They said: “Lord, fifteen, as your Holiness commanded.” When through the grace dwelling within him he knew that they had lied, he brought in the man who had received it and asked what he had received. When the man said that he had received five pounds, John brought forth the written notice that had been handed to him and said to them: “God will require from you the other ten centenaria. For if you had given fifteen pounds, as my humility commanded, she who brought five centenaria would also have given ten. And that I may make you certain, I shall bring her to you.”

When he summoned that woman through messengers, she immediately arose, came with the quantity of gold, and clasped the holy man's feet. When he had received the offering and prayed over it, he said to her: “I beseech you, did you not wish to offer only this to God, or something else also?”

When she perceived that this God-bearing man knew what she had done, she was shaken with fear and said: “By Saint Menna, with my own hand I, your handmaid, had written fifteen centenaria to give to you, my lord, and I found ten erased of themselves. Then, stupefied, I said within myself, ‘Surely it is not God's will that I give more than five.’”

Then, when the patriarch dismissed her, the dispensers fell at his feet seeking indulgence and declaring that they would do nothing further of this kind.

This saint possessed knowledge of the Scriptures, not in the wisdom of speech for empty glory, but in the execution of works and in the secret counsel of each day. No idle speech was heard, unless perhaps the ordering of civil affairs required it; rather, there were the religious practices of the holy fathers, the traditions of the Scriptures, or dogmatic problems because of the multitude of heretics surrounding the region.

If anyone began to disparage another, as one wise and ingenious he diverted him through another discourse. If the man persisted again, John summoned the weekly attendant and commanded him not to permit the man to enter to him again, so that through him he might moderate and instruct the others.

While he reclined upon a low couch and used cheap garments in his cell, a certain one of the city's landholders came up to him and saw that he was covered with a torn woolen covering. He sent him a covering worth thirty-six nomismata, earnestly asking that John cover himself with it in remembrance of him.

Because of the man's insistence, John received it and was covered by it for one night. Throughout almost the whole night he said to himself, as his chamber-servants related: “Who will say that humble John is covered with a cloak worth thirty-six nomismata while Christ's brethren are killed by the cold? How many desire to be filled with a little of the vegetables that are cast out from my kitchen? How many can even smell the wine that is poured out in my cellar? How many, do you think, are afflicted by hunger, cold, and miseries?

“But you expect also to attain eternal delight; you drink wine, devour immense fishes, and remain in bedchambers. Now, moreover, with all your evils, you warm yourself beneath a covering worth thirty-six nomismata. Truly, living thus and conversing amid such ease, you will not expect to enjoy everlasting joys there, but you will surely hear what that rich man heard: ‘You received good things in your life, and Lazarus likewise evil things,’ and so forth.

Immediately on the following day he sent the covering to be sold. But the man who had offered it bought it and presented it again to the patriarch so that he might be covered by it. When he had done this a third time, the holy man said to him joyfully: “We shall see who fails, I or you.” For that man was exceedingly wealthy. The holy man gently harvested him, little by little taking many things from him so that he might give them to the poor.

He was also very diligent in speaking about the deeds of saints who had been almsgivers. On one day, when he related from the life of Saint Serapion, who was called the Sindonite, he found that Serapion, as it is told, had given his cloak to a needy man, had proceeded a little farther, and had met another suffering from the cold, to whom he furnished his tunic.

Because he sat naked holding a Gospel book, when asked by someone, “Who stripped you, abba?” he indicated the Gospel book and said, “This one.” At another time also, he is said to have sold this very Gospel book and given the money as alms.

When his disciple said, “Abba, where is the Gospel book?” he said: “This book said to me, ‘Go and sell what you have and give to the poor.’ I sold the book itself and gave the book itself, so that I may have confidence on the day of judgment.”

When a certain widow once sought alms from him because her children were hungry, and he had nothing, he handed himself over to her so that she might sell him. She sold him to Greeks, whom he made Christians within a few days.

Reading these things concerning Saint Serapion, the holy man, stupefied and wholly suffused with tears, said: “Believe me, until today I thought that I too was doing at least something by giving as much money as I had, not knowing that certain men, overcome by compassion, even sold themselves.”

He commanded that collects for the dead be made diligently, saying that a short time before a certain captive, led away by the Persians, was thrust into prison. Certain men who fled from there and came to Cyprus were asked by his parents whether perhaps they had seen him. They answered that they had buried him with their own hands. But it was not he, but someone like him.

Therefore, as though for a dead man, they caused three collects to be made for him in each year. After four years, however, he escaped by flight from the Persians and came to Cyprus. When he heard from his family that they had made commemoration of him as though dead three times in the year—namely, on the Theophany, on the holy Lord's Day, and at Pentecost—he answered:

“At these three times of the year, a certain man clothed in white like the sun came, released me from the iron chains and custody, and admonished me to walk about throughout the whole day. No one recognized me, and on the following day I was found bearing the iron chains.”

“From this,” said Saint John, “we learn that those who sleep have rest when we make collects for them.”

A certain man offered him all the gold that he possessed, one hundred seven and one-half pounds. Bending his knees, he asked John to pray for the salvation of his only son and that the Lord would bring back with a good arrival his ship, which had gone to Africa.

When John had done this, the boy died, and that ship, upon which the man's brother was, suffered shipwreck. Everything with which it was filled perished, apart from the lives and the empty boat.

When that man was sorrowful beyond measure, at night in his sleep he saw someone as though in the patriarch's habit saying to him: “Why are you troubled, brother? Did you not ask me to petition God that he might save your son? Behold, he has been saved. Believe me, because if he had lived, he would have become depraved and unclean.

“Concerning your ship, know that unless God had been placated by the good thing that you did, sentence had been given that the whole ship, with its souls, should go into the deep, and you would have lost your brother. But rise and glorify God, who gave him to you and saved your son from this vain world.”

Awakening, therefore, that man found his heart consoled. Running to the holy patriarch, he cast himself at his feet and gave thanks, relating the vision that he had seen; and John glorified God.

When a certain monk went around the city with one young maiden and sought alms, certain men who saw them were scandalized. They reported to the patriarch that the man, by having a woman, was bringing reproach upon the monastic life.

Then Saint John, wishing to prohibit sin, commanded the woman to be flogged, but the monk to be beaten and thrust into prison. When this had been done, the monk appeared to him in a vision at night, showing him his back putrefied by the lashes and saying to him: “Does this please you, lord patriarch? Believe me, this time you erred as a man.” Saying these things, he departed.

In the morning, the holy man, mindful of the vision, sat sorrowful upon his bed. Sending for the monk who was in prison, he caused him to be stripped before him, so that he might see whether his back was as he had seen it in sleep. When this was done, by God's will even the wrap with which he was clothed was loosened and fell, and everyone saw that he was a eunuch.

Then the holy man said that in ignorance he had sinned against God and against him. He nevertheless admonished him that it was not fitting for a monk to lead a woman around in such a manner, to the scandal of those who saw them.

But the monk humbly rendered an account, saying: “Recently, when I was in Gaza and going out from the city, this woman met me, saying that she was a Hebrew and wished to become a Christian. She also adjured me with terrifying words not to allow her to perish.

“Fearing God's judgment, therefore, I received her and baptized her. I was leading her around with a simple heart, seeking a little support, so that I might introduce her into a monastery.”

Then the saint, after relating the vision to those who were present, brought forth one hundred nomismata to give him. But he wished to receive nothing and said: “If a monk has faith, he has no need of these; and if he has need of these, he has no faith.” This especially caused everyone to believe that he was God's servant.

This is Vincent's narrative. Certain other things follow.

XIII. Further Accounts of Saint John the Almsgiver

James of Voragine relates the following concerning this John the Almsgiver from his legend. A certain poor man came to him in a pilgrim's habit and sought alms. Summoning the dispenser, John said to him, “Give him six nomismata.”

Receiving them, the man went away, changed his habit, returned to the patriarch, and again sought alms. Summoning the dispenser, John commanded that six gold nomismata be given to him.

The dispenser said to him: “By your prayers, Father, this poor man has changed his habit and received alms twice.” But blessed John dissimulated, as though he did not know this. The man changed his habit a third time and came to John for alms. Then the dispenser touched blessed John, indicating that this was the man who had already received twice.

Blessed John answered him: “Go and give him twelve nomismata, lest perhaps he be my Lord Jesus Christ, who wishes to test me as to whether he can receive more here than I can give.”

The patriarch heard that there was a custom whereby, as soon as an emperor was crowned, the builders of monuments immediately took four or five tiny fragments of marble of various colors, entered before the emperor, and said: “Of what marble or metal does your imperial authority command a monument to be made for itself?”

Imitating this, John commanded that a monument be made for him, but he wished it to remain unfinished until the day of his death. He appointed certain men who, when he stood with the clergy at a celebrated festival, would approach him and say: “Lord, your monument is unfinished. Command, therefore, that it be completed, because you do not know at what hour the thief will come.”

