be it from us, lord, that we should be instructed in the teachings of a wicked art.” The Augustus said to them: “Do you know any man whose name is Nicholas?” Immediately, upon hearing so great a name, they raised their hands toward the stars and cried out: “Blessed are you, Lord God of Saint Nicholas, who do not forsake those who hope in you.”

When the Augustus eagerly asked who this man was and how great he was, one of them said: “He is holy in every respect, and through his merits we believe we have been rescued from the destruction intended for us.” Continuing to speak about his humility and goodness, he narrated in order the liberation of the three young men set forth above. When Caesar heard these things, he said: “Go and give thanks to the servant of God-or rather to God, who has delivered you through him. Carry to him from among my gifts this Gospel book wonderfully covered in gold, this golden vessel adorned with gems, and these other little gifts. Tell him to deign to accept these things and that, since I most willingly obey his commands, he should strive to pray for me rather than to threaten me; and let him entreat God for the peace of our kingdom and, still more, for that of the whole world.”

He performed many miracles during his life and after his death: concerning deliverance from a storm and shipwreck at the invocation of his name; concerning the multiplication of grain taken from the emperor's ships and nevertheless delivered at Byzantium according to the proper measure; concerning the deceit of Diana, appearing in the form of a woman, which was revealed to persons sailing to visit him; concerning an image of blessed Nicholas which a certain barbarian had set up to guard his possessions-when those possessions were nevertheless taken from him and, seeing this, he beat the image, Nicholas appeared to those who had stolen them and commanded them to be returned to him, because of which the barbarian was converted to Christ; and concerning a boy and a golden cup submerged in the sea but afterward restored to him together with the cup.

There is also the account of the deceit of a merchant who had sworn-or had given Saint Nicholas as surety to the Jew who lent him money-that he would repay it at the appointed time. But afterward, in court, the merchant employed a fraud. He placed the money in a hollow staff and gave the staff into the Jew's hand to hold; then the Christian swore to the Jew that he had repaid the whole amount. Afterward the merchant took back the staff entrusted to the Jew, who did not know that the money was inside. But while proceeding on his way, when he had fallen asleep, he was crushed and torn apart by oxen coming toward him. The staff was also broken by the oxen, the money came out, the fraud was understood, and the money was restored to the Jew. The Jew was also converted to the faith after the dead man had been raised.

There is also the account of a certain man who received the linen sheet from blessed Nicholas's bed as a relic. After prayer had also been made to Nicholas, the man received a son from his barren wife and named him Adeodatus. Years afterward, the boy was captured by the Hagarenes. When a year had passed and the day arrived on which the nobleman with his household was accustomed to celebrate a solemn feast in honor of blessed Nicholas, the boy Adeodatus was in the palace of the king of the Hagarenes, attending upon him. While the boy was recalling the feast customarily held in his house on that day in honor of blessed Nicholas, the saint himself appeared, seized Adeodatus by the hair, and presented him before his parents at their banquet.

There is also the account of the prior who was beaten because he would not permit the history and office of blessed Nicholas to be sung.

At last, blessed Nicholas, perceiving that death was present, began to pray and sing psalms. Seeing the holy angels coming to him, with his head bowed he began the psalm, “In you, Lord, I have hoped,” and so forth. When he had reached the verse, “Into your hands,” and so forth, he delivered his most precious soul to God into the hands of the archangels. From his honored tomb two springs flowed: one flowing with oil from the side of his head, and the other with water from the side of his feet, beneficial for health. But when, at a certain time, the bishop of Mirrea had been sent into exile by the prefect, the oil and water immediately ceased to flow until he was recalled from exile.

Section VI: On the conversion of Further India to the faith

As Rufinus bears witness in book X of the Ecclesiastical History, in that division of the terrestrial world which was celebrated by lot among the apostles for preaching the word of God, Parthia is said to have been assigned by lot to Thomas, Ethiopia to Matthew, and Nearer India, adjoining it, to Bartholomew. Between it, Parthia, and Media, but far more inward in extent, lies Further India, inhabited by many and various languages and peoples. As though it were far removed, no plough of apostolic preaching had made an impression upon it. Nevertheless, in the time of Constantine it received the first seeds of faith from a certain cause of the following kind.

A certain philosopher, Methodorus, is said to have penetrated into Further India for the sake of inspecting places and searching through the world. Invited also by his example, a certain Tyrian philosopher, Methyopius, wished for a similar reason to go to India. He had with him two little boys, related to him, whom he was instructing in letters. The younger of them was called Edesius, and the other Frumentius.

Now it is the custom of the barbarians there that, if at any time neighboring peoples report that their treaty with the Romans has been disturbed, all Romans who are found among them are slaughtered. The philosopher's ship was attacked; all were killed together with him. The little boys, found beneath a tree meditating and preparing their lessons, were preserved through the barbarians' compassion and were led to the king. He made one of them, namely Edesius, his cupbearer. But to Frumentius, whom he had perceived to be, as it were, foresighted and prudent, he entrusted his accounts and archives. From this they were held in great honor and affection by the king.

But when the king died, he left his wife, together with his little son, as heir to his kingdom. He gave those young men free power to do whatever they wished. Nevertheless, the queen entreated them suppliantly, as though there were nothing more faithful in the whole kingdom, to share with her the care of governing the kingdom until her son should grow to maturity, and especially Frumentius, whose prudence would suffice to govern the kingdom. For the other displayed simply a pure fidelity and a sober mind.

While they were doing this and Frumentius held the helm of the kingdom in his hands, with God stirring his mind and spirit, he began solicitously to inquire whether there were any Christians among the Roman merchants, to give them the greatest authority, and to admonish them to make assemblies in each place and to come together for the sake of prayer according to the Roman rite. But he himself did the same things much more, exhorted the others in this manner, invited them by favor and benefits, supplied whatever was opportune, provided places for buildings and other necessities, and rejoiced in every way that the seed of Christians should arise there.

But when the royal boy, whose kingdom he was administering, had grown to maturity, after everything had been completed and faithfully handed over, they returned again to our world, although the queen and her son greatly detained them and begged them to remain. Edesius hastened to Tyre to revisit his parents and relatives. Frumentius proceeded to Alexandria, saying that it was not right to conceal the work of the Lord. Therefore, he related to the bishop the whole matter as it had occurred and admonished him to provide some worthy man whom he might send as bishop to the now very many Christians assembled and the churches constructed in the barbarian land.

Then Athanasius, who had recently received the priestly office, considering Frumentius himself more attentively in the council of priests as a man full of the Spirit of God, conferred the priestly office upon him and commanded him to return, with the grace of the Lord, whence he had come. When he had gone to India as bishop, so great a grace of mighty works is said to have been given him by God that apostolic signs were wrought through him and an infinite number of the barbarians was converted to the end [read: faith]. We learned these things from Edesius himself, who was afterward made a priest of Tyre and who had been the companion of Frumentius.

Section VII: The converted nation and Saints Juventius and Florentius

At the same time, the nation of the Hebrews [read: Iberians] was also converted to the faith through a certain Christian captive found among us [read: found among them]. For it was their custom that, if a little child became ill, he should be carried about by his mother through each house, to see whether perhaps some remedy might be found in any house. It happened that a certain woman carried her sick little child through all the houses, and he was relieved in none. At last she came to that Christian captive, who healed him by her prayer. When this became known to the queen, and she herself was then ill, the captive was summoned and healed her also by her prayer.

But when the king, while hunting on a certain day, wandered astray and, separated from the others, found himself alone in places of the greatest darkness, he said: “If Christ, whom the captive preaches to my wife, is truly God, let him now deliver me from this darkness, and I shall worship him with all who are subject to me.” And so it was done. When a new church was being made, moreover, there was an immense column that could not be erected by any strength. The captive herself raised it by prayer alone and set it in its place.

Saint Juventius and Florentius also shone with holiness and miracles in those times. Saint Juventius, a Samaritan by nation, born from pagans, was converted at the preaching of Saint George, deserved to be advanced to the priesthood, and converted his parents to Christ by his teaching. At the admonition of an angel, he proceeded to Thessalonica. There, by the sign of the cross, he shattered the idols of Datianus and freed his daughter Cleopatronia, who was beset by a demon. When she had been converted to the faith and had received baptism with nearly two hundred persons, out of devotion she sent to Rome, to blessed Peter-that is, to his church-two candlesticks and other utensils, through Juventius and the blessed bishop Benedict. And when provisions failed them on the journey and they were passing along the shore, a great fish came out of the sea. When it had been caught by them, it sufficed for their sustenance for one week.

On one occasion a plundering soldier, together with his companions, took his garment away from him, and the following miracle occurred concerning it. It could never be sold, and wherever it was at night, a great light issued from it. But when a certain king, Rictiovarus, was laying waste the Roman territories in Asia and persecuting Christians, the said garment was carried to a certain church in the city where Rictiovarus was. He was killed with his whole army, as is believed, by the power of the saint whose garment it was. This occurred thirty years after the time when the said garment had been taken away from him.

Blessed Juventius lived until the time of Hilary, bishop of Poitiers, from whom he also received as a place for dwelling with his companions the fortress of Gravione. There he died in the one hundred and twentieth year of his life. Once, when he had fallen among six robbers and they wished to despoil and kill him, the first of them, who had raised his sword to kill him, ran himself through; the second hanged himself from an oak; the third, seized by a demon, expired; the fourth lost his eyes; the fifth, filled with madness, tore his own hands and arms with his teeth; and the sixth, running to the sea, cast himself into it.

Florentius, beginning to journey into Gaul at an angel's command, came to a port of the river Rhone and found there a broken ship without a pilot. Wishing to hasten to Mass as quickly as possible, because it was the Lord's Day, he entered it, commending himself to God after making the sign of the cross. He reached the bank safely, and there, finding a man tormented by a demon, he freed him.

An angel also revealed his arrival to blessed Martin, bishop of Tours, admonishing him to consecrate Florentius as a priest. He did this, receiving him with great joy and affection and assiduously praying to God to show him a place for his dwelling in which to serve him. A place was revealed to him, namely a certain cave near the Loire. Since there were many serpents in it, Florentius drove them away by his prayer.

Now because he had the custom of going to the city of Tours each year for the sake of prayer, on one occasion, when he came to a river in order to cross it, he found there a blind woman weeping bitterly. When, upon being questioned by him concerning the cause of such great grief, she had explained that her only son, who showed her the way, had been submerged in that river three days before and that not even his corpse could be found, Florentius, moved by compassion, prayed for him. An angel revealed to him that the boy was not dead but remained alive and well in a certain place. Accordingly, fishermen, casting their nets at the place shown by Florentius, drew him out alive. Florentius restored him to his mother and gave sight to the blind woman herself. He lived for 123 years and migrated to the Lord on the tenth day before the Kalends of October.

Section VIII: On Arius's recall from exile and his deceit

On Arius's recall from exile and his deceit, and on a certain Arian priest who deceived Constantine's sister.

For after Helena, Constantine's mother, had been taken from this light, Constantia, her daughter, having been left by Licinius-that is, having been widowed of him-used the consolations of her brother, the Augustus, that is, Constantine. It happened that a certain priest who secretly favored the party of Arius came into her acquaintance. But, when familiarity at first afforded abundant opportunity, he gradually began to spread a report, saying that envy had been aroused against Arius and that, because of private animosities, his bishop had pursued the matter contentiously, pierced by the spur of rivalry because Arius was held sufficiently dear among the people. By suggesting these and other things of this kind rather frequently, he made the mind of Constantia his own.

When she was about to die, she was visited by her brother and was addressed by him tenderly and religiously. She is said to have asked a final favor from him: namely, that he receive the priest into his familiarity and listen to whatever might be suggested to him by the priest for his hope and salvation. She said that she cared nothing for herself, since she was now departing from this light, but that she was concerned for the condition of her brother, lest perhaps his kingdom should suffer destruction on account of the punishments of innocent persons.

Having received these admonitions from his sister and believing his own sister's concern for him to be faithful, he lent his ear to the priest and ordered Arius to be summoned again from exile so that he might explain how he understood the faith. Then Arius wrote a statement of faith. This indeed appeared not to contain our meaning, but nevertheless to contain our words and profession. The emperor was amazed and thought that one and the same opinion was contained in Arius's exposition and in that of the council held previously. Nevertheless, he relaxed the vigor of his mind in no respect, but again referred him to the council's examination, because priests from the whole world were being invited to assemble for the dedication at Jerusalem.

He was indeed easily received by his supporters. But when he proceeded to Alexandria, his whole undertaking was there frustrated, because there is a place for deceits among the ignorant, whereas to direct deceit against those who know produces nothing other than laughter.

Meanwhile, while these things were being done in vain at Alexandria, the venerable Augustus died in the city villa at Nicomedia, in the thirty-first year of his reign, having named his children in his testament as heirs to the succession of the Roman world. At Constantine's death there appeared a hairy star, which the Greeks call a comet, as many relate.

At that time Constantius, to whom he had indeed assigned the government of the East, was not present. Constantine is said secretly to have summoned the priest whom, as we said above, his sister had commended and whom he had thereafter held as a familiar, to have handed him the testament that he had written, and to have adjured him under oath not to deliver it into the hands of anyone except Constantius when he should arrive. Since the eunuchs who were in the palace also favored Constantius, the judgment concerning the emperor's death [read: the announcement of the emperor's death] was artfully suppressed until Emperor Constantius arrived. With many who were attempting innovations suppressed, affairs were to remain restored and intact.

When Constantius arrived, the priest restored the deposit. In gratitude for this benefit, the emperor, desirous of the kingdom, became so bound to him that, although he aspired to command everyone, he patiently allowed himself to be commanded by that man. Therefore, having joined himself in friendship with the emperor, the priest began to make suggestions concerning the restoration of Arius and to persuade him that priests who were unwilling to acquiesce should be compelled.

Title IX: On Constantine the Great, Emperor

Chapter IV: On the Sons of Constantine the Great: Constantius, Constans, and Constantine

The division of the empire among Constantine's sons

After Constantine the Great had therefore died, his three sons succeeded to the same empire. They divided the Roman world among themselves in such a way that the elder Constantius held Constantinople and the East; Constans presided over Antioch, Illyricum, and Africa; and the younger Constantine possessed Rome and the western kingdoms.

Their father, when dying, left Dalmatius, the son of his brother, as a sharer in the kingdom. For Constantine the Great had two brothers, although not from the same mother, because Constantine alone was born from Helena and the other two from another wife. One of them was called Constantius, who had two sons, namely Gallus and Julian the Apostate, concerning whom it will be spoken below. The other was called Dalmatius, namely the brother of Constantine the Great, and he had a son upon whom he imposed his own name; it is this son who is discussed here. But this man afterward displayed a promising disposition and was not unlike his uncle Constantine. Not long afterward he was killed by a military faction, with his cousin Constantius permitting it rather than ordering it.

The younger Constantine, namely the son of Constantine the Great, for reasons that are not known brought war against Constans in the first years of the empire. When he involved himself too imprudently in wars, he was killed not far from Aquileia by the commanders of his brother Constans. As Hugh of Fleury says, this Constantine, for as long as he lived, wore royal apparel and continually adorned his head with a diadem. He always cultivated the good arts, but especially literary studies: he himself read, wrote, and meditated. Thus the commonwealth of the Romans was reduced to two Augusti, namely Constantius, who presided over the East, and Constans, who presided over the West.

Meanwhile Sapor, the most powerful king of the Persians, having occupied Mesopotamia, broke into Syria. After capturing many cities there, he inflicted great losses upon the provincials of the Roman people. On this account Constantius, having raised many armies from both East and West, proceeded against the Parthians with extraordinary preparation for war. He fought with them on nine occasions, now successfully and now unsuccessfully. The last battle was fought at Sighara. In it he lost an undoubted victory through the foolishness of the soldiers, who seditiously and foolishly demanded battle, contrary to the reasoning of warfare and the precepts of military practice, when the day was already declining. And although the emperor Constantius emerged victorious from that battle, it was nevertheless with little loss to the enemy. For it is believed that, if the battle had been prolonged into the following day, all the forces of the Parthians could easily have been destroyed.

Constans, his brother, who governed the two western regions, waged many wars of varying fortune against the Franks and Alamanni. At last he defeated and subdued them with great slaughter, though in a most difficult battle; for this reason they suppliantly sought peace from Constans. After Constans had for a long time governed the western kingdoms as a good prince, had sufficiently revered the servants of God, and had conducted himself justly and vigorously, he soon fell into a grave illness. When he had fully recovered from it, he seemed to be changed into another man and began to employ the counsels of wicked men. Turning from there to grave vices, he became intolerable to the provincials and hateful to the soldiers.

At that time, among the principal commanders of Constans was a certain man named Magnetius, a man of profound and provident counsel and accustomed to military affairs. He was, moreover, liberal and generous, for which reason he was dear to the whole army. Under his command Constans had several times routed the barbarians. Seeing that Constans had fallen away from his former virtue and was now hated by all orders of society, Magnetius devised a plan to kill him and occupy the western kingdom for himself. It assisted this plan that he knew Constantius was then occupied with the Parthian war of which it was spoken above. Therefore, not much later, with many conspiring with him and an opportunity having been obtained, he killed Constans, who suspected nothing of the kind, not far from the Spanish territories, in a fortress whose name was Helena. This was in the sixteenth year of his reign and the thirtieth year of his life.

After Constans had been killed, Magnetius, with no one resisting him, occupied Italy, Africa, the Gauls, and Illyricum. When this had been done, with the consent of all the soldiers he made a certain Vetranio, already advanced in age and beloved by everyone because of the success and long duration of his military service, a sharer in the empire. He was certainly an upright man and most knowledgeable in military affairs, but wholly without experience of all the liberal arts, to such a degree that he did not learn even the first elements of letters until he was advanced in age and an emperor. After these things had been accomplished, Magnetius sent him to defend Illyricum.

At that time in Rome, through a military tumult and a faction of the nobles, Nepontianus, the son of Constantine's sister, was chosen emperor. On the eighth day he was crushed by Magnetius's commanders. After his death, fearing that the Romans might attempt something against him, since he had learned that the Roman senate and people greatly favored Constantine's heirs, Magnetius came to the city with a great army. When he had arrived there, he killed many of the nobles; in addition, he relegated many who had favored Nepontianus into exile and began to oppress the city and Italy itself with a grievous tyranny.

Section I: Constantius's civil war and the death of Arius

When Constantius learned of his brother's death, he hastened to war against Magnetius and made peace with the Parthians-a peace certainly more useful than honorable. For he voluntarily left to the Parthians for their possession that part of Mesopotamia which lies beyond the Euphrates and which until those times had been under the dominion of the Romans.

And so Constantius, having gathered great forces from every side, set out for civil war against Magnetius in vengeance for his brother's murder. First he fought with him in a most grievous battle near the city of Mursa, in which Magnetius himself was defeated and almost captured. In that contest vast forces of the Roman Empire fell, forces fit for any foreign wars and which could have contributed greatly to triumphs and security. After that war Magnetius, having again repaired his forces, fought and was defeated. Accordingly, after being defeated in various battles and fleeing to Lyon in Gaul, he killed himself by his own hand in the third year and seventh month of his reign. His brother Decentius also, whom he had sent to defend the Gauls and had called Caesar, upon hearing of his brother's death, wrested his life from himself by a noose at Sens.

At that same time Gallus, the son of Constantius's paternal uncle, whom Constantius, when setting out to avenge his brother, had made Caesar and to whom he had entrusted the eastern empire, attempted a revolution and was killed by the command of Constantius. He was a man fierce by nature and more inclined toward tyranny, if it had been permitted him to rule in his own right. This Gallus crushed the Jews who, after killing soldiers during the night, had taken up arms for rebellion. He killed many thousands of persons, even those of an innocent age. He also delivered their cities-Diocaesarea, Diospolis, and Tiberias-and very many towns to the fire. Silvanus, moreover, having attempted a revolution in Gaul, was killed before the thirtieth day. From that time Constantius alone was prince and Augustus in the Roman Empire.

Constantius therefore reigned as the thirty-fifth emperor of the Romans. Although he reigned with his brothers, he himself was nevertheless the principal one; and after the death of his brothers Constantine and Constans, he remained sole monarch. He ruled, partly with his brothers and afterward alone and over the whole, for twenty-four years. Their empire began in the year of the Lord 340, but in the year of the world 4303.

From the beginning of his reign Constantius himself was corrupted away from the catholic faith through his friends who favored the Arians. Moreover, Athanasius, a man distinguished and of magnificent faith, disputed with Arius in the second year of this reign, with crowds standing on either side, at Laodicea, a city of Syria. A certain man named Probus, at the emperor's command, sat as arbiter between Arius himself and Athanasius, the most vigorous defender of the holy faith. There the splendor of the faith was beaten out to purity [read: was thoroughly examined], and from the divine books it was shown that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit exist in their proper persons, and yet that the nature of the three is one. Arius nevertheless remained in his wickedness with a hardened mind.

Rufinus, in book X of the Ecclesiastical History, says that Eusebius of Nicomedia, concerning whose dissimulation in subscribing it was spoken above, having obtained an opportunity from the circumstances and having been made familiar with the prince through the aforesaid priest, attempted to overturn everything and to reduce the acts of the Nicene Council to nothing. He caused Arius to come and, by imperial edicts, caused a council to be summoned again at Constantinople. To it there assembled especially those who followed Arius and Eusebius.

Having often met with Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, in order that he should receive Arius, they at last fixed a definite day and gave notice that either he himself was to receive Arius or, if he resisted, he should know that he would be driven from the church and thrust into exile and that Arius would be received by another. Then Alexander, during the night that intervened before the appointed day, lay beneath the altar and passed that entire vigil in prayer and tears, commending the cause of the Church to the Lord.

When light had arisen and Alexander nevertheless did not cease from prayer, Eusebius, with all his followers, as though the standard-bearer of a heretical war, went down early in the morning to the house of Arius and ordered him to follow him to the church. He declared that, unless Alexander acquiesced in their presence, he would be expelled and would yield his place. The minds of everyone were therefore suspended in expectation as to which would give way: the perseverance of Alexander or the insistence of Eusebius and Arius.

Arius, proceeding to the church surrounded by a crowd of bishops and peoples, turned aside because of human necessity to a public place. While he was sitting there, his intestines and all his entrails flowed out into a heap of excrement. Thus, in such a place, he paid the worthy penalty of his blasphemy and fetid mind. When this was reported in the church to Eusebius and to those who, together with him, were wearying the holy and innocent man Alexander about receiving Arius, they departed covered with confusion.

Section II: The persecution and exile of Athanasius

When Alexander, bishop at Alexandria, had died, Athanasius received his see. So great were his struggles in the Church for the integrity of the faith that even this appears to have been written concerning him: “I shall show him how great things he must suffer for my name.” Therefore, in the second year of the reign of Constantius, Arian impiety, supported by the protection of that emperor, persecuted first Athanasius and then all bishops who were not of its party, by exiles, prisons, and various kinds of afflictions.

For, as Rufinus says in book X, the emperor Constantius, deceived through the eunuchs by Arian bishops, complied with their wicked contentions with sufficiently earnest zeal. But they, fearing that Athanasius might at some time be given an opportunity of approaching the king and that through him the king might be instructed from the Scriptures concerning the truth of the faith that they were perverting, began in every way to accuse him before the prince and to represent him as though he were the author of every crime and shameful deed, as will be discussed more fully below when the doctors are treated.

When he was sought for death throughout the various places of the world, and scarcely a corner remained in which he could conceal himself, lest his hiding places become burdensome to anyone and an occasion of calumny be sought against innocent persons, presuming that nothing was now safe for him in the kingdom of Constantius, he departed as a fugitive into the territories of Constans. He was received by him with sufficient honor and religious devotion. This was before Constans was killed by Magnetius, as was said.

When Constans had learned more diligently the cause of Athanasius, which he had known by report, he wrote to his brother that he had discovered as certain that Athanasius, the priest of the most high God, was unjustly suffering flights and exiles. He said that Constantius would therefore act rightly if he restored him to his place without any molestation. If he were unwilling to do this, Constans would take care to accomplish it himself, penetrating the inner parts of his kingdom and exacting the most worthy punishments from the authors of the crime.

Terrified by this letter, because Constantius was conscious that his brother could do what he threatened, with feigned kindness he ordered Athanasius to come to him voluntarily. After touching him with a slight rebuke, he promised him that he might return secure to his church. But when, through the crime of Magnetius, the emperor Constans had been deprived at once of his kingdom and his life, those former instigators began again to arouse the prince's hatred against Athanasius. After driving him from the church, they sent in his place a certain George, a companion of their perfidy and savagery.

Section III: Maximinus of Trier and the martyrs under Sapor

At that time, as Jerome writes in the Chronicle, Maximinus, bishop of Trier, was held to be illustrious. When Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, was being sought by Constantius for punishment, he was honorably received by Maximinus. As is contained in his deeds, related by Vincent in book XV of the Historical Mirror, Maximinus was a native of Poitiers, born from most illustrious parents. His brother Maxentius was bishop of Poitiers. Maximinus himself, as was revealed through an angelic ministry to Agririus, bishop of Trier, was ordained as his successor.

Once, when Maximinus was proceeding to Rome, he found Saint Martin, not yet made a bishop, traveling there upon the road. While they were proceeding together, a bear attacked and ate the little ass that carried their small bundles. Maximinus is said to have commanded the bear to fulfill the service of the ass. It did so until they returned to the place called Ursarii Villa. There the saint gave the bear its former freedom to wander, while taking away its license to do harm.

Maximinus compelled Martin to go with him to Trier. When he had afterward set out for Poitiers to revisit his own people, he migrated there to the Lord. But his body was transferred to Trier, where it became renowned for miracles. Among other wonders, a certain priest, when compelled to swear the truth concerning a certain case upon his body, swore falsely and suddenly died upon the road. Another man, an archdeacon, was accused of adultery. When, at the inquiry of his bishop, an oath was required from him for his purgation concerning it, and he was preparing himself for this, he was seized by violent fevers, confessed his crime, and was delivered.

Meanwhile Sapor, king of the Persians, persecuted our people. Under him, as Sozomen writes, sixteen thousand martyrs were crowned in his kingdom. Among them was Simeon, archbishop of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, royal cities in Persia, who was accused before Sapor by the Magi. At first the king afflicted the Christians with immense taxes and assigned these exactions to cruel men. He then ordered Simeon to be brought to him in bonds. When he had been brought, Simeon did not adore the king.

When the king asked why he had not adored him, Simeon said: “Previously I was not brought here in bonds in order that I should deny the true God, and without any hesitation I fulfilled the solemn observances of the king. But now it is not lawful for me to do this.” At last he was ordered to adore the sun. He refused and was led into prison.

As he was going, there met him Eustazades, an aged eunuch, the king's foster father and the chief man of the royal house. He had formerly been made a Christian but, having suffered violence, had adored the sun. Sitting before the king's doors, he rose and adored Simeon. Simeon, rebuking him insultingly and crying out with fury, turned away from him and despised him. Then the eunuch, weeping and groaning, put off his splendid garment and put on a mourning garment.

When the king heard this and could not bend him, he ordered him to be beheaded. Eustazades obtained from the king that he should cause a herald to proclaim that he was dying for no other cause than for Christ. He caused this to be proclaimed so that those who had been cast down by his example might recover their courage. When Simeon learned this in prison, he joyfully offered hymns on his behalf.

Prischius, who was over all the king's artisans, seeing a certain old man named Ananias trembling beneath the sword, strengthened him, saying: “Close your eyes for a little while, old man, and be secure, for soon you will see the countenance of Christ.” Immediately Prischius also was beheaded with the others.

Blessed Simeon suffered on the eleventh day before the Kalends of May under King Sapor, and on the following day his companions suffered. Hence it is also said in the martyrology that, on the tenth day before the Kalends of May, many suffered martyrdom in Persia under King Sapor. In that contest of faith there suffered the bishops Milesius, Acepsimas, Mareas, and Hygor, and the priest Jacob, together with nearly two hundred clerics, fifty monks, and many consecrated virgins.

Section IV: The councils of Milan and Rimini

Moreover, when Constantius had come to the western regions to avenge his brother's murder and, with the tyrant Magnetius destroyed, alone possessed the citadel of the kingdom, he began to harass the western bishops and to compel them through deception to consent to the Arian heresy. The condemnation of Athanasius was first put forward, and thus the obstruction of this most powerful barrier was removed. For this purpose a council of bishops was convoked at Milan, and many were deceived.

But Eusebius, bishop of Vercelli, who by his preaching purified and defended the provinces of the West from the Arian pestilence just as Athanasius did those of the East, persecuted the Arians to such an extent that he condemned the heretic Auxentius, bishop of Milan, after he had been expelled by all Christians, and ordained Bishop Dionysius there in his place. Angered on this account, Constantius ordered a council to be held in the West and by letters summoned Eusebius, who was most renowned among the bishops, to it. But Eusebius, knowing the malice of many, sent letters of excuse, alleging his old age.

Contrary to his excuse, however, the emperor ordered the council to be held at Milan, which is not far from Vercelli. When the emperor had arrived and perceived that Eusebius was absent, he sent for him again. While Eusebius delayed in coming, Constantius meanwhile ordered the Arian bishops to describe their faith, and the catholics also to subscribe after Athanasius had been condemned. The first of these was Dionysius, bishop of Milan.

When Eusebius departed from Vercelli, Dionysius of Milan met him as he came, fell at his feet, and said: “I have sinned, father. Deliver me now, father, if you can.” Eusebius was summoned by the emperor. Since he could be bent neither by flatteries nor by threats to subscribe to the heretical opinion against the decrees of the Nicene Council, he at last said before everyone: “You say that the Father is greater than the Son. Why, then, have you preferred my son, namely Dionysius, to me in the subscription? The son is not above the father. Therefore let another, new document be made, on which I may be able to subscribe first of all.”

This pleased everyone, and the document on which Dionysius and some catholics had already subscribed was burned. When Dionysius and Secundus, catholic bishops who had subscribed out of simplicity, saw the subscription burned, they recognized their error and rejoiced. Eusebius, however, refused to subscribe himself on the other sheet, and so did the catholic bishops. Angered on this account, the emperor delivered Eusebius into the hands of the Arians, who afflicted him in many ways, as will be said below.

After the council had been dissolved, the emperor established that another, Arian council should be held. In it a determination contrary to the decrees of the Nicene Council was made concerning the matter of faith. Hence that synod of Rimini was afterward condemned together with all its decrees, as is evident in Distinction XV, Sancta. Dionysius, bishop of Milan, Eusebius, bishop of Vercelli, Paulinus, Tedanus, and Lucifer were thrust into exile. Hilary, bishop of Poitiers, was also joined to them, while the others either did not know or did not believe the fraud. But the outcome of the affair showed that the business had been conducted by such a plan.

When those men had been removed, a synod was immediately assembled at Rimini. There, in accordance with what the easterners had composed at Seleucia, cunning and crafty men easily circumvented the simple and inexperienced western priests. They did this by proposing to them which they would rather worship and adore: homousion or Christ. Since they did not know the force of the word-what homousion signified-the discussion was led as though to a certain pinnacle [read: disgust] and execration, while they affirmed that they believed in Christ, not in homousion.

Thus the minds of many, apart from a few who knowingly fell, were deceived. Coming to a position contrary to what the fathers had written at Nicaea, they decreed that the word homousion, as though unknown and foreign to the Scriptures, should be removed from the exposition of the faith; and they stained their communion with the communion of the heretics.

At that time the face of the Church was foul and exceedingly ugly. For it was not devastated by outsiders, as before, but by its own people. One man drove another into exile, and another was driven into exile, and both were of the Church.

Pope Liberius also was thrust into exile, and in his place his deacon Felix was substituted by the heretics. He was stained not so much by difference of sect as by connection in communion and ordination. At Jerusalem, Cyril, after Maximinus, received the priestly office in a confused ordination and varied at one time in faith and at another in communion. At Alexandria, George held with sufficient obstinacy a bishopric seized by violence, so that he thought those entrusted to him were given more for exercising the haughtiness of jurisdiction than that the priestly office was to be administered through religious duties.

At Antioch, indeed, many things were done in exceedingly confused fashion at different times. For when Eudoxius had died, and bishops of many different cities were striving with the highest ambition for that see, they at last transferred Meletius from Sebaste, a city of Armenia, contrary to the decrees of the council. Nevertheless, he was thrust into exile by those same men because, contrary to their opinion, he began to preach in the church not the faith of Arius but our faith. A great multitude followed him when he was driven from the church and was separated from the society of the heretics.

Section V: The threefold division of Arianism and Pope Liberius

Meanwhile, as Rufinus continues in the place cited above, so that a malice rich in evils might also rage against itself, the priests and peoples who at first had been torn from the Church under Arius as their leader were divided again into three sects and parties.

For Eunomius, a man leprous in body and mind and corrupted by the royal disease, yet extremely powerful in dialectical art, wrote very many things against our faith. He gave laws of disputation to his followers, from whom even now the Eunomian heresy takes its name. There was also another man named Macedonius, whom, after our people had been expelled-or rather killed-they established as bishop at Constantinople.

Thus that pestiferous beast which had first raised its head from the lower regions through Arius suddenly appeared in three forms: through the Eunomians, who say that the Son is in every respect unlike the Father, since a thing made can in no way be like its maker; through the Arians, who say that the Son can indeed be called like the Father, but by the generosity of grace, not by the property of nature, insofar as a creature can be compared with the Creator; and also through the Macedonians, who say that the Son is in every respect like the Father, but that the Holy Spirit has nothing in common with the Father and the Son. That these three opinions are judged heresies by the Church is found in XXIV, Question III, the penultimate chapter.

Constantius, as is contained in the Tripartite History, had ordered a council to be celebrated again at Nicaea in Bithynia, but in a moment the city was shaken. Arsacius, who had passed from military service into the eremitic life and was enclosed there in a certain tower of the city, had foreknown this earthquake. When he learned of it, he announced it to the people. When they did not believe him, he returned to the tower and was found dead, lying prostrate in prayer. He is said to have asked God that he should die before he saw the destruction of the city. He also cured a demoniac and killed a dragon. This occurred in the consulship of Tatian and Cerealis, on the eighth day of August.

The council was therefore transferred to Seleucia in Isauria. Constantius commanded Lauricius, duke of Isauria, to be present there so that he might minister to the bishops in whatever was necessary.

Therefore, after Pope Julius, as Vincent transcribed from the Book of the Pontiffs-Julius himself had also sustained many tribulations, had been in exile for ten months, and, after he died, was buried on the Aurelian Way at Rome-his successor Liberius was also deported into exile by Constantius because he refused to consent to the Arian heresy. He was in exile for three years.

Gathering the priests, with their counsel he secretly ordained the venerable priest Felix in his place. Felix held a council and found two priests, Ursatius and Valens, consenting to the Arian emperor Constantius; and he condemned them in a council of forty-eight bishops. After a few days Ursatius and Valens, led by zeal, asked Constantius to recall Liberius from exile so that he might participate only in a single communion, apart from a second baptism. Then, when authority had been sent, Liberius consented to the commands of the Augustus that he should communicate with the heretics in one participation only, provided that they did not rebaptize.

Thus, returning from exile, he lived in the cemetery of blessed Agnes with the sister of Constantius, so that he might return to the city, as it were, through her intervention. But she, being faithful, refused to petition the Augustus because she had learned of the council. Constantius, together with Valens and Ursatius, then convoked certain persons from the dregs of the Arians. After holding what was, as it were, a council, he sent for and recalled Liberius from the cemetery of blessed Agnes, expelling from the Roman episcopate Felix, who was catholic and who was at last also crowned with martyrdom.

Thus Liberius, as Jerome notes in the Chronicle, conquered by weariness of exile, subscribed to heretical depravity and entered Rome as though victorious. Nevertheless, this Pope Liberius exhorted others to the endurance of labors which he himself neglected to fulfill. He wrote as follows to all bishops, as is contained in VII, Question I:

"It has been reported to us that, because of past labors and persecutions, some of you have abandoned the peoples assigned to you and committed to you by God, and choose freedom from the labors of the episcopate, desiring to lead your life in silence and leisure rather than to remain among those things committed to you. The Lord says: 'Blessed is he who perseveres to the end.' From what, then, does blessed perseverance arise except from the virtue of patience? For according to the apostolic preaching, all who wish to live piously in Christ suffer persecution.

"Therefore, most beloved brothers, let not the bitterness of afflictions constrain you to withdraw from the pious purpose of your mind. Consider how great things our Lord and Redeemer bore for our absolution and liberation, and to what insults he delivered himself to be subjected, so that he might free us from the chains of diabolical power.

"Therefore attend to yourselves and to the whole flock in which the Holy Spirit established you as bishops to govern the Church of God, which he acquired with his own blood, so that there may be no one who deceives or seduces you through loftiness of speech, so that you abandon the peoples committed to you and, because of the reproach of evil men, give yourselves over to rest, so that you save yourselves alone and leave your sons orphans." Thus far he.

Therefore, from the day on which Liberius subscribed, as is written in the Book of the Pontiffs, there was a persecution among the clergy, so that priests and clerics were killed inside the church and were crowned with martyrdom. Felix, after being deposed, lived on his estate on the Portuensian Way, where he rested in peace on the fourth day before the Kalends of August.

Section VI: Eusebius of Rome and other victims of Constantius

Eusebius-not the bishop of Vercelli, but a priest of the city of Rome, as is contained in his deeds-began to declare Liberius himself a heretic. Through his teaching many avoided the communion of Liberius, and he strengthened the assembled people in the Lord.

He was apprehended by Constantius, while Liberius himself said: "Are you alone a Christian in the city of Rome?" Eusebius answered: "Thus we trust in the Lord, because Christ will find us faithful, just as we preserve the blessing which we received from blessed Julius." Liberius said to him: "Do we not perform the office of Julius?" But Eusebius replied: "You would, if you had persevered in the faith which at first, during the persecution, you appeared to maintain. But the matter itself teaches you."

Constantius said: "And what difference is there between faith and faith?" Eusebius answered: "We sinners maintain the faith integrally, but the madness of the devil and the envy of superstition hold you, who sent Felix-a pure bishop and a priest declared such by everyone-into exile, and who ordered death to be inflicted upon Christians, and especially upon clerics, priests, and deacons."

Then the angered Constantius, at the request of Liberius, caused the priest Eusebius to be enclosed in a certain chamber of his house which was four feet high. Remaining enclosed there for many months and persevering constantly in prayer, after seven months he at last slept in the Lord on the nineteenth day before the Kalends of September.

The priests Gregory and Orosius collected his body, and his relatives buried it in the crypt beside the body of blessed Sixtus. There they also placed the inscription: "To Eusebius, man of God." When Constantius heard this, he caused Bishop Gregory to be enclosed alive in that same crypt. Then the priest Orosius secretly collected the half-living blessed Gregory by night because of the Augustus Constantius. When Gregory had breathed forth his spirit, Orosius buried him beside the body of Eusebius. This Orosius wrote down these deeds.

From that same day, by command of the emperor Constantius, whoever was found inside the churches not confessing or participating in the same manner as Liberius was punished with the sword without a hearing. People were slaughtered by the sword in the squares, streets, churches, and baths, while Constantius together with Liberius persecuted the Christians.

At Constantinople, as is contained in the martyrology, the natal feast of blessed Paul, bishop of that city, is celebrated on the seventh day before the Ides of June. Having been sent into exile by the Augustus Constantius because of the catholic faith, he was cruelly strangled through the plots of the Arians and migrated to the heavenly kingdoms.

At Trier also is celebrated the feast of Saint Paulinus, bishop and confessor, who was relegated into exile by Constantius because of the catholic faith. Wearied until death by the changing of his places of exile, he received from the Lord in Phrygia the crown of blessed suffering.

Likewise, on the seventh day before the Ides of May, the most sacred body of blessed Andrew the apostle, together with the bones of Saint Luke the evangelist and Timothy, the disciple of blessed Paul, were translated to Constantinople under the emperor Constantius.

Section VII: Leontius of Antioch and the conversion of Victorinus

When Gallus, having been made Caesar, came to Antioch, as the Tripartite History relates, a column in the form of a cross was seen in the sky around the East. At that time Leuntius [i.e., Leontius], who had succeeded Stephen, was bishop at Antioch. Before he was a prelate, he had been cast down from the dignity of the priesthood because, while living with a woman named Eustolia and wishing to conceal a shameful suspicion, he is known to have cut off his own genitals. Nevertheless, through the exertion of the emperor Constantius, he was afterward ordained bishop.

In his time, when hymns were said to God at the end of the psalms, the catholics said: “Glory to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Spirit.” The Arians, however, said: “Glory to the Father and to the lesser Son,” wishing to signify that the Son was less than the Father.

When the Arian Leuntius could not prohibit the catholics, he is reported to have touched his head, which was already gray, and said: “When this snow has dissolved, an immense quantity of mud will be gathered,” signifying that after his death there would be discord among the people because of the different manner of singing the psalms.

Under this Leuntius, Flavian and Diodorus were the first to divide the choirs of those singing psalms into two parts. From there this custom began to be observed throughout the whole world. Celebrating vigils at the tombs of the martyrs, they also summoned lovers of God to such service.

At this time, as Jerome writes in the Chronicle, Magnetius killed himself by his own hand in the palace at Lyon. His brother Decentius, whom he had sent as Caesar to defend the Gauls, ended his life by a noose at Sens, as was said above. Gallus Caesar, however, having been summoned by his cousin Constantius, into whose suspicion he had come because of his excellent disposition, was killed in Histria; and his brother Julian was called Caesar at Milan.

At that time Martin, as it is read, served as a soldier under Julian Caesar. Antony the monk died in the desert in the nineteenth year of the reign of Constantius and the one hundred and fifth year of his life. His sayings will be treated below.

In that same year-that is, the nineteenth of Constantius-as Jerome bears witness in the Chronicle, Hilary, bishop of Poitiers, who three years before had been driven into Phrygia through the faction of Saturninus, bishop of Arles, and the other Arians who were with him, composed books concerning our religion. But he and his books will be treated more fully when the doctors are discussed.

Around that time Victorinus the rhetor and Donatus the grammarian-“my teacher,” says Jerome in the Chronicle-were held to be distinguished at Rome. Of these, Victorinus even merited a statue in the Forum of Trajan. As Vincent says in the Historical Mirror, this is the Donatus whose little book is read to this day in the schools by boys learning the first rudiments of grammar.

I believe that this Victorinus is the man concerning whom Augustine says in the book of the Confessions that, when he was a gentile, he would say privately to his friend Simplicianus, a most devout man: “Know that I am a Christian.” Simplicianus would answer: “I shall not believe it unless I see you in the church.” And Victorinus, smiling, would say: “Do walls, then, make a Christian?”

When he had said these things several times, at last the fervor of faith overcame the shame by which he feared to displease his friends. He entered the church and publicly asked to be made a Christian. When the clerics offered him a written formula for professing that he believed the articles of faith, as was then the custom among them, and offered that he might do so, as it were, in secret, as though sparing his embarrassment, he refused. Instead, ascending the ambo where he could be seen by everyone, he publicly and in a loud voice confessed the things that belong to the faith, while the church was full, the Christian people rejoiced, and Rome marveled.

Section VIII: The death of Constantius

Finally, as is related from the Tripartite History, Constantius, coming to Opsocrenis [read: Mopsucrenis], died from an apoplectic seizure brought on by excessive eating [read: brought on by excessive anxiety]. Julian, called the Apostate, succeeded him. He was not the son of the aforesaid emperor Constantius, but the son of another Constantius, who was a cousin of his.

For an explanation of this, Hugh of Fleury, in the place cited above, relates that Constantine the Great, who called Byzantium Constantinople after his own name and magnificently adorned it, had two brothers from the same father but not from the same mother, namely Helena. For their father had only Constantine by Helena. Of these brothers, one was called Dalmatius and the other Constantius. This Constantius had two sons, namely Gallus and Julian. Of these, Gallus was Caesar for a short time under Constantius Augustus, but was killed through his agency. Julian, however, was made Caesar by him and sent against the rebellious Gauls. He suddenly conquered them and, having become pleasing to his soldiers, was called Augustus by them. When Constantius proceeded against him in war, he died on the journey, in the forty-fifth year of his life. Thus Constantius, who had persecuted the catholics, endured the whole period of his reign without peace.

Title IX: On Constantine the Great, Emperor

Chapter V: On Julian the Apostate

Julian's reign, education, apostasy, and accession

Julian therefore, as Jerome says in the Chronicle, reigned as the thirty-sixth emperor of the Romans, in the year of the Lord 364, but in the year of the world 4327 according to the lesser computation, and 5563 according to the greater. He reigned for one year and eight months. But Vincent says in book XV of the Historical Mirror that elsewhere three years are assigned to his reign, those eight months being counted as one year; hence there seems to have been an error of a scribe here. Finally, Bede, in the book On Times, says that he reigned for two years and eight months.

This Julian, as is contained in the Tripartite History, while formerly studying at Constantinople as a young man, had Mardonius as his pedagogue, Nicoles as his grammarian [read: Nicocles as his grammarian], and Eubolius the sophist, who was then a Christian, as his teacher of rhetoric. Julian himself was also a Christian at first. When he advanced in learning-or, according to another reading, in speaking-a report spread among the people that he was capable even of governing the Roman commonwealth. When this became more widely heard, it caused agitation in the emperor Constantius. For that reason he removed Julian from the city of Rome [read: the imperial city] and sent him to Nicomedia, forbidding him to associate with Libanius the sophist, who lived there and was a pagan. Julian therefore did not dare to visit Libanius, but nevertheless used his books.

Then Maximus, the Ephesian philosopher, came to him, drawn by his reputation; Valentinian afterward ordered this man to be killed as a magician. When Julian had first tasted his words as though they were philosophical, he began to imitate his religion. Maximus also put a desire for the empire into his mind.

Since these things did not escape the emperor's ears, Julian, placed between hope and fear, wished to conceal the suspicion against him. He who had formerly been an upright Christian was afterward made a betrayer. Having been tonsured, he pretended to live the monastic life: secretly he was indeed exercised in philosophy, but publicly he read the sacred books of the Christians. Finally, he was appointed a lector in the church of Nicomedia, and under this guise he escaped the emperor's fury. He did these things because of fear, while in no way abandoning the hope which he had conceived in his mind. He would say to his friends that happy times would come when he became emperor.

Afterward he became suspect to the emperor and fled. Eusebia, the emperor's wife, found him in concealment and with difficulty persuaded the emperor that he should not be killed, but should be sent to Athens to study philosophy. Coming there and seeking diviners everywhere, he found one who caused demons solemnly to appear to him. When Julian saw them, he signed himself, and immediately the demons fled. The magician reproved him because he had signed himself. When Julian praised the power of the cross, the magician said: “Do not suppose, good man, that they feared this sign; rather, they withdrew because they abhorred it.” Thus, ensnaring the wretched man, he filled him with hatred for the Christian sign.

After Julian was subsequently recalled from Athens, he was appointed Caesar by Constantius, received Constantia, the latter's sister, as his wife, and was sent into Gaul against the barbarians. When he entered a certain city, a laurel crown of the kind with which cities are customarily adorned was hanging between columns. The cord broke, and it fell upon his head and crowned him most fittingly. He therefore conquered the king of the barbarians and was called Augustus. Since an imperial crown was lacking, one of the standard-bearers placed around his head the torque which he wore upon his neck.

Puffed up by this title, Julian despised Constantius and persuaded Italy and Illyricum to adhere to him, as Hugh says in the place cited above. When Constantius, who was situated in the imperial city, heard this, he abandoned the preparation for the Persian war and proceeded against him. But, as was said, he died on the journey. Julian came to Constantinople and was made emperor.

Wishing to please everyone, Julian recalled the catholics whom Constantius had exiled, and he gave pagans permission to sacrifice to idols. He expelled eunuchs, barbers, and cooks from the palace: the eunuchs because his wife had died and he did not marry another after her; the barbers, he said, because one was sufficient for many; and the cooks because he used simple foods.

He was the only emperor since Julius Caesar to recite orations in the senate house. He gathered philosophers from every quarter. In an oration which he wrote concerning the Caesars, he assailed all the rulers before him. Moved by this arrogance, he also wrote against the Christians. In the third book Against the Christians, after he had collected many examples of the human dispensations in Christ, he said: “If each of these does not possess some ineffable contemplation, they plainly constitute the greatest blasphemy against God.”

Section I: Julian's character and his measures against Christians

Concerning Julian's character and appearance, Gregory of Nazianzus says in book IX Against the Pagans: “Julian's character became known to me while I knew him more clearly at Athens. The exceeding abundance of his inconstancy of character made me cautious. For he is an excellent prophet who considers well. I saw no sign in him that appeared useful to me: a rigid and inflexible neck; shoulders tossed about; eyes darting, directed here and there, and looking furiously; restless feet; nostrils breathing injuries and contempt; ridiculous gestures always bearing this same quality; unrestrained and, as it were, bubbling laughter; assent and denial together; conduct established upon no reason; disorderly questioning; and a response possessing no agreement with itself. When I had seen these things, I immediately said: ‘O what an evil the Roman commonwealth is nourishing!’” Thus far he.

It is contained in the Tripartite History that he grew a long beard like a philosopher. The people of Antioch mocked him about it in this way: “Let his beard be shorn, so that it may be useful for ropes.” And because, on account of his superstition, he very frequently sacrificed a bull to the idols, he ordered an altar and a bull to be fashioned upon his solidus. Therefore the people of Antioch said: “This bull overturns the world.” Retaliating with insults, he published a sufficiently witty and urbane book against the people of Antioch, which he called the Antiochene.

Concerning his savagery toward Christians, it is said from the Tripartite History that through certain sacrifices, invocations, and the immolation of blood he attempted to wash away our baptism and to renounce his ecclesiastical profession. He polluted the springs of Daphne near Antioch with sacrifices so that those who drank the water might be affected by its horror. When he had also polluted with that crime foods offered for sale in public-for bread, meat, fruit, and vegetables were sprinkled from the sacrifices-the Christians groaned when they saw it. Nevertheless, according to the apostle's command, they ate them: “Eat everything that is sold in the meat market,” and so forth.

Julian indeed pretended to have a mild countenance, but he prepared snares with which to deceive the innocent. In public images he painted Jupiter, Mercury, and Mars, and in this way he secretly caused his subjects to adore the gods. He also caused pagans to become accustomed to the Christians' works of duty.

Concerning matters of this kind he wrote to Arsacius, pontiff of Galatia, admonishing him that a priest should not attend spectacles, should not drink in taverns, and should not take part in shameful things. He had established hospices in every city; for this work he ordered thirty thousand modii of grain and sixty sextarii of wine [read: thirty thousand modii of grain and sixty thousand sextarii of wine] to be given to him each year. “A fifth part of these,” he said, “ought to be expended upon the poor who attend the temple, and the rest distributed to the needy and to strangers.” He also said that contributions of this kind were to be made by those offering the first fruits of their crops to the gods. Homer, he said, approves this by introducing Eumenius doing such things [read: introducing Eumaeus doing such things].

When Christians came to him because they were being excessively burdened with tributes and exactions, he answered: “It is your part to endure evils patiently, for this is the command of your God.” At Caesarea Philippi, he took down the bronze image of the Savior which had been erected by the woman freed from the flow of blood through touching the hem of his garment. In place of it he set up his own statue. Fire falling from heaven split it around the breast, and the head with the neck was cast down as one part; the remaining part stood until that time and preserved the mark of the thunderbolt.

While he was sacrificing, a sign of the cross surrounded by a crown was shown to him in the entrails of the animal. When others interpreted this as a victory of the Crucified, he answered that the Crucified was rather being confined and that no space was being left to him for expansion.

Wishing to please the Jews as well as the gentiles, he commanded them to rebuild their temple. They made no progress in the work, since whatever they constructed by day fell at night, with danger to many. When this had now happened for three days, on the fourth day a splendid sign of the cross appeared in the sky, and the garments of the Jews were filled with the sign of the cross.

While Julian was sacrificing at the shrine of Fortune at Constantinople, Maris, bishop of Chalcedon, who had been blinded by old age and was guided by the hand of another, openly called him an apostate. Julian said to him: “Not even your Galilean God is able to cure you.” He answered: “I give thanks to God that I do not see you stripped of piety.”

Julian withdrew all privileges from our clerics, dissolved both the honors and the laws enacted for them, and handed them over to the curiae. He ordered virgins and widows who were supported by the churches to pay back the things which they appeared formerly to have received from the public treasury. He removed the ornaments of the churches, destroyed our temples, and demanded again the money previously given for their construction.

He was exceedingly hostile to the inhabitants of Caesarea in Palestine because, even while he was reigning, they had demolished the shrine of Fortune which alone had remained. Therefore, seeking the possessions and money of those churches by means of beatings, he collected three hundred pounds of gold from them. He also caused all the clerics to be enrolled among the soldiers to serve the province.

Concerning this Julian, Augustine and Ambrose speak thus in XI, Question III: “Was not the unbelieving emperor Julian an apostate and an unjust idolater? Yet Christian soldiers served an unbelieving emperor. When the matter came to the cause of Christ, they recognized none but him who is in heaven. When he wished them to adore idols, offer incense, or move arms against Christians, they placed God before him. When he said, ‘Lead out the battle line for the defense of the commonwealth against such a nation,’ they immediately obeyed. They distinguished the eternal God from a temporal lord.” Thus far there.

Section II: Lucifer of Cagliari and the Luciferian schism

Concerning Lucifer the heresiarch, Rufinus narrates in book X of the Ecclesiastical History, saying that Lucifer was entreated by Eusebius, namely the bishop of Vercelli-since each had been relegated to regions near Egypt-that they should go to Alexandria to see Athanasius and, by common deliberation with those priests who had survived, determine the state of the Church. Lucifer refused to be present himself and sent his deacon as a legate in his place, while he himself proceeded with intent purpose to Antioch.

He appointed Paulinus bishop while the parties there were still divided among themselves, yet hoping that they could be recalled into one body if such a man were chosen for them in whom both peoples, not merely one, might rejoice.

Meanwhile Eusebius proceeded to Alexandria. There a council of confessors was assembled, few in number but integral in faith and many in merits. They assigned the care of the East to Athanasius and that of the West to Eusebius. There a fuller discussion concerning the Holy Spirit was added: namely, that he should be believed to be of the same substance and deity as the Father and the Son, and that nothing at all in the Trinity should be called created, inferior, or later.

Through Scripture a discussion also arose among them concerning the difference between substances and subsistences, which the Greeks call ousiai and hypostaseis. For “substance” signifies the very nature and principle by which some thing is constituted, while “subsistence” indicates of each person the very fact that it exists and subsists. Therefore, because of the heresy of Sabellius, three substances-that is, subsistences or hypostases-were to be confessed. Concerning the incarnation of the Lord, it was also established in that council that the body which the Lord assumed was assumed neither without sense nor without a soul.

When Eusebius returned to Antioch and found a bishop ordained there contrary to his promise, he departed, impelled by shame and indignation together, granting his communion to neither party. For when he had left that place, he had promised that he would act in the council so that a bishop would be ordained for them from whom neither party would withdraw.

Meanwhile Lucifer, grieving over the injury that Eusebius had not received the bishop ordained by him, himself did not intend to receive the decrees of the Alexandrian council. Yet he was bound by the act of his legate, who had subscribed to the council by Lucifer's authority. He chose, therefore, after receiving back his legate, to preserve toward the others his own opinion, different from theirs but pleasing to himself.

Thus he returned to the regions of Sardinia and died, whether because, having been quickly overtaken by death, he had no time to change his opinion-for things rashly conceived are commonly corrected with time-or because he remained immovably fixed in this disposition. In the meantime, however, the schism of the Luciferians took its beginning from him.

Their error, as is contained in XXIV, Question III, the penultimate chapter, consisted in this: they were unwilling that those who had adhered to the Arians should be received or should remain in their orders and dignities, even though they returned to the catholic faith. Nevertheless, the council, or the fathers in it, had mercifully decreed and determined that they were to be received. On this account, those called Luciferians separated themselves from the unity of the Church and were declared heretics.

Eusebius, however, as the Tripartite History continues, journeying through the East and Italy, discharged the office of physician and priest together. He recalled each of the churches, after they had renounced unbelief, to the health of right faith. In particular, he found Hilary, now returned from exile and situated in Italy, striving for those same things in restoring the churches and repairing the faith of the fathers. Hilary, however, was a man gentle and peaceable by nature, learned at the same time, and most well suited to persuasion; he therefore conducted the affair more diligently and suitably. He also published nobly written books concerning the faith, in which he carefully exposed both the cunning deceits of the heretics, the deceptions suffered by our people, and their simplicity, prone to believe wrongly. Thus these two men, like certain magnificent lights of the world, illuminated Illyricum, Italy, and the Gauls with their splendor, so that all the darkness of the heretics was driven away even from hidden and confined corners.

Section III: Julian's laws and persecution against the faithful

After Julian came to the East to attack the Persians in war, he began to be carried along in public by the madness toward the worship of idols which he had previously concealed. More cunning than the other persecutors, he struck down almost a greater part of the people through rewards, honors, flatteries, and persuasions than if he had assailed them cruelly by violence and torments.

Then also, as is said in the Tripartite History, he established laws against piety. First, he forbade the sons of the Galileans-for so he called the worshipers of Christ-to study the disciplines of the poets, rhetoricians, and philosophers. “For according to the proverb,” he said, “we are wounded by our own feathers, since, armed with our own writings, they undertake wars against us.” He also enacted another law, commanding that the Galileans be expelled from military service.

Jerome says in the Chronicle that Phesius, an Athenian sophist [read: that Prohaeresius, an Athenian sophist], when a law had been issued that Christians should not be teachers of the liberal arts, voluntarily abandoned his school, although Julian granted to him personally that he might teach as a Christian.

And so, as Rufinus says, Julian decreed that the schools of letters should be open only to those who venerated gods and goddesses. He ordered that the belt of military service should be given only to those who sacrificed. He determined that the government of provinces and the authority to pronounce law ought not to be entrusted to Christians, since their own law had forbidden them even to use the sword. Each day he advanced in devising laws of this kind, in which he might discern something subtle or cunning, yet something that appeared less cruel.

When, like foul serpents bubbling forth from the caverns of the earth, the profane bands of magicians, philosophers, haruspices, and augurs had come to him, they all alleged alike that nothing would succeed through their arts unless Athanasius were first removed as an obstacle to them all. Therefore he was sought for death, but he remained in hiding.

Julian also gave another proof of his folly and levity. For when at Daphne in the suburb of Antioch he poured a libation to Apollo and received no answer concerning the things which he asked, he inquired from the priests about the causes of the silence. They said that the demons declared the tomb of the martyr Babylas to be situated nearby and that for this reason the responses were not given. Then Julian ordered the Galileans to come and remove the martyr's tomb.

Accordingly, the whole Church assembled-women and men, young men and virgins, girded with immense exultation-and in a long procession they drew the martyr's shrine, singing psalms with the greatest cries and saying with exultation: “Let all who adore carved images be confounded, and those who glory in their idols.” For six miles the faithful people sang this in the ears of the profane prince with such exultation that the sky resounded with their cries.

From this Julian was driven into so great a rage of anger that on the following day he ordered Christians to be apprehended everywhere, thrust into prison, and afflicted with punishments and tortures. Sallustius, his prefect, did not approve this, although he was a gentile; nevertheless, under orders, he carried it out.

He seized one young man who first came before him, named Theodore, and tortured him from first light until the tenth hour with such cruelty, and with so many executioners taking turns, that no age remembers a similar deed. Yet Theodore, suspended upon the rack while the torturer pressed upon his sides from either direction, did nothing except repeat, with a serene and joyful countenance, the psalm which the whole Church had sung on the preceding day.

When Sallustius perceived that, after expending every cruelty, he had accomplished nothing, he returned the young man to prison. He is said to have gone to the emperor, reported what he had done, and admonished him not to attempt anything of that sort thereafter; otherwise he would procure glory for the Christians and dishonor for himself.

“We ourselves afterward saw this Theodore at Antioch. When we asked him whether he had experienced a sensation of pain, he said plainly that he had indeed felt little pain, but that a certain young man had stood beside him, wiping the sweat from him with a most white linen cloth and frequently pouring cold water upon him. He was so delighted by this that he became sadder when he was ordered to be taken down from the rack.”

As is said in the Tripartite History, after the body of the martyr Babylas was removed, a thunderbolt sent from heaven reduced to ashes the entire temple of Apollo, together with its golden and gilded image.

The vessels of the churches were also ordered to be assigned to the treasury. Julian, the maternal uncle of this Julian, gathered in one place at Antioch the cloths dedicated to God, contemptuously threw them upon the ground, and sat upon them. Immediately his private parts and the regions surrounding his thighs were struck with so great a putrefaction that they bred worms. He was not free of this affliction until his death.

They caused sacred virgins, unaccustomed to being seen by the people, to stand naked in the theater; finally, after cutting them through the middle, they invited pigs to eat them. At Ascalon and Gaza, pagans cut virgins apart, heaped barley upon them, and set them before pigs.

At Sebaste they opened the tomb of John the Baptist, committed the bones to fire, and scattered the ashes. Bede, however, says in On Times that certain monks then living there collected some small particles from those bones.

In Heliopolis, a city of Phoenicia, as Theodoric relates [read: as Theodoret relates], pagans cut open the belly of the deacon Cyril and even ate from his liver. Whoever participated in that crime lost their teeth and became unable to speak, because their tongues putrefied and fell away; they also lost their sight.

The same author relates that the doors of the greater church at Antioch were taken away. Julian, prefect of the East, then entered together with Felix, superintendent of the royal treasuries, and Helpidius, count of the private affairs, who had once been Christians. The prefect Julian urinated against the sacred altar. Felix, seeing the most precious vessels which Constantine and Constantius had frequently offered, said: “See in what vessels the Son of Mary is served!”

Not long afterward, the aforementioned Julian died when his bowels putrefied, expelling excrement not below but above. His most Christian wife vehemently rebuked him. He therefore asked the emperor that the church be restored to those from whom it had been taken, but he died without bending the emperor. Felix, pouring blood from his mouth by day and night and with the veins of his body emptied on every side, quickly expired.

Valentinian, who was then a millenarius but afterward emperor, struck with his fist one of the ministers of the temple of Fortune who purified those entering the temple by sprinkling them. For Valentinian had seen a drop of water upon his cloak and said that he had been defiled by that purification. On account of this he was immediately sent into exile.

Section IV: The martyrdom of John and Paul

Under this Julian the Apostate, the brothers John and Paul, Gallicanus, Saint Donatus, bishop of Arezzo, and very many others suffered, as Vincent narrates in the place cited above from their deeds.

For when Julian heard that John and Paul were sustaining the poor from their own possessions, he commanded them to adhere to him just as they had adhered to Constantine. But they said: “While the glorious emperors Constantine and his sons, Constans and Constantius, gloried in being servants of Christ, we Christians served them. But because you have abandoned a religion full of virtues, we scorn to obey you and have withdrawn ourselves entirely from you.”

Julian sent this answer back to them: “I myself once held a clerical office in the Church, and, if I had wished, I would have attained the first rank of the Church. But, considering it vain to pursue inactivity and leisure, I applied my mind to military service; and by sacrificing to the gods I acted in such a way that I attained the empire. Therefore you, who were reared in the imperial court, ought not to be absent from my side, so that I may have you as the first men in my palace. But if you despise me, I shall act so that I am despised [read: But if you despise me, I shall act so that you do not despise me].”

They answered: “Placing God before you, we do not fear to lose the friendship of a mortal man, lest we incur the enmity of the eternal God.” Julian then fixed a period of ten days in which they might come to him voluntarily, after which he would compel them to come. They said: “Carry out today what you intend to do after ten days.”

During those ten days they therefore distributed all their possessions to the poor. On the eleventh day, at the hour of supper, Terentianus came to them bearing a small image of fire [read: a golden statuette of Jupiter]. When they refused to adore it, he caused a pit to be made in their house and concealed them there after they had been beheaded, publishing abroad that by the emperor's command they had been sent into exile. A little afterward Julian was killed in the war against the Persians, as will be related below.

Demons, moreover, were cast out of possessed bodies within the saints' house, confessing their suffering, to such a degree that the son of Terentianus cried out in that house that he was being burned by the holy martyrs. Seeing this, Terentianus was converted to the faith, and his son was freed from the demon.

Section V: Saint Gallicanus

Saint Gallicanus also suffered under Julian. He had formerly been Constantine's master of the soldiers and was greatly beloved by him. When Constantine sent him against the Scythians, who had rebelled against the empire, Gallicanus asked that, if he returned victorious from the battle, Constantine's daughter Constantia should be given to him as a wife.

Constantine was deeply saddened by this request, considering that Gallicanus was a pagan and that his daughter had a purpose of virginity. Constantia herself consoled her father, strengthening him so that he should not distrust God, but should promise Gallicanus what he had requested if he returned victorious against the Scythians.

It was accordingly settled that John and Paul, the chief officers of Constantia and most Christian men, should proceed with Gallicanus into battle, while Gallicanus's two daughters, Arthica [i.e., Attica] and Arthemia [i.e., Artemia], should remain with Constantia in the meantime.

Gallicanus therefore returned victorious and, having been received joyfully by everyone, hastened to the church of the apostles to give thanks to God. Seeing this, Constantine was astonished because Gallicanus was a pagan. When he asked why he had done this, Gallicanus answered:

“While I was in battle, when our men were failing and I did not know what I should do, Paul and John told me that I would immediately obtain victory if I made a vow to the God of heaven. As soon as I did this, a certain young man appeared to me bearing a cross upon his shoulder and said to me: ‘Take your sword and follow me.’ Then two armed soldiers stood beside me. Strengthening me on either side, they led me through the midst of the enemy to their king. I received him and his two sons bound from them, and I killed no one at all, nor did I do so or order it to be done. I have vowed myself a Christian, and I have also resolved to abstain from marriage.”

While everyone therefore rejoiced, his two daughters, already converted through Constantia, remained with her in virginity. Gallicanus himself departed from there and built a monastery near the city of Ostia. There he ministered with his own hands to the poor and to strangers.

When he was asked to be bishop there, he refused, but chose the man who was to be ordained. He performed such great miracles there that demons fled from possessed bodies at his command alone. He had four houses in which he stored provisions for the poor. God guarded them in such a way that whoever entered maliciously or for the purpose of taking anything immediately became either demoniac or leprous.

When the demons were then questioned, they answered that unless Gallicanus sacrificed, the disease which had occurred would invade all collectors of revenues. But because no one dared to approach so great a man concerning this matter, the emperor Julian commanded him either to depart from that place or to sacrifice to the idols. Immediately abandoning everything, Gallicanus sought Alexandria and was joined to the saints there for one entire year. From there he withdrew into the desert. When, even there, he was invited to sacrifice and scorned to do so, he was beheaded and passed to the Lord.

Section VI: Saint Donatus of Arezzo and other martyrs

Under the same Julian, Saint Donatus, bishop of Arezzo, also suffered. He had once been raised as a cleric at Rome by the priest Pigmenius and was instructed together with the emperor Julian in all worldly wisdom. In divine teaching he was a gentle and humble lector.

After Julian assumed the empire, he ordered Donatus's father and mother to be killed. Donatus fled to the town of Arezzo, and the monk Hilarinus received him joyfully into his house. As they lived together, applying themselves to prayers and abstinence, many sick persons were healed through their merits. Donatus was ordained priest by Satyrus, bishop of the city of Arezzo.

In those days there was a certain man named Eustachius, a collector of the treasury. While he was administering municipal affairs, a war arose which harassed the province. When his wife, named Euphrosyna, saw the enemy approaching, she feared that the money of the treasury which her husband possessed would be taken from her. In her husband's absence she took the public money and concealed it; amid this tribulation she was overtaken by death.

When peace had been restored, Eustachius returned to the city. Finding his wife dead, he searched through the house for the said money. When he did not find it and the money entrusted to him was demanded back by the officials, he and his sons were taken into secure custody so that they might be handed over to punishment. He approached the holy priest Donatus and explained his affliction and danger.

Donatus said to him: “Show me the tomb of your wife.” Going with him to it and offering a prayer over the tomb, Saint Donatus said: “Euphrosyna, I adjure you through the Holy Spirit to say what you did, or where you placed the money for which your husband is now being tortured.” Suddenly a voice came from the tomb, saying: “At the entrance of my house; I concealed it there by digging.” They searched there and found it, and through this the man was freed from that distress.

When the bishop of the city of Arezzo had died, Donatus was elected by the voice of all and, although he resisted greatly, was consecrated. When on a certain day he was celebrating Mass and his deacon was ministering the blood of Christ to the faithful people, the deacon, pushed by pagans, fell, and the holy chalice was broken. After its fragments had been collected-for it was made of glass-Saint Donatus restored it by his prayer to its former form. Through this miracle very many were converted to the faith and baptized.

After these things Quadratianus, an augustalis, took Hilarinus and Donatus captive and attempted to compel them to sacrifice. When they refused, he ordered the mouth of Donatus to be pounded with stones. While he was being struck, Donatus said: “I have always desired this.”

Finally, Quadratianus caused Hilarinus to be beaten with clubs until he breathed forth his spirit, and Donatus to be thrust into prison. After Donatus was freed from his chains, he approached a spring of water near the city where there was a dragon that infected the water and made it poisonous. When Donatus approached the place upon a little ass, the dragon came out to meet him in order to devour him. Saint Donatus struck it with a whip and killed it; he purified the water itself from the poison and made it drinkable. By his prayer he also procured another spring for the people.

Furthermore, he freed from a demon the daughter of a certain great but pagan man who was called Theodosius. And, what is more marvelous, he raised a certain dead man for a time. For the dead man had a creditor to whom he had owed two hundred gold solidi and who possessed a bond written by the debtor's hand. Although the money had been repaid to the creditor, the debtor had not received back the bond. The creditor was preventing the burial until satisfaction should be made to him concerning the debt, and he displayed the bond.

The dead man's wife, knowing that the money had been repaid to him, approached Saint Donatus, commending herself to him in this matter. Donatus came with her to the bier and said to the dead man: “Rise and see what you are to do with this man, who does not permit you to be buried.” Rising and sitting upright in the coffin, the dead man refuted the creditor concerning the debt that had been paid; receiving the bond himself, he tore it apart. Looking upon the saint of God, he said: “Command me, therefore, to sleep again.” Donatus answered: “Go, son, in peace.”

On another occasion, when there was a great drought from which famine followed, he obtained abundant rain by prayer. Although he was then outside the city, he returned home with dry garments, as though not even a drop of water had touched those garments.

Finally, Quadratianus, hearing of the marvels which Donatus performed and on account of which the Christian people increased, ordered him to be beheaded.

Gordianus also, a vicarius of Julian, was attempting to compel the holy priest Januarius to sacrifice. Through Januarius's preaching Gordianus was converted to the faith and was baptized with his wife Marina and fifty-three persons from his household. First the image of Jupiter which they had in the house was melted down and, through Saint Januarius, cast into the sewer.

When Julian heard this after some days, he commanded Clementianus to send Januarius into exile and, if Gordianus refused to sacrifice, to behead him. This was done, and Gordianus's body was thrown to the dogs. But during the night it was taken up by his household, and he was buried with blessed Epimachus, whom Julian had caused to be killed in those days.

Julian the Apostate also caused Saint Pigmenius himself, who had raised the emperor Julian from boyhood and instructed him in sacred letters, to be cast into the Tiber for the faith of Christ. He made very many other martyrs of Christ as well, as is evident from the martyrology.

Section VII: The martyrdom of Cyriacus of Jerusalem

When Julian proceeded against the Persians in war, he came to Jerusalem and caused Bishop Cyriacus to be sought out. This man had found the Lord's cross at the request of Saint Helena. He had been called Judas by his parents, but after he was converted to the faith he was called Cyriacus.

When Cyriacus was presented before Julian, the emperor attempted to persuade him to sacrifice to the idols, promising him riches and great honors in return. When he refused, Julian ordered him to be stretched out and molten lead to be poured into his open mouth. When he received no injury from this, Julian caused him to be stretched upon an iron bed, with burning coals placed beneath it and salt and fat scattered over them, and ordered his body to be beaten from above with rods. Speaking in Hebrew, Cyriacus prayed to God.

The tyrant, marveling at his endurance, ordered him to be taken back to prison. His mother, named Anna, came to him and exhorted him to contend manfully for Christ. When this was reported to Julian, she was presented before him by his command. Because she refused to sacrifice, he commanded her to be suspended by her hair and torn with iron claws.

When she had been tortured for three hours and said nothing, the emperor said: “What is it, Anna? Have the claws treated you well?” She answered: “Senseless dog and worker of every iniquity, if you possess greater torments, bring them forth. For I am prepared to contend against your father Satan, whom I hope to conquer through the name of Christ.” Then the Apostate ordered burning lamps to be applied to her sides, and she breathed forth her spirit.

Afterward Cyriacus was summoned. When he was asked by what magical practices it came about that he did not feel the punishments, he answered: “O accursed and unworthy dog, you who turn the power of God into magical practices, after not many days you will be struck by a heavenly plague.”

Then the tyrant ordered a deep pit to be made and a multitude of serpents to be placed in it by enchanters, and Cyriacus to be cast among them. None of these harmed him in any way. When a certain soldier named Amon, moved by this miracle, rebuked the tyrant for such great madness and confessed that the God of the Christians is great, he was beheaded.

After these things Julian commanded Cyriacus to be placed in a cauldron full of boiling oil. Finally, when he received no injury from this, Julian caused him to be struck in the breast with a very powerful iron instrument. From this he was taken up into glory on the fourth day before the Nones of May.

When Cyriacus was bishop at Jerusalem, the Lord performed many miracles through him by expelling demons and healing the sick.

Section VIII: Julian's Persian expedition and death

Julian the Apostate, therefore, continuing against the Persians, sent a demon into the West, as is contained in the Lives of the Fathers, so that it might bring him some response from there. When the demon wished to pass through a place where a certain monk named Publius lived, it was unable to pass, but remained there for ten days. During this period the monk did not cease from prayer by day or by night.

At last the demon returned ineffectually to Julian and reported to him that the monk Publius had not permitted it to pass. Julian said in anger: “When I return, I shall take vengeance upon him.” But not long afterward he was destroyed, as will be related.

As Socrates bears witness in the Tripartite History, when there was at Antioch, among others, a certain excellent instructor of young men, and Julian had threatened that upon his return from Persia he would destroy all the Christians, a sophist named Libanius said to that instructor, mocking him and the Christians as it were: “What do you think the carpenter's son is doing now?” He answered prophetically: “The Creator of all, whom you have called the carpenter's son, is fashioning a little coffin for Julian.” And so it happened that after a few days Julian's dead body was brought back in a little coffin. Nevertheless, the response of that demon concerning the victory to be obtained had been false, just as both it and its father are liars.

As the Apostate Julian was passing through the regions of Caesarea, Basil, bishop of Cappadocia, came out to meet him with many attendants. Seeing him, the emperor said: “I have out-philosophized you, O Basil.” Basil answered: “Would that you had philosophized!” And he offered him three barley loaves as a blessing.

The emperor ordered his attendants to receive them and to give Basil hay in return, saying: “Barley is the fodder of beasts. Since he gave it to us, let him himself receive hay.” Receiving it, Basil said: “We, O emperor, offered you from the things which we eat. But you have given us that with which you nourish the irrationality of your nature; although you willingly mocked our offering, unwillingly you have made this hay into food for us.”

Hearing this, Julian raged and said to him: “The feeding of this hay shall be given to you without being taken away. But when I have returned after subduing the Persians, I shall desolate your city, so that it may become more productive of hay than of men. For I am not ignorant of the audacity you urged upon your people: unable to endure the enchantment, they completely restrained the goddess whom I adored after setting her up [read: they completely shattered the goddess whom I adored after setting her up].” Having said these things, he proceeded toward the region of the Persians.

Basil returned to the city, summoned the entire multitude, related the emperor's words to it, and gave it excellent counsel, saying: “Brothers, reckon money as nothing and provide for our safety, so that, if time is granted, we may placate the tyrant upon his return with gifts.” Going to their houses, each person brought to Basil with eagerness the things which he possessed in his hands, namely an infinite quantity of gold, silver, and precious stones.

Basil placed these things in the treasury, writing each person's name above them, and said to them: “God is powerful both to strike him and to restore your possessions to you.” Immediately he commanded all the people and clergy of the city, together with the women and infants, to ascend the mountain upon which a temple had been built in honor of Mary the Mother of God. Undertaking a fast for three days, they asked the Lord to scatter the purpose of the wicked emperor.

While they persevered in prayer, Basil saw a multitude of the heavenly army on either side of the mountain. In their midst there sat upon a glorious throne one in the appearance of a woman, saying to the magnificent men standing nearest her: “Call Mercurius for me.” When he stood before her, she said to him: “Kill Julian, who blasphemes against God and my Son.” Saint Mercurius, who had been a soldier during his life, was seen to depart swiftly from her with his armor.

That lady then called Basil and gave him a little book containing in its narrative the whole creation of the world and, on the right, man fashioned by God. At the end, where man had been fashioned, was the word “Spare.” Basil immediately awoke from sleep and was placed at once in fear and joy. Libanius the sophist, who was in Persia and was discharging the office of quaestor, saw a similar vision of Julian's death on the same night.

Greatly astonished, Basil came to the city with Eubolus alone and approached the place of Saint Mercurius's tomb, where his arms were also preserved. When Basil sought those arms and did not find them, he asked the custodian where they were. The custodian affirmed with an oath that they had been there in the evening. Basil understood the vision and, gladdened by it, returned to the mountain while everyone was still sleeping.

When he had awakened them, he revealed the vision, saying that the emperor Julian had been killed that night. Giving thanks to God, they returned to the city and approached Saint Mercurius's tomb, where his lance was kept affixed. They saw that it was wet with blood.

While everyone was assembled in the church and praising God, behold, Libanius, Julian's quaestor, who had escaped by flight, came into the congregation in the church and narrated the death of the impious Julian. He said that when Julian was beside the river Euphrates with his army, and the soldiers' watches were guarding him, a certain unknown soldier came with his arms and a lance. With a violent and terrible assault he pierced Julian and, suddenly departing, appeared nowhere. The most wretched Julian himself gave forth a horrible cry and expired with a blasphemous shout. Libanius also narrated the similar vision which he had received concerning this; hence he sought and received baptism.

On the following day Basil commanded each person to take back the possessions deposited with him. They all said with one voice: “If we wished to give all these things to a temporal emperor so that he would not demolish our city, much more ought we to offer them to the eternal emperor, who has freed us from so great a destruction. Behold, all things are in your hands. Do with them as God shall command you.” Even though they were unwilling, Basil gave a third part of the possessions back to them. He expended the remainder upon the adornment of the church and gave a part to the poor.

Jerome, however, says thus in the Chronicle: “Julian set out against the Persians and, after victory, had vowed the blood of our people to the gods. There he was led into the desert by someone through a pretended flight. When through hunger and thirst the Apostate had lost his army and, unadvised [read: too incautiously], was wandering away from the columns of his own men, his flanks were pierced by an enemy horseman who happened to meet him, and he died in the fortieth year of his age [read: the thirty-second year of his age].”

As Hugh of Fleury says, when Julian was dying he began to blaspheme Christ the Lord, saying: “You have conquered, Galilean; you have conquered!” With these words the wretched man expired in the third year of his reign.

Socrates bears witness in the Tripartite History that, in the city of Carthage, a woman was found in the temple where Julian, when setting out, had secretly sacrificed. She was suspended by her hair, with her hands stretched out and her womb opened; in her liver he had sought a sign of victory. At Antioch, many chests full of human heads were found in the palace, and innumerable bodies of the dead were found submerged in wells.

When Julian's death had been announced in that city, the people celebrated a public festival, saying in the theaters with exhortation: “O greatest fool, where are your prophecies? God and his Christ have conquered.”

Section IX: The reign of Jovian

After Julian's death, as Hugh of Fleury bears witness, Jovian reigned for eight months. He was a strong and noble man. At the time when Julian set before his soldiers by law the choice that they should either sacrifice or withdraw from military service, Jovian was a millenarius. He chose to lose the military belt rather than obey the emperor's impious commands. Nevertheless, when Julian set out for war, he retained Jovian among the military men because of the necessity of the war.

When, after Julian's death, Jovian was forcibly drawn by the soldiers to the imperial office, he said that he was unwilling to rule pagan men, since he himself was a Christian. When the voice of everyone acclaimed him in common, saying that they too were Christians, he accepted the empire.

Sozomen says that the emperor Jovian issued to Secundus, prefect of the praetorium, a law that those who presumed to violate a sacred virgin by a nuptial bed should be punished with a capital sentence, as should those who looked upon her with an immodest gaze, to say nothing of those who perhaps attempted to seize her.

As soon as Jovian was elected, Rufinus says in the Ecclesiastical History, divine clemency came to him beyond all hope. For they were confined on every side and held by the enemy, and no means of escape was available. Suddenly they saw envoys sent by the barbarians asking for peace and promising food and other necessities for sale to the army, which had been consumed by want.

Thus, after peace had been arranged for twenty-nine years, Jovian returned to Roman soil. Admonished by the fall of his predecessor, he sought out Athanasius by honorable and most dutiful letters. From Athanasius he received the form of the faith and the manner in which the churches were to be ordered.

Having been made emperor, Hugh of Fleury says, Jovian considered the common safety and how he might lead the army unharmed from the midst of the enemy. But when he had been trapped by the difficulty of the terrain and surrounded by the enemy, and foresaw no means of escape, he made a treaty with Sapor, king of the Persians, and conceded to him the town of Nisibis and a part of upper Mesopotamia. Afterward the Persian king caused a market of goods to be prepared for him in the desert, and thus Jovian led the Roman army unharmed from the midst of the enemy.

But when he had returned to Illyricum, he withdrew into a certain new chamber. There, overwhelmed and suffocated by the heat of the coals and the brightness of the walls recently coated with lime, he ended his life in the eighth month after he had begun to rule. Thus an untimely death ruined beginnings so pious and so joyful.

This Jovian, as James of Colonna relates, was from Pannonia. As the delivery of his father's wife approached, it was announced to his father in a dream that he should call the child Jovian. He was distinguished in body, joyful in spirit, devoted in intellect to the study of letters, inclined to civility, naturally liberal, most skilled in military affairs, and lacking in nothing required for governing the empire. He died in the twenty-third year of his age.

Section X: Apollinaris of Laodicea and his heresy

Around that time Apollinaris of Laodicea flourished. Jerome speaks of him as follows in On Illustrious Men: “Apollinaris, bishop of Laodicea in Syria, whose father was the priest Probus, devoted himself especially to grammar in his youth. Afterward, writing innumerable works on the sacred Scriptures, he died under the emperor Theodosius. Thirty books by him against Porphyry are extant, which among his other works are especially approved.”

But Rufinus, in book XI of the Ecclesiastical History, accuses him of heresy, saying as follows: “Apollinaris of Laodicea was indeed a man instructed in other respects. But while he was excessively driven by the vice of contention and delighted to go against everything that anyone thought, through the display of a talent badly fortified he generated a heresy from contention. He asserted that a body without a soul had been assumed by the Son of God.

“When he was pressed by the evident testimonies of the Gospel, he afterward reversed himself and, lest he appear to be entirely defeated, said that Christ indeed possessed a soul, but not that part by which it is rational; he possessed only that part by which it gives life to the body. He said that the Word of God himself supplied the place of the rational part.” Hence this was determined and declared to be heretical in XXIV, Question III, the penultimate chapter.

The Tripartite History places two men named Apollinaris at Laodicea in that time: the father a priest and the son a lector, the father a grammarian and the son a rhetorician. Yet according to Vincent in the Historical Mirror, it seems rather that the father, not the son, was the bishop, he who had the priest Probus as his father, as Jerome said above. Bede also says that this man introduced the aforesaid heresy, namely the man who was bishop of Laodicea.

Title IX: On Constantine the Great, Emperor

Chapter VI: On Valentinian and Valens

Valentinian's accession, division of the empire, and election of Ambrose

Valentinian was the thirty-eighth emperor. According to Vincent in the Historical Mirror, because he was a true catholic he had been deprived of military service by the most impious Julian on account of the orthodox faith. Therefore, after Jovian died near the city of Nicaea, Valentinian obtained the empire by consent of the Roman soldiers. He held it for eleven years.

He shone not only in courage but also in prudence, temperance, justice, and greatness of body. He took his brother Valens as a partner in the kingdom. He retained the western regions for himself and conceded the eastern regions to be governed by his brother.

As Jerome says in the Chronicle, the emperor Valentinian was excellent and similar to Aurelian in character, except that certain people interpreted his excessive severity and parsimony as avarice and cruelty. He began to reign with his brother Valens in the year of the Lord 367, and in the year of the world 4330.

In the following year an earthquake occurred throughout the world. The sea went beyond the shore and overwhelmed innumerable peoples in Sicily and in many cities. In the third year of this reign, Valens, the brother of Valentinian, was baptized by Eudoxius, bishop of the Arians, and persecuted our people.

As is contained in the Tripartite History and noted in Distinction LXIII, when the emperor Valentinian was coming from the East to the western regions, Auxentius died. Auxentius was a teacher of Arian treachery who had torn apart the church of Milan like a wolf. Since Valentinian wished, by God's ordering, that a catholic bishop be consecrated, he summoned the bishops and spoke these words to them:

“You who are instructed in the divine eloquences know openly what sort of man a pontiff ought to be. You know that it is not fitting for him to govern his subjects by word alone, but also by his conduct, to show himself an imitator of every virtue, and to possess good conduct as the witness of his teaching. Therefore establish such a man in the pontifical see that even we who govern the empire may sincerely submit our heads to him and, when we transgress, may necessarily receive his admonitions like the medicines of a healer.”

When the emperor had said these things, the synod asked that he himself should instead make the decision, since he was wise and pious. But he said: “Such an election belongs to you. For you, who have obtained divine grace and shine with an uninjured splendor, will be better able to elect.” The priests then departed from the episcopal seat and deliberated.

When by divine ordering Ambrose, who had not yet been baptized, was elected, the emperor rejoiced and said: “I give thanks to you, almighty Lord, because the man to whom I had entrusted bodies, you have entrusted with souls; you have shown my judgment to agree with justice.” When Saint Ambrose was saddened by what had happened, the emperor comforted him and said: “Do not fear, because the God who chose you will always assist you, and I too shall always be your helper and defender.” Thus far there.

Section I: Valentinian's character, wars, and government

This Valentinian, as James of Colonna writes, arose from a family of middling rank in Pannonia. He was a distinguished man, becoming in countenance, quick in intellect, grave in character, and most cultivated in speech, although he was sparing in speaking. He knew how to paint most beautifully, to devise new weapons, and to fashion images from clay or wax.

As certain persons say, he would have been preferred to all who had been before him if he had lacked the foul men to whom he had entrusted himself as though they were most faithful.

When he had been acclaimed emperor as though against his will, and in those days the army wished him to give it another man as his partner in the empire, he assembled the multitude and said: “It belonged to you, soldiers, to give me the empire and government. But once I received it against my will, it is now not yours but mine to take thought for common affairs.” Hence he soon called his brother Valens to be his partner in the empire, as was said.

When Valentinian was now passing the third year together with his brother Valens, at the exhortation of his wife and father-in-law he created his son Gratian, who was not yet fully of age, Augustus.

At that time Valentinian crushed the most ferocious nation of the Saxons, situated among inaccessible shores and marshes and terrible to the Romans through courage and agility. He defeated them in a great and difficult war within the boundaries of the Franks as they planned an incursion into Roman territories.

The Burgundians also, a new enemy with a new name, numbered more than eighty thousand armed men, as is reported. Having abandoned their dwellings, they had settled upon the bank of the river. Although they were peoples of great courage and boldness, they were defeated and displaced.

At that time the most ferocious nation of the Alans first went out from their territories and inflicted much damage upon the Roman provinces. Valentinian met them in a most difficult war and defeated them, compelling them to flee within the Maeotian marshes. When the emperor pursued them with the Roman legions, he was impeded by the nature and difficulty of the places and suffered grave loss from the barbarians, who frequently burst forth.

Therefore, employing a sounder plan, he set forth an edict to everyone: if any people or nation could enter these marshes and crush the Alans, they would be freed from every tribute for ten years.

At that time the nation of the Sicambri was neighboring to the Alans. After Troy had been captured, they entered under the leadership of Antenor and came into the territories of the Pannonians. Building a city there, they called it Sicambria. Living there for a long time, they became a great people.

Accordingly, after many battles the Sicambri defeated the Alans and compelled them to obey the Roman Empire. They therefore remained free for ten years from the tribute which they paid to the Roman Empire. When the ten years had elapsed, the Romans began to exact the customary tributes from the Sicambri, whom Valentinian had called Franks because of their courage, from their ferocity.

The Franks answered the Romans that, by reducing the Alans beneath the yoke of Roman dominion, they had paid the Roman Empire at the cost of their own blood. Therefore tribute should not be sought from them in the future. When the Sicambri or Franks refused to pay while the Romans demanded it, the emperor's legates were killed in a tumult which arose among the people.

For this reason Valentinian, angered against them, assembled an army and declared war upon them. In a single war they were crushed by him, so that they abandoned their own dwellings and came into the territory of the Germans. There, after building the city of Cologne, they lived for many years. Multiplying greatly, they became terrible to their neighbors.

Under Valentinian, a certain Procopius assumed a tyranny at Constantinople and drew many of Valentinian's commanders with him into partnership in the tyranny. But he was defeated and destroyed by Valentinian's army in Phrygia. Very many of his party were killed or relegated into exile.

Section II: Valentinian's death, his sons, and Justina

Finally, in the eleventh year of his reign, when the nation of the Sarmatians had spread itself through the Pannonian regions and was laying many low by fire, plunder, and slaughter, Valentinian prepared war against them near the town of Brigetio. While he was answering their embassies, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, a sudden effusion of blood through his nostrils-which the Greeks call apoplexy-came upon him. Having lost his voice but with sense and memory unimpaired, he expired.

He left two sons: Gratian, whom he had received from his first wife, and the younger Valentinian, whom his second wife Justina had borne to him.

When Valentinian died, as is contained in the Tripartite History, the soldiers of Italy appointed his son Valentinian, a boy, emperor on the sixth day after his death. His brother Gratian and his paternal uncle Valens afterward accepted his empire, although unwillingly, because it had been done without their knowledge.

The boy was born from Justina, whom his father Valentinian had held as a wife together with Severa, in the following manner. Justus, Justina's father, was judge of Picenum in the time of Constantius. He saw in a dream that from his right thigh he had begotten the imperial purple. When this vision became publicly known and reached Constantius, Constantius caused Justus to be killed.

His daughter Justina came so fully into Severa's acquaintance that she lived with her. Severa, captivated by Justina's beauty, told the emperor that Justina was so beautiful that even she herself was seized by love for her.

The emperor wished to take Justina, but nevertheless did not wish to cast aside Severa, from whom Gratian had already been born. He therefore publicly proposed throughout the city a law that it should be permissible for those who wished to possess two wives at the same time.

Accordingly, after Justina was joined to him as a second wife, he named their son Valentinian, who afterward presided over the Roman Empire. From the same Justina he also had three daughters: Grata, Placida, and Galla. Nevertheless, that law concerning the possession of two wives was afterward abolished by canon and civil law.

Section III: Valens, the Arians, and Basil

Concerning Valens, Valentinian's brother, who ruled with him, the Tripartite History narrates that although he was a catholic, his wife made him an Arian. Eudoxius, bishop of Constantinople, was the author of his seduction. When Eudoxius baptized him, he bound him by an oath to remain in that sect.

This Valens therefore exiled Eusebius of Samosata. Eusebius concealed the messenger who had brought him the letters of his exile so that the messenger would not be killed by the people. At night he went out with one servant alone, carrying with him only a feather cushion and a book.

When a certain Arian named Eunomius had been ordained in his place, no one from the people came to the church. Seeing this, Eunomius departed from the city. After him Lucius was ordained. On one occasion, as he was passing, it happened that young men were there playing ball. When their ball happened to pass beneath the feet of the bishop's ass, the boys, wailing, kindled a fire and cast the ball through its midst, as though they had purified it.

At that time Agelius was bishop of the Novatians. He always used a single tunic and walked without shoes.

Amphilochius relates in the deeds of blessed Basil that the Arians obtained from the emperor Valens an order that he should cast the Christians out of the church of the city of Nicaea and give it to them. Saint Basil came to Valens and spoke on behalf of the Christians.

Demosthenes, the prefect of the emperor's banquets, supported the heretics and, while uttering a blasphemy, committed a barbarism. Basil said to him: “It is your part to think about stews, not to cook divine dogmas.” Immediately confounded, Demosthenes fell silent.

Valens then said to Basil: “Go and judge between them, but not according to the immoderate love of your people, for that is not fitting.” Basil answered: “If you condemn my judgment, exile me and cast out the catholics.”

Then Basil departed and said to the Arians: “Come, both you and the catholics. Close the church, and let each party seal it. After three days, if it is opened by your prayers, let it be yours. But if it is not opened, and after we do the same for one night it is not opened for us, take it.”

This was done, and it was opened to the Christians, not to the Arians. For when prayer had been made, the bars were shattered and the keys fell together with the bolt; under a vehement wind the gates struck against the walls. Basil therefore began the chant: “Lift up your gates, O princes,” and so forth. When the gates had opened, the Christians entered. On account of this miracle many of the Arians were converted to the catholic faith.

Jerome says that in the third year of Valentinian's reign so great a tempest arose at Constantinople that hail of marvelous size fell and killed some people. Among the Atrebates wool fell from heaven mingled with rain. In the following year Nicaea, which had often fallen before, was utterly overturned by an earthquake.

In the next year Athanaric, king of the Goths, stirred up a persecution against the Christians, killed very many, and expelled them from their own dwellings into Roman soil. Eusebius, bishop of Vercelli, died. Hilary of Poitiers had died two years before; and Didymus, Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, and Gregory of Nazianzus flourished. But these doctors and others will be treated more fully below in the following title, concerning the doctors of the Church.

Section IV: Valens's persecution of the catholics

After Valentinian's death, therefore, as James of Colonna attests, his brother Valens reigned for four years with his two nephews, Gratian and the younger Valentinian, the sons of the elder Valentinian. Although Valens himself, as was said above, had declined into the Arian heresy, nevertheless he long concealed the persecution which he intended against the catholics, restrained by brotherly affection and fear. For he considered how great a force the faithful emperor had exercised in avenging the faith.

But the impiety which he had meditated while his brother Valentinian was alive he revealed immediately after his death. For, now free in his unbridled audacity, he issued a law that monks and clerics who had been assigned to the divine work of faith should abandon the manifold activity of secular affairs and be compelled to military service.

At that time a great multitude of monks dwelling there had filled those vast deserts of Egypt, spread out even to the present day, which human habitation had not known because of thirst and barrenness and the most dangerous abundance of serpents. Therefore, at the command of the emperor Valens, tribunes with their soldiers were sent to this place to draw away the saints and true soldiers of Christ, by another and novel manner of persecution, either from the faith or from the desert. They also killed many companies of saints there. But it would be lengthy to recount in writing what things were everywhere done throughout the various provinces, by similar visions [read: by these and similar commands], against the catholic churches and the peoples of the right faith.

When Athanasius, as he was dying, had chosen Peter to be his successor in the city of Alexandria, this Peter afterward became so ready to receive heretics, as Jerome writes in the Chronicle, that he brought upon himself the suspicion among some that he had accepted money. But Lucius, bishop of the Arian party, as Rufinus says, flew upon the sheep like a wolf. The aforesaid Peter immediately boarded a ship and fled to the city of Rome.

Lucius, however, as though the material for cruelty had been taken away [read: as though material for cruelty had been presented to him], went so eagerly after blood that he seemed to preserve no appearance of religion. When this Lucius entered Alexandria, as Theodoric says [read: as Theodoret says], the gentiles said: “Welcome, bishop who does not defend the Son. Serapis loves you and has brought you in.”

At his first entrance into Alexandria, such numerous and shameful things were done to the virgins and continent women of the Church that things like them are not recorded in the persecutions of the gentiles. For they tore apart the garments of the holy virgins and led them naked throughout the whole city, mocking them with obscenity as much as they could. They dressed a certain boy in a woman's garment, painted his eyes and face with pigment, and made him move this way and that upon the altar itself and make gestures toward it with his hands as though celebrating.

Afterward, placing in the church one of their own men, who was very well known for shamefulness and was stripped of his garment and naked in his genital parts, they made him an obscene preacher against Christ. In place of sacred words he uttered crimes, praising lust, impiety, fornication, intercourse between males, theft, food, and drink.

“After the flights and exiles of the citizens,” says Rufinus, “after the slaughters, tortures, and flames to which Lucius condemned innumerable persons, he turned the weapons of his fury against the monasteries. He laid waste the desert and declared wars upon those who were at rest.” At one and the same time he undertook to attack three thousand or more men dispersed throughout the whole desert in secluded and solitary habitation. He sent an armed force of cavalry and infantry. But they, on the contrary, offered their necks to the swords and said nothing except: “Friend, for what have you come?”

And, as is contained in the Tripartite History, when Valens had commanded all catholics to be expelled from the city of Edessa, a certain poor woman, carrying her son in her arm, ran toward the church by an unclosed door. All the catholics had gathered there, although the prefect, wishing to spare them, had commanded that no one should remain in the church.

The prefect, indignant on account of that woman, said to her: “O unhappy woman, where are you running so headlong?”

She answered: “Where the others are.”

Then he said: “Have you not heard that the prefect is going to kill everyone who is found there?”

She said: “I have heard, and therefore I hasten so that I may be found among them.”

When this had been heard, the prefect immediately ran back to the prince and said that all were prepared for death, but that it was impious to kill so many in a short time. Thus he called the prince back from his anger.

Afterward the prefect, as Theodoric says [read: as Theodoret says], compelled them by the prince's command either to communicate with the Arians or to go into exile. When all remained silent, he said to Eulogius, their leader: “Why are you silent?”

He answered: “It is not necessary to answer when nothing has been asked.”

The prefect said: “Did I not speak to all of you? I admonished you to communicate with those with whom the emperor communicates.”

Eulogius said: “I have a shepherd, and I obey his commands.”

The prefect immediately dispatched eighty of them into Thrace.

When a certain Maximus, the emperor's prefect, strove to overthrow Basil, the pillar of the true faith, and attempted to bend him to the emperor's will, now by flatteries and now by threats and terrors, Basil answered the prefect fearlessly: “Heap these words upon young boys. They and those like them indeed look to such promises.”

When the prefect said that so great a persecution should not be stirred up on account of a single word, namely homoousion, Basil answered: “Those who are fattened upon the divine eloquences do not endure even one syllable of the divine dogmas to be corrupted, but embrace every kind of death for them. I judge the emperor's friendships to be great when joined with piety; without it, I call them perdition instead.”

When the prefect called him a fool, Basil said: “I desire always to have this folly.”

And when death was threatened against him, Basil said: “Would that I possessed something worthy as a gift to offer to the one who would release Basil more swiftly from the knot of this bellows.”

When the prefect gave him until the middle of the night as time for deliberation, Basil said: “Tomorrow I myself shall be the man who I am now. Would that you did not change yourself.”

That same night the emperor's wife was tormented as though handed over to torturers, and their only son paid the penalty for his father's impiety. Therefore the emperor, affected by so many terrors, sent messengers asking Basil to entreat the Lord for him and his empire. From that time onward he also embraced Basil's constancy and gave him excellent estates for the use of the poor and lepers who were governed by him.

After a short time, however, forgetful of what had gone before, the emperor wished to ratify with his own signature a law concerning Basil's exile, but he could not. For the pen was broken, and the second and third pens suffered as the first had. Then, trembling, he tore the document with both hands.

Meanwhile, while Valens was raging against the catholics at Antioch, there was a monk there named Aphraates. Looking down from the palace upon him as he passed through the street, the emperor saw that he was dressed in a very cheap cloak and, in his advanced old age, was hurrying along. The emperor said to him: “Tell me where you are going.”

He answered: “To pray for your empire.”

The emperor said: “You ought to pray at home, according to the monastic custom.”

Aphraates answered: “You speak very well, if you would permit me to do so. I did this while Christ's sheep enjoyed peace. But because they are now moved by the greatest tumult, so that they are held captive, I must run about everywhere and save them from necessity.”

On hearing this the emperor made threats but remained silent. One of his chamberlains, however, who had charge of the bath, spoke harshly to the holy man. But immediately after his words, when he went down to prepare the emperor's bath, he lost his mind, descended into the boiling water, and died there.

Then the book of Themistius the philosopher called Valens back from raging against the catholics at Antioch. In it he argued that Valens ought not to be so hostile to the Christians because of ecclesiastical disagreement, since among the pagans a difference of sects was evident and each person remained in his own opinion. Perhaps, he said, this was more pleasing to God, since he is not easily known and is glorified in different ways, so that each person might fear him the more because the completeness of knowledge concerning him—how, in what manner, or how great he is—is the more unknown.

Section V: Firmus and the death of the elder Theodosius

At that time, as James of Colonna relates, a certain Firmus, after stirring up the peoples of the Moors in the regions of Africa, established himself as king. Having also assumed the name of emperor, he claimed Africa and Mauretania for himself.

Against him the emperor Valens sent from Spain Theodosius, the father of Theodosius the Great, who afterward ruled the Roman Empire, together with an army. Crossing into Africa, he routed the nation of the Moors in great battles and compelled Firmus himself, afflicted and overwhelmed by battles, to a voluntary death.

After he had arranged affairs in Africa with most experienced foresight, he was ordered, while envy attended him [read: at envy's instigation], to be killed by Valens at Carthage. When he learned this, Theodosius caused himself to be baptized for the remission of sins. After he had obtained the sacrament of Christ which he had devoutly sought, secure after the glorious life of this age also concerning the eternity of life, he voluntarily offered his throat to the executioner.

Socrates, however, in the Tripartite History speaks thus concerning this event. At that time Valens caused it to be investigated by necromancy who would reign after him. The demon disclosed four letters: T, E, O, and D. Therefore the emperor, driven by jealousy, killed many bearing such a name, thinking that they wished to assume tyranny. Thus men called Theodotus, Theodore, and Theodosius were killed, and all who bore these letters at the beginning of their name. Because of this fear, very many changed their names, denying with an oath those which they had previously possessed. Vincent says that upon this occasion Theodosius, the father of the emperor Theodosius, appears to have been killed, although Jerome was silent about it.

Section VI: Gratian's victory and the conversion of the Goths to Arianism

Meanwhile Gratian, the son of Valentinian and the nephew of Valens, who governed the western empire, saw an inestimable multitude of enemies poured into the Roman territories. Trusting in the power of Christ, he attacked them with a far smaller number of soldiers near Strasbourg, a town of Gaul, and completed that most formidable war with incredible success. For he killed more than thirty thousand Alemanni in that battle with the least loss among his own men.

In those times also the Goths, fleeing the territories of Scythia before the face of the Huns, joined battle with them and were defeated and put to flight with a great slaughter of their own people. Therefore the Goths abandoned their own dwellings, crossed the Danube with all their multitude and herds, and came into the soil of the Roman Empire. They were received by the emperor Valens without any agreement of treaty.

At that time the Goths were ruled by two leaders, Frigiderius and Athalaric. When they contended with one another concerning power, a very grave war was waged between them. After civil battle had been joined between them, Athalaric was defeated in one battle and then another. But Athalaric himself, together with those of his forces who had survived the war, fled for refuge to the emperor. The emperor not only received him but also assisted him against Frigiderius.

Trusting in the aid of the Romans, Athalaric renewed his strength, again attacked Frigiderius, and deprived him, defeated in battle, of both life and army together. In gratitude for this benefit, the greater part of the Goths who had followed Athalaric, and who after the death of Frigiderius had surrendered themselves to him, sent messengers to Valens and humbly asked him to send them bishops by whom they might be instructed in the rule of catholic truth, for the Goths were idolaters at that time. Then Valens, employing malignant depravity, sent teachers of Arian doctrine to them, since he himself was an Arian. Thus that whole nation was made Arian.

Section VII: The defeat and death of Valens

Now in the thirteenth year of Valens's reign, after he had perpetrated tortures and killings of the saints throughout the whole world, that root of our miseries—the nation of the Goths, which had been received into a treaty by the emperor Valens—was compelled by famine and injuries to rise in arms because of the intolerable avarice of the commander Maximus. First the Goths defeated the army of Valens and poured themselves throughout Thrace, laying waste everything with fires, plunder, and slaughter.

When Valens learned these things, he went out from Antioch. While he prepared war against the Goths, he was goaded by a late repentance for his sin and commanded that the clerics, bishops, and other saints whom he himself, led by depraved counsel, had expelled from their sees should be recalled from exile.

Thus, in the fifteenth year of his reign, he waged that lamentable war in Thrace with the Goths, who were then most fully equipped through the training of men [read: through the training of their forces] and an abundance of resources. At the very first attack of the Goths, the disordered squadrons of Roman cavalry abandoned the unprotected defenses of the infantry. The infantry were soon surrounded by the enemy cavalry and overwhelmed by clouds of arrows. While they ran madly here and there, they were utterly cut down.

The emperor Valens himself turned in flight. Wounded by an arrow and repeatedly slipping from his horse because of his excessive pain, he was carried with difficulty by his men into the hut of a certain small farmstead. While he lay hidden there, he was discovered by the pursuing enemies and suddenly consumed by fire. By God's just judgment, he was burned with fire by those whom he himself had burned with the fire of Arian perfidy. And those men burned him alive who, on account of him, were going to burn even after death in the vice of error.

After the emperor had been killed and they had gained a complete victory, the Goths now proceeded without fear toward the city of Constantinople. When they constrained that most powerful of cities with a continual siege, Dominica Augusta, the wife of Valens, gave out much money and drove the enemies away from laying waste the city. She faithfully preserved the empire for the relatives who governed the western empire.

At this point Jerome ends his Chronicle, which he had continued where Eusebius had left off. After Jerome, Prosper, Bede, and Sigebert the monk continued it.

Title IX, Chapter VII

Gratian and the beginning of the reign of Theodosius

After the heretical emperor Valens had been killed by the Goths, Gratian—his nephew and a son of the elder Valentinian—who governed the western empire with his brother Valentinian, another son of the aforesaid elder Valentinian, obtained the principate of the Roman summit. He began to reign in the year of the Lord 381 and reigned for six years after the death of his paternal uncle.

This Gratian, as James of Colonna attests, was highly educated in letters. He knew how to compose verse, to speak ornately in the manner of rhetoricians, and to explain controversies. He was, moreover, very thoroughly trained in arms, for every day he exercised himself with darts and missiles in the manner of his ancestors. In addition, he was sparing of wine and a conqueror of food, sleep, and lust.

As the histories say, he was full of every good activity, if only he had seriously occupied his mind with the care of the commonwealth. He was estranged from that care not by will, but by practice.

Therefore, when after the death of Valens he saw the state of the commonwealth collapsed in the East, Gratian, with the same foresight by which Nerva was once elected emperor and through whom the commonwealth was repaired by Trajan, summoned Theodosius from Spain. With everyone favoring it, he clothed him with the purple at Sirmium, took him into a partnership of the empire, and set him over the eastern provinces.

Thus Theodosius, having been made emperor, trusted that the commonwealth afflicted by the wrath of God would be repaired by the mercy of God. For, transferring all his confidence to hope in Christ, without delay he attacked those very great Scythian nations which had previously been feared by his ancestors, which had also been summoned by Alexander the Great [read: which had also been avoided by Alexander the Great], and which were then most powerful. For, after killing Valens, the prince of the Romans, and crushing the Roman army, they were most fully equipped with Roman horses and arms. These peoples were the Alans, Huns, Taphali, and Goths.

He defeated and subdued them in great and numerous battles. He liberated Thrace and the East, which had in great part been occupied by these nations, and rescued them from every tumult of wars. When these things had been gloriously accomplished, he entered Constantinople in triumph with Gratian's consent.

After these things had thus been done and the condition of the East settled, Gratian went to the western regions, leaving Theodosius at Constantinople. Theodosius considered the small number of his own men and, lest he dishearten them by continually waging war, struck a treaty with Athalaric, king of the Goths.

Not long afterward Athalaric came to Theodosius at Constantinople, and Theodosius received him with marvelous kindness. When Athalaric himself had entered the city and had beheld its buildings and how richly adorned were those who had assembled for the feast day, and when he clung to each sight with his mind astonished, he finally entered the emperor's royal court. When he saw there the various acts of service and offices, he turned to Theodosius and said: “Without doubt you are an earthly god, O emperor; whoever dares to raise a hand against you will himself be guilty of his own blood.”

When the king of the Goths had remained at Constantinople, he departed from human affairs. The emperor himself walked before his funeral procession and delivered him to burial with due honor. After his death all the nations of the Goths, seeing the kindness, munificence, and other virtues of Theodosius, voluntarily surrendered themselves to the Roman Empire.

Afterward, at the same time, the nation of the Parthians—who were still fierce because they had defeated Julian and injured the territories of the Roman Empire—of their own accord sent ambassadors to Theodosius at Constantinople seeking a treaty of peace. When they had been received with marvelous gladness, a treaty was struck with them.

Therefore, after the East had been pacified, the excellent emperor did not cease, by most just and most merciful laws, to assist the Church laboring against the impious, which the heretic Valens, favoring the Arians, had vehemently afflicted. The pious emperor rejoiced more to be a member of that Church than to reign upon earth.

Furthermore, he commanded the images of the gentiles to be overturned everywhere, understanding well enough that earthly gifts are placed in the power not of demons but of the true God. Not long afterward, once the nations of the barbarians had been subdued, he made his son Arcadius a partner in the empire.

Section I: The tyranny of Maximus and the death of Gratian

At the same time, while Theodosius governed the eastern empire and Gratian, together with his brother the younger Valentinian, protected the western empire with excellent laws and repaired the fallen commonwealth, a certain Maximus, one of the Roman commanders, seized the tyranny in Gaul. He was an upright and vigorous man and, as some maintain, like Augustus Octavian in all things, except that he broke the faith of his oath.

This Maximus had been sent by Gratian into Britain, where he overcame the Picts and Scots, who were overrunning the island, several times in battle. Elated by this victory and, as some maintain, compelled by the soldiers, he crossed into Gaul and there, with all favoring him, assumed the purple.

When the emperor Gratian was there, he neglected the army and the Roman legions and preferred to the veteran Roman soldier a few of the Alans whom he had brought over to himself with an immense quantity of gold. He always employed their company, so much so that at times he made a journey in the same clothing as they. For this reason he aroused against himself the minds of the veteran soldiers.

As soon as Maximus learned this, he considered that the time had now arrived in which he might claim the Roman Empire for himself. Relying upon many auxiliaries of barbarians and Romans, he moved his camp against Gratian.

When Gratian learned this, he was suddenly terrified by Maximus's arrival, especially because all his army had gone over to the tyrant Maximus. While Gratian planned to cross into Italy, where his brother reigned, he was circumvented by the treachery of Maximus and, as some maintain, was killed at Lyon, a city of Gaul.

Therefore, after Gratian had been killed, Maximus easily occupied all Gaul. He gave the part which is called Armorica, adjoining the Ocean Sea toward the west, to be possessed by the Britons whose assistance he had employed in these wars against Gratian's commanders. From its British inhabitants it is called Lesser Britain even to the present day.

Thus Maximus, having occupied the Gauls and aspiring to the empire of the whole world, prepared to cross into Italy against Valentinian with an incredible apparatus of war. When Valentinian learned of his approach and saw that he was unequal to him both in number of soldiers and in strength, he voluntarily abandoned Italy and fled for refuge into the East, to Theodosius at Constantinople.

Thus, after Gratian had been killed and his brother Valentinian put to flight, the tyrant Maximus obtained the western empire. Almost all Italy, with the exception of the city of Rome, followed the party of Maximus.

Section II: Maximus and Saint Martin

While Maximus ruled in Gaul, he frequently summoned the blessed bishop Martin and, when he had received him within the palace, honored him greatly. His whole discourse with Martin concerned future things, the glory of the faithful, and the eternity of the saints.

When the other bishops had assembled before Maximus and the shameful flattery of them all toward the prince was observed, apostolic authority resided in Martin alone. For even if it was necessary to make supplication on behalf of certain persons, he commanded rather than entreated.

Although frequently invited, Martin also abstained from Maximus's banquet, asserting that he could not be a participant at the table of a man who, contrary to his oath, had deprived legitimate emperors, one of his life and the other of his kingdom.

Maximus, however, said that he had not assumed the empire voluntarily, but had defended with arms the necessity of imperial rule imposed upon him by the soldiers. He said that this necessity did not appear alien to the will of God, in whose power victory had already rested through an incredible outcome, and that none of his adversaries had fallen except in battle.

At last Martin, overcome by reasoning or entreaties, came to the emperor's banquet, the emperor rejoicing in a marvelous manner that he had obtained this. The most illustrious men were present: Evodius, prefect and likewise consul, than whom no one was ever more just; and two powerful counts, the emperor's brother and his paternal uncle.

Martin's priest reclined in the middle, while the blessed pontiff himself sat upon a small chair placed beside the king. At the middle of the banquet, as was customary, a servant offered a golden cup to the king. But the king directed that it be given instead to the most holy bishop, expectantly desiring that he himself should receive the cup from Martin's right hand. Martin, however, after he had drunk, handed the cup to his own priest, judging that no one more worthy could drink before him. The emperor and all who were present marveled at this deed, so that the very act by which they had seemingly been held in contempt pleased them.

When Maximus was hastening with a very great army to occupy the city of Rome and the remainder of Italy, blessed Martin foretold to him that, if he attempted this, he would perish a short time afterward. Maximus nevertheless judged that at his first arrival he would be victorious. This occurred, as will be evident below.

When Valentinian had fled for refuge to Theodosius at Constantinople, Theodosius, mindful of the benefits which Valentinian's father and brother had conferred upon him, received him with paternal devotion. He not only preserved toward Valentinian while he lived the fidelity which he owed him, but also consoled him, though driven out after his brother's death, by preserving his imperial dignity; and with kindness and favor he commanded him to be of good hope.

Section III: Theodosius defeats Maximus

Theodosius, therefore, moved by just and necessary causes toward civil war, sought in the case of the two august brothers to avenge the one who had been killed and to restore the other. He burst forth against the tyrant Maximus, superior in faith alone but far inferior in comparison with the whole apparatus of war.

Although Maximus's success rendered him terrible, Theodosius in the straits of his anxieties did not lapse into sacrilegious curiosities. Instead he sent to John, who dwelt in the Egyptian desert and whom, as his fame increased, he had learned to be a man of God endowed with the spirit of prophecy. From him he received a most certain announcement of victory.

Theodosius therefore departed from the city of Constantinople and the eastern regions and came to Rome with the forces of the whole East. At that time Maximus was seated at Aquileia as a spectator of his own victory, while the commander Andragasus [read: Andragathius] administered the highest direction of the war.

With very large forces of soldiers, Andragasus [read: Andragathius] had fortified by an astute plan every approach through the Alps and across the rivers. But while he prepared to forestall and overwhelm the unsuspecting enemy by a naval expedition, he voluntarily abandoned the very barriers which he had obstructed and prepared to go by a sea route to meet Theodosius.

Theodosius, however, hurrying by a land route, entered the empty Alps without anyone perceiving it. At Aquileia, where Maximus was present with a small force, he shut in, captured, and killed without trick or contest that great enemy Maximus, who was ferocious and who exacted tributes and payments even from the most savage nations of the Germans by terror alone.

When the count Andragasus [read: Andragathius], who had prepared to forestall the unsuspecting enemy by a naval expedition, learned of Maximus's death and despaired that he could thereafter resist Theodosius, he hurled himself headlong from his ship into the waves. Thus, drowned, he ended his life.

“Behold,” says Orosius, “how in Christian times civil wars are concluded when they cannot be avoided. For the city was captured and the tyrant who stirred up the war was killed. Behold, on the other side the enemy army was defeated, and Andragasus [read: Andragathius], the tyrant's count, more bloodthirsty than the tyrant himself, was driven to death. Ambushes of so great a kind were dissolved and mocked, as were military preparations of so great a kind; and yet Theodosius devised no tricks and drew no sword from its sheath. Nevertheless that most formidable war was brought without bloodshed all the way to victory through the deaths of two men.”

Section IV: Valentinian's restoration and Justina's persecution of Ambrose

Thus, after Maximus had been killed, the younger Valentinian was restored to the kingdom by Theodosius. Having recovered Italy and restored his forces, he hastened against the son of the tyrant Maximus, who was still ruling in Gaul. He defeated and killed him in the first battle. When he had been killed and all that multitude of tyrants had been removed, Valentinian received the western kingdoms beneath his dominion and restored the commonwealth in Gaul.

Valentinian's mother was Justina, the wife, as was said, of the elder Valentinian. As Rufinus says in the Ecclesiastical History, she, a foster-child of the Arian heresy, confidently disclosed to her easily deceived son the poisons of her impiety which she had suppressed while her husband was alive.

Therefore, while she was at Milan, she began to disturb the condition of the churches and to threaten the priests with expulsions and exiles unless they confirmed the decrees of the Council of Ariminum, by which the faith of the fathers had been violated. In this warfare she struck Ambrose, the strongest wall and tower of the Church, and, wearing him down with threats, terrors, and every kind of attack, sought an initial entrance for herself by which the Church might be conquered.

But although that Jezebel was armed with a malignant spirit, Ambrose, filled with the spirit of Elijah, resisted her. Nevertheless, she did not cease to rage, chatter, make a tumult, stir things up, and inflame the peoples toward discord. She considered it an injury that affairs turned out less in accordance with her judgment, and she complained about this before her son.

The young emperor, therefore, inflamed by resentment over the insult which his mother had falsely fabricated, sent a troop of armed men to the church. He commanded the door to be broken, the holy places to be attacked, and the priest of God to be dragged away and driven into exile. But the perseverance of the faithful people was so great that they preferred to lose their lives rather than their bishop Ambrose.

Again, a certain Benevolus, who then presided over the imperial archives, was commanded to dictate imperial decrees against the faith of the fathers. But, being a most Christian man, he denied that he could utter the imperial words and speak against God.

When a higher honor was promised to him if he fulfilled the commands, he said: “Why do you promise me a higher rank as the reward for impiety? Take away the very rank which I possess, provided only that the conscience of my faith endure uninjured.” Saying this, he cast his belt before the feet of those who commanded the impious things.

Ambrose, however, did not defend himself against the queen's fury with hand or sword. Instead, placed beneath the altar with fasts and uninterrupted vigils, through supplication he prepared God as defender of himself and of the Church.

It must be diligently noted that when the younger emperor Valentinian, at the insistence of his Arian mother Justina, demanded from Ambrose one church for the Arians, Ambrose did not consent. He said the things contained in Cause XXIII, Question VIII:

“I myself was approached by the counts so that through me the basilica might promptly be handed over. They said that the emperor had commanded that it ought to be handed over by his own right, since all things were in his power.

“I answered: If he sought from me that which is mine—that is, my estate, my silver, or anything of this kind belonging to me—I would not resist, although all things which are mine belong to the poor. But the things which are divine are not subject to imperial power.

“If he seeks my patrimony, seize it. If he seeks my body, I shall meet him. Do you wish to drag me into chains? Do you wish to drag me to death? It is my will. I shall not fortify myself by a surrounding multitude of people, nor shall I hold the altars while begging for life; rather, I shall be sacrificed more gladly for the altars.

“I shuddered in spirit when I learned that armed men had been sent to occupy the church's basilica, lest, while the people claimed the basilica, some slaughter should occur which would turn to the destruction of the whole city. I prayed that I might not survive the funeral pyre of so great a city, or rather of all Italy.”

And below:

“Against weapons, soldiers, and Goths, my tears are my weapons. Such are the defenses of a priest; otherwise I neither ought nor am able to resist. Would that I were secure that the church would by no means be handed over to the heretics. I would willingly go to the emperor's palace, if this accorded with the priestly office, so that I might contend in the palace rather than in the church. Who would deny that the cause of faith must be conducted in the church?

“Do not burden yourself, emperor, by thinking that you possess any imperial right in those things which are divine. Do not exalt yourself, but if you wish to rule for a longer time, be subject to God. It is written: ‘The things which are God's to God, and the things which are Caesar's to Caesar.’ Palaces belong to the emperor; churches belong to the priest. The right over public things has been entrusted to you, not the right over sacred things.

“Holy Naboth defended his vines with his own blood. If he did not hand over his vineyard to the king, shall we hand over the Church of Christ?”

And below:

“What is more honorable than that the emperor should be called a son of the Church? When this is said, it is said without sin and with grace. For the emperor is within the Church. A good emperor seeks the assistance of the Church; he does not reject it.

“If that which is within my right were sought—such as a house, an estate, or gold—I would willingly offer it. I can neither take anything away from the temple of God nor hand anything over. I received it to be guarded, not to be handed over.” Thus far there.

Amid these events that impious Jezebel ended her life, so that she might not complete the persecution which she had begun against the Church.

Title IX, Chapter VIII

Theodosius's character and family

After Gratian had been killed and Valentinian had been restored to the western empire, Theodosius alone obtained the eastern empire. He began to reign in the year of the Lord 387; from the origin of the world, in the year 4,351 according to the Hebrews and Jerome, and in the year 5,486 according to the Septuagint and Eusebius; and in the year 1,138 from the foundation of the city. He reigned for eleven years after the death of Gratian.

He was from Spain, as was said, and was born from the elder Theodosius, who had been unjustly killed by the emperor Valens. He was most devoted to the catholic faith, as James of Colonna says, and an enlarger and defender of the commonwealth. In character and body he was like Trajan, from whom, as some write, he derived his origin.

Nevertheless, he was unlike Trajan in this: Trajan was a gentile, while Theodosius was a devout catholic. He was merciful in spirit, compassionate, accessible, and thought to differ from others only in his clothing. He was liberal toward everyone, lavish toward the good, a lover of simple talents, an admirer of learned ones, and a lover of his citizens. He honored and rewarded them with money, especially those whose services toward himself or the commonwealth he had approved under adverse circumstances.

He so greatly detested that desire for triumph by which Trajan was stained that he did not initiate wars but found them. He was moderately learned in letters, yet studious and very diligent in learning the deeds of his ancestors. When he read them, he execrated proud and cruel princes.

He nevertheless possessed—something which cannot be denied—strict precepts from the law of nature, and he was suddenly angered by unworthy affairs, but was immediately softened. Therefore blessed Ambrose admonished him that he should establish nothing harsh while he had begun to be angry, but should revolve in his memory the twenty-four letters of the Greeks. Thus, his mind having been led elsewhere by that thought, his anger would weaken after the intervention of a short time.

He was accustomed to make an elegant and joyful banquet among his friends, but not an expensive one. He governed his health through temperance in eating.

He was joined in marriage to a woman named Fallacia [read: Flaccilla], from whom he received his sons Arcadius and Honorius. When she died, he took as his wife Galla, the daughter of the elder Valentinian and Justina. She bore him Placidia, to whom afterward the name Galla was added from her mother's name.

Section I: Eugenius and Arbogast defeated by Theodosius

Thus, while Theodosius governed the Roman Empire in the East and the younger Valentinian in the West, as certain persons report, Valentinian was killed by the treachery of the count Arbogast. But, as others maintain, he ended his life by a noose for hidden reasons—yet this also occurred through the treachery of the aforesaid commander, who was preparing the empire for himself. Valentinian was killed at Vienne, a city of Gaul.

After he had been extinguished, the said Arbogast created a certain Eugenius emperor. This Eugenius had formerly been a grammarian and teacher of Latin letters, but after leaving the schools he served in the palace and was the imperial secretary of the emperor Valentinian. On account of his singular eloquence, he was honored by everyone.

These two, therefore, induced the eunuchs by great promises to bring about the death of their lord. While Valentinian slept, he was strangled by them, so that he might be thought to have ended his life voluntarily.

Arbogast chose for the empire precisely such a man upon whom he might impose only the title of emperor, while he himself would govern the empire according to his own judgment. For Arbogast himself was a Frank by birth, but a barbarian in spirit and counsel, savage and cruel, and a most sordid worshiper of idols. Valentinian had entrusted to him the care of all the armies on account of his singular knowledge of military affairs.

Thus the tyrant Eugenius, preparing the Roman Empire for himself through Arbogast's zeal, gathered from every quarter innumerable and unconquered forces, whether from Roman garrisons or from auxiliaries of the barbarians, some of whom Arbogast had drawn in by power and others by kinship. With these forces he took the road toward Italy against the prince Theodosius.

When the emperor Theodosius learned of the death of his colleague Valentinian, he was no less inflamed toward vengeance and took up arms against Eugenius. Nevertheless, the pious emperor sought to learn God's will through John, a most holy anchorite and a man endowed with the spirit of prophecy: whether it would be better to preserve peace or wage war. As concerning Maximus, so also concerning this man, John promised Theodosius victory, although not without a very great outpouring of blood on both sides.

Theodosius therefore prepared for war against Eugenius, fortified not so much by the assistance of arms and weapons as by that of fasts and prayers, and not so much by the watches of guards as by spending the night in supplications. For he went about with the priests and the people to all the places of prayer. Before the shrines of the apostles and martyrs he lay prostrate in ashes and sackcloth, and with humble intercession sought from the saints faithful assistance for himself.

But the pagans began to invoke sacrifices. At Rome, where Theodosius then was, they began to inspect the bloody entrails of animals from deadly victims and to announce a certain victory to Eugenius.

When Theodosius began to press upon the passes of the Alps which the enemies had occupied, those who had sacrificed to the gods were the first to be turned to flight. Especially so was Fabianus, prefect of the city [read: Flavianus, prefect of the city] and a pagan, who, favoring Eugenius, had been the cause of all the sacrifices. He had greatly insulted the Christians and promised a certain victory to Eugenius; although he could have escaped, he ran into death.

Eugenius and Arbogast had deployed their ordered battle lines upon the plains and had occupied the high sides of the Alps and the unavoidable passages by sending cunning ambushes ahead. Thus, by the disposition of the war alone, they ought to have been the victors, had the Lord not fought for the justice of Theodosius.

Theodosius, therefore, stationed upon the summits of the Alps, prostrated his body upon the ground and fixed his mind upon heaven. After he had passed the night in prayer until sleep, he confidently seized his arms. Alone, knowing that he was not alone, he fortified himself with the sign of the cross and cast himself into the battle, certain that he would be victorious even if no one followed him.

When he came to the foremost troops, they surrendered themselves without a struggle to the legitimate prince. But a most bitter conflict was waged with the others who were in the valleys in dense battle lines with Eugenius and Arbogast.

For some time the victory stood doubtful. The auxiliary barbarians whom the emperor had hired for the war were already being poured out in slaughter and were already turning their backs to the enemy. But this occurred not so that Theodosius might be defeated, but so that he might not appear to conquer through barbarians.

Then Theodosius, when he saw the battle lines of his men turned about, cast away his weapons and turned to his accustomed auxiliaries. Prostrate in the sight of God, he said: “Almighty God, you know that in the name of Jesus Christ your Son I have undertaken just battles of just vengeance. If it is otherwise, take vengeance upon me. But if I have come here with a justifiable cause, trusting in you, extend your right hand, lest perhaps the nations say: ‘Where is their God?’”

For he stood upon a lofty rock from which he could be seen by his men and could see them while he spoke these things. Through this supplication of the prince, those who were with him, made certain by God, were encouraged toward the slaughter.

It happened, moreover, that Arbogast, a count of the enemy party [read: Arbitio, a count of the enemy party], although he had caught the unsuspecting emperor within ambushes placed around him, was by God's will turned toward reverence for the Augustus. He not only freed the emperor himself from danger but also furnished him with assistance.

It was also learned that, after that prayer which the emperor had poured out to God, that great and ineffable whirlwind rushed into the faces of the enemies. The darts cast by the faithful were carried through the air and struck the enemies beyond the measure of a human cast. On the contrary, the weapons which the unbelieving enemies cast were turned back against the enemies themselves.

When these things had been seen, fear born of human conscience looked out for itself. For the hostile army immediately prostrated itself before the victorious Theodosius.

Eugenius, seeing the slaughter of some of his men and the surrender of others, attempted secretly to withdraw himself from the war. He was captured and killed by the soldiers of Theodosius. Arbogast, however, attempted to seek safety in flight. When he perceived himself surrounded on every side by enemies and no way of safety lay open to him, he killed himself with his own hand. Thus the civil war was confined by the blood of these two men.

Before the battle against Arbogast, Theodosius had sent ten thousand Goths whom he had hired for payment. Circumvented through barbarian treachery by Arbogast, they were utterly destroyed. To have lost them was a gain, and to be defeated was to conquer.

Let the detractors of the Christian religion now say whether, from the foundation of the city, there was any single civil war undertaken from so pious a necessity, completed with so divine a success, and settled with so merciful a kindness.

It was therefore evident that Theodosius was always victorious in wars by divine power, not by the strength of human forces. So great was Theodosius's mercy and kindness after this victory that he wished the sons of his enemies, who were not yet Christians and had fled to the church, to be made Christians. Afterward he loved them with Christian charity and did not deprive them of their possessions, but increased them in honors.

Section II: Theodosius destroys the temples of the idols

Therefore, after victory over the tyrants, the pious prince Theodosius, with the greatest care and the greatest zeal, after heretics and pagans had everywhere been driven out, took care to extend everywhere the worship of the Christian religion. He restored to the catholics the churches which the heretics had taken away by violence, and he rose up with all his strength against the rites of the pagans. By a law which he issued, he commanded that all temples of idols everywhere throughout the whole Roman world be overthrown. For down to the times of this most fortunate prince the idols were worshiped by the gentiles; but he, kindled with pious zeal, commanded them to be destroyed.

Now when, at Alexandria in Egypt, they had begun by command of the prince to overthrow a certain temple of idols, the gentiles resisted even with arms, also killing some of the Christians in that tumult. And when the ensuing sedition and killing were reported to the prince, he indeed refused to exercise vengeance upon the killers, reserving them for correction and exposing them rather to subjection. But he decreed that henceforth those who hindered those things—that is, the overthrow of the temples of the idols—ought to be killed. When this was established by the prince's rescript, fear and stupor seized the gentiles, and they resisted this work no further.

At that time there was at Alexandria that temple of Scrapis [read: Serapis] which was marvelous to all of the age. In it an immense image of that same Scrapis [read: Serapis] was worshiped, so great that its right hand touched one wall and its left the other. That monster was said to have been composed from every kind of metal and wood. There were, besides, certain things in the said temple which, constructed by deceits and art, induced amazement.

Now when permission for overthrowing the idols had been given by the emperor through a rescript, certain things had already been spread among the people: that if a human hand touched that temple of Serapis, the earth, opening, would immediately be dissolved into chaos, and the heaven would suddenly fall headlong.

But behold, one of the soldiers, a faithful man fortified more by faith than by arms, rose up and with all his force dashed the thing he had seized [read: a double-edged axe] against the deceiver's jaw. A cry was raised among the peoples. Yet neither did heaven then fall, nor did the earth sink. Then, striking again and yet again, he cut down the smoky image of rotten wood. After this its head, struck off from the neck, and its trunk, when fire was applied, burned as easily as dry wood. Afterward the other idols throughout all Alexandria were likewise cast down.

In the temple of Saturn there was a certain priest named Tyrannus. As though by a response from the divinity, he told the noble and principal men worshiping in the temple, whose matrons had pleased him for his lust, that Saturn had commanded that his wife spend the night in the temple. Then the man who heard this, rejoicing that his wife was called worthy of the divinity, sent her to the temple more elegantly adorned.

In the sight of everyone the matron was shut in. The priest Tyrannus, after closing the doors and handing over the keys, departed. Then, when silence had been made, he crept through hidden and subterranean approaches into the very image of Saturn through open cavities. That image had been hollowed out at the back and carefully fastened to the wall, with lights burning brightly beneath it. He suddenly conveyed a voice to the supplicating woman through the cavity of the image's mouth, so that the unhappy woman trembled with fear and joy because she thought herself worthy of the address of so great a divinity. Afterward, by a certain art, all the lights were extinguished. Then he descended and introduced the poison of adultery into the terrified woman.

When these things had now been done for a long time, as it were, among all the matrons, it happened that a certain woman of chaste mind abhorred the deed and, having returned, disclosed to her husband the deceit of the crime. He, inflamed by the injury to his spouse—or rather to himself—delivered that priest Tyrannus to tortures. He confessed the deceits, and shame invaded everyone because of so great a foulness and fraud. For these things he did not escape unpunished, and he received what he deserved.

Now who could enumerate the superstitious crimes of the idol of Canopus? There was a public school of magical art there; there, among the pagans, a greater gathering was held as at a fountain of demons than was held at Alexandria. That image had been made with such deceitful art that it seemed to sweat water. The water was concealed in a vessel in its belly, and, descending, it extinguished the fire placed beneath the image, as though the god Canopus were greater than the god of the Chaldeans, which is fire, because by extinguishing it he seemed to overcome it. But no sweat availed to prevent this idol too from being brought to the ground when the fraud had been exposed.

Moreover, it was the custom in Egypt for the measure of the river Nile to be carried to the temple of Serapis, as though to the temple's author of the waters and inundation. But when his image had been overturned and consumed by fire, all the pagans declared that Serapis, mindful of the injury, would no longer bestow the waters and abundance. But in order that God, not Serapis, might be shown to be far more powerful than the Nile and to command the waters of the river at his own seasons [read: God might show that it was not Serapis, who was far later than the Nile, but he himself who commanded the river's waters in their appointed seasons], from that time onward so great a flood rose that no former age records its equal. In all these things the most pious emperor gave thanks to God because the most ancient errors of idolatry were being removed.

Section III: The massacre at Thessalonica and Theodosius's public penance

During the same time, through a certain stealthy incursion of the demon, a foul stain was inflicted upon the religious prince. For when a sedition had arisen at Thessalonica and a certain man from among the soldiers had been killed by an assault of the people, the emperor, inflamed by the savagery of the sudden report, invited the people to the circus games. He ordered soldiers unexpectedly to surround them and everywhere to cut down with the sword whoever came in their way, and vengeance to be given not according to the crime but according to fury. There more than five thousand men were slaughtered.

Now when, not long afterward, the emperor came to Milan and wished to enter God's sacred temple, Ambrose, the bishop of God who still presided over that church, met the approaching emperor at the threshold of the church and addressed him with these words:

“Emperor, do you not know the things perpetrated by you? Why, after the cause of so great a fury, do you not recognize the mass of your wickedness? Perhaps the power of empire prevents recognition of the sin; nevertheless, it is fitting that reason conquer power. Nature must indeed be known, and its mortality and dissolution and dust, and the lowly condition of the progenitors from whom we have received this vile corpse; and, trusting not in a purple garment, let us not ignore the infirmity and fragility of the body with which we are covered. With what eyes will you look upon God and God's temple? What hands will you extend to him, from which the blood of the innocent still flows? With what presumption will you receive God's sacred body and blood, when by your command so much blood of the innocent has been shed? Withdraw, therefore, withdraw, lest by a second sin you endeavor to increase the wickedness of the former ones. Accept the bond with which the Lord of all binds you.”

Obeying these words, the emperor did not presume to enter God's church, but returned to the palace weeping and groaning. For he had been instructed in the divine sayings and knew that Christ's bishop had spoken true things. Nor was he ignorant of the things proper to priests and those proper to kings.

When a space of eight months had passed, the sacred Nativity of Christ our Lord drew near. But the emperor, remaining in the palace amid continual lamentations, poured forth tears without ceasing. Rufinus, the master of the soldiers, observing this, attempted to console the Augustus. The emperor, full of sobs, said to him: “You, Rufinus, do not perceive the evils which I suffer. For God's temples are open to slaves and beggars; they freely entreat the common Lord of all. But entrance is denied to me, and, what is worse, the heavens are closed to me.” While saying this, he interrupted his words with sobs.

Then Rufinus said: “I shall run, if it pleases you, and persuade Bishop Ambrose to absolve you from the bond with which he has bound you.”

The emperor answered him: “You will not persuade Ambrose. For I know his decree to be most just, and in this case he will not reverence imperial power.”

But when Rufinus asserted that Ambrose could be bent, the emperor commanded him to proceed with haste; he himself, with a humble retinue, followed the footsteps of the one preceding him.

It is indeed marvelous: when Ambrose perceived that Rufinus had come to the church, anticipating him with words he said: “You have followed the impudence of dogs, O Rufinus, though you exist as the author of the death of so many innocent persons; and now, wiping shame from your forehead, you do not blush, nor do you fear to bark against the divine majesty.”

When Rufinus begged him to loose the emperor's bond and added that the emperor would follow immediately, Ambrose said to him: “I foretell to you, Rufinus, that I shall forbid him to enter the sacred thresholds. But if he turns the empire into tyranny, I shall willingly receive death for the truth.”

Hearing these and other things, Rufinus reported to the emperor the will of the prelate. But when the emperor learned this in the middle of the street, he said: “I shall proceed, and I shall receive the insults cast into my face.”

Therefore, when he arrived, he did not dare enter the basilica, but, finding the bishop seated in the reception room, begged that he loose his bond. But the bishop said that his presence was tyrannical, that Theodosius was raging against God, and that he was trampling God's sacred laws.

The emperor answered him: “No, most holy father, I do not rise up against the ecclesiastical ordinances, nor do I contend to enter the sacred thresholds. But I entreat you to loose my bonds and to pray for me to the clemency of the common Lord, and that the door which our Lord opened to all who do penance not be closed to me.”

Then the prelate said: “What penance have you shown after so many impieties? With what medicines have you cured incurable wounds and blows?”

The emperor answered him: “It is your work to teach and prepare the medicines, but mine to receive the things offered.”

And when the emperor introduced the example of David, who joined murder to adultery and nevertheless was pardoned, he replied: “You have imitated him when he erred; imitate him when he corrected himself.”

“Since, therefore,” said Ambrose, “you committed your judgment to fury, and reason did not pronounce the sentence but rather wrath, write a law which annuls the decrees of fury. For thirty days let a sentence of death and proscription remain only in letters and await the judgment of reason. When these days have passed and wrath has now ceased, let reason judge the case and dispose in truth what it has recognized within itself.”

The emperor willingly accepted this admonition, confessed it to be an excellent law, immediately caused it to be written, and confirmed the letters with his own hand.

Thus, therefore, the most sacred emperor, presuming with the prelate's permission to enter the thresholds, supplicated the Lord neither standing nor with knees merely bent; rather, lying prone upon the pavement, he proclaimed the Lord's saying: “My soul has cleaved to the pavement,” and so forth. Pulling out his hair with his hands, striking his forehead, and sprinkling the pavement with drops of tears, he begged to obtain pardon.

When the time approached at which he was accustomed to carry an offering to the altar, he rose and entered with tears. But when he had offered, he stood within the sanctuary rails, as he had been accustomed. Again Ambrose did not acquiesce, but taught him the distinction of places. First he asked what he was waiting for there. When the emperor said that he was awaiting the reception of the sacred mysteries, Ambrose sent word through the archdeacon:

“O emperor, the inner places have been assigned to priests alone; others are permitted neither to enter nor to touch them. Go out, therefore, and hold this expectation in common with the others. For purple makes emperors, not priests.”

Then the most faithful emperor, receiving this rule also with a grateful spirit, sent back word: “I did not remain within the rails because of audacity, but because I learned that this custom exists in the city of Constantinople. Therefore I give thanks for this medicine.”

Thus both bishop and emperor shone with such and so great a virtue: the former with the fervor of zeal and confidence, the latter with purity of faith and obedience.

When he had returned to Constantinople and proceeded to church on feast days, after the gifts had been offered upon the altar he immediately went out. And when Nectarius, the bishop there, sent to ask why he did not wish to stand within, the emperor sent this answer: “I was scarcely able to learn what the difference is between an emperor and a priest. I have scarcely found a teacher of the truth. I have known Ambrose alone to be worthily called a pontiff.”

The wife of this man, Placella [i.e., Flaccilla], did not differ greatly from her husband's purpose in devotion toward God. It could not be said how greatly she venerated the priests of God and especially the poor of Christ. For she ministered to the sick poor with her own hands, using neither slaves nor others as ministers; rather, she herself went about through the dwellings of the poor and the hospitals, serving the sick, cleaning their pots, and washing their feet.

That excellent woman used to say: “To distribute gold is the work of empire; I offer this work to the Most High for the safety of the empire.” And she often said to her husband Theodosius: “Husband, you ought to consider what you formerly were and what you now are. If you do this continually, you will never be ungrateful for such great benefactions.”

In the Decrees, Distinction 96, Duo sunt, it is said that Ambrose excommunicated Theodosius. And in Cause XI, Question III, Cum apud Thessalonicam, it is related, taken from the Ecclesiastical History, that for that killing he performed public penance as ordered by Ambrose's imposition and established that law of which mention has been made.

Title IX, Chapter IX

The death of Theodosius and the succession of his sons

Thus, while Theodosius was ruling with great fear of God and with the exaltation of the Church, the Lord God gave peace in his days. For, when the din of wars had been lulled, the world enjoyed an excellent peace, the commonwealth having been made tranquil.

But after no long time, the most faithful emperor fell into illness at Milan. Constrained by care for the ordering of the commonwealth, he sent for his sons. When they arrived, he gave to Arcadius, the elder of his sons, the empire principally in the parts of the East; and to Honorius, his younger son, endowed with equal dignity, he handed over the empire of the West to be governed. Finally he migrated from the earthly empire, as is believed, to the heavenly one.

In his time at Emmaus a double boy was born, divided from the navel upward. The bodies of the prophets Habakkuk and Micah were revealed and found. Augustine, converted to the faith, was baptized by Ambrose. And Jerome flourished. But concerning these things below.

Section I: Arcadius and Honorius; Gildo, Rufinus, and Stilicho

Therefore, when Theodosius had died, his two sons succeeded to the empire. They began to reign in the year of the Lord 398, and they reigned together for thirteen years. Their father, as James of Colonna reports, while he was still living had entrusted the care of his sons to two men. One was Rufinus, whom he had placed over the eastern court; to the other, namely Stilicho, he had entrusted the western court. Moreover, a certain Gildo from among the companions of Theodosius governed the regions of Africa.

As soon as this Gildo knew that Theodosius had been removed from human affairs, judging that there would be little hope in his young sons, he broke faith and occupied Africa. His brother Masteher [read: Mascezel], detesting his brother's perfidy, left Africa, came to Honorius in Italy, and reported his brother's rebellion to him. When Gildo learned that his brother had gone to Honorius, he deceitfully surrounded and killed the two sons of Masteher [read: Mascezel] who had been left in Africa.

Masteher [read: Mascezel], therefore, was sent with an army against Gildo, as a suitable man inflamed against his brother by the killing of his sons. But Masteher [read: Mascezel], knowing from the examples of Theodosius how much prayer and humiliation avail in desperate affairs, first went to the island of Capraria with holy men, imploring God's clemency for many days and nights with prayers and fasts.

Then, having taken confidence from God, and strengthened also concerning victory by a nocturnal vision in which Ambrose appeared to him and announced this, he advanced against the enemy—he himself with five thousand against eighty thousand armed men. When those first meeting him were uttering pious words of peace and a standard-bearer resisted insolently, Masteher [read: Mascezel] drew his sword and wounded him in the arm. Weakened on account of this, the man lowered the standard. Those following, thinking from this that the foremost ranks had surrendered, abandoned Gildo and delivered themselves to Masteher [read: Mascezel].

When Gildo sought flight by ship, he was brought back to the place by contrary winds, captured, and strangled. But Masteher [read: Mascezel], elated by victory and despising the fellowship of the saints, after he had violently dragged certain persons from a church, was killed by order of Honorius.

While these things were being done in Africa, Rufinus, to whom Theodosius had entrusted the care of the eastern court, corrupted by the evil of perfidy, attempted to invade the empire with the auxiliaries of the barbarians. By order of the prince Arcadius, he paid the penalty for so great a crime by a most just death.

At the instigation of his wife, this Arcadius caused a council to be assembled for the deposition of John Chrysostom, because John had publicly reproved the emperor's wife, likening her to Herodias. On this account Pope Innocent excommunicated the emperor Arcadius, because he had procured this, namely, that John be deposed and sent into exile, as is contained in Distinction 26, Duo sunt.

Now Stilicho, to whom Theodosius had entrusted the care of the western court because his son Honorius, to whom he had given the western empire, was quite young, after the death of Arcadius treated the empire of Honorius with contempt and endeavored to substitute his own son Eucherius for himself, as it were, in the empire. Hence he also secretly negotiated treaties with the nation of the Goths. He permitted the Vandals, Suevi, and Burgundians to rage against and infest the Roman provinces when he could have driven them back, so that in this way, at least, Honorius would be compelled to make his son Eucherius emperor. And although he had often conquered and often shut in Alaric, king of the Goths, he always released him.

When the scene of such great evils had been disclosed to Honorius, Stilicho was killed after an army had most justly been moved against him. His son Eucherius, who, in order to obtain for himself the favor of the pagans, had promised the rebuilding of the temples of the idols and the destruction of the churches, and also a persecution of the Christians, was punished with his attendants.

Section II: Radagaisus and Alaric invade Italy

During the earlier times when Arcadius and Honorius were reigning together, a certain Radagaisus, one of the most powerful kings of the Goths, who had not yet received the faith of Christ, invaded all Italy in a sudden attack. It is written that there were more than two hundred thousand Goths in his army. Beyond this unconquered multitude and unconquered strength, he was a pagan and a Scythian who had devoted all the blood of the Roman race to his gods.

Therefore, as this most monstrous beast approached the Roman walls, immense fear invaded the Romans. Within the city there was a great running about of pagans, crying that they were suffering these things because the sacred rites of the great gods had been neglected by the Romans. For this reason, great complaints were made everywhere about restoring and observing the sacred rites. Blasphemies seethed throughout the whole city, and the name of Christ was publicly blasphemed by the pagans. Among them especially a certain Symmachus, a great and distinguished orator, raged; he also dealt with the people by letters and writings for the restoration of idolatry.

On this occasion two pagan commanders of Goths and Huns, namely Pharus [read: Sarus] and Uldin, were hired by the Romans. But God did not allow a matter of his power to be accomplished by human strength. For Radagaisus, suddenly terrified by divine power, withdrew with his forces onto the rough ridge of the mountain of Fiesole. Those for whom Italy had at first seemed narrow were driven by divine power onto one small summit of a mountain.

While they labored from hunger and thirst, Radagaisus alone, taking up the hope of flight, secretly deserted his men. But falling among our men, he was captured and immediately killed. The others were either captured or killed by the Romans. So great a multitude of captive Goths is said to have existed that, in the manner of the cheapest cattle, herds of men were everywhere sold for single gold coins.

When this barbarian king had been killed, another most powerful king of the Goths, named Alaric, raged through the Roman provinces; he, however, was a Christian. Having now been received into the bosom of Italy, he shook trembling Rome from nearby with terror. He sent word to the emperor Honorius that Honorius should either engage him in war or give the Goths a place to inhabit within his empire. Therefore Honorius, after communicating counsel with his men, assigned them Gaul, which lay exposed to the fury of the Vandals—for they had not yet crossed into Spain—to inhabit.

Thus, when Alaric had accepted this concession and was making for Gaul with his entire army, he stopped for a little while near the city of Piacenza to refresh the pack animals. But Count Stilicho, pursuing the Goths to the destruction of the commonwealth, when he desired to attack them by ambush, entrusted the chief command of the war to a certain pagan count. On the most sacred day of Easter, when the Goths suspected nothing of the kind, this man rushed cruelly upon them and laid low no small part of them.

For at first, disturbed by the sudden attack of those men, the Goths avoided battle because of reverence for the holy day. At length they seized their weapons and exhorted one another; by their own valor they laid low the army that was already victorious and turned those men to flight. When they had been utterly routed and a great part of them had been slain, the Goths, stirring themselves outwardly into rage [read: stirred into a frenzy of fury] and abandoning the journey they had undertaken, took the road toward the city of Rome.

They devastated everything through which they passed with slaughter, plunder, and fire. Without delay they came to the city itself. Then they besieged it, and, when it had long been besieged, by God's just judgment they took it. Nevertheless, Alaric first gave the command that, if any had fled to holy places, especially to the basilicas of Peter and Paul, he should allow them to remain unharmed and free; and that afterward, insofar as they could while intent upon plunder, they should refrain from bloodshed.

Rome, therefore, the mistress of the world, was taken, broken open, burned, and devastated. What, then, concerning the many nations which waged wars among themselves and never spared the conquered in the abodes of their gods, and yet in this devastation of the city he willed that those fleeing to the churches of the saints should be free?

Augustine writes many most lucid things concerning matters of this kind at the beginning of The City of God, in order to confute the falsehood of those Romans who most unjustly complained that Rome had always suffered evils and adversities after receiving the faith of Christ, and who attempted to restore the worship of idols. He refutes their error with most efficacious reasons.

Therefore, whatever devastation, slaughter, plundering, burning, and affliction was committed in that most recent calamity of Rome, the custom of wars did this. But what was done in a new manner was that, in an unaccustomed appearance of affairs, barbarian inhumanity appeared so mild that the most spacious basilicas were filled with a people who were spared, where no one was struck; from them no one was seized; to them many who were to be liberated were led by pitying enemies; and from them none who were to be made captive were led away, not even by cruel enemies.

This must be attributed to our Christ and to Christian times. Whoever does not see it is blind; whoever sees it and does not praise it is ungrateful; whoever insults the one who praises it is insane. Far be it that any prudent man impute this to the savagery of the barbarians. He terrified those most ferocious and most savage minds; he restrained them; he wondrously tempered them—he who so long before had foretold through the prophet: “I shall visit their iniquities with a rod,” and so forth; “But my mercy I shall not scatter from him.”

After the city had been plundered, the barbarians voluntarily departed on the third day after they had entered, when some buildings had been set on fire. And lest anyone perhaps doubt that this had been permitted to the enemies for the correction of the city's pride, wantonness, and blasphemy, at the same time the most renowned places of the city which could not be set aflame by the enemies were broken apart by thunderbolts.

In that irruption Placidia, daughter of the prince Theodosius and sister of the emperors Arcadius and Honorius, was captured by Asculphus [read: Athaulf], a kinsman of Alaric, and taken as his wife. This afterward occurred to the great advantage of the commonwealth.

Rome was therefore taken by the Goths in the year of the Lord 400, or thereabouts, but in the one thousand one hundred seventy-fourth year from its foundation.

Thus, withdrawing from the city, the barbarians raged through Campania, Lucania, and Bruttium with a similar slaughter and reached the cities of Calabria. When, with hands having been mounted [read: with ships having been boarded], they wished to cross into Sicily, they suffered shipwreck and lost many of their men. Amid these things, while Alaric deliberated about what he ought to do, he was extinguished by a sudden death.

When he had died, the Goths at Consentia diverted the river Busento from its bed by the labor of captives and buried the body of their king Alaric with infinite treasures. When he had been buried, they restored the river to its former course. But lest anyone thereafter be able to know the place of burial, they cruelly killed all the captives whom they had employed to complete the work.

When this had been done, they all with one mind created Asculphus [read: Athaulf] king. Then, returning to Rome, they eradicated like locusts whatever remained. Placidia, a shrewd and prudent woman, then bent the mind of her husband with subtle blandishments so that he might of his own accord seek peace from the Roman emperors. After he had obtained it, he observed it quite zealously while he lived; and he desired to serve the emperor Honorius in defense of the commonwealth and to expend the strength of the Goths.

This Asculphus [read: Athaulf], since he was a prudent and keen man and was supported by great forces of Goths, is said in the first days of his reign to have longed vehemently to make and call all Roman soil the empire of the Goths, the Roman name having been forgotten and abolished; that Rome itself should be called Gothia; and that Asculphus [read: Athaulf] himself should hold the monarchy in the commonwealth as Octavian had.

But when by much experience he had proved that the Goths, on account of their unbridled barbarity, could in no way obey laws, and that the laws of the commonwealth ought not to be forbidden—for without them a commonwealth is not a thing—he sought at least for himself the glory of restoring in its entirety and increasing the Roman name by the strength of the Goths, and of being held among posterity as the author of the Roman restoration, since he could not be its transformer. On this account he abstained from war and longed for peace, principally through the persuasive counsel of his wife Placidia, a woman of most acute intellect and sufficiently approved religion, toward every work of good ordering.

While he remained at Barcelona, a city of nearer Spain, in order to seek and procure peace, he was killed, as is reported, by the treachery of his own men.

After him Sigeric was created king by the Goths. Since he was inclined toward peace, he was killed by his own men. Then Wallia succeeded to the kingdom, chosen for this purpose, that he should break the peace with the Romans, but ordained by God for this purpose, that he should confirm the peace. Therefore, after giving excellent and most select hostages, he composed an excellent peace with Honorius. Moreover, he restored to him his sister Galla Placidia, formerly the wife of Asculphus [read: Athaulf], and offered himself with his Goths against the other nations which had occupied Spain.

Section III: Arcadius, the younger Theodosius, and Honorius

But Arcadius, who had held the seat of the eastern empire at Constantinople, was seized by a grave illness. When he perceived himself to be near death, he declared his son Theodosius Augustus and gave the king of the Persians to him as his guardian. The king benignly undertook the guardianship of the boy and made a most firm peace with the Romans.

This younger Theodosius began to reign after the death of his father, together with Honorius his paternal uncle, in the year of the Lord 413.

Now when the Vandals were raging through Gaul on account of the recent irruption into the city, and Honorius was occupied by other arduous affairs in Italy, he sent several legions to defend Gaul. But these legions created as emperor a certain Constantine merely on account of the hope inspired by his name and valor. As soon as he invaded the empire, he gathered an army against the barbarians. Longing in vain hope for the empire of the whole West, he also attempted to occupy Spain.

Hence, when he had sent certain of his men with an armed force and many had adhered to them, nevertheless two noble and wealthy men, Didymus and Viridianus [read: Verinianus], favoring Honorius, gathered no small army and resisted the tyrant Constantine. Against them that tyrant Constantine sent his son Constans, made Caesar from a monk. Supported by the aid of the barbarians, he defeated them in war, put them to flight, and killed them.

Therefore, the Vandals, seeing that they could not withstand Constantine and the power of his men, entered Spain. Devastating everything with slaughter, plunder, and fires, they reduced the inhabitants to such misery that, from the want caused by famine, they ate human flesh.

Thus Honorius, when he perceived that the strength of the commonwealth was being weakened by daily injuries, placed Count Constantius, a vigorous and warlike man, over the whole army and sent him, furnished with many forces, into Gaul against Constantine. Constantius entered Gaul, joined battle with him, and destroyed Constantine himself at the city of Arles; Constantine's son Constantius [read: Constantine's son Constans] was captured and killed at Vienne.

The Vandals, Suevi, and Alans had devastated and occupied several provinces of Spain. Celtiberia alone was held by Roman judges, and the Alans infested it with continual incursions. But the aforesaid Constantius, supported by the aid of Wallia, king of the Goths, defeated the Alans in a most difficult war, inflicted a very great slaughter upon them, and killed their king. Those who survived abandoned their settlements in Lusitania and New Carthage and fled to Gunderic, king of the Vandals, who was reigning in Galicia. They subjected themselves to his rule, and one people was formed with them.

Meanwhile, while these things were being done in Spain, a certain Tertullus, one of the patricians, a rich and powerful man, with certain peoples from Italy favoring him, usurped the empire for himself. Immediately abandoned by his men, he was killed by the supporters of Honorius.

After him a certain Attalus invaded the empire at Rome. On the third day he was captured by Constantius and sent to Honorius; with his hand cut off, his life was granted to him.

Moreover, in Africa, Heracanus [read: Heraclianus] and his son-in-law Sabinus, commanders of the Roman army, gathered many auxiliaries of the Moors and of other nations. With three thousand ships he undertook a journey to occupy Rome and the empire of Italy. But, terrified by the encounter with the maritime count, he was the first to abandon his men, seized a ship, and fled back to Carthage, which he had occupied. There, not long afterward, he was killed by his own men.

Therefore, when so many and such great disturbances throughout the whole world had been quieted by God's favor, the emperor Honorius united his sister Galla Placidia, already betrothed to him, in marriage to Count Constantius, a great man and of most uncorrupted faith, to the great joy of everyone. From her Valentinian, the third of that name and afterward emperor, was born.

Now the kings of those nations which had occupied Spain, seeing that Honorius's constancy prospered in all things and that the Goths had been joined to the Romans in friendship, sent envoys with most select hostages to the emperor Honorius, subjecting themselves to him.

Honorius also, perceiving the valor and industry of Constantius, with everyone at Ravenna praising him, clothed him with the purple and made him a partner in the empire. He died seven months thereafter, to the greatest loss of the commonwealth.

Finally the emperor Honorius, religious and excellent, not unlike his father in religion and magnificence, when ten years had passed in which he had reigned with his father Theodosius, six in which he had reigned with his brother Arcadius, and three with his nephew the younger Theodosius, left the commonwealth at peace everywhere and died at the city of Rome. His body was buried beside the shrine of Peter.

This Honorius made a constitution concerning what should be done in a case of schism, as is evident in Distinction 79, Si duo. But because laymen, of whatever status, can dispose nothing concerning ecclesiastical affairs nor make constitutions over the clergy, that constitution therefore has force insofar as it was approved and canonized by the Church. Indeed, he did this at the request of Pope Boniface, as is contained in Distinction 97, Ecclesiae meae.

Title X

The following Title X principally contains the deeds of the holy doctors and their more notable sayings, of those who lived from Constantine, the first emperor, down to the times of the emperors Arcadius and Honorius—that is, from the year of the Lord 300, or thereabouts, down to the year of the Lord 450, or thereabouts. These are, namely, Eusebius, Athanasius, Ambrose, Augustine, John Chrysostom, Paul Orosius, Rufinus, Maximus, John Damascene, Claudian the poet, Lactantius, and Sulpicius Severus. It also concerns certain holy pontiffs and others, namely Martin, Brice, Zenobius, bishop of Florence, Maurilius, Alexius, and Paula.

Chapter I

"Those who are learned shall be as the splendor of the firmament"

"Those who are learned shall be as the splendor of the firmament, and those who instruct many unto justice as the stars unto perpetual eternities." Daniel 12.

Although after the apostles there have always been illustrious men in the holy Church who shone not only in holiness but also in doctrine, who instructed the wise, enlightened the foolish, and put to flight the darkness of errors and vices like stars which the night does not obscure, nevertheless these shone most greatly from the time of Constantine the Great down to the times of the emperors Arcadius and Honorius. They were most holy and most learned men in divine as well as human knowledge, who not only taught the peoples by word and confuted heresies but also instruct men daily by the writings which they left.

Hence their works are approved by the Church, as is evident in Distinction 15, The Holy Roman Church: the works of blessed Cyprian, martyr and bishop of Carthage; the works of blessed Gregory Nazianzen, bishop; the works of blessed Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria; the works of blessed Hilary, bishop of Poitiers; the works of blessed John, bishop of Constantinople; the works of blessed Ambrose, bishop of Milan; the works of blessed Augustine, bishop of Hippo; the works of blessed Jerome, priest; the works of blessed Prosper, a most religious man; and the works of blessed Basil, bishop of Caesarea.

Moreover, in Distinction 16, in the chapter How Holy, the general synod celebrated under Justinian confirmed the works of certain other Greek doctors, namely Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria; Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria; Gregory of Nyssa; Gregory the Theologian—this man, I think, is Nazianzen—Timothy, bishop of Alexandria; and Cyril, bishop of Alexandria. Because we possess few works in Latin from the last-named Greeks, they are therefore omitted. Concerning the other, earlier men, we shall set down below both their lives and certain flowers from their books, and most especially the passages which are found transcribed in various places in the Decrees.

Section I: The several men named Eusebius

Among the others, Eusebius, bishop of Vercelli and a contemporary of Athanasius, shone like the splendor of the firmament. Of these two, just as Athanasius defended the faith against the faithless Arians in the East, so did Eusebius in the West. And although he left no writings, nevertheless he very greatly illuminated the Church by his word and by the example of his holiness.

But in order to remove equivocation, which is the mother of error, it must be observed that many illustrious men served under this name, contemporaries or almost near in time. And, omitting that Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, who was the greatest supporter and defender of the Arians, there was first a certain Eusebius, pope and martyr, who immediately preceded Pope Melchiades; Sylvester succeeded Melchiades in the time of Constantine.

Around the same time flourished Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea, who wrote an Ecclesiastical History and a chronicle from the time of Ninus down to his own times, and who suffered martyrdom, as is said, concerning which something was said above.

Eusebius, a priest of Rome, also shone in holiness of life and constancy. Reproving both the emperor Constantius and Pope Liberius, Arians, to their faces for their error, he was fearlessly shut within a most confined chamber and was crowned there.

There was in those times another certain Eusebius of Nicaea, who published certain very lucid works. From his sayings the following is contained in the section On Consecration, Distinction 2:

Because the assumed body—that is, Christ—was to be taken away from our eyes and carried to the stars, it was necessary that on the day of the Supper he consecrate for us the sacrament of his body and blood, so that what was once offered as the price might continually be worshiped through a mystery; so that, because a daily and unwearied redemption was proceeding for the salvation of men, the offering of redemption might be perpetual; so that the everlasting victim might live in memory and be ever present in grace, truly a single and perfect sacrifice, to be esteemed by faith, not by outward appearance, and to be judged not by exterior sight but by interior affection.

Hence heavenly authority confirms: “For my flesh is truly food,” and so forth. Let every doubt of unbelief therefore depart, since he who is the author of the gift is himself also the witness of its truth. For the invisible priest by his word and secret power converts visible creatures into the substance of his body and blood, saying thus: “Take and eat; this is my body.”

Therefore, just as at the command of the Lord who gave the order, the heights of the heavens, the depths of the waves, and the expanses of the lands suddenly came forth from nothing, by an equal power in the spiritual sacraments, where power commands, the effect serves.

And how it ought not seem new and impossible to you that earthly and mortal things are converted into the substance of Christ, ask yourself, who have been regenerated in Christ. Long ago, alien to truth, a stranger to mercy, exiled inwardly from the way of salvation, you were dead. Suddenly initiated into Christ's laws and renewed by the mysteries, you passed into the body of the Church not by seeing but by believing; and from being a son of perdition you merited by a hidden divinity to become an adopted son of God.

Remaining in visible measure, you were invisibly made greater than yourself without increase of quantity. Nothing was added outwardly, and the whole was changed inwardly. Therefore, just as, without bodily perception, your former vileness having been laid aside, you were suddenly clothed with a new dignity; and just as the fact that God, with the mind wounded, healed what was wounded, washed what was infected, and cleansed what was unstained [read: God healed what was wounded in you, washed what was infected, and cleansed what was stained] is entrusted not to your eyes but to your senses; so, when you ascend to the reverend altar to be satisfied with spiritual foods, behold by faith the sacred body and blood of your God. Honor it, marvel at it, touch it with the mind, receive it with the hand of the heart, and above all take the whole draught with the inner man. Thus says he.

This rhetorician, as Vincent relates in the Mirror of History, composed innumerable books which pertain to the applause of the people, and, having followed history more closely, is read most zealously by those who wish to declaim. He wrote against the Jews and the gentiles, and especially ten books of Innovations, and very many short homilies upon the Gospels. He flourished under the emperor Constantius and was buried at Antioch.

Section II: Eusebius of Vercelli

In the times of Diocletian and Maximian, Eusebius of Vercelli, still a little catechumen, came to Rome with his parents and received baptism and his name from Pope Eusebius. Before baptizing him, Pope Eusebius was instructed by an angel what manner and how great a man he would become, and by what name he should call him. At his very baptism angelic hands were seen which lifted him from the sacred font.

He always remained a virgin. After baptism he touched no woman with a kiss, not even his mother—not by despising his mother but by fleeing fault.

When a certain noble matron, captivated by his beauty, wished to approach his chamber, she circled the streets of the city for the whole night and could not reach his chamber because angels were guarding it. Hence, on the following day, being contrite, she cast herself at his feet, and, seeking pardon, confessed the crime she had contemplated.

Pope Marcus, who succeeded Sylvester, ordained him a priest because constancy of faith excelled in him and because he was already fifty years old. He shone with such holiness that during the solemnities of the masses the sacred mystery appeared between his hands.

After this, Pope Julius, seeing the Arians as if prevailing under the emperor Constantius, consecrated him bishop of the city of Vercelli, which at that time held the principality among the other cities of Italy. When he had entered Vercelli, all the doors of the churches were closed through the doing of the heretics, so that no one might enter. But blessed Eusebius, having learned of their malice, prayed on bended knees before the door of the greater church, and the closed doors were divinely opened.

When blessed Eusebius was purifying all the provinces of the West from the Arian pest by his teaching, just as Athanasius was purifying those of the East, the emperor Constantius labored to drive him into exile. Blessed Eusebius persecuted the Arians to such an extent that he condemned Auxentius, the Arian bishop of Milan, after he had been expelled by all the Christians, and ordained Saint Dionysius bishop there in his place. Hence Constantius, angered against him, assembled councils.

When Eusebius came to the council of Milan to which he had been summoned by the emperor, he tore up there a writing made in favor of the Arians against the truth of the faith, which bore the subscriptions of very many catholic bishops who had been deceived through ignorance by an equivocal word. The emperor Constantius, angered, handed him over to the will of the Arians.

Dragging him from the midst of the other bishops and flogging him violently, they dragged him over the stairs of the palace from the top to the bottom, and again from the bottom to the top. When his head had been battered by the stones of the steps and he had already poured out much blood, and still refused to consent to them, they bound his hands behind him and dragged him by the neck so that he might assent to them. But, yielding in nothing, he steadfastly said that he remained in his confession and would willingly die for it.

When other catholic bishops, animated by his example, had been sent into exile, he was bound and enclosed in a cage at Sercopolis [read: Scythopolis]. Then the Arians dragged him from there, denied him food and drink, and shut him for seven days in a most confined place. After some days they sent him to a still more confined place, so that he could turn himself in no direction or see any of his men. There he was consoled by an angelic visitation in so great an affliction.

Finally, when Constantius had died and Julian the Apostate had taken up the empire, in order that he might render himself lovable to everyone, at the beginning of his empire he permitted each person to live under whatever law he wished. On this account the bishops were recalled from exile, and Eusebius himself was released free.

After Julian, while Jovian was emperor and the Arians had been quieted, Eusebius returned to Vercelli, and the people received him with great exultation. But when afterward the Arian Valens was emperor, the Arians sprang up again and resumed strength against the catholics. They stirred up a sedition against Eusebius while he was visiting the dioceses, surrounded his house, seized him, dragged him supine outside the house, and overwhelmed him with stones. Thus he migrated to the Lord, crowned with martyrdom.

He was buried by his disciples in the church which he himself had constructed. He lived at least eighty-eight years.

Title X, Chapter II

“Like the flower of roses in the days of spring”

“Like the flower of roses in the days of spring, so Athanasius shone in the temple of God.”

For the rose is the most beautiful flower. Fragrant in odor, it strengthens; by its white and red color it delights the sight; by its substance or juice it restores and refreshes. So Athanasius was the good odor of Christ through the reputation of his uprightness. He delighted those who saw him by the brightness of purity and the fervor of charity. By doctrine he restored those who were weak in truth. And, what is more marvelous, amid the thorns of persecutions he shone more than the other doctors.

At the time when Bishop Alexander was observing the feast day of Peter the Martyr at Alexandria, after the solemnities had been completed, he was waiting in a place near the sea for the clerics who were to assemble for a meal. From afar he saw a game of boys upon the seashore, imitating, as is customary, a bishop and those things which are customarily done in churches. When he had watched them intently for a rather long time, he also saw certain more secret mysteries being performed by them. Immediately disturbed, he ordered the boys to be seized and brought to him.

When they were present, he carefully asked what their game was, what they had done, and how. Fearful, as that age is, they denied it at first. Then they disclosed the deed in order and confessed that certain catechumens had been baptized by them through Athanasius, who had played the bishop in that childish game.

Then Alexander diligently inquired of those who were said to have been baptized what they had been asked and what they had answered. When he saw that all things agreed with the rite of our religion, he is said, after conferring with a council of clerics, to have determined that for those upon whom water had been poured with the interrogations and answers complete, baptism ought not to be repeated, but those things which priests customarily perform ought to be completed.

But Athanasius and those whom that game seemed to have made priests or ministers he handed over, after their parents had been summoned and adjured by God, to be reared by the Church. After a short time had passed, when Athanasius had been instructed by a grammarian, he was soon restored by his parents to the priest, as one commended to the Lord in faith, and was reared like a certain Samuel in the temple of the Lord.

At the time of the Council of Nicaea he was also present at the counsels of that bishop Alexander, greatly assisting the old man. When Alexander proceeded to his end in a good old age, Athanasius was chosen to bear the priestly ephod—that is, to be bishop of Alexandria.

Now in a year of the reign of Constantius, since the emperor himself greatly favored the Arians and was himself an Arian, as Rufinus says in Book X, the eunuchs and those who were about him, carefully instructed for this purpose by the Arian bishops, took care that Athanasius should not be given an opportunity to approach the emperor, lest the emperor be taught by him concerning the truth of the faith. But they frequently accused Athanasius before the emperor as the author of every crime and shameful act, to such an extent that they carried a human arm in a box and showed it to the emperor himself, affirming that it had been cut from the body of a certain Arsenius by Athanasius for the sake of magical art.

Therefore, the angered emperor summoned a council at Tyre and ordered Athanasius to be condemned, sending one of the counts from his own side; and Athanasius was brought there. Thus, when the council was seated, his Arian rivals arose, saying: “Behold the arm of Arsenius which he cut from him. Let this man who is present state for what cause.”

This Arsenius was a young cleric. Having committed a certain offense, since he feared punishment by Athanasius, he fled to unknown places. Meanwhile the Arians, judging that he would not return or come to that place at that time, cut an arm from a certain corpse and secretly showed it to the emperor. Afterward they asserted in the council that Athanasius had cut it from Arsenius, not under the pretext of punishment but in order to perform works of magic.

But since certain catholics had previously perceived the calumny prepared against Athanasius, they arranged that Arsenius should be sought and found and should come secretly to the city where the council was assembled, and that he should remain hidden until someone was sent for him.

Therefore, when his rivals had arisen in the council and had shown the severed arm to everyone, many catholic bishops who did not know of their fraud began to hold Athanasius in horror. Athanasius rose in the midst and said: “Do you know this Arsenius?”

Many answered: “We know him very well.”

He said: “Let someone therefore be sent for him. Let him come, and let the truth of the deed shine forth.”

Immediately those who knew him and his place went for him. When he arrived, Athanasius said: “Show your right arm, Arsenius.” When he had shown it intact, Athanasius said: “Show the left also.” When it too appeared intact, the calumny was uncovered.

An accusation by a certain woman was also introduced. She said, having been suborned for this purpose by the Arians, that she had at one time received Athanasius as a guest, suspecting nothing, and had suffered from him by night the violence of corruption.

Athanasius was ordered to be brought in for this purpose. He entered with Timothy his priest and instructed him that, after the woman had finished speaking, while Athanasius himself remained silent, Timothy should answer the things she had said.

When the woman had delivered what she had been taught, Timothy turned to her and said: “Truly, woman, did I at any time remain with you, or did I do violence to you, as you assert?”

Then she, with the obstinacy customary to women of such a kind, said: “Did you do violence to me? Did you stain my chastity with yourself in that place?” At the same time, turning to the judges, she began to adjure the faith of God that she spoke true things.

Then a shame that was ridiculous began to possess everyone, because the faction responsible for the fabricated crime had been exposed so easily while the accused remained silent. But because it was a council for oppressing the man, not for judging him, a clamor was suddenly raised by everyone. They cried that Athanasius was a magician and deceived the eyes of those looking upon him; and, after making an assault, they prepared to tear him apart with their own hands.

But Archelaus, who with the others presided over the council at the emperor's command, snatched him from the hands of those tearing at him and led him away through secret exits. Nevertheless, the council assembled again and, as though absolutely nothing had been discovered, condemned Athanasius as if convicted of the charges brought against him. By sending proceedings of this kind throughout the world, they compelled the other bishops to consent to their crime, while the emperor protected them.

From that time Athanasius was driven as a fugitive throughout the whole world, and no safe place of concealment remained for him. Tribunes, prefects, counts, and armies were commanded by imperial edicts to search for him. Rewards were offered to informers if anyone should deliver Athanasius alive, especially, but if not, his head. Thus the forces of the whole kingdom contended in vain against him with whom God was present.

Meanwhile, he is said to have lain hidden for six continuous years in the basin of a cistern which had no water, so that he never saw the sun. But when he seemed to have been betrayed by the maid who alone knew of it and served the masters who had provided him the hiding place, being warned, as it were, by the Spirit of God, on the very night on which the officials were coming with judges to seize him, he removed to another place. Thus those who came were frustrated; the masters also having turned to flight, they exacted penalties from the maid as from a false informer.

Then Athanasius went to the regions where Constans, the brother of Constantius, reigned. Constans received him honorably and, having heard his true doctrine and unjust persecution, wrote letters to his brother, even with threats, that he should restore him to his place. Thus recalled from exile, Athanasius returned to Alexandria.

As Sozomen reports in the Tripartite History, while Athanasius was once proceeding through Alexandria, it happened that a flying crow cried out. Immediately the pagans standing around, reproaching him as a magician, asked that he disclose to them what that crow signified. Smiling, he said to them: “In the Latin language ‘tomorrow’ is a future day very near at hand. By crying this, therefore, it signifies that tomorrow will be a sorrowful day for you.”

On the next day letters came from the emperor to the judges, ordering that the pagans not be permitted to enter their temples or celebrate their solemnities. Their more venerable and general festival was therefore destroyed.

But after Constans had been killed, Athanasius was again expelled from the Alexandrian see by the will of Constantius, and another man named George was appointed bishop in his place by the heretics. But, as Jerome writes in the Chronicle, after a time, when George, who had been ordained in Athanasius's place, was burned in a sedition of the people, Athanasius returned to Alexandria.

Afterward, however, while Julian the Apostate was emperor, since all the magicians and soothsayers to whom he attended asserted that nothing prosperous would happen unless Athanasius were killed, once again, as Rufinus says, an army was sent; once again commanders were sent; once again the church was attacked.

When the sorrowful and weeping people stood around him, he is said to have used a prophetic saying among them: “Do not be disturbed, little children, for it is a little cloud and will quickly pass.”

When he had departed and was making his journey by ship along the river, the count who had been sent for this purpose, having learned of his route, began to pursue him urgently. When Athanasius's little ship happened to put in at a certain place, he learned from those passing by that his executioner was behind him and already appeared to be threatening. All the companions who were present, terrified, advised seeking the desert as a refuge for flight.

Then Athanasius said: “Do not be frightened, little children. Let us go rather to meet our executioner, so that he may know that he who defends us is far greater than he who persecutes us.”

He turned the little ship and, making his journey, went to meet the man who was pursuing him. The man, who could in no way suspect that the one whom he sought would come to meet him, ordered them to be questioned as if they were merely travelers, asking where they had heard that Athanasius was. When they answered that they had seen him going not far away, the man passed by at full speed, hastening in vain to capture the one whom, placed before his eyes, he had been unable to see. But Athanasius, also protected by God's power, returned to Alexandria and remained there safely in hiding until the persecution ceased.

And note that, in Cause XIX, Question III, section Against, Gratian says that Paul, the first hermit, in his testament left his cloak to Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, but his tunic to blessed Anthony.

What was said above, that Athanasius lay hidden for six years in a cistern under the emperor Constantius, is read differently elsewhere. As Vincent of Beauvais reports in Book XVIII of the Mirror of History, when the Arians under the aforesaid Constantius stirred up calumnies against blessed Athanasius, he avoided the corrupted judgment and entrusted himself neither to friend, relative, nor cleric.

But when officers suddenly entered his house, clothed in a tunic and hood he fled at midnight and came to a certain virgin. Although that virgin was young and very beautiful, she had been accustomed at Alexandria to avoid the sight of everyone. When Athanasius had fled for refuge to this virgin, the holy bishop said to her, terrified by the novelty of so unexpected a matter:

“I am harassed by the Arians and assailed by calumnious charges. Therefore, lest I too be branded by a baseless stigma, and lest those who are unjustly prepared for my punishment fall into sin on my account, I judged it better to flee. But God revealed to me this night that I could be saved with no one as I could with you.”

Then she, rejoicing together in the Lord and casting aside vain thoughts, concealed that holy man within the secret parts of her cell for six years, as long as the aforesaid emperor Constantius lived. She herself washed his feet and supplied all necessary things to him in person. She also borrowed the books which he sought and provided them for him to read. Nevertheless, no one in the city was able to discover where he remained until, when Constantius had died, Athanasius again put on his own garments at night and suddenly appeared in the church while everyone marveled. For all believed that they saw him as one raised from the dead.

He satisfied his closest friends, saying: “I did not betake myself to your hiding places so that you could safely swear that you did not know where I remained. And because it was necessary for me to be sought everywhere, I lay hidden in that virgin's cell, where no one would suspect that I was concealed because she appeared young and beautiful. Thus I benefited both her and my reputation or glory.”

Section I: Concerning the books published by Athanasius

Jerome, in On Illustrious Men, speaks thus concerning the books of Athanasius published by him: Two books of his Against the Gentiles are circulated; one book against Valens and Ursacius; many books On Virginity and On the Persecutions of the Arians; a work On the Titles of the Psalms; and a very lengthy history of Anthony the monk in lucid discourse; and several other things which are rarely possessed by the Latins.

He also composed the symbol of faith which begins, “Whoever wishes,” and so forth, which is sung at Prime on Sundays in the churches unless a greater solemnity intervenes. And although it belongs to the Roman pontiff alone to issue a symbol of faith, it is pronounced by everyone and publicly not because it was issued by Athanasius, but because it was approved and authenticated by the universal Church as full of catholic truth, according to Thomas in the Second Part of the Second Part.

Vincent of Beauvais says in Book XV of the Mirror of History that there is found a very useful exhortatory book of Athanasius to monks, from which I have excerpted the flowers written below, namely:

It is permitted to you, initiated into Christ by these beginnings, to glory in him, so that your beginning may be perfection. And, prevailing over the degrees placed between you and the true fruit of living, having occupied the peak of its summit, may you hold the highest point.

While you hear me not only willingly but also eagerly, you have made me shameless through your love. For I lead those who go before me and, extended beyond the measure of my ability, I am compelled to lead those whom I desire to follow.

Abstinence is the nurse of continence, which suffers the reins more easily if it is not incited by the spurs of delights. Those who believe that the thing from which they abstain is unlawful diminish for themselves the reward of their labor. For to beware of unlawful things is the yoke of necessity; to conquer things set before one is the hand of choice [read: to conquer permitted things is the gift of choice]. To abstain from evils is the reward of discipline; to rise above good things is the liberty of choice, not the end of command.

If it can be done, let only the bowl of inward reading break prayers [read: the inward desire for reading interrupt prayers]. Let food be simple and clothing cheap. Let your life command and your tongue persuade, because example bears more authority than speech.

Honor upright women who are truly devoted to the pursuit of religion with a measured veneration, so that neither severity be inhuman nor attentiveness relaxed. But in speaking with them, age, hour, and solitude are principally to be avoided by you, so that everything which can be fabricated against you as though it could also be believed may be avoided. Let the very seeds of rumor perish before they are nourished. For not only credence in the deed but almost even the possibility of the lie must be banished, so that your good may not be blasphemed.

Blessed and illustrious is the life concerning which falsehood is allowed nothing. Nor does the envy of secular labor [read: the hostility of worldly spite] escape me, which always burns to detract from religion. But let the world employ its own nature, provided that it finds nothing in our discipline. Let falsehood be hurled about according to custom, provided that what is said cannot even be probable.

Nevertheless, no one ought to despise the wound of infamy, because it is always fitting to feign a reputation [read: rumor has always been accustomed to fabricate], but should take precautions all the more attentively because rumor is also accustomed to invent falsehoods.

Let departure from the house be necessary and rare, such as either the rule of religion requires or the cause of performing work directs toward the substance of one's livelihood.

Abstain from all gifts except those which supply daily food and yearly clothing, knowing that it is written: “Having food and things with which we may be covered, with these let us be content.” The poor widow put in more than everyone, because that which is the whole cannot be little. Nor did anyone give more abundantly than the one who reserved nothing for himself.

Why should anyone not loose by the will to live that which must be broken by the law of dying, making reward from lot, so that he may increase virtue from necessity? Indeed, by distributing his household property, let him make great things from small, precious things from cheap, and eternal things from transitory. Thus says he.

Title X, Chapter III

“Like the full moon in his days”

“Like the full moon in his days, so Hilary, bishop of Poitiers, shone in the temple of God.” He also flourished at that time.

As Vincent of Beauvais reports in Book XV, chapter 23, of the Mirror of History, from his Acts, he was of Bordeaux and Aquitanian by nation. He was always an excellent Christian and most wise in Sacred Scripture.

It is also read concerning him that, when in adolescence he devoted his labor to letters and did not advance as quickly as he desired, despairing of attaining knowledge he withdrew from the schools, proposing to occupy himself with other things. While traveling on the road, he found a certain well having great upright stones around its mouth, as is customary. Seeing that those stones had been hollowed in certain places by the continual drawing of the rope, he resumed strength of mind and confidence, saying: “If a rope, which is so soft, by continually rubbing this very hard stone has cut and hollowed it, then by continuing I too shall certainly be able to advance and fulfill my desire.” Hence, returning to the schools, he continued his study and became most acute and learned.

Therefore, when the people of Poitiers saw that he fought all heretics with his whole strength, they all elected him bishop alike. Immediately, defending from the tree of faith not only his own land but all France against the heretics, he was exiled by the emperor Constantius, who was himself a heretic, at the suggestion of two heretics, because they could not endure his wisdom.

Exiled, he went to the island of Gallinaria. Although it was full of serpents, when he went there all the serpents disappeared from that island.

While living as a layman he had had a wife, and from her he received one daughter, whom he called Apra [i.e., Abra]. After Hilary her father had been made bishop, when she sought an earthly spouse, Hilary by his persuasion led her to the purpose of virginity. When he saw her firm in it, fearing lest in the future she decline from the holy purpose, he urgently asked the Lord to call her to himself and not allow her to live longer. This was done; for after a few days she fell asleep in the Lord. Her father buried her with his own hands.

Seeing this, his wife, herself also a most devout woman, asked Bishop Hilary that he obtain for her herself what he had obtained for their daughter. This too followed: she migrated to the Lord.

In the fourth year of his exile, the emperor Constans ordered that all the exiled bishops, Hilary among them, should return and dispute concerning the truth of the faith. Having returned, Saint Hilary asked the emperor that permission to speak be given him. But those two bishops, unable to endure his eloquence, obtained from the emperor that he should be compelled to return to Poitiers.

Thus, while he was returning to Poitiers, a certain woman met him, weeping for her son who had died without baptism. Moved by her prayers and tears, Saint Hilary raised him.

It is also read concerning him, as Vincent reports in the place cited above, and James of Voragine, that while the Arian heresy raged throughout the world, even Pope Leo, corrupted by this pest, caused a council of all the bishops to be summoned. Saint Hilary also came, though rather late, yet fortified with the arms of faith.

When it was announced that he was present before the doors, the pope, indignant not as at one coming late but rather as at a catholic, commanded the synod that none of his fellow bishops should rise for him or assign him a place to sit. Therefore, when the man of God had been presented to the council, he respectfully greeted those seated. The pope, insulting him as though he did not know him, is reported to have answered thus: “Are you Hilary the cock?”

He replied: “I am not Hilary the cock, but Hilary from Gaul.” It is as if he said: “I am not a cock by nation, but a bishop from Gaul.” For he was Aquitanian by nation, but in pontifical dignity he was preeminent among the Gauls.

The pope, moved by the agitation of his spirit, said: “Even if you are Hilary from Gaul, I am Leo, judge of the apostolic Roman see.”

Then Hilary, understanding his obstinate contention, answered him: “If you are a lion, nevertheless you are not of the tribe of Judah. And if you sit as judge, nevertheless you do not sit upon the seat of majesty.”

Immediately the pope, scorning the seat—or rather the dignity of the see—rose, and, threatening the discerning bishop greatly, went out, saying: “See, for when I return to you, I shall leave you humbled by these proud reasonings.”

Hilary said: “And if you do not return?”

Then the holy man, preparing to sit upon the ground, is reported to have said as a supplicant: “The earth is the Lord's, and its fullness.” At that utterance, the ground itself, as is reported, suddenly broke forth and rose upward, providing him a seat no lower than that of the bishops sitting in the midst. While everyone, and especially the catholics, marveled at this and praised God for the merit of the saint, a cry was raised: the apostolic man, struck by a sudden failure, had died.

Thus the synod was dissolved, and all the bishops returned reverently to their own places amid praises of blessed Hilary, the head of the error having been crushed.

But because it is not clearly found that at that time anyone named Leo was in the papacy, therefore, so that this miracle may agree with history, Vincent, in the place cited above, and James say that it could be said that Pope Liberius, who favored Constantius and the other Arians, had two names and was called both Leo and Liberius. For the custom had not yet been introduced into the Church that a pope's name should be changed at his creation. It is clear that this Liberius was pope in the time of Hilary.

Or perhaps around that time there was some antipope called Leo. But nothing concerning this is said in the Ecclesiastical History, the Tripartite History, or Jerome's Chronicle. Hence it is held as a doubtful matter.

Section I: Hilary's death, miracles, and writings

When Saint Hilary, having returned to Poitiers, became ill and knew that his death was approaching, as Vincent reports, he caused Leoninus, a priest of that city whom he especially loved, to come to him. As night approached, Hilary ordered him to go out and report whether he heard anything outside. Returning, the priest explained that he had heard voices of the city's people making a tumult for this purpose [read: the voices still of the tumultuous city].

While he kept watch around Hilary, awaiting his end, at midnight he was again ordered to go out and report to the man lying there what he could hear. When he reported that he heard nothing, immediately an exceedingly great brightness, which not even the priest himself could endure, entered to Hilary. And thus, as the light gradually withdrew, Hilary migrated to the Lord.

Now two merchants once came to the basilica of this same saint, possessing a form or mass of wax, as though jointly and in common. One addressed the other, proposing that they offer it to so great a confessor. But he expended his words in vain upon the mind of his companion, who refused this. Nevertheless, he prostrated himself in prayer with his companion and placed that wax before the rails of the tomb. Immediately the appearance of the wax divided itself into two wholly equal parts. The part belonging to the faithful offerer was accepted, while the other part, before very many witnesses, rolled itself as far as the other rails and by divine command was repelled with every insult, as though the saint refused to receive what the other had not devoutly offered him. Then that man, confounded, groaned and afterward offered greater things.

Likewise, when a certain boy once fell asleep beside a hedge, lying with his mouth open, a serpent entered his mouth. When his parents brought him to Saint Hilary's basilica, they prostrated themselves in prayer for the boy's health. Immediately the serpent came out from the boy's mouth, poured out its venom before everyone, and died; and the boy was restored unharmed.

Jerome, in the book On Illustrious Men, says that Hilary composed twelve books against the Arians, titled, I believe, On the Trinity; another book On Synods, which he wrote to the bishops of Gaul; likewise the first and second commentaries on the Psalms, in which work he imitated Origen but also added some things of his own; another little book to Constantius, which he directed to him at Constantinople; likewise a book against the heretics Ursacius and Valens, containing the history of the synods of Rimini and Seleucia; likewise a book of hymns and another of mysteries; likewise commentaries on Matthew; and treatises on Job, which he translated according to the sense from the Greek of Origen; another elegant little book against Auxentius; and some letters to various persons.

He died at Poitiers while Valentinian and Valens were reigning. Certain sayings from his book On the Trinity are set down so that the profundity of his doctrine may appear.

Section II: Concerning the Passion of Christ

Around the subject matter of Christ's Passion, Hilary speaks thus in Book X of On the Trinity:

The only-begotten God, without failing from himself, assumed true man according to the likeness of our man. Although in him a blow might fall, a wound descend, bonds come together, or suspension raise him up, these things indeed brought the assault of suffering, yet they did not bring the pain of suffering—just as a weapon piercing water, pricking fire, or wounding air.

The weapon indeed inflicts all these effects according to its own nature, inasmuch as it pierces, wounds, and pricks; but in these objects the suffering inflicted does not retain its own nature, since it is not in the nature of water to be pierced, fire to be pricked, or air to be wounded, although it is of the nature of the weapon to wound, prick, and pierce.

Christ indeed suffered while he was struck, suspended, and died. But the suffering rushing upon his body was indeed suffering; nevertheless, it did not exercise the nature of suffering, since the penalty failed in its penal ministry [read: the penalty raged in its penal office] and the power of the body received, without the sensation of penalty, the force of the penalty raging against it.

Assuredly that body of the Lord possessed the nature of our pain, if our body has by nature the ability to tread upon the waves and walk over them and is not kept back by the barriers of a closed house. But if the Lord's body alone has this nature, that it is borne upon wet places, stands upon liquids, and passes through things tightly closed, what do we judge concerning flesh conceived from the Spirit through the nature of a human body? That flesh is from heaven, and that man is from heaven, having a body for suffering; and he suffered, but did not have a nature for feeling pain.

And below: What infirmity, therefore, do you believe ruled over this body, whose nature possessed so great a power, namely, to lay prostrate those who came to seize him? But perhaps the pain of his wounds swelled. I ask you, O asserter of the Lord's infirmity: what terror from the nail penetrating his flesh did he possess who restored a severed ear by the touch of his hand alone? Does the hand which produced this ear grieve at the nail? And does he feel a wound who left no pain of the wound in another? Is he sorrowful through fear that his flesh will be pierced, by whose touch flesh is healed after it has been cut?

And below: Therefore, when the powers of the sayings and deeds have been compared, it is not uncertainly demonstrated that bodily infirmity was not in the nature of his body, and that, although that suffering was inflicted upon the body, it nevertheless did not impart to the body a nature of feeling pain. For although the form of our body was in the Lord, nevertheless the form of our corrupted infirmity was not in the body which the Virgin brought forth from conception by the Holy Spirit. Thus says he.

Because these words are obscure, they could generate error in the minds of simple persons who do not understand them soundly. For on the surface they seem to say that Christ, insofar as he was man, did not possess true pain in his Passion.

Hence blessed Thomas, in Book III of the Sentences, Distinction 15, sets down three modes of speaking. The first is according to William, bishop of Paris, who said that Hilary retracted these things in a certain letter which is said to be his.

The second mode is that Hilary speaks here concerning Christ according to the divine nature, in which without doubt there was no pain or other suffering. For in those words Hilary was disputing against those who said that the Son of God was a creature.

The third mode of exposition is that of the Master of the Sentences in Book III, where he sets down the aforesaid words. It consists in this: Hilary did not wish simply to exclude pain, fear, and things of this kind from Christ, but three things which surround pain.

The first is the dominion of pain; hence he says, “What infirmity, therefore, do you believe ruled over this body?” and so forth. That is, pain and fear existed in him, but not according to suffering as it exists in us, because in us they somewhat obscure reason, but not in Christ.

The second is the meritorious cause of pain, which is noted when he says, “Nevertheless, not the form of corrupted infirmity,” and so forth; and again, “Not possessing a nature for feeling pain.” He says this because there was in his nature no ordering toward pain from any deserving of sin, as there is in us, at least from original sin.

The third thing which he excludes from Christ is the necessity of pain, which is noted when he says, “Let us see whether that order of suffering,” and so forth. For he possessed in his reason the power by which he could have excluded fear and sorrow from sensuality if he had willed, which is not so in us. This can be seen more fully there.

Section III: Concerning the sacrament of the Eucharist

The same Hilary speaks thus in Book VIII of On the Trinity:

These matters must not be spoken of according to human or worldly sense, nor must the perversity of alien knowledge and impious understanding be wrung out through a violent and imprudent proclamation of the heavenly sayings [read: the perversity of an alien and impious interpretation be wrung from the soundness of the heavenly sayings through violent and imprudent preaching]. For unless we have learned from him the natural truth of Christ in us which we declare, we speak foolishly and impiously.

For he himself says: “My flesh is truly food, and my blood is truly drink. And he who eats my flesh and drinks my blood remains in me, and I in him.” Therefore, concerning the truth of the flesh and blood no place for doubting is left. For now, both by the declaration of the Lord himself and by our faith, it is truly flesh and truly blood; and these, received and drunk, bring it about that we are in Christ and Christ is in us.

Therefore he himself is in us through the flesh. But that through the sacrament of the communicated flesh we are in him, he himself testifies, saying: “You shall see me, because I live and you shall live; because I remain in the Father, and you in me, and I in you.”

If he had wished only a unity of will to be understood, why did he expound a certain degree and order for consummating unity, unless so that he might be believed to be in the Father through the nature of divinity; we, on the other hand, to be in him through his bodily nativity; and he again to be in us through the mystery of the sacraments? And thus a perfect unity through the mediator would be taught: while we remain in him, he himself would remain in the Father, and, remaining in the Father, he himself would remain in us. Thus we would advance toward unity, since, with him who is naturally in the Father according to nativity, we too would naturally be in him, while he himself naturally remained in us. Thus says Hilary in On Consecration, Distinction 2, In Christ.

Concerning the divine persons, their properties, and matters of this kind, he speaks thus in the same book On the Trinity:

Immense is that which is being treated—namely, inquiry concerning the mystery of the Trinity—and incomprehensible, beyond the signification of speech, beyond the reach of sense. It is not proclaimed, not attained, not grasped. The nature of the thing itself consumes the signification of words. An impenetrable light blinds the gaze of sense; that which is contained by no boundary exceeds the capacity of understanding.

Therefore, in my perception there is decay; in understanding, stupor; but in speech I confess a new infirmity, namely silence. It is exceedingly dangerous to bring forth anything concerning such great and hidden matters beyond the heavenly prescription, so that discourse concerning God should go beyond the definition of God. The form of faith is certain. Therefore nothing is to be added, but a limit must be established for audacity. Whatever is sought beyond it is not understood.

The same author says in Book I of On the Trinity: That man is the best reader who awaits the understanding of sayings from the things stated rather than imposes it upon them, and who carries back more than he brings in, and does not force that to seem contained in the sayings which before reading he presumed ought to be understood. Therefore, when discourse concerns the things of God, let us grant to God the knowledge of himself and serve his sayings with pious veneration.

The same author says in that book: The understanding of sayings must be taken from the causes of speaking, because the thing ought not be subject to the discourse, but the discourse to the thing. This is in the title On the Meaning of Words, Understanding.

Title X, Chapter IV

“Like shining fire and incense burning in the fire”

Great Basil, in the time of Julian the Apostate, Valens, and others, was like shining fire and incense burning in the fire: fire through ardent love, shining through the irradiation of doctrine, and incense burning in the fire through devout contemplation.

He is called the father of the monks in the East, just as Benedict is in the West. He wrote a rule of living for them. He instituted double monasteries, namely, monasteries of men and women in one monastery, yet separately and with the greatest honorableness. The Church afterward abolished these because of the dangers, as is contained in Cause VIII, Question II, We Define.

In a vision he was shown to the holy man Ephrem as a column of fire reaching as far as heaven, as is contained below.

Saint Amphilochius, who wrote his marvelous life, relates that, when Basil was seven years old, he was handed over by his parents to letters. Afterward he went to Athens, the mother of words, where with Gregory Nazianzen, Julian the Apostate, and Libanius the sophist he studied Greek doctrine, in which he was not able to find God, the Creator of all.

While he was there, on a certain night a divine splendor of faith kindled him, and he began to examine thoroughly the Scriptures of the whole Christian religion. Kindled by this spirit, he went to Egypt and sought the sacred books. Returning, he devoted himself to the study of the divine Scriptures and in Greece showed the way of salvation to many worldly philosophers.

Among them, seeking Eubolus his teacher, he found him, now worn out with old age, disputing among his disciples. Basil reproved him. Those who were with him said: “Who reproves you, O philosopher?”

He answered: “Either God or Basil.” Turning to Basil, he said: “What is the definition of philosophy?”

Basil answered: “The first definition of philosophy is the meditation of death.”

Marveling, Eubolus said: “Who is pure?”

Basil answered: “He who is above the world. The words of the world are indeed sweet, but the world is bitter to him who holds it corruptly. The pleasure of the body is one thing and the pleasure of the spirit another; these cannot coexist in anyone at the same time. For no one can serve two masters.”

They remained without food for three days, inquiring together concerning the word of life. Then Eubolus, having learned from him the way of truth, humbled himself under him, offering himself and his possessions. After everything which he had was sold and given to the poor, so that they might go to Jerusalem, they came to Antioch. There they preached the word of God to Libanius the sophist and his disciples.

They came to Jerusalem and, prostrate, sought regeneration there from Bishop Maximinus. They came with him to the Jordan, and Basil prayed that a sign of his faith be revealed. Then lightning came over them, and from that same lightning a dove, which disturbed the waters and flew back into heaven.

After a year they returned baptized to Antioch, where Basil was ordained deacon under Bishop Meletius. Then, as they approached Caesarea, their arrival was revealed by a nocturnal vision to Eusebius, together with the fact that Basil would become his successor. This was done not long afterward.

Having been consecrated, Basil asked that grace and understanding be given to him to offer the sacrifice of the altar in his own words. After six days, having been placed in ecstasy, he began to minister at the coming of the Holy Spirit.

On a certain night the Lord Jesus came to him in a vision with the apostles, making an offering of bread upon the altar, and awakened him, saying: “Let your mouth be filled with praise, so that every day you may offer sacrifice to me.”

Unable to bear the vision with his eyes, Basil approached the altar and wrote upon a sheet: “Let my mouth be filled with praise, that I may sing a hymn to your glory.” After the end of the prayer he raised the bread and, dividing it into three parts, communicated one; he reserved another to be buried with himself; and he placed the third in a golden dove which hung above the altar.

When he went out, Eubolus and the chief of the clergy, who stood before the door of the temple, prostrated themselves and said that they had seen an intelligible light in the temple and men clothed in white, and had heard the voice of the people glorifying God.

When a multitude had assembled in the church for the divine mystery, a certain Hebrew, wishing to examine the mystery of the office, mingled with the people and saw an infant divided in the hands of Basil. Approaching with the others, he received true flesh and true blood. Reporting this to his wife, he was baptized with his whole household.

Section I: The servant's written compact with the devil

A certain senator named Procerius wished to consecrate his daughter to God. The devil, envying him, inflamed one of his servants with love for her. The servant addressed a certain enchanter and received from him a letter which said: “Go and stand at night upon the tomb of a gentile and lift the sheet into the air. Demons who will lead you will stand near.”

When this was done, the devil, reading the letter, said: “Do you believe in me?”

The servant said: “I believe.”

The devil added: “Do you renounce Christ?”

He said: “I renounce him.”

But the devil said: “You Christians are faithless. When you have need, you come to me; but after your desires have been completed, you return to your Christ, who benignly receives you. Therefore make for me a written, voluntary renunciation of your Christ and your baptism, and a profession of me which I may possess on the Day of Judgment; and immediately I shall complete your desire.”

He did this. Then Satan sent spirits of fornication to the girl, and they inflamed her with love for the young man. Casting herself upon the ground, she began to cry to her father: “Have mercy on me, father, because I am tormented on account of that boy. Join me to him, otherwise I shall die.”

Her father, unable to resist many prayers and blandishments, finally gave her to the boy as his wife. After a short time, the young man was observed by others not to enter the church or communicate in the sacred things. They said to his wife: “Do you know that your husband is not a Christian, but belongs to an alien faith?”

Then she, filled with sorrow, prostrated herself and began to tear herself with her fingernails and beat her breast, crying: “Alas, why was I born?” Her husband ran to her and contended that what she had heard was not true. Coming to consolation, she said: “If you wish to satisfy me, tomorrow let us go together to the church, and in my presence partake of the sacred mystery.”

Then, compelled, he explained to her the course of his deed and his compact with the devil. She ran to Saint Basil and narrated to him the order of the events.

Basil questioned the boy whether the matter stood thus, and with tears he related everything. The saint said to him: “Do you wish to return to God?”

He said: “I wish to, but I cannot, because in writing I renounced Christ and made a profession to the devil.”

The saint said to him: “Let this not trouble you; God is benign. Do you believe that you can be saved?”

He said: “I believe, Lord; help my unbelief.”

Then, shutting him in after making the sign of the cross over him, Basil labored together with him for three days. Afterward he visited him, saying: “How are you, son?”

He answered: “Holy man of God, I cannot endure the cries, terrors, and stonings of the demons who hold my writings in their hands and say: ‘You came to us; we did not come to you.’”

The saint said to him: “Do not fear; believe God.” Giving him a little food with the sign of the cross of Christ, he shut him in again. After a few days, again visiting him, Basil asked how he was.

He answered: “I hear their threats and cries from afar, but I do not see them.”

Again Basil gave him food and shut him in. On the fortieth day he returned and, asking how he was, heard him say: “I am well, holy man of God. For today I saw you fighting for me and conquering the devil.”

Then the holy man summoned the entire church and instructed them to pray for him that night. Taking the boy, he led him into the church. The devil, invisibly seizing him, attempted to snatch him from Basil's hand, so that, pulling the boy, he pushed the holy man.

The devil said to him: “You prejudge me, O Basil. For I did not come to him, but he himself came to me. Behold the sheet written by his own hand which I am carrying to the judgment.” Very many heard his voice, while the people cried, “Lord, have mercy.”

The saint said to him: “Blessed is God. This people will not lower their hands from the height of heaven until you return the written document.”

While the people continued in prayer, behold, the writing came, carried through the air and seen by everyone, and was placed in Basil's hands. Giving thanks, he said to the boy: “Do you recognize these letters?”

He answered: “Yes, father, because they were written by my hand.” Basil tore it apart, handed the boy over to his wife, and gave him a rule for living thereafter.

Section II

Saint Basil also, illuminated one day by divine splendor, went out from his city, saying to certain of his disciples: “Sons, follow me, so that with me you may see the glory of God, and let us marvel at the master on account of his disciples.”

A priest named Anastasius also knew this by the power of the Holy Spirit. He had a wife who had lived with him in virginity for forty years, and he himself fasted daily on bread and water except on Saturday and the Lord's Day.

He said to the woman, his sister in practice: “I am going to work in the field. Rise and adorn the house. Around the ninth hour, take a thurible and candles and go to meet Saint Basil the archbishop, for he is coming to lodge in the house of sinners.”

When she had done this with veneration and fear, the holy father Basil arrived, gave her a blessing, and said: “How are you, Lady Theogenia?”

Terrified that he called her by her name, she said: “Well, holy man of God.”

Basil said: “Where is Lord Anastasius, your brother?”

She said: “Lord, he is my husband, and he has gone to work in the field.”

He said: “He is in your house.” Terrified by these words, the woman, struck with stupor, fell to the ground, crying: “Holy man of God, pray for me, a sinner, because I see great and marvelous things in you.”

Making a prayer over her before everyone, he said: “Stretch a cloth between your arms.” When she had stretched it, he ordered living coals from the thurible to be poured upon it. Placing incense upon them, she walked before them.

Therefore, when they came to the priest's house, he too met them. Kissing the saint's feet, he said: “Whence is this granted to me, that the holy man of God should come to me?”

When they had gone to the church, at the command of Archbishop Basil the priest stood at the sacred mystery. While he ministered, Saint Basil and certain of the worthy saw, at the time of the elevation of the Lord's body, the Holy Spirit descending in the form of fire and surrounding the priest and the altar.

When they had communicated and returned to the house, while they took food Saint Basil said to him: “Tell me whence you have this treasure, and what your life is.”

He answered: “I am a sinner subject to public taxes, possessing two yokes of oxen, one for the service of pilgrims and the other for the service of the taxes. This woman is my fellow servant, who ministers to the poor and to me.”

The saint said to him: “Call her your sister, as she is, and tell me your virtues.”

He said: “I possess nothing good and am alien to every virtue.”

Then the saint led him to one of the cells of the house and said to him: “Open the door for me.” When he refused to open it, saying that the necessities of the house were there, the saint opened it by a word. Entering, he found there a leper wasted away in several members of his body.

Basil said to the priest: “Why did you wish to conceal this treasure of yours?”

He answered: “He is furious and abusive, and therefore I feared lest perhaps he should slip in speech.”

Basil said: “You have contended well for him. But allow me to minister to him this night, so that I too may receive a reward.”

Then they left the holy man of God in the cell with the leper and closed the door. Making prayer over him throughout the whole night, Basil healed him. Leading him out, Basil returned to the city.

Section III: Concerning Basil's doctrine

Jerome, in the book On Illustrious Men, says: Basil, distinguished bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, carefully composed books against the heretic Eunomius, a volume on the Holy Spirit, eight homilies on the Hexaemeron, and other treatises.

Vincent of Beauvais, in Book XV of the Mirror of History, says that these are found among his books: nine books on the Hexaemeron and one book on the institution of monks.

And note that, from the book on the Holy Spirit against Eunomius, at the Council of Florence celebrated in the presence of the Greek emperor and many bishops of the Greeks before Lord Pope Eugenius IV, it was proved and concluded against the error of the Greeks that the Holy Spirit proceeds not only from the Father but also from the Son. Basil openly attests this in the said book. This Basil is of great authority and deserved veneration among them.

He himself also wrote a rule of monks, in which, among other things, he says:

If we move rightly and fittingly those things which have been implanted in us, this is to live according to virtue. But if we corrupt the benefits of nature, this is to incline toward malice. Therefore, this is the definition of evil: not to employ rightly the movements of the soul implanted in us by God. But the definition of virtue is to employ the same movements rightly according to the commandment of God and conscience.

Therefore, by a certain natural affection we are constrained toward everything which we judge good. If, with no one teaching us, we are constrained toward love for the kindred of our flesh, and if we are also joined by every affection and service to those whose benefits we have received, what is so good as God? I perceive a love of God utterly ineffable, which can be felt rather than spoken. Because, therefore, the Lord has sown in us the seeds of the virtues, without doubt he also requires their fruit.

Concerning the praise of solitary and common life, he speaks thus:

It profits greatly toward preserving the memory of God to dwell secretly and rather remotely and not to live with those who act more negligently. For it happens that a soul looking upon a multitude of persons living wickedly is first hindered from attaining understanding of its own evils and from being able to purge by penance the things in which it has offended, or to cut away the causes of fault by amendment of the vices, because, in comparison with the worst persons, it now judges itself already to have accomplished something great. It is afterward hindered by the disturbances and occupations which the common life of men is accustomed to possess.

Nevertheless, in many cases I also see that it is more useful to lead a common life with those who are of the same will and purpose than a solitary one. First, because each person alone is not sufficient for bodily uses and for the service of subsistence, but we need one another's work. Nor does the principle of charity permit one to seek what is one's own. Further, one does not easily recognize one's own faults when there is no one to reprove them. But in an assembly of brothers, his offense easily appears to the offender when he is reproved or censured by several persons. Against the snares of the devil, moreover, the fellowship of many is safer and more useful than solitary life.

It is a sign of incontinence to act with disordered and uncomposed movements. It is unbecoming to raise up a crackling laugh with noise. This is accustomed to happen through incontinence of mind even to unwilling persons, and usually softens and dissolves the gravity and constancy of the spirit.

The desire for food is natural. But if there is anything which can satisfy this necessity of the body more quickly or more easily, it should be chosen in food. Whatever things inflict manifest harm upon the body are also to be avoided. Clothing should be chosen for us which can cover nakedness and keep away the force of cold and that which harms from without. The religious habit itself is like a certain pedagogue for the weak, so that it guards them, even unwilling, from dishonorable and indecent conduct.

Joy in the Lord exists when we conduct ourselves according to God's commandment, act for God's glory, suffer gladly for his name, or congratulate others who act rightly. A person eats and drinks to God's glory if he always holds in memory the God by whom he is fed.

If anyone directs his soul toward every word of the Psalms as the taste is directed toward discerning the flavor of foods, he is the one who fulfills what is said in the Psalms: “Sing psalms wisely.”

The one who presides ought diligently to examine for what part each person is suited and thus to enjoin that work or office which is fitting, so that neither those who enjoin are thereby condemned as evil stewards because they enjoined upon someone an office unsuited to him, nor those upon whom it is enjoined appear to have an occasion for sin.

A monk ought not to undertake anything on his own authority; he ought to undertake what is enjoined by those who preside. He who faithfully and purely loves God and is certain of the Lord's recompense does not judge the things enjoined upon him to suffice, but always seeks further increases of work, even if what he does appears to be beyond his strength.

In the Decrees, the following things are contained from the words of Basil. In Cause XX, Question IV: A monk is not permitted to make a vow without the consent of the abbot. But if he has made one, it is to be broken.

And in Cause XXI, Question IV, Every: “Everything which is received not on account of necessity but on account of elegance bears the accusation of pride,” as the great Basil says.

Likewise, in Distinction 90, from the Eighth Synod, although these things were taken from the words of Basil, it is said: “If any monk has loved contentions or quarrels, or has brought a manifest insult against a brother, let him expiate it by prolonged penance according to the judgment of the ruler and the measure of the sin. And he who has been contentious or murmuring shall do penance, according to the judgment of the prior, for as long as the character of the fault endures.”

The same Basil speaks thus in On Consecration, Distinction 2: The Apostle teaches us fear, saying: “He who eats and drinks unworthily eats and drinks judgment to himself.” But the saying of the Lord teaches us faith, saying: “This is my body,” and so forth.

And the Apostle says concerning the only-begotten Son of God: “He humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.” Therefore, when the soul has faith in these things, considers the glory of his magnificence, and marvels at the excess of his humility—how one so great and of such a kind was obedient to the Father unto death for our life—I judge that it can be stirred toward affection and love of him and of God the Father, who did not spare his own only Son but handed him over for us. He who receives the bread and cup of the Lord ought to prepare such faith and affection in his soul.

Section IV: Basil's brothers and Gregory's book on the creation of man

Basil had two brothers, Gregory and Peter, as Rufinus says in Book XI of the Ecclesiastical History. One followed his brother in the word of doctrine and the other in works, in such a manner that each reproduced either Basil or Gregory.

Certain lucid works of this younger Gregory survive. Jerome also says concerning him: Gregory, bishop of the city of Enizene [read: Nyssa] and brother of Basil of Caesarea, a few years ago read to me and Gregory Nazianzen books against Eunomius; he is said both to have written and to be writing many other things.

This Gregory's book is On the Image, that is, on the creation of man, which he published as a supplement to Basil's Hexaemeron. Yet that book, as Vincent of Beauvais says in Book XV of the Mirror of History, is to be read cautiously because certain small marks of falsehood are intermingled with it. From that book these few things have been excerpted:

Man is brought forth into this life naked of natural coverings, unarmed also and helpless, and most destitute of all necessary things. According to what is seen, he seems worthy of pity rather than happiness. For he is not armed with protruding horns, not fortified with the defense of claws or teeth, nor does he pour out deadly poison through any sting; by these things most beasts and serpents are naturally equipped for their own vengeance.

Nor is his body covered with hair, although it would have been fitting for him who was set over others for dominion to be fortified by natural provision with his own arms, lest he require the supports of others for his protection. For the lion and the boar naturally possess sufficient strength for their own safety. The bull has horns, the hare swiftness, the stag a leap and sure sight. Other animals have size, and others a projecting service of the mouth. Winged animals also have the service of wings, and bees a sting. It is agreed that some single natural protection has been conferred upon absolutely all; man alone is believed to have been left destitute before all.

And how, someone will say, did such a one obtain the principality of all things? But I judge that nothing is difficult to demonstrate here: through that which is believed to be lacking to our nature, a certain occasion is given by which he obtains dominion over all subjected things.

For if these supports had been naturally attributed to his body, he would first be like the beasts and would appear difficult in an encounter. Then he would disdain to exercise lordship over others, since he would need none of their assistance. But now the use of our life is divided among the individual things subjected to us, so that our possession of principality over them may appear necessary.

For the slowness of our body and its difficulty in rapid movement caused us to employ the provision of horses; and this provision supplied from the yearly returns of labors those supplements which nature lacked. For other causes also, beasts of burden have been subjected to us as necessary for life. Because we needed a bite and teeth for restraining beasts or taking vengeance upon them, the nature of dogs supplied what was lacking to us. In place of horns or claws, iron, stronger and more penetrating, was invented by men.

Section V: Ephrem visits Basil

When Saint Ephrem the Syrian was in the desert and heard the works of this great Basil, he asked without ceasing that it be revealed to him what manner of man Basil was, as the aforesaid Amphilochius reports. Placed in ecstasy, he saw a column of fire whose summit touched heaven, and a voice saying from above: “Such is the great Basil.”

Immediately taking an interpreter, he came to Caesarea. Entering the church secretly on the feast of the Theophany, he saw great Basil proceeding in a white stole with the white-robed clergy, and said to the one following him: “We have labored in vain, as I judge, brother. For since that man is in such an order, he is not as I saw him.”

As Basil proceeded, Ephrem stood in a hidden place in the church and said within himself: “We who have borne the burden and heat of the day have obtained nothing. And is this man, though he is in such an escort and human honor, a column of fire? I marvel.”

While he said these things, the saint sent his archdeacon, saying: “Go around the western door, and in a corner of the church you will find an abbot wearing a hood with another short man. Call him to me.”

When blessed Ephrem learned through the interpreter what was said, he answered: “You are mistaken, brother; we are strangers.” The archdeacon went away and reported these things to the archbishop.

While Basil was reading the sacred books, Saint Ephrem saw a fiery tongue speaking through his mouth. Basil said to the archdeacon: “Go and say to him: ‘Lord Ephrem, enter the presbytery.’”

The saint, stupefied by these things, bent his knee and said: “Truly, truly Basil is great; truly he is a column of fire; truly the Holy Spirit speaks through his mouth.”

Ephrem asked the archdeacon to excuse him and requested instead that Basil greet him after the ministry in the sacristy. Thus, after completing the ministry, Basil entered the sacristy and greeted him, saying: “Welcome, O father of the sons of the desert, who have multiplied Christ's disciples in it and driven out demons. You have come to see a sinful man. May God give you a reward according to your labor.”

Ephrem received Communion from Basil's hands. While Basil showed him hospitality, Ephrem asked him to petition God that he might speak Greek.

Basil said: “You have asked beyond my strength. But because you have asked faithfully, come, let us petition God, who shall perform the will of those who fear him.”

When they had made prayer and risen, Basil said to him: “Why do you not receive ordination to the priesthood?”

He answered: “Because I am a sinner.”

As they lay upon the ground, the saint placed his hands upon Ephrem and said in the Greek language: “Receive, save, have mercy, and preserve us, O God, by your grace.” They rejoiced spiritually for three days. Saint Basil ordained the interpreter a deacon and Ephrem himself a priest, and dismissed them in peace.

Before Basil, the holy man, migrated from the body, during the illness from which he also died, he summoned to himself, as though he needed his services, a certain Jew named Joseph, very skilled in the medical art. The man of God loved him greatly because he foresaw that he would be converted to the faith.

Joseph touched his pulse and, recognizing by the touch that death was at the doors, said to the household: “Prepare the things necessary for burial, because he will die immediately.”

Hearing this, Basil said: “You do not know what you are saying.”

Joseph said to him: “Believe me, lord, because today the sun will set with the sun.”

Basil said: “What will you say if I do not die today?”

Joseph answered him: “This is impossible, lord.”

Basil said to him: “And if I live until the sixth hour tomorrow?”

Joseph said: “If you live until that hour, I shall die.”

Basil said: “May you die to sin, but live to Christ.”

The man answered: “I know what you are saying. If you live until that hour, I shall do what you exhort.”

Then blessed Basil, although according to nature he was then about to die, nevertheless obtained from God a postponement of death and lived on the next day until the ninth hour. Seeing this and stupefied, Joseph believed in Christ. Basil, overcoming the weakness of his body by the strength of his spirit, rose from his chamber, entered the church, and baptized him with his own hands. Afterward, returning to his bed, he happily departed.

Concerning his free and fearless address to the heretical emperor Valens and to Julian the Apostate, and his foreknowledge of the death of Julian himself through Mercurius, something was said above.

Likewise, a certain woman gave him, in a closed writing, the sins for which he was to obtain remission from the Lord. By praying he obtained it. Hence the woman, receiving the writing, found them erased, with one exception.

When Basil, dead, was being carried to the church, she cast the sheet bearing that writing upon the bier, praying that he procure from God that this one also be erased for her. A short time afterward, receiving the sheet, she found it obliterated, as Sigebert reports.

When his body had been carried into the church, Gregory Nazianzen, hearing of his passing, came hastily and, falling upon his honored body, poured out tender tears abundantly. With twelve bishops and the multitude of the city, they reverently committed him to burial. He died on the first day of January.

Section VI: Saint Ephrem

Concerning Saint Ephrem, of whom mention was made, Jerome says in the book On Illustrious Men: Ephrem, deacon of the church of Edessa, composed many things in the Syriac language and came to such renown that after the reading of the Scriptures his writings are read publicly in certain churches. I read a Greek volume on the Holy Spirit which someone had translated from the Syriac language, and even in translation I recognized the acuteness of his sublime intellect. He died under the prince Valens.

Vincent of Beauvais says in Book XV of the Mirror of History that seven works of his survive among us, namely, On Penance, On the Struggles of the Age, On Compunction of Heart, On the Blessedness of the Soul, On the Resurrection, and On the Day of Judgment.

Among other things, in the book On Compunction, he inveighs thus against lukewarm religious:

You have renounced this age, dearest one, and again you seek worldly rest. You were called into tribulation, and you inquire after refreshment. You were called into nakedness, and you contend to apply zeal to clothing. You were called into thirst, and, rejecting water, you delight to drink wine. You were also called to vigils, and you are dissolved by the idleness of sleep. You were called to weep and lament, and you pour forth laughter with a guffaw. You were called into subjection, and you contradict. You were called into meekness and humility, and you walk proud and exalted. You were called into charity, and you hate your brother.

Why do you go about resentful toward your neighbor, whose burden you ought to have borne? Why, on account of your sluggishness, do you disparage and accuse the good and sweet yoke of Christ as though it were hard, heavy, and unendurable?

And below: Come, dearest ones, let us conduct business while the market is held. A worldly man sometimes advances excuses, inasmuch as he is bound in the world. But what shall we say? What excuse shall we possess if we have been negligent? It is to be feared and trembled at lest perhaps those who exalt us here with praises should begin to deride us there and insult us. Thus says he.

It is read concerning Saint Ephrem that, while he was a deacon of the church of Edessa, he merited by God's grace to possess knowledge of natural things. He always led a quiet life and for very many years taught all who came to him to live. At length, because of a certain necessity, he went forth from his cell.

For when a severe famine raged in that city through the multitude of country people, moved by pity he approached the rich, saying: “Why does no mercy move you for human nature thus failing before your eyes, while you preserve things rotting within for your condemnation?”

They said: “We have no one to whom we ought to entrust money to be distributed to the needy. For everyone wishes to conduct business for his own advantage.”

He said: “What manner of man do I appear to you?”

They said: “We know that you are a servant of God.”

He said: “Give me, therefore, your money, and I shall undertake the ministry of pilgrims and the wretched.”

Having received the money, he enclosed the city's porticoes with certain walls and placed three hundred beds in them. There he restored those perishing from famine, also caring for the sick and burying the dead.

When that year had been completed, after which there was a great abundance of crops, he returned to his cell. He died there after the space of one month. Vincent reports these things in Book XVIII of the Mirror of History. Whether this Ephrem is the one of whom mention was made before is not certain.

Title X, Chapter V

“Like lilies that are beside the passage of water”

Like lilies that are beside the passage of water, so Gregory Nazianzen and Didymus, placed beside the waters of secular letters, flourishing in Greece in the whiteness of purity and the golden hue of eternal wisdom, spread the fragrance of odoriferous doctrine in the Church.

First, concerning Gregory. As Vincent relates in Book XV of the Mirror of History, while preserving entire the seal of chastity and while still a young man flourishing at Athens in the studies of philosophy, in sleep he saw two exceedingly beautiful women sit down on his right and left as he sat and read. Looking at them with a rather stern eye under the impulse of chastity, he asked who they were and what they wanted with him.

But they, embracing him rather familiarly, said: “Do not take it ill, young man. We are known to you and quite familiar. For one of us is called Wisdom and the other Chastity, and we have been sent to dwell with you because you have prepared a sufficiently pleasant and clean dwelling in your heart.”

Afterward, when Athens constrained him to teach rhetoric because of its very high regard for his learning, he secretly boarded a ship and departed. Troubled by a storm at sea, he vowed that he would serve God. This also he did. But when he had been raised to the priesthood by his father, who was a bishop, he bore this with difficulty and withdrew for a time.

Rufinus speaks thus of him in Book XI of the Ecclesiastical History: Cappadocia brought forth Gregory together with Basil: both noble, both educated at Athens, both fellow students. Both were asked, with God’s help, to make profession of rhetoric. Basil indeed fulfilled that work magnificently, but Gregory more magnificently despised it.

When Gregory had wholly bound himself to the service of God, he presumed so much upon the love of his fellow student that he removed Basil, as he sat, from the teacher’s chair and, laying hold of him with his hand, led him with himself to a monastery. There, as they say, for thirteen years, all books of the secular Greeks having been put away, they devoted their labor solely to the volumes of divine Scripture. They followed their understanding not from their own presumption, but from the writings and authority of the elders, concerning whom it was established that they themselves had received from apostolic succession the rule of understanding. Examining chiefly their commentaries on the prophets, they sought the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden in earthen vessels.

But when they themselves, now sufficiently instructed, were called by divine dispensation to instruct the peoples, and each was drawn by a different path to the same work, Basil, going about the cities and countryside of Pontus, began to stir by words and kindle by preaching the sluggish spirits of that nation, who had little concern for future hope.

Gregory, however, continually cultivated the good earth of his own heart, and here made much greater progress in himself than Basil did in others. Basil received what those who renounced the world laid at his feet; Gregory, content with the sacrament of having nothing and possessing all things, clung greedily and with great desire to the riches of wisdom alone, and by his example preached freedom from the cares of the world.

Therefore, not long afterward, Basil became bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia. Gregory, however, being appointed bishop in place of his father at the town of Nazianzus, faithfully endured the turbulence of the heretics. When peace had been restored, he came to Constantinople to teach, where he was established as bishop. There, in a short time, he accomplished so much in reforming a people infected with the ancient poisons of the heretics that then for the first time they seemed to themselves to become Christians and to behold the new light of truth, since the teacher of religion taught many things by words, but more by examples.

But when envy followed upon the glory he had obtained, certain men began to contend that, with him returning to his own place, another should be ordained bishop. Perceiving that this was only being whispered and muttered under the breath, he himself brought forth what no one dared to say to him: “Far be it that any dissension among God’s priests should arise on my account. If this storm is because of me, take me and cast me into the sea, and the tossing will cease for you.”

Then, returning to his own church, he passed the time of life that remained. Because he was now worn out in age and infirm in body, he selected a successor for himself, so that, while that man governed the church, he might enjoy the repose of weakness and old age.

Jerome writes thus of him in the book On Illustrious Men: Gregory Nazianzen, bishop, a most eloquent man, my teacher, by whose exposition I learned the sacred Scriptures, composed all his works in thirty thousand verses. Among them are these: On the Death of His Brother Caesarius; Praises of the Maccabees; Praises of Cyprian; Praises of Athanasius; Praises of Maximus the Philosopher after His Return from Exile; a book of the Hexaemeron, with Virginity and Marriage disputing against one another; two books Against Eunomius; one book On the Holy Spirit; and one book Against the Emperor Julian. He practiced the life of a monk in the countryside and died about three years before this under the emperor Theodosius.

According to Thomas in the First Part, he was of such authority among the ancients that no one dared to reject his opinions or sayings, although that which he himself held as an opinion concerning the angels—namely, that they were created long before the creation of the world—is not commonly held today; rather, it is held that they were created at the beginning of the age, when other things also were created.

Section I: From his apologetic book on his flight from pastoral care

In his apologetic book, where he assigns the causes of his flight from pastoral care, Gregory says thus:

The cause of that disturbance of mine, by which I contradicted so persistently and, putting aside the modesty that had always been my inseparable companion, resisted so imprudently, was its sudden coming upon me, just as, when a sudden noise has thundered, those struck by terror are at once disturbed. The next cause was the recollection of my quiet and silence, since I saw that what I had loved from the beginning of my life and had vowed to God amid the greatest dangers was being hindered for me.

For truly nothing seems more excellent to me for a man with a view to the blessed life than that, the carnal senses having been closed, and having been made exterior to the flesh and the world, someone should turn into himself and, having been made a stranger to mortal cares, should speak to himself alone and to God; so that, having been raised above all visible things, he may fill his mind with divine perceptions and heavenly forms without any admixture of earthly things; and, having truly been made an immaculate mirror of the image of God and always receiving light from his light, he may bear in himself certain first tokens or beginnings of the future age; and, although still placed upon earth, may in a certain manner enjoy the fellowship of angels; and, earthly frailty having been despised and abandoned, may be transported to the things above by the coming of the Holy Spirit.

If perhaps any one of you has at some time felt the ardor of love of this sort, he knows what I say and recognizes the things of which I speak. But in certain men the sickness of envy hinders the faculty of judging rightly, and they fasten a vicious name upon philosophy, calling it vainglory, and defame illustrious wisdom and studies with the appellations of boastfulness. The crowd of the unskilled is more ready to disparage good studies than to imitate them.

I was also ashamed because of certain men whom I saw possessing nothing at all pertaining to the amendment of their life, rushing competitively into holy things with unclean feet and, before they were held worthy even of the first entrance and the doors, proceeding immediately to the tribunal and hastening to the priesthood; and, with the others thrust aside, reclining upon the sacred altars themselves, so that it may deservedly be said according to the ancient proverb: “Is Saul also among the prophets?”

Although it is difficult to know how to obey one who rules, it is much more difficult to know how to rule others. For as much as the hope and glory of this rule are greater, so much more grave is the danger, at least for those possessing understanding. For if there is any disease of vices in rulers, it is easily poured into those who are ready to obey him, and that which is evil passes from him much more easily than whatever virtue and industry may be in him. For nothing is so easy as to become evil, even if no one teaches or compels it; but it is exceedingly difficult to become good. Very many of us are ready to receive evil.

One must fear, he says in the same book, lest we be found to be certain very bad painters of the beauty of virtue before other painters—that is, before the common people, who ought to paint it in themselves—by offering them the worst exemplars of that image. Or certainly lest the matter of the familiar proverb happen to us, so that we who undertake to heal others are ourselves found to be teeming with ulcers.

Moreover, it is not enough that the man to whom the highest charge of teaching is committed should not be evil; for being evil is assuredly blameworthy and disgraceful even in those who are taught. Rather, he ought to be furnished with all good things. We ought never to think that any end has been made for us of good things or any boundary set to advancement. Those things rightly done by us are not so much to be brought into the light as those things which we have not yet willed to fulfill are to be reckoned as loss.

This life ought to be considered by us as a certain ascent, in which it avails nothing to have completed what you have climbed unless you surmount what remains. Nor should we measure ourselves by comparison with others or think ourselves to be something great if perhaps we are found more excellent than some. Rather, let us judge it a loss if we do not conduct ourselves worthily of our place and rank. And if any things are done by us, let them be weighed not by comparison with the negligent, but by the authority of the commandment.

Those who preside ought not to constrain their subjects by force or necessity, but to persuade them by reason and examples of life, because everything that is extorted from unwilling persons, besides the fact that it seems tyrannical, cannot indeed endure. For whatever is drawn violently is accustomed to return, just as, if someone bends the top of a young tree, once released it returns again to what it had been. But that which is done from purpose and will is as lawful as it is certain, being bound by the strongest bond, namely, that of its own will.

Truly it seems to me that to rule or instruct a human being is the art of arts and the discipline of disciplines, since man is certainly, among all living beings, the most varied in manners and diverse in will.

But for us who preside, the chief endeavor is to conquer those who love carnally and in no manner wish to yield to us, fighting against their own selves, so that they may be for us a kind of veil against those on whose behalf we fight; while each one brings as much zeal to covering and concealing the diseases of sins as he ought to have brought to showing the sickness to the physician.

Some ought to be rebuked before everyone because they despise more secret admonitions. Others ought to be admonished more secretly because, when corrected publicly, they become more shameless. All the actions of some ought to be observed more diligently and examined even to excess, especially of those who, while they think their evils are concealed by a certain art of theirs, raise themselves and are puffed up against others. In the case of others, certain things ought to be passed over, and, though seeing, one ought as if not to have seen, and, though hearing, as if not to have heard, lest by rebuke they come to final contempt—those who perhaps are ashamed to extend and multiply their faults.

What this Gregory touches very briefly concerning the varied manner of admonishing and correcting delinquent subjects according to the variety of their condition, Gregory the Great, that is, the pope, treats at length, descending to particulars in the Pastoral Book and citing this Gregory Nazianzen.

Finally, Nazianzen himself says: To philosophize according to God, and to know how to hold the rudders of souls and to govern others when I myself had not yet learned to obey those governing rightly, I judged to be a business above me, especially at this time, when we see men being turned this way and that and disturbing all things, so that nothing seems better than to flee from the midst and lie hidden.

I indeed do not fear external wars, nor do I dread that beast which has now risen up against the churches, that is, Julian the Apostate, in whom is the fullness of the devil, although he threatens fires, swords, and beasts; although in cruelty he exceeds all persecutors who were before him; although he seeks new kinds of torments. For me there is one remedy against all these things, one victory: willingly to receive death for Christ.

But concerning the internal war of vices, I do not know what I should do, what aids I should procure, what gift of the Holy Spirit I should invoke, with what spiritual arms I should surround myself against the snares of the devil. I indeed confess myself to be exceedingly weak for his battles, and on this account I confess that I have turned my back. Covering my face with confusion, I sat alone, because I am filled with bitterness. I sought to be silent, understanding that the time is evil.

Section II: On the proper manner of monastic life and the modesty of preachers

The same Gregory says:

I set a guard upon my mouth and gave silence to my lips, since I saw it to follow that the mind first ought to be purified by philosophy in deed, and only then to open the mouth, draw in the spirit, utter a good word, and speak God’s wisdom perfectly among the perfect.

I desired, namely, to see that pale company offering glory to God in the Church: those who meditate upon the law of the Lord day and night; those who live as an example and admonition of a better life to all the rest. They are also silent preachers of the law of God and of Christ’s Gospel, in whom their very habit displays the insignia of virtue: a shaggy head with uncombed and bristling hair, shorn only as much as suffices; bare feet like those of the apostles; the cheapness of their garment, condemning the arrogance and pride of the age; a belt more precious through its very neglect, holding only so much of the garment as does not permit it to wander loose.

Their gait is ordered; their eye does not wander; they never laugh, but smile gently. Their speech is brought forth with reason, or their silence is more precious than speech. In praising they are not excessive, but offer as much as suffices for exhortation and not for flattery. A rebuke is more precious when joined with praise; the measure of sadness and joy is most just, and the tempering of each by the other most fitting. Gentleness is joined with austerity, freedom with modesty, so that one is not hindered by the other.

They mingle with crowds and withdraw into secrecy, doing each with measure, so that in the one they are joined with human beings and in the other with God. They lead a common life without common vices, but a private life not without the common affection of fraternity.

And, what is greater and more illustrious than all these things, in poverty they are rich, having nothing and possessing all things; having nothing in the world and living above the world. For them labor is delight; placed in the flesh, they live outside the flesh. Their portion is the Lord; they are poor for the sake of the kingdom, and kings for the sake of poverty; glorious in humility, strong in weakness.

But let us shun and avoid those who are incurable, lest perhaps we be stained by their contagions and not so much deliver our health to them as take their sicknesses upon ourselves. Thus he speaks there as above.

The same Gregory says to the emperors at Constantinople, as found in Distinction X: “Do you receive freedom of speech? Do you willingly accept that the law of Christ subjects you to priestly power and to these tribunals? For he gave us power; he gave us a principate much more perfect than your principalities. Or does it seem just to you that spirit should yield to flesh, that heavenly things should be overcome by earthly things, and that human things should be preferred to divine things?”

The same author says in Cause I, Question I: There is no doubt that one who endeavors to purchase the gift of God for a price in sacred ordination can thereafter in no manner remain or be recalled to it. Let such a man be cut off from communion in every way. For what else is it to purchase the gift of the Holy Spirit for a price than a capital crime and the simoniacal heresy? How detestably this is punished in each Testament is readily apparent from many examples.

For Gehazi sold the grace of healing to Naaman the Syrian; when Elisha exacted punishment for this same grace of healing, Gehazi was made a leper and lost it. Judas sold the Redeemer of all and, soon hanged by a noose, did not obtain that same grace of redemption—and deservedly, because no one can retain what he has sold.

Simon Magus also, when he wished to buy that same grace of the Holy Spirit, heard from Peter the sentence of his condemnation: “Your money,” and so forth. The Lord also, in order to show that those buying and selling were without this grace, left all the other sinners in the temple, but, rebuking and scourging specifically those buying and selling in the temple, cast them out of the temple. For those whom Christ casts out of the temple—will the Holy Spirit make them a temple for himself? Thus far the quotation. You have a lengthy treatment of simony in the Second Part of the Summa.

Section III: Didymus of Alexandria

As Rufinus says in Book XI of the Ecclesiastical History, Didymus, having been deprived of his eyes at a young age, when he still did not know the first elements of letters, was inflamed with a greater desire for the true light. Hearing it written in the Gospel that “what is impossible among human beings is possible with God,” and therefore trusting in the Lord, he prayed most earnestly that he might receive illumination of the heart.

He mingled studies and labor with prayers, and unremitting and continual vigils, so that hearing might confer upon him what sight conferred upon others. When, after the labor of working by lamplight, sleep came upon him, as it is accustomed to come upon those who labor by night, Didymus, like a clean animal ruminating the food it had taken, called it back whole and reconsidered in memory and mind those things which he had learned a little earlier from the reading of books as others ran through them.

Thus in a short time, with God teaching him, he came to such learning and knowledge of divine and human things that he became a teacher of the ecclesiastical school, being highly approved by Bishop Athanasius and the other wise men in the Church of God.

He was also so skilled in the other disciplines, whether dialectic, geometry, astronomy, or arithmetic, that none of the philosophers, when proposing to him anything from these arts, was ever able to overcome or confute him. Rather, as soon as he had received his answers, he believed him to be a master of the discipline concerning which he had proposed the question.

His writings are held in great admiration by all. We, however, who were in some degree hearers of his living voice, heard a far greater grace and some divine thing—I know not what—sounding above the human voice in those discourses which came forth from his mouth.

Blessed Antony also, when he had descended from the Thebaid to Alexandria to bear testimony to the faith of Athanasius against the Arians, consoled him with magnificent words: “Let it in no way offend you, Didymus, that you seem to have been deprived of carnal eyes. For those eyes which mice, flies, and lizards possess are lacking to you. But rejoice that you have the eyes which angels possess and by which God is seen, through which a great light of knowledge is kindled for you.”

Jerome says thus concerning him in the book On Illustrious Men: Didymus of Alexandria, blind from a young age and for this reason ignorant of the elements of letters, presented to everyone so great a marvel of himself that he learned dialectic, and also arithmetic and geometry—disciplines which especially require sight—even to perfection.

He wrote very many noble works: commentaries on all the Psalms; commentaries on the Gospels of Matthew and John; two books On Doctrines against the Arians; one book On the Holy Spirit, which I translated into Latin; eighteen volumes on Isaiah; three books of commentary on Hosea; five books on Zechariah at my request; commentaries on Job; and many other things.

Vincent says, however, in Book XV of the Mirror of History that nowhere did he find any of all these books of Didymus except the book On the Holy Spirit, which Jerome bears witness that he translated. In its prologue Jerome himself speaks thus:

Wishing to chatter something concerning the Holy Spirit, I preferred to be the translator of another's work rather than, as certain men do, to adorn myself like an ugly little crow with the colors of others. Long ago I read little books on the Holy Spirit, and, according to the comic poet's judgment, from good Greek works I saw Latin works that were not good. There was nothing manly there, nothing close and compressed, but everything flaccid, soft, and polished.

But my Didymus, possessing the eye of the bride and those eyes which Jesus commanded to be raised to the fields whitening for harvest, gazing far and more deeply, restores to us the ancient custom according to which a prophet is called a seer. Certainly, whoever reads this man will recognize the thefts of the Latin writers and will scorn the little streams when he has begun to draw from the fountains.

The Savior, who is also the Truth, says concerning the Holy Spirit: "For he will not speak from himself"; that is, without me and without the judgment of me and of the Father, because he is inseparable from my will and the Father's. And further: because he is not from himself, but is from the Father and from me. I speak the truth, that is, I inspire what he speaks, since he is the Spirit of truth.

For "to say" and "to speak" in the Trinity are not to be received according to our custom by which we converse and speak among ourselves, but according to the form of incorporeal natures, and especially of the Trinity, which continually inserts its will into the hearts of the faithful—into the hearts of those who are worthy to hear it.

Indeed, for the Father to speak and the Son to hear, or conversely for the Son to speak and the Father to hear, is for the Father and the Son to be of the same nature. And in the Father and the Son the Holy Spirit is the bond and communion. He who is the Spirit of truth and the Spirit of wisdom cannot hear the Son speaking things which he does not know, since he is himself that which is brought forth by the Son: that is, God proceeding from God, the Spirit of truth proceeding from the Truth, the Consoler flowing from the Consoler. Thus far the quotation.

Title X, Chapter VI

“Like a rainbow shining among clouds of glory”

Like a rainbow shining among clouds of glory, so blessed Jerome, a rainbow of glory—that is, glorious—placed among the dark clouds of delinquents and those going astray, illuminated the Church. By a most true and most tenacious interpretation he cleared Scripture, which had been clouded by the falsehoods of Hebrews, Greeks, and Latins who interpreted it badly. Translating from the Hebrew with respect to the Old Testament, and from the Greek with respect to the New, except for a few things, he handed it down in Latin to the faithful. He illuminated very many of its books by commenting upon them and confuted many heretics by his doctrine.

On account of the bright light of his wisdom, the Church has granted him such authority that whatever opinions or books of writers he rejected are held as rejected, and the things which he wrote are firmly maintained, as is clear in Distinction XV, The Holy Roman Church. And although dense clouds of men emulating him tried by diverse calumnies to obscure his glory, amid them his truth and holiness shone more brightly.

This Jerome, then, the son of Eusebius, was born in the town of Stridon, which lies upon the borders of Dalmatia and Pannonia. Baptized at Rome as a boy, he was most fully instructed in the Greek, Hebrew, and Latin languages. He had Donatus as his teacher in grammar, Victorinus in rhetoric, and Gregory Nazianzen in sacred Scripture.

As he himself writes concerning himself to Eustochium, when in his youth he delighted exceedingly in the study of gentile authors, avidly reading Cicero by day and Plato by night, and if at any time he looked upon the books of the prophets, their uncultivated speech repelled him, for which reason he put them aside, on a certain occasion about the middle of Lent he was seized by so sudden and burning a fever that, while his whole body was now growing cold, vital heat throbbed in his breast alone.

While the rites of his funeral were therefore being prepared, he was carried to the tribunal of the Judge, where there was an immense light. Asked of what condition he was, he answered: “I am a Christian.”

The Judge said to him: “You lie. You are a Ciceronian, not a Christian. For where your treasure is, there also is your heart.”

Jerome became silent. Immediately the Judge ordered those standing near to beat him for a very long time. But Jerome, crying out and wailing, said: “Have mercy upon me, Lord; have mercy upon me.” Those who stood near entreated the Judge to grant pardon to the young man.

He himself began to swear by God and to say: “Lord, if ever I possess books, if ever I read them, I have denied you.” Released at this word of his oath, he returned to himself and found himself drenched in tears and, lest it be thought a dream, his shoulders livid from the blows received before the Judge.

Rabanus touches upon this point in On the Afflictions of the Church, saying: “We read that blessed Jerome was scourged by an angel because, though a Christian man, he attended to the fictions of the gentiles,” as found in Distinction XXXVI. Therefore he afterward read the sacred books with as much zeal as he had never before devoted to the gentile books.

If afterward he at times introduces testimonies of the gentiles in his books, he assigns the reason for this in Distinction XXXVII, Those Who from the Table, saying: “If at any time we are compelled to recall secular letters and to say certain things from those which we formerly omitted, it is not of our will but, so to speak, of the gravest necessity, so that we may prove that those things which were foretold many ages before by the holy prophets are contained in the writings of the Greeks, the Latins, and other nations.”

Accordingly, when he was thirty-nine years old, he was ordained a cardinal priest of the Roman Church. While at Rome for three years he labored over the sacred letters and supplied eminent examples of holiness by purity of life and abstinences. He obtained such favor among the peoples that by the judgment of all he was considered worthy of the highest priesthood.

But because he reproved the wantonness of certain clerics and monks, and because they, unable to endure it, laid snares for him, giving place to their madness he withdrew from the city and went to Gregory Nazianzen, bishop of Constantinople, for the sake of fuller instruction in the divine oracles.

The nature of the snares that certain men prepared for him is related: namely, by secretly placing a woman’s garment in his bedchamber after his own had been removed. When, rising at night for matins, he put on the woman’s garment, thinking it his own, he entered the choir and was mocked by his rivals as if he kept a woman in his chamber. But this is not very authoritative.

After he had acquired from Gregory a most excellent knowledge of the sacred page, he passed into the desert. He himself narrates how much he endured there, writing thus to Eustochium:

How often, when situated in the desert and in that vast solitude which, scorched by the sun's heat, offers a dreadful habitation to monks, did I think myself amid Roman delights. I sat alone because I was filled with bitterness. Sackcloth made my deformed limbs bristle, and neglected skin had drawn over my flesh the foulness of an Ethiopian. Daily there were tears, daily groanings. And if at any time, as I resisted, oppressive sleep overcame me, I dashed upon the bare earth my bones, which scarcely held together.

Concerning food and drink I am silent, since even the sick use cold water, and to have received anything cooked is a luxury. Therefore I, who on account of fear of Gehenna had condemned myself to such a prison, a companion only of scorpions and wild beasts, was often present among choirs of girls. Faces grew pale with fasts, yet the mind burned with desires in a cold body; and, before its human being, the flesh, had already died, only the fires of lusts boiled.

And so, destitute of every help, I lay at Jesus's feet; I watered them with tears, I wiped them with my hair, and I subjected the resisting flesh by the fasting of weeks. I am not ashamed of my unhappiness; rather, I lament that I am not what I was. I remember that, crying aloud, I frequently joined day with night and did not cease from beating my breast until, at the Lord's command, tranquillity returned.

I feared even my cell itself as if it were conscious of my thoughts; and, angry and severe with myself, I alone penetrated the deserted places. Wherever I saw hollow valleys or the rugged precipices of mountains, there was the place of my prayer, there the most wretched prison of my flesh. And, as God is my witness, after many tears, after my eyes clung to heaven, at times I seemed to myself to be among the companies of angels and, glad and rejoicing, I sang: "After you we shall run in the fragrance of your ointments." Thus speaks he.

Section I: His life at Bethlehem and the lion

When four years had been passed in this penance, he returned to the town of Bethlehem. There, gathering many disciples in a short time, he labored for fifty years and six months in the holy purpose of the religious life and in translating and expounding the Scriptures.

On a certain day toward evening, while he was disputing about the Scriptures with his disciples, a limping lion suddenly entered. While the brothers scattered in fear of it, Jerome went to meet it as if it were a guest. When the lion showed him its foot, he ordered the brothers to wash it and found that it had been injured by thorns. Without delay the lion recovered and, putting aside all ferocity, lived among them like a domesticated animal.

Then Jerome, seeing that it had come both for the health of its foot and for their utility, by the counsel of the brothers assigned to it the duty of guarding in the pastures the ass that carried wood from the forest.

Meanwhile, on a certain day, while the ass was grazing, the obedient lion was overcome by sleep and slept. Behold, merchants, seeing the ass without a guardian, led it away with them. Awakening, the lion did not find its companion. When, after searching everywhere for a long time, it had not found the ass, it came sadly to the gate of the monastery.

Seeing that it had come later than usual and without the little ass, and that on arriving it did not dare to enter, the brothers thought that, compelled by hunger, it had eaten the ass. Giving it nothing, but sending it back to what remained of the carcass, although they nevertheless doubted this, they went out to the pastures to see whether they could find any sign of its death.

Returning because they had found nothing, they reported the matter to Jerome. Patiently bearing the loss and treating the lion humanely, they imposed the little ass's duty upon it, namely, that it should carry wood from the forest.

While it performed this diligently, on a certain day, after carrying the wood, it went out to the field as if still anxiously seeking its companion. From afar it saw the merchants approaching with laden camels, with that ass going before them. For it is the custom in those regions that, when they travel a long distance with camels, they take with them one going ahead with a cord and a little bell upon its neck.

When they approached one another, the lion recognized the ass and rushed upon them with a great roar. As the men fled, the lion, striking the earth terribly with its tail, compelled the laden camels to go before it to the monastery.

Hearing this, Jerome enjoined the deepest silence and ordered the gates to be opened kindly and, once the camels had been unloaded, that they should await the divine will concerning the matter. Then the lion, walking about the monastery as it was accustomed and prostrating itself before each brother, seemed to ask pardon with its tail for a fault it had not committed.

When, as Jerome had advised, they had prepared necessities for the guests who would come, behold, it was announced that guests who wished to see the abbot were standing before the gates. Entering, they modestly prostrated themselves before Jerome in order to merit pardon for the theft they had committed.

He gently raised them and, admonishing them thereafter not to usurp the things of others, ordered that they be refreshed and then depart after receiving their camels with the merchandise. But they would eat nothing until, despite Jerome's great resistance, they gave him half the oil which they were carrying. They also promised that thereafter the same measure of oil would be sent to them annually by themselves and their heirs. And thus they gladly returned to their own places.

It is read in certain little works entitled with the name of Augustine, and in others attributed to Cyril or other men, concerning many miracles done after Jerome's death at his invocation, and especially concerning three dead men raised to life when his tunic had been laid over them, who related the punishments and glory shown to them in the other life. But because it is not authoritative that such doctors wrote those things, and because neither Vincent in the Mirror of History, nor Jacob of Voragine, nor other historians make mention of them, we therefore omit relating them.

Vincent speaks thus concerning Jerome's writings in Book XVII of the Mirror of History:

- Expositions of His Faith to Pope Damasus.
- One treatise On the Nicene Creed.
- One book of commentaries on Ecclesiastes.
- Eighteen books on Isaiah.
- Twenty books on Jeremiah.
- Fourteen books on Ezekiel.
- One book on Daniel.
- Three books on Hosea, and similarly on each of the Minor Prophets.
- Four books on Matthew.
- One book on Mark.
- Works on the Epistle to the Ephesians, on the Epistle to the Galatians, on the Epistle to Titus, and on the Epistle to the Philippians.
- Several books on that which is written, "the husband of one wife," to Oceanus.
- On Twelve Questions, to Hedibia.
- On Eleven Questions, to Algasia.
- One book of Hebrew Questions on Genesis.
- One book On Three Questions, to Pope Damasus.
- Two books of Hebrew Questions on the Book of Kings.
- Two books of Questions on Paralipomenon.
- One book of the Breviary on the Psalter.
- One book On the Best Manner of Interpreting, to Pammachius.
- One book On the Interpretations of Hebrew Names.
- One book On the Study of the Scriptures, to Paulinus.
- One book On the Priestly Garment.
- One book On the Prodigal, to Damasus.
- One book On the Corruption of the Seventy in the Psalter.
- One book On the Forty-Two Stations of the Children of Israel.
- One general treatise Against Heretics.
- Three books Against the Pelagians.
- Two books Against Jovinian.
- One book Against the Luciferians.
- One book Against Helvidius, on the Perpetual Virginity of Mary.
- One book Against Vigilantius.
- One book Against Origen, on the Resurrection.

- One book To the Priest Avitus, on the Errors of Origen.
- One book Against Rufinus, Presbyter of Aquileia.
- One Apologetic to Augustine.
- One Exhortation to Julian.
- One book On Penance, to Rusticus.
- One book On the Perfect Man.
- One book On the History of Joachim and Anna.
- One treatise On the Fifteen Signs Preceding the Judgment.
- One book On Illustrious Men.
- One book On the Distance of Places.
- One book On the Life of Clerics, to Nepotian.
- One book, the Epitaph of Nepotian, to Heliodorus.
- One book On the Institution of a Cleric or Monk, to Paulinus.
- One book On the Life of a Monk, to Rusticus.
- One book On the Life of a Cleric, to Oceanus.
- One book On Preserving Virginity, to Eustochium.
- One book To the Virgin Demetrias.
- One book To Laeta, on the Instruction of Her Daughter.
- One book To a Mother and Daughter Dwelling in Gaul.
- Rebukes of the Consecrated Virgin Susanna.
- One book On Her Fall.
- One book To Geruchia, on Monogamy.
- One book To Furia, on Preserving Widowhood.
- One book To Salumia, on the Death of Nebridius.
- One book of consolation To Paula, on the Falling Asleep of Blesilla.
- One book To Pammachius, on the Falling Asleep of Paulina.
- One book To Oceanus, on the Death of Fabiola.
- One book of consolation To Tyrasius, on the Falling Asleep of His Daughter.
- One book, the Epitaph and Death of Paula.
- One book To Numenius and Alexander, on the Resurrection of the Flesh.
- One Apologetic to Pammachius.
- One book To Heliodorus, on Contempt of the World.
- One book To Ctesiphon.
- One book To Domnion.
- One treatise On the Three Virtues.
- One book On the Death of Uzziah, the Seraphim, and the Coal.
- Expositions of Psalm Forty-Four, to the Virgin Principia, one book.
- Seventy brief epistles to diverse persons.
- Ten sermons, and especially one very lengthy and notable sermon On the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Some extracts from these works are briefly placed below; many of them are also contained in the Decretals.

Section II: Extracts concerning the Christian and monastic life

Nothing is happier than the Christian, to whom the kingdoms of heaven are promised. Nothing is more laborious than he, who is daily imperiled concerning his life. Nothing is stronger than he, who conquers the devil. Nothing is weaker than he, who is overcome by the flesh.

Judas falls from the summit of the apostolate into the Tartarus of perdition, and is moved neither by the intimacy of the banquet, nor by the dipping of the morsel, nor by the grace of the kiss so as to refrain from betraying as a mere man the one whom he knew to be the Son of God. What was wiser than Solomon? Yet he was made foolish by the loves of women.

We say these things, son Rusticus, so that on the first page we may teach you that you have begun great things and pursue lofty things; and that, while trampling upon the incitements of youth—indeed, of puberty—you ascend the grade of perfect age. But the path on which you proceed is slippery, and not so much glory follows upon victory as ignominy follows upon a fall.

I know that I shall offend very many who refer a general disputation concerning vices to an insult against themselves, and who, while becoming angry with me, indicate their own conscience and judge much worse concerning themselves than concerning me. For I shall name no one, lest with the license of ancient comedy I select and lash particular persons. It belongs to a prudent man to dissemble—indeed, to amend—what he understands to be in himself, and to be indignant with himself, not to heap curses upon the admonisher.

And below, as is also found in Cause XVI, Question I: If desire for the clerical state tickles you, learn what you may teach, and offer a rational sacrifice to Christ. Do not be a soldier before you are a recruit, nor a master before you are a disciple.

We are now examining the cradle and customs of a monk. First it must be treated whether you ought to live alone or with others in a monastery. It pleases me that you have the companionship of holy men and do not teach yourself or enter without a teacher upon a way which you have never entered; for then you would immediately be liable to turn aside in the opposite direction and to error, to walk more or less than is necessary, to slacken while running, or to fall asleep while delaying.

In solitude pride quickly steals in. If a man has fasted for a little while and has not seen another human being, he thinks himself to be of some importance. Forgetting himself, he judges other men’s servants. He extends his hands for what his appetite demands. He sleeps as much as he wishes. He does what he wills. He fears no one and thinks everyone inferior.

What, then? Do we reprehend the solitary life? By no means, for we have often praised it.

And below, as found in On Consecration, Distinction V: Let the book of the Psalter never depart from your hand and eyes. Let body and mind together tend toward the Lord. Conquer anger by patience. Love knowledge of the Scriptures, and you will not love the vices of the flesh. Nor let your mind be vacant for diverse disturbances; if they settle in your breast, they will rule you and lead you to the greatest offense.

Do some work, so that the devil may always find you occupied. Either weave a little basket from rushes or bend flexible twigs into a hamper. Let the soil be sown. Let garden plots be divided by an equal boundary; when seeds of herbs have been cast into them or plants set in order, let irrigating waters be led to them. Let fruitful trees be grafted with buds or shoots, so that after a little time you may pluck the sweet fruits of your labor.

Make hives for bees, to which Solomon’s Proverbs send you, and learn the order of monasteries and regular discipline in their little bodies. Let nets for catching fish also be woven. Let books also be written, so that the hand may produce food and the soul may be filled by reading. For every idle man is in desires.

The monasteries of the Egyptians maintain this custom: they receive no one without work and labor, not so much because of the necessity of sustenance as for the salvation of the soul, lest it wander through pernicious thoughts.

Jerome adds an example concerning himself: because in his youth, when his mind burned with thoughts even amid fasts, he gave himself as a disciple to a certain man from among the Hebrews who had been converted to the faith, in order to learn the Hebrew idiom, in which he labored greatly.

He adds another example concerning a certain Greek youth in a monastery of Egypt whom he saw with his own eyes. When the youth was gravely tempted by the vice of the flesh and could not extinguish the flame of the flesh by any abstinence of the body, he cured him by this device. He instructed one of the monks to pursue him with quarrels and insults and afterward to come to accuse him before the abbot, as though the youth had insulted him and inflicted an injury upon him.

The youth was so afflicted by insults of this kind that had been brought against him and by the false accusations that within a year he was freed from those temptations. Hence, when the abbot asked how he stood amid a temptation of this kind, he answered: “Father, I am not permitted to live—and should it please me to fornicate?”

And below: No art is learned without a master. Even mute animals and herds of wild beasts follow their leaders. Among bees there is one prince. Cranes follow one in lettered order. There is one emperor, one judge of a province, one bishop. When Rome was founded, it could not have two brothers as kings at the same time and was dedicated by fratricide. In a ship there is one helmsman, in a household one lord, and in every great army the standard of one man is awaited.

Through all these things the discourse tends to this: that I might teach you that you must not be left to your own judgment, but ought to live in a monastery under the discipline of one father and in the companionship of many, so that from one you may learn humility, from another patience; this man may teach you silence, that man meekness. Do not do what you wish.

Eat what you are ordered. Have what you receive, and be clothed with as much as you receive. Pay the required amount of the work enjoined upon you. Be subject to the one to whom you do not wish to be subject. Come weary to your bed and sleep while walking, and be compelled to rise when your sleep is not yet complete.

Recite a psalm in your order, in which not sweetness of voice but affection of mind is sought. Serve the brothers. Wash the feet of guests. When you have suffered an injury, be silent. Fear the superior of the monastery as the Lord; love him as a parent. Believe that whatever he commands you is salutary for you, and do not judge the opinion of your superior, whose office it is for you to obey and to fulfill the things commanded.

And below: By no means consider what evil things others do, but what good thing you ought to do. Conduct and live your life, therefore, so that you may proceed to the altar of Christ like a virgin from the bridal chamber and may possess a good testimony from those outside.

The same Jerome says to Paulinus: If you wish to exercise the office of a presbyter, if perhaps the honor or work of the episcopate delights you, live in towns and villages and make the salvation of others your gain. But if you desire to be what you are called—that is, a monk, that is, one alone—what are you doing in cities, which assuredly are not habitations of solitary men but of many?

Each way of life has its own leaders set before it. Let Roman commanders imitate the Camilli, the Fabricii, the Reguli, and the Scipios. Let philosophers set before themselves Pythagoras, Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle; poets, Homer, Virgil, Menander, and Terence; historians, Sallust, Herodotus, and Pliny; orators, Lysias, Demosthenes, and Cicero.

And, to come to our own people, let bishops and presbyters imitate the apostles and apostolic men, whose honor and merit they who preside seem to possess. But let us have as leaders of our purpose Paul, Antony, Macarius, and Hilarion. Our leader is Elijah and Elisha. Our commanders are the sons of the prophets and the Rechabites.

Section III: That wisdom is to be sought more than eloquence, and the study of sacred letters more than secular ones

Jerome says in the letter to Nepotian:

David, a cold old man, is wrapped in garments and does not grow warm unless he has embraced a young woman. Who, therefore, is this Shunammite, a wife and virgin, so fervent that she warmed the cold man, so holy that she did not provoke the warm man to lust? Let most wise Solomon explain his father’s delights, and let the peaceful man recount the embraces of the warrior man: “Possess wisdom; possess understanding. Love her, and she will preserve you.”

Nearly all powers of the body are changed in old people, and, as wisdom alone increases, the others decrease: fasts, vigils, alms, running here and there, receiving pilgrims, defending the poor, persistence and perseverance in prayers, visiting the sick, working with the hands, and all things which are exercised through the body become less when the body is broken.

I do not say this because wisdom is cold in the young, seeing that in very many old people it withers with age, but because youth endures many wars of the body and amid the incitements of vices and the ticklings of the flesh is choked in its powers, like fire among pieces of wood, so that it cannot unfold its own brightness.

But the old age of those who instructed their youth in honorable arts and meditated upon the law of the Lord day and night becomes more learned with age, more certain through experience, wiser with the passage of time, and gathers the sweetest fruits of former studies.

Hence that wise man of Greece, Themistocles, when at the completion of one hundred and seven years he saw that he was dying, is reported to have said that he grieved because he was then departing from life when he had begun to be wise.

Moreover, “Shunammite” is called “scarlet” in our language, signifying that she glows with wisdom and burns with divine reading. To what end have these things been repeated in so long an introduction? Lest you ask from me childish declamations, little flowers of maxims, enticements of words, and certain sharp things briefly concluded at the ends of individual chapters, which may stir applause and shouts from the hearers.

Let Wisdom now embrace me, and let our Abishag, who never grows old, rest in my bosom. Hear, therefore, as blessed Cyprian says, things not eloquent but strong. Hear a brother in office, a father in old age. Thus speaks he.

Section IV: On the study of gentile or secular letters

The same Jerome does not reprehend the study of gentile or secular letters simply and altogether, but rather its excess or an improper end: namely, delight in eloquence or the display of glory, and not instruction; or the omission on its account of things more useful and fitting to one's state.

Hence Jerome himself says to Damasus upon the Gospel of the Prodigal: "We see a priest of God, with the Gospels and the Prophets put aside, reading comedies, singing the words of bucolic verses, holding Virgil in his hands, and making in himself a crime of pleasure what in boys is a cause of necessity," as found in Distinction XXXVII.

The same author says in the following chapter: Does it not seem to you that they walk in vanity of sense and darkness of mind who by day and night are tortured by dialectical art; who, as investigators of nature, raise their eyes beyond heaven and are plunged beyond the depth of the earth and the abyss into a certain void; who seethe over the iambus; who studiously distinguish and collect in their heart so great a forest of meters?

And, to pass to the other part: those who seek riches by right and wrong; who flatter kings; who hunt after the inheritances of others; who heap up wealth, though they do not know to whom they will leave it in a moment.

The same author says upon Isaiah in the following chapter: They are made drunk with strong drink who abuse secular wisdom and the little snares of the dialecticians, which ought to be called not so much bonds as phantasms—that is, certain shadows and images which quickly perish and are dissolved.

According to Jerome himself, they are figuratively signified by the pods which the swine ate, with which that prodigal of the Gospel desired to fill his belly and could not. For such doctrine is the food of demons, which inflates the mind but does not satisfy it.

But Jerome does not censure the study of such things in a due manner for a due end. Rather, upon the Epistle to Titus he says: "If anyone knows the grammatical or dialectical art, so that he possesses the principle of speaking rightly and judges between true and false, we do not condemn it. Geometry, arithmetic, and music possess truth in their knowledge. But that knowledge is not the knowledge of piety. The knowledge of piety is to know how to read the Scriptures and understand the Prophets, to believe the Gospel, and not to be ignorant of the Apostles," as found in Distinction XXXVII, If Anyone.

In the following chapter he says concerning Daniel and his companions: "Let them learn the Chaldean teaching with the same mind with which Moses learned all the wisdom of the Egyptians. But let them learn not in order to follow it, but to judge and refute it. In the same manner, if anyone wishes to write against mathematicians, he will be exposed to the laughter of those skilled in mathematics if he is unskilled in mathematical learning; and likewise if, disputing against the philosophers, he is ignorant of the doctrines of the philosophers." Thus speaks he.

Jerome says upon Leviticus: These two things are the works of a bishop: that he may learn from God by reading the divine Scriptures and meditating upon them frequently, and that he may teach the people. But let him teach those things which he has learned from God—not from his own heart or human sense, but those things which the Holy Spirit teaches.

There is also another work which Moses does. He does not go to the wars or fight against the enemies. But what does he do? He prays, and so long as he prays, his people conquer. If he lets down and relaxes his hands, his people are conquered. Therefore let the priest pray without ceasing, so that his people who are under him may conquer, so that they may conquer the invisible enemies, the Amalekites—that is, the demons—as found in Distinction XXXVI, If Anyone.

Section V: On the life and conduct of clerics

Jerome says to Nepotian:

Let the cleric who serves the Church of Christ first interpret his own designation, and, when the interpretation of the name has been set forth, let him strive to be what he is called. For cleros in Greek is called "lot" in Latin. Clerics, therefore, are so called either because they are of the lot of the Lord, or because the Lord himself is their lot—that is, the portion of clerics.

They ought therefore so to present themselves that they may possess the Lord and themselves be possessed by the Lord. He who possesses the Lord and says with the prophet, "The Lord is my portion," can possess nothing outside the Lord. For if he possesses anything else besides the Lord, the Lord will not be his portion—for example, if gold, if silver, if possessions, if varied household goods are his portion, the Lord disdains to become his portion together with these things. This is found in Cause XII, Question I, The Cleric.

And again: Avoid as a kind of plague the cleric who is a merchant and who has been made rich from poverty and glorious from obscurity, as found in Distinction LXXXVIII.

And below: The glory of a bishop is to provide for the needs of the poor; the disgrace of a priest is to devote himself to his own riches. I, born in a poor house and a rustic hut, who could scarcely satisfy my growling belly with millet and coarse bread, now disdain fine flour and honey.

And below: Many build walls and remove the columns of the church; marbles gleam, ceilings shine with gold, the altar is distinguished with gems, yet there is no selection of Christ's ministers.

Nor let anyone object to me that in Judea the temple, table, lamps, censers, plates, cups, little bowls, and the other things were fashioned from gold. These things were approved by the Lord at that time, when priests sacrificed victims and the blood of beasts was the remission of sins. Although all these things preceded as a figure, they were written for our sake, upon whom the ends of the ages have come. But now, since the poor Lord has dedicated the poverty of his house, let us carry the cross and reckon delights as mud.

And below: To seize something from a friend is theft; to defraud the Church is sacrilege. To have received what is to be distributed to the poor, and, while very many are hungry, to reserve it, is either timidity or caution. But to subtract anything from it—which is a crime of the most manifest kind—surpasses the cruelty of all robbers.

And below: Crates the Theban, once a very rich man, when he was proceeding to Athens to philosophize, cast away a great weight of gold, for he did not think that he could possess virtues and riches at the same time. We, laden with gold, follow the poor Christ; and, reclining upon our former wealth under the pretext of alms, how can we distribute the things of others faithfully when we timidly reserve our own? A full belly easily disputes about fasts. It is not having been at Jerusalem, but having lived well at Jerusalem, that is to be praised. All these things are Jerome's, in Cause XII, Question II, Glory.

The same author says to the same man: Be subject to your bishop and love him as the parent of your soul. But let bishops know that they are priests, not lords. Let them honor clerics as clerics, so that honor may be rendered to them by clerics as bishops.

That saying of the orator Domitius is well known: "Why should I hold you as a prince," he says, "when you do not hold me as a senator?" One Lord, one temple, one ministry. Let us know that what Aaron and his sons were, the bishop and presbyters are.

Let us always remember what the Apostle Peter commanded priests: "Feed the flock of the Lord which is among you, not by constraint but voluntarily according to God; neither for the sake of base gain, nor as exercising dominion among the clergy, but made a pattern of the flock from the heart." A wise son is the glory of his father. Let the bishop rejoice in his judgment when he has chosen such priests. This is found in Distinction XCV, Be Subject.

The same Jerome says to Lucinus, in Distinction XII: "I think that you ought briefly to be admonished that ecclesiastical traditions, especially those which do not injure the faith, must be observed as they were handed down by the elders, and that the custom of some ought not to be overturned by the contrary practice of others."

The same author says: Either never or rarely let the feet of women tread your little hospice, because he cannot dwell with God with his whole heart who delights in the approaches of women. A woman burns the conscience of the man dwelling with her. Never dispute about the appearances of women. Let women not know your name. Love in your mind, not by bodily association, the woman whom you see living well. But it is good not to touch a woman; therefore it is evil to touch one, as found in Distinction XXXII, The Little Hospice.

The same author says: Either be equally unacquainted with all girls and virgins of Christ, or love them equally. See that you do not remain under the same roof, nor trust in past chastity, because you cannot be holier than David, stronger than Samson, or wiser than Solomon. Always remember that a woman cast the inhabitant of paradise out of his own possession.

If on account of an affair of the clerical office either a widow or a virgin is visited by you, never enter the house alone. Do not sit alone with her alone, secretly and without an arbiter or witness. Have such companions also as will not bring you into disrepute by their company. Let them be adorned not by clothing but by conduct, and let them not curl their hair with a curling iron, but promise chastity by their habit.

Beware of all suspicions, and whatever can plausibly be invented against you, avoid beforehand lest it be invented. Holy love does not possess frequent little gifts, handkerchiefs, bands, garments applied to and offered at the mouth, tasted foods, and coaxing and sweet little letters. "My honey, my light, and my desire" is Christ. We blush at every delicacy, pleasure, witty urbanity worthy of laughter, and the other follies of lovers in comedies; we detest them in worldly people—how much more in clerics and monks.

The same author says to Oceanus: The first temptations of clerics are the frequent visits of women. Woman is a harmful race, a door of the devil, the way of iniquity, a scorpion's blow. She strikes with flaming fire when she approaches. Stubble kindles a fire which burns even the foundations of mountains. I judge that, if women dwell with men, the devil's birdlime will not be lacking. Therefore the man's withdrawal sets up the arms of chastity. After the temptation of her suffering at Antioch, Thecla is forbidden to proceed with Paul.

The same Jerome says to Nepotian: Read the divine Scriptures very frequently; indeed, never let reading be put down from your hands. Learn what you may teach; remain in the things which you have taught. Let not your works put your speech to shame, lest, when you speak in the church, anyone silently answer: "Why, therefore, do you not do these things which you say?"

He is a dainty teacher who with a full belly disputes about fasts. A robber too can accuse avarice. While you teach in church, let not the shout of the people but their groaning be stirred. Let the tears of your hearers be your praises.

Let the discourse of a presbyter be seasoned by the reading of the Scriptures. I do not wish you to be a declaimer or a noisy and garrulous wrangler without reason, but one skilled in the mystery. A brazen brow often interprets what it does not know and, when it has persuaded others, claims knowledge for itself also. Nothing is so easy as to deceive a worthless common crowd and an unlearned assembly by fluency of tongue, which admires more whatever it does not understand.

Adornment and filth are to be avoided equally, because the one savors of delights, the other of glory. Of two imperfections, it is better to possess holy rusticity than sinful eloquence.

You must avoid the banquets of secular men, especially of those who swell with honors. It is shameful for a priest of the crucified and poor Lord, who was also fed by another's food, to keep watch before the doors among the lictors of consuls and soldiers. It is better for the judge of the province to dine at your house than for you to dine at the palace.

Let your fasts be pure, chaste, simple, moderate, and not superstitious. A continual fast is to dine daily and daily to hunger. Fasting heals the wounds of the delinquent and sanctifies the healed.

The same author says: Let your fasts be daily; let refreshment flee satiety. For it profits nothing to carry an empty stomach for two or three days if it is filled up in like measure afterward, as found in On Consecration, Distinction V.

The same author says in the same place: Beware lest you have an itching tongue or ears; that is, lest you either disparage others yourself or hear others disparaging them. And know that you will be judged by your own sentence concerning all things which you say about others.

Nor is this a just excuse for those who report such things: "I cannot inflict an injury upon others." No one gladly reports something to an unwilling hearer. An arrow is never fixed in a stone; sometimes, rebounding, it strikes the one directing it. Never dispute concerning the appearances of women. Let not another household know through you what is done in another.

Hippocrates adjures his disciples before he teaches them and compels them to swear to his words. He exacts silence by oath and prescribes their speech, gait, disposition of meekness, and conduct. How much more ought we to do so, to whom the medicine of souls has been committed.

We ought to love the houses of all Christians as our own. Let them know us as consolers in their griefs rather than as table companions in prosperity. The cleric who, when frequently invited to a meal, does not refuse is easily held in contempt. All these things are Jerome's in the said letter.

Section VI: On contempt of the world

Jerome says to Heliodorus:

Although your little nephew may hang from your neck; although your mother, with disheveled hair and torn clothing, may show you the breasts with which she nursed you; although your father may lie upon the threshold, proceed by trampling over your father and fly with dry eyes to the standard of the cross. To be cruel in this matter is the highest kind of piety.

The love of Christ and the fear of Gehenna easily break these bonds. On the contrary, Scripture commands that parents be obeyed; but whoever loves them above Christ loses his own soul. The enemy holds a sword to kill me, and shall I think about my mother's tears?

And below, the same author says: You fear poverty, but Christ calls the poor blessed. You are terrified by labor, but no athlete is crowned without sweat. You think about food, but faith does not fear hunger. You fear to dash upon the bare earth limbs wasted by fasts, but the Lord lies with you. The uncombed hair of your squalid head bristles, but Christ is your head. The infinite vastness of the desert terrifies you, but walk about paradise in your mind. As often as you strive there in thought, so often you will not be in the desert.

And, to hear the Apostle answering briefly to all things: "The sufferings of this present time are not worthy," and so forth.

You are dainty, dearest one, if you wish both to rejoice here with the world and afterward to reign with Christ. Let that day come on which the earth with its peoples will tremble at the voice of the trumpet, and the world will bellow more mournfully. Kings once most powerful will tremble with bare side. Venus will be displayed with her offspring; then fiery Jupiter will be brought forward, and foolish Plato with his disciples. Aristotle's arguments will not profit.

Then you, a rustic and poor, will exult, laugh, and say: "Behold my crucified God. Behold the Judge who, wrapped in cloths, wailed in a manger. This is that son of the laborer and the prostitute. This is he who fled into Egypt; this is he clothed in scarlet; this is he crowned with thorns; this is the magician, the one having a demon, and the Samaritan. Behold, O Jew, the hands which you fastened. Behold, O Roman, the side which you pierced."

The same Jerome says in On Consecration, Distinction V: He errs in no small degree who prefers a lesser good to a greater. Does he not lose the dignity of a rational human being who prefers either fasting to charity or vigils to integrity of the senses, so that on account of immoderate abstinence and the indiscriminate chanting of psalms or offices he incurs the mark either of madness or of sadness?

Can God, like a human being, be bent by a multitude of words? For God is to be prayed to not by words but by the heart. Therefore the singing of five psalms with purity and serenity of heart and spiritual cheerfulness is better than the modulation of the whole Psalter with anxiety and sadness.

"I am the Lord," he says, "loving judgment, hating robbery in a holocaust." He offers a holocaust from robbery who afflicts himself either by an excessive lack of foods or immoderately.

The same author says in On Consecration, Distinction V: Let us not receive such foods as we either digest with difficulty or grieve to have eaten because they were prepared at great and ruinous labor. The preparation of vegetables, fruits, and legumes is easier, does not need the art and expenditures of cooks, and, taken in moderation, sustains the human race without care; for that which does not possess the enticements of gluttony is not devoured avidly and is digested by a lighter digestion.

From excessive satiety diseases are generated, and very many, through the impatience of gluttony, are remedied by vomiting; and what they disgracefully brought in, they cast out more disgracefully.

Hippocrates teaches in the Aphorisms that thick and obese bodies which have fulfilled the measure of their growth, unless they are quickly diminished by the removal of blood, break forth into paralysis and the worst kinds of diseases; and for this reason that subtraction is necessary, so that they may again possess a condition in which they can grow. For the nature of bodies cannot remain in one state, but must either always increase or decrease; nor can a living body exist unless it is capable of growth. Thus speaks he.

The same Jerome says to Domnion against a certain man who disparaged him because he had written against Jovinian:

I marvel that a monk and young man is not ashamed—one from whose beauty the charms of Venus flow, whose eloquence in speaking is so great that he is suffused with comic wit and elegance—to go about the houses of nobles, to cling to the greetings of matrons, to make a battle against our religion, and amid these things to disparage his brother, to declaim against me, and to gnaw with a dog's tooth the books which I wrote against Jovinian.

Foolish am I, who without cause had Gregory Nazianzen and Didymus as catechists in the holy Scriptures. Instruction in Hebrew profited me nothing, nor daily meditation from youth even to this age in the Law, the Prophets, the Evangelists, and the Apostles.

A man has been found perfect without a teacher, who in eloquence surpasses Cicero, in arguments Aristotle, in prudence Plato, in learning Aristarchus, in multitude of books Didymus Chalcenterus, and in knowledge of the Scriptures all the interpreters of his time. Finally, he is said to request a subject and, referring something to the flesh and something to God, to dispute on either side of it—that is, both for justice and against justice.

I ask you, therefore, dearest father, to admonish him not to speak against his purpose, not to destroy by words the chastity which he promises by his habit. Let not one who is a virgin or continent—for he himself will see what he boasts himself to be—compare married women with virgins.

Let him spare himself, spare me, spare the Christian name. Let him know himself to be a monk not by speaking and running about, but by keeping silent and sitting. I do not condemn marriage, but I wish all those who perhaps cannot sleep alone because of nocturnal fears to take wives. Thus speaks he.

That everyone ought to fear and guard against dangers of the soul

Jerome says to Eustochium, as found in Cause XXXII, Question V:

If Paul, the vessel of election and prepared for the Gospel of Christ, on account of the goads of the flesh and incitements of the vices, represses his body and subjects it to servitude, lest, while preaching to others, he himself be found reprobate; and nevertheless sees another law in his members fighting against the law of his mind and taking him captive in the law of sin; if after nakedness, fasts, hunger, prisons, scourges, and torments, turning into himself, he cries, “Unhappy man that I am, who will deliver me from the body of this death?”—do you think that you ought to be secure?

Beware, I ask, lest at some time the Lord say concerning you: “The virgin Israel has fallen, and there is no one to raise her.” I shall say boldly: although God can do all things, he cannot raise a virgin after her fall. He is indeed able to deliver her from punishment, but he is not able to crown one who has been corrupted. Thus far the quotation.

The same author says in the same epistle: I do not wish pride to come to you from your purpose, but fear. You walk laden with gold; a robber must be avoided. This life is a racecourse for mortals. Here we contend so that elsewhere we may be crowned. No one enters securely among serpents and scorpions.

“Behold,” says the Lord, “my sword is made drunk in heaven,” and do you suppose that there is peace upon the earth, which generates thorns and thistles, which the serpent eats? We are surrounded by great companies of enemies; all things are full of foes. Fragile flesh, soon to be ashes, fights alone against many.

But if their multitude troubles you, and at each incitement of the vices you begin to burn, and your thought says to you, “What shall we do?” Elisha will answer you: “Do not fear, because there are more with us than with them.” With your eyes opened you will see the fiery chariot which, after Elijah’s example, may raise you to the stars, and then you will joyfully sing: “Our soul is like a sparrow,” and so forth.

And below: It would have been more right for a person to have entered marriage and walked upon level ground than, while striving toward higher things, to fall into the depth of hell. I do not wish you to permit a thought to grow; while the enemy is small, kill him. Let wickedness be crushed in the seed. Let not, I beseech you, the daughter of Zion become a harlot city, and after the hospitality of the Trinity let demons dance there and sirens and hedgehogs make their nests, as found in Cause XXXII, Question V, If Paul.

The same Jerome says in the epistle to the Galatians, as found in Cause XXXII, Question II: “Just as seeds are gradually formed in the womb and it is not reckoned homicide until the completed elements receive their forms and members, so a perception conceived by reason, unless it has broken forth into works, is still retained in the womb and quickly perishes by the enemy.”

Jerome proves by many authorities of both Testaments that after baptism someone can sin and rise again through penance. He writes against Jovinian, who asserted the contrary and was therefore a heretic, in On Penance, Distinction II, For If.

There Jerome expounds that saying of John, “Everyone who is born of God does not sin,” which Jovinian introduced on his own behalf. It is to be understood conditionally: namely, while he remains in spiritual nativity through grace, he does not sin. For, Jerome says, just as day and night cannot be mingled, so neither can justice and iniquity, sin and good works, Christ and Antichrist.

If we receive Christ in the lodging of our breast, we immediately put the devil to flight. If we sin and the devil enters through the door of sin, Christ immediately departs. Hence David too, after sin, says: “Restore to me the joy of your salvation,” which, namely, he had lost through sin.

And below: John himself says in his first canonical epistle: “If we sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the just, and he is the propitiation for our sins.” He says “we have,” not “you have”; and not only for the sins of John and the others, but also for those of the whole world. In that whole world were the apostles and all believers, from which it is plainly proved that one can sin after baptism.

And below, concerning what the Apostle says to the Hebrews: “It is impossible for those who have once been illuminated and have tasted the heavenly gift and been made partakers of the Holy Spirit, and have fallen away, to be renewed again to penance, crucifying again the Son of God,” and so forth. Therefore even the baptized can fall into sins.

But lest Montanus and Novatian confirm their error from this, contending that the baptized cannot obtain pardon through penance for sins committed after baptism, the Apostle resolves this error by adding: “But, dearly beloved, we trust better things and nearer to salvation concerning you, although we speak thus. For God is not unjust, that he should forget your work,” and so forth. It is as though the Apostle said: I have spoken thus so that I might draw you back from sins and make you more cautious through fear of despair.

And below, the same author says: God created us with free judgment. We are drawn by necessity neither to virtue nor to vices; otherwise, where there is necessity, there is no crown. As, therefore, in good works God is the perfecter—for it is not of him who wills or runs, but of God who has mercy and helps, so that we may be able to reach the finish—so in evils and sins our knowledge supplies the incitements and the devil the completion.

When he sees that upon the foundation we have built hay, wood, and stubble, he then sets the fire beneath it. Let us build gold, silver, and precious stones, and he will not dare to tempt us, although even in this there is not assuredly a secure possession. For the lion sits in ambush to kill the innocent.

And below: Who does not know that under the lofty dispensation of God all the saints of former times were of the same merit as Christians now are? As Abraham pleased in marriage, so now virgins please through perpetual chastity. They served the law and their time; let us also serve the law and our time, upon whom the ends of the ages have come.

David, chosen according to the Lord's heart, who had done all his wills, when tempted by the devil, speaks after his sin as a penitent: "Have mercy upon me, O God, according to your great mercy." A great sin wishes to be blotted out by great mercy. Solomon, beloved by the Lord and to whom God had twice been revealed, because he was a lover of women, departed from the love of God. The Book of Days relates that the most impious king Manasseh, after the Babylonian captivity, was restored to his former dignity. The holy man Josiah was pierced through by the king of Egypt in the field of Megiddo.

It is superfluous to write concerning Moses and Aaron, who offended God at the water of contradiction. For what if he who was nourished in the paradise of delights among nine stones was wounded? Lucifer descended from the mountain of the Lord to the infernal regions. If that most high sublimity fell, who cannot fall? If there are falls in heaven, how much more upon earth? All these things are Jerome's in On Penance, Distinction II, For If.

The same Jerome says to Rusticus in On Penance, Distinction III: "Seven times in a day the just man falls and rises again." If just, how does he fall? If he falls, how is he just? But he does not lose the designation "just" who always rises again through penance, and not only seven times but seventy-seven times.

The Gloss expounds this fall or lapse in three ways. In one way, for adversity, and then he is said to fall from prosperity. In a second way, for mortal sin, and then he falls from charity. In a third way, for venial sin, and then he falls from a certain purity. A determinate number is placed for an indeterminate one.

The same Jerome says in On Penance, Distinction I: Because the divine nature is clement and loving, and more inclined toward indulgence than vengeance, if anyone after a fall into sins turns himself to true penance, he will quickly obtain pardon from the merciful Judge. The same author says: "The second plank after shipwreck is simply to confess one's fault."

Section VII: On God's mercy and clemency toward penitents

Jerome says to Rusticus, as found in Distinction XCIII, The Deacons: God's moderation and loving-kindness seek only our return, and by his long goodness he desires to save us. But if we are not converted, if we are hard-necked, if we persevere in sins until death, God does not have mercy upon those continually sinning.

The same Jerome says in On Penance, Distinction I, The Importunate Woman: In the Gospel a woman at last merited to be heard, and, although the door was closed with its bars, at midnight a friend received loaves from a friend. God himself, who cannot be overcome within himself by anyone's powers [read: cannot be overcome by any powers arrayed against him], is overcome by the publican's prayers. The city of Nineveh, which had perished by sin, stood firm through tears.

Why have these things been repeated in so long an introduction? So that you who are great may look upon the little one; so that you who are a rich shepherd may not despise a sick sheep. Christ took the thief from the cross into paradise and, lest anyone think conversion too late, made the punishment for homicide a martyrdom.

Christ, I say, joyfully embraces the returning prodigal son; and, leaving the ninety-nine sheep in the desert, the one little sheep which had remained is carried back upon the shoulders of the Good Shepherd. But when the sinner, recognizing his wound, has handed himself to the physician to be healed, there a rod is not necessary, but the spirit of gentleness. Thus far the quotation.

The same Jerome says upon Daniel in On Penance, Distinction I: For this reason God speaks of himself as threatening evils upon a nation, and if it does good—namely, by repenting—his clemency changes the threats. Again he asserts that he promises good things, and if it does evil, he says that he changes his sentence—not against human beings, but against their works, which have been changed. For God is not angry with human beings, but with vices; when these are not in a person, he by no means punishes, because the person has been changed.

And below: When Daniel, foreknowing future things, expresses doubt concerning God's sentence, saying to Nebuchadnezzar, "If perhaps God may forgive your sins," those who boldly promise pardon to sinners act rashly. Nevertheless, pardon is promised to Nebuchadnezzar if he does good works.

The same author says upon the Book of Judges in On Penance, Distinction I: Behold the benign Lord, mingling mercy with severity and weighing the measure of the punishment itself with a just and clement balance. He did not hand the delinquents over to punishment perpetually in the present, but for as much time as they served Cushan-Rishathaim, that is, for eight years.

Learn, therefore, O hearer, whoever you are who are conscious to yourself of some error: for as much time as you know that you have erred, for as much time as you have sinned, for so much time nevertheless humble yourself to God and make satisfaction to him by the confession of penance. Do not wait until Cushan-Rishathaim humbles you—that is, until the necessity of fear extorts penance—but yourself forestall the harshness of these torturers. For if you amend yourself, if you correct yourself, he is loving and merciful, and tempers vengeance toward the one who forestalls it by repenting.

And let us consider this: that not before they cried out, but after they cried out to the Lord, he raised up a savior for them.

The same author says upon Exodus in On Penance, Distinction I, And He Came: All things which the saints do, they do in the sight of God; but sinners flee from the sight of God, as Cain did. If the saints eat and drink, they do so in the sight of God, as is said here concerning Aaron when he came to eat with Moses's father-in-law. All things which they do, they do in God's sight, even if they have sinned, as did the one who said—namely, David—"I have done evil before you." For to do evil in God's sight is to repent quickly concerning what has been committed; but to flee from God's sight is not to be converted and not to do penance.

The same Jerome says in On Penance, Distinction I: The canons do not set a measure of time for doing penance sufficiently clearly for every crime, so that it might be said concerning each how each one is to be amended; rather, they decree that it be left to the judgment of an understanding priest. For before God the measure of time does not avail so much as that of sorrow, nor abstinence from foods so much as the mortification of crimes. On this account they command that the times of penance be shortened according to the faith and manner of life of the penitents, and judge that they should be prolonged according to negligence.

Section VIII: Why excommunication is imposed by the Church

Excommunication is imposed by the Church so that the sinner who had been excommunicated by God through sin may return to penance.

Jerome says upon the Book of Judges, as found in Cause XI, Question III, Hear: As it seems to me, even now human beings are handed over from the Church into the power of the devil in two ways. In one way, when a person's offense is manifest to the Church and through God's priests he is expelled from the Church, so that, marked by everyone, he may be ashamed and, being converted—that is, coming to penance—it may happen that his spirit is saved.

In another way, someone is handed over to the devil when his sin is not manifest to human beings, but God, who sees in secret, beholds his mind and soul serving vices and passions, and sees that in his heart he does not love God, but avarice, lust, vainglory, and other things of this sort. The Lord hands such a man over to Satan, because he departs from his mind, turns himself away, withdraws from his malignant thoughts and desires, and leaves his house empty. Thus far the quotation.

Those who are evil—that is, who persist in evil—are not to be brought into the Church through baptism. But if those already existing in the Church have manifest evils and are incorrigible, they are to be cast out of it through excommunication. If they are not notorious, they are to be tolerated in the Church, but with caution.

The same author says in the same place: I beseech you who are faithful to preserve your life and manner of conduct, lest in anything you either suffer scandal yourselves or cause scandal to others. Rather, let it be for you a matter of the greatest zeal and the greatest caution that no polluted person enter this congregation of saints, that no Jebusite dwell among you. "Jebusite" is interpreted "trampling."

Therefore, since we cannot cast out those who trample us—namely, those whose sins are hidden—let us at least cast out those whom we can, namely, those whose sins are manifest. For where there is no evident sin, we cannot cast anyone out of the Church, lest perhaps, uprooting the tares, we uproot the wheat with them.

The Jebusites—that is, those who trample—are in the Church, whom the children of Israel were not able to cast out. Neither can we do so spiritually with those who unworthily hear the word of God and, when they have heard it, neither depart as unbelievers nor remain as faithful people, but, having received knowledge of the mysteries and searched more secret matters of the faith, turn and attack us and rend the words of the Lord, staining the pearls that are the ornaments of faith. Thus far the quotation.

Jerome says upon Joshua, as found in Distinction XLV: The great loss that follows from the omission of correction when it ought to be made must not be passed over idly. When one man, namely Achan, sinned, the wrath of God came upon the whole people.

This happens when the priests who preside over the people wish to appear benevolent toward delinquents and, fearing the tongues of sinners lest perhaps they speak badly of them, forget priestly severity and refuse to fulfill what is written: "Rebuke the sinner before all, so that the others may have fear"; and again: "Take away evil from among yourselves." Nor, kindled by zeal for God, do they imitate the Apostle saying, "I have handed such a man over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh," nor that Gospel saying, "If your brother sins against you," and so forth.

While they spare one, they contrive the destruction of the whole Church. What is this goodness? What is this mercy: to spare one and bring all into danger? For the people are polluted by one sinner, just as the whole flock is infected by one diseased sheep.

Concerning sins of this sort—namely, manifest ones—that saying of Jerome in Cause XXIV, Question III is also understood: "Putrid flesh must be cut away, and a scabbed sheep driven from the folds, lest the whole house, mass, body, and flock burn, be corrupted, putrefy, and perish."

But where someone sins from passion and recognizes himself, one must act benignly and mercifully with him. Of such a person is to be understood what the same Jerome says upon Jeremiah, in Distinction XLV: "They say, 'Depart, you polluted ones; depart, go away, do not touch us, do not communicate with us.' Such speech does not illuminate the blind, heal the sick, or cure the infirm, but rather kills and finally casts him into the danger of despair."

Good rulers, weighing the infirmities of others from their own infirmity, strive more by the relief of humility and gentleness to rescue sinners from the snare of error than by austerity to drive those tottering into the pit of perdition. Hence the Teacher of the Gentiles says: "I became weak to the weak."

Section IX: On God's scourges which contribute to salvation

Jerome says upon Nahum, as found in Cause XXIII, Question V:

"Why, therefore, do you devise things against the Lord?" He who created the world will also make its consummation. If he seems to you cruel, rigid, and bloody—he who destroyed the human race in the flood, rained fire and sulfur upon Sodom and Gomorrah, submerged the Egyptians in the waves, and laid low the corpses of the Israelites in the desert—know that he rendered punishments in the present so that he might not punish eternally.

If the things which the prophets seem to say concerning the Lord's severity are true, they themselves said: "God will not judge twice for the same thing in tribulation." But if they are false, then what is said is also false: "A double tribulation will not arise." If it is true that God will not judge twice for the same thing, therefore those who have been punished will not afterward be punished. Accordingly, those who perished in the flood, the Sodomites, the Egyptians, and the Israelites received their evils in their own life.

But understand this, according to the doctors, only concerning those who were pierced with compunction amid the scourges themselves.

If anyone objects that, according to these words, if someone is punished in the present, he will not be punished in the other life, because God does not judge twice for the same thing, and thus it should be desired for adulterers and other criminals that by a brief and swift present punishment they escape eternal torments, Jerome answers: God knows the measures of all things, and likewise of punishments; the sentence of the Judge cannot be forestalled, nor can the power to exact punishment from the sinner thereafter be taken from him, and a great sin is expiated by great and long torments.

But if someone has been punished like the man who had gathered wood on the Sabbath, such a person is not punished afterward, because his lighter fault has been compensated by a present punishment.

Jerome says upon Malachi, in Distinction L, And He Will Purge the Sons of Levi: "For it is time that judgment should begin from the house of God." And elsewhere it is written: "Begin from my holy ones." Understand by the sons of Levi every priestly dignity.

If priests are to be purged and refined—namely, through tribulations—so that they may be found pure gold and silver, what must be said concerning the others? When they have been amended and refined, then they will offer just sacrifices to God, and their sacrifice which they offer for Judah and Israel—that is, for those who confess the Lord and behold his peace in their mind—will please God.

On heretics

Jerome says upon the Epistle to the Galatians, as found in Cause I, Question I: Marcion and Basilides and the other plagues of the heretics do not possess the Gospel of God, because they do not possess the Holy Spirit, without whom the Gospel that is taught becomes a human gospel. Nor should we think the Gospel to be merely in the words of the Scriptures, but in their meaning; not in the surface, but in the marrow; not in the leaves of the words, but in the root of reason.

The same author says upon Haggai: "Thus is this people of the heretics in my sight," says the Lord. Everything they do, everything they offer to me—whether vows, offerings for salvation, peace offerings, offerings for sin, or holocausts; whether through alms, fasts, or chastity of the body—will be contaminated in my sight. Although in its appearance it seems holy, nevertheless, because it is offered by one who is polluted in soul, all things are polluted. This is found in Cause I, Question I, insofar, namely, as it concerns salvation.

Jerome says to a certain Levite: There are two kinds of Christians. There is one kind which, bound to the divine office and dedicated to contemplation and prayer, ought to cease from every disturbance of temporal things, such as clerics and those devoted to God, namely, converts. For cleros in Greek means "lot" in Latin, because the Lord chose such people as his lot—that is, his portion.

And below: There is another kind of Christians, such as the laity. For laos in Greek means "people" in Latin. They are permitted to possess temporal things, but only for use—that is, not for enjoyment. For nothing is more wretched than to despise God on account of the least thing. They are permitted to take a wife, cultivate the earth, judge between man and man, plead causes, place offerings upon the altar, and render tithes; and thus they will be able to be saved if they avoid vices by doing good. This is found in Cause XII, Question I, Two.

Jerome says, as found in Cause VIII, Question I, that clerics ought to excel laypeople in goodness: What edification is there for the disciple if he understands himself to be greater than the master? Hence not only bishops, presbyters, and deacons ought to take great care that they excel in conduct and speech all the people over whom they preside, but also those of an inferior grade, such as readers, doorkeepers, exorcists, acolytes, and absolutely all who serve the house of God; because it vehemently destroys the Church of Christ for laypeople to be better than clerics.

Section X: That the better men ought to be assumed into prelacy

Jerome says upon Leviticus, as found in Cause VIII, Question I: Although the Lord had commanded and made his choice concerning the appointment of a leader, nevertheless the synagogue is also assembled. For in ordaining a priest, the presence of the people is also required, so that all may know and be certain that the one who is more excellent than all the people, who is more learned, holier, and more eminent in every virtue, is chosen for the priesthood.

And below: Furthermore, the fact that Moses assembled the whole synagogue signifies that all the powers of the soul ought to be collected into one in choosing a priest, so that all the powers of the soul may keep watch upon him and be attentive. Let nothing of wisdom, nothing of knowledge, nothing of industry be lacking in them; rather, let the whole multitude of the senses be present, the whole congregation of holy thoughts.

The same Jerome says in the Book of Numbers, as found in Cause VIII, Question I, If Therefore So Great: The Lord says to Moses: "Take to yourself Jesus, the son of Mary, and place your hand upon him," and so forth. Hear how manifestly the ordination of the leader of the people is described. There is no acclamation of the people here, no consideration of blood relationship, no regard for kinship. Let the inheritance of fields and estates be left to relatives; but let the government of the people be handed to the one whom God has chosen: namely, to such a man as possesses within himself the Spirit of God, before whose sight God's commandments stand, who is very familiar with Moses—that is, in whom is the clarity and knowledge of his law—so that the children of Israel may be able to hear him.

Against those who seek or become proud concerning prelacy, the same Jerome says in Cause VIII, Question I: This is to be inferred against those who swell with pride concerning the episcopate and think that they have obtained not the stewardship of Christ but a dominion; for they are not immediately better than all those who were not ordained bishops, nor should they consider themselves more approved from the fact that they themselves were chosen.

If the sins of sons rightly bar a person from the episcopate, how much more does each man, considering and knowing himself, withdraw himself from this, knowing that the powerful will powerfully suffer torments? He withdraws not so much from an honor as from a burden, and does not hesitate to leave the place for others who are more worthy.

Against evil rulers Jerome says in Cause VIII, Question I: Perhaps we say something boldly, yet we say what is written. A leader for the people and a judge for the Church is not always given by God's judgment, but according as our merits demand. If our acts are evil and we work malignant things, leaders according to our heart are given to us.

Hear, therefore, what the Lord says: "They made for themselves a king, but not through me; a prince, but not through my counsel." This saying seems to concern Saul, whom the Lord had chosen and had ordered to be made king. But because he had been chosen not according to God's will—namely, that of good pleasure—but according to the merit of the sinful people, God denies that he was appointed by his will or counsel.

And below: Let us understand that something of this kind also occurs in churches. If a people acts malignantly in God's sight, such a judge is given to the church under whom the people suffers hunger and thirst—namely, of hearing the word of God.

Section XI: That children are neither good nor evil by the quality of their parents, nor because they were begotten in marriage or fornication

Jerome says in the epistle against Rufinus, in Distinction LVI: To be born from adultery is not the fault of the one who is born, but of the one who begets. Just as among seeds the earth which cherishes does not sin, nor the seed which is cast into the furrows, nor the moisture and heat by which the tempered grain sprouts into a shoot, but, for example, the thief and robber who by fraud and violence carries off the seed; so the ground of human beings—that is, the womb—receives what is its own, cherishes what it has received, gives body to what it has cherished, distinguishes the embodied thing into members, and amid those narrow places of the secret belly the hand of God always works, the same Creator of body and soul.

Do not despise the goodness of the Potter who fashioned you and made you as he willed. He is the power of God and the wisdom of God who in the womb of the Virgin built a house for himself. Jephthah, numbered among the holy men by the Apostle's testimony, was the son of a prostitute. Esau, born from Rebecca and Isaac, rough in mind as in body, degenerates like good wheat into darnel and oats, because the cause of vices and virtues is not in the seeds, but in the will of the one who is born.

The same author says upon Matthew, in the same distinction: Our Lord Jesus Christ willed to be born not only from foreigners but also from adulterous unions, granting great confidence to us, so that, from whatever household we are born, provided that we imitate his footsteps, we are not separated from his body, whose members we have been made through faith.

On giving alms

Jerome, treating that saying of Malachi, "In tithes and firstfruits you pierce me, and in want you are accursed," says upon Malachi, in Cause XVI, Question I: Whenever famine, scarcity, and want of all things oppress the world, let us know that this descends from the wrath of God, who says that he is defrauded in the poor if they do not receive alms. We can also interpret tithes and firstfruits as his possession.

If anyone learned and instructed in the law of the Lord can instruct others, he ought not to assign what he possesses to his own prudence and talent, but should give thanks first to the Lord, who bestows all things, and then to his priests and ministers, by whom he was taught. Thus speaks he. And this is spiritually to give tithes.

Jerome says to Pope Damasus, in Cause XVI, Question I, concerning alms to be given by clerics and to whom they are to be given: Because whatever clerics possess belongs to the poor, and their houses ought to be common to all, they ought to keep watch over the reception of pilgrims and hospitality. They must take the greatest care that from the tithes and offerings they furnish to monasteries and hospitals such support as they wish and are able, and that among the poor they regard not so much poverty as religion.

The use of tithes and offerings, however, can in no way come to laypeople. According to the Gloss, this is understood concerning the right of receiving them, because that is spiritual; but concerning their fruits, these can be granted to them for a time.

On the disordered love of spouses

Jerome says against Jovinian, in Cause XXXII, Question IV: The origin indeed was honorable; the greatness of the love was deformed. It makes no difference from how honorable a cause anyone becomes insane. In the wife of another, every love is shameful; in one's own wife, excessive love is shameful. A wise man ought to love his wife by judgment, not by affection—that is, passion. The impulse of pleasure does not rule in him, nor is he carried headlong to intercourse. Nothing is more foul than to love one's wife as though she were an adulteress.

On usury

Jerome says upon Ezekiel, in Cause XIV, Question III: Certain men think that usury exists only in money. Foreseeing this, divine Scripture removes superabundance from every thing, so that by lending you may not receive more than you gave.

The same author says: Others are accustomed to receive little gifts of diverse kinds in return for money lent at interest, and do not understand that Scripture calls usury and superabundance whatever it is that a person receives in excess of what he gave.

Title X, Chapter VII

“Like the morning star in the midst of a cloud”

Like the morning star in the midst of a cloud, which shines more brightly than the other stars, especially when a cloud exists in the air and it precedes the sun about to rise, so the sacred prelate Ambrose, in Italy—most especially where the dense shadows of the Arian heresy existed—in his time shone beyond the others in the Church by doctrine and holiness, preceding in age and in the faith of the fathers the sun, Augustine.

Hence, over Ambrose himself after his death, when he had been placed upon a bier in the church, certain people saw a radiant star.

Jerome says in On the Twelve Doctors: Ambrose, seized upon the profound things of penance and a bird of the air, for as long as he goes forth into the deep, seems to take fruit from on high. All his opinions are columns of the faith and of the Church. Augustine says that not even an enemy dared to reprehend his faith and his most pure understanding in the Scriptures.

Paulinus, bishop of Nola, wrote his life.

This Ambrose, then, the son of Ambrose, prefect of Rome, while as an infant he had been placed in a cradle in the courtyard and was sleeping, was suddenly approached by a swarm of bees, which so filled his face and mouth that they appeared to enter and leave it as if it were their own little hive. Afterward, flying away, they were raised to so great a height in the air that they could scarcely be seen by human eyes.

Terrified by this event, his father said: “If this little child lives, he will be something great.”

Accordingly, educated in letters at Rome, while he pleaded causes splendidly in the praetorium, he was sent by the emperor Valentinian to govern the provinces of Emilia and Liguria.

When he had come to Milan, and there was then no bishop there because the bishop had died, the people assembled to provide a bishop for themselves. But when no small sedition arose between the Arians and Catholics concerning the choice of the bishop, Ambrose proceeded there for the sake of calming the sedition.

Immediately the voice of an infant thundered, saying: “Ambrose for bishop.” All unanimously assented to this voice, acclaiming Ambrose as bishop.

When he learned this, in order to deter them from it by terrors, he left the church, ascended the tribunal, and, contrary to his custom, ordered that tortures be applied to persons. Although he did this, the people nevertheless acclaimed: “Your sin be upon us.”

Then, troubled, he returned home and wished to profess philosophy, but he was restrained from doing this. He also caused public prostitutes to enter openly to him so that, when these were seen, he might turn the people away from choosing him, not so that he might be polluted with them.

But when he did not succeed even thus, and the people always acclaimed, “Your sin be upon us,” he sought flight at midnight. Although he thought that he was proceeding toward Ticinum, in the morning he was found at the gate of the city of Milan which is called the Roman Gate.

When he had been found and was being guarded by the people, a report was sent to the most clement emperor Valentinian. He received it with the greatest joy, because the judges sent out by him were sought for the priesthood. The prefect Probus also rejoiced because his word had been fulfilled; for, when Ambrose was departing and Probus gave him his commands, he had said: “Act not as a judge, but as a bishop.”

When, after hiding again, Ambrose had been found, since he was a catechumen and discerned God’s will in this, he was baptized and on the eighth day was raised to the episcopal see.

Hence Ambrose himself says in the epistle to the people of Vercelli: “A neophyte is forbidden to be ordained, lest he be raised up by pride. But if the humility fitting for the priesthood is not lacking, where the cause is not present, the vice is not imputed. Accordingly, the Westerners approved my ordination by judgment, the Easterners by example,” as found in Distinction LXI, in the paragraph By All These Things, where the Gloss says that the constitution ceases in this case—namely, so that a dispensation may be made concerning it.

Section I

When Ambrose had gone to a certain city for the ordination of a bishop, the empress Justina and other Arians opposed his choice, wishing one from their sect to be ordained. One of the Arian virgins, more imprudent than the others, ascended the tribunal and seized blessed Ambrose by his garment, wishing to drag him toward the women so that, beaten by them, he might be expelled from the church with injury.

Ambrose said to her: “Even if I am unworthy of so great a priesthood, nevertheless it is not fitting for you to lay a hand upon any priest whatsoever. Hence you ought to have feared God’s judgment, lest something happen to you.”

The outcome confirmed this saying. For on another day he conducted her dead body to the tomb, repaying kindness for her insult. This deed greatly terrified everyone.

Returning to Milan, he suffered innumerable snares and persecutions from the empress Justina, the Arian mother of Valentinian the Younger, who stirred up the peoples against him by gifts and honors.

When many Arians strove chiefly to send him into exile, one man, more unhappy than the rest, was stirred to such fury that he rented a house for himself next to Ambrose’s church for this reason: that he might keep a prepared carriage there, so that, with Justina procuring it, he might more easily seize Ambrose and carry him into exile.

But by God’s judgment, on the very day on which he thought to seize Ambrose, he himself was expelled into exile from the same house in that same carriage. Nevertheless Ambrose, returning good for evil, furnished him expenses and necessities.

At that time there were many in Milan possessed by demons, who cried out in loud voices that they were being tormented by Ambrose. But Justina and many other Arians, calumniating this report, said that Ambrose had procured men to say that, though possessed, they were being tormented by Ambrose.

Then suddenly one of those Arians, seized by the devil, began to cry: “Would that those who do not believe Ambrose were tormented as I am.” But they, confounded, killed the man by plunging him into a pool.

A certain heretic, a most vehement disputant, hard and unconvertible to the faith, while hearing blessed Ambrose preaching, saw an angel speaking into his ears the words which he preached to the people. When he had seen this, he began to defend the faith which he had persecuted.

A certain soothsayer summoned demons and sent them to Ambrose so that they might harm him. But the demons returned and announced that they could approach neither Ambrose himself nor even the doors of his house, because an unconquerable fire fortified that whole building, so that even those stationed far away were burned by it.

When the said soothsayer was being tortured by the judge on account of certain evil deeds of his, he cried that he was being tortured by Ambrose.

A demon released a certain demoniac as he entered Milan and invaded him again as he left the city. Asked why he had released the man when he entered the city, it answered that it had feared Ambrose.

On another occasion, when the devil cried through a man possessed by him that he was being tormented by Ambrose, the saint said: “Be silent, wretch, because Ambrose does not torment you, but your envy does, because you see human beings ascending there from which you, unhappy one, fell; for Ambrose does not know how to be puffed up.” Immediately the devil became silent.

When on a certain night someone, secretly introduced to Ambrose’s chamber by a price from Justina, had raised his right hand with a sword to strike him, his hand immediately withered.

On a certain day Ambrose came to the palace of Macedonius, master of the offices, to intercede for someone. But when he found the doors closed and could obtain no opportunity to enter, he said: “You also will come to the church, and, though the doors are not closed but open, you will not be able to enter.”

After some time Macedonius, fearing enemies who pursued him, fled to the church, but although the doors were open, he was unable to enter.

The exceedingly young son of a certain most illustrious man, Pansophilus, as Vincent relates in Book XVIII of the Mirror of History, suffered from an unclean spirit and was healed by the priest’s frequent prayer and imposition of hands.

Afterward, overtaken by a sudden infirmity, he breathed out his spirit. His mother, full of faith, lifted him up and placed him in the bed of the priest Ambrose while Ambrose was absent. When Ambrose returned and found the dead boy in his little bed, pitying the mother and contemplating her faith, like Elisha he placed himself upon the infant’s body and by praying restored him alive to his mother.

As Jacob of Voragine relates, when blessed Ambrose was proceeding to Rome and was lodging at a certain village in Tuscany with an exceedingly wealthy man, he carefully questioned him about his condition.

The man said: “My condition, lord, has always been fortunate and glorious. I abound in infinite riches. I possess very many servants and attendants and a numerous household of sons and grandsons. I have always had all things according to my wish, nor has anything adverse ever happened to me which might make me sad.”

Hearing this, Ambrose said to those who were with him: “Rise, and let us flee from here as quickly as possible, because the Lord is not in this place. Hurry, and make no delay in fleeing, lest divine vengeance seize us and involve us likewise in the sins of these people.”

When they had fled and proceeded a little distance, suddenly the earth opened and swallowed that man with everything belonging to him, so that no trace remained except a certain exceedingly deep pit.

Seeing this, Ambrose said to his companions: “Behold, brothers, how mercifully God punishes when he gives adversities here, and how severely he is angry when he always bestows prosperity.”

In a certain fortified town in the regions of the East, as Vincent relates from Paulinus where cited above, a synagogue of the Jews was burned by Christians because the Jews had insulted Christian monks. When the count of the East reported this deed to the emperor Theodosius, the emperor commanded that the synagogue be rebuilt by the bishop.

When Ambrose heard this command, he sent a letter to the emperor in which he urged him to revoke that decree. If Ambrose were not worthy to be heard, he would also not be worthy to be the one who was heard on the emperor’s behalf, or the one to whom the emperor entrusted his prayers and vows. He was prepared even to undergo death for such a matter, lest by his own dissimulation he make the emperor a transgressor who had commanded such unjust things against the Church.

Afterward, however, when Ambrose had returned from Aquileia, where he then was, to Milan, with the emperor in the church, he treated the same cause before the people. In that discourse he introduced the person of the Lord speaking to the emperor: “I made you an emperor from the lowest condition. I handed an army over to you. I established one of your seed upon the royal throne. And do you grant triumphs over me—that is, to my enemies?”

As Ambrose came down from the raised seat, the emperor said: “Bishop, today you have preached against us.”

Ambrose answered that he had spoken not against him but on his behalf. Thus he obtained the revocation of that decree. Nor would he approach the altar before the emperor testified upon his own faith that he ought to do this. Once that promise had been repeated upon his faith, Ambrose proceeded with the divine mysteries.

On a certain day, a man named Cresconius, when he had been ordered to be seized because of his crimes, fled to the church. He was seized and led out of the church by the soldiers of Stilicho, count of the East, notwithstanding the prohibition and defense of Ambrose together with his clerics.

But while Ambrose persevered in prayer with the clergy, suddenly, released by divine power, leopards, ascending with a swift leap to the place in which those who had triumphed over the church were sitting, left them grievously torn.

Seeing this, Stilicho was led to penance, so that for many days he made satisfaction to Ambrose; and he released that accused man of his who had been taken from the church.

Section III: Ambrose’s authority, manner of life, and death

From the foregoing, therefore, and also from those things said above in the preceding title concerning the correction exercised toward Theodosius, Valentinian, and Justina, it is clear that Ambrose was of the greatest authority and constancy, fearing no one.

He was also exceedingly devoted in the office. Hence he instituted a special office and chant in the church of Milan, which that church alone retains. He composed prefaces for almost all the feasts of the more celebrated saints.

He greatly sympathized with human falls. For, as Paulinus relates, when someone confessed his fall, Ambrose wept most bitterly, so that he compelled that man also to weep. Yet he was not so sympathetic and merciful that he left sins, especially manifest ones, unpunished.

Hence, when certain people presented a flagitious man to him, he said: “This man must be handed over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, lest he dare thereafter to perpetrate such things.” The devil immediately seized and tore him. This is also evident in the penance imposed upon the emperor Theodosius.

He was of such abstinence that he fasted daily except on the Sabbath, Sunday, and principal feasts, because the custom there was not to fast on Saturday and Sunday.

He was of the greatest chastity. For Jerome relates that he said: “We not only extol virginity, but preserve it.”

He was of such loving-kindness and sweetness that, when the death of any holy priest or bishop was announced to him, he wept so bitterly that he could scarcely be consoled. When he was asked why he thus lamented holy men who had proceeded to glory, he answered: “Do not think that I weep because he has departed, but because he has gone before us, and because it is difficult to find one who may be held so worthy of his office.”

He was of the highest liberality and mercy toward the poor. Hence he says in the book On Offices, in Distinction LXXXVI, chapter Not Enough: Let us sympathize with the sins or calamities of others. Let us aid the necessities of others as much as we can, and sometimes more than we can. For it is better to furnish reasons for mercy and suffer envy than to make a pretense of inclemency. We once incurred envy because we broke the mystical vessels in order to redeem captives.

Blessed Augustine, who was baptized by Ambrose, relates that he received three teachings from him. The first was that he should procure a marriage for no one, lest afterward the spouses, angered with one another, curse him as the mediator of their marriage.

The second was that he should not commend for military service anyone wishing to serve in the army. The reason for this is lest soldiers practice calumny and others cast the blame back upon him. But today military service ought to be dissuaded and, if it were possible, prohibited, because soldiers are free for nothing except robberies of friends and enemies and every flagitious deed.

The third was that, when invited to banquets, he should not attend, lest perhaps he exceed the measure of temperance.

Finally, when Ambrose saw avarice, the root of all evils, growing more and more, especially among the powers of the world and ministers of the Church, he groaned deeply and asked to be delivered more quickly from the dangers of this age.

Rejoicing, he revealed to the brothers that he had obtained this, saying that he would remain with them until the Lord’s resurrection. While he lay in sickness and dictated Psalm Forty-Four as a notary wrote, suddenly, as the notary watched, fire covered his head for a short time in the manner of a shield and entered through his mouth as though it were an inhabitant. Then his face was transformed like snow, but afterward returned to its former appearance.

While he labored in this illness, the count of Italy, who was at Milan, heard of it and summoned the nobles, saying that, when so great a man departed, there would be danger lest the destruction of Italy be imminent. He asked them to approach the man of God and beseech him that he obtain from the Lord a further span of life.

When Ambrose heard this from them, he answered: “I have not lived among you in such a manner that I am ashamed to live longer, nor do I fear to die, since we have a good Lord.”

At the time of his illness, four deacons assembled to discuss who would be good for ruling after his death. Although they were far from Ambrose’s bed, they named Simplicianus so softly that they could scarcely hear one another. From far away Ambrose cried three times: “He is old, but good.” Terrified at hearing this, they fled. Nevertheless, after his death they chose no other than Simplicianus himself.

Honoratus, bishop of Vercelli, when he had given himself to sleep, heard someone call him three times, crying: “Rise, because he is now about to depart.” Rising immediately, Honoratus gave him the sacrament of the Eucharist. After this Ambrose extended his hands in the form of a cross and breathed out his final spirit amid words of prayer. He flourished around the year of the Lord 390.

After his death, when a certain presbyter at a banquet disparaged the saint among others, a blow immediately struck him and ended his life.

When three bishops had assembled in the city of Carthage and one of them disparaged blessed Ambrose, what had happened to the presbyter who disparaged him was related. When that bishop regarded it lightly, he received such a wound, and an extreme one, that on that very day he ended his life.

Section IV: Books published by Ambrose

- One book On Paradise.
- Two books On the One Penance.
- One book On Flight from the World.
- Five books On the Trinity, to Gratian.

- Three books On the Holy Spirit.
- One book On the Incarnation of Christ.
- Six books On the Sacraments.
- One book On Pastoral Care.
- Three books On Offices.
- Three books On the Death of His Brother Satyrus.
- One book On the Consolation of Valentinian.
- One book On Choosing a Bishop, to the People of Vercelli.
- Six books on the Hexaemeron.
- One book On Noah's Ark.
- One book On Isaac and the Soul.
- One book On the Good of Death.
- Two books On Jacob and the Blessed Life.
- Two books On Holy Abraham.
- One book On Holy Joseph.
- One book On the Blessings of the Patriarchs.
- One book, an Apology on Holy David.
- One book On Elijah and Fasting.
- One book On Holy Naboth's Vineyard.
- Three books On Holy Virginity.
- Eleven treatises upon eleven Psalms.
- One book upon "Blessed Are the Immaculate."
- Ten books upon Luke.
- Fourteen books upon the fourteen Epistles of Paul.
- Two treatises On the Surrender of the Basilica.
- One treatise On the Death of Theodosius.
- One book On Widows.
- One book On the Creed, to the Newly Baptized.
- Four books On the Weakness and Interpellation of Man.
- Seventy-seven brief epistles to diverse persons.
- Seventy-five declamatory sermons.
- He also wrote the legend or passion of blessed Agnes and the finding of the bodies of Gervasius and Protasius.

Some things have been excerpted from these books, especially those transcribed in the decrees in various places.

It is said that Ambrose, upon the Epistle to the Corinthians, said that a woman departing from her husband because of fornication should either be reconciled or remain unmarried—that is, not marry another—but that the husband himself can take another when he dismisses his wife because of fornication.

Gratian says in Cause XXXII, Question I, According to That, that this was inserted into Ambrose's book by falsifiers, or says that it must be understood otherwise than the letter sounds, as he shows there.

Section V: On the sacrament of the Eucharist, that Christ is truly there

Ambrose says in the book On the Sacraments, and in On Consecration, Distinction II: “All things whatsoever the Lord willed, he did in heaven and upon earth,” and because he willed it thus, it was thus done. Therefore, although the appearance of bread and wine is seen, nevertheless after the consecration nothing other than the flesh and blood of Christ is to be believed.

Hence the Truth himself says to the disciples: “This is my flesh for the life of the world.” And, to speak more marvelously, it is plainly no other flesh than that which was born of Mary, suffered upon the cross, and rose from the tomb. This, I say, is that very flesh. Therefore the flesh of Christ which is still offered today for the life of the world is Christ; and when it is worthily received, eternal life is restored in us.

The same Ambrose says in the same distinction concerning its excellence: It is truly marvelous that God rained manna for the fathers in the desert, who were fed with daily food from heaven, whence it is said: “Man ate the bread of angels.” Consider now which is more excellent: the bread of angels, or the bread of Christ, which assuredly is the body of life?

That manna was from heaven; this is above heaven. That was of heaven; this is of the Lord of the heavens. That was liable to corruption if it were kept for another day; this is alien to every corruption. Whoever tastes it religiously will not be able to experience corruption.

Water flowed for them from the rock; for you, blood from Christ. Water satisfied them for an hour; Christ’s blood washes you forever. The Jew drank and thirsted; when you drink, you will not be able to thirst. That was in shadow; this is in truth. But light is more powerful than shadow, divinity than figure, and the body of the Author than manna from heaven.

Perhaps you say: “I see something else. How do you assert to me that I receive the body of Christ?” This remains for us to prove. How many examples, therefore, do we use to prove that this is not what nature formed, but what the blessing consecrated, and that the power of the blessing is greater than that of nature, because by the blessing nature itself is changed?

Moses held a rod in his hand. He cast it down, and it became a serpent. Again he seized the serpent’s tail, and it returned to the nature of a rod. You see, therefore, that by prophetic grace the nature of the serpent and of the rod was changed twice.

He also places many other examples: the waters of Egypt, which were turned into blood by Moses’s word and afterward into their former nature; the waters of the Red Sea and the river Jordan, which stood still or were turned backward; the most bitter waters which were sweetened when wood was cast into them; the rock which, struck with the rod by Moses, gave waters; the iron which, shaken from its handle and sunk in the depth of the water, floated and entered its handle at Elisha’s command; and the fire coming from heaven at Elijah’s prayers.

He adds: You have read concerning the works of the whole world that “he spoke, and they were made” from nothing. Therefore, can the Word which was able to make from nothing what did not exist not change the things which exist into that which they were not? For it is no less to give new natures to things than to change them.

But why do we use arguments? Let us use his own examples and be strengthened by the truth of the mystery of his incarnation. Did the customary order of nature precede when the Lord Jesus was born of Mary? If we seek the order of nature, a virgin generated. And this body which we confect is from the Virgin. Why do you seek the order of nature in Christ’s body, since Christ himself was born of the Virgin beyond the order of nature? It was assuredly the true flesh of Christ which was crucified and buried. The Lord himself cries: “This is my body.” Thus far the quotation.

The same author says in the same place, in On Consecration, Distinction II: It is ordinary bread upon the altar before the words of the sacraments. When consecration comes, from bread it becomes the flesh of Christ. Consecration is made by Jesus’s words. For the priest does not use his own discourses, but the discourses of Christ. What is Christ’s discourse? This by which all things were made. For the Lord commanded, and heaven, earth, sea, and the other things were made.

Concerning baptism the same Ambrose says in the same book On the Sacraments, in On Consecration, Distinction IV: Through the water of baptism there is a passage from earthly to heavenly things. Therefore Passover is called a passage. This is a passage from sin to life, from fault to grace, from pollution to sanctification. He who passes through this water does not die but rises again.

Not every water heals, but that which possesses the grace of Christ; water does not heal unless the Holy Spirit first descends.

The same Ambrose says in Cause I, Question I: The baptism of the faithless does not heal; it does not cleanse, but pollutes those who will not approach God in the flood of waters. For, as is said through the Apostle, whatever is not from faith is sin, and it not only does not profit those who perform it and those for whom they perform it, but is unto judgment.

Gratian says in the following paragraph that Ambrose speaks concerning the baptism of those heretics who in baptizing do not preserve the Church’s form, such as the Arians and Sabellians.

The same Ambrose says upon the Epistle to the Romans, in On Consecration, Distinction IV: The grace of God in baptism requires no groaning, no lamentation or any work, but faith alone, and forgives all things freely. According to the Gloss, this is understood concerning exterior penance—that is, satisfaction.

Section VI: On penance

Ambrose says in On Penance, Distinction I: No one can properly do penance except one who has hoped for indulgence. But God excepts no crime, since he has forgiven all sins.

And in the following chapter: The Lord willed the right of loosing and of binding to be equal, for he permitted each under an equal condition. Therefore he who does not possess the right of loosing does not possess that of binding either.

It is certain that the Church possesses both. Heresy possesses neither.

The same author says in the same distinction, There Are Those Who Think: You find more easily one who has preserved innocence than one who has fittingly done penance.

The same author says: Some seek penance so that they may wish communion to be restored to them immediately. They do not so much desire to loose themselves as to bind the priest. For they do not so much desire to strip themselves in their conscience as to clothe the priest with it. On account of these it was commanded: “Do not give what is holy to dogs,” and so forth. That is, the fellowship of sacred communion is not easily to be granted to unclean spirits—namely, to those persisting in sins—as found in On Penance, Distinction I.

Concerning contrition, Ambrose says in a Lenten sermon: Penance is to lament past evils and not again to commit things that must be lamented, as found in On Penance, Distinction III; that is, to propose not to commit them.

The same author says in On Penance, Distinction I, There Are Those Who Think: There is nothing which is of such great sorrow as that each person, placed beneath the captivity of sin, should remember whence he slipped and whence he fell, and that from that fair and beautiful intention of the divine creation he has flowed down to bodily and earthly things.

The same Ambrose says thus in the Apology of David, in On Penance, Distinction III: So great and powerful a king—namely, David—did not suffer the consciousness of the offense to remain with him even for a small moment after he was reproved by Nathan, but by a prompt confession and immeasurable sorrow he returned his sin to the Lord, saying: “I have sinned.”

And below: Finally, the sorrow of his innermost affection moves the Lord, so that Nathan said: “Because you have repented, the Lord has removed your sin.” The promptness of the pardon therefore declared that the penance—that is, the sorrow—had been profound in the king, which carried away the offense of so great an error. Thus far the quotation, namely, concerning fault and eternal punishment.

Concerning confession, the same author says in the book On Paradise, in On Penance, Distinction I: No one can be justified from sin unless the sin has first been confessed—that is, at least in the purpose of the mind.

The same author says in a Lenten sermon: Behold, now the acceptable time is present, in which confession liberates the soul from death; confession opens paradise; confession grants the hope of being saved. Hence Scripture says: “Tell your iniquities, that you may be justified.”

The same author says in the book On Paradise: “The serpent deceived me, and I ate,” Eve said to the Lord when he inquired. A fault followed by confession of offenses is venial—that is, worthy of pardon. Therefore the woman who was not silent before God but rather confessed her sin is not without hope; a curative sentence followed her, as found in On Penance, Distinction I, The Serpent.

Concerning satisfaction, Ambrose says in the sermon for the Sunday of Abraham: The medicine of mercy removes great sins. We have many aids by which we may redeem our sins. You possess money; redeem your sins. The Lord is not for sale, but you are for sale. You have been sold to your sins; redeem yourself by your works. Your money is cheap, but mercy is precious. “Alms,” says Scripture, “liberates from sin,” as found in On Penance, Distinction I.

The same author says in the book On Penance, in the same distinction: Immediately after his fault God cast Adam out of paradise. He did not delay, but immediately separated him from the delights so that he might do penance. Immediately he clothed him with a tunic of skins, not silk.

The same author says in the same place: God made no limitation, since he promised his mercy to all and granted to his priests, without any exception, the authority to grant remission. But those who aggravate their fault should also aggravate their penance—that is, make it greater. For greater crimes are washed away by greater weeping, as found in On Penance, Distinction I, God.

When Ambrose himself says in the book On the One Penance that, if there is one baptism, so also there is one penance, this is understood according to Gratian, in On Penance, Distinction III, of solemn penance, which was performed only once; concerning this, see Distinction L, At the Head.

Section VII: On the virtues

Ambrose says in the Hexaemeron: That soul is painted by God which possesses within itself the shining grace of the virtues and the splendor of loving-kindness. That soul is well painted in which the likeness of divine operation shines. That soul is well painted in which there is the splendor of glory and the image of the Father's substance. According to this image, in which the precious painting shines, Adam was painted before sin; but when he fell, he put it aside, as found in On Penance, Distinction II, That Soul.

The same author says in the book On Flight from the World: To be like God is to possess justice, wisdom, and to be perfect in virtue, as found in On Penance, Distinction II.

Likewise Ambrose says in Cause XXXII, Question I: When wickedness is renounced, virtue is immediately adopted. For the departure of malice effects the entrance of virtue. By the same endeavor by which crime is excluded, innocence is joined.

The same Ambrose says in On the Blessed Life: The wise man is never empty. He always possesses within himself the covering of prudence, who can say: "I put on justice; I clothed myself with judgment." These are the inner garments of the mind, which no one else can take away unless someone strips himself by his own fault. Thus Adam, stripped in this manner, was found naked, as found in On Penance, Distinction II.

The same author says in the book On Paradise: That shepherd of the Gospel is read to have carried the fallen sheep, not cast it away. Solomon also says: "Do not be excessively just." For moderation ought to temper justice. For how will the one whom you hold in disgust offer himself to you to be healed, if he thinks that he will be an object of contempt rather than compassion to his physician? This is found in On Penance, Distinction I, The Serpent.

The same Ambrose says in the book On Offices: There is also an unjust mercy, concerning which it is written in the law regarding a certain man: "You shall not have mercy upon him." In the Books of Kings it is read that Saul contracted an offense because he had mercy upon Agag, king of the enemies, whom the divine sentence had forbidden to be preserved.

And below: The form of justice must especially be maintained, lest anyone withdrawn from the fellowship of communion on account of a crime extort from the priest's facility, by a brief little tear prepared for the moment or even by more copious weeping, a communion which he ought to seek for very many periods. Does he not, when he grants indulgence to one unworthy person, provoke all to the contagion of falling? For facility of pardon supplies an incitement to delinquency, as found in Cause XXIII, Question IV, There Is an Unjust Mercy.

The same Ambrose says in the sermon beginning More Bitter: A father does not always kiss his son, but sometimes chastises him. Therefore, when the one who is loved is chastised, loving-kindness is then exercised toward him. For love possesses its own blows, which are sweeter when inflicted more bitterly. Religious chastisement is sweeter than flattering remission, as found in Cause V, Question V, He Is Not Kissed.

The same Ambrose says upon "Blessed Are the Immaculate": Let him judge concerning another's error who does not possess in himself something which he condemns. Let that man judge who is led to pronounce by no hatred, offense, or levity.

And a little afterward: A good judge does nothing from his own decision or the private purpose of his will, but pronounces according to laws and rights. He brings forward nothing prepared or meditated from home, but judges as he hears, decides according to the nature of the matter, obeys the laws rather than opposing them, examines the merits of the cause, and does not change them, as found in Cause III, Question VII, Let Him Judge.

The same author says in the book On Offices: Fortitude which in war protects the fatherland from barbarians, or at home defends the weak, or protects companions from robbers, is full of justice, as found in Cause XXIII, Question III.

The same author says: The law of virtue is not to inflict injury, but to drive it away. For he who does not repel injury from a companion when he is able is as much at fault as the one who inflicts it. This is found in the same place.

The same Ambrose says in the sermon beginning Divine, to the Father, and in Distinction XXXV: On the sixth day the beasts were created, and with the beasts arose the power of eating and the use of foods. Where food began, there the end of the world was made. There it began not to know its own increase, where divine things began——where the divine works concerning it began to rest. By this judgment it is declared that the world was diminished through the foods through which it ceased to be increased.

And below: That we may know fasting not to be new, he established there the first law concerning fasting.

And below: Until then no one had known how to transgress, and that which is the first transgression had not yet arisen. The fast of abstinence was enjoined; the law was from the Lord God, the transgression of the law from the devil; the fault through food, the hiding place after food; the knowledge of infirmity in food, the strength of fortitude in fasting. The serpent counsels gluttony; the Lord decrees fasting. Therefore gluttony expelled the wanderer from paradise; abstinence recalled the wanderer to paradise. Thus far the quotation. And he adds beautiful things concerning sobriety and drunkenness.

On liberality and mercy

The same Ambrose says in the book On Offices: Perfect liberality is commended by faith, cause, place, and time, so that it first works toward the household of the faith.

For it is a great fault if, with your knowledge, a faithful person is in want; if you know him to be without means, to endure hunger, to suffer misery, especially when he is ashamed to be in want; if he has fallen into a cause either of captivity or calumny and you do not aid him; if he is in prison, under punishments and torments, and, although just, is tortured on account of some debt. For although mercy is owed to all, it is owed more to the just man.

If in the time of his affliction he obtains nothing from you; if in the time of danger, when he is being dragged to death, your money avails more with you than the life of the one about to die.

And below: That liberality also is to be approved by which you do not despise the neighbors of your stock if you know them to be in need. Weakness also must be considered, and sometimes modesty, which reveals noble birth.

It is also beautiful liberality to preserve measure even in the gift itself, so that you may abound for more people, not to pour out beyond measure for the sake of winning favor. Do not undertake superfluous buildings, nor omit necessary ones; adorn God's temple with fitting honor; give to pilgrims as much as is necessary, not superfluities.

And below, the same author says upon Luke: The practice of mercy is common. Therefore it is a common precept, necessary to every office and every age, and to be rendered by all. The publican is not excepted, nor the soldier, the farmer or city-dweller, the rich or poor; all are moved in common to contribute to the one who does not possess. For mercy is the fullness of the virtues, and therefore the perfect form of virtue is prescribed to all, as found in Distinction LXXXVI, Not Enough.

The same author says in the book On Offices: The Church possesses gold, not to preserve it but to expend it and assist necessities. For what need is there to guard that which helps nothing? Or do we not know how much gold and silver the Assyrians carried away from the Lord's temple?

Is it not better for a priest to melt it down for the sustenance of the poor, if other aids are lacking, than for a sacrilegious enemy to contaminate and carry it away? Will not the Lord say: "Why did you suffer so many needy persons to die of hunger? Why were so many captives led into commerce and not redeemed, and killed by the enemy? It would have been better that you preserve vessels of living beings than vessels of metals."

To these things you cannot return an answer. For what will you say? "I feared lest adornment be lacking to God's temple." He answers: The sacraments do not seek gold, nor do things which are not purchased with gold please by gold. The redemption of captives is the adornment of the sacred things. Those truly are precious vessels which redeem souls from death. That is the true treasure of the Lord which works what his blood worked, as found in Cause XII, Question II, Gold.

The same author says in On Flight from the World: He whose portion is God ought to love nothing except God, lest he be hindered by the duty of another necessity. For that which is contributed to other offices is taken away from the worship of religion and from this office of ours. This is the true flight of a priest: the renunciation of his household and a certain alienation from those dearest to him, so that he who desires to serve God may deny himself to his own, as found in Cause XII, Question I, He Whose.

The same author says in the book On Offices: Finally, if one person cannot be assisted unless another is injured, it is more fitting to help neither than to burden the other.

And below: It belongs to a priest to harm no one and to wish to benefit all; but to be able to do so belongs to God alone, as found in Cause XXIII, Question IV, Finally.

The same Ambrose says in the book On Offices, as found in Cause XXII, Question IV: "The innocent believes every word." His easiness is not to be censured, but his goodness praised. To be innocent is to be ignorant of what may harm. Even if he is circumvented by someone, he judges well concerning all, since he thinks faith to exist in all.

Inclined by this gift of his mind, Joshua believed the Gibeonites, established a covenant of God, gave peace, and confirmed fellowship. When the fraud was discovered, the people began to be indignant. Joshua, nevertheless, did not judge that the peace which he had given should be revoked, because he had confirmed it by the sanctity of religion.

The same author says in the same place: Let no one promise anything dishonorable. Or, if he has promised it, it is more tolerable not to do what was promised than to do what is shameful. All promises are not always to be fulfilled. Finally, the Lord God himself frequently changes his sentence, as found in Cause XXII, Question IV, Each One.

Section VIII: On diverse vices, and first on avarice

Ambrose, expounding upon Luke the example of that rich man whose field brought forth abundant fruits, says in Distinction XLVII: Just as those who through madness have been carried away in mind no longer see the things themselves but the phantasms of their passion, so also the mind of the avaricious person, once bound by the chains of cupidity, always sees gold, always silver, always calculates revenues. He regards gold more gratefully than the sun. His very prayer to God seeks gold.

Sometimes, by the most wicked art of usury, gold is even born from gold itself. But neither satiety nor an end will ever come to cupidity.

And below: But the avaricious man says: “What injustice is it if, while I do not invade the things of others, I guard my own more diligently?” O shameless saying! You call them your own. From which hidden things did you bring them into this world when you entered this light? When you came forth from your mother’s womb, surrounded, I ask, by what resources and supports did you enter?

And a little afterward: Let no one call his own what is common. More than would suffice for use has been obtained violently. Is God unjust, that he should not distribute equally to us the supports of life, so that you should be affluent and abounding while things are lacking to others and they are in want? Or did he do this rather because he willed to confer upon you proofs of his kindness and to crown another through the virtue of patience?

But you, after receiving God’s gifts and drawing them into your bosom, think that you do nothing unjust if you alone possess the goods of so many. For who is so unjust, so avaricious, as one who makes the food of many not his use but his abundance and delights?

For it is no less a crime to take away from one who possesses than, when you can and abound, to deny those who are in need. The bread which you retain belongs to the hungry; the garment which you shut away belongs to the naked; the money which you bury in the earth is the redemption of the wretched. Know, therefore, that you invade as many goods as you could furnish when you have the ability. Thus far the quotation. See the Gloss, which expounds certain obscure words, such as “what is common,” that is, what must be shared in a time of necessity.

Concerning simony, Ambrose says in the book On the Mysteries: When you were ordained bishop, what you gave was gold; what you lost was your soul. When you ordained another, what you received was gold; what you gave was leprosy—namely, the spiritual leprosy of sin and suspension.

The same author says: You did not receive grace when you were ordained, because you did not merit it gratuitously.

The same author says: Foul leprosy quickly follows Gehazi as his recompense, and money wickedly acquired contaminates body and soul. You see that through the deed of the originator—namely, Gehazi—the succession of the heir is condemned. Why, therefore, is the seed of Gehazi condemned forever, unless you understand the seed of vices rather than of lineage—that is, simoniacs? This is found in Cause I, Question I, When He Was Ordained.

Concerning usuries, he says in the book On Naboth, as found in Cause XIV, Question III: Many, fleeing the precepts of the law, when they have given money to merchants, exact usuries not in money but receive from their merchandise what are, as it were, the profits of usuries. Therefore let them hear what the law says: “You shall not receive usury of foods, nor of all things.”

The same author says: Food is usury, and clothing is usury, and whatever is added to the principal is usury; and by whatever name you wish to call it, it is usury. Understand this in a loan made beforehand with the principal intention of this.

The same author says in On the Good of Death, as found in Cause XIV, Question IV: If anyone receives usury, he commits robbery; he does not live life.

Against lust, Ambrose says in the book On the Patriarchs, as found in Cause XXXII, Question IV: Let no one flatter himself concerning human laws. What is not permitted to a woman is not permitted to a man. The same chastity which is required from the wife is required from the husband. Whatever is committed with one who is not a lawful wife is condemned by the crime of adultery.

The same author says in the same place: No one is permitted to know a woman besides his wife. Therefore the right of marriage has been given to you, lest you fall into a snare and sin with another woman. It is more tolerable if a fault lies hidden than if authority is usurped for the fault.

Against pride, Ambrose says in the book On Offices, as found in Cause XI, Question III: If anyone does not obey the bishop, desiring to raise and exalt himself and seeking also to overshadow the bishop's merits by a simulated affection for doctrine, humility, or mercy, he is led astray from the truth and grows proud. For this is the rule of truth: that you do nothing for the sake of commending yourself by which another is made smaller.

Nor, if you possess some good, should you exercise it for another's deformation and censure. Do not defend the wicked man, nor judge that holy things should be committed to the unworthy. Nor should you accuse and rebuke one whose crime you have not discovered.

Section IX

Ambrose says in the Hexaemeron, as found in Cause XV, Question I: Those things which proceed from our will must be guarded against: the offenses of youth and the irrational passions of the body. Therefore, of the things whose masters we are, let us not seek their beginnings externally or divert them onto others, but let us acknowledge as properly ours those things which we can avoid doing if we wish.

This is said concerning that which properly appears evil. For those things are not evil which neither entangle the mind with crime nor bind the conscience. Hence no wise man will call poverty, obscurity, sickness, or death evils, nor number them among the lot of evils.

The same author says in the book On the Blessed Life: There is no reason for us to ascribe our misery to anyone except our will. None of us is held in fault unless he has turned aside by his own will. Things inflicted upon those resisting do not possess guilt.

And below: Christ chooses a voluntary soldier for himself; the devil claims a voluntary servant for himself. He possesses no one bound by the yoke of servitude unless that person has first sold himself for the price of sins, as found in Cause XV, Question I, There Is Not.

The same Ambrose says: Marriages fill the earth; virginity fills paradise.

The same author says: Integrity of body is to be sought by us; I counsel it by advice, not command it by authority. For virginity alone can be counseled; it cannot be commanded, as found in Cause XXXII, Question I.

The same author says in the book On Paradise, as found in Cause XV, Question I, Nor He: Consider this also: when the impious man is killed, Christ is poured in; and where abomination is abolished, sanctification is consecrated, because the Lord said: "On that day when I killed every firstborn of Egypt, I sanctified to myself every firstborn of Israel," which is referred to every time.

The same Ambrose says near the beginning of his Pastoral: The honor and sublimity of the episcopate can be equaled by no comparisons. If you compare the splendor of kings or the diadem of princes with it, royal glory will be as far inferior to episcopal honor as lead is to the brightness of gold. For you see the necks of kings and princes submitted to the knees of priests, and, after kissing their right hand, they believe themselves fortified by their prayers, as found in Distinction XCVI, There Are Two.

The same Ambrose says in the Pastoral: Human beings first learn what they may teach. But I, taken from the tribunals to the priesthood, began to teach what I myself had not learned. Thus it is necessary to teach and learn at the same time, since there was no leisure to learn beforehand.

What, before all else, ought we to say except that we should be silent so that we may be able to speak? Let the tongue be subjected to the mind and possess reins by which it may be recalled to measure. Let it bring forth discourses weighed in the balance of justice, so that there may be gravity in meaning, weight in speech, and measure in words. For the devil lies in wait most especially when he sees passions of anger being generated within us.

I indeed love you whom I begot in the Gospel no less than if I had received you from marriage. For nature is not more vehement for loving than grace. Just as gravity is commended in old men, eagerness in young men, so modesty in adolescents is commended as a certain endowment of nature.

Modesty must be preserved in movement itself, gesture, and gait. For the disposition of the mind is discerned in the state of the body, and the motion of the body is a certain voice of the soul. There are those who, by walking slowly, imitate theatrical postures, so that whenever they move a step, they seem to preserve certain rhythms.

Nor do I judge it honorable to walk at a run, unless the cause of some necessity or danger requires it. If there is assuredly some defect in nature, let art amend it. We ought not only to speak nothing indecorous but not even to offer an ear to sayings of this sort, because the one whom hearing delights provokes another to speak.

Modesty also stands forth more in the beauty of the body itself, yet in such a way that the beauty itself is not produced but natural, simple, more neglected than elaborated, assisted not by costly and gleaming garments but by common ones.

Let nothing be added to its brightness. Let the voice itself be neither faint nor broken, sounding nothing feminine, but preserving a certain form, rule, and masculine vigor. Just as I do not approve a soft and broken sound of voice or gesture of body, so I do not wish to imitate a savage or rustic nature.

I judge that this chiefly befits ecclesiastical persons in the offices of ministers: to avoid the banquets of strangers, either so that they themselves may be hospitable to pilgrims or so that there may be no occasion for reproach.

There is no need for younger men to visit the homes of widows and virgins except for the sake of visitation, and this with elders—that is, with the bishop—or, if the cause is more serious, with a presbyter.

Why, O cleric, do you not expend upon reading those times in which you are free from the church? Why do you not revisit Christ, address Christ, hear Christ? We address him when we pray; we hear him when we read the divine oracles.

Although honorable jokes may be pleasant, nevertheless they are foreign to the ecclesiastical rule. I judge that not only excessive jokes but all jokes are to be avoided.

The same Ambrose says: So great is the splendor of honorableness that tranquillity of conscience and security of innocence make the life blessed. It is plainly blessed, because it is not estimated by the judgments of others but perceived by its own inward senses as its own judge. It neither seeks popular opinions for any reward nor fears them as punishment.

Goodness is popular and pleasing to all, and there is nothing which slips so easily into human senses. But who will commit himself to the counsel of one whom he does not think wiser than he himself is? Or how can you judge one superior in counsel whom you see inferior in conduct?

Shall I truly think him suitable to give me counsel which he did not give to himself, and believe that he has leisure for me when he has none for himself—whose soul pleasures occupy, lust conquers, avarice subjugates, cupidity disturbs, and agitation shakes? How is there a place of counsel here, where there is no place of quiet? Thus speaks he.

Title X, Chapter VIII

“Like the sun shining”

Like the shining sun, which is called the lord of the planets and the father of light, shining above all luminaries, delightful to the eyes, and looking through all things, so Augustine illuminated the Church: the jewel of the doctors, the father of theologians, sweet in eloquence, elucidating all subjects by penetrating them.

Hence Jerome says concerning him in the book On the Twelve Doctors: Augustine the bishop, flying over the peaks of the mountains like an eagle and not considering the things which are at the roots of the mountains, proclaims in clear speech the many regions of the heavens, the positions of the lands, and the circuit of the waters.

Prosper says concerning him in the book On the Contemplative Life: Saint Augustine was acute in intellect, sweet in eloquence, skilled in secular literature, industrious in ecclesiastical labors, illustrious in daily disputations, composed in all his action, acute in resolving questions, circumspect in convicting heretics, catholic in expounding our faith, and cautious in expounding the canonical Scriptures.

Emicius also, after commemorating and praising Jerome and certain other doctors, concludes: Augustine surpasses all these by his intellect and knowledge. For although Jerome admits that he read six thousand volumes of Origen, Augustine nevertheless wrote so much that no one could copy his books even by writing day and night, much less find time to read them.