Once, when a patrician wished to place a certain quantity of the church's money in commercial dealings, and the patriarch in no way consented but wished it to be distributed to the poor, after contending greatly the two departed from one another in anger.

When the eleventh hour came, the patriarch sent word to the patrician through the archpriest, saying, “Lord, the sun is at its setting.” Hearing this, the patrician came to him suffused with tears and sought pardon.

When a certain nephew of his had heard a grievous insult from a particular tavernkeeper and sorrowfully related it to the patriarch but could not be consoled, the patriarch answered him: “And how has anyone dared to say these things and open his mouth against you? Certainly, son, today I shall do such a thing to him that all Alexandria will marvel.”

Hearing this, the nephew received consolation, thinking that John would cause the man to be grievously beaten. Seeing that he had received consolation, John kissed his breast and said: “Son, you truly show yourself a nephew of my humility when you prepare yourself to be scourged and to suffer insults from everyone. For true kinship is recognized not from flesh and blood, but from virtue of mind.”

Immediately, therefore, he sent for that man and caused him to be free from every payment and tribute. Hearing this, everyone marveled and understood this to be what he had said: “I shall do such a thing to him that all Alexandria will marvel.”

Likewise, when he commanded that five coins be given to a certain man seeking alms, the man was immediately indignant that he had not given him greater alms. He at once burst forth into insults against John and began to revile him to his face.

Hearing this, John's servants wished to rush upon him and beat him grievously. Blessed John prohibited this, saying: “Permit him, brothers, to speak evil of me. Behold, for fifty years I have blasphemed Christ through my works, and shall I not tolerate one insult from this man?” He commanded that a bag of money be brought and placed before him, so that he might take from it as much as he wished.

Once, when the people of Alexandria left the church after the Gospel had been read and occupied themselves with idle words outside, the patriarch went out with them and began to sit among them. When everyone marveled at this, he said to them: “Sons, where the sheep are, there also is the shepherd. Either enter and I shall enter, or, if you remain here, I too shall remain with you.” He did this once and again and taught the citizens to remain in the church.

When a certain young man had carried off a particular nun, and clerics reproached that young man before blessed John and said that he should be excommunicated, as one who had destroyed two souls—namely, his own and that woman's—Saint John restrained them, saying: “Not so, sons, not so. I shall show you that you commit two sins. First, because you act against the Lord's command, which says, ‘Do not judge, that you may not be judged.’ Second, because you do not know for certain whether they sin even to this day and have not repented.”

Frequently, when blessed John was in prayer and placed in ecstasy, he was heard to dispute with God in such words: “So it is, so it is, good Jesus. Let us see who will conquer: I by scattering, or you by supplying.”

When, stricken by fever, he saw that he was approaching death, he said: “I give you thanks, God, because you have heard my misery entreating your goodness that nothing might be found belonging to me as I die except one tornes.” He therefore commanded that this be given to the poor.

After his death, his venerable body was placed in a sepulcher where the bodies of two bishops had been buried. And behold, those bodies marvelously yielded to Saint John and left the middle place empty for him.

A few days before he died, a certain woman had committed a most shameful sin and dared never to confess it to anyone. Saint John told her at least to write it down, because that woman knew how to write, to bring it to him sealed, and that he himself would pray for her.

She assented and, writing her sin and carefully sealing it, handed it to blessed John. But after a few days John became infirm and rested in the Lord. Thinking herself disgraced and confounded, and believing that he had left the writing to someone and that it had come into someone's hands, she went to Saint John's tomb. Weeping there most abundantly, she cried out, saying: “Alas, alas! Thinking to avoid confusion, I have become a confusion to everyone.”

While she wept most bitterly and asked blessed John to show her where he had left her writing, behold, blessed John proceeded from the tomb in pontifical habit, flanked on either side by the two bishops with whom he had been buried. He said to the woman: “Why do you trouble me so greatly and permit neither me nor these saints who are with me to rest? Behold, our stoles are wet with your tears.”

He extended to her her writing, sealed as it had been before, saying: “Look at this seal, open your writing, and read.” Opening it, she found her sin entirely erased and found written there in this manner: “Through John my servant, your sin has been erased.”

Thus she rendered immense thanks to God, and blessed John returned to the tomb with those two bishops. This saint flourished, as was said above, in the time of Emperor Phocas, and therefore around the time of Pope Gregory, namely in the year of the Lord six hundred fifteen, or thereabouts.

A certain monk, a holy man named Natalius, wishing to test John while he was then living—to see whether he could be persuaded by words and easily inclined to scandal—entered the city of Alexandria and enrolled all the public prostitutes. He went in to them in order, saying to each: “Do not fornicate with another, but grant me this night.”

Entering to one in a corner of the house, he prayed all night with bent knees for her conversion. Afterward, going out in the morning, he commanded her not to reveal to anyone what was done through him.

But one revealed his way of life and was immediately seized by a demon while the old man prayed. Everyone said to her: “God has rendered to you what you deserved, because you lied in excusing him, since he had not entered to fornicate.”

When evening came, Natalius said in everyone's hearing: “I wish to go to the place. Mistress Such-and-Such—namely, the prostitute—awaits me.” When many rebuked him, he said: “Do I not have a body as others do, or is God angry only against monks?”

Certain men said to him: “Take one woman for yourself, abba, and do not scandalize others.” Feigning himself angry, he said: “Truly I shall not hear you. Let him who wishes to be scandalized be scandalized.”

When a complaint concerning him was brought before blessed John, the Lord hardened John's heart so that he did not believe it. Natalius entreated God that after his death he would reveal the matter to someone, so that it might not be imputed as sin to those who were scandalized concerning him. God therefore converted many prostitutes through this means, and Natalius sent them to monasteries of women.

One morning, as Natalius left the house of one woman, another man who was approaching her to fornicate gave Natalius a slap, saying, “How long, most wicked man, will you not amend yourself from such uncleannesses?”

Natalius answered him: “Believe me, you will receive such a slap from me that all Alexandria will be gathered together.” And behold, a little afterward, someone in the appearance of a Moor gave the man a slap, saying, “This is the slap that Abba Natalius sends you.” Immediately he was vexed by a demon, so that everyone ran to his cries; nevertheless, after repenting, he was delivered through Natalius's prayer.

Approaching death, the man of God left this writing: “Do not judge before the time.” When the women confessed what he had done, everyone glorified God, and blessed John especially, saying: “Would that I had received the slap that he received.”

This is a marvelous example and is not to be imitated; but from it this is to be gathered: that one must not easily judge for evil the extraordinary works of holy men.

XIV. The Account of Peter the Customs Officer

The aforesaid Saint John, wishing to induce people to give alms, used to introduce this notable deed. Once, when beggars sat in the sun's ray, they began to confer with one another concerning those who gave them alms: to praise certain good almsgivers by name and to condemn others as avaricious and grasping.

Among the others, a certain man named Peter the customs officer was brought into the midst of their conversation. He was rich and powerful but exceedingly merciless to the poor, because beggars approaching his house were driven away from him with excessive indignation.

When none of them was found who had ever received any alms from his house, one of them said, “What do you wish to give me if I receive alms from him?” When they had made an agreement with him concerning something, that man approached Peter's house seeking alms.

But Peter, returning home at that time, found the poor man before the doors while his servant was carrying rye bread from the oven into the house. Not finding a stone, Peter seized one loaf of rye bread and struck the importunate petitioner by throwing it at him.

But the man received it, brought it to his poor companions, and joyfully boasted that he had received alms from the hand of Peter himself.

After two days, Peter, sick unto death, saw a judgment standing before him and certain Moors hanging his evil deeds upon one pan of a balance. On the other side of the balance, certain white-clad men stood sorrowful because they found nothing to place there.

Then one of them said: “Truly, we have nothing except one loaf of rye bread, which two days ago he gave to Christ under compulsion.” When they placed it upon the balance, the balance was made equal. They said to him: “Add to this rye bread; otherwise these Moors will seize you.”

Awakening and being delivered from the infirmity, he said: “If one loaf of rye bread, which I cast in fury, profited so greatly, how much more will it profit to distribute all one's goods among the poor?”

Thus, on a certain day, when he was clothed in excellent garments and proceeded along the road, a certain shipwrecked man sought some covering from him. Immediately Peter stripped himself of his precious garment and gave it to him. Receiving it, the man immediately sold it.

When the customs officer returned and saw the garment hanging for sale, he was greatly saddened, so much that he did not wish even to take food, saying: “I am not worthy that the needy man should hold my memory.”

And behold, while he said such things, he saw someone shining more brightly than the sun, bearing a cross above his head, and clothed in the garment that he had given to the needy man. He said to him, “Why do you lament, Peter?”

When Peter had expressed the cause of his sorrow, he said to him, “Do you know me?” Peter answered, “Yes, Lord.” And the Lord said: “I have been clothed with this since you gave it to me, and I give thanks for your good will, because I was afflicted by the cold and you covered me.”

Returning to himself, Peter began to benefit the needy and to say: “As the Lord lives, I shall not die until I become one of them.”