Volusianus also says concerning him that whatever Augustine happened not to know is lacking from the law of God. Devout Bernard likewise calls him the strongest hammer of the heretics.

Deservedly, therefore, like a shining sun, he shone in God’s temple by the splendor of most illustrious doctrine, the ardor of most fervent love, and the beauty of a most holy life.

Possidius, bishop of Calama, described this life, as Cassiodorus relates.

Augustine, therefore, was born in the African province, in the city of Carthage, from honorable parents: from his father Patricius, a gentile, and his most Christian mother, called Monica.

In his youth he was so fully instructed in the liberal arts that he was held to be a supreme philosopher and a most eloquent rhetorician. Because of his exceedingly great and acute intellect, he understood the books of the liberal arts almost by himself.

Hence he says concerning himself in the book of the Confessions: All the books of the arts which they call liberal, as many as I was able to read, I read and understood by myself, although I was then the most wicked servant of evil desires. Whatever there is of the art of disputing and speaking, whatever there is concerning the dimensions of figures, music, and numbers, I understood without great difficulty and with no human being handing it down.

You know, Lord my God, that speed in understanding and learning is your gift, but I did not sacrifice to you from it.

But because knowledge without charity inflates and does not edify, from the error of gentility he fell into the heresy of the Manichaeans. They posit two principles of things: namely, God as the author of invisible things and the devil as the author of visible things. They also assert that Christ’s body was not true but phantasmal—that is, aerial. Augustine remained in this error for nine years.

When he was now nineteen years old and a certain exhortatory book of Cicero concerning philosophy or the acquisition of wisdom came into his hands, he was greatly moved toward its teaching because it invited him to contempt of the world and devotion to wisdom.

Nevertheless, this restrained him and did not wholly seize him: that the name of Jesus Christ was not in that book. He had drunk in this name with his mother’s milk and retained it deeply. Whatever he read in which this name was absent, although polished and true, did not satisfy him.

The vanity of the world began to become vile to him, and he began to direct himself wholly toward study.

Nevertheless, by fornication he had a son named Adeodatus from a certain unattached woman. Adeodatus was afterward baptized with him and was of so acute an intellect that he was an object of admiration even to Augustine his father. But in his youth he was taken away from this light.

Augustine’s most devout mother, named Monica, now a widow after her husband’s death and persevering in great holiness of life, wept daily for her son’s error, praying continually for the hastening of his conversion.

One day, as Augustine himself relates in the book of the Confessions, while she prayed in grief, she saw herself standing upon a certain wooden rule. A certain exceedingly beautiful young man—namely, an angel—appeared to her and asked the cause of so great a sadness.

She answered: “I lament the perdition of my son Augustine.”

The young man said to her: “Be secure, because where you are, there he is.” Looking, she saw Augustine beside her upon that rule.

When, therefore, she was gladdened and had related these things to Augustine, he answered: “You are mistaken, mother. It was not said to you thus, ‘Where he is, there you are,’ but, ‘Where you are, there he is.’” On the contrary she said: “It was not said to me, ‘Where he is, there you are,’ but, ‘Where you are, there he is,’” because Augustine in turn was to be led to the right rule of the Catholic faith, in which his mother then was but he himself was not.

When his pious mother was persistent in seeking her son’s conversion, she approached a certain holy bishop, asking that he intercede for him and speak with him in order to lead him out of his error.

He answered: “He is still swollen by the novelty of that error, but by reading he will discover how great its impiety is.”

When she still pressed him with tears, he answered, overcome by her persistence: “Go secure; it is impossible that the son of so many tears should perish.”

After Augustine had taught rhetoric at Carthage for many years, hearing that study was conducted more quietly and more perfectly at Rome, he boarded a ship and departed for the City without his mother’s knowledge, lest she follow him. Many disciples assembled to him there, hearing his teaching. There also he became ill, while his mother was ignorant of it but prayed continually for his salvation, and he was very quickly restored to health.

At that time the Milanese asked Symmachus, prefect of the Romans, that some teacher of rhetoric be appointed for them. For this reason Augustine was sent there by him, where Saint Ambrose was then bishop. But his mother, unable to rest, followed him as far as Milan, although with much difficulty.

Section I

Augustine frequently heard Ambrose preaching, with much devotion. One day, in preaching, Ambrose discoursed at greater length upon such material, refuting that error by arguments so efficaciously that Augustine wholly cast that heresy out of his mind.

When his mother learned this from him, rejoicing greatly, she said to him: “I believe my God, because I shall not pass from this world before I see you a perfect Christian.” Hence she herself also venerated and loved Ambrose, having learned that Augustine had abandoned that error through his teaching.

Accordingly, although the way of Christ now pleased him, he was reluctant to go by it, doubting that he could endure the customs of the Christian religion. Reproaching himself, as is evident in the book of the Confessions, he said to himself: “How many boys and girls there are in the Church who serve their God in all chastity and obedience. Why do you stand in yourself and not stand? Cast yourself upon him, and he will receive you and heal you.”

The Lord also put it into his mind that he should go to a certain servant of God named Simplicianus, a man of great renown, because from his youth he had served God most devoutly and had experienced many things. He was already an old man, and divine grace shone in him. Augustine was to confer with him concerning the surges of his thoughts, so that he might consult him as to what manner of walking in God’s way would be suitable for one disposed as he was, on which one person went in one manner and another in another.

Simplicianus exhorted him to receive baptism, introducing to him the example of Victorinus, his greatest friend in the art of oratory, who, converted from gentility to Christ, entered a church full of people and did not blush publicly to confess his belief and recite the articles of the faith.

Strengthened, Augustine returned home. One day, while he was speaking in the courtyard of his house with Alypius, his dearest friend and fellow countryman, a certain acquaintance of theirs from Africa, named Nepotianus, arrived. He began to relate to them the marvels which had been published in his regions concerning the holiness of blessed Anthony the hermit, who had been unlettered and had died a little before.

Augustine, his face changed, said to Alypius: “What do we hear, Alypius? What do we suffer? The unlearned rise and seize heaven, and we with our branches of knowledge are plunged into the deep. Is it shameful to follow because they have gone before?”

Immediately pierced with compunction, he burned toward God at the examples of Anthony which he had heard from his life. Having left Alypius, he entered the garden of that house alone and placed himself beneath a fig tree. Letting loose the reins of his eyes and dissolved into weeping, he poured forth a great rain of tears of compunction, reproaching himself and saying: “How long, how long? Tomorrow and tomorrow? ‘Allow me now; allow me a little while.’ ‘Now’ had no measure, and ‘allow me a little while’ went forth at length. And you, Lord, how long? How long shall I place counsels in my soul?”

Concerning this delay of his he afterward complained very greatly in the same book of the Confessions, saying: “Late have I loved you, beauty so ancient and so new. Late have I loved you. You were within, and I was outside, and there I sought you; and, deformed, I rushed upon those beautiful things which you were. You were with me, and I was not with you. You called and cried out, and broke my deafness. You flashed and shone, and put my blindness to flight. You blazed and brought breath, and I pant for you. I tasted, and I hunger and thirst for you. You touched me, and I burned toward your peace.”

While, therefore, he wept most bitterly beneath that fig tree, he heard a voice saying to him: “Take up and read; take up and read.” His tears being restrained by this, he began to consider whether the voice heard was that of children singing for amusement around the garden wall. But when he could not remember having heard such a voice sung by children or others, he judged it to be what it was: namely, that voice formed by God.

Hence he returned to the place in the courtyard of the house from which he had withdrawn from Alypius. Finding there the book of Paul’s epistles which he had left upon the table when, unable to restrain his tears, he had withdrawn into the garden, he opened the book. Casting his eyes upon the first verse which occurred, he read: “Put on the Lord Jesus Christ.” Immediately, as though a light of security had been poured into him, all the shadows of doubt fled from him. He understood from those words that the Lord was telling him to put on the Lord Jesus Christ by receiving baptism, which he wholly determined that he would do.

Meanwhile a most violent pain of the teeth seized him so that he lost his speech. Therefore, since he could not speak, he wrote upon wax tablets that they should pray that the Lord might mitigate the pain. As they prayed with him, he immediately felt himself healed.

At last, when the paschal solemnity arrived, he was baptized by blessed Ambrose when he was already thirty years old, together with his son Adeodatus and his friend Alypius. Then, as it is related, Ambrose said, “We praise you, God,” and Augustine answered, “We confess you, Lord.” Alternately they composed that hymn itself to the end.

Wonderfully confirmed in the Catholic faith and filled with the greatest fervor of divine love, Augustine abandoned every hope and care of the world and also renounced the schools which he governed. Nor in those days was he satiated by the marvelous sweetness, as he himself says, of contemplating the height of the divine counsel concerning the salvation of the human race.

He says: “How much I wept at the hymns and canticles, moved by the voices of the sweet-sounding Church.” These had then been instituted to be sung in the church of Milan.

Speaking to the Lord in the said book of the Confessions, he says: “You, Lord, had pierced my heart with your charity, and I carried your words fixed through my inward parts. The examples of the servants of God whom you had made living from the dead, gathered into the bosom of my thought, burned and consumed my heavy torpor like devastating coals. O Jesus, my helper, how sweet it suddenly was for me to lack the delights of my vanities; and those things which I had feared to lose it was now a joy to dismiss. You cast them out from me, you true and highest delight. You cast them out and entered, sweeter than every pleasure, though not to flesh and blood; brighter than every light, more inward than every secret, and higher than every honor, but to those who are high in themselves [read: but not to those who are high in themselves].”

Section II

After these things, taking with him Nebridius and Evodius, his mother, and his son Adeodatus, he was returning to Africa. When he was at Ostia on the Tiber and they had disembarked from the ship to refresh themselves, they spoke with one another very sweetly concerning heavenly things.

Then she said to her son: “Now I delight in nothing in this life, since I see you, earthly happiness having been contemned, a servant of Christ.” His pious mother then became ill there, died, and was buried. At her passing he poured forth pious tears and poured forth devout prayers to God for her.

After his mother’s death Augustine returned to his own estates, where, attending to fasts and prayers with friends, he wrote books and taught the untaught.

When his fame became known, blessed Valerius, bishop of Hippo, caused him to be summoned to himself and, although he was unwilling, ordained him a presbyter as Augustine wept over so great an order. When people, as if consoling him, said that he was worthy of a greater honor, he answered that he therefore mourned because the presbyterate approached the episcopate, which he greatly fled. Hence he also avoided approaching any city lacking a bishop, lest it happen that he was taken up into that office.

Having therefore been made a presbyter, he immediately established a monastery of clerics and began to live according to the rule constituted under the holy apostles.

But because the aforesaid bishop Valerius, his ordainer, was a Greek and less learned in the Latin language and letters, he granted power to Augustine, who was most skilled in Greek and Latin, to preach to the people in his presence, contrary to the custom of the Eastern Church. And although many bishops disparaged this matter, the holy bishop did not care, provided that Augustine satisfied the people in what Valerius himself could not do so openly.

At the same time the presbyter Fortunatus was seducing very many by the cunning of the Manichaeans. Saint Augustine overcame him by disputing publicly. He also refuted Faustus, that great snare of the devil, and other Manichaean and Donatist heretics. On this account they laid snares for him and threatened him with death, since the heretics proclaimed among themselves that it was not a sin to kill their enemy, but that a remission of sins was to be had from it.

Valerius, fearing that at some time Augustine might be taken away from his church and given as bishop to another city—for at one time he would have been taken from him for this purpose had he not caused Augustine to go to a secret place so that he could not be found—obtained from the archbishop of Carthage that he himself should yield the episcopate and Augustine should be promoted as bishop of the church of Hippo.

Although Augustine had resisted very greatly, he was at last compelled to be made bishop and to govern the church of Hippo pontifically. Afterward he both said and wrote that it ought not to have been done that he was ordained while his bishop was living, because of a prohibition of a universal council which, after he was ordained, he learned. Hence afterward he took care in councils of bishops that all the statutes of the fathers ought to be made known by ordainers to those about to be ordained.

It is read that he afterward said concerning himself: “In no matter do I perceive the Lord to be so angry with me as in this: when I was scarcely worthy to be placed at an oar, I was placed at the stern-post, at the summit of the governance of the Church.”

Section III: Concerning his manner of life

His garments, footwear, and other adornments were neither too abject nor exceedingly splendid, but of a moderate and suitable habit.

It is also read that he said concerning himself: “I confess that I blush at costly clothing, and therefore, when it is given to me, I sell it, so that, because the garment cannot be common, its price may be common.”

The clerics of his church lived in common like regular canons, as is evident in Cause XII, Question I, I Do Not Wish, and the chapter Certainly. The order of regular canons is also said to have had its beginning from him. He also wrote for them the rule which very many religious profess today, such as the Preachers, the Hermits, the Servites, all regular canons, although they are of diverse religious orders, and others.

From this rule was transcribed the statement, “Do not call anything your own,” and so forth, in Cause XII, Question I. And that statement in Cause XXXII, Question V: “Not only by touch and affection but also by sight does desire for women both seek and become the object of desire,” and so forth. And that statement in Cause V, Question V: “Do not judge yourselves to be malevolent when you report the crime of another”—namely, from charity—and so forth.

And this statement to prelates, in Distinction LXXXVI: “When the necessity of discipline in restraining conduct compels you to say harsh words, it is not required of you that you ask pardon from your subjects,” and so forth. See there.

He always used a frugal and sparing table, and among vegetables and legumes he usually had meats on account of infirm guests. At that table itself he loved reading or disputation more than feasting. Against the plague of detraction he had this written upon the wall there:

> Whoever loves with words to gnaw the life of those absent,
> Let him know this table is unworthy for himself.

When certain bishops most familiar to him once loosened their tongue in detraction, he rebuked them so harshly that he said either those verses must be erased or he would withdraw from the table, unless they ceased from detraction.

He was always mindful of the poor and liberally furnished from the things which he was able to have. For if the people did not bring aid, he also ordered vessels belonging to the Lord, such as chalices and the like, to be melted down and given for the sake of the poor and captives, reporting that he had learned this deed from blessed Ambrose.

He provided for his blood relatives not so that they might possess riches, but so that they might either not be in need or be less in need. He had vessels not of silver, except spoons, but of wood, glass, marble, or earthenware—not on account of poverty, as though he could not have them, but on account of honorableness.

He never had a zeal for new buildings, avoiding in them the entanglement of a mind which he wished to be free so that he might be able to attend more fully to the Scriptures. Nevertheless he did not impede those wishing to build them, unless he perceived that it was being done immoderately.

He did not wish to buy a house, field, or villa. He rejected many inheritances left to him because, he said, they were owed rather to the children of the dead. Hence he himself also says in Cause XVII, Question IV: “Whoever wishes, after disinheriting his son, to make the Church his heir, let him seek another who will accept it than Augustine; indeed, God being propitious, he will find no one.”

He adds an example concerning what Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, did, according to the law of heaven, however, not of the forum.

He never permitted any woman—not even his own sister or the daughter of his brother, who likewise served God—to live with him. For he said that, although no suspicion of evil could arise concerning a sister or nieces, nevertheless, because such women could not exist without other persons necessary to them, and other women would come to them, the weaker could be moved to human temptations by those women or be weakened by the evil suspicions of human beings.

He never wished to speak alone with a woman unless some secret matter intervened. Therefore, says Gregory, great caution must be taken by us from this learned man. Distinction LXXXI, It Is Read.

He rarely wished to intercede for anyone by letters or words, recollecting that a certain philosopher, in consideration of his reputation, had not furnished many things to friends. He often said: “The power which is asked oppresses.” When he did this, however, he so tempered his style that he was not burdensome but merited to be heard by the civility of his composition.

He wished to hear cases between strangers more than between acquaintances, saying that he could freely discern what was unjust among them and make one of them a friend—namely, the one on whose behalf he rendered a judgment through justice. But among friends he would lose one—namely, the one against whom the judgment came.

He also praised very greatly those in whom there was a desire to die, and concerning this he frequently recited the examples of three bishops. Omitting two, he used to say that Cyprian reports concerning a certain bishop that, when he labored under a grave illness, he still prayed for health to be restored to him. A beautiful young man appeared to him, groaned with indignation, and said: “You fear to suffer and do not wish to depart. What shall I do with you?”

He was invited by many churches to preach the word of the Lord there, and by preaching he converted many from errors. Sometimes in preaching he made a digression from his subject and then used to say that the Lord had ordained this for someone’s advancement. This happened concerning a certain Arian merchant who, while hearing his preaching, was converted when Augustine turned aside from his subject and spoke against that heresy.

He himself also reports that, when his mother was with him at Milan and found that the faithful there did not fast on the Sabbath, although elsewhere she had been accustomed to fast, she began to waver within herself whether she ought to fast according to her former custom or not to fast according to the custom of the Milanese.

Accordingly, through her son Augustine she consulted Ambrose about what she ought to do. Ambrose answered him: “When I am at Rome, I fast on the Sabbath. When I am at Milan, I do not fast. So also you, at whatever church you arrive, preserve its custom, if you do not wish to be a scandal to anyone or anyone to you.” Distinction XII, That. This must be understood in those things which are not contrary to the commandments of God or the Church, or to one’s vow or rule.

Hence the same Augustine says in Book IV On Baptism: “This is plainly true, because reason and truth must always be preferred to custom. But if reason supports custom, nothing ought to be retained more firmly.” Distinction VIII, In Vain.

And he says to the presbyter Casulanus, in Distinction XI: “In those matters concerning which divine Scripture has established nothing certain, the custom of the people of God and the institutions of the elders must be held as law. And just as violators of divine laws, so transgressors of ecclesiastical customs must be restrained.”

In his days, namely around the year of the Lord 411, the Vandals, who were unbelievers and spared neither sex, order, nor age, occupied the whole province of Africa. At last they besieged with a powerful force the city of Hippo, where Augustine was bishop.

Under this tribulation Augustine led the most bitter and mournful life of his old age, when he saw some killed, others put to flight, churches widowed of priests, and cities with their inhabitants dispersed. Therefore, having called together the brothers, he said: “Behold, I have asked the Lord either to rescue us from these dangers, or to grant patience, or to receive me from this life, lest he compel me to see so many calamities. And behold, I have obtained the third thing which I sought.”

Hence, laboring with fevers in the third month of the siege, he lay down upon his bed. Understanding that the dissolution of his body was imminent, he caused the seven penitential psalms to be written out for him. Lying upon his bed, he recited them where they had been placed against the wall, weeping abundantly.

In order that he might attend to God more freely and that his intention might be impeded by no one, for the ten days before his departure he commanded that no one enter to him unless either a physician came in to him or refreshment was brought to him.

While he himself was held by illness, a certain infirm man approached him, asking that Augustine impose his hand upon him to recover health. Augustine said to him: “What is it, son, that you say? Do you think that, if I could do any such thing, I would not confer it upon myself?”

But when the man persisted, saying that he had been commanded by the Lord in a vision to approach Augustine and thus would recover health, Augustine, seeing his faith, prayed for him, and he was healed.

He healed many possessed persons and performed many other miracles. In Book XXII On the City of God he relates that two were liberated from a demon—through Augustine himself, as is believed, although he does not name himself.

Finally, when the dissolution of his body drew near, he left this memorial teaching: that no human being, of however excellent merit, ought to pass away without confession and the Eucharist. This he himself also did.

When he was brought to the final hour, with all the members of his body unharmed and his sight and hearing intact, in the seventy-sixth year of his age and the forty-fifth of his episcopate, while the brothers stood present and prayed, he slept with his fathers.

He made no testament, because the poor man of Christ had nothing from which to make one.

When the barbarian people occupied that whole land and profaned the holy places, Augustine’s body was secretly carried to Sardinia. Two hundred and eighty-three years after his passing, Liutprand, king of the Lombards, hearing that Sardinia had been devastated by the Saracens, brought the body of blessed Augustine from there at a great price and placed it, after it was translated, at Pavia.

Section IV: Concerning the books published by Augustine

As Vincent relates in Book XIX of the Mirror of History, the books, treatises, and epistles of Augustine extend to one thousand and thirty, so that this saying deservedly suits him: “He lies who professes to have read you whole.”

The principal books among them, however, both those of great volume and those of daily use, are these:

- The book On the City of God, divided into twenty-two books against the errors of the pagans concerning the worship of their gods. There he describes two cities: Jerusalem, or the Church, whose king is Christ and whose citizens are those virtuous by a true and living faith; and infernal Babylon, whose head and king is the devil and whose citizens are the reprobate. In the present life the elect are afflicted and oppressed by the evil, while the reprobate frequently flourish in worldly things. The love of God founded in humility builds the city of Jerusalem and grows even to contempt of self; but the love of self growing even to contempt of God builds infernal Babylon.
- Fifteen books On the Trinity.
- Thirteen books of Confessions.
- Seven books On Baptism, Against the Donatists.
- Three books To Marcellus, on the Baptism of Infants.
- Four books On Christian Doctrine.
- Four books On the Soul and Its Origin.
- Three books On Free Choice.
- Six books Against Julian the Pelagian.
- Three books Against the Epistle of Permenianus [i.e., Parmenianus].
- Three books Against the Letters of Petilian the Donatist.
- Four books Against Cresconius the Grammarian.

- Four treatises On the Creed.
- Twelve books On Genesis According to the Letter.
- Seven books of Questions on the Pentateuch.
- Seven books of Locutions on the Heptateuch.
- One hundred and fifty upon the Psalter, in which he expounds the whole Psalter.
- One hundred and twenty-four homilies upon John.
- Sixty-five treatises On the Words of the Lord.
- Twenty treatises On the Words of the Apostle.
- Ten homilies upon the First Canonical Epistle of John.
- One book upon the Epistle to the Galatians.
- One book upon the Epistle to the Romans.
- Two books On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount.
- Two books On Questions in Matthew and Luke.
- One treatise On the Agreement of Matthew and Luke in the Genealogies of the Lord.
- One treatise upon "Who shall find a valiant woman?"
- One book of Annotations on Job.
- One book On Christian Discipline.
- One book On Eighty-Three Questions.
- Two books On the Incarnation of Christ.
- One book On Faith and Works.
- One book To Valentinus, on Grace and Free Choice.
- One book to the same man and to the monks who were with him, On Correction and Grace.
- One book On Nature and Grace.
- One book On the Perfection of Justice.
- One book To Boniface.
- One book To Macedonius.
- One book On Seeing God, to Paulina.
- One book To Proba, a Religious Woman.
- One book On the Quantity of the Soul.
- One book On Continence.
- One book On Penance.
- One book On Patience.
- One book On Virginity.
- One book On the Good of Widowhood.
- One book On the Good of Marriage.
- One book On Adulterous Marriages.
- One book On the Ten Hearts [read: On the Ten Chords].
- One book On Divine Predestination.
- Two books Against the Adversary of the Law and the Prophets.
- One book On Lying.

- One book On the Grace of God.
- One book On Faith, to Peter.
- One book On Catechizing the Uninstructed.
- One book On the Presence of God, to Dardanus.
- One book On the Nature of the Good, Against the Manichaeans.
- One book called the Mirror.
- Four orations On the Concupiscence of the Flesh Against the Spirit.
- One book Against Five Kinds of Enemies.
- One book On Marriage and Concupiscence.
- One book On the Predestination of the Saints and Perseverance.
- One book On the One Baptism.
- One book To Aurelius, on the Work of Monks.
- One book On Purgatorial Fire.
- One book On the Nature of Demons.
- One book On the Praises of Charity.
- One book On the Care to Be Taken for the Dead.
- Two books On Diverse Customs, at the Inquiry of Januarius.
- One book On the Grace of the New Testament.
- One book On Questions of the Old Testament.
- One book On the Utility of Believing.
- One book On the Christian Life.
- One book On the Christian Combat.
- One book On True Religion.
- One book On Eighty-Eight Heresies.
- One book To the Presbyter Orosius.
- One book On the Error of the Priscillianists.
- Six books On Music.
- Thirty-two books Against Faustus the Manichaean.
- One Enchiridion to Laurence.
- Two books of Soliloquies.
- One book On the Immortality of the Soul.
- One book On the Blessed Life.
- Two books On Order.
- Three books On the Academics.
- One book On the Liberal Disciplines.
- One book To Count Julian.
- One hundred and fifty brief epistles to diverse persons.
- Two hundred diverse sermons.
- His epistles to Jerome also.
- One book, the Rule for the Institution of Canons.

- Two books of Retractions.
- One book On the Spirit and the Letter.

The titles of other works having been omitted, it is also reported, as Vincent says in the Mirror of History, that Augustine published the book entitled On the Soul and Spirit, which without doubt is most useful, elegant, and eloquent. But this book's style does not seem to me to savor of Augustine. Hence some report rather that it was excerpted and compiled as a compendium by Hugh of Saint Victor from diverse books of Augustine.

Augustine himself was very humble. Hence the same man says: "An old man may be taught by a boy. A bishop of so many years, I am prepared to be taught by a colleague who has not yet served a year." Cause XXIV, Question III, If You Have.

The same author says in Distinction IX: "Do not be subject to my writings as though to the canonical Scriptures. But whatever you believed in those, when you find it, believe without hesitation. In these, however, do not hold firm what you held as certain unless you understand it to be certain."

The same author says concerning himself in the chapter Do Not: "For we are of that number that we do not disdain to receive as said by the Apostle even to us: 'And if perhaps you understand anything otherwise, God has revealed this also.'"

He also showed in the book of the Confessions how great his purity was, for in it he accuses himself before God and human beings of those things of childhood and adolescence which are reckoned the smallest sins or none at all, as is evident there.

Section V: Concerning the mystery of the Trinity

Augustine speaks thus in the book On the Trinity, as is also found in On Consecration, Distinction IV:

All those whom I was able to read who before me wrote concerning the Trinity which is God—the Catholic expositors of the old and new divine books—directed themselves to teach this according to the Scriptures: that the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, of one and the same substance, intimate the divine unity in inseparable equality. Therefore they are not three gods but one God.

Although the Father begot the Son and therefore the Son is not he who is the Father, and the Son was begotten by the Father and therefore the Father is not he who is the Son, the Holy Spirit is neither the Father nor the Son but the Spirit of the Father and the Son, himself also coequal with the Father and the Son and pertaining to the unity of the Trinity.

Nevertheless, we do not say that the same Trinity was born of the Virgin Mary, crucified under Pontius Pilate, buried, rose, and ascended into heaven, but only the Son. Nor do we say that the same Trinity descended upon Christ when he was baptized in the appearance of a dove, or upon the apostles in the appearance of fire, but only the Holy Spirit.

Nor do we say that the same Trinity said from heaven over Christ when he was baptized or transfigured, "You are my beloved Son," or, "This is my beloved Son," but only the Father, although the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit operate inseparably just as they are inseparable. Thus far the quotation.

Hence the whole Trinity operated and created, or formed, Christ's humanity, and that dove, cloud, fire, and voice. Nevertheless, the union of that humanity was to the person of the Word, not of the Father or the Holy Spirit. That dove or fire was not for union but for the signification of the Holy Spirit alone, and that voice for representing the Father alone.

Section VI: Concerning the properties of the divine persons

Augustine speaks thus in Book VI On the Trinity: A certain man, wishing to intimate most briefly the proper things severally in the Trinity of persons, said: "Eternity is in the Father; form is in the image; use is in the gift."

And because Hilary was of no mean authority in the treatment of the Scriptures and the assertion of the faith, he placed in his books these words—namely, Father, image, and gift; eternity, form, and use.

Searching out their hidden understanding as much as I am able, I judge that in the word "eternity" he followed nothing except that the Father does not have a father from whom he himself is. But the Son is from the Father, that he may be and that he may be coeternal with him. For if the image perfectly fulfills that of which it is the image, the image itself is equaled to it, not it to its image.

In this image he named form, I believe, on account of beauty, because there is so great a congruence, and the first equality and the first similitude, dissenting in no matter, unequal in no manner, dissimilar in no part, but corresponding in identity to him whose image it is.

There is the first and highest life, for which to live, to understand, and to be are not different, but the same. There is the first and highest intellect, for which to live and to understand are not different, but are the same. And this is one and, as it were, the perfect Word, to which nothing is lacking, and a certain art of the omnipotent and wise God, full of all living and immutable reasons.

And all are one in it, just as it is itself one from one, with whom it is one. There God knew all things which he made through it.

There is also a certain ineffable embrace of the Father and the image, which is not without enjoyment—that is, without joy and without charity. Therefore that love, delight, felicity, or beatitude—if indeed it is spoken at all worthily by a human voice—is called “use” by him.

And in the Trinity it is the Holy Spirit, not begotten, but the sweetness of the Begotten and the Begetter, pouring over all creatures with immense generosity and abundance according to their capacity.

Accordingly, those three appear to be determined in relation to one another, and in themselves are infinite. Let him who sees this in part or through a mirror in an enigma rejoice, knowing God, and give thanks. But let him who does not see strive through the piety of faith toward seeing, not through blindness toward calumniating, because God is one, yet a Trinity. Thus speaks Augustine.

The words of Hilary are of such profundity, as the Master says in Book I of the Sentences, Distinction XXXI, that, even when Augustine’s said exposition is furnished, human understanding is scarcely able to understand them in any measure.

Augustine says in the Enchiridion: All things were created by the supremely, equally, and immutably good Trinity. Yet they are not supremely, equally, or immutably good. Nevertheless, they are individually good and all together very good, because the admirable beauty of the universe consists of them all.

In it even that which becomes evil, when good is elicited from it, ordered and placed in its own location, commends the more eminent goods so that they may please more and be more praiseworthy when they are compared with evils. Thus speaks the same author.

Augustine says in the Enchiridion: Nothing happens unless the Omnipotent wills it to happen, either by permitting it to happen—which pertains to evils—or by himself doing it—which pertains to goods.

The same author says: Almighty God is so powerful and good that he would in no manner allow anything evil to exist in his works unless he were so powerful that he could elicit a greater good from every evil: as from the impiety of the Jews in Christ’s Passion, the redemption of human beings; and from the cruelty of unbelieving tyrants, the patience and crown of the martyrs.

Augustine himself says in On Penance, Distinction II, in the final paragraph: God alone is called omnipotent. Although he can do all things, this alone he cannot do—namely, sin, because the ability to sin is not a power to do anything. For this is not ability, but failure.

Section VII: Concerning God’s foreknowledge and predestination, that they do not remove free choice toward good or evil

Augustine speaks thus in Cause XXIII, Question IV: Nebuchadnezzar merited fruitful penance. Did he not repent after innumerable impieties, when he had been scourged, and receive again the kingdom which he had lost? Pharaoh was made harder by the same scourges and perished.

Let him who judges the divine counsel with an excessively lofty, wise heart render me an account: Why did one medicine prepared by one physician avail one for destruction and another for salvation, unless because we are Christ’s good odor to God in every place—to one an odor of life unto life, to another an odor of death unto death?

As regards nature, both were human beings; as regards dignity, both were kings; as regards the cause, both possessed God’s people captive; as regards the punishment, both were mercifully admonished by scourges. What, therefore, made their ends diverse except that one, feeling God’s hand, groaned in the recollection of his own iniquity, while the other fought by free choice against God’s most merciful truth?

The same author says in the same place: God would never render destruction to vessels of wrath if a human being were not found to possess voluntary sin, because God would not justly inflict wrath upon a sinful human being if that human being had fallen into fault from God’s predestination.

The same author says: It is said most foolishly that God’s predestination operates in all persons, whether toward good or evil, so that a certain necessity appears to drive human beings toward either. In goods the will must be understood, but not without grace; in evils the will must be understood without grace.

But when we read that some have been handed over by God to their desires, or hardened, or left to their sins, we profess that they themselves merited this because crimes of theirs of such a kind went before that they owed a penalty to themselves, whereby even punishment would be turned into guilt for them.

And thus we do not complain concerning God's judgment, by which he abandons those deserving to be abandoned, and we give thanks for his mercy, by which he liberates those not deserving to be liberated.

God's predestination is also always in the good. It knows that sin committed by the will of the human being alone is either to be forgiven with praise of mercy or punished with praise of justice.

In our evil works, however, God's foreknowledge alone must be understood, because, just as he foreknew and predestined those things which he himself made and gave us to do, so he only foreknew and did not predestine those things which he neither made himself nor gave us to do. Thus far the quotation.

The same Augustine says: No necessity compels the will of a human being walking voluntarily to walk, although it is necessary that he walk while I see him walking.

In the same manner, if the foreknowing providence of God sees something, it is necessary that it be, even if it possesses no necessity of nature. But foreknowledge beholds those future things which proceed from freedom of choice. Therefore, when referred to the divine gaze—to which, namely, all things are present—they are necessary through the disposition of divine knowledge; but, considered in themselves, they do not abandon the absolute freedom of their nature.

Therefore, without doubt, all things which God foreknows will be future come to pass; but some of them proceed from free choice—namely, human acts.

The same Augustine says in Cause XXIV, Question III, Let Them Be Corrected in the Faith: "Not knowing who pertains to the number of the predestined and who does not pertain, we ought to be so affected toward all by the affection of charity that we wish all to be saved."

The same author says in Cause XXIII, Question IV: Just as prayer must not cease for those whom we wish to be corrected—even though, with no human being praying for Peter, the Lord looked upon him and made him weep for his sin—so correction must not be neglected, although God makes those whom he has willed to be corrected, even when they have not been corrected.

A human being then profits from correction when God has mercy and assists—that God who makes those whom he wills profit even without correction.

Augustine says in the book On Correction and Grace: Human beings are compelled to confess that it is a gift of God that a person ends this life before he is changed from good into evil, because it is said: "He was taken away"—namely, by God, while good—"lest malice change his understanding."

Why this gift is given to some and not given to others is unknown. Nevertheless, let those who, according to the Scriptures concerning which I have already set down many testimonies, confess with us that perseverance in the good is a gift of God, and why this gift is given to some and not given to others, deign to be ignorant with us without murmuring against God, and exclaim that word of the Apostle: "O depth of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How incomprehensible are his judgments!" This is in On Penance, Distinction IV, If from Good.

Augustine says upon John, concerning the passage, "No one comes to me unless the Father has drawn him": "A great commendation of grace," says Augustine. "No one comes to Christ unless drawn. Whom he draws—namely, by his grace—and whom he does not draw, and why he draws this one and does not draw that one, do not investigate if you do not wish to err. Receive and understand once for all. You are not yet drawn; pray that you may be drawn. The mind, however, is not drawn unwillingly, but by love."

God also sometimes draws human beings to himself by the lash of tribulations. Hence Augustine says in the book to Vincent the Donatist: Who can love more than God? Yet he does not cease not only to teach us sweetly, but also to restrain us wholesomely. To the light fomentations of benefits by which he consoles us he often also joins the most biting medicine of tribulations.

He tries even pious and religious patriarchs by hunger and drives a contumacious people by graver penalties. When asked three times, he does not remove the thorn of the flesh from the Apostle, so that he may perfect virtue in infirmity.

And below: You should know that sometimes a thief scatters fodder to turn cattle away, while sometimes a shepherd recalls wandering sheep with a lash. The one who binds a madman and rouses a lethargic patient is troublesome to both, yet loves both. This is in Cause V, Question V, Not Every.

The same Augustine says in the book On Free Choice, in On Consecration, Distinction IV: Grace which is given through Christ not only effects the remission of sins, but also causes the law to be fulfilled and nature to be liberated, lest sin have dominion.

The Spirit of grace also gives faith, which is granted by God even when it has not been sought. For faith belongs to free choice, yet is the gift of God.

The same author says Against Julian, in On Consecration, Distinction IV: No one removes sins except Christ alone, who is the Lamb taking away the sins of the world. He takes them away both by forgiving the things which have been done—in which original sin is also contained—and by assisting lest they be done, and by leading to the life where they cannot be done at all. Thus far the quotation.

Christ takes them away insofar as he is God, by authority with the Father and the Holy Spirit, and insofar as he is a human being, meritoriously.

The same Augustine says in On Penance, Distinction III: When grace destroys the prior evils—namely, through penance for them—it also rewards the goods. And when it destroys what it did not find its own, it loves and rewards what it planted in the sinner.

Section VIII: Concerning the beatitude to which virtue leads

Augustine says in Book X On the City of God: It is the certain judgment of all human beings who can use reason in any manner that all wish to be blessed. But while mortal infirmity asks who are blessed or whence they become so, many and great controversies have been stirred up. In these philosophers have worn away their studies and leisure.

Concerning this matter we read that the Platonists are the noblest among all philosophers for this reason: because they were able to understand that the immortal and rational or intellectual soul of the human being cannot be blessed except by participation in the light of that God by whom both it and the world were made.

Thus they deny that anyone will attain that which all seek—that is, the blessed life—unless he adheres in the purity of chaste love to that one supreme being who is the immutable God. But they erred in this: that they thought many gods ought to be worshiped, or assented to the peoples who worshiped them.

The same Augustine says in the book of the Confessions: We all wish to live blessedly. But neither is that person blessed who does not possess what he loves, whatever it may be; nor he who possesses what he loves, if it is harmful; nor he who does not love that which, since it is the best, ought to be loved.

For he who seeks what he cannot obtain is tormented; he who has obtained what ought not to have been obtained is deceived; and he who does not seek what ought to have been obtained is sick.

Therefore a fourth remains, where the blessed life may be found: when that which is the best thing of a human being is both loved and possessed. This, however, is God. If we follow him, we live well; but if we attain him, we live blessedly.

But how do we follow that which we do not see? Or how do we see, we who are foolish—namely, darkened in ourselves concerning divine things? But we are assisted through faith in the sacred Scriptures working through love.

Hence Augustine adds: Therefore, as we desire to flee into dark places, by divine dispensation let that obscurity of authority meet us, and with the marvelous things and voices of books, as with more tempered signs and shadows of truth, let it caress us.

Accordingly, with the precepts of the faith of true religion preserved, let us not abandon the way which God fortified for us by the separation of the patriarchs, the bond of the law, the prediction of the prophets, the sacrament of the humanity assumed, the testimony of the apostles, the blood of the martyrs, and the occupation of the nations. And let us submit our little reasonings to the divine utterances.

Let us hear, therefore, what end of goods you, O Christ, prescribe for us. Nor is there doubt that it is the end toward which you command us to strive with the highest love. He says: “You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind.”

Love therefore is directed toward God; by it a human being seeks not to place himself on an equal footing with God but to subject himself to him. The more urgently he does this, the more blessed and sublime he will be; and, with him ruling, we shall be free.

Through charity it will come to pass that we are conformed to God, and, circumcised from this world, are not confounded with those things which ought to be subject to us.

Finally, if virtue leads us to the blessed life, I would affirm that virtue is nothing except the highest love of God. For even that which is called fourfold virtue is so called from a certain varied effect of that love itself.

Temperance is love presenting itself whole to that which is loved. Fortitude is love readily tolerating all things for the sake of that which is loved. Justice is love serving the beloved alone, and therefore ruling rightly. Prudence is love sagaciously choosing the things by which it is assisted from those by which it is impeded.

But we have said that this love is not of just anything, but of God—that is, of the highest good, the highest wisdom, and the highest concord. For charity is simple and pure; inspired by the Holy Spirit, it leads to the Son, through whom the Father is known.

The office of temperance now, therefore, is to put off the old human being and to be renewed in God—that is, to contemn all bodily enticements and popular praise and to direct the whole love toward divine things, lest by sins a human being subject himself to those things which by deeds rightly done are subjected to him by divine law.

For what else is it to be mocked and deceived by false goods than to judge things inferior to yourself worthy of wonder and desire?

Concerning fortitude not many things need be said. For that love of which we speak, which ought to be inflamed toward God with all holiness, is called temperate in not desiring these things and strong in losing them.

But among all these things which are possessed in this life, the body is a most burdensome bond under the most just laws of God on account of the ancient sin, than which nothing is more widely known for preaching and nothing more hidden for understanding.

Therefore this bond shakes the soul with fear: lest it be disturbed and vexed by labor and pain, and lest it be taken away and destroyed by death. For it loves the body by the force of custom, not understanding that, if it uses it well and knowingly, its resurrection and reformation will be subject to its husband by divine power and law without any molestation, when with this love it has turned itself wholly toward God.

When these things are known, it will not only contemn death but even desire it. As an example for us, it must be considered how strong lovers of gold, praise, or women are in enduring for the sake of that which they love.

It belongs to justice, however, to serve most willingly the God whom it loves and to govern all other things, some already subject to itself and some which it presumes ought to be subjected.

As Augustine says in the book of the Confessions and in Distinction VIII, Those Things Which Are Contrary: When God commands something contrary to the custom or pact of any people, even if it was never done there, nevertheless it must be done; and if it was omitted, it must be restored; and if it was not established, it must be established.

For if it is lawful for a king in the city in which he reigns to command something which neither anyone before him nor he himself had ever commanded, and if obedience to him is not contrary to the society of his city—indeed, it would be contrary to society if he were not obeyed, namely in lawful things—since it is the general compact of human society to obey its kings, how much more must God, the ruler of his whole creation, be obeyed without doubt in those things which he has commanded?

For just as among the powers of human society a greater power is preferred to a lesser for obedience, so God is preferred to all. Thus far the quotation. This pertains to justice: namely, to obey superiors.

Concerning prudence a longer discourse must be made, for to it pertains the discernment of things to be desired and avoided. If it is absent, none of those things which have been said can be accomplished. The vigilance of its watch is that we not be deceived little by little by an evil persuasion creeping beneath us. For he who despises small things falls little by little.

Augustine says in Distinction XXXVIII: Although error must be guarded against as much as we can, not only in greater but also in lesser matters, and although error cannot occur except through ignorance of things, nevertheless it does not follow that everyone who does not know something immediately errs, but he who judges that he knows what he does not know. For he approves the false as true, which is proper to error. But it matters very greatly in what matter anyone errs. Thus far the quotation.

For, as the same author says in the Enchiridion and in Cause XXII, Question II: In those matters in which it makes no difference for attaining the kingdom of God whether they are believed or not, and whether they are thought true or not, to err in these must be judged either no sin or a very small one. But in those things without faith in or knowledge of which God cannot be worshiped, to err or be deceived is pernicious.

Here it must also be noted that in every crime there is an error of choice, because reason obscured by passion sees that which is proposed to it for doing, even if it is unlawful in itself, nevertheless as a greater good to be preferred to God's command. Hence it is said in Proverbs: "They err who work evil."

And Augustine says that sin is not the appetite for evil things—namely, things evil in themselves—but the abandonment of better things. Hence one who acts contrary to prudence, which is right reason concerning things to be done, also acts so that better things are not preferred to lesser goods.

Section IX: Concerning love

Augustine says in the book of the Confessions: Why should I dispute further concerning morals? If God is the highest good of the human being, it is nothing other for a human being to live well than to love God with all his heart, with all his mind, and with all his soul.

From him it comes that the human being is guarded incorrupt in that love, which belongs to temperance; is broken by no hardships, which belongs to fortitude; serves no other, which belongs to justice; and watches in discerning things lest deception creep beneath, which belongs to prudence.

This is the one perfection of the human being, by which alone it is obtained that he may enjoy the truth. This is inferred for us from both Testaments.

A human being who loves God cannot fail to love himself. Indeed, only he who loves God loves himself, because he diligently acts so that he may enjoy the highest good.

But what you do with yourself must be done with your neighbor also: namely, that you may lead him to that good toward which you yourself strive. For it is that one good which does not become narrow for all who strive toward it with you.

From this love of neighbor arise the duties of human society, in which it is difficult not to err. For sin is committed against a human being in two ways: in one, if he is harmed; in the other, if, when you are able, he is not aided.

Since a human being is a rational soul using a mortal body, he who loves his neighbor does good partly to the body and partly to the soul. Medicine pertains to the body; discipline to the soul. I call medicine whatever restores or guards the health of the body, such as food and drink, covering, shelter, and the like.

That discipline which is the medicine of the soul is divided into two: restraint and instruction. Restraint is effected by fear, instruction by love—I speak of the person who is aided through discipline. For the one who gives aid has no part in either except to love.

In these two Testaments the Lord gave us the rule of discipline. For in the Old, fear prevails; in the New, love. In the former servitude, in the latter liberty, is proclaimed by the apostles.

Deservedly, therefore, O Catholic Church, you preach that not only he whose attainment is the blessed life must be worshiped purely, to whom alone the rational soul cleaves without misery. You exclude everything made which is subject to time; neither do you confound what eternity, truth, and peace distinguish, nor do you separate what one majesty conjoins.

But you also embrace the charity of neighbor in such a way that with you the medicine—namely, of the sacraments—prevails against all the various diseases by which souls sicken on account of their sins.

Augustine likewise says in the book On Christian Doctrine: The things which are to be enjoyed make us blessed—namely, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, one God. By those things which are to be used, we who strive toward beatitude are assisted and, as it were, supported, so that we may be able to arrive at and adhere to those things which make us blessed.

But we, who enjoy and use and are placed between both, if we wish to enjoy those things which must be used—as all created things are—our course is impeded, so that we are either delayed from obtaining those things which must be enjoyed or even called back from them, being fettered by the love of inferior things.

For to enjoy is to adhere to some thing for its own sake, which must be done in God alone. But to use is to refer whatever has come into use to the attainment of that which you love, provided it ought to be loved. For unlawful use must rather be called abuse.

Augustine says elsewhere that nothing is worse than to use things which are to be enjoyed—namely, to serve God for the sake of temporal things—and to enjoy things which are to be used—namely, to establish the end of one's love in created things.

Not all things that must be used are to be loved from charity, but only those which either are referred with us to God in a certain fellowship, such as a human being or an angel, or, being related to us, deem something unworthy by God's beneficence through us, as the human body [read: or, being related to us, need God's beneficence through us, as the human body does].

Therefore four things must be loved. One is that which is above us—namely, God. Another is that which we are—namely, the soul. Another is that which is beside us—namely, our neighbor as regards the soul. The fourth is that which is beneath us—namely, our body and our neighbor's. It is certain, however, that the holy angels also are contained under the command by which we are ordered to love our neighbor, for great benefits are now furnished to us by them.

And as the same Augustine says to Macedonius in Cause XXIII, Question IV: A human being ought to love his neighbor as himself, so that any human being whom he can restrain by the consolation of beneficence or by the formation of teaching and discipline, he may lead to worshiping God. This pertains, namely, to those living in the world.

The same author says upon the First Epistle of John, in On Penance, Distinction II: If anyone has so great a charity that he is prepared to die for the brothers, charity is perfect in him. But is it entirely perfect as soon as it is born? It is born so that it may be perfected. When it has been born, it is nourished; when it has been nourished, it is strengthened; when it has been strengthened, it is perfected. When it has come to perfection, then it is said: "For me to live is Christ, and to die is gain."

Section X: Concerning the degrees of contemplation through visible creatures, and the powers of the soul for knowing and loving God

Augustine says in the book of the Confessions: You struck my heart, Lord, and I loved you. But heaven also, and earth, and all things which are in them—behold, from every direction they tell me to love you, nor do they cease to tell all, so that they are without excuse.

What, however, do I love when I love you? Not bodily form, not sweet song, not the delight of perfumes, or anything of this kind. And yet I love a certain light, voice, odor, food, and embrace of my interior human being: where there shines for the soul what place does not contain; where there sounds what time does not carry away; where there is fragrance which a breath does not scatter; where there is savor which voracity does not diminish; where there adheres what satiety does not tear away. This is what I love when I love my God.

And what is this? I questioned the earth, and it said, "I am not." And all things which are in it confessed the same. I questioned heaven and its luminaries, and I said to all things which stand about the doors of my flesh: "Tell me concerning God, which you are not; tell me something concerning him." They cried out in a great voice: "He made us." The questioning was mine; their response was their appearance [read: My questioning was my attention, and their response was their appearance].

I directed myself toward myself and said to myself: "Who are you?" And I answered myself: "A human being." And behold, body and soul are present in me, one exterior, the other interior; but that which is interior is better.

For the bodily messengers report to reason, which presides and judges the response of heaven and earth, which say: "We are not God, but he made us." I, the interior human being, therefore knew this through the ministry of the exterior—that is, through the senses of my body.

Does this appearance therefore become evident to all whose sense is intact? Why then does it not speak the same to all? Small animals see these things, but nevertheless are unable to question them. For reason as judge is not placed over their reporting senses.

But human beings are able to question, so that the invisible things of God may be beheld, being understood through the things which were made. Yet through love they are subjected to those things, and those who are subjected cannot judge concerning them. Nor do those things answer those who question unless they judge.

Their voice indeed—that is, their appearance—speaks to all, but only those understand it who, having received it outwardly, compare it inwardly with truth. For truth says: "God is not heaven and earth, nor any body," because bulk is less in any part than in the whole.

Now you are better, O soul, because you animate the bulk of your body, furnishing it life, which no body furnishes to a body. But your God is also the life of all things. Therefore I shall ascend to him through my soul itself.

I shall pass over that power of mine by which I adhere to the body and vitally fill its frame, because it is common to the horse and the mule. I shall also pass over that power which gives sensation to my flesh, because it likewise is common to beasts.

And behold, I come into fields and broad courts where there are treasures of innumerable images of things of every kind brought in by the senses. I drive these very images away from the face of my recollection until that which I will is cleared of cloud and proceeds from hidden places into sight.

There heaven and earth are present to me with all the things which I was able to sense in them, except those which I have forgotten. There I also meet myself and recall myself—what, when, and where I did, and with what affection I was affected when I acted. There are all things which I remember, whether experienced by me or believed.

From the same abundance I myself also combine now these, now those similitudes of things, either things experienced or things believed from those which I did not experience, with past things. And from these I also ponder future actions, occurrences, and appearances, and all these things as though present.

Here also are all those things perceived from the liberal disciplines which have not yet fallen away, as though in a more remote interior place; and I bear not their images but the things themselves.

For when I hear the three kinds of questions—whether it is, what it is, and of what kind it is—I indeed retain the images of the sounds from which these words were formed, and I know that they passed through the ears with a noise and now no longer exist. But I touched the things themselves which are signified by those sounds through no bodily sense, nor did I see them anywhere except in my mind. And in my memory I concealed not their images but the things themselves. Whence and by what way they entered my memory, I do not know.

Memory likewise contains innumerable reasons and laws of numbers and dimensions, none of which the bodily sense impressed, because they themselves are neither colored, nor fragrant, nor sounding, nor tasted, nor handled.

It also contains the affections of my mind, not in the manner in which the mind has them when it suffers them, but in a far different manner, according as the power of memory bears itself.

Through all these things I run and fly this way and that; I penetrate, and there is never an end. I shall therefore pass over even this power of mine, ascending through my mind to you, who remain above me.

For cattle and birds have memory; otherwise they would not return to their lairs and nests, nor to many other things to which they become accustomed. For they could not become accustomed to any things except through memory.

But where shall I find you, true good and secure delight, if I find you beyond memory? How, therefore, do I seek you, Lord? For when I seek you, I seek the blessed life. But how do I seek it? Is it through recollection, as though I had forgotten it and still retained that I had forgotten it? Or through the appetite for learning something unknown, either which I never knew or which I so forgot that I do not even remember myself to have forgotten it?

Is not the blessed life itself that which all desire? Where, therefore, did they know it so that they might love it? Surely we possess it in some kind of knowledge, concerning which I labor to discover whether it is in the memory; because, if it is there, we were already blessed at some time.

Do we remember it as one remembers Carthage who has seen it? Not thus, because the blessed life is not seen with the eyes, for it is not a body. Do we remember it as we remember numbers? No. For he who possesses them in knowledge does not still seek to obtain them.

Do we remember it as we remember joy? Perhaps thus. But far be it, Lord, that if I rejoice with any joy whatsoever, I should think myself blessed. For there is a joy which is not given to the impious, but to those who freely worship God, whose joy you are. And the blessed life itself is to rejoice from you, concerning you, and on account of you.

But those who pursue another joy do not pursue the true joy itself. Nevertheless, their will does not recede from some image of joy. The blessed life, therefore, is joy concerning the truth. All desire this joy. But he will be perfectly blessed if, with no molestation interrupting, he shall rejoice in the truth alone through which all things are true.

Where, therefore, O Truth, did I find you so that I might learn you? For you were not already in my memory before I learned you. Where, therefore, did I find you so that I might learn you, except in you above me, and nowhere is there place? We approach and withdraw, and nowhere is there place.

O Truth, everywhere you preside over all who consult you and simultaneously answer all, even those consulting diverse things. You answer clearly, but not all hear clearly.

Unhappy, says the same author, is he who knows all these created things but does not know you. But blessed is he who knows you, even if he does not know all these things. He, however, who knows you and these things is not more blessed on account of these things, but is blessed on account of you, if, knowing you, he glorifies and loves you as God.

Thus the faithful human being, for whom the whole world is riches and who, as though possessing nothing, possesses all things by adhering to you, whom all things serve—even if he knows not even the courses of the north—is assuredly better than the measurer of heaven, the enumerator of stars, and the weigher of elements who neglects you, who disposed all things in measure, number, and weight.

Section XI: Concerning the greatness of God

Augustine says in the book of the Confessions: What is my God? What, I ask, except the Lord God? Highest, best, most omnipotent, most hidden, most present, most beautiful, stable and incomprehensible, immutable, changing all things; never new, never old; renewing all things and leading the proud into old age, and they do not know it.

Always acting, always at rest; gathering and not needing; carrying, filling, and protecting; creating, nourishing, and perceiving [read: perfecting]; seeking, although nothing is lacking to you. You love and do not burn; you are jealous and secure; you repent and do not grieve. You are angry and tranquil. You change your works and do not change your counsel.

You receive what you find and never lost. Never needy, and you rejoice in gains; never avaricious, and you exact usuries. More than enough is paid out to you so that you may owe—and who possesses anything which is not yours? You render debts, owing nothing; you forgive debts, losing nothing.

And what have we said, my God, my life, my holy sweetness? Or what does anyone say when he speaks concerning you? And woe to those silent concerning you.

Who will grant me that you come into my heart and inebriate it, and that I embrace you, my one good? What am I myself to you, that you command that you be loved by me and, unless I do it, are angry with me and threaten immense miseries? Say to my soul: “I am your salvation.”

Augustine says in Book XXII of The City of God, Chapter XIV, after he enumerated very many things which God conferred upon us in this life: All these things are consolations of the wretched and condemned, not the rewards of the blessed. What, therefore, are those rewards if these consolations are so many, so great, and of such a kind?

What will he give to those whom he predestined to life, if he gave these things to those whom he also predestined to death? What goods will he cause them to receive in that blessed life, for whom in this misery he willed his only-begotten Son to suffer so many evils even unto death?

What goods shall we receive in that kingdom, when we have already received such a pledge in Christ dying for us? Of what sort then will be the spirit of the human being, then possessing no vice—neither one beneath which it lies, nor one to which it yields, nor one against which it contends even praiseworthily—but perfected by the most peaceful virtue?

How great, how beautiful, how certain will be the knowledge of all things there, without any error or labor, where the very wisdom of God will be drunk in its fountain with the highest felicity and without any difficulty? Of what sort will the body be, which, wholly subject to the spirit and vivified, will need no nourishment?

The same author says in the final chapter of The City of God: All those numbers which now lie hidden in bodily harmony, disposed inwardly and outwardly through all bodies, together with the other things which will appear great and marvelous there, will kindle rational minds in praise of so great an Artisan through delight in rational beauty.

What the movements of such bodies will be there I do not dare to define. Nevertheless, both movement and rest, just like the appearance itself, will be seemly, whatever it shall be, where nothing which is not seemly will exist.

True glory will be there, where no one will be praised either by error or flattery; true honor, which will be given to no unworthy person, nor will any unworthy person strive for it; true peace, where no one will suffer anything adverse either from himself or from anyone.

The reward of virtue will be he himself who gave virtue and promised himself to it, than whom nothing can be greater or better. There we shall be at leisure and shall see; we shall love and shall praise.

Section XII: Concerning the mediator, Christ Jesus

Augustine says in the book of the Confessions: You are the Truth, presiding over all things. But through my avarice I did not wish to lose you; instead I wished to possess a lie together with you. Just as no one wishes so to speak what is false that he himself does not know what is true, so I lost you, because you do not deign to be possessed with a lie.

Whom, therefore, could I find who would reconcile me to you? The mediator between you and human beings had to possess something similar to you and something similar to human beings, lest, similar to human beings in both, he be far from God, or, similar to God in both, he be far from human beings and thus not be a mediator.

He is the one whom in your secret mercy you revealed to the humble and sent so that by his example they might learn humility itself. He appeared among sinful mortals both mortal and just: mortal with human beings and just with God.

And because the stipend of justice is life and peace, through justice joined to God he would empty the death of the justified impious, which he wished to possess in common with them. He was revealed to the ancient saints so that they might be saved through faith in his future Passion just as we are through faith in his past Passion.

How, therefore, you loved us, good Father, who did not spare your only-begotten Son but handed him over for us impious ones! For us he was made to you victor and victim, and victor because victim; for us, to you, priest and sacrifice, and priest because sacrifice; making us sons from servants by being born from you and by serving us.

Deservedly my hope in him is strong, because you will heal all my infirmities through him who sits at your right hand and intercedes for us; otherwise I would despair. For those infirmities are many and great, but your medicine is more abundant.

We could think that your Word was removed from conjunction with the human being and despair concerning ourselves, unless he were made flesh and dwelt among us.

This only one of yours, in whom all the treasures of the wisdom and knowledge of God are hidden, redeemed me by his blood. Let not the proud calumniate me, because I consider my price, and I eat and drink; and, poor, I desire to be satisfied from him among those who eat and are satisfied, and they praise God who seek him. Thus speaks he.

Augustine says in The City of God: So that the human being might walk more confidently toward truth, the Truth itself, the Son of God, having assumed a human being without consuming God, came and established and founded faith—namely, by teaching the things which belong to faith.

Augustine says: Christ the human being contemned all earthly things so that he might show that they are to be contemned. Human beings seek dignities, honor, and power. He did not wish to be made king but, when sought for this, fled.

They seek riches, and he lived most poor, not having where he might lay down his head. They seek delights, and he labored in vigils, fasts, and abstinence. They flee and shudder at adversities and reproaches, but he did not avoid insults, spittle, scourges, curses, nails, and the lance.

The same Augustine says upon the Psalms, in On Consecration, Distinction II: The Jews approached Jesus so that they might crucify him. Let us approach so that we may receive his body and blood. Truly the Lord is great, and his mercy is great, who gave us his body to eat and his blood to drink.

The same Augustine says in On Consecration, Distinction II: I neither praise nor blame receiving the Eucharist daily. Nevertheless, I exhort that it be received on every Lord's Day, provided that the mind is not in an affection for sinning. For I say that one who still possesses the will to sin is burdened by receiving the Eucharist rather than purified. I say this concerning him whom mortal sins do not burden.

The same author says: One person may say that the Eucharist is not to be received daily; another affirms that it is to be received daily. Let each person do according to what he piously believes ought to be done.

Section XIII: Concerning faith

In Cause XXIV, Question I: Where faith does not exist, justice cannot exist, because the just person lives from faith. Nor should schismatics promise themselves anything from this reward, because likewise, where charity does not exist, justice cannot exist.

The same author says in Cause XXXVIII, Question I, in the paragraph From These Things Therefore: The whole life of unbelievers is sin. Nor can that which is done without God—namely, through indwelling grace—be good, that is, meritorious. For where knowledge of eternal and immutable truth—namely, through faith—is lacking, virtue is false even in the best morals.

Although no one is to be compelled to receive the faith, nevertheless he can and ought to be compelled to preserve it once received. Hence Augustine says to Vincent the Donatist, in Cause XXIII, Question VII: You see, I think, that it must not be considered that anyone is compelled, but what that is toward which he is compelled—whether good or evil.

Not that anyone can be unwilling [read: can be good unwillingly], but by fearing what he does not wish to suffer, he either abandons the stubbornness which impedes him or is compelled by ignorance to know the truth [read: is compelled to recognize a truth previously unknown], and now willingly holds what he did not wish to hold.

My former opinion was that no one ought to be compelled to the unity of Christ, but that the matter must be conducted by the word, fought by disputation, and conquered by reason, lest we possess feigned Catholics whom we had known as open heretics.

But this opinion of mine was overcome not only by the words of those contradicting it but by examples of those demonstrating it. For first my own city was set before me, which, although it was wholly in the party of Donatus, was converted to Catholic unity by fear of the imperial laws. And many other cities were likewise recalled to me by name.

Section XIV: Concerning correction

Augustine says upon the Psalms, in Cause XXIII, Question IV: When we say these two names, “human being” and “sinner,” they assuredly are not said in vain, because you will not wholly liberate the human being unless you have persecuted the sinner.

Discipline attends to the duty of this name, as it is suitable and adapted to everyone who rules: not only to a bishop ruling his people, but also to a poor man ruling his house, a rich man ruling his household, a husband ruling his wife, a father ruling his offspring, a judge ruling his province, and a king ruling his nation. Thus mercy must be closed to no human being, and impunity must be relaxed for no sin. Thus far the quotation.

The same author says upon the preceding Psalm: Do not, with judgment abandoned, show mercy to a poor person in an evil cause. If you spare his purse, you strike his heart; and you render him the more wicked insofar as he sees a just person favoring him.

The same author says in the Enchiridion, Distinction XLV: He who corrects with a blow one over whom power is given, or restrains him by some discipline, and nevertheless forgives from his heart the sin of the one by whom he was offended, gives alms, because he furnishes mercy. For many goods are furnished to those unwilling when their utility is considered, not their will, because they are found to be enemies to themselves.

The same author says in the sermon On the Words of the Gospel, Cause XXIII, Question IV: Always be disjoined in heart from the evil; for a time be cautiously joined in body. An evil person does not stain you in two ways: if you do not consent and if you rebuke.

And this is not to consent: not to communicate. Therefore, neither be consenting, so that you approve, nor negligent, so that you do not censure, nor proud, so that you censure by insulting.

The same Augustine says upon the Psalms, in Cause VII, Question I, in the final paragraph: The voice of those suffering tribulation with Christ—that is, of martyrs being endangered amid persecutions but presuming upon their Head—and saying: “O God, attend to my help.”

With them is the voice of every just person for whom, because of charity, the abounding iniquity of Christians is a suffering, as it was for Lot, who endured bodily persecution from no one in Sodom but suffered from the evils of those among whom he dwelt. Therefore, the persecution of the just person is either from a lion in attack or from a dragon among fools [read: from a dragon in snares]. Hence let all cry: “O God, attend to my help.”

The same author says to Vincent, in Distinction XLVII: However much the discipline of my house may watch, I am a human being and live among human beings. Nor do I dare arrogate to myself that my house is better than Noah’s ark, where among eight human beings one was found reprobate; or that it is better than Abraham’s house, where it was said, “Cast out the handmaid and her son”; or that it is better than Isaac’s house, concerning whose two twins it was said, “Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated.”

But before the Lord God, who is witness over my soul, I simply confess to your charity: since I began to serve God, just as I have experienced with difficulty any better than those who advanced in monasteries, so I have not experienced any worse than those who fell away from monasteries.

Section XV: Concerning sin, and first concerning original sin

Augustine says in On Faith, to Peter, in On Consecration, Distinction IV: Believe most firmly and doubt in no manner that every human being who is conceived by the intercourse of male and female is born with original sin, subjected to impiety and subject to death, and on this account is born naturally a child of wrath. From this wrath no one is liberated except through faith in the mediator, the human being Jesus Christ.

Hold most firmly that not only human beings who use reason, but also little children, whether already born or dying in the womb, if they pass from this world without the sacrament of baptism, are to be punished by eternal fire. For although they possess no sin of their own action, nevertheless by carnal conception they drew the condemnation of original sin from birth.

The same author says in On the Baptism of Infants, in On Consecration, Distinction IV: Through Christ’s baptism it is effected that the flesh of sin is emptied. It is not, however, emptied in such a way that innate concupiscence does not exist in the flesh, but so that it does not harm.

For if after baptism they arrive at the natural age, there they possess something against which they may fight and which, with God assisting, they may overcome, if they have not received grace in vain.

For neither is this furnished to adults in baptism, except perhaps by a miracle of God: that the law of sin fighting against the law of the mind is thoroughly extinguished and does not exist. Instead, whatever was done, spoken, or thought by the human being when the mind subjected to the same concupiscence served it is wholly abolished and held as though it had not been done.

The same author says to Boniface, in Cause I, Question IV: And so, when a human being has been made another in himself from the one who begot him, he is not held liable for another's sin without his own consent. Therefore he drew the guilt because he was one with and in him from whom he drew it when that which he contracted was committed.

But one does not draw from another when, with each now living his own life, there is that from which it is said: "The soul which has sinned, it itself shall die."

Concerning actual sin the same Augustine says in the book of the Retractions, Cause XV, Question I, in the first paragraph: Sin is the will to retain or obtain what justice forbids, from which it is free to abstain. This is therefore true because that which is sin alone has been defined, not that which is also the penalty of sin—namely, that which is committed from ignorance.

And in the same place the same Augustine says that what he himself wrote in the book On True Religion must be understood in the same manner: "To such an extent is sin a voluntary evil that, if it is not voluntary, it is in no manner sin. And this is so manifest that neither a scarcity of learned persons nor a crowd of unlearned persons dissents from it."

He says that it must be understood concerning what is committed knowingly, not ignorantly. Although even those things committed by those not knowing or by those compelled cannot be called wholly involuntary, because, namely, the person both wills to perform that act which he does not know to be sin and, because he neglected to know that what he did was prohibited, in some manner willed that ignorance from which the sin proceeded.

Augustine adds in the following paragraph: All human beings who knowingly do what is not lawful would wish it to be lawful. To such an extent does no one seek sinning itself for its own sake, but for the sake of that which follows from it.

The same author says in Book V of The City of God: It can be said without being wholly absurd that certain astral influences have force upon the dispositions of bodies, but that the wills of the soul are not subject to the positions of the stars.

Augustine says in Book XII of The City of God, Chapter VII: No one seeks an efficient cause of the evil will. For it is not efficient but deficient, because that also is not an effecting but a defecting. For to defect from that which supremely is toward that which is less is to begin to possess an evil will.

To wish to find efficient causes of these defections, when they are not efficient but deficient, is as if someone wished to see darkness or hear silence. Nevertheless, both of these are known to us, the former not except through the eyes and the latter not except through the ears, yet not in appearance but in the privation of appearance.

Therefore let no one seek from me to know that which I know I do not know. Thus our mind indeed beholds intelligible appearances by understanding, but where they fail, it learns its ignorance by not knowing. For who understands transgressions?

This I know: the nature of God can never fail in any part. Those things, however, which were made from nothing—as all created things were—are able to fail, namely from themselves.

Insofar as they exist and do good when they do something, they possess efficient causes. Insofar as they fail, they act evilly from this. For the defect is not toward evil things but is evil—that is, not toward evil natures, but evil for this reason: because, contrary to the order of natures, it is from that which is supreme toward that which is less.

Avarice is not a vice of gold but of the human being who perversely loves gold after justice has been abandoned, which ought incomparably to be preferred to gold. Thus far the quotation. And so concerning other things.

The same author says in The City of God and in Cause XV, Question I: If concupiscence or disobedience, which still dwells in dying members, is moved as though by its own law beyond the law of our will, it is without fault in the body of one who does not consent.

Augustine says in On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, in On Penance, Distinction II: Just as sin is reached by three degrees—suggestion, delight, and consent—so there are three distinctions of sin itself: in the heart, in deed, and in custom, like three deaths.

One is as though in the house, when in the heart consent is given to desire—that is, to the delight of any mortal sin. The second is as though now carried outside the gate, when assent proceeds into deed. The third is when, by the force of evil custom, the mind is pressed as though by an earthly mass, already stinking, as in a tomb. Whoever reads the Gospel understands that the Lord raised these three kinds of dead persons.

The same Augustine says in On Faith, to Peter, Cause XV, Question I: Animals—namely, irrational ones—will render no account concerning their deeds, because they are not rational. Human beings, however, because they are rational, will render an account to God concerning themselves and all the things which they received for the use of this life, and according to the quality of their acts they will receive either punishment or glory.

The same Augustine says in the book On Purgatorial Fire and in Distinction XXV, in the paragraph Otherwise These Things, treating those words of the Apostle, “If anyone builds upon this foundation wood, hay, and stubble,” and so forth: There are many who understand this reading badly. They are deceived by a false security when they believe that capital crimes can be purged by a transitory fire—namely, that of purgatory—and that they themselves afterward can arrive at eternal life.

But those who thus flatter themselves seduce themselves. For by that transitory fire—namely, purgatory—not capital but small sins, that is, venial sins, are purged.

He adds examples there, not of all, but of some things which are called mortal, adding: Whoever knows that any of these exercises dominion in himself, unless he worthily amends it and abstains from them, the eternal flame will slaughter him without any remedy.

He also sets down many things concerning venial sins which are purged in the other life through the transitory fire of purgatory.

Section XVI: Concerning one who repents at the end of life

Augustine says in the book On Penance, in On Penance, Distinction VII, final chapter: Since there are many things which impede and draw back a sick person from true penance—such as the affliction of illness, disordered love of family, habitual practice in evils, attachment to the present life, and the like—it is most dangerous and near to destruction to prolong the remedy of penance until death. But it is a great thing if God inspires someone then.

But if one converted in this manner should even live and not die, we do not promise that he will escape every punishment. For he must first be purged by the fire of purgation who deferred into the other age the fruit of conversion—that is, making satisfaction for the punishments owed for sins committed.

Augustine adds: This fire—namely, that of purgatory—although it is not eternal as regards the office of purging, for as regards its substance it is eternal, is grievous in a marvelous manner. For it exceeds every punishment which anyone ever suffered in this life. So great a punishment was never found in the flesh, although the martyrs suffered marvelous torments and many wicked persons often endured very great punishments.

Let each person therefore study so to correct transgressions that after death he need not endure punishment. For there are certain sins which, although mortal, are made vital in penance, yet are not immediately healed. He who before was about to die lies sick but will live.

But he who dies impenitent dies altogether and is tormented eternally. He who ends impenitent would sin forever if he lived forever. But it belongs to the mercy of God that he works the end of sin. All these things are found there.

Section XVII: Concerning suffrages for the dead

Augustine speaks thus in the Enchiridion and in Cause XIII, Question II: The time which is interposed between the death of a human being and the final resurrection contains souls in hidden receptacles, as each is worthy of rest or misery according to what it obtained in the flesh while it lived.

Nor must it be denied that the souls of the dead can be relieved by the piety of their living relatives. But these things profit those who, when they lived here, merited this for themselves: that afterward they could profit them.

And below: When sacrifices of the altar or alms of any kind are offered for all the baptized, for the very good they are acts of thanksgiving—that is, for the blessed; for those not very good or for the evil, they are propitiations—that is, for those who are in purgatory; for the very evil, as for the damned, although they are no aid to the dead, nevertheless they are consolations of the living.

For those whom they profit, they profit either so that there may be full remission or certainly so that the condemnation itself may be more tolerable. Thus speaks he.

Here “condemnation” is understood not as the punishment of hell, which is never removed or alleviated, but as the punishment of purgatory, which is redeemed or diminished through suffrages, according to Thomas in Book IV.

The same author says in On the Care to Be Taken for the Dead: Because we do not discern who those are whom suffrages made for the dead profit, it is necessary to make them for all the regenerated, so that none of those to whom these benefits ought particularly to come may be passed over. It is better that they be superabundant for those whom they neither harm nor profit than that they be lacking to those whom they profit.

Nevertheless, each person acts more diligently for his own relatives so that the same may be done for him by his own. Cause XIII, Question II. This must be understood concerning those who depart not in notorious crime, because such persons are deprived of suffrages just as they are of burial.

Concerning venial sins the same Augustine says to Felicianus, in On Penance, Distinction I, There Are Three: There is the daily penance of the humble and good faithful, in which we strike our breasts, saying, "Forgive us our debts," and so forth. Nor do we wish those things to be forgiven which we do not doubt were forgiven in baptism, but assuredly those which, although small, nevertheless frequently creep in through human frailty—namely, venial sins.

If these are gathered together against us, they will so weigh us down and oppress us as one great sin does. For what difference does it make for shipwreck whether the ship is covered and overwhelmed by one great wave, or whether water, creeping little by little into the bilge and left and contemned through the negligence of the sailors, fills and sinks the ship? For this reason fasts, alms, and prayers keep watch. Thus far the quotation.

And what he says—that many small sins oppress as one great, that is, mortal sin—is understood dispositively, not essentially or effectively.

Section XVIII: Concerning sins in particular—superstitions, auguries, incantations, and the like

Augustine says in the book On Christian Doctrine: Whatever was instituted by human beings pertaining to the making and worshiping of idols, or to worshiping a creature or any part of a creature as God, or to consultations and certain compacts of significations agreed and covenanted with demons, is superstitious. Of such a kind are the undertakings of the magical arts which poets are accustomed to commemorate rather than teach.

The books of haruspicy or augury are of this kind. To this kind also pertain all bindings and remedies which the discipline of physicians condemns, whether in incantations, in any marks which they call characters, or in any things to be suspended, bound, or even danced over.

Nor are those persons to be separated from this kind of pernicious superstition who formerly were called genethliacs on account of consideration of the days of birth but are now called mathematicians. For in attempting from these things to predict our actions or the outcome of actions, they err exceedingly.

After first concluding with many particular examples, he says: All arts of this kind, whether harmful or trifling superstitions, established from a certain pestiferous fellowship of human beings and demons as covenants of a faithless and deceitful friendship, must be thoroughly repudiated and fled by a Christian. Cause XXVI, Question II, That Which Is.

The same author says in a certain sermon: He who observes the Egyptian days, the Kalends of January, or other days; or who observes, attends to, or assents to those observing any divinations, fates, or auguries, strives more toward his condemnation than toward salvation.

This is so whether through Pythagorean necromancy he inquires into the life or death of the sick, or into future prosperity or adversity; attends to written dream-books; or places upon human beings or animals, for any infirmity, lots which are called those of the Apostles or written little slips, except for the Creed and the Lord's Prayer. Let such persons know that they have transgressed the Christian faith and, as enemies of God, grievously incur his wrath. Cause XXVI, Question VII, Do Not Observe.

Against simoniacs, Augustine speaks thus in Cause I, Question I: Just as he who bought Joseph was a eunuch, so he who buys grace has no living seed in his dry generative organs.

Likewise, the fire of the sacrifice which had lived beneath water for the seventy years of the Babylonian captivity was extinguished when Antiochus sold the priesthood to Jason. This signified that the fire of the Holy Spirit does not shine in simoniacal sacraments.

Against usurers, Augustine says upon the Psalms: If you lend to a human being—that is, if you give your money as a loan—from whom you expect to receive more than you gave, whether it be wheat, wine, oil, or anything else, you practice usury and in this must be reproved, not praised. Cause XIV, Question III, If You Lend at Interest.

The same author says to Macedonius, in Cause XIV, Question IV: What shall I say concerning usuries, which even the laws themselves and judges command to be returned? Is one who secretly removes or seizes something from a rich person more cruel than one who slaughters a poor person by usury?

These things assuredly, and things of this kind, are possessed evilly; and I would wish that they be restored, but there is no judge through whom they may be reclaimed. See the Gloss there.

The same author says in On the Words of the Lord: Do not make alms from interest and usuries. Cause XIV, Question V. This is because they must be restored to those from whom they were extorted, if they are known, and not given to the poor.

Against judges and witnesses, Augustine says to Macedonius, in Cause XIV, Question V: Assuredly, not whatever is taken from one unwilling is taken away injuriously. For many are unwilling to render the physician his honor or the workman his wage; nevertheless, those persons do not receive injuriously the things which they receive from one unwilling, since those things would rather be withheld injuriously.

But a judge ought not therefore to sell a just judgment, nor a witness true testimony, because an advocate sells just patronage and one skilled in law true counsel. For the former are employed between both parties for examination; the latter stand on behalf of one party.

The same author says in Cause XI, Question III: Whoever in judging is led either by blood relationship, friendship, hostile hatred, or enmities perverts the judgment of Christ, who is justice.

The same author says: Whoever, being of any power, conceals the truth provokes the wrath of God upon himself. Both are guilty: he who conceals the truth and he who speaks a lie, because the former does not wish to benefit and the latter wishes to harm.

Augustine says in a homily, in On Penance, Cause II, Question I, in the chapter Many: We are unable to prohibit anyone from communion—although this prohibition is not deadly but medicinal—unless he has either confessed voluntarily or has been named and convicted in some judgment, whether secular or ecclesiastical. For who is able to assume both for himself, so that he himself may be someone's accuser and judge?

Augustine says in Cause XIV, Question V: For if anyone uses fields unjustly and wrongfully in vessels [read: uses fields that were unjustly and wrongfully invaded] so that he makes abundant alms from their fruits, robbery is not therefore justified. Nor, if another avariciously broods over a paternal or justly acquired estate, is the rule of civil law by which he was made its legitimate possessor therefore to be blamed.

Nor will the perversity of a tyrannical faction be praiseworthy if the tyrant treats his subjects with royal clemency. Nor is the order of royal power reproved if the king rages with tyrannical cruelty. For it is one thing to will to use an unjust power justly and another to use a just power unjustly.

Section XIX: Concerning wars and offices

Augustine says against the Manichaeans, in Cause XXIII, Question I: What is blamed in war? Is it that those who at some time are going to die, die so that those who will live may rule in peace [read: so that those who are to live may be subdued in peace]? To have reproved this belongs to the timid, not to the religious.

The desire to harm, the cruelty of avenging, an unreconciled and implacable mind, the savagery of rebelling, the lust for ruling, and any similar things—these are the things which are rightly blamed in wars. Wars to be waged are usually undertaken by good persons so that these things may also be punished rightfully against the violence of those who resist, when either God or some legitimate authority commands.

The same author says in the following chapter: To serve as a soldier is not a transgression, but to serve as a soldier for the sake of plunder is a sin. Nor is it criminal to administer the commonwealth, but to administer the commonwealth so that you may increase riches is a sin.

For this reason, by a certain providence, stipends were established for soldiers, lest, while expenses are sought, a robber grow fat. Hence John the Baptist also says to soldiers: "Be content with your stipends." This judgment of John can be said to soldiers, protectors, and all rulers. Whoever receives the stipend publicly decreed for him, if he seeks more, is condemned by John's judgment as a calumniator and extortioner.

The same Augustine says in the book of Questions on the Old Testament: When anyone has undertaken a just war, whether he fights openly or by ambush makes no difference to justice. Just wars are ordinarily defined as those which avenge injuries. Thus a nation or city must be punished which either neglected to avenge what was wickedly done by its people or to return what was taken away by injury. Cause XXIII, Question II, The Lord.

The same Augustine says to Macedonius, in Cause XXIII, Question V: When a human being is killed by a human being, it differs greatly whether it is done from a desire to harm or unjustly to take something away, as by an enemy or robber; or by the order of avenging—that is, punishing—or obeying, as by a judge or executioner; or by the necessity of escaping or bringing aid, as a robber is killed by a traveler or an enemy by a soldier.

Sometimes one who was the cause of a death is more at fault than the one who killed. Yet not everyone who is the cause of another's death is guilty: for example, if someone seeks sexual violation and, if he does not obtain it, kills himself; or if a son, fearing the pious blows of his father, perishes by a fall, and the like.

When these things occur, we owe them human grief, but on account of them we ought not, lest they occur, to repress the will to perform right deeds.

The same Augustine says to Publicola: Far be it that those things which we do and possess for a good and lawful purpose should be imputed to us if, through them and apart from our will, some evil happens to someone. Otherwise neither domestic nor agricultural tools ought to be possessed, lest someone kill himself with them. For what exists in the good or lawful use of human beings from which destruction cannot be inflicted? Cause XXIII, Question V, Concerning Those to Be Killed.

Section XX: Against carnal sins

Augustine says in Distinction LXXXVIII: It is never lawful to fornicate. It is sometimes lawful and sometimes not lawful to engage in business. Before you are a cleric, it is lawful; after you have been made a cleric, it is not lawful.

The same Augustine says in the Questions on Deuteronomy, Cause XXXII, Question IV: The Lord prohibits being prostitutes and approaching prostitutes, whose shamefulness is publicly for sale. Just as under the name of theft every usurpation of another's property is understood, so under the name of adultery every unlawful intercourse and the illegitimate use of those members must be understood as prohibited.

The same author says in Book II of The City of God, Cause XXXII, Question V: While the purpose of the mind remains, through which the body also merited to be sanctified, the violence of another's lust does not remove from the body itself the sanctity which the perseverance of one's own continence preserves. But one ought rather to tolerate all evils than to consent to evil—that is, to sin.

Augustine in On Purgatorial Fire places fornication—that is, that of an unattached man with an unattached woman—among deadly sins, in Distinction XXV, in the paragraph Otherwise These Things.

Augustine says in On the Words of the Lord, Cause XXXII, Question VI: If you are going to take wives, preserve yourselves for your wives. As you wish to find them, so let them find you. Who lives who does not wish to take a chaste wife? And if he is to receive a virgin, who does not desire one untouched? You seek one untouched; be untouched. You seek one pure; be pure. For she is able, and you are not unable.

The same author says in On Adulterous Marriages, in the same question: Husbands are indignant if they hear that adulterous men undergo punishments like those of adulterous women, although they ought to be punished more gravely insofar as it pertains more to them both to conquer by virtue and to rule women by example.

The same author says in On Adulterous Marriages, Cause XXXII, Question VII: The evil of adultery surpasses fornication, but adultery is surpassed by incest. For it is worse to lie with one's mother than with another's wife. But the worst of all these is that which is done contrary to nature, as if a man should wish to use a woman's member not conceded for this purpose.

And this act which is contrary to nature is done abominably with a prostitute, but more abominably with a wife.

The same Augustine says in Book III of the Confessions and in Cause XXXII, Question VII: Flagitious deeds which are contrary to nature must everywhere and always be repudiated and punished, such as those of the Sodomites were. Even if all nations did them, they would be held by the same guilt of crime under divine law, which did not so make human beings that they might use one another in that manner.

For the very fellowship which ought to exist between us and God is violated when that same nature, of which he is the author, is polluted by the perversity of lust.

Against the ambitious: that no one ought to desire or seek the governance of others, but, when ordered to these things, ought to obey.

Augustine says in Cause VIII, Question I, in the chapter He Who Desires the Episcopate: No one is prohibited from the study of knowing truth, which pertains to praiseworthy leisure. But the superior place without which the people cannot be governed, even if it is so held and administered as is fitting, is nevertheless indecently desired.

Therefore the charity of truth seeks holy leisure; the necessity of charity undertakes just business. If no one imposes this burden, one must be at leisure for perceiving and contemplating truth. But if it is imposed, it must be undertaken because of the necessity of charity. Yet not even thus must the delight of truth be wholly abandoned, lest that sweetness be withdrawn and just necessity be oppressed.

The same Augustine says to Valerius, in Distinction XL: Before all things I ask that your religious prudence consider that nothing in this life, and especially at this time, is easier, lighter, or more acceptable to human beings than the office of a bishop, presbyter, or deacon if the matter is conducted perfunctorily and flatteringly—but nothing before God is more wretched, sad, or damnable.

Likewise, nothing in this life, and especially at this time, is more difficult, laborious, or dangerous than the office of a bishop, presbyter, or deacon—but nothing before God is more blessed if one fights in the manner in which our emperor commands.

What that manner is, however, I learned neither in childhood nor in adolescence. And at the very time when I began to learn it, I was compelled, deservedly for my sins—for I do not know what else to think—so that the second place at the helm was entrusted to me, who did not know how to hold an oar.

The same author says to Eudoxius, in Cause XVI, Question I: But we exhort you, brothers, in the Lord, that you guard your purpose and persevere to the end. But if Mother Church should desire any works of yours, neither undertake them with greedy elation nor reject them with flattering sloth, but obey God with a meek heart, bearing with mildness him who rules you, who directs the meek in judgment, who teaches the mild his ways.

Do not prefer your leisure to the necessities of the Church in labor. If no good persons were willing to minister to her, you would not find how you might be born.

Against liars, Augustine in the book On Lying, Cause XXII, Question II, first sets down eight kinds of lies, concluding thus: Whoever thinks that there is any kind of lie which is not sin deceives himself shamefully, since he judges himself an honorable deceiver of others.

And in the said chapter he says: No one is to be led to eternal salvation with a lie furnishing assistance.

And in the said question he says: Let a human being do what he can even for the temporal salvation of human beings. But when he has come to this, that he cannot consult such salvation except by sinning, let him now judge that he has nothing to do.

Augustine likewise says in Cause XXII, Question III: It belongs to great wisdom for a human being to retract what he has spoken evilly.

Section XXI: Concerning penance

Augustine says to Vincent, in On Penance, Distinction I: Think that no one can pass from error to truth, or from any sin, whether great or small, to correction, without penance.

The same author says in the book On Penance, in On Penance, Distinction III: Penance is a certain vengeance of one grieving, punishing in himself what he grieves that he committed.

One must grieve continually for sin—namely, actually when it occurs to the mind, or at least habitually—which the force of the word itself declares. For to repent is to hold punishment, so that one always punishes in oneself, by avenging it, that which one committed by sinning.

The same author says in the same book and in On Penance, Distinction V: Let the penitent consider the quality of the crime: whether it was in a sacred place or not; at a festal time or another; in its perseverance, namely how long he remained in it and repeated it; in the variety of the person; by what kind of temptation he did this; and in the manifold execution of the vice itself.

For there are those who do not await temptation but anticipate pleasure. All this variety must be confessed and lamented.

The same author says in the same work, in On Penance, Distinction I: Let whoever repents repent wholly and show grief with tears. Let him represent his life to God through the priest; let him forestall God's judgment through confession.

The Lord commanded lepers about to be cleansed that they show themselves before priests, teaching that sins are to be confessed by bodily presence, not through a messenger and not disclosed through writing.

The same author says in the same work, in On Penance, Distinction VI: He who wishes to confess so that he may find grace should seek a priest who knows how to loose and bind, lest, when he has been negligent concerning himself, he be neglected by the one who mercifully admonishes and seeks him, lest both fall into the pit—namely, if a blind person is led by a blind person.

And below: Let the spiritual judge—that is, the confessor—take care that, just as he does not commit the crime of wickedness, so he does not lack the gift of knowledge. It is necessary that he know how to recognize whatever he has to judge. Judicial power requires this, that he discern what he must judge.

Therefore let the diligent inquisitor—namely, the confessor, the subtle investigator—wisely and, as it were, shrewdly interrogate the sinner concerning what perhaps he does not know or wishes to conceal through shame.

Once the crime is known, let him not doubt to investigate its varieties, and its place and time, and so forth. Once these have been known, let him be benevolent, prepared to exact and to carry the burden with him. Let him possess sweetness in affection, piety concerning another's crime, and discretion concerning variety.

Let him aid the one confessing by praying, giving alms, and doing other good works for him. Let him always assist him by soothing, counseling, promising hope, and, when it is necessary, rebuking. Thus far the quotation.

The same author says in the Enchiridion, in On Penance, Distinction III: Assuredly one must take care lest anyone judge that those crimes of the kind committed by persons who do not attain the kingdom of God are to be perpetrated daily and redeemed daily by alms.

For life must be changed for the better, and God must be rendered propitious concerning sins through alms, not in some manner bought for this purpose: that it may always be lawful to commit them with impunity. He gave no one permission to sin, although through mercy he grieves over things committed [read: although in mercy he blots out sins already committed], if fitting satisfaction is not neglected.

The same author says in the same distinction: The satisfaction of penance is to cut out the causes of sins and not to indulge an entrance to their suggestions—that is, to remove the roots and the near and remote occasions of sins.

The same author says in the same work, in On Penance, Distinction III: The perfidious still press, for they understand more than they ought, and say: “Although penance may avail those sinning once after baptism, nevertheless repeated penance will not profit those sinning often; otherwise remission would be an incitement to sin. For who would not sin if he could always return?”

But they were [read: But they err]. Indeed, it is certain that sins greatly displease him who is always ready to destroy them. For if he loved them, he would not always destroy them in this manner but preserve them.

Christ calls himself a physician. It belongs to physicians to heal a sick man a hundred times. He would be inferior to the other physicians if he were ignorant of things possible to others. He is mindful of himself who promised: “I do not wish the death of the sinner, but that he be converted and live.”

For what sinner did he exclude? That he promised indulgence to all he declares by other promises. “He who confesses me before human beings,” he says, and so forth. Every sinner, however great and however often he has sinned, of whatever order, even if he has been a priest—“I also will confess him before my Father”; that is, I will reveal him, his sin forgiven and himself made virtuous.

For “whoever shall call upon the name of the Lord”—that is, according to that by which he is called Lord, namely, whoever shall call him to himself by serving and not contradicting him, as that person did while existing as a sinner—“shall be saved.”

The same Augustine says in the same work, in On Penance, Distinction VI, Chapter I: Let the penitent labor to be in the Church and to strive toward the unity of the Church. Unless the unity of the Church comes to his aid, the soul of the dead person will not be liberated from the hands of the enemy.

But it must be believed that all the alms, prayers, and works of justice and mercy of the whole Church come to the aid of the one who acknowledges his death for conversion. Hence no one can repent worthily whom the unity of the Church does not sustain.

Augustine says in On the Words of the Apostle, Cause XI, Question III: Every Christian who is excommunicated by priests is said to be handed over to Satan. How so? Because the devil is outside the Church, just as Christ is in the Church.

The same author says upon John: A Christian ought to fear nothing so much as being separated from the body of Christ. For he who is separated from the body of Christ is not his member and is not animated by his Spirit, but is a member of the devil.

The same author says in On Penance, Distinction VI: Let one confessing not seek priests separated from the unity of the Church—namely, through heresy or excommunication.

Section XXII: Concerning restitution

The same Augustine says to Macedonius, in Cause XIV, Question VI: If another’s property, on account of which the sin exists, can be restored and is not returned, penance is not performed but feigned. But if penance is truly performed, the sin is not forgiven unless the thing taken away is restored, if it can be restored.

But concerning how restitution must be made, you have the matter in the second part, Title II.

The same Augustine says On Tithes, in Cause XVI, Question I: Tithes are the tribute of needy souls. And if you give a tithe, you obtain not only abundance of fruits but also health of the body.

Therefore the Lord does not seek a price but honor. But if it is a sin to give late, how much worse is it not to give?

And below: This is the Lord’s most just custom: that if you do not give him a tithe, you yourself will be reduced to a tenth. You will give to an impious soldier what you are unwilling to give to Christ.

God is always prepared to do good for us, but he is hindered by the malice of human beings. Tithes, therefore, are required from debt, and those who are unwilling to give them invade the property of others. Thus speaks he.

Concerning this matter you have a full treatment in the second part.

Title X, Chapter IX

“Like a vessel of gold, solid with every precious stone”

Like a vessel of gold, solid with every precious stone of virtues, was John Chrysostom, bishop of Constantinople in the times of the emperors Honorius and Arcadius.

His surname corresponds to him—namely, “Chrysostom,” which in Greek is interpreted “golden mouth”—on account of his very great wisdom and eloquence.

He wrote very abundantly in Greek, but few of his little works were translated into Latin. Certain sayings from them are inserted here.

Thomas says upon John that the Greeks, in expositions of the divine Scriptures, prefer Chrysostom’s exposition to all others.

He was a vessel full of grace, solid by the constancy with which he fearlessly rebuked and reproved everyone, even princes.

His life, manner of conduct, lineage, and persecutions are sufficiently declared in the Tripartite History. Moreover Palladius, a bishop and his disciple, described more fully in Greek, in the manner of a dialogue, the persecutions which John suffered, especially from Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria. The venerable Ambrose, abbot general of the Camaldolese order, translated this book from Greek into Latin around the year of the Lord 1430. From it I excerpted all the things set down below, except those which are alleged from the Tripartite History.

When John had therefore attained the eighteenth year of his age, he devoted his labor to the oratorical art. Medetius [i.e., Meletius], bishop of Antioch, a man of complete holiness, seeing him modest and powerful in intellect, caused him to remain with himself once he had been summoned, baptized him, and ordained him lector.

After three years, occupying the neighboring mountains, he gave himself as a companion to a certain old Syrian devoted to continence. He remained with him for four years, overcoming the incitements of natural ardor by the study of letters.

Thereafter he sought the desert and passed two years enclosed there in a cave. During this time, living almost without sleep, he thoroughly learned the sacred Scriptures. Made infirm by excessive vigils and abstinence, he was compelled to return to the city.

There he was made deacon, and after five years he was ordained presbyter by Flavian, bishop of holy memory, although unwilling and resisting. For twelve years in the office of the presbyterate, by word, writings, and holiness of life, he adorned the church of Antioch.

When blessed Nectarius, bishop of the see of Constantinople, had been taken from this light, many of the clergy who sought that see aided themselves with gifts and various entreaties. But the people solicited the king that a skilled and holy pastor be given to them.

It was suggested to the emperor, chiefly by Eutropius his chamberlain, that John, the presbyter of Antioch, be given, for the fame of his probity and doctrine was already flying through the regions. When this pleased him, he arranged that John the Constantinopolitan be summoned cautiously, lest perhaps, learning of it, he hide himself.

Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, beholding his constancy and irreprehensible confidence, attempted to impede his ordination but was unable.

Accordingly, when he had been ordained bishop, as is said in the Tripartite History, he was regarded as more severe on account of zeal for chastity. On account of the rectitude of his life, being incautious, he did not know how to foresee future things. In conversation he was judged arrogant by those who did not know him. In teaching he was foremost, in expounding excellent, and in restraining morals most capable.

Therefore, when he had been made bishop of Constantinople while Honorius and Arcadius reigned, he suddenly wished to correct the life of the clergy and stirred them all to hatred of him. They all avoided him as though he were furious and disparaged him among everyone.

Because he never invited anyone to a meal and did not wish to be invited by anyone, they said that he did this because he ate shamefully. Others proclaimed that he acted so on account of an excellent and exquisite use of foods. In truth, however, because of his abstinence his stomach and head always ached, and therefore he avoided the feasts of meals.

The people, however, loved him exceedingly on account of the sermons which he delivered in the church, making little of whatever his rivals spoke against him.

He compelled clerics who possessed concubines or women introduced secretly to cast them out. He preached against cupidity and admonished them to abstain from delicacies and drunken excess. He exhorted not only clerics but laymen to nocturnal vigils.

He cut away the superfluous expenses of his house and distributed them to the poor. On this account many watched to impose calumny upon him, searching into his former life at Antioch, but they found nothing reprehensible.

John also began to rebuke certain leading men, and therefore greater envy was kindled against him.

He did another thing which greatly moved many. Eutropius, the emperor's prefect, possessing consular dignity, wished to avenge himself upon certain persons who had fled to the church. He strove to have a law established by the emperor that no one should flee to a church; indeed, that accused persons who had fled there should be dragged out against their will.

A few days later, when Eutropius had offended the king, he fled to the church. John, hearing this, approached him as he hid beneath the altar and, making a reproving homily against him, rebuked him most harshly.

This matter offended many because John not only was unwilling to furnish mercy to the unhappy man but did not cease rebuking him. The emperor, however, took him from there and caused his head to be cut off. Therefore, because John confidently rebuked many for diverse causes, he was hateful to very many.

Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, wished to depose him and desired to intrude a certain presbyter named Isidore. Therefore he diligently sought causes for deposition.

But the people defended John and were fed by his doctrine with marvelous eagerness. John also compelled priests to live according to the canonical sanctions, saying that those who were unwilling to imitate the life of priests ought not to enjoy priestly honor.

He governed not only the city of Constantinople vigorously, but also the surrounding regions by prudent laws with imperial authority. When he learned that sacrifices were still offered to demons in Phoenicia, he sent clerics and monks there and caused the temples of idols to be destroyed.

At the same time there was a certain man named Gaymas [i.e., Gainas], Celtic by race, barbarous in counsel, wholly raised up by tyrannical ambition, infected with the Arian plague, and made master of the soldiers.

He had asked the emperor to give one church within the city to himself and his people. When the emperor had promised this, he asked John to grant him one church so that he might restrain his tyranny in this way.

But John, most powerful in virtue and wholly inflamed with zeal for the faith, said: "Do not, O emperor, promise this or give what is holy to dogs. Do not fear this barbarian, but command us both to be summoned and hear in silence what is said between us. I shall so restrain his tongue that he will not presume to seek this."

Hearing this, the emperor rejoiced and summoned them both on the next day. When Gainas sought one oratory for himself, John said: "The house of God is open to you everywhere, so that no one prevents you from praying."

Gainas said: "I am of another sect, and I demand to have one temple with my people. I have undertaken many labors for the Roman commonwealth; therefore I ought not to be contemned in my petition."

John answered him: "You have received very many rewards, and ones which surpass your struggles. You were made master of the soldiers and, moreover, adorned with the consular toga. You ought to consider what you were a little while ago and of what kind you now appear: what your former poverty was and what your substance now is; what garments you used and in what garments you are now clothed. Therefore, because a few labors conferred the greatest rewards upon you, do not be ungrateful toward the one who honors you."

By these words John closed his mouth and compelled him to be silent.

While John therefore governed the city of Constantinople vigorously, the aforesaid Gainas, seeking the empire, sent barbarians by night to burn the palace, since by day he could do nothing. Then it was openly shown how Saint John guarded the city.

For a packed multitude of armed angels possessing immense bodies appeared to the barbarians and immediately put them to flight. When they reported this to their lord, he marveled greatly, knowing that the army of soldiers had been stationed throughout other cities.

When on the following night he sent them again, they were similarly put to flight by the vision of the angels. At last he himself went out, saw the miracle, and fled, judging that soldiers lay hidden by day and guarded the city by night.

Departing from there, he went to Thrace and, gathering a great army, devastated everything, while all feared his barbaric savagery. The emperor therefore imposed the burden of an embassy upon most holy John.

But John, unmindful of enmities, departed eagerly. Gainas, recognizing his confidence undertaken on account of piety, met him after a long journey, placed John's right hand upon his own eyes, and commanded his sons to kiss John's sacred knees. For John was a man of such virtue that he compelled even very terrible men to be humbled and to fear him.

John Chrysostom therefore flourished at Constantinople and was held admirable by all. But when the Arians multiplied greatly and possessed a church outside the city, they nevertheless assembled on the Sabbath and the Lord's Day within the gates and porticoes and sang hymns and antiphons by night.

At daybreak, however, proceeding through the middle of the city, they assembled at their own church, frequently singing in contempt of the orthodox: "Where are those who say that three are one in power?"

John, fearing that the simple might be drawn by this singing, himself instituted that a multitude of the faithful should attend to nocturnal hymns, so that both the work of the Arians might be obscured and the profession of the faithful strengthened. He also caused silver crosses to be made, which were carried with silver candlesticks.

Then the Arians, inflamed by the zeal of envy, rose even to slaughter. One night Brison, the eunuch of the empress, who had been appointed by John to conduct the hymns, was struck by a stone. Certain persons from the people of each party were also killed. Moved by these things, the emperor prohibited the Arians from singing hymns publicly.

At that time Severian, bishop of Gabala, honorable among many leading men and greatly loved by the emperor himself and the empress, came to Constantinople and was received gratefully by John.

When John proceeded into Asia, he commended his church to Severian. But Severian commended not the faith but himself to the people. The cleric Serapion took care to report this very thing to Chrysostom.

When Severian passed by, Serapion did not rise. Indignant, Severian cried: "If the cleric Serapion shall not have died, Christ was not born in human nature."

Hearing these things, John returned and expelled Severian from the city as a blasphemer. This greatly displeased the empress, and she caused him to be recalled, asking John to be reconciled to him.

John in no manner acquiesced until the empress placed her son Theodosius upon his knees, supplicating and adjuring him to be reconciled to Severian.

Most especially this bishop Severian, Acacius, Antiochus, and a certain Isaac, a little Syrian who was leader of monks—disorderly and undisciplined men, rivals of John—strove toward his deposition. For because of his rebuke of vices and reformation of morals, John was grievous to them even to see.

Hence they opened their heart by letters to Theophilus, whose versatile talent for machinations of this kind they knew. Gladly embracing this, he sought an occasion, even a slight one, to accomplish it.

Section I

At that time Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, unjustly expelled Dioscorus, a most holy man, and Isidore, who previously had been his dearest friend. They came to Constantinople so that through John they might relate his deeds to the prince.

John honored them but, before knowledge of the cause, was unwilling to communicate with them. Nevertheless, a false rumor went to Theophilus that John communicated with them and brought them assistance.

Indignant, Theophilus armed himself mightily not only to exercise vengeance upon them but also to depose John. Concealing his intention, however, he sent to all the bishops of each city of that region, saying that he wished to condemn Origen's books.

He also circumvented Epiphanius, a most holy man and bishop of Cyprus, and made him his friend, similarly asking that he too condemn Origen's books. But Epiphanius, not attending to his deceits on account of his holiness, convoked his bishops in Cyprus and prohibited the reading of Origen's books.

He asked John to suspend himself from reading those books and to confirm the things which had been ordained. But John, making little of these things, labored in ecclesiastical teaching and flourished in it, and cared nothing for the things which were being devised against him.

At last Theophilus manifested his concealed hatred and indicated that he wished to depose John. Immediately John's enemies, many leading men of the palace, and clerics, finding an opportune time, strove that a council be held against John at Constantinople.

After these things Epiphanius came to Constantinople, bringing with him the condemnation of Origen's books, and declined John's invitation on account of Theophilus.

Some, on account of reverence for Epiphanius, subscribed to the condemnation of Origen's books, but very many refused to do this. One of them was Teotinus, bishop of Sichia [i.e., Theotimus, bishop of Scythia], a man most renowned for rectitude of life.

He answered thus: "My Epiphanius, neither do I bring injuries against one who has long rested well, nor do I presume to attempt a blasphemous matter. You condemn those things which our predecessors were unwilling to reject. For I perceive no evil teaching in his books. Those who bring insults against them do not know themselves."

"Athanasius, defender of the Nicene Council against the Arians, calls this man a witness of his faith, joining his books to his own and saying: 'The marvelous and most industrious Origen furnishes us this testimony concerning the Son of God, asserting that he is coeternal with the Father.'"

Here it must be observed that there was a great dispute concerning Origen's teaching among ancient and holy doctors, some approving and others reproving it. This was because the errors of his teaching had not been so manifested.

Hence those who approved it perhaps had not yet read those errors in his books, or because it was said that the errors had been inserted by falsifiers. But afterward, once they had been detected, the teaching together with its author was reproved by the Church, except for those things which Jerome approves as true.

John Chrysostom, however, was indignant that Epiphanius had performed an ordination in his church without ecclesiastical rules; nevertheless he asked that Epiphanius remain there with him among the bishops.

But he answered that he would neither remain with him nor pray unless John expelled Dioscorus and subscribed to the condemnation of Origen's books. When John refused to do this, Epiphanius was incited against John by those who envied him.

Hence Epiphanius passed judgment against Dioscorus, condemned Origen's books, and began to disparage John as their defender.

John sent him this message: "You have done many things contrary to the rules, O Epiphanius. First, you performed an ordination in a church constituted under my jurisdiction. Then by your own authority you celebrated sacred rites in it. Again, when invited, you excused yourself; and now anew you trust in yourself. Therefore take care lest sedition arise among the people and you yourself undertake the peril of this matter."

Hearing these things, Epiphanius departed. When he was about to return to Cyprus, he sent to John, saying: "I hope that you do not die a bishop."

John sent back to Epiphanius, saying: "I hope that you do not return to your homeland." Both assuredly happened. For Epiphanius died on the way, and John Chrysostom, deposed from the episcopate, ended his life in exile.

But when Epiphanius had departed from Constantinople, it was related to John, as is said in the Tripartite History, that the empress Eudoxia had incited Epiphanius against him.

On this account John, inflamed with zeal, delivered a sermon to the people which contained a complete reproach of all women. This sermon was accepted by all as though it had been delivered against the empress.

When the empress learned this, she complained to the emperor, saying that an insult brought against his wife redounded rather upon him. Moved by this, the emperor ordered that a synod be held against John.

Therefore Theophilus, hearing the desire of the emperor and empress, hastily gathered bishops already, as it were, prepared for this. All John's enemies eagerly came together, calling him proud and impious.

Accordingly, many bishops having been gathered at Constantinople, as is said in the Tripartite History, they no longer treated Origen's books but raised themselves against John. Hence they summoned him four times to the assembled synod.

He was unwilling to come, asserting that they were his manifest enemies, but cried that a universal synod should be held. Therefore the synod condemned him because he was unwilling to obey.

From this a great sedition was stirred among the people, who defended John against the clergy. But the emperor's command compelled him to depart.

Palladius sets these things out more fully; all that follows is in his words.

Section II

Palladius expresses the reason for which Theophilus expelled that holy man Isidore, formerly his friend.

This Isidore had been ordained presbyter by Athanasius. In the eightieth year of his age he was the receiver of pilgrims in the city of Alexandria.

A certain widow from among the foremost women of the city gave him one thousand gold pieces, adjuring him that he distribute them to the poor of Alexandria for clothing without Theophilus's knowledge, lest, if he knew, he expend them upon buying stones. For a certain rage for building had besieged him.

Isidore therefore received the money and distributed it to the poor. When this reached the ears of Theophilus—for he had spies for these matters—he caused Isidore to be summoned. When he learned from him that the matter stood thus, he bore it most grievously that the said money had not come to him and wished to avenge it as an injury to himself.

After two months, with priests assembled and Isidore present, Theophilus produced a paper which he himself had fabricated, saying: "I received this accusation against you, O Isidore. It is now the eighteenth year, but because I was occupied by other things I had handed it over to oblivion. While searching for other papers, I found this one again. What, therefore, do you answer to it?"

The paper contained the crime of the Sodomites. Isidore answered that the one who had given the libel should be summoned.

But because the young man whom Theophilus asserted had given the libel of accusation and with whom Isidore was said to have committed the evil was not present, the judgment was deferred until the next day.

Meanwhile, through his agents, Theophilus solicited a certain young man with many promises to accuse Isidore concerning this, offering him fifteen gold pieces to perform this very thing.

When the young man had arranged to execute it, he came to himself, fearing on the one hand the penalties of the laws if he failed in proof, and on the other Theophilus's indignation if he exposed the calumny; he fled to the church without carrying out the deed.

Nevertheless, after instituting a trial, Theophilus expelled Isidore from the Church, declaring that he had committed grave crimes. Isidore himself, fearing that Theophilus, aroused to still graver anger, might plot against his safety, went to Mount Nitria, resuming the monastic order in which he had been reared as a young man, and remained there in a cell.

Meanwhile Theophilus, conscious how indecently he had acted and mistrusting his uncertain victory, sent letters to the neighboring bishops, ordering that certain leading men be cast out from the mountain and the monks be driven from the inner desert. They came down to Alexandria with the elders and begged Theophilus to tell them why they had been condemned or cast out. Twisting his bloodshot eyes and raging like a many-formed monster, he fastened an iron collar with his own hands around the neck of Ammonius, his peer; striking his cheeks and attacking and bloodying his nose with outstretched fingers, he threatened in a roaring voice: "Heretic," he said, "anathematize Origen!" although nothing concerning Origen was at issue and only hatred of Isidore stood between them. Thus, bloodied and without any answer, they returned to their companions and devoted themselves to prayer.

Theophilus did not rest, but summoned the neighboring bishops and assembled a council against the monks. Although he had neither summoned them to answer nor addressed them, he condemned three leading men from among them, fearing to pronounce sentence against the multitude, and imputed perversity of doctrine to them. Though he had often honored them more than bishops before, he did not fear to call them magicians because they seemed attached to Isidore.

When Theophilus had therefore driven the holy men from the mountain, he procured for himself five little men who had never been seen in the assembly of the elders of the desert and were most unworthy. He ordained one of them as bishop, another as presbyter, and three as deacons.

He admonished them to give their accomplices libels of calumny against those three holy men, their fathers, similar to the other libels which he himself had composed.

Therefore he entered the imperial palace with them and, in his own person, brought an accuser against those men, namely the bishop of an Egyptian diocese. He asked that they be expelled from all Egypt by military force.

Accordingly, going to the mountain with an armed band, by night he invaded the monasteries, plundered their cells, and sought those three men with his customary indignation. Yet he did not find them, because they had hidden in a well with their books.

The monks, therefore, having been put to flight, made for Palestine and occupied Aelia, that is, Jerusalem. Three hundred monks outstanding in virtue followed them, while the others were dispersed through other places.

When Theophilus learned this, he commanded the bishops of Palestine by letters that they should not retain them, nor receive them either into an ecclesiastical place or into any other private place.

Compelled, therefore, to depart from there, they at last arrived at the imperial city, namely Constantinople. Visiting John and explaining to him the cause of their coming and expulsion, they commended themselves to him, concluding:

“If you also, father, despise us, whether from reverence for Theophilus or from fear of him, as do the other bishops, nothing now remains for us except to go to the emperor and publish the most wicked works of Theophilus himself, to the injury of the Church. Therefore, if you have a care for ecclesiastical reputation, persuade him to permit us to remain in Egypt. For we have sinned neither against the laws of our God nor against that man himself.”

Having heard these things, John, after tears of compassion and thinking that he could easily turn Theophilus’s anger against them into favor, willingly took up the matter. He admonished the men to conceal in silence the cause of their coming until he himself should write to Theophilus.

Meanwhile he caused provision to be made for their lodging and sustenance, the monks themselves assisting from the labors of their own hands.

Now it happened that clerics were then in the imperial city on certain business. John summoned them to himself and asked whether they knew those men and their case.

They answered that they knew them very well and that the men had suffered injury, but that it belonged to him to reconcile them to Theophilus. Yet in the meantime he should not communicate with them, lest Theophilus be saddened by this, though he should nevertheless render to them the offices of humanity.

John did all of this.

John wrote to Theophilus, supplicating and requesting this favor from him as from a son and brother: that he should recall those men to himself peaceably.

In reply, Theophilus indeed denied John the favor. He sent certain men trained for contests of this kind, of whom we spoke above, so that they might present libels which he himself had dictated, containing falsehood and calumny under a covering.

And since he could not disparage their manner of life, he caused them to be marked within the palace as though they were magicians from Egypt.

But when the monks perceived that they had accomplished nothing, but that he had turned aside into the precipice of greater anger, they brought with them many persons established in dignities. Anathematizing every heresy, they delivered libels to John in which the men now set forth his tyranny, adding certain chapters which it is vexing and shameful to recount before weaker persons.

Again, both by himself and through other bishops, John wrote to Theophilus, exhorting him that they should desist from the accusation. In this tenor he wrote again to Theophilus:

“These men have been driven to so great a resentment against you that they accuse you even by libels which they have presented. Now write back what seems good to you, for they do not listen to me that they should depart from this intention.”

At this Theophilus, inflamed with still greater anger, prohibited Dioscorus, bishop and brother of the monks, who had grown old in ecclesiastical affairs, from the Church itself, writing thus to Bishop John:

“I think that you are not ignorant of what the canons of the Nicene Council prescribe when they decree that a bishop is not to judge a case beyond his own boundaries. But if you are ignorant, learn, and cease to receive libels against me. For even if it is necessary for me to be judged, it is fitting that this be done by Egyptians rather than by you, who are separated from us by a journey of seventy-five days.”

Having received and read the letter, John indeed kept it by him. But to the monks of both parties he spoke those things which pertain to peace.

On hearing them, both parties were exasperated: the one because it seemed to be oppressed by the force of tyranny; the other, namely the party for Theophilus, because they would not presume to enter upon peace without him, at whose command they had presented libels full of calumny.

And so, after addressing them, John dismissed them from his presence.

Then the monks went forth, first meeting Augustus, and afterward approached the empress in the church. They asked John on their own behalf [read: they petitioned the empress in the church of Saint John] that the libels against them of the opposing monks—those, namely, who were of Theophilus’s party—should be examined before the prefects of the city; then that Theophilus, even if unwilling, should be brought and subjected to John’s judgment; and finally that Theophilus’s monks should either prove the crimes which they had cast against the holy elders or be subjected to the penalty of retaliation.

Thus Elaphius was sent to Alexandria to bring Theophilus, while the prefects were to execute the remainder of the sentence.

But when the case was argued and those men were detected in calumny, in their fear they turned everything back upon Theophilus, who had suborned them and had dictated the libels of calumny.

As the order of reason required, they were all imprisoned until Theophilus's arrival. Some of these died in custody because Theophilus delayed too long. Others, after his arrival, softened the severity of the judges with money and were sent into exile.

At last, though late, Theophilus arrived, standing like a tabereus [read: a dung-beetle] honored with filth among those whom he had brought from Egypt and India itself.

He remained there for three weeks. Neither did he meet Bishop John, as bishops are accustomed to do, nor did he approach the church, but he persisted in wandering by night and day and daily joining new hatred against John to the old, because John had received Isidore and Dioscorus, whom Theophilus had unjustly expelled, not into communion—as had been reported to him by wicked men—but for their sustenance.

He plotted against John so that he might not only be driven from the Church but deprived of life itself, partly by a profusion of gold against the truth, purchasing the partiality of powerful men; partly by more sumptuous banquets, inducing those given over to their belly; and partly by the hope of greater dignity, inducing various persons from among the clergy.

Two deacons had been driven out by John for their crimes and separated from the Church, one on account of homicide and the other on account of adultery. Theophilus, abusing their fickleness, exhorted them to present libels against John which he himself had dictated and which contained calumny. He promised to restore them to the place of their ministry, which he afterward also did.

Therefore John's principal adversaries were four bishops: Theophilus of Alexandria, Antiochus, Acacius, and Severian; two presbyters; five deacons; three men from the king's court furnishing aid with military force; and three wealthy widows, who to the destruction of their own salvation possessed money from plunder—money which could also disturb and intimidate the constancy of men—Marsa, Crasticia, and Eugraphia, vain and insufficiently chaste, and especially the third.

Theophilus stayed with Eugraphia, together with Severian, Acacius, Antiochus, and the rest who were hostile to John because of his most chaste admonitions.

At last they presented libels full of calumny against John to the emperor—with gold assisting them through all things—so that they might drag John himself, even unwilling, to their council.

"We were," says Palladius, who wrote these things, "with John, fifty bishops [read: forty bishops] then sitting in the episcopal dining hall, and wondering how that man, whom the emperor had commanded to come alone and answer for abominable crimes, had come accompanied by so many bishops; and how he now changed the opinions of the princes and perverted very many of the clergy."

While we were speaking thus among ourselves, John said: "Pray, brothers; and if indeed you love Christ, let no one for my sake desert his own church. For I am already being poured out, and the time of my dissolution is at hand. As I see, I shall first suffer many oppressions, and at last I shall depart from life. Remember me in your prayers."

Therefore, held by inexpressible grief, some of us poured forth a very great abundance of tears; others, kissing his eyes, his sacred head, and his mouth, could not restrain themselves from weeping and sobs.

"Sit down, brothers," said John, "and cease to weep, lest you afflict me further. For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain."

For the report had already flashed abroad, on account of the greatness of his boldness in rebuking, that he was to be beheaded.

"If you retain in memory," he said, "remember how I have always said to you that the present life is a way: both its sorrow and its joy pass by. All the things which we behold are marketplaces. We sell, we buy, and presently we depart. Are we better than the patriarchs, and do we surpass the prophets and the apostles, so that this life should remain immortal for us?"

At this one of those present, groaning, said: "But we lament our own lot: our desolation, because we are left as orphans; the widowhood of the Church; the confusion of the laws; the ambition of men who do not fear the Lord and who thrust themselves upon the rudders of the Church; the poor left destitute; and doctrine abandoned."

Having heard these things, John said to the speaker: "It is enough, brother. Do not pursue more. But, as I said, do not abandon your churches. For the teaching of Christ did not take its beginning from me, nor will it cease in me. Did not Moses die? Was not Joshua found after him? Did not Samuel die? Was not David conquered [read: anointed]? Paul was beheaded and left Tumotheus [read: Timothy]."

When these things had been said, Culisius, bishop of Apamea, said: "If we retain our churches, we shall necessarily be compelled to communicate and to subscribe."

At this the holy man said: “Communicate indeed, lest you divide the Church. But do not subscribe, for I am conscious of nothing on account of which I deserve to be deposed or cast down.”

Section III

While they were relating these things among themselves, it was announced that those whom Theophilus had sent were standing before the doors. John ordered them to enter immediately.

When they had entered, he asked of what rank they were. When he learned that they were bishops, he asked them to sit and to say for what cause they had come.

“We have only a brief,” they said. He ordered it to be read. Its text was as follows:

“The holy synod assembled at the Oak to John. We make known that we have received libels against you containing innumerable evils. Come, therefore, taking with you the presbyters Serapion and Tingi. For this is necessary.”

The place where Theophilus and his men had assembled was called the Oak; this place was outside the city.

After the document had been read, the bishops who were with John contradicted it, writing back to Theophilus through three bishops—Lupicius, Demetrius, and Elisha—and two presbyters—Severus and Germanus—all holy men, as follows:

“Do not dissolve the affairs of the Church. Do not confound order, and do not rend the Church for which Christ descended to the earth.

“But if, in your impatience, you wish to dissolve the canons of the Nicene Council and to hear a case beyond your own boundaries, come over to us yourself, into a well-ordered city. And do not, after the likeness of Cain, call Abel forth into the field so that we may hear you through a crack.

“For we have against you libels containing seventy headings of manifest and abominable actions. And, by the grace of God, more of us have assembled than has your synod—not for the overthrow of the Church, but for peace. For your synod has thirty-six bishops from one province, but we are forty from various provinces, among whom there are also seven metropolitans.

“And it is necessary and fitting, according to the canons, that the fewer be judged by the more numerous and more excellent. We also have your letter through which you admonish John, our fellow bishop, that a bishop ought not to judge beyond his own boundaries. Therefore, in obedience to the ecclesiastical laws, ask your accusers to desist from their accusation of you.”

But John said to his bishops: “Write what seems good to you; but it is fitting for me to reply to the things which have been written to me.”

Thus he sent a message to Theophilus, saying:

“Whether anyone is able to say anything against me, I do not know even to the present. But if anyone has brought something against me, and you wish me to come, remove from your assembly my manifest enemies, whom their own negligence has made hostile to me.

“And now let me not contend over the place where I ought to be judged, although it was especially fitting that this be done in the city.

“There are, however, those whom I reject as suspect: Theophilus, whom it is certain to have said in Alexandria and in Lycia, ‘I am going to the imperial court so that I may depose John.’ That this is true is proved from the fact that, when he arrived, he neither met me nor communicated with me.

“He, therefore, who is proved to have been an enemy before the hearing—what do you think he will do after judgment?

“Likewise Acacius, who said, ‘I am seasoning a pot for him.’ But what shall I say of Severian and Antiochus, whose crimes even the theaters of the age sing?

“Therefore, if in truth you wish me to come, drive these four from the council, if they are judges. If you do this, I am prepared to come not only to your charity, but to any universal synod.

“Know, therefore, that if you send to me a thousand times, you will carry back no other answer from me.”

When they had gone out, a notary immediately entered, having a royal edict by which, according to their demands, John was to be dragged unwilling to the judgment; and he pressed him.

When an answer had been given to the notary, two of John’s presbyters were announced as present: a certain Eugenius, who had received as the reward of his faction against John the episcopate of Heraclea, and Isaac, a monk—to say nothing worse.

They said to John: “The synod commands you to come over to us to answer the charges.”

John, in turn, wrote back through other bishops: “By what consequence, I ask, by what order do you judge, you who have made my enemies judges?”

At this, after those bishops had been seized, they killed one [read: they beat one], confounded another, and placed upon the neck of a third the iron which they had prepared for the holy man, so that, when it had thus been put upon him, they might send him by ship to more remote places.

Finally, they pronounced sentence against Saint John, whose face they had not seen and whose voice they had not heard, accomplishing together the wickedness which they had woven long before.

A report was sent to the emperor beginning thus:

“Because John, accused of certain crimes and conscious of them, was unwilling to appear to clear them, the laws depose persons of this kind, which is what he has suffered. The libels, however, contain a crime of injured majesty. Let Your Piety command him to be expelled, even unwilling, to pay the penalties for so great a crime. For it is not permitted to us to inquire into these things.”

The crime was a curse against the empress, whom—as they had reported—he had called Jezebel.

In this manner John was driven from the Church, a count having been sent for this with the assistance of soldiers, no differently than for a battle against barbarians.

And because this greatly displeased the people, lest a sedition arise he surrendered himself to them without resistance, so that he might be led secretly to the small estates of Bithynia.

But nearly half the day had passed when it happened that a certain movement, as though an earthquake, occurred in the king’s bedchamber.

Terrified by this, they recalled John by sending a notary, and a few days afterward restored him to his own throne.

But Theophilus, together with the Egyptian bishops, entrusted his safety to flight. For the city had borne his deed so indignantly that they sought to submerge him in the waves of the sea.

And it is said in the Tripartite History that, when an earthquake occurred, a murmur arose throughout the whole city, all saying that this had happened because of the unjust expulsion of John.

The empress asked the emperor that John be brought back into the city.

Many messengers were sent successively on behalf of the emperor and the people, asking that he return, come to the aid of the perishing city, and calm the sedition of the people.

Although under compulsion, he returned, the people meeting him with wax candles and lamps.

And when the people wished him to sit in his seat in the customary manner, he was unwilling, saying that it was fitting for him to be restored by the synod which had condemned him.

The people, however, persisted so urgently in requesting this that he acquiesced in them, namely, by sitting upon the episcopal throne.

At that time a silver statue, wrapped in a cloak, had been placed in the square beside the church of Saint Sophia in honor of the empress; there soldiers and leading men performed public games.

This greatly displeased John, since he saw that it pertained to an injury of the Church.

Therefore, with his accustomed boldness, he again armed his tongue. And although it was fitting to turn the princes aside by a word of supplication so that they should withdraw from such sport, he did not do this; rather, using the sovereignty of his eloquence, he assailed those who saw such things being done.

The empress drew this toward an injury to herself, and again sought that a synod be held against him.

John, perceiving this, delivered that famous homily: “Herodias still rages,” and so forth. This provoked the empress still more to procure his expulsion.

After another two months, having breathed a little after the blow inflicted, they raged against John a second time.

Finding no plausible beginning at all, they sent to Alexandria, to the sophist most expert in this matter, suggesting thus:

“Either come again as our leader, to act against John; or, if you fear to do this because of the people, suggest to us some manner from which we may take a beginning.”

Having received the letters, Theophilus himself was unwilling to come, knowing by what deed he had escaped. But he sent those three bishops, sending together with them certain canons made by the Arians against the most blessed Athanasius, so that, by using these, they might construct calumnies against John: namely, because after his deposition he had dared to return without a secular decree.

For he was by nature fervid, rash, bold, and contentious beyond measure; and whatever had seemed good to him, he tolerated neither judgment nor counsel, striving from the outset that his own judgment and sentence should always conquer and prevail.

They did what they had been instructed to do. When metropolitans and all the bishops had been summoned from Cappadocia, Syria, Pontus, and Phrygia, they assembled at Constantinople.

Upon arriving, they communicated with John according to the order of the canons, lest they incur the same things as before.

When this matter was learned, the princes bore it ill. And Theodore, bishop of Tyana, a man of the highest gravity, when he perceived from those who had come what was to be done, took leave of the imperial court and returned to his own church, lest he follow the rashness of Theophilus.

But Leontius and Ammonius, satellites of Theophilus, together with the bishops Acacius and Antiochus, caused that most wicked sentence to prevail in this second synod, decreeing against John that no place should be given John to clear himself, by force of the canons which Theophilus had sent, issued by forty accomplices of Arius and containing as follows:

“If any bishop or presbyter, justly or unjustly deposed, shall of his own accord return to the church without a synod, he shall no longer have any place for excuse, but shall be expelled altogether.”

And this rule, as wicked and issued by the most wicked men, was eliminated at the Council of Sardica by the Romans, Illyrians, Italians, Macedonians, and Greeks, when Liberius or Julius, under the rule of Constans, admitted Athanasius and Marcellus the Galatian to communion, on whose account that canon had been issued.

And those two, Leontius and Ammonius, joined to Acacius, Antiochus, Cyrinus, and Severian, enemies of John, went in to the king so that, by force of the said canon, John should be driven from the Church without any hearing, because he had returned to his church without the authority of a synod.

And when a dispute took place before the king, the Johannites—that is, those who supported John’s party—asserted that the canon had been issued by the Arians; the Theophilites—that is, those who favored the injustice of Theophilus—asserted, to the contrary, that the canon had been established by Catholics.

The venerable man Elpidius, bishop of Laodicea in Syria, together with Tranquillus, advised the king that John ought not to be expelled irrationally. For he had not previously been deposed, but had been driven out by a count. Nor had he returned of himself, but at the command of His Piety, a notary having been sent for this purpose.

Furthermore, it could be shown by manifest indications that the canons which they brought forward were those of heretics.

But when John’s adversaries persisted in contending without discipline, and some were making a din with clamorous voices while others appeared to rave before the emperor with insolent gestures and swollen mouths, Elpidius, most learned in the canons, modestly obtained a little silence and addressed the king thus:

“Let us not vex Your Clemency longer, O emperor, but let this be done: let our brothers Acacius, Antiochus, and the others subscribe that they are of the faith of those who set forth the canons which they themselves allege. Then the controversy is resolved.”

When the emperor perceived the simplicity of the proposal, he smiled and said to Antiochus: “Nothing more useful can be brought forward.”

The emperor, however, was innocent in all the things which were being done.

Severian and the others, therefore, being anxious concerning this proposal, since they could answer nothing before the king’s judgment, and being pressed by their difficulties, promised, although unwilling, to subscribe.

But when they had departed from the king’s presence, they refused to fulfill the promise, as though it had been made without deliberation. They deliberated instead upon the manner in which John might be expelled.

While these things were being done, and some thought thus and others otherwise, nine or ten months passed, during which Bishop John, with forty-two bishops joined to him, daily conducted the things of God, and the people enjoyed his teaching with great delight.

Meanwhile the season of Lent arrived. Antiochus and the others again went in to the king and persuaded him that, with Easter approaching, he should command John to be expelled as though convicted.

The emperor, worn down by their wickedness, believed them as though they were bishops. He therefore commanded John to leave the church.

John answered him: “I received this church from God our Savior so that I might diligently care for the salvation of the people, and I cannot abandon it. But if you altogether wish this to be done, because the city dissents from you, use force against me, so that I may have as an excuse that, expelled by your authority, I left my order.”

And thus, sending men from the palace with a certain reserve, they drove him out, commanding meanwhile that he remain in the episcopal residence.

At the same time they awaited some sign of divine indignation, so that if anything should happen either to his adversaries or to themselves, by bringing him again into the church they might reconcile God to themselves; otherwise they would again plot against him, as Pharaoh against Moses.

Amid these things the day of Holy Saturday arrived. Again they commanded him to leave the church which he had entered to perform the offices. He answered them according to his former words.

The king, therefore, fearing the holy day and a commotion of the city, summoned Acacius and Antiochus and said to them: “What are we doing? See whether perhaps you have not counseled rightly.”

Then those most valiant and exceedingly great-hearted men in wickedness said to the king: “Let the deposition of John be upon our head, O emperor.”

As the assistance which remained, the bishops who were present with John approached the king and queen in the shrines of the martyrs, asking with tears that they spare the Church of Christ, especially because of the approaching Easter, and that they restore to those who were to be regenerated, who were already fully instructed, their priest.

But they were not heard. Thus Saint Paul, a bishop undaunted and full of confidence, said to Queen Eudoxia: “Fear God. Have mercy upon your children, and do not violate the holy solemnity of Christ by an effusion of blood.”

Finally, John’s presbyters in whom the fear of God was present began the vigils after the people had assembled in the public bath which is called the Constantinian.

When Antiochus, Acacius, and Severian, men of a ruined mind, learned this, they approached the master of the soldiers, importunately asking him to impede the assembly of the people.

When he refused because he feared a scandal among the people, they persisted in this, denying that a commotion of the people would occur and relying upon lies. At last he gave them a certain Lucius, a pagan tribune of the soldiers.

This Lucius, having with him four hundred Thracians, suddenly rushed by night, together with the clerics and soldiers of Acacius, upon the Lord’s flock like a wolf. With flashing iron he made a way for himself and cut apart the people as they attended to the divine rites.

He proceeded so far that amid the blessed waters he prevented those who were being initiated, and he shed the blood of the deacon who held the venerable mysteries in his hands. Striking the presbyters upon the head with clubs, he filled the baptismal pool with blood.

Naked women, together with the men who had been prepared for baptism, committed themselves to flight from fear of slaughter or of dishonorable defilement.

One departed weeping, wounded in the hand. Another dragged a virgin cut open by blows. All, having turned to plunder, appropriated to themselves all the ornaments and the things stored away.

Presbyters and deacons were sent to prison. Edicts containing various threats were repeatedly posted in various places unless each person should renounce communion with John.

When the fifty days had been completed, after the fifth day Acacius, Antiochus, Severian, and Cyrinus entered before the emperor and said to him:

“O king, you have been given to us by God, subject to no one. Since you rule over all, it is permitted to you to do whatever you wish. Do not be more merciful than the presbyters or holier than the bishops. We said to you in the presence of all, ‘Let the deposition of John be upon our head.’ Therefore do not spare one man to the destruction of us all.”

The king therefore sent a notary and commanded these things to John: “Acacius, Antiochus, Severian, and Cyrinus have placed your condemnation upon their own heads. Therefore, commending yourself to God, depart from the church.”

Thus, after the manifest command, Bishop John, as he was departing together with the bishops who favored him, said to all: “Come, let us pray.”

Then a certain faithful man from among the foremost of the city made these things known to John: “Because Lucius, exceedingly bold and shameless of face, is prepared in the public bath with the soldiers to drag you away and expel you unwilling if perhaps you resist or delay, a great commotion is arising among the people. Hasten to depart from the church, lest perhaps the people, flowing together to your aid, join battle with the soldiers.”

Then John, having kissed certain of the bishops with tears, addressed those who were within the sanctuary, saying: “Remain here meanwhile, so that, having departed, I may rest a little.”

Entering the baptistery, he summoned Olympias, Petachia [read: Pentadia], and Procula, deaconesses, most devout and noble virgins already of mature age, and Silvina, the wife of the blessed Nobriolus [read: Nevridius], then a widow outstanding in virtue. He said to them:

“Come here, daughters, and hear me. As I see, the things concerning me have their end, and perhaps you will see my face no more.

“This one thing I ask, this I beseech: let none of you abandon her customary benevolence toward the Church. And whoever shall have been ordained not of his own will nor from ambition, but by the consent of all, incline your heads to him as to John. For the Church cannot exist without a bishop. Have mercy upon me by always remembering me in your prayers.”

At these things the women, drenched with tears and lamentation, rolled themselves at his sacred feet.

Then John made a sign to one of the more honorable presbyters, saying: “Take these women away from here, lest they disturb the multitude.”

He departed toward the eastern side, leaving aside the western, where a beast of burden had been prepared and the people were awaiting his departure from there.

John avoided this so that there might be no sedition and conflict among the people.

Section IV

After these things a flame, suddenly leaping from the middle of the throne upon which John had been accustomed to sit, like a heart placed in the middle of a body, sought the teacher of the word of God.

When it did not find him, it consumed the whole seat; gradually rising upward, it went out through the roof.

But so that there might be a perpetual memorial of that deadly synod, that fire passed harmlessly over the intervening multitude of the people like a man crossing a bridge.

It did not first seize the nearer part of the church—lest we attribute an event of this kind to proximity—but the nearest part of the royal hall, so that no one might doubt that the miracle had been divinely brought about.

That fire, whirling about, was stirred as though proceeding by a certain compact. It demolished the adjoining roofs and spared only the small building in which a multitude of sacred vessels had been stored.

It did not reverence the material of gold or silver, but spared it lest it furnish to detractors a place for falsehood, so that they might be able to charge the holy man with having carried away something from the precious furnishings.

No loss of life occurred in that assault of the fire, either of human beings or of beasts. Rather, the force of that conflagration washed away the filth of those wickedly dwelling there, while the fire ruled from the sixth hour until the ninth.

Meanwhile, of the bishops who supported John’s party, some were held shut up, others were dragged into custody, and some lay hidden.

But John, together with Cyriacus and Eulysius, were bound by the prefects’ soldiers and led into Bithynia, not without threats of punishments because the church had been burned.

Afterward Cyriacus and Eulysius, having been brought bound together with the other clerics and proved innocent, were dismissed.

But the most blessed John added at last this proof of constancy to his remaining boldness, writing to them in this manner: “Even if in other matters no place for answering has been given to me, at least let me be heard concerning the deed done to the church. Indeed, as you say, I was the author of the fire; yet I was not heard even about this.”

He was led by soldiers into a most remote town of Armenia so that he might be killed by the Isaurians, who besieged it by night and sometimes by day. This place is called Cucusus.

A certain Arsacius, brother of the blessed Nectarius, was substituted in John’s place as bishop of Constantinople—a man whom fishes would surpass in eloquence and frogs in conduct.

When he had lived for one year and two months, he died at the end, swearing that under oath he had promised his brother Nectarius that he would never admit any election to the episcopate made concerning him.

Atticus, a presbyter and the architect of the entire plot against John, was substituted for Arsacius.

When he perceived that none of the eastern bishops nor the people of the city itself communicated with him, Atticus, ignorant of the divine Scriptures, acted so that those who did not communicate might be compelled by imperial rescripts when summoned.

The rescript against the bishops contained threats of this kind: “If anyone shall not communicate with Theophilus, Porphyrius, and Atticus, let him be driven from the church and cast out from his own possessions.”

Hence some, weighed down beyond measure by the weight of earthly things, communicated in large numbers; others were drawn to communicate by gifts.

But those who despised lineage, homeland, the glory of the world, and bodily oppression fled so that they might not communicate. Some preserved themselves at Rome, others in the mountains, and others in monasteries.

The rescript against laymen who would not communicate with that intruder contained this: if they were in dignities, they should remain deprived of them; if in the military, they should surrender the military belt; common people and artisans, after being fined money, should be driven into exile.

John, however, passing a year in exile at Cucusus, fed very many of the Armenian poor with the word of God.

His rivals, stirred by envy when they heard of his fruit, transferred him to Arabissus, subjecting him to various injuries so that, if they could, they might drive him even from life.

But there also, accomplishing the greatest marks of virtues, he drew many to God by his words, even unbelievers.

Hence, goaded by the flame of greater envy, Severian, Porphyrius, and other bishops from Syria—because the odor of his holiness grew everywhere—took care that he be transferred to another place.

And when they heard at Antioch that John’s most welcome philosophy was being proclaimed, they were cut to the heart.

Struck by this marvel, many clerics of the opposing faction said: “See a terrible dead man making the living and the victors tremble—astonishing!”

Those who trembled lest secular powers and ecclesiastical riches be lost together with their own power and principate testified by their pallor to their fear of one priest alone, deprived of his city, weak in flesh, and an exile.

Unable therefore to bear it, they sent to the army another, stronger rescript with an added penalty, procuring that John be transferred through the narrow places of a certain region, from which it was not permitted to depart, to Pityus, namely, a wholly deserted place.

Moreover, the soldiers of the praetorian prefect who conducted him pressed him exceedingly hard along the way. They asserted that they had it in their commands that they were to be advanced to a higher rank if he died on the road.

One of them, indeed, secretly showed him some humanity. But the other was so hostile and savage that he regarded the recommendations and blandishments made to him on behalf of the holy man as injuries done against himself, caring for this alone: that John should die.

Finally, when there was violent rain, so that the inundation beat upon his back and breast, the man, caring nothing, led him out.

Again he regarded an immense heat of the sun as a delight, knowing that by this the holy man’s head, bald like that of Elisha, was afflicted.

While amid all these things the holy man completed that most difficult journey for three months, he persevered like a radiant star.

They arrived at a certain church where a certain holy martyr named Basiliscus was buried, who had suffered martyrdom under Diocletian at Nicomedia together with Saint Lucian. There they remained.

And in that night Basiliscus appeared to him, saying: “Brother John, have confidence, for tomorrow we shall be together.”

This happened. For when they continued the journey, leading John toward the place of exile, and he was afflicted by fevers on the road, they brought him back to the said church of the martyr Basiliscus.

There John, having received the heavenly sacraments, poured forth a prayer before all those standing by, saying according to his custom: “Glory be to God for all things.”

And having signed himself at the end of the prayer, he stretched out his feet and passed over to Christ.

So great a multitude of virgins, and so great a company of monks and of persons distinguished by the testimony of a more honorable life, came to meet him from Syria, Cilicia, and Pontus, that very many thought they had come by arrangement.

And he was buried honorably with the martyr Basiliscus.

Section V

Although a certain reason has been assigned in the Tripartite History, as is evident above, Palladius himself assigns several causes why John ate alone, as it were, and wished neither to invite others to eat nor to be invited.

First, because on account of the heat of his head he was unsightly, except that in the summer he used what is called dia-rhodon.

Then, because by reason of a certain infirmity his stomach required an ordered regimen, to such an extent that often the things which had been prepared seemed distasteful and it was necessary to seek things which were not present.

Then, because, often forgetful of food, he fasted until evening, partly occupied by ecclesiastical cares and partly abstracted by spiritual understandings.

Then, to avoid the laughter, guffaws, vain speech, and detraction which occur at banquets; and, being an adversary of intemperance in delicacies, he judged it altogether a sacrilege.

Then, so that he might cut away from the stewards occasions of theft, lest, multiplying in their accounts the prices of gifts which had been designated for the use of the poor, they should claim them for themselves.

Furthermore, considering the dispositions of the city, he judged that it was fitting for him, as a steward of Christ, either to honor all dignities equally or to subject himself to no one.

And on account of these things, bidding farewell to curses arising from matters of this kind, he ate alone.

Section VI

And because that Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, in order to excuse his own rashness in his proceeding and persecution against John, asserted in his writing that John, incited by a lust for domination, had deposed sixteen bishops in one day and ordained his own men in their places, Palladius declares this to be false.

For it was not sixteen but only six bishops of Asia, and not in one day but after an investigation conducted over two years and in a council of very many bishops and metropolitans, who were removed on account of their excesses; and other men, outstanding in virtue and eloquent in doctrine, were substituted.

For when the bishops of Asia had assembled at Constantinople on account of ecclesiastical necessities, Eusebius, bishop of Valentinopolis, on the first day of the week handed to the synod a libel of accusation against Antonius, bishop or archbishop of Ephesus, containing seven chapters concerning his excesses.

The last of these was that he held it as a decree and law to sell the ordinations of bishops according to the measure of their revenues.

Both those who gave and Antonius, who received, were present; nor were proofs lacking.

When the libel had been received, John exhorted Eusebius to desist, lest perhaps he had been moved against Antonius by indignation, but instead to be reconciled to his brother. He also procured the same through another bishop familiar with him.

Eusebius, however, persisted, again presenting a libel containing the same things and adjuring John that he proceed in the case, for he was prepared to prove the crimes alleged.

When those chapters had therefore been read through, those father bishops assembled in the council began to examine the last one, namely that concerning simony, as the crime of greater weight and more detestable.

Antonius, who was present, was therefore questioned and denied the alleged crime.

Those also were questioned who had been named as having given him money for ordination, and they similarly denied it.

Eusebius offered to prove it through witnesses; but because they were not present, the case was deferred.

And because John feared the suborning of the witnesses, in order to discover the truth of the matter John arranged to go personally into Asia to examine them.

When Antonius, conscious of his crime, perceived this, he treated secretly with one of the more eminent men of the court who was his friend, so that John should not be permitted by the prince to depart, on the ground that he was more necessary for the affairs of the city.

When this had been done, the examination of this matter was committed to one of the metropolitans and two bishops, so that they should go into Asia to the city of Pepis [read: Hypaepa], and within two months the witnesses who had been introduced should appear under penalty of excommunication.

For various reasons they did not appear, nor did Eusebius the accuser at the appointed time; on account of this he too was excommunicated, either as a deserter or as a detractor.

Meanwhile the accused Antonius died.

The Ephesians sent to John that there should be given to them a chief priest who would govern well the church that had long been afflicted, both by Arians assailing it and by men devoted to avarice and money. They asked him to come personally and to furnish to that church a form of living well.

John went, although he was held by ill health of body and the inclemency of the weather stood in his way. Embarking upon a ship, after a storm he finally arrived at Ephesus.

And when the bishops of Lydia, Asia, and Caria had assembled, amounting to seventy men, they ordained a bishop there.

Eusebius was present, asking to be reconciled. When this was denied him because he had committed calumny, he added prayers, saying:

“Although this case has been argued for two years and only the delay of the witnesses stood in its way, I beseech Your Piety that you deign to examine the witnesses, for they are now present. For although Antonius, who performed the ordination after accepting gold, has died, nevertheless those who were ordained after giving a price are alive.”

It pleased the synod that the matter be examined more diligently. The things which had been done were read out. The witnesses entered, and those also entered who had been ordained after giving gold.

At first they denied it. But when the witnesses persisted—partly laymen, partly presbyters in whom they had previously seemed to confide, and certain women—recounting the nature of the gifts, the places, the times, and the quantity, and when consciousness of the crime also pressed them, they confessed of their own accord, without being compelled to the uttermost.

“We gave it,” they said, “thinking that this was the custom, so that we might seem to be freed from the curia. But now, if indeed it is honorable, we ask that we remain in the ministry of the Church. But if not, let us at least receive back the gold which we gave. For some of us gave the gold and various furnishings of our wives.”

At this John promised the synod, saying: “I shall press the king that they be absolved. But you command them to receive from the revenues of Antonius what they gave.”

The synod commanded that the gold be restored by the heirs of Antonius, and that those men, removed from the priesthood, remain in communion, lest, if such things were everywhere permitted, an Egyptian custom should arise of selling and buying the priesthood.

The records of all these things are extant, and the judges survive.

For the investigation was not made in one day, as Theophilus lies, but over two full years; nor were sixteen deposed for the vice of simony, but six.

In their place others were substituted, distinguished in virtue and adorned by the grace of divine speech.

But after John’s exile, within four years, his most wicked rivals recalled these men into the church, driving out those who had been lawfully substituted, to the supreme destruction and singular detriment of Christ’s sheep.

And, having ordained the eunuch of Victor the tribune, they placed him in the episcopal seat.

But the man who had been ordained by seventy bishops they kept shut in prison to the present time.

He was a man who had been trained in the liberal disciplines and who, after a solitary life, had been called from the desert because of his knowledge of sacred things.

That eunuch, however, was subject to his belly, raving after women, shameless, a purchased and ignoble prostitute, neither man nor woman; he is said to have carried theatrical girls upon his shoulders, his head crowned with ivy, even after his baptism.

When Flavian, bishop or patriarch of Antioch, died, a certain most holy man, Constantius, was called by the people to be bishop. He was meek above all others, singular in active and contemplative life, a virgin, and, in brief, admirable in every virtue.

But when the criminal Porphyrius saw a man of such merit, he took care to drive him away by money in this manner. He wrote to the princes and obtained that he be driven into exile as the author of innovations and sedition.

They sought that another be appointed in his place, and secretly did what they had sought, Porphyrius himself, together with Acacius, Antiochus, Severian, and their accomplices, having accepted a price.

Section VII

Afterward, however, John was driven from the Church a second time.

Theophilus sent his letters to Pope Innocent, indicating how he had deposed him.

When Innocent had read them, he shuddered at the rashness and pride of Theophilus, objecting that he alone had written and that he had omitted to report the course of the whole affair: namely, for what reason and with what persons joined to himself he had dared to depose John. Moved by the indignity of the affair, he wished to write back nothing.

After three days four bishops sent by John arrived, most reverend men bearing letters to Pope Innocent: one from John, a second from forty bishops concerning communion with John, and a third written by John's clergy.

John's letter had the following beginning:

"To the venerable and most blessed lord, Bishop Innocent, John: greeting in the Lord.

"We think that, even before our letter, this audacious crime has reached the ears of Your Piety. Indeed, the magnitude of the wickedness has caused no part of the world to remain which the report of this dreadful calamity has not filled. Rather, the fame of the deeds, reaching even the very ends of the earth, has stirred immense groaning and mourning everywhere.

"But because it is fitting not merely to mourn and pursue the matter with lamentations, but to amend it according to our strength and prudently to foresee how this most savage storm of the Church may be put to rest, we judged it necessary to exhort my most honorable lords the prelates, Clement, Pappus, and Eugenius [read: Demetrius, Pansophius, Pappus, and Eugenius], to leave their churches, entrust themselves to the sea, and hasten to your charity, so that, when all things had been clearly set forth, they might earnestly request that a salutary remedy be given to so great a calamity."

Thereafter John narrates the event at length in the letter itself: how Theophilus, bishop of the Alexandrian church, although commanded by the emperor to come to Constantinople to clear himself of the crimes alleged against him, finally came with many bishops, not to clear the crimes but to depose John.

And when, after assembling a synod of his own men, he had drawn John's clergy to himself, he caused John to be summoned by bishops to the synod to answer his accusers.

When John refused, alleging that his accusers and judges were his manifest enemies, but offering himself as prepared to answer the objections and to clear himself before any persons whatever, provided that the matter proceeded in the due manner, Theophilus therefore deposed him and cast him out of the Church and the city.

But when John had been recalled by the emperor as quickly as possible to his own church, John himself urged the emperor to assemble a council to which Theophilus and he might come so that the affair could be examined.

But Theophilus had already fled.

Afterward, when many bishops had again been assembled at Constantinople by Theophilus's accomplices, through their procurement and conspiracy John had again been cast from his church by military force, a great slaughter having been made in the church on the night of the Easter solemnity.

And at last he concludes the letter thus:

"Therefore, considering all these things and learning them manifestly and more fully from my lords the venerable bishops, deign to apply your zeal, labor, and diligence, which is the duty of our party. For thus you will confer a favor not only upon us but upon all the churches, and you will receive a reward from God.

“We have also written these things to Venerius, bishop of Milan, and to Chromatius, bishop of Aquileia. Farewell in the Lord.”

To these things the most blessed Pope Innocent wrote back. Maintaining communion with both parties, he decreed that Theophilus’s judgment was null and void, saying that another irreproachable synod of western and eastern priests ought to be assembled, with the parties’ friends first withdrawing from the council, and then their enemies, since the judgment of either party is very often not right.

A few days afterward, a presbyter of Theophilus came with a deacon of the church of Constantinople, carrying Theophilus’s letters and certain records in which John appeared to have been condemned by thirty-six bishops.

When Innocent had read these and discovered that neither were the faults grave nor had John been present, he shuddered more and more at the madness of Theophilus.

Having dismissed them with grave letters rebuking his rashness, he gave himself to the work of prayer; and, after a fast had been proclaimed for the Church, he prayed to divine clemency that scandals of this kind might be removed.

The substance of the letter was this:

“Brother Theophilus, we decree that both you and our brother John are in our communion, as we also expressed in our former letters; and we now also persist in the same judgment.

“Therefore, if you trust in your conscience, you too hasten to judgment at the next synod to be held, and contend there according to the canons and decrees of the Nicene Council. If you prevail, your case will be evident and irrefutable.”

A short time had passed when the presbyter Teotinus of Constantinople [read: Theotecnus of Constantinople] came, carrying the letters of a council of twenty-five bishops of John. By these they taught that John had been driven from the city with the aid of soldiers and sent into exile, and that the church had been burned.

A little afterward there arrived a little man foul in appearance and ruined in mind, who vomited forth many curses against John. He had brought letters from certain bishops—Acacius, Antiochus, Cyrinus, and Severian—and delivered them to Innocent; by these John was falsely accused of having burned the church.

When this falsehood had been manifestly detected, Innocent repelled him with indignation, not even wishing to write back.

Different bishops who had been sent arrived daily, carrying letters from very many persons.

Among the others were Germanus the presbyter and Cassianus the deacon of John, men of great religion, who brought letters from all John’s clergy. These contained that their church had suffered tyranny, its bishop having been violently expelled by soldiers and sent into exile, while the bishops Acacius, Antiochus, Severian, and Theophilus of Alexandria effected it.

Innocent, the Roman pontiff, endured it no longer.

He wrote to Emperor Honorius, brother of Arcadius, who ruled in the West, that he should cause a synod of western bishops to be assembled concerning these things, and, when they had come together into one judgment, report it to him.

When this had been done and the judgment reported, Emperor Honorius wrote to Pope Innocent that he should send five bishops, two presbyters of the Roman church, and a deacon who would carry his letters to his brother.

The tenor of the letter was this:

“I now write for the third time to Your Clemency, asking that you correct the things wickedly done against John, bishop of Constantinople. But, as I see, this has not been done to the present.

“Wherefore, desirous of ecclesiastical peace and troubled with immense care, I write again through holy bishops and presbyters. For when the churches are at peace, peace also comes to our empire.

“Command the eastern bishops to assemble at Thessalonica. For our western bishops have sent chosen men of stern constancy, who incline toward neither party through love or hatred: five bishops, two presbyters of the Roman church, and one deacon.

“I ask that you receive them with every honor, so that, if they have been persuaded that John was justly expelled, they may teach me to depart from his communion. But if they discover that the eastern bishops acted wickedly of their own accord, let them likewise separate themselves from the communion of those men.

“What the judgment of the western bishops concerning Bishop John is can be established from almost all the letters which they have repeatedly given to me. Of these I have appended two containing the same thing after the remainder, namely those of the bishops of Rome and Aquileia.

“But before all things I ask this from Your Clemency: command Theophilus of Alexandria to be present, even unwilling. For all these evils are said to have arisen through him, so that the synod of the arriving bishops, impeded in nothing, may bring a peace fitting for our times.”

Therefore three holy bishops and two presbyters received the letters of Emperor Honorius, Pope Innocent, and the bishops of Italy—Chromatius of Aquileia, Venerius of Milan, and other bishops—and one commonitory of the whole West, and, undertaking the journey at public expense, proceeded toward Constantinople.

The commonitory was this: that John ought not to enter into judgment unless the church and communion were first restored to him, so that, with every occasion of delay removed, he might be able to enter the council of his own accord.

After four months they returned, reporting Babylonian affairs: namely, that they had been detained at Athens by a certain tribune of the soldiers, who afterward added a centurion to them, who did not permit them to approach Thessalonica at all.

For there they intended first to deliver their letters to Bishop Anysius, because the council was to be assembled there.

And, having been thrown into two ships after a storm, on the third day they arrived before the city near the suburbs of Victor.

In that place, detained by those who guarded the ports, they were commanded to go back. Shut up in the maritime fortress which they call Athyra, and tortured there, they were divided from one another: the Romans in one cell, the others in several.

When they were required to give up the letters, they did not acquiesce, saying that it was not fitting that, since they were elders, they themselves should not deliver the emperor’s letters and those of the bishops to the emperor himself.

When we obstinately refused and wished to give them neither to the notary who came nor to others who pressed us for this, at last a certain tribune of the soldiers named Valerian, from Cappadocia, approached. Having broken the thumb of Bishop Marianus, he violently took away the sealed letter of the king together with the other letters.

On the following day, either the king’s courtiers or Atticus, who was said to have invaded John’s see, sent to us, offering three thousand numismata so that we should communicate with Atticus and remain altogether silent concerning John’s judgment.

We did not acquiesce in them at all. We therefore persisted in asking that, since we could accomplish nothing peaceful, we should at least be permitted to return to our churches.

The savagery of the men moved them, and the Savior had also shown this by various revelations.

For Paul the Apostle had appeared in the ship to a certain holy deacon, a most meek and chaste man, saying: “See how carefully you walk, not as unwise but as wise, redeeming the time, because the days are evil.”

Therefore that same tribune Valerian, standing by, threw them into an old and rotten ship, a price—as was reported—having been given to the shipmaster that he should destroy them. Sailing continuously, he drove them away from Tyris [read: Athyra].

After very many stadia had therefore been traversed, when we already seemed about to perish, we arrived at Lampsacus. Having changed ship, from there they reached Hydruntum in Calabria.

Palladius does not relate further what was done thereafter.

But it is found in the Tripartite History that, when John had passed to the Lord, violent hail descended upon Constantinople and all its suburbs, all saying that this proceeded from the wrath of God because of the unjust expulsion of John.

The death of the empress, which followed on the fourth day, gave credence to these words; for she had been a great cause of this affair because of the indignation conceived against John.

But when the western bishops heard of John’s death, they wished in no way to communicate with the eastern bishops until the name of that most sacred man should be placed among the predecessor bishops, intimating from this that he had been most unjustly deposed and banished.

Pope Innocent also excommunicated Emperor Arcadius because he had consented to the deposition and exile of John, as is found in Distinction 96, Duo sunt.

Theodosius also, the most Christian emperor and son of the aforesaid Arcadius, who bore the name and piety of his grandfather, after the death of his father caused the sacred relics of this holy doctor to be transferred in the month of January to the imperial city.

The most faithful people met him with wax candles and lamps. Theodosius himself, supplicantly adoring his relics, prayed on behalf of his parents Arcadius and Eudoxia, who were already dead, that he should grant pardon to those who had sinned in ignorance.

Section VIII

I do not believe that Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, who was the origin and principal cause of the whole evil against John Chrysostom, was that doctor who wrote upon the Gospels, whose minor works are approved, but another.

When the heresy of the Anthropomorphites arose—that is, of those who said that God was corporeal and had bodily members like human beings, because Scripture frequently speaks of the eyes, ears, face, hands, and feet of the Lord—and a very great crowd of simple monks adhered to this error, Theophilus preached and thought the contrary: namely, that God is spiritual, not corporeal, and that the words of Scripture were not to be understood so superficially and according to the bark, but were spoken through similitude, so that the eyes of God signified the sight or knowledge of God, and similarly concerning the other members.

When the monks of Egypt heard this, they abandoned their dwellings and came to Alexandria, stirring up sedition against him, so that they attempted to kill him as a heretic, because he asserted the contrary and commanded it to be believed.

Perceiving this, when they had approached him he received them joyfully, saying: “Thus I see you, sons, as the face of God.”

They said to him: “If you speak truly, anathematize the books of Origen, which oppose our opinion. If you do not do this, you will suffer from us the penalties which belong to men rebellious against emperors and God.”

But he said: “Do not rage. I shall do what pleases you.” Thus he restrained their fury.

A certain Serapion followed that error, a man advanced in years in the desert, of great abstinence, and renowned for holiness. John Cassian, with a companion, recalled him from that error, as he himself relates in the first Collation.

And under this pretext, namely of condemning the books of Origen, Theophilus caused the bishops of Egypt to assemble at Constantinople.

He circumvented Epiphanius, a most holy man and bishop of Cyprus, and made him his friend, asking that he likewise condemn the books of Origen. This he did.

But when they had assembled at Constantinople and he had incited Epiphanius against John, it was not his care to treat of Origen’s books, but of the deposition of John.

This Epiphanius, however, was a holy man of marvelous liberality toward the poor. When on a certain day he had distributed all the money of the church and nothing remained to him, a certain man suddenly arrived and offered a purse containing much money, and immediately departed; nor could it ever be known whence he came or where he went.

Certain poor men, wishing to deceive him so that he would give something to them, agreed with one another that one of them should lay himself on his back upon the ground as though dead, while the other should stand over him lamenting him and crying out in plaintive voices that he had nothing with which to bury him.

When Epiphanius came upon them and the man asked him for money so that he might be able to bury his dead companion, Epiphanius prayed that he might sleep in rest, furnished the things necessary for burial, consoled the man concerning the dead, and departed.

But the man struck his companion and said: “Rise, so that today we may feast from your labors.”

When he had struck him repeatedly and discovered that he was dead, he ran to Epiphanius and announced what had happened, asking him to raise the man.

Epiphanius consoled him, but was unwilling to raise the man, lest the ministers of God be readily mocked.

When this Epiphanius visited Paula, the mother of Eustochium, in her sickness, and had been secretly asked by Jerome, who was present there, to exhort her to drink wine because of her infirmity, Paula smiled as he did this, saying that he had been sent by Jerome for this purpose. Nevertheless, she did not acquiesce in relaxing her rigor.

When Jerome asked Epiphanius what had resulted from this, he answered: “I accomplished only this: that she nearly persuaded me, an old man, not to drink wine.”

He wrote some things, but few. It is also reported that demons are expelled at the sepulcher of the holy man himself.

From these things and others it is evident that John Chrysostom was a contemporary of Jerome.

Hence Jerome himself, in On Illustrious Men, says: “John, presbyter of the church of Antioch, a follower of Eusebius of Nicaea [read: Eusebius of Emesa] and Diodore, is said to have composed many things, of which I have read only On the Priesthood.”

I heard from a Greek cardinal, very learned, that he wrote as copiously in Greek as Augustine did in Latin.

Vincent, however, says that he found only the following books of his translated: one book, That No One Is Injured Except by Himself; one book, On the Restoration of the Fallen; two books, On Compunction of Heart; likewise many homilies upon Matthew, in various form and number; eighty-eight homilies upon John; many homilies upon the Epistle to the Hebrews; seven homilies On the Praises of Paul; thirty sermons.

In the beginning, when he was made a lector, as is found in his deeds, he wrote a book Against the Jews; when made a deacon, the book On the Priesthood.

Some things drawn from these will be set down.

Section IX

Chrysostom, in the book That No One Can Be Injured Except by Himself, says:

“What is virtue of soul? To think rightly concerning God and to act rightly among human beings. This alone is what no one can take away.

“For liberty, bodily health, riches, and things of this kind can be taken away, because they are not properly the goods of a human being; but virtue of soul alone is. Hence it is evident that no one can be injured by another, because virtue, which alone is the good of a human being, cannot be taken away from him.

“Nor do I say that no one injures another, but that no one is injured by another. For Joseph’s brothers injured him and acted wickedly against him, but he himself was not injured.

“Indeed, I shall say something further: those alone who injure are injured, and the harm which they inflict upon others hurts no one else.

“But if anyone, beaten or afflicted by another, brings forth a blasphemous or impious word, he has indeed been injured; in this, however, not by another but by himself through his own impatience.

“For the fire of avarice is kindled by riches and is fed by riches; and when men have given their hands to it, it daily sharpens swords with those riches, prepares pits and precipices, and dashes them against a thousand rocks and shipwrecks.

“Nevertheless, as volunteers they delight like swine on a stage [read: in mud] and, like dung-beetles, to roll its dung.

“It is certain, therefore, that unless someone injures himself, he cannot be injured by others, even if the whole world conspires against him.

“Nor is temptation the cause of falling and ruin, but instability and cowardice of soul, which even without temptation is sometimes cast down of its own accord, as is also a building constructed upon sand, even if rivers and winds do not press upon it.

“If you indeed do all the things which are in your power, you ought also to hope for the things which are from God. For he will also be present to you if you have not first failed yourself.”

The same man says in the book On Compunction of Heart:

“I do not see, dearest one, that any of us is held by a true and perfect desire for heavenly things. Otherwise we would regard all things which seem to be burdensome as a shadow and a laughing matter.

“A true lover of Christ transfers himself entirely to that place toward which the intention of his love leads him. And that delight and sweetness which he beholds through the spirit obscures every delight of visible sweetness of this kind.

“For he is so inflamed and burns with the love of Christ that, even if you apply immortal flames, he does not know it, does not feel it, and is not burned.

“For much more vehement is the fire of Christ by which he is burned through love; and, bound by blessed desire, he bears all things in such a manner that from the penalties which he suffers he receives consolations of his love more than he feels pain of body.

“This is the custom of lovers: they are unable to cover their custom [read: their love] in silence and cannot contain their flames within the breast, but narrate them frequently, so that by the very constancy of narrating they may receive consolation for their love and take refreshment from their immense love.

“Now we do not so much speak of compunction of heart as experience it, because to teach and not to do brings not only no gain but even very great loss.

“For it is a great condemnation for one who composes his speech and neglects his life.

“How can it happen that a weak and cold soul should bring forth words of compunction?

“I do not wish you to think that mountains or deserts can so confer silence upon the soul and destroy its disturbances as does that fire which Christ kindles within.

“Silence and repose, therefore, are to be sought not only of places, but of the soul and intention. For if the soul bears an intention of repose, it will not be disturbed even in the habitation of a city.

“But it is impossible for compunction of heart to flourish amid delights.

“True compunction of heart is to do great things and speak humble ones, to act justly and to fear on behalf of sinners.

“I do not say that we think about or groan over our sins, which are many and grave; rather, we do not even make mention of them.

“But while there is no grief concerning past sins, we more easily give place to new evils which come upon us.”

The same man, in the title On the Restoration of the Fallen, says:

“Just as it is philosophical to refrain from tears for an ordinary dead person, so I say that to receive consolation for the death of a soul is foolish and irreligious.”

And below:

“Some of the unskilled believe it to be enough and judge it desirable if they merely lack Gehenna. But I say that it is a much more grievous torment to be removed from that glory and to be barred from the sight of Christ.

“That fire, however, is called inextinguishable not only because it is not extinguished, but because it neither extinguishes nor purifies those whom it receives.

“And just as it does not possess a nature of consuming, so neither does it possess one of illuminating. Rather, it is a dark fire and a shadowy flame.

Section X

Concerning those things which are contained in the Decrees from the words of Chrysostom’s book On the Restoration of the Fallen:

“Believe me: such, such is the piety of God toward human beings that he never rejects a person’s repentance if it is offered to him purely and simply. Even if someone has reached the summit of evils and wishes to return thence to the way of virtue, he receives him, embraces him willingly, and does all things so that he may recall him to his former state.” On Penance, distinction III, Talis.

The same man in a sermon:

“Perfect repentance compels the sinner willingly to suffer all things. For in the heart is contrition; in the mouth, confession; in the work, complete humility, namely of action [read: satisfaction]. This is true and fruitful repentance.” On Penance, distinction III.

The same man in a sermon:

“The stronger medicine, which works especially in repentance, is almsgiving, namely with regard to satisfaction. For just as in the precepts of medicine a remedy receives many herbs, but one that is most dominant, so also in repentance this herb is more dominant and powerful, and it itself effects the whole. Hear what Scripture says: ‘Give alms, and all things are clean for you.’” On Penance, distinction I, Medicamentum.

The same, On Penance, distinction I:

“Now, brother, remember your sins and frequently pronounce them in the sight of God, and beseech God’s clemency for them; you will erase them more quickly. But if you now forget your sins, then you will remember them unwillingly, when they are published throughout the whole world in the sight of all friends and enemies and of the holy angels.”

The same, upon the Epistle to the Hebrews:

“If you continually hold your sins in your mind, you will never retain evil against your neighbor in your heart.” On Penance, distinction I, Non tibi.

The same:

“There is no remedy for sins like the continual memory of them, namely for grieving over them.”

The same, On Penance, distinction I:

“Who has ever seen a cleric repent quickly? If, when detected, he has humbled himself, he does not grieve because he sinned, but is confounded because he lost his glory.”

The same, against those who impose indiscreet penances upon penitents, upon Matthew:

“There are even now men who command every justice to the people and themselves observe not even a little, wishing to appear just not by doing but by speaking.

“Such are those who impose a heavy burden upon those coming to penance, who say and do not. And thus, while the present penalty of penance is fled, the future penalty of sin is contemned.”

And he gives the example of a young man who, when too great a burden is imposed upon him, casts it off or fails beneath it.

And below:

“Is it not better to render an account to God for mercy than for cruelty? For where the father of the household is generous, his steward ought not to be grasping. If God is kind, why does his priest wish to appear austere?” Thus far there.

The same concerning evil prelates, upon Matthew, distinction XL, chapter Multi, says:

“See how you sit upon the chair. The place does not sanctify the man, but the man the place. An evil priest acquires from his priesthood guilt, not dignity.

“You sit in judgment. For by living well and teaching well, you instruct the people how they ought to live; but by teaching well and living badly, you instruct God how he ought to condemn you.”

And below:

“He who shall have desired primacy on earth will find confusion in heaven; nor will he be numbered among the servants of Christ who has treated of primacy.”

The same, upon the Epistle to the Hebrews, distinction XLII, chapter Quiescamus, says:

“God will grant you a reward not from the life of those whom you receive, namely pilgrims or those to whom you give alms, but from your will, from much honor, from mercy, and from goodness.”

The same, upon Matthew, distinction LVI, says:

“Let us never be ashamed of the vices of our parents, but let us seek and embrace that one thing: virtue.”

And below:

“No one is altogether either to be praised or blamed for the virtue or vice of his parents. No one is truly obscure or illustrious from that source. Rather, to say something more carefully considered, I do not know how he does not shine the more who, born from parents altogether alien to virtues, has himself been marvelous by the virtue of God.” Thus far there.

The same, upon the Epistle to the Hebrews, question XI, chapter III:

“Let no one contemn the bonds of the Church. For it is not a man who binds, but Christ, who gave this power and made human beings lords of so great an honor.”

The same, question XXII, chapter V, Iuramenti, says:

“Both perjury and falsehood, namely pernicious falsehood, are condemned by the penalty of divine judgment, Scripture saying: ‘The mouth which lies kills the soul.’”

The same in the following chapter:

“He who is prepared to perjure himself appears already a perjurer before he swears, because God judges not merely from works but from thoughts and from the heart.”

The same, upon Matthew, question XXIII, chapter VIII:

“Phinehas killed a man, and it was reputed to him unto justice. Abraham, not only a murderer but even a parricide, which is graver, pleased God the more. Peter committed a double homicide. Nevertheless, the deed which was done was spiritual.

“Therefore, let us not regard works alone, but let us most diligently inquire into the time and cause, the will, the difference of persons, and whatever other circumstances have attended the works themselves. For otherwise we cannot arrive at the truth of things.”

The same, On Consecration, distinction IV, says:

“The waters of baptism could never purify the sins of believers unless they had been sanctified by the touch of the Lord’s body.”

Title X, Chapter X

Others also flourished in those times.

For in the time of Augustine, Orosius the historian flourished in Spain. As Vincent writes in the Historical Mirror, book XIX, he wrote historical books which are entitled On the Ormesta of the World, at Augustine's request or command. In them he unfolded the miseries and calamities of human beings from the beginning of sin, or of the world.

He did this against the vain speech of the pagans, who defamed those times as though they were infested with evils beyond what was customary because Christ was worshiped and idols were spurned.

And this book is greatly commended in the Decrees, distinction XV, Sancta Romana, as exceedingly useful against the calumnies of the pagans.

The same man also wrote an apologetic book for himself against the Pelagian heresy. From it the following original passage is taken:

"As though enlightened by the Lord, let us be persuaded that lamps burning in our hands are prepared in good works. These, wearied by temptations of many kinds, are always endangered by their own failure and by the blow of another.

"But if the light which is in you is darkness, how great will that darkness be?

"Or do you truly think it easy that one should simply be free of scurrility while joyful in speech; of wrath while solicitous; of negligence while patient; of sloth while meek; of vaunting while learned; of envy while supreme—apart from that desire of vainglory which is the general darkness of all good works?

"Therefore, let each one of you undertake a comparison, so that he may despise himself more because of the superiority of one who is better than be justified by contempt for one who is lesser.

"Christ, the Son of God, in the virtue and glory of the Father, created in the beginning, redeemed in the middle, and will judge at the last."

The same man says in the prologue to the history On the Ormesta of the World:

"If this world is governed by divine providence, which is as pious as it is just, a human being who is weak and contumacious through the mutability of nature and the freedom of license must, just as one in need of aid, be governed piously; so also it is necessary that he, immoderate in liberty, be corrected justly."

Section I

Also held illustrious at that time was a certain man called Tichomus [read: Tyconius], an African by nation, learned in the divine writings, as Vincent says in the Historical Mirror, sufficiently instructed in history, and not ignorant of secular matters. He was also studious in ecclesiastical affairs.

He wrote three little books On the Internal War and expositions of various causes of the Church, in which, in defense of his own people, he made mention of ancient synods.

From all these things it is known that he was a Donatist. Hence Augustine says of him in book III of On Christian Doctrine: "Tyconius, who wrote most invincibly against the Donatists although he was himself a Donatist, is found there to have had a most absurd heart, in that he was unwilling to abandon them in every respect."

He made a book which he called The Book of Rules, because in it he pursued seven rules by which, as by keys, the hidden things of the divine Scriptures might be opened. Concerning these you have above, in the title concerning the gift of understanding.

He also expounded the Apocalypse of John ex intergo [read: in its entirety].

Rufinus, a presbyter of Aquileia, published books in an elegant style.

Concerning him Heraclides says thus: "Rufinus was a man of noble manners and sufficiently steadfast in a singular purpose. No one gentler and more placid—as though knowing all things—could be found in the male sex."

He also says that Rufinus lived at Jerusalem with Saint Melania for thirty-seven years, supported the poor and pilgrims at his own expense, and recalled many heretics and schismatics to the unity of the faith and ecclesiastical peace.

But Helinand says thus concerning him, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, book XVIII: Blessed Jerome charged Rufinus with the Pelagian heresy in addition to the heresy of Origen, and likewise John, bishop of Jerusalem.

Concerning these two Gennadius speaks thus:

“Rufinus, presbyter of the church of Aquileia, was no small part among the doctors of the Church, and possessed an elegant talent for translating from Greek into Latin.

“Finally, he presented to the Latins the greatest part of the Greek libraries: the books of Basil, bishop of Caesarea; Gregory Nazianzen; the Recognitions of Clement of Rome; and the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius of Caesarea, to which he also added two books.

“He also translated the Sentences of Evagrius, the Sentences of Pamphilus the Martyr, and Against the Mathematicians. But he did not translate all of Origen, for Jerome also translated some things which are distinguished in his own prologue.

“He also discussed the Creed in such a manner that, in comparison with him, others are thought not even to have expounded it; likewise the blessing of Jacob upon the twelve patriarchs, and many letters exhorting to the fear of God.

“He also answered the detractors of his books in two volumes. And he wrote explanations upon three prophets, namely Hosea, Joel, and Amos.”

John of Jerusalem likewise wrote one book against the detractors of his study, in which he showed that he followed the talent of Origen, not his faith.

But because Jerome marked him as not having thought catholically concerning free will, in those sayings or opinions in which Jerome accused him the Church reproved him; distinction XV, Sancta Romana, approves the others.

Vincent says in the Historical Mirror, book XIX, that after hostility had arisen between Jerome and Rufinus on account of questions of Scripture, they composed books of invectives which were indeed sufficiently brilliant but used speech that was excessively biting.

Hence Rufinus says thus against Jerome in book I:

“The sons of men—their teeth are weapons and arrows, and their tongues,” and so forth.

“But for these wounds which are inflicted among human beings by the tongue, there is almost no physician. And therefore I turned myself to Jesus, the heavenly physician, who gave me a most powerful antidote taken from the medicine-box of his Gospel, by which the force of the pain might be comforted by hope of the future just examination.

“Therefore that draught which Christ mixed consisted of these words: ‘Blessed shall you be when men curse you and persecute you,’” and so forth.