Giving to the poor everything that he possessed, he summoned his notary and said to him: “I wish to entrust a secret to you. If you disclose it, or if you do not hear me, I shall sell you to barbarians.” Giving him ten pounds of gold, he said to him: “Go into the holy city, buy merchandise for yourself, sell me to some Christian, and distribute my price to the poor.”

When the man refused, Peter said to him, “If you do not hear me, I shall sell you to barbarians.” Leading him, therefore, as he had said, clothed in filthy garments, the notary sold him to a certain silversmith as though he were his own servant; receiving thirty nomismata for him, he dispensed them to the poor.

Peter, therefore, when sold, performed all the base offices, so that he was despised by everyone, struck by the other servants, and now judged insane. But the Lord frequently appeared to him and consoled him by showing him the garments and the nomismata.

While the emperor and all those known to him grieved over the loss of so great a man, certain neighbors of his came to Constantinople to visit the holy places. Invited by Peter's master, while they dined they said to one another in a whisper, “How exceedingly like this man is to Peter the customs officer.”

As they looked at him curiously, one said, “Truly, it is Lord Peter. I shall rise and hold him.” Perceiving this, Peter secretly fled.

The doorkeeper, however, was deaf and mute and opened the door by a sign. Peter commanded him not with signs but with words. The man immediately heard, recovered speech, smiled at Peter, and opened the door for him.

Entering the house while everyone marveled at his speech, the doorkeeper said: “The man who worked in the kitchen has gone out and fled, but see whether he might be a servant of God. For when he said to me, ‘I tell you, open,’ immediately a flame came forth from his mouth, touched my tongue and ears, and restored speech and hearing to me.”

Leaping up and running after Peter, they could find him no longer. Then everyone from that house performed penance because they had treated so holy a man so basely.

Title XII, Chapter IX

Gregory relates in the book of the Dialogues many miracles and examples of virtues to be imitated, which were performed by holy men in diverse parts of Italy around his own times.

I. Honoratus and Libertinus

In the parts of Samnium there was a certain man named Honoratus who, from the years of childhood, burned with love of the heavenly homeland through abstinence, withdrawing himself from the eating of meats and restraining himself even from idle speech.

On a certain day, when a feast had been prepared by his parents for their neighbors and meats had been made ready for eating, Honoratus, firm in his purpose of abstinence, refused to touch the meats. His parents began to mock him, saying: “Shall we bring fish for you from the mountains?” For in that place fish were customarily heard of, not seen.

When the water failed at the feast, a servant proceeded to the spring with a bucket. As he drew water from the spring, a fish entered the bucket. Before the faces of those feasting, the servant poured out the water with the fish, which was of so great a size that it could suffice Honoratus for the nourishment of the whole day.

Marveling at this, everyone began to venerate him whom they had formerly despised. At last, although Honoratus was a bound serf together with his father, because of his virtues he was given liberty by his lord. Constructing a monastery in a place called Fundis, he became the father of nearly two hundred monks.

On a certain day, a mass of an immense rock was torn from the mountain that rises high above his monastery. Coming down the mountain's slope, it threatened the destruction of the whole cell and the death of all the brothers. When the holy man saw it coming from above, repeatedly invoking Christ with a loud voice, he immediately extended his right hand and opposed the sign of the cross. He fixed the falling rock upon the very side of the mountain's slope, so that even now, to those looking at the mountain, it appears to hang as though about to fall.

In the time of King Totila, a certain man named Libertinus was provost of the aforesaid monastery of Fundis. Converted and instructed as a disciple of the said Honoratus, he was a man of great virtues.

Among other things, once when, seated on a horse, he made a journey for the use of the monastery, Darida, a commander of the Gothic army, met him. His arms-bearers cast Libertinus from the horse and took the horse away. He not only patiently bore the casting down and the loss, but also offered them the whip by which he had compelled the horse to go.

When they departed, Libertinus gave himself to prayer. When the horse-robbers came to the river named Vulturnus, their horses, neither beaten by spears nor bloodied by spurs, were able neither to move themselves nor to cross the river.

Returning to themselves and understanding that this had happened to them because of the injury done to God's servant, they returned to him and offered back the horse they had taken. When he refused to receive it, they compelled him to do so by lifting him themselves and placing him upon it. After this they freely continued their journey with their own horses.

At another time Libertinus proceeded to Ravenna for the monastery's business. According to his custom, wherever he went he always carried in his bosom for devotion a little boot of the venerable abbot Honoratus, of whom we spoke above.

As he proceeded along the way, a certain woman offered him the body of her dead son, held his mount by the bridle, and piously said with an oath: “You shall in no way depart from here unless you raise my son.”

Since he regarded such a miracle as unprecedented, he trembled at the oath of her petition. There the humility of his manner of life and piety toward the mother struggled with one another: fear, lest he presume upon unaccustomed things; grief, lest he not aid the bereaved woman.

But, to the greater glory of God, piety conquered that breast of virtue, which was strong precisely because it was conquered. Thus he descended from the horse, bent his knees, extended his hands toward heaven, brought forth the little boot from his bosom, and placed it upon the dead boy's breast.

As he prayed, the soul returned to the boy's body. Taking him by the hand, Libertinus restored him alive to his mother and thereafter continued his journey.

As Gregory adds in answer to Peter's question, in the manifestation of so admirable a sign the virtue of both concurred with the woman's faith—namely, that of both Libertinus and Honoratus, whose little boot he carried as a sign because of his devotion.

So also Elisha, in touching the waters of the Jordan with Elijah's cloak, divided them not by the cloak itself but by invoking the God of Elijah. For he was then able to manifest the master's virtue when from humility he recalled the master's name to memory.

Against this venerable man Libertinus, the one who held the governance of the monastery after Honoratus's death burned with grievous anger, so that he committed an excess against him. Because he found no rod with which he could strike him, he threw a footstool at him and bruised his head and face, rendering his whole countenance and face livid.

Libertinus, so violently beaten, silently withdrew to his own bed. On the following day, however, a matter had been appointed for the monastery's use. When the morning hymns had been completed, Libertinus came to the abbot's bed and humbly sought his prayer and permission to leave the monastery.

The abbot, knowing how greatly Libertinus was honored and loved by everyone, thought that he wished to leave the monastery because of the injury that he had inflicted upon him. Hence he asked him, saying, “Where do you wish to go?”

Libertinus answered: “A matter of the monastery has been appointed, father, which I cannot set aside, because yesterday I promised that today I would go where I resolved to go.”

Then the abbot, considering from the bottom of his heart his own harshness and hardness and the humility and gentleness of Libertinus, leapt from the bed, held Libertinus's feet, and testified that he had sinned and was guilty because of that blow.

Libertinus, on the contrary, prostrated himself upon the earth and, cast down at the abbot's feet, ascribed what he had endured to his own fault, not to the other's cruelty. Thus it happened that the father was led to great gentleness and the disciple's humility became the master's teacher.

When Libertinus had departed for the monastery's business, many men and nobles who greatly honored him saw his face so livid and swollen. Marveling, they solicitously asked what this was and the cause of so great a swelling of his face.

He answered them: “Last evening, because my sins required it, I struck against a footstool, and thus I suffered this.” Thus the holy man, preserving in his breast the honor of truth and of his master, neither betrayed his father's fault nor incurred the sin of falsehood. Here Gregory declares: “I prefer the virtue of patience to signs and miracles.”

In the same monastery there was a monk of great life who was the gardener. A thief was accustomed to come there and, climbing over the hedge, secretly carry away vegetables. Although the gardener planted many things, he found fewer and saw some trampled by feet and others torn up.

Going around the whole garden, he found the way by which the thief was accustomed to come. Walking through the same garden, he also found a serpent. Commanding it, he said, “Follow me.”

Coming to the thief's entrance, he said to the serpent: “In the name of Jesus Christ, I command you to guard the entrance and not permit the thief to enter.” The serpent immediately stretched itself crosswise, and the monk departed.

When at midday everyone rested according to custom, the thief came and climbed the hedge. As he placed his foot down into the garden, he suddenly saw that the outstretched serpent had closed the way. Terrified, he fell backward, and his foot, through his shoe, became caught on a stake of the hedge. Thus he hung head downward until the gardener came. At the usual hour, however, the gardener came to the place and found the thief hanging on the hedge.

The gardener said to the serpent: “Thanks be to God; you have fulfilled what I commanded. Depart now.” It immediately departed.

But he said to the thief: “What is this, brother? God has handed you over to me. Why have you so often presumed to commit theft amid the labor of the monks?” Saying these things, he freed the man's foot from the hedge in which it was caught and lowered him without injury.

He said to him, “Follow me.” Leading the man as he followed to the garden's entrance, he furnished him with great sweetness the vegetables that he had desired to carry away by theft, saying: “After this, do not commit theft. But when you are in need, come in here to me, and those things that you labor to take with sin I shall devotedly give you.”

II. Saint Equitius

In the parts of Valeria there was a most holy man named Equitius, who because of the merit of his life was held in great admiration among everyone. He became the father of many monasteries in that same province.

When in the time of his youth the incitements of the flesh wearied him in sharp conflict, the distresses of his contempt for himself made him more diligent in the practice of prayer. While he sought a remedy in this matter from almighty God with continual prayers, on a certain night, with an angel standing by him, he saw himself being made a eunuch. It appeared in his vision that the angel cut away every movement from his genital members.

From that time he became as foreign to temptation as if he had no sex in his body. Relying upon this power through the aid of almighty God, as he had formerly presided over men, so afterward he began also to preside over women. Nevertheless, he did not cease to admonish his disciples not readily to trust themselves after his example in this matter and, being liable to fall, to tempt a gift that they had not received.

At the time when practitioners of magic were apprehended in this city, Basilius, who was foremost in magical works, fled to Valeria in monastic habit. Going to Castorius, the most reverend bishop of the city of Amiternum, he hoped to obtain from him that he would commit him to Abbot Equitius and commend him to his monastery.

The bishop then came to the monastery leading the monk Basilius with him and asked Equitius, the servant of God, to receive this monk into his congregation. Immediately looking at him, the holy man said: “Father, I see that this man whom you commend to me is not a monk but a devil.”

The bishop said to him, “You seek an occasion not to furnish what you can.” Equitius answered: “I indeed declare him to be what I see. Nevertheless, lest you think that I am unwilling to obey, I shall do what you command.” Thus Basilius was received into the monastery.

Not many days afterward, when Equitius had gone somewhat farther from the cell in order to exhort the faithful to heavenly desires, it happened in a monastery of virgins whose care also lay upon him that one of them, who appeared beautiful according to the corruption of this flesh, began to suffer fever and to be vehemently distressed. Now not with loud voices but with shrieks she cried: “Today I shall die unless the monk Basilius comes and himself restores health to me through the diligence of his treatment.”

But in the presence of so great a father [read: in the absence of so great a father] none of the monks dared to approach the congregation of virgins, much less that man who had arrived newly and whose life the congregation of brothers did not yet know.

Therefore a messenger was suddenly sent and this was announced to Equitius: namely, that she was grievously infirm and sought Basilius as a visitor. Hearing this, the holy man smiled disdainfully and said: “Did I not say that this man was a devil, not a monk? Go and expel him from the cell. Concerning the handmaid of God who is pressed by the distress of fevers, do not be solicitous, because from this hour she will neither labor under fevers nor seek Basilius.”

The monk returned and learned that the virgin of God had been restored to health at the hour that Equitius, though situated far away, had said it. In the power of the miracle he held the example of the Master, who, when invited to the ruler's son, restored him to health by a word alone.

After being expelled from the monastery, the aforesaid Basilius said frequently that by magical arts he had suspended Equitius's cell but nevertheless had been unable to injure anyone belonging to him. At last Basilius was burned with fire at Rome.

Likewise, on a certain day a particular nun from the monastery of virgins entered the garden. Seeing a lettuce, she desired it and, forgetting to bless it with the sign of the cross, greedily bit it. But, seized by the devil, she immediately fell.

While she was vexed, this was announced to Equitius. Hastening, he ran up. When he had entered the garden, the devil who had seized her began to cry through her, saying: “What did I do? I was sitting upon the lettuce; she came and bit me.” When the man of God with great indignation commanded him to release God's handmaid, he immediately departed.

Likewise, a certain nobleman of the province of Nursia named Felix, when he perceived that the aforesaid holy man Equitius did not possess sacred orders and nevertheless ran about everywhere and preached the word of God, one day approached him with the boldness of familiarity and said: “Since you do not possess sacred orders and have not received permission to preach from the supreme pontiff, how do you presume to preach?”

Compelled by his inquiry, the man of God disclosed how he had received permission to preach, saying: “I consider within myself those things that you say to me. But on a certain night a handsome young man stood by me in a vision and placed a medicinal instrument—that is, a phlebotome—upon my tongue, saying: ‘Behold, I have placed words in your mouth. Go forth to preach.’ From that day, even if I wished to remain silent concerning God, I am unable.”

Gratian notes these things in cause sixteen, question seven, in the section beginning “The same.” There he says that when an angel sent Equitius in sleep to preach and Equitius complained of a defect of the tongue, the angel touched his tongue with a phlebotome and cured the defect.

When Peter asked Gregory concerning the manner of life of this Equitius, who performed such works, Gregory answered him: “The work is from the gift, not the gift from the work; otherwise grace is no longer grace. For gifts precede every good work, although the gifts themselves also increase from the work that follows.

“Nevertheless, lest you be deprived of knowledge of this man's life, the most reverend man Albinus, bishop of the city of Reate, knew this well, as did many others who related it. But why do you seek more works, when purity of life accorded with the practice of preaching?

“So great a fervor for gathering souls to God inflamed him that he presided over monasteries in such a manner that he ran everywhere through churches, fortresses, villages, and the individual houses of the faithful and stirred the hearts of his hearers toward love of the heavenly homeland.”

He was very poorly dressed and so despised that, if someone who did not know him happened to be greeted by him, that person would even disdain to return his greeting. Whenever he went to other places, he was accustomed to sit upon a mount more contemptible than other mounts. Upon it he used a halter in place of a bridle and sheep-skins in place of a saddle.

He himself carried the sacred codices, placed in leather bags, on his right and left sides. Wherever he arrived, he opened the fountain of the Scriptures and watered the hearts of minds [read: watered the meadows of minds].

At that time certain clerics of this Apostolic See complained flatteringly against this holy man, saying: “Who is this rustic who has seized for himself the authority of preaching without the permission of our apostolic lord? If it pleases you, let someone be sent for him, so that ecclesiastical vigor may recognize what sort of man he is.”

Persuaded by the clerics, the pontiff gave his assent that Equitius should be brought to the Roman city. Julian the defensor, who afterward became bishop of Sabina, was sent to bring him with great honor, lest the man of God experience any injury from the summons.

Julian came swiftly to his monastery and asked where Abbot Equitius was. He received the answer that Equitius was in the valley cutting hay with the monks. Julian therefore sent his servant, who was sufficiently proud, to summon Equitius.

Coming to the place, the servant asked which of those cutting hay was Equitius. When he was shown to him, he looked at him from afar and was seized by immense terror. Coming to him and kissing his knees, he announced that his lord sought him.

Returning his greeting, Equitius said: “Lift up the green hay and carry fodder to the mounts upon which you came. Behold, I shall follow you when the work is completed, because little remains.”

Equitius therefore followed the servant carrying the hay, shod with hobnailed boots and bearing a hay-scythe upon his neck. While he was still some distance away, the servant indicated by his very habit who he was. Julian despised him, but as soon as Equitius came near, intolerable fear seized Julian, so that his tongue was unable to explain why he had come.

Perceiving this, the man of God Equitius began to render immense thanks to almighty God because heavenly grace visited him through the supreme pontiff. Immediately Equitius began to urge Julian most vehemently to pursue the journey.

But when Julian asserted that he was wearied from the journey and could not depart that day, Equitius said: “You sadden me, son, because if we do not depart today, tomorrow we shall not depart.” This was fulfilled precisely as though foretold by a prophet.

For on the following day at dawn, a servant came to Julian upon a horse wearied by violent speed, with a letter from the pontiff. In it Julian was commanded not to dare to remove God's servant from the monastery. For in a vision the pontiff had been vehemently terrified because he had presumed to send for the man of God to be presented before him. Thus Equitius remained in his monastery.

When Peter marveled how error concerning such a man could have stolen upon so great a pontiff, so that he commanded someone to be sent for him, Gregory removed the cause of the astonishment, adding:

“Why do you marvel, Peter, that we who are men are deceived? Has it escaped your mind that David, who was accustomed to possess the spirit of prophecy, gave judgment against the innocent son of Jonathan when he heard the words of a lying servant? Nevertheless, because it was done by David, we believe it just by the hidden judgment of God, and yet by human reason we do not see how it was just.

“What marvel is it, therefore, if we who are not prophets are led elsewhere by the mouth of liars? Moreover, it is a grave matter that the density of cares lays waste the mind of every prelate. When the mind is divided among many things, it becomes less for each one; and an error steals upon it in any one thing in proportion as it is more widely occupied among many.”

After the death of Equitius himself, miracles also appeared to demonstrate his sanctity. When a certain countryman placed a chest of grain above his sepulcher in the oratory of blessed Lawrence, a whirlwind suddenly sent from heaven lifted that chest from the sepulcher and cast it far away.

When the Lombards entered the province of Valeria and the monks of the said holy man's monastery fled to his sepulcher in the oratory, the Lombards entered the oratory and began to drag the monks outside so that they might be scattered by torments or killed.

One of the monks, groaning, said: “Ah, Saint Equitius, does it please you that we are dragged away thus and that you do not defend us?” At his voice an unclean spirit immediately invaded the Lombards. Falling to the earth, they were vexed so long that even the Lombards who were outside recognized that they should not dare to violate the sacred place further.