The same man says in book II:

“That eastern master, namely Jerome, when Christ the judge sat upon the tribunal, with the angels standing by and interceding for him, when placed amid blows and torments, swore that he would never possess or read secular books.

“Now, I ask, let us reread the things which he writes. But there is not one page of his work which does not pronounce him a Ciceronian, where he says not only ‘our Tully,’ but ‘our Flaccus and Maro.’

“Indeed, he scatters Chrysippus, Aristides, Empedocles, and the names of the other Greek authors before his readers like smoke and clouds, so that he may appear learned and very widely read.

“When writing to girls or little women, who assuredly desire and ought to be edified only from our Scriptures, he interweaves examples from his Flaccus or Maro.”

Jerome, however, says thus against him:

“According to the saying of the illustrious orator, it is apparent that he has the will to lie but not the art of fabricating.

“We erred as young men; let us amend as old men. With the same fervor with which we formerly praised Origen, let us now condemn him who has been condemned by the whole world.

“If, when accused, I am silent, I shall seem to acknowledge the crime. Hospitality is dear to us in the monastery. We receive all who come to us with the joyful appearance of humanity.

“For we fear lest Mary with Joseph should find no place in the lodging, lest Jesus, excluded, should say to us: ‘I was a stranger, and you did not receive me.’

“Heretics alone we do not receive. For our purpose is to wash the feet of those who come.

“In one thing I shall not be able to agree with you: that I should spare heretics. If this is the cause of the discord which you have toward me, I can die; I cannot be silent.” Thus says he.

And from these things it is evident that Rufinus held something of heresy, whence Jerome reproved him.

Section II

There also flourished in the time of Honorius, according to Vincent’s Historical Mirror, book XX, the illustrious, prudent, and eloquent man John the hermit, who is also called Cassian.

I do not know for what cause he was driven from the church of Constantinople by John Chrysostom; and, having been ordained a presbyter at Marseilles in Gaul, he wrote many things.

Among them, in many books addressed to various persons, he also set forth the lives, teachings, and rules of the fathers which he had discovered in Egypt.

Concerning him Gennadius says in the book On Illustrious Men that, having been ordained a deacon by John the great bishop and a presbyter at Marseilles, he founded two monasteries, one for men and one for women, which remain to this day.

With experience as his mistress, he wrote in measured speech—and, to speak more openly, finding words through understanding and moving his tongue through action—the things necessary to the profession of all monks.

Concerning his books Vincent writes thus in the place cited above:

“Certainly this man’s minor works contain much edification of souls and shine with brilliant speech. These, among the many works of the ancients, I judge that I have read anything so useful for advancing toward spiritual progress and the summit of spiritual perfection [read: Among the many works of the ancients, I judge that I have read scarcely anything so useful for one advancing toward spiritual progress and the summit of spiritual perfection].

“Hence also the blessed Father Dominic, as is read in his life, diligently reading and vigilantly understanding that book which is inscribed The Collations of the Fathers, and searching in it for the paths of salvation, attained a great summit of perfection.

“For that book treats of purity of heart, of vices, and of the perfection of all virtues.”

But that book is said to be numbered among the apocrypha in distinction XV, Sancta Romana, where it says, “The minor works of Cassian, presbyter of the Gauls.”

This is perhaps because Prosper, whose teaching is approved by the Church in the said chapter, and after him also Cassiodorus, accuse him, asserting that he wrote uncatholically concerning free will and grace, and attributed more to free will and less to grace than was fitting, in the Collations, namely the first of Moses and that of Chaeremon concerning the protection of God.

Nevertheless, some, such as Master John Dominici in the book entitled The Love of Charity, excuse him in this matter, saying that his statements can be preserved if they are understood soundly and maturely, and not in the manner in which Prosper and others expound them, understanding them too hastily and superficially.

First, therefore, this venerable man wrote to Bishop Castorius [read: Castor] ten books On the Institutes of Cenobites and the Eight Principal Vices and Their Remedies.

Then, to Bishop Leontius and his brother Belladius [read: Helladius], ten Collations of the Fathers, namely of the abbots Moses, Pannutius [read: Paphnutius], Daniel, Serapion, Theodore, Serenus, and Isaac, dwelling in the Scetic desert, which he had heard from them.

After these, to Bishop Honoratus and Cutherius [read: Eucherius], another seven Collations of three anchorites leading their life in another desert of Egypt, namely Chaeremon, Nesteros, and Joseph.

Finally, another seven to the brothers Juvenian [read: Jovinian], Meucrius [read: Minervius], Leontius, and Theodore, which are those of the abbots Piamun, John, Theonas, and Abraham: twenty-four Collations in all.

At the last, when asked by Leo the archdeacon, afterward bishop of the city of Rome, he wrote seven books On the Incarnation of the Lord against Nestorius the Heretic.

With these he made an end of writing and of life under Theodosius the Younger, that is, the son of Arcadius.

Although he visited some of the said abbots, he did not, however, receive from their mouths all those opinions and words just as he writes them, even if he received some. Rather, he published them in his monastery, fashioning his own questioning and their answer, just as was done by saints in their dialogues, at which those asking the questions were not always present when the saints themselves composed them.

Some things concerning those Collations will be said in the following title, when hermits and cenobites are treated.

Section III

At that time Maximus, bishop of Turin, shone forth. As Vincent writes in the Historical Mirror, book XX, he labored elegantly in composing homilies to be declaimed in the church.

He is read to have composed treatises in praise of the apostles and of Saint John the Baptist; concerning Saint Eusebius of Vercelli; concerning Saint Cyprian; and a book On the Grace of Baptism; On Avarice and Hospitality; On the Eclipse of the Moon; On Alms; On Fasting; On the Passion of the Lord; and many other things.

Around the same time the bodies of Stephen the protomartyr, of Nicodemus, and of Gamaliel and his son Abibo were revealed, Gamaliel appearing three times by night to the presbyter Lucian and teaching him the place where they were buried.

John, bishop of Jerusalem, approached that place with other bishops to whom Lucian had disclosed the vision. When they began to dig, an earthquake occurred, and so great an odor burst forth that no one remembered ever having perceived its equal.

The power of this odor freed seventy persons from various infirmities.

The body of the most holy protomartyr Stephen was carried to the church of Zion at Jerusalem.

And, as Sigebert relates, in the eighth year of Honorius the presbyter Orosius, returning from Jerome—to whom he had been sent by Augustine to learn the question concerning the origin of the soul—carried relics of the protomartyr Stephen to Africa with the history of their discovery. With the grace of miracles accompanying it, the Lord glorified it everywhere.

Hence Augustine, in the last book of The City of God, narrates many miracles performed at his relics which he himself also saw.

The same Sigebert relates concerning a certain miracle that, in the sixth year of Honorius, a certain Jew, since he had often received baptism for the sake of gain in many churches of the heretics, also came to the church of the orthodox with the same intention, to be baptized.

When he was to be baptized, the water of the font suddenly disappeared. Again and yet again water was brought and the font filled; and again and yet again the water disappeared, displaying the power of God and the perfidy of the Jew.

Around those times, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, book XIX, Bishop Donatus was held illustrious in holiness and the virtue of miracles—not Donatus of Arezzo, but another later in time.

By spitting into the mouth of an enormous dragon he killed it; eight yokes of oxen were scarcely able to drag it away to be burned.

This dragon, as Sozomen says, lay upon a public road near a bridge. It ate goats, sheep, cattle, horses, and human beings.

When that dragon raised its head against the bishop as he passed, as though about to devour him, the bishop made the sign of the cross, spat into its mouth, and killed it.

Eight pairs of oxen dragged it into a neighboring field, and it was burned there.

Section IV

In the time of Theodosius the Younger, John Damascene, presbyter and monk, was held to be a distinguished doctor, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, book XVIII, chapter one hundred.

As the same author narrates from his deeds, John, instructed from infancy in Greek letters, attained knowledge of all the liberal arts before twelve years of age.

Exercising himself in the love of God and of his glorious Mother, he assumed the monastic habit and remained a virgin. He most diligently chanted the Hours of the Queen of Virgins every day.

When he had been made a presbyter, he celebrated Masses most devoutly in her honor.

Moreover, he was accustomed to compose prayers, antiphons, responsories, and sequences, which at her solemnities he chanted most sweetly in her honor.

Noble men entrusted their sons to him to be educated. He not only instructed them most diligently in letters, but also carefully formed them toward fear and love in every uprightness of conduct.

One day, when he had gone beyond the city walls and was walking for a short time with his scholars, Saracens suddenly rushed upon them in their customary manner. Together with a multitude of human beings and animals, they seized John also and carried him with them into Persia.

When a division of the plunder was made among the robbers, it happened that John Damascene fell to the share of a certain man who was the richest among them.

Although the others were assigned to the labors of servitude, by a divine disposition and through the merits of the Blessed Virgin that man acted more gently toward John.

The captive, however, did not neglect to discharge the customary due of servitude; but, persisting in fasts and vigils, he directed most devout prayers to the Blessed Virgin every day.

When that pagan perceived his good manner of life, as though overcome by a spiritual enchantment, he permitted him to go and return freely wherever he wished within the precincts of the palace.

One day he addressed him thus:

“My dearest John, I have marveled at your prudence in dictating, your courtliness in writing, your usefulness in taking precautions [read: singing], your sweetness in playing the organ, and also your holy purpose and manner of life.

“I have a young son no less dear to me than I myself am. I ask that you instruct him in the liberal arts and take care to conform him to yourself in dictating, writing, reading, and singing, so that if perhaps you should one day depart from us free, you may in a certain manner remain wholly among us in him.”

Receiving the boy obediently and humbly, and beginning to instruct him from the first elements, within a few years John rendered him so instructed in the liberal arts that, if you attended to the rhetorical mode of dictating of master and disciple, if you beheld the form of the writing, or if you heard the melody of the voice, you would declare that there was no difference between the two.

Moreover, when John seemed necessary to Emperor Theodosius in certain matters on account of the merit of his life and the uprightness of his conduct, as well as the splendor of his eloquence, the emperor sent an embassy and commanded that lord to send John to him as quickly as possible.

Not daring to contradict the imperial command, the man caused John to be conducted honorably to the emperor at Constantinople.

The emperor received him with honor and granted him a monastery in the city in which he might quietly serve God with the brothers. The emperor himself also came there frequently and treated familiarly with him concerning the condition of the kingdom and the salvation of his soul.

But so that the good John might still be proved in the furnace of tribulation for an increase of merits, that young man whom he had taught in Persia, moved by a spirit of wickedness, dictated a letter by his own sense and talent in John’s manner of dictating and his distinctive hand of writing.

He sent it furtively to Constantinople and caused it to be cast into a place in the palace where it might more quickly be found by the imperial ministers.

The letter was as follows:

“To the beloved friends who are in Persia, John Damascene, least of the monks, greeting.

“Know that the emperor has sent the strength of his army to various wars among the most distant nations, and that the imperial city and its neighboring regions have remained empty of men. Therefore, since you are wise, come securely and without delay obtain manfully the victory prepared for you.”

The letter was therefore found and read through before the emperor. Treason was cried out by all, and inquiry was made as to who was the author of this treason.

The form of the letter and the manner of writing were examined, and it was reported to the emperor to be John’s.

John was immediately sought and, with much injury, led into the emperor’s presence, while he marveled whence so sudden a tumult and conspiracy against him had arisen.

The whole people, casting insults against him, proclaimed him not a priest but a traitor, not a monk but an apostate; and, raging, they scarcely restrained their hands from his eyes.

Then the emperor, when silence had been made, sighed and said:

“O most wicked John, ungrateful for my benefits, you have returned evil to me for good. Most wicked Sarabaite, insofar as it lay in you, you betrayed the fatherland, taking liberty away from me and mine and thrusting us into the worst captivity.”

When the letter was shown to him, he answered thus:

“Truly, lord, I recognize the form of writing and the manner of dictating as my own kind. But God is my witness that I did not make it at all.”

When all made a din against him because he appeared to wish to conceal the truth, they cried out from every side that he should be punished with death without delay.

The judges, having taken counsel, said with equal agreement that because he had been a special friend of the emperor, he ought not to be killed, but the hand which had perpetrated so great a crime ought to be cut off.

When this had been done, he gave thanks to God for the pain of the wound and the diminishment of his body, and for a short time grieved that he could no longer offer sacrifice in his honor.

Therefore the hand, cut off by the office of the executioner, was, at the emperor’s command, hung before the monastery of John himself as testimony of so great a crime.

Immediately the maimed man came before the image of his special Lady. With the wound uncovered and the arm extended, he piously disputed with her, saying:

“Lady, are these the rewards of our merits? Is this the blessedness of your servants?

“Be it so, my Lady: you worthily wished me, a sinner, to be scourged according to my deserts. But why did you permit the instrument of your office to be entirely cut off?

“For this hand, by frequently writing hymns and songs of your praise, prepared them; and it many times offered to God the Father the most sacred body and blood of your Son in your honor for the salvation of all sinners.”

When he had repeatedly completed such words with lamentation, it happened one night that, after this lamentation, exhausted upon his bed, he appeared neither wholly sleeping nor waking.

And behold, the Queen of Virgins was present with a great light and a joyful face, consoling him with this address:

“What are you doing,” she said, “my most faithful child?”

“Alas, Lady,” he said, “why do you ask me? Rather, I ask you: where were you when I suffered these things? Behold, to my dishonor—and indeed to yours—the severed hand of your little servant hangs in the church.”

But she said: “Be strengthened in the Lord, son. He who fashioned the whole human being from nothing can restore your hand to you.”

Having said these things, while he watched she went to the church, brought back his hand, and with marvelous kindness restored it to his arm in a moment.

Then, giving ineffable thanks, when daylight had returned he arose, summoned the brothers, showed them his hand, and encouraged them to glorify with him the magnificent works of God.

Immediately, solemnly vested, he celebrated in a loud voice a Mass of the most blessed Virgin.

When the emperor heard of the miracle, he came to his feet and, kissing John’s hand with his own mouth, after praise of God and of the glorious Virgin diligently inquired of him whether he knew anyone anywhere who possessed his manner of dictating and form of writing.

John indeed reported the matter to him, and thus the truth of the affair became known when it was investigated more diligently.

This John Damascene published a book of Sentences, notable and very learned, whose statements are frequently alleged by modern doctors. He wrote it in Greek, but Pope Eugenius caused it to be translated into Latin.

This John Damascene is also said to have compiled the history of Barlaam the hermit and Josaphat, son of King Ademur [read: Abenner], who was converted to the faith through his teaching.

That history is very moral and devout, showing the vanity of the world, inducing contempt for the age, setting forth probable arguments of the faith, and intimating the tranquil and perfect state of religion. Vincent narrates it at length in the Historical Mirror, book XVI, through many chapters.

He appears to have held the heresy of the Greeks who say that the Spirit proceeds from the Father, not from the Son, which is heretical and condemned.

Nevertheless, Blessed Thomas says in the Summa that he can be excused from the vice of heresy, because it had not yet been declared by the Church that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, and that the contrary—namely, that he does not proceed from the Son but only from the Father, as the Greeks hold—is heretical.

Section V

In the time of the divine Theodosius there was an illustrious poet, Claudian. Although he was a pagan, he remained at Rome.

He published two metrical books, namely the Greater Claudian and the Lesser Claudian. A few of his verses are these:

“Alas, how blind a love inheres in vices!

“For many, transgressions have been the bonds of friendship.

“What does it profit to confess one’s errors when the ship has already sunk?

“If you fear, if you desire more things, if you are led by anger, you will suffer the yoke of servitude; you will tolerate unjust laws within.

“Then you will possess all things by right, when you will be able to be king of yourself.

“Through practice a readier descent into worse things is granted; license counsels luxury.

“Now I do not complain that the unjust have risen to the summits of affairs. They are raised on high that they may fall with a heavier fall.

“Take counsel for all, not for yourself, and let not your own interests move you, but the public wishes.

“Do not condemn all human beings for the crime of a few.

“The world is formed according to the example of the king. Edicts are not so powerful to bend human minds as is the life of the ruler.

“Luxury is a very sweet evil which, always devoted to the judgments of the body, dulls the senses with darkness.

“The fickle crowd is always changed with the prince.

“Pride, when joined to excellent conduct, defiles it.

“Let not what pleases you come before you, but what ought to have been done; let regard for what is honorable subdue your mind.

“He is nearest to the gods whom reason, not anger, moves.

“The resources which the hand of a deceitful parent gathered, the hand of a worse son will pour out.

“It is more to have preserved what was acquired than to have sought something new.”

The same man says in the Lesser Claudian:

“Death, you who will condemn the guilty and give rest to the pious, make all things equal.

“Luxury, a dissuader from what is honorable, and abundance make human minds forgetful.”

Section VI

At that time another poet flourished who was called Prucientius [read: Prudentius], and he composed a book On the Conflict of the Vices and the Virtues. A few of his verses are set down here:

“First Faith seeks the field, about to fight beneath the doubtful lot of battle, disordered in rustic dress. She challenges the dangers of breaking the raging war.

“Behold, modest Patience stood with grave countenance. Unmoved amid the battle lines and their varied tumults, she watched with eyes fixed and remained unhurried.

“Cease to speak grandly. God breaks everything proud. Great things fall; inflated things burst; swollen things are pressed down.

“Learn to put away haughtiness; learn to beware. The humble ascend the heights; the fierce are delivered to the depths.

“Avarice is borne along, girded with a capacious bosom. Whatever precious thing devouring Luxury had left behind, she seized with a hooked hand.

“Nor is it enough to have filled her ample folds; it delights her to stuff shameful gain into purses.

“She ravishes the whole race of human beings. There is no vice on earth more violent.

“The highest repose is to desire nothing beyond what due need demands, so that simple nourishment and one garment may cover the feeble limbs, moderately restore them, and not draw beyond the measure that satisfies nature.

“Let love join what we understand; let that by which we live breathe together in one pursuit. Nothing divided is firm.

“Peace is the full work of virtue; peace is the summit—that is, the end—of labors. Peace is the reward of completed war and the reward of peril.

“Nothing is pleasing to God without peace, nor is a gift at the altar. Peace is the conclusion of merits.

“She does not swell up inflated; she does not envy as a rival of an achievement. Being patient, she endures all things and believes all things.

“When injured, she never swells up. She forgives every offense. Pardon hastens to precede the setting of the light.”

Thus says he.

Section VII

Under the aforesaid pontiffs and emperors, however, several heresies arose which were condemned by the Church and finally reduced to nothing, having been refuted by the aforesaid doctors.

Hence, at the command of Emperor Theodosius and with the assent of Pope Damasus, a holy universal synod of one hundred and fifty fathers was assembled at Constantinople.

This synod, condemning Macedonius, who denied that the Holy Spirit is God, taught that the Holy Spirit is consubstantial with the Father and the Son. It gave the form of the Creed which the entire confession of Latins and Greeks chants in the Church at Masses on solemn days. It was also decreed there that the bishop of Constantinople, as the bishop of New Rome, is to have privilege after the Roman pontiff, as is evident in distinction XXII, Renovantes. These things are from Vincent’s Historical Mirror, book XVII.

Priscillian also, a bishop in Spain around those times, founding a heresy of his own name, disturbed the Church.

He confounded the persons of the Holy Trinity, saying that the Father is the same as the Son and the same as the Holy Spirit, which pertains to the heresy of the Sabellians.

But he held other errors. For he regarded foods of flesh as unclean. He separated married men from unwilling women, and conversely.

He assigned the opicium [read: fashioning] of all flesh not to the true and good God but to evil angels.

He said that the soul is of the same nature and substance as God, and that souls, for a certain voluntary contest—though one not to be exercised on earth [read: one to be exercised on earth]—descend gradually through seven heavens and through certain principalities, and encounter an evil prince by whom, he said, this world was made; and that by this prince they are sown through various bodies of flesh.

He said that human beings are bound to the stars of fate, and that our body is composed according to the twelve signs of heaven, placing Aries in the head, Taurus in the neck, Gemini in the shoulders, Cancer in the breast, Leo in the hands, Virgo in the belly, Libra in the navel, Scorpio in the hips, Sagittarius in the male member, Aquarius in the bladder, Capricorn in the shins, and Pisces in the soles of the feet.

Seeking to be heard concerning these matters in councils of bishops, he went to Rome, and there he was rejected by Saints Damasus and Ambrose.

In Gaul also he was judged a heretic by Saint Martin and other bishops in the Synod of Burgendala [read: Bordeaux].

But when he understood that he was to be condemned, he appealed to Emperor Maximus. Having been heard by him and driven from the episcopate, he was killed at Trier by the prefect Evodius, together with many of his followers, while the emperor decreed that the accomplices of this sect in Spain should be killed.

The bishops Ithacius and Ursatius, the accusers of Priscillian, were deprived of the communion of the Church by bishops who said that it was an abomination for a human being of any sort to be killed through the accusation of bishops, while Emperor Maximus and certain bishops defended Ithacius and Ursatius.

And for this reason Saint Martin was harassed by Emperor Maximus, because he refused to communicate with Ithacius. Nevertheless, he scarcely obtained that the Priscillianists should not be killed.

These things are from Vincent in the place cited above. The condemnation of this heresy is found in cause XXIV, question III, the penultimate chapter.

Section VIII

In the time of Pope Innocent I, as Sigebert says, while Honorius and Arcadius were ruling, Pelagius in Britain attempted to stain the Church of Christ with an execrable doctrine, saying that a human being can be saved without the grace of God, and that each individual is directed to righteousness by his own merits and his own will.

He said that infants are born without original sin, but are as innocent as Adam was innocent before his transgression; and that they are not therefore to be baptized in order that they may be released from sin, but in order that through adoption they may be admitted into the kingdom of God; yet that outside the kingdom of God there is an eternal and blessed life for them.

He said that Adam alone was injured by his sin, and that he died not by the desert of fault but by the condition of nature, since he would have died even if he had not sinned.

He also said that the prayers which are made by the Church, whether for unbelievers or for believers, are ineffectual.

Pope Innocent therefore condemned him and Celestinus [read: Celestius] and Julian, his accomplices. Jerome also, and Augustine most especially, assailed them as enemies of the faith with the weapons of truth.

Hence many chapters against these errors are found in On Consecration, distinction IV, Placuit, and the four following chapters, and from the Council of Milevis, at which Augustine was present.

Among the Easterners also, a question raised concerning God caused grave agitation: whether God is a body and has a human form, or is incorporeal and wholly foreign to human form.

The simpler hermits asserted that God is corporeal and under human form, because sacred Scripture tells of the eyes, face, ears, hands, and feet of God.

Others, thinking better and truly, denied this; and what Scripture sets forth on the surface concerning the members of God they expounded spiritually according to the true sense—for example, God's eye as his sight and knowledge, his hand as his operation, and other things of this kind.

Hence it was determined by the Church to be heresy to believe that God has corporeal members, as is evident in cause XXIV, question III, the penultimate chapter.

Under Emperor Honorius also, as the same Sigebert says, the heresy of the Predestinarians began to spread.

They are therefore called Predestinarians because, when disputing about divine grace and predestination, they asserted that the labor of good works does not profit even those living piously if they have been predestined by God to death, and that living wickedly does not harm the impious if they have been predestined by God to life.

This most dangerous assertion both removed the good from good things and provoked the evil to evil things.

This heresy is said to have taken its beginning from books of Augustine that were badly understood. Nor is this to be imputed to Augustine as a fault, just as it is not to be imputed to the Lord God, the author of sacred Scripture, from which heretics, understanding perversely, drew occasions for their errors.

For there is nothing good and lawful in human use from which destruction cannot be inflicted by abusing it, as is said in cause XXIII, question V, De occidendis. Therefore, the fault is to be imputed to the one who abuses it, not to the one who gave the good thing.

Section IX

Sulpicius Severus also was held illustrious at that time in Aquitaine, near the city of Toulouse, noble in birth and learning, and conspicuous for his love of poverty and humility.

He was also dear to the holy men Martin and Paulinus, as Helinand says.

He wrote little works not to be despised: many letters to his sister exhorting her to the love of God and contempt of the world; two to the aforesaid Paulinus; and others to other persons.

But because private necessity is interwoven in some of them, they are not arranged here.

He also wrote a chronicle, the life of Blessed Martin, and a conference held between Postumianus and Gallus, with himself as intermediary and judge.

In his old age, deceived by the Pelagians and recognizing the fault of loquacity, he maintained silence until death, so that by keeping silent in penitence he might amend the sin which he had contracted by speaking.

From the aforesaid conference held between Gallus and Postumianus, Vincent excerpted the things written below in the Historical Mirror, book XIX.

“When with a prosperous course,” says Severus, “we had reached Alexandria, foul conflicts were being carried on there between the bishops and the monks on this occasion, or for this reason: priests, having often gathered into one, were seen to have decreed in repeated synods that no one should read or possess the books of Origen, who was regarded as the most skilled of the expositors of sacred Scripture.

“But certain bishops recalled some exceedingly insane writings in his books. His defenders, not daring to defend these writings, said rather that they had been fraudulently inserted by heretics, and therefore that the rest also ought not to be condemned on account of them.

“The bishops, resisting these men more obstinately, compelled by their authority that all the upright things should be condemned together with the perverse things and with the author himself. And because the books which the Church had received were sufficient and more than sufficient, they said that this reading, which would harm the unwise more than it would profit the wise, was to be rejected entirely.

“But when I investigated certain things from those books rather inquisitively, very many things pleased me greatly. Yet I also reproved many things in which there is no doubt that he thought perversely, although his defenders contend that they were falsified.

“I marvel that one and the same man could have been so different from himself, because, in that part in which he is approved, he had no equal after the apostles; but in that part in which he is rightly reproved, no one is taught to have erred more shamefully.

“And although these and other things of this kind were brought forth by the bishops, a sedition arose from the zeal of the parties. Since it could not be suppressed by the authority of the priests, in a savage precedent the prefect was called upon to regulate the discipline of the Church.

“Terrified by him, the brothers were scattered and the monks were driven through diverse regions, so that, after edicts had been issued, they were not permitted to remain in any place.

“This disturbed me greatly: that Jerome, a most Catholic man and one most skilled in the sacred law, was thought at first to have followed Origen, whereas now that same man especially condemned all his writings.

“Nor indeed did I dare to judge anyone rashly concerning this matter. Nevertheless, the most excellent and learned men were said to disagree in this contest.

“Thus, however, whether that was an error, as I think, or a heresy, as it is thought, it could not be suppressed by the many censures of the priests; but it could by no means have spread so widely if it had not grown through contention.

“Alexandria was therefore wavering in a disturbance of this kind when I came there. The bishop of that city received me very kindly, and better than I expected, and attempted to keep me with him.

“But it was not my intention to remain where envy was boiling over from the recent destruction of the brothers.

“Therefore, departing thence, I sought the town of Bethlehem, which is six miles distant from Jerusalem. It is, however, sixteen stopping places distant from Alexandria.

“Jerome governs the church of that place, for it is a parish of the bishop who holds Jerusalem.

“This man, in addition to the merit of faith and the endowment of virtues, is so instructed not only in Latin and Greek but also in Hebrew letters that no one would dare to compare himself with him in any field of knowledge.

“I marvel, however, if he is not known to you through the many works which he has written, since he is read throughout the whole world.”

“He is exceedingly well known also to us,” said Gallus. “For before this five-year period I read a certain little book of his in which the whole nation of our monks is assailed and most vehemently censured by him. Hence our Belgian is sometimes accustomed to become very angry because Jerome had said that we eat until we vomit.

“But I,” said Gallus, “pardon that man, and I think that he disputed concerning the Eastern monks rather than the Western ones. For voraciousness among the Greeks is gluttony; among the Gauls it is nature.”

Then I said, “Gallus, you defend your nation like a schoolman. But I ask you: does that book condemn only this vice in monks?”

“Indeed,” he said, “he left out absolutely nothing which he did not censure, tear apart, and expose. He pursued avarice especially, and vanity no less. He discussed many things concerning pride and not a few concerning superstition.

“I shall truly confess that he seems to me to have painted the vices of many. Moreover, concerning the familiar associations of virgins with monks and clerics, he disputed things as true as they were forceful; hence he is said not to be loved by certain persons whom I am unwilling to name.”

Postumianus said: “As I had begun to say, I was with Jerome for six months. His continual struggle against the wicked and perpetual contest stirred up the hatred of the lost.

“Heretics hated him because he did not cease to assail them. Clerics also hated him because he pursued their vices and crimes. But plainly all the good admired and loved him.

“For those who judge him to be a heretic are truly mad. I would say that the man’s knowledge is Catholic and his doctrine sound.

“Neither by day nor by night does he rest. He is always either reading something or writing.

“Had it not been fixed in my mind and promised, with God as witness, to approach the desert I had set before myself, I would not have wished to depart from so great a man for even the briefest point of time.

“Therefore, having entrusted to him all my possessions and my whole household, which had followed me against my will and held me entangled, I returned free to Alexandria. Having visited the brothers, I hastened toward the Upper Thebaid—that is, to the furthest parts of Egypt—for vast, open solitudes of the desert were reported to contain monks there.”

Section X

He thereafter narrates several marvelous things which he saw or heard while journeying through the desert.

In some monasteries a hundred men lived together under one abbot.

He tells of a certain twelve-year-old boy, sent by the abbot to carry loaves to a certain solitary. When an asp of marvelous size met him on the way, the boy grasped the asp with his hands without any fear, wrapped it in his cloak, led it to the monastery, and placed it on the ground before the brothers.

But when the brothers praised the child’s faith, the abbot, in order to keep him in humility, had him sharply beaten for this as though for the transgression of a vice.

He tells of another solitary who in their presence gathered dates from a palm tree, and a great lion took that food from his hand like a domestic animal.

He tells of another to whom a she-wolf came while he was dining, arriving at the hour at which he dined; and, after taking food from his hand following dinner and licking his hand, she afterward withdrew.

He tells also of another who was speaking with two men who had come to him for the sake of a visit, when a lioness of marvelous size came. Rolling herself at his feet as though with weeping, she begged for his help.

Understanding this, that man of God arose and followed the lioness, who led him to her cave, where she was nourishing five grown cubs born blind. She placed them before the anchorite, and he restored sight to them.

The wild beast was not ungrateful: after a few days, as though in return for the gift of the benefit bestowed, the lioness brought him the hide of a beast.

He tells likewise of a certain man who had come to another solitary in order to serve God under his discipline. When the solitary told him that he would not be able to endure his austerity and commands, the man persevered in his petition and offered himself for everything commanded, even to enter into fire.

The solitary accepted him, suddenly testing him by such an experiment. For he commanded him to enter an oven which had been kindled nearby. Obeying without delay, he cast himself into the midst of the fire, suffered no pain there, and came out unharmed.

The same abbot commanded another man who came to him for the sake of taking up religious life to pour water every day upon a certain dry staff which he fixed in the earth in his sight. He drew the water from the river Nile, two miles distant from the place.

And when he had labored in this work for two years, at last that dry wood flowered, which Severus relates that he himself saw with green leaves.

Severus himself relates in the same book that a certain holy man was endowed with incredible power for driving out demons. He healed possessed bodies not only when present and not only by a word, but, when absent, sometimes by sending the fringes of his haircloth or letters.

And while he was sought out in a marvelous manner by peoples coming to him from the whole world, and in addition by prefects, counts, and judges of various powers, vanity began to creep upon him from honor just as honor had arisen from virtue.

When first he was able to perceive this, he strove for a long time and greatly to drive it out as it raged within him. But vanity could not be expelled entirely while his power continued, even though he was secretly conscious of it.

Everywhere the demons acknowledged his name; he was unable to exclude from himself the peoples flowing to him. Meanwhile, the hidden poison crept in his breast, and he was unable to purge himself of the secret thoughts of vanity.

Turning himself wholly to God with prayers, therefore, he is said to have prayed that, with the devil's power permitted against him for five months, he might become like those whom he himself had healed.

Why should I linger over many words? That most powerful man, that man made famous throughout the whole world by signs and mighty works, that man before whose doors the highest powers of this age had prostrated themselves, was seized by a demon, was held in chains, and suffered all those things which possessed persons are accustomed to endure.

At last, in the fifth month, he was purged not only of the demon but also—what was more useful and more desirable for him—of vanity.

And below, directing his pen to the works of Blessed Martin, he says:

Postumianus said: "Indeed, when for a long time I was listening more intently to you concerning the mighty works of the saints, I returned in my thoughts to my Martin.

"I perceived deservedly that all those things which the several men had done in diverse ways were easily accomplished through this one man.

"For although you relate sublime things, so far as I may say it with the peace of the saints, I have heard absolutely nothing from you in which Martin was inferior.

"For those men, free from every impediment, with only heaven and the angels as witnesses, is plainly taught [read: are plainly taught] to have worked marvelous things.

"This man, in the midst of the assembly and society of peoples, among disagreeing clerics, among raging bishops, although he was pressed from this side and that by daily scandals, nevertheless stood founded upon an unconquerable virtue against all things; and he worked things so great that not even those who are reported to be or to have been in the desert did the like, even if they had done equal things.

"For this man fought in loco in equo [read: in an unfavorable place], namely while dwelling in the world, and nevertheless conquered; those men contended ex equo loco [read: from level ground] or even from higher ground, namely in the desert.

"But although you have related the illustrious deeds of others, you have related of no one that a dead person was raised. In this, at least, it is necessary that you confess one thing: no one is to be compared with Martin.

"This man also often impavit [read: commanded] fires. The ferocity of beasts, conquered, succumbed. He restrained the rage of wild animals and the poisons of serpents. He freed those beset by demons. Angels spoke with him daily.

"Against vanity and boasting, moreover, he bore so unconquered a spirit that no one despised those vices more bravely.

"I, therefore, shall always preach the monks of Egypt. I shall praise the anchorites. I shall marvel at the hermits. Nevertheless, I shall always except Martin.

“I shall not dare to compare any one of the monks with him, and certainly not any one of the bishops. Egypt confesses this; Syria confesses this; the Ethiopian has learned this; the Indian has heard this; the Parthian and the Persians know it; nor is Armenia ignorant of it.

“I shudder to say what I recently heard. I do not know what unhappy man said that in that book of yours about Martin you had lied about many things.

“That is not the voice of a human being but of the devil. Nor in this respect is Martin disparaged, but the faith of the Gospel is diminished.

“But the unhappy, degenerate, sleepy men are ashamed of deeds done by others which they themselves cannot do.”

Because, therefore, the deeds of this saint whom the Church especially venerates and whom peoples celebrate solemnly are sufficiently well known, they will be noted here in abridged form. Sulpicius Severus, of whom immediately above, described them at length and in lucid speech.

Title X, Chapter XI

“Martin, poor and lowly, enters heaven rich; he is honored with heavenly hymns,” Holy Mother Church sings concerning him.

He was poor indeed in spirit, that is, poor in temporal substance by his voluntary will.

He was poor, that is, having little of the perversity of vices, even when he was a youth and a soldier.

He was lowly in his estimation of himself, by humility. He was lowly in sparingness of food, drink, and vestitutus [read: clothing].

He enters heaven rich: rich, namely, in the abundance of merits and virtues; rich in the copiousness of miracles of every kind.

He is honored with heavenly hymns: by the angels in glory, and by the churches of the world in manifold celebration.

And all these things will be evident from his history.

Martin, therefore, was born in Sabaudia, a town of the Pannanians [read: in the town of Sabaria in Pannonia], but was raised in Italy at Ticinum, that is, Pavia. With his father, a tribune of the soldiers, he served as a soldier under Constantius and afterward under Emperor Julian.

He did not do so voluntarily. For, divinely inspired from infancy, when he was twelve years old he fled to the church against the will of his parents and asked to be made a catechumen; and from that time he longed for the desert.

He would have satisfied his vows if the weakness of the flesh had not stood in the way.

But when the Caesars had decreed that the sons of veterans should serve as soldiers in place of their fathers, Martin, although unwilling, was compelled to serve as a soldier for his father when he was fifteen years old.

Martin, content with only one servant, often ministered to him in service and frequently removed and cleaned his shoes.

At a certain time in winter, while passing through the gate of the city of Amiens, he encountered a poor man. When the man had received alms from no one, Martin, understanding that he had been reserved for him, drew his sword and divided the cloak which alone remained to him, since he had bestowed his other things as alms. Giving one part to the poor man, he clothed himself again with the remainder.

On the following night he saw Christ clothed with the part of his cloak, and Christ joyfully saying to the angels standing around: “Martin, still a catechumen, has covered me with this garment.”

Thereafter the holy man, not raised up in glory but recognizing the goodness of God, caused himself to be baptized when he was eighteen years old.

At the insistence of his tribune, who had promised that when the time of his tribunate was completed he would renounce the world, Martin continued to serve as a soldier for two more years, yet free from those vices in which that kind of human being is accustomed to be entangled.

Hence he was poor in possessions, because he reserved nothing of his pay for himself except food, but bestowed it upon the poor and did not think about the morrow.

Afterward he was poor of the vices of which he had been entirely stripped through baptism.

Meanwhile, when barbarians were breaking into Gaul, Julian Caesar began to distribute a donative, that is, pay, to the soldiers.

But when he came to Martin, Martin, no longer wishing to serve as a soldier, refused to receive it, saying to Caesar: “I am a soldier of Christ; it is not lawful for me to fight.”

Indignant, Caesar told him that he was refusing military service not for the sake of religion but from fear of the imminent battle.

Martin answered him: “If this is ascribed to cowardice and not to faith, tomorrow I shall stand unarmed before the battle line; and in the name of Christ, protected by the sign of the cross, not by shield or helmet, I shall securely penetrate the formations of the enemy.”

Caesar therefore commanded that he be kept under guard, so that he might make his deeds equal to his words.

But on the following day the enemy sent an embassy concerning peace, surrendering themselves and all their possessions. Hence it was doubtful to no one that such a victory without blood had been granted through the merits of the saint.

Having left military service, he went to Saint Hilary, bishop of Poitiers, submitting himself to his discipline.

Attending to his fervor, Hilary wished to ordain him a deacon, so that he might bind him more closely to himself.

Martin, lowly through humility, was by no means willing to accept this; but he did not refuse the order of lector.

Not much later, admonished by the Lord in dreams that he should visit his parents, who were still held in paganism, he obtained permission from Saint Hilary, who begged him with tears to return to him, and undertook the journey, foretelling that he would suffer many adversities.

While making his journey among the Alps, therefore, he fell among robbers.

When one of them had brandished an axe over his head, another prevented the blow of the one striking him, namely by holding back his hand.

With his hands bound behind his back, Martin was entrusted to one of them for guarding.

When the robber asked whether he had been afraid, Martin answered that he had never been so secure, because he knew that the mercy of God would be present especially in temptations.

Beginning to preach to the robber, he converted him to the faith. The robber led him back to the road, commended himself to his prayers, and released him.

Afterward that robber was seen to lead a praiseworthy life.

When Martin had passed Milan, the devil, appearing to him in human form, asked where he was going.

When Martin answered that he was going where the Lord called him, the devil said: “Wherever you go, the devil will oppose you.”

And Martin said to him: “The Lord is my helper; I shall not fear what man”—that is, the devil—“may do to me.” The devil immediately vanished like smoke.

Coming at last to Pavia and visiting his parents, Martin converted his mother to the faith. His father, however, remained in error.

But when the Arian heresy was springing up throughout the world and he almost alone resisted it there, he was publicly beaten and cast out of the city, and went to Milan, establishing a monastery for himself there.

But, driven from there by the Arians, he withdrew with only a certain presbyter of great virtues to the island of Gallinaria.

Remaining there, he unknowingly ate poisonous hellebore among the other herbs. Perceiving from eating it that death was near him, he drove away all pain and danger by the power of prayer.

Afterward, hearing that Blessed Hilary was returning from exile to Poitiers, he set out to meet him. When Hilary had already passed by, Martin came to Poitiers and constructed a monastery for himself near that city, performing many miracles.

Section I

When the bishop of the city of Tours in Gaul was taken from this light, the neighboring bishops, the clergy, and the people of Tours assembled to provide a future prelate there. Almost all agreed upon Martin.

But knowing that, because he was lowly—that is, very humble—he could not be drawn from his monastery for this purpose, one of them, using a wise plan, pretended that his wife was gravely ill.

Going to the monastery, he insistently begged Martin with tears that he would deign to visit her for the salvation of her soul.

The holy man, overcome by compassion and ignorant of the pious ambush, departed from the monastery.

As he followed and approached the city, crowds of people who had been lying in concealment surrounded him, calling him their bishop. When, because of his humility, he wished to flee so great a dignity, they detained him and brought him into the city and church with great glory and joy, so that he might be consecrated bishop.

And although certain prelates objected because he was misshapen in his clothing, contemptible in countenance, and lowly—and especially one named Defensor—when the regular reader was absent, one of the clerics arose to supply the deficiency. Opening the Psalter, he read through in the hearing of all the first passage which met his eyes.

That verse was: “Out of the mouth of infants and nursing children you have perfected praise”—namely, in Martin, at the petition of simple persons, you have shown perfect praise—“because of your enemies,” who despised this man, “that you may destroy the enemy and the defender”: literally, to confound the man who was called Defensor, who resisted such praise and the nomination of Martin more than the others.

And thus Defensor, having been pointed out, was confuted by all.

The chosen pontiff of God remained constant in his accustomed lowliness of humility and austerity.

Hence, even when residing in the sacristy, he never used the episcopal chair; for no one ever saw him sit in the church. Rather, he sat in a rustic little cell which they call a tripod.

Encountering at Paris a leper who was horrible to everyone, he kissed and blessed him, and immediately the man was cleansed.

And because he could not endure the tumult of the people approaching him for diverse reasons, being accustomed to the quiet of contemplation he constructed a monastery about two miles outside the city, exceedingly humble in its dwellings and very difficult of access.

There, when eighty disciples had gathered, they lived in the greatest austerity of eremitical life.

No one there knew wine unless infirmity compelled it. A soft garment was regarded there as a crime.

They knew no bodily exercise except the art of the scriptorium, to which the younger men devoted themselves; but they devoted themselves only to prayer and reading.

Several bishops were created from among them.

When in a certain place someone was venerated by the people as a martyr, Martin, finding nothing certain concerning his name or way of life, abstained from such veneration, lest by venerating him he should grant an increase to superstition, and lest by forbidding it without clear knowledge he should take away the devotion of the people.

At last he approached the place, praying over the tomb and asking that it be made known to him what it was.

Turning to the left, he saw a shadow blacker than black standing there.

Adjured by Martin to declare who he was and of what merit, he answered that he had been a robber, had been killed there for his crimes, and had no fellowship with the martyrs.

From that time Martin caused that altar to be removed and, when the fraud had been revealed, prohibited the veneration of the place.

When, on a certain feast day, he was coming from the monastery to the church to celebrate, a poor naked man met him.

Martin, beholding him, commanded his archdeacon to clothe the man who was freezing.

But when the archdeacon delayed doing it, Martin at last entered the sacristy of the church. While he was alone, the poor man, still naked, presented himself to him.

And since Martin was alone, devoting himself to prayer in his customary manner, he secretly removed his tunic and gave it to the poor man, and immediately commanded him to depart.

The archdeacon came to him, urging him to proceed to carry out the ministries.

Speaking of himself, Martin said that he could not do such a thing unless the poor man received a garment.

The archdeacon did not understand, because, since Martin was covered above by a cope, he did not see him without a tunic within.

He alleged that the poor man was not present.

But Martin said: “Let a garment be brought to me; a poor man to be clothed will not be lacking.”

Compelled, the archdeacon went to the marketplace and bought one cheap and short Bigerric tunic for five silver pieces, and cast it before Martin’s feet.

Then Martin, after everyone had been excluded, removed the cope and clothed himself with that garment, and afterward put on the alb so that the tunic which he had just received would not be seen.

Thus, therefore, clothed in the pontifical vestments, poor and lowly in humility, he proceeded to the altar to celebrate Mass.

But while he offered the sacraments for the people, a fiery globe appeared over his head and was seen by many.

Moreover, when he elevated the sacrament and the sleeves of the alb fell down, so that his bare arms appeared—for that purchased tunic scarcely reached to the elbows—it is reported by some that angels suddenly covered his bare arms with golden and jeweled sleeves.

Section II

He entered rich in the abundance of virtues and merits.

Concerning these riches Gregory says: “If you desire to be truly rich, love true riches, namely the virtues. What is richer than patience, purity, justice, charity, faith, and the others in which he shone?”

He was so patient that, although he was the supreme priest, he was often injured with impunity by clerics, nor on account of such things did he drive them from his charity.

No one saw him angry, no one grieving, no one laughing.

His own archdeacon sometimes called him delirious, and nevertheless he was not moved against him.

On a certain occasion Martin, clothed in rough clothing with a black and hanging cloak, was making a journey seated upon an ass, while his companions followed at some distance.

When the horses of certain soldiers coming toward him from the opposite direction were frightened before him, their riders, imputing this to Martin, cast themselves to the ground in a headlong leap. Seizing Martin, they beat him severely.

But he, silent, offered his back to those striking him. At this they raged all the more, because, as though not feeling their blows, he seemed to despise them.

After this, when they mounted their horses to continue their journey, those animals remained so fixed to the ground that, however much they were whipped, they remained firm as rocks.

At last the soldiers were pierced with compunction and, attributing this to the injury inflicted upon Martin by their blows, returned to the man of God, seeking pardon for the sacrilege committed against him.

He freely granted it; and when permission to depart had been given them, their horses proceeded at a rapid pace.

His companions arrived and found him lying on the ground from the blows and giving thanks to God.

He was of such purity and constancy in praying that he seemed almost never to cease from prayer.

For, just as it is the custom of ironworkers to strike the anvil amid their works as a certain relief from labor, so also Martin always prayed while he was doing something else.

Because of his great purity, angels and saints frequently visited him.

Hence, on a certain occasion, when Martin was praying alone in his cell, and Severus and Gallus, his disciples who wrote these things concerning him, approached and waited before the doors, they were suddenly shaken by a marvelous dread and heard several persons conversing.

When afterward they asked him about this, he answered: “I shall tell you, but I ask you to tell no one. Agnes, Thecla, and Mary came to me.”

And he confessed that he was visited by them not only on that day but often, and that Peter and Paul were frequently seen by him.

Nor is it marvelous, because if the clean of heart shall see God, much more shall they see his saints.

He was rich in justice, not regarding the person of human beings.

For when, after being earnestly invited by Emperor Maximus, he found himself with his chaplain at the emperor’s banquet and, having drunk from a bowl offered to him by a servant, Emperor Maximus waited with great devotion afterward to receive the bowl from his hand for drinking, Martin offered it not to him but to the priest who was his companion, saying that there was no one more worthy to drink after himself. This was related above in the preceding title.

But on another occasion, when he had approached Emperor Valentinian concerning a certain just petition and the emperor had denied him an audience several times, commanding his ministers to close the doors to him because he was unwilling to grant what Martin intended, Martin at last gave himself to persistence in prayer for this matter for a week, fasting in ashes and haircloth.

Thereafter, when an angel appeared to him and admonished him to enter to the emperor, he went to the palace and, all the doors lying open, reached the emperor himself.

When the emperor saw him and was angry that he had been admitted, he refused to rise for him, until fire invaded the royal chamber and began to burn the emperor’s garments from behind.

From this miracle, the emperor, although angry, confessed that he had perceived divine power in Martin. Hence, rising and embracing him greatly, before Martin asked he granted all the things desired.

He also offered him many gifts, which the man of God did not accept at all.

He was exceedingly rich in faith and charity.

For through charity itself, Augustine says, the poor man is rich.

He was of such compassion that he received all penitent sinners into the bosom of mercy.

And when the devil once complained concerning him, asking why he received again to penance those who had fallen into sins, Martin answered: “If you yourself, wretched one, should cease from harassing human beings and repent of your deeds, trusting in the Lord I would promise even you the mercy of Christ.”

Through the greatness of his faith he moved mountains, namely by driving away from creatures demons most exalted in pride, as from a cow driven by a demon, and from one fraudulently attempting to extort divine worship from him for itself.

For on a certain day the ancient enemy appeared to him in the form of a king, adorned with purple, a diadem, and golden boots, and with a joyful face.

When they both had long remained silent, the devil at last said: “Recognize, O Martin, the one whom you worship. I am Christ, about to descend to earth; I wished first to manifest myself to you.”

And when Martin, still marveling, remained silent, the devil said again: “Martin, why do you hesitate to believe the one whom you see? I am Christ.”

Then Martin, instructed by the Holy Spirit, said: “The Lord Jesus did not foretell that he would come clothed in purple and gleaming with a diadem. I shall not believe that Christ has come unless he is in that form and clothing in which he suffered and bears the marks of the cross.”

At this utterance the devil, confounded, disappeared and filled the cell with a stench.

Demons often appeared to him under diverse forms: sometimes in the form of Venus, sometimes of Jupiter, sometimes of Mercury, and sometimes of Minerva. Recognizing them, he spurned them.

Section III

He was most rich in the abundance of miracles, so that after the apostles none of the saints was equated with him.

The Lord conferred so great a grace upon him that, through the power of the divine Trinity, he merited to become the magnificent raiser of three dead persons.

In a certain field, when a woman besought him with tears for the raising of her young son, where there was a multitude of pagans, Martin prayed for him on bended knees, and he was raised. From this almost all those pagans were converted to the faith.

The second was a certain catechumen who, while he remained in Martin’s monastery to be instructed in the faith and in Christian conduct, was overtaken by an almost sudden death while Martin was absent.

When this was announced to Martin on his return, he prayed for him, and he rose from the dead.

That man, when restored to life, was accustomed to relate that, when his soul was released from his body and had received a sorrowful sentence from the judge before whom it had been presented—namely, to go to the places of darkness—an angel suddenly suggested to the judge that this was the man for whom Martin was praying. Hence the soul was commanded to return to the body, so that Martin might obtain what he desired.

The third was a certain servant who, from despair, had wrested life from himself by a noose.

Compassionating the death both of his soul and of his body, Martin by his prayer drew the soul out of hell—which was a very great thing, and a setting aside of the common law granted to very few saints—and, joining it to the body, raised the man.

Likewise, when Evantius, the uncle of Gallus who relates this, had been brought by a most grave infirmity to his last extremity, Martin was summoned to visit him. He was healed by Martin’s power and met him while he was coming on the road.

And on the following day, when a serpent had bitten one of the boys of Evantius’s household and the poison, diffused through his limbs, was bringing him near death, he was presented to Martin. When Martin placed a finger upon the wound, the poison, already poured through the whole body, was drawn back and went out through that opening of the puncture, and the boy was healed.

He was so powerful in work and speech that all things seemed subjected beneath his feet: insensible things, vegetative things, animals, and intellectual beings.

Fire, which devours all things, forgot the force of its nature through him.

For when he himself had set fire to a certain temple in order to remove idolatry, and the flame of that fire, with the wind blowing, extended toward neighboring houses, Martin opposed himself to the flame, and it proceeded no farther.

On another occasion, when a fire carelessly placed caught in the chamber where he rested, he escaped unharmed while praying in the midst of the flames, because he was unable to go out.

When certain merchants sailing upon the waters of the sea were endangered after a tempest had arisen, one of them, though an unbeliever, cried out and said, “God of Martin, help us,” and immediately a calm was made.

Every year hail which thickened in the air devastated a certain district, that is, a village, of Sens. When the inhabitants of that place sought help from Martin, that tempest so ceased after he poured forth prayer for it that, as long as Martin lived thereafter—namely, for twenty years—that tempest did not afflict them. It invaded again, however, in the year in which he died.

When he commanded that a lofty pine tree dedicated to demons, at which pagan superstitions were practiced, should be cut down, the pagans and peasants resisted.

Nevertheless, they agreed to this work on this condition: that, as they cut down the pine, Martin should remain fixed in that place toward which no one doubted that the very great tree would fall, so that he might receive it as it fell upon him.

When he assented and the cut tree leaned toward Martin, he opposed the sign of the cross to it. Immediately the pine, turning itself in the opposite direction, nearly crushed several of the pagans who were in a safe place.

They were converted to the faith by this miracle.

A certain dog was barking against someone and as though about to bite him. That person commanded it in Martin’s name to be silent, and it became quiet.

When a serpent came through a river toward him and his companions from the other side, he commanded it to return whence it had come, and it went back very swiftly.

When he was going to visit the diocese of Candes for the sake of settling discord, journeying with his companions beside a river, he saw diving birds in the river lying in wait for fish and seizing every one they could.

“This,” he said, “is an image of demons. They lie in wait for the unwary; they seize those who do not know; they devour those seized; and they cannot be satisfied by the ones devoured.”

He therefore commanded them to leave the deep water and seek deserted regions. Immediately, forming a flock, they sought the mountains and woods.

At Nîmes, when a synod of bishops had assembled, what had been decreed in it was intimated to him by an angel.

He cast demons out of many possessed persons.

They feared him so greatly that, when he left the monastery and approached the church, demons cried out through the possessed, roaring as though at the arrival of a judge they were feeling the pains of punishment. Hence, as though groaning, they announced his arrival beforehand.

Oil blessed by him in a glass vessel increased beyond its measure for curing diverse illnesses. And even when the vessel slipped from a window onto a marble pavement, it remained unbroken.

Section IV

Finally, he enters heaven through a happy death.

For when peace had been restored among the clerics of the church of Candes, to which he had gone from his diocese, the man suddenly began to be deprived of his bodily strength.

Calling together his brothers, he foretold that the dissolution of his body was imminent.

But his disciples wept abundantly and said: “Why, father, do you desert us, or to whom do you leave us desolate? Ravening wolves will invade your flock. And who will be able to restrain them from biting when the shepherd has been taken away?

“We know indeed, father, that you desire Jesus; but, your rewards being safe for you, have mercy rather upon us by asking the Lord that the limit of your life be extended.”

Moved by their tears in the bowels of compassion, he himself also wept. Then he prayed, saying: “Lord, if I am still necessary to your people, I do not refuse the labor. Your will be done.”

“O ineffable man,” the Church sings, “neither conquered by labor nor to be conquered by death, who neither feared to die nor refused to live.”

And when for some time he was held by the affliction of fevers on his bed, where he lay in ashes and haircloth, he was asked to permit some softer bedding to be placed beneath him.

He did not consent, saying: “It does not befit a Christian to die otherwise than in ashes and haircloth. If I were to leave another example to you, I myself would have sinned.”

With his eyes and hands always directed toward heaven, he did not relax his unconquered spirit from prayer.

And since he continually lay on his back, when the priests begged him to relieve his little body by changing his side, he said: “Permit me to look toward heaven rather than toward earth, so that my spirit may be directed to the Lord.”

While saying these things, he saw the devil standing by.

“What,” he said, “are you doing here, bloody beast? You will find nothing deadly in me; rather, the bosom of Abraham will receive me.”

And with this utterance, in the eighty-first year of his life, he passed to the Lord.

His body shone like that of a glorified human being, and a concord of angels was heard by many; by them he is honored with heavenly hymns.

O how great was the grief of human beings, how great the lamentations of the sorrowing, especially the choirs of monks and virgins, because it is pious to rejoice for Martin, and it is pious to weep for Martin.

His heavenly glory was shown to several holy men.

On the Lord’s day on which the saint departed, Blessed Severinus, bishop of Cologne, was going around the altars of his church after Matins, praying with the archdeacon, when he heard angels singing in heaven.

Calling the archdeacon, he asked whether he heard anything. When he answered that he heard nothing, Severinus told him to attend diligently.

Raising his head while Severinus prayed for him, the archdeacon said that he heard certain voices in heaven.

Then Severinus said: “My lord Martin has passed to the Lord, and the angels are bearing his soul into heaven. Demons were present also; but, finding nothing of their own, they withdrew confounded.”

The archdeacon therefore noted the day and hour; and, sending a messenger, he found that Martin had passed to the Lord at that hour.

On the same day, when Blessed Ambrose was solemnly celebrating Mass at Milan, he fell asleep at the altar between the prophecy and the epistle.

Because no one presumed to awaken him, and the subdeacon did not dare to read the epistle unless the bishop gave the signal, when a space of two or three hours had passed some persons awakened him, saying: “Father, the hour has passed and the people wait, very weary. Let our lord therefore command the subdeacon to read the epistle.”

He said to them: “Do not be disturbed. My brother Martin has passed to the Lord, and I rendered service at his funeral. But, because you awakened me, I was unable to complete the final prayer.”

Noting the day and hour, they found that he had passed away on that day.

Severus also, the monk who described above the deeds of Martin himself, as he relates, at the hour in which Martin passed from the world saw Blessed Martin clothed in white, with fiery countenance, flashing eyes, purple hair, and a book in his hand; and, after giving him a blessing, Martin condescended into heaven [read: ascended into heaven], where he is honored with heavenly hymns.

When the men of Poitiers and Tours, who had assembled at the place of his passing, disputed over the body after he died, at last at midnight, while the men of Poitiers were oppressed by a heavy sleep, the men of Tours passed the body through a window and, by boat along the Ligur [i.e., Loire] River, carried it to Tours with great joy.

He is also honored magnificently by the Church, since it commanded that on his feast day there should be abstention from manual works, as is stated in On Consecration, distinction III, Pronunciandum.

And many basilicas are constructed under his title.

Section V

Saint Brice, Martin's archdeacon, was exceedingly envious of him and troublesome to Saint Martin himself, sometimes inflicting insults upon him.

For when a certain poor man once sought Martin, Brice said to him: "If you seek that madman, look in the distance. For he is the man who, as though insane, gazes at heaven."

When the poor man had obtained from Martin what he sought, Martin called Brice to him and said: "Brice, do I seem mad to you?"

When, from shame, he denied that he had said this, Martin said: "Were my ears not at your mouth? Amen, I say to you that I have obtained from the Lord that you shall succeed me in the episcopate; and know that you will suffer many adversities in it."

When Brice heard this, he said: "Did I not speak the truth that this man is mad?"

After the death of Blessed Martin, Brice was elected bishop of Tours, and thereafter devoted himself to prayer.

And although he was proud, he was nevertheless chaste in heart.

In the thirtieth year of his episcopate, a certain woman clothed in religious garb who washed his garments conceived and bore a son.

Then all the people, judging that the boy had been conceived by Brice, ran to his door with stones, saying: "For a long time we have tolerated your lust out of regard for Saint Martin, but now we are by no means able to kiss polluted hands."

When he firmly denied this, he said: "Bring the infant to me."

When he was brought, being thirty days old, Brice said to him: "I adjure you by the Son of God to say here before everyone whether I begot you."

And the infant said: "You are not my father."

But when the people pressed him to inquire who the infant's father was, he answered: "That is not my part. I have done what pertained to me."

The people, however, attributing this whole thing to magic arts, said: "You shall by no means rule over us under the false name of shepherd."

Then, to clear himself, he carried burning coals in his cloak as far as the tomb of Blessed Martin. When the coals had been cast out, his garment was found unharmed, and he said: "Just as this garment was not injured by the coals, so my body is clean from contact with the woman."

But when the people still did not believe this, they afflicted him with many injuries and cast him out of the episcopate, so that the saying of Saint Martin might be fulfilled.

Then Saint Brice went to the pope and, remaining there for seven years, bewailed in penitence the offense which he had committed against Saint Martin.

The people, however, made Justinian bishop for themselves and sent him to the city against Brice to obtain the episcopate.

While he was journeying, he ended his life in the city of Vercelli, and the people appointed Armenius in his place.

Therefore, in the seventh year, Brice returned by authority of the pope and received lodging six miles from Tours. On that same night Armenius breathed out his spirit.

Knowing this through a revelation, Brice told his companions to arise and go with him to bury the bishop of Tours.

As Brice entered the city through one gate, the dead man was carried out through another.

When he had been buried, Brice recovered his see; and, surviving for six years, he led a praiseworthy life and rested in peace in the forty-third year of his episcopate.

That he cleared himself of the crime falsely imposed upon him by carrying burning coals in an unharmed garment was not according to the common law, since a purgation of this sort is prohibited, but arose from a special prompting of the Holy Spirit, as is contained in the Decrees.

Title X, Chapter XII

Zenobius, a pontiff of Florence, the light of the world and enlightened by divine light, irradiated the Church, especially in the parts of Tuscany, by holiness of life, the glory of miracles, and also doctrine, being endowed with a twofold knowledge, although he left no published little works to posterity.

Born, therefore, of noble but pagan parents—his father Lucian and his mother Sophia—he derived his origin from Florence.

Entrusted to letters in his boyhood years, by an acute intellect and immense study he reached the summit of all philosophy in a rather short time.

When his progenitors had arranged that a beautiful and noble girl should be betrothed to him as he was already approaching the twentieth year of his age, he refused carnal nuptials and betrothed his soul, a chaste virgin in faith, to the one husband Christ, humbly seeking baptism from Theodore, bishop of the city, and devoutly receiving it.

Hearing this, his parents, filled with fury and accompanied by their attendants, assailed the pontiff with insulting words and threats.

But while Zenobius stood by, and divine grace already worked marvelously in him, so great a sweetness of speech was poured upon his lips that not only did his kindred dismiss the indignation they had conceived, but, after abandoning the error of paganism, they themselves also received the sacraments of baptism.

Zenobius, having despised the vanity of the age, wholly bound himself to divine services.

Having been made a cleric and adhering to the bishop, he was created a canon of the cathedral church.

Advancing from virtue to virtue with marvelous speed, he was assumed as archdeacon of that basilica, being made for all a mirror of holiness and an example of religion.

For he was constant in prayer, devoted to preaching, driving away the poisons of heretics such as the Arians by disputations, expansive in charity, liberal toward the poor, and conspicuous in every uprightness.

When the most blessed man Ambrose, bishop of Milan, was passing through Florence, he bound Zenobius himself—who visited him and whom he regarded as a perfect and most learned man—to himself by a certain intimate and familiar love.

Coming afterward to the city of Rome, Ambrose made known to Damasus, the supreme pontiff, the holiness and wisdom of Zenobius.

For this reason Damasus caused him to be summoned to himself and determined that he should remain with him.

On a certain day, when Pope Damasus was going to the church of Saint Mary across the Tiber and Zenobius was with him, the prefect’s son, dissolved by paralysis, was presented to him, and Zenobius restored him to health by his prayer.

Sent as a legate to Constantinople by the supreme pontiff for certain causes, he faithfully and diligently fulfilled that for which he had been sent and returned to the city.

Meanwhile it happened that, when Theodore, bishop of Florence, was taken from this light, no small controversy and contention arose between Catholics and heretics concerning the election of a successor.

For this reason Damasus sent Zenobius, as a citizen, to quiet the tumult.

As he approached Florence, the people went out to meet him, receiving him with much honor. Escorting him as far as the church, they all began to cry out unanimously: “Let Zenobius be our bishop.”

But, entirely refusing this and understanding the burden, he returned to the one who had sent him and announced that he could do nothing.

The magistrates and the people, however, directed solemn ambassadors to Damasus, asserting that all unanimously sought Zenobius and would not turn to another, and supplicating with urgent prayers that he would deign to grant him as their shepherd.

The supreme prelate resisted at first, grieving that so holy a man was to be separated from him.

At last, overcome by their importunate prayers, he heard them according to their desire, instituting Zenobius bishop of Florence; and although Zenobius was unwilling, Damasus himself, as though unwilling, sent him to Florence to execute the pastoral office.

Received with the greatest joy and veneration, he was enthroned.

The holy man did not diminish but increased the works of the virtues day by day, feeding his flock by the word of doctrine and example of holiness; persisting in preaching and in hearing confessions; refuting heretics with reasoned arguments; stirring the remiss to good works by exhortations; rebuking the disorderly and perverse; and giving everything to the poor beyond the scantiness of his own sustenance.

He subdued his flesh by abstinence from food and drink as much as health permitted, was covered with haircloth beneath his tunic, and adhered to fasts and vigils.

Intent with Mary upon prayer and contemplation, in order that he might more fittingly devote himself to them, he remained with holy men—Eugene his archdeacon and Crescentius the subdeacon—in the church of Saint Lawrence, which was then outside the walls though nearby, observing an almost eremitical life.

Section I

In order to make known his marvelous holiness and to confirm the truth of his teaching, the Lord deigned to work many miracles through him while he was still placed in the flesh.

For he raised several dead persons.

A certain noble lady of Gaul, as she was going to visit the shrines of the apostles, brought with her her only son, weakened by the journey; having heard the holy man's fame, she caused the boy to be commended to him until her return.

But the infirm youth ended his final day on the second weekday after Easter, at the very time when Blessed Zenobius was proceeding in procession with the clergy and people to the church of Saint Peter Major, as is observed even now.

For that pontiff is reported to have instituted that three-day procession after Easter in order to implore God's mercy toward those communicating unworthily and to preserve grace in those receiving devoutly.

But on that day the mother of the youth, returning from the city of Rome, entered Florence and learned that her son had passed to the Lord.

Although cast down in spirit, yet supported by the magnanimity of faith, she caused the corpse of her dead son to be taken up; and, with a numerous crowd following and compassionating her, she approached the place where she had heard that the holy man was present.

She came to him when he had already left the church of Saint Peter and was proceeding with the clergy on the road called that of the Albizi. She caused the corpse of her son to be placed at the saint's feet, tore her garments in grief, pulled out her hair, and, full of tears, cried out that her only son, who had been entrusted to him, should be restored to her, and that otherwise she would not return to her own people.

Moved by her tears, the saint of God poured forth prayer and made the sign of the cross over him; and, when he had been made alive again from the dead, he assigned him to his mother.

Hence all the clergy and people, giving thanks to God, were refreshed with immense joy and confirmed more and more in the faith.

On another occasion, when the saint was visiting with his clerics a certain church near the walls of the city, it happened that the corpse of a certain noble youth was carried to the tomb along that road.

When the saint perceived this, he wished to turn aside from the road lest he meet them, but as they hastened to him he could not do so.

Placing the lifeless body at his feet, they begged that he would deign to raise him, having now experienced his power for that work.

Although he excused himself greatly from so great a work, when they insistently entreated him he was compelled by their prayers and, by the power of prayer, raised him from the dead.

It is added that he raised a third person, namely a five-year-old boy. While the boy was on a public road near the cathedral church, oxen raging with a cart rushed upon him and crushed him.

His tearful mother, gathering him in a linen cloth, carried him to Eugene, the holy man's deacon, so that, presenting him to Zenobius, she might beg that he be raised by him. And this was done.

A certain blind man asking alms at the gate of the church, having heard the fame of his miracles, approached him on the road with undoubting faith, asking him to have mercy upon him.

And because the man was a pagan, Blessed Zenobius asked him whether he wished to become a Christian if he received sight.

When he assented, Zenobius prayed for him, and he immediately received sight.

He freed a certain boy possessed by a demon.

For when the boy was burning with fevers and his mother, called by him forty times in one night, had given him drink, and he sought drink again, the wearied mother offered the drink, saying in anger: “Drink in the name of the devil.”

From that time a demon invaded him. But when he was presented to the saint, Zenobius freed him from the affliction by his prayer; and afterward the mother and son, who were unbelievers, were baptized.

A certain noble lady, a widow and a pagan, had five sons. When they had become adults, they frequently afflicted their mother with injuries and insults, even to blows.

On a certain day, when they had beaten her sharply, she, exceedingly angry, cursed them: that, turned into madness, they might devour their arms with their own teeth.

Divine vengeance immediately followed them. For, seized by demons and turned into madness, they began to gnaw their own arms.

Seeing this, the mother, full of tears, cried aloud for help. The neighbors, aroused by her cry, bound them with chains lest they harm themselves and others.

At last the mother, still a pagan, had recourse to the saint of God, laying before him the misery of her sons.

After prayer had been made from morning until Terce, at last he freed them from the demons and restored them to health; and, after instruction in the faith, he bestowed baptism upon them with their mother.

When Ambrose, bishop of Milan, who had been familiar with him from youth, once visited him, and Eugene his deacon lay ill, Eugene heard of the death of a certain relative without fitting provision for his soul and, burdened greatly by compassion, was greatly aggravated in his illness.

Ambrose urged Zenobius not to delay in providing for the case.

Zenobius therefore blessed water and, sending it to Eugene, commanded him to rise from his bed, go to the house in which the dead man lay and pour it over him, and then come with him and present himself before Zenobius without delay.

When this was done, the man who had died arose, and together they stood before the holy man.

The man also survived for a long time afterward. Eugene, however, returning to his bed, happily fell asleep in the Lord in that infirmity.

At last, full of days and holy works and foreknowing his death, Zenobius gathered the clergy and people in the church and publicly announced his departure to them all.

Admonishing them to fraternal charity and mutual peace, he consoled those saddened by his departure with the hope that, ascending into heaven, he would furnish them aid.

Then, returning home, he became ill. After receiving the sacraments of the Church most devoutly, while the clerics chanted psalms, in the ninetieth year of his age, in the time of Pope Innocent I—namely, in the year 424 from the Incarnation, on the twenty-fifth of May—that most holy soul, released from the body, penetrated the heavenly kingdoms.

He was buried with exceptional honor in the church of Saint Lawrence, not ceasing even after death to illuminate the Church by miracles.

In the fifth year from the day of his burial, his successor Andrew arranged to transfer the saint’s body to the cathedral church dedicated to the Savior.

In order that this might be done more honorably, the surrounding bishops were summoned to this most pious work.

When the bishops, clothed in pontifical vestments, carried the sacred body from the church of Saint Lawrence to the mother church and were before the gate of the oratory of Saint John the Baptist, which is on the northern side, there was then a certain elm there dry of leaves, because it was winter, namely the twenty-sixth of January.

The bishops, pressed by the multitude of the people, each one of whom desired from devotion to touch the bier, fell; and the bier, driven this way and that, struck the elm.

At its touch that elm suddenly put forth leaves and flowered.

At last the body, carried into the church, was honorably placed there. The head, however, separated from the body and covered with silver, is frequently shown to the devout people.

The elm, cut into little pieces out of devotion, was replaced by a marble column erected there for perpetual remembrance, with a cross also of marble placed upon its summit. It remains there to the present day before the aforesaid gate of the church of Saint John.

Title X, Chapter XIII

Saint Maurilius, bishop of Angers, was a contemporary of Blessed Martin and, indeed, was promoted by him to the priesthood.

Born of most illustrious parents in a certain town of the region of Milan, he was instructed in sacred letters and liberal studies and ordained a lector by Blessed Ambrose; and, in the course of time, he was ordained by Martin to another order, that of priest.

Thereafter, entering the city of Angers, he heard that in a certain village named Calonne there was a most ancient temple dedicated to the diverse cults of idols, and he approached it.

Seeing that it could not be destroyed by human hand, he prayed to the Lord that he himself would destroy it by his power. This was suddenly done, for fire descending from heaven consumed the whole thing in a moment.

In that place he caused a church to be built and consecrated by Blessed Martin. Dwelling there for twice six years, devoting himself to fasts and prayers, he shone with many virtues.

Among other things, a shepherd struck by a viper and turned into a swelling, so that his death was expected soon, was brought before him.

When he had prayed over him and impressed the sign of the cross with his saliva upon the little wound through which the viper had infused poison, immediately all the poison dispersed through the body went out through that place, and he was healed.

Not far from the said village of Calonne was a certain hill adorned with shrines of diverse idols, to the destruction of souls.

He therefore proceeded to that place with the faithful in order to destroy it.

But the demons hidden there in the idols began to cry out: “Why, Maurilius, do you persecute us even here? In these regions there is no place to which we can escape you.”

When the sign of the cross was opposed to them by him, the demons suddenly fled with a great roaring and not without an immense stench.

When the idols had been reduced to ashes by fire, he constructed an honorable monastery there.

While the saint had his residence there, it happened that some merchants passing by led a certain captive to be sold by them.

The man, leaping forward, entered the church and asked the man of God to redeem him.

When, out of piety, Maurilius wished to pay his lord the price for him, the man did not consent but caused him to be dragged by force from the church by his companions.

When the holy man prayed that this lord might expire as swiftly as possible, he died.

But his companions, fearing lest some judgment of God should likewise enfold them, sought pardon and insistently supplicated that life should be restored to the dead man.

The saint, fearing lest the man’s death become an occasion of perdition for him, prostrated himself in prayer with tears and did not arise until he obtained both life for the dead man and liberty for the captive.

When certain men sailing on a river were shipwrecked after a tempest arose, with every human hope of escape lost, they invoked the holy man for help and, when a calm was made, escaped unharmed.

Because he frequently went about, now visiting churches and now the sick, and used a little ass since he was burdened by weakness, a robber stole it one night.

But the thief, seized by a demon, was mocked as he wandered about like a madman for the whole night.

When morning came, the robber was present with the little ass before the doors of the blessed man’s house and confessed his crime.

And when he tried to flee, with the devil working lest he be healed, he remained after being adjured by the saint.

Maurilius freed him from the demon and afterward absolved him from his sins; and for the nocturnal labor which he had suffered, he commanded that three gold pieces be given him, and permitted him to depart free without the little ass.

Section I

When the church of Angers was widowed of its shepherd, those assembled to provide themselves a future prelate did not come together into one, because they sought the things that were their own, not those of Jesus Christ.

While they were thus disagreeing, it was announced that Martin, archbishop of Tours, had arrived, and they all awaited his judgment.

Entering among them, therefore, he said: “Men and brothers, hear and attend to my counsel. He who has been chosen by the Lord as your pontiff is Maurilius, presbyter of the church of Calonne.”

With equal resolve they agreed with the saint’s judgment, for they already knew the man’s virtues and merits.

Having received the archbishop’s command, Maurilius was seized very swiftly from his own church and, though unwilling, was placed in Martin’s presence.

When he entered the church with Blessed Martin, to declare the merits of so great a priest a dove of snowy whiteness, gliding down from heaven, descended upon his head and sat there; and then Martin consecrated him, while an army of angels was also present.

Now placed in the pontifical see, he shone with so great a grace of the Lord that signs of mighty works no smaller than those worked through the apostles were done through him: casting demons out of the possessed, healing the sick, and restoring sight to the blind.

But another miracle, marvelous in many ways, is also to be noted in the saint—not one miracle, but several.

While he was celebrating the solemn rites of Mass in the basilica, a certain matron arrived with her dying son. Since she had been sterile, the holy man had obtained him from the Lord by his prayers. She desired that, before the boy died, he should receive from him the sacrament of chrism.

But while Maurilius delayed in the celebration, the boy died.

When the office of Mass had been completed and he learned that the boy had died without the gift of chrism, he imputed it to his own delay and for a long time lamented with irremediable tears the fault of his disobedience.

When not even these things sufficed for him, he at last thought that among his fellow citizens he could not fully expiate the guilt of so great a negligence.

Therefore, having found such a plan, he secretly removed himself from there and carried with him the keys of the reliquary of the saints’ relics belonging to that church.

Reaching a port, unrecognized by the others he boarded a ship. While he was sailing, the keys of the said relics happened to slip from his hands and were submerged in the sea.

He is then reported to have cried out: “Unless I see these same keys again, I shall never return to the city from which I am fleeing.”

Crossing the sea, therefore, and changing his clothing so that he might be less easily known, he attached himself to one of the chief men of that religion [read: region], professing himself to be a gardener.

He was appointed to cultivate his garden, supporting his little body from the labor of his hands.

The house [read: The Lord] gave so great an abundance of vegetables that he offered them to all who had need, and they did not fail; hence he was loved by all.

Because the church of Angers was as though widowed by this event, very many persons were admonished in a vision that unless they sought Maurilius, found him, and led him back to the city, the city of Angers would soon be destroyed.

For this reason, by the common counsel of the people, four vigorous men were appointed to journey through the world to find him.

When they had sought him for a long time, for several years, and had not found the one whom they sought throughout the diverse regions, as they sailed near land upon a calm sea, suddenly a great fish emerged from the sea and leapt into the ship.

Taking it and disemboweling it, they found within it the keys of the reliquary.

Marveling greatly at this matter, they began to suspect that the saint of God had suffered shipwreck and been submerged. Hence they even deliberated about returning to their homeland, thinking him dead.

But all were admonished in dreams not to return, but to hasten the undertaking begun.

Continuing their voyage from this event and at last going down upon land, by the working of divine prudence they came to the house of that lord who had hired the saint as a gardener.

Hearing that lord call Maurilius to bring vegetables in the usual manner, they recognized him when he came.

Falling at his feet and asking with many tears, they begged him to have mercy upon the city of Angers, which would fall unless he returned.

Although, astonished, he could not deny himself to their weeping, he began to resist more urgently, saying: “I have bound myself by a vow and oath never to return to my homeland until I merit to see the keys which I lost.”

When the keys were shown to him by them and they declared how they had found them, he arranged to return.

Meanwhile, the fame of this affair flew about everywhere; and where he had been an abject stranger and gardener, he was venerated eagerly by all.

Wearied by vigils and fasts and also by prayers concerning his return, he slept a little, and an angel of the Lord appeared to him, saying: “Arise, Maurilius, and fulfill the desire of the peoples seeking you. For behold, the Lord has preserved the sheep entrusted to you through your merits and prayers, and has restored to you the boy whom you long sought with weeping.”

Why say more? The saint returned with the greatest honor to his city and, now secure concerning the Lord’s promise, went to the tomb of the boy and invoked Christ with many tears.

When Maurilius arose from prayer, the boy arose from death.

Giving him chrism, Maurilius called him Renatus from the event. Bound to divine services and adhering to Maurilius, he was sufficiently instructed in letters and merited to flourish with such great virtues that after Maurilius he attained the pontifical chair.

Other miracles being omitted, the holy man always had poor sustenance, little water, and cheap furniture.

Indeed, when the days of holy Lent arrived, throughout that whole time his food was dry and taken in the evening; every third day he had warm water, a little salt, and barley bread which he himself threshed and ground.

During those days he did not set foot in public, being always covered with haircloth and ashes.

Nevertheless, he did not grow sluggish through bodily wasting, nor did pallor appear in his countenance. He was robust in body, and his face was red as a rose.

He died in the ninetieth year of his age and the thirtieth of his episcopate.

And when he was carried to the tomb, blind persons who touched his bier merited to receive sight.

Title X, Chapter XIV

Saint Alexius, who by a new art deceived the world and marvelously triumphed over the enemy of the human race, passed from this world to the Father of all in the twentieth year of Innocent I and in the eighth year of the emperors Arcadius and Honorius, shining with miracles, although in life he had been abject and unknown to human beings.

Therefore, to touch briefly upon his deeds, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, book XIX, he was the son of Euphemianus, a most noble Roman citizen, who was chief in the emperor's palace, full of riches and possessing a large household of servants.

Fearing God, he and his wife Egloës [i.e., Aglaës] devoted themselves constantly to works of mercy, and also to prayers and fasts.

Since his wife was sterile, by prayers they obtained from the Lord that one son should be given to her, whom they called Alexius.

They reared him in holy conduct and, thereafter themselves abstaining even from marital intercourse, entrusted him to be instructed in the liberal disciplines.

When he had grown up, they procured for him a bride of imperial lineage.

When the nuptials had been celebrated, the whole city was crowned with joy.

Indeed, when night came, Alexius entered the chamber to his bride and addressed her, exhorting her to virginity, showing that this would be most pleasing to God and his angels, that the pleasures of the body make people like brute beasts, and that vanity would perish as swiftly as possible.

Having persuaded her to this purpose, he handed her his ring and the head of his belt, so that she might preserve them as long as it pleased God.

Taking from his substance what seemed fitting to him, he secretly withdrew from the bridal chamber and the house; and, proceeding to the sea, he boarded a ship and reached Edessa, a city of Syria.

There, having bestowed upon the poor what he had carried with him and being clothed in a most cheap garment, he began to beg with the other poor in the church of Mary, the Mother of God, receiving Communion on every Lord's day and conferring upon other poor persons what remained in excess to him.

When morning came on the second day of the nuptials and Alexius did not appear, he was sought throughout the whole city; and when he was not found, the joy of the nuptials was changed into the mourning of his parents and the entire household.

Euphemianus sent messengers throughout the world to make inquiry concerning his son.

Some of them, reaching Edessa in Syria, gave alms to their lord as he begged among the poor, not recognizing him.

But he, not failing to recognize them, gave thanks to God because he had merited to receive temporal aid from his own servants.

The servants, returning from every direction, reported that they had found him nowhere.

All therefore remained in no small sadness.

His bride, however, declared that, like a turtledove after the loss of her mate, she wished to remain with her mother-in-law until she received a report concerning her most sweet bridegroom.

Meanwhile, when for seventeen years he had persevered in begging at the said church, wholly devoted to prayer, a voice came from the image of the Virgin of that church to the sacristan, saying: "Bring the man into the house of God, because his prayer ascends like incense in the sight of God."

When the sacristan did not know what man it designated, it was declared to him that it spoke of Alexius.

He therefore brought him in, held him in great veneration, and made known the deed.

Because Alexius feared the stealthy approach of vainglory to himself, since he had begun to be honored by all, he departed from there.

He boarded a ship to be carried to Tarsus in Cilicia, but by a contrary wind the ship was driven to the port of Ostia.

Descending from it and entering the city, he met his father, recognizing him but remaining unknown to his father.

He supplicated him that he would deign to grant him some little dwelling in his house to inhabit, so that his Lord might have mercy upon him and upon his pilgrim son.

When the father heard the name of his son, moved in the bowels of piety, he assented and commanded his servants to assign the man a certain place in his palace and furnish the necessities.

He therefore commanded that a dwelling be prepared for him in the courtyard of his house, so that he might see him when entering and departing, and that provision be made for him from his table.

But the servants, unruly in the manner of their kind, inflicted many injuries and derisions upon him while their lord was ignorant, and Alexius endured all things without complaint, always applying himself to prayer in great austerity.

Thus he remained there for another seventeen years.

Then, when the Lord revealed his death so that he might carry back the triumph from his long contest, he asked the servants for a writing tablet and reed, and wrote who he was, how he had departed, where he had lived, and narrated all things in order.

Having closed the document, he surrendered his spirit as it sought the things above.

On the Lord's day, however, after the solemn rites of Mass, a voice was heard from heaven, saying: "Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened, and I shall refresh you."

At this voice all were terrified and stupefied.

A voice came a second time, saying: "Seek the man of God, so that he may pray for Rome."

When they asked among themselves who he could be and were unable to know, they heard a third time: "Seek in the house of Euphemianus."

And all turned to Euphemianus, who was present, and asked why he wished to conceal so great a grace from others; but he also declared that he did not know.

Therefore, when the supreme pontiff Innocent and the emperors Arcadius and Honorius proceeded to the house of Euphemianus, Euphemianus himself ran ahead to arrange the house according to what befitted them.

But one of the servants who ministered more attentively to Alexius said to Euphemianus: "See, lord, whether perhaps it is that pilgrim whom you received long ago and have kept in your house. For that man is of great patience and prayer."

Reaching the house, Euphemianus approached the little cell of Alexius's dwelling and found him dead.

Uncovering his face, he saw it shining like the countenance of an angel.

When he wished to take the closed document which Alexius held in his hands, the dead man did not release it.

When therefore the pope arrived with the emperors and a very great multitude of the people, Euphemianus announced that the man of God had been found and that he held a document in his hands which he had been unwilling to release.

The supreme prelate approached the place where the holy body lay and took the document from his hands, which he immediately released, and handed it to a notary to be read before all the people.

But Euphemianus, hearing his son named, became lifeless and fell to the ground.

When his spirit returned, he tore his garments and pulled out his hair because of immense grief. He uttered pitiable cries, poured forth abundant tears, cast himself upon the body of his son, and did not cease to kiss him, saying: "Alas for me, my lord! Why have you afflicted me thus? Why for so many years have you crushed my soul?" and so forth.

His mother also, hearing this, came upon them full of tears, roaring like a lioness whose cubs had been taken.

His wife came similarly after her, clamorous and tearful, uttering words which could not be imagined in such an event.

But the Lord made his saint marvelous. For at his touch the blind saw, the sick were healed, and those possessed by demons were freed.

Seeing such great marvels, for honor and no small advancement, the supreme rulers themselves wished to be the bearers of such a burden.

The most sacred body was carried with no small difficulty, because of the multitude desiring to touch the sacred relics, to the church of Saint Boniface; and there it was laid away most honorably with hymns and praises on the seventeenth day of the month of July, in the year of the Lord 410.

Title X, Chapter XV

In the following year, namely the ninth year of Emperor Honorius, as Sigebert says, Paula, a most noble, most wise, and most holy woman, passed to Christ.

Jerome described her life, beginning thus:

“If all the members of my body were turned into tongues and all my limbs resounded with a human voice, I would say nothing worthy of the virtues of Saint Paula.

“Noble by birth, but nobler by holiness; once powerful in riches, but now more distinguished by poverty, she was an example of chastity to all the matrons of Rome.

“She conducted herself in such a manner that no one even among slanderers ever dared to touch her reputation.

“She did not seek the powerful; nevertheless, she did not look down with disdain upon the proud and those seeking glorious things. She sustained the poor; she invited the rich to do good.

“By fleeing glory, she merited the glory which follows virtues like a shadow, and, abandoning those who seek it, seeks those who despise it.

“Born, therefore, of such a stock, she was joined to the man Toxotius, who draws the most exalted blood of Aeneas and the Julii.

“And we say these things not because they are great in those who possess them, but because they are marvelous in those who despise them. Human beings of the age receive those who flourish in these privileges; we praise those who despise them for Christ’s sake.

“She bore five children: Blesilla, over whose death I consoled her at Rome; Paulina, who left the holy man Pammachius heir both of her purpose and of her possessions, to whom we also published a little book concerning her death; Eustochium, who is now in the holy places a precious jewel of virginity and of the Church; Rufina, who at a mature funeral strengthened the pious soul of her mother [read: whose untimely death deeply distressed the pious soul of her mother]; and Toxotius, after whom she ceased to bear children.

“What poor person, when dying, was not wrapped in her garments? What cleric was not sustained by her resources?

“Seeking them most carefully throughout the whole world [read: throughout the whole city], she regarded it as a loss if anyone weak or hungry was sustained by another’s food.

“She despoiled her children, and amid the rebukes of her relatives she said that she was leaving them a greater inheritance: the mercy of Christ.

“Nor could she for long endure the visits and frequent attendance belonging to exalted birth and a most noble family.

“She once had as a guest Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis in Cyprus, which is now called Constantia; and she possessed Paulinus, bishop of Antioch, who remained in another house, through kindness as though he were her own.

“Inflamed by their virtues, at every moment she thought of abandoning her homeland.

“Why say more? She descended to the port, while brother, kindred, relations by marriage, and children followed and desired to conquer her by affection.

“Little Toxotius stretched out suppliant hands on the shore. Rufina, already marriageable, silently entreated with tears that she should await her nuptials.

“And nevertheless Paula directed dry eyes toward heaven, overcoming affection toward her children by affection toward God.

“She did not know herself to be a mother, so that she might prove herself a handmaid of Christ.

“Thus, plowing the sea by ship, she journeyed through many regions, visited the holy places of the Promised Land and the monks of Egypt, and at last, intending to remain at Bethlehem perpetually, remained for three days [read: for three years] in a narrow lodging, until she constructed cells, monasteries, and lodgings for pilgrims beside the road on which Mary and Joseph had not found lodging.”

When she first visited the Lord’s manger, she saw in a certain imaginary or sensible vision Christ being born of the Virgin, the angels praising together, and the Magi adoring, as though those things were then actually occurring, as the same Jerome relates near the beginning of the sermon On the Assumption.

Jerome says:

“She had Blesilla as mother and Rogatus as father. Of these, the one is of the lineage of the Scipios and the Greeks [read: Scipios and Gracchi]; the other, through almost all Greece to this very day, is reported by riches and nobility to draw the blood of Agamemnon, who destroyed Troy in a ten-year siege.

“She cast herself down with such humility—which is the first virtue of Christians—that whoever had seen her before would not now believe her to be the same, but the last of the handmaids.

“And although she was surrounded by frequent choirs of virgins, she was the least of all in clothing, voice, bearing, and gait.

“After the death of her husband, she never wished to eat with any man, however holy she knew him to be.

“She did not approach baths unless she was in danger.

“Even in a most grievous fever she had no soft bedding for her couch, but rested upon the hardest ground with little pieces of haircloth spread beneath her—if indeed that is to be called rest by which she joined days and nights with almost continual prayers.

“She so bewailed light sins that you would have believed her guilty of the gravest crimes.

“When she was rather frequently admonished by us to spare her eyes and preserve them for the reading of the Gospel, she said: ‘The face which, against God’s command, I frequently painted with purple dye, white lead, and antimony is to be disfigured.

“‘The body which devoted itself to many delights is to be afflicted. Long laughter is to be compensated by perpetual weeping. Soft linen garments and things most precious with silk are to be exchanged for the roughness of haircloth.’

“Her generosity alone exceeded measure; and, paying interest, she also made interest [read: she also frequently contracted another loan].

“I confess my error. I reproved her because she was too profuse in giving, and warned her lest she should not always be able to do what she willingly did, according to that saying of the Apostle: ‘Not that there should be relief for others, but tribulation for you.’

“With marvelous modesty she dissolved this argument with most skilled speech [read: with most sparing speech], saying that she had this as her vow: that she should die begging, leave not even one coin to her daughter, and even at her funeral be wrapped in another person’s shroud.

“She wished to learn the Hebrew language, which I learned from adolescence with much labor and sweat, and she attained it, so that she chanted the Psalms in Hebrew and sounded out the speech without any quality of the Latin tongue.

“We discern this to this day in her holy daughter Eustochium, who always adhered to her mother and obeyed her commands in such a manner that she never lay down, went out, or took food without her, and had not even one coin in her own power.

“In this alone did Paula have longing for her homeland: that she might know her son, a man, and a grandson [read: her son, daughter-in-law, and granddaughter] to have renounced the age and to serve Christ.

“But when she had fallen into a most severe illness, the piety of her daughter Eustochium, always proved toward her mother, was then proved all the more by diligently standing by her in all things.

“With what prayers, with what lamentations and groaning, did she run between her mother lying ill and the onrush of the Lord [read: the cave of the Lord], lest she be deprived of so great a companionship, lest she live in Paula’s absence, but that she should be carried upon the same bier!

“Why say more? The most prudent woman perceived that death was present and, as though she were going to her own people and abandoning strangers, whispered those verses: ‘Lord, I have loved the beauty of your house,’ and so forth; and, ‘How beloved are your tabernacles, O Lord,’ and so forth.

“When she was asked by me why she was silent and why she did not wish to answer me when I cried out to ask what she suffered, she answered in the Greek language, which she knew, that she had no affliction, but regarded all things as quiet and tranquil.

“After this she became mute and, holding a finger to her mouth, traced the sign of the cross upon her lips.

“She turned even that sweat [read: death-rattle] by which the life of mortals is ended into praises of the Lord.

“The bishops of Jerusalem and other cities were present, and an innumerable multitude of priests, Levites, monks, and virgins; and songs of psalms resounded in diverse languages.

“Carried upon a bier by the hands of the bishops, she was placed in the middle of the church, in the cave of the Savior.”

Title XI

Title XI contains the deeds of one hundred and two years, or thereabouts, namely from the year of the Lord 418 until the year 518.

It treats of eleven supreme pontiffs, namely Boniface, Celestine, Sixtus, Leo I, Hilary, Simplicius, Felix II, Gelasius, Anastasius II, Symmachus, and Hormisdas.

It treats also of the emperors succeeding one another in the East: Theodosius the Younger, Marcian, Leo I, Zeno, and Anastasius.

In the West there reigned Valentinian III and, after the usurpation, Maximus, Avitus, Majorian, Severus, Anthemius, Orestes, and Odoacer; and finally Theodoric was made king in Italy by Zeno, one succeeding another.

This title also contains the origin and progress of other kingdoms: namely, the kingdom of the Persians; of the eastern and western Goths, that is, those reigning there; the kingdom of the Huns; of the Vandals, who, having become Arians, persecuted the Church in Africa; the kingdom of the Lombards; and the kingdom of the Franks and Britons.

It also contains the doctors of that time and the holy bishops and abbots then flourishing.

Title XI, Chapter I

From the year of the Lord's Incarnation 381, in which Gratian began to rule, Sigebert began to describe the contemporaneity of several kingdoms: namely, that of the Romans; of the Persians, which afterward became that of the Saracens; the kingdom of the Franks; of the English; the kingdom of the Vandals; the kingdom of the Lombards; the kingdom of the Visigoths; the kingdom of the Ostrogoths; and the kingdom of the Huns.

We shall note something briefly concerning all these.

Concerning the kingdom of the Romans, about which something has been said and, with life as companion, is to be said down to the present time—namely, the year of the Lord 1454—Sigebert speaks thus in his Chronicles:

"According to Daniel's interpretation from the vision of the statue seen by Nebuchadnezzar, this kingdom is the fourth monarchy and the last of the world, signified in the iron shins and feet of the statue, yet mixed with clay.

"For just as iron breaks, subdues, and crushes all things, so from its origin it broke, struck, and subdued almost all the kingdoms of the world.

"But in the last time, that kingdom, which in its iron shins had stood for a very long time and most firmly without any weariness, at last, when the composition of human weakness in the feet had been mingled with the iron of its strength, began to slip from the exalted degree of its dominion with a terrible crash.

"The Persians first struck this kingdom. They had always held themselves almost as equals with the Romans, but now, while the state of the commonwealth wavered, they did not fear to attack them beyond measure and were moreover able to mutilate them at their borders, when, after Julian the Apostate was killed and the army miserably subjugated, the Persians became exceedingly fortunate through their misfortune.

"And thus that kingdom which for so long had held almost all the nations of the world for plunder and dominion, now, when the omnipotence of God was angered against it, lay open to the plunder and mockery of almost all nations, receiving double in the cup which it had mixed for others.

"Those who formerly contended with other nations for glory alone were now scarcely able to take sufficient counsel for their own safety.

"For whatever nations were exiled from their homeland either for the sake of diminishing the multitude of their household or from love of exercising their ferocity assailed the empire of the Romans, cut away from its most extensive body certain parts, as it were, and established for themselves in them a place for reigning."

And because, of the ecclesiastical and royal powers by which the world is governed, the ecclesiastical is the greater, as is contained in distinction XCVI, Duo sunt, it is therefore necessary to treat first of the supreme pontiffs.

Section I

Boniface, the fortieth from Peter, succeeded Zosimus—of whom it was said above in Title X—to the supreme pontificate.

He was Roman by nation and presided over the Church for three years, five months, and thirteen days.

Against him a certain other man named Eulalius was ordained pope.

Therefore, when the clergy disagreed, by command of Emperor Honorius, who was still living, Boniface, who had been ordained first, was placed in the apostolic see.

When, after Boniface died, many sought for Eulalius, who had been expelled, to be recalled, Eulalius did not consent to return to Rome.

And note that concerning this Emperor Honorius writes thus to this Pope Boniface, as is contained in distinction LXXIX:

"If perhaps two men have been ordained through the impious rashness of contenders, we decree that neither of them is to become priest, but we judge that he alone is to remain in the apostolic see whom divine judgment and the consent of the universality shall choose from the number of the clerics by a new ordination."

There the Gloss notes that, since it does not pertain to the emperor to establish anything concerning elections and other ecclesiastical matters, he did this at the request of the Church, and the Church approved it.

And as Gratian adds in the following section, this is not understood of the case when one man is elected canonically and another is afterward created in fact, because the first prevails.

Or, according to the Gloss, it is understood when neither is elected by two parts of the cardinals, as is required, because then neither of them is pope, as is stated in the Decretals, On Election, in the final chapter.

Or a council will be summoned when, namely, there is doubt concerning the right of each.

This Boniface also decreed that no woman or nun should touch or wash the consecrated cloth of the altar, or offer incense at the altar; and that a slave or one bound to the curia should not be ordained, namely unless he had been freed.

He presided over the Roman Church in the tenth year of Emperor Honorius, but in the year 418 from the Lord's Incarnation.

Section II

When Boniface passed from this light, Pope Celestine, the forty-first, succeeded to the see of Peter.

He was Roman by nation and sat for nine years, ten months, and nine days.

He established that the introit of the Mass should be said from the Psalms of David, as is observed for the most part. This was not done before, but the epistle of Paul and the Gospel were said.

And not only the introits, but also the graduals or responsories and the offertories began to be said before the sacrifice, and prayers to be sung with modulation at Mass in the Roman curia.

Under this most blessed prelate Celestine, a certain bishop Peter built the church of Saint Sabina on the Aventine Hill. Celestine consecrated it and placed there several bodies of saints, especially those of Pope Alexander I, Eventius, and Theodulus, and of Saint Serapia the virgin and Saint Sabina the widow and martyr. It now belongs to the Friars Preachers.

By this Pope Celestine, Bishop Palladius was sent to the Scots believing in Christ.

After him Saint Patrick, a Briton by race and son of Conches, the sister of Saint Martin, was sent to them by the same pope.

Ordained archbishop of the Scots by Celestine himself, distinguished by holiness and excelling in doctrine for sixty years, Patrick converted the whole island of Ireland to Christ. He will be discussed below.

This Celestine inveighs against those who promote laymen and unworthy persons to orders and dignities, saying thus:

"Whoever desires to be a teacher ought first to be a disciple, so that he may be able to teach what he has learned.

"Every institution of life strengthens itself toward that to which it tends by this principle.

"He who has devoted no labor to letters will not be able to be an instructor.

"He who has not advanced through each period of service will not be able to reach the order belonging to the reward of service.

"Priesthood alone among these things is held cheaper. Why is it bestowed more easily, when it is fulfilled with greater difficulty?" This is in distinction LIX, Ordinatos.

The same Celestine says in distinction LXII: "The people are to be taught, not followed. We also, if they do not know, ought to admonish them what is lawful or what is not lawful, not give our consent to them."

The same man says in cause XXVI, question VI, chapter Agnovimus:

"Whoever has denied penance to a human being at the time of death takes salvation away from him.

"Those who did not believe that God could suffice to aid the dying even in a moment despaired of the mercy of God.

"The thief hanging at Christ's right hand would have lost his reward if the penitence of one hour had not aided him.

"While he was in punishment he repented, and by the command of a single word he merited, with Christ promising it, a dwelling in Paradise."

Under this Pope Celestine, as is said in the Decrees, distinction XVI, chapter Sexta, according to Bede a universal synod of three hundred fathers was celebrated at Ephesus in the times of Theodosius the Younger against Nestorius, bishop of Constantinople.

Nestorius said that Blessed Mary was the mother not of God but only of a human being, because he posited in Christ two distinct persons, namely a human and a divine person.

Hence he was declared a heretic, and it was determined that there is only one person in Christ, but in two natures, namely divine and human, and that the Blessed Virgin ought to be called the Mother of God.

Some, however, say that it was celebrated under Pope Sixtus, who follows immediately.

Section III

After Celestine, Sixtus, the second of this name and the forty-second pope, sat in the chair of Peter.

He was Roman by nation and governed the Church for eight years and nineteen days.

He was accused of a false crime by a certain patrician named Bassus. Hence Sixtus himself writes thus to all the bishops in the Decrees, cause II, question IV:

“You commanded that I write to you how this dispute was stirred up against me and by whom, so that it might be repelled by your support and my cause might be strengthened.

“Know, therefore, that I am accused by a certain Bassus and unjustly persecuted.

“Hearing this, Valentinian Augustus commanded, by our authority, that a synod be assembled; and, when the council had been held, I satisfied everyone after a great examination, although I could have escaped quite well in another way.

“Nevertheless, fleeing suspicion, I cleared myself before everyone, namely freeing myself from suspicion and rivalry, but not giving a form for doing this to others who are unwilling to do it or have voluntarily chosen it [read: have not voluntarily chosen it].”

These things are there.

When he had thus been cleared before sixty-six bishops, the aforesaid Bassus was condemned by the synod, yet in such a manner that on his last day viaticum should not be denied to him, because of the piety of the Church.

Valentinian Augustus and his mother Placidia, indignant against Bassus with holy fervor, condemned him, relegated him to exile, and assigned all his resources to the Catholic Church.

By the just judgment of God he died within three months.

Nevertheless, Blessed Sixtus, unmindful of the injury, caused his body to be preserved with spices with every service of humanity and buried it honorably with his own hands in the church of Blessed Peter.

At the exhortation of this pontiff, Emperor Valentinian offered many gifts to ecclesiastical churches and renewed many things in the church of the apostles Peter and Paul which had been taken away by barbarians.

Under this Pope Sixtus, Emperor Theodosius died at Constantinople.

Pope Sixtus says thus in the Decrees, cause XXIV, question I:

“I remember that I preside under the name of him whose confession was glorified by the Lord, and whose faith never favors any heresy but indeed destroys all heresies.

“I understand that it is not lawful for me to do otherwise than expend all my efforts upon that cause in which the salvation of the universal Church is assailed.”

Section IV

While Marcian was ruling at Constantinople and Valentinian III in Italy, after the passing of Pope Sixtus, Leo, the first of this name, was created pope.

He was Tuscan by nation and presided over the Roman Church for twenty-one years, one month, and twenty-nine days.

He was very powerful in declaiming homilies and most eloquent in his sermons.

He wrote seventy decretal letters. He delivered seventy-nine sermons to the people, which are also preserved in writing; hence he was called the Sermologist.

And because of the commendation of this holy man’s prudent intellect and the charm of his eloquence, some things from his sayings are introduced below.

He added to the Canon of the Mass: “a holy sacrifice, an immaculate victim.”

He was conspicuous in holiness.

Whenever he was asked by anyone to give them some relics of the apostles or martyrs, he was accustomed to celebrate Masses in honor of those apostles or martyrs at their bodies or memorials whose relics were sought.

Thus he divided piece by piece the grandeuum of the altar [read: the brandeum of the altar]—that is, the corporal in which he had wrapped the consecrated body of the Lord—and gave it as relics of the apostles or martyrs.

Hence, if anyone doubted, by piercing those cloths with a little knife he drew forth blood, thus making manifest to all that even by the consecration of the mysteries the blood of the apostles or martyrs which had been shed for Christ entered those cloths by divine power, and that those cloths were therefore deservedly given as relics of the saints in whose honor they had been consecrated.

By his prayers and entreaties he obtained peace for the city when he personally approached Attila, who was stationed with his peoples near Ravenna, so that Attila would depart from Italy when he was striving to go to plunder the city of Rome.

In his times and those of Emperor Marcian, the fifth and most celebrated synod, of six hundred and thirty fathers, was celebrated in the city of Chalcedon against Eutyches, an abbot of Constantinople.

He asserted that after the assumption of humanity Christ did not exist from two natures, but that the divine nature alone was preeminent in him, as though the human nature had been changed into the divine.

Therefore, when the aforesaid heresy had been condemned, they established twenty-seven canons, whose principal author was Saint Anatolius, bishop of Constantinople, as is contained in distinction XVI, chapter Sexta.

Hence Emperor Marcian, present at the council, said, as is contained in distinction XCVI:

“Following the example of the most religious prince Constantine, we wish to be present at the synod to confirm the faith, not to display power, so that, once truth has been found, the multitude, drawn by perverse doctrines, may disagree no longer; judging it fitting that its chapters be confirmed regularly by a synod rather than sanctioned by our law.”

These things are there.

Not only was Abbot Eutyches condemned, but also his defender Dioscorus, formerly bishop of Alexandria.

Nestorius also, formerly bishop of Constantinople, who had been condemned as a heretic in the preceding Council of Ephesus for asserting two persons in Christ, was again condemned with other heretics.

It was decreed that Blessed Mary, the Mother of the Lord, should be believed and called not only Christotokos but also Theotokos, because of the blasphemies of Nestorius, who falsely asserted that she bore not God but a mere human being.

To refute the said errors, Vincent in the Historical Mirror, book XXI, chapter XXXV, relates this miracle as having occurred from the acts of the said council.

For while the heretics disputed with the orthodox in the presence of Pope Leo, the orthodox said:

“Let us write our faith on one document, and you heretics yours on another, and let us place them with our seals upon the body of Saint Euphemia. Let us secure the tomb before the emperor and pray to God—we according to our faith, you rather according to your perfidy—that God may manifest the true faith to us.”

When this had been done, the orthodox prayed and fasted for seven days.

After this, all went with the emperor to the tomb. Opening it, they saw Saint Euphemia holding the document of the orthodox in her hand, while the document of the heretics had been cast beneath her feet.

His little work, or letter, directed to Bishop Flavian—namely, concerning the mystery of the faith—was approved down to its last iota in distinction XV, Sancta Romana.

I believe this to be the letter which, as is read, after he had published it he placed upon the tomb of Blessed Peter the Apostle, praying and fasting for forty days so that, if there were anything in it which ought to be corrected, Peter might amend it.

Peter appeared to him at the end of the forty days, saying that he had amended it where it was expedient.

When the same man prayed and fasted at the tomb of Blessed Peter, asking that Peter obtain pardon for his sins, Peter himself appeared, saying:

“I have entreated the Lord for you, and he has forgiven you all your sins. Only concerning the imposition of hands must you be examined”—that is, whether you imposed hands well or otherwise upon anyone, namely by conferring orders or benefices.

Concerning certain statutes made by him, Vincent relates in the place cited above:

“Because the malignant one does not cease to lie in wait for the followers of piety and always searches out some new thing against truth, it was resolved that no one should be able to build a monastery or oratory without the consent of the bishop of the city.

“In monasteries a slave is not to be received to be made a monk without the consent of his own lord.

“Nor are monks to involve themselves in ecclesiastical or secular affairs.

“Nor is it lawful for a cleric to serve simultaneously in the churches of two cities.

“Clerics or monks who are conspirators are to lose their own rank, for this vice is cut away entirely even under external laws.

“A cleric or layman who accuses a bishop ought not to be received unless their reputation has first been examined.

“It was resolved that ordinations of bishops should be made within three months.

“Every church that has a bishop is also to have a steward from its own clergy.

“The severity of enactments must be numerous where license for faults is frequent.”

These things are there.

Among his other statutes, these things are contained in the Decrees, distinction XIV:

“Just as there are certain things which cannot be overturned by any reason, so there are many things which must be tempered either because of the necessity of the times or because of consideration of ages, with this consideration always preserved: that in matters which are doubtful or obscure, we should know that course to be followed which is found neither contrary to the evangelical precepts nor opposed to the decrees of the holy fathers.”

Concerning the continence of clerics, he says thus in distinction XXXII:

“The election of all priests is so excellent that things which in other members of the Church are free from fault are nevertheless regarded as unlawful in them.

“For although those constituted outside the order of clerics are free to devote themselves to the fellowship of nuptials and the procreation of children, nevertheless, for displaying the purity of perfect continence, carnal marriage is not conceded even to subdeacons, so that those who have wives may be as though not having them—that is, may not use them—and those who do not have them may remain single—that is, may not contract marriage.”

Pope Leo says in distinction XXXVIII:

“If lack of knowledge seems intolerable in laymen, how much more in those who preside? It is neither worthy of excuse nor of pardon.”

The same man says concerning the manner of correction in distinction XLV:

“Although things which are to be reproved sometimes occur among priestly persons, nevertheless, in regard to those to be corrected, let benevolence do more than severity, charity more than power, exhortation more than agitation.

“But those who seek the things that are their own, not those of Jesus Christ, easily depart from this law; and while it pleases them to dominate rather than to take counsel for their subjects, honor inflates them into pride, and what was provided for concord tends toward harm.”

The same man says against cupidity in distinction XLVII:

“A Catholic man, and especially a priest of the Lord, just as he ought to be entangled by no error, so he ought to be violated by no cupidity, Scripture saying: ‘Do not go after your desires.’

“For a mind greedy for power neither knows how to abstain from forbidden things, nor to rejoice in things conceded, nor to grant consent to piety.”

The same man says concerning undue promotions in distinction LXI:

“We marvel that among you, through the occasion of an unquiet time, the presumption of those canvassing for office, or a popular tumult, had such power that the pastoral summit and governance of the Church were entrusted to unworthy persons and to those established far outside priestly merit.

“This is not to take counsel for the people but to harm them, not to furnish governance but to increase danger.

“For the integrity of those who preside is the salvation of their subjects, and where the soundness of obedience exists, there is a sound form of doctrine.”

And below:

“But if in any grades of the Church care must be taken prudently and knowingly that nothing in the house of the Lord be disordered and nothing inverted, how much more must labor be expended that there be no error in the election of him who is placed over all the grades?

“For the state and order of the whole household of the Lord will waver if that which is required in the body is not found in the head.

“Where is that precept of Blessed Paul the Apostle, issued through the Spirit of God, by which in the person of Timothy the whole number of Christ’s priests is instructed, whence it is said to each one of us: ‘Impose hands hastily upon no one, nor make yourself a sharer in the sins of others’?

“For what is it to impose hands hastily, unless it is to bestow priestly honor upon the unproved before the age of maturity, before the time of examination, before the merit of obedience, and before experience of discipline?

“For just as he who maintains upright judgment in electing a priest obtains for himself the fruit of a good work, so he who exalts an unworthy man to the fellowship of his dignity afflicts himself with grave harm.

“That which is contained in general enactments is not to be omitted in the case of any person.

“Nor is that order to be regarded as lawful which has been conferred contrary to the precepts of divine law.”

And below:

“Nor can there be doubt concerning the advancement of him to whom, for many labors, chaste conduct, and strenuous deeds, the reward of a higher place is owed.”

The same man says:

“We establish that the Church of the Lord is not to be entrusted for governance to those who, ignorant of lawful institutions and unacquainted with all humility, have wished not to take their increase from the lowest things but to have their beginning from the highest, since it is exceedingly unjust and absurd that the inexperienced should be preferred to masters, the new to the ancient, the untrained to the meritorious.”

The same man says concerning penance for the sick in cause XXVI, question VI:

“Those who in a time of necessity and under the pressure of urgent danger implore the aid of penance and the manner of reconciliation are neither to be forbidden satisfaction nor denied reconciliation, because we can neither impose measures upon God’s mercy nor define times for it. With him conversion suffers no delays in coming, the Spirit of God saying through the prophet: ‘When you have turned and groaned, you shall be saved.’”

And he says in cause XXVI, question VII:

“The times of penitence are to be established with moderation according to your judgment, as you perceive the minds of the converted to be devout, having consideration likewise for advanced age and regarding the necessities of any dangers and illnesses,” and so forth.

The same man says in On Penance, distinction V:

“The quality of profit either excuses or accuses the merchant, because there is honest gain and shameful gain.

“It is difficult, however, that sin should not intervene in commerce between seller and buyer.

“And one seeking pardon for unlawful things must abstain even from lawful things.”

Thus says he.

The feast of this saint is celebrated on the vigil of the apostles Peter and Paul.

Section V

After Leo I, Hilary, a Sardinian by nation and the forty-fourth in the catalogue of the Roman pontiffs, undertook the governance of the Roman Church.

He sat for six years, two months, and ten days.

He disseminated decretals concerning the Catholic faith throughout the East, confirming three synods, namely Nicaea, Ephesus, and Chalcedon.

He also condemned Eutyches, Nestorius, Dioscorus, and all their followers.

He restored many things to the Roman churches.

This Hilary says thus in cause XXV, question I:

“Let it be lawful to no one to violate either the divine constitutions or the decrees of the apostolic see without peril to his state, because the guilt of such transgressions will look to us who administer the offices of the most powerful priest if we are found negligent in the causes of God, since we remember what we ought to fear and how God threatens the negligence of priests.

“Indeed, he who enjoys a higher honor sins with greater guilt, and the sublimity of those sinning makes the vices of sins more grave.”

At that time Blessed Mamertus, a venerable doctor and bishop of Vienne, flourished.

As John of the Collection says, he established that three-day litanies should be celebrated before the Ascension in the regions of Gaul.

The cause of this was that at Vienne very great earthquakes occurred at that time, which cast down many houses and churches. Nocturnal sounds and cries were heard.

On Easter Day, fire descending from heaven burned the king’s palace; wolves and other wild beasts entered the city, ran about, and devoured many persons.

Because of these things Saint Mamertus instituted a three-day fast and the saying of litanies, and thus that tribulation became quiet.

This institution was afterward assumed and commanded by the whole Church, as is evident in On Consecration, distinction III, chapter Rogationes.

Sidonius, bishop of Auvergne and a very learned man, marvelously commends this Mamertus, who was also surnamed Claudianus, saying:

“No one like Claudianus, who wrote the book On the State of the Soul, in my time had such power to affirm what he wished.

“He thinks like Pythagoras, divides like Socrates, explains like Plato, enfolds like Aristotle, flatters like Aeschines, grows angry like Demosthenes, blooms like Hortensius, delays like Fabius, feigns like Crassus, dissembles like Caesar, advises like Cato, dissuades like Appius, and persuades like Tullius.

Thus says he.

Section VI

When Hilary died, Simplicius, a Tiburtine by nation and the forty-fifth, was enthroned in the Roman see.

He held it for fifteen years, one month, and eight days.

He condemned Peter, an Eutychian and bishop of Constantinople, and established many holy things in the Church, as John of the Collection says.

Felix, the forty-sixth, succeeded him in the pontificate.

He was Roman by nation and sat for six years, eleven months, and eighteen days.

He lived in the time of Odoacer, king of Italy, and Emperor Zeno.

Under his pontificate, the aforesaid Peter, whom the apostolic see had condemned, was recalled to the royal city of Constantinople by Bishop Acacius, who had been substituted for that same Peter in the see of Constantinople.

When venerable Pope Felix heard this, as John of the Collection relates, he assembled a council at Rome and condemned and deposed Acacius together with Peter.

When Acacius had been condemned, Emperor Zeno wrote to Pope Felix that, if Acacius should repent and draw back from the error, he should be received.

Then the blessed pontiff sent two men concerning this, namely Bishop Misenus and a certain Vitalis.

When they came to Constantinople, they did not act according to the command of the supreme pontiff who had sent them, but were corrupted by money.

When Felix discovered this, he assembled a council, recalled them, and cast them out from the communion of the faithful.

Section VII

After Felix, Gelasius, the forty-seventh, an African by nation, governed the Roman Church for four years, eight months, and nine days.

This holy man was a lover of the poor, and by his munificence he freed the city itself from the danger of famine.

He was most learned and most eloquent, as is apparent from his decretals, and solicitous in the investigation of the Scriptures.

He wrote five books against Eutyches and Nestorius, and two against Arius, and letters concerning the faith to diverse persons.

He also composed some hymns in the manner of Blessed Ambrose, and prefaces and very many prayers which are in use.

He declared which writings of the Old and New Testaments were authentic in addition to the decrees and decretal letters of the supreme pontiffs, and which authors and writings were apocryphal—that is, doubtful—and which were condemned, as is evident in distinction XV, Sancta Romana.

He also declared which passages from sacred writings were to be read in the readings of Matins at diverse times of the year.

He says thus in the Decrees, distinction X:

“Who but one who thinks that his transgression will pass unpunished for him would say that either the laws of princes, the rules of the fathers, or paternal admonitions ought to be despised?”

The same man says to Theodoric, king of Italy, in whose time he lived:

“It is certain that our magnificence [read: your magnificence] wishes, for the increase of its own felicity, that the kings of Roman princes [read: the laws of Roman princes], which it commanded to be observed in human affairs, should be preserved much more concerning reverence for Blessed Peter the Apostle.”

The same man says in cause I, question I:

“Let priests set no payments for those to be baptized and confirmed among the faithful, because we are commanded to give freely the things which we have freely received; and therefore let them not attempt to exact anything from the aforesaid.”

The same man says in distinction XCIII:

“We establish that deacons are to observe their proper limits.

“Let them not dare to baptize without a bishop or presbyter, unless perhaps, when those orders are situated farther away, extreme necessity compels it—which is also frequently conceded to laymen.

“They are not to have the right to exercise the distribution of the sacred body in the presence of a bishop or presbyter, unless these are absent.”

The same man says to Emperor Anastasius, who lived at that time, in distinction XCVI:

“There are indeed two things, august emperor, by which this world is principally governed: the sacred authority of the pontiffs and the royal power.

“Of these, the burden of the priests is so much the weightier because they will render an account in the divine examination even for the rulers themselves of human beings.

“You therefore know that among these matters you depend upon their judgment, and that they cannot be reduced to your will.”

And for this he introduces the example of Pope Innocent, who excommunicated Emperor Arcadius, and of Saint Ambrose, who excommunicated Theodosius the Great.

The same Gelasius says thus in distinction LXXXVIII, Consequens:

“A report recently sent to us announced something which must not be passed over: that very many clerics gape after dishonest transactions and shameful gains, recounting without any shame the Gospel reading in which the Lord himself is said to have driven the merchants from the temple after beating them, and not recalling the words of the Apostle in which he says, ‘No one serving as a soldier for God entangles himself in secular transactions.’

“They also pretend with a deaf ear not to hear the Psalmist David singing: ‘Because I have not known trafficking, I shall enter into the powers of the Lord.’

“Therefore, let men of this kind know that henceforth they must abstain from unworthy gains and cease from every contrivance and cupidity of any business; or, in whatever grade they have been placed, let them immediately be compelled to abstain from clerical offices, lest the house of God, which is a house of prayer, be made a den of robbers through the offices of commerce.”

Section VIII

When Blessed Gelasius went to the fathers, Anastasius II, a Roman by nation and the forty-eighth in order, was created pope.

He sat for one year, eleven months, and twenty-four days.

In his time many of the clergy withdrew themselves from communion with him because, without a council of bishops, he had communicated with Photinus, a deacon of Thessalonica, who favored the heretic Acacius.

Hence, because he wished secretly to recall Acacius—namely, to dignity—but could not, he was struck by divine judgment, as is stated in distinction XIX, Anastasius, where the Gloss says that while defecating he discharged his intestines.

His decretal directed to Emperor Anastasius, which begins According to the Church, in the same distinction, as the Gloss says, is condemned together with its author because in it he seems to say that those ordained by a heretic—as were those ordained by that heretic Acacius—could execute the offices of their orders without another dispensation, which is false.

After Anastasius, Symmachus, the forty-ninth pope, was assumed to the supreme priesthood.

He was Sardinian by nation and held the chair for fifteen years, seven months, and twenty-eight days.

He established that on Lord’s days and feast days the Glory to God in the highest should be said. Pope Telesphorus had previously ordained that it be said only on the day of the Nativity.

At the ordination of this Symmachus, however, so great a schism arose among the clergy at Rome that slaughter was committed not only of laymen but of clerics.

For this Symmachus was ordained in the Constantinian Basilica of Saint John Lateran, while Laurentius was made pope—or rather antipope—in the church of Saint Mary Major.

Therefore the clergy was separated and the people divided. Some senators also favored Symmachus, others Laurentius.

After much controversy, as John of the Collection says, they agreed upon this: that they should go to Ravenna concerning the matter and await the judgment of King Theodoric, who then reigned in Italy and was descended from the Goths.

When both had come to Ravenna, they received this judgment from the king: that whoever had first been ordained and upon whom the greater part had agreed should be regarded as the true pontiff.

Hence, by this judgment, Symmachus obtained the supreme prelacy.

Unwilling to return evil for evil, he ordained the said Laurentius bishop in the city of Nuceria.

But when four years had passed, Laurentius again came to Rome at the suggestion of certain men and renewed the schism, while the consuls Festus and Probinus adhered to him. Against Faustus and the consul [read: Faustus the ex-consul], who protected Symmachus and the Church, they stirred up wars and seditions, so that slaughter and homicide occurred in the midst of the city.

The clergy was divided to such an extent that some communicated with Symmachus and others with Laurentius.

Moreover, Festus and Probinus, having suborned false witnesses, sent them to Ravenna to King Theodoric against Symmachus, seeking that the king give a visitor to the apostolic see.

At their suggestion the king, contrary to the canons, gave a certain Peter by name, bishop of the city of Altinum.

And, as is said in the Decrees, distinction XVI, section Hinc etiam, King Theodoric commanded bishops from diverse provinces to assemble in the city of Rome, so that a holy council might judge concerning those things which Symmachus’s adversaries said were charged against the venerable Symmachus, prelate of the apostolic see.

But the bishops of Liguria, Emilia, and Venetia suggested that the one who was said to have been accused ought to convene the synod, knowing that first the merit of Blessed Peter the Apostle belonging to his see, and then the authority of the venerable councils, secure in the Lord’s vision [read: following the Lord’s command], had given him singular power among the churches; and that the prelate of the aforesaid see had not been subjected to the judgment of inferiors.

To these things the most serene king, with God inspiring him, answered that it belonged to the judgment of the synod to prescribe what was to be followed in so great a matter; and that nothing pertained to him concerning ecclesiastical affairs except reverence.

He also committed it to the power of the pontiffs to deliberate whether they wished to hear the proposed matter or did not wish to do so, according to what they judged more useful, provided that peace should be given to the city of Rome by the provision of the venerable council.

The bishops sitting in the synod, however, assembled by the authority of that same Symmachus, said:

“Pope Symmachus, prelate of the apostolic see, assailed by accusations of this kind, as far as concerns human beings, is to be immune and free; we reserve his whole cause to the judgment of God.

“Concerning the clerics of the aforementioned pope who departed from their bishop prematurely contrary to the rules and made a schism, we decree that this be done: that, making satisfaction to their bishop, they may obtain mercy and rejoice that they are restored to ecclesiastical offices.”

Laurentius, bishop of Milan, subscribed this statute, then Peter, bishop of Ravenna, and after him seventy-five bishops.

These things are there.

And the Gloss says there that Symmachus had been calumniously accused of heresy.

And, as John of the Collection says, Peter, who had been made visitor but became an invader of the apostolic see, was condemned together with the antipope Laurentius, and Symmachus was received by all the clergy as the true pontiff.

At Carthage in the time of Symmachus, a certain Arian bishop Olympius, while blaspheming the Holy Trinity in the baths, is reported to have been visibly burned when an angel discharged three fiery darts.

At Constantinople, however, when a certain Arian bishop named Cutherus baptized a certain Barrabas and, distinguishing the Trinity badly, said, “I baptize you, Barrabas, in the name of the Father through the Son in the Holy Spirit,” the water suddenly disappeared.

At that time, when Thrasamund, king of the Vandals in Africa and an Arian, had exiled two hundred and ninety Catholic bishops, among whom was Fulgentius, an excellent doctor and bishop, Pope Symmachus benevolently exercised the hand of his liberality toward them by assisting them in Sardinia.

Gregory relates in book IV of the Dialogues that Paschasius the deacon was a very learned man, greatly devoted to alms and to holiness, so much so that when, dead and placed upon a bier in a church and clothed in a dalmatic, he was touched by a certain possessed man, that man was freed.

Because Paschasius adhered too greatly to the party of Laurentius, judging him rather to be pope, after death he was found by Saint Germanus, bishop of Capua, when Germanus had approached the baths because of infirmity, serving there in his soul—that is, in an aerial body—while sustaining the punishment of purgatory.

He explained that the aforesaid matter was the cause of his punishment and asked to be aided by Germanus’s prayers.

When this had been done, because he was found there no longer, he is believed to have been freed.

This Symmachus was most eloquent, as is evident from his decrees, which are many.

He says thus in distinction XL:

“We do not judge, as you say, that Blessed Peter received from the Lord, together with the privilege of the see, a license to sin for himself or his successors.

“He transmitted to posterity a perpetual endowment of merits with the inheritance of innocence.

“That which was conceded to him through the light of his deeds pertains to those whom an equal splendor of conduct illuminates.

“Who doubts that he whom the summit of so great a dignity raises up is holy?

“If in him good things acquired through merit are lacking, those which are attested by the predecessor of the place suffice.

“For either it raises illustrious men to these summits, or it illuminates those who are raised.”

He also held a council in the city, in which he says thus, as is contained in distinction XCVI:

“Your fraternity, having duly followed the ecclesiastical laws, defined beneath fear of the divine judgment the things which were to be established, and reached the summit of justice when it sufficiently embraced all things and the fullness required no addition, especially concerning clerics whom love of dominion invaded and caused to spurn the yoke of ecclesiastical discipline. Their transgressions are difficult to narrate.

“Nevertheless, I do not delay to intimate to your venerable order one thing which occurs to me.

“Among other things, I report a certain writing of Basil, of illustrious memory, as though made out of love for ecclesiastical property, in which no prelate of the Roman Church was present or subscribed,” and so forth.

For the understanding of this, as the Gloss notes there, when Pope Symmachus became gravely ill and feared that, if death befell him, another schism might occur because of the clamor of heretics or others, he persuaded the patrician Basil, who held the place of Odoacer, king of Italy, at Rome, to make a constitution that a papal election should not be held without consultation with Basil himself, and that no one should be permitted to alienate the immovable possessions of churches and their sacred property. Basil did all this.

But this constitution was revoked by a council.

The reason is also alleged through the council in the said chapter Bene: namely, because it was not lawful for laymen, nor is it lawful, to have any power of making enactments in the Church apart from the Roman pope. Laymen, namely, remain under the necessity of obeying, not the authority of commanding.

And thus it was determined that that constitution or writing was of no force, although it had been made with a pious intention.

And this, as is said at the end of the said chapter, was lest there remain an example for any laymen, however religious or powerful, to presume in any city and in any manner to decree anything concerning ecclesiastical resources, the care of disposing of which has indisputably been committed by God to priests alone.

Section IX

After the passing of Symmachus, Hormisdas, the fiftieth pope, a Campanian by nation, ascended the chair of Peter in the year of the Lord 517.

He sat in it for nine years and seventeen days.

Hearing that Emperor Anastasius had fallen into the Eutychian heresy, as John of the Collection relates, he sent Ennodius, bishop of Pavia, and Peregrinus of Messina as legates to him at Constantinople with a formulary of the orthodox faith which he was to confess.

The emperor was unwilling to consent to it, but attempted to corrupt them with money and gifts.

The legates of the apostolic see, however, despising his gifts, urged Emperor Anastasius to receive the admonition of the Catholic Church and not stain so great an empire with the blemish of heresy.

But Anastasius, filled with fury against Pope Hormisdas, among other things which he wrote proudly to him, proudly placed this in his letters: “We wish to command others, not to be commanded ourselves.”

Moreover, he cast the legates from his sight with insult and, having placed them in a fragile ship, commanded the magistrates conducting them not to put them ashore in any city of Greece and not to publish the letters of the supreme prelate which he had directed to the eastern churches.

But not long afterward that same Anastasius perished by the just judgment of God through a stroke of lightning.

To Justin the Elder, who succeeded the aforesaid Anastasius in the empire, Hormisdas sent as legate Saint Germanus, bishop of the city of Capua, with many others for the sake of restoring the faith.

He was received honorably and with great joy, strengthened the hearts of many who were doubtful in the faith, and, at his petition, Justin recalled all whom Anastasius had relegated to exile because of the Catholic faith.

Hormisdas says thus concerning those to be ordained in distinction LXI:

“In selecting or ordaining priests, it is necessary to exercise perspicuous care, for it is fitting that those who must preside over those to be corrected should be irreproachable.

“He to whom the rudders of the Church are committed ought to manifest his life by long probation.

“We do not deny that conduct pleasing to God exists in laymen, but the institutions of the faithful seek soldiers proved for themselves.

“One ought to learn before he teaches, and rather to furnish others from himself an example of religious conduct than to take one from them.

“It is fitting that he who must pray for the people be more blameless than the people.

“One who bears the stain of a memorable crime does not possess the bright dignity of priesthood.”

According to others, this Hormisdas held the pontificate for four years.

Title XI, Chapter II

After the supreme pontiffs have been named who sat in the chair of Peter until the time of John I, we return to the Roman Empire, which is intended more than the other kingdoms, and to those reigning in it.

When Emperor Honorius died, he had given his sister Placidia in marriage to his count Constantius, who had performed many things strenuously for the Roman Empire.

For Attalus, who had usurped the kingdom or empire of Rome but, soon dismissed from it, had adhered to the Goths and, with the aid of the Goths, exercised a tyranny in Gaul against the Roman Empire, was seized by the aforesaid Constantius when he proceeded to war against him, and was sent to Honorius.

Emperor Honorius entered Rome in triumph, with the said Attalus going before his chariot. After one of his hands had been cut off, Attalus was sent into exile on Lipari.

This same Constantius, as vicar in the city, also did many things for the Christian faith against the Pelagians.

From the aforesaid Placidia, sister of Honorius, he received a son named Valentinian, the third emperor of this name.

Thereafter Honorius was assumed [read: assumed] the aforesaid Constantius into a share of the kingdom.

When Constantius had returned to Toulouse in order to subject it to himself again, he died there by an untimely death.

After the death of his father Arcadius, Theodosius the Younger ruled in the East together with his uncle Honorius, who was in the West.

After the death of Honorius this Theodosius ruled alone for three years, and afterward for twenty-four years with Valentinian III, to whom he gave the empire in the West, and with his mother Placidia, sending them to Italy.

He caused the body of John Chrysostom, who had been exiled by his father Arcadius, to be transferred honorably to Constantinople.

He was so exceedingly merciful that he adjudged none of those injuring him to death, saying: “Would that it were possible even to recall the dead to life.”

His court seemed a monastery. He listened to the praises of Matins and read sacred books.

His wife Eudocia, being most learned, composed several poems.

They had a daughter also named Eudoxia, whom they gave in marriage to the aforesaid Valentinian.

He also published a codex, a book of laws, from the constitutions of ancient princes reduced into three codices, namely the Hermogenian, Theodosian, and Gregorian, and from other extraneous constitutions, as Prosper says.

When Honorius had died after ruling for thirty-one years, a certain tyrant John invaded the empire of Italy, as is thought at the command of Crastinus [read: Castinus], who presided over the army as master of the soldiers.

But Theodosius the Younger, nephew of Honorius, sent Ardaburius by sea against him into Italy. Ardaburius, who had often fought against the Parthians and was commander of the army, put to flight the tyrant John within Ravenna while he feared nothing hostile.

John the tyrant, having been made weaker while he sought by war to recover Africa, which Boniface held, was killed.

When he had therefore died and Castinus had been sent into exile, because it did not seem that John could have presumed the kingdom without Castinus’s complicity, Theodosius Augustus considered to whom he ought to entrust the kingdom of Italy.

There was then a certain Valentinian, a boy born of Placidia, daughter of Theodosius the Great and sister of Honorius and wife of Constantius, whom Honorius himself had made Augustus.

Theodosius the Younger therefore took this Valentinian, crowned him, and sent him with his mother Placidia to Italy, appointing him emperor and his mother Augusta, in the year of the Lord 427, but from the beginning of the world 5,626 according to the Seventy.

Against Boniface, who had been sent by Emperor Honorius against the barbarians but through envy was falsely represented as rebelling against the empire, and who flourished in glory and power in Africa, Mavortius and Galbio were sent. While they prepared to besiege Boniface, they were overcome and killed by him.

Count Sigisvult was again sent against Boniface.

But Boniface, perceiving that he could not hold the whole of Africa, admitted into Africa from Spain the peoples of the Vandals and Alans with their king Gaiseric.

Entering Africa, they devastated all things with slaughter, plunder, captives, sword, and fire, and stained the Catholic faith there with Arian foulness, as was evident above.

Valentinian Augustus went to Emperor Theodosius the Younger at Constantinople and received his daughter Eudoxia in marriage.

Theodosius the Younger, wishing to assist Africa against the Vandals, sent three commanders—Ariobindus, Ansila, and Germanus—with a great fleet into Sicily.

By deferring the business through long delays, they were more a burden to Sicily than a defense to Africa.

Peace was made by Valentinian Augustus with Gaiseric, king of the Vandals, and Africa was divided between them according to certain territories.

In the time of this Theodosius and Valentinian, as Sigebert, Vincent, and John of the Collection relate, when the earth at Constantinople shook with an earthquake for four months, a certain man was raised into the air by divine power before all who were praying.

He was admonished by a divine voice that, when litanies had been made, all should sing: “Holy God, Holy Strong One, Holy and Immortal One, have mercy upon us.”

When this had been done, the earthquake ceased.

Section I

In the following year, King Vortigern, having taken counsel with wise men about what he ought to do for his protection, commanded builders to come and construct for him a most strong tower.

But when the earth swallowed up their work, he was advised by diviners to seek a human being without a father and cause the stones and cement to be sprinkled with his blood, as though by this deed the foundation could stand.

A youth named Merlin was therefore found, who was said to have no father.

His mother was brought, and she confessed before the king that she had conceived not from a human being but from a spirit appearing in the form of a human being, which was, namely, through an incubus demon.

Merlin taught the manner of remedying that swallowing up, so that he should not be killed.

This Merlin revealed many obscure things and prophesied many future things.

For he disclosed that there was a lake beneath the foundation, and that beneath the lake two dragons lay hidden, one of which, the red, designated the people of the Britons, while the other, the white, designated the people of the Saxons; and he disclosed which would prevail in their conflict with one another.

He also foretold that Aurelius Ambrosius would reign after Heugist [i.e., Hengist] had been conquered and Vortigern burned, and that his brother Uther Pendragon would succeed him in the kingdom, and that both would perish by poison.

Concerning Arthur, whom he calls the Boar of Cornwall, he prophesied that he would aid the Church of God, that he would subject the western islands to himself, that he would possess the provinces of Gaul, that he would display himself as terrible to the Roman army, and that he would have a doubtful end.

He also prophesied that England would come under the dominion of the Normans, and spoke concerning many other things which could scarcely be understood.

For the Spirit of God is accustomed to speak his mysteries through whomever he wills, as through the Sibyl and through Balaam the diviner.

At that time also, according to Sigebert, Christianity was expanded among the Persians.

For Bishop Maruchas [i.e., Bishop Maruthas], performing an embassy, freed by prayer the son of their king Sidigris [i.e., king Isdegerd] from a demon, on account of which greater glory accrued to the faith.

But afterward a greater persecution against the Christians flared up from the enemies of God.

Eudoxia also, wife of Emperor Theodosius, coming to Rome from Jerusalem, where she had gone by vow, brought the chain by which Blessed Peter was held bound in prison under Herod but was freed by an angel.

When it had been joined to the chain in which the same Peter stood bound under Nero, it was made one; and by contact with it, after much time, a certain count was freed from a demon.

And from this the feast of Saint Peter in Chains was instituted in place of the festival which the Romans held in honor of Octavian for the victory obtained on the first day of August.

Section II

After the death of Theodosius the Younger—in whose time the bodies of the Seven Sleepers, who under Emperor Decius had been shut in a cave and crowned with martyrdom, were raised by God to confute an error that had arisen among certain persons who denied the resurrection of the dead; and after they had spoken to Theodosius himself and to many others, bearing witness to the resurrection, they fell asleep in peace—Marcian assumed the empire at Constantinople.

He began to rule in the year of the Lord 455, but from the beginning of the world, according to the Hebrews, 4,416, and according to the Seventy interpreters and their followers, 5,654.

Valentinian III, however, ruled in the West. He held the empire for thirty years: twenty-five with Theodosius the Younger and five with Marcian.

But when Valentinian had been killed at Rome by a certain soldier of Aetius, a certain nobleman named Maximus seized the empire. In order to establish the empire more firmly for himself, he took Eudoxia, the widow of Valentinian, as his wife by force.

But before two months had been completed he was killed by the Romans.

And in the same year, after the city had been captured and plundered by Gaiseric, king of the Vandals, and after he himself had returned to Africa, the Romans, like sheep at the point of death, set over themselves a certain man named Avitus.

Emperor Marcian composed a treaty with him, and Avitus ruled at Rome and in Italy for four years.

Marcian himself was killed in the sixth year of his empire.

Therefore, in the year of the Lord's Incarnation 458, and from the origin of the world 4,431, but according to the larger reckoning of others 5,657, Leo I was made emperor at Constantinople.

He ruled for sixteen years, and made his son, who was also called by his own name, a partner in his empire.

A little afterward, when Avitus had died at Rome, a certain Majorian, with the army unwilling at Ravenna, seized the Roman Empire.

When he had reigned for about four years, he was killed near the city of Tortona.

After his death a certain Severus was clothed with the purple at Ravenna.

While he was emperor, the king of the Alans entered Italy with great forces. Ricimer the patrician, meeting him with an army, fought with him in a very grave and difficult battle not far from the city of Bergamo; and after slaughter on both sides, the king of the Alans was conquered and killed.

The aforesaid Severus, after ruling in Italy for four years, closed his last day.

After him, with the consent of the whole army, Anthemius received the rights of empire in Italy.

Against him a certain Servandus, prefect of the Gauls, called himself emperor in Gaul. Conquered in war and captured by Anthemius's commanders, he was condemned by a capital sentence.

While these things were being done in Italy, Aspar the patrician, having plotted snares against Leo Augustus, attempted to cast him down from the citadel of empire.

But Leo, recalling the army that was in Sicily, killed Aspar, conquered in battle, together with the son whom Aspar had made Caesar.

While Italy was thus tossed by internal disturbances, Gaiseric was still ruling Africa. Desiring also the empire of Italy, he was attempting to come into Italy with an innumerable army.

When this was learned, Basiliscus the patrician, master of the soldiery under Anthemius, met him and, engaging in a naval battle, compelled Gaiseric to return to Africa after many of his men had been lost.

After these things, for causes that are not known, a great hunger for discord arose between Ricimer the patrician, who was stationed at Milan and governed Liguria, and Anthemius, who ruled Italy.

When with great preparations they were preparing to attack one another, and while the preparations for war were under way, Epiphanius, bishop of Pavia, a man conspicuous for sanctity, interposed himself as a restorer of peace and at first called them back to concord.

But Ricimer, raging with barbarian perfidy—for he was a Goth by race—broke the peace, gathered great forces of barbarians, advanced toward Rome, and for some space of time placed his camp not far from the city, to the destruction of the city and of all Italy.

Leo, who ruled at Constantinople, having compassion upon the desolation of Italy, sent a certain Olybrius with an army into Italy.

Coming to Rome while Anthemius was still alive, Olybrius obtained royal power.

Meanwhile Bilimer, ruler of the Gauls, when he had heard that Ricimer was attacking Anthemius, desired to bring aid to his prince. Having gathered an army of many men, he hastened to the city and, engaging Ricimer with unequal forces at Hadrian's Bridge, was conquered and killed.

When he had been destroyed, Ricimer soon entered the city with many who favored him, captured and killed Anthemius, who had now ruled for four years, and exposed part of the city to plunder.

But he did not long rejoice in his perfidy and cruelty, for during the third month, tormented by illnesses, he himself died at the city.

Therefore, when Ricimer was dead, Olybrius, who was staying at Ravenna, came to Rome and disposed matters according to his own judgment, with no one preventing him.

While he applied himself wholly to arranging the condition of the republic, he closed his last day in the seventh month after he had come to Italy.

After his death a certain Glycerius, through the agency of Gundobad the patrician, obtained the empire at Ravenna with the consent of all Italy.

But not long afterward Nepos the patrician, supported by a multitude of Romans, deprived Glycerius of imperial power and ordained him bishop at Salona, a city of Dalmatia.

But while internal discord endured between Glycerius, or Eucherius, and Nepos, and these two were preparing war with their utmost strength, Saint Epiphanius, of whom mention was made above, intervened; Glycerius yielded, and the terms of a treaty were confirmed between them.

While this Leo I was emperor, Arthur began to reign among the Britons. The marvelous deeds of this man resound even upon the tongues of peoples, although many are believed to be fabulous.

He was in truth a renowned king, prevailing in much probity and magnificence, and showed himself lovable to all; for by the favor of his men he expelled and put to flight the Saxons, Scots, and Picts, who occupied a great part of the island of Britain, after they had been afflicted in many battles.

At that time also, when the Saracens were making incursions into Egypt, the Venetians transferred the body of Blessed Mark from Alexandria to Venice.

Section III

After Leo I had held the eastern empire for seventeen years, he departed from life, and Zeno obtained the empire in the year from the Incarnation 473, but from the beginning of the world 5,673 according to the reckoning.

Here some say, as does John of the Collection, that Leo I at his death left the empire to his son, who was also called Leo and whom during his life he had made a partner in the empire.

Others say that this Leo II was not the son of Leo I but his grandson, namely, one born of the daughter of Leo I and Zeno.

But Leo II, fearing the savagery of Zeno, became a cleric, using his mother's counsel.

When Zeno required the mother to betray her son, she used womanly cunning and presented to him another similar in appearance.

And Zeno ruled for seventeen years.

Meanwhile in Italy a certain great and powerful man from among the Roman patricians, having gathered a large army, deposed Nepos, who had occupied the city and a great part of Italy, from the imperial summit, and assumed the empire for his son, whom he called Augustulus.

Nevertheless Orestes himself governed affairs, because his son was still a boy.

But Odoacer, king of the Turchilongi [i.e., Turcilingi], or Siri [i.e., Sciri], and of the Heruli, coming against Orestes with a very great army, met him in the parts of Liguria.

Orestes, seeing that he could prevail in nothing against the exceedingly strong multitude—especially since certain of his men were deserting him, against whose request for a portion of the lands he had previously resisted—at last shut himself within Pavia, trusting in its fortification.

But Odoacer, soon arriving there, stormed the city and entered it by force.

All things were laid waste by plunder; the sword raged everywhere; fire consumed both sacred and private buildings.

Orestes, having been captured, was led to Piacenza and killed there.

Thereafter the barbarians, dispersed throughout all the cities, without any delay subjected Italy to their own right.

Therefore Odoacer, to whom the victorious army of Orestes had soon subjected itself, seeing prosperous successes come to him, assumed royal dignity.

Then, coming to Rome with the army, he deposed Augustulus and gave a portion of the lands to the soldiers.

And thus, having obtained dominion in this manner, he governed the cities at pleasure in his own name and in that of the army.

And thus the empire of the Romans, marvelous to the whole world, and that august dignity which had begun with Octavian, perished in Augustulus.

Odoacer moreover conquered and killed Philegeus, king of the Rugians, in Germany, and returned to Italy with very great plunder and an immense number of captives.

Section IV: Concerning Theodoric, Who Reigned in Italy after Odoacer Had Been Killed by Him

For fuller information concerning him, it must be known, according to John of the Collection, that Valamir, king of the Ostrogoths, first served in Italy in the obedience of Attila, king of the Huns.

But after Attila had died, mindful of their former liberty, he withdrew himself and his men from the dominion of the Huns.

Ardaric, king of the Gepids, and the other subject peoples of this kind did likewise.

But the Huns, grieving not only that Valamir and his army had shaken off the yoke of their dominion, but that they had also been the authors who caused the other peoples to do similar things, pursued the Goths as fugitive slaves and attempted by arms to compel them to be subjected again to servitude.

Therefore Valamir, having gathered his men, rushed upon the Huns and raged against them with so great a slaughter that thereafter the men feared the arms of the Ostrogoths.

Leo, who then ruled, soon entered into a treaty with the Goths who were laying waste Illyricum, and received as a hostage from Valamir, his paternal uncle, Theodoric, the son of Thiudimir, born of a concubine named Alcuva.

But after Valamir had been killed among the Assyrians [read: among the Sciri], his brother Thiudimir received the royal rights.

He immediately received back with gladness his son Theodoric, who had been given as a hostage to Emperor Leo.

Then Theodoric, son of Thiudimir, in his eighteenth year, without his father's knowledge and with some attendants summoned, invaded the neighboring people of the Sarmatians and carried back to his father the best of their spoils.

Thiudimir, with the marvelous favor of all his men, soon assumed Theodoric to the rudders of the kingdom.

Zeno, who had received the empire after Leo I around the year of the Lord 480, hearing that Theodoric had been made king by his father, summoned him to himself at Constantinople and exalted him with great honor and riches.

He even elevated him with the fasces, a dignity that is reckoned the first after the imperial summit, and placed a bronze statue of him before his palace.

But while Theodoric abounded in delights of this kind at Constantinople, his Ostrogothic soldiers began to suffer need, since because of the sanction of the treaty they were not permitted to carry off plunder in their accustomed manner, nor were the stipends offered by the emperor sufficient.

They cursed the treaty and reproached the useless compact made with Zeno.

They immediately sent men to Theodoric to tell him that, while he overflowed with the banquets of the Greeks, they themselves endured the miseries of poverty.

They exhorted him that, if he wished to take thought for himself and his men, he should return more quickly, so that his entire people might be supported and might seek new lands to inhabit.

But when Zeno heard this and feared greatly, in order to free himself and the neighboring regions from fear of the Goths, he persuaded Theodoric to cross into Italy and claim it for himself from its unjust occupiers.

Giving Italy to him, he again confirmed the grant even by the sacred veils, as was the custom, and, commending to him the senate and the Roman people, commanded him to depart.

Therefore Theodoric returned to his men for these reasons, and exhorted the Goths to be prepared as soon as possible to set out from there upon the journey to possess Italy.

But before they arrived in Italy, he conquered and killed in war Trastila, king of the Gepids, who was devising snares against him.

He also laid low Brisa, king of the Bulgars, together with his great ranks, in a great slaughter.

Therefore, departing from Thrace and Moesia, Theodoric set the Goths in motion with their wives and children, with their household goods and all their possessions; and through Sirmium, Pannonia, Illyricum, and other regions he entered Italy.

When he had entered it, he placed his camp beside the Sontius [i.e., Isonzo] River, not far from Aquileia; and while the beasts of burden, wearied by the length of the journey, were refreshed for some time in the very rich pastures found in that place, Odoacer soon met him with a great army of his men and with all the forces of Italy.

Theodoric gladly received him and, overcoming him in a great battle, finally turned him to flight.

After Odoacer had been put to flight, Theodoric hastened from there to Verona, where Odoacer with a smaller army met him in battle.

But Theodoric, engaging in battle not far from Verona, also crushed Odoacer himself with a great slaughter and compelled him with his army to turn their backs.

Certain of his soldiers, however, while in fear of flight they plunged headlong into the Athesis [i.e., Adige] River, were entangled in the waters and suffocated.

Then Theodoric, pursuing the fugitives, immediately invaded and occupied Verona, its citizens having been dismayed.

Odoacer with those of his men who remained made for Rome, but, its gates having been closed against him, he was excluded.

When he saw that entrance was denied to him, he consumed with sword and flame every place through which he made his journey.

He betook himself to Ravenna so that he might defend himself there against his enemies.

But Theodoric, departing from Verona, reached Milan.

While he remained there, a great multitude of soldiers and many peoples of Italy assembled.

But after a few days had intervened, the surrendered army, at the instigation of a certain man named Tufa, handed itself over to Odoacer's party.

This event so greatly terrified Theodoric that he kept himself and his army within the fortifications.

At last, leaving there his mother, sisters, and the whole multitude of the common people, he set out for Ravenna to besiege Odoacer with chosen companies of armed men.

He placed his camp in the place whose name is Pinetum, and besieged Odoacer for almost three continuous years.

Gundobad, king of the Burgundians, observing such vicissitudes of Italy, entered Liguria with an immense army; and, plundering everything he could seize, he led away with him into Gaul an infinite multitude of captives.

At length, while Theodoric was besieging Odoacer in the city of Ravenna, this siege was prolonged beyond what he and the Goths had estimated at the beginning.

Thus Theodoric, remaining with the Goths around it for almost three full years, was unable to take it.

Yet during this same time he took all the towns neighboring Ravenna except Cesena, which was itself also held by a strong garrison of Odoacer.

At last, when the besiegers and the besieged were weary, the matter was settled by a compact, so that Theodoric and Odoacer together would be partners in dominion.

Upon these terms Theodoric and the Goths entered Ravenna, and thereafter no parts of Italy were closed to him.

But this partnership of the kingdom did not endure long.

For since they held hidden suspicions against one another, Theodoric, forestalling him, killed Odoacer after inviting him to dinner.

Therefore, after Odoacer had been killed, Theodoric alone ruled with the Goths throughout Italy.

His dominion was not very harsh, although he retained for his men the portion of the lands which Odoacer had recently divided.

For the rest, he permitted the cities to be governed by themselves and by their citizens.

He established the seat of the kingdom at Ravenna and dwelt there, reigning alone in Italy for thirty-five years.

But proceeding to Rome soon after Odoacer's death, he was received by the Romans with joy.

He granted them an annual provision of 120,000 modii of wheat.

Meanwhile Bishop Epiphanius, full of sanctity, was sent by Theodoric into Gaul to Gundobad for the redemption of captives. On account of reverence for his sanctity, six thousand captives granted to him as a gift were led back with him into Liguria.

At that time the Saxons and Britons fought for a long while by land and sea with the victory doubtful. At length the more powerful held the island for a long time.

Meanwhile Theodoric, in order to confirm the strength of his kingdom securely, joined Aldeflondia [i.e., Audofleda], daughter of Clovis, king of the Franks, to himself in marriage.

He joined his sister Amafreda [i.e., Amalafrida] in marriage to Henricus [read: Thrasamund], king of the Vandals.

He joined Amafreda's daughter Malaberga [i.e., Amalaberga] in marriage to Ermefrid [i.e., Hermenfrid], king of the Thuringians.

Theodicodo [read: Theodoric] likewise joined the daughters born to him of a concubine, one to Alaric, king of the Visigoths, and the other to Sigismund, king of the Burgundians.

But he gave his third daughter Amalasuntha to Eutharic, who, coming from the stock of the Alamanni, had been summoned from Spain.

And thus no neighboring people of Italy and of the western region was omitted which was not allied to Theodoric either by the affinity of a marriage union or by the covenant of a compact.

After these things Theodoric did not remain idle and sluggish.

For in the year of the Lord 515 he joined all Sicily, with all its adjacent islands, to his kingdom, and also subjected Dalmatia to himself.

During these times he also crossed the Alps and the Rhône with a great army and went into farther Gaul against the Franks.

But when Theodoric, king of the Goths, oppressed the republic in Italy, in earlier times Boethius, a most illustrious senator—of whose wisdom it will be said below—and a lover of the republic, opposed the king in many things for the sake of justice.

And since, on account of the nobility of his lineage and his eloquence, there was a great opinion of him among all, he was feared even by the king himself.

Therefore, as is believed, certain persons having been suborned to accuse him of the crime of injured majesty, they said that, after betraying the Roman city, he had summoned Prince Anastasius into Italy so that he might free the republic from the hand of Theodoric.

For this reason, having seized the occasion, Theodoric banished him with certain other Roman nobles at Pavia, where, placed in prison, he wrote the book The Consolation of Philosophy, and where at last he was killed by him.

Symmachus the patrician, father-in-law of Boethius, who himself also adorned the republic with him, was killed by Theodoric.

This Theodoric was an Arian heretic, and he imprisoned Pope John I, killing him through the prolonged wasting of prison.

But divine punishment followed most quickly.

For by a horrible and unexpected death Theodoric suddenly breathed out a soul polluted by many sins.

A certain solitary man of great virtue saw that soul in a vision of the spirit, in the midst of Pope John and Symmachus, being plunged by them into the nearby cauldron of Vulcan.

After his death the Goths at Ravenna, since he had left no sons, set over the kingdom of Italy Athalaric, born of his daughter, together with the same Amalasuntha, his mother.

When Athalaric had ruled the Goths in Italy for four years, he was taken away by an untimely death.

His mother Amalasuntha, daughter of Theodoric, after his death associated with herself in the kingdom a certain Theodahad.

Unmindful of the benefit conferred, not long afterward he caused her to be strangled in a bath.

Justinian, who ruled in the East, bore her death most grievously and was justly moved against Theodahad, concerning whom it will be said below in the following title.

Section V

After Zeno had died, Anastasius succeeded to the empire.

He began to rule in the year of the Lord 493, but from the beginning of the world 5,591, and ruled for twenty-five years.

Corrupted by a certain Anthericus, he stained the Roman Empire with the Eutychian heresy. For this cause he also persecuted the Catholics.

And because, though admonished by Pope Hormisdas through legates, he was unwilling to separate himself from the heresy, he replied insolently to the pope and inflicted injuries upon the legates.

Under the empire of this Anastasius also, a certain most powerful king of the Saracens came to the Catholic faith.

When he was to be baptized and the Eutychian heretics wished to draw him to the cruelty of their doctrine, he confounded them by this example, saying that he had received letters in which it was asserted that Michael the Archangel was dead.

When they replied that this was impossible, since angels are by nature incapable of suffering, the king said: “How then, according to you, was Christ crucified in bare divinity, unless he was of two natures, since not even an angel has died?”

Also in the time of Anastasius, at the beginning of his reign, Tato, the seventh king of the Lombards, destroyed the Heruli even to annihilation, captured and killed their king Rodulf, and reigned for ten years.

But afterward Wacho killed Tato, his paternal uncle, and, seizing the kingdom of the Lombards, held it for eighteen years.

He brought war against the Gepids and conquered the Sueves in the year of the Lord 500.

Before Tato, however, the sixth king of the Lombards was called Daphon, who reigned for five years; and before him the fifth was Godo, who reigned for twelve years.

Under him the Lombards, eager for new settlements, occupied the region of the Rugians because it was fertile and almost deserted.

The ninth in the kingdom of the Lombards was Walthari, Wacho’s grandson through his daughter, who reigned for seven years.

Trasamund, who had succeeded his brother—or father—Huneric as king of the Vandals in Africa, followed his perfidy in the persecution of the Church and, after closing the churches of the Catholics, again banished 220 bishops to Sardinia.

But when Trasamund, king of the Vandals and of Arian perfidy, had died, Hilderic, his son, born of the captive daughter of Emperor Valentinian, obtained the kingdom.

He did not follow the error and admonitions of his most wicked heretical father, who at his death had bound him never to adhere to the Catholics, but imitated the faith of his Catholic mother.

When Hilderic had obtained the kingdom, he recalled from exile all the bishops whom his father had banished and commanded the churches to be restored.

Section VI

Athalaric, therefore, a boy born of Amalasuntha, daughter of Theodoric, and of his father Eutharic, who came from the stock of the Alamanni, succeeded with his mother to the kingdom of Italy when King Theodoric died without male offspring.

Since he was a boy, all care and government of the kingdom belonged to his mother, who was a widow.

Therefore the queen, undertaking the care of the boy, handed him over to be instructed in Latin letters, and had commanded that certain teachers of letters and men of the greatest gravity from among the elders of the Greeks be around the boy for the formation of his character.

She herself exercised the government of the kingdom with considerable severity, reconsidering injuries done by the Goths and even certain deeds of Theodoric, and reducing them to a milder form.

Among these was this also: she restored to the sons of Boethius and Symmachus the patrimonies already confiscated by Theodoric, asserting that they had been condemned upon false denunciations rashly believed by the king.

But Theodahad, her cousin, who possessed great estates in Tuscany and had occupied many properties of his neighbors by tyranny, she compelled with bitter rebuke to make restitution of what had been taken away.

This severity of the queen made many of the Goths her enemies.

Therefore certain leading men of the Goths, conspiring together, determined to favor the boy against the power of his mother.

For this reason, coming to the queen, they said that it did not please the Goths that their king should live under masters and teachers, nor that one handed over to elders should obey them; that horses, arms, and the exercises of young men befitted a great king, not the imitation of the coldness of elders or the diligence of teachers.

For by these his body and spirit were made effeminate, but by those his vigor and skill increased.

For a king was not made in order to teach the people the discipline of letters, but to exalt his power by war and arms.

Although the queen was not ignorant of the end toward which these things tended, she nevertheless conceded, lest she seem to resist their demand.

The youth, having been handed over to the company of his equals, was in a very short time carried over into a more wanton life, harlots, lusts, and other pleasures of this kind.

Because of evil counselors he became so resistant and hostile toward his mother that he did not deign either to hear her or to speak to her.

Therefore the queen, when she saw herself attacked by her adversaries through these devices and despoiled of the kingdom, did not endure the grief, being a woman of great spirit, but, after secretly sending assassins, caused three leading men of the Goths, who were the authors and counselors of the boy's evil counsels, to be killed.

She herself, after the youth had been reconciled to her, resumed the government.

Athalaric, however, having fallen from the wantonness of his former life into various illnesses, died after four years of his reign and in the eighteenth year of his life.

Amalasuntha, after the death of her son, thinking that the government of the kingdom would proceed more advantageously for her if she had a partner and helper, assumed her cousin Theodahad into a share of the kingdom.

Theodahad was instructed in Greek and Latin letters and had devoted much effort to philosophy.

Yet, weak and inconstant by nature, he labored under many vices.

Thus, assumed into the kingdom through the queen's beneficence, he immediately displayed ingratitude and perfidy.

For, secretly conspiring with the queen's enemies, he captured her and banished her to an island in Lake Vulsini [i.e., Bolsena].

Not long afterward he permitted her to be killed or strangled by the sons and kinsmen of those whom the queen had caused to be killed in her son's sedition.

This wickedness and perfidy of Theodahad disturbed many of the Goths, and they were not far from sedition.

When Emperor Justin learned this, judging the time suitable for liberating Italy, he turned his mind and thoughts toward these regions.

Section VII

At this time Clovis reigned among the Franks, an upright man and strenuous in arms, but still devoted to the worship of idols.

He took as wife Clotild, sister of the king of the Burgundians, a most Christian maiden.

When at first she was with her husband within the closed silence of the bedchamber, before she was joined with him in marital union, she said to her husband: “O my lord, before you are joined to me by the marital bond, I ask one thing: that you believe in the true King and Lord, Jesus Christ, creator of heaven and earth, who created you and redeemed you with his own blood, and in the Holy Spirit, illuminator and confirmer of all the just. And when these things have been acknowledged, abandon vain and mute idols and restore the holy churches which you have destroyed.”

But the king, who was still a barbarian, then mocked her admonitions.

When afterward she had conceived by him and borne a son, Queen Clotild herself wished the little child to be baptized, which he, as a gentile, refused.

But the queen pressed the king so greatly that she obtained from him by entreaties that the child be baptized.

When he had been baptized, he died very quickly, and King Clovis said to the queen: “Now it is apparent that Christ is a worthless god, because he could not preserve in life the one through whom his faith could have been greatly exalted.”

She answered him: “Rather, in this I perceive that I am greatly loved by my God, because he has received the first fruit of my womb, he who has granted his kingdom to my son, far better than yours.”

She conceived a second time and gave birth to one whom, as with the first, she caused to be baptized with great insistence.

When he had been baptized, he immediately became so ill that his life was despaired of.

The king said to her: “Truly weak is this Christ your God, who can preserve in life no one baptized in his name. For if you bear a thousand and baptize them, all will perish.”

But the boy recovered through the prayers of his mother, and afterward reigned after him.

The holy woman attempted to lead her husband to the faith, but he resisted.

Not long afterward it happened that Clovis engaged the Alamanni in war.

When in that battle his army was already yielding and, not without the slaughter of many, was already fleeing from the face of the enemies, and the king stood astonished at this, a certain Christian named Aurelian, one of his companions, said to the king: “O prince of the Franks, recall your courage within you. Believe in the God of heaven whom your wife preaches to you, and without doubt victory over your enemies will be given to you.”

At this utterance his heart was suddenly changed, and, lifting his eyes to heaven, he said with tears: “Lord Jesus Christ, whom my wife preaches and adores, who assist those who hope in you, in this my necessity I ask your aid, promising you that, if you give me victory over my enemies, I shall believe in you and shall be renewed in the waters of baptism in your name. Until now I have invoked my gods, and they do not aid me.”

At this utterance the Franks, suddenly animated as if by divine power, renewed the battle.

Those who had already fled in companies from the face of the enemies made an assault and compelled them to flee.

The Franks pursued them, killed many, and captured many. Their king also fell in the battle.

Therefore Clovis, having obtained this miraculous victory, returned into Francia and related to his wife the things that had been done.

Blessed Remigius, bishop of Reims, was immediately summoned and came to the king.

After he had been sufficiently instructed in the faith, the king approached the church to be baptized.

But when holy chrism was lacking, suddenly a snow-white dove, gliding down from heaven, brought in its beak a vial filled with chrism, from which the blessed pontiff anointed the king.

Even today this vial is religiously preserved in the church of Reims, and from it the kings of the Franks are anointed at their coronation.

When the king had been baptized, that whole people of the Franks received the faith and was baptized.

At that time, by command of King Clovis, the first synod of the Franks was celebrated at Orléans, in which many things useful to the Church were decreed.

After this glorious king had enlarged his kingdom far and wide through all Gaul, he died at Paris and was buried in the church of Saint Peter which he and his wife Clotild had built.

His four sons divided his kingdom in this manner: Theuderic obtained the seat of the kingdom at Reims; Chlodomer at Orléans; Childebert at Paris; and Chlothar at Soissons.

Section VIII

When King Clovis had come to Paris, he said to the queen and to his people: “It seems sufficiently harsh to me that the Goths, who are Arians, hold the best part of Gaul. Let us therefore go and, with God’s aid, cast them out of the land.”

The queen said to him: “Let us first make a church in honor of Blessed Peter the Apostle, so that he may be your helper in battle.”

The king said that he would do this upon his return.

Therefore Clovis, setting himself in motion with his army, directed his course toward Poitiers, for Alaric, king of the Goths, was then staying there.

But while passing through the territory of Tours, the king sent messengers with gifts to the basilica of Blessed Martin, and also sent his horse, which he loved very greatly.

When the messengers had entered the threshold of the church of Blessed Martin, the primicerius of the church ordered this antiphon to be sung: “You have girded me with strength for war,” and so forth.

The messengers, after leaving the gifts and requesting the support of prayers, returned with joy.

When the king came with the army to the Vincenna [i.e., Vienne] River and, because of the flooding of the rains, did not find the place where he ought to ford it, he entreated the Lord to show him the ford.

When morning came, a hind of marvelous size, preceding them at the Lord’s command, showed the ford. After it had crossed, the people followed the ford.

When the king arrived at Poitiers and had pitched his tents not far from the church of Saint Hilary, that night a fiery torch was seen to go forth.

It appeared over those tents as an aid to King Clovis through the power of Blessed Hilary.

The king therefore commanded his army that it should receive neither food nor anything whatever as provision from that district, and should not even seize spoil.

Therefore, fighting bravely with his forces ten miles from Poitiers against the king of the Goths, the Goths, having been exceedingly battered together with their king, turned their backs, and Clovis stood forth as victor.

Then, entering the city of Tours, he bestowed many gifts upon the church of Blessed Martin.

He wished to receive back or redeem from them his horse, which he had previously sent to that church, by giving one hundred silver solidi for it.

When these had been given, the horse could not be moved in any way.

He said: “Give another hundred solidi.”

When he had given them, the horse was immediately released and departed.

Then the king departed with joy and said: “Truly Blessed Martin is good in aid, but dear in business.”

King Clovis then received the imperial codicils from Emperor Anastasius in the church of Blessed Martin.

With a golden crown placed upon his head, he mounted a horse and with his own hand distributed much gold and silver in the courtyard before the people.

These things are from Gregory of Tours.

Section IX: For a Fuller Explanation concerning Clotild, King Clovis Her Husband, and Their Sons

Note, according to Vincent after Gregory of Tours, that when Gundenchus [i.e., Gundioc] reigned in Burgundy, who is said to have been of the lineage of Athalaric, he had four sons: Gundobad, Godegisel, Chilperic, and Godomar.

Gundobad therefore killed his brother Chilperic with the sword and commanded Chilperic's wife to be drowned in water with a stone tied to her neck.

He also had two daughters, of whom the elder was called Chrona; changing her clothing, he condemned her to exile.

The younger, named Clotild, he retained with himself at home.

At length this Clotild was betrothed to Clovis and, in a hidden manner, sent him a ring through a certain man, with Gundobad not knowing but Clovis consenting.

After this Clovis sent an envoy to Gundobad for his bride Clotild.

When Gundobad denied that Clotild was Clovis's bride, the ring of Clovis sent to Clotild was produced; by the counsel of the Burgundians and fearing the wrath of Clovis, he handed her over, although as if unwillingly, and appointed her as wife to Clovis.

Clotild, when she had become the wife of Clovis, asked him for two things.

First, that he worship the true God, since he was then a pagan. Second, that he seek the portion of her father and mother, whom Gundobad, the maternal uncle of Clotild herself, had killed, and at the same time avenge their blood.

He therefore did the first not then but afterward.

In order to accomplish the second, he again sent Aurelian to Gundobad on account of Queen Clotild's treasure.

Moved to anger, Gundobad said: "Will my kingdom or my treasures be handed into the hands of Clovis? Depart from me."

Aurelian said: "My lord the king commands you to send back to him with the greatest speed the treasures of his wife; otherwise he will meet you with his army."

Then the Burgundians, after taking counsel, said to the king: "Give to your niece from your substance what falls to her, because it is decreed that this is just; and have a treaty with Clovis and the people of the Franks, lest perhaps they rush upon our land, because that people is most ferocious and without God."

Gundobad did all this through the hands of Aurelian, sending the greatest part of his treasure to Clovis together with the household goods of his niece.

When Gundobad had died, his son Sigismund reigned in Burgundy in his place.

When Clovis had died, his four sons divided the kingdom equally among themselves, namely Theuderic, Chlodomer, Childebert, and Chlothar.

The first, namely Theuderic, had a son named Theudebert, strenuous and useful, and they were raised to great power.

Amalaric also, son of Alaric, king of the Goths, sought and obtained from the aforesaid brothers their sister as his wife.

In those days Queen Clotild, coming to Paris, asked her sons that, taking indignation at her injury, they avenge the death of her father and mother.

Moved with great anger, they sought Burgundy with a great army against Kings Sigismund and Godomar, sons of Gundobad.

At that time King Sigismund was building in Burgundy the monastery of the holy martyrs of Agaunum, namely Maurice and his 6,666 companions.

Therefore the army of the Burgundians was moved against King Chlodomer and his brothers Childebert and Chlothar, sons of Clovis.

While they fought one another, the Burgundians were slain.

Sigismund, however, when he had fled to the holy martyrs, was pursued by Chlodomer, who seized him, his wife, and his sons, led them as captives into the district of Orléans, and shut them in prison.

Blessed Avitus, who was then a holy abbot of God at Orléans, entreated Chlodomer not to kill them, but he was unwilling to hear him.

He killed Sigismund, his wife, and his sons, and cast them into a well.

This Sigismund, as Sigebert says, had killed his brother Sigeric, using the evil counsel of his stepmother.

Afterward, applying himself to suitable penance and devoting himself to the martyrs of Agaunum, he was worthy of pardon; the grace of healings frequently granted to many through him after his death, and the cure bestowed through him upon those suffering from fever, bear witness to this.

His feast is observed on the third day before the Kalends of May.

Again Chlodomer, after killing Sigismund, engaged with Sigismund's brother Godomar and was struck and killed, as Gregory of Tours writes in the History of the Franks.

When the Franks saw this, moved by excessive grief and anger, they pursued Godomar, destroyed and killed him, and, laying waste all the regions, killed everyone from boy to old man and returned.

Chlothar, hearing this, took as his wife Chlodomer's wife, named Guntheuca.

Queen Clotild, however, was rearing with herself the three orphaned sons of Chlodomer, namely Theodoald, Gunthar, and Chlodoald.

At that time King Theuderic, his son Theudebert, and King Chlothar, crossing the Rhine with an army of the Franks, directed their course into Thuringia against Hermenfrid, king of the Thuringians.

When the Thuringians heard this, they deceitfully made trenches and covered them with turf.

When they had assembled there for battle and perceived that the horses had fallen there, they became exceedingly indignant.

There was so great a slaughter of the Thuringians that the river itself, filled with their corpses, carried the Franks over them as over a bridge; and they trampled them down, laid waste that whole region, led away captives, and depopulated everything.

King Hermenfrid also escaped with difficulty by slipping away in flight.

Hermenfrid had two brothers, Baderic and Bercarius [i.e., Berthar].

And according to Hugh of Fleury, King Chlothar, returning from there, led away with him Regund [i.e., Radegund], daughter of King Berecharius [i.e., Berthar] and niece of Hermenfrid, and joined her to himself in lawful marriage.

But she afterward, leaving the marital bed, received the religious habit within the city of Poitiers; persevering in it, she ended her life praiseworthily.

But King Theuderic, brother of the aforesaid Chlothar, as Gregory of Tours says, gave his word to King Hermenfrid and caused him to come to him at the city of Culpiacum [i.e., Zülpich].

While they were speaking together upon the city wall, Hermenfrid was pushed, fell from the wall to the ground, and died.

Theuderic also commanded his children to be killed together.

Section X

Childebert, brother of Chlothar and Theuderic, while he was at the city of the Arverni, received messengers sent to him by his sister, wife of Amalaric, king of the Goths.

She signified to him how many evils Amalaric had done to her and how he laid snares for her because of the Catholic faith.

For when she went to the church of Christ and prayed, he cast dung and many foul substances upon her and beat him [read: beat her] so severely that she vomited blood.

She collected the blood in her veil and sent it to her brother, saying: "Dearest brothers, avenge my suffering and injury."

When Childebert heard these things, moved by great anger, he gathered a very great army and went into Spain to fight against Amalaric.

Amalaric, however, having been turned to flight, while he sought a ship by which to escape and did not quickly find one, was surrounded by Childebert's army; and when he fled to a church of the Christians, before he entered it a certain Frank struck him, and he died.

Then Childebert, after laying waste Spain, entered the city of Toledo and carried away great treasures from there.

He returned from there with his sister, who nevertheless died on the journey when illness overtook her, and was afterward buried at Paris beside her father Clovis.

Among the other treasures, Childebert caused many chalices and other objects made of gold for the ministries of churches to be distributed among the churches.

Queen Clotild, after the death of her husband, frequently went to Tours and served the Lord at the tomb of Saint Martin, coming rarely to Paris and rearing with herself the sons of the dead Chlodomer, as has been said.

But when she was at Paris, Childebert, seeing that she loved the sons of his elder brother exceedingly and thinking that she would make them kings, said to his brother Chlothar: “Our mother wishes to elevate the sons of our brother. Therefore, after taking counsel, we ought to consider what we should do. For either let us cut their hair or kill them, and let us divide their father’s kingdom between us.”

They therefore sent Arcadius, a noble and capable man, to the queen at Paris, speaking deceitfully: “Tell our mother to send us the sons of our brother so that we may establish them as kings.”

Believing this, she sent them joyfully.

When they arrived, Chlothar seized the elder boy, cast him to the ground, thrust a knife into his armpit, and he died.

Seeing this, his younger brother cast himself at Childebert’s feet and said weeping: “Assist me, most devoted father, lest I too perish as my brother did.”

Then Childebert, moved by his tears, said: “I beseech you, dearest brother, grant me the life of this one, and I shall give you whatever you wish for him.”

But he, kindled with anger, said: “Either cast him away from you, or you will certainly die for him. You are the one who perpetrated this evil, and now you wish to free him?”

Hearing these things, Childebert cast him away from himself; Chlothar killed him and slaughtered their foster boys, and, mounting their horses, they departed.

When the queen heard this, crushed by excessive fury, with a great company of psalm-singers and immense mourning she caused their little bodies to be buried at Paris.

One of them was ten years old, the other seven.

But the third, named Clodoald, escaped and was freed through the aid of strong men.

Afterward, leaving the earthly kingdom, he cut his own hair with his own hand and became a cleric; advancing in good works, he was at length ordained a priest.