III. Saint Constantius

Near the city of Ancona there was a church under the title of blessed Stephen. In it a venerable man named Constantius served while performing the office of sacristan. The reputation of his holiness had extended itself far and wide to human knowledge, because this man, utterly despising earthly things, burned with the whole exertion of his mind for heavenly things alone.

On a certain day, when oil was lacking in that church and the aforesaid servant of God had nothing from which to light the lamps, he filled all the church's lamps with water. Placing papyrus in their midst according to custom, he applied fire and lit them. Thus the water burned in the lamps as though it were oil.

Because Peter asked of how great humility this man, so great in miracles, had been, Gregory declares it through the following notable example.

On a certain day a countryman came from a distant place to see him. At that same hour it happened that the holy man stood upon wooden steps, serving in the repair of the lamps. He was exceedingly small, of a slight and contemptible form.

When the man who had come to see him asked who Constantius was and earnestly sought that he be shown to him, those who knew him showed him who he was. But, as foolish minds believe a person's merit from the quality of the body, seeing him small and contemptible, he began altogether not to believe that this was the man.

A certain conflict arose in the countryman's mind, and he thought that the one whom he had held so immense by reputation could not be so short in appearance. When many assured him that this was indeed he, he despised and mocked him, saying: “I believed him to be a great man, but this man has nothing of a man.”

As soon as Constantius, the man of God, heard this, he joyfully abandoned the lamps that he was repairing and swiftly descended. He rushed into that countryman's embrace, began to clasp him with his arms and kiss him out of exceeding love, and gave great thanks because he had judged such things concerning him, saying: “You alone have had open eyes regarding me.”

From this one must ponder how great his humility was within himself, since he loved more greatly the countryman who despised him. For an inflicted insult proves what sort of person each one lies hidden within himself. As the proud man rejoices in honors, so the humble man rejoices in his own contempt.

Marcellinus was bishop of that same city of Ancona. Excessive pain from gout had contracted his step, and his familiars therefore carried him in their hands wherever it was necessary.

On a certain day, when the city was set on fire through negligence, although many ran together and cast water competitively, the flame so increased that it appeared to threaten the destruction of the whole city, so that no one was able to oppose it.

The said bishop came, carried in their hands, and commanded his attendants to place him against the fire. He was placed where the whole force of the flame appeared to press. In a marvelous manner the conflagration began to turn back upon itself, as though by its recoil it cried out that it could not pass the bishop. Thus, with the flame restrained at that boundary, it at last grew cold within itself.

IV. The Monk Nonnosus

On Mount Soracte there was a monastery in which a man named Nonnosus was provost under a most harsh abbot, whose conduct he always tolerated with marvelous equanimity.

Because the said monastery was situated on the mountain's summit, no level ground lay open for the brothers to cultivate even the smallest possible garden. One very small place had grown out upon the side of the mountain, but an immense mass of rock projecting naturally occupied it, which fifty pairs of oxen would have been unable to move.

When human labor had been despaired of for removing the said mass from there, Nonnosus gave himself to prayer in the silence of the night. In the morning the monks found that mass of rock withdrawn farther from its place, so that a broad space was left there for making a garden.

The same Nonnosus, when at one time he washed the glass lamps in the oratory, let one slip from his hands, and it was broken into innumerable pieces. Fearing the most violent fury of the father of the monastery, he gathered the fragments. When he had prayed with tears, the lamp was found whole.

At another time, when oil was lacking in the monastery, the time for gathering olives was already at hand, and no fruit, even the smallest, appeared upon the olive trees. It seemed good to the father of the monastery that the brothers should go all around to furnish their labor to outsiders in gathering olives, so that from the recompense for their work they might carry a little oil back to the monastery.

The man of God Nonnosus prohibited this with great humility, lest the brothers, going out from the monastery while seeking gains of oil, should suffer losses of souls. Instead, he commanded that the few olives upon the monastery's trees be gathered, placed in the mortar, and that the little expressed from them be brought to him.

When it had been brought before the altar in a vessel, he prayed and commanded that a very little of it be placed in all the vessels for oil. All of them were found full on the following day.

V. Saint Boniface, Bishop of Ferentis

In the parts of Tuscany there was a man of venerable life named Boniface, who held the episcopal office in the city called Ferentis and fulfilled it in his conduct. This city, however, is shown utterly overthrown and uninhabited toward Viterbo, by whose citizens it is said to have been destroyed.

This Boniface began to be illustrious in virtues and miracles in his boyhood. For while he still lived with his mother, the boy, going out from the lodging, sometimes returned without his linen garment and frequently even without his tunic, because as soon as he found someone naked, he clothed him. He stripped himself here so that before God's eyes he might be clothed with the other's reward.

Then his mother was accustomed frequently to rebuke him, saying that it was not just that he, himself needy, should lavish garments upon the poor.

On a certain day the boy's mother entered the granary and found that almost all the wheat she had prepared there for herself as the provision of the whole year had been expended by her son upon the poor.

While she struck herself with slaps and blows because she had, as it were, lost the year's sustenance, Boniface, the boy of God, came upon her and began to console her with such words as he could. When she admitted no consolation, he asked her to leave the granary in which a little remained.

When his mother withdrew, Boniface gave himself to prayer there. When it was finished, he brought his mother in. She found the granary fuller than it had been before when the grain was gathered there by her. Seeing this miracle and being pierced in heart, his mother now began to urge him to give, since he could so swiftly receive what he sought.

She was also accustomed to raise hens in the vestibule of her lodging, but a fox coming from the neighboring countryside carried them off. On a certain day, while the boy Boniface stood in the same vestibule, the fox came according to custom and took a hen.

He immediately entered the church and, prostrating himself in prayer, said with open cries: “Does it please you, Lord, that we cannot eat from my mother's sustenance? For behold, the fox eats the hens that she raises.” Rising from prayer, he departed from the church.

The fox soon returned, released the hen that it carried in its mouth, and, dying before his eyes, fell to the earth. Thus the holy and simple boy was heard in cheap matters, so that in small things he might learn how greatly he ought to presume upon God in great petitions.

When he became a bishop, he had so poor a church that for its entire sustenance it possessed nothing else except only one vineyard. On a certain day this vineyard was so devastated by hail that scarcely small and sparse clusters remained upon its few vines.

When Boniface entered it, he rendered great thanks to almighty God because he recognized that in his poverty itself he was still being constrained. For poverty is accustomed to be the guardian of humility for good minds.

When the time was now at hand when those few clusters began to ripen, he placed a guardian over the vineyard according to custom. On a certain day, however, he commanded the priest Constantius, his nephew, to prepare all the wine vessels in the episcopal residence. His nephew marveled greatly at this, since he had no wine at all. Nevertheless, he did what had been commanded.

The man of God therefore entered the vineyard, gathered the clusters, carried them to the winepress, and commanded everyone to depart from there. He remained alone with one very small boy, whom he placed in the same winepress and caused to tread those very few clusters.

When a little wine flowed from those clusters, the man of God began to receive it in a small vessel and to distribute it as a blessing among all the prepared casks, so that all the vessels scarcely appeared to have been moistened.

When this had been done, he summoned the priest and commanded the poor to be present. Then the wine began to increase in the winepress so that it filled all the poor people's vessels that had been brought. When he perceived that he had made sufficient satisfaction, he commanded the boy to ascend from the winepress, closed the storehouse, secured it with the impression of his own seal, and immediately returned to the church.

On the third day he summoned Constantius, prayed, and opened the storehouse. He found that the vessels into which he had poured the exceedingly scant liquid were pouring forth wine abundantly, so that the increase of wine would have invaded the whole pavement if the bishop had entered any later.

Then he terribly commanded the priest Constantius not to disclose this miracle to anyone for as long as he lived. He feared lest, struck by human favor because of the power of the deed, he should become empty within from the same source by which he appeared great outwardly to men. He followed the example of the Master, namely Christ, who, instructing his disciples in the way of humility, commanded them to tell no one concerning himself the things they had seen.

At another time, when a nobleman named Fortunatus obtained with great entreaties from the aforesaid holy man Boniface that on the feast of blessed Proculus the martyr he would celebrate the solemnities of the Masses in the church dedicated to him and turn aside to his house for a meal, Boniface entered Fortunatus's house after the solemnities of the Masses had been completed.

Before he uttered a hymn to God, suddenly a man with a monkey stood before the door and struck cymbals, as certain men are accustomed to seek their living by the art of playing. The holy man, disdaining the sound, said: “Alas, alas, alas! This wretched man is dead. I have come to the table of refreshment; I have not yet opened my mouth in praise of God, and he, coming with a monkey, has struck cymbals.”

Nevertheless he added and said: “Go and, for charity, give him food and drink; but know that he is dead.” When the unhappy man had received bread and wine from that house, he wished to depart through the door. But an immense stone suddenly fell from the roof and came upon the crown of his head. Prostrated by the blow, he was lifted up half-dead. On the following day he died according to the sentence of the man of God.