In those days, when Theuderic, son of Clovis, had died, his own son Theudebert received the kingdom.

After these things Childebert and Theudebert, his nephew, set their army in motion and arranged to go against Chlothar.

Hearing these things and seeing that he could not resist their power, Chlothar fled to an island [read: fled into a forest] and poured all his hope into the mercy of God.

But Queen Clotild, their mother, went to the tomb of Blessed Martin and, prostrate there in prayer and keeping vigil for the whole night, entreated the Lord that civil war not arise among her sons.

When they had assembled with great forces to kill him on the following day, in the morning, in the place where they were gathered, a very great storm arose, tearing apart the tents; with flashes of lightning intermingled and rains rushing down with mighty thunder, it overturned everything.

They, prostrated, fell to the earth, beaten by very powerful hailstones and gravely wounded, and no covering remained to them except the shield alone.

They feared this above all: that they might be burned by fire from heaven.

Their horses were also so widely scattered that they were scarcely found within twenty stadia, and many of them were not found.

Then, prostrate and doing penance, they entreated pardon from God because they had wished to do such things against their own blood.

But not one drop of rain descended upon Chlothar.

They sent messengers and sought peace and concord. When this had been granted, they returned to their own lands.

After these things Childebert and Chlothar, having gathered a great army, again directed themselves into Spain.

After entering it, laying waste and burning the land and killing the people, they besieged the city of Zaragoza.

The people who were held besieged there, clothed in haircloth and with ashes scattered upon their heads, turned to God in such humility that they went around the city walls singing psalms with the tunic of Blessed Vincent the Martyr.

When the kings heard this, they seized a certain peasant from the city and said: “Go, tell the bishop of the city to come to us with confidence, doubting nothing.”

When he had done this, the bishop immediately met them with gifts.

Childebert asked that relics of Blessed Vincent be given to him by the bishop, and the bishop gave him Vincent’s stole.

Therefore the aforesaid kings, having acquired the greater part of Spain, returned with many treasures and spoils.

Childebert built the church of Blessed Vincent at Paris, and, dying through a prolonged illness, was buried there.

Queen Clotild, abounding in good works, migrated to the Lord at the city of Tours, full of days.

Her body was borne thence with great honor to Paris by her sons Childebert and Chlothar and buried beside her husband Clovis.

Title XI, Chapter III

Sigebert says that it does not seem useful to repeat at greater length the origin of the kingdom of the Persians, because the reader sufficiently recalls from the histories of the ancients what the antiquity of this kingdom was, how great it was, and how powerful the nobility of that antiquity was.

Yet I shall note this: having often abused victory over the Romans, and now having recently slain Julian the Apostate, routed the army of the Romans, and mutilated the Roman Empire in its territories, and having thus composed a treaty of peace according to their own pleasure within twenty-nine years [read: for twenty-nine years], they bore their prosperity without moderation.

And, with their King Shapur acting more insolently, they were in every way hostile to the Christians and Romans.

This Shapur, who had already ruled for a long time, ruled for twenty-eight years from the first year of Gratian.

After him Sidigerdis [i.e., Isdegerd] ruled for thirty-four years; Gaugaranes [i.e., Vararanes] his son, thirty-eight; after him Duades, thirty-one; Rabbades, sixteen; Cosdroe [i.e., Chosroes], thirty-seven; Homisda [i.e., Hormisdas], seventeen.

His son Cosdroe [i.e., Chosroes] killed him and reigned for thirty-eight years.

His son Sirois [i.e., Siroes] also killed him and reigned for one year.

After him Hormisda [i.e., Hormisdas] reigned for one year.

Then the Saracens, who had previously been under the king of the Persians, conquered them in war and, with the situation reversed, reduced them under their own lordship, namely in the twentieth year of Heraclius, emperor of the Romans, according to the chronicle.

From then on, therefore, in place of the kingdom of the Persians, it is entitled the kingdom of the Saracens.

When their emir Muhanbad [i.e., Muhammad] had died, Ebubeber [i.e., Abu Bakr] held the principate for three years.

After him Aumer [i.e., Umar] held it for twelve years. A certain Persian, pretending that he wished to adore him, killed him by driving a sword into his belly.

Hoccinem [i.e., Uthman], who was substituted for him, held the principate for ten years.

When he also had been killed, Mubavias [i.e., Muʿāwiya I], having been made emir from an admiral, held the principate for twenty-five years.

After him his son Gizid [i.e., Yazid] held it for three years; Mathua, one; Abdalam [i.e., Abdallah], one; Adimelech [i.e., Abd al-Malik], twenty-two; Ulid [i.e., Walid], seven; Zulcimen [i.e., Sulayman], two; Ammar [i.e., Umar], two; Gizid [i.e., Yazid], three.

A certain Jewish magician, promising this Yazid that he would reign for forty years, persuaded him to command that the images of God and of the saints be taken down throughout his whole kingdom.

Seduced by the hope of reigning for a long time, he indeed published the edict, but he himself soon died.

After him Elwalid held the principate over the Saracens for twenty years; Yazid, one; Marwan, six.

After Marwan had been killed, Muhammad held it for five years; Abdallah, nineteen; Mahdi, nine; Moses, two; Aaron his brother, twelve; Muhammad, five.

This Muhammad engaged his brother Abdallah in battle and was overcome by him; against his will he suffered him to reign jointly with himself.

By this war the kingdom of the Saracens was shaken for some years.

There its history ceases, namely under the year of the Lord 821, after 616 years.

Title XI, Chapter IV

Therefore in the first year of the emperors Gratian and Valentinian, which was the year 381 from the Lord's Incarnation, Priam first reigned over the Franks—not the great Priam, king of Troy, but another—and he reigned for five years.

The second king, his son Marcomer, reigned for thirty-three years.

The third, Pharamund, reigned for eleven years.

The fourth, Clodio, his son, the long-haired king, reigned for eighteen years.

The fifth, Merovech, reigned for ten years.

The sixth, Childeric, reigned for twenty-five years.

The seventh, Clovis, reigned for thirty years; he was baptized by Blessed Remigius.

The eighth, Chlothar, reigned for fifty years.

The ninth, Chilperic, reigned for twenty-three years.

The tenth, Chlothar, reigned for forty-four years.

The eleventh, Dagobert, reigned for fourteen years.

The twelfth, Clovis, reigned for seventeen years.

The thirteenth, Chlothar, reigned for three years.

Then his brother Theuderic was elevated to the kingdom, but was rejected by the Franks and tonsured, and was banished at Paris into the monastery of Saint Denis.

The fifteenth, his brother Childeric, reigned for twelve years.

The sixteenth, his brother Theuderic, who had been tonsured, was restored to the kingdom and reigned for thirteen years.

The seventeenth, Clovis, reigned for four years.

The eighteenth, Childebert, reigned for eighteen years.

The nineteenth, Clovis, reigned for four years.

The twentieth, Chlothar, reigned for two years.

The twenty-first, Chilperic, reigned for five years.

The twenty-second, Theuderic, reigned for fifteen years.

The twenty-third, Childeric, reigned for nine years; he was tonsured as a monk.

But Pippin the prince, by apostolic authority and the election of the Franks, was anointed and consecrated king by Saint Boniface, bishop of Mainz.

His line through his sons Carloman and Charles was also blessed by Pope Stephen with hereditary royal succession, and every alien was forbidden from invading it by apostolic anathema.

He therefore reigned as the twenty-fourth king for eighteen years.

Charles, who was called the Great on account of the great things he did, reigned as the twenty-fifth king; he reigned for forty-six years.

Of these years he reigned for only thirty-three over the Franks, the kingdom having been divided with his brother Carloman.

Then the Romans, departing from the emperor at Constantinople, acclaimed imperial praises to Charlemagne, crowned him by the hand of Pope Leo, and called him Augustus.

But this will be stated more fully when his times are reached.

Having assumed the empire, he ruled the Romans and Franks for thirteen years.

Then his son Louis reigned and ruled as emperor for twenty-seven years.

Then Lothar, son of Louis, usurped the empire for himself.

But when his brothers took this gravely and rose against him, in the fourth year of his empire they assembled and were pacified after the empire had been divided.

Louis reigned in Germany, and Charles in Francia for twenty-four years; this Charles was the twenty-eighth to reign in Francia.

For the twenty-ninth, Louis the Stammerer, reigned for two years.

The thirtieth, the brothers Louis and Carloman, reigned for five years.

The thirty-first, Emperor Charles, invited by the Franks to assist them against the incursion of the Normans, reigned in Francia for five years.

The thirty-second, Odo, son of Duke Robert, reigned for nine years.

The thirty-third, Charles, son of Louis the Stammerer, reigned for seventeen years; he died an exile and a martyr.

The thirty-fourth, Rudolf, reigned for two years.

The thirty-fifth, Louis, reigned for twenty-seven years.

The thirty-sixth, Lothar, reigned for thirty-one years.

The thirty-seventh, his son Louis, reigned for one year.

When he had died, while the Franks wished to transfer the kingdom to Duke Charles, brother of King Lothar, and while Charles deferred the matter for counsel, Hugh, who was called Capet, marshal of Francia, usurped the kingdom.

He was the son of Hugh the Great by Hedwig, sister of Emperor Otto I.

Thus the kings from the stock of Charles failed in the year of the Lord 987.

Therefore Hugh Capet reigned as the thirty-eighth king in Francia for nine years.

The thirty-ninth, his son Robert, reigned for thirty-four years.

After him the fortieth, his son Henry, reigned for thirty years.

After him his son Philip reigned for forty-nine years.

After him the forty-second, his son Louis the Fat, reigned for twenty-eight years.

His son Philip, recently anointed king while still a boy, was riding a horse in the city of Paris near the church of Saint Gervase when a pig happened to put itself beneath the horse’s feet; it caused the horse to fall headlong upon him and brought mourning upon the Franks through his sudden and pitiable death.

The forty-third, Louis, son of that same Louis the Fat, reigned for forty years.

After him the forty-fourth, his son Philip, reigned for forty-four years.

The forty-fifth to reign in Francia was Louis, son of the aforesaid Philip; he reigned for three years.

The forty-sixth was his son Louis, who still reigns, namely at the time when Vincent wrote this Historical Mirror.

These things are from Vincent.

But more will be said of these matters below, and also of the successors.

Title XI, Chapter V: Concerning the Kingdom of the Britons

The ancient history of the Britons relates, as Vincent says in the Historical Mirror, book XVII, chapter 5, that Ascanius, son of Aeneas the Trojan, had from his son Silvius a grandson named Brutus.

By being born he killed his mother, and later by accident he killed his father while hunting.

The cause of this parricide rendered him so hateful to his kinsmen that, expelled from Italy, he fled to Greece.

While he was there as an exile, he began to prevail with such probity that, when the Trojans who were held captive there flocked to him, he obtained their leadership.

Supported by their multitude and animated by their counsel, he sought from Pandrasus, king of the Greeks, liberty to go to other nations.

The king, however, moved by anger, wished to crush him in war, but was by no means able to do so.

For victory came so prosperously to Brutus that he killed very many from the king's army and unexpectedly captured the king himself.

He threatened the king with death unless he assented to those making request.

He demanded from him his daughter as wife, an abundant quantity of gold and silver, ships, grain, and the other things necessary for a sea journey.

Therefore, when more than three hundred ships had been procured by the king's command and loaded with every kind of provision and with gold and silver, Brutus received the king's daughter and, after greeting the king, undertook the voyage by sea.

They passed Africa and Mauretania and came to the shores of the Tyrrhenian Sea, where they found four generations of their people living in exile with their leader Corineus.

Taking them with themselves, they directed their journey toward the boundaries of Aquitaine.

There a very grave war arose for them with the Gauls, over whom ten kings presided at that time.

In this encounter the marvelous fortitude of the leader Corineus appeared: he struck one consul upon the top of the head so powerfully that he cut him into two parts, his whole body having been divided.

Turnus, Brutus's nephew and himself a most valiant soldier, who killed six hundred men there with his sword alone, was killed by the swords of the enemies.

He gave his name to the city of Tours because he was buried in that place.

When that struggle, in which many were killed on both sides, had ended, Brutus returned with his men to the ships and, undertaking the journey begun, at length arrived at the island appointed for him.

The name of that island was Albion, and it was inhabited by giants alone, with whom they repeatedly had conflict.

Brutus called the island Britain from his own name, and his men Britons.

The leader Corineus called the land which fell to his lot Corinea, which is now called Cornwall, or the Horn of Britain, through corruption of the said name.

Section I: Concerning the Successors of Brutus and How the Saxons Obtained England, according to Vincent in the Place Cited Above

When twenty-four years had elapsed from the time they entered the island, Brutus died, leaving three sons as heirs of his kingdom.

After burying their father, they divided their father's kingdom among themselves, each naming his own part from his own name.

The first, whose name was Locrinus, possessed the middle part of the island, which was afterward called Loegria.

The second, who was called Kamber, received that part which was afterward called Cambria and is now called Wales.

The third, whose name was Albanactus, possessed the land that is now called Scotland and bestowed upon it from his own name the name Albania.

The first, namely Locrinus, reigned for ten years and died; and thus the Britons reigned in free dignity down to Julius Caesar, under whose empire they were made tributaries to the Romans.

Later, in the time of Antoninus Verus, at the insistence of Lucius, king of the Britons, they received the mysteries of Christianity through the legates of Pope Eleutherius.

In that land some attained even to the crown of martyrdom.

For when persecution arose under Caesar Diocletian, although the faith failed in many, nevertheless in others it could neither be broken nor conquered by death.

But after the tyrant Maximus had emptied the island of Britain of the protection of soldiers, the Picts and the other barbarian nations rushed upon them and began to lay waste the unwarlike people and the whole land with slaughter and plunder.

Another evil was added to this one: King Vortigern, for his own protection and the defeat of his enemies, invited the still-pagan people of the Saxons.

For although for some time they protected them strenuously and bravely, enticed by the desire of ruling, they sought from the king the dignities of the citizens so that they might no longer bring aid to the citizens but might rather exercise tyranny over them more freely.

The Britons, guarding against this, expelled them.

But, after being repulsed, they returned in greater numbers and, feigning peace, deceitfully killed nearly all their leading men.

Prevailing therefore for a time, they occupied cities and castles until King Aurelius Ambrosius arose, who killed their leader, took the cities away from them, and put their remnants to flight.

After him arose Uther Pendragon, brother of Aurelius, who begot Arthur, an unconquered and magnificent king.

After these men six kings of their people reigned.

Then, when the Angles prevailed with the aid of Africans and other peoples, the Britons lost the monarchy of the island and the diadem of the kingdom.

Some fled into Lesser Britain, where both their race and their name remain, while others fled into Wales.

When they returned again, they obtained the kingdom; but not long afterward, when divine vengeance pressed them through famine and mortality, they left the island to be invaded by foreign peoples.

From that time the Saxons, that is, the Angles, held under their dominion England, named from them.

Section II: Concerning the Catalogue of the Kings of Britain, according to Vincent in the Place Cited Above

Therefore, from the first year of Gratian onward, Maximus reigned among the Britons for thirty-three years.

From then on the strength of the Britons was weakened by the excessive incursions of enemies.

And because they could have no aid from the Romans, who were laboring everywhere under war, they withdrew themselves from their dominion.

After taking counsel, they directed the archbishop of London to Aldroenus, king of Lesser Britain, so that he might assist them.

He handed over to them his brother Constantine with an armed band of soldiers, and thus Constantine was erected as king.

He reigned for ten years and had three sons: Constans, who became a monk; Aurelius Ambrosius; and Uther Pendragon.

Accordingly, after another twenty-three years, some place the coming of the Angles into Britain, namely in the year of the Lord 447, and say that Aurelius Ambrosius then began to reign.

But it appears more true that they came long before he reigned.

Finally, forty-five years after the aforesaid year, some place the beginning of the kingdom of the Angles, for the histories are greatly discordant in this matter.

Thus the Britons, no longer able to bear the power of the Angles, as conquered men yielded to their right and name.

The first from the people of the Angles was Olli; the second, Telim; and, succeeding one another, they reigned among them for seventy years.

After these, Edilbert reigned as the third among them for fifty-five years.

After him his son Cadbald reigned for twenty-four years.

His son Caccobert reigned in the year of the Lord 640, and reigned for twenty-five years.

He was the first in England to destroy idols and enlarge the faith of Christ.

After him his son Egbert reigned for eight years; after him his brother Lothere, twelve years; after him Edric, two years.

When he had died, foreign kings of the nations divided the kingdom of England for four years.

After these Vitred, son of Egbert, freed the Angles from that oppression and reigned over them for thirty-six years.

After him his son Edilbert reigned for eight years, namely until the year of the Lord 735.

From this point I refrain from recording the kingdom of the Angles, because I do not possess the histories of the ancients concerning these matters.

These things are from Vincent.

Title XI, Chapter VI: Concerning the Origin of the Kingdom of the Vandals

The Vandals also, sprung from Scythia, as Vincent says in the place cited above, chapter 8, having been conquered by the Goths, began to invade the lands of others, since they had been unable to retain their own.

When they were dwelling around the Danube, after a long time Gimerith, king of the Goths, again conquered them in war and drove them from there, compelling them to abandon whatever lands they seemed in any manner to possess, to subject themselves to the Roman Empire, and humbly to ask Constantine the Great that a place to dwell be given to them.

They obtained this, and peacefully inhabited the Pannonias assigned to them by him for sixty years.

From there, in the thirteenth year of Arcadius and Honorius, summoned at the instigation of Stilicho, who was devising rebellion against the republic, they poured themselves through Gaul with the Alans joined to them and for some time tore it apart most miserably.

The Goths then expelled them from there, not indeed taking thought for the peace of Gaul, but emptying the country for their own rapacity.

The Vandals, having entered Spain, depopulated now Spain and now Gaul for a long time.

But not even there could they be safe from the Goths.

For because the Goths were greatly troubling Italy, Emperor Honorius, after deliberating with his men, granted to the Goths by a welcome confirmation Spain and Gaul, which he grieved had been taken from him by the Vandals and other peoples.

Therefore, when the Goths hastened to put the Vandals and other enemies to flight from the territories assigned to them, and the Vandals, enclosed on every side, seethed with fear of the Goths, an unexpected and welcome opportunity of prosperity met them, the sins of the people bringing it about.

For when rivalry arose through envy between Boniface and Aetius, Roman commanders, Boniface was made the inferior.

Because he was unwilling to avenge the grief of his injury except with damage to the republic and danger, he crossed to Spain and invited the Vandals to occupy Libya and Africa.

When they had flown there, they confirmed their kingdom there for a long time and disturbed divine and human things without any regard for humanity or divinity.

Having entered Africa, among other lands they besieged the city of Hippo, in which Augustine, outstanding among teachers, was bishop.

And because the said Vandals spared no age, sex, or rank, Augustine, greatly afflicted by compassion, became ill and at last fell asleep in the Lord during the siege.

After a few months the city was captured, despoiled, and destroyed by the Vandals.

They became Arian heretics from pagans because, when they sent to Emperor Valens asking him to send them learned bishops who would teach them the Christian faith which they wished to believe, he, who was himself an Arian, sent Arian bishops, by whom they were infected with that error.

How and how greatly they persecuted the true Catholics will appear below in this same title.

Section I

Therefore from the first year of Gratian onward Modigisil reigned over them for thirty years.

After him his son Gunderic reigned in Spain for sixteen years.

When, after Seville had been captured, he impiously and arrogantly extended his hands against the church of that city, he was immediately seized by a demon through God’s judgment and died.

His brother Gaiseric, succeeding him in the kingdom, reigned for forty-eight years.

He is said to have apostatized from the Catholic faith into the Arian sect.

After arranging the succession of rule among his sons so that, when one brother died, the surviving brother would succeed without dispute from the sons, he died.

His son Huneric, succeeding him, reigned for eight years.

He raged grievously against the Church of God, as will be said below.

At length, struck by God's judgment and swarming with worms, he expired miserably.

After him Guntabundus [i.e., Gunthamund] reigned for nine years; after him his brother Transimundus [i.e., Thrasamund], for twenty-six.

He bound by oath his son Hilderic, born of Eudoxia, daughter of Emperor Valentinian, who had been captured by Gaiseric, that he would not adhere to the Catholics in his kingdom.

When his father had died, before he received the kingdom, Hilderic commanded all the Catholics to be recalled from exile and the churches to be restored by the bishops.

Thus, having received the kingdom, he reigned for eight years, seventy-four years having elapsed from the time his grandfather Gaiseric profaned the condition of the Church in Africa.

After him Gilimer reigned for five years. He was of such great cruelty that he did not spare even his kinsmen.

At length Belisarius the patrician, sent by Emperor Justinian at God's command to liberate Africa from the hand of the Vandals, entered Carthage at night with the wagons of peasants entering the city, captured it, and received infinite riches.

He reduced Gilimer from flight to surrender and led him back to the emperor at Constantinople.

Thus the kingdom of the Vandals was destroyed.

Thus at last that Vandal fury, together with the name itself, was utterly extinguished.

The persecution carried out by these Vandals against the African Church will be described below.

Title XI, Chapter VII

The Goths, who among the ancients were called Getae and afterward were divided from themselves into two kingdoms, namely those of the Ostrogoths and Visigoths, are known from the history of Jordanes to have had the following origin, as Sigebert says, whom Vincent introduces in book XVII of the Historical Mirror, chapter 11.

They first inhabited Scandza, an island of Scythia.

Not content with its possession, they departed from there with their king Berith and, wandering through the neighboring islands and lands of Scythia, harassed the neighboring peoples with wars and subjected the surrounding peoples to themselves by terror of their name.

Afterward, under Filimer, their fifth king, advancing to the farther parts of Scythia and as far as the nearer banks of the Danube, they wandered long and widely through the lands of Thrace, Dacia, and Moesia.

There for many times—indeed, for many centuries—they grew into a great people; attaching many peoples to themselves by their victories, they enlarged their name and fortitude with strength.

Many, clever in natural ability and also instructed in the studies of philosophy, put off their barbarian nature and excelled other barbarous peoples in humanity and honorable conduct.

In the time of Emperor Decius, however, crossing the Danube with their king Guma, they grievously pressed upon the Roman Empire.

When attacked by Decius in war, they crushed the Roman army and killed Decius himself together with his son Decius.

Elated by this prosperity and afterward often made superior in encounters with Roman commanders, they were a terror to the whole world.

While they were still situated across the Danube in the time of Emperor Valens, they began to clash among themselves in civil war.

When Athalaric, commander of one party, had prevailed over Fritigern, commander of the other party, Fritigern sought aid from Valens and promised to become a Christian.

Valens sent him aid and, being himself an Arian, caused them to be led into the sect of the Arians.

Section I

In the thirteenth year of Emperor Valens, the Huns, of whom it will be said below, were themselves raging powerfully in Scythia, as Vincent says in the History, in the place cited above, chapter 12.

Ferociously seizing an opportunity from the internal rivalry of the Goths, they unexpectedly invaded their territories and, after conquering them in war, either subjected them to themselves, tortured them in captivity, or drove them from their fatherland.

Thus the Goths, who had subjected many peoples to their servitude, were subjected to the empire of the Huns and greatly increased their power, since all who served the Goths obeyed the principate of the Huns through the Goths.

In this manner the Huns held the principate in almost all Scythia and excelled all in strength.

Some of the conquered Goths crossed the Danube and thrust themselves into the territories of the Roman Empire, asking Valens that land be given to them to inhabit.

When this had been obtained, for some time they restrained themselves from every insolence of arms.

At length, compelled by the avarice of the Romans and want of household substance, they stirred up grievous wars in the very bosom of the empire.

Emperor Valens, meeting them, was conquered by them in war and burned by fire; by God's just judgment he brought excessive harm upon the republic but increased the enemies' exaltation.

These Goths who pressed upon the Roman Empire called themselves Visigoths, that is, western Goths, and for many years harassed the western territories of the Romans as far as the farthest parts of Spain, where afterward they also grew into a kingdom.

But the Goths who suffered themselves to remain in their native soil across the Danube under the dominion of the Huns had petty kings of their own people and called themselves Ostrogoths, that is, eastern Goths.

They too afterward, through their king Theodoric, having received dominion over the kingdom of Italy from Emperor Zeno, held it for many years.

And thus the Goths, as if fiercely tossing east and west with the two horns of their head, created from themselves two kingdoms: that of the Visigoths in Spain and that of the Ostrogoths in Italy.

Section II

Therefore, from the first year of Gratian onward, Fritigern reigned over the Visigoths for three years.

After him Athanaric reigned for one year. Having entered into a treaty with Theodosius and been invited by him to Constantinople, he died on the fifteenth day after he arrived.

From then the Visigoths were without a king under Emperor Theodosius for fourteen years.

Afterward, when the Visigoths had broken their treaty with the Romans, they created Alaric king over themselves, and he reigned for fifteen years.

After him Athaulf reigned for three years. When he was killed by his own men, Sigeric reigned for one year.

When he likewise had been killed by the Visigoths, Wallia reigned for twenty-two years.

After him Theodoric reigned for fourteen years; after him his son Thorismund, for three.

When he had been slaughtered by his brothers Frederic and Theodoric, his brother Theodoric succeeded him in the kingdom and reigned for thirteen years.

But when he too had been slaughtered by his brothers, Euric reigned for nineteen years.

After him his son Alaric reigned for twenty-one years.

At length Clovis, king of Francia, animated by signs of divine aid, engaged him in battle; after Alaric had been killed, Clovis transferred to the territory of Francia whatever the Visigoths possessed in Gaul.

But Amalaric, son of Alaric, fleeing into Spain, reigned there for sixteen years.

When he treated his wife Clotild shamefully because she refused to serve the Arian sect with him, he was killed in Spain by Childebert, Clotild's brother.

After him Truda [read: Theudis] reigned for seventeen years.

When he had been killed by his own men, Theudigisel reigned for two years.

When he too had been killed by his men during a banquet, Agila reigned for nine years.

When he acted insolently against his men, Athanagild, with the Romans assisting him, killed him and reigned for twenty-two years.

When he had died, Leovigild reigned with his brother Leuna [i.e., Liuva], and afterward alone, for six years.

After him his son Reccared reigned for fifteen years.

Thereafter Bethericus [i.e., Witteric] reigned for seven years; Sigigbodus [i.e., Sisebut], twenty-nine years; Sintila [i.e., Suintila], two.

When Sintila [i.e., Suintila] had been rejected by the Visigoths on account of his cruelty, Sisenand reigned for twenty years; Chyntila [i.e., Chintila], sixteen; and his son Tolga [i.e., Tulga], still a boy, four.

When Tolga [i.e., Tulga] had been rejected on account of the levity of boyhood and tonsured as a cleric, Chintasindus [i.e., Chindaswinth] reigned for seventeen years.

After him his son Flavius reigned, to whom twelve years are assigned.

At length the Saracens crossed from Africa into Spain and claimed it for themselves.

Thus the kingdom of the Visigoths and Sueves was destroyed and reduced under the Saracens, approximately 346 years having elapsed from the time they were expelled from Scythia by the Huns.

But from the time when the Vandals yielded and the Sueves had been conquered, they began to reign in Spain, approximately 256 years elapsed.

The kingdom of the third part of Spain, which is called the Galician kingdom and which neither the Visigoths then nor afterward the Saracens could subject, still flourishes unharmed.

Therefore, protected by the faith, it remains unconquerable.

The aforesaid kingdom ended in the year of the Lord 720.

Section III

Among the Ostrogoths, Vinitharius reigned from the first year of Gratian onward for six years.

Babanber [read: Balamber], king of the Huns, killed him in battle.

After him Hunimund reigned for two years; Horismud [i.e., Thorismund] likewise, two.

After him the Ostrogoths were without a king for forty years.

After these things Valamir received the kingdom and reigned for thirty-one years.

When he had been killed in battle, his son Theodoric succeeded him, to whom nineteen years are assigned.

Theodoric, after killing Odoacer, king of Italy, whom he had received in good faith, obtained Italy and reigned there for thirty-two years.

He at length killed Boethius, worn down by exile, concerning whom above, and also Symmachus the patrician.

He also killed by hunger Pope John, whom he had imprisoned.

But after twenty days Theodoric suddenly died; a certain holy hermit saw him naked and unshod, cast and thrust by Pope John and Symmachus the patrician into the cauldron of Vulcan.

Athalaric, Theodoric's grandson through his daughter, succeeding in the kingdom of Italy and of the Ostrogoths, reigned for eight years.

After him Theodahad, assumed into the kingdom by Amalmunda [i.e., Amalasuntha], Athalaric's mother, reigned with her for two years; after these things alone for one.

Eldepadus [i.e., Ildibad] reigned for one year; Erarius [i.e., Eraric], one; Totila, ten; Theias [i.e., Teia], two.

With him the kingdom of the Ostrogoths ended.

Title XI, Chapter VIII

Concerning the kingdom of the Huns, Vincent says after Sigebert that the barbarity of that people, which held the principate in almost all Scythia, would make him keep silent, had not that famous destruction of Gaul and Italy compelled him to speak, when through Attila their king the judgment of God poured itself far and wide.

God drew him against sinful peoples as a sword polished and sharpened from the sheath of his indignation.

I shall therefore disclose briefly concerning their origin what is read in the histories of the ancients.

Similarly [read: Filimer], king of the Getae, son of Gadaric the Great, already holding the principate of the Goths, formerly the Getae, in the fifth place after their departure from the island of Scandza, when he entered the lands of Scythia with his people, found among the people certain large women whom they call Alirunas [i.e., Haliurunnae] in the Getic language.

Holding them suspect, he drove them from his midst and, after they had been driven far from his army, compelled them to wander in the wilderness.

When wild men, whom some call satyr fauns, saw them wandering through the desert and mingled themselves with their embraces in intercourse, they produced this most ferocious race.

At first it was among the Maeotian marshes, a small, foul, and meager race resembling human beings, known by no other voice except that it presented the likeness of human speech.

Those whom perhaps they did not overcome in war they put to flight by their terrifying appearance, casting excessive fear upon them from the horror of their countenance.

For they possessed, as it were, a shapeless mass rather than a face, of a fearful blackness, having points rather than eyes; their grim appearance betrayed the confidence of their spirits.

They rage even against their own offspring on the first day of birth, for they cut the cheeks of the males with iron so that, before they receive the nourishment of milk, they are compelled to undergo endurance of a wound.

Hence they grow old without beards and are youths without beauty, because a face furrowed by iron consumes with a scar the timely grace of hair.

They are small in form but keen in movement, unencumbered and exceedingly ready for riding, broad in the shoulders, prepared with bows and arrows, firm in the neck, and always erect in pride.

Therefore the Huns, produced from such stock, were a horror and fear to all neighboring peoples.

Their power was increased by victory over the Goths dwelling beyond the shores of Lake Maeotis, who flourished in Scythia with the glory of singular power and fortitude.

The Huns obtained that victory in this manner.

Hun hunters, following the tracks of a stag, crossed the Maeotian marshes, which they had previously thought impassable, and carefully explored the Scythian region.

They announced all that they had explored to the Huns and encouraged them to cross.

Under their leadership, when the marshes had been crossed, they suddenly fell upon the Scythian peoples like a whirlwind and subjected them all to themselves.

They expelled from their habitations the Goths themselves, who ruled and excelled the others.

Elated among the other peoples of Scythia by this prosperous success, after the victory over the Goths the Huns labored for almost eighty years toward the shaking and ruin of the world.

Therefore from the first year of Emperor Gratian, Balamber and Mundruth [i.e., Mundzuc], father of Attila, ruled over the Huns; also his brothers Octer [i.e., Octar] and Rugila; and Bleda and his brother Attila, until the death of Emperor Marcian, for about eighty years.

Section I

Attila, king of the Huns, and his brother Bleda dwelt within Pannonia.

Supported by a multitude of powerful nations, they most savagely laid waste the surrounding provinces, namely Macedonia, Moesia, Achaea, and both Thraces.

For this reason Marcian, terrified lest Attila penetrate to the inner regions of the empire, himself made a temporary peace with the Persians and Vandals.

Attila, however, led by desire for the kingdom, killed his brother Bleda after surrounding him with deceit.

After Bleda had been killed, Attila compelled all the nations that had been subject to them to obey him alone.

Thus Attila, supported by the protection of most powerful nations, turned his mind toward demolishing the western empire.

At that time the most famous Ardaric, king of the Gepids, was subject to his dominion.

Valamir also, ruler of the eastern Goths and a king nobler than Attila himself, then served him.

In addition there were the most powerful nations, namely the Marcomanni, Sueves, Quadi, Heruli, and Thuringians.

Proud in his rule over all these and supported by the strength of their forces, Attila thought he could easily do whatever he desired.

Moreover, he endeavored to attack the Roman Empire no less by counsel and cunning of spirit than by strength of arms.

Therefore Attila, king of the Huns, departing his provinces with a formidable army, first traversed Germany and attacked Gaul.

Because he seemed to thirst for nothing other than the blood of Christians, he laid waste all things divine and human together, destroyed the best-fortified cities, burned churches, and consumed everything like a raging tempest.

Section II: Concerning Saint Nicasius and His Sister Eutropia, Martyred by These Huns

Although, as Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, book XXI, chapter 37, some say that the aforesaid suffered martyrdom from the Vandals. Nicasius, bishop of the city of Reims, and Anianus, bishop of Orléans, distinguished by great virtues, flourished in Gaul. Through their merits and prayers they strove for a long time to defer this wrath of God's indignation, so that meanwhile they might recall the people to repentance. But the people, treasuring up wrath for themselves, in no way obeyed their salutary precepts. Meanwhile, when the city was besieged and the whole region laid waste, they wished to destroy the Christians alone, as enemies of their gods and opponents of their customs.

At last, on the day of its overthrow, while they fought bravely on every side, the citizens, struck with terror, ran to Saint Nicasius, who was prostrate in prayer, asking what he judged it more useful to do: to hand themselves over to servitude under the nations, or to fight for the safety of the city even to death.

Foreknowing from a revelation of God that the city was to be utterly overthrown, he answered with great constancy: "We are not ignorant that this indignation has been provoked by your crimes through God's just judgment. Therefore, pricked by the divine scourges, let us undertake the danger of death, not unwillingly or despairing, but most devotedly and patiently, with the highest hope of our salvation, so that this present death may become for us not a punishment but a remedy. Behold, I am prepared to die as a shepherd for the sheepfold. Let us pray more earnestly for our enemies, wishing salvation for them as for friends."

Holy Eutropia, his sister, with her hands extended toward heaven, also roused the people with all her strength toward the crown of martyrdom.

Therefore, when the furious assault of the pagans rushed in, the holy man, accompanied by his sister, met them with hymns and spiritual songs at the door of the basilica of the Holy Mother of God, Mary, which he had founded as the citadel of his see.

As soon as he saw the armed battle lines, indicating silence with his hand, he said: "O fortitude ministering to divine commands, why do you turn the victory of your dignity, contrary to the condition of human nature, into rage? For the title of true right was once inscribed upon noble warriors: to spare the humble and subdue the proud. And behold, the Christian people, humble and devoted to their God, lie prostrate in your sight and, obedient even to death, await the remission of sins. You also repent of your crimes, acknowledging the true God, lest perhaps his indignation, which through you becomes for others a correction unto salvation, become for you the wage of infernal damnation. But if, persisting in impiety, you seek to slaughter my sheep, first offer me for them as a victim to the divine majesty, so that together we may deserve to be found worthy of heavenly blessedness."

After these words, while the bishop prostrate in prayer was singing this verse, "My soul has cleaved to the pavement," immediately, when his head was cut off by the blow of an executioner, the word of holiness did not cease from the mouth of the beheaded man; but, by fulfilling it, he obtained the sentence of immortality which he sought, saying: "Give me life according to your word."

Holy Eutropia, seeing impiety softened around her and her beauty reserved, as it were, for the pleasures of the pagans, leapt upon the priest's killer and said: "Alas, cruel tyrant, you have slaughtered a great man of God with unworthy hands, and you reserve me to be abused by you. The divine sentence already condemns you."

Then, provoking him to her own martyrdom, with a sudden leap she seized his eyelids and, not by womanly courage but by divine vengeance, tore out his eyes as an avenger.

Thus, preferring immediately to run upon the swords of the persecutors rather than to succumb by assenting to the pleasures of the pagans, she at once merited the palm of martyrdom with her brother and the others.

When the entire slaughter of martyrdom had been completed and sacred blood was flooding forth, sudden terror invaded the persecutors, as if they saw heavenly battle lines fighting and the church itself resounded with a horrible noise, so that, abandoning the city's spoils, they fled irrevocably through the crossroads.

Thus, while the city remained solitary for a long time, the bodies of the martyrs were preserved there under angelic custody, so that lights were seen from afar during the nights and sweetest sounds, as of choirs of the powers above singing celestial songs, were heard by many.

Hence, already strengthened by divine revelation and power, the very few fellow citizens who had remained to bury the bodies of the saints, with divine providence arranging it, hastened to the city with fasts and prayers.

Sensing there a sweetest fragrance and mingling groaning with joy, they buried the bodies of the saints in suitable places.

From then on they strove more attentively to serve the Lord without fear of enemies.

Saint Nicasius had long before foretold that the cause of the devastation of Gaul was Sodomitic prosperity arising from satiety, namely from idleness, avarice, and concupiscence of the flesh.

In the aforesaid year, as Sigebert says, Auctor, bishop of Metz, was taken captive; but, with his captor [read: the Huns] struck by blindness, he was released together with the captives of his city.

Section III

Therefore Attila, king of the Huns, supported by the aid of Valamir, king of the Ostrogoths, Ardaric, king of the Gepids, and many northern peoples subject to him, as Sigebert says, departed from Pannonia and invaded the western empire with five hundred thousand armed men.

First, so great an indignation of God raged through them throughout all Gaul that no city, castle, or town could be protected from their fury by any fortification at all.

In the preceding year, however, many signs occurred.

For continual earthquakes and many signs from heaven were shown. In the evening the sky from the north became red like fire, with brighter lines intermingled through the fiery redness and deformed into this appearance.

The moon was darkened, a comet appeared, and many other things which the impending succession of events showed not to be without meaning.

While the Huns with their king were besieging the city of Orléans, Ethius [i.e., Aetius], patrician of the Romans, flew to the aid of Gaul, together with the military forces of Theodoric, king of the Visigoths, Meroneus [i.e., Merovech], king of the Franks, and other peoples.

Meanwhile, as John de Columna [i.e., John of Colonna] testifies, Attila, foreseeing with barbarian cunning that it would not be safe for him if the Goths who dwelt within Gaul were joined to the Romans for war, pretended to be a friend to the Goths and asserted that he would fight against the Romans alone.

Aetius, foreseeing these devices with no less acuteness, directed legates to Theodoric, who at that time ruled at Toulouse, asking that he be allied with the Romans by treaties of peace against the Huns.

Theodoric assented to the legates of the Romans and, according to Aetius's desire, was allied with the Romans, taking thought for himself no less than for them.

In addition, the Burgundians, Alans, Franks with their King Merovech, Saxons, Riparioli, Lambriones, Sarmatians, Armoricans who are now called Britons, Lutetians where Paris now is, and almost all the peoples of the West were an aid to the Romans.

The sagacity of Aetius the patrician assumed them all into fellowship in the war, lest he meet Attila with unequal strength.

Therefore, after some light engagements, the armies of both parties met in the Catalaunian Fields, which extend for two hundred miles in length and seventy in width.

When they had now come to the place where the contest could not be deferred, Attila, as a pagan and barbarous man, inquired of soothsayers and diviners what the outcome of the war would be.

Examining the entrails of animals according to the gentile rite, they announced unfavorable things to Attila, yet said that this slight consolation would exist: the highest commander on the hostile side would fall in the coming war.

Attila, thinking that the death of Aetius, which he desired above all, would occur, did not hesitate to commit himself to war with the destruction of his own men, contrary to what that supreme commander of the Romans used to say: “I prefer to preserve one citizen,” and so forth, provided only that he could destroy Aetius, who resisted his undertakings.

The most powerful nations assembled from each side, the battle lines were arranged, and, when the day was already turning toward evening, battle was joined with this purpose: that if Attila were overcome by the enemies, he and his men might escape more easily under cover of night.

Thus the battle lines met on each side, and a war began such as scarcely any history relates.

For a long time they fought most fiercely with equal fortune, and many thousands of men were laid low on each side.

That whole plain was filled with corpses, so much so that the warriors were compelled to fight even upon the bodies of the slain themselves.

At last, by God’s will, after great slaughter in both armies, Attila’s army yielded.

Had night not supervened, few from his army would have escaped.

The histories report that 180,000 men fell on both sides in this battle.

So much blood was poured out there, both from men and from horses, that a little stream flowing through the middle of the field grew so greatly that, made a torrent, it carried with it the corpses of the slain.

Nevertheless Attila’s belief concerning the death of Aetius the patrician deceived him, for while Aetius remained unharmed, Theodoric, king of the Goths, was killed among the strongest companies of the enemy.

On the following day Attila, confessing himself routed and conquered, confined himself with his men within the fortification of the wagons.

Thorismund, however, son of the king of the Goths, who had fought with his father against the enemies, wishing to avenge his father’s death with the blood of the Huns, arranged to attack Attila’s camp with his Goths.

When Attila learned this and had already despaired of confidence in his life, he commanded a great pile to be constructed from the saddles of the horsemen.

Mounting it, he instructed his men that if the enemies pressed them, he should be burned by his own men after fire had been placed beneath it rather than perish by the swords of the enemies, be made a mockery after capture by the Romans or Goths, and, a king of so many and such powerful nations, come into the hands of the enemies.

Aetius, however, incautiously considering that, if Attila had been killed and his army destroyed even to annihilation, the Romans could easily be oppressed by the Goths, persuaded Thorismund, as if consulting his interests, to return home as quickly as possible and receive his paternal kingdom.

He added that, if it were invaded by his brother, he would have to struggle more bitterly with his own people than with the enemies.

Thorismund, gladly embracing this counsel as advantageous to himself, returned home with his forces and received his paternal kingdom without any dispute.

But alas, how much harm to the fatherland did the ignorance of men bring through this provision; and while it desired to avert harm, it introduced it, as will be shown below.

Section IV

Therefore Attila, raised to the hope of safety after the departure of the Goths, like a raging lion released from prison, with those who had survived the war—of whom there was still an infinite people—again attacked the cities of Gaul.

First the noble and famous city of the Tungri was captured and overthrown by him, all its citizens having been killed.

Then he came to Troyes, in which city Saint Lupus was bishop.

Adorned in pontifical vestments, Lupus proceeded with his clergy to meet Attila as he came.

When he had come before him and been admitted to him, he said: “Who are you, who lay waste and trample the earth?”

Attila answered him: “I am Attila, king of the Huns, the scourge of God.”

At this utterance the bishop commanded the city gates to be opened and said: “Let the scourge of God be welcome.”

He led them into the city; but by God’s judgment, as soon as they entered, they were all struck with blindness, and, passing through the middle of the city, they injured no one.

Therefore, while Attila was laying waste Gaul, he heard that the Romans and Goths were again uniting forces against him and renewing the war.

Learning this, he hastily abandoned Gaul and returned.

There, after gathering a very great army, he came into Italy, the very fountain of the Roman Empire, and continuously besieged for three years the city of Aquileia, situated at the very entrance of Italy, while the citizens resisted strenuously.

When through the long siege his army had despoiled the whole adjoining region and, in the manner of locusts, scraped away everything necessary for food, the besiegers labored under no less hunger and want than the besieged.

But one day, while King Attila went around the city walls, he observed the storks which had nested in the city’s towers migrate from the city in one movement and carry their young outside through the fields, lifted in their beaks.

Seeing this, Attila said to those who accompanied him: “Behold, the birds, foreknowing future things, abandon the city that is to perish.”

At this sign the spirits of the barbarians were provoked; they attacked the city from every side with a great assault, fresh men succeeding the weary, and denied rest to the besieged.

At last, after the walls had been violently broken, the barbarians entered the city.

Entering it, they plundered its wealth, and all whom they met were slaughtered without distinction of sex or age.

Only matrons who possessed some beauty were reserved for the lust of the barbarians, a fate worse than every death.

There was then in the city a certain woman, noble according to worldly dignity and beautiful in body, but nobler in chastity and modesty, named Digna.

Her house stood upon the bank of the river that flows through the city.

When she heard that maidens were preserved by the barbarians, fearing that she too might become a mockery to the most filthy barbarians and that they might defile the beauty of her soul by inflicted lust, as soon as she perceived them approaching her house, she wrapped her head and cast herself headlong from the highest citadel of her house into the whirlpool.

When the city had been captured, Attila killed all its citizens and leveled it to the ground.

Therefore, after Aquileia had been destroyed, Attila attacked the surrounding cities and, demolishing them like vulgur [read: lightning], destroyed them utterly: Concordia and Patavium, which today is called Padua; then, throughout all the cities of the Venetias, they attacked and captured Verona, Vicenza, Brescia, and Bergamo.

While Aquileia was being besieged and at length destroyed, a city began to be built in the diocese called Castellum.

For wealthy men of the province of Venetia, fleeing the plunderings of Attila’s army with their servants and carrying precious household goods, abandoned their own dwellings and, departing with laden hands, were safe from the assault of the barbarians upon the islands called Rivus Altus [i.e., Rialto], since the barbarians had no use of ships for inflicting violence upon others.

Because the sands did not suffice for habitations, they carried sand in ships and industriously fortified dwellings, calling them Venice from the common name of the province.

After the destruction of Aquileia and the other cities of the province of the Venetias, the cities of Emilia were plundered in the same manner.

He spared only the city of Ravenna in this manner.

John, bishop of that city, accompanied by his clergy in white garments, hastened as a suppliant outside the city to Attila, who was encamped in the suburbs with his army, and begged him to spare the city and its citizens.

Attila, having heard the reputation of the bishop, answered: “I am willing to spare it. But lest your citizens glory that by their counsel or strength they resisted our power, I first wish the posts of the city gates to be taken down and trampled by the hooves of our army’s horses.”

The citizens of Ravenna accepted this condition with a willing spirit.

Attila therefore passed through Ravenna with his army without otherwise laying waste the city.

This tyrant did these things around the year of the Lord 453, but from the beginning of the world, according to the Seventy interpreters with their followers, in the year 5,651 according to the Hebrews.

Advancing thence into Liguria, Attila plundered Milan and Pavia, their citizens having been captured or killed.

At last, satiated with the slaughter of human beings and with plunder, he placed his camp at the place where the Minutius River [i.e., Mincio] flows into the Po.

Remaining there, he began to turn over in his mind whether he should go to Rome.

But fearing the example of Alaric, who did not survive long after capturing and despoiling the city, he deferred going.

Meanwhile a most peaceful embassy came to him from Rome.

Section V: Concerning Pope Leo, Who Came to Attila Asking Him to Leave Italy

Therefore the most holy Pope Leo, fearing for his spiritual sons, went personally to the king; obtaining everything he desired, he brought back the safety not only of the Roman city but also of all Italy.

For that most cruel king had been terrified by God’s command and could say nothing to Christ’s priest except what the holy prelate desired.

When the pontiff had departed, Attila was asked by his men why, beyond his usual custom, he had shown such reverence to the Roman pontiff, and why he had obeyed all that the pontiff had not only requested but even commanded.

He is said to have answered: “I did not honor the person of the man who came, but another man standing beside him in priestly clothing, narrower in form [read: more august in form] and venerable with white hair, who, with sword drawn, threatened me terribly with death unless I fulfilled everything that he sought.”

Therefore Attila, restrained from his hardness in this manner, after Italy had in great part been despoiled of its wealth and some citizens killed and others taken captive, returned to Pannonia.

Not long afterward Honoria, sister of Prince Valentinian, while she was guarded more strictly by her brother out of regard for chastity, directed her eunuch to Attila, asking that he extort her from her brother in marriage.

Receiving this message, Attila, because he had already approached the boundaries of Italy [read: had already left the boundaries of Italy] and could not return to Italy except with a weary army, sent an embassy to Emperor Valentinian and commanded him with threats to send him immediately his sister, together with a portion of the empire, to be joined in marriage; otherwise he would soon bring worse things upon the western empire.

But soon, by divine judgment, he departed from this life.

For, after returning to his own lands, beyond the many wives whom he had married, he joined to himself in marriage a certain most beautiful maiden named Hildico.

Holding most lavish banquets for this wedding, while he slept on his back because of drunkenness from the wine he had imbibed at the preceding banquet, he was suffocated by an eruption of blood which was accustomed to flow from his nostrils.

That night the Lord appeared in a dream at Constantinople to Emperor Marcian and showed him Attila’s bow broken, for that people was accustomed to use this kind of weapon in war.

By this vision it was signified that Attila was dead.

But because virtue always begets envy, Emperor Valentinian, as the event showed, greatly fearing the prosperous successes of Aetius, commanded him to be killed by the sword.

Thus Aetius, a warlike man and once the terror of Attila, fell through envy alone.

But the death of Aetius by no means went unpunished for Valentinian, for before the year was completed he too was killed by Tranhasila [i.e., Transila], a certain soldier of Aetius, after he had held the empire for thirty years, namely twenty-five with Theodosius and five with Marcian.

Section VI

Meanwhile the perfidious people of the Huns with their king Attila, as Hugh of Fleury says and Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, book XX, chapter 13, having departed from the sheath of their habitation, cruelly gnashed toward the dangers of very many peoples.

When Attila surrounded the walls of Orléans and turned every device of his military force toward the destruction of that city, Saint Anianus, bishop of that city, trusting in the Lord, carried the relics of the saints around the circuit of the wall and sang with a sweet voice.

Then a certain wretched priest captured by the barbarians addressed him in these words: “What you now do, each one of us diligently did in his own city, but it profited no one.”

When he had said these things, he immediately fell dead by divine vengeance, condemned to perpetual punishment.

Meanwhile the hostile army hurled missiles and also battered the wall with rams.

Then, while the people fled to the church, the bishop exhorted them to trust in the Lord.

He himself climbed the wall and, silently looking toward heaven, began to pray.

When he perceived the Lord’s aid to be present, he suddenly spat at the barbarians.

So great a mass of rain suddenly descended and checked the assault of the impious by a four-day flood that no one who wished to fight among the enemies could transfer himself to another place, but the marvelous power of God held the hostile company still.

When the rainstorm ceased, Saint Anianus went to Attila to entreat him for the people entrusted to him.

But, spurned by the perfidious man, he returned by the opposite gate of the city.

On the following day, when the bars of the gates had been opened, Attila’s leading men entered the city and, after lots had been cast to divide the people, loaded wagons from the people’s substance.

While the saint admonished the people not even thus to despair of God, he was suddenly carried by the Lord in prophetic manner to the place where Agentius—or according to others Aetius—the patrician who governed the republic in Gaul, was staying with his army together with Thorismund, king of the Goths.

Appearing to a court soldier, he said: “Go, tell my son Agentius that if he delays coming to the city today, tomorrow it will already profit nothing.”

Having said these things, he immediately departed.

When the soldier reported the message to Agentius, he, joyful and now secure concerning victory, admonished by divine revelation, hurried to Orléans together with Thorismund and his own army and that of the Goths.

He found the enemies unprepared and inflicted a great slaughter upon them.

Thus some of the Huns succumbed to swords, while others, compelled by fear, handed themselves over to the channel of the Loire, destined to meet their end in death.

Saint Anianus, however, returning good things for evil, rescued through his prayers many whom he saw being tortured before him.

He rejoiced in Christ that none of his sheep had been missing from their number except the one who, despairing of the Lord contrary to his command, had handed himself over to the barbarian people.

Therefore, when the bitter barbarity had been laid low, so great an abundance of crops arose from the earth at Orléans that the people exulted doubly in the Lord: both concerning deliverance from impious ferocity and concerning the generosity of divine grace.

When this saint, having been made bishop of Orléans, was about to enter the walls of that city, he sought from Agrippinus, who was in command of the soldiers, that all those whom he held shut in prison for various crimes be released on account of the favor of his entrance.

When Agrippinus resisted and refused this entirely, a stone of great weight fell from on high and struck the crown of his head.

Laid low by this blow and carried by the hands of his servants to his own house, he very quickly recognized that the wound had descended upon him because he had been unwilling to grant what the man of God had requested.

But when the blood from his head did not cease to flow and the aforesaid pontiff visited him for charity's sake, as soon as he placed the sign of the cross upon the wound with his own hand, he restrained the stream of blood and freed him from death.

And while by his own prayer he healed one corrected man, he obtained the others for whom he had previously petitioned.

When this same saint was raising to a greater height the church which his predecessor, Blessed Onuertius [read: Euvertius], had founded, the man who was in charge of the craftsmen fell from the roof and incurred danger of death, so that, with his whole body shattered, he scarcely gasped with his last breath.

But the saint of God restored him to health by prayer after making the sign of the cross.

Section VII: Concerning the Passion of the Eleven Thousand Virgins, Ursula with Her Companions

At this place in his Chronicles Sigebert describes their passion, because they suffered under those who grew especially powerful in the land at this time.

But from their history it appears that they suffered long before, for the Huns themselves had also begun long before this time to leave their original places and range through the world.

Therefore, when Saint Ursula was the only daughter of Dionotus, a most noble and wealthy prince of the Britons, exceedingly beautiful and of great ability, and, when she had become marriageable, was sought in marriage by the son of the king of England, she saw her father, a very Christian man, greatly distressed over this: both because it was not consonant with reason to compel his daughter, already devoted to God, to marry, and, conversely, because by withholding consent he feared the ferocity of the pagan.

Divinely inspired, she herself persuaded her father to assent to the tyrant, yet with this condition proposed: that the son of the king of England deliver to her ten virgins selected in age, beauty, and lineage; that he join one thousand virgins both to her and to each of them; that eleven triremes, that is, ships, be prepared according to their number; and that he give her a truce of three years for the dedication of her virginity.

The young bridegroom himself was to be instructed in the faith during these three years.

She used this novel counsel of the Holy Spirit so that either the difficulty of the proposed condition might turn his mind away from his purpose concerning her, or by this opportunity she might dedicate all her contemporaries with herself to God.

Because the matter was being conducted by the Lord, the young man assented to everything proposed and brought his father to do the same.

Having been baptized, the bridegroom commanded that everything requested be hastened, and sent the virgins to Ursula his bride.

Then the virgin's father, after taking counsel, ordained that his daughter have men as directors, by whose assistance she and the virgins might be governed in spiritual matters and in the necessity of temporal things.

Many persons came together from every side to so marvelous a spectacle, even bishops.

Among them was Pontulus [read: Pantulus], bishop of Basel, who conducted them as far as Rome and, returning thence with them, underwent martyrdom.

Saint Gerasina, queen of Sicily and sister of Daria, Saint Ursula's mother, when the matter was reported to her, left the kingdom in the hand of her little son Adrian, went there with her four daughters, and associated herself with them even to martyrdom.

Therefore, when the triremes and provisions had been prepared, this most sacred company departed from Britain and came to the city of Cologne.

There it was revealed to Ursula by the Lord through an angel that they would proceed to Rome and, returning from there to that place, she with her bridegroom and the whole company would come through martyrdom to glory.

Therefore, sailing from the city of Cologne to Basel, they proceeded thence on foot to Rome.

Pope Cyriacus and the clergy received them all with joy and honor.

He himself was from Britain, had certain kinswomen among them, and was himself a virgin.

It was revealed to him that he would obtain the palm of martyrdom with them.

Therefore, while they remained there at Rome for some time, Pope Cyriacus caused those who had not yet obtained the grace of baptism to be washed in the sacred font.

At length, manifesting his will before all his clergy, he renounced the papacy, after he had governed the Church for one year and about three months, the nineteenth after Peter the Apostle.

The clergy took this exceedingly ill, since he was leaving the see of Peter to proceed with that multitude of women, for they did not know the counsel of the Lord.

Nevertheless, by his counsel and persuasion they elected another named Antherus, removing that Cyriacus from the catalogue of pontiffs.

While the said sacred company remained at Rome, two wicked gentile princes, Maximus and Africanus, fearing that the Christian religion would be excessively increased from so great a multitude of the faithful, to whom others were also being joined, discovered the place toward which they were going.

They sent a message to Julius, their kinsman and a prince of the king of the Huns, that when they came to Cologne he should slaughter that entire multitude upon their arrival.

Therefore Blessed Pope Cyriacus departed from the city with the said multitude of virgins and with several holy bishops also associated with them, and proceeded toward Cologne.

Meanwhile Etherius, Ursula's bridegroom, whose mother and father had both become Christians and whose father was now dead, succeeding him in the kingdom, was admonished by an angel to meet his bride at Cologne and there undergo martyrdom with her.

But the young man, now made faithful, had so tasted divine grace that, despising carnal nuptials, he desired heavenly ones and held dying for Christ as most desirable for himself.

Therefore, acquiescing in the angel's admonitions, with his mother, his sister Florentina, Bishops Clement and Marculus with his niece, and many others, by God's ordering they came to Cologne from one direction, while Ursula with Pope Cyriacus and eleven thousand virgins arrived together from the other.

When they had disembarked from the ships, the Huns who were then besieging Cologne, like wolves among sheep, sent that entire sacred company through martyrdom to heaven.

When the others had been killed, they came to Ursula and, astonished by her beauty, presented her alive to their prince.

Captured by love of her beauty, he consoled her over the killing of the virgins and promised to have her as his wife if she assented to him.

When she refused him, the indignant tyrant directed an arrow at her and made her a martyr.

Among them was one called Cordula, who, overcome by human fear, remained in the ship that night.

But, strengthened by God, she manifested herself on the following day and was killed.

She afterward appeared to a certain person, commanding that a feast of her be held on the following day.

According to others they suffered in the year of the Lord 237, in the time of Pope Antherus and Emperor Maximian.

Although the time of their passion may be doubtful, the Church in no way doubts their martyrdom.

Title XI, Chapter IX

Concerning the Viruli, who afterward in their native tongue were called Lombards from their long beards, according to Vincent in the Historical Mirror, book XVII: we indeed read a certain origin, but we do not find a certain time for their origin.

For we read that kings reigned over them, whose names also we have learned, but we do not find the years of their reigns distinguished by their times.

While they dwelt in Scandinavia, an island of Scythia, they were so multiplied that their land could not contain them, and they took counsel to diminish their multitude by the departure of a third part.

They sought by casting lots who ought to depart.

Therefore the third part of the Viruli, or Lombards, whom the lot sent forth had selected, departed from the island of Scandinavia under the leaders Agio and Ibor; uncertain and wandering, they went from place to place and were often attacked in many wars.

They defended their safety and liberty manfully, as if their lives were at stake.

After Agio and Ibor had died, Agelmund first reigned over them for thirty-three years.

While he conducted himself with greater confidence than was justified, he was destroyed by the Bulgars with many of his men.

Lamissio reigned as the second, so called because he had been drawn from a pool, that is, from a whirlpool.

For when his mother, having borne seven in one birth, had cast them into a fishpond, and King Agelmund, making a journey, turned them over with a spear, this Lamissio firmly grasped his spear; because of this he was lifted from there and reared by him.

Thus virtue advanced in him, so that he succeeded him in the kingdom and avenged his death upon the Bulgars.

Tethu was the third; Hildeoch the fourth; Gludeoch [i.e., Gudeoch] the fifth.

For the forty years from the time they set out for Rugiland, the sequence of their deeds was as follows, according to Sigebert.

Under Gudeoch and his son Claffo, the sixth king, they dwelt in Rugiland.

Under Tato, the seventh king, they dwelt in the fields of Affed [read: Asfeld].

There, in the third year, when Rodulf, king of the Heruli, had been killed by Tato and the kingdom of the Heruli destroyed, the power of the Lombards increased.

Wascho [i.e., Wacho] killed Tacchone [i.e., Tato] and obtained the kingdom as the eighth king for forty years, according to the chronicles.

He left his son Ualtarith [i.e., Walthari] as successor to the kingdom, who reigned for seven years.

After him Andohin [i.e., Audoin] reigned for seventeen years; his son Albuinus [i.e., Alboin], thirty-one years, namely twenty-five in Pannonia and six in Italy; Eleb [i.e., Cleph], two years.

Afterward they were under dukes for ten years.

After these things they appointed Authari king, whom on account of the dignity they called Flavius; from him onward all kings of the Lombards were named Flavii.

Six years are assigned to him.

Argilulphus [i.e., Agilulf] reigned for twenty-five years; his son Adalcaldus [i.e., Adaloald], five; Ariperith [i.e., Aripert], nine.

His sons contended over the kingdom for one year.

Of them, Germoard [read: Grimoald], duke of Taurmacium [read: Turin], deceitfully killed Godepert, seized his kingdom, and took his sister as wife, reigning for nine years.

After him Pertaricalcus [i.e., Perctarit], son of Ariperith [i.e., Aripert], reigned for seventeen years; his son Cunperch [i.e., Cunipert], twelve.

His son Ciperch [i.e., Liutpert] succeeded him, having Arusprandus [i.e., Ansprand] as guardian.

Regubertus [i.e., Ragimpert], duke of the people of Turin, overcame Arusprandus [i.e., Ansprand] in battle and reigned for one year.

When he had died, his son Ariperch [i.e., Aripert] reigned for nine years.

The son of Arusprandus [i.e., Ansprand] fought with him, and, when Ariperch [i.e., Aripert] fled and was drowned in a river, received the kingdom.

But when he died after three months, his son Citprandus [i.e., Liutprand] reigned for thirty-two years; Rascis [i.e., Ratchis], seven.

When Rascis [i.e., Ratchis] became a monk, his brother Aistulphus [i.e., Aistulf] reigned for seven years.

When he had been struck by God's judgment, Desiderius reigned for eighteen years.

When he had been conquered and captured at Pavia by Charlemagne, the kingdom of the Lombards ended and Italy was freed from their hands.

But the deeds performed by them, and especially by Totila, who was their king, will be related more fully below.

Title XI, Chapter X

Because among the barbarian nations which rose with their kings from diverse places against the Roman Empire and against the true faithful were the Vandals, concerning whose origin it was said above, who stirred up a great persecution against the Church in Africa, it must now be considered more fully.

Therefore Honoricus [i.e., Huneric], succeeding his father Gensericus [i.e., Gaiseric] in the kingdom of the Vandals in Africa, at the beginning of his reign, as is the subtlety of barbarians, began to act more mildly and moderately, especially concerning the Christian religion.

As Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, book XXI, chapter 74, being anxious to show himself religious, he sought out the Manichaean heretics, of whom he burned many and destroyed very many by ships bound overseas [read: sold very many to ships bound overseas].

He found almost all of them to be Manichaeans of his own religion, especially priests and deacons of the Arian heresy.

Being the more ashamed on this account, he raged against them still more.

At the request of Emperor Zeno and Placidia through written edicts [read: Emperor Zeno and Placidia, widow of Olybrius], he gave permission that the church of Carthage, which for twenty-four years had been deprived of such an ornament, should ordain for itself whatever bishop it wished.

Therefore he sent through his notary an edict to be read publicly, that, according to the petition of Emperor Zeno, the church of Carthage should have a bishop proper to its religion.

While this edict was read to the church in our presence, we began to groan, because through the intervening deceits of evil men a future persecution was being prepared.

Thus we answered the legate: “If this is so, with these dangerous conditions interposed, the Church does not wish to have a bishop. Let Christ govern it, who has always deigned to govern it.”

The legate neglected to receive this representation, and at once the people, that it should then be done, blazed like fire; their clamor was intolerable, so that it could be quieted by no means.

Therefore, when Eugenius, a holy man and acceptable to God, had been ordained bishop, sublime gladness arose and accumulated joy came to the Church of God, the Catholic multitude under the barbarian nation exulting over the ordination of a restored pontiff.

For that man of God began through his good manner of life to be held venerable and reverend even by those who were outside, and to be so pleasing to all that, if it had been lawful, he would have delighted to lay down his life for everyone.

Money is proved never to have remained with him, unless perhaps it was offered at the hour when the sun, completing the course of day, gave place to the darkness of night; and he reserved only as much as would suffice for the day, not as much as covetousness would seek, while our God daily and continually gave immense and greater things.

Section I

But when his fame was everywhere celebrated and manifest, the bishops of the Arians began to be tormented by grave envy, pursuing him with daily calumnies, and Cyril above all.

What more need be said?

They represented concerning him to the king that he should by no means sit upon his throne or deliver the customary word of God to the people.

Then they also demanded that he prohibit males or females proceeding in barbarian dress from being seen in the church.

He answered as was fitting: “The house of God lies open to all who enter; no one will be able to repel them,” especially because there was an immense multitude of our Catholics proceeding in that dress because they served the royal household.

When the king received such an answer from the man, he ordained that torturers be stationed at the church doors.

When these saw a man or woman proceeding in the fashion of their people, they immediately cast small toothed stakes into the hair upon the head and fixed them there; pulling more violently, they tore away the whole skin of the head together with the hair.

Some immediately lost their eyes while this was done; others died from the pain itself.

After this punishment, women, the skin stripped from their heads, were led through the streets for display to the city, with a herald going before them; they counted this as a very great gain for themselves rather than suffering.

We knew very many of them and do not know that any of them then withdrew from the right path.

When he was unable to break the faith in this manner, he devised that the men of our religion appointed in his court should enjoy neither rations nor their customary stipends.

He also added that they be worn down by rustic labors, and directed men noble in lineage and exceedingly delicate to the fields of Utica, so that under the burning heat of the sun they should cut the turf of the crops.

They all went with joy, rejoicing in the Lord.

In their company was one who had a withered hand which for very many years had rendered him no service.

When he truthfully excused himself as unable to work, he was commanded more violently to proceed.

But when they reached the place and all groaned in prayer especially for him, by divine mercy that withered hand was restored sound to the confessor.

From this point the honorable persecution [read: Huneric's persecution], which caused our pain and travail, took its beginning.

Huneric himself, who had already long shown himself kind, desiring to establish the kingdom after his death for his sons—which did not occur—began cruelly to persecute his brother Theodoric and his sons, leaving none of them unless death took away the opportunity for his desire.

First, knowing that the wife of his said brother Theodoric was astute, lest perhaps she arm her husband or elder son, who seemed prudent and wise, against the tyrant with sharper counsels, he imposed a crime upon her and commanded her to be killed by the sword.

Afterward that elder son, instructed in letters, was also killed; according to Gaiseric's ordinance, because he was older than all, the kingdom among the grandsons was especially owed to him.

He proceeded to perpetrate something still more cruel.

While the people stood by in the middle of the city, before the steps of the New Square, he commanded Jocundus, a bishop of his own religion whom they called patriarch, to be burned with fire because he was exceedingly acceptable in the household of Theodoric, the king's brother, by whose support perhaps that house could obtain the kingdom.

Then he also banished Gento's elder son, named Godagis, with his wife, to cruel exile without the consolation of male or female servant.

But after the killing of his wife and son he similarly exiled his brother Theodoric, naked and destitute.

After Theodoric's death he placed his surviving infant son and his two adult daughters upon asses and cast them far away in affliction.

Pursuing with false accusations very many noble counts of his own people because they favored his brother, he slaughtered some with the sword and burned others.

He existed as an imitator of his brother Gaiseric [read: his father Gaiseric], who drowned his own brother's wife by tying a weight of stones to her and casting her into the foul Ausaga, the river of the circus [read: the famous Amsaga River of Cirta].

After the mother's death he also killed her sons.

As Gaiseric lay dying, he had commended many to him under oath; but Huneric, unmindful of his pledge and a violator of his oath, slaughtered them with various punishments and fire.

For Heldic, whom his father had appointed governor of the kingdom, now aged and a veteran, he shamefully beheaded; and Heldic's wife, with another named Chevarica, he burned in the middle of the city.

He commanded their bodies to be dragged through the streets and squares. After they had lain for the whole day, only with difficulty, when requested by his bishops, did he permit them to be buried in the evening.

For five or more years these persons suffered things which could have sufficed them for eternal reward if they had been Catholics and had borne the things mentioned for their faith.

We could not remain silent even about this, so that the king's impiety should by no means be concealed even against his own people.

He not only burned his bishop Jocundus with flames, but also burned very many of his own priests and deacons—that is, Arians such as he was—and moreover delivered them to beasts.

Section II

Therefore, when in a short time all whom he feared had been cut off and he had made firm for himself, as he thought, a kingdom which was brief and perishable, hateful and secure in part [read: idle and secure on every side], like a roaring lion he turned all the weapons of his fury toward persecutions of the Catholic Church.

Before the storm of persecution, however, the threatening evil was demonstrated by many preceding signs and visions.

For almost two years before it occurred, a certain person saw the church of Faustus shining in its customary ornament; and while he rejoiced in the brightness of so great a splendor and in the shining candles, suddenly the radiance of that light was extinguished.

When darkness succeeded, an adverse stench arose in the nostrils; that whole crowd of persons clothed in white which had been seen in the church was driven outside by certain Ethiopians who threatened them.

A certain priest also saw the basilica of the said Faustus filled with a crowd of innumerable peoples, and a little afterward emptied and filled with a multitude of pigs and goats.

The venerable Bishop Quintinianus also saw himself standing upon a certain mountain, from which he looked upon a flock of innumerable sheep; in the midst of the flock were two cauldrons boiling exceedingly.

The killers of the sheep were present and plunged their flesh into the boiling cauldrons.

While this was done, that entire multitude of sheep was consumed.

I think that those two kindled cauldrons were the two cities of Successa and Larensis [read: Sicca Veneria and Laribus], in which the multitude was first assembled and from which the conflagration took its beginning; or else King Huneric and Cyril his bishop.

What more?

First the tyrant decreed by a terrible command that no one should serve in his palace or conduct affairs unless he had made himself an Arian.

A huge number of them, with unconquered vigor, cast away temporal military service rather than lose the faith.

Afterward he cast them from their homes, despoiled them of all substance, and banished them to the islands of Sardinia and Sicily.

He hastened to establish this also throughout all Africa: that the fisc should claim for itself the substance of our deceased bishops.

A person able to succeed one who had died was not to be ordained before he first offered five hundred solidi to the royal fisc.

But this structure which the devil attempted to construct Christ immediately deigned to destroy.

For his household officers represented to him, saying: “If your command preserves this, our bishops appointed in the parts of Thrace and other regions will begin to suffer worse things.”

He then commanded the sacred virgins to be gathered, directing Vandals with midwives of their people to inspect and handle them contrary to the law of modesty and shame, where neither mothers nor any Catholic matron were present.

They tortured them by grievous suspension, bound immense weights to their feet, and applied heated iron plates to the back, belly, breasts, and sides.

Amid the torments they said to them: “Say that the bishops and your clergy lie with you.”

We know that very many were then destroyed by the bitterness of these punishments.

Others who remained, their skin having dried, were made misshapen.

For he endeavored to find a path through whose entrance he might make the persecution public, as he did.

Acting thus, he was able by no means to discover how he might stain the Church of Christ.

Section III

With what rivers of tears shall I continue, when he destined for exile in the desert 4,975 bishops, priests, deacons, and other members of the Church?

Among them were very many gouty persons, others deprived by advanced age of temporal sight.

In their number was Felix, bishop of Abiritina, who had now been in the episcopate for forty-four years.

Struck by paralytic disease, he neither sensed anything nor spoke.

Thinking especially concerning him that he could not be carried upon a beast, we suggested that his people ask the king to command that one who would soon die be permitted at least to remain at Carthage, because by no means could he be led into exile.

The tyrant is reported to have said in fury: “If he cannot sit upon an animal, let untamed oxen be yoked to drag him bound with ropes to the place I commanded.”

We carried him throughout the whole journey bound crosswise upon a mule like a log of wood.

All were assembled in the cities of Succensa and Larensis [read: Sicca Veneria and Laribus], so that the Moors, meeting them there, might lead those handed over to them into the desert.

Then two counts arrived and, with damnable subtlety, began to address God’s confessors with flattering words: “Why does it seem good to you to be so obstinate that you do not obey our lord’s commands? You could be honorable in the king’s sight if you hasten to do his will.”

At once they shouted with a mighty outcry: “We are Christians; we confess the inviolate Trinity as one God.”

They were confined under heavier but still looser guard, where we were permitted to enter, speak a word of exhortation to the brothers, and celebrate the divine mysteries.

There were also very many little children there, whom their mothers followed with maternal affection, some rejoicing and others trying to hold them back. Some rejoiced that they had borne martyrs; others, by contriving the flood of rebaptism, tried to recall them from confessing the faith.

Yet at that time blandishments conquered no one, nor did carnal affection bend anyone toward the earth. It is pleasing to relate briefly what one woman then did.

While we accompanied God’s army and perhaps advanced more often by night because of the heat of the sun, we saw a little woman carrying a small sack and other garments, holding one infant by the hand, and comforting him with these words: “Run, my lord. You see where all the saints proceed and hasten joyfully toward the crown.”

When we rebuked her because she seemed importunate, and because it was not fitting for her sex either to join herself to men or to associate herself with Christ’s army, she answered: “Bless me, bless me, and pray for me and this little grandson of mine, with whom I go into exile. Let the enemy not find him alone and recall him from the way of truth unto death.”

At these words, filled with tears, we could say nothing except that the will of God be done.

Section IV

But when the adversary, who perhaps was already saying, “I shall divide the spoils; I shall fill my soul; I shall kill with my sword; my hand shall have dominion,” could seize no one, he sought narrow and most foul places, within whose chambers he might confine God’s army.

Then even the consolation of human visitation was denied to them.

They were punished and grievously afflicted with cudgels.

The confessors of Christ were cast, constraining confinement pressing them, one upon another like swarms of locusts—and, to speak more properly, like most precious grains of wheat.

In that crowding no provision of place allowed them to withdraw for the natural office; compelled by the necessity of dung and urine, they did these things in the same place, so that the stench and horror then surpassed every kind of punishment.

At times, after immense gifts had been given to the Moors and while the Vandals slept, we were scarcely admitted secretly to enter among them.

Entering, we began to sink as if in a whirlpool of mud up to our knees, then seeing fulfilled that saying of Jeremiah: “Those who were nourished in saffron garments embraced their own dung.”

What more?

With the Moors clamoring on every side, they were commanded to prepare for the journey to the place to which they had been destined.

Thus, departing on the Lord’s Day with their garments smeared with dung, and their faces and heads likewise, though cruelly threatened by the Moors, they sang a hymn to the Lord with exultation: “This is glory for all his saints.”

Blessed Pontiff Cyprian, bishop of Winditzilia [read: Unizibira], was then present there, an outstanding consoler, who cherished each with a pious and paternal affection, not without rivers of flowing tears, prepared to lay down his life for his brothers and voluntarily to hand himself over to sufferings if he were permitted.

He then expended among his needy brothers in that necessity everything he possessed.

For he sought an opportunity by which he, a confessor in spirit and virtue, might be associated with the confessors.

Afterward, through many contests and the squalor of prison, he proceeded with exultation into the exile which he desired.

How great multitudes then ran together from diverse regions and cities to see God’s martyrs is testified by the roads and paths of the peoples, which could by no means contain the companies of visitors.

An inestimable crowd of the faithful, converging over the summits of mountains and through valleys, descended carrying candles in their hands and casting their infants before the footsteps of the martyrs, crying aloud in this manner: “To whom do you leave us wretches while you proceed to the crown? Who will baptize these little children for us in the font of perennial water? Who will lay the hand of penance upon us and, when we are bound by the chains of sins, release us by the indulgence of reconciliation? May it be permitted for us also to go with you, if it were lawful, so that no necessity might separate sons from fathers in such a manner.”

Amid these utterances and praises no consoler was now admitted to proceed, but the multitude was forced to run so that they might reach the place where a ship had then been prepared [read: where a camp had been prepared] and receive a laborious dwelling.

When the old men failed, and perhaps others who, although young, were delicate, they began first to be beaten with the points of spear shafts and with stones so that they would run.

Failing all the more from this, they were further wearied.

Afterward it was commanded by the Moors [read: the Moors were commanded] that those who could not walk be dragged by their bound feet like the carcass of a dead animal through hard and rough places, where first their garments and afterward their individual limbs were torn away, because here the head was crushed upon the sharp edges of rocks and there the sides were split.

Thus they breathed out their spirits amid the hands of those dragging them.

We were by no means able to gather their number because the multitude constrained us.

The others, who were more able, reached the places of the wilderness in which they were stationed.

They received barley to eat like beasts of burden.

There is said to be so great a multitude of venomous animals and scorpions there that it seems incredible to those who do not know it; by their breath alone they pour the poison of venom even into those situated far away.

They say that no one struck by a scorpion ever escaped.

Yet their poisonous ferocity, with Christ defending them, is shown down to the present to have harmed none of his servants.

But after they had been nourished with grains of barley, even this was taken away, as if God, who rained manna upon the fathers in the desert, could not also feed those consigned to such exile.

Section V

The most savage tyrant Huneric devised against the Church of God that, having cut off certain limbs, he might destroy the whole body by mangling it.

For on the day of the Lord's Ascension, while the king was absent, he directed a command to be read to Bishop Eugenius in the middle of the church by Emperor Zeno's legate [read: with Reginus, Emperor Zeno's legate, present, he directed a command to be read to Bishop Eugenius in the middle of the church], written in the following tenor, which he also sent throughout all Africa by couriers:

"King Huneric of the Vandals and Alans to all bishops of the Homoousion. It is established that, not once but often, your priests have been forbidden to hold assemblies in the allotments of the Vandals, lest by their sedition they overturn Christian souls. Despising this matter, many have now been found contrary to the prohibition celebrating masses in the allotments of the Vandals, asserting that they hold the complete rule of faith. And because we do not wish there to be scandal in the provinces granted to us by God, know that by God's providence, with the consent of our holy bishops, we have established this: that by the day of the Kalends of January next to come [read: the Kalends of February next to come], with every excuse of fear set aside, you shall all come to Carthage, so that you may enter into conflict concerning the account of the faith with our venerable bishops and may prove properly from diverse scriptures the faith of the Homoousians which you defend, so that it may be known whether you hold the complete faith."

When we who were present learned and read together the tenor of this edict, we groaned because it indicated the fury of a future persecution, especially where it said, "In the provinces granted to us by God."

Then it seemed reasonable to Saint Eugenius that the heart of the barbarians might be softened by making a representation.

He endeavored to represent to the king that the adherents of his religion who were overseas also ought to be summoned.

He said: "Let the clemency of the king know that with God's aid we in no way decline or flee the disputation prescribed by law, but without the consent of the whole body we ought not to undertake the causes of the faith which must be asserted by us."

Eugenius did this not because persons were lacking in Africa who could refute the objections of the adversaries, but so that those who were alien to their dominion and possessed greater confidence of liberty might come and might likewise announce to all lands and peoples the injustice of our oppression.

But he who was weaving deceits refused to hear him, devising reasons with frequent argumentations so that he might harass with various persecutions whichever bishops he had heard were learned.

He had already sent Donatian of Viminacium into exile after 150 cudgels had been laid upon him, as well as Praesidius Sbseculensis [read: Praesidius, bishop of Sufetula], a sharp man.

Then he also put to flight [read: beat with cudgels] the venerable Mansuetus, Germanus, Fusculus, and many others.

While these things were done, he commanded that no one of our religion have a common table with them, nor that they eat at all with Catholics.

This matter afforded them no benefit, but conferred the greatest gain upon us.

But when the fire of persecution kindled the affair and the flame of the hostile king burned everywhere, the Lord showed a certain miracle.

There was in that same city, namely Carthage, a certain blind man named Felix, known to almost everyone.

It was revealed to him in a dream by the Lord that he should go to his servant Bishop Eugenius and, at the hour when he blessed the font so that those approaching the faith might be baptized, should touch his eyes and would receive light.

Admonished the first and second time, he feared that a delusion was being made and neglected to go.

But appearing a third time, the Lord gravely rebuked him.

He immediately came to Eugenius, led by the hand, explaining the vision and the delusion.

When Eugenius through humility excused himself, asserting that he was a sinner, Felix persisted in his petition with excessive importunity.

Overcome by his prayers, Eugenius approached the baptismal font and, when prayer had been made with great groaning, afterward said to the blind man: "I have already told you, brother, that I am a sinful man. But may he who has deigned to visit you deign to grant this according to your faith."

Making the sign of the cross over his eyes, he restored his sight.

Felix was seized and questioned as to how he had received light, and he related everything in order.

When this became known to the king, the bishops of the Arians said that Eugenius had done it through magical arts.

And because they could not obscure the man's most widely known blindness, they would have wished to kill him if they had been able.

Section VI

That calumnious future day of the Kalends appointed by him was now approaching.

The bishops not only of all Africa but also of many islands assembled, afflicted by suffering and sorrow.

Silence was maintained for many days while he separated from them the skilled and most learned men, to be killed after calumnies had been alleged.

For he burned with fire one from that company of learned men, named Laetus, a strenuous and most learned man, after the prolonged squalor of prison, thinking that by such an example he would strike fear and injury into the others.

At length they came to the conflict of disputation at the place which the adversaries had chosen.

Our men, avoiding the tumult of shouting lest afterward the Arians say that some of ours had oppressed them, delegated from themselves ten men to answer for all.

Cyril placed for himself with his attendants in a high place a most proud throne, while we stood by.

Our bishops said: "The discourse must be conducted in the place where the proud exaltation of power does not dominate."

Turning toward Cyril, our men said: "Propose what you have determined."

Cyril said: "I do not know Latin."

Our bishops said: "We manifestly know that you have always spoken Latin. You ought not now to make excuse, especially because you kindled the conflagration of this affair. But if you desire to know our faith, this is the truth which we hold. For by royal command we are instructed to render an account of the Catholic faith which we hold. Therefore, according to the small measure of our strength, with the aid of the faith which we believe and preach, we undertake briefly to make it known [read: supported by divine aid, we undertake briefly to make known what we believe and preach]. First, we have learned that the unity of substance of the Father and the Son, which the Greeks call homoousion, must be explained by us."

"Thus we confess the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit to be in the unity of deity in such a manner that we confess with faithful confession that the Father subsists in the property of his person, the Son likewise exists in his own person, and the Holy Spirit retains the property of his person.

"For we do not assert that the Father is the Son, nor confess the Son to be the Father or Holy Spirit, nor understand the Holy Spirit to be either Father or Son; but we believe the unbegotten Father, the Son begotten of the Father, and the Holy Spirit proceeding from the Father and the Son to be of one substance, or of one essence, because the unbegotten Father, the begotten Son, and the proceeding Holy Spirit have one deity, but three properties of persons.

"And because a heresy arising against this Catholic and apostolic faith had introduced a certain novelty, asserting that the Son was not begotten from the substance of the Father but subsisted from things not existing, that is, from nothing, the Greek term homoousion, which is interpreted 'of one substance or essence,' was established to refute and utterly abolish this profession of impiety which had arisen against the faith, signifying that the Son came into being neither from things not existing nor from another substance, but was born of God the Father.

"Therefore those who think that homoousion must be removed wish to assert that the Son existed from nothing. But if he is not from nothing, without doubt he is from the Father; and rightly the Son is homoousios, that is, of one substance with the Father.

"That he is from the Father, that is, of one substance with the Father, is proved by these testimonies. The Apostle says: 'Who, since he is the brightness of glory and the figure of his substance.' And in the Gospel Christ says: 'I am in the Father, and the Father is in me'; and again: 'I and the Father are one.' This is referred not only to unity of will but to one and the same substance, because he does not say, 'I and the Father will one thing,' but 'are one.'

"But because we confess there to be two natures in the Son, that is, true God and man, whatever the Scriptures report of him concerning the excellence of power and sublimity, we judge must be attributed to the remembrance of his divinity. Whatever they relate more humbly concerning the same one, below the honor of heavenly power, we assign not to the Word of God but to the man assumed, as this: 'The Father is greater than I,' because it is referred only to the humanity; and this: 'Father, if it can be done, let this cup pass from me,' and so forth.

“But concerning the Holy Spirit the Apostle says: ‘There are divisions of graces, but the same Spirit,’ and so forth, adding: ‘One and the same Spirit works all these things, dividing to each as he wills.’ Hence it is indubitably clear that the Holy Spirit is both God and the author of his own will.

“Therefore there is one religion, one glorification of the Trinity, so that we may hear the Apostle as the Corinthians heard: ‘May the grace of our Lord, and the charity of God, namely the Father, and the communion of the Holy Spirit be with all of you.’ He speaks in the singular to indicate the unity of essence.

“This, therefore, is our faith, founded upon the evangelical and apostolic traditions and upon the fellowship of all the Catholic churches which are in the world, in which through God’s grace we trust and hope to remain even to the end.”

When this our little book, having been offered, was read, they could by no means endure the light of truth with blind eyes; raging, they raised cries and bore it grievously that we had called ourselves Catholics by our own name.

They immediately lied and represented to the king concerning us that we had made an uproar and fled the hearing.

He, kindled at that same hour and believing the lie, hastened to do what he wished.

Already having a written decree, and secretly directing his men with the decree through the diverse provinces, on one day he closed the churches of all Africa while the bishops were stationed at Carthage, and granted as a gift to his bishops, namely the Arians, all the substance of the bishops and churches.

Knowing neither what he said nor concerning whom he affirmed it, they were not ashamed to set against us the law which our Christian emperors had given against them and against other heretics for the honor of the Catholic Church, adding many things of their own as pleased the tyrannical power.

Afterward, when these death-bearing edicts had been transfused with poisonous venom, he commanded all the bishops who were assembled at Carthage—whose churches, substance, and houses he had already seized—to be despoiled in their lodgings and, after being despoiled, driven outside the walls.

No animal, no servant, and no change of the clothing they bore was permitted them at all.

He added that no one should receive any of them in lodging or furnish sustenance; whoever attempted this for the sake of mercy was to be burned with his entire house.

The expelled bishops then acted wisely: although begging, they did not depart from there, because if they withdrew, they would not only be recalled entirely by force, but their enemies would also lie, as they did, that the bishops had fled the conflict; especially because, when they might be brought back, the Church’s substance no longer existed, its houses having been occupied.

Therefore, while they lay groaning around the walls beneath the open sky, it happened that the impious king went out to the fishponds.

They all preferred to meet him, saying: “Why are we afflicted in this manner? For what evils perhaps committed do we suffer these things? If we were assembled for a disputation, why have we been despoiled? Why are we led about? Why are we carried away, and, without our churches and houses, labor outside the city with hunger and nakedness, rolling amid dung?”

Looking upon them with savage eyes, before he heard their representation, he commanded horses with riders to be let loose upon them, so that by such violence they might not only be crushed but even killed.

Many of them were then crushed, especially the old men.

Section VII

Then those men of God were commanded to assemble at a certain place called the House of Memory, not knowing the fraud prepared for them.

When they arrived, a rolled document was shown to them, and with the cunning of the serpent it was said to them: “Our lord Huneric, although he grieves that you have been despisers, nevertheless, so that you may not delay to obey his will and become of his religion, has now thought good concerning you. If you swear to do what this document contains, he will restore you to your churches and houses.”

All the bishops answered: “We always say, have said, and shall say: we are Christians; we are bishops; we hold the one and true apostolic faith.”

Those sent by the king hastened also to disclose to them the tenor of the writing, which had been colored with these words.

For the calumnious sequence contained this: “Swear whether, after the death of our lord the king, you desire his son Hilderic to be king, and whether none of you will direct letters to the regions overseas. If you give an oath concerning this matter, he will restore you to your churches.”

The pious simplicity of many then thought to give the oath contrary to the divine prohibition, lest afterward God’s people say that through the fault of the priests who refused to swear, the churches had not been restored.

Other, more astute bishops, perceiving the deceit of the fraud, were by no means willing to swear, saying that this was forbidden by evangelical authority when the Lord said: “You shall not swear at all.”

The king’s ministers said to them: “Let those who determine to swear withdraw to one side.”

As they withdrew, the notaries wrote what each said and from what city he was.

It was done similarly with those who did not swear.

Immediately each party was consigned to custody.

Afterward the fraud which had been concealed appeared.

For it was said to those who had sworn: “Because you wished to swear contrary to the evangelical command, the king has commanded that you shall never see your cities and churches, but, banished, you shall take the journey to the colonies to cultivate the land [read: you shall be assigned under the law of the colonate to cultivate fields], on condition that you neither sing psalms nor pray nor carry a codex in your hands for reading. You shall not baptize, ordain, or presume to reconcile anyone.”

Likewise he said to those who did not swear: “Because you do not desire the kingdom of the son of our lord, you refused to swear. For this cause you have been commanded to be banished to the island of Corriscaria [read: Corsica], so that you may cut timber useful for the lord’s ships.”

That beast, thirsting for the blood of the innocent, added that, before the bishops had yet been directed into exile, most cruel torturers should be sent at one time throughout all the provinces of Africa, so that no house or place remained in which there had not been wailing, and no age and no sex was spared except those who submitted to their will.

Some they beat with cudgels; others they burned by suspension.

They tortured women, especially noble women, entirely naked in public view contrary to the laws of nature.

Of these I shall name briefly and in passing one of ours, Dionysia.

When the barbarians saw that she was not only bold but also more beautiful than the others, they first attempted to subject her, stripped of her clothing, to the cudgels.

When she suffered and said, “I am secure concerning God; torture me in whatever manner you please, yet do not uncover the modest members,” raging still more, they stripped her of her garments and placed her in a higher place, making her a spectacle to all.

While under the blows of the rods streams of blood now flowed over her whole body, she said with a free voice: “Ministers of the devil, what you reckon that you do for my reproach is itself my praise.”

Because she was filled with the divine Scriptures, constrained by the punishments prepared for her and thus already a martyr, she strengthened others for martyrdom.

By her holy example she liberated nearly her whole fatherland.

When she saw that her only son Majoricus, still of exceedingly tender age and delicate, was fearful through dread of the punishments, striking him with signals of her eyes and rebuking him by maternal authority, she so strengthened him that he was rendered stronger than his mother.

She said: “Remember, my son, that in the name of the Trinity we were baptized in our Catholic mother. Let us not lose the garment of our salvation, lest the one inviting us come, not find the wedding garment, and say to the ministers, ‘Cast him into the outer darkness.’ That punishment must be feared which is never ended; that life must be desired which is always possessed.”

Therefore, establishing her son with such words, she speedily made him a martyr.

Embracing her victim and giving thanks to the Lord with her voice as much as she could, she preferred to bury him in her own house unto the joy of future hope, so that whenever she poured out prayers to the Trinity over his tomb, she might consider herself never alien from her son.

But who is able to relate in order how much Dionysia's sister, named Dativa, and Leontia, daughter of Saint Germanus the bishop, and Emelius, a venerable physician and kinsman of Dativa, and also Tertius, a religious man illustrious in his confession of the Trinity, or Boniface, the Sibidensian bishop, suffered, and by what torments they were disemboweled?

Section VIII

I am not able to report the things done in the city of Culusi, because it is impossible to reckon even the quantity of martyrs or confessors there.

There a certain matron, Victoria, the author of her own name, while she was burned by continual suspension in the sight of the people, was entreated in this manner by her husband, who had already been lost, with her children present:

"Why do you suffer, wife? If you despise me, at least take pity upon these whom you have borne. Impious woman, why do you forget the little children of your womb and reckon as nothing those whom you bore with groaning? Where are the covenants of conjugal love? Where are the bonds of fellowship which were long ago written between us in tablets by the law of honor? Look, I beg you, upon your sons and husband, and hasten to fulfill the command of the royal order, so that you may gain freedom from the torments still threatening, and at the same time may be given back to me and our children."

But she, hearing neither the weeping of her children nor the blandishments of the serpent, raised the affection of her eyes higher from the earth [read: raised her affection much higher above the earth] and despised the world with its desires.

When, through continual suspension, her shoulders had now been torn away and even those who tortured her thought her dead, they took her down. "At all times she was entirely sound." [read: they took her down entirely lifeless in every part]

She afterward related that a certain virgin had stood beside her and touched each of her limbs, and that she had immediately been healed.

But how shall I proclaim Victorian, a citizen of the city of Ad Rumitana [read: Hadrumetum] and then proconsul of Carthage, since words fail me?

No one in the regions of Africa was wealthier than he.

He was also held exceedingly faithful before the impious king concerning the affairs always committed to him.

It was communicated to him familiarly by the king, and it was said that he would hold him dear above everyone if he readily lent assent to his command.

But that man of God gave with great confidence this answer to those sent to him: "I am secure concerning Christ, my God and Lord. Tell these things also to the king. Let him raise me upon fires; let him drive me to beasts; let him torture me with every kind of torment. If I consent, I was baptized in the Church in vain. For if this present life were the only one and we did not hope for the other, which is true and eternal, I still would not have acted so as to glory temporally for a little while and exist ungrateful to the Creator who conferred his faith upon me."

Provoked by this, the tyrant afflicted him with so many torments and such punishments that human speech will not be able to explain them.

Exulting and happily consummating his course, he received the martyrial crown.

Who could explain the contests of the martyrs performed at the city of Tabada?

There two brothers, secure concerning the Lord, swore to one another that they would ask the torturers to be tormented with one punishment and an equal torment.

While during the first suspension they hung for a whole day with masses of stones tied to their feet, one of them asked to be taken down and given a respite.

His other brother, fearing that he might deny the faith, cried out from the suspension: "Do not, do not, brother! We did not swear thus to Christ. I shall accuse you when we come before his terrible throne, because upon his body and blood we swore that we would suffer for him together."

Saying these and other things, he strengthened his brother for the battle of suffering.

The brother, crying out with a great voice, said: "Add whatever torments you wish, and constrain Christians with cruel punishments. What my brother will do, I also will do."

How many heated plates burned them, how each was furrowed [read: with what claws each was furrowed], and by what torments they were twisted, the event itself teaches.

Their teachers [read: Their torturers] themselves cast them from their sight, saying: “The whole people imitates these men, so that no one is converted at all to our religion,” especially because no bruises and no traces of punishments were visible upon them at all.

I hasten to tell to God’s praise what was done in the city of Tracena [read: Tipasa] in Greater Mauretania.

When they saw an Arian bishop, formerly one of Cyril’s notaries, ordained for their city to destroy souls, almost the whole city fled with a strong departure [read: by naval transport] to nearby Spain, leaving very few who had found no means of sailing.

The Arian bishop began to compel these first by blandishments and afterward by threats, so that he might make them Arians.

But, strong in the Lord, they not only mocked the madness of the one persuading them, but even were found publicly celebrating the divine mysteries, assembled in one house.

When he learned this, he secretly directed a report against them to Carthage.

When this became known to the king, he sent a certain count in anger and commanded that, with the whole province assembled there in the middle of the forum, he cut off their tongues and right hands to the roots.

But by the power of the Holy Spirit they so spoke, and still speak, with their tongues cut off just as they did before.

If anyone wishes to be unbelieving, let him now go to Constantinople and he will find one of them, the subdeacon Reparatus.

For this cause he is held exceedingly venerable in the palace of Emperor Zeno, and especially is venerated with great reverence by the empress.

But who could attain or heap together in fitting speech the diversity of punishments which, by command of their king, the Vandals exercised even against their own men?

At Carthage the matter displayed today in public shows it: you may see some without hands, others without eyes, others without feet, some mutilated in the ears, and others whose shoulders were torn away by excessive suspension, so that the head which was accustomed to project was sunk into the middle of the shoulder blades.

When the ropes broke, some who had been suspended high fell with a mighty blow from that height of suspension; many lost the crown of the brain together with the eyes; some immediately breathed out their spirit when their bones had been broken, others a little afterward.

These things were done in the presence of the legate of Emperor Zeno, who, coming to Carthage, boasted that he had come for the defense of the Catholic churches, so that the tyrant might show him that he feared no one, and for the reproach of the republic itself.

Then also, when Saint Eugenius, pastor of Carthage, had already been placed in exile, nearly five hundred or more of the whole clergy of the church of Carthage, worn by slaughter and media [read: slaughter and hunger], among whom were very many little boy lectors rejoicing in the Lord, were delivered far away to cruel exile.

Section IX

Therefore all the fathers, cheerful amid beatings upon their backs [read: Therefore all, preparing their backs for blows, cheerful], proceeded into exile.

While they were still established upon the journey of the longer road, merciless and violent men of the Arian bishops were sent, suggesting that whatever Christian compassion had perhaps contributed for their future sustenance be cruelly taken away.

Then each one of them perhaps sang more gladly: “Naked I came out of my mother’s womb; naked I must also proceed into exile, because the Lord knows how to extend food to the hungry.”

Two Vandals who had repeatedly been confessors under Gaiseric, accompanied by their mother and despising all their riches, also proceeded into exile with those clerics.

Concerning the multitude of confessors proceeding, that is, the clerics of the church of Carthage, at the representation of a certain apostate lector named Teucharius, who knew which of them were vocal, strenuous, and suited to the measures of song, it is said that twelve little boys ought to be separated by his designation.

When he was then a Catholic, he had had them as pupils.

Immediately, upon his representation, they were released in haste [read: couriers were dispatched in haste], and by the violence of barbarian fury the twice-six number of boys was called back from the journey.

They were separated in body, not in spirit, from the flock of the saints.

Fearing the precipice and unwilling to be torn away, with tearful sighs they clasped the knees of their companions; nevertheless heretical violence, separating them with threatening swords, recalled them to Carthage.

But when blandishments were not used with them as if with persons of such an age, they were found superior even to their own years; and lest they sleep in death, they kindled the lamp of evangelical light.

The Arians were grievously indignant at this and were ashamed that they had been overcome by boys.

Hence, inflamed, they commanded them again to be subjected to cudgels, though only a very few days before they had torn them apart with various beatings.

Wounds were impressed upon wounds, and the restored wounds grew raw again.

But with the Lord strengthening them, it came about that neither did their younger age fail in pain, and their strengthened spirit grew all the more in faith.

Carthage now honors them with marvelous affection and regards the company of boys as, so to speak, a twelfth choir of apostles [read: a choir of twelve apostles].

They dwell together, eat together, sing psalms together, and glory together in the Lord.

In those days two merchants also were crowned with outstanding martyrdom.

At that time, moreover, the bishops, priests, and clerics of the Arians raged more cruelly than the king and Vandals.

For a certain bishop among them, named Antonius, more cruel than the others, exercised such unspeakable and incredible things against our people that they cannot be narrated.

He was in a certain city near the desert, neighboring the province of Tripolitana; like an insatiable beast thirsting for the blood of Catholics, he ran roaring here and there to seize them.

For the impious Huneric, knowing the cruelty of Antonius, wished Eugenius to be exiled in those parts of the desert.

When Antonius received him to be guarded, he enclosed him in such strict custody that he permitted no one to enter to him.

Moreover, he planned to destroy him by various torments of snares and punishments.

But while Saint Eugenius lamented the harms of the persecution, wore down his aged body with the roughness of haircloth, lay naked upon the earth, and watered his bed of sackcloth with showers of tears, at some point he felt the hostile disease of paralysis.

When this report was turned into joy for the Arian, he hastened to the bed of exile of the man of God.

Seeing that the true pontiff, under the constraint of suffering, uttered words with stammering, he planned at the same time to destroy the one whom he did not wish to survive.

He commanded exceedingly harsh and very sharp vinegar to be sought.

When it had been brought, he poured it into the unwilling and resisting throat of the venerable old man.

After it had been received, especially harmful to that suffering, the disease increased.

Christ's mercy, mercifully assisting him, afterward furnished health.

When the aforesaid Antonius likewise afflicted another of our bishops, banished to the city of Luna, with diverse persecutions and could not make him an Arian, and saw Christ's soldier always constant in confession, he constrained the bishop with immense chains bound to his hands and feet.

With his mouth stopped lest his tongue cry out, he sprinkled upon his body the water of supposed rebaptism, as if he could bind conscience together with the body, or as if the one who hears the groans of those in fetters and searches the secrets of the heart were not present, or deceitful water could overcome the purpose of so great a will, which the man had already sent bound into heaven by pouring forth tears [read: sent as an embassy to heaven by pouring forth tears].

He immediately released the man from his bonds and followed him with a voice as if rejoicing: "Our brother Abdiner has become a Christian of our church."

Abdiner answered him: "That is the condemnation of your shameful death, Antonius, where the consent of the will is held. Tenacious of my faith, by frequent utterances confessing what I believe and have believed, I defended it by crying out. But afterward, when you bound me with chains and blocked the door of my mouth, in the praetorium of my heart, with the angels subscribing to the violence, I drew up the record of the acts and sent it to my Emperor to be read repeatedly."

This violence of the tyrants was general.

For the Vandals had been sent everywhere for this purpose: that, while traveling upon the roads, they should lead persons to their priests to be slaughtered.

It was not lawful for private persons or merchants to travel anywhere, sell anything, or buy anything unless they had the character of the beast upon their forehead or hand.

Their bishops and priests, with a band of armed men, went around villages or towns at night.

After breaking the posts of doors, carrying water and a sword, these robbers of souls entered; and those whom they found at home, some perhaps asleep in their beds, sprinkling with a fiery shower and river [read: a fiery and lightning-like shower], with demoniacal shouting they called their own Christians, displaying rather the game of their heresy than any religion.

In this the less capable and slothful imputed to themselves the sacrilege of pollution fulfilled upon them.

The more prudent rejoiced that nothing inflicted upon them while unwilling and asleep harmed them.

With us seeing it, by such violence at Carthage the son of a certain nobleman, about seven years old, was separated from his parents by command of Cyril.

Without shame, while his matronly mother with loosened hair ran after the abductors through the whole city, he cried as loudly as he could, "I am a Christian; I am a Christian"; they stopped even his mouth and plunged the innocent soul into their whirlpool.

Section X

It is proved that the same was done concerning the children of the venerable physician Liberatus.

For by command of the king he was ordered to be sent into exile with his wife and children.

Arian impiety devised that the little children be separated from their parents and, through the affection of piety, overthrow the parents' virtue.

The tender pledges of the children were separated from their parents.

When Liberatus wished to pour forth tears, rebuked by the authority of his wife, the tears immediately dried in the very passage of their exit.

For his wife said to him: "Liberatus, will you lose your soul on account of your children? Reckon them not to have been born, for Christ will avenge them also. Do you not see them crying out and saying, 'We are Christians'?"

But what this woman did in the sight of the judges must not be concealed.

For although she and her husband were held separately in prison custody so that they did not see one another at all, it was reported to the woman and said to her: "Now dissolve your hardness. Behold, your husband has obeyed the king's command and has become our Christian."

She answered: "Let me see him; I shall do what God wills."

Led out of prison, she found her husband standing with an immense multitude, bent before the tribunal [read: bound before the tribunals].

Thinking true what the enemies had feigned, putting forth her hand she seized his garments nearest his throat and, with all seeing, choked him, saying: "Lost and reprobate man, unworthy of the grace of God and his mercy, why did you wish to glory for a little while and perish eternally? What will gold profit you? What silver? Will they deliver you from the furnace of Gehenna?"

She said many other things.

Her husband said to her: "What do you suffer, woman? What seems so to you? Or what perhaps have you been able to hear concerning me? I remain a Catholic in the name of Christ, nor shall I ever be able to lose what I hold."

Then the heretics, conscious of their lie, were by no means able to color their exposed deceit.

And because we spoke briefly above concerning the violence of their savagery, very many men or women, fearing it, shut themselves up—some in caves, others in desert places—with no one aware of them.

There, with no sustenance of food coming to their aid, overcome by hunger or cold, they breathed out a contrite and afflicted spirit amid these harms of affliction, carrying inviolate with themselves the security of the faith.

Section XI

A season of incredible famine occurred and began to lay waste all Africa with one devastation.

No rain was then present; the whole face of the earth remained sallow, because neither were oxen at hand, nor did any settlements remain at all.

One part of the hands of the country people had perished, and continually whatever perhaps survived was already seeking burial.

Some were scattered through the fields; others sought the hidden places of the woods, searching for ancient roots of herbs or some refuse.

Some, while attempting to enter houses, fell at the very threshold; with hunger overcoming them, they fell in companies.

The roads and paths, filled with corpses, killed the living travelers on every side with the stench of the dead breathing their last.

Funerals of those expiring were not lacking anywhere on any day, and there was no strength that might bestow burial as an act of mercy.

For the living did not suffice for burying while hunger dominated, since they themselves were to die a little afterward.

The unhappy multitude pressed to be gathered at the city of Carthage itself.

While animated corpses still flowed there in companies, when the king saw the piles of the dead to be carried in [read: the devastation of impending deaths], he immediately commanded all to be driven from the city, lest the common contagion of those failing prepare a tomb even for his own retinue.

At length this most wicked tyrant Huneric, struck by God's judgment, swarming with worms, expired miserably.

After him Gunthamund reigned for nine years, and he recalled Bishop Eugenius from exile.

Section XII

But before the reign of that most wicked Huneric, of whom it has been said, Valentinian, emperor at the Roman city and the third of this name, was killed by Trasila, a certain soldier of Aetius, whom Valentinian himself had commanded to be killed through envy, fearing that perhaps Aetius, since he was most experienced in war and famous through many victories, might take the empire from him.

A certain nobleman named Maximus seized the empire at Rome, and before two months had been completed he was killed by the Romans.

In order to confirm the empire for himself, this Maximus seized by force Eudoxia, Valentinian's widow, and joined her, though resisting, to himself in marriage.

Indignant at marriage to the tyrant, she sent a messenger to Gaiseric, king of the Vandals in Africa, asking that, coming to Italy and to the city itself with an army, he rescue her from the power of the tyrant Maximus.

Rejoicing at this message, Gaiseric crossed to Italy by ship with a very powerful army of his men.

At that time Pope Leo still held the pontificate at Rome.

Therefore the Romans, struck by so terrible a report, since they despaired of being able to meet the arriving barbarians in war, especially since certain nobles favored Gaiseric, abandoned the city and hid themselves among the surrounding mountains and woods.

Gaiseric, arriving and finding the city empty of every garrison, entered it.

But "of the kindly pontiff, who so softened the king," [read: the kindly pontiff's entreaty, by God's action, so softened him] so that, although everything had been handed over to his power, he abstained from fire, slaughter, and punishments.

Therefore, during fourteen days, by an unhindered and free search, Rome was despoiled and emptied of all its wealth.

Many thousands of captives, according as each one's age, skill, or beauty pleased him, were led to Carthage with Eudoxia, who was the cause of so many evils.

Rome was captured by Gaiseric, king of the Vandals, in the forty-fourth year after Alaric, king of the Goths, captured and plundered it, but 1,208 years after its foundation.

The barbarians, abandoning the city and pouring themselves through Campania, plundered everything like a whirlwind.

By them Capua, most noble of cities, was reduced even to the ground.

Only the city of Naples, fortified by the strength of its walls and the robustness of its citizens, escaped that fury and insatiable avarice.

After Gaiseric had been enriched by the wealth of Italy, he returned to Africa.

He joined in marriage to his son Transimundus [i.e., Huneric] the daughter of Emperor Valentinian, whom he had led away with her mother.

From her Hilderic was afterward born, who in the course of time ruled the Vandals in Africa in the fourth place after Gaiseric.

But when the Romans learned that Gaiseric had departed from the boundaries of Italy, emptied and like dying sheep, they set a certain Avitus over the republic; Emperor Marcian also composed a treaty with him.

This Avitus ruled in Italy for four years.

While he was emperor, the Visigoths with their king Thorismund, who had occupied the greater part of Gaul, crossed the Pyrenees and invaded Spain.

They plundered many cities and despoiled them after they had been plundered, and, laden with spoils, returned to their own lands.

Since the aforesaid Vandals and their princes had been infected with the Arian heresy, as was said above, and since it was also spreading within Gaul to its destruction, as Sigebert, Vincent, and John de Columna [i.e., John of Colonna] report, such a miracle was shown.

For when the city of Nasata [read: Vasata] had been freed from the siege of the Huns through divine aid, and the bishop was celebrating Mass for the people in thanksgiving, looking upward he saw above the altar, as if from the vault of the temple, three drops of equal size, brighter than crystal, fall equally.

Flowing together and joined into one, they formed, as it were, one most beautiful gem.

When they placed it in the middle of a golden and jeweled cross, the other gems fell out.

Placed separately, however, it gave health to the sick; and among those adoring the image of the holy cross it increased devotion, because it appeared clear to the pious and clean, but obscure to the impious and unclean.

Therefore by this prodigy the Lord, who corrects those who err, declared to all that the Son was not less than the Father, nor the Holy Spirit inferior to both, as the perfidious Arians prattle, but that one God in three persons is of one and equal substance, and that divinity ought not to be treated by the unworthy.

Title XI, Chapter XI

Concerning teachers outstanding in learning and sanctity, who also wrote many works and flourished in the time of the aforesaid emperors of this title.

Blessed Prosper, a very learned man of the region of Aquitaine and notary of the aforesaid Pope Leo, flourished in the times of the emperor Leo and of Pope Leo I. Concerning him Gennadius speaks as follows in his book On Illustrious Men: “Prosper, of the region of Aquitaine, scholastic in discourse and vigorous in his assertions, is said to have composed many works. Among them I have read a chronicle inscribed with his name, containing the period from the creation of the first man, according to the faith of the divine Scriptures, down to the death of Valentinian and the capture of the city of Rome effected by Gaiseric, king of the Vandals, and down to the time of this emperor Leo, in which Prosper also died. I have also read his book against the little works of Cassian, which the Church of God approves as salutary, but which Prosper nevertheless defames as harmful. For, in truth, the opinions of Cassian and Prosper concerning the grace of God and free choice appear contrary in some things.” The letters of Pope Leo against Eutyches, given to various persons concerning the true incarnation of Christ, are believed to have been dictated by Prosper himself.

Nevertheless, in the Decretals the little works of Prosper, a most religious man, are approved, in Distinction XV, The Holy Roman Church.

Among other things he wrote two books. One of them is entitled Of Sentences, or Epigrams. This book is partly in prose and partly in verse, and in certain places it is read in schools by masters of grammar. His other book, addressed to Julian, is entitled On the Contemplative Life and contains three books. Each was drawn in concise form from the sayings of Augustine. A few passages from them are inserted here.

I. Verses from the Book of Sentences

Whoever schemes to harm another first strikes himself with his own dart.

Whoever does not scorn the honor proper to human nature, love in every human being those things which you recognize as your own—yet in such a manner that concord avoids depraved morals, and that there be no alliances with any vices, even among a few [read: and that there be no treaties of peace with vices].

Behold, God the Creator alone is truly eternal. Life living in himself, he remains that which he is. A power prior to things past and later than things future [read: A power prior to things past and beyond things future], he receives nothing variable and has nothing that falls away.

The patience of the highest King long defers many things, holding in suspense the weights of an equitable judgment. Hearts are sometimes healed by a fatherly scourge, and the physician heals wounds by means of wounds.

True praise of the Lord is brought forth from the mouth of one praying if the things that flow in the voice possess the inward places of the heart. It does not profit anyone to speak good things in words alone unless a devout mind possesses that which the tongue sounds well. For it is wretched to speak rightly and to live wickedly: the rule of justice condemns the petitions of the wicked [read: the rule of justice condemns known evil].

Even in this life repose is given to many saints whose minds the falling world does not hold, whom no desires for perishable things weary, and for whom Christ is every good and every honor.

Called to the heavenly homeland through Christ’s redemption, the pilgrim passes the life of fleeting time. And while he strives through things not his own toward the promised rest, he suffers many dangers of the worldly road. That road, now beset with adversities and now filled with favorable things, either breaks the fearful or binds the wavering. Amid these snares, one who runs toward true joys is not caught by treacheries if Christ is his way.

The mind will be able to restrain no motions of the flesh unless it has always been capable of loving Christ. God is to be worshiped with this devotion of desire, so that God himself may be the entire reward of justice.

To blame in anyone things that are not known is malicious; for, if any things are known, they are good [read: To blame in anyone things that are not known is malicious, especially if the things known are good]. Let ears not lie open readily to savage rumors. Let it not please one to believe things that it is profitable not to know.

It is not enough to unfold the Lord’s precepts with the tongue. He remembers the law who is a doer of the work.

Those at rest can search both Laws if hearts lie free from the tumult of the world. The inner chambers of the Lord's teaching are, in this time, fully accessible to no human being. For there always remains something by which the saints may be able to grow, and the glory of the perfect is a beginning.

In the holy, the concord of peace is beautiful in their conduct. The impious part of the world is hostile to the portion of the devout.

The eternal joys of life will always be what they were, because God himself will be the cause of rejoicing. Nor will a diverse will produce varying movements: in all there will be one light and one love. And happy experience, placed among the highest goods, will neither wish to be increased nor fear to be diminished.

He who rejoices that he uses sins prosperously is exceedingly unhappy in his prosperity. For no one is innocent merely from fear of punishment if he does not love holy and just rule.

All things profit the good, whom death itself makes blessed, so that they may receive the rewards of princes.

An unharmed mind loses nothing when the body is violated. Wounds of the flesh do not stain a will that is unwilling, nor does an unwilling will receive the guilt of the deed. A servile yoke does not weigh down liberated hearts [read: A servile yoke does not weigh down free hearts].

The sinner alone serves evil, although he may use a spacious kingdom; nevertheless, he is a wretched servant. When the mind is under the excessive dominion of a fleshly tyrant, it is subjected to as many scepters as there are vices.

Wishing to know in which part of things you are to be placed, examine what you fear and what it is that you love. For all movements arise from a twofold kindling, and the offspring correspond to their own beginnings.

Behold, the Maker is shown by wondrous signs of his works, and all created things sing of their Maker.

What profit is there in drawing out the causes of disease at length? Why does today's health await an uncertain tomorrow? We know that pardon is not to be denied to those who have been corrected, but the last day is known to none of us.

When the wrath of the Mighty One flows because of the deserts of sin, enclosing all things, it confines the guilty person on every side. God himself, the living God, is a safe refuge for one who fears [read: God himself is the one safe refuge for one who fears]: let him who departs from God return to him, lest he perish.

Untouched and modest virginity is preserved in the body; the virginity of the soul is uncorrupted faith.

Behold, you wish to rejoice and desire to know hidden things. Seek the highest things, so that the lowest may not hold you. When, devout mind, you labor overcome in the praise of God, rejoice that so great a work vanquishes you well. Seek the good without end in the Good [read: Seek the Good without end], and persist when it has been found. Seek; let such vows have no limit. For he who believes that he now needs no gift, not desiring to grow, loses in tepidity the things he has acquired.

Exult, recognizing yourself reborn in the flesh of the Word. If you are a part of him, Christ will be your portion. He made himself the road for you to the promised kingdom—that God, the creator of the things of heaven and earth. For your sake he was born a man from the sacred Virgin [read: the God who created the world, heaven, and earth was born a man from the sacred Virgin for me]. He offered his back to lashes, his cheeks to blows, and his face to spittle, and did not refuse to be fastened upon the cross. Dying, he bore me; rising when death had been conquered, he bore me with himself above the stars to the Father.

What, then, should I refuse to endure for so great a hope? Or what will there be that separates me from the Lord? Apply fire; Terror, search my entrails with your hand [read: Apply fire; Torturer, search my entrails with your hand]: my loosened limbs will escape your punishments. If I am enclosed in a blind prison and bound with chains, free in an ecstasy of mind I shall approach God. If the executioner prepares to sever my neck with the sword, swift death will find short life unafraid [read: swift death and brief punishment will find me unafraid]. I do not fear exile: the world is one home for all. I scorn hunger: let the word of the Lord be food for me. Nor shall I marvel at riches; I shall pursue no honors. Yet this confidence does not rise in me from myself. You, Christ, grant me to speak; may you also grant me to suffer." These are his words.

II. Prosper's Sentences in Prose

Human beings are to be loved in such a way that their errors are not loved, because it is one thing to love that which they were made, and another to hate that which they do.

None of God's works is without mercy, since he takes counsel for a human being both by indulgence and by a scourge.

He who worships God in order that he may merit something other than God does not worship God, but that which he desires to obtain.

That death which a good life has preceded is not to be thought evil.

God is thought more truly than he is spoken, and he exists more truly than he is thought. Yet it is no small part of knowledge if, before we are able to know what he is, we are able to know what he is not.

The depths of the mysteries in the Holy Scriptures are good: for this reason they are covered, lest they become cheap; for this reason they are sought, that they may exercise us; for this reason they are opened, that they may feed us.

Conversion to him must not be deferred. For he who promised indulgence to one doing penance did not promise tomorrow's day.

All things that are feared are reasonably avoided; but God is to be feared in such a way that one flees from him to him.

From Augustine, in the Book of Prosper's Sentences, in On Consecration, Distinction II: "This is what we say, which we strive in every way to prove: that the sacrifice of the Church is effected by two things and consists of two things—the visible appearance of the elements and the invisible flesh and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ; the sacrament and the reality of the sacrament, that is, the body of Christ—just as the person of Christ consists of and is constituted from God and man, since Christ himself is true God and true man."

Likewise in the Book of Prosper's Sentences, in the same distinction: "Christ was sacrificed once in himself, and yet he is sacrificed daily in the sacrament, namely representatively." Prosper says that this is to be understood thus: that in the manifestation of his body and the distinction of all his members, true God and true man hung upon the cross only once, offering himself to the Father as a living victim—capable of suffering and mortal—efficacious for the redemption of the living and the dead: namely, of those whom the height of the divine counsel judged, foreknew, predestined, and called to be redeemed, in the modes and at the times in which it was fitting for this to be done. These are his words.

Prosper, in the book On the Contemplative Life—and it is contained in Cause XII, Question I—says: "It is expedient that the resources of the Church be possessed, and that personal resources be despised for love of perfection. For the resources of the Church are not personal but common. And therefore, whoever becomes a despiser of his own property after all the things he possessed have been relinquished or sold, when he has been made a prelate of a church, becomes the steward of all the things the Church possesses. Thus Saint Paulinus sold the immense estates that had been his own and distributed them to the poor; but when he had been made a bishop he did not despise the resources of the Church, but administered them most faithfully. By this deed it is sufficiently shown both that one's own possessions ought to be despised for the sake of perfection and that, without an impediment to perfection, the resources of the Church—which are assuredly common—can be possessed.

"What did Saint Hilary do? Did he not either leave all his possessions to his parents or sell them and distribute them to the poor? Yet when, through the merit of his perfection, he became bishop of Arles, he not only possessed the things that the Church then had, but also enlarged them by accepting numerous inheritances from the faithful. Therefore, if men most learned without ambiguity in both secular and divine letters had known that the possessions of the Church ought to be despised, those who had left everything ought never to have received them." These are his words.

The same author in the same work, also in On Penance, Distinction I: "Moreover, those whose sins lie hidden from human knowledge, neither confessed by themselves nor made public by others, if they are unwilling to confess or amend them, will have as avenger that very God whom they have as witness. And what does it profit them to escape human judgment when, if they remain in evil, they will go into eternal punishment as God repays them?"

The same author, concerning prelates: "The one to whom the dispensation of the word has been entrusted, if he lives holily and yet is either ashamed or afraid to reprove those living ruinously, perishes with all who perish while he is silent. And what will it profit him not to be punished for his own fault when he is to be punished for another's? I lie if the Lord does not say this through Ezekiel, speaking: 'I have appointed you a watchman for the house of Israel,' and so forth.

"We wish to be called shepherds, yet we do not strive to be shepherds. We avoid the labor of our office; we seek the dignity. When we behold rich or powerful persons sinning, not only do we not reprove them, but we even venerate them, lest, when offended, they either cease to send us their customary gifts or withdraw the services we desire.

"And so, remembering either my lack of skill or my end, I groaned and wished, after the burden of my episcopate had been laid down, to flee far away and remain in solitude, and there to await God, who would save me from faintness of spirit and from the tempest."

III. On Charity and the Order of Loving

The same Prosper, in the book On the Contemplative Life, speaks as follows concerning charity and the order of loving: "Therefore, if we show charity to God and to our neighbor, we shall easily resist sin, abound in good works, despise the enticements of the age, and accomplish with love all things that are difficult or harsh for human frailty—provided that we love God with the perfect charity which is ours from him, from the whole heart, from the whole soul, and from all our strength. For each person sins from that part from which he loves God less. But if we love him from the whole heart, there will be nothing in us from which we may serve the desires of sin.

"And what is it to love God, unless it is for the soul to be occupied with him, to conceive a longing for the enjoyment of his vision, a hatred of sin, and a loathing of the world? It is also to love the neighbor, whom God determined should be loved as oneself; to preserve the lawful measure in that very love; and not to overturn the established order of affection.

"We love our neighbors as ourselves if we love all of them not because of any advantages of our own, not because of benefits hoped for or received, and not because of affinities or blood relationships, but for this alone: that they are participants in our nature. Accordingly, we love all our neighbors as ourselves when we counsel them toward good conduct and toward obtaining eternal life, and take thought for their salvation just as for our own; when we think of ourselves amid their sins and dangers; and when, just as we would wish aid to be given to us, so we give aid to them—or, if the means is lacking, retain the will to give aid.

"But because our body is a part of us, it is to be loved by us for this end: that we naturally take counsel for its health and frailty and act so far as it, being subjected to the spirit in due order, may come to eternal salvation after receiving immortality and incorruption.

"Those overturn the order of loving—even though it is said in the Song of Songs, 'God ordered charity in me'—who also do not preserve the measure of loving: either they love the world, which is to be despised; or they love their bodies, which are to be loved less, more than they ought; or they do not love their neighbors as themselves; or perhaps they do not love God more than themselves.

"But those love God more than themselves who, for love of him, do not spare their own temporal welfare, who hand themselves over to tribulations and dangers, who are prepared to be stripped of their own resources, to become exiles from their homeland, and to renounce parents, wives, and children; and, to say the whole, who not only do not flee the very death of the body, but willingly receive it, desiring rather to depart from the life of their body than from God, the life of their life.

"This is true and perfect charity, which the Apostle calls the more excellent way. For just as no one arrives where he is tending without a way, so without charity, which is called the way, human beings cannot walk, but can only wander." These are his words, in On Penance, Distinction I, near the beginning.

The same author in the same work: "The treatment of questions, even if it does not instruct the mind of the one finding that which it seeks, nevertheless exercises the understanding of the one seeking. Just as knowledge without the gift of charity puffs up, so, if charity is mingled with it, it builds up.

"Let the ecclesiastical teacher labor especially for this: that those who hear him may be made better by sound disputations. Let him first shed the tears which he wishes to be shed by his hearers, and thus kindle them by the compunction of his own heart.

"The discourse of a bishop ought to be so simple and suitable—even if less polished in Latin—yet disciplined and grave, that it excludes no one, however unlearned, from understanding it, but descends into the breast of all who hear it with a certain delight.

"There are those who, by a depraved examination, assess not the reason of the things said but the dignity of those saying them, and attend more to who says something than to what they say, although truth, from wherever it shines forth, is to be ascribed not to human ingenuity but to God.

"Thus dissimilar remedies are to be applied to sins, just as the sins themselves come from dissimilar causes. 'Reprove,' says the Apostle, 'entreat, rebuke, with all patience and teaching.' Reprove equals; entreat elders; rebuke juniors—with all patience and teaching. For one chastised gently shows reverence to the one chastising; but, offended by the excessive harshness of the one rebuking him, he receives neither the rebuke nor salvation. Indeed, persons of this kind, weighed down by a mass of sorrow, succumb and flee the faces of all the saints through whom they might be restored to God; or else, exasperated, they rush forward into shamelessness in every kind of sinning.

"As long as someone is ignorant of his own sins, which he ought to recognize and lament, so long does he consider those of others.

"It is not impossibility that makes the things we are unwilling to observe difficult, but the will. Let them come into customary practice, and they trouble no one.

“Those are the riches to be sought by us which can both adorn and fortify us, which we cannot acquire unwillingly nor lose: these are the riches of virtues and the resources of the poor.

“The loss of a temporal good becomes an exercise for the just and a punishment for the unjust. For the just person, seized by desire for heavenly things, does not feel temporal things at all, whether he possesses them or loses them; and the unjust person does not lose without pain that which he possessed with delight.

“O unheard-of crime! The sweet yoke of Christ having been despised, we receive the iron dominion of cupidity by a voluntary inclination of our minds; and, after casting aside the light burden of our Lord, which does not weigh down those subjected to it but honors them, and does not press them down but raises them up, we weigh down our necks with a leaden weight that can more quickly be put down than borne.”

IV. On Various Vices

The same author in the same work: “Just as virtue, if it is true, justifies the soul that truly cleaves to it, so simulated virtue condemns it. And the soul is guilty in two ways: both because it does not do the good by which it may live spiritually, and because it seeks the likeness of the good under which it may live wickedly and lie hidden.

“The proud person wishes to be believed constant; the prodigal, liberal; the avaricious, needy; the rash, brave; the inhuman, sparing; the gluttonous, humane; the idle, quiet; the timid, cautious. Shamelessness ascribes to itself the name of confidence. Insolence holds out the designation of liberty. Wordiness feigns eloquence, and the evil of curiosity lies concealed beneath the appearance of spiritual study.

“By envying another’s good, the envious person makes it his own punishment. The envious person has as many tormentors by a just penalty as the envied person has praisers.

“Some are made chaste either by the temperament of their bodies, or fear of temporal punishment suspends them from the act of unchastity, or the denial of opportunity leaves them without it. But although they are chaste from necessity and not from will, nevertheless the first, if they give thanks to God for the benefit of nature, and the second and third, if they become accustomed to live chastely, advance from necessity into virtue; and, as delight in chastity itself gradually increases, they become truly chaste.”

The same author in the same work, concerning the signs of manifest pride: “In some persons pride rules so manifestly that it neither deigns nor is able to conceal itself. Their very bearing and gait, upright neck, fierce face, threatening eyes, and terrifying speech openly proclaim pride.

“Those whom the itching scab of a proud mind has corrupted do not observe the precepts of their elders, but, when reproved for their negligences, they either sit in judgment upon them, insolently rebel, or murmur. They dispute about a higher place. They even shamelessly desire to be preferred to their betters. They mockingly assail the simplicity of spiritual brothers. They insolently vaunt their own opinions. They disdain services when offered and stubbornly seek them when denied.

“They have obstinacy in intention, hardness in the heart, boasting in conversation. In humility they are deceitful; in jest, biting; in hatred, obstinate. They are sluggish for a good work; late for common fellowship; unyielding in service; quick to carry out what they do not understand; inhuman in brotherly services; rash in hearing; presumptuous in teaching; hideously unrestrained in laughter; ungrateful for benefits; puffed up by acts of service; imperious toward their subjects.”

“By envying them, the envious make the merits of those living holily into their own sins. Whatever good they hear has been done or said by holy persons, either they do not believe at all, or they turn it into evil by interpreting it wickedly. And every evil that lying report has spread abroad concerning them they immediately believe as if they themselves had seen it, and savagely contradict those who prove it not to be true.

“They fabricate everything against their rivals. At the progress of those rivals, they fail. They burn with unprovoked hostilities. They fear that the malice of their heart will be discovered. They are always bitter, never certain; friends of the devil, enemies of themselves; deceitful toward all; anxious at things to be rejoiced over and joyful at things to be lamented, perverse in each. They sow discords among friends. They discolor the reputation of good persons with lies. They are like friends in service, enemies in soul; restrained in word, foul in deed.

“Consider, I beseech you, how their own evils will punish the envious, whom even the goods of others punish. Where will those who become evil in the presence of good be able to become good? Or when will they use evils well, who do not cease to use goods badly?”

The same author says: “Vanity, that is, vainglory, is a certain puffed-up affection of a languishing soul concerning various delights, greedy and at the same time ignorant of obtaining honor; inflated by the empty disease of preeminence; hollow, diseased, turbulent; mistress of light-minded souls; flattering to all who are poorly grounded; smoky toward those who resist; seductive to those who are to be captured; unconquered by those it has captured.

“It carries vain human beings about with the wind of its own blast. They shamefully boast of riches of which they are not conscious in themselves. They desire to be proclaimed by all. They rejoice in the greetings of those who meet them. They burn for their flatterers. They obey their pleasures. They eagerly teach what they do not know. They wish lofty things to be believed of them. They prefer delightful things to grave ones. In promising they are swift; in performance, false; grave in word; everywhere deceitful; joyful amid prosperity; frail amid adversities; born for acts of deference; anxious at reproaches.” These are his words.

V. Petronius, Bishop of Bologna

Petronius was bishop of Bologna, sprung from a noble lineage and a very learned man. He lived in the time of Theodosius the Younger and Pope Celestine. As it is said in his legend, he was sent from Constantinople into Italy for the purpose of rooting out the heresy that had infected those regions. Arriving at Bologna, and pleasing to the people by his teaching and conduct, he led many to the truth of the faith and of right manner of life.

Now when the church of Bologna was vacant and there were differing inclinations concerning the creation of the future bishop, Petronius himself was at length sent to Pope Celestine, so that Celestine might himself provide them with a shepherd. And when, upon arriving at Rome, he had visited the pope and Petronius was setting forth the people’s commission, the Lord—on the preceding night—had revealed to the pope that he should consecrate as bishop of Bologna the one who had been sent by the people of Bologna as their envoy for this purpose. The pope therefore appointed Petronius himself and set him over the church of Bologna.

He lived holily and was practiced in the pursuits of monks; from youth he is said to have received the habit and rule of Blessed Blasius. He is also thought to have written the Lives of the Fathers, concerning the monks of Egypt, as Jerome says in the book On Illustrious Men. Monks embrace it as a mirror and rule of their profession.

Gennadius, however, speaks of him as follows: “I have read under his name a treatise on the ordination of a bishop, full of reason and humility. Its more elegant language shows that it is not his, but, as some say, belongs to his father Petronius, a most eloquent man and most learned in secular letters. For in the treatise itself he indicates that he had been praetorian prefect.”

Vincent, in Book XXI, Chapter XXV of the Historical Mirror, says as follows: “From a certain book of Petronius, partly metrical and partly in prose, I have noted these moral excerpts:

> What do laws accomplish where money alone reigns,
> or where poverty can never prevail?
> Now judgment is nothing but merchandise publicly offered.

“In prose: It is safer to recover a lost thing at small cost than to descend into a doubtful lawsuit. It is dangerous to be involved in another’s secrets.”

“Beauty makes a vain mixture with wisdom [read: Beauty makes a rare mixture with wisdom]. I have always and everywhere lived in such a way that I spend each day as though it were my last and would not return. What is not common that nature has made best? I do not know how, but poverty is the sister of a good mind. Nothing is so arduous that importunity does not extort it.

“In verse:

> A people for sale turns its votes toward plunder > and the clamor of gain; the senate is first for sale, > and majesty itself, corrupted by gold, will lie prostrate.
>
> Whoever possesses coins sails beneath a secure breeze
> and governs Fortune according to his own judgment.
> He composes poems, declaims, rebukes everyone, > pleads causes, and becomes superior to Cato.
>
> I speak of small things. Whatever is desired will happen > to those who furnish coins: the coffer possesses Jupiter enclosed.
>
> O piety, greatest of things and deservedly so,
> gentlest virtue of human beings.”

There are other sayings as well.

VI. Other Writers of That Time

At that time there was a certain Celestine [read: a certain Caelestius], as Vincent reports in Book XXI, Chapter XXVI of the Historical Mirror. Before he joined Pelagius in heresy, while still a young man he wrote from a monastery to his parents a letter in the form of a little book [read: three letters in the form of little books], necessary for all who desire God. Indeed, the moral sayings in it betrayed nothing of the vice later disclosed, but contained an entire incitement to virtue.

There was also Julian, a bishop of Campania [read: a bishop of Capua], a man of acute understanding in business [read: a man of acute understanding], learned in the divine Scriptures, and scholastic in the Greek and Latin languages. Therefore, after he had undertaken to defend the impiety of the heretic Pelagius, he wrote against Saint Augustine, the assailant of that Pelagius [read: Before he revealed Pelagius's impiety in himself, he was distinguished among the teachers of the Church. Later, attempting to defend Pelagius's heresy, he wrote against Saint Augustine, its assailant], first four books and again eight books [read: first four books and again seven books]. There is also a book containing the disputation of both parties. During a time of famine and distress this Julian distributed his own goods as alms to all in need; enticing many of the nobles, and especially religious persons, by an appearance of compassion, he joined them to his heresy.

At the same time the priest Eutropius wrote to two sisters, handmaids of Christ, who because of devotion to chastity and love of religion had been from an inheritance by their parents [read: had been disinherited by their parents]. He wrote two letters of consolation in the form of little books, in elegant and suitable discourse, fortified not only by reasoning but also by testimonies from the divine Scriptures.

Then also the deacon Vigilus wrote, from the tradition of the monastic fathers, a concise rule which is read in assembly in the monastery for the advancement of the brothers. In clear discourse it contains within itself the discipline of the whole of monastic perfection.

At that time Victorius of Marseilles, a rhetorician, also wrote on Genesis from the beginning of the book down to the death of the patriarch Abraham. He also produced Christian books in verse, indeed with a devout meaning; but, as a man occupied with secular literature and trained under no master in the divine Scriptures, he fashioned opinions of lighter weight.

Theodore also flourished in the time of Leo, as Hugh of Fleury says. He was bishop of the city which, founded long ago by Cyrus, king of the Persians, is called Syria [read: Theodoret also flourished in the time of Leo, as Hugh of Fleury says. He was bishop of the city called Cyrus after its founder, the Persian king]. He wrote an ecclesiastical history, taking his beginning from the end of the books of Eusebius and bringing it down to his own time, namely that of the emperor Leo.

VII. Arator and Priscian

In the time of the emperor Justinian, concerning whom we shall speak in the following title, the poet Arator flourished. He was a subdeacon of the Roman Church and elegantly composed two metrical books on the history of the Acts of the Apostles. Some sayings from them are placed here to make known the unusual ability of the man.

In verse:

> Judea, polluted by the blood of her own crime, > dared this and completed the wicked deed. The senseless betrayer > paid to himself the recompense of his crime; he shuddered > at the weariness of his own guilt. Hateful to heaven and earth, > he perished between the two.
>
> The crowd that was to bear the everlasting cross, > and that followed the Lord [read: and that followed the faithful Lord], spurned fields, > for it was to possess the heavens.
>
> For this faculty is stronger: from the part > to acquire the whole more fully.
>
> The love of gold would be that which always burns breasts [read: When does the love of gold cease? It always burns hearts], > by which the mortal race is captured; from this root
> every evil sprouts. Its ambition burns more violently > as it grows, and hunger for gain, added to plunder, goads it.
>
> Peter is enclosed in a dark prison, but not without light;
> nor can the shadows, with their furnace-like gloom [read: tawny gloom], conceal the day of the Church. Love that confessed you, the Lord, enriches whom with honor [read: Love that confessed the Lord three times enriches him with honor]. Bearing the name Peter from the name of the rock, he carries everlasting designations, bearing foundations that will never suffer ruin.

His body was asleep, but within him there kept watch the faith that knows not how to sleep. The Song proclaims this:
"I sleep, but my heart keeps watch."

"O Paul, rapacious wolf! The blessing of Jacob gave you this name to bear. What will now remain in the world that you do not draw into your mouth, after pleasing ingenuity has yielded [read: after Greek ingenuity has yielded] and in doctrine you conquer unconquered Athens?

"O repose that spares wickedly [read: O repose wickedly obtained]! O breasts always given to sleep and bare of good! To how many ruins lies open the one whom night alone holds! He does not know how to keep watch in danger who suffers himself to sleep for God.

"O beloved band which fights with the arms of Christ! O people born for the highest God! Most gentle is the lot of the punishments which your vows bear, and it is the power of the kingdom to suffer perpetually for the King."

There was also at that time Priscian, the supreme grammarian, whose books on grammar are available everywhere. This is his statement in the larger volume: "I believe that nothing among human inventions is perfect in every respect." And, as Sigebert says, it is evident that those err who say that he lived in the time of Julian the Apostate. For he wrote the larger volume On the Parts of Speech not for Julian the Apostate, who lived a long time before, but for Julian the consul and patrician, as is read in the title of the book itself. He also wrote the smaller volume On Construction, and another On Accidents; all these concern grammar. There is also a book by Priscian On Natural Questions, addressed to the king of the Persians.

VIII. Blessed Fulgentius

Around the time of Pope Gelasius there also became renowned in Africa Blessed Fulgentius, bishop of Ruspe, conspicuous in sanctity and glorious in wisdom and teaching. He was born to a father named Fulgentius and a mother named Marciana, from the noble stock of the senators of Carthage, according to Vincent in the Historical Mirror, from the deeds of Fulgentius.

His mother first caused him to be instructed in Greek letters, and no less in Latin. When he had grown up, he became a procurator. But when he had read Blessed Augustine's exposition of Psalm 36, he began to wish to become and profess himself a monk. "He who bestowed the will upon one willing," he said, "is able also to give the capacity."

He was therefore made a monk by Blessed Faustus the bishop, who, when banished for the faith by the Arian Huneric, built a monastery for himself in the place of his exile. Having heard this, his mother ran to him, crying out to Faustus, "Give me back my son!" But Faustus, treating her insults with contempt, did not even give her permission to see her son.

Afterward Fulgentius was afflicted with a skin eruption because of excessive abstinence. To those who blamed him on this account he said, "Those also become ill who are fattened daily with richer foods."

When Faustus was again driven from there, Fulgentius, having received permission, sought a neighboring monastery, where Felix presided over a few but simple brothers. By him Fulgentius was immediately compelled to occupy the place of abbot. And because they had loved one another from youth, each assumed the other's name.

These two were afterward dragged away by a certain Arian priest, also named Felix, who was rich in possessions. While they were beating Saint Fulgentius, Felix said, "Spare Brother Fulgentius, I beg you, for he cannot endure torments. Let your cruelty be turned upon me." At length the priest shaved their heads, stripped off their garments, and cast them naked and empty-handed from his house.

And when many told Fulgentius to make a complaint against the priest who had beaten them, he answered, "It is not lawful for a Christian to seek vengeance in this age. The Lord knows how to defend the injury done to his servants."

After this he returned to his monastery. He again went to another monastery, where he imposed the name of abbot [read: laid aside the name of abbot]. There two aged priests discharged the office of abbot. Subjecting himself to them, Fulgentius made praiseworthy use of the copyist's art and praiseworthily wove fans from palm leaves. He devoted himself to this work even when he was abbot in his own monastery. But he was compelled by Bishop Faustus to return to his own place.

Afterward, when he had been made bishop of Ruspe, he retained his former purpose in both clothing and food, content with one exceedingly cheap tunic in summer as well as winter. He did not use an orarium as all bishops did. He wore a leather girdle. He used boots without ornament in winter and light shoes in summer. Within the monastery he sometimes put on sandals. He often walked barefoot.

He himself neither possessed a costly chasuble, or one of a costly color, nor permitted the monks to possess one. Beneath the chasuble he walked wrapped in a blackish or milk-colored mantle. He was never seen by us with bare shoulders. Nor did he seek sleep after putting aside his girdle. He slept in his tunic and offered the sacrifice in it. At the time of the sacrifice he said that hearts rather than garments must be changed.

He never ate meat of any kind, but only vegetables, barley broths, and eggs. As long as he was young, he ate them without oil; after he grew old, with oil poured over them, lest dimness of the eyes impede the office of reading. While healthy he always abstained from wine. When he drank it because of infirmity, he so drowned it with water that it scarcely tasted of wine. Moreover, he always urged the brothers to vigils.

After this he was sent into exile in Sardinia. Sixty bishops and more were bound together with him by the chain of exile. He was the tongue and understanding of them all. And just as Blessed Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, among his privileges merited that he alone should write the letters to be given in the African council, so Fulgentius likewise merited that he alone should dictate the letters to be sent from exile.

He was invited to Carthage by Thrasamund, the Arian king. That king, full of faithlessness, wrote certain propositions to him, to which Fulgentius replied chapter by chapter. He composed three little books for the king, to which Pinta, an Arian bishop, wished to reply more than he was able. Against him Fulgentius afterward wrote a book which he entitled Against Pinta.

He was never delighted to perform wonders, and never desired that this grace be given to him.

When, however, he was being sent into exile a second time, he foretold to Militeus, a religious man [read: to Juliateus, a religious man] grieving over their departure, that he would return quickly. He added, “Let this also be a secret with you, which excessive charity compels me to reveal.” For he used to say, “Wonders do not confer justice upon a human being, but human recognition, which is more to be fled than sought. For whoever has become known to human beings, unless he has been just, will come condemned to earthly punishments [read: will come condemned to eternal punishments]. But one who is just in the sight of God, even if he has been unknown to human beings, will receive, crowned, the blessed joys of the saints.”

IX. His Admonitions Concerning Religious Life

The same Fulgentius used to say: “Necessity sometimes compels a monk perhaps to use richer foods. But for him to begin to claim the ownership of a personal right in any things, however small, is an evident testimony of a proud will and avaricious cupidity.”

The same author: “Whoever receives anything more from the common substance becomes a debtor to the community whose substance it is; but humility alone aids the debtor.”

The same author: “True monks are those who, their own wills having been justified [read: their own wills having been put to death], are prepared to will nothing and refuse nothing, but only to observe the counsels or commands of the abbot.”

If anyone had presumed to ask for more than he received [read: ask before he received anything], Fulgentius immediately denied it, even if the man deserved to receive it, saying, “A monk ought to be content with the things he has received.” Moreover, without his counsel he did not permit even his own prior to do anything.

He loved less the brothers who labored and performed bodily works with tireless strength but did not possess zeal for reading, and he did not judge them worthy of the greatest honor. But a lover of spiritual knowledge, even if deprived of bodily strength, was loved especially by him.

When he disputed before the brothers, he loved it if someone set before him the most difficult questions, on which he labored. All the brothers everywhere, even those simple by nature, were permitted to ask him whatever they wished; and he did not cease to give an account, overcome neither by weariness nor labor, until they confessed that they were satisfied.

He wrote against Faustus, bishop of the Gauls, who secretly assented to the Pelagians while openly wishing to appear Catholic.

When Fulgentius was recalled from exile, he was received with such devotion that they made a new kind of shelter over him from their cloaks stretched out above him. When he departed from Carthage, the people everywhere came to meet him with candles, lamps, and branches of trees.

He applied the greatest diligence lest any cleric be adorned with ostentatious garments or be occupied in secular business; that all should have homes not far from the church and cultivate a garden with their own hands; that they should take care to chant sweetly and pronounce correctly; and that, in each week, all clerics and widows, and anyone among the laity who was able, should fast on Wednesday and Friday.

At the Council of Vincensis, by the judgment of all the priests who had assembled, he was placed before a certain bishop named Quodvultdeus, who affirmed that he had precedence over Fulgentius. At the time, however, Quodvultdeus remained silent, lest he appear to diminish the council's authority. But after the council, Fulgentius perceived that the bishop was grieving and feared that, because of his own honor, a holy scandal might be generated. Judging it better that through charity he should be made lesser than, without charity, greater, he afterward obtained by insistent entreaties from the Council of Supheta [i.e., the Council of Sufes] that his own name should be recited later.

When Boniface, bishop of Carthage, was dedicating a church at Hurni [read: at Burnos], he waited two days for Fulgentius to give a discourse in his presence. He was so delighted in Fulgentius's words that he watered the ground with tears until Fulgentius finished the sermon.

One year before his death, Fulgentius left ecclesiastical occupations. Secretly withdrawing from his monastery, he dwelt on the island of Circina upon a small rock whose name is Chilim [read: whose name is Chilmi]. There, after a monastery had been built, he devoted himself to God and to himself.

He became most grievously ill for seventy days and said this alone: "Lord, give me penance here and indulgence afterward [read: Lord, give me patience here and indulgence afterward]." When the physicians advised him to use baths, he did not consent, saying, "Will baths be able to make a mortal man not die at his own time?"

While dying, with the brothers standing around him, he said: "Brothers, in looking to the salvation of your souls, I have perhaps shown myself troublesome and difficult; and therefore I beseech you that each person who grieves over anything forgive me." He ordered money to be given to the needy, recalling from his own memory the names of widows, orphans, pilgrims, and disabled persons in need there [read: all persons in need there], and what was to be given separately to each one.

X. The Writings of Fulgentius

The same Fulgentius wrote several little works useful for the edification of the Church. Indeed, he produced two books addressed to Euthymius On the Remission of Sins; one book addressed to Donatus On Faith; three books On the Mystery of the Mediator; three books addressed to Monimus On Predestination and Certain Other Questions; one book of replies against the objections of Thrasamund, the Arian king; one book On the Continence of Married Persons to Be Preserved after a Vow; one book addressed to Proba On Virginity and Humility; one book addressed to the same woman On Prayer and Compunction; one book addressed to Eugippius On Charity; one book addressed to the senator Theodore; and one book addressed to Venantia On Penance and Indulgence. He also wrote a number of sermons, especially very many sermons on the solemnity of the Nativity of the Lord and of Blessed Stephen the protomartyr.

A few things from these little works are noted here for the commendation of his eloquence.

Here he speaks as follows to the senator Theodore: "How great a grief do you think there is in the devil because he sees that the world has been despised by you and knows that you have been converted to Christ? For although Christ died equally for all the faithful, nevertheless the conversion of the powerful of the age fights on behalf of Christ's acquisitions.

"Nothing is lacking in God, because the whole is in him. Nothing remains beyond him, because nothing exists apart from him. Therefore, if some, after despising the love of temporal things, pass over into love of him, they are full in him in whom there is need of nothing; secure in him in whom nothing is feared; truly glorious in him whose glory is not taken away.

"Because you delight to run in the way of the commandments, nature does not give you this, but grace. For the eye also was made in such a way that it can see light, but it cannot see unless light pours itself into it. Therefore, that the eye sees is the benefit of light; if it lacks that light, it will remain blind in darkness.

"Accordingly, do not ascribe any good thing to yourself as though it were your own, lest you fail to receive what you were able to receive and lose what you had received.

"Detestable is the pride of the human heart by which a human being does what God condemns in human beings. But more detestable is that pride by which a human being attributes to himself what God gives in human beings. Condemnable is the person who uses the substance of the world badly, but more condemnable is the proud person who is carried away by spiritual gifts."

The same author, to Venantia, On Penance and Indulgence: "That is not perfect goodness by which every malice is not conquered. That is not perfect medicine for which any disease is found incurable.

"Let no one, despairing of the middle [read: despairing of the physician], remain in the infirmity of sin, because the Apostle says: 'Christ died for the impious.'

“Salutary conversion stands upon a twofold principle: that neither penance desert the one who hopes, nor hope desert the one doing penance.

“If the long duration of sins could conquer mercy, Christ would not have come in the last age of the world to take away the sin of the perishing world.

“At whatever age someone is called, if he does not spurn the kindness of God calling him, he must receive the denarius of life. Nor is penance ever late before God, in whose sight things past as well as things future are always held as present.”

Title XI, Chapter XII

In the times of the aforesaid emperors, Paulinus, bishop of the city of Nola—which is distant by a few miles from Naples in Campania—was also found outstanding in holiness of life and in divine wisdom.

As Vincent says in the Historical Mirror, he composed many things in brief verse; a consolatory little book on the life of an epitaph [read: a consolatory little book in the form of an epitaph], addressed to a certain person, concerning the death of a Christian and baptized infant; several letters to Severus; and, before his episcopate, a panegyric addressed to the emperor Theodosius concerning his victory over the tyrants, chiefly because he had conquered more by prayer and faith than by arms. He also made a sacrament of hymns [read: He also made a sacramentary and a hymnary]. He likewise wrote many letters to his sister, and produced disputations and treatises On Contempt for the World and on various matters. Nevertheless, the chief of all his little works is the book On Penance and on the General Praise of All the Martyrs.

He was also renowned for power against demons, in expelling them from possessed bodies.

Blessed Gregory, in Book III, Chapter I of the Dialogues, relates concerning him a singular example of exceptional charity toward a neighbor. This seems, from what has been said above, to have occurred in the time of the emperor Zeno: namely, when, after the emperor Valentinian III had been killed, Gaiseric, king of the Vandals in Africa, was summoned by Valentinian's surviving wife, as was said above. Entering Italy, he took the City and despoiled it of almost all its goods. Afterward, descending into Campania, he also exposed those cities to plunder, fires, and slaughter, and returned to Africa with very many captives.

Gregory therefore says in the place cited above: "When, in the time of the raging Vandals, Italy had been depopulated in the regions of Campania and many had been transported from there into the African region, Paulinus, the man of the Lord, bestowed upon the captives and the needy all that he could have had for the use of the bishop. And when now absolutely nothing remained that he could bestow upon petitioners, one day a certain widow came. She declared that her son had been led into captivity by the son-in-law of the king of the Vandals, and she asked Paulinus for his price in order to redeem him.

"But the man of God, inquiring what he could give to the woman making the request, found nothing in his possession except himself. He answered the woman who was petitioning him, saying: 'Woman, I have nothing that I can give. But take me myself; declare that I am a slave under your right, and, so that you may receive your son, hand me over into servitude in his place.'

"Hearing this from the mouth of so great a man, she believed it to be mockery rather than compassion. But he, since he was a most eloquent man and excellently instructed in external studies, quickly persuaded the doubting woman to believe the things she had heard and not to hesitate to hand over a bishop into servitude for the recovery of her son.

"Accordingly, they both proceeded into Africa. The widow presented herself to the king's son-in-law, who was detaining her son as a captive, and first asked that he ought to grant her her son. When that barbarian, swollen with the pride of arrogance, disdained to hear her, the widow said, 'Behold, I present this man as a substitute for him; give me back my only son.'

"When he had looked upon the man of handsome appearance, he inquired what craft he knew. Paulinus answered him: 'Indeed, I know no craft, but I know well how to cultivate a garden.' The gentile man accepted this willingly. He received Paulinus as a slave and restored her son to the widow. Thereupon the widow returned to her own home, while Paulinus undertook the care of cultivating the garden.

"When that same son-in-law of the king entered frequently, asked after his garden and gardener, and saw that Paulinus was a very wise man, he began to forsake his familiar friends, to speak more often with his gardener, and to delight in his conversation. Paulinus was accustomed daily to carry vegetables and green herbs to his table and, after receiving bread, to return to the care of the garden.

"When this had been done for a long while, one day he said to his lord, who was speaking with him in greater privacy: 'See what you do, and consider how the kingdom of the Vandals ought to be arranged, because the king is going to die very soon and with all speed.'

"When the son-in-law heard this, because he was loved by the king before the others, he by no means kept it silent from him, but made known what he had learned from his gardener, who was a wise man. When the king heard it, he immediately answered: 'I should like to see this man about whom you speak.' The son-in-law said to him: 'He is accustomed to carry green herbs to me for my meal. I shall cause him to bring them here to the table, so that you may recognize who it is who has spoken this to me.'

"And so it was done. When the king reclined to dine, Paulinus arrived to carry vegetables and green produce from his work. When the king suddenly saw him, he trembled. Summoning Paulinus's lord, who was related to him through his daughter, the king revealed to him the secret that he had formerly concealed, saying: ‘What you heard is true. For this night in a dream I saw judges sitting upon tribunals opposite me. Among them this man also sat, and by their judgment the scourge that I had once received was taken from me. But ask who he is, for I do not suspect that a man of such great merit is one of the common people, as he appears to be.’

“Then the king’s son-in-law took Paulinus aside and inquired who he was. The man of God answered him: ‘I am your slave, whom you received as a substitute for the widow’s son.’ When the man insistently required that he disclose not who he was, but what he had been in his own land, and demanded this more frequently, the man of the Lord, constrained by great adjurations, testified that he had been a bishop.

“When his owner heard this, he became exceedingly afraid and humbly made an offer, saying: ‘Ask whatever you wish, so that you may return to your land with a great gift.’ Paulinus, the man of the Lord, answered him: ‘There is one benefit that you can bestow upon me: that you release all the captives of my city.’ All of them were immediately sought out throughout the African region and, with a ship laden with grain [read: with ships laden with grain], were released in Paulinus’s company in satisfaction of the venerable man.

“Not many days afterward the king of the Vandals died and lost the scourge which, by God’s dispensation, he had held for his own destruction and for the discipline of the faithful. Thus it came to pass that Paulinus, the servant of almighty God, foretold true things and that he who had handed himself alone into servitude returned with many from servitude to liberty. He plainly imitated him who, assuming the form of a servant, rescued us so that we should not be servants of sin, but should be delivered from servitude into the liberty of grace and glory.”

Title XI, Chapter XIII

Around that time, as Vincent writes in Book XXII of the Historical Mirror, Sidonius Apollinaris flourished at the city of the Arverni. From being prefect he was made bishop. He was a man most noble according to the dignity of the age and most skilled in literary learning.

Concerning him Helinand speaks as follows: “Gennadius, in the book On Illustrious Men, unless I am mistaken, calls this Sidonius Salvian, a priest of Marseilles, whom he remembers with much praise in this manner: ‘Salvian, a priest of the church of Marseilles, instructed in human and divine literature and—to speak without envy—a master of bishops, wrote many things in scholastic and clear discourse. Among them are these which I have read: three books On the Good of Virginity, addressed to the priest Marcellus; four books Against Avarice; five books On the Present Judgment; and, for the merit of those works, one book of satisfaction addressed to Bishop Salonius; one book of exposition of the final portion of Ecclesiastes; one book of letters to Claudius, bishop of Vienne; and, after the custom of the Greeks, one book in verse, a Hexaemeron, from the beginning of Genesis down to the creation of the first human being. I do not recall how many homilies he made for bishops.’” These are the words of Helinand.

Vincent, in the place cited above, says: “This Sidonius, a man of ingenuity and elaborate eloquence, wrote many difficult letters. From them these moral sentences have been excerpted.”

From the first book of Sidonius’s letters: “It belongs no less to natural conduct to cultivate one’s own person than one’s estate [read: It is no less in keeping with your birth for a man to cultivate his person than his estate]. Reverence is owed to a friend even when he is afflicted. Rome is the dwelling place of laws, the gymnasium of letters, the senate-house of dignities, the summit of the world, and the homeland of liberty. No great glory is given to anyone if he shines through comparison with inferiors.”

From the second book, the same author: “The very fact that you grant litigants plentiful access to yourself is an indication that you will judge well [read: The very fact that you grant litigants access to yourself only with difficulty is an indication that you will judge well]. For who does not desire himself to be chosen for arbitration [read: chosen as arbiter] when he is going to grant something either for a price or through favor? Neither the defeated man accuses your sentence as foolish, nor the victor mocks it as shrewd. Out of regard for truth, those bound by the judgment expend reverence upon you, and those set free, gratitude.

“The counsels of physicians who attend and disagree are generally to be avoided. Little learned and sufficiently diligent, they most dutifully kill many sick persons.

“Certain persons, having transgressed common human and divine law, reckon supreme happiness to be supreme power. They are the more marvelous in this very respect, because they understand too little that they lie beneath a most restless servitude [read: They are all the more wretched for this very reason, because they understand too little that they lie beneath a most restless servitude]. For just as kings rule human beings, so desires for ruling rule kings.

“An estate with ample revenues ought not to be dearer to the heart or to pleasure than a neighbor who is one’s equal in good conduct.”

From the third book, the same author: “Not to answer a chatterer is an insult. Young men apply very much praise to their own conduct whenever, while striving on account of the merits of business, they have recourse to the counsels of the experienced [read: Young men add very great praise to their conduct whenever, uncertain about the merits of affairs, they resort to the counsels of the experienced].”

Concerning detractors and murmurers, who speak as follows about someone, the same author says: “He is talkative, but not witty; ridiculous, but not joyful; arrogant, but not steadfast; curious, but not perspicacious; courting present times, carping at past times, and fabricating future ones [read: courting present times, carping at past times, and scorning future ones].

“If he has been asked for a benefit, he is burdensome to the petitioner, a detractor of what was denied [read: If he is about to ask for a benefit, he is importunate in asking and a detractor of what is denied], a rival of what was received, crafty in restoring it, querulous when it is demanded, and talkative when it is returned. If he must be asked, he pretends that he is prepared, dissembles that he was petitioned, sells what he performed, makes public what was secret, calumniates what was delayed, and denies what was paid.

“He is a hater of fasts and a pursuer of letters [read: He is a hater of fasts and a pursuer of banquets], producing a favorable judgment not concerning one who lives well, but one who feeds him well. Amid these things he is nevertheless most avaricious himself, for it is not so much good bread that feeds him as another’s bread. He is greedy for drinking and greedier for detraction; with an equally rabid mouth breathing mud, foaming wine, and speaking poison. Living in this manner, he is a pleasure to few, an object of love to none, and an object of laughter to all.”

The same author, from the fourth book: “Never disdain old companions because of the novelty of those who follow. For otherwise you will appear to use friends as though they were flowers, pleasing only so long as they are fresh. Private pursuits always overthrow the public good.”

The same author, from the fifth book: “I judge that the most exact man can be reckoned the one about whom a bad citizen cannot keep silent concerning the good [read: I noticed that a most exact man could be recognized as one about whom a bad citizen could speak ill and a good citizen could not keep silent]. Perfect love ought not so much to recall what it has discharged of its duties as to remember what it owes.

“This force indeed belongs to evil conduct: that the crimes of a few disfigure the innocence of the multitude; yet, conversely, the charity of the good cannot excuse the outrages of many through the virtues shared with them [read: the rarity of the good cannot excuse the outrages of many through the virtues shared with them].

“Who would not become embittered when he sees virtue defiled by the accusation of vices [read: Who would not become embittered when he sees the purity of virtues defiled by the accusation of vices]? If we choose a humble man, he is called abject; if an upright man, proud. If one less instructed, he is believed ridiculous because of ignorance; if one somewhat learned, he is said to be puffed up because of knowledge. If a severe man, he is dreaded as cruel; if an indulgent man, he is blamed for leniency. If a simple man, he is despised as brutish; if an acute man, he is avoided as crafty. If a diligent man, he is adjudged suspicious [read: If a diligent man, he is adjudged superstitious]; if a relaxed man, negligent. If an industrious man, covetous; if a quiet man, ignorant [read: if a quiet man, slothful]; if an abstemious man, avaricious; if one who feeds others well, gluttonous.

“It is fixed and rooted in human sinners by a natural vice that those who do not understand the arts do not admire artisans. Either the stiff-neckedness of peoples or the luxury of clerics is with difficulty subjected to monastic disciplines [read: Either the stiff-neckedness of peoples or the license of clerics is with difficulty subjected to monastic disciplines]. As true praise adorns, so false praise chastises.

“A certain barbarism of conduct is pleasant speech and an afflicted soul. One reaches the nectar of heavenly draughts through cups of earthly bitterness. If affliction pours out upon us however great an anxiety of the present life, we endure little if we remember what he who invites us to heaven drank at the gibbet [read: However great the cups of present life’s anxieties that affliction offers us, we endure little if we remember what he who invites us to heaven drank at the gibbet].”

Title XI, Chapter XIV

At the same time Cassiodorus flourished, as Helinand says. He was first a senator and afterward a monk; but before his monastic life he was chancellor to Theodoric, king of Italy. On the king's behalf he composed many letters to various persons concerning secular business.

The same man, as Vincent says in the Historical Mirror, composed 150 treatises upon the Psalms entrusted to him [read: while commenting upon the Psalms, he composed 150 treatises]. He elegantly composed a book On the Nature of the Soul, and a book On Orthography.

He himself says, as Gratian reports in Distinction XXXVII, in the section following the chapter We Read: "All the splendor of rhetorical eloquence, all the modes of poetic expression, and every variety of seemly pronunciation took their beginning from the divine writers."

The same Cassiodorus, in the prologue to his letters: "Persuasion that has more danger than honor must be avoided. One must speak for the purpose of persuasion in one way to those satiated with much salutary reading, in another way to those held in suspense by a moderate tasting, and in another to those fasting from the savor of letters; so that it is often a kind of skill to avoid what pleases the learned."

The same author in the third letter: "The assembly of the wise is the dignity of rulers. An innocent judge is an easy persuader of what is right; beneath his praiseworthy manner of life one is ashamed not to possess approved conduct."

The same author in the seventh letter: "It is exceedingly unjust that, from one substance, among those to whom equal succession belongs, some should flow in abundance while others groan beneath the hardships of poverty."

In the ninth letter: "It becomes each person to display in conduct the honor that he bears in name."

The same author in the twelfth letter: "A deceitful mind does not follow the judgment of the one commanding, but rather unfolds its own wishes. We owe it to all who act well that the assent of our praise should accompany them. For the running of horses is incited by cries, and by the hands of those making noise it is brought about that speed is sought from mute animals. How greatly, then, do we believe human beings can be stimulated, whom we find uniquely born for eagerness for praise?"

The same author in the fourteenth letter: "Let us willingly give assent to all whenever the voice of petitioners is just. It is not fitting that a benefit which suffers no loss through liberality should be difficult."

The same author in the fifteenth letter: "The resources of the absent always lie open to injuries, and what cannot be terrified by the insult of the mind of the one passing through seems in a certain way to draw opportunity into wrongdoing [read: The resources of the absent always lie open to injuries, and that which cannot deter an invader's mind by resistance seems in a way to invite wrongdoing]."

The same author in the twentieth letter: "A ruler's resources become richer when he remits a debt and, scorning the paltry value of money, acquires the noble treasures of reputation. What is not learned in youth is not known in mature age. Greater caution must be employed in preserving things than in finding them. It becomes a prince to bestow greater things than he may appear to have received from a servant. A road more inclined toward mercy always lies open to good minds."

The same author: "Praiseworthy fortitude lies hidden beneath inactivity; and while it has no space for proving itself, the whole light of merits is concealed." These are his words.

Title XI, Chapter XV

Concerning Boethius, who is also called Blessed Severinus by some. Because he wrote a book On the Trinity for the defense of justice and against the Arian heretics, he was imprisoned at Pavia and killed by Theodoric, king of the Goths and an Arian, when he reigned in Italy. Yet Boethius is not inscribed in the catalogue of the saints, just like very many others who were of the greatest merit before God but less known to human beings.

Concerning him Vincent speaks as follows in Book XXII, Chapter XV of the Historical Mirror: "Boethius composed many works. For in his time, as is read, a heresy concerning the Trinity arose. But when a full synod had assembled, he withdrew himself, lest the conduct of the cause be imposed upon him because of the fluency of his eloquence. Since on this account he was held suspect by the worshipers of Christ, he composed one book On the Holy Trinity against those heretics.

"When Theodoric, king of the Goths, invaded the Roman commonwealth by arms, Boethius resisted him more than all others. Afterward, when he had been accused before him of laboring earnestly to snatch the senate and commonwealth from his hands, he was proscribed with several others, sent into exile, and imprisoned at Pavia.

"While placed in prison, as though he grieved over the change of things, and in order to seek medicines of consolation for so great a sorrow not so much for himself as for others, he produced there the book On the Consolation of Philosophy. He showed that glory, dignity, and other earthly things are not true goods, but are nothing; that they are to be sought by no one; that one should neither grieve over their loss nor rejoice over their acquisition.

"At length, wearied by long exile and imprisonment, he was killed by Theodoric himself in the year of the Lord 521, according to the chronicles."

Besides the things that have been mentioned, he is found to have written a book On the Discipline of Students and a book On Music; books of Topics and Divisions concerning logic, and books of categorical and hypothetical syllogisms; and commentaries upon the books of Aristotle.

Sigebert speaks of him as follows: "At that time Symmachus the patrician adorned the Roman commonwealth, and with him his son-in-law Boethius, a distinguished man of consular rank, learned in both languages and in all the liberal arts. Nearly all of these he translated from Greek into Latin discourse and expounded."

Two other books are also cited by the doctors as composed by him: namely, the book On the Two Natures in Christ and the book On the Hebdomads.

Certain excerpts from his books are placed here, chiefly from the book On the Consolation of Philosophy.

From the book of hypothetical syllogisms he speaks as follows: "There is no good that does not shine forth more beautifully if it is approved by the knowledge of many. Friendship possesses this as its own special gift: it is unwilling to have solitary thoughts. For whatever someone thinks honorably, he confesses to none more readily than to the one whom he loves."

In Book I of The Consolation of Philosophy he speaks as follows: "The pursuits of philosophers, amid the fruitless thorns of the passions, kill the crop bearing the rich fruit of reason; and they accustom human minds to disease, but do not free them—things sweet through deceit.

"'We had conferred upon you such arms,' namely those of the virtues, 'which, unless you had first cast them aside, would have protected you with unconquered firmness,' Philosophy says to Boethius.

"Although the army of fools is numerous, it is nevertheless to be scorned, because it is ruled by no leader but is carried away rashly and everywhere, raving by error alone.

"If you await the work of one who heals, you must uncover the wound.

"The liberty of conscience possesses this for the defense of right: that the offense of powers is always despised.

"An old man lessens this burden of adverse fortune: when some crime is fastened upon the wretched, they are believed to have deserved the things they suffer [read: I would say only this: the final burden of adverse fortune is that, when some crime is fastened upon the wretched, they are believed to have deserved the things they suffer]."

The same author in meter:

> Through how many slippery changes does Fortune turn affairs!
> A harmful punishment owed to crime oppresses the innocent, > while perverse conduct sits upon a lofty throne > and tramples holy things.

Virtue lies hidden, enclosed in darkness in clear light [read: Virtue lies hidden in obscurity, though bright in darkness].
To behold the truth [read: You too, if you wish to behold the truth] with clear light, to take the path along the straight course:
drive away joys, put hope to flight, drive away fear, lest grief be present. The mind is cloudy and joined to reins wherever these things reign.

The same author in Book II: "Every change in subject affairs occurs not without a certain wave, as it were, of minds [read: But every sudden change of affairs occurs not without a certain wave, as it were, in minds]. Prudence measures the outcomes of affairs. For who possesses happiness so well composed that he does not quarrel in some respect with the quality of his own condition?

"No one easily agrees with the felicity of his own fortune. For there is something in each lot of which one without experience is ignorant and at which one with experience is horrified.

"This place which you call exile is a homeland to those who dwell in it. To such a degree nothing is wretched unless you think it so; and, conversely, every lot is blessed through the equanimity of the one enduring it. For who is so happy that, when he has surrendered his hands to impatience, he does not immediately wish his condition to be changed?

"Nature is content with the fewest and smallest things. If you wish to press its sufficiency with superfluities, whatever you pour in will become either unpleasant or harmful.

"There is need of very many supports to protect the costly variety of household goods. And this saying is true: those who possess many things need many things; conversely, they need least who measure their abundance by the necessity of nature.

"Other animals are content with their own limits. But you, like God in mind, seek the ornaments of an excellent nature from the lowest things, and you do not understand how great an injury you do to your Creator. He wished the human race to excel all earthly things; you thrust your dignity beneath every lowest thing. For if it is agreed that every person's good is more precious than the one whose good it is, when you judge the vilest things to be your goods, you subject yourselves to those same things by your own estimation.

"In every adversity of fortune, the most unhappy kind of misfortune is to have been happy.

"With how many bitter things is the sweetness of human happiness sprinkled! Even if it appears pleasant to the one enjoying it, nevertheless it cannot be prevented from having when it wishes to be retained [read: Even if it appears pleasant to the one enjoying it, nevertheless it cannot be prevented from departing when it wishes].

"O splendid blessedness of mortal riches! Whoever has acquired it ceases to be secure.

"Honor accrues not to virtues from dignity, but to dignities from virtue; and dignity bestowed upon the wicked not only fails to make them worthy, but rather betrays and displays them as unworthy.

"Dew, unless it is for popular breezes and empty rumors, we do not know how to act rightly [read: But you, unless it is for popular breezes and empty rumors, do not know how to act rightly]; and, after abandoning the excellence of conscience and virtue, we hunt for rewards from the petty talk of others."

When a certain man had assailed with insults someone who had assumed for himself the false name of philosopher, not for the practice of true virtue but for proud glory, he added that he would now know whether the man was a philosopher if he patiently endured the injuries inflicted upon him. Then the other assumed patience for a little while and, after receiving the insult, said as if exulting, "Do you now at last understand that I am a philosopher?" The first man replied rather caustically, "I would have understood if you had kept silent."

"I think adverse fortune benefits people more than favorable fortune. The latter lies with a flattering appearance of happiness; the former is always true. The latter deceives; the former instructs. Favorable fortune leads those astray from the true good by enticements; adverse fortune very often draws them back with a hook, returning them to true goods.

"Or do you think this should be reckoned even among the smallest things: that this harsh and horrible fortune discloses to you the minds of faithful friends? She separates for you the cetros faces of your companions from the doubtful [read: She separates for you the certain faces of your companions from the doubtful]. In departing, she takes away her own and leaves yours," she says.

"Every concern of mortals, although it exercises the labor of manifold pursuits, proceeds indeed by a different path but strives to arrive at the one end of blessedness. When someone has attained it, he can desire nothing beyond it, for it contains all goods within itself. It is therefore clear that blessedness is the state made perfect by the gathering together of all goods. As we have said, all mortals attempt to attain it by a different path. For a desire for the true good is naturally implanted in human minds, but wandering error leads them away to false goods.

“No pestilence is more efficacious for doing harm than a familiar friend [read: No pestilence is more efficacious for doing harm than a familiar enemy]. If you do not possess your own brightness, another’s splendor does not make you illustrious.

“The seeking of pleasures is full of anxiety, but their satiation is full of repentance.

“Will you attempt to heap up money? You will wrest it from one who possesses it [read: Will you attempt to amass money? You will wrest it from one who possesses it]. Do you wish to shine with dignities? You will supplicate the one who grants them; and you who desire others to perish in honor will become base in the humility of petitioning [read: you who desire to precede others in honor will become base in the humility of petitioning]. Do you desire power? Exposed to the plots of your subjects, you will lie open to dangers. Will you seek glory? Distracted through every harsh thing, you will cease to be secure. Will you lead a voluptuous life? Who will not scorn and cast aside servitude to the cheapest thing, namely the body?

“Who would give a law to lovers? A greater law is unto love itself [read: Love is a greater law unto itself].

“Whatever each person seeks before other things, he judges that to be the highest good.

“O glory, glory! What else have you become than a great swelling of the ears? Those who are falsely proclaimed must themselves blush at their own praises.

“If bodily pleasure makes persons blessed, beasts are more blessed than human beings, for their every intention hastens toward the fulfillment of wanton desire.

> O you who govern the world by everlasting reason, > begetter of earth and heaven, who command time > to proceed from eternity; who, yourself remaining stable, > cause all things to be moved; most beautiful yourself,
> bearing the beautiful world in your mind
> and forming it in a like image—and so forth.

“From Book IV: There is nothing that the Omnipotent cannot do. But he cannot do evil; therefore evil is nothing.

“Just as probity itself is a reward to the upright, so wickedness itself is a punishment to the wicked.

“It is wretched to have willed depraved things; to have been able to do them is more wretched, without which ability the effect of the will to have mercy would have languished [read: It is wretched to have willed depraved things; to have been able to do them is more wretched, without which ability the effect of the wretched will would have languished].

“Therefore those who will, can, and complete a crime are pressed by a threefold misfortune.