In this matter, Gregory says, one must ponder how great a fear ought to be shown to holy men. For they are temples of God; and when a holy man is drawn to anger, who other than the inhabitant of that same temple is stirred to anger?

At another time, the priest Constantius, his nephew, sold his horse for twelve aurei. Placing them in his own chest, he departed to perform some work. Suddenly poor people came to Boniface, entreating that he bestow something upon their need. Since he then had nothing to give, he began to be agitated in mind lest the poor depart from him empty.

He suddenly recalled that his nephew Constantius had sold his horse. Therefore, while his nephew himself was absent, he approached the chest, piously and violently broke its fastenings, took the twelve aurei from it, and distributed them to the poor as it pleased him.

Returning from his work, Constantius found the chest broken and did not find the price of the horse. He began to make a great noise and to cry with excessive fury: “Everyone lives here; I alone cannot live in this house.” At his voice Bishop Boniface came, together with all who were present in the same episcopal residence.

When the man of God wished to calm him with a gentle voice, Constantius began to answer with contention, saying: “Everyone lives with you; I alone cannot live before you. Return my solidi to me.”

Moved by these words, the bishop entered the church of blessed Mary and began with extended hands to ask the Lord to return to him that with which he might mitigate the madness of the raging priest. When he suddenly lowered his eyes toward his garment between his extended arms, he found twelve aurei in his bosom, shining as though they had been brought forth from the fire at that same hour.

Immediately departing from the church, he cast them into the bosom of the raging priest, saying: “Behold, you have the solidi that you sought. But let this be known to you: after my death you will not be bishop of this church because of your avarice.”

From the truth of this sentence it is gathered that he had prepared those solidi for acquiring the episcopate; but he died in the priesthood.

Likewise, on a certain day, when two Goths who professed that they were hastening to Ravenna came to him for the sake of hospitality, with his own hand he furnished them a small wooden vessel full of wine, which perhaps they might have for their meal on the journey.

After they departed, while they drank the wine not only upon the whole journey but also during the several days that they remained at Ravenna and upon their return to him, it never failed from that vessel. It was as though the wine was not increased but was born within that vessel.

Likewise, at another time, when he entered the garden and saw that it was covered by a great multitude of caterpillars that consumed every plant, he turned toward them and said: “I adjure you in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ: depart from here and do not eat these plants.” They all immediately went out, so that not even one remained.

VI. Saint Fortunatus, Bishop of Tuder

As Gregory says in the first book of the Dialogues, Fortunatus prevailed by grace of immense power in driving out spirits, so that at times he expelled legions of demons from possessed bodies. A legion, moreover, contains the number six thousand six hundred sixty-six demons.

Among other marvels, as Gregory relates from the report of a certain Julian, a defensor in the city who had died a short time before and had been sufficiently familiar with the said Fortunatus, he performed this deed.

A certain noble matron in the neighboring parts of Tuscany had a daughter-in-law whom her son had recently taken as wife. This woman was invited by friends to go to the dedication of a certain oratory under the title of Saint Sebastian. On the night preceding the day of the dedication, the said daughter-in-law, overcome by the pleasure of the flesh, was unable to abstain from her husband.

When morning came, although the carnal delight she had committed deterred her, shame commanded her to proceed to that oratory. Blushing more before the faces of men than fearing God's judgment, she went with her mother-in-law to the dedication of the oratory.

As soon as the relics of blessed Sebastian the martyr entered the oratory, a malign spirit seized the aforesaid matron's daughter-in-law and began to vex her before all the people.

When the priest of that same oratory saw her being vexed most violently, he immediately took the sindon from the altar and covered her with it. But the spirit suddenly invaded him also. Because he wished to presume upon something beyond his powers, he was compelled in his own vexation to recognize what he was. Those who were present therefore carried the girl from the oratory to her home.

When the malign spirit wore her down by continual vexation, her parents, loving her carnally and persecuting her through their love, handed her over to practitioners of magic to obtain a remedy of health, so that they might utterly extinguish her soul whose flesh they strove to benefit for a time.

She was led to a river, immersed in the water, and for a long time enchanted by magical art so that the devil might depart. By the marvelous judgment of almighty God, while one was driven from her by perverse art, a legion suddenly entered her. From this she began to be agitated by as many movements and to resound with as many voices and cries as the spirits by which she was held.

Then, after taking counsel, her parents confessed the fault of their perfidy, led her to the venerable man Bishop Fortunatus, and left her. Receiving her, he gave himself to prayer for many days and nights and applied himself with as great an exertion of prayers as he found the battle line of a legion standing against him in one body. At last he restored her so sound that it was as though the devil had never invaded her.

At another time this same servant of almighty God expelled a spirit from a certain possessed man. When the malign spirit perceived that the day was already growing toward evening and that the hour was secluded from men, he pretended that he was a particular pilgrim. He began to go around the city's streets and to cry:

“O holy man Fortunatus the bishop, behold what he has done! He has cast a pilgrim from his lodging. I seek where I ought to rest, and I do not find it in this city of his.”

At that time a certain man sat by the coals in his lodging with his wife and small son. Hearing his voice and asking what the bishop had done to him, he invited him into his lodging and caused him to sit with him beside the coals.

While they spoke of various things in turn, the malign spirit invaded the man's little son, cast him into those same coals, and drove out his soul. Bereaved and wretched, the man recognized both whom he himself had received and whom the bishop had expelled.

Assigning the reason why God permitted so great an injury to happen to this man, Gregory says to Peter: “I judge that this man who, while ostensibly offering hospitality, was bereaved of his son was delighted not by the work of piety but by disparagement of the bishop. For the punishment that followed made known that the preceding reception was not without fault.

“There are some who strive to do good things for this reason: that they may obscure the grace of another's operation. On this account, I judge that this man who received the malign spirit in hospitality was intent upon display rather than upon the work, so that he might appear to do better things than the bishop by receiving the one whom the bishop had expelled. When the intention that precedes is perverse, everything that follows is little, even if it appears upright.”

The same servant of God restored sight to a certain blind man brought to him.

He also restored to greater gentleness than it had possessed before a certain soldier's horse that had turned to madness, so that it tore with bites those whom it could attack, by making the sign of the cross over its head. When the soldier asked with great and importunate entreaties that Fortunatus retain the cured horse for himself, he was unwilling, lest he appear to receive it because of the power of the miracle. Nevertheless, lest he sadden the man by not receiving it for charity, he accepted it after giving him a price.

The same Gregory further relates, from a certain old man of the city of Tuder who reported these things to him, that when he eagerly asked whether the old man had known Fortunatus and what he knew concerning him, the man answered: “That man was far different from the men whom we see now. For whatever he sought from almighty God he obtained even while he sought it.”

He continued: “On a certain day, when Goths who were hastening toward the parts of Ravenna came near the city of Tuder, they carried off two small boys from a possession subject to the aforesaid city. When this was announced to the holy man, he caused the aforesaid Goths to be summoned to him.

“When they arrived, he first sought by gentle speech to placate their harshness and afterward added: ‘What price do you wish for them? I shall give it. Release and return them, and in this furnish a gift of your favor.’

“The elder of them answered: ‘Whatever else you command, we are prepared to do, but not to return these boys.’

“The venerable man said to him: ‘You sadden me and do not hear your father. Do not sadden me, for it is not expedient for you.’ But he departed refusing. On the following day also, when the bishop again sought the same thing, he wished in no way to assent.

“The bishop said to him: ‘I know that it is not expedient for you to depart after saddening me.’ The Goth despised his words, returned to the lodging, and sent the same boys of whom the matter concerned ahead with his men, placed upon horses. He himself mounted his horse and immediately followed.

“When in that same city he came before the church of blessed Peter the apostle, his horse's foot slipped, and the horse fell with him. His thigh was immediately broken so that the bone was divided into two parts. Lifted in their hands, he was at once carried back to the lodging.

“He swiftly sent and brought back the boys whom he had sent ahead, and he sent word to the venerable man Fortunatus, saying: ‘I ask you, father, send your deacon to me.’

“When the deacon came to him as he lay there, the Goth returned the boys whom he had brought back and had refused to return to the bishop, saying: ‘Go and tell my lord bishop: Because you cursed me, behold, I have been struck. But receive the boys whom you sought, and, I ask, intercede for me.’

“The deacon received the boys and brought them back to the bishop. Fortunatus immediately gave blessed water to the deacon so that he might cast it over the body of the man who lay there, which he did.

“A marvelous and exceedingly astonishing thing: as soon as that water touched his thigh, the whole fracture was made solid. Thus that Goth mounted his horse and continued his journey as though he had suffered no injury.”

Gregory relates from the report of the same old man that in the said city of Tuder a certain man named Marcellus lived praiseworthily with his two sisters. It happened that, when he became infirm, he died on Holy Saturday. Because his body had to be carried some distance, his burial was delayed.