“If wickedness makes persons wretched, the longer-lasting a wicked person is, the more wretched he is.

“The wicked who are unpunished are more unhappy than those paying penalties, even though in their punishment no hope of correction and no regard for example should be maintained. For punishment is good by reason of justice; impunity is evil by the desert of iniquity.

“An injury inflicted is the misery not of the one receiving it but of the one inflicting it.

“The same author, from Book V: You who seek heaven with an upright countenance and raise your brow on high, carry your mind upward also.

“Eternity is the whole, simultaneous, and perfect possession of interminable life.

“A great necessity of probity has been enjoined upon you—you do not wish to dissemble—since you conduct all things before the eyes of a judge who sees all [read: A great necessity of probity has been enjoined upon you, if you do not wish to dissemble, since you conduct all things before the eyes of a judge who sees all].” These are his words.

I. Concerning Symmachus the Patrician

Symmachus the patrician, the father-in-law of Boethius, although he was an excellent Roman citizen, was most unjustly killed by Theodoric, king of Italy and a heretic. As Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror in the place cited above, he made one book of letters. A few sentences have been extracted from it and are noted here.

“Every display is not without suspicion of a lie, because whatever is assumed is not thought one’s own.

“A more tender affection makes a complaint more ready. The soul of one who loves is soft and is arraigned at every sensation of pain. If you handle it too negligently, it quickly withers like a rose; if you hold it too harshly, it dissolves like lilies.

“Nature always rejoices in equals, and everything similar to itself is familiar to it.

“It is the nature of things that those who stammer speak more. For, through shame at their defect, they affect an abundance of speech.

“Those whose mind is honorable have a weak brow.

“A conjecture is just when it is gathered from the weight and estimation of friends.

“Whoever intervenes on behalf of the best men seems not so much to love their advantage as to commend his own judgment.

“The mind is relieved of sickness whenever a friend is directed to duties [read: The mind is relieved of sickness whenever it is directed toward friendly duties].

“It is a lesser thing to scorn another’s opinion than to disagree with one’s own.

“I have hated long garments on a small body. That garment is becomingly put on which neither drags dust nor, lowered to the ground, is trodden upon.

“I know that old men become sluggish in undertaking labors; but because vices increase with time, the judgment of the living voice is more suitable for the communication of business [read: since failings increase with time, the indication of the living voice is more suitable for communicating business mutually].

“It is a labor of Superua cui to commend conspicuous men, as if you were to carry a torch before persons placed in the sun [read: It is a superfluous labor to commend conspicuous men, as if you were to carry a torch before persons placed in the sun].

“From my own mind I judge that friendship cannot feel satiety with dutiful persons [read: From my own mind I judge that friendship cannot feel satiety with duties].

“In an evident matter it is wearisome to be lengthy, but in arduous matters more prolonged diligence is of great value.

“In truth, every affection is impatient even of a just and lawful delay.

“The kindness of friends knows how to favor mediocre writings, but the envy of others does not know how to pardon them.

“It is dangerous to inhabit a homeland laboring from a failure of provisions; it is cruel and impious to desert it.

“We do not lack practice in tolerating adversity, for, frequently struck, we have learned to bear the blow of fortune.

“Just as, in the clothing of human beings and the other cultivation of life, things suitable to place and time are assumed, so the variety of talents in familiar writings ought to imitate a certain negligence, but in forensic writings to sharpen the arms of eloquence.

“It is familiar to good persons to accumulate good pursuits whose favor they perceive does not perish.” These are his words.

Title XI, Chapter XVI

Concerning certain most holy and most learned bishops.

First, concerning Saint Eucherius, bishop of Lyon, and Saint Hilary, who was bishop of Arles, something was said in the preceding title. These two, namely Eucherius and Hilary, both most noble and most eloquent men, flourished at the same time as Saint Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, concerning whom something will be said in the following chapter.

Eucherius, as Vincent says in Book XXI, Chapter XX of the Historical Mirror, was from a most noble senatorial family. Enclosed within a cave, he was made bishop by the revelation of an angel.

Hilary composed many most splendid sermons for the people. His natal day is the third day before the Nones of May.

And, as Gennadius says, Eucherius wrote one letter to Valentinian, his kinsman [read: Eucherius wrote one letter to Valerian, his kinsman], On Contempt for the World and Secular Philosophy, in scholastic and rational discourse; and another, obscure letter addressed in the persons of his sons Salonius and Veranus, afterward bishops. He also reviewed certain little works of Saint Cassian, extended broadly in discourse, and gathered into one volume, on a narrower path of words, the things necessary for ecclesiastical as well as monastic pursuits.

Gennadius says concerning Hilary that he was learned in the Holy Scriptures and a lover of poverty, and was solicitous concerning provision for the poor not only through the devotion of his mind but also through the labor of his body. For the refreshment of the poor he even practiced rural labor beyond his strength, since he was a man illustrious in birth and educated in a far different manner.

Nor did he neglect to labor in spiritual matters. For he possessed grace in teaching and, without acceptance of persons, brought to bear upon all the disciplined work of preaching. With a moral talent he also produced certain little works, which are the judgment of a learned mind and a faithful tongue. Among them, in a foremost work necessary for the benefit of many, he composed the life of Saint Honoratus, his predecessor. Eucherius and Hilary flourished while Valentinian and Marcian were emperors.

Hilary therefore says that this Honoratus desired baptism by his own decision in adolescence and, by mature counsel while healthy, feared death. Thus, while a catechumen, he rejected wantonness, honored clerics as fathers, and, sometimes with a boy's understanding, aided the poor [read: sometimes with a boy's means, aided the poor].

After he had now been baptized, his father, troubled by the suspicion of earthly affection and fearing that his son would be snatched from him by Christ, attempted to entice him away from the pursuits of youth and to entangle him in hunts, games, and the various pleasures of the world. The young man disdained that in which his aged father delighted, always compelling himself with this exhortation: "This life delights, but it deceives."

And so, having been converted, he subjected himself to the yoke of the Lord's service, understanding that the supreme yoke of captivity is the license of youth. Therefore, when his hair had been cut off and his garment changed, another person was shown so suddenly from the former one that his father lamented no otherwise than if he had been bereaved of his son. His father confronted him, resisted him, and threatened him; yet the boyhood supported by faith was shaken by none of these things.

The Lord stood beside his new recruit as consoler and raised up for him one of his own brothers as a companion. Converted by his example, the elder followed the younger.

When they shone together with many virtues and together adorned their whole homeland, one began to cast the other forward for praise and expose him to glory. But while each wished to be obscured beneath the other's shadow, the brightness, as though reflected, radiated upon both.

Thus, fearing their own glory, they thought that they had received themselves back in this life by way of reward [read: they reckoned that they had received their reward in this life]. Disdaining human society and favor, they burned with love of the desert. Therefore, after distributing everything, they departed from their country. And lest anything be thought to have been rashly begun by them through youthful boldness, they took Saint Caprasius, an old man of perfect gravity, as guardian of their age.

Thus a hiding place for pilgrimage was sought, and the fame of virtue was fled. But wherever they went, there, whether they wished or did not wish it, another reputation was produced.

Finally, when his brother in Christ, the man Venatio, had died [read: when his brother in Christ, the man Venantius, had died], Saint Honoratus came to a desert near the city of Arles. Because of the convenience of seclusion, he sought an island that was vacant on account of excessive desolation and inaccessible because of venomous animals. When he entered, the horror of the solitude fled and the multitude of serpents yielded.

When many gathered to him there, he was made the father of many monks. Shining with many marvelous virtues, he was greatly solicitous for the reception of strangers and pilgrims and for liberal distribution to the poor. He reserved nothing for himself and his own except the food and clothing of the present days.

Thus, on one occasion, when his generous and munificent coffer retained only one gold piece after many thousands, in a failure of many kings he gave even that very piece steadfastly to a poor man [read: in a failure of many resources he gave even that very piece steadfastly to a poor man]. He said to me and others standing by, “It is certain that the one who will bring something is now approaching.” Scarcely had a space of three or four hours passed when someone immediately arrived who gave credibility to his words.

For my sake he also approached the homeland which he had disdained. At length, with great difficulty, by his most devout exhortations and at the same time by tears and prayers, he converted me, hard and untamed, to God and led me with him to the desert. First he nourished me with milk and afterward with the food of wisdom.

Nevertheless, when he had received governance in this church, under him the Church of Christ flourished just as the monastery had flourished before. At length he was received by his final sleep. Meanwhile, the sleep of many was shaken by various visions, whose character was that the offices of the saints were coming to meet that holy man. And truly, at that same point of midnight, he filled the church with an assembly at the reception of the holy body, so that it was thought that the gathering had been aroused by none but angelic messengers. Thus he was committed to burial with honor.

Title XI, Chapter XVII

That Blessed Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, was shown marvelous to all Gaul in wisdom, in austerity of life, and in miracles.

As Vincent says from his deeds in Book XXI, Chapter IV of the Historical Mirror, Germanus was born of most illustrious parents and instructed from infancy in the liberal studies. After the Gallican lecture halls, he also acquired knowledge of law at Rome. Then, by the profession of advocacy, he adorned the tribunals of the prefecture. Shining in that activity with manifold praise, he obtained a wife exalted in birth, conduct, and riches; immediately the commonwealth advanced him to the insignia of honors. When he governed the territory of Auxerre, it was his custom to indulge rather in the pursuits of young warriors than to devote his labor to the Christian religion.

There was a pine tree in the middle of the city. From its little branches hung the heads of wild beasts captured by him, for the admiration of his excessive hunting. Saint Amator, bishop of the city, frequently addressed him with these words: “Cease, I beg you, most illustrious man of the good, from practicing these games [read: Cease, I beg you, most illustrious of men of rank, from practicing these games], which are an offense to Christians but are to be imitated by pagans.” Germanus, however, was willing in no way to obey the man admonishing him.

When Germanus had on one day withdrawn to estates under his jurisdiction, Saint Amator cut down that tree with its roots and immediately assigned it to be consumed by fire. He commanded the little trophies hanging from it to be cast far from the city.

When Germanus heard this, his soul was so kindled with anger that, forgetful of the holy religion with whose gift he had already been distinguished, he threatened death to the most blessed man. And lest the assembly of Christians resist him in his fury, he gathered crowds of his own men to himself and unexpectedly came to the city. When all these things, learned by certain persons, were disclosed to Saint Amator, he said, “I judge myself unworthy to become a witness for the Savior by the shedding of blood.”

Therefore, foreseeing through divine revelation his own end and that Germanus would succeed him, he set out for Autun, where Julius, ruler of the commonwealth and governor of Gaul, presided. Amator addressed him thus: “Since the Lord has made it known to me, I have recognized my end. And because there is no other who is to receive the governance of the holy Church except the most illustrious Germanus, as God has revealed to me, I ask your Highness to grant me permission to tonsure that same man.”

The prefect said to him, “Although he is necessary to the commonwealth, nevertheless, because God—as your Blessedness testifies—has chosen him for himself, I cannot come against his command.” Then Saint Amator, having obtained his wish, returned to his city with joy.

As Amator entered the church, when the people also wished to enter, he addressed them thus: “Sons, unload your hands of javelins, because this is a house of prayer, not the arena of battling Mars.” They did so. Then the bishop, seeing that Germanus carried nothing of savage honor [read: seeing that Germanus carried no savage burden], commanded the doorkeepers to secure the doors of the church with bars. Joining together the assembled crowd of clerics, he himself laid hands upon Germanus and seized him. After invoking the name of the Lord, he removed the hair from his head and, after the secular ornaments had been cast aside, clothed him in the habit of religion together with the honor of promotion, exhorting him with these words: “You must labor, brother, to preserve uncontaminated the honor entrusted to you, because almighty God has entrusted the pastoral office to you.”

He also exhorted the people to consent to the will of God concerning the election of Germanus. The whole crowd, consenting in confirmation of his persuasion, answered, “Amen.”

Saint Amator himself began to be wearied by a sharp dissolution of his body. But even amid pains he did not cease from preaching, and said: “Prevent lamentation. Certainly voices that wander in mourning are to be emitted where a worse person succeeds a better one. But not only the life of this man will profit you, but also his death.”

Then he commanded himself to be carried to the church, so that he might there return his spirit to the Giver, where by day and night he had been accustomed to profess himself to that same Giver. Ascending the pontifical throne at about the third hour of the day, he sent forth his spirit. Immediately a choir of saints succeeded him and, while many beheld it, carried his spirit to heaven in the form of a dove with hymns and praises.

When his body was being conducted to burial, a certain paralytic, who had now been detained by that disease for thirty years, merited to be washed with the water with which Amator’s dead body had been washed. Germanus, then a priest, commanded this to be done; when it had been performed, the man was immediately healed.

This same Saint Amator, when he was a young man of age and excellently instructed in letters, was compelled by his parents to betroth a certain virgin. But when the time of their union pressed upon them, mutually exhorting one another, they made a vow of virginity. And behold, an angel of the Lord was present, who brought them two crowns, praising their resolution and exhorting them to persevere. Thereupon the girl handed herself over to the company of virgins. Amator shone in the clerical state with such proclamations of virtues that, after the death of Saint Eladius, he merited to be substituted in the episcopate.

When he had been made bishop, shining through many miracles, he converted many to the faith by the teaching of his preaching. Seeing, however, that the church was small and could not hold so great a multitude of Christians as was gathering, Saint Amator asked a certain citizen of Auxerre named Ruptilius to grant him a certain dwelling for enlarging the basilica. Ruptilius refused to do this, but afterward, when he became gravely ill, he granted it. There the basilica was constructed in which Amator tonsured Saint Germanus.

I. The Episcopate and Austerity of Germanus

After Germanus received the priesthood unwillingly and by compulsion, he was suddenly changed from all that he had been. The warfare of the world was abandoned and that of heaven assumed; his wife was changed into a sister; his substance was distributed to the poor.

From the day on which he took the beginning of the priesthood until the end of his life, he never received wheaten bread, wine, oil, legumes, or salt for the use of seasoning flavor. On the day of the Resurrection or of the Lord’s Nativity, a single drink was taken, in which the flavor of wine was diluted with very much water. At meals he first tasted ashes, then took barley bread, which he nevertheless threshed and ground himself.

His garment was always a cowl and tunic. Neither an addition in winter nor a lightening in summer was admitted. Each remained in use for so long—unless perhaps it was given away—until it was dissolved by excessive wear, while a hairshirt always clung underneath.

The space of his little bed was bounded by hewn wooden bars containing ashes cast in up to the edge. Yet, compacted by daily pressure, the unworked ashes offered only hardness. His whole bedding consisted of a haircloth placed beneath him and only one rough covering placed above. No addition raised his head from his shoulders along the joining of the neck. Thus, lying face downward, he condemned his limbs to the ground.

At night he never removed his clothing, rarely his belt, and rarely his footwear. He was always girded with a leather strap and a little case containing relics of the saints. His groaning was continual and his prayer persevering. I define it absolutely thus: amid so many crosses he drew out a long martyrdom.

Without acceptance of persons he offered hospitality to all and washed the feet of all with his own hands.

When his life and reputation shone with many miracles, a delegation sent from Britain to the bishops of Gaul announced that the Pelagian heresy had widely occupied the peoples in their regions and that aid must be given to the Catholic faith. For this reason a universal synod was assembled. By the judgment of all, two illustrious lights of the region—Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, and Lupus, bishop of Troyes—were sought with entreaties. The business was received by them most devoutly.

When they passed through the territory of the city of Paris, the citizens came out to meet them, sought the blessing of such great men, and expended upon them the veneration that was due. They were lodged in a village whose name was Nemetodorum.

While Blessed Germanus refreshed the gathering multitude with an exhortation of the saving word, he saw from afar, among others standing by, a certain girl named Genevieve. Perceiving in her something heavenly or angelic, I know not what, he extolled her with such a proclamation and addressed her parents thus: “That day on which it befell you to become the parents of so great an offspring made you blessed. Her birth produced joy even for the angels themselves. For she will be of precious merit before God and of a purpose of spiritual perfection.”

After pursuing several more things in praise of the virgin, he at length embraced her with gentle kindness and, amid mild caresses, asked whether she wished to receive the celibacy of a consecrated life and to be designated by betrothal to Christ. Delighted at the name of so great a bridegroom, she embraced the title of virginity and confessed that she had long desired to bind herself by this profession.

Meanwhile, the same saint turned his course toward the church, while a very great company of people followed. There, amid holy psalms and prolonged prayer, he held his right hand tirelessly over the virgin’s head.

Then, on the following day, when she had returned to him and he had spoken to her concerning the profession of the previous day, he fixed his countenance upon the ground. Presently he saw a bronze coin, perhaps brought there by divine ordinance, engraved with the representation of a cross. He immediately picked it up from the ground, gave it to Genevieve in place of a gift, and commanded her always to carry it suspended from her neck in memory of him.

“Moreover,” he said, “never permit other ornaments of worldly beauty to be placed upon either your neck or your fingers.” Having spoken thus, he bade the virgin farewell and admonished her to be mindful of him. After commending her to her parents, he continued the journey he had begun with Blessed Lupus.

II. The “Alleluia” Victory and the Second British Mission

On a certain day the devil, the plotter, having prepared accidental snares, injured Germanus’s foot through the occasion of a fall. He was ignorant that Germanus’s merits were to be propagated by affliction, just as were those of Blessed Job.

While Germanus was constrained for some time in one place by the necessity of his infirmity, an accidental fire broke out in the vicinity where he was staying. After consuming the houses there—which were covered with the reeds of carts [read: which were covered with marsh reeds]—it was borne, with the winds driving it, toward the lodging in which the blessed man lay. But the flame, growing pale at the dwelling of the holy man [read: dreading the dwelling of the holy man], raged farther away and round about. Thus, while infirm, he performed many mighty works.

And since he permitted no remedy to be applied to his disability, on a certain night he saw a figure present, shining in snow-white garments. With an outstretched hand the figure seemed to raise him as he lay and commanded him to stand upon firm footprints. After that hour the pains were so put to flight and he recovered health in such a manner that, when day returned, he entered upon the labor of the journey without fear.

Meanwhile, the Saxons and Picts, with their forces joined, undertook war against the Britons, and the Britons, undaunted, sought the aid of the holy bishops. Hastening their promised arrival, the bishops bestowed so much confidence that it was believed a very great army had arrived. Thus Christ fought in the camp under apostolic commanders, to such a degree that, instructed by daily preachings, the people flew in rivalry toward the grace of baptism.

Thus the army proceeded, wet with baptism; the protection of arms was despised and the aid of God awaited. This training, or formation, of the camp was announced to the enemies. Presuming upon victory over what seemed an unarmed army, it hastened with increased eagerness [read: they hastened with increased eagerness].

Germanus, leader and standard-bearer of the army, admonished everyone to answer his voice with a single cry. As the enemies approached, the priests cried “Alleluia” three times. One cry from all followed, and the enclosed places among the mountains multiplied it as the air reverberated.

The hostile column was laid prostrate by terror. They trembled as though not only the encircling rocks, but the very structure of heaven itself, had fallen upon them. The speed of their feet was scarcely believed sufficient. They fled everywhere, cast away their arms, and rejoiced to have snatched away even their naked bodies. Many also fell headlong and died from fear.

Thus, the enemies having been overcome without bloodshed, the Christians triumphed after gathering the spoils. The holy bishops hastened to return to their own places, after the heretics there had been confuted.

Not long afterward it was announced that the aforesaid Pelagian heretics had sprouted again in Britain, and the entreaties of all were again brought to Saint Germanus, that he might protect the cause of God which he had previously gained. Accordingly, after joining Saint Severus, bishop of Trier, to himself, he willingly consented, delighting in labors and gladly expending himself for Christ.

When he had now advanced a little, one of his disciples, who had been secure from Ireland [read: who had followed him from Ireland] and had been chosen for this same expedition, set out after him because he had been unable to depart with him. When he came to Ternodorum, he lay down there and died a little later.

When Saint Germanus, together with his companions, had confounded the heretics as before and was returning to his own country, it happened that he came to the same place. Knowing through the Spirit that his disciple had died there, he approached the place in which the man had been buried and ordered the grave to be opened. Calling the man by name, he asked what he was doing and whether he still desired to serve with him.

Thereupon the dead man, having recovered the vital spirit, sat up and answered that all things remained sweet to him and that he did not wish to be recalled here any further. When the saint consented that he should rest, the man laid down his head and again fell asleep in Christ.

III. The Swineherd Made King

When Germanus was preaching in Britain, on a certain day he entered the palace of the king of Britain with his disciples. He sent a messenger to the king and, because of the violent cold and the approach of night, requested lodging. But when the pitiless king refused to grant it, Germanus, remaining beneath the open sky with his disciples, patiently endured snow and hail.

Now the king's swineherd approached, returning from the pasture and carrying back to his own little hut the provision he had received in the palace. When he saw Saint Germanus wasting away with his disciples from the cold, moved by the dignity of his person, he said: "I beg you, whoever you are, lord, to spare yourself and your companions. Come to my lodging and kindly receive the service of my poverty."

When Germanus humbly turned aside to him, that swineherd advised his wife to kill the one calf they possessed and set it before their guests for supper. After supper, therefore, Germanus summoned the woman and commanded her to gather the calf's bones diligently and arrange them upon its hide before its mother in the manger. When this had been done, the calf rose without delay and, standing beside its mother, began to eat hay.

When Germanus heard this, he asked his hosts to accept this benefit for the present without prejudice to the right of hospitality.

When morning came, Germanus proceeded to the palace and waited for the king to depart from it. He hurried to meet him as he came out and authoritatively inquired why the king had denied him lodging in the evening. Fixed in amazement and thunderstruck by the saint's authority, the king was unable to answer.

Then Germanus said, "Depart, and leave the kingdom to a better man." When the king hesitated, Germanus drove the reluctant man onward. "You will depart," he said, "and, as the Lord has determined, you will never again abuse royal power."

The king, fearing the heavenly authority in the bishop, departed without distinction together with his wife and children, and did not presume to enter again. Then Germanus caused the swineherd to come and, while the whole palace marveled, established him as king. From that time kings proceeding from the stock of the swineherd rule the nation of the Britons, God marvelously ordering human affairs through Blessed Germanus.

IV. Saint Cassian of Autun

When Germanus was returning from Britain, passing through Autun, he came to the tomb of Saint Cassian the bishop. When he inquired how Cassian was faring, the latter immediately spoke from the tomb in the hearing of all: "I enjoy sweet repose; I await the coming of the Redeemer." Blessed Germanus answered him, "Rest for a long time, and intercede more attentively for us, that we may merit to obtain the joys of the sacred resurrection."

This Cassian was born of a noble family in Alexandria. Instructed in the divine letters by Saint Leo, bishop of that same city, he worshiped God from infancy. Abandoning all things for Christ, he constructed in the city of Orta a church in honor of Saint Lawrence, just as he had been instructed by Lawrence in a vision.

Then the emperor Jovian, who succeeded Julian the Apostate, fearing God, chose Cassian as bishop in the city of Orta while the people acclaimed him. But after he had governed it for some time in every sanctity, he bade farewell to all, abandoned everything, and undertook a pilgrimage with a few clerics. Entering the sea, he sailed to Marseilles. From there, while persecution by heretics and pagans was raging, he came to Autun and was joyfully received by Saint Simplicius the bishop.

After Cassian remained with him for three years, Simplicius migrated to the Lord. All the clergy and people there elected Cassian himself bishop. The Lord deigned to confer such grace upon him that the Lord constantly displayed miracles through him, granting sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, and health to the disabled. After completing twenty years in the said episcopate, he migrated to the Lord Jesus Christ, to rise again in glory with the other saints.

V. The Thief, the Alms, and Other Deeds

When this same Saint Germanus had returned to Gaul, one day, as evening was already approaching, a traveler with bare feet and lacking a cloak approached his company. Germanus grieved at his nakedness. The man, deceitfully attaching himself to the fellowship, joined them at their lodging. While the guards, who were keeping vigil for God and not for animals, were occupied, the nocturnal robber seized the beast on which the elder man rode.

When day returned, the loss of the mount was discovered. Lest an animal be lacking to the priest, one of the clerics was transformed from a horseman into an impeded pedestrian [read: was changed from a horseman into a pedestrian]. While the journey was underway, the companions riding around Blessed Germanus beheld him veiling with a shadow upon his face the joy conceived against the delay [read: an uncustomary joy]. Then one, having assumed boldness, asked the cause of the joy.

But Germanus said: "Let us delay a little, because the labor of that unhappy man is both to be laughed at and lamented. You will soon see him in distress." When they had halted, they looked behind themselves and saw the man on foot leading the captured animal. When they had waited for the one hastening toward them, he immediately fell at the saint's feet, confessed the crime he had committed, and related that he had been so ensnared through the entire space of the night that he could not advance farther and could find no other path of escape except to restore the stolen animal.

To these things the saint said: “If yesterday we had given you a covering while you were naked, there would have been no necessity for stealing. Receive what is lacking; restore what is ours.” Thus the man who confessed the crime received not only pardon in place of the punishment for what he had committed, but also a reward by way of blessing.

On another occasion, while Germanus was making a journey, poor persons seeking alms met him. He asked the deacon how much there was for expenses. The deacon answered that there were only three gold pieces. Germanus immediately commanded all of them to be given.

To this the deacon said, “From what shall we live today?” Germanus answered him, “God will feed his poor; give to the poor what you possess.” The deacon, as if provident, distributed two and reserved one. A little afterward certain horsemen coming behind him offered him a gift of two hundred gold solidi.

Then, turning to the deacon, Germanus said: “Receive the things that are handed over, and understand that you committed fraud against the poor. For if you had bestowed upon the needy the whole of what I told you, our Rewarder would today have returned three hundred.” The deacon trembled because the secret of his guilt had become known to the bishop.

When Germanus was lodged in a certain place, after supper the table was prepared again. Marveling, he asked for whom it was being prepared anew. They told him that it was for those good women who walk by night. That night Saint Germanus determined to keep vigil. And behold, he saw a multitude of demons coming to the table in the form of human beings.

He commanded them not to depart and, rousing all the household of the house, asked whether they knew those persons. They answered that all were their male and female neighbors. Then the saint sent persons to the houses of each one in that neighborhood, meanwhile commanding the demons not to depart. Those sent by the holy man went to the neighbors’ houses and found them sleeping in their beds. The demons, therefore, adjured by the saint, said in the hearing of all that they were demons who thus mocked human beings.

When the man of God was ascending the Alps of Italy in the company of certain merchants, he saw among others a certain lame old man who was unable to cross a torrent descending from the mountains. Seizing this man’s burden, the holy man carried it across on his own shoulders. Crossing a second time, he also transported the old man himself upon his lowered neck.

Behold the marvelous virtue of charity, which bestowed so much strength upon the holy man that, although the hunger of so many fasts had wearied him, the fatigue of a continuous journey was exhausting him, and finally he could scarcely carry himself—and although he was also a person of such nobility—he first transported the burden and then bore upon his holy shoulders a rustic most burdened by age and disability.

VI. Germanus at Ravenna and His Death

When he came to Ravenna, where Peter the bishop then governed the Church of Christ by apostolic institution, he was received after having been awaited for a long time with desire. The chief men met him; princes surrounded him; the Church embraced him with exultation.

The venerable queen Placidia also, who ruled in the West with her son Valentinian, the third of that name—for in the East Theodosius the Younger held the empire—sent to the priest’s lodging a very large silver vessel filled with more delicate foods, without any admixture of meat. Germanus distributed what he had received in such a way that he gave the foods to his ministers but claimed the silver itself for the poor. In place of the gift he sent back a little wooden dish containing barley bread.

She embraced each with immense rejoicing: both that he had sent her silver to the poor and that she had received the holy man’s food together with the service of the humble little vessel. For she afterward surrounded the wood with gold and preserved the bread for many remedies and mighty works.

While Germanus remained at Ravenna, he also raised a dead man there, and his life shone forth through many miracles.

Indeed, in that Ravenna, when Queen Placidia had invited him to a banquet and he had consented, he was carried from his lodging to the palace upon a donkey, worn out by age, vigils, fasts, and labors. During the feast the servants secretly told the queen that Saint Germanus’s donkey had suddenly died. After ordering them to be silent, she commanded that a horse of marvelous gentleness be presented to the saint in place of the donkey.

Looking upon it, he said, “Let my donkey be presented to me, because the one who brought me here will carry me back.” Proceeding to the outstretched corpse, he said, “Rise, lazy one; let us return to the lodging.” Immediately springing up, the donkey shook itself and, as though it had suffered no evil, carried him with more vigorous strength.

Before he departed from the city of Ravenna, however, one day, after the morning solemnity had been completed, while he was conferring with the bishops about religion, he brought forth a most sorrowful declaration, saying: “Dearest brothers, I commend my passing to you. In a nocturnal sleep I seemed to myself to receive from the Lord the provision for pilgrimage.”

After a few days it came to pass that, when his illness grew worse, he migrated to the Lord. The queen received the little case containing relics which he carried at his neck. Bishop Peter claimed the cowl together with the hairshirt. Of the other bishops, one received the belt, another the cloak, and two divided the tunic, so that they might possess some memorial from the inheritance of his sanctity.

His body, however, was carried back into Gaul to his own city, as, while still living, he had requested of Queen Placidia.

When the bearers came to the city of Vercelli, Saint Eusebius, bishop of that city, having learned of Saint Germanus's death, solemnly entered the church which Saint Germanus had promised to dedicate for him when he returned, intending to dedicate it himself. He commanded candles to be lit, but the ministers were unable to light them, although they attempted it repeatedly.

Seeing this, Saint Eusebius understood that the dedication either ought to be deferred to another time or reserved for another bishop. Meanwhile, it was reported that the procession of the sacred funeral was coming. While all went to meet it, the body was carried by the hands of Saint Eusebius into the aforesaid church, and immediately all the candles were kindled by divine power.

Then Saint Eusebius remembered Saint Germanus's promise and recognized that what Germanus had promised while living he had accomplished when dead. Therefore, proclaiming a feast day to the people, he approached the altar and, chanting "Glory to God in the highest" as loudly as he could, afterward celebrated the sacred funeral rites.

Thus the body of Saint Germanus was received by his own citizens with great devotion and a great gathering of peoples, and was honorably buried. He died in the year of the Lord 450, in the thirtieth year of his episcopate. Indeed, he raised three dead persons.

VII. Saint Lupus and Saint Peter of Ravenna

Because mention was made of Saint Lupus, as the companion of Saint Germanus in confuting the heresy of the Pelagians in Britain, it must be known, according to Vincent in Book XXI of the Historical Mirror, that this saint was the foremost of the family of the Lenchi [read: this saint was from the city of the Leuci and foremost of his family]. Pimeniola of glorious memory, the full sister of Saint Hilary, bishop of Arles, was his wife.

In the seventh year of their marriage, by mutual exhortation they devoted themselves to conversion. Then, after leaving everything, he sought Saint Honoratus, abbot of Lérins. Having subjected his neck to Honoratus's institution, he was instructed in all the doctrines of vigils and abstinences.

After a year he returned, so that he might sell what remained to him for distribution to the poor, and was immediately seized for the episcopate of the city of Troyes. There, teaching the people the way of salvation and vigorously governing the clergy, after two years he proceeded with Saint Germanus into Britain to root out the heretics. On this journey they were an object of admiration to all through marvelous signs.

Not long afterward, when the army of the Huns, diffused everywhere throughout Gaul, oppressed it, the holy man, returning to his accustomed defenses, protected by heavenly aid the city of Troyes—which lay exposed upon open plains, fortified neither by arms nor walls—placing only intercession and prayer before God, as was said above.

He also became renowned through many other miracles. He healed a paralytic woman, freed by the imposed sign of the cross a girl rendered mute by the assault of a demon, and healed several other sick persons.

For nearly twenty-five years, having no experience of lying upon a bed, he sustained the labor of resting upon a board. His customary garment was nothing but a hairshirt. Always content with the use of one tunic, he remained wakeful in prayers and endured through alternate nights. Wearing down his little body with fasts of two days, he laid prostrate the incitements of youth and tirelessly watered his face with tears.

Moreover, the deeds that were his taught examples of virtue in the schools of his own disciples. For in Saint Polychronius, bishop of Medunum [read: Saint Pulchronius, bishop of Verdun], the grace of cures shone forth; and Saint Severus, ordained at Trier and preaching to the peoples of Germany, we do not doubt was mingled with the fellowship of the apostles.

Saint Lupus, after discharging the priesthood for fifty-two years, sent forth his spirit to heaven.

Concerning Saint Peter, bishop of Ravenna, of whom mention was also made above, elegant sermons remain, as Vincent says in the place cited above, and are cited by learned men.

Title XI, Chapter XVIII

While Marcian was emperor, and while Saint Germanus, of whom something was said above, was still living, Saint Remigius was born in Gaul. He afterward became archbishop of Reims.

As Vincent reports from his deeds in Book XXI of the Historical Mirror, when the persecution of the Vandals had devastated the Gauls, or France, a certain enclosed holy man had very frequently prayed for the peace of the Church. One night, after keeping vigil for a long time, he at length fell lightly asleep from weariness. Suddenly, by the will of God, it seemed to him that an angel was present.

While the angel was speaking out of devotion concerning aid for the Gallican Church, a voice came to them, saying: “That woman named Cilina will bear a son named Remigius, who will free his nation from the incursions of evil persons.”

Immediately awakening, the man ran to Cilina’s house and announced what he had heard. When she did not believe that, now an old woman, she could conceive by an aged husband, he answered: “Know that, when you have weaned the boy, by anointing my eyes with your milk I shall also recover my sight.” For, so that merit might increase for him as it did for Tobias, he had lost the light of his eyes. Thus everything was accomplished as he had foretold.

Therefore, when the boy had been born and handed over to letters, as soon as he was able he entered an enclosure. When he was twenty-two years old, he was elected archbishop—indeed, rather seized—by all the people of Reims. Thus, when he attempted to resist, a ray of new light suddenly descended upon the crown of his head, as though the sun itself, coming from heaven, had fallen upon him.

Since he excelled before and afterward in every virtue, he was of such great gentleness that sparrows came to his table and received remnants of food in his hands.

Once, while he was making a circuit of the parishes, he was lodged in the house of one of his female relatives. While they were speaking with one another, a servant of the house informed his mistress that the innkeeper had now sold all the wine except for a little that he had left for preserving the vessel. Blessed Remigius, seeing that she blushed, learned the cause, comforted her, and immediately went out into the garden as though to walk about.

Coming before the door of the cellar, he entered and asked whether there was any wine. “Behold,” said the servant, “the little that remains.” Remigius said, “Close the door until I return to you.” Going behind the cask, he made a cross over it. As he prayed with bent knees, the wine issued out through the buridone [read: through the bung], so that it was poured through the middle of the cellar. Seeing this, the servant cried out, ran to his mistress, and announced what he had seen.

This excellent doctor wrote diffusely upon the Gospel of Matthew and briefly upon the epistles of Paul.

It was said above how he baptized Clovis, the first king of the Franks to become a Christian from a gentile, and anointed him with chrism brought by a dove. When the said King Clovis wished to endow the church of Reims, he said that he would give to Remigius as much land as Remigius could walk around while the king slept at midday. This also was done.

But since a certain man possessed his mill within the boundaries of Blessed Remigius, the miller indignantly drove Remigius away while the blessed man was walking around them. Remigius said to him, “Friend, let it not be hard for you that we possess this mill jointly.” When the man rejected him, the wheel of the mill immediately began to turn in the opposite direction. He called after Saint Remigius, saying, “Servant of God, come, and let us possess the mill jointly.” Remigius answered him, “Neither for me nor for you.” Immediately the earth opened itself and swallowed the mill.

The prudent saint, foreknowing a famine that was to come in those regions, had gathered heaps of grain in a certain estate to provide for the necessities of the poor. At a suitable time, drunken rustics, mocking the prudence of the old man, set fire beneath them. Hearing this, he came there and, because of the cold of his age and of the evening hour, began to warm himself. With a tranquil heart he said, “A fire is always good. Nevertheless, the male descendants of those who did this will be ruptured in their genitals, and the women will be goitrous.” This so happened in that estate down to Charlemagne, who partly killed them and partly dispersed them through other places because they had killed one of his lieutenants.

I. Remigius and Bishop Genebald

After a long time, when Saint Genebald, a prudent man, had the niece of Blessed Remigius as his wife and they had mutually released one another for the sake of religion, Blessed Remigius ordained the aforesaid Genebald bishop of Laon.

But because Genebald permitted his wife to come to him rather frequently for the sake of being instructed, his spirit was inflamed with concupiscence through their frequent conversation, and he fell with her even into sin. When she conceived and bore a son, she informed the bishop of this. Confounded, he sent word back to her, saying, “Because the boy was acquired through theft, I wish him to be called Latro, ‘Robber.’”

Lest any suspicion arise, he permitted his wife to come to him as before. Nevertheless, after lamenting the first sin, he fell with her a second time into sin. When she bore a daughter and reported this to the bishop, he answered that she was to be named Vulpecula, “Little Fox.”

At length, returning to himself, he approached Blessed Remigius and, falling at his own feet [read: falling at Saint Remigius’s feet], wished to remove the stole from his own neck. Saint Remigius forbade this. When he had heard from him what had happened, he gently consoled him, enclosed him by himself in a certain cell for seven years, and governed his church in the meantime.

Therefore, in the seventh year, while Genebald persevered in prayer on the Supper of the Lord, an angel of the Lord stood by him, declared that his sin had been forgiven him, and commanded him to go outside. When he answered, “I cannot, because my lord Remigius closed this door and secured it with his seal,” the angel said, “Behold, so that you may know that heaven has been opened to you, this door will be opened for you with the seal unharmed.” Immediately, as he said, it was opened.

Then Genebald, casting himself in the middle of the doorway in the form of a cross, said, “Even if my Lord Jesus Christ should come here to me, I shall not depart from here unless my lord Remigius, who enclosed me, comes here.” Then Saint Remigius, at the admonition of an angel, came to Laon and restored him to his own place. Genebald afterward persevered in holy works until death; and Latro his son, who also was holy, succeeded him in the episcopate.

At length Blessed Remigius, illustrious through many virtues, rested in peace around the year of the Lord five hundred. When his body was being carried upon a bier to the church of Saints Timothy and Apollinaris, it began to weigh so greatly beside the church of Saint Christopher that it could not be moved. At length they asked God to show whether he wished Remigius to be buried in that small church of Saint Christopher, where there were no relics. Immediately they lifted the body with the bier most easily and buried him there with honor.

When many miracles were afterward performed there, they enlarged the church and wished to place him in a crypt made behind the altar, but they were wholly unable to move him. They passed the night in prayers, and at midnight, when all had fallen asleep from weariness, on the following morning—namely, the Kalends of October—they found the sepulcher with the body of Saint Remigius carried by angels into that crypt behind the altar. Therefore, the feast made for him on the Kalends of October concerns the translation of his body, but his death is celebrated on the octave of Epiphany.

II. Saint Patrick

In an earlier time of Saint Theodosius the Younger, Saint Patrick was also illustrious. He was a Briton by race, who was sent by Pope Celestine I to the Scots newly converted to the faith and was ordained archbishop of the Scots. There, distinguished in sanctity and excelling in doctrine for sixty years, he converted the whole island of Ireland to Christ.

Besides those mighty works that he performed, he raised sixty dead persons. He redeemed many captives at his own expense. He founded three hundred sixty-five churches. He ordained as many bishops. He consecrated three thousand priests. He baptized twelve thousand persons. Like Elijah, he fasted for forty days and forty nights upon the summit of a mountain. He lived for one hundred twenty years.

He made three petitions to God for the Irish. The first was that each of the faithful, even though he should come to a state of penitence at the end of his life, should be received into mercy. The second was that Ireland should never be consumed by barbarians. The third was that no Irish person should survive until the coming of the Judge.

But when at first he wished to convert the aforesaid exceedingly bestial people from error by terror of torments and by love of the joys above, they said to him that they would never be converted to Christ by his words or miracles unless one of them could behold both those torments of the evil and the joys of the blessed, so that they might be made more certain by things seen than by things promised.

When he became yet more devout in prayers and fasts for this purpose, the Lord Jesus appeared to him, giving him the text of the Gospel and a staff. These are held in veneration to this day as great and most precious relics and are kept as a sign of the highest prelacy—that is, of the archiepiscopate—of that country. That staff itself, because the Lord Jesus bestowed it upon his beloved Patrick, is called the Staff of Jesus.

Accordingly, the Lord led his saint into a deserted place and showed him a certain round pit, dark on the outside, saying that whoever, truly penitent and armed with true faith, entered that pit and remained in it for the space of one day and one night would be cleansed from all his sins and, passing through it, would see not only the torments of the evil but also the joys of the good.

Thus, when the Lord disappeared from his eyes, Patrick joyfully constructed a church in the same place and established canons of the Blessed Father Augustine in it. He enclosed with a wall the pit, which is in the cemetery before the front of the church, and placed doors and bolts upon it, lest anyone presume to enter it rashly and without permission. He entrusted the key governing entrance into the said pit to the prior of the said church.

In Patrick's own time many, moved by penitence, entered the pit. When they returned, they testified both that they had experienced the greatest torments and that they had seen [read: they testified that they had experienced the greatest torments and had seen joys]. Blessed Patrick commanded their accounts to be recorded in the same church, and by their testimony others began to receive the preaching of Blessed Patrick. Because a person is cleansed from sins there, that place is therefore called the Purgatory of Blessed Patrick.

Vincent, however, says in the place cited above that this history is not received by many, especially because it says there that souls freed from purgatory do not immediately fly to heaven but remain for a time in the earthly paradise, as in an intermediate place of rest, and afterward arrive at their homeland at the appointed time; whereas, on the contrary, no intermediate place between purgatory and the heavenly paradise is believed to exist for souls that have been cleansed or are to be cleansed. Thus he says.

But if it is said—as is commonly asserted by certain persons from those regions—that, after a short stay in that place of purgatory, during which they sustain great penalties and injuries from demons, but only through imagination, they emerge from it and live in the world like others, and through those penalties of purgatory make satisfaction for the penalties owed for their sins, no absurdity seems to follow.

Title XI, Chapter XIX

Concerning certain other holy men.

Because it was said above how Saint Germanus betrothed to Christ a certain girl named Genevieve on account of the sanctity that he foresaw in her, I therefore relate briefly concerning her that she was a virgin of Paris and was illustrious in Gaul through great sanctity, as Sigebert says.

After she vowed her virginity to God before Saint Germanus, she withdrew herself from all the vanity of the world. When her mother was going to church and had commanded her to remain at home, Genevieve cried out to her with tears: “With Christ consoling me, I shall keep the faith that I promised to Blessed Germanus, and I shall frequent the thresholds of the church.” Her mother, therefore angered, struck her with the palm of her hand. Because of this, she was immediately deprived of sight for nine months.

At length, remembering the testimony that the bishop had given concerning her daughter, she commanded Genevieve to draw water from the well. Going to the rim of the well, Genevieve wept because her mother had lost the light of her eyes on account of her. Then, when the vessel had been filled, she made the sign of the cross over the water and brought it to her mother. Her mother received it with faith and veneration, her hands extended toward heaven; and, bathing her eyes from it twice and a third time, she recovered her sight.

When Genevieve was offered to Bishop Julicus with two girls for consecration, and this was being done according to the number of the years of their age, the bishop, knowing by divine means that Genevieve was more exalted than all, said, “Place before the others her who follows behind, because she has already obtained this sanctification from heaven.”

After her parents died, she entered the city of Paris. For some time she was so beset by paralysis that her body, now lifeless for three days, was preserved with only her cheeks a little red. When she was healed again, she professed that in spirit she had been led by an angel into the repose of the righteous and into the punishment of the reprobate.

When Attila, king of the Huns, was devastating the Gauls, the terrified citizens of Paris endeavored to carry their possessions to other, safer cities. Saint Genevieve summoned their matrons and urged them to persist in prayers, vigils, and fasts, so that, like Judith and Esther, they might escape destruction. She also urged their men not to carry their goods away from Paris, because, while other cities were laid waste, Paris would be preserved under the protection of Christ.

Because of this, they rose against her, calling her a false prophetess. While they were deliberating whether to stone her or submerge her in a river, an archdeacon arrived from Auxerre. He related the testimony of Blessed Germanus, who said concerning her that she had been chosen by God from her mother’s womb. “And behold,” he said, “I present the blessed gifts that Saint Germanus left for her.” Then the citizens dissolved their counsel. By her prayers, however, she drove away the aforesaid army, so that it did not surround Paris.

From her fifteenth year until her fiftieth, her food was barley bread and beans, which she mixed again in a pot and ate after two or three weeks. From the Lord’s Day until the fifth day of the week she fasted, and from the fifth day until the Lord’s Day. She never drank wine or anything intoxicating. After her fiftieth year, at the urging of the bishops, for the sake of obedience she began to eat fish and milk with barley bread.

With great veneration she loved the Catulensian village, in which Blessed Dionysius suffered. It was also her devotion to construct a church there in his honor. She urged the priests that each should make a contribution toward this building. They answered, “Our scant resources will perhaps suffice for building, but a supply of lime to be burned is lacking.” Filled with the Holy Spirit, she prophesied and said, “Go out, I beg you, to the bridge of the city, and report to me what you hear.”

Going out, they stood astonished in the street. Behold, two swineherds were conversing, one of whom said to the other: “While I was following the tracks of a wandering sow because of her offspring, I found a limekiln of marvelous size.” The other answered, “And I found in the forest, beneath the roots of a tree uprooted by the wind, a limekiln from which I believe nothing was ever removed.” Hearing this, the priests gave thanks and returned. On hearing these things, the saint filled her bosom with tears for joy. She summoned Genesius the priest to construct a basilica in honor of the aforesaid martyr. Thus, with all the citizens bringing aid and Genevieve imploring, it was constructed.

During its construction, when the drink failed the assembled carpenters, the saint took a cup and prostrated herself apart with tears. Then, rising and making the sign of the cross over the vessel, the vessel was filled to the brim with drink. From it the workmen drank most abundantly until the completion of the basilica and gave thanks.

One night about cockcrow, as she went to church accompanied by virgins, the lighted candle that was carried before them was extinguished. When she took it, it was immediately lighted again. On another occasion, while she was rising from prayer in the church, a candle in her hand that had not yet been lighted was lighted by divine power. After portions were taken from it, many sick persons were healed.

A certain woman who stole Genevieve's shoes was blinded when she returned home. But when, penitent, she prostrated herself before Genevieve's feet and sought pardon for the theft, she recovered sight after Genevieve signed her eyes.

King Childeric of the Franks also greatly loved her. Fearing that the saint would rescue certain prisoners whom he intended to kill, he entered the city of Paris and commanded the gate to be closed. Hearing this, the saint immediately proceeded to free the souls. In her hands the city gate was opened without a key. Thus she followed the king and obtained from him that the prisoners' heads should not be cut off.

At that time there was also Blessed Symeon. Merchants going and returning report that he asked about her, saluted her with profuse veneration, and requested that he be mindful in her prayers [read: requested that she be mindful of him in her prayers].

In the church of Saint Dionysius at Paris, persons possessed by demons who were presented to her were freed. From the day of Epiphany until the Supper of the Lord, enclosed in a cell, she devoted herself to God alone. A certain religious girl, approaching and moved more by curiosity than by faith, wished to know what the saint did in her cell and was blinded. But when Genevieve came out from the cell, she restored the girl's sight.

The Lord performed many other miracles through her. She lived for more than eighty years, full of the spirit of prophecy.

I. Saint Leonard

Saint Leonard was raised from the sacred font by Blessed Remigius and was instructed by him in saving disciplines. His parents were reckoned foremost in the palace of the king of France. He obtained such great favor from the king that all prisoners whom he himself visited were immediately released.

When the fame of his sanctity increased, the king compelled him to remain with him for a long time, until he might give him a bishopric. Leonard refused this and, desiring solitude, abandoned all things and came preaching to Orléans with his brother Lifardus.

After they had lived for some time in a certain monastery, Lifardus wished to remain as a solitary upon the bank of the Loire, while Leonard, by the admonition of the Holy Spirit, resolved to preach in Aquitaine. Kissing one another, they departed.

Leonard, therefore, preaching everywhere and performing miracles, dwelt in a certain forest near the city of Limoges, where a royal hall had been constructed for the sake of hunting. It happened that one day the king was hunting there and the queen, having gone out there for recreation, was endangered in childbirth.

While the king and household mourned on account of the queen's danger, Leonard passed through the wood and heard the voices of those lamenting. Moved by piety, he hastened there and, when summoned by the king, entered. When the king asked who he was and Leonard answered that he had been a disciple of Saint Remigius, the king conceived good hope. Thinking him well instructed by a good master, he brought him in to the queen and asked that through his prayers he might obtain a double joy: his wife recovered and an offspring brought forth. Then Leonard poured forth a prayer and immediately obtained what he sought.

The king offered him many things in gold and silver. Leonard immediately refused them, admonishing him to distribute them to the poor, and said: "I need none of these things. Rather, after despising the riches of the world, I desire only to serve God in some forest." When the king wished to hand over the whole wood to him, Leonard said: "I do not accept that whole wood. Rather, I ask that as much as I shall be able to go around with my little ass in an entire night be granted to me." The king did this most willingly.

Accordingly, after a monastery had been constructed there, he lived there for a long time in great abstinence with two monks who had joined him. Since water was one mile distant from them, he commanded a wholly dry well to be dug there, which he filled with water by his prayers. He called the place Nobiliacum because it had been given by a noble king.

There he shone with such great miracles that whoever invoked his name in prison immediately went out free, after whatever bonds had been broken, with no one opposing him, and presented his chains or shackles. Many of these remained with him and served the Lord there.

Seven families from his noble stock also sold all things and came to him. After a portion of the forest had been distributed to each, they remained there with him and drew very many by their example.

At length Saint Leonard, illustrious through many virtues, migrated to the Lord on the eighth day before the Ides of November, around the year of the Lord five hundred.

Because he performed many miracles even after his passing from this world and that church was small, it was revealed to the clerics that they should build a basilica elsewhere, so that it might be more capacious for the multitude of the people arriving, and should transport Saint Leonard's body there. They and the people persisted in a three-day fast and in prayers. When they looked, they saw the whole province covered with snow, but saw that place where the body of Blessed Leonard wished to rest entirely free of snow.

He was therefore translated there. The multitude of diverse kinds of iron before his sepulcher shows how many miracles the Lord performs through him concerning prisoners.

One miracle from among many is placed here. A certain man dwelling in the place of Saint Leonard—that is, Nobiliacum—and existing as very faithful and devoted to that saint was captured by a certain tyrant. Thinking within himself, the tyrant said: "This Leonard releases all who are shackled, and every power of iron melts before him like wax. Therefore, if I bind this man in chains, Leonard will immediately be present and free him. But if I can guard him, I shall cause him to redeem himself for one thousand solidi. I know, therefore, what I shall do. I shall dig a deep pit in the tower and cast him into it weighed down with shackles. Then I shall place a wooden chest over the mouth of the pit and make armed soldiers lie within it. For although Leonard breaks iron, he has not yet entered beneath the earth."

When he had fulfilled everything as he had thought and that man had repeatedly called upon Saint Leonard, Leonard came by night and overturned the chest in which the soldiers lay, enclosing them beneath it like dead men in a sepulcher. Then, entering the pit with much light, he took the hand of his faithful man and said, "Are you sleeping, or are you awake? Behold Leonard, whom you desire."

The man, marveling, said, "Lord, help me." Immediately, after the chains had been broken, Leonard took him up and carried him outside the tower in his own arms. Then, conversing with him as a friend with a friend, he led him back as far as his own place and his own house.

II. Another Saint Leonard

It is read concerning another holy man, Leonard, of the same profession and virtue, whose body rests at Corbie. When he was a prelate in a monastery, he cast himself down with such humility that he seemed inferior to all.

But since almost the whole people flowed together to him, certain envious persons persuaded King Lothar that, unless he guarded himself against Leonard—who was assembling many under the pretext of religion—the kingdom of France would incur no small loss. The king, too credulous toward them, commanded that Leonard be expelled. But the soldiers who came to expel him were so pierced by his words that they promised they would become his disciples.

The king also sought pardon, and Leonard's detractors were deprived of their possessions and honors. The king greatly loved the aforesaid man of God, Leonard, because of his merits, and only with difficulty, at the prayer of the holy man, restored the possessions and honors to those detractors.

Leonard also obtained from the Lord that whoever was held in prison should immediately be released when his name was invoked—if, that is, it were expedient for that person's salvation.

One day, while he applied himself to prayer, a very great serpent extended itself from the region of his feet as far as his bosom. On account of this he in no way rose from prayer. When the prayer was completed, however, he said to it: "I know that from the beginning of your creation you disturb human beings as much as you can. But power has not been given to you over me—that is, to do everything you desire. Do against me whatever I have merited." When this was said, the serpent leapt out through his hood and fell dead at his feet.

After these things, when he had pacified two bishops who were at discord with one another, he foretold that he would come to his end on the following day. This happened.

III. Saint Vedast, Bishop of Arras in Gaul

Alcuin, who is also called Albinus, wrote the life of Saint Vedast, as Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror. This Saint Vedast, an excellent preacher, flourished in the time of Clovis, king of the Franks.

When the said Clovis, after gaining victory against the Alemanni, had vowed that he would become a Christian, he approached the town of Toul, where Saint Vedast was. After Clovis had been instructed by him in the faith, Vedast afterward led him to Blessed Remigius for the sake of obtaining baptism. On the way Blessed Vedast gave sight to a blind man. By this miracle the king was greatly strengthened in the faith.

After Blessed Remigius baptized Clovis, he earnestly commended Saint Vedast to him.

When Vedast had received a certain noble and religious man as a guest, and when, at the man's departure, Vedast wished to provide him with wine for the journey but had none in his house, Vedast obtained by a divine miracle that an empty vessel be filled with the best wine, from which Vedast provided for him. Vedast nevertheless commanded the boy who had drawn the wine to tell no one of such a sign during his lifetime.

After these things Saint Remigius made Blessed Vedast bishop of Arras. When Blessed Vedast entered the city, he healed a lame man at the gate and gave sight to a certain blind man.

Among fragments of walls and houses he found the ancient ruins of a church. A bear sprang out from the ruined caverns. When the man of God commanded it to seek deserted places, it departed and was seen no more in those regions.

A certain noble Frank named Ocinus invited King Lothar, the son of Clovis, and Saint Vedast with him to a meal. As they entered the house, the holy man extended his hand and signed all the vessels with the sign of the cross. There were certain vessels there filled with ale but infected by enchantments according to gentile error. They immediately burst apart with a crash, and whatever liquid they contained was poured out. When the king and the nobles sought the cause of this event, it was explained, and they were greatly strengthened in the faith.

He presided over the church of Arras for almost forty years.

On the night on which he passed away, a column of most brilliant light was seen to stand for the space of about two hours from the summit of the house in which he lay as far as the height of heaven. When the clergy, people, and priests of other churches assembled for his funeral rites, amid the voices of those weeping they heard persons singing psalms in heaven.

For the place of his burial he had chosen an oratory that he had constructed from wooden planks at poor expense. This place was difficult of access because of the marshes surrounding it. But when it became late and those who had assembled were preparing to depart, they asked the saint to permit himself to be carried to the church of the holy Mother of God, Mary, over which he had presided in the city. When they lifted the bier, they felt no weight.

IV. The Holy Abbots Severinus of Agaunum and Maxentius of Poitiers

When Clovis had now governed the kingdom of France well for twenty-five years, he was suddenly seized by a feverish illness. Since he could be healed by no art of the physicians, he heard the fame of Saint Severinus, abbot of the monastery of Agaunum, who was held by the inhabitants of the place to be distinguished by the titles of many miracles. Through messengers he humbly entreated Severinus to come to him.

Devout and kindly, Severinus came to him and through his prayers freed him from his inward feverish infirmity. Moreover, remaining with him for some space of time, by sacred prayers he restored to health many persons from his household and from the people of Paris who were oppressed by diverse afflictions: restoring movement to the lame, speech to the mute, sight to the blind, and hearing again to the deaf, and driving unclean spirits from the bodies of the possessed.

At length King Clovis addressed him benignly, saying: “I beseech you, father abbot, receive as much money as you wish from our treasury, and distribute it to the poor as you please. Let all guilty persons who are confined in prison in my kingdom and are detained for their wickedness be released by your indulgence.”

At the king’s command, therefore, all the prisons in his kingdom were opened. An innumerable multitude of those who were to be afflicted with diverse tortures and punished with the death they deserved came forth rejoicing at the arrival of Blessed Severinus, released from every kind of torment.

When he learned through the revelation of an angel that his death was approaching, he ascended from the city of Paris to a certain mountain. On its summit was an oratory in which two priests remained serving God. Received honorably by them, amid their holy conversations he commended his spirit to the Lord. At the very hour of his death the whole place was surrounded by light like a star.

V. Saint Maxentius

Maxentius the abbot, as Sigebert writes, was from Poitiers. Among other miraculous works of virtue, he merited to raise a dead person. Very often birds of the wild, leaving the branches of the groves, took now grains of wheat and now fragments of bread from his hand.

He was also frequently visited by angels, to such a degree that the splendor of the cell in which he dwelt, continually singing psalms, gleamed in the sight of the servants or monks like shining globes of stars. His refreshment was barley bread and water. Yet he was frequently fed by divine banquets.

He applied himself to prayers in such a manner that, from his bending himself down, swellings appeared upon his limbs like the humps of camels.

At one time, while the monks, laboring amid their works, were burdened by thirst, this man of God completed a prayer and fixed his staff in the field in the sight of those standing by. A living spring flowed forth beneath it. From it the monks gave thanks and quenched their thirst, and many sick persons were afterward healed from it.

At one time the Franks came to a military conflict with the Goths, with King Clovis preceding them. When they approached the monastery over which Maxentius presided, they began to consider that they should overthrow it and kill the holy man. At the devil's persuasion one of the barbarians stretched out his hand to behead him, with his sword suspended in the air. The swordsman's hand remained extended in vain, and the saint's neck remained unharmed.

After a little while, the man began to tear himself with his teeth and lacerate his own body with wounds. At length, inflamed into madness, the unhappy man became his own murderer. The others, however, were suddenly blinded in their eyes and disturbed in mind, so that one scarcely recognized another.

When this came to the ears of Clovis, he ran very swiftly to the holy man, prostrated himself, humbly adored, and sought pardon for himself and his men. The man, full of God, moved by the king's prayers, made the sign of the cross over them and bestowed the blessing of a sacred gift from a fragment of bread. He brought them health and permitted them to return to the camp.

After these things, when a certain cultivator of a crop hurried on the Lord's Day to pull rye in the harvest, his hand was constricted for two years, so that no remedy of physicians could apply health. But, going to the holy man, after prayer was poured forth he recovered complete health. Maxentius restored similar soundness to a certain woman whose hands had been made useless because she had spun on the Lord's Day.

At length, announcing his death to his monks, he rested in peace.

VI. Saint Melanius and Saint Arnulphus

There was also another abbot, Melanius, noble in birth, distinguished in beauty, and chaste in body, as Vincent reports in Book XXII of the Historical Mirror. By his counsel King Clovis fed the poor and honored the saints.

Melanius once met the devil in the appearance of a horned bull. The saint asked where it was going. It answered, "I am going to the brothers to give them a drink." The saint immediately went to his oratory. The devil, however, entered one of the elders as he drank water. When the devil tormented him, the saint struck the tormented man with the palm of his hand and shook out the demon. He was of such great virtue that demons did not dare to conceal themselves before him.

In the district of Vannes he raised a dead boy who was tormented by a demon. The demon, seducing him and knowing that it was to be cast out, had strangled him in a private chamber.

There was also Saint Arnulphus, the son of Saint Remigius in baptism, who was illustrious in Gaul. After many contests in preaching Christ, he was crowned with martyrdom in the Aquilian forest.

When Saint Remigius baptized Clovis, he commended Saint Arnulphus to him. Clovis gave him his niece as wife and handed them both over to Saint Remigius. Remigius persuaded them to remain virgins, which they did.

A voice from heaven came to Arnulphus in dreams, saying, "Unless anyone renounces all things that he possesses, he cannot be my disciple." He approached Saint Remigius with the greatest haste, received provision for the journey from Blessed Remigius, abandoned his bride and all things, and completed twenty-seven years in his pilgrimage in a lay habit.

At Ravenna, after Matins on the Lord's Day, he had remained alone in the church to pray. There the soul of a certain sinner, which the devil was dragging to hell after it had been stripped from the body, began to cry out: "Saint Arnulphus, chosen of God, give aid, and restrain these assaults of the enemies." Then he, moved to tears, prayed with most abundant weeping. The soul returned to the body, the man lived again, and he indicated by whose merits he had been saved. In a clear voice he disclosed to those present that Arnulphus himself was the pilgrim.

Immediately the saint, fleeing vainglory, returned to Saint Remigius. When he came upon the River Seine at the place called Cella, he encountered a certain dead man being carried upon a bier. After pouring forth prayer, he restored him to life and brought him with him to Saint Remigius.

Blessed Arnulphus, fleeing the people of Reims, again undertook a pilgrimage. After a visitation to the body of Saint Saturninus at Toulouse and Saint Hilary at Poitiers, he at length came to the body of Blessed Martin at Tours. There, through the revelation of an angel, he was made bishop.

One night there, when at the beginning of the vigils he began, “O Lord, you will open my lips,” the clerics fell asleep and there was no one to answer. An angel added, “And my mouth shall announce your praise.”

VII. Saint Vigor, Bishop of Bayeux

In the time of Childebert, king of the Franks and son of Clovis, of whom something was said above, Saint Vigor, bishop of the city of Bayeux, was illustrious. Born in the province of Arras from noble parents who were powerful in faith, he lived in religion with the monks within the monastery of Saint Vedast, as Vincent reports in Book XXII of the Historical Mirror.

He shone with such great obedience and humility that he seemed more pleasing than all. Since his very wealthy parents desired that he, while they were still living, should succeed to their abundance of possessions, but he aspired more eagerly to heavenly things, he took one little boy with him and, not knowing where he was going, took after abandoning his parents [read: he took one little boy with him and, not knowing where he was going, departed after abandoning his parents]. By divine direction he arrived in the region of Bayeux.

While he was on the journey, an angel of the Lord admonished him in dreams, saying: “Proceed where you have determined to go, because a place has been prepared for you by the Lord, and no small people is to be converted to the faith through you.”

Continuing the journey he had begun, he came to a village called Redeversus, where the people were held by the worship of idols. Constructing an oratory, he passed the nights in vigils and prayers and continually prayed to the Lord that the Spirit of God would illuminate that people for the knowledge of truth. The Lord bestowed so much grace upon him that, through his preaching and example of holiness, almost all were converted to the faith of Christ.

When the Lord wished his soldier to be made manifest, it happened that the son of a certain man—a little boy whom Vigor had converted to Christ—died while tormented by fevers. His mother, exhausted by weeping, ran to the servant of God and tearfully begged him to restore her son, extinguished by death. After sending forth a prayer for the little boy, he said to the woman, “If you believe with your whole heart in the God whom Christians worship, you will obtain whatever you wish.” Hearing these things, she therefore believed and returned to the house where she had left her dead son. She found him outside the house praising God.

Through this miracle the fame of his sanctity resounded far and wide. Divine mercy granted manifold medicine to the sick through his prayers, so that he restored sight to the blind, movement to the lame, and health to the infirm.

In a certain forest there was an enormous serpent that burned human beings and livestock with its breath. A certain wealthy man who possessed estates around the place asked the man of God to go there and free the people and livestock from that destruction.

Going there, Vigor said, “Ancient serpent and Satan, in the name of Jesus Christ I command you to come out of the cave.” It immediately came out with its head raised, emitting flames from its mouth and grinding its teeth, as though prepared to devour. Its length was forty feet.

As soon as the man of God saw it, he opposed the sign of the cross to it. It closed its mouth, lowered its neck, and came to him. Saint Vigor bound a thong around its neck and handed it to his servant Redemirus to be led to the sea, commanding that the serpent should not return from there again. This was done.

He also cast another serpent out of a place called Cella and a third from a place called Cameron. For this reason, all the aforesaid estates were handed over to him in possession.

When the bishop of Bayeux died, Vigor was ordained bishop there by the will of God, at the petition of the clergy and people. But a certain count named Beltulfus, burning with avarice, proudly and violently occupied a field belonging to the said church. When the saint prayed that God would defend the inheritance of the Church, that proud man fell from his horse and died with his neck broken.

Before Vigor’s conception it had also been revealed to his mother by an angel that she would have a son whom the Lord would magnificently illuminate with his grace. He died an old man, leaving many disciples educated in holy conduct.

Title XII

Title XII contains the deeds of eighty-seven years, namely from the year of the Lord 518 until the year of the Lord 605.

In this interval these supreme pontiffs succeeded one another: John I; Felix III; Boniface II; John II; Agapetus; Silverius; Vigilius; Pelagius I; John III; Benedict I; Pelagius II; and Gregory I.

The emperors were Justin the Elder, Justinian the Younger, Tiberius, and Maurice.

It contains principally many sayings of Pope Gregory; the history of the Goths defeated by Belisarius and afterward by Narses; how the Lombards entered Italy; and the deeds of many holy men and holy women who shone in the world in those times by life and miracles.

Chapter I

After the death of Anastasius, the perfidious emperor, the impious Justin the Elder succeeded him, concerning whom something will be said below. After Hormisdas, John I, the first of that name and the fifty-first in the number of the pontiffs, merited to hold the apostolic chair.

Because the aforesaid emperor Justin, as a true Catholic and most devout man, not only recalled from exile all the bishops and other most holy men whom Anastasius the heretic had sent into exile because they did not favor his error, and received them honorably, but had also ordained that the churches held by the Arians in the eastern regions be taken away from them, Theodoric, king of Italy and himself an Arian, therefore sent Pope John with certain senators and consuls to the emperor Justin, so that he would revoke such an edict and the churches would be restored to the Arians. Otherwise, Theodoric himself would expose all Italy to sword and fire.

To prevent the extermination of Italy, Pope John, although infirm, undertook the journey to the city of Constantinople, where Justin resided.

As Hugh of Fleury reports after Gregory in the book of the Dialogues, when John had now reached the regions of Corinth, it became necessary that a horse on which he might sit during the journey be sought for him. When a certain noble man heard this, he granted to John the gentlest horse, upon which his wife had been accustomed to ride, with the condition that when John had arrived at an open place where a suitable horse could be found for him, the horse should be sent back for his wife.

This was done. For, when another suitable horse was found as the journey continued, John sent the first one back to the nobleman. But when the wife of the aforesaid nobleman again wished to mount it as she had been accustomed, she was no longer able. For with immense blowing and neighing and with unceasing movement of its entire body, it seemed to disclose, as though with disdain, that after carrying the limbs of the pontiff it could not carry a woman. When her husband prudently perceived this, he sent the horse back to the venerable man, seeking with earnest entreaties that John himself should possess what he had now dedicated by the sitting of his holy person [read: the horse, which he had now dedicated to his own possession by sitting upon it].

He was received by the whole city of Constantinople with the highest honor, as Helinand says, so that at the fifteenth milestone from the city itself the people proceeded to meet him with candles, lamps, and crosses, giving thanks that they had merited to receive the successor of Blessed Peter and the vicar of Christ.

When he was received with the highest joy by the emperor and all the clergy and people, immediately at the Golden Gate, in the sight of all, he granted sight to a blind man who asked it. Justin humbled himself and, prostrate upon the ground, adored holy Pope John.

John, with the other envoys, asked Justin to hear the embassy, so that Italy might be freed and not exposed to extermination by Theodoric. He did this, permitting the Arians to use the churches that they had held before.

After obtaining those things for which he had gone, as Hugh of Fleury says, John returned to Ravenna, where the frequently named tyrant Theodoric held the seat of the kingdom. In the zeal of envy, because he had heard that John and his companions had been received and treated honorably by the emperor, Theodoric wished to kill him with the sword. But he feared that he would incur the excessive indignation of Emperor Justin. Nevertheless, he consigned him to the custody of a prison, where, wasted by the foulness of the prison, he rendered his spirit to God.

His martyrdom is celebrated on the fifth day before the Kalends of June. His body was translated from Ravenna to the City and buried in the church of Blessed Peter. He was Tuscan by nation, from a father named Constantius. He sat for two years. The papacy was vacant for fifty-eight days.

I. Felix II and Boniface II

Felix II succeeded John in the chair of Peter. He was the fifty-second in the catalogue, a Samnite by nation, from a father named Castorius. How long he sat is uncertain. For according to some it was eleven years; according to others, such as Martinianus and John of Columna, it was four years, two months, and fifteen days.

He constructed the basilica of Cosmas and Damian in the city of Rome. He rebuilt from the ground the church of Saint Saturninus on the Salarian Way, which had been consumed by fire in his time.

He held two ordinations during the month of March in the City and ordained fifty-five priests, four deacons, and twenty-nine bishops for diverse places. Added to his fathers, he was buried in the church of Saint Peter. The episcopate was vacant for three days.

After the death of Felix, Boniface II ascended the chair of Peter. He was a Roman by nation, from a father named Sigibund, and the fifty-third in the order of the Roman pontiffs. He sat for two years, for he was in the time of Emperor Justinian.

There was also a schism at that time, because another man named Dioscorus was ordained pope, but not canonically. On account of this, a dissension arose among the clergy and in the senate and endured for about one month. In the meantime Dioscorus died, and the schism was removed, Boniface II remaining in the see of Peter. Boniface, led by zeal and deceit, reconciled this Dioscorus to the clergy under the bond of anathema [read: Boniface, led by zeal and deceit, reconciled the clergy under the bond of an anathema and written pledge].

This Boniface assisted the clergy with much sustenance in a peril of famine. He assembled a synod in the basilica of Blessed Peter and made constitutions. He ordained Vigilius the deacon as his successor. But because this had been done against the canons, he revoked it.

Migrating to the Lord, he was buried in the basilica of the Prince of the Apostles. The episcopate was vacant for two months and fifteen days.

Under this pontiff, a report came to Rome from the African bishops, who by unanimous will and counsel deliberated and established that the bishop of Carthage should establish and do all things by the counsel of the Roman Apostolic See.

Pope Boniface says as follows, in Distinction LXXXIX:

> The providence of ordering established different grades and distinct orders for this purpose: that while the lesser exhibited reverence to the greater and the greater bestowed love upon the lesser, true concord might arise, a joining together out of diversity, and the administration of the several offices might be properly generated. For the whole could subsist by no other reason unless such a great order of difference preserved it. Because, indeed, each creature cannot be governed or live in one and the same quality, the example of the heavenly armies instructs us. For since there are angels and archangels, it is clear that they are not equal, but one differs from another in power and order.

II. John II

John II succeeded Boniface in the Apostolic See. He was the fifty-fourth, also called Maturius [read: also called Mercurius], a Roman by nation, from a father named Projectus, from the Caelian Hill. He sat for two years and four months. He lived in the times of Athalaric, king of Italy, and Emperor Justinian.

At that time, before his death, Justin the Elder, a religious man, with the greatest love of the Christian religion, sent his faith in writing, in his own handwriting, to the Apostolic See through the bishops Apatius and Demetrius [read: through the bishops Hypatius and Demetrius]. He also caused to be offered to Blessed Peter the Apostle a golden cup surrounded with gems and very many silver chalices.

John held one ordination during the month of December in the City, promoting fifteen men to the priesthood and twenty-one to the episcopate in diverse places. When he passed from this world to the Father, he was buried in the basilica of Blessed Peter. The episcopate was vacant for seven days.

Pope John writes as follows to the bishop of Syracuse, in Cause XVI, Question II, chapter Visis:

> Your fraternity added that a considerable dispute and sedition arose between clerics and monks from this cause—namely, by whom priests ought to be instituted there for the churches of the monks. Let no one doubt that this occurs at the instigation of the cunning enemy. For he has a thousand modes of doing harm, and we are not ignorant of his craftiness. From the beginning of his fall he endeavors to cut apart the unity of the Church, to wound charity, to infect the sweetness of holy works with the gall of envy, and by every means he can to overthrow and disturb the human race. For he grieves greatly and is ashamed that steadfast human beings, formed from earthen material, maintain upon earth the charity that he himself was unable to possess in heaven. Therefore, so far as is granted to our frailty, we must fortify every approach against his cunning for doing harm, lest death enter our gates.

> Accordingly, after the counsel of many brothers has been diligently sought, we decree that henceforth churches handed over to monks are to have their priests instituted through their own members. For divine and secular laws hold that the institution belongs to him whose possession it is. And if charity was ready in giving what is greater, let holy liberality be readier in granting what is lesser. For it was greater to give the possession than to grant the investiture. For how would the rights of a possessor be acknowledged and the things granted to him be returned to him as his own, where what is his is given through another and is taken away when that other wills? For it is a human custom to fear him by whose judgment and will one is now raised up and now cast down.

Thus it is written there. But concerning this matter—namely, concerning the chaplains of monks—you have there in the gloss what the law is.

III. Agapitus

The fifty-fifth in the see of Peter was Agapitus, a Roman by nation, from a father named Gordian, a priest. There are diverse opinions concerning how long he was in the chair of Peter. John of Columna asserts that he sat for eleven years; according to others, only one year, which appears truer.

Theodahad, king of the Goths and of Italy, sent this blessed pontiff to Constantinople to Emperor Justinian. For he had heard that Justinian was most gravely disturbed against him on account of the death of the daughter of King Theodoric, because Theodahad had caused or permitted it. Theodahad believed that through the mediation of the pontiff the prince would be reconciled to him.

Coming to Constantinople, Agapitus was received with great glory by Justinian. But, after holding a conference with that prince, he discovered that he had fallen into the pestiferous dogma of the Eutychians. For he had been seduced by Anthimus, bishop of Constantinople.

When the blessed pontiff steadfastly rebuked the emperor because he had stained the majesty of the Roman Empire with the pollution of perverse dogma, the emperor at first bore that rebuke gravely, so that he said to him, “Either consent to us, or I shall cause you to be carried into exile.”

The most blessed pope, in no way moved, said to him: “I, a sinner, desired indeed to come to the most Christian emperor Justinian, but I have found Diocletian. Nevertheless, emperor, I do not fear your threats, so long as the true faith remains unshaken in me.”

The emperor, marveling at his holy constancy, was restrained from that fury of his. He commanded a council of the eastern bishops to be assembled in the royal city. When it had assembled, Blessed Agapitus, in the presence of the prince Justinian, proved against Anthimus from the words of the Gospels that there were two natures in the Lord Jesus Christ. When Anthimus had been convicted but was unwilling to withdraw from his obstinacy, he was condemned and deposed.

Then the emperor Justinian, filled with joy, humbled himself before the Apostolic See and adored the most blessed Pope Agapitus. He asked him to institute a Catholic bishop in the city of Constantinople. Agapitus set over that city as bishop a certain most holy man named Mennas.

After Blessed Agapitus had obtained from the emperor those things for which he had been sent by King Theodahad and was preparing himself for the return, he was seized by a grave illness and died at Constantinople. His body, however, was translated to Rome and buried in the church of Blessed Peter.

He held one ordination and ordained four deacons and eleven bishops. The episcopate was vacant for one month and twenty-six days.

Pope Agapitus says in Distinction I, On Consecration:

> The Catholic vessel, the trumpet of the Gospel, the herald of justice—that is, the priest—erased with Catholic prayers the sacred coverings of the altar and see that had been infected with the sacrilegious names of the Arians.

IV. Silverius

After Agapitus had been taken from this world, Silverius, the fifty-sixth pontiff, received the supreme prelacy. He was a Campanian by nation, from a father named Horimisda, bishop of Rome [read: from a father named Hormisdas, bishop of Rome], concerning whom something was said above. Silverius was nevertheless legitimate, because before Hormisdas was promoted to the clergy he had a wife, by whom he begot Silverius.

Silverius sat for one year, five months, and eleven days. Although he was a holy and good man, nevertheless, at the will and compulsion of King Theodahad, he was made pope without a decree of the clergy. For Theodahad had commanded that whoever did not consent to his ordination should be punished by the sword.

Therefore, the priests did not subscribe according to the ancient custom of the Roman Church, nor did they confirm a decree before his consecration. But afterward, because of the scandal that could arise, the priests subscribed themselves to his decree. King Theodahad, who had introduced this most evil and detestable custom into the Church, died not long afterward by the judgment of God.

Meanwhile Theodora, wife of Emperor Justinian, who was contaminated by the heresy of the Eutychians, grieved that Anthimus the patriarch had been deposed by Blessed Agapitus for his error. She sent letters to Pope Silverius, asking him either to come to her at Constantinople or to remove and depose Mennas, whom Pope Agapitus had made patriarch of Constantinople, and recall Anthimus.

But Pope Silverius, placing his hope in the Lord and knowing that one must obey God rather than human beings, wrote back to the empress: “Far be it from me, lady empress, ever to do this thing: to recall to the apostolic summit a heretical man already condemned in his perfidy.”

On hearing this, the empress, filled with a womanly fury, wrote to Belisarius the patrician, who was then at Rome, that, when an occasion had been taken, he should remove Pope Silverius from the pontifical see and carry him into exile. At that time the empress used the counsel of a certain Vigilius, who was then the representative of the Roman Church in the royal city. For, led by ambition, he aspired to the papacy.

When it became known among the Romans that the pontiff Silverius had incurred the empress’s indignation, certain false witnesses rose against him and accused him, leading him, of having sent letters to the king of the Goths [read: accused him, saying that he had sent letters to the king of the Goths], who was beyond the Po and commanded the Goths there, saying: “Come to Rome with an army, and I shall open for you the gate that is beside the Lateran and shall hand over to you Belisarius the patrician.”

Hearing this, Belisarius gave it no credence, for he knew that they were led by envy. Nevertheless, he caused Silverius to come to him. When he came into the palace, a certain subdeacon named John suddenly removed the pallium from his neck. After he had been taken away from their midst, stripped of his pontifical vestments, and clothed in a monastic garment, one of his clerics who had seen this went outside and announced to the clergy, saying, “The lord pope has been deposed and made a monk.” Hearing this, they all fled.

But Vigilius the deacon received him under his pledge and sent him into exile on the Pontian Islands, where he sustained him with the bread of tribulation and the water of anguish. Dying not long afterward, Silverius, a true confessor of Christ, rendered his spirit to the Lord and was buried in that same place. A multitude of the sick who fled to him was healed.

He held one ordination during the month of December and ordained fourteen priests and nineteen bishops for diverse places. The episcopate was vacant for one day.

Concerning him it is written as follows in the Decretals, Cause XXIII, Question IV:

> Gilisarius our patrician [read: Belisarius our patrician] commanded me to come peacefully to him in the prince’s palace for certain ecclesiastical dispositions. At the first and second curtain—that is, the chamber or door, according to the gloss—he detained all the clergy and people who came with me and permitted no one to enter except me alone and Vigilius our deacon. But after I had been detained by force and led before the aforesaid patrician, they sent me into exile, in which I am sustained only with the bread of tribulation and the water of anguish.
> Nevertheless, I have not relinquished, nor do I relinquish, my office. Rather, with the bishops whom I was able to assemble, I anathematized those who did such things against me; and together with them I established by apostolic authority that no one should ever be deceived in the way that I was deceived.

The same Silverius says to the aforesaid Vigilius:

> Therefore, together with those who consent to you, possess the sentence of full damnation; and let the name and office of the priestly ministry be taken away from you.

The gloss explains: so that he cannot obtain it.

As Gratian adds in the following section, Silverius did this lawfully and most justly, because he avenged not his own injury but that of the Church, for the injury of a prelate insofar as he is a prelate is the injury of the Church. Yet he could also avenge his own injury, because he had no superior, according to the gloss.

Note there a twofold defect in the text. The first occurs where, in the preceding chapter Obicitur, it says “that of Silvester.” The word is corrupted, as may be believed, by the fault of a copyist, because it intends to say “that of Silverius”; he was not called Silvester, but Pope Silverius. The second defect is that the chapter begins “Gilisarius,” where the first letter is changed. For it intends to say “Belisarius,” as is evident from the chronicles.

V. Vigilius

After Silverius, the aforesaid Vigilius was created the fifty-seventh pope. He was a Roman by nation, from a father named John, a consul. He sat for seventeen years, six months, and twenty-five days.

After the empress Theodora learned this, she immediately wrote to the pope that, according to what had been promised, he should recall the heretic Anthimus. Vigilius sent her this response: “Far be this from me, lady empress. For if at the beginning I spoke evilly and foolishly, I grieve for it. But now, although I am unworthy, I am the vicar of Christ and Blessed Peter on earth. Therefore, I in no way consent to restore to his former state a heretical and anathematized man, justly condemned by my most holy predecessors Agapitus and Silverius.”

When the empress learned this, she was greatly disturbed, but for some time concealed the fury that she had conceived against Vigilius.

Meanwhile Totila, king of the Goths, reduced the city of Rome to his power after many other cities of Italy had been captured and laid waste, and the Romans were dispersed here and there, as will be said in the following chapter. Some of the number of the senators, afflicted together with Pope Vigilius, hastened to Constantinople and explained to Emperor Justinian the calamities to which Rome was subjected. Receiving them kindly, the emperor consoled them and promised soon to aid the calamities of the City, which he did, as will be said.

But Pope Vigilius, who had earlier been received by the emperor, was unwilling to recall the heretic Anthimus at Theodora’s suggestion. After he endured many reproaches, he was thrust into exile at the emperor’s command, together with the clerics who had followed him from the City. When he had remained there for some time, afflicted by many exactions, he was recalled by the emperor through the intercession of the Roman people and nobles. While returning, he died on the island of Sicily.

Helinand, however, as Vincent reports in Book XXII of the Historical Mirror, speaks otherwise concerning this Pope Vigilius. Namely, when Vigilius was unwilling to recall Anthimus to the episcopate, as was evident, Theodora, wife of Justinian, sent a certain scribe to Rome to bring Vigilius to Constantinople by force.

When he had been placed in a ship and the ship had moved, the Roman people cast stones, sticks, and cooking pots after him, saying: “You did evil to the Romans; may you also find evil where you are going. Famine be with you; mortality be with you.”

After he entered Constantinople, they were in contention for two years concerning the recall of Anthimus. Vigilius did not consent to it, saying: “It was not Justinian and Theodora who caused me to come here, but Diocletian and a female lictor. Do what you will; I receive things worthy of my deeds.”

Then a certain man struck him with the palm of his hand, saying: “Do you not know to whom you speak, murderer? For you killed Pope Silverius and the son of a widow with kicks and clubs.”

Then Vigilius fled to the basilica of Blessed Euphemia and held the column of the altar. Dragged from it, he was cast outside the church. With ropes placed around his neck, he was dragged through the whole city until evening. He was then sent into prison, where a little bread and water were given to him. The Roman clergy who had come with him were sent into exile to diverse places to cut metals.

This Vigilius established as follows, in Distinction I, On Consecration:

> If the fabric of any church has been destroyed, it must be restored. If the solemnity of consecration ought to be restored in that place in which there were no sanctuaries, we judge that it presents no obstacle if water that has not been exorcized is cast through it, because in the consecration of any church in which an altar of the Holy Spirit is not placed, we know there to be only the celebration of Masses.
> Therefore, if any basilica of the saints has even been renewed from its foundations without movement of the altar, without any doubt, when the solemnity of Masses has been celebrated in it, the consecration of the whole sanctification will be fulfilled. But if the sanctuaries that it possessed—that is, the relics of the altar—have been removed, it will again receive the reverence of sanctification by their deposition and by the solemnity of Masses.

Thus it is written there. The expression is obscure; but see the gloss.

Vigilius was succeeded in the pontificate by Pelagius, the fifty-eighth pope, who sat for eleven years, ten months, and eighteen days. At the beginning of his episcopate there was no one in the City who wished to communicate with him, asserting that he had consented to the death of Pope Vigilius and had been the cause of his being afflicted with such great penalties and afflictions.

For this reason, after the clergy and people had been assembled at Saint Peter's, before Narses the emperor's chamberlain, Pelagius ascended the ambo. Holding the Gospels and a cross over his head, he swore that he had inflicted no evil upon Vigilius. Thus the people and clergy were calmed.

Note that there were two popes named Pelagius. One was this man concerning whom we now speak; the other was he who was immediately before Pope Gregory and after this first Pelagius. Since many chapters attributed to Pelagius are cited in the Decretals, and it is not said whether they are from the first or second, this must therefore be attended to.

VI. John III

After Pelagius, John III, the fifty-ninth, sat in the see of Peter. He was a Roman by nation and remained in it for twelve years, eleven months, and twenty-six days.

When this blessed pontiff learned that Narses was justly moved against the Roman people because they had complained to Emperor Justin concerning his government as he governed Italy, the pope himself considered how many good things had proceeded from the presence and providence of Narses, not only for the Romans but for all Italy. He hastened swiftly to Naples and strove with tears to reconcile him to the Romans, so that he would return again to Rome.

Narses said to him: "Say, most holy pope: what evil have I done to the Romans? I shall go to the feet of the prince, so that all Italy may know how I labored with all my strength to rescue it from the hands of the barbarians."

Nevertheless, at the persuasion of the pontiff, Narses returned to Rome and strove to recall the Lombards from entering Italy, but he was unable. For Alboin, king of the Lombards, who had received letters from him through a messenger that he should enter Italy, was already moved by a certain indignation, as will be said in the following chapter. Having already assembled great forces with their wives, children, and all their equipment, they had abandoned Pannonia and undertaken the journey. The king himself and the Lombards entered Italy in the year of the Lord 568.

Pope John says as follows in Cause XVI, Question III:

> Moreover, if anyone raises a complaint about the number of years, let him know that between Christians and those who are of one faith a fixed number has been appointed for prescription. But where the fury of pagans and unbelievers is involved in the case, however much time may pass, it does not prejudice the right of churches, which, not knowing corporeal arms, await God alone as their champion, when it pleases him to have mercy. But if length of years impedes in such matters, God himself must be reproved, who after four hundred thirty years freed the children of Israel from the servitude of Pharaoh, and the Redeemer himself, who after thousands of years freed the human race from hell.

VII. Benedict I and Gregory's Intended Mission to the English

After John III was taken from this light, Benedict I, the sixtieth pope, was created. He was a Roman by nation. After four years, two months, and one day less, he departed from life.

While he presided at Rome, there was a great famine in Italy, and especially at Rome. For the nation of the Lombards had consumed all things round about with hostile fury. Therefore, at the pontiff's prayers, lest the Romans be endangered by want, the most pious Emperor Justin sent ships to Egypt to carry grain to Rome. When the ships put in at the port, it freed not only the City itself but all Italy from the plague of famine [read: When the ships put in at the port, they freed not only the City itself but all Italy from the plague of famine].

At that time, as John of Columna writes, the Spaniards and Franks differed in celebrating Easter. For the Spaniards celebrated Easter on the twelfth day before the Kalends of April, but the Franks on the fourteenth day before the Kalends of May. That the Franks celebrated rightly became clear by divine means through this: the fonts in Spain that were accustomed to be filled spontaneously by divine power on the Holy Saturday of Easter for baptizing were filled not on the Easter of the Spaniards but on that of the Franks.

By this Pope Benedict, Gregory was ordained cardinal deacon. At his urgent request, he was permitted to depart to preach to the English, but very swiftly, because of the excessive complaint of the Romans, he was recalled from the journey he had begun, as Vincent notes in Book XXII of the Historical Mirror.

For one day, when many wares had been brought to the City by merchants and many people gathered from here and there to buy, it happened that Gregory, before he ascended to the supreme pontificate, passed through the marketplace. He saw certain boys exposed for sale there, of a milk-white color and a comely countenance, and having hair of exceptional brightness.

Looking at them, he asked from what region they had been brought. He was told that they came from Britain, whose inhabitants were all of a similar color. When he inquired whether the people of that island were Christians, he heard that they were pagans.

Then Gregory, drawing long sighs from his inmost heart, said: “Alas, what grief, that the author of darkness possesses such bright countenances, and that a nation with so pleasing an appearance of the brow bears a mind empty of inward joys.”

Again he asked what the name of that nation was. He was told that they were called Angles. “Well,” he said, “for they have angelic faces, and it is fitting that such persons should be coheirs of the angels in heaven.”

“What name,” he asked, “does the province itself have from which they were brought?” It was answered that those provincials were called Deiri. Gregory said, “They are called Deiri because they are to be led from the wrath of God to the mercy of Christ.”

Therefore, approaching the supreme pontiff, inflamed with zeal for their conversion, he asked him to abandon certain ministers of the word of God to the nation of the English in Britain [read: he asked him to send certain ministers of the word of God to the nation of the English in Britain], through whom they might be converted to Christ. He offered himself as ready for this, if it pleased the apostolic lord. Although with difficulty, the pope, overcome by Gregory’s unwearied entreaties, consented.

Concealing the business of his departure from his fellow citizens lest they impede him, Gregory undertook the journey with the apostolic blessing as swiftly as he could. But when it came to the people’s knowledge, all the citizens and suburban inhabitants, hearing it, ran to the church of Blessed Peter. As the apostolic lord went to the church, they cried out to him with a terrible voice: “Alas, apostolic lord, what have you done? You have offended Saint Peter; you have destroyed Rome, because you have dismissed Gregory.”

Moved by these voices and fearing the outcry of the people, the supreme pontiff sent an embassy after him with the greatest haste, commanding him to return to Rome as swiftly as possible.

When Gregory had now completed three days’ journeys and was resting in a certain meadow around the sixth hour, while the others were occupied with necessary matters and Gregory was reading, a locust approached. Leaping onto the page that he was running through, it settled there. Gregory, perceiving that it remained very tamely in the place where it had settled, began to interpret its name to his companions: “Locust—as though, ‘Stay in the place,’” intimating to his companions that they would not pursue the journey farther, as happened.

For apostolic messengers suddenly came, with their sweating horses wearied, bearing letters that commanded his return. Others nevertheless say that it was not Pope Benedict but Pelagius who permitted Gregory to set out for England and afterward recalled him. But the first account is truer, as is evident from the history.

Title XII, Chapter II

After the death of Benedict, Pelagius, the sixty-first pontiff, a Roman by nation, undertook the governance of the Roman pontificate. He sat for ten years, two months, and ten days.

He was consecrated pope without the emperor being consulted, because the Lombards were already besieging the City, so that they could not go out safely.

Gregory, who became pope after him, was afterward sent by him to Constantinople as representative—or Gregory was sent by Pope Benedict and afterward confirmed in the same office by Pelagius. There, in the presence of Emperor Tiberius, he confuted Eutychius, patriarch of Constantinople, who held an evil opinion concerning the resurrection of bodies—namely, that they would be airy and subtler than the winds. There also, at the exhortation of Leander, bishop of Seville, he composed part of the book of the Morals upon Job.

Around that time the Goths who inhabited the Spains returned from Arian perfidy to the Catholic faith. For Hermenegild, son of the king of the Spains, took as wife the sister of Aildebert [i.e., Childebert II], king of the Franks, a most devout girl. Through her exhortation and the preaching of Blessed Leander, Hermenegild was converted from the Arian perfidy in which his father languished to the true faith.

When his father learned this, he endeavored to persuade him by rewards and bend him by terrors to return to the sect of his perfidy. When Hermenegild answered that he could never abandon the true faith that he had come to know, though late, his angered father first deprived him of the kingdom after all his earthly possessions had been taken away. But when he could not soften the strength of his mind even in this way, he confined him in prison and bound his neck and hands with iron.

On the day of the approaching Paschal solemnity, in the untimely silence of the night, his perfidious father sent a bishop of the Arian perfidy so that Hermenegild might receive from his hand the communion of a sacrilegious consecration and through this he merits returning to his father's favor [read: and through this might merit to return to his father's favor].

But the youth beloved by God reproached the Arian bishop who came, as he ought, and repelled his perfidy from himself with fitting rebukes. For although outwardly he lay bound, inwardly he nevertheless remained erect upon the great summit of the mind.

When these things were reported to his father, he roared again with an insane mind. Immediately he sent attendants, commanding them to kill Hermenegild in the place where he lay bound. Entering the prison at once, they fixed an axe in his brain and took away the life of his body.

Divine miracles were not lacking to show his true glory. For in the nocturnal silence of the night, the singing of psalmody was heard and lamps were seen beside the body of that king and martyr.

When his perfidious father heard this, he was moved and, doing penance, grieved that he had done it, though not so far as to obtain salvation. For he recognized that the Catholic faith was true, but, terrified by the vain fear of his nation, he did not merit to arrive at it.

Nevertheless, when illness arose and he was brought to his last extremity, he took care to commend his son Reccared—whom he was leaving in his own perfidy and in the kingdom—to Bishop Leander, whom he had earlier afflicted greatly. He asked Leander to accomplish in Reccared by his exhortations such things as he had accomplished in his brother.

After his father's death, King Reccared followed not his perfidious father but his martyred brother and was converted from the Arian heresy to the true faith. He brought the whole nation of the Visigoths to the true faith so completely that he permitted no one to serve as a soldier in his kingdom who existed as an enemy of the kingdom of God through heresy.

These things Gregory says in the book of the Dialogues. It is also contained in Cause XXIV, Question I, in the final chapter, which begins Coepit.

Pope Pelagius was very abundant in establishing decrees, as is evident in many places in the Decretals. Against schismatics he says as follows in Cause XXIV, Question I:

> Schism itself, which is a Greek word, signifies a rending. But there cannot be a rending in unity. Therefore, he who communicates with schismatics does not communicate with unity. They made parties for themselves and, separating themselves from that which is one—to speak in the words of the Apostle Jude—they do not have the Spirit.
> From all these things this is effected: because they are not one in unity, because they wished to be in a party, and because they do not have the Spirit, they cannot possess the sacrifice of the body of Christ.

The present question for us is not whether we ought to tolerate evil persons, but whether we ought to be associated with schismatics. Even if they, abounding in their own opinion, nevertheless sought the truth while placed within their mother's inward parts, they were not to be repelled by us until, with reason as guide, the truth of the matter became clear to them.

But because they divided themselves from the universal Church, as Blessed Augustine says, every Catholic securely detests that party which he knows does not communicate with the universal Church strengthened by the apostolic sees.

Nor does it lighten their crime, but rather increases it, that you said they resisted for a long time so that they might not receive into their communion those who communicate with the apostolic sees. For in this, although those who wished to communicate with such persons must also be blamed, much more must those be execrated who separated themselves from communion with the apostolic sees not only in the priests but also in the laity themselves.

Nor does it profit them that in the same letters you report them to have suspended themselves from communion by nature [read: from our communion] either through ignorance of reason or through simplicity of their understanding. For this itself is rather the reason they are schismatics: not a judgment of holding diverse opinions, but a certain most evil opinion divided them, since they feared things reported among themselves yet unknown to them and rashly believed against the Apostolic See. Blessed Augustine declares that these persons are especially schismatics.

Since there cannot be two Churches, either you believe those persons—namely, the schismatics—to be the Church, and thus, which God forbid, you will judge us schismatics; or, if it is established that the true Church is in the apostolic sees, recognize them as divided from unity and recognize that the question of communion has been removed, since it is established that true communion cannot exist except in unity.

Therefore, do not wish, as though there were no difference between schismatics and the Church, to be associated indifferently with the sacrifices of both. That which a schismatic confects is not the body of Christ, if we are directed with truth as guide.

Thus he says. But this last statement must be understood soundly according to the gloss, and rightly: namely, that a schismatic does not confect the sacrament of the Eucharist when he does not preserve the form of the Church. Or, if he preserves the form, that which he confects is said not to be the body of Christ with respect to its effect, not with respect to the true sacrament, because in the person confecting it, or in one knowingly receiving it from him, it works not salvation but destruction on account of their abuse.

The same Pelagius says as follows against those who said that the Church carries out persecution when she punishes the evil or compels them to keep the good that was promised, in Cause XXIII, Question V:

Let not the empty words of persons who say that the Church carries out persecution hinder you when she either restrains the things that are committed or seeks the salvation of souls. They were inventors of this report. No one persecutes except him who compels another to evil. But he who punishes evil already done, or prohibits it from being done, does not persecute but loves.

For if, as they think, no one is either to be rebuked from evil or compelled to good, human and divine laws must be made void, which, at the persuasion of justice, establish both punishment for the evil and rewards for the good.

That schism is an evil and that persons of this kind ought to be repressed even through external powers, both the authority of canonical Scripture and the truth of the rules of the fathers teach us. Therefore, whoever is divided from the apostolic sees is undoubtedly in schism and endeavors to erect an altar against the universal Church.

But let your Glory consider what the canon inserted in the Synod of Chalcedon establishes concerning such persons. For there it decrees in substance that those who make a schism in the Church, rebelling against their superiors, and who, after being admonished, scorn to obey, ought to be excommunicated and deposed. If they persist in making seditions in the Church, they are to be repressed through secular powers.

And below:

Blessed Augustine also says concerning such persons: "Many things must be done even with the unwilling, who are to be punished by a certain kindly severity, and whose benefit rather than their will must be consulted. For in correcting a son, however harshly, paternal love is not thereby lost."

Therefore, you also are to do what we, knowing the intention of your Christianity, frequently exhort: give your labor so that such things may not be permitted to occur further. For your Highness ought to remember what God did through you at that time when Totila the tyrant possessed both Istria and Venetia and the Franks were also laying waste all things. Nevertheless, you did not permit a bishop of Milan to be made before you had reported the matter to the most clement prince and learned again through his > writings what ought to be done. Amid enemies raging everywhere, both the man who was being ordained and the man who was to ordain him were nevertheless conducted to Ravenna by the providence of your Highness.

Thus it is written there.

The same pope says to Narses the patrician, in the chapter following in the same cause and question:

> What am I to say concerning the Ligurian and Venetian bishops and the Istrians, whom your fitting Excellence knows how to repress by both reason and power, while you permit them to glory in their rusticity in contempt of the apostolic sees?

And below:

> Therefore, do not hesitate to repress persons of this kind by princely or judicial authority. For the rules of the fathers have specially established that if any person holding an ecclesiastical office resists him to whom he is subject, gathers separately, erects another altar, or makes a schism, he is to be excommunicated and condemned. But if perhaps he scorns even this and persists in making divisions and schisms, he is to be repressed by the public powers.

This Pelagius ordained and commanded that no patriarch ought to call himself universal. He also established that neither archbishop, primate, nor patriarch could ordain before receiving the pallium, and that within three months of his confirmation he ought to seek consecration and the pallium from the Apostolic See; otherwise he is punished, as in Distinction C, chapter I.

Concerning general councils he says as follows in Distinction XVII:

> We are instructed anew by many apostolic, canonical, and ecclesiastical rules that general councils ought to be celebrated without the judgment of the Roman pontiff.

And below, at the end:

> But the greater and more difficult questions, as the holy synod established and blessed custom requires, are always to be brought to the Apostolic See.

Thus it is written there—namely, questions that concern the faith or the universal state of the Church.

The same pope, in Distinction I, On Consecration, declares all the prefaces that are said in the Mass: namely, on the Resurrection; on the Ascension of the Lord; on Pentecost; on the feast of the Trinity; on the Nativity of the Lord; on the Epiphany of the Lord; concerning the Apostles; concerning the Holy Cross; and concerning the fast in the Forty Days. The preface concerning the Virgin Mary is also added. These are in addition to the common daily preface.

The same Pelagius, writing to Antonina the patrician concerning monks, says in Cause XVI, Question I, chapter De praesentium:

> I hold it exceedingly bitter that persons are led from the purpose of the monastic life to the office of defender—that is, of judge, advocate, and procurator—in which the things promised to God by monks can in no way be fulfilled. For there is every kind of difference between that habit and this office. There are rest, prayer, and labor of the hands in the former; but here there are the examination of causes, summonses, acts, public lawsuits, and whatever either ecclesiastical ordinances or the necessity of petitioners demands.
> May God cause those who either nurture in that habit under you or grow up in monasteries [read: those who are either nurtured by you in that habit or grow up in monasteries] to be such that, at an advanced age and after a proven life, they may be promoted not to the offices of lawsuits but to the priesthood.

The same Pelagius granted by dispensation that a certain man who, after the death of his wife, had possessed a female servant as a concubine while in the lay state could be promoted to the diaconate, provided that he dismissed her. He writes to the bishop of Florence in Distinction XXXIV, chapter Fraternitatis, saying:

> Because the deficiency of our time, in which not only the merits but the very bodies of persons have failed, does not permit the rigor of that strictness to remain; and the age of the man who is under consideration is known to remove the suspicion of future incontinence.

The same pope says to Narses the patrician:

> Because we know that, by the hidden judgment of God, your soul has been guarded from contamination by schism, even though through the iniquity and pride of others, we have given thanks to almighty God, who is accustomed to work good things even from the evil acts of human beings.

This is in Cause XXIII, Question V, chapter Relegentes.

The same pope says as follows concerning continence in Cause XXVII, Question I, chapter De viduis:

> Just as widows or virgins, if perhaps they were unable to contain themselves, were in no way forbidden to marry according to the Apostle, so, after holding deliberation with themselves, they ought to preserve the faith of chastity promised to God. But we ought to cast no snare upon such persons, but only to set before them exhortations concerning the eternal reward and the penalties of divine judgment, so that our conscience may also be absolved and their intention may render an account for itself to God.
> One must indeed beware of that to which the blessed Apostle bears witness concerning their conduct and acts, saying—

We pass over explaining this more fully, lest the unstable sex seem not so much terrified as admonished.

The same pope, writing concerning changes of places to Benignus the archbishop, says as follows in Cause VII, Question I:

> Know, most beloved brother, that it is one thing to act from a cause of necessity or utility, and another from a cause of presumption and one's own will. Therefore, he does not change his see who does not change his mind—that is, he who migrates from city to city not for the sake of avarice, domination, his own will, or affection, but is changed for a cause of necessity or utility. For the utility of many must be preferred to the utility or will of one person.
>
> For it is one thing to change, another to be changed; and one thing to cross over spontaneously, another to come under compulsion and necessity. Therefore, those who do this not spontaneously but under compulsion do not change a city, but are changed.

The same pope says to the same person in the following chapter:

> Everyone who groaned and who feared Saul [read: who was oppressed by Saul] fled and came to David. If David, the most pious and most just king, knew it to be a sin to receive those fleeing persecution and passing from place to place, he would by no means receive such persons, keep such persons with him, or place them in other cities.
>
> Those who persecute bishops and compel them to go from city to city persecute not so much them as our Lord Jesus Christ, whose embassy they discharge. But those who deny that mercy is to be shown to fugitives and to those suffering necessity deny Christ himself, who is mercy and truth.

The same pope says in Cause VII, Question III, chapter Talia:

> Certain persons, knowing that they cannot be brought to the episcopate by age, knowledge, or merits of life, wish to disturb the Church for this purpose alone: that the future bishop may promise them immunity concerning those things that they have seized from it, and that ambition for the episcopate may become security for robbery.

And below:

> Cause Elpidius the deacon, elected as though by all, to hasten to us. Nevertheless, through your Dilection and by the present command, we specially admonish him not to promise anyone that he will give or is going to give anything; nor to dare to make or promise any security to anyone concerning past ecclesiastical causes; nor, as though already made bishop, to permit those things that have been plundered to remain freely so.

The same pope writes as follows to the illustrious Eresconius, in Cause X, Question III:

> We wish you to guard this by every means: that none of the bishops of Sicily presume to receive more than two solidi from the parishes pertaining to him under the name of the cathedraticum, nor compel the priests or clergy of their parishes to prepare banquets for them beyond their resources.

The same pope writes as follows to Sergius the chancellor, in Cause XI, Question I:

> If any cleric, whether of an inferior or superior grade, exists as a plaintiff and directs his actions against a lay person, let him by every means go nowhere other than before the judge of the province to plead his case. But if any lay person has considered that a cleric of any grade is to be sued, let him set forth before the judgment of the bishops established in the same city or territory the actions that he thinks he possesses.
>
> That rule which commands the plaintiff to follow the forum of the defendant manifestly demonstrates this order to agree and accord in all respects with the laws.

Title XII, Chapter III

Gregory succeeded Pelagius as the sixty-second in the number of the pontiffs.

“Gregory” is interpreted “watching,” which agrees with him most excellently. For he watched toward God by the light of grace, with the passions lulled through contemplation, according to that word of the Song: “I sleep, and my heart watches.”

He watched over himself, perfectly resisting vices and adhering to virtues, continually standing prepared against the snares of the devil through humility, prayer, and fear, according to that word of Christ: “Watch, praying at every time, that you may be able to flee all those things”—namely, dangers—“and to stand before the sight of God.”

He watched over his neighbors and subjects with respect to their souls, especially through moral doctrine; and not only over those of his own time, but perpetually over future human beings through the books published by him. With respect to their bodies, he watched through the greatest liberality. No pontiff is found who watched in such a manner to provide for the poor. He fulfilled that word of the Apocalypse: “Be watchful.”

Finally, John the Deacon says that, when as a teachable youth Gregory had passed with the commonly traversed course from the rising of infancy to the fork of the Pythagorean letter, he began without hesitation to abandon the left branch together with the pleasure of the world and to pant with all his strength toward the right branch with heavenly desire.

For understanding this, one must know concerning the Pythagorean letter that the letter Y was invented by him. When a boy ascends to the use of reason, if he hands himself over to vices, he takes the branch of that letter that descends to the depths. But if he takes the way of the virtues, he ascends by the right branch to the things above, although laboriously.

Gregory I, who is also called the Great because of his exceptional sanctity, the sublimity especially of his moral wisdom—in which he surpassed almost all the doctors—and his most worthy administration of the supreme pontificate with the greatest humility, since nothing shines more brightly upon the neck of a pontiff than humility, as he himself says in Distinction C, chapter Contra morem, received the Church of God to govern after Pelagius died from the plague.

Although unwilling, under the compulsion of all the clergy, the acclamation of the Roman people, and the assent of Emperor Maurice, he was found after his desired flight. Lest he appear contrary to the will of God, he received the burden. He was the sixty-second in the order of the Roman pontiffs, an order that he especially adorned.

Something will be said more diffusely concerning both his life and his doctrine. Paul, the historian of the Lombards, wrote his life, which John the Deacon afterward compiled more diligently.

This Gregory, therefore, born from senatorial stock, had as his father Gordian and as his mother Silvia, most noble Romans. When in his youth he had attained the highest summit of philosophy and abounded in a supply of possessions and riches, he nevertheless thought of abandoning all things and transferring himself to the state of religion.

But while he delayed his conversion for a longer time and thought that he would serve Christ more securely if under the appearance of the urban praetorship he outwardly rendered service to the world, many things arising from the care of the world began to grow against him. He was now held within the world not only in body but also in mind.

At length, deprived of his father, he constructed six monasteries in Sicily and built a seventh within the walls of the City, in his own dogma [read: on his own property], in honor of Saint Andrew the Apostle. There, after abandoning garments of silk radiant with gold and gems, he was covered by a cheap monastic habit.

There in a short time he came to such great perfection that at the very beginning of his conversion he could already be reckoned in the number of the perfect. His perfection can in some measure be weighed from the words that he wrote in the prologue to his work upon the Dialogues, where he says:

> My unhappy mind, struck by the wound of its occupation, remembers what it once was in the monastery: how greatly it rose above all things that are rolled away; how it was accustomed to think of nothing except heavenly things; how, although still retained by the body, it already passed beyond the very enclosures of the flesh through contemplation; and how it loved even death—which is a punishment to all—as the entrance to life and the reward of its labor.

Finally, he afflicted his body with such great strictness that, when his stomach had been weakened, he could scarcely subsist. Suffering a cutting of the vital parts, which the Greeks call syncope, he approached his departure through frequent agonies at successive moments of the hours.

Once, while he was writing something in the monastery over which he presided, an angel of the Lord came to him in the appearance of a shipwrecked man and tearfully asked that mercy be shown to him. Gregory caused six silver coins to be given to him, and the man departed. On the same day he returned again, asserting that he had lost many things and received few. After he received the same number of silver coins from Gregory, he returned again on the third day and with importunate cries asked that relief be given to him in his misery.

Gregory learned from the administrator of his monastery that nothing remained in the monastery to be given except a silver dish in which his mother had been accustomed to send him legumes. He immediately commanded it to be given, and the man departed at once with joy. This was an angel of the Lord, as he afterward revealed.

When Gregory commanded that all things pertaining to the conversion of religion be diligently observed, two of his monks, unable to bear the rigor of this discipline, departed without bidding farewell to their host. Perceiving this, Gregory, then abbot, as the best shepherd took care to recall the wandering sheep to the fold lest they perish. He sent certain persons after them to bring them back when they had been found.

The messengers left the City to seek them. The monks who had fled saw from afar those who were seeking them, but they themselves were not seen by the seekers. Therefore, so that they might not be found but might be passed by, they entered a certain cavern beside the road and hid themselves there.

When the mounted messengers arrived beside that place so that they might find them more swiftly, their horses stopped. Although they urged them with spurs, they could in no way lead them farther or back. Inspired by God that this might perhaps be happening because those whom they sought were nearby, they entered the cave, found them hiding, and brought them back. Who would doubt that this was done by Gregory's merits?

Two others also, when they had resolved to depart from the monastery, were seized by the devil, and one of them was also deprived of sight. After they confessed their sin—namely, the flight they intended—they were freed by Gregory from the demon's torment. Similarly, another who had committed theft, retaining part of the price from a certain thing sold, was tormented by the devil until he confessed the sin to Gregory.

On the other hand, there were many monks of holy life in that monastery. Concerning a certain Gerentius [i.e., Gerontius], Gregory himself narrates that, when Gerentius [i.e., Gerontius] was placed in grave sickness, he saw men clothed in white—that is, angels—descending from the regions above into that monastery. One of them said: "Venim for this purpose [read: We have come for this purpose]: to send certain brothers from Gregory's monastery into military service." One, commanding another, said: "Write down Marcellus, Valentinian, and certain others—and this sick man himself, who beholds us." All of them were successively called away by the Lord a little afterward.

Moreover, while Gregory himself was abbot, when all private ownership had been eliminated in the monastery, it happened that one of his monks named Justus, who was skilled in the art of medicine and sometimes, with Gregory's permission, provided medicines or counsel for health to the sick, was led by cupidity at the devil's instigation. He secretly retained as his own three gold coins offered to him by a certain man.

When Justus became ill and was visited by his fellow brothers, those gold coins were found among his medicines. This was reported to Gregory. The holy man understood the vice of private ownership to empty out the whole regular life, as experience teaches. He detested the crime exceedingly and commanded most strictly, as punishment for the offense, that none of the monks ought to visit Justus any longer. Only his own brother, who dwelt as a layman in that monastery, was to minister necessities to him, and through that brother the cause for the withdrawal of the customary fraternal visitation was to be explained to him.

When this was observed to the letter, the monk Justus understood from the punishment the gravity of his fault, groaned vehemently for his sin, and ended his life from that sickness.

When Gregory heard of his death, he was not content with that punishment. So that he might banish all private ownership from the monastery more and more, he punished the dead man also, commanding the monks to cast his body not in a sacred place but upon a dunghill, together with those three gold coins, saying to him while they performed this office: "Your money be with you unto perdition."

When these things had been accomplished, lest the man of God appear to have persecuted the person rather than the vice, after a little while he had compassion upon him. He commanded one of the monks, whom he judged more devout, to offer the sacrifice daily for him for as many as twenty-one days [read: for as many as thirty days].

When the monk had completed this, the dead man for whom the suffrage was being made appeared to his brother on the thirtieth day. When the brother asked how he fared, the dead man answered: "Until now I fared badly; now hutem well [read: but now I fare well], because today I received communion."

From this example it became widespread and most customary to celebrate thirty Masses for the dead. This is certainly most beneficial for those who are in purgatory. Other things being equal, if they are celebrated continuously, the suffrage will assist more than if they are interrupted, because it will be received more quickly, and not because the days have been discontinuous. For it appears absurd that such a suffrage would be ineffective on account of a discontinuity of days, since every Mass has its own value and degree of expiation, even if unknown to us. The greater the alms performed for a matter of this kind, the more, in comparison with other works, it will benefit the person for whom it is performed.

I. The Plague and Gregory's Election

In the seventh year of the reign of Maurice there was such a great inundation of waters that it was feared the world would again be dissolved by the waters of the flood. For at the city of Rome, because of continual rains, the River Tiber passed beyond its boundaries and flooded so greatly that it occupied the greater part of the City and overturned many houses.

Marvelous to tell, that inundation carried with it a multitude of serpents, among which a very great dragon was also seen. As this multitude of serpents descended toward the sea, they were suffocated by the salt waves and cast upon the shore. So great a stench followed from their accumulated multitude that it corrupted the entire adjoining region with its odor.

On account of this stench and the corruption of the air, the plague that they call inguinal followed throughout the entire surrounding region. It raged so greatly that within a few days many thousands of human beings died. Pope Pelagius died from this plague.

After he died, with the clergy, senate, and Roman people acclaiming, Gregory was named pope by the one consent of all. Declining the honor, he protested that he was unworthy of so great a priesthood. For the holy man feared that the glory of the world that he had earlier cast aside might at some time steal upon him beneath the color of ecclesiastical government.

When he saw the insistence of the entire people, he at some point feigned consent. He wrote to Emperor Maurice, whose son he had raised from the sacred font, adjuring him and asking with many entreaties that he never grant assent to the people's decree. But the prefect of the City, named Germanus, by God's will intercepted and retained his messenger and sent the will of the people, together with the decree of election, to the emperor.

On receiving it, the emperor rejoiced marvelously at the election of so great a man. He therefore granted his assent and, as was the custom, confirmed the decree.

Meanwhile, as the prince's assent was awaited, the plague devastated the people most gravely. Therefore, after the multitude had been assembled, the venerable deacon Gregory, as John of Columna writes, began an address of this kind to the people concerning penitence, saying:

> Most beloved brothers, it is fitting that we at least fear the scourges of God that we did not fear would come in the future, now that they are present and have been experienced. Let pain open for us an entrance to conversion, and let the very penalty that we suffer dissolve the hardness of our heart. For, as was foretold through the prophet, "The sword has reached even unto the soul."
> Behold, the whole people is struck by the blade of heavenly wrath, and individuals are laid waste by sudden slaughter. Sickness does not precede death, but, as you behold, death itself precedes the delays of sickness. The person struck is snatched away before he can be converted to the lamentations of penitence.
>
> Consider in what condition he arrives before the sight of the Judge, since he is not permitted to weep for what he did. The inhabitants are not removed in part, but fall together. Houses are left empty. Fathers behold the funerals of their sons, and their heirs precede them to destruction.
> Therefore, let each one of us flee to the lamentations of penitence while there is leisure to weep before the blow. Let us recall before the eyes of the mind whatever we committed by wandering, and let us punish by weeping what we did wickedly. Let us come before his face in confession and, as the prophet says, let us lift up our hearts with our hands to God.
>
> That he says through the prophet certainly gives confidence to our trembling: "I do not will the death of the sinner, but that he be converted and live." Let no one despair because of the enormity of his iniquities. For three days of penitence wiped away the long-standing faults of the Ninevites, and the converted thief merited the rewards of life even in the very sentence of his death.
>
> Therefore, let us change our hearts and presume that we have already received what we ask. The Judge is more swiftly bent to prayer if the sinner is corrected from his depravity. With the sword of so great a punishment hanging over us, let us persist in importunate prayers. For the importunity that is customarily displeasing among human beings pleases the judgment of Truth.
>
> Hence he says through the psalmist: "He calls upon me in the day of tribulation; I shall rescue you, and you will magnify me [read: Call upon me in the day of tribulation; I shall rescue you, and you will magnify me]." He himself is therefore witness concerning himself that he desires to have mercy upon those who call upon him, since he admonishes that he be invoked.
> Accordingly, dearest brothers, with a contrite heart and corrected works, tomorrow at first light let us come with a devout and > tearful mind to the sevenfold litany, according to the distribution designated below. Let none of you go out to earthly works in the fields. Let no one presume to conduct any business. Rather, assembling at the church of the holy Mother of God, let all of us who have sinned together lament together the evils we have done, so that the strict Judge, when he considers that we have punished our own faults, may himself spare us from the sentence of condemnation.

Accordingly, on the appointed day, a great multitude of every age, sex, and profession came according to the command of the deacon Gregory to beseech the Lord. By divine judgment the plague raged so greatly that, within the space of one hour, while the people uttered the voice of supplication, eighty persons fell to the ground and expired.

Nevertheless, the most eloquent doctor did not cease exhorting the people not to stop praying until, by divine mercy, the plague itself came to rest.

It was called the sevenfold litany or procession because Gregory established that they should proceed in seven orders. In the first order the clerics went before. In the second were monks and religious persons. In the third were all the nuns. In the fourth were infants and boys. In the fifth were virgins. In the sixth were all widows and continent persons. In the seventh were all married persons and the rest.

It is said that the most grievous plague happened in such a manner that, in sneezing or yawning, persons suddenly breathed out their spirits. Hence it was introduced by custom that in these acts one should say, “May God help you,” or make the sign of the cross.

This is intimated to have happened because the Romans had lived incontinently during Lent and, thus indisposed, had received communion at Easter; and afterward they occupied themselves more and more with lusts, games, and other vices.

II. Gregory’s Flight and Consecration

When Gregory, the future bishop, thought from his letters that the prince Maurice had not consented to the petition of all concerning his election, he afterward learned that his letters had been intercepted by Germanus, prefect of the City. Fearing the imperial response and the emperor’s assent to his election, he endeavored to forestall it.

Because he could not leave through the gates of the city, he cunningly obtained, as is reported, that he should be carried out openly by merchants in a changed garment. He sought the mountain passes of forests and the hiding places of caverns. While he was sought by all with the greatest solicitude, he was recognized by the indication of a column continually hanging from heaven above him. He was captured, dragged away, and consecrated at the church of the Prince of the Apostles.

Whoever reads his words clearly perceives that he ascended unwillingly to the summit of this honor. Hence he says as follows to Narses the patrician:

> While you describe the heights of contemplation, you renew the groaning of my fall, because I hear what I lost within when I undeservedly ascended outwardly to the summit of government. Know that I am struck by such great sorrow that I scarcely suffice to speak. Therefore, do not call me Naomi—that is, beautiful—but call me Mara, because I am full of bitterness.

And elsewhere:

> You who know that I have come to the order of the episcopate, if you love me, lament it, because I also bewail it unceasingly; and I ask that you pray to the Lord for me.

And in the prologue of the Dialogues:

> Behold, I am now battered by the waves of a great sea, and in the ship of the mind I am struck by the billows of a mighty tempest. When I remember my former life, I sigh as though, with my eyes drawn behind my back, I beheld the shore.

Because the plague was still devastating Rome in the customary manner, at Easter time he commanded that the procession with litanies be conducted around the circuit of the City. He ordained that an image of the Blessed Mary ever Virgin be carried before the procession. This image is said to be at Rome in the church of Saint Mary Major and to have been painted by Luke the Evangelist, not only a physician but also an excellent painter.

When the image was being carried, all infection and turbulence of the air gave way before it, as though fleeing it and unable to bear its presence. Marvelous serenity and purity of air therefore remained behind it.

Then, beside the image, as is reported, the voices of angels were heard singing, “Queen of heaven, rejoice, alleluia,” and the rest. Gregory, who followed the procession, immediately added, “Pray to God for us, alleluia.”

Gregory saw an angel standing above the Castle of the Holy Angel—which previously was called that of Crescentius, or the memorial of Hadrian—wiping blood from a drawn sword and replacing it in its sheath. Gregory understood that the plague had ceased, as happened.

III. Gregory's Humility

Gregory was of such great humility that he permitted himself to be praised in no way. Hence he writes as follows to Bishop Stephen, who had praised him in his letters:

> In your letters you have shown me favor greatly and beyond what I merited to hear. Although it is written, "Do not praise a person during his life," nevertheless, even if I was not worthy to hear such things, I ask through your prayers that I may be made worthy, so that the good things you have said may be in me.

The same pope says to Narses the patrician:

> By making a similarity of cause and name, you have formed clauses and declamations through the Scriptures. Certainly, dearest brother, you call an ape a lion. We observe ourselves to act in this manner when we frequently call mangy little dogs leopards or tigers.

The same pope says in a letter to Anastasius, patriarch of Antioch:

> Because you call me the mouth of the Lord and a lamp, and report that I can profit many, I confess that you have brought my judgment into the greatest doubt. For I consider what I am and apprehend in myself no sign of this good. I consider who you are, and I do not judge you to lie. When I wish to believe what you say, my infirmity contradicts me. When I wish to dispute what is said in my praise, your sanctity contradicts me.
> But I ask, holy man, that something concerning this conflict of ours agree for us: if what you say is not so, let it be so because you say it.

He wholly rejected even titles that sounded of boasting or vanity. Hence he writes as follows to Eulogius, patriarch of Alexandria, who had called him universal pope. This is contained in Distinction XCIX:

> Behold, in the preface of the letter that you directed to me, you took care to impress a word of proud appellation, calling me universal pope. I ask that your most sweet Holiness do this no further, because what is offered to another beyond what reason demands is subtracted from you.
>
> I do not seek to prosper in words but in conduct. I do not reckon that to be my honor in which I recognize that my brothers lose their honor. For my honor is the honor of the universal Church. My honor is the solid vigor of my brothers. Then I am honored when the honor owed to each person is not denied. Therefore, let words that inflate vanity and wound charity depart.

Thus it is written there.

He was unwilling that a word of command be spoken to him by fellow bishops and clerics. Hence, writing to Eulogius of Alexandria, he says:

> Your Charity speaks to me, saying, "As you commanded." I therefore ask that the word of command be removed from my hearing, because I know who I am and who you are. In place you are brothers to me; in conduct you are fathers.

Moreover, because of his excessive humility, he was unwilling that matrons should call themselves his maidservants. Hence, writing to Rusticiana the patrician, he says:

> I received one expression in your letters with distress, because "your maidservant" was said repeatedly. For I, who through the burdens of the episcopate have been made the servant of all, by what reason do you call yourself my maidservant? Therefore, I ask through almighty God that I never find this word addressed to me in your writings.

He was the first to call himself "servant of the servants" in his letters, and he established that others should be so named.

While he still lived, because of excessive humility he was unwilling that his books be published, and he judged his own to be worth nothing in comparison with those of others. Hence he writes as follows to Innocent, prefect of Africa:

> Because you wished the exposition of Saint Job to be sent to you, we rejoice in your zeal. But if you desire to be fattened upon delightful nourishment, read the little works of your compatriot Augustine, and do not seek our bran in comparison with his fine flour.

Thus he himself says.

I judge that this also was observed by him out of humility and so that curiosity might be avoided by readers in his books: although he was a supreme philosopher, was greatly commended in this by Albert the Great, and was most learned in the books of the gentiles, he never introduced into his books or homilies sayings of the gentiles.

Indeed, he rebuked not a little a certain bishop whom he had heard explain grammar to the people and moralize the fables of the poets, saying that the praises of Christ do not fit well in one mouth with the praises of Jupiter. This is in Distinction LXXXVI, chapter Cum multa.

IV. Maximianus and the Storm at Sea

When Gregory had been created cardinal deacon by Pope Benedict, he was directed by the pope to Constantinople for the affairs of the Church. Maximianus, who afterward became bishop of Syracuse and who was then provost of Blessed Gregory's monastery in the City, came with the brothers to Constantinople to visit the venerable deacon Gregory.

While Maximianus was returning to Rome, to the monastery entrusted to him, he was overtaken by an exceedingly great storm in the Adriatic Sea. By an inestimable order and an extraordinary miracle toward himself and all who were with him, he recognized both the wrath and the grace of almighty God.

For when the waves, raised by the violence of the winds, raged for their death, the rudders were lost from the ship, the mast was cut away, and the sails were cast into the waves. The whole vessel of the ship, battered by the excessive waves, had been loosened from all its joining. The sea entered through the opened oars [read: through the opened seams]. The sea filled the ship as far as the upper deck, so that the ship seemed to be not so much among the waves as the waves already within the ship.

At the same time those placed in the ship, now seeing the face of death before their eyes, all gave one another the kiss of peace and received communion in the body and blood of the Redeemer, each commending himself singularly to God that he might receive their souls kindly, since he had handed their bodies over to death in so fearful a manner.

But almighty God, who marvelously terrified their minds, more marvelously preserved their lives also through the merit of his servant Gregory, for whose special love they had come. For during eight days the same ship, filled with water even to the upper deck, made its own course and floated. On the ninth day it was conducted into the harbor of the Crotonian fortress. All who had sailed with the aforesaid venerable man Maximianus came out from it unharmed.

When Maximianus himself had also come out after them, the ship was immediately broken apart in the depth of the harbor [read: the ship immediately sank in the depth of the harbor], as though, when they departed, it had been deprived of the relief afforded by their weight. Filled with human beings, it had borne the waters and floated in the open sea; but when Maximianus departed with the brothers, it could neither bear the waters without human beings nor float even in the harbor. Through this almighty God showed that, by the merit of Gregory, whom the brothers had visited, he had held the laden ship in his own hand. These things are in Gregory's legend.

When Gregory returned to the City, there was in his monastery a very restless young man named Theodore, whom Gregory himself mentions in the Dialogues and in a homily. He dwelt there with his religious brother more from necessity than from will. It was exceedingly burdensome to him if anyone said anything for his salvation. He could not only not do good things, but could not hear them. By swearing and mocking, he testified that he would never come to the habit of holy life.

Nevertheless, struck in the groin by the pestilential disease that had grown thick in the City [read: the pestilential disease that raged through the City], he was brought to death. As he breathed his last, the brothers assembled with Gregory to protect his departure by prayer. His body had already died from its extremities; vital warmth still breathed only in his breast.

Suddenly, while those brothers stood by, he began to cry out and interrupt their prayers with great cries, saying: "Depart. Behold, I have been given to a dragon to be devoured. Because of your presence, it cannot devour me. It has already swallowed my head in its mouth. Give it room to torment me further and to do what it is going to do."

Then the brothers with Gregory began to say to him: "What is this that you say, brother? Impress upon yourself the sign of the holy cross."

He answered with great cries, saying: "I wish to sign myself, but I cannot, because I am pressed down by the scales of this dragon."

When the brothers heard this, together with the deacon Gregory they prostrated themselves upon the ground and began with tears to pray most vehemently for his rescue. Behold, the sick man suddenly began to cry out with a great voice, saying: "Thanks be to God. Behold, the dragon that had taken me to devour me has fled. It has been expelled by your prayers. Now intercede for my sins, because I am prepared to be converted and to abandon secular life."

Thus, by the prayers of Blessed Gregory, he escaped the death of the body and acquired the salvation of his soul. This is from Gregory's history.

V. Gregory's Government of the Church

When he had therefore been created Roman pontiff, he effectively governed with zeal the Church divinely entrusted to him. He compelled the Ligurians, Venetians, Iberians, and others who had made their confession in a written declaration to venerate the Synod of Chalcedon, and recalled them from schism to the unity of the holy Church.

He had already removed the inhabitants of Barbaricinum, the Sardinians, and the rustics of Campania from the vanity of paganizing, correcting them by preachings as well as by blows. With the Lord assisting him, through the most powerful authorities of his writings and importunate embassies, he had separated from the body of the whole holy Mother Church the heresy of the Donatists in Africa, of the Manichees in Sicily, of the Arians in Spain, and of the Agnoetae at Alexandria.

Only in Gaul did the heresy of the neophytes, sprouting from as many roots as there were simoniacal gifts, grow entirely far and wide and remain. Against it the venerable father fought forcefully before Queen Brunhild and also Theodoric and Theudebert, kings of the Franks, until he obtained that it be utterly condemned under anathema by an assembled general synod.

Nor, although the queen and kings sought it with many entreaties, did he give the pallium to Syagrius, bishop of Autun, before, in the presence of his abbot Cyriacus, they fulfilled that concerning which they had been admonished for expelling heresies. Hence he writes to them concerning these matters in Cause I, Question I, chapter Non est putanda, and chapter Fertur simoniaca.

From the very beginning of his consecration, throughout his whole diocese he ordained as bishops the best men he could find anywhere, with the greatest care. Whenever the necessity of ordaining priests pressed, he entirely excused neither the cardinals of his Church nor the monks of his monastery from entrusting the governance of a church to those who could better build it up equally by examples and words.

To touch upon a few out of many: from the cardinal priests of his Church he consecrated as bishops Boniface for Rhegium, Abenius for Perugia, and Dominus for Messina in Sicily. From the subdeacons he consecrated Gloriosus for Ostia, Festus for Capua, Peter for Troyes, and Castorius for Rimini. From the monks of his monastery he ordained as bishops Marinianus for Ravenna, Maximianus for Syracuse, and Sabinus for Callipolis.

He commanded Augustine to be ordained among the English by the bishops of Gaul. Through Augustine, the monks of that father—Mellitus, Justus, Laurence, and Paulinus—were nevertheless raised to the episcopate among the same nation at diverse times.

He spared, in a certain manner, only the deacons of the Apostolic See in this regard. Although their number abounded in the fullness of nineteen, he himself consecrated Boniface, Florentius, and Epiphanius. He removed none of them from office except Laurence the archdeacon, on account of pride and other crimes, in the Lateran basilica, where he immediately established Honoratus as archdeacon.

However greatly compelled by necessity, he strove to promote absolutely no one by force, lest under this occasion he appear, by removing someone, to depose him. He both prohibited this and rebuked it when done by another, in Distinction LXXIV, chapter Honoratus.

He also rebuked those established in the order of the diaconate—namely, the cardinals of the Roman Church—for devoting themselves to modulation of the voice when they ought to persist in preaching and alms, adding:

> It very often happens in the sacred mystery that, while a pleasing voice is sought, a fitting life is neglected; and the minister who sings provokes God by his conduct while he delights the people by his voice.

Hence he also prohibits this there, in Distinction XCII, chapter In sancta Romana ecclesia.

Then, for the compunction produced in the house of the Lord by music, with the greatest zeal he compiled a centon from the sweetness of antiphons, most usefully. He established the school of singers that to this day sings in the holy Roman Church according to the same ordinances.

With certain estates, he built for it two dwellings: one beneath the steps of the basilica of Blessed Peter the Apostle, and the other beneath the houses of the Lateran patriarchate. There to this day are preserved the couch upon which he reclined while modulating, the whip, and the authentic antiphonary.

Among the other peoples of Europe, the Germans or Gauls were conspicuously able to learn and repeatedly relearn the sweetness of this modulation. Yet they were wholly unable to preserve it incorrupt, both because of lightness of mind, through which some inserted things of their own into the Gregorian chants, and because of natural fierceness. For Alpine bodies, resounding exceedingly loudly with the thunder of their voices, do not properly echo the sweetness of the modulation they have received. These things John the Deacon says.

In the life of Blessed Eugenius, however, it is read that, when the office instituted by Ambrose was observed more than the Gregorian office, in the time of Charlemagne the Roman pontiff Hadrian assembled a universal council and established that the Gregorian office ought henceforth to be observed by all.

Charlemagne, acting as executor of this matter, reclined through diverse provinces [read: went through diverse provinces] and compelled all clerics to this very thing by threats and punishments, burning the books of the Ambrosian office wherever he found them.

When Blessed Eugenius came to the council and found that it had already been dissolved, through his sanctity he obtained from the pope that the prelates who had departed a little before—that is, three days previously—be recalled and assembled again.

When this was done, by common counsel and assent it was decreed that both the Ambrosian and Gregorian missals be placed upon the altar of Blessed Peter. With the doors closed and sealed with the seals of many lest fraud occur, they were to persist through the night in prayer, asking the Lord to deign to show by some sign which he preferred to be accepted universally.

This was obtained. For when they entered the church on the following morning, they found the Ambrosian missal closed in its place, but the Gregorian open and, according to others, its quires scattered here and there through the church. From this event they understood and thus established that the Gregorian was to be observed throughout the whole Church, but the Ambrosian was to be used only in its own church. This is observed to this day.

Concerning the chant of the offices, John the Deacon, cited above, says that when Charlemagne came to Rome and found a disagreement between the Roman and Gallican chant, he was offended. When the insolence of the Gauls argued that the chant had been corrupted by our countrymen with certain neueijs [read: with certain ditties], while our men, on the other hand, produced the authentic antiphonary as trustworthy evidence, he is reported to have asked which between a stream and a spring was accustomed to preserve purer water.

When they answered, “The spring,” he prudently added: “Therefore, we also, who until now have drunk corrupted water from a stream, must return to the principal currents of the perennial spring.”

Immediately he left two capable clerics of his own with Hadrian, then bishop. When they had been sufficiently and elegantly instructed, he recalled the metropolis of Metz to the sweetness of the ancient modulation and through it corrected all Gaul. When, in the course of time, they again corrupted it, Gaul was again brought back to the sweetness of the Roman chant through other clerics sent from the City.

VI. Gregory’s Liturgical Ordinances

Gregory compressed into the volume of one book the Gelasian codex concerning the solemnities of Masses, removing many things, changing a few, adding certain things, for the exposition of the Gospel readings.

In the canon of the Mass he added: “And dispose our days in your peace, and command us to be rescued from eternal damnation and numbered in the flock of your elect.”

He caused the Alleluia to be said at Masses outside the time of Pentecost. He commanded the Kyrie eleison to be sung. He decreed that the Lord’s Prayer be recited over the Host.

When he perceived certain persons murmuring concerning these things, as though he followed the customs of the church of Constantinople, the most pious father did not disdain to render an explanation. Concerning the Alleluia he said that, by the tradition of Blessed Jerome, in the time of Blessed Pope Damasus, this was drawn from the church of Jerusalem.

Concerning the Kyrie eleison, he also showed that this was not assumed from the Greeks, since they say it differently from the Latins.

Concerning the Lord’s Prayer, which is said in its place after the consecration, he says:

> It was the custom of the Apostles to consecrate the Host of the oblation at that Lord’s Prayer alone, it having first been said. It appeared exceedingly unfitting to me that we should say over the oblation a prayer composed by a learned man and should not say over his body and blood the very prayer composed by our Redeemer. But the Lord’s Prayer itself is said among the Greeks by the whole people, whereas among us it is sung by the priest alone.

Concerning the subdeacons, because it pleased a certain pontiff of ours that they should proceed clothed—namely, at Mass—whereas previously they went without the tunicles, they received this not from the Greeks but from their Mother, the Roman Church.

He afterward adds concerning the church of Constantinople:

> Who doubts that it is subject to the Apostolic See? Both the most pious lord emperor and our brother, bishop of that same city, continually profess it. Nevertheless, if it or another church possesses anything good, I am prepared to imitate it and to cause my inferiors, whom I prohibit from unlawful things, to imitate it. For he is foolish who thinks himself first in such a way that he scorns to learn the good things he sees in others.

The same pope says in Distinction XXII:

> As for the primate of Byzantium saying that he is subject to the Apostolic See: when fault is found in bishops, I do not know who is not subject to it. But when fault does not demand it, according to the principle of humility we are all equals.

With care he ordained stations through the basilicas or cemeteries of the holy martyrs, according to which the Roman people to this day run eagerly, as though he were living. Running among them himself while he still possessed sufficient strength to speak, he delivered twenty homilies on the Gospel before the Church at diverse times. He dictated the others of the same number, but, because an illness of the stomach continually afflicted him, he entrusted them to others to pronounce.

The army of the Lord followed Gregory as he went before. Innumerable voluntary cohorts of diverse sex, age, and profession flowed together from everywhere to hear the word of doctrine. As a leader of the heavenly army, he supplied to all only spiritual arms. But to the poor and strangers who had flowed into Rome because of the conditions of the times, he ministered daily stipends.

The most prudent ruler Gregory removed secular men from his chamber and chose for himself the most prudent clerics as counselors and intimates. Among them were Peter the deacon, his contemporary, with whom he afterward composed the four books of the Dialogues by disputing; Aemilianus the notary, who with his associates took down forty homilies on the Gospels; Paterius, likewise a notary, who, having been made secum dicerius by him [read: having been made secundicerius by him], culled certain most useful things from his books; and John the defender, who at Gregory's command was sent to Spain as examiner. John restored to his own see Januarius, bishop of the city of Malalita [read: city of Malaga], who had been deposed by neighboring bishops, and condemned those who had deposed him.

Gregory chose as intimates for himself the most holy monks: Maximianus, abbot of his monastery, whom he afterward made bishop of Syracuse and to whom he entrusted his authority throughout Sicily; Augustine and Mellitus, through whom he called the nations of the English to the grace of Christianity; Probus, whom, suddenly by revelation of the Spirit, he appointed abbot and sent to Jerusalem to establish a guesthouse; and Claudius, abbot of the city of Classis, who, while the pope was disputing, composed works concerning Proverbs, the Song of Songs, the Prophets, the books of Kings, and the Heptateuch, though not in the same sense as the pope.

Living with these men day and night, Gregory left behind nothing of monastic perfection in the palace and nothing of pontifical instruction in the Church. The most religious monks were seen everywhere adhering to the pontiff together with the most learned clerics, and a common life was maintained in diverse professions. Thus, under Gregory, the Church beside Rome was such as Luke the Evangelist and Philo record it to have been under the Apostles beside Alexandria [read: such as Luke records it under the Apostles and Philo records it beside Alexandria under Mark the Evangelist].

Then wisdom had visibly constructed for herself, as it were, a temple at Rome, and with the seven arts as columns of the noblest stones supported the atrium of the Apostolic See. None of those serving the pontiff, from the least to the greatest, displayed any barbarism in speech or dress. Rather, Latinity, clothed according to the Quirite custom in toga or state robe, singularly possessed its Latium in that Latian palace.

The studies of the diverse arts had flourished again there. Whoever perhaps lacked either sanctity or prudence had no confidence, by his own judgment, to stand before the pontiff. Prudent men whom I have mentioned—prudent rather than powerful—were summoned to the pontiff's profound counsels, while humble philosophy within rationally inquired by artful arguments what was thought preferable or most skillful to be followed in every business [read: what was thought preferable or most important to be followed in every business]. Rich idleness, which avenges itself upon the wise by an equal lot, remained despised before the doors of the chamber.

Only skill in interpreting both languages was lacking. The most eloquent Cecropian virgin, who once handed the keenness of her mind to the Latins when Varro took away her celibacy, claimed for herself the illusions of imposture, as Gregory himself complains in his letters.

No layman administered any office of the palace or any ecclesiastical patrimony. Ecclesiastical men undertook all functions of ecclesiastical law, while laymen were assigned only to military service in arms or to the continual care of fields.

For this reason, certain nobles first received the tonsure under the pretext of religion. Emperor Maurice prudently met their evasion. By a law issued through Longinus the imperial equerry, he commanded that whoever was implicated in public administrations should not be permitted to come to an ecclesiastical office.

Gregory greatly praised this law in this regard, saying: “He who abandons the secular habit and hastens to come to ecclesiastical offices does not desire to abandon the world, but to change it.”

VII. The Conversion of the English

Concerning the conversion of the English procured through him, from which he is also called the Apostle of the English, the same John the Deacon reports as follows.

Gregory was pressed by continual waves of thoughts concerning the conversion of the English Saxons, just as he had proposed during his monastic life. As soon as, after the state of the Church had been composed, he entered the fourth year of his pontificate, he sent Augustine with other monks from the monastery of his house to evangelize in Britain.

After a few days of the pilgrimage they had undertaken, they were weighed down by sluggish weariness and resolved to return home rather than approach a barbarous, fierce, and unbelieving nation whose language they did not even understand.

Without delay they sent Augustine—whom Gregory had indicated was to be consecrated their bishop if they were received by the English—back to Rome. They entreated the supreme pontiff to remove from them so laborious a journey and so uncertain and perilous a pilgrimage, recently imposed, and to permit his men to return.

Gregory wrote to them, saying:

> Gregory, bishop, servant of the servants of God and of our Lord Jesus Christ. Because it would have been better not to begin good things than to turn backward in thought from those things that have been begun, with the highest zeal, most beloved sons, you must complete with the Lord’s assistance the good work that you have begun.
>
> Let neither the labor of the journey nor the tongues of slanderers deter you. Rather, with all insistence and all fervor, by God as author accomplish what you have begun, knowing that the glory of the eternal recompense will follow a great labor more greatly.
>
> In all things humbly obey Augustine, your provost as he returns, whom we have also appointed as abbot over you, knowing that this will profit your souls in all respects.
> May almighty God protect you by his grace and grant me to see the fruit of your labor in the eternal homeland, so that, although I am unable to labor with you, I may be found together with you in the joy of recompense, because I wish to labor.

Strengthened by these exhortations, Augustine with the brothers sought Britain through Etherius of Arles, by whom the most pious father commended them in his own letters to the hospitality of the other bishops and kings of Gaul.

Coming to Ethelbert, king of the Kentish people, with God’s grace cooperating, Augustine easily obtained not only permission to preach but also food and dwellings in the city of Doruvernum, which was the metropolis of his kingdom.

Approaching it with his companions, with a cross or image of the Savior borne before them, Augustine sang, saying: “We beseech you, Lord, in all your mercy, that your fury and your wrath be removed from this city and from your holy house, because we have sinned.”

As they preached and performed miracles in the name of Jesus, many believed and were baptized, marveling at the simplicity of their innocent life and embracing the sweetness of heavenly doctrine.

For this reason Augustine came to Arles and, according to Gregory’s command, was consecrated bishop by Etherius. He returned to Britain. Immediately through Laurence the priest and Peter the monk he made known to Pope Gregory the conversion of the nation of the English and his own consecration. He suggested that Gregory send him very many ministers of the word of God, because he had a great harvest but few laborers.

Made joyful in Christ by these reports, Gregory sent many to Augustine, among whom the chief were Mellitus, Justus, Paulinus, and Rufinianus. Through them he sent all things necessary for the worship of the Church: sacred vessels, vestments of altars, ecclesiastical ornaments, clerical garments, relics of the Apostles and of many saints, and many codices.

He also sent him the pallium, commanding that under his own metropolis he should likewise ordain twelve bishops. He was to send individual bishops to London and York, who likewise, after consecrating twelve bishops, were to receive the pallium from the Apostolic See. After Augustine's death, the one among them who had merited to be consecrated first was to be regarded as the first.

He also commanded that among the nation of the English he should not destroy the temples of the idols, but, after holy water had been sprinkled upon them, should dedicate them as basilicas.

And because Augustine, questioning him concerning certain headings, inquired how a bishop ought to live with his clerics, and also concerning many other matters touching the diverse conditions of men and diverse affairs, the most humble Gregory answered each point and instructed him, as is found scattered through the various decretals.

Indeed, through Gregory's prayers almighty God conferred upon Augustine and his companions so great a grace of performing signs that they confirmed by the efficacy of signs the word of life that they preached with their mouth. Hence it came about that, after a few years had passed, the other kings of Saxony also came to the faith of Christ through his disciples.

Concerning this, Gregory himself wrote as follows to Eulogius, patriarch of Alexandria, who had reported to him the spiritual goods of his own church:

> Since I know that in the good things you perform you rejoice together with others, I return to you a recompense for your favor. For although the nation of the English, placed in a corner of the world, had until now remained faithless in the worship of wood and stones, it pleased me, with the aid of your prayer, that, with God as author, I ought to send to it a monk of my monastery. Having been made a bishop, he was conducted to the aforesaid nation at the end of the world.
>
> And now writings concerning his salvation and work have reached us, because he himself, or those who were sent with him, shine forth in that nation with so many miracles that they seem to imitate the powers of the Apostles in the signs they manifest. On the solemnity of the Lord's Nativity, more than ten thousand English were baptized by him, our brother and fellow bishop.

Concerning the conversion of these English, Gregory himself, as John the Deacon reports, also says in the books of the Moralia:

> Behold, the tongue of Britain, which had known nothing other than to utter barbarous growls, has now long since begun to resound with Hebrew words in the praises of God. Behold, the ocean, formerly swollen, now lies beneath the feet of the saints and serves. Through fear of God, the mouths of priests bind with simple words those barbarous movements of the ocean which earthly princes were unable to tame with the sword. And he who, while unbelieving, did not in any way fear troops of combatants now, faithful, fears the tongues of the humble. For because the power of divine knowledge is poured into him through miracles, he is restrained by fear of the same divinity, so that he fears to act perversely and desires with all his longings to come to the grace of eternity.

Nevertheless, Gregory himself wrote to the same Augustine concerning these miracles as follows:

> I know that almighty God, through your love, shows great miracles among the nation that he willed to elect. Hence it is necessary that concerning this same heavenly gift you both rejoice with fear and fear while rejoicing. Let us rejoice, certainly, because the souls of the English are drawn through exterior miracles to interior grace. But let us fear lest, amid the signs that are done, the weak mind raise itself up in its own presumption, so that, from the source whence it is outwardly raised by honor, it may inwardly fall through empty glory.

VIII. Concerning the Miracles Gregory Performed

In the City, a certain matron was accustomed to offer the customary offerings at the public stations while Blessed Gregory celebrated the solemnities of Masses. When, after the mysteries, he was about to give her the Host whose material had been offered by her, and Gregory said, “The body of our Lord Jesus Christ,” and so forth, she smiled wantonly. He immediately turned his right hand away from her mouth and placed that portion of the Lord's body upon the altar.

When the solemnities of the Masses had been completed, he questioned the matron before the people about why, when she was about to receive the body of the Lord, she had presumed to laugh. After muttering for a long while, she finally burst forth into words of this sort: “Because you declared to be the Lord's body the bread that I knew I had made with my own hands.”

Then Gregory, on account of the woman's unbelief, prostrated himself in prayer with the whole congregation. Rising after a little while, he found that the particle of bread which he had placed upon the altar had been made flesh. Showing it before everyone to the unbelieving matron, he was able both to call her back to the grace of belief and to take care to strengthen the whole people. Again prostrated in prayer with them, he restored the fragment of flesh to the original substance of bread.

At another time, when certain westerners made requests through legates, he enclosed, according to custom, a prandeum [read: a cloth relic] in individual little boxes under the names of the martyrs requested, sealed them above, and gave them to the legates. Carrying the relics they had received with appropriate veneration, after they had traversed several miles of the journey, they began foolishly to complain that they had undertaken so great a journey without knowing whether they had received bones of saints or, rather, pieces of flesh from the Roman pontiff.

Therefore, by common counsel, after removing the pontifical seal and opening the little boxes, they found pieces of cloth. Returning to the walls of the City in excessive fury, they tearfully complained through the archdeacon that Gregory had deceived them, so as to receive a cheap cloth in place of relics. They said that their lords abounded in most beautiful cloaks and consequently did not need the cheap cloths of the Romans.

Gregory was perhaps then celebrating the solemnities of Masses. When these had been completed, he received the cloth relics from those same legates before everyone and placed them upon the altar. He gave himself to prayer with all present, so that almighty God might disclose as quickly as possible whether that which had customarily been sent from the threshold of the Apostles as relics of the martyrs ought to be venerated.

Then, rising from prayer, he commanded the unbelieving legates to stand near. He asked for a small knife and, in the manner of the most holy Pope Leo, pierced the cloth; blood immediately flowed from its punctures. By this miracle, both the legates, confounded men, and all who were present, struck with trembling, prostrated themselves upon the ground with Gregory at his command. They did not cease from prayer until all the holes in the cloth relics were divinely closed.

Moreover, a certain one of the rich Romans, having left his wife, had been deprived of communion by the pontiff. Bearing this most grievously and being unable to invalidate the authority of so great a pontiff, he sought the aid of magicians. Persuaded by great gifts, they confidently promised that they could accomplish by their evil incantations that, once a demon had been sent in, the pontiff's horse would be tormented until it came into danger together with its rider.

Delighted by this promise, that incestuous judge permitted the magicians to stand hidden beside the road by which the pontiff was to proceed to the station, so that they could see those passing by but could not be seen by the passersby. When the magicians had recognized the great pontiff from the processions of those vested in chasubles and those bearing napkins, after sending in the demon they began to torment the horse so strongly that it was thought it could never be held by its rider or by the grooms.

Then Gregory, knowing by the revelation of the Spirit that the demon had been sent in, made the sign of the cross and both freed the horse from the present madness and, commanding that the sorcerers be brought down from their hidden height, punished them with perpetual blindness. They confessed their guilt at the accusation of the incestuous judge and, after much time, came to the grace of baptism. Gregory indeed willed to restore their eyes, lest they should return to magical practices [read: Gregory indeed did not will to restore their eyes, lest they should return to magical practices], but he commanded that they be maintained from ecclesiastical goods.

When Gregory, while pope, had built a monastery and established that no one should possess anything except in common, the abbot of the said monastery discovered that a certain monk secretly kept three coins received from his lay brother for some necessity of his own. He made this known to Pope Gregory, who excommunicated the monk as a terror to the others.

Meanwhile, unknown to Gregory, the excommunicated monk died. Upon hearing this, Gregory was grieved that the man had died excommunicated. But he drew up a document containing his absolution and gave it to one of the deacons to read over the tomb of the deceased. When the deacon had fulfilled the command, on the following night the deceased appeared to the abbot and made known that until then he had been held in custody, but declared that since yesterday he had been absolved when the absolution was read.

There is also read concerning him something that surpasses all marvels. On one occasion, while passing through Trajan's forum, he recalled that emperor's humanity and the justice he had exercised toward a widow whose son Trajan's son had killed while riding about on horseback. On account of this, Trajan had granted his own son to her as an adopted son, together with his very great riches.

Compassionating Trajan's damnation because he had died a gentile, Gregory entered the basilica of Blessed Peter, groaned for him, and prayed. It was divinely answered to him: “Behold, I have fulfilled your petition and have spared Trajan eternal punishment. Henceforth take the greatest care not to offer a petition for anyone damned.”

And Damascene relates in a certain sermon that Gregory, pouring out prayer for Trajan, heard a voice divinely addressed to him: “I have heard your voice, and I grant pardon to Trajan, to which matter all the East and the West are witnesses.”

Concerning this there is a manifold manner of speaking among theologians in the fourth book of the Sentences. But the more common opinion is that Trajan was raised again to the present life, in which, having been converted and baptized, he thus escaped hell. Nor had he been condemned in hell by God's final sentence, but only temporarily, until Gregory should pray for him. And the statement that there is no redemption in hell is understood concerning those who have been adjudged there by God's final sentence, but not those there temporarily, as this man was.

When Gregory was celebrating the solemnities of Masses in the church of Saint Mary Major in the City and said, “May the peace of the Lord be always with you,” the angels answered, “And with your spirit.” In memory of this event, when the supreme pontiff celebrates there on such a day, it is said that no answer is made to him by the choir at “May the peace of the Lord.”

IX. Concerning His Liberality and Piety Toward the Poor

There was found no one like him who observed the law of the Most High, which gives precepts concerning mercy and piety. For, as John the Deacon reports, by purchasing with his own money English boys dispersed through foreign regions, each year he brought them to knowledge of the faith.

Hence, writing to Candidus the priest, he says:

> As you proceed to govern the patrimony that is in Gaul, we desire that your beloved self, from the solidi you receive, buy clothing for the poor or English boys—that is, slaves—who are seventeen or eighteen years of age, so that, given to monasteries, they may make progress for God. Thus the Gallic solidi that cannot be expended in our land may be usefully expended in their own place.
> But if you can receive any of the monies returned which are said to have been taken away, from these also we desire that you buy clothing or boys. But because those who can be found there are pagans, I desire that a priest be sent with them, lest some illness occur on the way, so that he ought to baptize those whom he perceives to be dying.

The same Gregory, writing to Cyprian the deacon, commands that if the Jews dwelling on the possessions of the Church in Sardinia wish to be converted to the faith, he should remit to them a third or fourth part of their rents, adding:

> Nor do we do this without profit if, for the sake of lightening the burdens of their rent, we bring them to the grace of Christ. For although they themselves come with less fidelity, nevertheless those born from them are baptized with greater fidelity. Therefore, we shall gain either them or their children. And for this reason it is not burdensome, whatever we remit from the rent.

Hence, through both such alleviations of rents and promises of the kingdom of heaven, many Jews in diverse places were converted to the faith. Together with the salvation of the soul, he also conferred upon them garments suitable for those being baptized. Hence he wrote to Fantinus the defender that, since very many Jews wished to be converted to Christ, he ought to command the bishop of the place to baptize them on a feast day after the prescribed abstinence of forty days. He should make no delay because of the plague that had invaded that region, and garments should be bought for those who, because of poverty, could not procure them for themselves.

Solicitous also that the little children of the Arians be joined to the Catholic faith, he wrote to all the bishops of Italy, saying:

> Since the most abominable Autharith, at the Paschal solemnity that has recently passed, prohibited the sons of the Lombards from being baptized in the Catholic faith, the divine majesty extinguished him for this fault, so that he did not see the solemnity of another Passover. It is fitting that your fraternity admonish all the Lombards throughout your places that, because a grave mortality threatens, they reconcile to the Catholic faith those same sons of theirs baptized in the Arian unbelief—that is, by baptizing them—because they had not been baptized, since the Arians do not observe the form of the Church, so that they may appease the wrath of almighty God upon them.

The same man appointed suitable men to individual deaconries and guesthouses. And so that they might bestow care upon the needy and the disabled with greater security and sagacity, he fortified some with privileges. He wrote as follows to one of the most faithful among them:

> By no manner or device are you ever to be compelled by any man to render an account or to suffer any molestation. But because we have thus freed you from human accounts, so that you may know that you will render an account to our God concerning those things we have committed to you, we exhort you that sincerity of faith flourish in you, that your mind be more intent upon affairs, your care more weighty, your zeal more vigilant, your devotion more illustrious, and your service more effective.

Besides these things, he sent the religious Abbot Probus with much money to Jerusalem. By his diligence he established a venerable guesthouse. Both there and on Mount Sinai near Arabia, for the servants of God established under the governance of Palladius, he procured an abundance of daily food and clothing for as long as he was able to live.

Likewise, through diverse provinces, for the preservation of sacred religion and for the vigorous governance of the goods of the poor, he took on industrious men of his Church as administrators of the patrimonies. Among these he appointed Cyprian the deacon over the Sicilian patrimony; Pantaleon the notary over the Syracusan; Fantinus the defender over the Panormitan; Sergius the defender over the Calabrian; Romanus the notary over the Apulian; Benenatus over the Sanentician; Anthemius the subdeacon over the Neapolitan; Peter the subdeacon over the Campanian; Candidus the defender over the Tuscan; Urbicus the defender over the Sabine; Optatus the defender over the Nursian; Benedict the notary over the Carseolan; Felix the subdeacon over the Appian; Castorius the cartulary over the Ravennate; Castorius the notary over the Istrian; Antonius the subdeacon over the Dalmatian; John the notary over the Illyrian; Symmachus the defender over the Sardinian; Boniface the subdeacon over the Corsican; Pantaleon over the Ligurian; Hieronymus the defender over the patrimony of the Cottian Alps; Hilary the notary over the Germanician; and Candidus the priest over the Gallican. Through these men he provided marvelously for the poor.

So great was Gregory's hospitality in the patriarchal residence—as John the Deacon reports—that, apart from those whom, throughout diverse regions and also in Rome, he mercifully maintained with ecclesiastical alms as they fled the swords of the Lombards' treachery, he invited all manner of strangers to his table each day.

Among them, on a certain day, one came at whose hands Gregory himself, by the service of humility, wished to pour water. Turning aside, he took up a pitcher; but suddenly he did not find the man upon whose hands he had wished to pour water. When Gregory wondered within himself at what had happened, on that same night the Lord said to him through a vision: “On other days you received me in my members, but yesterday you received me in myself.”

At another time Gregory, according to his custom, commanded the treasurer to invite twelve strangers to the meal. Going, the treasurer fulfilled the command and arranged them together at the table. But while they reclined together, the pope looked and counted thirteen. Summoning the treasurer, he asked why, contrary to his command, he had presumed to invite a thirteenth.

Astounded, the treasurer counted the stranger-guests more carefully and, finding only twelve, answered as though secure: “Believe me, venerable father, there are only twelve, as you commanded.” Thus, when the one convicted repeatedly counted twelve again and did not see the thirteenth, whom Gregory alone was able to see, Father Gregory observed that the man reclining nearest him frequently turned vultis [read: frequently turned his face] and now simulated a young man, now an old man with a certain grayness.

When the meal was finished, he permitted the twelve to depart, but, taking the thirteenth by the hand, he led him into his chamber, vehemently adjuring him to deign to reveal himself and his name to him plainly. He answered, saying: “Why do you ask me about my name, which is wonderful? But know, recalling it to memory, that I am that shipwrecked man who once came to you when you were writing in the cell of your monastery, to whom you gave twelve coins and the silver dish, filled with vegetables, which your mother Silvia had sent to you. And let this be known to you for certain: from the day on which you bestowed these things upon me with a cheerful spirit, the Lord appointed you to become prelate of his holy Church.”

Gregory said, “How do you know this?” He replied, “Because I am his angel, sent to investigate your purpose.” Then Gregory was altogether terrified. The angel said to him: “Do not fear. Behold, the Lord has sent me to be your guardian as long as you are in this world.” Immediately Gregory fell upon his face, rendering immeasurable thanks to God.

Moreover, he converted into money the revenues of all the patrimonies and estates according to the Gelasian register, of which he clearly appeared to be a most devoted follower. From their rents, brought together in gold and silver, certain solidi were distributed four times in the year to all monasteries, churches, cemeteries, ecclesiastical orders, palace officials, and guesthouses: namely at Easter, on the natal feast of the Apostles, on that of Saint Andrew, and on his own natal feast. He prescribed this through the register according to which it had hitherto been disbursed.

On every first day of the month, without exception, he distributed generally to the poor the same kinds of goods that were gathered from the revenues. In their season the most discerning head of the Lord's household divided wheat, wine, cheese, pulse, lard, edible animals, fish, and oil. But spiced provisions and other things that were more delicate he honorably offered to persons of higher standing, so that the Church was thought to be nothing other than a certain common granary belonging to all.

He gave fifteen pounds of gold to three thousand handmaids of God for bed-coverings. To them he also conferred eighty pounds annually for daily stipends. Writing to the patrician Theoctista concerning these women or their holiness, Gregory says: “Theirs is such a life, and it is restrained to so great a degree by tears and abstinence, that we believe that, if they did not exist, none of us could now have survived for so many years in this place among the swords of the Lombards.”

Indeed, on every day he sent fixed stipends through appointed mounted couriers to any sick persons or persons disabled in any bodily member throughout the streets or crossroads of all the districts. But to the more bashful poor, before he himself took food, he took care to send from his table, door by door, a dish of the apostolic blessing.

When it happened that one of these poor persons was found dead by scavengers in the confined recesses of the lanes, Gregory, thinking that he had perished for lack of alms, was so saddened, as it is said, that for several days he abstained from celebrating Masses, as though he himself had slain him with his own hands—which it is impious even to say.

When Gregory was dedicating a certain church that had once belonged to the Arians, after relics of Sebastian and Agatha had been placed there, a certain pig appeared among those standing by, running here and there. At last it departed from the church and was seen no more. Hence the devil also was thought by all to have been expelled from that place through the consecrator.

On the following night, a great noise, as though of persons running about, was heard above the said church. On the next night, a still heavier sound was heard with so great a terror that it was as if the church had been utterly overturned.

After a few days, when the air was very serene, a cloud descended over the altar of the said church and covered it, and filled the church with so great a terror and fragrance that no one dared enter. On another day, the lamps were divinely kindled without fire. On many occasions on other days, after the lamps had been extinguished by the clerics following the office, they were found kindled without fire borrowed from elsewhere.

X. Concerning Gregory's Liberality and Mercy Toward Particular Persons

John the Deacon relates that this bishop Gregory, through the procurators of the ecclesiastical patrimonies, like a certain most keen-sighted Argus, carried the eyes of his pastoral solicitude throughout the breadth of the whole world, as can be judged from the many instances of which a few are related here.

The same man writes as follows to Peter the subdeacon:

> With fifty pounds of gold purchase new grain from outsiders and store it in Sicily in places where it will not perish, so that in February we may direct as many ships as we can there to bring it here, apart from the grain that, according to custom, we now await to be sent in February or October. For the yield of grain here was so small that, unless grain is collected from Sicily, severe famine threatens. But let the grain of the ecclesiastical tenants be collected without the harassment of anyone.

Writing to Anthemius the subdeacon, Gregory says:

> I desire that, as soon as you receive the present instruction, you offer to Donem Paterie [read: Lady Pateria] forty solidi for the footwear of the boys and four hundred modii of wheat; and to Donem Palatine [read: Lady Palatina], the widow of Urbicus, twenty solidi and three hundred modii of wheat. Let all these be computed in your accounts. But bring the total of the rent with haste.

The same man writes to the same:

> It has been made known to us that certain handmaids of God of the city of Nola, dwelling in the Aboritan house, suffer an excessive scarcity of food and clothing. It is fitting for us to aid them by God's command. Therefore, by the present instruction we command that you ought to give them forty solidi in gold and, in succeeding indictions, supply them twenty solidi annually, which may be computed in your accounts.
> Furthermore, we command that you give only two solidi each to Paulinus the priest of the monastery of Saint Erasmus on the side of Mount Syraptus [read: Mount Soracte] and to the two monks in the oratory of the Holy Archangel. Likewise, do not delay in giving the illustrious Paulina thirty solidi annually [read: the illustrious Palatina thirty solidi annually].

The same man writes to Peter the subdeacon:

> It has been made known to us that Marcellus, assigned to penance in the monastery of Saint Hadrian in the city of Palermo, endures the necessity of food and the excessive affliction of nakedness. Therefore establish for him as much as you foresee to be sufficient for food, clothing, and bedding.

Likewise, to the same:

> We have learned that the monastery of the Holy Archangel suffers need of food. Therefore let your Experience watch diligently, so that, if you learn that the monks of that place conduct themselves well and manifest truth can establish that they suffer need, you may aid them. Supported by this authority, you will hasten to do so in every way.
>
> But they also declare that they have a little estate of our Church called Viciana, which pays them one solidus and two tremisses. If it is so, permit them to possess it by libellary title for the sum of one tremissis. Therefore let it be your zeal to fulfill all these things, provided, as we have said, that its monks have shown themselves diligent in the service of God, as is taught [read: as is fitting].

Likewise, to the same:

> Since we have perceived that the son of a most worthy man suffers necessity not only through loss of sight but also through lack of food, we command your Experience that each year you ought to supply for his support twenty-four modii of wheat, twelve modii of beans, and twenty decimatatas of wine [read: twenty decimatae of wine], which may afterward be charged to your accounts.

The same man writes to Cyprian the deacon:

> Because of the necessities arising from various dangers, Cosmas says that he is bound by many debts, so that, for those same debts, he says that his sons are detained by his creditors. Therefore investigate his case with the greatest exactness. If you find that he is truly entangled in the aforesaid debts and has no substance from which he can pay them, then, for recovering his sons, arrange with the creditors for whatever sum you determine and pay it from the goods of the poor by our authority, knowing that whatever is given there will be counted as belonging to our patrimony.

The same man writes to the same:

Zeno, our brother and fellow bishop, has made known that certain persons in his city suffer want of food. Therefore, by the present writing, we appoint your beloved self to give our aforesaid brother one thousand modii of wheat, or, if he can transport more, up to two thousand. We exhort you, therefore, to introduce no delay or excuse in granting these things.

The same man writes to the religious Abbot Eusebius:

Let your charity believe me, because I have been greatly saddened by your sadness, and so forth. Furthermore, we have caused one hundred solidi to be given to your beloved self through Peter the subdeacon; I ask that you receive them without taking offense.

Likewise, to Fantinus the defender:

Cosmas the Syrian, bearer of the present letter, declared that in the business he conducted he contracted a debt, which, from the testimony of others and his tears, we believe to be true. And because he owed one hundred and fifty solidi, I desired that his creditors make some agreement with him, since the law provides that a free man may in no way be detained for debt if goods are lacking that can be assigned to that same debtor [read: goods are lacking that can be attached to that debt].

He asserts that his creditors can agree to eighty solidi. But because it is a great thing to demand eighty solidi from a man who has nothing, we have sent sixty solidi through your notary, so that you may speak carefully with those creditors and explain that, according to the laws, they cannot detain his son, whom they are said to hold. And, if it can be done, let them condescend to something less than we have given. Give to the man himself whatever remains of those sixty solidi, so that he may be able to live from it with his son. But perform this diligently, so that, once the solidi have been received, they draw up for him in writing a full security.

The same man writes to Castorius, deacon and cartulary of Ravenna:

We desire without doubt that the monk Valerian, whom, when corrected, you delivered to the monastery of Saint John situated at Classis, remain in that monastery. From the revenues of the Holy Roman Church that have been collected there, with you providing, we desire that all his expenses be met. And if anything remains, bring it to us when you come.

The same man writes as follows to Liberatus, formerly praetor:

We are not unaware how great is the distress of this world that presses you.

And below:

For perhaps, magnificent son, you have offended him in prosperous circumstances, wherefore he wills that you be purified by merciful bitterness. Therefore let neither temporal affliction break you nor losses of property shake you, because if, giving thanks in adversities, you render God placable to you, both the things that have been lost will be restored multiplied and, beyond these things, eternal joys will be bestowed.

But I ask that you not consider it an injury that we have written, through Romanus the defender, that twenty years of clothing [read: twenty annual allowances of clothing] be furnished to your boys, because things offered from the goods of Blessed Peter the Apostle, however small they may be, must always be received as a great blessing.

How great was the innocence in his liberality is shown from his letter, as John the Deacon reports. For he writes as follows to Pantaleon the notary:

Your Experience remembers what sort of oath, and how great an oath, it furnished at the most sacred body of Blessed Peter the Apostle. Therefore we also, being secure, have sent it to investigate the patrimonies of the Syracusan region. It is fitting, therefore, that you always keep before your eyes both your faith and the fear of that same Blessed Peter the Apostle, and act so that you may be reproved neither by men in the present life nor by almighty God at the last judgment.

We have learned, however, from the report of Salerius our cartulary that you found the modius with which the tenants of the Church were compelled to give grain to be of twenty-five sextarii. This we have cursed in every way, and we have grieved that you undertook this investigation late. But because you record that you broke that same modius and made a just one, we have rejoiced.

But because the aforesaid cartulary also took care to disclose to us the sum that has now been collected before your Experience from the frauds of the leaseholders in two territories, we rejoice that, after the unjust modius had been broken, you acted so zealously. For in the future we also consider past sins in this way, lest, if the things that the leaseholders fraudulently took from the peasants come to us, the sins perpetrated by them also be drawn to us.

Therefore we desire your Experience, with complete fidelity, to make a list, estate by estate, of the poor and needy tenants, and from the monies found as a result of the frauds to buy cows, sheep, and pigs, and to distribute them to each of the poorer tenants. We desire you to do this with the counsel of the most reverend Lord John the bishop, Hadrian the cartulary, and, if necessary, also with the counsel of my son Lord Julian, so that no one else may know, but it may be secret.

The same man, writing to Peter the subdeacon, says:

> We have learned that the peasants of the Church are burdened in the prices of grain, so that the fixed sum is not observed for them in purchasing at a time of abundance. Hence we desire that, according to the public prices at every time, whether more or less grain is produced, the measure of purchasing among them be maintained.
>
> But we desire that the grain which is lost by shipwreck be charged wholly to us, provided nevertheless that there is no negligence on your part in sending it, lest, while the proper time for sending is neglected, loss be generated from your fault.
>
> We have perceived it to be exceedingly unjust and inequitable that anything be received from the peasants of the Church in respect of the sextarii, and that they be compelled to give according to a larger modius than is brought into the granaries of the Church. Hence we command that grain should never be received from the peasants of the Church by a modius of more than eighteen sextarii, unless perhaps it is something that the sailors, according to custom, take in addition because they attest that the grain is diminished in the ships themselves.
>
> Likewise, they ought to exact neither siliquae beyond the pounds nor a larger pound. But according to your valuation, insofar as their ability suffices, let the total rent be increased, and thus let no shameful exaction be made.
>
> Lest, after my death, these same burdens that we remove because they have been superimposed be added again in any way, we desire that you draw up documents of security concerning the rents in such a way that you first state how great a rent each person ought to pay, with the added burdens in siliquae or grain dues inserted there.
>
> Before all things we desire you to attend carefully to this: that unjust weights not be set in exacting rents. But if you find any such, break them and establish new and correct ones.
> Furthermore, we have learned that the first payment of the burdatio greatly distresses our peasants, so that they are compelled to pay the taxes before they are able to sell their produce. Since they do not have the means to give these from their own property, they receive loans from public revenue officers and pay heavy interest for the same benefit, as a result of which they are constricted by grave losses.
> Hence we command that every loan they could receive from outsiders for the same cause be given publicly by your Experience and be received back little by little from the peasants of the Church as they have the means, lest, being constricted by the time, they be compelled to sell more cheaply and this by no means suffice for them.

He also commanded the same man that, concerning marriage payments, what the rich gave should not exceed the sum of one solidus, while the poor should give less, and that this should be given to the leaseholders and not entered into the account of the Church.

He also commanded that heirs should succeed to the goods of the Church's leaseholders, and not the officials of the Church, as happened in certain places. He commanded that if a tenant unjustly received anything from a leaseholder, it should be restored to the leaseholder from whom it was taken and not assigned to the Church, as had been done.

> But we desire you to receive no more from the estates of the Church than custom allows.

Likewise, concerning a certain work enjoined upon him, he says to the same:

> We give thanks to your Solicitude, because concerning the matter of my brother I instructed you that he ought to have sent the silver [read: I instructed you that you ought to send his silver back], and you so consigned it to oblivion as if something had been said to you by your lowest slave. Now, at least, let not your Experience but your Negligence take care to fulfill it, and send with all speed whatever you learn was in Antonius's possession.

XI. Concerning His Manifold Affliction, Patience, and Humility

At the end of his exposition upon Ezekiel, he says:

> Behold, insofar as we have been able through the Lord's largess, we have searched these things out for you also, dearly beloved brothers. But let no one reproach me if, after these things, I cease from speech, because, as you all discern, our tribulations have increased. On every side we are surrounded by swords; on every side we fear the threatening danger of death. Some return to us with their hands cut off; others are reported captured, others slain.
> Now I am compelled to restrain my tongue from exposition, because my soul is weary of my life. Now let no one seek in me the study of sacred eloquence, because my harp is turned into mourning. Now my heart does not keep watch in the investigation of mysteries, because my soul has slumbered from weariness. But how can one who is not permitted to live speak as he pleases concerning the meanings of Holy Scripture? And how can I offer sweet things to drink when I am compelled daily to drink bitter things?