Meanwhile his sisters came to Bishop Fortunatus, weeping and beginning to cry with loud voices: “We know that you possess the life of the apostles: you cleanse lepers and illuminate the blind. Come and raise our dead man.”

As soon as he learned that their brother was dead, he too wept and answered them: “Depart and do not say this, because it is the command of almighty God, which no one can oppose.”

When they had departed, on the following Lord's Day before dawn he summoned two deacons and proceeded to the dead man's house. He approached the place where the lifeless body lay and gave himself to prayer.

When the prayer was completed, he called the dead man by name in no loud voice, saying, “Brother Marcellinus [i.e., Marcellus].” As one gently sleeping and awakened by a voice, the man immediately opened his eyes and, looking toward the bishop, said: “O what have you done? O what have you done?”

The bishop said to him, “What have I done?” He answered: “Yesterday two men came, cast me out of the body, and led me to a good place. Today one was sent who said: ‘Lead him back, because Bishop Fortunatus has come into his house.’”

He immediately recovered from the infirmity and remained longer in this life. Nevertheless, it must not be believed that he lost the place that he had received, because it is not doubtful that through the prayers of his intercessor he was able to live better after death, since even before death he strove to please almighty God.

But why do we say many things concerning Fortunatus's life, when even now we possess so many proofs of virtues at his body? For, as he was accustomed to do while living, he still ceaselessly persists at his dead bones in releasing the demon-possessed and curing the sick whenever it is sought in faith.

VII. Saint Severus

In the parts of Valeria there was a certain man named Severus, a priest of the church of Saint Mary the Virgin and a man of very venerable life.

When a certain head of a household had come to the end of life, he sent swift messengers asking Severus to come to him as quickly as possible and by his prayers to intercede for his sins, so that, after performing penance, he might leave the body absolved from the guilt of his faults.

It happened unexpectedly that the priest was occupied in pruning a vineyard. He said to those who came to him, “Go ahead; behold, I shall follow you.” He delayed a little to complete the very small amount of work that remained. When it was completed, he began to proceed toward the house.

As he went, those who had first been sent met him on the way, saying: “Why have you delayed, father? Behold, he is already dead.” Hearing this, he trembled and began to cry with loud voices that he was the man's killer.

Weeping, he came to the dead man's body and cast himself with tears upon the earth before his bed. While he wept vehemently, extended his head toward the earth, and cried that he was guilty of the man's death, suddenly the one who was dead received his soul.

When those standing around saw this, marveling and uttering cries, they began to weep still more for joy. When they asked the man where he had been or how he had returned, he said:

“Very foul men were leading me, and from their mouths and nostrils issued fire that I was unable to endure. While they led me through dark places, suddenly a young man of beautiful appearance, with others, came to meet us as we went. He said to those who were dragging me: ‘Lead him back, because the priest Severus laments. For the Lord has granted him in answer to Severus's tears.’”

Severus immediately arose from the earth and furnished the aid of his intercession to the man as he performed penance. While for seven days the sick man, restored to life, performed penance for the faults he had committed, on the eighth day he joyfully departed from the body.

When Peter asked, “What is the reason that such men cannot now be found?” Gregory answered: “Peter, I judge that even now many such men are not lacking in this age. For they are not therefore not such men if they do not perform such signs. The true estimation of life is in the virtue of works, not in the display of signs.

“For there are very many who, although they do not perform signs, are nevertheless not unequal to those who perform signs.” He proves this through the example of Peter and Paul, who were of equal sanctity; nevertheless, Peter walked with his feet upon the sea, namely toward Christ, while Paul suffered shipwreck in the sea.

VIII. Datius, Bishop of Milan

In the time of Emperor Justinian, when Datius, bishop of Milan, driven into exile on account of the faith, proceeded to the city of Constantinople, he came to Corinth. While he sought a large house for lodging that could contain his whole company and could scarcely find one, he saw a house of suitable size and commanded that it be prepared as a lodging for him.

When the inhabitants of that place said that it was impossible to remain in it because the devil had inhabited it for many years and it had therefore remained empty, the venerable man Datius answered: “Indeed, we ought to lodge in that house if the malign spirit has invaded it and driven human habitation from it.”

He therefore commanded it to be prepared for him and entered, secure in his intention to endure those contests of the ancient enemy.

Thus, in the untimely silence of night, while the man of God rested, the ancient enemy began with immense voices and great cries to imitate the roars of lions, the bleating of sheep, the braying of asses, the hissing of serpents, and the squeaking of mice.

Suddenly awakened by the voices of so many beasts, Datius arose greatly angered and began to cry with a loud voice against the ancient enemy, saying: “It has happened well to you, wretched one. Behold, you who said, ‘I shall place my seat in the north; I shall be like the Most High,’ have through your pride been made like pigs and mice. You who unworthily wished to imitate God, behold, as you are worthy, you imitate beasts.”

At his voice the malign spirit was ashamed, so to speak, of his own dejection and did not enter that same house to display monsters as he had been accustomed. Thus it was afterward made a habitation of men.

IX. Sabinus, Bishop of Canosa, and Cassius of Narnia

In the parts of Apulia there was Sabinus, bishop of the city of Canosa. When in great old age he had lost his sight so that he saw absolutely nothing, Totila, king of the Goths, heard that he possessed the spirit of prophecy. He did not believe it but strove to prove what he had heard.

When the king came into those parts, this man of the Lord invited him to a meal. When they had now come to the table, the king was unwilling to recline but sat at the right hand of the venerable man Sabinus.

When a boy offered the father a cup according to custom, the king silently extended his hand, took the chalice away, and himself offered the wine to the bishop in the boy's place, so that he might see whether Sabinus would discern by the spirit of prophecy who offered him the cup.

Then the man of God, receiving the chalice but not seeing the minister, said, “May that very hand live.” Rejoicing at this word, the king was ashamed because, although he had been detected, he nevertheless found in the man of God what he sought.

As the life of this venerable man was prolonged into great old age as an example to those who followed, his archdeacon, inflamed by ambition to acquire the episcopate, attempted to destroy him with poison.

He corrupted the mind of the wine-pourer so that he would offer wine mixed with poison in a cup. When, at the hour of refreshment, the man of God reclined to eat, the boy, corrupted by rewards, extended to the bishop the cup of poison that he had received from the archdeacon.

The venerable bishop said to him, “You drink what you offer me to drink.” The boy trembled, knowing that he had been detected, and, though about to die, preferred to drink rather than endure the punishments for the guilt of so great a murder.

When he placed the chalice at his mouth, the man of God restrained him, saying: “Do not drink. Give it to me; I shall drink. But go and tell the one who gave it to you: ‘I indeed drink the poison, but you will not be bishop.’”

Making the sign of the cross, the bishop securely drank the poison. At that same hour, in another place to which the archdeacon had gone, he died, as though those poisons had passed through the bishop's mouth into the archdeacon's entrails. Although bodily poison was lacking to inflict death upon the archdeacon, the poison of his own malice killed him in the sight of the eternal Judge.

In that same time of the Goths, when King Totila came to Narnia, Cassius, a man of venerable life and bishop of that city, met him. Because his face was always accustomed to be red from a skin eruption, King Totila believed that this was not from an eruption but from continual drinking, and he utterly despised him.

But that almighty God might show how great was the man who was despised, in the field of Narnia where the king had arrived a malign spirit invaded his sword-bearer before his whole army and began to vex him cruelly.

When he had been removed from before the king's eyes and led to the venerable man Cassius, Cassius, the man of God, expelled the spirit from him by prayer and the sign of the cross, and it did not presume to enter him further. After this the king venerated Cassius from the heart, whom previously he had judged greatly contemptible from his face.

X. Andrew, Bishop of Fundi

Concerning Andrew, bishop of the city of Fundi, who was delivered from an imminent fall into incontinence through the vision of a Jew.

This Andrew, therefore, while leading a life full of many virtues and guarding himself within the fortress of continence under priestly custody, was unwilling to remove from the household of his episcopal residence a certain nun whom he had formerly kept with him. Rather, confident in his own and her continence, he permitted her to dwell with him—

From this it happened that the ancient enemy sought an entrance of temptation into his mind. For he began to impress her appearance upon the eyes of Andrew's mind, so that, enticed, he might think wicked things.

On a certain day a particular Jew, coming from the parts of Campania to Rome, traveled upon the Appian Way. Coming to the territory of Fundi when he saw that the day was already growing toward evening and found nowhere to turn aside, he came near a temple of Apollo and betook himself there to remain.

Fearing the sacrilege of that place, although he did not possess faith in the cross, he nevertheless took care to fortify himself with the sign of the cross. At midnight, disturbed by fear of the solitude, he lay awake. Suddenly looking, he saw a throng of malign spirits proceeding as though in attendance upon a certain power.

When the one who presided over the others had seated himself in the bosom of that place, he began to examine the causes and deeds of each of the spirits attending him, so that he might discover how much wickedness each one had accomplished.