The same man, writing to the patrician Italica and to Venatio, a patrician formerly a monk [read: to Venantius, a patrician formerly a monk], says:

My sins bring it about that for eleven months now it has been exceedingly rare for me to have been able to rise from my bed at any time, so that my life is a most grievous punishment. For daily I fail in pain, and I sigh while awaiting the remedy of death.

Moreover, so many attacks of fevers have fallen upon the clergy and people of this City that scarcely any free man or slave has remained who is fit for any office or ministry. From the neighboring cities, however, slaughters by mortality are reported to us daily. But you who are nearer Africa have, I believe, learned all the more exactly how it is devastated by mortality and sickness. Those who come from the East report still graver desolations.

Therefore, in all these things, because we recognize a universal scourging as the end of the world approaches, we ought not to be excessively afflicted by our own troubles.

The same man writes to Eulogius, patriarch of Alexandria:

Last year I received the most delightful writings of your Holiness, to which, because of the excess of my sickness, I have until now been unable to respond. For behold, nearly two years have now passed in which I have been confined to bed and am afflicted by so great pains of gout that on feast days I can scarcely rise for the space of three hours and celebrate the solemnities of Masses.

Immediately afterward I am compelled by grave pain to lie down, so that I can endure my torment while groaning interrupts me. This pain is sometimes mild for me, sometimes excessive. But it is neither so mild that it departs nor so excessive that it kills, whence it happens that I, who am daily in death, am driven back from death.

Nor is it a wonder, because, a grievous sinner, I am long held enclosed in such a prison of corruption. Hence I am compelled to cry out, "Lead my soul out of prison." But because I do not yet merit to obtain this through my prayers, I ask that the prayer of your Holiness furnish me aid by its intercessions and render me free from sins and from the weight of corruption, in that liberty of the glory of the sons of God which you know well.

Likewise, to the same:

I ask, therefore, that you pray more earnestly for me, a sinner, because both the pain of my body from gout and the bitterness of my heart from the afflictions of cares, the immense devastation of mortality, and the presence of so many swords of the barbarians afflict me vehemently. Amid all these things I seek not temporal but eternal consolation, which I cannot obtain through myself; but I trust that I may obtain it through the intercession of your Blessedness.

The same man, writing to Marinianus, bishop of Arabia [read: bishop of Ravenna], says:

It is now a long time since I have been able to rise from bed. For now the pain of gout torments me; now I know not what fire spreads with pain throughout my whole body. And it frequently happens that at one time heat together with pain assails me and causes both my body and my spirit to fail.

Therefore, most holy brother, entreat for me the mercy of divine pity, that it may graciously mitigate in me the scourges of its striking and grant patience to endure, lest—which may it not happen—the heart, through excessive weariness, break forth in impatience, and that which could have been cured through the wound increase in guilt through murmuring.

The same man writes to Bishop Sebastian:

Most holy brother, we are by no means able to say what things we suffer in this land at the hands of your friend Lord Romanus. Nevertheless, I say briefly that his malice against us has surpassed the swords of the Lombards, so that the enemies who kill us appear more benign than the judges of the republic, who wear us out in anxious thought through their malice, robberies, and deceits.

At one and the same time to bear the care of bishops and clerics, of monasteries also and of the people; to watch against the snares of enemies; to remain always suspicious against the deceits and malice of commanders—how great a labor and how great a grief this is your Fraternity judges the more truly, the more purely it loves me who suffer it.

The same man, writing to John, bishop of Ravenna, says:

I ascribe this to my sins: that this man who is now present—without doubt Romanus the exarch—both pretends not to fight against our enemies and forbids us to make peace. Although now, even if he wished, we are wholly unable to make it, because Ariulf, possessing the army of Autharith and Nordulf, desires that their subsidies be given to him, so that he may deign to speak with us at all concerning peace.

XII. Concerning the Books Published by Him

When he had been taken from the monastery, made a cardinal deacon, and sent to Constantinople as apocrisiary on behalf of ecclesiastical answers, he was earnestly asked by the brothers—and especially by Leander, bishop of Seville, who had come to Constantinople as a legate for the affairs of the Visigoths—and was compelled to unravel the book of Blessed Job, wrapped in many mysteries. He treated it in an admirable order through a series of thirty-five books.

In them he discussed the virtues and vices in such a way that he seems not to explain them by words alone but, in a certain manner, to display them in visible forms. Hence there is no doubt that he attained the perfection of those same virtues whose effect he was able to express so efficaciously.

As John the Deacon says, the earlier portions of the said book, namely the Moralia, he delivered orally before the brothers present. Because he found a little more unoccupied time, he dictated the later portions by treating them. When more ample periods were available to him, adding much, subtracting little, and leaving certain things just as they had been found, he arranged into books by emendation those things that had been taken down orally while he spoke.

When, after he had been made bishop of Rome, he dictated the last portions, considering the style in which he had delivered the first, he took care that, running through with diligent emendation the things he had spoken, he should raise them, as it were, to the likeness of those dictated, and that the things he had dictated should not differ far from the discourse of one speaking.

Nevertheless, he left almost as he had delivered it in conversation the third part of the work itself, because, while the brothers drew him toward expounding other things, they did not permit this part to be more subtly emended. This work, extended through thirty-five books, he set forth, as has been said, in six codices.

At the very beginnings of his episcopate, when he had been humbly reproved by John, bishop of the city of Ravenna, as to why so suitable a man had willed, by hiding, to flee the burdens of pastoral care, he composed the book of the Pastoral Rule as though rendering an account.

Dividing it by a fourfold method, he showed that it must be weighed carefully: how each person should come to the summit of governance when the necessity of affairs demands it; how one who duly comes to it should live; how one who lives well should teach; and with how great consideration one who teaches rightly should daily recognize his own weakness.

First, therefore, let him moderate desire. Then let life commend the office of teacher that is received by one not seeking it. Next, let the good that is shown by living well also be propagated by teaching. Finally, let consideration of one’s own weakness press down even each perfect work, lest the swelling of self-exaltation extinguish it before the eyes.

In the third part of the book itself, he shows at length how individual persons devoted to various vices are to be admonished in different ways according to the diversity of their conditions. Anastasius the Great, bishop of Antioch, translated this book of the Pastoral Rule into Greek and procured the venerable work for the Eastern churches.

Then, while Gregory still had voice and breath sufficient for speaking, running through the station churches he delivered twenty homilies on the Gospel before the people at diverse times. He did indeed dictate the others of the same number, but, because a continual illness of the stomach assailed him, he permitted others to pronounce them. He sent copies of these to Secundus, a servant of God, when he requested them.

When he was earnestly asked by his intimates to describe some things concerning the miracles of the fathers, Gregory, moved by this, interrupted the study of another exposition and set forth with his deacon Peter the miracles of the saints—especially those performed in Italy—through question and answer. He distinguished them merely by placing names before them and arranged them in four books.

Many years afterward, Zacharias, Roman bishop, most learned in Greek and Latin speech, translated these books of the Dialogues into the Greek language and made them known to the Eastern churches, although the crafty perversity of the Greeks immediately erased and removed the name of the Son in the commemoration of the Holy Spirit proceeding from the Father.

The second of these books describes at length and throughout the birth, progress full of virtues and miracles, and passing of Blessed Benedict. The fourth, through many examples, treats the state of the future life, namely hell, purgatory, and paradise.

Finally, at the request of the Romans, he treated the first and last parts, or visions, of the prophet Ezekiel, which appeared more obscure. Distinguishing these through twenty-two homilies, he revealed how much light they contain within.

As John the Deacon says, although these books are taught by doctors of a later age to have been produced with both most correct opinions and a lucid style of rhetorical eloquence, Blessed Gregory, from the sweetness of his humility, declared them uncultivated to Leander. Concerning the book of the Moralia, he writes as follows:

> I ask that whoever runs through the sayings in the Moralia of this work not seek in them the foliage of words, because, by Holy Scripture, the frivolity of fruitless loquacity is diligently restrained from its expositors, when it is forbidden to plant a name in the temple of God [read: plant a grove in the temple of God].
> Hence I also scorned to observe the art of speaking itself which the teachings of external discipline impart. For, as the tenor of this letter announces, I do not flee the collision of metacism, I do not avoid the confusion of barbarism, and I disdain to observe hiatuses, changes, and also the cases of prepositions, because I consider it exceedingly unworthy that I should restrict the words of the heavenly oracle beneath the rules of Donatus. Nor, indeed, were these things observed by any translators in the authority of Holy Scripture.

In these words it is recognized that Gregory did not strive after pompous speech, but rather fell into it from the former custom of secular exercise. Nevertheless, both Isidore and Bede greatly commend his eloquence. Gregory himself, however, out of humility, calls his doctrine bran in comparison with the doctrine of other doctors. But he also prohibited his own books from being read publicly—that is, at table or in church during the offices.

At the end of the Moralia, his very great humility is also shown, when he says:

> Now that this work is completed, I see that I must return to myself. For our mind, when it speaks rightly, is much dispersed outside itself. For while words are considered as to how they may be brought forth, because they draw the mind outward they diminish its integrity.
>
> And although I do not find that I have said any evil things, nevertheless I do not maintain that I have said none at all. But if, receiving them divinely, I have said any good things, I confess that by my own fault I have said them less well.
>
> Returning inwardly to myself, however, I inspect the root of my intention. I recognize indeed that from it I wished above all to please God. But, secretly and I know not how, an intention of human praise inserts itself into that same intention by which I strive to please God. When afterward, and too late, I discern this, I find that I act in one way in that which I know I began in another.
>
> It must therefore be confessed that our right intention, which desires to please God alone, is sometimes treacherously accompanied by a less right intention, which seeks to please men concerning the gifts of God. But if we are strictly examined by divine judgment, what place of salvation remains amid these things, when both our evil things are pure evils and the good things that we believe we possess can in no way be pure goods?

And after a few words:

> Therefore, I ask that each person who reads these things bestow upon me before the strict Judge the aid of his prayer, and wash away with tears everything he finds filthy in me.

He seems also to have written or expounded other things, from what he appears to signify to John the subdeacon, his representative at Ravenna, writing among other things as follows:

> Because Claudius, once my most beloved son, had heard me speaking of certain things concerning Proverbs, the Song of Songs, the Prophets, also the books of Kings, and the Heptateuch, which because of weakness I was unable to hand over in writing, he dictated them according to his own understanding, lest they perish through forgetfulness, so that at a suitable time he might bring these same things to me and they might be dictated more correctly.
> When he had read them to me, I found that the sense of my statements had been changed in a very mutilated manner. Hence it is necessary that, with every excuse and delay ceasing, your Experience go to his monastery, cause the brothers to assemble, and cause them to bring into the open, with complete truthfulness, however many little sheets concerning the various Scriptures he brought there. Receive them and send them to me more swiftly.

From this it is established that he composed more books than those aforesaid which we possess. And although, while the treachery of the Lombards raged, he ceased from the exposition of books after the treatises on Ezekiel, nevertheless, for as long as he could live, he did not cease from composing letters. Of these he left in the archive as many books as the years he lived, whence he left the thirteenth book of letters incomplete.

From the multitude of these letters, in the time of the first Pope Hadrian, certain decretal letters were excerpted and gathered into two volumes, as is now seen. It is called the Register of Gregory.

XIII. Concerning His Various Letters

When the most avaricious and at the same time most rapacious emperor Maurice, at the suggestions of Gregory's enemies, issued the most deadly law that no soldier who had been marked upon the hand should be permitted to be converted, Gregory answered him, among other things, as follows:

> The power of my lords' Piety over all men has been given for this: that those who desire good things may be assisted, that the way of the heavens may be opened more widely, and that the earthly kingdom may serve the heavenly. And behold, it is said in an open declaration that one who has once been marked in earthly military service is not permitted to serve Christ unless either his service has been completed or he has been discharged because of bodily weakness.
> To these things, behold, through me, his last servant and yours, Christ answers, saying: "From a notary I made you count of the guards; from count of the guards, Caesar; from Caesar, emperor; and not only this, but also father of emperors. I entrusted my priests to your hand, and do you withdraw your soldiers from my service?"
>
> Most pious lord, I ask: what will you, a servant, answer your Lord when he comes and says these things at judgment? Let my lord, I ask, inquire what earlier emperor gave this law, and let him consider more precisely whether it ought to have been given.

The same man writes to Theodore the physician:

> My sins bring it about, says Gregory, that, by whose counsel or suggestion I do not know, the emperor issued in his republic such a law as, so those who know the ancient laws say, Julian first issued; concerning him we all know how hostile he was to God.

There was a certain John who, from being a monk, was made bishop of the imperial city. At the time when Gregory was residing at Constantinople as the pope's apocrisiary, John had pretended, as though humbly, to flee the supreme priesthood. But when he had received it, he was lifted up to such a degree in pride that, seeking an occasion from another matter, he held a synod in which he endeavored to call himself universal.

When Pope Pelagius heard this, he annulled the acts of that same synod by letters he sent. Blessed Gregory, following Pelagius's sentence, often warned the aforesaid John and, when he delayed in yielding, punished him with an equal sentence. Under threat of the loss of their own honor, he commanded all bishops never either to write or to accept the profane title "universal."

But that John, purchasing with many deceptions the consent of the most avaricious prince for his hypocrisy, obtained that the emperor would write to Gregory, requiring him to be peaceable toward John. For this reason Gregory himself, among other things, writes as follows to the empress Constantina:

> From the writing of Sabinian, my deacon and representative, I learned how much the justice of your Serenity bestows itself in the causes of Blessed Peter, prince of the Apostles, against certain men proud in feigned humility and deceitful in flattery. Hence I continue to ask that you not permit the hypocrisy of anyone to prevail against the truth.
> For according to the Apostle's word, there are certain persons who, through sweet speeches and blessings, seduce the hearts of the innocent; who indeed are contemptible in clothing but swell in heart; who seem to despise all things in this world, but seek to obtain all at once the things that belong to the world; who confess themselves unworthy of all men, but cannot be content with private titles, because they desire that from which they may appear worthier than all men.

And after a few words:

> Furthermore, I make known that I received a writing from the most pious lord that I ought now to be peaceable toward my brother and fellow priest John. It was indeed fitting for so religious a lord to command these things to priests. But since this same John my brother, with novel presumption and pride, calls himself universal, so that in the time of my predecessor of holy memory he caused himself to be inscribed in a synod by this proud title—even though all the acts of that synod were dissolved when the Apostolic See contradicted them—the most serene lord intimated something grievous to me: namely, that he did not correct the one who is proud, but rather wished me, who in this cause defend the truth of the Gospels and canons, of humility and rectitude, to turn aside from my intention.
>
> In this matter, by my aforesaid brother and fellow priest, action is taken against the evangelical sentence, against Blessed Peter also, against all the churches, and against the canons. But there is an almighty God, in whose hand all things are, concerning whom it is written: "There is no wisdom, there is no prudence, there is no counsel against the Lord."
> Indeed, the aforesaid most holy brother attempts to persuade the most serene lord of many things, but I know well that those great prayers and tears of his permit nothing to be stolen from him by anyone contrary to his reason or his soul. Nevertheless, it is exceedingly grievous that it is patiently tolerated that, after all others have been despised, my aforesaid brother and fellow bishop alone attempts to be called "bishop."

But in this pride of his, what else is designated except that the times of Antichrist are already near? For he imitates him who, despising the legions of angels in their shared joy, endeavored to burst forth to the summit of singularity, saying: "Above the stars of God I shall exalt my throne; I shall be like the Most High."

Hence, by almighty God, I ask that you not permit the times of your Piety to be stained by the elevation of one man, nor in any manner give any assent to so perverse a title, and that in this cause your Piety by no means despise me. For although Gregory's sins are so great that he merits to suffer these things, there are no sins of Peter the Apostle such that he should merit to suffer such things in your times.

Hence again and again, by the almighty Lord, I ask that, just as earlier princes sought the favor of Saint Peter the Apostle, you also take care both to seek and to preserve it for yourselves, and that, because of the sins of us who serve him unworthily, his honor among us be in no way diminished. May he be able both to be your helper now in all things and afterward to forgive your sins.

We now reckon twenty-seven years that we have lived in this City among the swords of the Lombards. How many things are expended to them by the Church day by day so that we may be able to live among them need not be suggested.

Writing to the emperor Maurice concerning this matter, Gregory says:

Behold, without doubt Peter received the keys of the heavenly kingdom; to him the power of binding and loosing is granted; to him the care and principate of the whole Church is committed. And nevertheless he is not called the universal Apostle, while the most holy man John, my fellow bishop, endeavors to be called universal bishop. I am compelled to exclaim and say, "O times! O morals!"

Behold, in the regions of Europe everything has been handed over to the men of the barbarians [read: handed over to the power of the barbarians]: towns destroyed, cities overturned, fortresses overthrown, provinces depopulated. No cultivator inhabits the land, but worshipers of idols rage and rule daily in the slaughter of the faithful. And nevertheless priests, who ought to have lain weeping in ashes upon the pavement, seek titles of vanity for themselves and glory in new and profane designations.

Most pious lord, do I defend my own cause in this matter? Do I avenge a spiritual injury? I defend the cause of almighty God, the cause of the universal Church. Who is this who, against the evangelical statutes and against the decrees of the canons, presumes to usurp a new name for himself? Would that he who desires to be universal were one without diminution.

Behold, we know that many priests of the church of Constantinople have fallen into the whirlpool of heresies and have been made not only heretics but heresiarchs.

And below:

Therefore, the one who must rather be bent by the command of the most pious lords is he who scorns to furnish obedience to the canonical commands. He must be restrained who does injury to the holy universal Church, who swells in heart, who desires to rejoice in a title of singularity, and who also, by a private designation, places himself above the honor of your empire.

Behold, we all suffer scandal concerning this matter. Let the author of the scandal return to a right life, and all disputes among priests will cease. I am the servant of all priests insofar as they live in a priestly manner.

XIV. His Disciplinary Measures

Gregory, therefore, observing that he had been appointed pontiff by God so that he might tear out the roots of vices and plant virtues, condemned with the threat of anathema all customs which he learned had newly sprung up in the Church contrary to apostolic tradition.

He removed all secular men from his chamber. He joined to himself as intimates and counselors the most prudent of the clerics or monks. He himself also established, saying in a general synod, II, question VII:

Since the life of the shepherd ought to be an example to the disciples, clerics for the most part do not know what the life of their shepherd is in secret. Concerning this matter, by the present decree we establish that certain chosen persons from the clerics or even from the monks should serve in the ministry of the pontifical chamber, so that the one who is in the place of governance may have such witnesses as see his true conduct in secret and from assiduous sight take an example of advancement.

The most holy pontiff himself added to the Lenten fast, which is said to have been instituted by Blessed Peter and was begun by laymen on the Monday after the first Sunday of Lent, four days to be fasted before that Sunday, so that in this we might conform ourselves to Christ in a fast of forty days. For from the first Sunday until Easter there are only thirty-six days. In that Lenten fast he declares that abstinence must be made not only from meat but also from eggs and cheese, as is clear in Distinction IV, Finally.

Gregory himself imposed continence upon subdeacons, establishing that no one should thereafter be promoted to the subdiaconate unless continence had been promised implicitly, even if not explicitly, so that afterward they could not contract marriage and a marriage contracted in fact does not hold, as is clear in Distinction XXXI, Three Years Ago.

He also rebuked priests who lived with women, saying:

> I conspitio that it is impious to say or hear [read: I perceive that it is impious to say or hear], and contrary to the enactments of the holy canons. Where there is such a cohabitation of persons dwelling together, the goads of the ancient enemy are not absent. Therefore they must be admonished not to be deceived by the fraud of the ancient enemy, so that, according to the Apostle's word, our ministry may not be reproached.

This appears in Distinction LXXXI, It Is Fitting.

In the same distinction it is read that Blessed Augustine did not consent to dwell with his sister, saying: "Those who are with my sister are not my sisters." Therefore the caution of a learned man ought to be a great instruction to us.

Against simoniacs he says as follows in the Register and in I, question I:

> If a priest obtains a church through money, let him not only be deprived of the church but also be spalietur of the honor of the priesthood [read: be stripped of the honor of the priesthood], because none of the faithful is ignorant that to buy or sell an altar, tithes, and the Holy Spirit is the simoniacal heresy; and a blessing is converted into a curse for him who is promoted to this end, that he may become a heretic.

And below:

> Those who sell or buy holy orders cannot be priests, whence it is written: anathema to the giver, anathema to the receiver.

These are Gregory's words. These words, however, are very obscure. For such a simoniac cannot retain the benefice itself without a dispensation; and, if it is a benefice with cure, he is suspended from the execution of his offices and orders. Thus the statement that those who buy orders—even orders of any kind—cannot be priests is understood because, namely, they cannot carry out the acts of those orders. And thus they are understood to be anathematized, that is, suspended; for according to the ancient laws they were not excommunicated by the law itself, but suspended.

"Altar" means either the chapel itself; or presentation to the chapel, which is the right of patrons; or the patronage itself. To give or receive money for any of these is simony. "Tithe" here means the right of receiving tithes.

To sell the Holy Spirit is to receive money as the price of the sacraments in which the Holy Spirit is received, which is simony. And simony is called a heresy not properly but by similitude, because by that act a man seems to show that he can sell the Holy Spirit as though he were its lord, which is heretical to believe.

And the phrase "that he may become a heretic" is understood consecutively, not causally, because from the simoniacal promotion itself this effect follows: that he is regarded as though a heretic in the manner stated.

The same Gregory says in his treatise on the Gospels, at I, question I, There Are Some:

> When the prophet described a just man, he said: "He who shakes his hands free from every gift." He did not say "from a gift," but "from every gift," because one gift is from service, another from the hand, and another from the tongue. A gift from service is service unduly bestowed; a gift from the hand is money; a gift from the tongue is favor. Therefore, that man then shakes holy orders, his hands, free from every gift [read: Therefore, he who confers holy orders then shakes his hands free from every gift] when in divine matters he seeks not only no money but not even human favor.

The same man says in the Register, in the following chapter:

> If anyone who neither excels in holy conduct, nor is called by the clergy and people, nor is compelled by urging, but, already polluted by some crime, shamelessly receives the priesthood of Christ—with an unjust desire of the heart, or with filthy entreaties of the mouth, or by attendance, or by manual service, or by a fraudulent little gift—and receives the episcopal or priestly dignity not for the gain of souls but through the avarice of empty glory and appearances [read: not for the gain of souls but supported by the avarice of empty glory], and if in his lifetime he does not voluntarily leave it and unexpected death does not find him penitent, without doubt he will perish eternally.

This subject of simony, which reigns greatly in the Church, however, you have explained at length throughout the second part, Title I, Chapter I.

The same Gregory says in Homily XIII, and in I, question III, Those Who Sell, against judges who judge for money, even if justly:

> Those selling in the temple are those who bestow for a reward that which belongs to certain persons by right. For to sell justice is to preserve it in return for receiving a reward. But those buying in the temple are those who are unwilling to render to their neighbor that which is just, and who, while they scorn to perform a thing owed by right, send forth sin by a price given to patrons [read: buy sin by giving a price to patrons].

The same Gregory, in XI, question III:

> He who judges rightly and awaits the reward of compensation perpetrates fraud against God, because he sells, by receiving money, the justice that he ought to have imparted freely.
>
> They use good things badly who judge justly for temporal gain. For such persons are provoked toward truth not by the defense of justice but by the love of reward; if the hope of money is withdrawn from them, they immediately depart from confession of justice [read: depart from the defense of justice].
>
> The acceptance of gifts is a transgression of truth, whence it is also said concerning the just man: "He who shakes his hands free from every gift."

The same man says in the same question:

> It must above all be guarded against that rulers of the Church and those who exercise public judgments should in no way, when dictating sentences, be precipitate through fickleness or fury. Rather, after the cases have first been diligently examined, when the matter that was unknown has come fully to knowledge, then let divine and human law be unfolded; and according to what is established there, with acceptance of persons removed, let the definitive sentence be pronounced.

The same man says in Book XX of the Moralia, Distinction XLV:

> Everyone who judges justly bears a balance in his hand, and in each scale justice and mercy are borne. Through justice he renders sentence for the sin; through mercy he tempers the punishment of the sin, so that with a just deliverance he may correct certain things through equity and pardon certain things through compassion [read: with a just balance he may correct certain things through equity and pardon certain things through compassion]. He who sets the judgment of God before his eyes, always fearing and trembling, is apprehensive in every affair lest he fall by deviating from the path of justice.

The same man says in the preceding chapter of the same distinction:

> Either discipline or mercy is greatly impaired if one is maintained without the other. But rulers ought to possess toward their subjects both mercy that counsels justly and discipline that rages piously. Hence wine and oil are applied by the Samaritan to the wounds of the injured man: putrid things are cleansed by wine, and things to be healed are soothed by oil.
>
> Mildness, therefore, must be mixed with severity, and a certain tempering must be made from both, so that subjects are neither ulcerated by excessive harshness nor released from authority by excessive mildness.

The authority of the superior, the figure of the ark, and the example of Moses declare this.

The same Gregory says in a homily and in the same distinction:

> True justice has compassion; false justice has disdain. Although the just also are accustomed to be indignant at sinners, one thing is done from the swelling of pride and another from zeal for discipline. The just indeed are indignant, but they are not disdainful. They stir up persecution—that is, against vices—but they do so while loving.
>
> On the contrary, those who are accustomed to take pride in false justice despise all others, condescend with no mercy to the weak, and become worse sinners in the degree that they do not believe themselves to be sinners.

The same man says from the Register to the bishops established throughout Gaul, Europe, and Germany, in Distinction XLV:

> Although things worthy of reproof frequently occur among priests, benevolence should nevertheless accomplish more than severity in correcting them, exhortation more than agitation, and charity more than power, since none of us lives without reproof or without sin. For if the Lord had immediately judged Blessed Peter, our teacher, after his threefold denial, he would not afterward have received so great a fruit from him as he did.
> Therefore, rulers of the Church must rather be stirred up [read: treated patiently] and corrected than immediately judged. Hence it is necessary that all ecclesiastical affairs be considered more solicitously and guarded more diligently after the experience of many cases, so that through the spirit of charity and peace all matter of scandals, the presumption of the envious, and the oppression of simple brothers may be removed from the churches of the Lord.

These are his words. They seem to be understood and observed when the sins are hidden, or arise from some passion and weakness, and those who committed them grieve greatly over them, and when they do not arise from habitual malice with obstinacy.

Hence the same Gregory says from the Register, at II, question V:

> Paul says, "Do not rebuke an elder." But this rule is to be observed when the elder's fault does not by its example draw the hearts of the younger toward destruction. But where an elder furnishes the young an example leading to destruction, there he must be struck with a strict rebuke. For it is written, "You are all a snare to the young," and again, "Cursed is the child of a hundred years."

The same man says in a homily and at XXIII, question IV, If He Who:

> Those things committed against us I can easily forgive; but those committed against God we can remit with great strictness, and nevertheless not without penance.

The same man writes to Castorius, notary of Ravenna, saying:

> The more that is entrusted by us to you and the more necessary you see the cases imposed upon you to be, the more vigorous and solicitous you ought to show yourself. Therefore, if Maximus the bishop has done penance for his disobedience, as we appointed, your Experience ought to give him for his consolation the letter that we wrote to him, by which we signified that we restored both our favor and communion to him. For just as it is fitting that we be severe toward those persisting in contumacy, so we ought not to deny pardon to humility and to the penitent [read: to the humble and penitent].

The same man says in Homily XXVI and at XI, question III:

> Those who follow their own hatreds or favor in the cases of their subjects are unable to judge their subjects worthily.

The same man, writing to Boniface the defender, says at XXV, question II, Of the Institution:

> It is exceedingly harsh, and especially hostile to the good morals of priests, for anyone, under however great an excuse of reason, to strive to rescind things that have been well ordained and to teach by his example that established things can at some time be dissolved.

The same man says to Bishop Felix in the same question:

> If I destroyed those things that our predecessors established, I would justly be proved not a builder but an overthrower, as the voice of Truth testifies, saying, "Every kingdom divided against itself will not stand," and every knowledge and law divided against itself will not stand.

The same man says to Dominicus, bishop of Carthage, in the same question:

> Concerning ecclesiastical privileges about which your Fraternity writes, hold this without hesitation: just as we defend our own, so we preserve their rights for each and every church. With favor supporting no one do I impart beyond what he merits, nor, with ambition urging, shall I detract from anyone that which belongs to his right. But I desire to honor my brothers in all things and so to advance each by honor, provided that it is not something that can be opposed by one to another by right.

The same man says to Vigilius, bishop of Arles, in the same question:

> Since the pious desire of the will and the priestly intention of a praising determination must always be aided by efforts [read: the intention of a praiseworthy determination must always be aided by priestly efforts], the care of solicitude must be applied so that those things disposed or ordained for the peace of religious life may neither be neglected by dissimulation nor disturbed by any presumption. Rather, just as that which reason required usefully obtained determination, so that which has been determined ought not to be violated.

The same man says at XII, question II:

> It is fitting that we provide with suitable consideration for those choosing the religious life, lest an occasion of any necessity either render them slothful or—may it not happen—break their religious way of life.

The same man, writing to Luminosus, bishop of Rimini, says at XVIII, question I:

> We wholly prohibit any occasion for a popular assembly to be furnished among the servants of God—that is, religious persons—or in their dwellings, because it is not expedient for their souls. Nor may a bishop dare to place a cathedra there, and so forth, so that monks may always remain under the power of their abbots and, with every vexation and burden removed, may perform the divine work—that is, the office—with the highest devotion of mind.

Writing concerning religious persons to Bishop Januarius, he says as follows at XIX, question III:

> By an open determination of law it has been decreed that those entering a monastery for the sake of conversion should afterward have no liberty to make a testament, but that their goods should belong to that same monastery.

"For the sake of conversion" means for the sake of remaining. It is otherwise if they had entered for the sake of probation, according to the gloss. And there is no doubt concerning entry through tacit or express profession.

The same man says at XVIII, question II:

> For the sake of visitation and exhortation, let the bishop of the city approach the monastery as often as it pleases him.

This is understood of monasteries that are not exempt. He adds:

> But let the bishop fulfill the duty of charity in such a way that the monastery incurs no burden.

The same man says to John, bishop of Ravenna, in the same question:

> It has come to me that, in the churches of your Fraternity, certain places long ago consecrated as monasteries have now been made dwellings of clerics or even laymen.

And below:

> Therefore, if this has been done in any place, let your Fraternity hasten to amend it.

The same man says from the Register, in the same question:

> In no place do we permit monks and nuns to dwell in one monastery, nor even in those they call double monasteries. And if there is any such place, let the religious bishop take care that the women remain in their own place, but compel the monks to build another monastery; and let the goods they possess in common be distributed to them according to the rights belonging to them.

The same man, at XVIII, question I, It Has Come, prohibits monks from making women their comothers, namely by holding them at baptism or lifting them from the font.

The same man says from the Register, at XVII, question I:

> Souls [read: Ananias] had vowed money to God, which afterward, conquered by the devil's persuasion, he withdrew. But you know with what death he was punished. If, therefore, he who withdrew the coins he had given was worthy of the danger of death, consider of how great a danger you will be worthy at the divine judgment—you who withdrew from almighty God not coins but your very self, whom you had vowed to him under the monastic habit.

The same man says upon Ezekiel, in the same question:

> Those who do good things, if they resolve to do better things and after resolving do not do them, although they persevere in their earlier good things, nevertheless have fallen in the sight of the Lord.

Likewise:

> There are some who resolve to abandon all things, subject themselves to God's service, and restrain themselves with the bridle of chastity; but when they see that others have fallen after undertaking chastity, they withdraw themselves and lose merit.

The same man, writing to John, archbishop of Ravenna, says at XVI, question I:

> No one can serve in ecclesiastical duties and remain duly in the monastic rule, so that he maintains the strictness of the monastery when he is compelled daily to remain in an ecclesiastical monastery [read: in ecclesiastical ministry].

The gloss there says that either he speaks of secular clerics who wished to preside over monasteries although they did not observe the monastic life; or, if he speaks of monks, he means that one placed over a secular church possessing the cure of souls cannot observe monastic observances, such as silence and things of this sort, and attend to the cure of souls; or that he cannot simultaneously preside over a secular church and a monastery.

The same man, writing to Marianus [read: Marinianus], bishop of Ravenna, says at XVI, question I:

> You must take care lest monasteries perhaps sustain any burden from the promotion of any monk or abbot, so that if any of the monks from any monastery advances to the clerical office or a sacred order, he should afterward possess no power there.

The same man says from the Register, at XXVII, question II, concerning Agathosa:

> Although worldly law provides that, for the sake of conversion—that is, entry into religion—the marriage of spouses can be dissolved when either one is unwilling, divine law nevertheless does not permit it. For it in no way concedes that a husband dismiss his wife except for the cause of fornication, because, after the joining of the man and woman in marriage makes one body, one part cannot be converted while the other remains in the world.

These are his words. Nevertheless, he understands dismissal of a spouse because of fornication with respect to the marriage bed, not with respect to the bond.

XV. Against Detractors

Gregory says at II, question IV:

> The envy of the ancient enemy has this as its own: that those whom, because God resists him, he is unable to cast down by the perpetration of wicked acts, he meanwhile rends by fabricating false reports about them.

The same man says to Constantine, bishop of Milan, at XI, question III, In All Things:

> In all adversities that occur in this life, as you know, only the strict judgment of almighty God must be weighed, and one must always return to one's own heart. Let the tongue of no one implicate a person where conscience does not accuse him. For one whom conscience defends is free amid accusations; and one cannot be free without accusation if conscience alone, which accuses inwardly, accuses him.
>
> We have the testimony of Sacred Eloquence that, when very great evils are perhaps alleged, they ought not to be believed unless proved, but the things proved should swiftly be avenged. I have said these things, therefore, to show that it is an act of excessive levity if anyone strives to believe grave evils when they cannot be proved.
>
> Hence your Holiness ought to separate your mind from the rumors and detractions of slanderous men and think only those things that belong to the interior life and advance the welfare of your subjects.

The same man says in the same question:

> Amid the words of those praising or blaming, one must always return to the mind. If the good that is said of us is not found in it, this ought to generate great sadness. And again, if the evil that men say of us is not found in it, we ought to leap into great joy.
>
> For what does it matter if men do not praise us, if conscience demonstrates that we are free? We have Paul saying, "Our glory is this: the testimony of our conscience." Job also says, "Behold, my witness is in heaven." Therefore, if we have a witness in heaven and a witness in the heart, let us permit fools outside to say what they will.
>
> For what else do detractors do except blow into the dust and raise earth into their own eyes, so that from the source whence they blow more strongly in detraction, from that same source they see less of the truth?
> Nevertheless, they also must be summoned and calmly admonished, and satisfaction must be made to them in every way, knowing that Truth says concerning the Jews, "Lest perhaps we scandalize them." But if they are unwilling to receive satisfaction from the truth, you have a consolation that you may behold in the Gospel. For when it had been said to the Lord, "Do you know that the Pharisees, when they heard this word, were scandalized?" he answered them, "Let them alone. They are blind and leaders of the blind."
> Paul also admonishes, saying, "If it can be done, insofar as it depends upon you, have peace with all men," as though saying: if we desire to preserve charity in our mind toward those who hate us, even if they do not have peace with us, we nevertheless without doubt have peace with them.

The same Gregory assigns the reason why God permits this—namely, that good persons be detracted—saying at VI, question I:

> There are very many who perhaps praise the life of good persons more than they ought; and lest some self-exaltation creep in from the praise, almighty God permits the wicked to burst forth into detraction and reproach, so that, if some fault is born in the heart from the mouth of those praising, it may be suffocated by the mouth of those blaming.
> Hence it is that the Doctor of the Gentiles testifies that he runs in preaching amid ill repute and good repute, and that to some he is an odor of death unto death, to others an odor of life unto life.

That priests in particular ought not to be judged or despised because of detractions made against them, but ought to be honored by all, even princes, the same man shows by writing these things to the emperor Maurice at XI, question I:

> Let our lord—that is, the emperor—not be too quickly indignant with priests from earthly power, but, from heavenly consideration [read: from excellent consideration] and because of him whose servants they are, let him rule over them in such a way that he also bestows the reverence owed to them.
> For in the divine writings priests are sometimes called gods and sometimes angels. For concerning the one who is to be brought to an oath, it is said to Moses, "Bring him before the gods," namely the priests. And again it is written, "You shall not detract from the gods," that is, the priests. And the prophet says, "The lips of the priest guard knowledge, and men seek the law from his mouth, because he is the angel of the Lord of hosts."

What wonder is it, therefore, if your Piety deigns to honor those to whom the Lord, bestowing honor in his own utterance, calls either gods or angels?

Ecclesiastical history also relates that, when accusations in writing against bishops had been offered to the prince Constantine of pious memory, he accepted the documents of accusation and, summoning the bishops who had been accused, burned in their presence the documents he had received, saying, "Go and arrange your cases among yourselves, because it is not fitting that we judge gods." In this sentence, by the reverence bestowed, he furnished something more to himself through humility than to them.

For before him there were pagan princes in the republic who, not knowing the true God, worshiped gods of stone and lingneous material [read: gods of stone and wood], and nevertheless bestowed the greatest honor upon their priests. What wonder is it, therefore, if a Christian emperor, a man of God, honors priests, when pagan princes knew how to bestow honor upon the priests who served gods of wood and stone?

Therefore we assert this not only particularly concerning good priests, but generally concerning all priests, even the wicked, since we do not yet know what sort each will be in the terrible judgment of God. For the excellent preacher Paul says, "Do not judge yourself before the time [read: Do not judge before the time], until the Lord comes." For there are many things concerning his judgment that men do not know, because perhaps those whom you praise he reproves, and those whom you blame he will praise.

These are his words.

XVI. Against the Arrogant or Proud and Against Flatterers

Gregory says as follows in Book XXIII of the Moralia and in Distinction XLVI:

The teaching of the arrogant has this as its own: that they do not know how to impart humbly what they teach, and they cannot minister rightly even the right things they understand. For in their words it is disclosed that, when they teach, they seem to themselves to sit upon a certain summit, and they look down upon those whom they teach as though placed far below themselves at the bottom. They deign to address them not as counselors, but only as rulers.

Rightly does the Lord say to these through the prophet, "You ruled with austerity and power." On the contrary, true teaching flees this vice of self-exaltation in thought the more vehemently, the more ardently it pursues with the darts of its words the teacher of self-exaltation himself.

The same man says in the Pastoral Rule and in Distinction XL:

If the sense of human understanding recognizes itself to be foolish and sinful, it apprehends knowledge of inward brightness. But if it attributes to itself the splendor of wisdom or justice, it excludes itself from the light of higher knowledge, and it in no way penetrates the brightness of the true light in the degree that it exalts itself before itself through arrogance, according to Romans I: "Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools."

The same man says upon Ezekiel, in On Penance, Distinction III, Those Who Are Seduced:

Frequently a man is secretly entangled in many sins and appears great in one virtue. That very virtue also vanishes and fails, because when it becomes known to men it is without doubt praised, and their favor is eagerly desired.

And below:

For frequently pride lies hidden and chastity becomes known, and chastity, after being displayed for a long time, is lost near the end of life because concealed pride is retained uncorrected until the end. Therefore, when the reprobate are seen to act well, they show, as it were, a level road to the elect who follow. But when they fall into the snare of wickedness, they show to the elect proceeding after them, as it were, a pit of pride that must be avoided.

The same man says in the book of the Moralia and in On Penance, Distinction II, the final chapter:

For this reason such marvelous things as those in which the first angel existed, and those which he lost, are told concerning him in Holy Scripture: that it may show man what he himself, if he becomes proud, will suffer for the fault of his self-exaltation, since God did not will to spare by striking him whom by creating he raised into the glory of so great a brightness. Therefore let an exalted man consider what he merits on earth, if the angel exalted above the others was cast down in heaven.

The same man says in the Moralia concerning disobedience, at VIII, question I:

It must be known: if to resist is as the sin of divination, and to be unwilling to acquiesce is as the crime of idolatry, obedience alone possesses the merit of faith, without which anyone is proved to be unbelieving, even if he appears to hold the faith.

Against the avaricious and covetous, the same man says in Distinction XLVII:

We are unable to cleave to the author of good things in any other way unless we cut away from ourselves covetousness, which is the root of all evils.

The same man says in Book XIX of the Moralia and in Distinction XLVII:

All lovers of this world are strong in earthly things and weak in heavenly things. For temporal glory they desire to toil even unto death; for perpetual hope they do not persist even a little in labor. For earthly gains they tolerate every injury; for heavenly reward they refuse to bear the insults of even the slightest word.

Frequently they tolerate nakedness, abasement, and hunger to acquire riches and honors, and by abstinence they torment themselves for the very things they hasten to attain. They neglect laboriously seeking heavenly things all the more, the more slowly they think those things will be recompensed.

The same man says from the Register and at I, question I:

Since all avarice is the service of idols, whoever does not vigilantly guard against this, especially in bestowing ecclesiastical honors, is subjected to the vice of unbelief, even if he appears to hold the faith that he neglects.

The same man, writing to Bishop Siagrius, says at I, question I:

It must not be thought alms if that which is acquired from unlawful goods is distributed to the poor. For he who receives evilly with this intention, that he may distribute well, is burdened rather than aided.

Therefore, lest under the pretext of alms we strive to acquire something with sin, Scripture prohibits it, saying, "The sacrifices of the wicked, which are offered from crime, are abominable to the Lord." For whatever is offered in sacrifice to God from crime does not appease but provokes the wrath of the Almighty.

Hence again it is written, "Honor God from your just labors." Hence also it is said through Solomon, "He who offers sacrifice from the substance of the poor does the same as if he sacrificed the son before the sight of his father." From this it is easily recognized how greatly God's indignation is provoked when a sacrifice from plunder is offered to him.

Therefore, one must greatly turn away from perpetrating the sins of the simoniacal heresy under the pretext of alms.

The same man, writing to Januarius, bishop of Sardinia, says from the Register and at XIII, question II:

Nereida, a most illustrious woman, has complained to us that your Fraternity wishes to exact solidi from her for the burial of her daughter. But, after by God's authority we came to the honor of the episcopate, we wholly prohibited this vice from our Church and by no means permitted it to be usurped again through a depraved custom.

I therefore admonish that this vice of avarice not presume to be attempted again. But if, at any time, you permit someone to be buried in your church, if his parents or heirs freely wish to offer something for the lights, we do not forbid you to receive it; but we wholly prohibit anything from being requested or exacted, lest—which is exceedingly irreligious—the Church be said, may it not happen, to be venal, or you appear to rejoice over human deaths if you strive to seek profit in any way from their corpses.

Concerning simony in burial, this is found in the second part, Title I, Chapter I.

The same man, writing to Constantia, queen of Gaul, against those who inflict losses upon churches through thefts, fires, or other means, says as follows at XII, question II:

Since I know that the most devout lady diligently thinks about the heavenly life and the remedy of her soul, I judge that I commit a fault if I remain silent instead of suggesting those things that belong to the fear of almighty God, and if I do not diligently stir your most holy self concerning ecclesiastical peace.

He then relates the complaint made to him by a certain Bishop Julian, whose church's estate in those regions had been invaded by robbers and injured by plunder and fires. Hence he asks that satisfaction for such things be made by them, as canonical and civil law command, adding with the attachment of a penalty:

The highest good in human affairs is to cultivate justice, to preserve for each person his own rights, and not to permit toward subjects whatever power can do, but to preserve what is equitable.

The same man, writing to Augustine, bishop of the English, says in the same question:

> Your Fraternity can sufficiently weigh from the person how he may be corrected. For there are some who, possessing resources, perpetrate theft, and there are others who offend in this matter from poverty. Hence it is necessary that some be corrected by losses—that is, restitutions—and others by beatings.
> And when action is taken with a little strictness, it must be taken from charity, not from fury, because this is bestowed upon the one who is corrected, lest he be handed over to the fires of Gehenna. You also add by what increase he ought to return those things which he removed from churches by theft. But may it be far from the Church to receive with an increase that which it appears to lose in earthly goods and to seek the gains of a river [read: to seek gains from losses].

These are his words. There the gloss notes that, with respect to the forum of conscience, it suffices to make satisfaction for the loss; with respect to the judicial forum, it sets down a manifold opinion concerning the increase.

The same man says in the same question:

> Just as the Church ought not to lose its own goods, so it ought not, from the ardor of rapacity, to invade the goods of others.

The same man says in the same question:

> It is fitting that those who labor for ecclesiastical utilities rejoice in ecclesiastical remuneration, so that those who voluntarily subject themselves to the voluntary necessities of services may worthily be consoled by our provisions.

Gregory himself did this there by example, giving Theodore, a most eloquent man and his counselor, one slave of the Church.

The same man says in the same question:

> Since our Redeemer, the creator of the whole creation, propitiously willed to assume human flesh for this purpose—that, by the grace of his divinity, after breaking the bond by which we were held captive, he might restore us to the former liberty from servitude—it is salutarily done if men whom nature brought forth free from the beginning, and whom the law of nations subjected to the yoke of servitude, are restored by the benefit of the manumitter to the liberty in which they were born.

He also shows there that he himself did this. For, with regard to piety, he made Montanus and Thomas, slaves of the Roman Church, free and Roman citizens.

The same man says in the same question:

> It is the custom of the Apostolic See to hand commands to an ordained bishop that four portions ought to be made from every stipend that accrues: one to the bishop and his household because of hospitality and reception; another to the clergy; the third to the poor; and the fourth for repairing churches.

XVII. Concerning the Ancient Law

That in the ancient law one who, among other defects, has a continual scab or is heavy is prohibited from offering loaves to God, Gregory expounds in the Pastoral Rule and in Distinction XLIX as signifying the lust of deed or even of heart. Those devoted to vices of this sort ought not to approach the altar to celebrate or communicate, because they are criminal.

For Gregory says:

> He has a continual scab in whom the wantonness of the flesh rules without cessation. For in a scab the heat of the entrails is drawn to the skin. Through this lust is rightly designated, because, if the temptation of the heart leaps forth as far as action, the inward heat surely bursts forth into a scab of the skin and now wounds the body outwardly, because when pleasure is not restrained in thought, it also rules in action.
> He is heavy who does not exercise baseness in deed but nevertheless is burdened without restraint in his mind by continual thought of it. He is indeed by no means carried as far as an impious deed, but his spirit is delighted by the pleasure of lust without any goad of resistance. Therefore, he is heavy who, flowing down toward wantonness in all his thoughts, carries the weight of baseness in his heart.

Concerning the vice of gluttony, the same man says in the book of the Moralia and in On Consecration, Distinction V:

> The vice of gluttony tempts us in five ways. Sometimes times of need are anticipated. Sometimes, although the suitable hour is not anticipated, someone seeks more sumptuous foods. Sometimes he desires that the things to be consumed be prepared more carefully. Sometimes in the very quantity of consumption he exceeds the measure of refreshment. Sometimes the thing desired is contemptible, and nevertheless one sins more grievously by the very heat of immeasurable desire.

The same man, writing to Augustine, bishop of the English, concerning the surfeit of Carnival, says as follows in Distinction IV, the chapter Finally:

> Concerning that Sunday itself, however, we hesitate as to what should be said, since all lay and secular persons desire foods of flesh more carefully and beyond their custom on other days; and unless with a certain novel greed they gorge themselves until midnight, they do not otherwise think that they have received the observance of this holy time.
>
> This is certainly to be ascribed not to reason but to pleasure—indeed, to a certain blindness of mind. Hence they cannot be turned away from such a custom, and therefore they must be left to their own disposition with pardon, lest perhaps they become worse if they are prohibited from such a custom.

These are his words. He speaks of Sunday because at that time the Lenten fast began on the following Monday.

Concerning anger and envy, he treats at length in Book V of the Moralia.

XVIII. Concerning the Degrees of Sins and Temptations

Gregory, writing to Augustine, bishop of the English, says in Distinction V, The Testament:

> Every sin is completed in three ways: by suggestion, delight, and consent. Suggestion is made through the devil, delight through the flesh, and consent through the spirit, because first the serpent suggested the fault, Eve was delighted as the flesh, and Adam consented as the spirit.
> Great discernment is necessary between suggestion, selection [read: delight], and consent. For when the malignant spirit suggests a sin in the mind, if no delight in the sin follows, there is no sin at all. But when the flesh begins to be delighted, then sin begins to be born. If through deliberation it advances to consent: unless he has been washed with water, he is not permitted to enter the church until evening [read: If he consents through deliberation, then sin is known to be completed. The testament of the Old Law calls such a man polluted unless he has been washed with water and does not permit him to enter the church until evening].

The spiritual people, however, understanding this otherwise, consider that one is deluded as though through sleep when, tempted by uncleanness, he is defiled in thought by true images. But he must be washed with water, so that he may wash away the fault of thought with tears; and, unless the fire of temptation has first departed, let him know himself guilty until evening and deservedly outside the church.

In this same illusion, however, discernment is greatly necessary, which ought subtly to weigh from what cause it occurs to the mind of the sleeper. For pollution sometimes occurs from surfeit, sometimes from a superfluity or weakness of nature, and sometimes from thought. It is added there in Gregory's text and in the gloss when, because of this pollution, someone ought to abstain from celebration or communion. But this is declared more fully in the third part, in the title concerning the sacraments.

The same man says in On Penance, Distinction II:

> It must indeed be known that sin is admitted in three ways: one sins either through ignorance, weakness, or deliberate intent. Among these things it must be known that one thing is what the spirit suffers from the temptation of the flesh, and another when through consent the spirit is bound by delights.
>
> For frequently the spirit is tempted by a depraved thought but resists it. Frequently, however, it also wills through desire the perverse thing it has conceived within itself. An unclean thought in no way defiles the mind when it strikes it, but when through delight it subjects the mind to itself.
> Hence the excellent preacher says, "Let no temptation apprehend you except what is human." It is human temptation because frequently we are touched by a shameful thought even unwillingly. But it is now a demonic and not a human temptation when the spirit binds itself through consent to that which the corruption of the flesh suggests.

Concerning perplexity between diverse vices, Gregory says as follows in the book of the Moralia and in Distinction XIII. Expounding the words of Job, "The sinews of Leviathan's testicles are intertwined," he says:

> The arguments of his suggestions are bound together when they find persons entangled, so that they cause many to sin in such a way that, if perhaps they desire to flee sin, they do not escape it without some snare of sin; they commit a fault while inviting it [read: they commit a fault while avoiding it], and they are unable to release themselves from one without consenting to bind themselves in another.

He gives examples among laymen concerning one who swore to his friend that he would keep the secrets told to him, and the friend reveals that he wishes to kill someone. Among religious persons he gives the example of one who, having entered religion, proposes to obey his superior in all things, and the superior commands him to sin. Among prelates he gives the example of one who has obtained an ecclesiastical dignity with money. He afterward adds:

> Nevertheless, there is something to be done subtly to destroy the cunning of Behemoth: when the mind is constrained between lesser and greater sins, if absolutely no path lies open without sin, let the lesser always be chosen. For one who is enclosed on every side, lest he flee by a smaller circuit, casts himself down where the wall is lower.

These are his words. But, as the gloss there says, and well, in reality and according to truth no one can be perplexed between two sins in such a way that he must incur one of them, but only according to his own erroneous conscience. Then what Gregory says here must be observed. For one who has sworn to keep another's secret does not perjure himself if, by revealing it, he prevents evil; and so with the other cases.

XIX. Concerning Grace and the Virtues

Gregory says in Distinction XL:

> Any hidden places whatsoever cannot save a soul without grace, because sometimes in those very places we behold the errors of the elect. For Lot was just in the perverse city; on the mountain he sinned. But why do we say these things when we have known greater things? For what is more delightful than paradise? What is safer than heaven? And nevertheless man fell from paradise and the angel from heaven by sinning, because one who cast the nobility of God from himself was deprived of the nobility of the place.

The same man, treating upon Ezekiel the words of the prophet, "God rained upon one city; upon another he did not rain; and he rained upon part of the same city and left part dry," expounds them as follows:

> He pours the rain of grace into one soul and does not pour it into another, according to the hidden judgment of his cloud. And sometimes he does not rain upon the whole city but upon one part, leaving another part dry: that is, someone detests certain sins and not others. For detestation of crime is called rain because it is dropped into our heart from the fountain of divine grace, so that one may either thus come to true penance or be punished less by God.

This appears in On Penance, Distinction III, the section That Gregory. But perfect detestation of all sins belongs to grace making one pleasing; detestation of some belongs to grace freely given.

The same man says upon Ezekiel, Homily V, and in On Penance, Distinction II, He Can:

> In the hearts of the saints the Spirit, according to certain virtues, always remains; according to others, he comes in order to depart and departs in order to return. For in faith, hope, charity, and the other goods without which one cannot arrive at the heavenly homeland—such as humility, chastity, justice, mercy, and things of this sort—he does not desert the hearts of the perfect.
> But in the virtue of prophecy, eloquence of teaching, and manifestation of miracles, he is sometimes present to the elect and sometimes withdraws himself. Thus in the book of Wisdom the Spirit is called stable and mobile: stable because he remains in the hearts of the elect in the virtues without which life is not attained; mobile in those through which the power of holiness is shown, because sometimes he is mercifully present and sometimes mercifully withdraws himself.

These are his words. The first things belong to grace making one pleasing; the second to grace freely given.

The same man, treating upon Ezekiel the words, "God will be known in its steps when he receives it," for which we have, "God will be known in its houses," says in On Penance, Distinction II:

> When the Lord receives the holy Church, he is known in its steps, because his glory is declared through its increases. For the more the holy Church advances by ascending, the more God becomes known among men through its power.
> Job speaks concerning these steps, saying, "Through each of my steps I shall proclaim him." He proclaims almighty God through each step who, through the increases of the virtues he receives, always renders to him the praise of his loving-kindness. If there were not certain steps in the heart's ascent, the Psalmist would not say, "They shall go from virtue to virtue."
>
> Nor is it wonderful if there are steps from virtue to virtue, since every single virtue itself is increased through certain steps and thus, through increases of merits, is led to the summit. For the beginnings of virtue are one thing, its advancements another, and its perfection another. If faith were not increased toward perfection through certain steps, the Apostles would not have said to the Lord, "Increase our faith."

In expounding, he introduces the parable concerning seed cast into the earth, which first produced grass, then the ear, and finally full grain in the ear:

> When we conceive good desires, we cast seed into the earth. When we begin to perform right things, we are grass. When we grow toward the advancement of a good work, we arrive at the ear. When we make firm in the perfection of that work [read: When we are made firm in the perfection of that work], we now bring forth full grain in the ear.

He adds the example of Peter, who was first grass before Christ's Passion, afterward an ear after the Resurrection, and afterward full grain after Pentecost.

The same man, treating upon Ezekiel and in On Penance, Distinction II, the words of Ezekiel, "The living creatures did not turn back when they went," says:

> Each of the elect tends toward good things in such a way that he does not return to perpetrating evil things. And through Solomon it is said, "The path of the just, like a shining light, proceeds and grows unto the perfect day." For in their spirit a good desire and understanding of inward light is already a part of the day. But because they advance in virtue until the end of life, they then come to the perfect day when, conducted to the heavenly kingdoms, they will now possess nothing less in that light which they desire.

The same man says in Book I of the Moralia and in On Penance, Distinction III:

> A good thing is done in vain if it is abandoned before the end of life, because he also runs swiftly in vain who fails before he reaches the goals.

The same man says at XXIII, question I:

> Unless those carnal wars bore a figure of spiritual wars, never, as I think, would the books of the Jewish histories have been handed down by the Apostles to be read in the churches by Christ's disciples, to whom he came to teach peace. Finally, the Apostle, knowing that carnal wars are no longer to be waged by us but that the struggles of the soul against spiritual wickedness must be labored over, gives a command to Christ's soldiers as a master of the army, saying, "Put on the armor of God, that you may be able to stand against the snares of the devil."

XX. Concerning Faith and Obedience

Gregory says in the book of the Moralia and at XXIV, question I:

> Because Truth sees that with the Catholic Church alone there is a place where he may be beheld, the Lord indicates where he may be seen. Moses is placed upon the rock so that he may contemplate God's face, because unless one holds the solidity of faith, he does not recognize the divine presence. Concerning this solidity the Lord says, "Upon this rock I shall build my Church."
>
> It alone is that through which the Lord willingly receives sacrifice; it alone confidently intercedes for the erring. Hence, concerning the offering of the lamb, the Lord commanded, saying, "In one house you shall eat it, nor shall you carry any of its flesh outside." For it is eaten in one house because the true offering of the Redeemer is sacrificed in the one Catholic Church. The law prohibits its flesh from being carried outside because it forbids what is holy to be given to dogs.
>
> It alone guards those placed within it by the strong joining of charity. Hence the water of the flood indeed raised the ark to higher things, but destroyed all whom it found outside the ark.

The same man, writing to the patriarch of Antioch, says at I, question I:

> Since Paul says, "No one can lay another foundation beyond that which has been laid, Jesus Christ," that is, the faith of Christ, it is consequently proved that where Christ is not the foundation, no edifice of good work remains.

Concerning obedience, Gregory says in the final book of the Moralia and at XI, question III:

> What wonder is it, therefore, if sinful man subjects himself during the brevity of this life, when the mediator of God and men maintained obedience and commanded it to be maintained, and, when rewarding the obedient, did not abandon it?
> It must nevertheless be known that evil must never be done through obedience, while sometimes a good thing that is done must be discontinued through obedience. For the tree that God forbade man to touch in paradise was not evil. But so that man, well created, might grow better through the merit of obedience, it was fitting that he be prohibited even from a good thing, so that the thing he did would be a virtue the more truly insofar as, ceasing from a good thing, he showed himself subject and humble to his author.

The same man says in the same work and at VIII, question I:

> It must above all be known that obedience, if it possesses nothing of its own, is very small; and sometimes, if it possesses something of its own, it is nothing. For when the success of this world is commanded, when a higher position is imparted, one who obeys in receiving these things empties for himself the virtue of obedience if he pants after them from his own desire. For he does not direct himself under obedience who, in receiving this life's prosperous things, serves the desire of his own ambition.
> Again, when contempt of the world is commanded, when reproaches and insults are ordered to be acquired, unless the spirit desires this from itself, one who descends unwillingly and reluctantly to the things despised in this life diminishes for himself the merit of obedience.

A little above he says:

Obedience is rightly preferred to sacrifices, because through sacrifices another's flesh is slain, but through obedience one's own will is slain. Contrary to this, disobedience is shown to be the sin of divination.

The same man says in Distinction XII:

Let hard pride not resist apostolic commands, but through obedience let those things commanded by holy Roman and apostolic authority be savingly fulfilled, if you desire to have communion with that same holy Church of God, which is your head.

And at the end:

If anyone does not observe the commands of the Apostolic See, let him not doubt that he is an enemy of the commanded honor.

The same man says in Distinction XIX:

No one is a vas for willing or being able to transgress the commands of the Apostolic See [read: No one is permitted to will or be able to transgress the commands of the Apostolic See], nor the ministry of our ordinance, which it is fitting for your charity to follow. Therefore, let whoever wills to go against apostolic commands and decrees lie prostrate in grief over his ruin; and let him afterward have no place among priests, but let him be excluded from the holy ministry.

Let no one afterward have care concerning the judgment of him who, condemned by the holy and Apostolic Church, is doubted by no one to be so through his disobedience and presumption, because he ought not only to have obeyed the commands of the preeminent holy Church [read: the commands of the aforesaid holy Church], but also to have made them known to others lest they pass them by.

As the gloss there says, this disobedience is understood when someone asserts that the Roman Church is not the head of the others and cannot establish canons, which is heretical; hence such a person is excommunicated. But by transgressing the commands of the Church in another manner, one is not for that reason a heretic or excommunicated of himself.

XXI. Concerning the Sacraments

First, concerning baptism, Gregory says in the book of the Moralia and in On Consecration, Distinction IV:

What the water of baptism effects among us, among the ancients this was effected either by faith alone for little children, or by the power of sacrifice for adults, or by the power of circumcision for those who issued from the stock of Abraham.

Gregory says in Homily XXIV and in On Consecration, Distinction IV:

When priests, through the grace of exorcism, place a hand upon believers and forbid malignant spirits to dwell in their minds, what else do they do except cast out demons?

The same man, writing to Bishop Leander, says in On Consecration, Distinction IV:

Concerning the threefold immersion of baptism, nothing truer can be answered than what you yourselves have perceived: because in one faith a diverse custom of holy Church causes no hindrance. We, however, because we are immersed a third time, signify the mysteries of the three-day burial; and when the child is brought out of the waters a third time, the resurrection of the three-day period is expressed.

But if anyone perhaps thinks that this is also done out of veneration for the supreme Trinity, neither does this hinder immersion once in the waters when baptizing, because, since in three subsistences there is one substance, it can by no means be reprehensible to immerse an infant three times or once, since in three immersions the Trinity of persons, and in one the singularity of the divinity, can be designated.

The same Gregory says in On Consecration, Distinction IV:

Priests must not presume to sign the baptized upon the forehead with sacred chrism; rather, priests are to anoint the baptized upon the breast, and bishops afterward are to confirm them upon the forehead.

The same Gregory, writing to Bishop Januarius, says in Distinction XCV:

It has also come to us that certain persons were scandalized because we prohibited priests from touching with chrism those who have been baptized. We indeed acted according to the ancient usage of our Church. But if any are distressed concerning this matter, where bishops are absent we grant that priests ought also to touch the baptized with chrism upon their foreheads.

These are his words. There the gloss sets down several opinions concerning this. But according to Thomas in the fourth book and lay theologians, Gregory did this by a spiritual concession to them. For by common law priests, in confirming, do not in fact confer this sacrament unless they have this from a spiritual concession of the pope. Nor can bishops dispense or grant this, but the pope alone. And a contrary custom effects nothing, as in the title On Custom, chapter How Much.

XXII. Concerning the Sacrament of the Eucharist

Gregory says thus in a homily and in On Consecration, Distinction II, chapter What the Blood Is:

> Let us consider what manner of sacrifice that is which, for our cleansing, always imitates the Passion of the only-begotten Son. For who among the faithful can have any doubt that, at the very hour of immolation, the heavens are opened at the voice of the priest; that in that mystery of Jesus Christ choirs of angels are present; that the highest and the lowest things are joined; and that one thing is made from invisible and visible things?
>
> At one and the same time and moment it is both taken up into heaven by the ministry of the angels, to be joined to the body of Christ, and is seen before the eyes of the priest upon the altar. So great a unity of the Church is seen in Christ that everywhere there is one bread of the body of Christ and one chalice of his blood.
>
> For the chalice that a Catholic priest sanctifies—that is, one preserving the form of the Church in this—is no other than that very one which the Lord handed to the Apostles. For just as the divinity of the Word of God is one, which fills the whole world, so, although that body is consecrated in many places and on innumerable days, there are nevertheless not many bodies of Christ and many chalices, but one body of Christ and one blood, together with that which he assumed in the womb of the Virgin and which he gave to the Apostles.
>
> For the divinity of the Word fills that which is everywhere, and joins and causes that, just as it is itself one, so also the body of Christ may be his one body in truth. Hence it must be observed that, whether anyone receives more or less from it, all equally receive the body of Christ in its entire integrity, both all generally and each one particularly.
>
> Daily it is eaten and drunk in truth, but it remains whole, living, and immaculate. And therefore it is a great and fearsome mystery, because one thing is seen and another understood. But although the mystery is called one body and blood, it has the appearance of bread and wine by the Lord's agency, because we do not have the custom of eating raw flesh and drinking blood.

These are his words.

The same man says at I, question I:

> Many secular men, when they examine the life of priests more than their own, incur the great crime of contempt for the divine sacraments. Hence it happens that they not only reject the things said by them but, what is worse, also contemn the divine mysteries. Alas, into how great a snare they fall, so that they believe the divine and hidden mysteries can be made more holy by some than by others, although the one and the same Holy Spirit, diffused throughout the Church over the whole circuit of the lands, incomprehensibly sanctifies those mysteries, secretly and invisibly and by working, and blesses them by blessing.
> It is called a mystery because it has a secret and hidden dispensation. It is called a sacrifice as though a sacred deed, because it is consecrated for us by mystical prayer in memory of the Lord's Passion. They are called sacraments because under the covering of corporeal things divine power more secretly works salvation; hence they are called from secret or sacred powers.
>
> "Eucharist" in Greek is interpreted in Latin as "good grace." And what is better than the body and blood of the Lord? Therefore, whether it is ministered within the Church by the good or by the evil, it is nevertheless sacred, because the Holy Spirit gives life. It is neither increased by the merits of good ministers nor diminished by those of evil ministers.
>
> This is to be understood and held concerning the body and blood of the Lord; this concerning baptism and chrism; and thus concerning the others, because divine power works secretly in them, and this belongs solely to divine power, not to human efficacy.

XXIII. Concerning Penance

Gregory says thus in a homily and in On Penance, Distinction III:

> To do penance is to lament evils perpetrated and not to perpetrate again things that must be lamented—that is, to have the intention of not committing them. For he who so deplores some things that he deliberately commits others again either still does not know how to do penance or dissembles. For what does it profit if someone bewails the sins of lust and yet still pants after the heats of avarice?

The same man says:

> There are those who say that penance for a short time ought to suffice them for sin, so that it may be permitted to return again to sin. Rightly does the sentence of the first shepherd strike these, who says: "The dog has returned to its vomit, and the sow, though washed, to wallowing in the mire."

The same man says in On Penance, Distinction IV:

> It is established from the evangelical sayings that, if we do not forgive from the heart what is sinned against us—that is, rancor—then that also is required anew which we were rejoicing had already been forgiven us through penance.

According to Thomas, this is understood not as though things forgiven return with respect to guilt, but with respect to a certain effect of aggravation on account of ingratitude.

The same Gregory says in a homily and in On Penance, Distinction V:

> To resume after penance an occupation which before conversion—that is, conversion to penance—existed without sin, namely mortal sin, was no fault. For there are very many occupations which can be carried on either scarcely or not at all without sins. Therefore, as for those which implicate one in sin, namely mortal sin, it is necessary that the mind not recur to these after conversion.

He enlarges upon Peter, who after his conversion to the discipleship of Christ returned to fishing, as is evident after the Resurrection. Matthew, however, when he had abandoned the occupation of the tax office after he was called by Christ, did not return to it, because it was an unlawful occupation; Peter's, however, was lawful of itself.

Concerning absolution in penance, Gregory says in a homily and at XI, question III:

> The absolution of the presiding minister is then true when it follows the judgment of the inward judge. The raising of the man four days dead signified this well, because first the Lord gave life to the dead man, saying, "Lazarus, come forth"; and afterward he who had come forth alive was loosed by the disciples.

The same man says in On Penance, Distinction I, chapter The Sin of David:

> Without doubt the Lord does not leave sin without vengeance. For either the man himself punishes it entirely by himself, namely through perfect penance, or God, avenging it together with the man, strikes him, namely through tribulations patiently borne. Thus David, after the confession of his sin, merited to hear, "The Lord has taken away your sin"; and yet afterward, afflicted by many torments and fleeing, he paid the liability for the guilt he had perpetrated, namely with respect to the penalty owed.

The same man says upon Ezekiel and in On Penance, Distinction IV:

> This is chiefly to be considered by us: that in the perpetration of evils there ought to be no confidence in past good things.

And, treating upon the saying of the prophet Haggai, "They gathered wages and put them into a pierced sack," Gregory says there concerning the pierced sack:

> From one side there goes out what is put in from another, because undiscerning minds do not perceive how the things acquired by a good work are lost by an evil one.

XXIV. Concerning Matrimony

Writing to Bishop Verenus, Gregory says at XXXV, question X:

> To the studious sagacity of your Fraternity, beloved brother, I return the thanks that I owe, because, since you asked the things you ought, you made me joyful; hence I answer calmly the matters inquired into. You resolved to consult the Apostolic See as to whether a woman joined in nuptial union to an unrelated man pertains to his kindred; whether, when he has died, the kinship remains; whether the names of kinship are dissolved by another husband; or whether offspring received can pass legitimately into a union with the kindred of the first husband.
>
> For the word of God is valid and strong, durable, persevering, and immutable, not momentary, not transitory. Truth itself, who is God and is the Word of God, says by himself, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." Before God appeared among men, Adam, by his inspiration, said: "For this reason a man shall leave father and mother and shall cleave to his wife, and the two shall be in one flesh."
> Then, when Truth arose from the earth upon the earth and appeared visible in humanity, being asked whether it was lawful for a man to put away his wife, by prohibiting he forbade it unless perhaps fornication excluded the marital union [read: by prohibiting, he forbade it to happen unless perhaps fornication excluded the marital union], namely with respect to the bed. Hence he immediately brought forth into their midst the very same sentence which, before the ages, the Word abiding with the Father had inspired in Adam, he himself confirming the same thing which the first man had brought forth, namely: "For this reason a man shall leave father and mother," and so forth.

Therefore, if there is one flesh, how can any relative of theirs pertain to one unless he pertains to the other? It must be believed that this can in no way occur. Moreover, when one has died, affinity is not destroyed in the survivor, nor can another conjugal union dissolve the affinity of the prior union. But neither is it pleasing, nor can the offspring of another union pass to fellowship with the affinity of the prior husband, because the word of the Lord is valid and strong. And, as the prophet says, "The word of the Lord shall stand forever."

And another prophet says: "For he spoke, and they were made," and so forth; "he established them," and so forth. For after the word and command, he made the two one flesh—that is, male and female—and did not cease to make one with himself the innumerable multitude of both sexes, just as Truth says by himself: "I pray not for these only, but for those who will believe in me through their word, that they may be one, as you, Father, are in me and I in you, that they also may be one in us."

If anyone, therefore, with sacrilegious and rash daring seeks to extinguish kinship in the deceased, or under another husband to disperse the names of the former affinity, or believes that the offspring received from another union can legitimately be joined to the kinship of the former, he denies that the word of God is valid and strong and durable. And he who seeks to dissolve it so easily and so swiftly does not believe that the word of God remains forever.

Behold earth gathered and glued together from four places separated from one another by a great intervening distance. Fashion from it a body of whatever figure or immensity you wish. Will there be any human ingenuity that can separate those four parts from one another, so that each part can be recognized? You can gather this similitude from the four elements from which man was created, if you assign each species of them, which has been partitioned in many divisions, to parts distinct from one another. The same thing occurs in metals; this same thing is proved in liquids; the painter pursues it in colors by mixing colors through art.

These are his words.

The same man says at XXXV, question VIII:

Concerning those who wish to contract second marriages after the wife has died, we have justly, honorably, and reasonably provided that they abstain from her blood relatives and from those who are related to her to the fourth degree of genealogy. We have more mildly given this foretaste according to the indulgence of mother Church.

The same Gregory says at XXXV, question III, section But the Same, writing most humbly to Felix, bishop of the city of Messina:

As for what I wrote to Augustine, bishop of the English people, and to that English people itself which had recently come to the faith, lest it withdraw from the good it had received out of fear of more austere things, know that I did this specially and not generally; hence the whole Roman city is also my witness. Nor did I write these commands to them with the intention that, after they had been made firm with a solid root in fida [read: in the faith], if they were found within their own consanguinity they should not be separated, or that they should be joined within the line of affinity—that is, as far as the seventh generation—but because, while they were still neophytes, it was necessary first to consent to certain unlawful things among them and to instruct them by words and examples. According to the Apostle: "I gave you milk to drink, not food."

These are his words. And when Gregory says "to consent to an unlawful thing," this is understood with respect to something prohibited by common law. But it was not unlawful for them, because they were dispensed in this matter. And what he says concerning the seventh degree is according to the ancient laws; but through Gregory IX degrees of consanguinity and affinity of this sort were reduced, and only four degrees of consanguinity and affinity were determined by the Church, in the title On Consanguinity and Affinity, final chapter.

The same man says at XXXIII, question IV, chapter A Husband with His Own Wife:

If anyone uses his own spouse, namely in the matrimonial act, not seized by the desire for pleasure but solely for the sake of procreating children, he certainly is to be left to his own judgment, whether concerning entrance into the church or concerning receiving the mystery of the Lord's body and blood, because he who, placed in the fire, knows not how to burn is not to be prohibited by us from receiving.

These are his words. The same applies, according to Thomas and others, when he renders the debt to his spouse after it has been demanded, because in either case he does not sin even venially. Concerning these things, however, there is fuller treatment in the third part, Title I.

The same man says to Augustine, bishop of the English, and in Distinction V:

> If a woman at the same hour in which she has given birth—that is, has borne a child—enters the church to give thanks, she is burdened by no weight of sin. For the pleasure of the flesh is in fault, not pain. In the mingling of flesh there is pleasure; in the bringing forth of offspring, groaning. Therefore, if we prohibit a woman who has given birth from entering the church, we turn her very punishment into fault.

The same man says to the same person in the same Distinction:

> Her husband ought not to approach intercourse with her until the child who is born is weaned. But if, from a depraved custom, they hand their children over to others to be nursed, they ought not to mingle with their husbands until the time of purification has passed. Indeed, even apart from childbirth, when they are detained in their customary menses, they are prohibited from mingling with their husbands, so that the sacred law strikes with death one who approaches a menstruating woman.
>
> A woman, however, while she suffers the custom of menstruation, ought not to be prohibited from entering the church, because a superfluity of nature cannot be imputed to her as fault; hence it is unjust that she be deprived of entrance into the church for that which she suffers unwillingly.

And below:

> She ought not, however, to be prohibited from receiving the mystery of holy communion on those same days. But if, out of great veneration, she does not presume to receive it, she is to be praised; yet if she receives it, she is not to be judged. For it belongs to good minds to acknowledge faults where there is no fault, and often that which comes from fault is done without fault.

See the gloss there for what is called the time of weaning.

XXV. Concerning the Sacrament of Order

Gregory, writing to Syagrius, bishop of Autun, says thus at I, question VI:

> Just as he who, when invited, refuses and, when sought, flees must be admonished toward the sacred altars, so he who seeks them voluntarily or intrudes himself importunately must without doubt be repelled. For he who thus strives to ascend to higher things, what else does he do except decrease by growing and, while ascending outwardly, descend inwardly into the depth?
> Therefore, most beloved brother, let sincerity flourish in the ordaining of priests; let the consent be simple and without venality; let a pure election be preferred, so that the man advanced to the summit of the priesthood may be believed to be there not by the support of sellers but by the judgment of God.

The same Gregory says at I, question I:

> Be especially solicitous in ordination, and admit none to sacred orders unless they are advanced in age and pure in work. For first examine the life and morals of those who are to be placed in sacred order, so that you may be able to employ persons worthy of this office. Let neither the power nor the entreaty of any persons creep upon you. Therefore, when it is necessary to treat of these matters, employ grave and experienced men as participants in your counsel, and weigh this with them by common deliberation.

The same man, writing to all bishops, says in Distinction LXXXIX:

> We command the individual offices of ecclesiastical men [read: the individual offices of ecclesiastical law] to be committed individually to separate persons. For just as in one body we have many members, but all the members do not have the same act, so in the body of the Church, according to the truthful sentence of Paul, in one and the same spiritual body this office is to be conferred upon one person and another is to be committed to another.
>
> Nor, however well trained a person may be, are the offices of two matters to be committed to one person at one time, because if the whole body is an eye, where is the hearing? For just as the variety of members through diverse offices both preserves the strength of the body and represents its beauty, so also the variety of persons distributed no less through diverse offices manifests both the strength and the comeliness of the Church.
> And just as it is unseemly in the human body for one member to perform the office of another, so it is assuredly harmful and at the same time most shameful if the individual ministries of affairs have not been distributed to just as many persons.

The same man says to John, bishop of Caralis, in Distinction LXXXIX, chapter It Has Been Judged:

> Your Fraternity must take care that the property of any church not be committed to secular men or to those not living under our rule, but to approved clerics of your office, in whom, if anything of depravity can be found, you may be able to correct in your subjects what has been unlawfully done.

And immediately above he says:

> Whatever fraud shall be found to have been perpetrated concerning the property of the Church, even by laymen, let them be compelled to restore it with the penalty established by the laws.

The same Gregory says at XXIII, question VIII:

> If I had wished to involve myself in the death of the Lombards, today the nation of the Lombards would have neither king nor duke. But because I fear my God, I dread to involve myself in the death of any man.

Gregory wrote this to a certain bishop so that he might excuse him before Emperor Maurice and before others among whom he had been defamed by his rivals because he had been the cause of a certain bishop's death through a harsh prison and other penalties inflicted upon him. Gregory had summoned that bishop to himself because of certain information concerning his excesses which had been denounced to Gregory. Nevertheless, having been molested by him in nothing but received humanely, he suddenly died his own natural death, as Gregory wrote back to that man.

The same Gregory says in the Pastoral Rule and in Distinction XLIII:

> Let a ruler be discerning in silence and useful in speech, lest he utter things that ought to be kept silent or keep silent things that ought to be uttered. For just as incautious speech draws one into error, so undiscerning silence leaves in error those who could have been instructed.
>
> For often improvident rulers, as is said, fearing to lose human favor, are afraid to speak right things freely; and, according to the voice of Truth, they no longer devote themselves to the guardianship of the flock with the zeal of shepherds, but in the manner of hired men, because when the wolf comes they flee as they hide themselves under silence. The Lord rebukes them in Isaiah, saying, "Dumb dogs unable to bark."

And below:

> Hence through Isaiah the Lord admonishes, saying, "Cry out; cease not; raise your voice like a trumpet." For whoever approaches the priesthood assumes the office of a herald, so that he himself may advance crying out before the coming of the judge who follows terribly. Therefore, if the priest is ignorant of preaching, what voice of crying will the mute herald give?

Hence, as a figure of this, he introduces the fact that in the hyacinth-colored garment of the high priest, in which he entered the Holy of Holies, bells were placed at its extreminate [read: at its lowest edge] with pomegranates interwoven, to signify that in the conduct of the priest, signified by the garment, there ought to be the speech of preaching, so that he may teach by example and by word.

Pomegranates, or Punic apples, in which many seeds are united beneath one outer rind, signify the unity of the faithful. These were inserted, interwoven with the bells, to intimate that in preaching the priest ought to seek the unity of his hearers and nurture charity in them, not sow material for scandals. And the preacher must also guard against excess or excessive prolixity. This is signified by the man who had an emission of seed, who was held unclean in the law; nor from loquacity of this sort does fruit follow in the hearer, but disgust, just as no fruit follows from seed discharged through the infirmity suffered by that man.

XXVI

Gregory says in a homily and at XXIII, question IV:

> This life, which is situated between heaven and hell, just as it subsists in the middle, so commonly receives the citizens of both regions. Holy Church, however, receives them indiscriminately—that is, without distinction—and afterward discerns them at their departure.
> Therefore, if you are good, for as long as you subsist in this life, tolerate the evil with an even mind. For whoever does not tolerate the evil is by his own intolerance a witness against himself that he is not good. He refuses to be Abel whom Cain's malice does not exercise. For the iron of our mind cannot attain the sharpness of virtue unless the file of another's depravity has scraped it.

The same man speaks concerning prelates who have evil subjects in Book II of the Dialogues. Asked by Peter the Deacon whether one ought to desert them, he says at VII, question I:

> Evil persons gathered together must be borne with an even mind where some good persons are found who may be helped. For where there is no fruit at all from the good, labor over the evil is sometimes superfluous, especially if nearby causes are available through which they may offer better fruit to God.
> For something often takes place in the mind of the perfect which ought not to be passed over in silence: when they consider their labor to be without fruit, they migrate to another place for labor with fruit.

The same Gregory says in Book IV of the Dialogues and in On Penance, Distinction I:

> The wicked would have wished to live without end if they could have done so, so that they could have sinned without end. Those who never cease to sin while they live show by this that they always desire to live in sin. Therefore it pertains to the great justice of the judge that those who in this life, while they lived, never wished to be without sin should never be without punishment.

The same man says in Distinction XXV:

> As each person departs from here, so he is presented at judgment. Yet it must be believed that for certain faults there is a purgatorial fire before judgment, because Truth says, "But he who blasphemes against the Holy Spirit shall not be forgiven either in this age or in the future." In this sentence it is given to be understood that certain faults can be forgiven in this age and certain ones in the future. For what is denied concerning one thing, the consequent understanding plainly grants concerning others.
> But this must be believed concerning small and very little sins, such as habitual idle speech, immoderate laughter, and the sin involved in the care of household property, which is scarcely conducted without sin even by those who know how they ought to avoid fault. These still burden after death if they have by no means been remitted while one was still placed in life.

The same man says at XIII, question II, and in a Dialogue:

> When grave sins do not weigh them down, it then profits the dead if they are buried in a church, because as often as their relatives come to the sacred places and behold the burial place of their own, they remember them and pour forth prayers for them to the Lord. For as for those whom grave sins weigh down, placing their bodies in churches leads rather to a greater accumulation of damnation than to their absolution.

The same man says in the same question:

> The souls of the dead are released in four ways: either by the offerings of priests, by the prayers of saints, by the alms of loved ones, or by the fasting of relatives. But care for the funeral, the condition of the burial, and the pomp of the obsequies are consolations of the living rather than aids of the dead.

The same man says:

> Let the last will of the testator be preserved in every way.

The same man, writing to the bishop of Caralis, says at XVI, question I:

> We wish to admonish you lest, which God forbid, the pious wills of the dead be rendered void by your remissness.

The gloss says that it is otherwise if the wills were unjust.

The same man says at VII, question I:

> The adversity that is cast against good vows is a testing of virtue, not a judgment of reprobation. For who does not know how prosperous it was that Blessed Paul the Apostle was coming to Italy in order to preach? And yet, while coming, he suffered shipwreck; but the ship of his heart stood intact amid the waves of the sea.

The same man says in a letter to Candidus and at VII, question I:

> When a bodily striking is imminent, we do not know whether the judgment of God comes for purification or for vengeance. And therefore affliction ought not to be added by us to those scourged, lest, which God forbid, the offense of guilt have regard to us.

XXVII. Concerning Prelacy

As far as depends upon himself, each person ought not to seek prelacy but to flee it, yet to receive it from obedience. Gregory says from the Register and at VIII, question I:

> In your writings you relate that you greatly sought rest, but through this you show that you came fittingly to pastoral solicitude, because just as the place of governance is to be denied to those who desire it, so it is to be offered to those who flee it.
>
> And just as it is written, "Let no one take honor to himself, but he who is called by the Lord, as Aaron was"; and it is said to the shepherd of holy Church, "Simon son of John, do you love me more than these? Feed my sheep." From these words it is gathered that if one who is able to feed the sheep of almighty God refuses, he shows that he does not love the supreme Shepherd.
> For if the only-begotten Son of the Father, to fulfill the advantage of all, went forth from the secret place of the Father into our public place, what shall we say if we prefer our own seclusion to the advantage of our neighbors? Rest is indeed to be desired by us from the heart, and yet it must sometimes be postponed for the gain of many. For just as we ought to flee occupation with our whole desire, so, if there is no one to preach, it is necessary to undertake willingly the burden of occupation upon the shoulder.

We are taught this from the work of two prophets, one of whom endeavored to avoid the office of preaching, while the other received and sought it. For Jeremiah answered the Lord who was sending him, saying: "Ah, ah, ah, Lord God, behold, I do not know how to speak, because I am a boy." And when the almighty Lord sought a person to preach for him, saying, "Whom shall I send?" Isaiah offered himself, saying, "Behold, I, Lord; send me."

Behold, a different voice outwardly proceeded from each of them, but it did not emanate from a different fountain of love. For there are two commandments of charity: namely, the love of God and of neighbor. Therefore Isaiah, desiring through the active life to profit his neighbors, sought the office of preaching. Jeremiah, however, desiring through contemplation to adhere continually to the love of the Creator, speaks against his obligation to be sent to preach.

Therefore, what one laudably sought, the other laudably dreaded. The latter feared lest, by speaking, he lose the gains of silent contemplation; the former, lest by keeping silent he experience the losses of industrious work. But this must be perceived subtly in both: both he who refused did not fully resist, and he who wished to be sent first saw himself purified by the coal from the altar, lest either one not purified dare to approach the sacred mysteries, or one whom heavenly grace chooses proudly contradict under the appearance of humility.

The same Gregory, writing to the citizens of Naples, says in the same question:

It is neither new nor reprehensible that, in electing a bishop, the desires of the people divide themselves into two parties; but it is grave when in matters of this sort the election comes not from judgment but from favor alone.

The same Gregory says in Distinction LVI:

It is proved to be exceedingly perverse and contrary to ecclesiastical censure that someone, at the mere pleasures of certain persons, be deprived uselessly of offices from which his own fault or crime does not cast him down, and of the grade in which he serves.

Concerning the Jews, Gregory says, writing to Paschasius, bishop of Naples, in Distinction XLV:

Those who with sincere intention desire to lead persons alien to the Christian religion to the right faith ought to apply themselves to blandishments, not severities, lest adversity drive far away those whose mind an offered reason could have summoned to the level ground.

And below:

Therefore it must be done that, summoned rather by reason and gentleness, they may wish to follow us, not flee us, so that, by showing them from their own books the things we say, we may with God's help be able to convert them to the bosom of mother Church. Therefore, as both they themselves and their fathers, observing all their festivals and holy days through long periods past, have held them until now, let them have free license to observe and celebrate them; and do not permit them to be disturbed in such matters.

The same man, writing to Augustine, bishop of the English, says in Distinction XII:

Your Fraternity knows the custom of the Roman Church, in which it remembers that it was nurtured. But it pleases me that, whether in the Roman, Gallican, or any other church, you have found something which can please God more, you should choose it solicitously, and should infuse into the Church of the English, which is still new in the faith, by a distinguished institution, the things you have been able to gather from many churches.

For things are not to be loved on account of places, but places on account of things. Therefore, from every individual church choose the things that are pious, religious, and right; and, as though collected into a bundle, deposit these as a custom within the minds of the English.

In the same place, in the same Distinction, he says:

Just as we do not allow unlawful things to be perpetrated, so we do not deny the things that belong to custom.

XXVIII. Concerning the Blessed Life

Gregory says in a homily:

If we consider, most beloved brothers, the things promised to us in heaven, all the things possessed upon earth become worthless. For earthly substance is a weight, not a support. Temporal life, compared with eternal life, must be called death rather than life. For what else is the daily failing of corruption itself except a certain prolongation of death?

But what tongue suffices to say, or what understanding to comprehend, how great are the joys of the city above: to be present among choirs of angels; with most blessed spirits to see the uncircumscribed light, to behold the face of God, to be affected by no fear of death, and to rejoice in the gift of perpetual incorruption? At hearing these things the spirit catches fire. Now it desires to stand there, where it hopes to rejoice without end.

But one does not arrive at great rewards except through great labors. If the greatness of the rewards delights us, let the multitude of labors not deter us. "He shall not be crowned," says the Apostle, "unless he has contended lawfully."

The same man says in the book of the Dialogues and at XXIII, question IV:

The things which have not been predestined can by no means be obtained. But the things holy men effect by praying have been predestined in such a manner that they may be obtained by their prayers. For the very predestination of the everlasting kingdom was so arranged by the Almighty that the elect should arrive at it from labor, so that by asking they may merit to receive what almighty God disposed before the ages to give them.

Gregory says in a homily:

We know, by the testimony of holy eloquence, that there are nine orders of angels: namely, Angels, Archangels, Virtues, Powers, Principalities, Dominations, Thrones, Cherubim, and Seraphim. Hence it is said of the first angel: "Every precious stone was your covering: sardius, topaz, jasper, chrysolite, onyx, beryl, sapphire, carbuncle, and emerald." Behold, it spoke nine names of stones, because there are assuredly nine orders of angels. That first angel is said to have been covered with those orders, because, when he had been placed over all the hosts of angels, he was more brilliant in comparison with them.

And this is found in On Penance, Distinction II, chapter The Beginning. The same man also says in a homily:

It must be known that the name "angels" is the name of an office, not of a nature, because those spirits are then angels when some things are announced or performed through them. Those who announce the least things are called Angels, but those who announce the greatest are called Archangels.

Those through whom signs and miracles are frequently done are called Virtues. Those who have received this more powerfully than the others, so that adverse powers are subjected to their dominion, are called Powers; these adverse powers are restrained by their power lest they prevail to tempt as much as they desire.

Those who preside even over the good spirits themselves are called Principalities. While they dispose for their subjects the things that must be done, they rule over them for the fulfillment of the divine mysteries. Those who transcend even the powers of the Principalities are called Dominations. For to be a principality is to exist as first among the others; to dominate is also to possess any subjects whatever.

Thrones, too, are those hosts over which God always presides for exercising the office of judgment. They are called Thrones because they are filled with such great grace of the divinity that the Lord sits in them and decrees his judgments through them.

"Cherubim" is said to mean "fullness of knowledge." And those more sublime hosts are therefore called Cherubim because the more nearly they contemplate the brightness of God, the more perfect they are in knowledge.

Those who, from a singular nearness to the Creator, burn with incomparable love are called Seraphim. For "Seraphim" is interpreted "burning" or "setting on fire."

But because that city above consists of angels and men, to which we believe that as many of the human race ascend as it happened that elect angels remained there, we ought to draw something from those distinctions for the use of our conduct.

These are his words. And subsequently he sets down there how, from diverse exercises of the virtues, human beings are assumed in glory into the diverse orders of the lower or higher angels, according to the degrees of perfection of human works.

XXIX. Concerning the Warfare of Vices in God's Elect

Gregory, in Book XXXI of the Moralia, treating the saying of Job, "From afar he smells the battle"—namely, the horse concerning which he there speaks by similitude—"the exhortation of commanders and the howling of the army," says:

To smell the battle from afar is to recognize, from the causes that precede them, the battles of vices which will follow. For because by smell a thing not seen is recognized, to smell the battle from afar is assuredly, just as by the breath of the nostrils, so by the foresight of thoughts, to track hidden wickednesses.

First, therefore, God's elect, signified by the horse, consider lest they perform any venial things [read: any evil things]. Second, lest they perform good things incautiously. And after they have subjected crooked things, they strive also to subject upright things themselves, lest from merits they be turned into the fault of elation. For frequently through the vice of carelessness evils are born from good things.

With vigilant zeal God's elect person contemplates how arrogance arises from learning, cruelty from justice, laxity from piety, anger from zeal, and torpor from meekness. And when the good person does these things, he beholds how many enemies can rise up against him through them. For when he labors in the pursuits of acquiring learning, he solicitously prepares his mind against the contest of arrogance. When he desires justly to avenge the faults of delinquents, he considers most sagaciously lest the vengeance of cruelty exceed the measure of avenging justice.

When he strives to restrain himself by piety, he prudently looks ahead lest discipline be conquered by laxity. When he excites himself by the goads of right zeal, he provides with the greatest care lest he kindle in himself the flames of anger more than is necessary. When he tempers himself with the great tranquillity of meekness, he observes vigilantly lest he grow cold in body [read: lest he grow cold in torpor].

Therefore, because in the thought of the spiritual soldier every vice is beheld before it can creep upon him, it is rightly said concerning God's horse, "From afar he smells the battle." He also foresees what crowd of iniquities would rush in if he permitted even a few evil things to enter him. Hence there follows: "the exhortation of commanders and the howling of the army."

For the tempting vices which fight against us in an invisible battle under pride reigning over them, some go before in the manner of commanders, while others follow in the manner of an army. For all faults do not occupy the heart by an equal approach, but when the greater and fewer ones forestall the neglected mind, the lesser and innumerable ones pour themselves upon it in troops.

For pride itself, the queen of vices, when it has seized a conquered heart, soon draws it to be devastated by the seven principal vices as though by certain commanders of its own. An army follows these commanders, because importunate multitudes of vices assuredly arise from them. We show this better if we bring forward the commanders themselves and the army by enumerating them particularly.

For pride is the root of all evil, as Scripture testifies: "The beginning of every sin is pride." But its first offspring, the seven principal vices, are brought forth from this virulent root: namely, vainglory, envy, anger, sadness—that is, acedia—gluttony of the belly, and lust [read: vainglory, envy, anger, sadness, avarice, gluttony of the belly, and lust]. For because our Redeemer grieved that we had been captured by these seven vices of pride, he came to the battle for spiritual liberation full of the Spirit of sevenfold grace.

But pride has its army against us. For from vainglory arise disobedience, boasting, hypocrisy, contentions, obstinacies, discords, and presumption of novelties. From envy are born hatred, whispering, detraction, exultation in adversities, and affliction at a neighbor's prosperity. From anger are brought forth swelling of the mind, quarrels, insults, clamor, indignation, and blasphemies.

From sadness or acedia are born malice, rancor, pusillanimity, despair, torpor concerning the precepts, and wandering of the mind concerning unlawful things. From avarice arise treachery, fraud, deceit, perjury, restlessness, acts of violence, and hardenings of the heart against mercy. From gluttony of the belly, or gullet, are propagated inappropriate joy, scurrility, uncleanness, loquacity, and dullness of sense concerning understanding. From lust are generated blindness of mind, inconsideration, inconstancy, precipitation, love of self, hatred of God, affection for the present age, and horror or despair of the future.

Therefore, because the seven principal vices bring forth from themselves so great a multitude of vices, when they come to the heart they draw, as it were, the troops of an army following them. Of these seven, two are carnal and five spiritual; but each of them is joined to the others by such great kinship that one is brought forth only from another.

For the first offspring of pride is vainglory. When it has corrupted the oppressed mind, it soon generates envy, because, while it seeks the power of a vain name, it pines away lest another be able to attain it. Envy also generates anger, because the more the spirit is wounded by the inward wound of spite, the more it also loses the meekness of tranquillity. And because it is touched as though it were a hurting thing of the limbs [read: a hurting limb], therefore the hand of an opposing action is felt as though pressing more heavily.

Sadness is also born from anger, because the disturbed mind, by the degree to which it shakes itself inordinately, confounds itself by adijciendo [read: condemning itself]; and when it has lost the sweetness of tranquillity, nothing except the grief that follows from disturbance nourishes it. Sadness in turn is derived from avarice [read: Sadness in turn flows into avarice], because, when the confounded heart has lost the good of joy inwardly within itself, it seeks outwardly for a source from which it ought to be consoled. And the more it does not possess a joy to which it may recur inwardly, the more it desires to obtain exterior goods.

After these, the two carnal vices which remain are clear to all, because lust is born from gluttony of the belly, since by the very distribution of the members the genitals are seen to be supported beneath the belly. Hence, when one is refreshed inordinately, the other is assuredly excited to wantonness.

The commanders are well said to exhort and the army to howl, because the primary vices insert themselves into the deceived mind as though under a certain reason; but the innumerable vices that follow, when they draw it from reason into madness, confound it as though with a bestial cry.

For vainglory is accustomed to exhort the conquered heart as though from reason when it says: "In what respect are you less than this or that man? Why, therefore, are you not either equal or superior to them? How many things can you do which they cannot? Therefore they ought not to be superior to you."

Anger also is accustomed to exhort the conquered heart as though from reason when it says: "The things done toward you cannot be borne with an even mind. To tolerate these patiently is indeed a sin. And if they are not resisted with great exasperation, they will henceforth be accumulated against you without measure."

Sadness also is accustomed to exhort the conquered heart as though from reason when it says: "Where do you have cause to rejoice, when you bear such great evils from your neighbors? Consider with what sorrow all those must be regarded who are turned so greatly against you with the gall of bitterness."

Avarice also is accustomed to exhort the conquered spirit as though from reason when it says: "It is very much without fault that you desire certain things to possess, for you do not seek to be multiplied but fear to be in need; and what another retains badly, you yourself spend better."

Gluttony of the belly is accustomed to exhort as though from reason when it says: "God grants all clean things for eating, and he who refuses to be sated by food, what else does he do but speak against being fortified by what has been granted?"

Lust also is accustomed to exhort the conquered heart as though from reason when it says: "Why do you not enlarge yourself in your pleasure, when you do not know what may follow you? You ought not to lose the time received amid desires, because you do not know how swiftly it passes by. For if God did not wish man to be mingled in pleasure, he would not at the very beginning of the human race have made male and female."

Therefore, when this exhortation of the commanders is incautiously admitted into the accustomed place of the heart, it persuades unlawful things more familiarly. The howling of the army follows it, because the unhappy soul, once captured by the principal vices, while it is turned to madness by multiplied iniquities, is devastated by the savagery of wild beasts.

But because one like God strives prudently to foresee the contests of the vices, he assuredly smells the battle [read: But because God's soldier strives prudently to foresee the contests of the vices, he assuredly smells the battle]. With his nostrils stirred he detects the exhortation of the commanders; and because, by foreknowing from afar, he beholds the confusion of the iniquities that follow, he recognizes, as though by smell, the howling of the army.

Therefore, because from the description of the horse we have recognized either God's preacher or any soldier in the spiritual contest, let us now behold that same man again under the signification of a bird, so that we who learned his fortitude through the horse may also learn his contemplation through the bird, namely how greatly he flies through contemplation. Hence there follows: "Does the ancipiter grow feathers through your wisdom, spreading its wings toward the south?" For the ancipiter to grow feathers in the south [read: "Does the hawk grow feathers through your wisdom, spreading its wings toward the south?" For the hawk to grow feathers in the south] is for each of the saints to become strong at the touch of the Holy Spirit.

Concerning each one of these vices, however, you have extended treatment throughout the second part.

XXX

After Gregory, therefore, had sat in the chair of Peter for thirteen years, six months, and ten days, full of good works he rested in peace in the year of the Lord 506, but in the second year of the reign of Phocas [read: in the year of the Lord 604, but in the second year of the reign of Phocas].

After his death, when a severe famine followed, certain envious persons began to detract from Gregory, asserting that, as a prodigal man, he had consumed the whole treasury of the Church. Hence, in vengeance for this, they inclined the minds of the others toward burning his books.

When they had already burned certain of them and wished to burn the others, Peter the Deacon, his intimate, with whom he had discussed the four books of the Dialogues, is related to have resisted most vehemently. He asserted that these things could not erase Gregory's memory, since copies were held in diverse parts of the world. He added that it was an enormous sacrilege to burn so many books, and books of such a kind, by so great a father, above whose head he himself had very frequently beheld the Holy Spirit in the likeness of a dove.

At last he led them to this decision: confirming by oath what he had said, he would merit to die immediately if they themselves desisted from the burning of the books. But if he did not merit to die, but survived as a witness to his own testimony, he himself would also give his hands to the burners.

Accordingly, when the deacon's preparation had been made, the venerable Levite Peter came bearing the book of the Gospels. As soon as, after touching the sacrosanct Gospels, he gave testimony to Gregory's sanctity, free from the pain of death he breathed forth his spirit amid the words of a true confession.

At the same time, but while Gregory was living, there was a certain hermit, a man of great virtue, who had left all things for God's sake and possessed nothing except one cat. Caressing it frequently, he warmed it in his lap as though it were his cohabitant.

He therefore prayed to the Lord to show him with whom he ought to hope for a dwelling in the future reward, he who for love of him possessed nothing of the riches of the world. One night, therefore, it was revealed to him that he ought to hope for a dwelling with Gregory, the Roman pontiff.

But he, groaning deeply, thought that voluntary poverty had profited him little if he should receive a reward with one who abounded in such great worldly riches. Therefore, while day and night he compared Gregory's riches with his own poverty, sighing, one night he heard the Lord saying: “Since possession of riches does not make the rich man, but cupidity does, how do you dare to compare your poverty with Gregory's riches? You are proved to love that cat which you possess more by stroking it daily than he loves such great riches, which he disperses by not loving but contemning them and by bestowing them liberally upon all.”

And so the solitary gave thanks to God; and he who had thought his merit was diminished if he were made equal to Gregory began to pray that he might merit to receive a dwelling with him.

That hermit wondered that Pope Gregory was made equal to him in glory. But I, as one small in understanding, wonder vehemently that an unlearned and simple hermit, attending only to himself and not to the teaching of his neighbors, was made equal in glory to Gregory. Gregory exercised the supreme pontificate in such great humility that scarcely anyone was more humble; he was poured forth in such great liberality amid such great riches that he forgot no needy person; he shone with such great devotion that he ordered the office and chant of the Church; he was filled with such great learning, together with miracles, that he composed so many and such useful books; assailed by such great adversities from the Lombards and emperors, and vexed by so many nearly continual bodily pains, he bore all things most patiently.

I would wonder, unless I held in mind that the Lord is the weigher of spirits, who divides his gifts as he wills, gives to whom he wills and as much as he wills, without acceptance of any person. For he does not render the magnitude of the eternal, essential reward according to the quality of nobility, the quantity of dignity, knowledge, or teaching, the fruitfulness among the people, or bodily labor, but according to the amplitude of charity.

And when one man, with the same grade of charity, works few things outwardly at the end of creation and with modest knowledge [read: works few things outwardly with faith in the Creator and modest knowledge], while another, in great dignity, even ecclesiastical dignity, does very many things most useful to his neighbors, with the conversion of many by his teaching and miracles, according to the rule of divine justice both enjoy an equal essential reward.

Nor does what the Apostle says to the Corinthians disagree with this sentence: that each person shall receive a reward according to his own labor. This is true with respect to the accidental reward, so that he who has labored and borne fruit more may receive more accidental reward.

Title XII, Chapter IV

Because the road has been taken concerning the supreme pontiffs who existed from the time of John I as far as Gregory, concerning whom and whose sayings extended treatment has been given, the pen must return to the emperors who existed in those times.

It must be known that Justin the Elder, a most Christian emperor who reigned for nine years, succeeded Emperor Anastasius, who was treated in the preceding title. He began to reign in the year of the Lord 518; from the beginning of the world, in the year 5,717; according to another computation, in the year 4,486.

This Justin, as a most devout man, honorably received the legates sent to him by Pope Hormisdas and freed the bishops handed over to exile by the heretic Anastasius. Sending many golden and silver vessels to Rome, he bestowed them upon the church of Blessed Peter. With every effort he took care to extinguish the names of the heretics and to take churches away from the Arians.

Theodoric, king of Italy, bore this very ill because he was an Arian. He sent Pope John to Emperor Justin to protest to him that, if he did not restore the churches in the East to the Arians, all Italy would be exposed by him to fire and sword. Pitying the desolation of Italy, Pope John went to Constantinople and obtained from Justin what he sought, as was said above.

After this Justin had fought successfully against the Parthians and had established a most firm treaty with their king, being exceedingly old and failing, he designated Justinian, his nephew by his sister, as his successor, and died.

I. Justinian

Justinian succeeded Justin in the empire in the year of the Lord 528. For the restoration of the commonwealth, he first sent Belisarius the patrician against the Persians who had entered the Roman territories. Belisarius laid the Persians low in battle, vindicating the Roman boundaries; and, returning to Constantinople, he triumphed at Justinian's command. Justinian reigned for thirty-nine years.

Meanwhile the Lombards entered Pannonia and inhabited that province for twenty-four years.

And it must be noted that this Justinian collected in those times the ancient laws of the Romans, scattered through many volumes, and established many new ones. They were called the Digests or Pandects. They are called “Digests,” that is, things disposed, because they were diligently examined and ordered. “Pandects,” however, which is a Greek name, are so called as though receiving all things.

And, as is said by the Archdeacon, among modern writers, when they are cited, they are written in abbreviation with a double ff. This was introduced through a fault of scribes, because it ought to be a double s, with the title-mark cut across the letters themselves. It was explained as “holy sanction,” that is, a firm constitution. But that title-mark was so altered that it is formed by the letter f, and thus the Digests are designated ff.

Therefore, when Justinian saw the laws scattered in many books of very many legal experts, especially Julian, Scaevola, Papinian, Pomponius, Gaius, Modestinus, Paulus, and Ulpian, after superfluous things had been cut away he reduced them, and caused them to be reduced, into fifty books.

The one volume formed by these fifty books of the Digests or Pandects is thus divided today by legal experts into three volumes: namely, the Old Digest, the Infortiatum, and the New Digest. The first volume contains twenty-four and a half books. The second volume contains fourteen books and is called the Infortiatum. The third contains twelve books and is called the New Digest; its final rubric is On the Rules of Law.

Justinian also caused the volume called the Code, compiled by Theodosius the Younger, to be cut down. In it are contained the laws of many emperors, whose names are placed at the beginning of the laws; and it is divided into nine books.

The Volume is also so called because it contains four works within itself: namely, three books of the Code beyond the aforesaid nine; the volume of Justinian's Institutes, divided into four books; the volume of Justinian's Authentics, which are his own new decisions; and the volume of the Usages of Fiefs, which is not Justinian's but another emperor's, in which are written the customs of fiefs.

Moreover, in the year of the Lord 533 Emperor Justinian sent Belisarius, a most vigorous commander, to recover Africa, which for many passing years the Vandals, first pagans and thereafter made Arians, had possessed, as is contained in the preceding matters. Arriving there with a great army, Belisarius, with God's favor, immediately overcame the Vandals and recalled all Africa to the ancient body of the commonwealth under Roman rule.

Gelimer, king of the Vandals, when he could not bear the onset of Belisarius, fled to the Maurusians. But Belisarius, pursuing him there, captured him and brought him with him, bound by a silver chain. He also triumphed over him at Constantinople.

At that time in Italy shone Blessed Benedict, father of the monks in the West; but concerning him there will be treatment below in another place.

After these things, when Emperor Justinian had already long before fixed his mind upon liberating Italy, having found a suitable body of forces after the victory Belisarius had gained against the Vandals, he sent envoys to Theodatus. Theodatus had usurped for himself the kingdom of Italy after first procuring the death of Queen Amalasuentha, daughter of Theodoric, king of Italy, whom that Theodatus had taken as a partner and sharer in the kingdom.

Through his envoys Justinian sought that Italy and Sicily be restored to him, offering another dignity in recompense of this kind; but if Theodatus did not do it, Justinian declared that he should expect war. When Theodatus appeared to delay these matters, Justinian, thinking that he must wait no longer, ordered Belisarius to cross into Sicily with an army, yet in making his preparations to feign that he would be sent not to Sicily but to Africa.

Therefore, when the fleet had been prepared and the soldiers placed aboard it, Belisarius sailed to Sicily. He had sufficiently great forces of infantry, and in addition horsemen were being carried in the same fleet. Therefore, while he feigned that he was seeking Carthage, he departed into Sicily and remained in those places as though for the sake of refreshing himself.

Then, having taken from there a suitable time, by a sudden attack he assaulted and occupied the city of Catania. From there, soon displaying his forces and revealing his purpose, after many days he occupied Syracuse when the citizens surrendered themselves to him. After this, the course of his victory was marvelous, as cities surrendered themselves voluntarily and invited him.

The cause of this was the hatred of the Sicilians for the Goths, the authority of the Roman Empire, and the excellence of Belisarius. Because he had freed Africa from the Vandals, it was hoped that he would do the same concerning the Goths throughout Sicily and Italy. But the Goths had made no preparations throughout Sicily, nor did they think that there would be a future war. And so whatever Goths were in Sicily, astonished by Belisarius's sudden invasion, thought more about flight than resistance.

Palermo alone, because there was a strong garrison of Goths in that city, awaited and endured a siege. Since it was very strongly fortified from the land, the fleet was brought into the harbor—for the harbor lay open as far as the walls—and Belisarius observed that in certain places the height of the ships' masts was raised higher than the walls.

Therefore, archers stationed throughout the masts, striking the enemies placed below with arrows and weapons from every side, stripped the walls of defenders; and others, going up without any fear, battered the walls. Brought into this peril, the enemies surrendered the city. This was the last of the cities of Sicily that came into the power of Belisarius.

After this city had therefore been received, Belisarius returned to Syracuse, presented magnificent games, and scattered coin among the multitude.

Furthermore, at the same time, while matters in Sicily proceeded in this manner, Emperor Justinian commanded a certain Mundus—namely, a commander—to invade Dalmatia with other forces, so that the Goths, struck from both sides, might more easily be oppressed.

Therefore Mundus, having entered Dalmatia with an army, occupied Salona and enveloped those regions in war and tumult. But the Goths, having gathered great forces, hastened to the city of Salona. When they were nearby and war was being waged on both sides, battle was at last joined, not from preparation but beyond the preparation of either army. The cause of fighting in this manner was that, when they had seen one another, there was no delay before battle was joined.

They fought for some time so vehemently that nothing could have been done more strenuously. Many distinguished Goths fell in that battle, and at last Maurice himself perished. Both camps perceived that battle had been joined, and each hurried to bear aid to its own men.

While Mundus was on the way, he learned of his son's death. Then, being a man vehement and warlike by nature, and moreover inflamed by grief for his son, he was borne against the enemies as though in a certain rage. In the meantime all the forces of the Goths had arrived, and they fought on both sides with all their strength. The battle was most bloody and most bitter.

At last the broken Goths, after a great slaughter of their men, turned to flight. But while Mundus insatiably cut down the Goths and, in anger and grief for his lost son, pursued the routed enemy farther, he himself was killed by the fleeing enemies in his own victory. And thus vengeance for his son, exercised beyond measure, further added the death of the father.

After this battle both armies withdrew. For the routed Goths did not dare to remain in those places, and Justinian's soldiers, terrified because of the commander's death, abandoned Salona and went back. After the death of the commander Mundus and the withdrawal of the army, the Goths began to have greater power throughout Dalmatia.

For Grippa, one of the nobles of the Goths, after restoring the army, recovered the city of Salona and what Mundus had previously captured throughout those places. The affair of the Goths appeared much superior throughout those regions, and from these things the spirit of King Theodatus increased; for he himself was also from the nation of the Goths.

II. Justinian

But when Justinian had heard the things done in the Dalmatian war, he placed a certain Constantianus, one of his commanders, over the Dalmatian war and at the same time wrote to Belisarius that he should not delay crossing into Italy.

Therefore Constantianus, after restoring the army and sufficiently constructing a fleet, when he had remained at Dyrrachium for some time in completing these things, at last departed from there for Epidaurum. Certain scouts sent by Grippa were at Epidaurum. When they saw the fleet of Constantianus sailing beside the shore, the multitude of ships, and their excellent construction, they immediately returned to Grippa and reported a matter great in itself still more magnificently.

When he heard them, Grippa began to be uncertain in counsel. For he judged that to decide upon battle against such great forces was pernicious and rash, and he did not sufficiently trust in shutting himself within Salona, because the citizens were suspect and the walls of that town had collapsed through age in certain places. He also feared that, since the enemies prevailed at sea, he could quickly be reduced to want of provisions.

Anxious with these cares, he formed a plan. He departed from Salona with his forces and, having advanced some distance, fortified suitable places. Meanwhile Constantianus arrived at Lissa with the whole fleet. When he had there learned what had been done, he sailed to the nearest shore. Finally he moved the whole army to Salona and recovered the city without any difficulty.

When Grippa learned this, after remaining around those places for a few days, he resolved to depart; and, having been carried by sea to Ravenna, he entirely abandoned Dalmatia and Liburnia, which immediately came into the hands of Constantianus without anyone resisting.

Belisarius, however, after receiving Justinian's letters that he was to cross into Italy, left a garrison of soldiers at Syracuse and Palermo. Then, crossing from there into Italy with the army, he established a camp near Naples, which city was held by a great and strong garrison of Goths.

At last, sending many soldiers through the aqueduct by night, he caused them to enter the city and climb the walls. And while other soldiers fought by sea and land, they entered the city through a gate opened to them by the other soldiers. Slaughters and plunders were committed everywhere.

Nevertheless, after Naples had been captured, Belisarius used his victory most humanely. For he permitted no one of the Neapolitans to be killed or captured after their arms had been laid down. He kept the women intact from all lust and restored them to their husbands and parents.

But the Goths who dwelt at Rome and around those places, having heard the things done at Naples, were placed in the greatest suspicion and fear. Nor was it doubted that Belisarius would come to them with his victorious army. And through this, exhorting themselves and summoning the other warriors of their nation, they made camp between Anagnia and Terracina.

There, when the forces of the Goths were together, after complaining much about the prior wickedness of Theodatus and much about his present sloth, finally, when sedition arose in the army, they created Witigis as king for themselves. Witigis was not born of royal stock, but was held to be a great man in war; and by that virtue he had obtained for himself a name and very great authority.

But King Theodatus, perceiving these things, took flight and prepared to go to Ravenna. Yet attendants sent immediately after him by Witigis, the new king, overtook him on the way and killed him.

After these things Witigis set out for the city and exhorted the Romans not to make innovations, compelling them by oath to preserve fidelity to him. He said that if they did not do this, no one would be able to glory in his rebellion. And because his kingdom was new, he selected many persons from the Roman senate and people, whom he resolved to hold in the place of hostages.

He appointed to the city of Rome a certain Ludirim from among his nobles and left him four thousand chosen soldiers with whom to guard Rome. But he himself strove to seek Ravenna with the rest of the army, so that he might more firmly establish his kingdom.

When he had arrived there, he joined to himself in marriage Amalasuentha, the daughter and granddaughter of Theodoric, who was being held captive by Theodatus, so that he might honor his dominion with royal blood. He did not cease to summon and prepare forces of the Goths from every quarter, to arm infantrymen and horses among his people, and to provide the other things that pertain to war.

Since Witigis, king of the Goths, knew that a great multitude of Goths was dwelling around the Po and Ticinum, and that the remaining part of the said nation was throughout Cisalpine Gaul, he hastened to draw it together to himself. But in drawing it together, fear of the nation of the Franks presented itself to him. For at that time the Franks extended their dominion as far as the Alps, while the Goths possessed the region on this side of the Alps; and they were assuredly not friends with one another, but were regarded as mutually suspicious and, still more, discordant. It was also established that the Franks had recently been incited by Emperor Justin, who urged them to take up arms against the Goths. Because of this suspicion, Witigis, after sending ambassadors to the Franks, endeavored to remove suspicion on that side. This he at last obtained, a treaty having been entered into and friendship contracted with them.

Belisarius, however, after refitting and equipping the army, resolved to seek Rome. Therefore, after Herodian had been left at Naples with a garrison of soldiers and another garrison had been placed at Cumae, he himself sought Rome with the remainder of the army, having been made certain by some faithful persons that the Roman people would by no means close the gates against the emperor's army.

The Goths, therefore, being terrified and perceiving the will of the people, all resolved to depart of their own accord, except for the prefect Ludirim, who, led by shame, preferred to perish rather than abandon the city entrusted to his fidelity. Thus, while the Goths departed, the Romans obtained security. And it happened that on the same day and at the same hour the Goths departed from the city through the Flaminian Gate, while Belisarius entered Rome through the Caelimontane Gate, which is called the Asinarian Gate.

When Belisarius had been received within the city with the greatest rejoicing of the people, after addressing the senate and people with the things that were fitting, he then applied the greatest diligence in preparing the walls and fortifying the city. He not only attended to the walls, but also constructed battlements in suitable places and added ditches and embankments to the walls. He provided that a very great quantity of grain should be brought in by ships and preserved in the public granaries.

Nor was he meanwhile inactive; rather, through his commanders Constantinus and Bessas, at that time he received Narnia, Spoletum, and Perusia when the citizens surrendered themselves. Battle was also waged against the Goths not far from the city of Perusia. For as soon as King Witigis perceived the defection of the Perusians, he sent Unilas and Pissas with an army into Tuscany, so that they might hold the other cities in the alliance and recover the towns that had already defected.

Constantinus, a commander of Belisarius, was at Perusia, and he drew all his forces together there, except for a few left at Spoletum. When the forces of the Goths approached and were beneath the very walls of Perusia, Constantinus went out and, after drawing up a battle line prepared for fighting, attacked the Goths. A mighty battle was joined, and the contest was waged with great strength on both sides. After a long struggle, the Goths were at last overcome and turned to flight. A great slaughter was made of them, and many were captured. Among these, Unilas and Pissas, the commanders of the forces, were captured and sent to Belisarius at Rome.

Witigis, therefore, when on account of the defection of the cities he had received this defeat, judged that there should be no further delay and resolved to descend into war with absolutely the whole strength of the Goths. Accordingly, moving from Ravenna, he led the army toward Rome, having with him two hundred thousand men, very many among them being armored horsemen whom they call cataphracts. With all these forces he sought Rome in such a manner that he seemed to desire nothing more than that Belisarius should not await him. Therefore he halted neither at Perusia, nor at Spoletum, nor at Narnia, and did not wish to become entangled in war in those places, but hastened to seek Rome.

Belisarius, however, when he perceived so great a mass of war being turned against him, commanded Constantinus and Bessas to return to him quickly with the forces they possessed. Constantinus, obeying the command, came immediately from Tuscany to Rome. Bessas, who was at Narnia, departed more slowly, so that he became involved even with the foremost outriders of the Goths.

Witigis was making his way very near Narnia. When the first forerunners had arrived there, Bessas went out from the city of Narnia, attacked them, turned certain of their columns to flight, and killed many. But when he was pressed by a greater number, he withdrew himself into the city of Narnia. Soon afterward, hastening from there to Rome, he announced from his own sight that the Goths were at hand.

When the Goths approached Rome, they halted at the Aniene River. For Belisarius had fortified the bridge over that river on both banks with towers and forts and had commanded that it be guarded by a garrison of soldiers. Thus, being unable to cross at their first arrival, the Goths placed their camp across the river. But on the following night the soldiers who were in the garrison of the bridge, terrified by the multitude and ferocity of the barbarians, abandoned the towers and fortifications of the bridge. Secretly taking flight, they went away into Campania, fearing the punishment of Belisarius.

On the following day Belisarius, having taken one thousand horsemen, set out for those places so that he might observe both the situation of the region and what the enemies were doing, and at the same time choose a suitable place for his camp. But as he advanced and was near the river, horsemen of the Goths came to meet him beyond expectation. For a little earlier the Goths, perceiving that the fortifications of the bridge had been abandoned, had broken its barriers and gates. A great multitude of them had already crossed; and when it suddenly came against Belisarius, who was ignorant of this, he was compelled by an inspired occurrence to fight [read: he was compelled by the unexpected occurrence to fight].

At the beginning Belisarius discharged only the duties of a commander, giving orders and exhorting, and showing what was to be done. But when his men were pressed more and more by the enemies, then, with necessity compelling him, he exercised no longer the office of commander but that of soldier. Flying forward among the foremost fighters, he conducted the affair vigorously by hand and strength. On that day he himself underwent very great danger for this reason.

Belisarius had an outstanding horse which he used very frequently. When, therefore, he fought from that horse and moved among the foremost fighters, certain deserters who recognized him signified by a shout that they should strike Vala, that is, his horse. From this it came about that the whole battle was turned against Belisarius alone. Had an excellent band of his household not gathered around him, received the onset of the enemies rushing against him, and protected his horse and Belisarius with their bodies and arms amid a thousand blows of missiles, he could not have escaped.

But he was excellently defended, both by his own valor, since he fought most skillfully, and by the aid of his friends and household, who remained around him with incredible love. In this place many of the best among the household of Belisarius fell, and Mesentius in particular.

At last those who were with Belisarius, exhorting one another and making an attack, turned the enemies to flight and pursued them as far as the bridge. But the infantry who stood before the bridge, taking up the battle, easily repelled Belisarius and his men. Finally, when many combatants had fallen on both sides, they were compelled to seek Rome at full speed. The flight was toward that gate which is commonly called the Pincian. The Goths pursued Belisarius as far as that gate, so that they were struck from the walls of the city.

There was a mighty tumult in that place. For the Romans who stood upon the walls, being afraid because of the nearness of the enemies, were unwilling to open the gates. Hence Belisarius, after the enemies had again been driven away and he had at last been clearly recognized—for the sun had set—led his men within the city.

The battle of that day was by far the greatest and most varied. For fighting began a little after sunrise and ceased only when darkness was already occupying the earth. By the judgment of everyone Belisarius was esteemed the best fighter on that day, but among the Goths, Visandus. When Belisarius had led his soldiers back into the city, he ordered the Roman soldiers to keep watches along the walls that night. The Goths, however, after remaining around the walls for some portion of the night, returned to the king's camp, which was between the city and the Aniene.

On the following day, since no one came out to battle, the Goths prepared themselves for a siege and placed camps around the city in six locations, from the Flaminian Way as far as the Praenestine Way. Five gates of the city were besieged by these camps. Afterward they added seven camps beyond the Milvian Bridge [read: Afterward they added a seventh camp beyond the Milvian Bridge]. These last camps besieged the Aurelian Gate and obstructed the roads leading across the Tiber. They fortified the camps themselves with a rampart, ditch, and wooden towers; and, possessing the regions both on this side of the Tiber and beyond it, they overran everything with frequent incursions.

III. The Siege of Rome

Belisarius, on the other side, made the following provisions for the defense of the city. He himself undertook to guard the Pincian Gate, which was especially opposed to the larger camps of the Goths, and the Salarian Gate next to it on the outer side, and whatever portion of the wall was around those gates. He committed the Praenestine Gate to Bessas. He assigned the Flaminian Gate, which is to the left of the Pincian, to Constantinus. He placed others over the remaining gates.

The Goths, however, proceeding around the city, broke all the aqueducts. There were fourteen of these, constructed with marvelous workmanship, through which water was carried into the city. From their destruction it was not so much the inconvenience concerning water that harmed the Romans as the loss of the mills. For those aqueducts furnished the Romans a great convenience for grinding; when they were now broken, they brought the besieged great difficulties in grinding.

But Belisarius, devising remedies against these inconveniences, made provision in this manner: namely, that pairs of skiffs—that is, small boats—standing a short distance apart and joined by beams should hold mills between them, which were easily turned by the rapid course of the river. Ropes extended with the greatest tension from each bank supported skiffs of this kind. He placed such skiffs in sequence beside the bridge that is the first leading across the Tiber. Chains stretched across the river at the bridge caught every piece of material. The Tiber, however, supplied the want of the waters.

Belisarius provided with the greatest care many instruments of war along the walls for striking and repelling the enemies. The Goths likewise prepared various instruments for storming the city: engines, rams, wooden towers equal in height to the walls, and a very great number of ladders. King Witigis distributed their companies every day and prescribed what he wished each man to do. Belisarius stood every day before the gate with the most select of the soldiers. Thus battle was waged daily with varying victories on both sides.

When a suitable time for carrying out the affair appeared to the Goths, they went out suddenly from ambush and flew to attack Hadrian's millstone. Ladders having been applied, in a sudden assault they took the first enclosure, which surrounds the millstone in a square shape [read: they went out suddenly from ambush and flew to attack the Mole of Hadrian. Ladders having been applied, in a sudden assault they took the first enclosure, which surrounds the mole in a square shape]. This mole was the tomb of Emperor Hadrian, constructed with exceptional and magnificent workmanship. It is established that it was built of Parian marble with the highest diligence of craftsmen. In the middle of this square a round mass rises, lofty indeed in height and so great in breadth that there is an open area on its highest part. It has a bridge over the Tiber River, which extends from the mole itself to the other bank.

Belisarius, however, had provided that it should be guarded by his soldiers as though it were a citadel and a certain battlement, and had entrusted its care to Constantinus. Therefore, after taking the lower enclosure, the Goths strove to storm the millstone itself [read: the Goths strove to storm the mole itself]. But the soldiers fighting back from the upper part, so that they might repel the enemies more effectively, accomplished this with stones: they hurled down upon the enemies the statues that were on the highest part of that mole—statues of men, horses, and four-horse chariots fashioned by the excellent workmanship of artisans—some intact and some broken.

Constantinus also, suddenly bringing aid, repelled the enemies and added courage to his soldiers. In this manner the Mole of Hadrian was preserved, which today is called the Castle of the Holy Angel.

Thereafter King Witigis approached the Praenestine Gate with a multitude of Goths in order to storm it, but Belisarius, although with difficulty, defended it with his men. About three thousand of the Goths fell in these battles.

While the siege continued, the Romans, although they admired the virtues of Belisarius, nevertheless had a complaint against him: that, having stirred up war against so great a strength of Goths with his own scanty forces, he had brought Rome into its present difficulties.

Belisarius, understanding the complaints of the Romans, although at another time he had reported these same things to Justinian, then, being moved more greatly and immoderately, wrote more vehemently to Emperor Justinian, setting forth the siege of the city of Rome, the multitude of the enemies, and the small number of his own men: that only five thousand soldiers remained to him, while he was besieged by an army of two hundred thousand Goths; that the Romans, being unaccustomed to these dangers, were by no means enduring the siege; and that, as far as he himself was concerned, he had devoted his life to Emperor Justinian. But it was necessary to see what honor or infamy that affair was going to bring him.

When Justinian received this letter, he was greatly moved and immediately ordered certain forces already prepared to sail into Italy; and he determined to prepare other, larger forces. Valerianus and Martinus were over those forces already prepared. That winter they wintered throughout Aetolia and Acarnania. When these things were reported to the Romans, they sustained them in hope.

Meanwhile, while these things were being done at Rome, Asinarius and Uligasalus, commanders of the Goths whom King Witigis had sent into Dalmatia with an army, and to whom he had given a fleet, besieged Salona by sea and land after very great forces of barbarians had joined them. For Constantianus, who was there on behalf of Emperor Justinian, although unequal to so great a force of enemies, endured the siege in the city, which had previously been abundantly fortified. Sometimes, going out from the city, he even inflicted great losses upon the Goths by land and sea.

But Witigis, king of the Goths, because the storming previously attempted had succeeded shamefully for him, being thereby made more restless, did not cease examining all the things by which he might afflict the besieged Romans to the greatest degree.

There was a harbor beside the sea on the right bank of the Tiber River. Over it stood a city encircled by a strong wall. In that place ships deposited all the things that are carried by sea. From there they were again carried to Rome by land or river. Witigis, therefore, after suddenly and unexpectedly sending great forces of his men, took the city of Portus, because the townspeople were by no means sufficiently prepared to resist the sudden force of the Goths.

From an occupation of the city of this kind, great difficulties immediately increased at Rome, since the facility of transporting grain and the other things that are useful had been taken away. For the Goths left there guarded the town and the mouths of the Tiber so that nothing could be carried from there.

Then the aforesaid King Witigis caused one thousand Roman citizens whom he had previously led with him to Ravenna as hostages to be killed, except for a few who, when his anger became known, fled into Gaul.

Belisarius, however, fearing a failure of the grain supply, proclaimed to the Roman citizens that they should send their sons, wives, and every multitude useless for war to Naples. He compelled his soldiers to do the same. The Romans therefore sent out their wives, sons, and the multitude unfit for war.

At the same time—namely, in the year of the Lord 539—so severe a famine existed throughout all Italy, as Dacius [i.e., Datius], bishop of Milan, relates, that in the regions of Liguria women, through the scarcity of famine, ate their own sons.

Meanwhile Martinus and Valerianus, whom we said above had been sent by Justinian, came to Rome, having about one thousand six hundred horsemen. These were for the greater part Huns. Revived by the arrival of these horsemen, Belisarius resolved to wage war in another manner than before. For he did not guard the city by standing within the walls, but every day harassed the enemies with sudden incursions of cavalry. From this it came about that the contest was kindled without end on both sides and that they came into every kind of experience.

When Witigis, king of the Goths, had learned that battle would take place on the following day, he caused the Goths to be armed at first light. In arranging the battle line, he placed the infantry in the middle and disposed the horsemen on the right and left as though they were wings. Advancing in this manner to meet Belisarius, he joined battle.

The soldiers on both sides immediately charged fiercely. The commanders, standing behind them—Belisarius on this side and Witigis on that—exhorted their men. At the beginning of the battle the soldiers of Belisarius prevailed by far, and many fell from the battle line of the Goths; and they fought beside the enemies' very camp. Yet the Goths, abounding in multitude, sent other men forward into the place of those who fell. Battle was waged in this manner until midday, neither side prevailing.

Afterward the Goths, after they had taken the port of Ostia, wishing to prevent grain and other necessities from being carried to Rome, placed eight camps around that city between the Latin and Appian Ways. Thus they obstructed the Latin, Appian, and Ostian Ways, cutting off every facility of bringing things in. From this the condition of the besieged became exceedingly hard, and an undoubted famine threatened.

Nevertheless, so long as crops remained in the fields, soldiers went out from Rome by night, brought in grain, and sold it to the citizens at a great price; and in this way want was sustained. But when even this facility failed, then all things seemed desperate. The summer solstice had now come, and a pestilence had begun to spread at Rome. People frequently died, not only from the Roman populace but also from among the soldiers of Belisarius. Hence the affair itself was in the greatest difficulties and straits, and so the Romans, coming to Belisarius, complained gravely.

Then Belisarius began to turn his mind to this consideration: how he might bring upon the Goths the greatest possible difficulties in the matter of grain. For this reason he sent his soldiers to various places, and thus prevented supplies from being carried to the camps of the Goths. From this it happened in a very short time that the Goths conducting the siege were afflicted with no lesser difficulties than the besieged, especially from the failure of grain. Pestilence also invaded the camp of the Goths.

Meanwhile other forces sent by Justinian arrived in Italy. There were eight hundred Thracian horsemen, whom John, the son of Vitalian's brother, commanded. There were also one thousand three hundred chosen horsemen, over whom were Alexander, Marcentius, and Zeno. Moreover, three thousand infantrymen had been brought with the fleet, whom Paulus and Chonon commanded. There were besides five hundred infantrymen at Naples. All these forces, coming together as one, resolved to seek Rome. They carried with them many and great provisions.

When he himself attacked these forces and provisions from the rear, while those who had previously fled fought back from the front, he overwhelmed them with incredible slaughter. So great was the terror among all the Goths that the watches in the camps were doubled and they thought about no matter more than how they might keep themselves safe from the ambushes of Belisarius.

In this manner, after the enemies had also been terrified, the forces arrived at Ostia without any hindrance. The Goths, therefore, being wearied by many inconveniences, when they learned in addition that new forces had come to Belisarius, began to think about dissolving the siege. For already a mighty multitude in the camps of the Goths had been consumed either by pestilence or by the sword, and many had been weakened by disease or ulcers.

And now Witigis, after sending an embassy to Rome, when many things had been said and answered on each side concerning the cause of justice, finally consented that the controversies be referred to Emperor Justinian, so that the matters might be settled by his authority. Envoys were sent for this purpose, and a truce of three months was made until the envoys should return. Hostages were also given on both sides so that the truce might be faithfully observed.

Datius, bishop of Milan at that time, and with him certain citizens of Milan, came to Belisarius and said that the city of Milan would be in the emperor's power if even a small garrison were sent there. They declared themselves able to expel the Goths not only from Milan but from all Cisalpine Gaul, provided only that the authority of the emperor's name was present.

Belisarius received them kindly, commended them with many and most ample words, commanded them to have good hope, and affirmed that, when there should be opportunity, he would do what they requested.

At the same time, when all things seemed prosperous and joyful, a horrible danger came upon them, which in a brief moment nearly overturned everything. There was a certain Roman citizen named Presidius. Since he had been accustomed to dwell at Ravenna, at the beginning of the aforesaid war he had secretly fled from there and was proceeding to Rome. On the journey, however, soldiers of Constantinus dwelling at Spoletum took from him a sword adorned at great cost.

Thus despoiled and having suffered the injury indignantly, he set forth his complaint before Belisarius and requested that the things taken away be restored to him. Belisarius commanded that the sword be restored to him. Although he had commanded this more than once to Constantinus, the latter despised the command and said: “I, Constantinus,” he said, “will sooner cast that sword into the Tiber than return it to that worthless fellow,” speaking this very contumaciously and insolently.

Then Belisarius said, “Are you not subject to me?”

“I am subject,” he said, “since the emperor so wills; but in this one matter I shall never obey you.”

When Belisarius heard this, he became more angry and commanded the attendants to be summoned. Constantinus, however, thinking that the attendants were being summoned for his destruction, seized the dagger that hung at his thigh and rushed upon Belisarius, striking him a little below the stomach.

Had those standing around not immediately intervened, forcibly wrested away the dagger, and delivered Constantinus into the hands of the attendants, that would have been Belisarius's last day, and his death would have drawn all things together into ruin. The Goths would indeed have become masters of affairs on that very day. But the goodness of God did not permit such great evils to occur. Constantinus was killed a little afterward at the command of Belisarius.

While, on account of the truce made above, Belisarius at Rome and the Goths were guarding their camps and fortifications, complaints and altercations arose because the truce had been violated against good faith for a cause of the following kind.

Since the Goths were guarding the city of Portus, the maritime city of Centumcellae, and the city of Alba, which is in the Marsian territory, when necessities for their sustenance failed them they left those cities empty. The commander of the Isaurians, who had remained at Ostia with the fleet, occupied them.

When Witigis learned that these cities had been taken by the enemies, he sent ambassadors to Rome to complain that the truce had been broken against good faith through the occupation of the Gothic cities, and therefore that restitution of them ought to be made.

Belisarius answered the ambassadors in this manner: “Return,” he said, “to your king and tell him that the causes for which the Goths regarded those cities as abandoned are evident to everyone. But occupation of things possessed by no one can by no means be prohibited.”

From this suspicions arose, and the Goths sought to return equal things to Belisarius. For these three cities brought Belisarius great opportunities for the war. He then sent two thousand horsemen into the Picene territory and placed John Vitalianus over these forces, so that, if the Goths attempted anything, he would be prepared against them.

The Goths therefore attempted to seize Rome secretly, first by seeking a way through a certain aqueduct at night, and then by crossing the river upon rafts beside the Campus Martius. But in both places their hope deceived them. For lights seen through the aqueduct disclosed their fraud, and after the aqueduct had been obstructed the opportunity of invading was cut off from them; and at the Campus Martius the treachery, having been discovered, rendered their attempt vain.

That treachery—namely, to enter the Campus Martius upon rafts after crossing the river—was being arranged with the aid of two Romans from the lowest part of the common people. It had been arranged that the watchmen posted to guard the place by which men could enter the Campus Martius from the river, after receiving from the two Romans money given to them for this purpose, should accept from them a sleep-inducing drink; after drinking it they would be unable to awaken and, consequently, would leave their approach open.

But, by the will of God, one of the two, being led by repentance, disclosed the affair to Belisarius. When the other was captured, the sleep-inducing drug that the king had given him was found, and the whole course of the affair was explained. By the command of Belisarius his nose and little ears were therefore cut off, and he himself, placed upon an ass, was sent through the Pincian Gate to the camps of the Goths, so that Witigis might recognize that his fraud had been discovered and his attempt made manifest.

Belisarius, therefore, when these things had thus been detected, by no means judged that the truce was to be observed by him. Accordingly, he wrote to John that he should prosecute the war. Thus John, overrunning the Picene territory with two thousand horsemen, enveloped the whole region in plunder and pillage, the wives and children of the Goths being taken as booty.

He met Ugutheus, the paternal uncle of Witigis, who had been placed over forces of Goths against him, and overcame him in battle; he killed the commander himself together with a great part of his forces. Thereafter, having become victorious and captured many towns in the Picene territory, he left forces at Auximum and Urbinum after the cities had been fortified, led his forces onward, and took Fanum and Pisaurum.

Since the inhabitants of Ariminum did not agree well with the Goths, by approaching with the army he brought so great a terror upon them that, distrusting their ability to remain in that place, they all migrated to Ravenna. The citizens opened the gates to him, and in this manner John took Ariminum.

When the Goths learned that Ariminum had been taken, they resolved to dissolve the siege of the city of Rome and depart from there. Accordingly, after a few days Witigis burned the camps and departed with all the forces of the Goths. He also sustained great losses besides. For when half the army had already crossed the bridge, Belisarius commanded the hindmost to be attacked by his men. Many of the Goths were killed, and the others were forced to cross the bridge amid so great a tumult and haste that many fell into the river from both sides.

This siege of the city of Rome lasted one complete year and nine days, having begun in March.

Although Witigis hastened toward Ravenna, he nevertheless endeavored to retain in his power the cities of Etruria and of the other provinces. Therefore he sent his soldiers to guard Clusium, Urbs Vetus, Tudertum, Auximum, Urbinum, Caesena, and Mons Ferratus. He himself, however, set out with the remaining army to besiege Ariminum.

After the departure of the Goths, Belisarius commanded Martinus and Ildiger to hasten to Ariminum with one thousand horsemen and to lead away from there John and the horsemen who were with him, but to place infantrymen there. John himself was unwilling to obey, and he did not permit Damianus, his cousin, to obey with his horsemen. For this reason Ildiger and Martinus departed from Ariminum.

Meanwhile Witigis arrived and besieged Ariminum. At the very beginning they constructed a wooden tower equal to the height of the walls. The Goths therefore determined to storm the city on the following day with this tower against that part of the wall where access was easier. During the night John led out the soldiers and made a broad and deep ditch on that side.

A great battle was joined around the tower. After a long and savage struggle the Goths drew back the tower, with a great slaughter of their men and so great a loss that they cast aside the hope of taking the town by force. Witigis therefore planned to overcome the besieged by hunger.

Belisarius granted auxiliary forces to the Milanese envoys who had come to Rome during the aforesaid times. He placed Mundilas, one of his household and a vigorous man, over all the forces. When Mundilas had at last crossed the Po and arrived at the city of Ticinum, which is now called Pavia, the Goths came out of that town and attacked them. After a short battle had been joined, the Goths were driven within the city. Mundilas, however, crossed with his forces by the bridge that was beside the city. At length Mundilas and his men proceeded to Milan and were received into the city.

Thereafter Bergamum, Comum, Novaria, and other cities of those regions followed the example of Milan, voluntarily receiving Mundilas with his men.

When Witigis learned the things that had happened at Milan, he sent Uraias, his brother's son, to those places with a great army, both to hold in fidelity the cities that had not yet defected from the Goths and to attempt to recover those that had already withdrawn from him. Witigis himself sent to Theudebert, king of the Franks, who had recently entered into a treaty with him, so that he might join his auxiliary forces to those of Uraias.

Belisarius, when the crops were already ripening, went out from Rome and received Tudertum by agreement. Meanwhile Witigis resolved to make trial with all his forces of the city of Ancona, which was held by a garrison of Belisarius. At that time this city had walls only upon the mountain; the flatter places beneath it, although thickly occupied by buildings, were enclosed by no walls.

When the Goths arrived there, Chonon, a commander of Belisarius who was over Ancona, went out with one thousand soldiers to meet four thousand Goths in battle. He immediately paid the penalty of his presumption: defeated and turned to flight, he lost a great part of his men and was at last scarcely received into the city. While the Goths endeavored to take the city with ladders, others, casting in fire, burned all the buildings that were beneath the city.

IV. Narses and the Division of Command

Meanwhile it was reported that Narses had come into Italy with a new army. Narses was a eunuch and possessed much favor and power with Justinian. Indeed, he alone governed the emperor's court in all things, being receiver and dispenser of the imperial monies, a participant in all counsels, and sometimes a victor. He increased the army sent into Italy by five thousand soldiers.

Belisarius had meanwhile come into Picene territory because of the danger to the people of Ancona. Narses had done the same. The two commanders themselves and the armies came together as one near the city, so that they might deliberate concerning the common war.

The opinion of Narses prevailed: that aid should immediately be furnished to John, who was besieged at Ariminum. John, being exhausted by hunger with his soldiers, had signified by his letters that he had agreed upon a delay of seven days. Although many accused John's rashness because, against the command of Belisarius, he had shut himself within Ariminum and, led by pride and boldness, had done everything according to his own judgment without regard for the commander or his orders, nevertheless they moved their camps by sea and land and at last arrived at Ariminum.

When the Goths saw the two armies, thinking that they were being surrounded, they immediately dissolved the siege and sought Faventia in flight without any order. The fleet therefore arrived first, and those who went out upon land plundered the camps of the Goths. Not long afterward Martinus and Belisarius arrived with the armies.

When they saw John and the soldiers who had been besieged with him exhausted by pallor and want of food, Belisarius said to John, as though mocking his rashness: “You ought to give the greatest thanks to Ildiger.”

To this John answered exceedingly proudly that he indeed owed thanks to Ildiger, but all thanks to Narses, wishing to show that Belisarius had had no care for his safety unless Narses had compelled him. These words disturbed Belisarius and were the beginning of dissension. For after this John, fearing Belisarius, adhered to Narses, saying that the glory of Italy ought to be claimed not for Belisarius but for Narses.

These things so exalted Narses that he made a camp separately for himself and wished to follow none of the things that seemed good to Belisarius, but undertook his own enterprises and counsels concerning the war by himself. Nevertheless, they proceeded together to the siege of Urbinum, though not in the same camp: Belisarius took his position opposite that part of the city which looks toward the east, while Narses took his position toward the west.

When Belisarius had resolved to storm the city and was preparing engines, Narses, deriding the affair as vain, abandoned the siege a few days after they had come there and returned with his army to Ariminum. He left Belisarius and his men in a worse condition than if he himself had not come at the beginning. For the enemies, seeing part of the army depart, assumed confidence beyond measure.

Belisarius nevertheless remained in the siege and had resolved to make trial of storming it. At length those who were being besieged, being terrified, entered into an agreement and surrendered the city, so that the Goths and the inhabitants of Urbinum should be subject to Emperor Justinian with equal right with the other Italians who obeyed the emperor.

After Urbinum had been received, Belisarius led the army against the inhabitants of Urbs Vetus. The storming of that city was exceedingly difficult because, being established on a rock cut off on every side, it gave no true access for an assault. But hope lay in a failure of grain. For because Italy had been trampled by many armies in a long war, the individual cities suffered from scarcity of grain. Therefore, at last overcome by scarcity, the city came into the power of Belisarius.

Narses, however, while he was at Ariminum, sent John with an army to storm Caesena. There, while the commander attacked the walls with ladders, he was repelled with many wounds, lost many of his men, and Phanates, commander of the Heruli, perished there. Therefore John withdrew from Caesena and led the army to Forum Cornelii, which is now called Imola, and received it when the inhabitants surrendered themselves.

During the same time Mundilas and those who were with him at Milan began to be involved in the greatest difficulties on account of the arrival of the Franks. For Theudebert, king of the Franks, having been summoned by Witigis, as has been said, had sent ten thousand Burgundians to the Arar. Relying upon that multitude, Uraias placed his camp not far from Milan and obstructed every importation of grain and of the other supply.

Mundilas was necessarily compelled to distribute his forces among Comum, Bergamum, and Novaria. He himself had with him no great number of horsemen, because there was no difficulty in the defense of the city. For the Milanese citizens ran unanimously to the defense. But failure of the grain supply was feared in that most populous city if the barbarians should remain longer in those places.

Belisarius, therefore, understanding these things, sent Martinus and Ulianus with great forces so that, after joining the army of Mundilas, they might remove the barbarians. When these men arrived at the River Po, not daring to cross because of fear of the enemies, they remained for a long time in those places, daily frustrating the hope of Mundilas and the besieged. At last they wrote to Belisarius that they could not cross against so great a force of enemies.

When Belisarius heard these things, he immediately wrote to Narses concerning the imminent danger. Although Narses conceded that the army should proceed there, nevertheless, because the undertaking had belonged to Belisarius, the affair was conducted very slowly and carelessly, as though it were another's business. In this manner the delayed affair received frustration. Milan, however, was pressed more sharply and was already laboring intolerably from hunger.

Having been brought from this to the most extreme necessity, Mundilas and the soldiers agreed that they should be permitted to depart unharmed.

The Goths, however, after entering the city, spared no age. The citizens were slaughtered everywhere—not only those who could bear arms, but old men and those below the age of puberty. The women were handed over into the servitude of the Burgundians. The city was overthrown to the ground. A certain Roman citizen named Reparatus, captured in that city, was cut apart piecemeal by the Goths and given to dogs.

And thus the most beautiful and most populous city of all Italy underwent its final destruction because of the dissensions of Belisarius and Narses. Thirty thousand citizens of Milan were killed in that devastation.

When Belisarius heard of the slaughter of the Milanese, he was placed in the greatest grief. He wrote to Emperor Justinian the beginning and progress of the whole affair. When Justinian learned these things, he bore them with distress, but nevertheless punished no one. He recalled only Narses from Italy and commanded that the authority for the whole war should belong to Belisarius.

Hence Narses went away into Greece with part of the forces, while Belisarius remained in Italy with all the other forces. When Belisarius could now think more freely about waging the war, all his care was turned toward Witigis and Ravenna. Nevertheless, he determined that two towns must first be taken away from the Goths before the army was led against Witigis and Ravenna. These two towns were Auximum and Faesulae, both most strongly fortified by the situation of their places and both guarded by strong garrisons of Goths.

Therefore, after dividing the army into three parts, he resolved that he himself should set out with one part of the forces to besiege Auximum. He sent another part, with the commanders Cyprianus and Justinus, to Faesulae. He entrusted the third part of the forces to Martinus and John to be led, commanding them to make camp with these forces around the Po and to disturb Uraias and his forces in those places as greatly as could be done, lest they should come into Tuscany and the Picene territory to dissolve the sieges.

Martinus and John therefore set out with part of the army and occupied the city of Tortona. From there they began to harass Uraias and the Goths. Cyprianus and Justinus, however, went to Faesulae and arrived there. Although this city was most strongly fortified by its mountainous situation, they besieged it from the higher place where access to the city is more level. Belisarius, with a force strong by far, surrounded Auximum, which town Witigis had fortified with the best soldiers.

V. The Frankish Invasion

Theudebert, king of the Franks, after overcoming the Alps, descended through Citerior Gaul with eighty thousand men. He did this especially because, when they saw the war being conducted there, the warlike Franks judged that they themselves could then conquer all Italy.

Martinus and John had been sent by Belisarius against Uraias, and their camp was about seven miles distant from the camp of Uraias. Meanwhile the Franks suddenly appeared around those places. Uraias and the Goths, because of the treaty recently entered into, thought that these men had come as auxiliaries to them, as they had done in the preceding year in the war of Milan.

Very few of these Franks around their commander Theudebert were horsemen; all the remaining multitude was infantry. They bore as arms neither javelins nor bows, but for protecting the body a certain shield and a helmet, and for striking the enemy a sword and a double-headed axe. In battles they used axes especially; striking with these while drawn up, they broke the shields and helmets of the enemies, so that no one could resist so great a force.

Thus, crossing the River Ticinum by the bridge at Pavia as though they were friends of the Goths, they afterward inflicted great slaughters upon the inhabitants of Pavia and, with a certain barbarous savagery, killed the sons and wives of the Goths whom they found throughout the fields.

Soon afterward, having crossed the Po, when they approached the camp of Uraias, whether by design or by the rashness of the multitude, they became involved in a quarrel and battle with the Goths. There was no end to the fighting before the Goths, having been turned to flight, abandoned their camp.

In fleeing, the Goths came not far from the camp and soldiers of Belisarius, upon whom they brought the greatest astonishment. For they had heard nothing concerning the arrival of the Franks and thought that Belisarius had come by hidden routes to crush Uraias. Therefore, rapidly taking up their arms and advancing some distance, they unexpectedly encountered the Franks. Hence, being compelled to fight, they were quickly broken; not daring to seek their camp again, they consulted for themselves by flight alone.

The victorious Franks took both the camp of the Goths and that of the forces of Belisarius on one and the same day, and they remained in them, provisions having been found abundantly in both. Uraias therefore went in flight to Ravenna, while the forces of Belisarius passed through the territories of Placentia and Parma and, after crossing the ridge of the Apennines, went into Etruria.

This sudden arrival of the Franks disturbed Witigis and Belisarius together. The greatest fear seized Belisarius lest the Franks should descend into Etruria and crush the forces that were pressing Faesulae. For there is a short and expedient route through the territories of Placentia and Parma for descending into Etruria.

But the Franks, remaining around the Po, found neither wine nor other suitable things, as was natural in a region afflicted by a long war. Eating only the flesh of cattle and the water of the Po, they quickly fell into various illnesses. Being afflicted by these, since great numbers of them were dying, they resolved to go back; and by the same tracks by which they had come, they returned into Gaul.

The Goths who were being besieged by the soldiers of Belisarius at Faesulae, when they were pressed by hunger and the aid repeatedly requested did not come, at last surrendered the city by agreement to Cyprianus, Justinus, and the commanders of Belisarius. After a garrison of soldiers had been placed there, they proceeded with all the remaining forces to Auximum.

Although Witigis with the whole strength of the Goths promised that he would bring assistance to those who were being besieged at Auximum, nevertheless the besieged waited in vain. Therefore Belisarius, who had been compelled to draw together forces there from every quarter lest the labor of a long siege fall into nothing, resolved to compel them to surrender through some necessity. For the sake of this affair he devised the following.

There was a perennial spring of water outside the walls of Auximum, so near the walls that it was within the cast of a stone. Since Belisarius perceived that the besieged obtained water from that spring, he determined to take the spring away from them. For this purpose he sent down to the spring many men skilled in this craft, with axes and hammers prepared for the task and protected by many shields, so that they might dig out and destroy it.

Since they could do little to destroy it because of the tenacity of the structure and the resistance offered by the besieged through the wall, Belisarius abandoned this work and devised another. Namely, he caused the water of that spring to be infected with the malignant juice of herbs, the carcasses of beasts of burden, and a foul stone, and rendered it entirely useless.

The Goths, therefore, suffering from scarcity of water, sought an agreement from Belisarius: namely, that if the safety of their possessions were granted to them, they would depart for Ravenna after surrendering the city to him. But when the soldiers of Belisarius objected and demanded the whole booty of the fortress, Belisarius arranged the matter in this manner: that one half should be given to the soldiers as booty and the Goths should retain the other half for themselves. Thus the town was surrendered by this agreement.

VI. Ravenna

After these things, in the year of the Lord 542 [read: in the year of the Lord 540], Belisarius resolved to lead his forces against Witigis and Ravenna. After drawing them together from every quarter, he proceeded there. Immediately upon his first arrival he sent Maximus, one of his commanders, with part of the forces to watch and guard the banks of the Po, lest anything necessary could be carried from there into Ravenna. Vitalis, summoned by Belisarius, also came from Dalmatia with other forces and occupied the other bank of the river.

Meanwhile, when a great multitude of vessels came carrying grain and other supplies to Ravenna, the river itself rose to such a degree that most of the vessels were left helpless. From this it came about that all the vessels were captured by the soldiers of Belisarius. Thus the opportunity of carrying necessities to Ravenna by the River Po was taken away. Nothing could be brought in by sea, because enemies of the Goths possessed the sea everywhere.

When Ravenna was being besieged in this manner, ambassadors of the Franks came to Witigis. They announced that five hundred thousand armed men were about to cross into Italy and offered the liberation of the siege and the destruction of Belisarius if the Goths were willing to receive the Franks into a partnership in the dominion of Italy.

Belisarius, however, perceiving that ambassadors of the Franks had come to Witigis, immediately sent his own ambassadors to Ravenna. They offered concord between the Goths and the Roman emperor and, by recalling the faithlessness of the Franks, sought to cast the Goths away from their alliance.

Therefore, after hearing on each side the ambassadors of the Franks and of Belisarius, the Goths deliberated about what would be best. After a long dispute they preferred concord with the emperor. The result of the matters discussed was that all controversies should be delegated to the judgment of Emperor Justinian. Ambassadors were sent to Justinian for the sake of this affair, and a certain truce was established between the besiegers and the besieged.

Meanwhile, it happened that the public granaries at Ravenna were burned with all the grain. This affair brought the Goths into the greatest difficulties, since the grain had been consumed by fire and Belisarius did not allow more to be brought in.

During this time very many of the Goths who inhabited the Alps surrendered themselves to Belisarius. For the Alps divide Gaul from Italy, rise to a marvelous height, and have most difficult approaches. Sifigis, one of the Gothic nobles who possessed certain fortresses in the Alps, was the first of all voluntarily to receive the soldiers of Belisarius sent to those places, and he persuaded other fortresses to do the same.

During the same time, although Uraias gathered an army so that he might proceed to Ravenna, the Goths who were with him deserted his camp and went over as deserters to the soldiers of Belisarius. Thus Uraias, abandoned by his men, returned with a few into Gaul.

Meanwhile ambassadors came from Emperor Justinian, bearing Justinian's answer to the things that Witigis and the Goths had requested concerning concord. The substance of Justinian's decision was this: Witigis should retain in place all things beyond the Po, but should surrender everything on this side of the Po; he should hand over to the emperor half of the royal monies and retain the remaining part; and all the Goths who dwelt on this side of the Po should be subject to the Roman Empire.

The ambassadors therefore spoke first with Belisarius. Then, entering Ravenna, they explained their instructions. These were heard and approved with joyful minds by Witigis and the other Gothic nobles. Belisarius, however, heard them with grief, being indignant within himself and bearing it heavily that, although he could have a complete victory over the Goths, it was being taken away from him.

Accordingly, when the ambassadors returned a little afterward and requested his acknowledgment and subscription, he was unwilling to subscribe. At last Belisarius promised that he would do all the things Emperor Justinian had written when he was at Ravenna before Witigis and the other Gothic nobles, although he was turning over things far different in his mind.

When matters had thus been conducted, Belisarius was invited into the city of Ravenna by the willing Goths. He, after equipping the army and preparing a fleet that carried supplies of every kind in abundance, entered Ravenna amid the great rejoicing of the Goths and of the army.

Since the forces of the Goths were immense, Belisarius, wishing to diminish them, a few days after his entrance gave leave to all who dwelt on this side of the Po to return home. Wearied by long military service, they returned most willingly to their people. Thus, after the multitude of Goths at Ravenna had been diminished, the army of Belisarius remained within the walls of Ravenna far more powerful and plainly dominant.

After these things had been accomplished, the Gothic nobles who were anywhere throughout Italy either came themselves to Belisarius at Ravenna or sent their ambassadors. But because the acceptance of the kingdom by Belisarius was delayed, and this affair produced first wonder and afterward suspicion, the recall of Belisarius made by Emperor Justinian increased the suspicion.

For a report had become frequent, and certain persons had reported, that Belisarius was aspiring to the kingdom of Italy and had already fully accepted it. Moved by this, Justinian immediately recalled him from Italy to himself. When the Goths perceived this, at first they could by no means persuade themselves that he was going to return to Emperor Justinian. But after they saw preparations being made and all the things being arranged that it was proper to make for his departure, they recognized that they had been deceived and plainly circumvented by Belisarius.

But they did not know what they should do. For he held Ravenna and the Gothic nobles in his power, so that not even their complaints could be free.

The Goths who were beyond the Po, however, when they perceived this, assembled at Pavia and, after complaining much among themselves concerning the common calamity of the nation and the fraud of Belisarius, at last wished to establish Uraias as their king. He did not permit this, excusing himself especially by this argument: that, since he was the brother's son of Witigis, he would appear to act neither piously nor honorably if he seemed to assume the kingdom while Witigis was alive.

Excusing himself by this plausible argument, he was the author of the proposal that Ildovadus should be established as king, a man of great authority and great power among the Goths who had long ruled at Verona. Therefore, having been summoned from the city of Verona to Pavia and clothed in purple, Ildovadus was called king of the Goths and was commanded to consider the salvation of his nation.

Ildovadus, therefore, having been made king of the Goths, immediately sent ambassadors to Belisarius at Ravenna. Recalling the promise he had formerly made concerning accepting the kingdom of Italy and the Goths, they openly accused him of a failure of faith and complained that the Goths had been deceived by him through that fraud.

Accordingly, if he were still willing to fulfill his promises and become king, he should show it in deed: Ildovadus offered that he would come to Ravenna and place the purple at his feet. But if he wished rather to be the servant of Emperor Justinian than himself to rule, he should not bear it heavily if Ildovadus and the Goths who remained strove to provide for the common safety of their nation. This was the substance of the speech.

Belisarius answered this openly: that while Emperor Justinian lived, he would never accept a kingdom. With this answer the ambassadors returned to Ildovadus at Pavia.

Belisarius then, after preparing the fleet, sailed with Witigis, the other Gothic nobles, and the king's treasures to Byzantium—that is, Naples [read: Byzantium—that is, Constantinople]—in the fifth year after he had begun to wage war in Italy.

VII. Belisarius

This Belisarius, to omit his knowledge of military affairs, in which he surpassed all the men of his age, was a man of the highest humanity, through which he made himself accessible to poor and wealthy alike. Access to him was easy and free for every kind of person.

Moreover, his liberality was marvelous. To soldiers who had lost horses, bows, or arms without cowardice he immediately gave others. He had so great a care for country people that, when leading the army, he permitted none of them to be violated and no losses to be inflicted upon anyone. His soldiers did not dare to touch even the apples hanging upon the trees.

By that severity of discipline he brought it about that his camp was more abundant than any market in a city. So free and secure was the importation of things for sale. No one can relate worthily enough his restraint toward allied and friendly cities and his very great benefits to cities. No acts of oppression were ever heard of.

When Belisarius came to Byzantium, he was held in great honor and received with great rejoicing by Emperor Justinian, and he removed every suspicion that had previously been held concerning him. The Goths whom he had brought with him were also received kindly and humanely and were looked upon with a certain admiration. Nor was this without merit. For there was Witigis, king of the Goths, and his wife, the granddaughter of the late King Theodoric, who had possessed Italy. There were besides the two sons of Ildovadus, whom Belisarius had found at Ravenna in the keeping of Witigis and had not released, but had brought with him into Greece. There were also other Gothic nobles.

They marveled at the valor of Belisarius, who had accomplished such great things, raising him to heaven with praises because he had recently brought Africa and now Italy under the empire of Justinian.

Title XII, Chapter V

After the departure of Belisarius, by Justinian's command the government in Italy remained with John, Bessas, and Vitalis. Constantianus also came from Dalmatia and was himself added to the number of governors.

It immediately became apparent how greatly the government of these men differed from that of Belisarius. For when they succeeded to the government, they were his equals neither in humanity, nor in valor, nor in abstention from plunder. They themselves pursued plunder and booty and permitted the soldiers to rush into every license. They were proud indeed toward the allies, but excessively fierce against the enemies. Thus in a short time affairs began to turn backward and tend toward ruin.

Ildovadus, however, newly established as king of the Goths after the departure of Belisarius, prosecuted affairs with the greatest diligence. He commanded all the Goths and the Italians who agreed with them to take up arms and assemble at Pavia on the prescribed day. At the beginning the army with him was indeed small, but, continually increasing and daily assuming a better hope, it was filled by a multitude of Italians and Goths.

The avarice and injustice of Justinian's soldiers assisted the Gothic side to no small degree. For collectors of monies, sent into Italy by Justinian in the name of the treasury, began to vex the peoples with marvelous harshness and to compel them to payment of monies not owed. By this affair they brought so great a despair publicly upon the cities that they desired even the Goths to become their lords. Many voluntarily proceeded to Ildovadus and increased his army, so that he received into his power all the cities of the Venetians beyond the Po.

For this reason, not long afterward he did not hesitate to lead his men into battle and try the fortune of combat. This battle was fought not far from Tarvisium against Vitalis, who was one of Justinian's commanders. Victorious, Ildovadus cut down the army of Vitalis with so great a slaughter that, while Vitalis himself escaped with a few, all the others were either killed by the Goths or led away captive.

Through this great and illustrious victory the spirits of the Goths increased to an incredible degree. So great did the forces of the adversaries become that the Gothic cause was strengthened not only beyond the Po throughout Gaul and the Venetian territories, but also on this side of the Po. The name of Ildovadus became celebrated before Emperor Justinian and the other nations.

Not long afterward Ildovadus persecuted Uraias, the greatest man among the Goths, after suspicion had been raised that he agreed with the enemies. This was put forward as the cause, but the truer cause was that the power of Uraias was suspect to King Ildovadus; and therefore he commanded him to be killed.

Very many of the Goths disapproved of his death and openly detested it as a criminal and impious affair. Accordingly Ildovadus himself was killed at the villa by one of his bodyguards while he was dining at a banquet. Atharicus was created king in his place [i.e., Eraric was created king in his place]. He himself did not reign long, but because of his evil and inept government he was killed by the Goths in the fifth month after his election. Thus two kings were killed within two years.

Totilas, therefore, after Atharicus, was made king of the Goths by their great consent. Before he was made king he had ruled Tarvisium, which is a city of the Venetians. His father had been the full brother of King Ildovadus.

Therefore, when Ildovadus had been killed, Totilas himself, fearing on account of his kinship with him, secretly sent to Ravenna and entered into an agreement with Justinian's commanders that he would cross over to the enemies with all who were with him. When a day had been set at Tarvisium for carrying out the affair, and it had not yet come, the Goths, led by repentance because they had rejoiced in the death of Ildovadus and had created Atharicus king—a man by no means of such worth that he could defend the Gothic nation against so great a force of enemies—began to look to Totilas, the kinsman of Ildovadus, and desire him as king.

This was the Totilas whom some, on account of the savagery of the slaughters inflicted, as will be said, called a certain scourge of God, as they also called another man, Attila, who was king of the Huns and lived one hundred years earlier. This Totilas, king of the Goths, was indeed a Goth by race, but was born and raised in Italy.

Emperor Justinian, when he learned the things that had happened in Italy, reproached the inexperience and sloth of his commanders because, amid so great dissensions among the enemies and so great revolutions, although they had obtained an opportunity for conducting affairs, they had accomplished nothing advantageous.

Moved by these reproaches, all the commanders assembled together at Ravenna. While they deliberated there about making war, it pleased them before all things to lead the army to the city of Verona, for a certain hope of taking that city was secretly being offered to them. These commanders were eleven. The principal among them were regarded as Constantianus and Alexander, who had recently been sent into Italy by Justinian to collect monies.

Having set out with immense forces, when they approached Verona they determined to test the hope previously given to them. There was a certain Marcianus, a man noble at home, who possessed a fortress not far from Verona. He favored the emperor's side in spirit and had induced the guardian of one of the gates to introduce the emperor's army.

The secret affair having thus been arranged, when the army arrived there, Artabazes the Armenian was sent ahead with a band of chosen soldiers, so that he might first take the gate and await the remaining forces. Nothing of the things promised failed in that place. For when the soldiers came to the gate in the dead of night, the traitor opened it and received them within the city. Having entered the gate and taken the walls over it, they gave a signal to the army.

The Goths, perceiving that enemies were in the city, fled through a different gate. The commanders, hearing that the gate had been taken by their men, indeed entered immediately [read: set out immediately]; but before they came into the city they halted five miles from it, disputing among themselves concerning the booty.

Meanwhile day shone forth. A citadel overhangs the city of Verona, from which there is a view for a long distance within and outside the city. The Goths who had fled into the citadel, seeing that there were few enemies within the city and that the army was outside the city and did not approach the walls, suddenly made an attack from the citadel, overran the city, recovered the gate that was being held by the enemies, and closed it.

The soldiers who had entered by night, partly taking refuge upon the walls, fought back from above. When the commanders arrived a little afterward and found the gate closed, although the soldiers who were within called them and begged them not to abandon them, they nevertheless immediately departed. Part of the soldiers escaped by lowering themselves from the wall; among their number was Artabazes the Armenian, their commander. The others were killed. In this manner the affair at the city of Verona perished through the wickedness and avarice of the commanders.

After this, because the undertaking at Verona had escaped shamefully and disgracefully from them, Emperor Justinian's commanders departed from those places. Crossing the River Po, they proceeded to Placentia.

Totilas was staying at Pavia during this time. When he learned of the arrival of the enemies, he rapidly gathered whatever forces he could. Meanwhile Justinian's commanders advanced beyond Placentia and made camp beside the bank of the Po. Although Totilas was very unequal to them, he nevertheless resolved to go out against them with the forces he possessed and to make trial of the fortune of battle.

When the camps were near one another and it had pleased both sides to decide the battle, during the night Totilas sent ahead part of the horsemen. He commanded them to cross the river about twenty stadia beyond the enemy camp and, when battle had begun, to attack the rear of the enemies with as great a tumult as they could.

When the time came, he himself led the army against the enemies. Justinian's commanders did the same. The battle lines therefore met together and entered upon a most bitter battle, and every experience of the sword was exercised in that contest. When the battle burned most fiercely and the fighting was most ardent on both sides, with victory not yet inclining to either side, the horsemen of Totilas, having crossed the river, attacked the rear of Justinian's commanders.

The greater tumult that arose from this, since they were believed to be a mighty multitude, first disturbed Justinian's army and soon turned it to flight. For, their ranks having been dissolved, when they saw enemies standing before and behind them, they were quickly scattered. Many were killed by the pursuing Goths, and many also escaped by casting themselves through every pathless place. There was an immense multitude of captives; and, what had never happened before, all the military standards of the emperor's army were captured in battle by the enemies and carried back to Totilas.

This was an outstanding victory for Totilas, who had entered battle with a smaller force against a greater. Nevertheless, he used this victory most humanely, inflicting trouble upon none of the captives and even releasing many freely. This humanity greatly increased his fame.

Not long after obtaining the victory, Totilas, now conceiving greater things in spirit, sent an army into Etruria. He placed over this army three of the most distinguished Goths: Beldas, Rodericus, and Uliaris.

There was in Etruria one of the commanders who had been present in the recent battle and who afterward had never ceased to restore his forces and fortify towns. When the army of Totilas came upon him, he was surrounded by the enemies and besieged within the walls of Florence. A failure of the grain supply terrified Justinus. For nothing could be brought in to the besieged, and it appeared that what grain was within would shortly fail.

Sending to the other commanders at Ravenna, Justinus showed the danger in which the affair stood and asked them to bring him aid. Warned by this messenger, Bessas, Cyprianus, and John came into Etruria with their forces. When the Goths learned that they were approaching, they immediately dissolved the siege, moved their camp backward, and, having traveled the journey of one day, halted in a place called Mucellium.

After Justinian's army came to Florence, it pleased the commanders that, leaving a few as a garrison of Florence, they should contend against the enemy. When John first reached them and directed the battle line of his men toward the mountains, while the enemies fought back most strongly from the higher places, it happened that a certain soldier beside him was pierced through by a javelin and died. There was a false belief that John had been killed.

Flight began from this, and there was no measure in the flight. Scattered and dispersed, they went away in different directions. Thus the commanders themselves, driven by no enemies, were compelled to take flight. Nor after this did they assemble as one; rather, each held towns in different places according as he recovered himself from the flight.

The Goths nevertheless did not return to the siege of Florence, being frightened by the greatness of the forces that remained dispersed throughout the towns of Etruria; and winter came upon them.

Some say that Totilas entered Florence and, after a great slaughter of human beings, plunder, and fire had been committed there, left it virtually desolate; hence for some time it remained as though abandoned and uninhabited. At that time, however, it had a small circuit and a limited territory. Nevertheless, the assertion that Totilas thus devastated it, as Leonardus of Arezzo says, is not very authoritative.

I. Totilas's Campaigns and the Siege of Naples

Totilas, however, as soon as it was time to lead out the forces, gathered the army and came into the Gallic territory. There he besieged Caesena and the town of Petra, which by a corruption is commonly called Bertinorum, and took many other towns of that region either by force or by agreement.

When these things had been accomplished throughout those places and he found all things more prosperous, he resolved by no means to waste time there. Thus, crossing the River Tiber, by which Etruria is bounded, he proceeded through the Umbrians, Sabines, and Marsians into Campania. In these places, after Beneventum had been captured, he stripped it of its walls. He did not wish the enemies to have a seat of war in so strongly fortified a city if it should ever happen.

He then besieged Naples and strove greatly that the Neapolitans should prefer his friendship to his enmity. But Conon, Justinian's commander, was in the garrison of that city and possessed no fewer than one thousand soldiers. Accordingly, nothing could be decided freely in an assembly. When Totilas understood this, he placed his camp not far away and besieged the city. He did not, however, storm it, but remained quietly intent upon it.

Meanwhile, after sending part of the army, he took Cumae and certain other cities throughout those places, from which he obtained a great quantity of money. It also happened that certain women of the Roman nobility were captured in these places. Totilas commanded that all of them, preserved with the greatest benevolence, should be free, and sent them back to their parents and husbands with an honorable escort.

Since throughout these regions there was neither a commander nor an army to resist the attempts of Totilas, by continually sending part of his forces he brought Apulia, Lucania, and Calabria, together with all their towns, into his power. From this it came about that no further monies were paid to Justinian's commanders, and this affair caused great difficulty for the enemies.

For when money was lacking for Justinian's soldiers and their stipends were not paid, they wished neither to obey the commanders nor to go upon expeditions, but, shut within the towns, they plundered the possessions of their friends. They defiled everything with plunder and evil deeds. The commanders also, remaining within the walls because of these difficulties, defended only the towns from the enemies.

Dividing the cities among themselves, John governed Rome; Bessas, Spoletum; Cyprianus, Perusia; Justinus, Florence; and Constantianus, Ravenna.

Meanwhile Totilas besieged Naples more harshly and, after preparing a fleet, permitted nothing to be brought in either by sea or by land. From this it was evident that, unless someone brought aid, the city would at last come into the hands of the enemies.

Emperor Justinian, hearing the aforesaid things and grieving over so great disasters of Italy and over the disgrace of the empire, sent Maximus, the praetorian prefect, to correct and restore affairs in Italy. He gave him a fleet and an army from the Thracians and Armenians.

Maximus therefore set out from Byzantium and came into Epirus. There, when he considered the affairs of Italy from close by, being doubtful between hope and fear, he lost time through delay and idleness. For Maximus was a good man and not suited to the business of peace, but he was entirely inexperienced in war and, on this account, timid, delaying in all things, and exceedingly doubtful.

Since Maximus brought very little hope concerning himself, Justinian sent a certain Demetrius, who had formerly served in Italy under Belisarius, with another fleet into Sicily. When he had sailed into Sicily and heard of the siege of Naples, he resolved to bring aid immediately.

But since he despaired of accomplishing this by a direct route, because neither his fleet nor his army was sufficient to resist the besiegers, he sought Rome so that, after taking soldiers from there, he might fill the ships. But the soldiers who were at Rome were unwilling to board the fleet. For, having been defeated by the Goths in two battles, they greatly feared to proceed against the enemies.

Thus, with hope failing, Demetrius was compelled to proceed to extreme measures against the enemies. When he began to approach Naples, a commander of Totilas suddenly came upon him with swift ships and unexpectedly turned the fleet of Demetrius to flight. The Goths pursued them with their ships and, after a great slaughter, captured the armed vessel of Demetrius. Demetrius, commander of the fleet, and a few men escaped by leaping into skiffs.

After this Maximus sailed into Sicily with a larger fleet. When he arrived at Syracuse, through the same cowardice as before he lost time by delaying. When commands and threats from Justinian came upon him, not even because of these did he sustain the voyage against the enemies; rather, he entrusted the fleet to Demetrius, Herodianus, and Phases to be led, while he himself remained in Sicily.

It was already plainly winter when they began to sail. When they came to Naples, a storm suddenly arose and seized the fleet. It could be resisted neither with oars nor by any art, but drove them to the very shore where the camps of the enemies stood. Thus the Goths captured the ships, killed any who resisted, and led the others away captive. Demetrius himself was among their number. Herodianus and Phases, although they too had been captured, were preserved by a certain chance.

Totilas commanded Demetrius in chains to be brought to the walls of the city of Naples. There, after Conon the commander, the soldiers, and the Neapolitan citizens had been summoned, Demetrius spoke words of this kind and persuaded them to expect no further aid, since two fleets together with their fighters had been lost.

The besieged, already long wasted by hunger, when they saw Demetrius captured and every hope removed, turned to weeping and lamentation and did not know what they should do.

Totilas then addressed words of the following kind to the Neapolitan people and Justinian's soldiers: “Although, alone among all the Italians, being unwilling and fighting, you ought to be punished together with our enemies, nevertheless we desire to render benefits to you rather than vengeance, and we shall not be harsh even toward our enemies who are with you in the city. For we shall give them the opportunity either to serve as soldiers with us upon equal right with the other soldiers or to depart with all their possessions, whichever they wish. We are prepared also to confirm these things by oath.”

The Neapolitans and soldiers praised the speech of Totilas. Nevertheless, so that the surrender might be more honorable, they sought a truce of thirty days, in which it might be seen whether any aid would arrive. To this Totilas answered that he would grant them a space not only of thirty days but of three times thirty days.

The besieged, marveling at this liberality and clearly perceiving that there was no hope of aid, opened the gates within a few days and received Totilas and his army within the walls.

After entering Naples, he did evil to no one and was troublesome to none. Indeed, he used so great humanity that it seemed scarcely possible. For because many, their strength failing on account of lack of food, were sick, lest a sudden abundance of food taken immoderately bring danger upon them, he provided with the greatest care and diligence that food should be given at a fixed weight twice a day not only to the Neapolitan citizens but also to the soldiers. It was most diligently observed that they should take no more from it, and that on each day a little more should be added.

He furnished ships to Conon and his soldiers when they wished to depart. Totilas therefore used this humanity toward strangers. Toward his own men, however, he preserved so great a severity of discipline that he permitted no deed to go unpunished. For a robber and a violator the penalty was death and confiscation of goods; and those goods were handed over to the person who had suffered the violence. Thus the camps of the Goths and their entrances through friendly cities and nations were free from every crime.

II

During this same time the condition of the commanders of Emperor Justinian was entirely different. For the commanders themselves were neither abstinent, and the soldiers, having been drawn into every license, restrained themselves from no evil deed. Nor was anything more miserable in those times than the peoples of Italy who obeyed the emperor, since outside the walls they were plundered by the enemies, but within the walls by the soldiers. For the commanders, holding fortified citadels, cared nothing about the wrongs of their subjects.

Justinian therefore, compelled by these crimes, since despair followed more and more each day, turned his mind and spirit once again to Belisarius. For the other commanders seemed not merely unable to recover the things lost, but unable even to defend any longer the very things they held. For these reasons, therefore, Belisarius was again chosen for the charge of the Italian war, although during the intervening time he had waged war against the Medes and that war had not yet been fully ended.

Since it was necessary to enlist new soldiers, for he had left his old army near the Euphrates, Belisarius traveled throughout all Thrace and, lavishly distributing money, gathered nearly four thousand volunteer soldiers. Having placed them upon a fleet, together with Vitalis, prefect of Illyricum, who had lately come from Italy, he sailed. At length, after crossing the Ionian Sea, he landed at Salonae. On this very voyage he freed Hydruntum, a town of Calabria, from the siege of the Goths. He then sailed to Pola and at last arrived at Ravenna with the whole fleet.

At his arrival he found everything throughout Italy worse than his expectation. For the enemies everywhere seemed to prevail and to be in the best hope, while the allies everywhere throughout Italy were broken and brought to despair: the cities and peoples because of the wrongs of the soldiers; and the soldiers themselves, because much was owed to them by the emperor and no stipends were paid, were rebellious and hostile, and wished neither to obey the commanders nor to go out upon an expedition. They had also been reduced to a very small number.

The arrival of Belisarius likewise increased their despair. For although he was held to be an excellent commander and without dispute the foremost one, he nevertheless had brought forces greatly to be despised: four thousand recruits, but no money that might be given to the soldiers. Therefore, when at last he addressed them at Ravenna concerning undertaking the war, neither did the townsmen hear him with a joyful spirit nor did they give any signs of joy or good hope.

Finally Belisarius himself began to repent that he had come into Italy, especially since Totilas had greater forces obedient to him and had received Tibur into his power. Tibur, moreover, overhangs Rome and is distant from it no more than sixteen miles.

At last, after sending John, the son of Vitalianus, to Justinian, through him he showed the condition of Italy and at the same time wrote a letter containing this substance:

“You have sent me into Italy, most excellent emperor, destitute of men, horses, and money, which I both showed and declared repeatedly even before I departed from you. But it was an impiety not to obey your command. For we have been compelled to lead with us very few Thracian and Illyrian soldiers, and those recruits inexperienced in wars and not even knowing how to hold arms.

“The veterans whom we have found throughout Italy, having already been defeated in certain battles, so fear the victorious Goths that they can scarcely endure even the sight of them. Having long been defrauded of their stipends, they have been able to replace neither the horses nor the arms lately lost. They do not consent to go upon an expedition without these, nor anywhere are the forces so great that they can encounter the forces of the enemies without manifest destruction. For the greatest part of those who fought in Italy under your name have of their own accord crossed over to the enemies because of the disadvantages that we have recalled.

“We have no hope, moreover, that any revenues of money will come to us from Italy, since it is occupied in great part by the enemies, and the part that remains is so exhausted and afflicted by war that it can pay tribute in no manner. If, therefore, it was sufficient that Belisarius be sent into Italy, it has been most excellently provided for by you, for I am in Italy. But if you wish to overcome the enemies, other things must be provided by you. For a commander of war without those things that are suitable can accomplish nothing.

“Therefore it is necessary that you send here, above all, forces of my own soldiers; then an immense multitude of Huns and other barbarians. Besides this, it is necessary that this be provided by you: that monies be present. For without them nothing can suitably be done in war.”

These things were then written by Belisarius.

John therefore set out for Justinian with these instructions and, having remained for a certain time, made progress only slowly and anxiously.

Meanwhile Totilas, when no one brought aid to the besieged, received Firmum and Asculum by agreement. Then, proceeding from the Picene territory into Umbria, he besieged Assisi and Spoletum and received them within a few days. Totilas then led his army to Perusia. Cyprianus, Justinian's commander, was over Perusia. After Totilas had caused him to be killed through Ulianus, his armor-bearer, corrupted with money, the soldiers nevertheless pursued Ulianus after the death of Cyprianus and defended the city excellently. Therefore Totilas, unwilling to remain there for long, dissolved the siege of Perusia and hastened to seek Rome.

III

Meanwhile, when King Totilas had heard that Saint Benedict, a man of God, possessed the spirit of prophecy, as he proceeded toward his monastery he halted a little farther away and announced to him that he would come. When a message had immediately been sent from the monastery that he should come, Totilas, according to the perfidy of his mind, attempted to examine whether the man of God possessed the spirit of prophecy.

One of his sword-bearers was called Rigo. Totilas gave him his shoes, caused him to be clothed in royal garments, and commanded him to go to the monastery in his person. In attendance upon him he sent three counts who were accustomed to adhere to Totilas before the others, so that, walking beside him before the eyes of the servant of God, they might pretend that he was King Totilas.

Thus Rigo, adorned as a king by garments and attendants, approached. When the man of God perceived him coming from afar, he cried out, saying, “Son, put down what you are carrying, for it is not yours.” Rigo immediately fell to the ground in terror. Then those who had come with him were cast down upon the ground. Rising, they did not presume to approach the man of God, but returned to their king and reported with what speed they had been detected.

Then Totilas himself approached him, as Gregory writes in the second book of the Dialogues, relating these things. When he saw him sitting from afar, he did not dare to approach but cast himself upon the ground. Although the man of God twice and three times said to him, “Rise,” and he did not dare to raise himself before him, Benedict, the servant of Jesus Christ, deigned himself to raise the prostrate king from the ground.

He both reproved him concerning his deeds and in a few words foretold all the things that would happen to him, saying: “You do many evil things; you have done many. Now at last restrain yourself from iniquity. Indeed, you are going to enter Rome; you are going to cross the sea; you will reign nine years; in the tenth you will die.” Terrified by these things that he had heard, the king sought prayer and departed; and from that time onward he was less cruel.

After Totilas departed from the holy man, when he had come to Rome he surrounded it at suitable places. Nevertheless, he was not troublesome to the country people. For throughout this whole war Totilas did not permit farmers and cultivators to be harmed by his soldiers.

Belisarius had stationed Bessas, Conon, Artasiras, a Persian by race, and Barbation, a Thracian, as a garrison for Rome. When they went out from Rome against the Goths and first turned them to flight, at last, surrounded by the multitude of the Goths and having lost the greater part of their soldiers, they scarcely took refuge in the city.

From that time famine also followed; and nothing could be brought in either by sea or by land, since a fleet had long since been prepared for the siege. Totilas also made a bridge over the Tiber with a wooden tower from each bank of the river, and thus the passage was guarded.

Meanwhile Vigilius, the Roman pontiff, then dwelling in Sicily, when he learned that the Roman people were oppressed by famine, sent to Rome a great quantity of grain placed upon ships. The Goths, however, knowing this, came beforehand into the harbor when the ships were already approaching and, hiding behind towers and buildings, set ambushes. At last all the ships were captured by the Goths lying in ambush, to the utmost despair of the Roman people, who depended so greatly upon the expectation of this grain.

A certain deacon Pelagius was in Rome during the same time. In this difficulty of famine he had bestowed many and very great works of piety upon the Roman people, distributing money and relieving the need of individuals. On account of this liberality his name, already illustrious, became great. The Romans therefore came to him and humbly requested that for the safety of the Roman people he should set out as an ambassador to Totilas, to seek a truce of a few days and promise the surrender of the city if aid did not arrive within those days.

Pelagius, because it was necessary, obeyed the people. He came with these instructions into the camp to Totilas. Totilas had suspected by conjecture that this very thing would occur, for he had learned from deserters the extreme difficulty of the besieged. He received Pelagius when he came to him with honor.

But before Pelagius explained his instructions, Totilas himself forestalled him and inveighed against the Romans in a long and bitter speech, reproaching them in turn with the benefits of Theodoric toward the Romans and censuring the perfidy of the Romans toward the Goths. At the end he concluded that there was no way of conference or agreement unless, after the walls had been destroyed, they committed themselves and their possessions to the judgment and power of the Goths, to suffer those laws that the victor should deliver.

Hearing this bitterness and insult of speech, Pelagius judged that he ought not to persist further with him. He said: “Since you, Totilas, have not endured to hear the voice of an ambassador, but by anticipating it have cut off every way of conference, we flee to God, who is accustomed by his judgment to cast down the proud and excessively exalted minds of men." Having spoken these things, he returned immediately to the city.

When the Romans saw that Pelagius had returned with the matter unaccomplished, they knew neither what they should do nor where they should turn. On one side an intolerable famine pressed them; on the other the cruelty of Totilas and the Goths was before their eyes. They resolved rather to die through lack of food than to fall into the most savage hands of the Goths.

While Totilas thus besieged Rome, he sent another army to take Placentia. That alone of the cities of that region remained on Justinian's side.

Belisarius, exceedingly anxious concerning the danger of the city of Rome and unable to bring aid from Ravenna, determined to bring aid by another route. Therefore, leaving Justinus at Ravenna with a band of soldiers, he himself set out through Dalmatia to Dyrrachium. There he awaited the forces that were to come from the emperor.

Meanwhile Emperor Justinian sent John with an army to Belisarius, although not with great forces; but he was preparing to send greater ones in the following spring. For this purpose he had sent Narses the chamberlain to the Heruli and to certain barbarian nations dwelling around the Ister.

When the forces had therefore arrived at Dyrrachium, Belisarius and John, deliberating concerning the conduct of the war, came to this decision: that they should relieve the necessities of the Roman people. Belisarius accordingly set out from Dyrrachium with the fleet and reached Hydruntum. The Goths besieging Hydruntum dissolved the siege, fleeing before Belisarius and protecting themselves at Brundisium.

When Totilas heard of the arrival of Belisarius, he prepared to set out against him. But Belisarius, undertaking the journey by sea, reached the Roman harbor. When the Romans heard of his arrival, they endured all difficulties with better hope.

IV

John, however, after the departure of Belisarius from Dyrrachium, crossed the strait and attacked the Goths, who suspected no such thing. Turning them to flight and pursuing them with great slaughter, he took Brundisium. Having won the peoples of Calabria over to himself and brought them to goodwill toward Justinian, he came from Brundisium to the city of Cammisium and brought that town into his power. Not far from Cammisium is the village Cannae, in which that memorable battle between Hannibal and the Romans is related to have occurred.

Then, abandoning the journey to Belisarius, John turned his march with the army into the territories of the Bruttians and Lucanians. At the first attack he routed Ricomundus, the commander of the Goths; and, after a great part of the forces had been slain, he received the rest together with their commander in surrender. From this time all the Lucanians and Bruttians, defecting from the Goths, followed the imperial side.

Meanwhile Belisarius, waiting continually, was consumed by incredible grief. He condemned the inactivity of John, and had cast away his plan of seeking Rome. Therefore Belisarius, fearing that the besieged Romans might think themselves abandoned and devise something adverse out of despair, resolved to bring aid by the Tiber. For he did not have forces so great that he could encounter the enemies by land. The river and his ingenuity offered him hope of reaching the city by water.

Rising to this plan, therefore, he prepared two hundred ships that they call cursariae. These are ships having wooden bulwarks on every side, pierced at suitable places for shooting arrows and other missiles against the enemies. When the fleet had therefore been constructed and prepared with soldiers, Belisarius himself entered one of those cursariae and led at the front; the others followed. A land army also went at the same time beside that bank on which the harbor stood.

Belisarius had also sent to Bessas at Rome that, after making a sortie at that time, he should terrify the enemies as greatly as possible. But Bessas performed neither this nor anything else useful during that siege.

When the fleet had come near the bridge that Totilas had made over the Tiber, although it was still far from the city, as was said above, a most severe battle arose there with Belisarius, the Goths attempting to defend the bridge and the soldiers of Belisarius to force it.

After Belisarius had caused the rafts upon which a tower stood to approach the tower of the bridge in which the Goths were fighting, from the higher position he caused burning pitch and sulfur to be cast upon the tower of the bridge. From this it was burned together with two hundred Goths who were in it. Thus, when the Goths turned their backs, they took the bridge and immediately cut it apart; and they were about to proceed to Rome with the whole fleet, with grain and other necessities.

But, by the hidden judgment of God disposing it so because of their demerits, an impediment arising by a marvelous accident not from the enemies but from their own men overturned everything. For the Goths held the city of Ostia, which is on the left bank of the Tiber beside the sea, while Portus was on the right.

When Belisarius therefore set out with the fleet, he left his wife and possessions in the city of Portus and placed Isaac, a brave and faithful man, over the town with a sufficiently large garrison of soldiers, commanding and adjuring him not to depart from the town in any event whatsoever, but to remain there and defend the town.

When Belisarius had burned the towers of the enemies, as was said, messengers immediately flew to the city of Portus and, reporting a great victory, extolled it even more greatly. Exulting with joy at this report and raising himself up in spirit as if mad, Isaac, forgetful of the commands of Belisarius, commanded the soldiers to take up arms. Carried away by ardor and impulse, he ran to attack the station of the enemies that was on the other bank not far from Ostia. He suddenly attacked the Goths and drove them off at the first assault.

But the enemies, gathering themselves a little afterward and encouraging one another, returned against Isaac; and, after a great part of the soldiers who were with him had been slain and his madness had been shaken off, they captured Isaac himself.

After these things had thus been done, certain men swiftly reported to Belisarius that Isaac had been captured. Struck by this report, Belisarius asked nothing further—neither where nor when—but received it as if the enemies had taken Portus and held his wife and all his possessions in their hands.

Accordingly he was immediately affected by so great a grief that he could not speak. Turning backward, he recalled the fleet and soldiers on their course, with the most fixed purpose either of recovering the town while matters were still recent and not yet made secure by the enemies, or of dying in battle. In this manner a victory already prepared for Belisarius was abandoned by him.

When he arrived at Portus, he learned that the town was safe and that he had been deceived by an error. He took from this so great a grief that, seized by sickness, he lay ill. A fever following immediately detained him in a long and dangerous illness.

Isaac, however, the cause of such great evils, was killed in chains by the command of Totilas, in vengeance for Rodericus, commander of the garrison, who had died from a wound received in battle. Totilas altogether changed that humanity which he had shown at the beginning of his reign into pride and cruelty, whether by the success of prosperity or because virtue, assumed at the beginning, could not be feigned for long.

He spoke so bitterly concerning the Roman people that perhaps this terror was the cause of their enduring famine more stubbornly. The famine was so great that the flesh of horses, asses, and mules was regarded as delicacies during that time at Rome. They also ate dogs, mice, and certain things of that kind. They fed upon herbs of every kind, even those that livestock do not touch, upon the roots of herbs, and upon the bark of trees.

But when the Romans heard the things that had happened to Belisarius, they despaired of aid and turned to tears. Some of their own accord ended their lives; others, hiding, strove during the night to deceive the stations of the enemies; want of food killed many within their own walls.

V. Concerning the Capture of the City by Totilas

While Rome was therefore in these calamities, four Isaurians entered into a plan to betray the city. These kept watch at the Caelimontane Gate, which is commonly called the Asinarian. After a rope had been lowered from the walls during the night, they descended by it; and, going to Totilas, promised to betray the city to him. He encouraged them to this, promising them many things.

Therefore soldiers sent by Totilas were received upon the walls by the Isaurians. Soon, descending from there to the gate and relying upon their axes, they opened the gates. Totilas, having entered the city in this manner, held the army at the gate while awaiting daylight.

A shout suddenly arising from that quarter signified that enemies were within the walls. Columns of those fleeing went out through other gates opposite their entrance. Many also of the nobility and common people fled to the churches.

When day had therefore come, the Goths ran throughout the whole city and killed whomever they found among the citizens without any selection. Totilas himself, moving from the Lateran toward the church of Saint Peter as if to discharge a vow, made his way through the city. Bands of the fiercest men crowded around him with drawn swords full of blood, killing whomever they met without any distinction.

When he came to the threshold of Saint Peter, the deacon Pelagius, fearing his presence, clothed in the solemn habit of religion and holding the Gospels of Christ in his hands, bent his knees and said, “Spare, O king, your suppliants.”

But Totilas, with an exceedingly proud expression and as though disdaining him, said, “Do you now come to supplicate me, Pelagius?” To this Pelagius said, “Now, when God has willed you to be my lord. Therefore have mercy, lord, upon your servants.”

From this Totilas, his anger now as if soothed, commanded that no one should be struck after this and that there should be an end to the license of swords and to slaughters. He also commanded that no freeborn woman—whether virgin, married woman, or widow—should be violated, and he strictly guarded this. He freely conceded only the goods of the Roman citizens as booty; he willed their persons to be free.

Wishing, moreover, to cast down the spirits of the Goths, which had been raised by victory, Totilas summoned them to an assembly on the following day and addressed them in this manner:

“Is there anyone among you, fellow soldiers, who, seeing the changes—so great as have happened during these years—does not fear the frailty of human affairs and does not find it difficult to perceive whence these changes come? I omit that Rome, once mistress of the lands of the world, has now come into your hands. For these are not older matters [read: For these are older matters], and the ruin of this city did not now begin for the first time. I prefer to recall your own affairs. What was more powerful at the beginning of this war than the nation of the Goths throughout Italy? It placed two hundred thousand fighting men in the field, furnished with arms, horses, resources, gold, and silver; it possessed all Italy together with Sicily, Corsica, Sardinia, and Dalmatia.

“Who would ever have thought that this very great power would have been overthrown by seven thousand Greeks—for no more than these entered Italy at the beginning? Yet, when the Greeks held everything and plainly ruled, who would have thought that you, very few and poor, would recover Italy against twenty thousand Greeks? At the beginning you scarcely mustered four thousand horsemen and held nothing throughout Italy except Pavia, Verona, and Tarvisium; now at last you have taken Rome, the head of affairs, which Witigis could not subdue with an army of two hundred thousand and a year-long siege.

“This is a very great thing, fellow soldiers, and worthy of no small admiration. But if I should wish to attend to the causes of these changes, they are most manifest. For as long as the Goths wished to cultivate justice and equity among themselves, their affairs and power flourished. But when the desire of possessing more drove them astray, then domestic seditions, internal slaughters, and clandestine betrayals produced ruin among them.

“Considering these things, therefore, you ought by no means to be proud in this victory of the city, but to fear God and dread the mutability of fortune. You should understand this also: all empires and powers are lost very easily unless they are preserved through justice, prudence, and industry. Know, therefore, fellow soldiers, that the greatest part of the labor remains for you in this matter. For it is more difficult to defend things acquired than to acquire them.”

In these words the Goths praised the wisdom of their king.

After this Totilas summoned the Romans to himself and censured their ingratitude and errors: that, although they had formerly been in the hands of Odoacer and the work of Theodoric and the Goths had freed them from his tyranny, they had received so many benefits that they had scarcely known how to desire so many, on account of which they had lived rich and blessed for many years. Yet at last, although they had received no wrong and no insult, they had acted against their pledged faith and oath and had turned to receiving the Greeks—most frivolous men and without any virtue—who, immediately besieged by Witigis, had never dared to advance into battle, but, shut within the walls and wasted by famine, had endured every disgrace.

Afterward, having been made masters of the cities not by arms but by treasons and deceits, they had filled everything with publicans, collectors, and informers. These had compelled the cities and peoples of Italy with marvelous harshness to pay those tributes that had already been condoned and remitted to them for many years by Theodoric and the other kings, so that they might fill the insatiable avarice of their emperors.

“Say, Romans,” he said, “whether you have ever suffered any evil from the Goths and their kings. Say again whether you have ever received any good from these petty Greeks, who have inflicted more evils upon you as friends than upon their enemies. They are a vicious and maleficent race, and effective in no matter more than in lying.

“But the Goths were born in Italy and were raised together with you; yet foreigners and men unknown to you pleased you more than your own countrymen and those known to you, to such a degree that you hated those whom you ought to have loved. Desiring new things, you are like horses that become restive through ease and excessive abundance. Therefore, acting against upright faith and against your own advantage, you have deservedly paid these penalties thus far and will continue to pay them.”

Having said these things, he dismissed the Romans without any good hope.

During these days the case of Rusticiana, a noblewoman, was heard. The Goths accused her of having caused the statues of King Theodoric to be broken and destroyed in vengeance for her husband Boethius and her father Symmachus, whom Theodoric had caused to be killed. What was alleged against the woman concerning the destroyed statues was thought to be true. But a just grief excused her, because it was established that those great men had been killed unjustly. For this reason Totilas absolved the woman and preserved her safe from the assault of the Goths.

Totilas then sent the deacon Pelagius and the Roman Theodorus to Emperor Justinian. The substance of his instructions to them was this: if the emperor wished to have Totilas himself and the Goths in friendship, he would preserve the city of Rome and would furnish great and faithful assistance in every expedition; but if he preferred to have war with the Goths, Totilas would raze Rome to the ground, because, being occupied in war, he could neither defend it nor leave it to the enemies.

He also wrote to Justinian in this manner:

“I know that you have learned all the things that have been done concerning the city of Rome. These are the reasons for which we send ambassadors to you. We desire both to receive and to offer the goods of peace, as lately there was peace between the Roman emperor Anastasius and King Theodoric. Their concord and peace produced tranquillity in those times and very great advantages for both.

“If, therefore, you are of his mind, I shall deservedly call you a father, and you will have me and the Goths as auxiliaries in every expedition. But if you are of another mind, you will learn from the ambassadors the things that follow.”

Having sent these ambassadors, Totilas remained at Rome until their return. Meanwhile Belisarius lay at Portus, exhausted by fever and grief of spirit. During this time John proceeded to make many new movements among the Lucanians and Bruttians; for this reason Totilas also was compelled to send into Lucania and renew the war.

Not long afterward Totilas was informed of Justinian's answer. It was nothing other than that Belisarius was in Italy, to whose power and judgment he had entrusted the affairs of Italy. After Totilas understood that what he had sought was denied to him, and, indignant at the deed of John because he had provoked him with war while he was at rest and awaiting the messengers sent for concord, he took counsel to destroy the city of Rome.

Therefore, rising with marvelous cruelty, he reduced the walls of Rome to the ground in several places. The part overthrown was almost a third of the entire circuit of the walls. He then burned the Capitol; around the Forum, the Subura, the Via, and the Sacred Way [read: the Subura and the Sacred Way], he burned everything. The Quirinal Hill smoked; the Aventine breathed out the flames of the fire. The crash of falling houses was heard everywhere.

Amid the fires the urban multitude was led out of its ancestral homes with wives and children, having indeed the freedom to bewail its miseries [read: not even having the freedom to bewail its miseries]. He dispersed the people and crowd throughout the towns of Campania, but retained the senators and patricians with him in the position of hostages. After this he departed from Rome with the whole army and left it completely desolate and empty, so that neither any man nor woman remained.

Thereafter he stationed part of the army against Portus, lest the soldiers of Belisarius be able to attempt anything during his absence; and he himself set out with the remaining forces against John in Calabria. John, however, perceiving this, fled and received himself into Hydruntum. When Totilas arrived in those parts, in a brief moment he recovered all the Lucanians and Bruttians except the people of Hydruntum.

He also received Spoletum at that time, after its walls had been overthrown; nevertheless, the citadel alone was guarded. At almost the same time Tarentum was rebuilt, although it had previously been deserted. The Calabrians and other peoples driven from home rebuilt it, not indeed to its former size, but a part of it. Thereafter, having brought the Lucanians and Bruttians into his power, Totilas hastened with his men to go to Ravenna.

VI. Belisarius

Meanwhile Belisarius, freed from his long fever, undertook to attempt a bold enterprise that many might have considered rash, although afterward it appeared magnanimous and praiseworthy. For he then determined to occupy the desolate city of Rome unexpectedly and to fortify it.

Concealing this plan within himself, therefore, and leaving a few soldiers at Portus as its garrison, he set out with all his remaining forces. With neither his own men nor the enemies suspecting it, he occupied Rome and caused it to be fortified with incredible speed. For in the part where the walls had been overthrown, he restored something of a wall by hurried work. He dug deep ditches before the walls. He placed wooden towers and battlements upon the restored wall for its protection.

Belisarius completed these things with the greatest willingness and labor of the soldiers in twenty-six days. Ships came frequently from Portus, bringing in grain and other necessities. When the Roman citizens who had been dispersed throughout the neighboring towns heard of the restoration of the city, they migrated back into their homeland with great desire, especially because an abundance of grain was held there.

When Totilas perceived these things, he left his other concerns and hastened to seek Rome. Belisarius had not yet been able to put gates upon the city when the enemies arrived and, after pitching camp, began to assault the city, while Belisarius resisted manfully with his men. At last the Goths were turned to flight, and Laocea, the standard-bearer of Totilas, was pierced through.

Totilas then approached Tibur with his men and received himself into it. The Romans, moreover, lest they be troubled by sudden incursions from that direction where Tibur lies, destroyed all the bridges of the River Anio. After the departure of the Goths Belisarius caused the gates of the city to be made at leisure, together with ironwork for closing them. He sent the keys of the city of Rome to Justinian in Greece.

Departing from Tibur, Totilas set out with his men for Perusia. That city had already previously been besieged by the Goths, so that he might press the siege more strongly, since grain and other necessities were already failing in the city.

When John heard that Totilas was occupied in the siege of Perusia, and that Totilas had left the senators and patricians of the city of Rome whom he had led away with him throughout the towns of Campania under guard of soldiers, he considered extending the fame of his name through their liberation. Moving, therefore, from Calabria with a chosen body of cavalry and interrupting his journey neither by day nor by night, he came into Campania.

It happened by chance that Gothic soldiers encountered John and his cavalry, and immediately a battle began between them. Prevailing in it, John killed many Goths, wounded very many, and turned them to flight. Thus, taking the Romans from the individual towns of Campania out of the hands of the Goths, he liberated them.

Totilas, greatly moved when he heard the things done by John, resolved to avenge himself. Leaving, therefore, part of his army in the siege of Perusia, he himself hastened with the remainder through the Picene territory, the Marsians, and the Paelignians into Apulia and Calabria. Finding John, he attacked him and routed him together with his whole army. He also took the camp, although no great slaughter was made by the Goths. This victory especially rendered the name of Totilas illustrious because of the speed of the journey.

Not long after that battle other forces of Justinian, sent into Italy, began to land at Hydruntum. For the emperor had been moved by the frequent letters of Belisarius, who, explaining the condition of the war, sought reinforcements. The leaders of the new forces were Valerianus, leader of the Armenians, and Verus, leader of the Heruli.

When Belisarius learned that the emperor's forces had reached Hydruntum, he immediately left Conon as governor and, carried from Rome by sea with nine hundred chosen soldiers, hastened to seek Calabria and to unite the forces at Tarentum, which is a journey of two days from Hydruntum.

But, with a storm opposing him, he reached the harbor of Croton. Landing the forces there, and because there was no fodder in those places, he commanded the horsemen to proceed farther, while he himself remained at Croton with his wife and the infantry so that he might summon John to himself with the other forces.

Ruscia is a fortress of the Turini [i.e., the people of Thurii]. Above it is another town, farther removed from the sea and situated in a difficult place, which they call Ruscida. John guarded that town with a garrison of soldiers.

When the horsemen of Belisarius had arrived there, it happened by chance that soldiers of the enemies came against them, whom Totilas had sent to make trial of that town. When battle was joined, the soldiers of Belisarius, although fewer in number, nevertheless easily prevailed and killed more than two hundred of the enemies.

But, remaining in those places as victors and wandering about, and staying far from the eyes of their commander, they observed neither order nor discipline and sent out no scouts. After Totilas learned this, he set out with three thousand horsemen and attacked them while they suspected nothing. From this a great slaughter and rout began. Phasas, performing marvelous works of valor with his troop of horsemen, at last fell together with his horsemen. Barbation, another commander of Belisarius, fled with only two companions; the others were captured or killed.

This disaster was reported to Belisarius by messengers who had taken flight. Therefore Belisarius, having lost his cavalry and suspecting that the enemies would come against him, hastily boarded the ships. Committing himself with great grief to the winds, he was carried on that same day to Messana in Sicily.

When Totilas had accomplished this and perceived that the forces of the enemies had been disturbed, he determined to besiege the town of Ruscianum. When necessities failed the besieged there, they sent to Totilas seeking pardon. He granted impunity to them all and permitted them to retain all their possessions if they wished to serve as soldiers with him. In this manner he received the town. He granted the goods of the townsmen to his soldiers and commanded their persons to be free.

Conon, the commander whom Belisarius had stationed at Rome, was killed by the angry soldiers. They were especially indignant because, having secretly entered into the grain trade, he increased the price of provisions daily. The same soldiers sought pardon for this offense from Justinian through ambassadors, asserting that, unless the emperor granted it and paid the stipends owed to them, they would hand Rome over to Totilas. Through this fear all things were granted to them.

Antonina, the wife of Belisarius, set out for Byzantium during this time so that she might ask Theodora, the wife of Justinian, for the recall of Belisarius from Italy. Therefore, through the agency of his wife Antonina, Belisarius was recalled by Justinian from Italy into Greece, and indeed easily, especially since a great fear of war against the Persians was present.

This occurred almost five years after he had set out from Greece into Italy; and he had proceeded in this last expedition supported by a fortune unlike that of the first. Departing from Rome, he left three thousand chosen soldiers as a garrison under the command and government of the legate Hesperogenes, a prudent man and one skilled in wars.

At last Perusia, after the departure of Belisarius, having been besieged for a long time by the Goths and at last lacking provisions, was taken by force and arms in the seventh year of the siege, in the year of the Lord 550, or thereabouts.

After the city was taken, the man who commanded the army sent to Totilas, asking what was to be done concerning the bishop and concerning that people. Totilas sent this command back to him, saying: “First remove a strap from the bishop, from the crown of his head as far as his heel; then cut off his head. Kill by the sword all the people who are found there.”

Then the commander led the venerable Herculanus, bishop of the city of Perusia—who had been brought from the religious life of a monastery to the grace of the priestly order and made bishop—upon the city wall and cut off his head. He then cut the skin of the man, now dead, from the crown of the head as far as the heel, so that a strap might appear to have been taken from his body. Soon afterward he cast his body outside the wall.

Then certain persons, compelled by a cause of humanity, placed the severed head against the neck and, together with a small infant who was found dead there, handed the body of the saint over to burial beside the wall.

When, forty days after that slaughter, King Totilas commanded that the citizens of that city who had been dispersed in any places should return to it without any fear, those who had fled from famine returned. Recalling how holy a life the bishop had led, they sought where his body had been buried so that they might bury it in the church of Saint Peter with the honor owed to it.

When the tomb had been opened, after the earth had been dug out, they found the body of the child, now dead for forty days, corrupted by decay and full of worms; but the body of the bishop was incorrupt, as if it had been buried in that same hour. And what is still marvelous and venerable: the head was so united to the body as if it had by no means been cut off, so that no traces of the cutting appeared.

When they turned it from one side to the other, seeking whether any mark of the incision could be found, nothing of that kind was discovered. Gregory relates these things concerning Saint Herculanus in the third book of the Dialogues.

VII. Totilas

Totilas, having dispatched affairs in Calabria and gathered forces from every side, came to Rome and besieged it. The departure of Belisarius from Italy gave him confidence. When the siege was prolonged, Roman envoys set out for Justinian, begging him to send Belisarius back to Italy to dissolve the siege. But by delaying and procrastinating he accomplished nothing.

The Goths, moreover, having taken the city of Portus so that nothing could be brought to the besieged by the Tiber, brought nearly all the neighboring towns into their power. But the Romans with all diligence caused grain to be sown within the city and in empty places, so that, when the old grain failed, the new crop grown within the city walls might succeed it. In this manner they endured the siege for a long time. At last they would have preserved the city, had not the betrayal of a few men overthrown them.

At the gate by which one goes on the Ostian Way to Saint Paul, there was a station of Isaurian soldiers. These approached Totilas and promised to hand that gate over to him. Totilas sent two small boats down into the Tiber and placed trumpeters in them, so that, sailing against the current of the river, they might suddenly emit as terrifying a blast of trumpets as possible. He himself, setting out with the army in silence, took his position at the aforesaid gate.

Then the Romans, terrified by the terrible sound, thought that the enemies were present from that direction, and a rush was made from every side to that place. While all ran together and neglected the other places, the traitors, left alone, broke open the gate and received Totilas and the Goths within the city.

Immediately a slaughter of Romans and soldiers began, and thought was given no longer to resistance but to flight. The commander Diogenes, because he saw that there were no remedies, departed from Rome with part of the soldiers and hastened to seek Centumcellae. Overcome on that journey by an ambush of the Goths, after losing a great part of his soldiers and being himself gravely wounded, he scarcely escaped.

Among the other leaders there was also a certain Paulus from Sicily, commander of a troop of horsemen. After he had entered several battles by night throughout the captured city, at last he withdrew with his horsemen to the Mole of Hadrian. At length, when daylight had arisen and the other places of the city had been taken, nevertheless there was most violent fighting at the Mole of Hadrian.

For Paulus had four hundred horsemen, with whom he defended the Mole and the bridge beside it excellently. Having remained there throughout that whole day and the following night without food, on the next day they deliberated what they should do. Paulus therefore spoke words of this kind to the soldiers:

“In whatever direction we turn, fellow soldiers, you see that the last extremities are upon us. For there is no opportunity of flight, since the forces of the enemies are poured around us and watch us diligently. To surrender to the Goths, beyond the shame and baseness of the counsel, holds out tortures and dismemberment. For the savagery of the barbarians is not accustomed to be content with a simple death.

“To endure in siege, moreover, and to feed upon horseflesh would perhaps belong to those who hoped that aid would come to them; but for us, who lack this hope, no reason can persuade this endurance, unless they prefer the vilest postponement of death or, like fearful boys, prefer to be consumed by pain rather than cut by the sword.

“I think that surrendering to the enemies and wasting away through lack of food belong to those who have neither blood nor heart. But by us, men brave of hand and not unaccustomed to battles, a glorious death must be embraced. Let us die in such a manner that, drenched in the blood of the enemies, we do not fall unavenged, and that the enemy does not laugh at our destruction but laments it.

“For what profit is the addition of a few years to us, since, even if preserved now, we shall nevertheless die a little afterward? Go therefore with me to a glorious death, which citizens and enemies alike will admire and will carry to heaven forever with praises.”

Inflamed by these words, the soldiers devoted themselves to death. Therefore, embracing and kissing one another, with the most certain purpose of dying, they prepared themselves for combat. Their plan was to rush upon the nearest station and, after making a very great slaughter of the enemies, to perish.

When Totilas saw that they were preparing themselves for the final extremity, fearing that the efforts of desperate men would bring a slaughter upon the Goths greater than their number, he sent a certain man to them as a seeker of peace and gave them a choice: whether they preferred to lay down their arms and horses and depart unharmed, or to retain everything and serve as soldiers with him.

When the soldiers heard these things, they rejoiced. At last they all chose to remain with Totilas except their commander Paulus and Mandus the Isaurian, whom Totilas, liberally assisted with journey-money and other things, sent back to Byzantium. Totilas also commanded that the other soldiers of the garrison, as many as had fled to sacred buildings, should remain unharmed.

At Rome he neither raged nor made it desolate as before, but most diligently recalled the citizens both from the towns of Campania and from other places. He presented at Rome equestrian games and the other works of magnificence that were customarily performed in tranquil cities, with distinguished preparation, so that the citizens might take up good hope and be drawn by desire for the city.

He also endeavored to repair the buildings either overthrown or consumed by fire in the former devastation. Finally, he gave as much attention to making Rome populous as he had previously shown to making it desolate, whether because of a vow to the apostles Peter and Paul, or because this was expedient for the utility of the war, or because he was moved by the infamy arising from a destruction of this kind.

Afterward Totilas prepared an expedition into Sicily, which he accomplished by means of a great fleet of long ships. He besieged Regium and took Tarentum. Crossing into Sicily, after he had obtained many smaller towns by force or agreement, he besieged Syracuse by sea and land.

During the same time the Goths who had been sent into the Picene territory against John and Valerianus took Ariminum. In another battle joined not far from Ravenna, they killed Verus, leader of the Heruli, with all his forces. Those who were besieged at the city of Regium, their provisions failing, surrendered themselves to the Goths.

VIII. Justinian

When all these things were reported to Emperor Justinian at one time, he announced that Germanus, his cousin, would lead the Italian and Gothic war, and he immediately commanded great preparations to be made. For Germanus was a man of lofty spirit and of no less counsel, distinguished in liberality and of the highest favor among peoples and soldiers. Added to these things was the fact that after the death of Witigis he had taken as wife Matasuntha, the granddaughter of Theodoric. This circumstance had reconciled to him much of the favor of the Goths.

But when Germanus was already in Illyricum, the nation of the Slavs, having crossed the Danube, invaded the provinces of the Roman Empire, a cruel and savage race of men. When they turned into Macedonia and Thrace, they brought so great a fear upon Justinian that he commanded Germanus to interrupt the journey begun for Italy.

Meanwhile the Goths had very great time and opportunity to range throughout Italy and Sicily, for besides Ravenna, Ancona, Hydruntum, and Centumcellae, they possessed all the other places. One hope alone sustained men: the arrival of Germanus; but this too failed. For while he was vehemently expected in Italy, he was seized by disease and, to the great grief of his men, ended his last day in Illyricum.

Germanus had two sons whom he was leading with him into Italy. The emperor commanded them to pursue the undertaking begun by their father in Italy, together with John, son of Vitalianus, a commander already known throughout Italy and their kinsman. Therefore John and the sons of Germanus, leading the army, came to Salonae. Because it was winter, they determined to remain there and to cross to Ravenna immediately at the beginning of spring.

Emperor Justinian sent Liberius with a fleet into Sicily. He entered Syracuse, the Goths who held a station in the harbor being entirely unable to prevent his entrance. But a few days afterward, fearing a lack of necessary things, he sailed with the same fleet from Syracuse to Panormus.

Meanwhile Justinian, changing his plan again, appointed Narses the eunuch as commander of the Italian war and liberally promised him money and armies. He wrote to John that he should not cross into Italy, but, remaining at Salonae, should await the arrival of Narses. Narses, therefore, having taken up the business vigorously, gathered great forces from every side and, after making preparations, commanded the forces to be present with him in Illyricum.

Totilas, having now learned of the preparation of the enemies, had returned into Italy and was providing throughout Italy whatever seemed suitable for the work. But, so that he too might display his power against the Greeks and in turn invade them, he sent a fleet with a great number of men into Greece, commanding them to ravage everything with the greatest possible tumult.

That fleet first plundered Corcyra and the neighboring islands. Soon, crossing through Epirus, Acarnania, and Aetolia, it defiled everything with plunder and fires. Watching the sea also, it intercepted many ships of the Greeks that were sailing into Italy and Illyricum.

While these things were being done by the Goths in Greece, Totilas sent a new army into the Picene territory and commanded Ancona to be besieged by land and sea. He placed three commanders over this expedition, to whom he also assigned a fleet of forty-seven long ships.

Valerianus, who commanded at Ravenna, urged John, who was at Salonae, by letter to bring aid to the besieged people of Ancona, since he himself could not. John placed chosen soldiers from the whole army upon eighteen ships and sailed toward Ravenna. Valerianus came to meet him with twelve long ships. When by common counsel the whole fleet had sailed toward the enemy, they landed upon the shore of Ancona.

The ships of the Goths were therefore forty-seven, but those of the Greeks thirty. The commanders of the Greek fleet were John and Valerianus; those of the Goths were Ulidas and Gotildus. Their spirits greatly inflamed by a military address, they came into conflict from opposite sides.

At the beginning the battle was most bitter, with engagements meeting one another head-on. Although the Gothic fighters were excellent, nevertheless, not possessing experience in maritime affairs, they threw themselves into disorder; and in certain places, many being crowded together, they mutually impeded one another. The knowledge and discipline of naval affairs, however, greatly assisted the Greeks. Thus the Greeks were superior in the battle.

Several Gothic ships were sunk and perished together with their fighters and sailors. Many were stormed and captured with incredible slaughter. When the Goths saw this, they at last took flight. Only ten whole ships of the Goths fled back to the shore; the others were captured or sunk. The Goths then immediately burned the ships that had escaped, lest the enemies gain possession of them, and returned to the camp. Then, dissolving the siege of Ancona and abandoning the camps, they withdrew to Auximum.

John and Valerianus, therefore, entered the harbor with the victorious fleet, amid the greatest joy and the incredible rejoicing of the people of Ancona. Attacking the enemy camp and finding it deserted, they caused the provisions that were in it to be brought into the city of Ancona. A few days afterward John returned to Salonae and Valerianus to Ravenna.

This battle violently broke the spirit of the Goths and was, as it were, the beginning of their ruin.

Struck by this blow, Totilas recalled a great part of his forces from Sicily. Therefore Artabanes, Justinian's commander, who had succeeded Liberius and had received the fleet from him, having become more powerful throughout Sicily, not only freed the allies from siege but also besieged the Goths in towns at several places. A fleet of Justinian, arriving upon the people of Croton who had long labored under a Gothic siege, liberated them and broke the enemies with great slaughter.

It terrified the spirits of the Goths much more, especially since many and frequent reports were being spread concerning the arrival of Narses in Italy and concerning his preparations. A certain Reginaris, a man distinguished among the Goths who commanded at Tarentum, crossed over to Justinian's side with the towns that he guarded and with his soldiers.

IX. Narses

When this was the condition of affairs throughout Italy, Narses, having assembled his forces through the winter, hastened to make the journey. He had an army so great that scarcely all the other commanders throughout Italy had possessed its equal, monies having been abundantly granted by Justinian, who was magnificent in distributing them.

He had drawn immense forces not only from Thrace and Greece but also from other places. For with the consent of King Alboin he had received more than five thousand of the Lombards, most warlike men. Three thousand of the Heruli came to him. An immense multitude of Huns had flowed together. Assuades came with five hundred fighters of the nation of the Gepids, and John surnamed Phagas with an army of Greeks and Thracians. In addition, John, son of Vitalianus, had joined to him the army of the sons of Germanus.

Narses therefore, having these forces, moved from Illyricum and crossed into Italy by a land journey through Dalmatia and Liburnia around the gulf of the sea. At his first entrance he halted in the Venetian territory. Abandoning the inland route, Narses chose the road along the shore of the Adriatic Sea because it was free from enemies, and at last reached Ravenna with all the forces.

There were many veteran soldiers throughout Italy to whom stipends had been owed for a very long time. Narses paid all of them their stipends and healed and raised their spirits. At last he hastened from there to seek Rome.

During this time Isdrilas commanded at Ariminum, a man distinguished in war among the Goths. When he came into the territory of Ariminum, he attempted to impede the passage of the first columns of Narses. A battle was therefore joined not far from the walls of the town. In it a certain Herulian horseman, fighting hand to hand, killed Isdrilas; and his soldiers, terrified by the death of their commander, fled into the town.

The head of Isdrilas was brought to Narses. He rejoiced at it as at a good omen, because in the first encounter the adversary had been killed by his men. Full of good hope, he completed the journey. Accordingly, passing by Ariminum, he set out for Rome.

X

Totilas, learning the things that had been done in the Venetian territory and understanding the arrival of Narses at Ravenna, although his forces were with Teias, nevertheless departed from Rome, prepared an army against Narses, and went to meet him. At last a most bitter battle was begun on both sides. In the end the Goths were overcome with a very great slaughter, and Totilas was killed, according to the prophecy of Saint Benedict, in the tenth year of his reign.

After Totilas had been killed, whatever Goths fled from the battle crossed the River Po and remained at Pavia and around those places. When there they considered a new leader for their nation, Teias was chosen king of the Goths by the judgment of all. Having been made king, he immediately took possession of the treasures that Totilas had gathered at Pavia. He did not cease to restore the forces, assemble an army, distribute arms, lavish those treasures [read: bestow horses], and vigorously perform all things. He also sent to the Franks, promising them fellowship in the war.

After the killing of Totilas, Narses, hearing of the preparation of the Goths, commanded Valerianus to be with his forces around the Po as if on guard, lest the Goths, with fear removed, wander more freely. He himself sought Rome with the whole army. Passing along the way, he received Narni, which surrendered voluntarily. He granted soldiers to the people of Spoletum to serve as a garrison until their walls, overthrown by the Goths, should be restored.

At Perusia there were two commanders of soldiers for the Goths, Meligedius and Ulitus. They were exceedingly discordant with one another, for Meligedius desired to surrender the city, while Ulitus resisted. Thus, when a sedition arose, Ulitus was killed and Perusia was handed over to Narses by Meligedius.

Narses, having therefore set out for Rome, besieged it. It was still full of the former ruins, and few citizens were in it. When Narses resolved to storm the city, he attacked the walls at several places at the same time. The Goths, running together to those places, fought back from the walls. But certain soldiers of Narses, seeking more remote places, since there was solitude there, climbed the walls with ladders. A shout made from there showed that the city had been taken.

The Goths therefore abandoned the defense. Some sought the city of Portus in flight; others withdrew into the Mole of Hadrian as a citadel. In this manner Narses gained possession of Rome. Not long afterward he received the besieged citadel by agreement.

There were in Campania certain Romans of patrician family and others of the senatorial order whom the Goths had sent as suspected men into their towns. The Goths killed all these with their sons and kinsmen when Rome was taken by Narses. Likewise, the Goths killed three hundred young Romans whom Totilas had chosen as soldiers but had in truth led beyond the Po as hostages, when Rome was taken by Narses. Thereafter Narses besieged Portus with forces sent there and took it, and Centumcellae likewise.

Teias, king of the Goths, did not cease to solicit the nation of the Franks and to urge it to fellowship. Now he promised money, now a share of dominion throughout Italy. But the Franks had already determined not to involve themselves in a war of this kind, and thus the hope of the Goths perished.

XI

While Totilas lived, he had gathered the royal monies partly at Pavia and had placed no small part also in the citadel of Cumae, over which citadel he had placed his brother. When Narses learned this, he sent part of the army to besiege Cumae. He himself, remaining at Rome, attempted to restore the city and make it populous.

Lest the Goths who were beyond the Po be able to aid either Cumae or other places, he commanded John, son of Vitalianus, to remain in Etruria with his forces and restrain the attempts of the enemies.

When King Teias perceived that Cumae was being besieged, he determined to bring aid. Setting out from Pavia by transverse routes through the Picene territory and the lands of the Marsians, he reached Campania. When Narses learned this, he recalled John with the army from Etruria, and he himself set out with the other forces and sought Campania with the purpose of fighting.

It is related that not far from the city of Nuceria there is a certain river called Draco, indeed narrow in width but so great in depth that it is passable neither by foot soldiers nor by horsemen. Around the said river both armies halted. The Goths also had a fleet in the sea sufficiently near, which landed grain and the other provisions on the shore, whence they were carried into the camp.

But after the fleet of the Goths was lost through treason, the resulting lack, because necessities could not be brought in to them, compelled the Goths to abandon the place. From there the Goths went to the nearest mountain, which is called Lactarius. Narses followed them and encamped at the foot of the mountain.

There a savage battle was fought, everywhere most bloody. For the Goths fought out of desperation; the soldiers of Narses, conscious of their multitude, were ashamed to yield. Teias, king of the Goths, wished to be among the foremost fighters. He was conspicuous in arms: in his left hand he shook a shield, in his right a javelin. Many who came against him fell, killed by him.

But when many javelins had been fixed in his shield and adhered to it, and he was impeded by the shield, he cried out that another shield should be brought to him. When it was brought, he put down the former shield and took up the new one. In this changing of shields he was secretly wounded by a flying missile. Although he poured out much blood, nevertheless, fighting most bravely, he never drew back his foot and never turned his face toward his own men, but, continually fighting while turned toward the enemy, at last fell upon his face and died.

The Goths, by no means deterred by the death of their king, fought until night, with at last a great slaughter on both sides. When day came, however, the Goths finally sent ambassadors to Narses and offered that they wished to depart from Italy if they were permitted to leave unharmed and carry away their own possessions. But if Narses did not permit them this, as long as they lived, so long would they be prepared to fight.

When Narses understood the aforesaid things, after the matter had been discussed in council, he determined to permit the Goths a free departure with their possessions, lest he gain a victory against desperate men with great loss to his own men. During this, one thousand horsemen fled from the Goths and came to Pavia and other towns beyond the Po.

The rest, after entering into a treaty with Narses, carried off their private possessions and promised to leave Italy and never wage war against the Roman Empire, nevertheless retaining liberty without any subjection to the Roman Empire. When this had been done, Narses received Cumae and the other cities that remained. After the Goths departed from Italy, Narses then possessed it for seventeen years.

After this Justinian erected in the city of Constantinople a temple to the Lord Jesus Christ, who is the Wisdom of the Father. He called it Holy Sophia, that is, Holy Wisdom, excelling the other works of the world.

After Narses had overcome the Goths, the Roman clergy then assembled so that, together with the recommendation of Narses, they might ask the emperor that, if Pope Vigilius and the priests, deacons, and remaining clerics who had been sent into exile with him were still living, they should return.

Having received the report of Narses and of all the Roman clergy, the emperor and all his nobles rejoiced that God had given rest to the Romans. Immediately by his edict he recalled from exile all who afterward came into the presence of the emperor. He said to them: “Do you wish to receive Vigilius so that he may be your pope?”

They replied: “We give very great thanks.”

“Behold, here you have Pelagius, your archdeacon, and my hand will be with you.”

They all answered: “May God command your piety. Restore Vigilius to us now, and when God wills him to pass from this age, then, with your command, may Pelagius our archdeacon be given to us.”

Then the emperor released all those detained with Vigilius. Landing at Syracuse, they entered the land from the sea. There Vigilius became ill and departed to the Lord; but his body was brought to Rome.

Although this Justinian did many great things, nevertheless, at the instigation of his wife, who favored heretics, he persecuted and banished into exile two supreme pontiffs, namely Silverius and Vigilius. Not only the said Theodora but several other queens or empresses raised great injuries and scandals against the Church: the sister of Constantine the Great, who favored the Arians; Eudoxia, wife of Arcadius, in the persecution against John Chrysostom; Justina, mother of Valentinian; and many others. So too did Sophia, wife of Emperor Justin, whom Justinian, having no sons, adopted as a son by the counsel of the nobles and afterward established as emperor.

Narses overthrew and destroyed a certain Buccelinus, who was plundering Italy so that he might carry the spoils to his king Theodobert of the Gauls, when he was arranging to winter in Campania not far from Tarentum. Teutrius, also called Lucarius, the brother of Buccelinus, while burdened with much booty and desiring to return to his homeland, died his own death between Verona and Tridentum beside Lake Benacus.

Narses also, through Dagisterius, master of the soldiers, a warlike and vigorous man, obtained all the boundaries of Italy. When pestilence came in the year of the Lord 565, the peoples of Italy, and especially the Ligurians, were cast down.

At last Justinian, when he turned the ear of his heart away from the divine commands, incurred madness by the just judgment of God. Having summoned Justin, he delegated the care of the empire to him. Having done this, he died in the thirty-eighth year of his empire.

In the times of Justinian, when a great pestilence arose at Constantinople, the solemnity of the Purification of the Blessed Mary was established, and thus that mortality ceased. This feast was afterward celebrated throughout the whole world; in the following year it later began to rage in Italy. The said feast is called Hypapante among the Greeks and in Latin is interpreted “Meeting.”

During the time of this Justinian, Arator the poet flourished, a subdeacon of the Roman Church, who composed two metrical books concerning the Acts of the Apostles. In the time of Justinian also flourished the blessed Benedict, abbot, marvelous in life and holiness, concerning whom it will be said below.

The body of the blessed Anthony was also found in Egypt and at that time was carried to Alexandria with great veneration. Now, however, his body is certainly in the abbey of Montmajour near Arles in the province of Provence, and an arm is among the people of Vienne, where there is now a concourse of peoples, so that this development can clearly be apparent to one who considers it inwardly.

During the same time there also flourished in Scotland the blessed Brendan, who, illustrious in many virtues, was father of almost three thousand monks. Historiographers nevertheless omit the history of this pilgrim man [read: the history of this man's pilgrimage] because of the many apocryphal things and ravings contained in it.

At that time a certain Jew, taking an image of the Savior from a church, pierced it with a weapon. When he secretly carried it home under his garment, he found himself entirely bloodied by the blood that had flowed from it. Christians seeking the image found it by the traces of blood; after it had been restored to its place, they stoned the sacrilegious Jew.

Title XII, Chapter VI

Justin II therefore succeeded Justinian in the East, in the year of the Lord's Incarnation 566, and in the year of the world 5,764. He ruled for eleven years and crowned his wife, named Sophia, as Augusta.

This man, tenacious of every avarice, a despiser of the poor and a despoiler of senators, was so rapacious that he made iron chests in which he kept many talents of gold. He also fell into the Pelagian heresy, but was punished by the just judgment of God, as will be said below.

Narses the eunuch, of whom we have spoken, after he had freed all Italy from the assault of diverse enemies and rendered it quiet, endured envy from the Romans for his great benefits. They sent envoys to the imperial city, saying that it was better for the Romans to serve the Goths than the Greeks, where Narses the eunuch commands and rules according to his own pleasure.

Moved by their words, the emperor substituted his prefect Longinus in place of Narses. Moreover, Sophia Augusta sent this insult to Narses: that he should return to Constantinople and, with her girls in an assembly of women, distribute the allotted weights of wool.

Narses, after receiving the letter containing these injuries, is said to have answered this: that he would begin to weave such a web for Sophia Augusta that, for as long as she lived, she would never put it down. Departing for Naples, he instructed the Lombards to abandon the very poor lands of Pannonia that they inhabited and to flow together to possess the fertile soil of Italy.

When Alboin, king of the Lombards, heard this, he handed Pannonia over to the Huns and prepared his journey to Italy.

In the year of the Lord 570, battle lines appeared in the sky throughout Italy, and signified the human blood that was afterward poured out. Then, when rains continued for several days, the Tiber was increased by so great a force of waters that the lower places were submerged with a great destruction of the people. It happened similarly in certain other cities and places. Leovigild, king of the Goths, subdued the rebellious cities of Spain.

Alboin, therefore, king of the Lombards, summoned by Narses, entered Italy with a great multitude of Lombards, with sons and wives, and with other barbarian nations. He then entered Milan and within a brief space of time subjected to himself all Italy except Pavia, Ravenna, and Rome. The Lombards and their kings possessed it for 204 years, namely until the times of Charlemagne, as will be said.

This nation of the Lombards, who were first called Humili and now Lombards, in the year of the Lord's Incarnation 382 once abandoned the island of Scandinavia, situated in the northern ocean, and at last established their seat in Pannonia. From there, summoned by Narses, they came into Italy.

Although Narses, pacified by the persuasion of Pope John, attempted to recall the Lombards from entering Italy, nevertheless, because Alboin had already been inflamed by his letters and had undertaken the journey with all his men, their wives, and household, he could not be deterred from pursuing the undertaking begun.

At their first entrance they besieged the city of Milan on every side. When it had been violently broken open, they killed by the sword nearly all its inhabitants. For King Alboin had vowed that he would kill all Christians by the sword. Although the Lombards had then been baptized, they nevertheless worshiped idols and venerated the image of a viper as a god. From this error the blessed Barbarius [i.e., the blessed Barbatus], bishop of Beneventum, removed them and converted the said image of a viper into a most beautiful chalice.

After Milan had therefore been taken, all the other cities, fearing the cruelty of the barbarians, voluntarily subjected themselves to him.

Meanwhile Narses died at Rome. His body was placed in a leaden coffin and carried with all his riches to Constantinople—or, as others say, to Naples. Through his virtue he merited the dignity of the patriciate. He was a most pious man, so devoted to vigils and prayers that he obtained victories more by supplications poured out to God than by military arms. For he was Catholic in religion, munificent toward the poor, and sufficiently zealous in repairing churches.

Alboin, king of the Lombards, after entering the part of Italy that lies more broadly open there, gave it to his nephew Gisulf, a man of the greatest power.

In the year of the Lord 574, the Armenians publicly received the faith of Christ. Venetia and all Cisalpine Gaul were possessed by the Lombards except Pavia. After it had sustained a siege for three years, it was at last surrendered in this year.

I. King Alboin of the Goths [read: King Alboin of the Lombards]

Before he departed from Pannonia, Alboin joined battle with the neighboring king of the Gepids and killed him. While that king's son armed himself for vengeance for his father's killing, he too was overcome and killed by Alboin. His army was overthrown partly by the sword and partly by captivity.

Among the captives Rosamund, the daughter of the slain king of the Gepids, was found, most beautiful in body. Alboin took her as a wife to his own destruction. As John of Columna also relates, he took away the head of the slain king, adorned the skull or cranium with gold, and made from it a vessel for drinking, like a mixing-bowl, which he used at great solemnities and feasts.

After this Alboin, following many slaughters of men and destructions of cities, was at Verona. Once, while he reclined at dinner with the queen his wife on a solemn day, heated by much wine, he filled with wine the cup that he had caused to be fashioned from the head of his wife's father, presented it to his wife, and said, “Drink with your father.”

After she looked upon her father's head, she groaned, but in the manner of a woman covered it with feigned joy. From then onward she began to consider how she might avenge upon her husband the death of her father and brother.

At that time there was in the commander's army a certain young man handsome in body and vigorous in arms. He knew carnally a girl assigned to the queen's service. It happened that, when the king was absent, the queen summoned the said girl to herself and caused her to lie in her own chamber, while the queen lay in the girl's chamber.

When this had been done, she sent word to the young man in the girl's name that he should come to her that night. He came to the place in the first twilight of night, and, entering the bed in which the queen had placed herself, lay with her.

When this had been done, the queen said to the soldier, “Do you know who I am?” When he called her by the name of his lover, she said, “I am not she, but I am Queen Rosamund.” She added, “Today you have perpetrated such an affair that, unless you kill King Alboin and avenge my father, whom he killed, you will without doubt perish by his sword.”

He was vehemently stupefied at her words, but at last acquiesced after many promises. On the appointed day, therefore, he hid in the chamber fortified with every weapon. When the king had placed himself naked in bed, the young man leapt out of hiding and attacked the king with a drawn sword. As he was naked, the king rose from the bed and seized a stool with which to defend himself. But not for long: he was easily wounded by the armed man and at last killed.

After perpetrating this crime, the queen took a great part of the king's treasures and fled to Ravenna together with the soldier who had killed her husband. There she took him as husband. Not long afterward the queen fell in love with another most beautiful young man and desired to have him as husband; hence she considered destroying that former husband.

Mixing poison into wine, therefore, she asked him to drink. When he began to swallow it, perceived a great bitterness, and held the matter suspect, he commanded the queen herself to drink the remainder. When she refused, he drew his sword and compelled her to drink. After she had swallowed it, both died on that same day.

After Alboin, a certain man was substituted by the Lombards in the kingdom.

II

Around those times in Sicily [read: Around those times in Cilicia], a certain Theophilus, otherwise sufficiently modest, had unjustly lost his dignity—namely, his office as vicedominus (ecclesiastical steward)—after being calumniously accused. He bore so grievously so great a wrong that he omitted nothing to recover the reputation taken from him, to such an extent that, by the counsel of sorcerers, he invoked the devil to furnish him aid in recovering his honor, prepared to do everything that the devil commanded him.

The devil offered to do this for him, provided that he denied the faith and gave himself wholly to him, so that he should also write with his own hand an instrument of such a gift and hand it over to him. When this had been done, it followed by diverse means that he recovered his honor.

But the wretched man, returning to himself, recognized his crime and did penance for forty days, seeking the intercession of the Mother of God, to whom he had been devoted, and obtained pardon for his sin. Hence the Blessed Mary appeared to him while he slept and cast upon the bed the instrument of his denial that he had given sealed to the devil, as testimony of the remission made to him.

From the history of the Britons, John of Columna relates that at a certain most celebrated court, held in the city of the Legions with an assembly of princes, all the kings of the western nations and the princes of the Gauls were present. There it was deliberated that, under Arthur, leader of the Britons, they should occupy Italy and the city of Rome itself.

Therefore, having gathered a great army within the boundaries of Burgundy, Arthur advanced to battle against Lucius, commander of the Spains, who governed those regions under Prince Leo. On the journey he conquered a certain giant in single combat, and not long afterward, far from the city of Langres, joined a bloody battle with the Roman commanders. From it, after a grievous slaughter of both armies, he came away victorious.

After this victory, while he directed his journey toward Rome itself, he heard that Mordred, his nephew, whom he had left for the guardianship of the kingdom, had occupied Britain and established himself as king. Understanding this, Arthur desisted from his purpose and led the army back into Britain against his nephew.

After he landed there, he joined a most bloody battle with him. In it this marvelous and horrible thing is related by the report alone: that only twenty survived from that army, although the forces of both armies were innumerable. Arthur himself, after receiving a mortal wound in battle, was carried to a certain island, from which he never returned. Hence, according to the prophecy of Merlin, he had a doubtful end. His kinsman Constantine succeeded him in the kingdom.

Around those times in the East, a certain boy, the son of a Jew, had been brought by his contemporaries, the sons of Christians, as Vincent relates from the Mariale, to receive in the church of Saint Mary, Mother of the Lord, the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. Because of this, when his father perceived it, the boy was cast into a burning furnace, from which he was drawn unharmed by Christians.

For when his mother heard that the father was burning the son, she ran to free him. But when she saw the fires scattered here and there from the open mouth of the furnace, she cast the adornment of her head upon the ground and, with her hair loosened, filled the city with her cries, proclaiming herself wretched.

The Christians, however, running together to the spectacle and drawing the fires back from the mouth of the furnace, found the boy reclining as if upon the softest feathers. When the faithful had blessed God, they cast the Jew, his father and the author of this crime, into the furnace. The fire so completely consumed him that it scarcely left any small trace even of his bones.

When the Christians asked the boy what shelter he had had among the fires, he said: “That woman who, in the basilica where I received bread from the table, sits upon a chair and carries a little boy in her lap—she covered me with her mantle lest the fire devour me,” namely, the most blessed Virgin Mary. Thus the boy, having recognized the faith, believed and was baptized with his mother; and many other Jews were converted to Christ by this miracle.

In Gaul, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, a mountain above the River Rhône, after giving a roaring sound for many days, was at last shaken loose from another mountain neighboring it and was cast into the Rhône together with churches, houses, men, and animals.

Lothar, king of the Franks, pursued into Britain his son Chramn, who had long rebelled against him and committed many evils in his kingdom. He met Chramn and Chonober, leader of the Britons and his auxiliary. He killed Chonober, and, after Chramn had been captured, caused him to be burned with his wife and daughters.

After this, as Gregory of Tours relates, while King Lothar was hunting in the forest of Chocilia, he was seized by a violent fever. From there he went to the villa Compendium, which is a royal palace. When he was grievously afflicted there, he said: “Alas, alas! What manner of king do you think the heavenly King is, who is known to kill such great kings?” In this weariness he breathed out his spirit. He died in the fifty-first year of his reign. His four sons, carrying him with great honor to Soissons, buried him in the basilica of Saint Medard.

III. Concerning the Division of the Kingdom of the Franks among the Sons of Lothar and Their Wives

In those times, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror after Gregory of Tours, book twenty-two, chapter 117, Chilperic after his father's death received the treasures that his father had gathered at the villa Brumachum. He sought the Franks beyond and, after giving them many gifts, subjected them to himself. Soon he entered Paris and occupied the seat of King Childebert.

But he was not permitted to possess it for long, for his brothers, joined together, expelled him from it. Thus these four—Charibert, Guntram, Chilperic, and Sigebert—made a lawful division among themselves. Charibert received the kingdom of Childebert and established his seat at Paris. Guntram received the kingdom of Chlodomer and established his seat at Orléans. Chilperic, receiving the kingdom of his father Lothar, established his seat at Soissons. Sigebert obtained the kingdom of Theodoric by lot and established his seat in the city of Reims.

King Charibert took Vigoberga as his wife. The queen had two girls, daughters of a certain poor man, who were exceedingly beautiful; the name of the elder was Marcovefa, and the name of the younger was Merofledis. The king burned exceedingly with love for them. On this account Vigoberga afflicted them with excessive hatred, for she had also commanded their father to be made a preparer of wool-work.

Because of this the king, exceedingly angered, left Vigoberga and took Merofledis as wife. After this he also joined Marcovefa, her sister, to himself in marriage. For this reason he was excommunicated by Saint Germanus, bishop of Paris. But when the king refused to leave her, she was struck by the judgment of God and died. And not much time afterward King Charibert also died and was buried in the fortress of Blavia, in the church of Saint Romanus.

Furthermore, when King Sigebert saw that his brothers were taking wives unworthy of themselves and joining maidservants to themselves in marriage, he sent an embassy into Spain and, after many gifts had been given, sought the daughter of King Athanagild. The girl, named Brunhild, was elegant, beautiful, and intelligent. When he had received her, because she had been subject to an alien law, namely that of the Arians, he commanded her to be baptized.

When King Chilperic saw this, although he already had several wives, he sought in marriage Brunhild's own sister, named Galbunda, promising that he would dismiss his other wives. After she had been taken by him in marriage and baptized, she became a woman of great holiness. But through the hatred of Fredegund, his most wicked concubine, a great scandal arose between them.

Accordingly, Galbunda said that she could by no means endure such great injuries from Fredegund. She asked the king that, leaving behind the treasures that she had brought with her from Spain, he permit her to return freely to her father. But he caressed her with gentle words. Finally, through the most wicked counsel of Fredegund, he strangled her by night in her bed. After her death God displayed miracles on her behalf. When this had been done, Chilperic's brothers, indignant with him over this, wished to cast him out of the kingdom.

At that time Chilperic had three sons by Andovera his queen, namely Theodobert, Merovech, and Lodoveus. Fredegund herself, being crafty, also deceived her mistress Andovera, for Fredegund herself was from the lowest household.

When, therefore, King Chilperic proceeded with Sigebert his brother in an army against the Saxons, Queen Andovera remained at home pregnant and bore a daughter. Fredegund gave her counsel that she should cause the child to be baptized quickly, so that the king, coming from battle, might joyfully behold his baptized daughter.

Accordingly, when a bishop had been summoned to baptize her, because there was no matron to receive her, the mother herself, admonished by Fredegund, received her from the sacred font. When the king came with victory, Fredegund went out to meet him, saying: “Thanks be to God, because our lord the king has had victory over his enemies, and a daughter has been born to you. With whom, my lord, will you sleep this night? For my lady the queen is your co-mother through your daughter Hildeinde.”

And he said, “If I shall be unable to sleep with her, I shall sleep with you.” When the king had entered his hall, Queen Andovera ran to meet him with her daughter. And the king said, “You have done an abominable thing through your simplicity. For now you will not be able to be my wife.” He asked her to put on the sacred veil together with her daughter, and he gave her many estates and villas. He condemned to exile the bishop who had baptized her, and joined Fredegund to himself as queen.

IV

Vincent, in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-two, chapter 128, from the history of the Franks, relates that Chilperic sent his elder son Theodobert—whom he had previously sworn to Sigebert would not cross beyond the Loire—with an army against him as an enemy. Ranging around the cities of his uncle Sigebert, he invaded Tours, Poitiers, and the rest.

At Poitiers he fought against Duke Gundovald. Gundovald's army was struck down and fled, and Theodobert made a great slaughter there. Moving his army from there, he ranged through Limoges and Cahors, invaded and devastated them, burned churches, destroyed monasteries, killed clerics, cast down monasteries of men, made sport of girls, and devastated everything. At that time there was greater groaning in the churches than in the time of the persecution of Diocletian and Maximian.

Amid these discords Chilperic also moved his army, advanced as far as Reims, and burned and subdued everything. Hearing this, Sigebert summoned those nations that are beyond the Rhine, came to Paris, and resolved to go against his brother. Chilperic, fleeing through the region of Rouen with his wife and sons, entered the city of Tournai and there shut himself in and fortified himself. Sigebert, however, received those cities that are situated beyond Paris as far as Rouen, and from there returned to Paris.

Then the Franks who had once looked to Childebert the Elder sent an embassy to Sigebert and, abandoning Chilperic, established Sigebert as king over themselves. He sent them to besiege his brother in the aforesaid city of Tournai, saying that he would follow with an army.

Blessed Germanus, bishop of Paris, said to him: “If you go and are unwilling to kill your brother, you will return from there alive and victorious. But if you devise otherwise, you will die. For thus the Lord says through Solomon: ‘Into the pit that you prepare for your brother, you will fall.’” He neglected to hear this.

Then Fredegund, mindful of her arts, made two Timanensian youths drunk and said to them: “Go to Sigebert's battle-line, and pretend that you ought to raise him as king over you, and kill him. If you are able to escape, I shall honor you magnificently and your offspring. But if you fall, I shall distribute many alms throughout the places of the saints.”

They, however, without hesitation, fierce as they were at heart, came to him pretending that they wished to suggest another matter. Drawing knives, they struck him in both sides. He fell crying out and gave up his spirit; there those murderers also fell. Chilperic knew nothing until Fredegund narrated everything concerning his brother's death. Then King Chilperic, departing from Tournai, buried his brother Sigebert at the village of Lambras.

After King Sigebert had been killed, Queen Brunhild remained with her sons, full of grief and not knowing what she ought to do. Duke Gundovald secretly seized her son Childebert by night and fled with him into Austrasia. After the nations over whom his father had reigned had been gathered, he established him as king.

King Chilperic, however, coming to Paris, seized Brunhild and thrust her into exile at the city of Rouen. He commanded that her daughters also be detained in the city of Meaux.

After this Chilperic sent his son Merovech with an army beyond the Loire. But Merovech, abandoning his father's arrangement, then returned through the region of Le Mans and, pretending that he wished to visit his mother Andovera, came to Rouen. There he was joined to Queen Brunhild and joined her to himself in marriage.

When Chilperic learned that, contrary to divine and canonical law, he had taken his uncle's wife, he became exceedingly bitter and hastened to that city. But when they learned that he intended to separate them, they fled to the basilica of Saint Martin, which was constructed of wooden boards above the walls.

Since the king was unable to cast them out of there by contrivance, he deceitfully swore to them: “If it is the will of God,” he said, “I shall not separate them.” When this had been heard, they came out of the basilica. After they had been received graciously, the king feasted with them.

After this, however, through the plotting of Fredegund on account of his union with Brunhild, Merovech was tonsured and, at the command of Chilperic his father, was ordained a priest. He was sent to an island in Nomanicum, so that he ought to live there according to the rule.

At that time also blessed Germanus, bishop of Paris, full of virtues, migrated to the Lord. Having been carried gloriously and with great honor into the church of Saint Vincent, he was buried there. After this Childebert the Younger sent an embassy to Chilperic concerning the recovery of Brunhild his mother, and Chilperic peacefully returned her.

V

After this King Chilperic, through the counsel of Fredegund, commanded that new and burdensome assessments be made throughout his whole kingdom. For this reason many, abandoning those cities and possessions, sought other kingdoms, saying, “It is better to wander abroad than to be subjected to such peril.” The people, grievously oppressed, cried out to the Lord.

At that time King Chilperic became gravely ill. When he recovered health, his sons became gravely ill. Fredegund, full of grief and lamentation for her sons, now repenting, said to the king: “For a long time, while we act wickedly, divine piety has borne with us. Often it has chastised us with fevers and other evils, and we have neglected to amend ourselves. Behold, now we are losing our sons. For now the tears of the poor, the lamentations of widows, and the sighs of orphans are killing them. Behold the immense weights of gold and silver. Cellars and granaries overflow full, and we do not know for whom we gather them. Behold, we have lost that which we held more beautiful. What, therefore, will all these things profit us?

“Now, therefore, let my counsel please you: command that what we wickedly persuaded be restored, and command that the new assessments, which we made unjustly and wickedly, be burned with fire, so that, even if we lose our sons, we may at least escape everlasting punishment.”

Then the king, pierced in heart, handed over all the unjust assessments to be burned with fire. After this his little son died, and also another named Lodobert. Fredegund, however, bore a son whom they called Lothar. He afterward became a great king and also begot Dagobert.

Especially at that time, great discords arose between Chilperic and Childebert his nephew, for Fredegund and Brunhild stirred them up on both sides.

Queen Fredegund was exceedingly beautiful and intelligent, and an adulteress. At that time Landric was an effective and vigorous man in the court of King Chilperic, whom the aforesaid queen loved greatly, because he committed lust with her.

On a certain day, when King Chilperic had gone rather early from the villa Callensis into the district of Paris to practice hunting, he returned from the horses' stable into the chamber of the palace. She was washing her face in that chamber. The king, coming up behind her, struck her on the buttocks with a staff. But she, thinking that it was Landric, said, “Why do you do this, Landric?” Looking back, she saw that it was the king and was vehemently terrified. The king, however, made exceedingly sad, proceeded to the hunt.

Fredegund therefore summoned Landric to herself and narrated everything that she had done, saying: “Consider what we ought to do, because tomorrow we shall be subjected to severe torments.” Landric, moved with a contrite spirit and tears, said: “At so evil an hour did my eyes see you, for I do not know what we ought to do. Distresses press me on every side.”

But she said to him: “Do not fear. Hear my counsel, and let us do this thing and we shall not die. When the king comes from the hunt at late evening as it grows dark, let us send men to kill him, and let heralds cry out that the ambush is that of Childebert his nephew. When he is dead, we shall reign with our son Lothar.”

Accordingly, at the beginning of night, when King Chilperic was returning from the hunt, certain young swordsmen, made drunk with wine and sent by Fredegund, struck the king in the belly with two scramasaxes (large single-edged knives) while he was dismounting from his horse and the other persons were proceeding to their own affairs. He cried out and gave up his spirit.

The swordsmen whom the queen had fraudulently sent cried out, saying, “The ambushes of Childebert, king of the Austrasians, have done this against our lord.” Then the army ran here and there; when they had found nothing, they returned to their own places.

Thus, after Fredegund had ingeniously killed Chilperic her husband, she remained in the kingdom with Lothar her little king and Landric, whom they chose as mayor of the palace. The Franks also established the said Lothar as king over themselves.

When Childebert, king of the Austrasians and son of Sigebert, heard this, he gathered an army. For, when Guntram his paternal cousin had died, Childebert himself had received the kingdom of Burgundy.

Once, while this Guntram, king of the Franks, wearied from hunting, slept in the lap of his armor-bearer beside a stream of water, he afterward awoke and, stupefied, said that in a dream he had crossed over an iron bridge and had seen many treasures beneath a certain mountain. When the king proceeded there according to the credibility of the dream, he found many treasures. After accepting them, he assigned them to the uses of the holy Church.

After Guntram's death, therefore, when Childebert had received his kingdom, the Burgundians, the Austrasians, and the upper Franks moved a great army through Champagne, went out, and devastated the territory of Soissons with Gundovald and Wintrio.

Hearing this, Fredegund gathered an army with Landric and the other leaders of the Franks. Coming to the villa Brumachum, she gave many gifts and presents to the Franks and incited them to fight against her enemies.

When she learned that the army of the Austrasians was numerous, she gathered the Franks who were with her and gave them counsel, saying: “Let us rise by night against them, with lamps carried before us by those proceeding in front, and at the same time let us carry branches of the woods in our hands, with little bells bound upon the horses, so that their watchmen and the keepers of their horses may be unable to recognize us. At the beginning of the dawning day let us rush upon them, and perhaps we shall conquer them.” This counsel pleased them.

When the appointed day had been announced on which they ought to assemble for battle at the place called Truncia in the territory of Soissons, she rose by night, as she had counseled, with the equipment of arms, with branches in their hands and the other things that we related above. Mounted on their horses, they came as far as Truncia, while she carried Lothar, the little king, on her arm.

When the enemy watchmen perceived the branches of the woods as though upon mountains in the column of the Franks, and heard the ringing of the little bells, one man said to his companion: “Were there not yesterday fields in this and that place where now we perceive woods?” But the other, mocking him, said: “Certainly you became drunk this night and now rave. Do you not hear the little bells of the horses pasturing beside that wood?”

While they did these things and dawn gave the beginning of the day, the Franks rushed with the noise of trumpets upon the sleeping Austrasians and Burgundians and killed the greatest part of their army, from the greatest to the least. Gundovald and Wintrio also escaped with difficulty, slipping away in flight. Landric pursued Wintrio, but he escaped by the course of a very swift horse.

Fredegund, however, with the rest of the army, advanced as far as Reims and, after all Champagne had been burned, returned with many spoils to the city of Soissons.

At the same time Childebert, king of the Austrasians, had two sons. The elder, born from a concubine, was called Theodobert. The younger, born from the queen, was named Theodoric; him, with his grandmother Brunhild, he sent into Burgundy, into the kingdom of the great King Guntram.

At that time Childebert the Younger died, and he had reigned twenty years. His son Theodobert succeeded to the kingdom of his father, that is, in Austrasia, but Theodoric in Burgundy.

VI. Concerning Saint Columbanus's Rebuke of King Theodoric for Adultery, and His Persecution against Saint Columbanus

Theodoric, therefore, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-three, chapter 4, rejoiced in this: that within the boundaries of his kingdom he had Saint Columbanus, an abbot of very many and a most renowned man.

But when the man of God came very frequently to Theodoric, he began to rebuke him for mingling in the adulteries of concubines and for not rather enjoying the consolation of a lawful marriage for the procreation of royal offspring. When the king, obeying his command, answered that he would separate himself from all unlawful things, his grandmother Brunhild was stirred up against the man of God.

For she feared that, if the king cast off his concubines and took a queen as wife, he would place a limit upon his grandmother's dignity and honor. Therefore, on a certain day when she came to him, she brought Theodoric's adulterine sons to him. When he asked what they wanted from him, she said, “They are the king's sons. Strengthen them by your blessing.”

But he said, “Know that they will by no means reign, because they came forth from brothels.” Then she, raging, commanded the little boys to depart. As the man of God was leaving the royal hall, while he crossed the threshold, a crash was suddenly produced. Shaking the whole house, it struck terror into everyone; nevertheless it did not restrain the fury of the wretched woman.

Then through messengers she commanded the provosts of the monastery that no journey outside their boundaries should lie open to any of them, and that neither lodging nor any assistance should be given to his monks.

But the man of God, perceiving the royal minds moved against him, hastened to break their obstinacy. At the setting of the sun he came to the public villa Pissa, where the king then was. When this had been announced to the king, he commanded that suitable provisions be prepared with royal refinement and sent to the servant of God.

When Columbanus saw the foods and cups prepared with royal refinement, he asked what they wished to do with these things. They said, “These things have been sent to you by the king.” Abhorring them, the saint said: “The Most High rejects the gifts of the impious, nor is it fitting that the mouths of the servants of God should be polluted by the foods of him who denies access to the servants of God not only in his own habitations but also in those of others.”

When these words had been spoken, all the vessels were broken into pieces, the wines and beer were poured upon the ground, and the other things that had been separated were scattered. The terrified servants announced to the king the circumstance of the deed.

Terrified, he hastened at dawn with his grandmother to the man of God, begged pardon for the offense, and they promised that they would afterward amend themselves. Pacified by these promises, he returned to the monastery.

The pledged rights of marriage were not kept for long but were violated, and the customary adulteries were perpetrated by the king. When the man of God heard this, he sent to the king letters full of blows and threats. Hence Brunhild, again moved, stirred up the king's mind against him. She also began to solicit the bishops, that they might detract from his recall and stain with blame the regular state that he had handed down to the monks [read: disparage his religious life and stain with blame the monastic rule that he had handed down to the monks].

Accordingly, the king came to Luxeuil and complained to him that he departed from the customs of the provincials and that access within the more secret enclosures did not lie open to all Christians. Columbanus, as he was bold and great in spirit, said to him: “If you have come to this place in order to destroy the habitations of the servants of God and to stain the regular life, know that your kingdom will fall utterly and will be submerged together with all the royal progeny.” The outcome of the matter afterward proved this.

Terrified by these words, therefore, he quickly stepped back outside the refectory that he had entered. When he was pressed by the harsh rebukes of the man of God, he said: “You hope that I shall confer upon you the crown of martyrdom, but I am not of such madness that I should perpetrate so great a crime. Rather, it pleases me that you, whose monastic purpose differs from the customs of others, should strive to retrace the way by which you came.”

To these things Columbanus said that he would not depart from the enclosures of the monastery unless he were dragged away by force. The king therefore departed and left a nobleman named Handulf, who, expelling the man of God from the monastery, conducted him into exile near the town of Nessonense.

While staying there, he heard that the prison in that place was full of condemned men. Hastening there, he announced the word of God. When all answered that, if they were freed, they would amend themselves and do penance, the man of God commanded his servant to bring them out of those iron bonds. With his hand the servant crushed the iron like a rotten shrub and freed them from prison.

After performing the office of evangelical service, Columbanus washed and dried their feet. Then he commanded them to enter the church and to wash away with tears the crime committed.

When the tribune heard that the prison had been emptied, he pursued them with soldiers. But after the man of God prayed for them that they should not be returned to chains, by an evident miracle they were released as free through the closing of the church's doors by divine power.

Not much time afterward Saint Columbanus, fearing nothing, returned to the monastery from which he had previously been exiled. When the king and his grandmother Brunhild heard this, stimulated by sharper goads, they commanded a cohort of soldiers to drag him violently from the place and carry him back to his former exile.

When the soldiers entered the monastery and passed before him, by the will of God they could not see him. When this had been announced to the king, his fury increased and he sent a certain count to him. The count asked him on the king's behalf to depart from there. He answered that he would not depart unless compelled by force.

At last the man of God, perceiving the danger to others if he satisfied his own steadfastness, departed from there and came to the fortress of Avalon. But while on the road the keeper of Theodoric's horses wished to pierce him with a lance, the man's hand, which he extended with the lance, grew rigid. Seized by a demon, he fell at the saint's feet, but was freed by his prayer.

Furthermore, King Theodoric, divinely struck near the town of Metz, died amid the conflagrations of a blazing fire. After him Brunhild substituted his son Sigebert in the kingdom.

But Lothar, mindful of the prophecy of the man of God, gathered an army, wishing to recover the kingdoms of his brothers [read: the boundaries of the kingdom] that were owed to his dominion. He killed the captured Sigebert, and captured his five brothers, the sons of Theodoric, together with their great-grandmother Brunhild. He killed the boys separately.

But Brunhild he first set ignobly upon a camel and, leading her around, displayed her to the enemies. Afterward, having entangled her in the tails of untamed horses, he miserably deprived her of life. Thus, when the stock of Theodoric had been utterly and radically removed, Lothar alone obtained the monarchy of the three kingdoms. In this way the prophecy of blessed Columbanus was fulfilled in all things.

This Saint Columbanus was illustrious in many miracles. Among other things, once, when he had visited the sepulcher of blessed Martin with his companions, the money that they had carried with them for traveling expenses was secretly taken away. When he had piously complained in prayer before Saint Martin that he had not come so that his companions' goods should be taken away, immediately the man who had stolen them appeared, beaten, disclosed the theft and the place where he had hidden them, and restored them.

Likewise, when Columbanus was remaining in a certain woodland place, receiving sustenance from the fruits of trees, and his servant approached the place at mealtime to gather fruits, he found a bear eating the fruits and announced it to the man of God. Columbanus sent him back to the place, commanding him to divide the fruit trees and apples, assigning one part to the bear for its sustenance and another part as food for the man of God.

The animal was wholly obedient and took nothing from the part assigned to the man of God. This is to the great confusion of men who do not obey God.

Among the other disciples of this Saint Columbanus was Saint Gall. After he had lived with Columbanus for a time in holy religion, inspired by God he ran through diverse places, constructing religious houses. It is read that he received from the Lord a special grace for casting out unclean spirits. He refused a bishopric offered to him, but, dwelling in desert places, had leisure for himself and God alone. After many miracles, he rested in the Lord.

VII

Thereafter, in the eighth year of his empire, Emperor Justin began to be infirm in his feet. On this account he took Tiberius, count of the Excubitors, adopted him as a son, and declared him his successor, as Hugh of Fleury relates.

When Justin died, as Sigebert testifies, after he had ruled for about twelve years, Tiberius, the second of this name, received the empire in the year of the Lord 577, and in the 5,775th year from the beginning of the world, according to the more common opinion.

For previously, when the Romans were pressed by a shortage of food, many of them gave themselves to the Lombards. These Lombards, as was said above, entered Italy while Justin was emperor.

This emperor was a just, vigorous, useful, and wise man, distinguished in judgments, an almsgiver, and—what is more excellent than all—most devout and wholly Catholic.

When he distributed to the poor many things from the treasures that Justin had gathered, Sophia Augusta reproved him more frequently, saying that he would reduce the commonwealth to poverty: “What Justin gathered over many years, you prodigally scatter within a short time.”

He said to her: “I hope in God that money will not be lacking to our treasury, provided only that the poor receive alms or captives are redeemed.”

Then, on a certain day, while he walked through the palace, he saw in the pavement of the house a marble slab upon which the Lord's cross had been carved. He said: “We ought to fortify our forehead and breasts with the Lord's cross, and behold, now we trample it beneath our feet.” He immediately commanded the slab to be removed from there.

When it had been taken up, they found another slab bearing this sign of the cross, which he also commanded to be lifted. When this had been removed, they found a third also bearing such a sign of the cross. He commanded this also to be taken away. When it had been removed, they found a great treasure of more than a thousand talents of gold. After the gold had been taken up, he bestowed alms more abundantly than he had previously been accustomed.

Moreover, while Narses the patrician was presiding over Italy, he caused a great cistern to be dug in his house, in which he hid immense treasures. After all who knew of this matter had been killed, he entrusted it to one old man, from whom he had exacted an oath to conceal it.

After Narses died, the old man set out for Tiberius and said to him: “If it will be profitable to me, I shall disclose to you a matter of great usefulness.” “Speak,” said the emperor, “for it will be profitable to you.” The old man disclosed the place of the treasure that Narses had hidden.

Rejoicing, Tiberius sent his servants to that place. When the cistern had been opened, they found the treasure, and the cistern could scarcely be emptied over several days. Then, with a bountiful hand, Tiberius distributed nearly all the said treasure to the poor.

In the following year, namely the second of his empire, Tiberius sent his army against the nation of the Persians and happily subdued it. Returning victorious, he brought so great a mass of booty, with twenty elephants, that it was believed able to suffice for human desire.

Dappon, king of the Lombards [i.e., Cleph], closed his final day on the tenth day after his election. After him they were without a ruler for ten years, during which various dukes subjected almost all Italy except the city of Rome, which is known never to have come into the power of this nation.

During those times the Goths, divided, laid one another low by mutual slaughter. Pelagius II then governed the little ship of Peter; he was spoken of above.

The Lombards, crossing the Alps, rushed into Gaul and, after exacting great booty and a vast number of captives, returned to Italy. Wolves, entering the city of Burgedalensis and fearing no one, devoured the dogs.

At last Tiberius Augustus, when he had ruled for many years and foresaw that the end of his life was imminent, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-three, at the beginning, chose for the empire a certain man, Cappadocian by birth, vigorous and most wise, who was also called Maurice.

He also handed over to Maurice his daughter Constantia, adorned with royal ornaments, saying: “Let my empire be granted to you with this girl. Use it, therefore, happily, and hold equity and justice unceasingly in mind, for these are the principal insignia of the best emperor.” After he had said this, he breathed out his spirit.

Then Maurice, clothed in purple and crowned with a diadem, proceeded to the circus. After praises had been acclaimed to him and gifts bestowed according to custom, he, the first from the nation of the Greeks, obtained the Roman Empire.

VIII

Maurice therefore received the empire in the year of the Lord 584 and in the 5,784th year of the world, according to the computation of the larger number. He ruled for twenty-one years. He was a man Catholic in faith and sufficiently useful to the commonwealth. By his industry the Huns, who are also called Avars, were overcome and subdued.

Around this time true blood flowed from broken bread. In the first year of Maurice, the Persians troubled Armenia with plundering, fires, captivity of bishops, and captivity of peoples. Nevertheless, they could by no means burn the church of the forty-eight martyrs who suffered in Armenia under Licinius.

In the second year of Maurice's empire, Antioch was overturned in this manner. A certain citizen of that city was so given to alms and hospitality that he never ate on any day without a poor man or guest. On a certain day he went around the city until evening in order to find a poor man or guest. At last he found an elderly man, clothed in a white garment and standing with two companions in the middle of the city.

When he invited the man to hospitality, he received this answer from him: “O man of God, you were unable, together with our Symeon, to save it from being overturned.” Having said this, he shook the cloth that he held in his hand over one half of the city. Immediately that half of the city was overturned together with its habitations and inhabitants.

When he wished also to shake the cloth over the other half of the city, he was scarcely bent by his two companions, with many entreaties, to spare the remaining half of the city. Thus, after consoling the astonished man who was watching this by the salvation of his house, he departed and appeared no more.

In the seventh year of Maurice, excessive rains flooded, so that almost everyone doubted whether the waters of the flood in the time of Noah would cover the earth again. And so great a calamity came upon them that no one remembered a more grievous one from the beginning of the world.

A great dragon also, in the manner of a stout beam, descended through the Tiber into the sea with an innumerable multitude of serpents. The beasts suffocated by them and cast upon the seashore corrupted the air by their putrefaction. This was discussed above in the chapter concerning Pope Gregory.

Gregory, in the third book of the Dialogues, relates that in that flood of waters this miracle happened at Verona. At Rome, indeed, the River Tiber left its channel and increased so greatly that its wave flowed over the city's walls and occupied the largest regions within it.

At the city of Verona, however, it came to the church of blessed Zeno, martyr and pontiff. Although the doors of this church were open, the waters did not enter the church at all. Increasing little by little, they reached as far as the church's windows, which were near the roofs. Thus the standing water closed the church's doorway as though that liquid element had been changed into the solidity of a wall.

Since many had been found within and the church was surrounded on every side by the multitude of waters, they had no way by which they could leave and feared that they would fail there from hunger and thirst. They came to the church's doorway to drink and drew water, which, as I said before, had increased as far as the windows, yet did not flow within the church in any manner. Accordingly, it could be drawn as water. Standing before the doorway to display the martyr's merit to everyone, it was water for assistance and was, as it were, not water for invading the place.

Around those times this Emperor Maurice fought through his prefects against the Armenian Persians. He sent fifty thousand solidi to King Giliber [i.e., King Childebert II] of the Franks, so that with his army he might drive the Lombards from Italy. Giliber afterward sent a multitude of Franks into Italy.

Meanwhile the Lombards fortified themselves in the cities. After gifts had been offered to the envoys of the Franks, they confirmed peace with the king of the Franks, and the army of the Franks returned into Francia. When Maurice afterward learned this, he began to demand from the king of the Franks what he had offered, but the king of the Franks gave him no answer.

At that time the Lombards appointed Authari, son of Daphon [i.e., son of Cleph], as king over themselves. He was called Flavius, from whom they were afterward surnamed Flavii. He was their thirteenth king and reigned six years.

King Authari of the Lombards invaded Bresillus, situated above the bank of the Po, from which Droctulf, a duke, had fled from the Lombards and, handing himself over to the emperor's party, stoutly resisted the army of the Lombards with allied soldiers. But when he could not resist, he fled to Ravenna. The city Bresillus was captured and its walls were broken down.

Thereafter the Lombards besieged Rome. But when the Tiber overflowed so greatly that the waters rose above the city's walls and a plague also came upon them, they dissolved the siege. Through this inundation of waters, which occurred in the month of October, an innumerable multitude of men and beasts perished throughout Italy, especially at Rome and in Liguria and Venetia. Thunder and lightning also occurred beyond what was customary.

When Pope Pelagius died from that plague, Gregory was elected and approved by Maurice, although Gregory himself, who had lifted Maurice's son from the sacred font when he was at Constantinople, had adjured him by letters not to assent to such an election of him, as was said above.

For some time Maurice was affectionate and devoted toward Gregory, but afterward, through his own avarice and the false reports of others, he was changed into an adversary, as will be evident.

IX

In the eighth year of Maurice, Chosroes, son of Hormisdas, king of the Persians, killed his father after the Persians had blinded him. Chosroes fled to Emperor Maurice and, overcoming the Persians by his power, received the kingdom of the Persians, in which he reigned thirty-eight years. Emperor Maurice gave him his daughter, named Maria, as wife. Chosroes will be discussed below.

In the tenth year of Maurice, a certain man in Gaul, while cutting wood in a forest, was so infested by flies that he became insane for two years. Then, exhibiting himself under the garb of religion, he presented himself as a false prophet. Afterward, also performing healings upon the infirm, he said that he was Christ and commanded that he be adored as Christ.

With the people who adhered to him in great number, he pursued as enemies those who were unwilling to adore him. He was afterward killed by a certain faithful man, and thus his followers were dispersed. These things are from Sigebert.

Reccared, king of the Visigoths, disturbed the borders of the Romans in the tenth year of Maurice, as Sigebert says. Two years afterward the same king assembled a synod of sixty-two bishops at Toledo. There, after the Arian heresy had been renounced and anathematized, he confirmed himself with the whole assembly of the Visigoths in the Catholic faith.

At Constantinople a four-footed boy was born, and another having two heads. These prodigies portended adversities for the places in which they were born.

Around those times Philtanus reigned in Ireland. In Scotland was Brendan, whose brother was named Adelphius. From this Adelphius's daughter, who was called Gelgehess, Philtanus, king of Ireland, begot Saint Furseus, who will be discussed below, and his brothers Foillanus and Ulcanus. To this point Gregory of Tours composed the history of the Franks.

Around that time the tunic of our Lord Jesus Christ was found in the city of Zaphat, not far from Jerusalem, through the confession of Symeon, a Jew. By the bishops Gregory of Antioch, Thomas of Jerusalem, and John of Constantinople, it was placed at Jerusalem in the place where the cross of Christ was venerated.

Gaugericus, bishop of Cambrai, was illustrious.

At that time Agilulf, king of the Lombards, rose against the Romans. But through the agency of Queen Theudelinda, not long afterward he entered into a treaty with them. Pope Gregory sent the books of the Dialogues to this queen.

In those days the Lombards rushed upon Monte Cassino and broke down everything that they could find in the monastery of Saint Benedict. But they were able to seize no one, just as the Lord had promised the same servant of his: that although he would hand the possessions over to the nations, he would nevertheless save the souls. The monks therefore fled and sought Rome, carrying with them the codex of the Rule published by blessed Benedict, the weight of bread, and the measure of wine.

From morning until midday the sun was diminished to a third part of itself, namely by an eclipse when its light was withdrawn.

In the Egyptian River Nile, animals of human form were seen—a man, namely, and a woman—standing above the water as far as their loins. Adjured by God by men, they displayed themselves to be seen from morning until the ninth hour. The man was broad-chested, with a terrible countenance and red hair mixed with gray. The woman had breasts, a woman's face, and long hair. All the people marveled at them, naked as far as the loins; the water covered the rest.

In the eighteenth year of Maurice, the contention between the Roman Church and the arrogance of John of Constantinople, who had usurped for himself the name of universal patriarch, had been begun under Pope Pelagius and was then agitated not lightly by Gregory. It could not come to rest before John himself died a sudden death. Many letters of Gregory against John are found concerning this.

Augustine, bishop of the English, was consecrated by Etherius, bishop of Arles, and sent there with others by blessed Gregory. After holding a synod with the bishops of the Britons and Scots, because he found priests and monks who were adversaries of the truth, whom he wished to have as companions in preaching, he terrified them with a prophecy of a future calamity upon them.

In the twenty-first year of Maurice, the western English with their king Sigebert were converted to the faith of Christ through Bishop Mellitus, who had been sent with the aforesaid Augustine by Pope Gregory. Through Augustine himself, the dignity of the archbishopric that was formerly at London was transferred to the church of Canterbury.

After a very great drought had preceded, columns of locusts followed in a very great multitude. Devouring whatever grew green in the fields, they produced an immense famine for two years.

The first exarch of Italy, a Roman patrician, was created by the Roman people, and was the first prince against the Lombards; such a magistracy had not previously existed among them. He recovered the cities that were formerly held by the Lombards, namely Sutrium, Polimartium, Hortas, Tudertum, Ameria, Perusia, Luciolas, and many others.

Agilulf, king of the Lombards, confirmed peace with Cechano, king of the Huns, when the latter sought it through envoys coming from Pannonia. A comet appeared for a month.

X. Concerning the Killing of Maurice by Phocas, His Successor in the Empire

Finally, when Maurice perceived that Pope Gregory did not assent to his wishes, inasmuch as they were unjust, he admired the freedom of speech of so great a pontiff and the constancy of his rebuke, and strove to exercise tyranny against him.

But in that same year, namely the last of his empire, as John the Deacon relates, a certain man clothed in monastic garments, moved by a certain divine power, appeared. Taking a sword in his right hand and carrying it naked, namely from the forum as far as the bronze statue of the gladiator, he predicted that the emperor would die by the sword.

When Maurice learned this, he restrained himself from the tyranny to be inflicted upon Gregory. He feared all the more greatly that he would soon undergo the divine judgment that had been threatened against him, inasmuch as he believed Gregory could not lie, who at some time had, as it were, threatened this through letters.

Immediately he composed written prayers and sent many sums of money, candles, and incense both to Gregory himself and to all the patriarchs, bishops, and monks of cities or solitudes. He especially prayed for this: that he might receive the deserts of his evils in this world and not in the world to come.

When he had also sought this with tears for a long time, on a certain night while sleeping he saw himself standing before the bronze gate of the palace, in the presence of a great multitude, before the bronze statue of the Savior. Then a terrible voice came from that image of the incarnate Word, that is, the bronze figure, saying, “Give Maurice.”

The ministers of the judges seized him and placed him before that image of the Savior. From it a voice went forth: “Where do you wish me to repay to you the evils that you perpetrated in this world?” But he answered: “Lord, lover of men and just judge, repay them to me here rather than in the future world.”

Immediately the divine voice commanded that Maurice, Constantina his wife, all his sons and daughters, and all his kindred be handed over to the soldier Phocas.

Awakening, Maurice caused his son-in-law Philippicus to be summoned to him. He had formerly suspected that Philippicus wished to take the empire from him. Concluding that he was to perish because of the suspicion, Philippicus summoned Gordiana his wife and bade her a final farewell as one who would not return. After receiving the sacrament of communion, he came to the palace.

Entering the emperor's chamber, he fell at the emperor's feet. The emperor rose to him and likewise fell at his feet, saying: “Forgive me, I pray, because, taught by a divine revelation, I have learned that you committed against me none of the things that I suspected. But if you know anyone in our ranks who is customarily called Phocas, tell me.”

Philippicus, reflecting for a long time within himself, said: “I know one Phocas, who, recently named procurator by the army, contradicted your command.” When Maurice asked what his character was, he answered: “He is a certain young man and rash, but timid in action.” Maurice said, “If he is timid, then he is certainly also a murderer.”

While he hesitated over a matter of this kind, on the following day a magistrianus, returning from the hermits to whom he had carried the emperor's prayers, reported the answer, saying: “God, having received your penance, will save your soul and will establish you with your whole household among the saints. But you will fall from the empire with ignominy and danger.”

When Maurice heard these things, he glorified God and maintained his penance. But he did not withdraw from his desires even to this extent: he threatened Peter the praetor with deadly letters, commanding that the army should winter in dangerous places and, having crossed the Danube, should seek for itself, amid dangers, provisions from the region of the Slavs, lest they consume public food.

Peter summoned the commanders and said: “The emperor's commands—that the Romans should winter in a foreign province—seem exceedingly burdensome to me. It is cruel for the Romans not to obey, but to obey is most cruel. Avarice produces no good, because it is the mother of all evils. The emperor, sickening from it, is made the cause of these greatest evils for the Romans.”

Accordingly, when the army heard this through the commanders, it turned to sedition. Raising Phocas the centurion upon a shield, they acclaimed him exarch. After the praetor had been driven away, they sent Theodosius, the emperor's son, and Germanus, his father-in-law, so that one of them might undertake to rule over them. They consented in no manner, but rather reported it to Maurice.

Maurice wished to destroy Germanus. Since Germanus had fled into a church, Maurice scourged his own son as a betrayer of his plan. Although he sent many men to drag Germanus from that church, this was never permitted. Rather, torn by many insults from the people, Maurice was called a Marcionist heretic.

When a grave tumult had been stirred within Constantinople, Maurice, with his appearance disguised, boarded a vessel by night with his wife and sons. Fleeing, he came to Saint Antonion [read: Saint Autonomus]. Phocas, however, was made emperor with the army. At his command Maurice, with his sons, wife, and daughters, was beheaded near Macedonia [read: near Chalcedon] in the manner that had been announced to him.

Accordingly, on the seventh day before the Kalends of May, the image of Phocas and of Leontia his wife, the Augusti, was brought to Rome with their favorable letters. After acclamation had been made to them by the clergy and senate in the basilica of Julius, at Gregory's command the image was deposited in the oratory of Saint Caesarius established in the Lateran Palace.

When Phocas, having been made emperor, requested from Gregory, who then presided at Rome, that a deacon of the Roman See be sent to him with great reverence of humility, Gregory wrote thus:

“It pleases us to consider with joys and great acts of thanksgiving how great are the praises we owe to Almighty God, because, after the yoke of sadness had been removed, through the piety of your imperial benignity we came to times of liberty.

“For the fact that your serenity did not find a deacon of the Apostolic See remaining in the palace according to ancient custom was not due to my negligence, but to the gravest necessity. For while all the ministers of this Church, with fear, avoided and fled such oppressive and harsh times, it could be imposed upon none of them that he should go to the royal city to remain in the palace.

“But after they learned that, by the arrangement of Almighty God's grace, your clemency had come to the summit of the empire, they themselves also, persuaded by joy, hasten to come to your footsteps, although previously they had greatly feared to go there.

“The bearer of the present letter, who was the first of all the defenders, is well known to me through long attendance, approved in life, faith, and morals. I judged him fit for the footsteps of your piety. Therefore, with God as author, I made him a deacon and took care to send him swiftly. Having found an opportune time, he will be able to relate to your clemency all the things that are done in these parts.

“I ask that your clemency deign to incline pious ears to him, so that you may be able to have mercy upon us all the more swiftly, inasmuch as through his report you will have learned our affliction more truly. For we are unable to set forth fully by any representations how we are oppressed by daily swords and by so many incursions of the Lombards, behold, now through the length of thirty-five years. But we trust in Almighty God that he who raised up pious lords in the commonwealth will extinguish the cruel enemies.”

Title XII, Chapter VII

Concerning the Saints Who Were Illustrious in Life and Miracles in the Times of the Aforesaid Emperors

As Sigebert relates, in the seventeenth year of Emperor Maurice Saint Goar, coming from Aquitaine, was illustrious in Gaul. As Vincent narrates in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-three, from his deeds, he made a church in the suburb of Trier beside the river and placed there many relics of saints.

There he served God by day and night in fasts, vigils, prayer, and preaching. He converted many pagans and healed the sick. Hence the devil, envying his virtues, brought many tribulations upon him.

Accordingly, it happened that Alboin and Alamannus, envoys of the bishop of Trier named Rusticus, came as spies to the cell of the man of God so that they might be able to find there some novel or vain thing. They saw that, according to his usual practice, in the morning after psalmody and Mass he took food in charity with pilgrims and the poor.

Thinking that this was done not from charity but from gluttony, they accused him to the archbishop, saying that they had seen him eat or take drink in the morning without restraint.

When the archbishop heard this, he commanded those envoys to return there and present Saint Goar before him, saying that he wished to make an inquiry concerning him, so that he might know by what contrivance or art Goar had presumed to show such examples to the people entrusted to him.

When they came to blessed Goar, they spoke deceitfully to him, thinking that they could cover with flattering words the accusation by which they had defamed him. They said: “Our archbishop Rusticus sends you greeting and commands that you hasten to Trier for a conference with him.”

Hearing these things, Saint Goar said with joy: “May God cause me to be able to obey him, because obedience must be rendered without delay.” That night he made a supper for them according to his means, while he himself persevered in praises, as he was accustomed.

When morning came, after he had completed his course, he celebrated the solemnities of the Masses. When he had completed the divine office, he said to that servant: “Son, make for us a joyful day from our abundance, so that these envoys of the archbishop may perform charity together with us, because they are on a journey. And perhaps God will bring some poor man or pilgrim so that we may feast together.”

When they heard this, they could not hide the wickedness of their hearts and refused to consent to him. But after a certain pilgrim had been brought in, the saint ate with him in charity. Seeing this, the envoys joyfully saddled their horses, saying, “Now we have manifestly seen what we shall announce to the archbishop.”

Accordingly, after receiving from the man of God food and drink in vessels as provisions for the journey, they walked with him and began to be violently pressed by hunger and thirst. Putting their hands into the provision-box and wineskin, they found nothing, although they had certainly carried sufficient sustenance with them from Goar's house.

Alboin said to Alamannus: “I have never had such hunger and thirst.” Saying this, he fell from his horse as though dead. Alamannus, turning to the servant of God, said: “Aid us, pious priest of Christ, because we are dying of hunger and thirst.”

When Saint Goar heard these things, he said with joy: “Today, sons, when you saw an unworthy man perform charity, you should not have refused. My God permits these things that you now suffer to occur for your correction.”

While he said these things to them and hunger exceedingly afflicted them, three hinds of marvelous size came, representing the Trinity. Commanded by him to stand, they made themselves still. He milked them into a vessel and commanded them thereafter to depart.

The saint anointed their bodies with that milk, and immediately they felt none of the pain that had befallen them from hunger. Strengthened by it, they put their hands into their bundles, found food and drink, and feasted.

As they marveled among themselves at the things that had happened and were afraid, they pursued their journey and at last came to Trier. But the servant of God Goar proceeded through the oratories and churches of the saints, as he was accustomed to do.

The aforesaid envoys approached their archbishop and found him sitting upon his throne in synod with his clergy. They narrated the things that had happened to them and that they had seen.

When he heard them, he began to say with anger: “Insofar as I wish to consider with the understanding of my heart [read: As far as I am able to judge with the understanding of my heart], the custom of this obstinate man, who eats thus in the morning and milks beasts, must without doubt be imputed to gluttony rather than charity. Nevertheless, it must be inquired why he does this, or from what desire for human praise, and whether it is from the part of God or from the part of the adversary.”

He had scarcely completed the words, and behold, the man entered the house in which the archbishop himself was sitting. Entering, he began to look all around to see whether there might be a place where his disciple could stand and where he might hang or conceal his cloak.

After looking around for a long time, he saw in a corner of the house what appeared to be the likeness of a staff. It certainly was not a staff, but a ray of the sun penetrating the interior of the dwelling through a window. When he approached the ray of the sun, which presented the appearance of a rather thick pole, he hung his cloak upon that ray and there commanded his disciple to stand.

When Archbishop Rusticus saw this together with his clergy, he said: “Do you now see what he has done? Truly, if this deed were from God, he would not have eaten so early, because the earlier saints entered the kingdom of God through prayers and fasts. But what this marvelous deed that I see may be, I do not know in any manner; yet I am not a little stupefied by it. In the morning he eats and drinks, and now he also suspends his cloak upon a ray of the sun. Let him therefore come nearer, so that he may render an account concerning these things to those sitting around.”

Then a certain man came carrying in his arm an infant three nights old, who had been cast into a marble sewer where poor little women were accustomed to throw their infants. Seeing him, the archbishop said to Saint Goar: “Now you must show us whether your ministry is true or false. If it is true, through true obedience I command you to cause this infant to make known to us his father and his mother. If you are able to do this, we shall believe you and your virtues; but if not, we ought to believe nothing of you.”

Then the man of God sighed grievously and poured out tears, vehemently marveling why the pontiff, a disparager of his works, had commanded such a vain and inept obedience from him. Pouring out a prayer, he said: “Holy Trinity, I invoke you; and you, infant, in the name of the Trinity I adjure, that you name your father by name and likewise your mother.”

Answering, the infant said: “This Rusticus is my father; my mother is called Afflagia.” When he heard this, the bishop quickly fell at Saint Goar's feet, saying: “Now I know truly that you are a holy servant of God, to whom my crimes, which I thought so hidden that no one knew them except me, the woman, and one servant of mine, have been revealed through the words of my own son.”

Hearing these things, blessed Goar, filled with astonishment at the miracle, said: “Alas, alas, lord! Why through me, a wretched man, have your sins, hitherto hidden, been made manifest? A voluntary secret confession before God would have been better than this ignominious publication against your will.”

Then he solicitously and kindly admonished him to penance, saying: “As greatly as our Savior is merciful in forgiving, so greatly must you be prepared to do penance. But I, insofar as divine piety will grant me life and deign to hear me, have now resolved, with brotherly charity compelling me, to perform penance for you for seven years.”

When Sigebert, king of the Franks, heard the fame of such great sanctity and the new deeds, he immediately sent his envoys and commanded Saint Goar to come to him. As the king marveled and recounted all the miracles that had been done by the saint, all the people acclaimed to the king that he should make Goar archbishop of the city of Trier.

Since this was pleasing to the king, he asked the saint of God to consent to it. The saint answered him: “It is better for me to die than to receive the ministry of a bishop who is still living and to sin in the sight of the Lord. O king, permit Rusticus to bewail his crimes, just as you wish the Lord to forgive your sins.”

When the king pressed him greatly concerning this and asked him, with all the people and clergy seeking it, Goar said: “Most glorious prince, permit me first to return to my cell, so that I may prepare myself to give an answer to your highness.” The king said to him, “Go in peace, and when twenty days have passed, come to the city of Metz to answer.”

Returning to his cell, therefore, Goar began to be made sorrowful and to be wearied by a severe fever. Why say more? By day and night he prayed to the Lord to give him the aid of his defense and to deliver him from so grievous a yoke that the king wished to impose upon him. Unable to return to the king, he at last rested in peace in a good old age.

I. Saint Brigid

Before those times, namely while Justin the Elder was emperor, as Sigebert relates, the holy virgin of God Brigid shone in Scotland with admirable sanctity and miracles. As Vincent narrates in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-two, she was born in Scotland of Christian and noble parents. From childhood she grew in the pursuits of good things, was always intent upon chastity and sobriety, and, growing from good things to better, was admirable for signs from her girlhood itself.

When her mother sent her to gather butter from the milk of the cows and to render it by weight, as other girls in those regions were accustomed to do, this virgin, already given to hospitality and wishing to obey God rather than men, began to distribute both the milk and the butter liberally to the poor and to guests.

When the time came for all to render the produce of the cows, her fellow workers displayed their work. It came to Brigid's turn to render her work. Frightened and having nothing to render because she had bestowed everything upon the poor, and frightened by fear of her mother, she turned herself wholly to the Lord and ran to prayer. The Lord heard her, and immediately after the prayer she assigned to her mother her own work, more abundantly abounding in butter than that of all her fellow workers.

Not long afterward, when her parents wished according to human custom to betroth her, she, inspired from heaven and wishing and vowing to present herself to Christ as a chaste virgin, went to a most holy bishop named Machilla. He placed a white pallium, a bright garment, upon her head.

Kneeling humbly before God and the bishop at the altar and offering her virginal crown to the Lord, she touched the wooden foundation of the altar. It was immediately made green and, remaining green in this manner to the present day, drives infirmities from the faithful.

Once, when she had cooked lard in a cauldron for guests who were arriving, she mercifully gave some to a dog that fawned upon and begged from her. Nevertheless, when the lard was afterward drawn from the cauldron and divided among the guests, it was found completely full, as though nothing had been taken from it.

Once, when she had summoned reapers and laborers to her harvest and the day had become cloudy and exceedingly rainy throughout the surrounding region, not a drop of water fell upon her harvest.

Once, when she was pasturing her sheep in a level and grassy place, a very great inundation arose and she returned home with wet garments. When a solar ray entered within through the openings of the house, she, with the edge of her eyes dulled by shadow, thought that a tree had been placed crosswise and fixed there. Upon it she placed her rain-soaked garment, and thus it hung upon that slender solar ray as though upon a great and firm tree.

When lepers sought beer from her for drink and she had none, she blessed pure water, converted it into the best beer, and gave it to them. When someone sought salt from her, she converted a stone into salt. She restored eyes to one born blind.

Certain most wicked men stole her oxen and wished to cross a river with them. The men were submerged, while the oxen remained safe and returned by themselves to Saint Brigid's house.

A fierce and wild boar came at full speed to Brigid's flock, namely of pigs. Seeing it, the saint blessed it; immediately, after laying aside all ferocity, it remained with the herd of pigs.

A certain simple man saw a fox walking through the king's palace. Not knowing that it was tame and trained in diverse arts of agility, he killed it. When this became known, the angry king commanded that the man be killed and that his wife, his sons, and all that he had be reduced to servitude, unless a similarly trained fox were returned to him.

When Brigid heard this, she yoked her cart and proceeded across the level countryside to ask the king, along the road that led to the royal palace, beseeching God from the depth of her heart to provide. Immediately the Lord sent one of the wild foxes to her. Running across the fields, it approached blessed Brigid's cart, lightly raised itself, entered her cart, and, placing itself beneath Saint Brigid's garment, sat tamely in the cart with her.

Coming to the king, Brigid began to ask that the man who had offended in ignorance be absolved. The king refused unless a similar fox were restored to him. Brigid produced a fox trained in every art of cunning, as the former one had been. Marveling, the king commanded that the accused man depart free.

Not long after the man had been freed, when the saint had returned home, the deceitful fox, twisting itself amid the crowds and moving cunningly, fled and could not be captured.

Nine men were accustomed to bind themselves by a certain abominable superstition with vows and oaths that on the Kalends of June they would slaughter a man. Brigid preached to them that they should desist from this error. They refused unless the vow were first fulfilled. She began to pray to the Lord against the execration of their error.

Those men went out and beheld an image in the likeness of the man whom they wished to slaughter. They immediately pierced it through with their lances and, as though after a triumph over their adversary, returned to Brigid with their arms bloodied. Thus they were converted to penance.

By her prayer she conveyed an immense felled tree to the place appointed. She performed many other miracles.

Title XII, Chapter VIII

In the times of Childebert and Lothar, kings of the Franks, Saint Carilephus flourished. In the camps of Holy Church, protected by the shield of faith against the powers of the air, he hurled the darts of doctrine and flashed with the thunderbolts of miracles.

Born of most illustrious parents in the territory of Ariminum [read: in the territory of Auvergne], he was sent for the sake of learning to the monastery of Menate, where he received eloquence in letters and the form of holy conduct.

When he wished to undertake a singular contest against the devil and lead the eremitical life, a monk of the same monastery named Anitus was present for the sake of conference, a man endowed with the prerogative of the highest merits. While they held conversations with one another, they opened the codex of the Holy Gospel, and the line that first met them at the top was this: “He who loves father or mother more than me is not worthy of me.”

Accordingly, blessed Anitus, who was placed over the service storerooms, secretly placed the keys of the cellar beneath his abbot's pillow. Proceeding together, they came into the suburb of Orléans.

When they heard the fame of Saint Maximinus, who presided there over the companies of monks dwelling in the monastery of Micy, they hastened to see him. Humanely received by him, they were distinguished with priestly dignity through him.

Afterward, seeking a more remote habitation, they divided the vast woodlands and sought solitudes. As they traveled through them among all the shaded places of the groves and the most hidden lairs of wild beasts, a fertile place presented itself to their sight. It was then called Pitiachus and is now called the cell of Saint Anitus.

When a spring of water had been found there, they served God in that place for very many days with Saint Carilephus. When the fame of Saint Anitus reached the king's ears, at the king's command a basilica was built there and enriched by the king's resources.

Blessed Carilephus proposed to avoid the world's prosperous things and to seek adversities for the guardianship of himself. Hence, departing from Saint Anitus, he entered the interior of the desert. Taking his fellow soldier with him, he turned his course toward the parts of the city of Le Mans.

At last he turned aside into a place called Casagnanum, remote in access and delightful in the fertility of its soil. Accordingly, it was often visited by the wild beasts of the wilderness at his coming, so that it might in a certain manner be said: “And the beasts of the earth will be at peace with you.”

Amid these things Childebert went with his wife and all his retinue to the region of Le Mans. While he remained there, it was announced to him that a buffalo, an unusual beast in those places, lay hidden there. Rejoicing, the king commanded the hunters to prepare what was necessary for capturing the beast.

As they diligently traversed the land, the wretched buffalo that was to be captured ran to Saint Carilephus, as though approaching a singular protection. At last the hunters came to the place where the holy man was and the buffalo behind him. Then the servants, troubled by the unusual novelty of the matter, dared neither to touch the beast nor to bring any trouble upon the holy man.

When the king saw the miracle, he by no means honored the power of God, but said indignantly: “Whence comes to you, O unknown person, such great presumption, that without anyone granting it you dared to break into woodland under my right and to diminish in any respect the dignity of our hunt?”

The saint answered him: “O good king, we have broken into the haunts of wild beasts by no means for the sake of despising you or disturbing the hunt, but we sought places inaccessible to men so that we might be occupied more familiarly and earnestly in the service of the Lord.”

The troubled king commanded that they depart from there. But the servant of God invited the king to drink, so that he might be refreshed. He did not acquiesce but, despising him, attempted to return. The horse upon which he sat stood immovable and, though bloodied by the spurs, could not move itself.

While the king and all with him marveled at this, not knowing the cause of the matter, one of them, more prudent than the others, said: “Excellent king, I judge that this happened because you treated that servant of God insultingly.” He urged him to send a messenger to the man of God seeking pardon.

When the king had done this, the saint said: “Go and tell the king to return, because this happened to him since he departed angry and without a blessing.” The swift messenger returned to the king and related what had been enjoined upon him. Immediately, when its bonds had been loosed, the horse moved itself.

Returning to Saint Carilephus, the king prostrated himself and with tears sought and obtained pardon. He humbly asked that, out of devotion, Carilephus bring the wine to drink that he had previously offered.

When the man of God extended one cup of wine to the king, he and his retinue drank from it. It was marvelous that a small glass vessel abounded into so great a quantity that everyone drank sufficiently, yet its supply was not diminished.

Queen Aldiogadis [read: Queen Ultrogotha] also, a most noble and devout woman, heard the character of his life—namely his parsimony in food, sleeplessness at night, and vileness of garments, for he was wrapped in haircloth and lay sleeping upon the bare ground. Desiring to enjoy his presence, she promised that she would give him all the revenue of the estate where she resided if he deigned to visit her.

He said to the queen's messengers who came to him: “It is equitable and salutary for me to beware the sight of a woman, lest I, dwelling in the squalid places of the wilderness, be caught in the enemy's snares. Go, therefore, excellent young men, and relate these words to your lady. If I have any power, I shall pray to the Lord for her. But for as long as I am in the body, let her hold that I shall never see the face of a woman, nor will this little monastery ever lie open to the entrance of a woman.”

A little afterward, with the monks standing by, he predicted that the dissolution of his body was imminent. But when the report had spread through the people's mouths that Carilephus had never permitted himself to behold the sight of a woman or a woman to approach his monastery, a certain dishonest and curious woman wished to test the outcome of this matter.

Cutting the hair of her head, putting on male garments, girded with arms and carrying a staff, she approached the place. But when she wished to penetrate the interior and examine it curiously, both lights of her head were afflicted by a sudden bursting. Seized by a demon, she emitted through her mouth, from the enclosure of her breast, a horrifying flood of most dark blood.

After his death, namely that of Saint Carilephus, the blind were illuminated at his sepulcher, the infirm were healed, and those possessed by demons were freed.

Saint Anitus, abbot of the district of Chartres that they call Portensis, foretold his own departure when the Holy Spirit revealed it. After he was honorably buried, a church was built in his honor near the city of Orléans.

When the anniversary day of his assumption was solemnly celebrated and other citizens were proceeding to his church, a certain man, having a hoe, went to dig or cleanse a vineyard. When he was reproved by others because he did not attend this feast, he answered, “This man whom you worship was also a laborer.”

But when he entered the vineyard, his face was turned toward his back. Then, trembling and with great weeping, he entered the basilica as the people looked on. After a few days of praying continually in the same place, he recovered with his neck made straight.

I. Saint Gregory, Bishop of Langres

As Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-two, Gregory was born from the senators of Autun and governed that region for forty years so severely and strictly that the guilty could not endure him. He had a wife named Armentana, from whom he received sons. After her death he was elected bishop of Langres.

He caused thin barley loaves to be placed for himself beneath wheaten loaves. Breaking and distributing the wheaten loaves, he ate the barley ones without anyone knowing. He also did not drink wine, choosing such a glass that it concealed the clearness of the water.

Many demoniacs, signed with the rod that he was accustomed to carry, were healed; and if any sick person took anything from his bed, he was healed.

In ignorance he was accustomed to frequent the sepulcher of Saint Benignus. Saint Benignus appeared to him, rebuked him, and admonished him to build an oratory over his sepulcher. Made joyful by the martyr's discovery, he wept most bitterly because he had previously prohibited it and fittingly repaired the crypt that had fallen through age.

There, for love of the martyr, he had an oratory in which relics of many saints were kept. At night he proceeded to it from his house adjoining the baptistery. Striking the closed door with his hand alone, he opened it; entering, he prayed for a very long time in silence.

Afterward, for three hours and more, voices of saints singing psalms with him were heard. When this was completed, he returned so cautiously to his little bed and laid himself upon the couch that no one perceived it. The keepers of the baptistery unlocked the door with their own key and found it opened, as though no one had opened it.

On the day of this Gregory's burial, a certain religious man saw the heavens opened. The deceased had a face like a rose, but the rest of his body was white as a lily. He caused himself to be buried beside Saint Benignus.

As he was carried to burial, prisoners cried out that he should have mercy upon them. His body became so heavy that it could not be carried. When it had been set down, the beam in which the prisoners' feet were enclosed and constricted split in the middle after its obstacles had been repelled, and they were freed by the judge.

After much time, when his body was transferred to another place by Saint Tetricus, his successor and son, his face was found whole and unharmed, and nothing in his garment had changed.

A certain girl, combing her head on the Lord's Day, felt the teeth of the comb fastened to her fingers in such a way that she was greatly tormented. But she was healed at Saint Gregory's sepulcher.

In the time of Emperor Justinian also, as Sigebert says, two uterine brothers flourished in Gaul, born on one and the same day and consecrated pontiffs: Medard to the see of Noyon and Gildard to that of Rouen. On one day they were released from the world and received by Christ.

Concerning Saint Medard, Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror from his legend that, when he carried to an artisan the chasuble that his mother had given him, he gave it to a certain blind man who met him. Likewise, whatever he received for food while he pastured a flock of pigs he gave to the needy, while he himself was in want from day to day.

While still a boy in the schools, he predicted to a certain companion of his, Eleutherius, that he would receive the office of count in public administration and that, when thirty years old, he would become a pontiff. Thus it happened: that man was made bishop of Tournai.

At Medard's passing, the priest Vilcarius saw the heavens altogether opened, and lights shone before Saint Medard's body for three hours in the sight of all who were present. Immediately a great flood flowed over the earth when exceedingly warm rain fell from heaven.

II. Saint Germanus

Saint Germanus was a native of the territory of Autun, with Eleutherius as father and Eusebia as mother, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-two. Because the said Eusebia his mother had conceived him within a brief space after another child, moved by womanly shame, she desired to destroy him before birth.

She took a potion to destroy him, but when she could not harm him, she lay upon her belly so that at least by her weight she might suffocate him whom poisons did not injure.

He had a companion named Stratidius. Stratidius's mother, in order to obtain Germanus's inheritance for her son, placed a prepared potion in one flask and wine in another, commanding a girl that, when both came from school, she should offer the wine to the former and the poison to the other. But she unknowingly exchanged the flasks and cups and gave the poison to Stratidius and the wine to Germanus. Although anxious care was expended upon Stratidius, even if death did not take away his life, it nevertheless fixed in him the sign of death.

Germanus was therefore appointed abbot at Saint Symphorian by the venerable pontiff Nectarius. The bishop, inflamed by Germanus's good works, thrust him into custody. By divine will the prison was opened to him, but he did not depart from it unless the bishop's command was humbly given to him.

When an accidental fire arose, Germanus took a pot from the hearth and climbed upon the structure, singing “Alleluia.” Pouring out a little water in the form of a cross, he restrained the fires.

A certain Frank named Kariulsus had invaded his possessions. A bear avenged Germanus, devouring three of Kariulsus's horses every day and always tripling the damage until that man came to his senses.

When Germanus entered to her, Anna, the wife of Ebro, said: “Behold, Saint Germanus seems to me to walk with a horned face.” Ebro himself, both for honor and for terror, by no means presumed to sit beside the saint on that day. We believe that, because of his conversation with the Lord, this saint merited to be seen horned, as Moses was.

Four years beforehand he knew that he would become a bishop. For in sleep he saw the keys of the gate of Paris being extended to him by a certain old man. When he asked why this was done, he received the answer that he should save souls. Therefore, when the bishop of that city died, while Germanus was going to meet King Childebert, he was immediately elected bishop of Paris.

As he went to the church of a certain village, he met a certain youth named Amantius, whom he discovered being led in chains because he refused to be subjected to Jewish laws. But when Saint Germanus made the sign of the cross over him, the chains were loosed.

Likewise, when he had gone to Paris to the church of Saints Gervasius and Protasius for the sake of praying and entrance was denied to him because the doors were closed, he made the sign of the cross and opened the bolt.

Why say more? Wherever the presence of the pontiff turned itself, medicine was lacking for no kind of disease. Before him even demons, unable to tolerate his presence, lamented their burnings with a terrible howl. When he carried his foot out of a house or church, one could see the slaughter of demons before the gaze of so great a pontiff and triumphator.

They fell in troops around the saint's footsteps, poured out in diverse ways: some mute, others crying out. As though reporting their deeds before a judge, they did not escape their own torments.

Moreover, it cannot be explained how prodigal he was in alms. Frequently content with one chasuble or tunic, with whatever remained he clothed a naked poor man, so that the needy man was warmed while the giver grew cold.

How great also was the outpouring of redemption in him, when from every side those who were to be freed from the yoke of servitude ran together at the name of the blessed man. When at some time nothing was in his hands, sitting sad and anxious, he was severe in countenance and austere in speech. Then, if perhaps he was invited by someone to a meal, he compelled the fellow guests or his own servants to contribute together that from it they might free even one captive from servitude.

Who could worthily repeat how great a power of words revolved in his mouth when he preached to the people, so that astonishment arose in every learned person and a general compunction was produced in common? From the mouth of the speaker one would believe that the words were formed by an angel, while he spoke more than a man and, carried away in an excess of mind, compelled the hearts of the people, with sincerity of doctrine, to burn with divine ointments.

Riding on a journey, he always either spoke something concerning God or the Word, or sang. He traveled with his head uncovered, even if snow or rain pressed upon him. When he came to the table, a servant was immediately present reciting divine discourses, so that amid the courses of food the guest's spirit might be more fully satisfied by spiritual nourishment. He sullied no time in which he did not either benefit another or advance himself.

He predicted the day of his death in this manner. Some days beforehand, summoning his notary to himself, he commanded him to write only this much above his bed in his chamber: “The fifth day before the Kalends of June.” Although everyone was ignorant what this might mean, the saint's departure from the world afterward made it manifest. For on that day, nearly eighty years old, he migrated to the Lord.

III. Saint Radegund, Queen in Francia

She was of a barbarian nation, from the region of Thuringia, with King Berengar as her father. When that region had been devastated by a victory of the Franks, she departed from her homeland. Then among the very men whose royal prey she was, a dispute arose concerning the captive girl. Unless she had been returned after the contest was concluded, the kings would have moved arms against one another.

When she came into the lot of King Lothar, she was taken into the region of Vermandois and assigned to guardians at the royal villa Athias for nurture. When the aforesaid king wished to receive her at Victuriacum after preparations had been made, she slipped away by night with a few persons.

Then, when he had directed her from Soissons so that he might require her as queen, she avoided royal pomp, lest she increase in the world; but she is not changed from him to whom even human glory is owed. She therefore married an earthly prince, yet was not separated from the heavenly one.

As secular dignity accrued to her, her will inclined itself more than dignity permitted. Fearing that she would be degraded by God as she advanced in worldly rank, she enriched herself with alms from her resources. For whenever anything came to her from tributes, from all the things that came to her she gave tithes before she received them. Then she distributed what remained to monasteries, and where she could not go on foot she went around by sending a gift.

Likewise, at night, when she reclined with the prince, asking that she wished to rise because of human necessity, she arose and left the chamber. For so long she bent down in prayer before the privy, having cast down haircloth, that, warmed by spirit alone, she lay penetrated by frost, her whole flesh half-dead.

Because of this the king was told that he had in her a monastic wife rather than a queen, whence he himself, irritated, was exceedingly harsh toward her good works. But she partly soothed and partly endured the quarrels modestly inflicted by her husband.

It is enough to know how, during the days of Lent, she governed herself while doing penance singularly amid royal garments. Therefore, as the time of fasting approached, she sent to a religious nun named Pia, who, in support of Radegund's holy purpose, reverently sent her a haircloth sealed in linen. The saint put it against her body and carried it throughout all Lent beneath her royal garment as a sweet burden.

If the king was absent, who could believe how she poured herself out in prayer, how she bound herself as though present at Christ's feet, and how, as though filled with delicacies, she was satisfied by a long fast in tears? To her, contempt for the belly's food was complete refreshment in Christ, and her entire hunger in Christ was that which she accomplished solicitously through piety.

If anyone, as is customary, was assigned by the king to be killed for a criminal fault, the most holy queen was moved to torment lest the designated accused die by the sword. How she ran about among faithful household servants and nobles, by whose flatteries she soothed the prince's mind, until from the very anger of the king whence the lot of death had proceeded, thence ran forth the voice of salvation.

Divine clemency advanced her, occupied in these blessed deeds, to such a degree that even while she was still a laywoman in the palace, miracles were made manifest through her by the Lord's bounty.

Finally, while the most holy woman walked through a certain villa, men thrust into prison for a crime cried aloud from the prison that she should succor them. She asked what it was, but the servants lied that a crowd of beggars was seeking alms. Meanwhile those who were held in fetters were compelled by the judge to be silent. When night came, their chains were broken and, released from prison, they ran to meet the saint.

Because, with divinity prospering it, some occasion falls toward salvation so that she might live more religiously, her brother was killed innocently. Sent by the king, therefore, she came to blessed Medard at Noyon and urgently begged that, after her garment had been changed, he consecrate her to the Lord.

Immediately she took off the noble garment in which, on a most celebrated day and with pomp accompanying her, she was accustomed to proceed as queen, and placed it upon the altar. Removing her ornaments and gems, she venerably burdened the table of divine glory. Breaking the girdle weighted with gold, she gave it for the needs of the poor.

IV

Furthermore, the mind of the aforesaid Saint Radegund was intent upon Christ. At Poitiers, through the inspiration and cooperation of God's grace, she constructed a monastery for herself by the arrangement of the most exalted King Lothar. Rejoicing, she entered it, where she might both seek the ornaments of perfection and gather a great congregation of maidens to Christ, the bridegroom who never dies.

When an abbess had been elected and established, Radegund handed both herself and all her possessions over to her authority, reserving nothing for herself from her own right, so that she might run unencumbered after Christ's footsteps and increase so much more for herself in heaven as she had withdrawn from the world.

But the envious enemy of the goods of the human race, whose will she had abhorred to do even while she was in the world, did not cease to persecute her. For, just as she had already learned through messengers what she feared, the most exalted King Lothar came to Tours with his most excellent son Sigebert as though for the sake of devotion, so that he might more easily approach Poitiers and receive his queen.

When this became known, blessed Radegund composed sacramental letters under attestation to the apostolic man Saint Germanus, bishop of Paris, who was then with the king. She sent them more secretly through Proculus, her agent, with a present or blessings.

When the man full of God read them, he cast himself with tears at the king's feet before Saint Martin's sepulcher, beseeching him by divine attestation, as had been intimated to him through the letters, not to approach Poitiers.

Then the king, full of bitterness and understanding that this petition was that of the blessed queen, was led to penance, imputing this to evil counselors and judging himself unworthy because he had not merited to possess such a queen for longer. He also prostrated himself before Saint Martin's thresholds at the feet of the apostolic man, asking that on his behalf Germanus seek pardon from blessed Radegund, so that she might forgive what he had sinned against her through evil counselors.

Divine vengeance punished them concerning this in the present life. For just as Arius, fighting against the Catholic faith, deposited all his intestines in a privy, so it also happened to those who acted against blessed Radegund.

Then the king, fearing divine judgment, asked the blessed man Germanus, the bishop, to go swiftly to Poitiers to seek pardon on his behalf, which he did. Coming to Poitiers, Germanus entered the monastery's oratory and prostrated himself at the holy queen's feet, seeking pardon for the king.

Rejoicing that she had been snatched from the jaws of the world, she kindly forgave him and prepared herself, unencumbered for God's service, to follow Christ wherever he might go.

Who could enumerate the infinitely many ways in which she bore herself in each matter? At the table she also secretly ate fine-wheat or barley bread hidden beneath a flat cake, so that no one perceived it. For from the time when she was veiled by blessed Medard's consecration until her illness, she had nothing for food except legumes and vegetables—not fruit, fish, egg, or any other thing. For drink she took nothing except honeyed water and a drink called miratum [read: piracium, perry or pear cider].

Then, according to the custom of Saint Germanus, she commanded a very secret mill to be brought to her. During the whole forty-day fast she labored at it only as much as a four-day refreshment demanded.

When a bath had been prepared, on Saturday she, girded up, washed the heads of the needy, rubbing away whatever scab, mange, or moth-like corruption there was, not disdaining the purulent sores and at times drawing out worms, cleansing the putrefactions of the skin. She herself combed one by one the heads that she had washed. If, as they departed, anyone had worn-out garments, she took them away and returned new garments shorn of roughness.

She caused ragged people to be properly clothed before they came to a meal. When they had been gathered and the service prepared, she herself extended water or a cloth to each; and for the infirm she herself likewise wiped mouth and hands.

Then, when three courses had been brought, she stood fasting before those dining and was present to the guests. She herself cut the bread, meat, or whatever was set before them. For the sick and the blind she did not cease herself to extend foods with spoons.

Taking women covered with diverse spots of leprosy, she embraced them with a kiss, loving them with her whole soul in God. As they departed, she furnished assistance in gold or clothing.

During the first Lent in which she enclosed herself in a little cell until it had passed, she took no food of bread except on the Lord's Day, but only herbs or vegetables of mallows seasoned without a drop of oil and without salt. Taking not even two sextarii of water during the whole fast, she labored under so great a thirst that, with her throat dried, she could scarcely recite the psalms, parched.

Always having haircloth against her body, she completed vigils while chanting. Before her she had ashes spread out and, after haircloth had been thrown over them, used this for her little bed. She had no sleeve with which to clothe her arm except that she made two sleeves from her stocking. But she treated herself in such a way that not even the abbess perceived these things.

While all the nuns were still asleep, she cleaned and anointed their footwear and sent it back through the individual cells.

Of the monastic offices, nothing pleased her unless she served first. She chastised herself if she performed a good work after another. Therefore, in her turns, sweeping the monastery's streets or corners and cleansing whatever was filthy, she did not shrink from carrying away burdens that others abhorred even to see. Not delaying to cleanse even the secret work, she swept and carried away the stench of dung.

She believed herself the lesser unless she ennobled herself by the vileness of service, carrying wood upon her arms. Falling, and not withdrawing herself though injured, beyond her assigned week she served the infirm, herself preparing foods, washing the faces of the sick, then, when the meals had been completed, herself washing the vessels and cleaning the kitchen brightly.

She showed kindness to all, washing and kissing their feet; and, still prostrated before everyone, she begged pardon for negligence committed.

After so many labors, her own voice that reports them shudders at what punishments she inflicted upon herself. On one occasion she had iron rings brought to her and bound them around her neck or arms for forty days. Inserting three chains and binding them tightly around her body, she enclosed the hard iron as the tender flesh grew over it.

When the fast had passed and she wished to draw out the chains enclosed beneath the skin but could not, the flesh across her back and breast was cut in a circle over the chained iron, so that the blood poured out emptied her little body to the utmost.

On another occasion she commanded a plate of bronze to be made in the sign of Christ. Heating it in her cell, she pressed it deeply into two places of her body, with all the flesh cooked. Thus, while the spirit burned, she caused the limbs to burn.

Still devising something more grievous against herself as her own torturer, during one Lent, beyond the austere fast and the torment of burning thirst, while the punishment of haircloth scattered her tender limbs with rough bristles, she commanded a brazier full of burning coals to be carried in.

When the others had departed from there, her trembling limbs were armed in spirit for punishment, considering that because these were not times of persecution she could not become a martyr. Amid these things, as though to cool so fervent a spirit, she resolved to set her body on fire.

The glowing metal was applied, hissing as it burned the limbs. The innermost skin was consumed wherever the heat touched it. A silent pit was made where it touched, but the decaying blood disclosed the openings because her voice did not betray her in the punishment. Thus, for the sweetness of Christ, the woman willingly received so many bitter things. Hence it came about that miracles did not keep silent about what she herself had hidden.

Praise of God departed from her heart and mouth to so small a degree that, on a certain day, when she saw the monastery's doorkeeper, named Codegundis, passing by, when she wished to call her by her name she cried, “Alleluia.” She did this a thousand times.

Never was a lie, never a curse, uttered from her mouth against any person whatever. Not only did she not detract from anyone, but she did not even hear one who detracted. She always prayed patiently for those who persecuted her and taught others to pray.

She never imposed upon anyone what she herself had not first done. From wherever a servant of God came, she solicitously inquired how he served God. If she learned from him any new thing that she herself did not do, she immediately first imposed it upon herself with all alacrity, and afterward both taught it to the congregation by word and displayed it by example.

When a psalm or reading ceased before her, she never departed. Although at night she seemed to take sleep for the space of scarcely one hour, a reading was always being read. When the reading ceased, her mind, intent upon Christ, seemed to say, “I sleep, and my heart watches.”

Concerning her miracles: a certain woman, when she labored grievously from an invasion of the enemy and they were scarcely able to bring the rebellious foe to the saint, commanded the adversary with his swelling to cast himself upon the pavement. As soon as he cast himself to the earth according to the blessed woman's command, he who was feared became afraid and was expelled.

Because the glory of the Creator also exists in the smallest things, it happened that, while a ball of yarn that the saint had spun hung from the chamber, a mouse came to touch it. Before it bit through the thread, it died and hung in its bite.

The most blessed woman asked that a stout laurel tree be torn from its place and transferred to her little cell for delight. When this had been done, because the transplanted root did not adhere, it became wholly dry in its leaves.

The abbess jestingly imputed this to her, saying that unless she prayed that the tree adhere to the earth, she would abstain from food. This was not said vainly, for through the saint's intercession the dried laurel revived in leaves, branches, and root.

Likewise, when the said saint was enclosed in her little cell, she heard weeping over a little nun who had died. Compassionating her corpse, the saint commanded it to be carried to her little cell and commanded everyone to depart. Meanwhile, while the funeral rites were prepared, she handled the little body, which had been dead for seven hours, and by praying restored her to life and health.

When she sent to the emperor for a portion of the wood of the saving cross and they brought some from it, she placed it in her monastery at Poitiers. Many miracles were displayed in the presence of this wood.

But when the messengers made their journey by sea, a great storm arose, so that their ship lay exposed to perils in the middle of the sea for forty days and nights. Despairing of escape, they invoked Saint Radegund for their aid. At the invocation of her name, a dove appeared. Circling the ship, it restored her servants from the gates of death to life.

At the very hour in which she migrated from the world, the saint appeared in sleep to a tribune of the treasury named Demolemus when he was failing entirely from an illness of suffocation. Touching his throat, she healed him, commanding that he release seven men whom he held in prison.

Awakening and finding himself healthy, he judged that the saint had migrated at that hour. Sending a messenger, he found it so, and he absolved from prison those who had been freed.

Vinoberga was one of her servants. By a rash presumption she presumed to sit in the blessed queen's chair after her departure. When she had done this, struck by God's judgment, she burned so greatly that everyone saw smoke proceeding upward from her. Confessing before all the people, she cried out that she had sinned and that she burned because she had sat in the blessed woman's seat.

For three days and nights, suffering the burning, she cried aloud: “Lady Radegund, I have sinned. I acted wickedly; forgive me. Cool my limbs burned by harsh torment.” All the people, seeing her in so great a punishment, prayed for her. Thus the blessed woman, kindly yielding to everyone's prayers, restrained the burning fire, and Vinoberga returned home safe.

The passing of this saint is observed on the Ides of August.

V. Brendan and Maglorius

At that time, as Sigebert says, Brendan was illustrious in Scotland. Seeking the Fortunate Isles by a seven-year voyage, he saw many things worthy of miracle.

Machutus, who is also called Maglorius, having been brought up according to the rule by Brendan and having been his companion in that voyage, was illustrious in Britain for sanctity and miracles.

As Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-two, Maglorius was born of noble parents in quadrangular Britain, from a mother said to be already decrepit, namely sixty-six years old, who was the sister of Haymo, the father of Saint Samson.

Saint Brendan the abbot baptized this Maglorius, received him thereafter as a spiritual son to be spiritually educated, and instructed him in letters. Although tender in age, he was nevertheless strong in spirit and founded in stable gravity. He testified that a fiery vigor burned strongly within his little body, so that while his fellow pupils were seen to chatter their teeth from excessive cold, he, fervent in spirit, was warm in body at every hour.

Accordingly, in the manner of boys, he and his fellow pupils proceeded to the seashore, so that they might relieve the labor of discipline by permission to play. But while the others fled before the inundation of the continually swelling sea, abandoned their play, and returned to the schools, the holy boy remained on the shore, sleeping upon a bundle of seaweed.

As the sea approached, it did not touch him at all but surrounded him. By divine will, as greatly as it rose around him, so greatly was the place on the shore where he lay raised up.

At last the boy, awakened by the horror of the sound of the waves, looked around. When he saw none of his fellow pupils, he began to call them by name. When no one answered him, he said within himself: “Almighty God, where have I now been placed? Do not abandon me, but aid me.”

Meanwhile the master solicitously asked the disciples where his most beloved pupil was. When they answered that they did not know, he groaned, fearing that Maglorius had been submerged. With evening already imminent, he proceeded to the seashore with his schoolboys, and they began to look all around through the waves of the sea, to see whether perhaps they might happen to see even the boy's corpse.

Not finding him, they returned to the monastery and celebrated the boy's funeral rites as though he were already dead. But while Saint Brendan prayed at night, an angel appeared to him, signifying that the boy was safe amid the sea's waves. “Behold,” he said, “for the boy's preservation a perpetual island has been made where he lay sleeping.”

Then the saint, giving thanks to the Lord, went with the brothers to the shore in the morning. There he saw the boy singing praises to the Lord upon a higher place of the island and joyfully greeted him.

Inviting everyone to bless God, the boy added: “Permit me to remain for at least one day now where the Savior's piety has deigned to illuminate me by a miracle. But bring my psalter also, so that I may have it with me; and if there is no means by which it may be carried to me, place it in the sea.”

When the holy master cast it into the sea, the bundle of seaweed upon which the boy had lain sleeping ran up, received the psalter upon itself, and presented it to the boy on the island, unwetted by the waters.

When Saint Brendan wished to assign him to his parents at their request, the boy said tearfully: “Holy master, venerable also to my parents, did I not hear, when the Gospel was read, ‘Do not call anyone your father upon earth’?” Thus his parents left him with the master.

On a certain night, he rose so that, according to custom, he might carry before the master into the church for Matins a candle burning in a lamp. When he approached the lamp or lantern to light it, the other boys, his companions, at envy's instigation, extinguished the fire from which the light ought to be kindled, wishing him to suffer blows from the master on this account.

When he discovered this, the boy, uncertain what to do, gathered at least the dead coals into his bosom. Suddenly fire broke forth among them, while his garment remained unharmed by them. Returning to the master, he found the candle illuminated by an angel.

Thus, remaining a virgin throughout his whole life, he put on the monastic habit. At last, when Saint Machutus returned to his homeland after a long voyage, flashing with miracles, the kings and nobles of that province elected him to the summit of the episcopate.

Solemnly ordained and happily administering the sacred office for some time, he again equipped ships and came to a certain island with Brendan, his former master. There they found a sepulcher of marvelous size.

Then Saint Brendan with his brothers asked blessed Machutus that by his prayer he should raise whatever body was buried there. Although at first he excused himself from this work, lest he appear disobedient to his master he prostrated himself with tears and, praying, raised the dead man, who was of giant stature.

When asked who he was and of what condition, he answered that he was named Milduinus and had been a pagan and idolater. He also narrated the torments that he had endured with the other lost souls and that through the merits of blessed Machutus he had been snatched from them.

He confessed that Christ is true God and the Son of God, and that the Jews who crucified him were tormented more than the others. Understanding, therefore, that he had been raised by the power of the Deity, he urgently sought to be reborn from water and the Spirit. Instructed by Machutus in the faith, he received baptism and, after a short time, rested in the Lord.

At last, preparing to return to their homeland, they moved their vessel from its station. When the most sacred day of Easter dawned, looking around, they approached what seemed to be a small island. There, at the brothers' suggestion, Machutus began to celebrate the solemnities of the Masses.

As the brothers sang the Mass with psalmody, the order of the Mass reached the Lord's Prayer. Then suddenly the whole thing that seemed to be an island was moved. It was a beast of those called whales, an inhabitant of the abyss, of so great a size that a little earlier they had believed it to be an island or some considerable expanse of land.

Those standing above perceived that it was a living animal. While everyone, terrified and crying out that they would now be submerged and swallowed, the man of the Lord stood unafraid, trusting in God, until the Mass had been completed. He began to comfort the company of brothers, setting before them the prophet Jonah, preserved unharmed for three days in the whale's belly, and saying that divine aids are present where human aids are absent.

When all fled to the ship, the holy man prostrated himself in prayer, asking God to make that whale immovable until that congregation of brothers escaped unharmed. Thus it happened that it remained immovable.

The same Saint Machutus, when he celebrated Mass on the vigil of Easter, commanded men carrying a corpse before the church doors to wait until the completion of the Mass. When it had been completed, by his prayer he restored that dead man to life.

When the man who had been raised, being thirsty, sought a drink of wine, the saint commanded that a marble vessel full of water be brought. By his episcopal blessing he converted the marble vessel into glass and the water in it into excellent wine.

As he traveled through Britain preaching the word of God, he found a swineherd mourning because by the cast of a stone he had killed a sow, since it had unseasonably devoured the crops. Seven piglets lay upon her, unable to draw milk or anything from her teats.

Compassionating him, the saint of God placed the point of his staff into the sow's ear. Thus she revived and nourished her young.

Likewise, when in a certain place many things had been brought to him and his companions, among the rest a certain countryman gave a little ass for carrying wood from the forest. One day a wolf killed and ate it. But the saint of God went into the forest where the wolf had withdrawn, caused the wolf to come to him, and placed upon it the burden of wood to be carried in place of the ass. Made a domestic animal, it performed the ass's office in carrying burdens.

The Lord performed very many other things through him. At last he rested with a holy end on the seventeenth day before the Kalends of December.

VI. Saint Samson of Dol

Sigebert relates that at that time Samson, archbishop of Dol and kinsman of blessed Maglorius, and Maglorius, Samson's successor—who had crossed from Britain beyond the sea to Britain on this side—were illustrious for sanctity and miracles.

As Vincent relates from Samson's deeds in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-two, this Samson was born in the province of Metiana from noble parents: his mother was Anna, formerly sterile, and his father Amon. It was revealed by the Lord to his mother herself that she would conceive such a son, upon whom she should impose the name Samson, who would become great in the sight of God and a holy priest.

Thus conceived and born, when he was five years old and wished to attend schools, his father opposed it lest he become a cleric. But, admonished by a heavenly rebuke through a dream, he was warned not to recall him from the schools.

He was therefore under the mastership of an excellent teacher of the Britons named Elchut, who was one of Saint Germanus's disciples. He was the wisest of all the Britons in all the Scriptures of the New and Old Testaments and all the arts of philosophy.

Thus the boy, instructed by him in letters, when he was about fifteen years old exercised himself in fasts and vigils more than everyone, so that he often strove to observe fasts of two days.

On a certain day in summertime, when the brothers had gone out to clear harmful growths of herbs from the crop, a certain snake coming out of a bush bit one brother in the groin. He immediately fell to the earth half-dead. When everyone despaired of his life, Samson came and, entreating God for his safety over the space of three hours, restored him completely to health.

When the aforesaid Samson was ordained deacon by Lord Dubricius, the pope—that is, the bishop—a dove was seen to descend upon him and remain immovable. The same happened when in his time he was promoted to the priesthood.

The more he ascended to a higher grade, the more he inserted himself into the path of stricter abstinence. Overcoming lustful incitements in the flower of his youth, he possessed a voluntary purity of the flesh as though by nature. He never tasted anything of any animal throughout his whole life.

Out of envy, one of the brothers offered him a death-bearing cup infected with poison, the malice of which had been shown by the trial of a certain animal that died from it. Drinking it, Samson was harmed in no respect.

But because the man who had committed so great a crime against the saint did no penance within himself, God's vengeance came swiftly. For on the following Lord's Day, when he communicated from Samson's hand, Satan entered him with the morsel and tormented him terribly, so that he tore himself, shamefully stripped himself naked, and lacerated his lips with his teeth.

But when the man of God Samson compassionated him and entreated with tears on his behalf, he obtained his deliverance, while the man performed penance before everyone for the evil committed.

The saint passed almost the whole night sleepless, occupying himself in reading and meditating upon the Scriptures. If it was ever necessary for him to rest as a man, inclining himself against a wall or the support of some hard object, he never slept upon a bed.

Inspired by God, he undertook a long journey to visit his infirm father. As he passed through a forest, a companion of his, fallen to the earth and half-dead from fear and horror of a certain monstrous animal that met them, was restored to safety by his prayer.

At last he came to the house of his father Amon. Rejoicing greatly at his arrival, his father publicly brought forth a capital crime that he had concealed within himself, vowed himself to the service of God, and caused his head to be tonsured. He also caused his wife, Samson's mother, with their five sons, to serve the Most High. But one sister, then a little girl, whom Samson foreknew would be entangled in pleasures, he nevertheless commanded to be nourished because she was a creature of God.

Then, returning to the former monastery, he found a terrible serpent in the grove. When it breathed against him with its head aflame, he killed it by the sign of the cross.

Created abbot in his monastery, he taught his brothers by word and example to live according to the Rule and the life of the saints. After a year and a half, entering a vast solitude, he resolved to dwell alone so that he might enjoy God more frequently. There by prayer he also procured for himself a spring of water.

In a nocturnal vision three bishops crowned with a golden diadem appeared to him as they entered the church. When he asked their names, they said that they were Peter, James, and John and had come to confirm him as bishop.

Hence, a little afterward, bishops assembled with Dubricius his metropolitan to provide a bishop for a certain widowed church. When the Lord revealed to them that Samson should be received for that pontificate, it pleased everyone to assent to him.

A dove was seen to descend upon him and remain until he was ordained bishop. It was seen by Dubricius and two excellent monks, when he celebrated Mass, that fire solemnly went forth from his mouth and nostrils. At his Masses, from the day when he was ordained priest, angels were ministers of his altar and sacrifice.

At last, while he solemnly celebrated Mass at Easter, an angel of the Lord appeared to him, strengthened him, and admonished him to set out across the sea.

Undertaking the journey, he visited his mother on the way and also found his sister separated from her mother and polluted by adultery. Because she persisted in this evil, he excommunicated her.

After doctrine and miracles, he at last came by ship into Lesser Britain. Descending from the ship near the harbor, he found a certain man weeping, looking toward the sea, and remaining at the door of his hut. When Samson asked him the cause of his grief, he said: “I have in this hut a leprous wife and a demon-possessed daughter, and I await a man from across the sea who ought to heal them, as was promised to me.”

The man of God therefore entered the hut and, pouring out a prayer over them, restored them to health.

In those parts he founded a monastery called Dol. After very many had been gathered there to serve God, and not ceasing by day or night from divine conversations and prayer, while devoting himself to fasts and vigils, he rested in peace, illustrious in miracles.

VII. Saint Ethbinus

As the Historical Mirror, book twenty-two, relates, this saint was born in the regions of Britain. Most noble in his father's house, he was instructed in the liberal arts until his fifteenth year.

When his father died, his mother fled to Saint Samson, who consecrated her with the sacred veil and dedicated her to God; shaving the hair of her son Ethbinus's head, he made him a cleric. Remaining with Samson for some years, Ethbinus continually served him.

On a certain day while Samson celebrated, Ethbinus heard the words of the Lord saying in the Gospel: “He who does not renounce all that he possesses cannot be my disciple.” Compelled by this voice, he abandoned everything and came to Saint Similianus the abbot. He received the monastic habit from his hand and, in the monastery of Tauracum, bent his neck beneath the Lord's yoke.

In this monastery dwelt Saint Vignalocus, priest and monk. At the abbot's command he was accustomed to visit a church one mile distant from the monastery and there offer sacrifices to the Lord. For this he joined to himself Saint Ethbinus the deacon as a companion.

On a certain day, therefore, as they went, they found a leper lying in a field, filled entirely with wounds and asking aid from them with a tearful voice. When asked concerning his infirmity, he said: “Grievous pains rage throughout my body, but beyond them one pain is so harmful that, if I pass this day without its alleviation, I judge death to be near. For my nostrils, full of dung, are burned by the heat of the infirmity.”

Then Ethbinus, seizing him by the sides, lifted him upward from the ground, and Vignalocus extended his hands to the man's nostrils. But the poor man began to cry with a tearful voice: “Do not, elder, take my nostrils with your hands, because the pain does not permit it. But if you wish to wash away my pain, it is necessary that you put my nostrils into your mouth and draw in this way.”

Then Vignalocus, exalted by merits, humbled himself. When he thought to alleviate the poor man's pain, with his own mouth he received the flesh of the Son of God. Immediately, as he drew it to himself, a marvelous piece fell into his mouth.

Blessed Ethbinus, holding the Lord by the sides, looked upward, saw heaven opened, and saw the holy cross appear upon the head of the Lord whom he held. He also saw the Lord's angels coming to meet them.

Then he said to the priest: “Holy father, believe that the one whom I hold with my hands and you with your mouth is our Lord Jesus Christ, who handed himself over for us.”

When they wished to hold the Lord with their hands, he lifted himself into the clouds, saying: “My servants, you were not ashamed of me in my afflictions; neither shall I be ashamed of you in the kingdom of my Father. Your inheritance is with me, and salvation in my kingdom belongs to those who will have been mindful of you in their prayers.”

When he had said these things, he vanished from their eyes and was received into heaven. As they remained stupefied, each began to attribute the miracle to the other: Vignalocus to Ethbinus because of his perfect obedience, so that he omitted nothing commanded to him; Ethbinus to Vignalocus because of his daily celebration of Mass.

Finally, when the Franks devastated Britain, Ethbinus sought the regions of Ireland. In a forest called Nectensis, as a poor pilgrim, he made a hut and built a church in which he served the Lord.

On a certain day, in the name of Christ, he healed a lame man seeking alms from him. A certain woman also sought healing for her paralytic son. Ethbinus answered her: “We sinners cannot perform this miracle; we do not have this in practice. But if you wish your son to be healed, lead him to Saint Brigid's sepulcher.”

She said: “O father, I have already carried him there, but on a certain night I heard a voice telling me to approach you.” Entering the oratory, therefore, Ethbinus poured out prayers to the Lord on his behalf and restored him to health.

The holy man lived in that same place for twenty years, flashing with miracles. He was of such great abstinence that food entered him during the week only on Thursday, and that food was bread and water. He drank wine only when he communicated.

When he was now eighty-three years old and wearied by sharp pain, he summoned the brothers and foretold his death. After commending them to God, he rendered up his spirit before the altar on the fourteenth day before the Kalends of November.

VIII. Saint Basolus

In the second year of Emperor Justin, as Sigebert says, Basolus the abbot and Sindulphus, priest and recluse, were illustrious in Francia.

This Basolus, as Vincent relates from his deeds in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-two, was born in the territory of Limoges. When, in the times of his youth, the growth of sacred service touched him, he turned himself wholly to the work of divine service.

When he moved his foot beyond the boundaries of that place as a pilgrim, an angel of the Lord appeared to him as a companion on the journey. With the angel as guide, he came to the city of Reims, where the holy man Egidius, fourth after blessed Remigius, held the pontificate.

King Chilperic of the Franks and the nobles of the kingdom loved Egidius greatly. Thus, in the dispute that had arisen between Chilperic and Childebert concerning the principate of the kingdom, the same prelate did not fail to aid King Childeric [read: King Chilperic]. Hence he afterward sustained many adversities.

Honorably received by this man, the man of God Basolus sought that a more secret dwelling be granted to him because he had the intention of avoiding the crowds of peoples. At first, by the grace and authority of the same pontiff, he led the monastic life in a certain monastery at the roots of the mountain of Reims.

When he had grown sublimely from virtue to virtue, wishing to undertake the solitary way, he constructed for himself a cell with an oratory on the summit of the wooded mountain. Dwelling there for forty years, he faithfully fought in singular combat against the ancient serpent.

When he labored there from lack of water, he turned devoutly to God and prayed. More quickly than it can be said, a spring began to flow most abundantly in that same place, sweet to drink and healthful for the infirm to drink.

When a certain rich and powerful man named Attila entered that forest for the sake of hunting, he pursued a fleeing boar of marvelous size. Ascending the mountain, it came to the cell of the man of God and, laying aside all ferocity, stood prostrate before his feet as though imploring protection for its life.

Compassionating it, Basolus fixed the beast's pursuers in one place by so great a power that they perceived with their eyes the beast very near to them, yet were wholly unable to touch it. Then Attila, recognizing God's power and seeking pardon for his presumption, conferred upon the holy man whatever around that place was under his right and also certain estates to possess.

A certain man, judged for a crime committed and suspended from a gibbet, was already near his end amid the nooses when the memory of this holy confessor suddenly came to him. With what voice he could muster and with his whole heart constrained, he invoked Saint Basolus and tearfully asked him to come to his aid.

Immediately the noose broke and the man fell from on high. Astonishment rushed upon everyone, and that man, free, departed from death.

IX. Saint Amandus

In the sixth year of Emperor Justin, Saint Amandus was born. As Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror in the place cited above, he was born of noble parents and instructed from infancy in sacred letters. He left his parents and assumed the habit of religion in a certain monastery.

While he walked around the monastery on a certain day, he suddenly found a very great serpent, which immediately, by the power of the cross and prayer, he compelled to return to its pit, never to depart from there.

Afterward, leaving that monastery for the sake of pilgrimage, he came to Tours, to blessed Martin's sepulcher. There he remained in a certain cell for fifteen years, always covered with haircloth and sustained by water and barley bread.

From there he went to Rome to visit the thresholds of the apostles. When on a certain night he wished to keep vigil in the church, the church's keeper irreverently cast him out. While he slept before the church doors, Saint Peter appeared to him, asking him to return to Francia for the sake of preaching.

When he came there and preached the word of God with the greatest constancy, he suffered many injuries. When he rebuked Dagobert, the king of Francia himself, concerning his crimes, he was expelled from his kingdom.

At last, when the king had no son, he asked the Lord to give him a son who could succeed him in the kingdom. When, therefore, by God's will he had a son, the king solicitously considered who should baptize him, and Saint Amandus came to his mind. On this account he caused him to be diligently sought.

When Amandus had been found and brought by royal command, he was received with great joy. The king, prostrate at his feet, asked him to forgive what he had perpetrated against him and to baptize the son whom the Lord had granted him.

Amandus freely granted the first petition. But, fearing to be entangled in secular business, he altogether refused the second and departed. Nevertheless, the king sent to him Saint Eligius and his companion Dado. Wearied by their entreaties, Amandus came to the king and baptized his son.

After this, when the bishop of Traiectum migrated to the Lord, the king, although Saint Amandus resisted greatly, placed him in the cathedral seat in the church of Traiectum and caused him to be elevated there.

When he had steadfastly preached the word of God there for three years and saw his preaching despised by very many, he abandoned those who despised him and entered Vasconia, a most ferocious nation, for the sake of preaching.

When he had entered it and a certain frivolous and wanton entertainer began verbally to disparage his preaching, the man was immediately seized by a demon and began to lacerate and tear himself with his teeth. Crying aloud that he had done injury to God's servant, he expired.

Proceeding from there to another city, Amandus was humanely received by the bishop of the city. When that bishop, for the sake of humility and hospitality, gave water for his hands, Amandus commanded that the water be carefully preserved. For he believed that through the man's merits it would be for the salvation of many of the faithful, and this followed. For a certain blind man, washing his eyes with that water, suddenly received his sight.

After these things Saint Amandus, returning into Gaul, obtained from King Childebert a place called Manto, so that he might build a monastery there. But a certain bishop of the city of Ulcina, bearing this with displeasure, commanded his servants to cast him out from there or else to kill him.

Coming to him deceitfully, they told him to proceed with them and that they would show him a place suitable for constructing a monastery. But the saint, recognizing their malice because God revealed it to him, went with them to the summit of the mountain where they had resolved to kill him. Nevertheless, he had not told this to his own companions because he greatly desired martyrdom.

But when a storm suddenly arose, rain and hail so covered the mountain that the malicious men who had resolved to kill him saw absolutely nothing. Now thinking that they were going to die, they prostrated themselves, sought pardon, and entreated him to permit them to depart alive. Then the saint prayed until serenity had been restored and their sight recovered, and they returned to their own places.

At last Saint Amandus, after many miracles, rested in peace.

X. Saint Paul, Bishop of Léon

Saint Paul, bishop of Léon, was entrusted from childhood to the blessed man Hydultus to be formed in learning and morals, together with Saint Samson, afterward to become a bishop.

When Paul came to the house of his sister, situated upon the shore of the British sea, at her request he poured out prayers to the Lord that the waves of the sea might be restrained within an appointed channel and that the desired land might be enlarged by some space for her and the inhabitants of her island.

When the sea suddenly drew back its waves and dry land began to appear, he and his sister alike arose from prayer and approached the shore. Then Paul commanded his sister to carry little stones in her hands as far as the furthest margin of the sea. For the land, drained of the waters, had been enlarged by his prayer for a thousand paces or more.

Then they bent their knees in prayer upon the shore. When it was finished, Paul, turned toward the sea, said: “Let the little stones that I have placed at your boundaries be a sign between me and you, so that you may never again dare to cross them or enter these territories of ours.” The dreadful element of the sea observes the command of this speech even to the present day.

When they returned home, they suddenly saw that by divine power the aforesaid little stones had been made stone columns of marvelous size, so that the thing simply requested was returned doubled. The way that they took that day, walking through the midst of those columns, is still called Paul's Path among the Britons.

On a certain day, when they were making a journey and the disciples, grievously wearied as they traversed the forests, sought water and did not find it, he miraculously procured it for them. He also compelled a very great serpent to go over a precipice into the sea.

XI. Saint Gregory, Archbishop of Tours

As Sigebert says, in the eighth year of Justinian Gregory was ordained archbishop of Tours and was held illustrious in all things.

As Vincent relates from his deeds in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-two, Gregory was a native of the region of Auvergne. Once, when he was making the journey from Burgundy to Auvergne, a great storm arose against him: dense rain was gathered in the clouds, and the sky began to flash with frequent fires and resound with thunder.

While everyone grew pale with fear, Gregory drew from his bosom the relics of the saints that he continually carried around his neck and steadfastly held them against the clouds. These were immediately divided and, passing to the right and left, provided those making the journey an unharmed passage.

But pride, which is very often nourished by virtues, crept completely into his youthful mind. And because a fall is near to pride, while he privately rejoiced and arrogated to his own merits the aid that had been furnished, the horse upon which he sat immediately fell and dashed him grievously to the earth. Bruised throughout his whole body, he could scarcely rise. Understanding sufficiently the cause of his fall, he thereafter took care lest the spur of vainglory cast him down upon any occasion.

Thus, burning with love of blessed Martin and being exceedingly suitable for the pastoral office, he received the cathedral seat of Tours to govern in Martin's place, after blessed Euphronius, who had governed that church immediately before him, migrated to the Lord.

Gregory himself furnished many churches and published books in praise of the saints and in exposition of the sacred Scriptures. He repaired in vaulted form the mother church that blessed Martin had constructed and that had been consumed by excessive age, and he adorned it with historical scenes from the deeds of Martin himself.

Once, when he was proceeding along a road carrying around his neck a golden cross with relics, he saw the little lodging of a certain poor man, covered with leaves and the cuttings of twigs, being burned. The man, with his wife and children, ran noisily here and there and carried water, but they were unable to diminish the flames.

Then Gregory ran up and raised the cross against the balls of flame. Immediately, at the sight of the sacred relics, the whole fire was so stupefied that it was unable to scorch any further, even in the least, those things that it had already seized.

Once Gregory went to the sepulcher of blessed Hilary to make supplication. From there he turned aside to visit Saint Radegund, formerly a queen and then a nun. While the two inhabitants of paradise spoke together concerning the times, the oil that was accustomed to flow there drop by drop before the pledges of the Holy Cross so increased at the arrival of the pontiff that within the space of one hour it overflowed beyond one sextary.

Moreover, when this blessed queen was to be summoned to the kingdom of heaven, Gregory received a message concerning her passing. When she had already migrated as he hastened to her, he placed her sacred limbs in the sepulcher.

He had completed sixteen years in the episcopate when that namesake of his, Gregory the Great, was installed in the Apostolic See. It is also believed that each had long been bound to the other by familiar friendship.

Thus, when this Gregory journeyed to the sacred thresholds of the apostles, the pope received him with great reverence. Leading him to the confession of blessed Peter, he placed him at his side and requested that he rise.

Meanwhile the pope, since he was of most profound understanding, marveled at the secret dispensation of God. He considered that so great a grace had flowed into this man, for he was short in stature. Gregory soon perceived this divinely and, rising from prayer, looked toward the pope with his customary placid countenance and said: “The Lord made us, and not we ourselves. He is the same in the small as in the great.”

When the holy pope recognized that his thought had been answered, rejoicing that he himself had been detected, he thereafter began to hold in great veneration the grace that he had hitherto marveled at in Gregory. He so ennobled the see of Tours that he also gave it a golden chair, which by his decree was thereafter to be preserved at the aforesaid see.

When Gregory died, he caused himself to be buried in such a pavement or place that he would be trodden under the feet of everyone and held in no reverence. But the flock of blessed Martin, not tolerating such things, lifted him from that place and set him with due reverence in a beautiful elevated mausoleum at the left of the sepulcher of Saint Martin.

He died on the fifteenth day before the Kalends of December. He wrote the history of the kings of the Franks, from which many things in this work have been excerpted; the miracles of blessed Martin after his passing, in four books; and many other things.

XII. Saint John the Almsgiver

In the time of Emperor Phocas, as Vincent relates from his deeds in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-three, chapter one hundred eight, John, patriarch of Alexandria, flourished. He was surnamed John the Almsgiver.

When he was still in Cyprus, a youth of fifteen years, one night in sleep he saw a maiden brighter than the sun and adorned. She stood before his bed and struck him on the side. Awakening, when he truly saw her standing and thought her to be a woman, who also bore upon her head a crown made from branches of olives, he signed himself with the sign of the cross and said to her: “Who are you, and how have you dared to come in upon me while I sleep?”

With a cheerful countenance and smiling lips, she said to him: “I am the first of the king's daughters. If you possess me as a friend, I shall lead you into the emperor's presence.” Saying these things, she disappeared.

Returning to himself, he therefore understood the vision and said: “I truly believe that it is almsgiving and compassion that truly caused God to be clothed with flesh.”

Immediately he clothed himself and, waking no one, went to the church. It was already dawn. As he went, he met a certain man afflicted by the cold, stripped himself of his goatskin garment, and gave it to him.

He had not yet reached the church when suddenly a certain man clothed in white met him and gave him a bundle of one hundred nomismata, saying: “Receive this, brother, and dispense it as you wish.” Receiving it at once for joy, John returned, wishing to give back that bundle as though he needed nothing, but he found no one. Understanding, therefore, that the vision was not a fantasy but the truth, he often dispensed to the brethren whatever he was able.

A certain rich man whose house thieves had entered and stripped down to the straw approached him with great reverence and told him his calamity. Having compassion upon him, John commanded that fifteen pounds of gold be given to him. But the men to whom the gold had been entrusted, accepting the counsel of the steward and envying through the operation of the devil, gave him only five pounds.

When the archbishop was returning from the collect, a certain woman gave him in writing notice of a gift of five centenaria of gold. When he had received it, he summoned the dispensers and said to them: “How many pounds did you give to the man who came to me for alms?”