While the individual spirits, in response to his inquiry, set forth what they had done against the good, one sprang into their midst and disclosed by how great a temptation of the flesh he had moved the mind of Bishop Andrew through the appearance of the nun who dwelt in his episcopal residence.

The malign spirit who presided listened to this eagerly and believed the gain accomplished for him to be greater in proportion as he inclined the soul of a holier man toward a fall into perdition. The spirit who confessed these things added that, by the evening hour of the preceding day, he had drawn Andrew's mind so far that he gave the nun a caressing slap upon the back.

Then the enemy of the human race gently exhorted him to do what he had begun, so that among the others he might hold the palm for Andrew's ruin.

While the Jew who had arrived watched these things awake and trembled with great anguish of fear, the spirit who presided over all those attending there commanded that they inquire who the man was who had presumed to lie in that temple.

The malign spirits went to him and, looking more closely, saw that he was fortified with the sign of the cross. Marveling, they said: “Alas, alas! An empty vessel, but signed.” When they reported this, that whole throng of malign spirits disappeared.

The Jew who saw these things suddenly arose and hastened to the bishop. Finding him in his church, he drew him aside and asked by what temptation he was pressed. The bishop, ashamed, was unwilling to confess his temptation.

When the Jew said that Andrew had cast eyes of depraved love upon that handmaid of God, and the bishop still denied it, he added: “Why do you deny what is asked, when by yesterday evening you were brought so far that you struck her hind parts with a slap?”

At these words the bishop, seeing that he had been detected, humbly confessed what he had previously denied stubbornly. Taking counsel for his fall and shame, the Jew indicated how he had known this and what he had heard concerning the bishop in the assembly of malign spirits.

Recognizing this, Andrew immediately cast himself upon the earth in prayer. Soon he expelled not only that handmaid of God but also every woman who dwelt there in his service. In that same temple of Apollo he suddenly made an oratory of blessed Andrew and thereafter entirely lacked every temptation of the flesh.

The Jew by whose vision and rebuke he had been saved he drew to eternal salvation, instructed in the faith, and baptized. From this example, those who dedicate their bodies to continence should not presume to dwell with women, lest a sudden ruin of the mind steal upon them from the presence of a desired form. But this event also furnishes us both fear and confidence.

XI. Fridianus and Sabinus

Gregory relates that the venerable man Venantius, bishop of Luna, told him that in the church of Lucca, near Luna, there was a bishop of marvelous virtue named Fridianus. All who dwell there attest that this most celebrated miracle of his is remembered.

The river Ausaris, which flowed near the walls of that city, was accustomed frequently, when an inundation occurred, to leave the channel of its course, spread through the fields, and overturn whatever it found sown or planted.

When this happened frequently and great necessity pressed the inhabitants of that place, they attempted with devoted labor to divert it through other places. But although labor continued for a long time, it could not be turned from its own channel.

Then the man of the Lord Fridianus made a little rake for himself. Approaching the river's channel alone, he applied himself to prayer. Commanding the river to follow him, he drew the rake through the earth by the places that seemed good to him.

Abandoning its own channel, all the river's water followed him, so that it entirely deserted the place of its customary course and claimed for itself a channel where the man of the Lord had made a mark by drawing the rake through the earth. Thus it no longer injured whatever was sown or planted for the future sustenance of men.

Gregory relates, upon the testimony of the same Venantius, bishop of Luna, and of John of Piacenza, then prefect at Rome, that in the city of Piacenza there was a bishop of marvelous sanctity named Sabinus.

On a certain day, when his deacon announced to him that the Po had left the channel of its course, occupied the church's fields, and held beneath the water of that river all the places there that would serve for nourishing men, Sabinus, a man of venerable life, answered: “Go and tell it: ‘The bishop commands you to restrain yourself and return to your own channel.’”

Hearing this, the deacon despised and mocked it. Then the man of God summoned a notary and dictated, saying: “Sabinus, servant of our Lord Jesus Christ, sends a written admonition to the Po. I command you in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ that you no longer depart from your channel into these places and that you do not presume to injure the church's lands.”

He added to the notary: “Go, write this, and cast it into the river's water.” When this had been done, the river's water, receiving the holy man's command, immediately restrained itself from the church's lands. Returning to its own channel, it no longer presumed to depart into those same places. By this the hardness of disobedient men is confounded, since an irrational element obeyed the commands of a holy man through the power of Jesus.

XII. Saint Cerbonius and Bishop Fulgentius

The venerable man Cerbonius, bishop of Populonia, also gave a great proof of his sanctity in our days. Since he was very intent upon the practice of hospitality, on a certain day he received passing soldiers into his lodging. When Goths suddenly came upon them, he hid those whom he had received and, by hiding them, saved their lives from the wickedness of the others.

When this was announced to Totila, the perfidious king of the Goths, inflamed by the most monstrous madness of cruelty, he commanded that Cerbonius be led to a place called Merulis, eight miles from this city, where he then sat with his army, and that he be cast to bears to be devoured in a spectacle of the people.

When that perfidious king had taken his seat at the spectacle, a great multitude of people gathered to behold the bishop's death. The bishop was then led into the midst, and an exceedingly savage bear was sought for his death, which by cruelly tearing human limbs might satiate the savage king's spirit.

The bear was therefore released from its cage. Inflamed, it swiftly sought the bishop. But the bear suddenly forgot its ferocity, bent its neck, humbly lowered its head, and began to lick the bishop's feet, so that it was manifestly given everyone to understand that toward that man of God the hearts of men were beastlike and those of beasts were, as it were, human.

Then all the people who had gathered for the spectacle of death were turned with a great cry to wonder and veneration. The king himself was also moved to cultivate reverence for him. Even now some survive who were present and saw this event.

The same holy man Cerbonius had prepared a sepulcher in his own church, namely at Populonia, over which he presided. When the nation of the Lombards entered Italy and devastated everything, he went to the island of Elba.

When there he became infirm unto death, he commanded the clerics attending him: “Place me in my sepulcher, which I prepared for myself at Populonia.” When they said that they could not do this because the Lombards held those places and ran about everywhere, he answered: “Carry me back securely and do not fear. But take care to bury me there swiftly, and depart suddenly from there.”

When he died, they placed his body in a little boat so that they might carry it there. While they were on the way, immense rain broke forth. Throughout the whole space of sea that lies from the island of Elba to Populonia, namely twelve miles, stormy rain descended, but not one drop of rain fell into that boat.

After the saint's body had been buried as he commanded and they departed suddenly, Gumarith, a most cruel duke of the Lombards, arrived. From this it was manifestly evident that the saint had been illustrious in the spirit of prophecy when he commanded their sudden departure.

A similar miracle concerning rain occurred around Fulgentius, bishop of the church of Otricoli. When Totila approached those same parts with his army, the bishop took care to send gifts to him through his clerics and to mitigate the madness of his fury with offerings.

As soon as Totila saw them, he despised them and, enraged, commanded his men to constrain the bishop by force under every harshness and preserve him for his examination.

When the fierce Gothic servants seized him, they commanded him to stand in one place as they surrounded him. They made a circle for him in the earth, beyond which he was in no way to dare to extend his foot.

While the man of God stood in excessive sun, surrounded by those Goths and enclosed by the marking of the circle, suddenly lightning and thunder and so great a force of rain broke forth that those who had received him into their custody were unable to endure the immensity of the rain.

Although an exceedingly great inundation of rain occurred, not even a drop descended within the marking of that same circle in which Fulgentius stood. When this was announced to the king, that savage mind was turned to great reverence for him.

XIII. Isaac of Syria

Isaac was not from Italy, but when he first came from the parts of Syria into Italy, he arrived at the city of Spoleto and remained there almost until the final times of the Goths. Many of our people knew him, especially the sacred virgin Gregoria, who now dwells in the Roman city.

When in the time of her youth she fled into the church after her marriage had already been arranged and sought the manner of life of a nun, she was defended by this same man and led to the habit that she desired.

Isaac therefore entered a church in the city of Spoleto and sought from the keepers that permission be granted him to pray there as long as he wished and that he not be pressed to depart from the church at the more private hours.

He immediately stood to pray and passed the whole day in prayer. He joined the following night to it continuously. On the second day also, with the night that followed, he persisted tirelessly in prayers, and he joined a third day in prayer as well.

When one of the keepers, inflated by a spirit of pride, saw this—from which he ought to have profited, he came instead to the harm of his own defect—he began to call Isaac a dissembler and, with a rustic word, to cry that he was an impostor who displayed himself praying for three days and nights before the eyes of men.

Immediately running to him, he struck the man of God with a slap so that, as a dissembler of religious life, he would depart from the church with insult. But a malign spirit suddenly invaded him, cast him down at the man of God's feet, and began to cry through his mouth: “Isaac casts me out! Isaac casts me out!”

For it was not known by what name the pilgrim was called, but the spirit who cried that he could be cast out by him disclosed his name. The man of God immediately leaned over the body of the vexed man, and the malign spirit that had invaded him departed.

What had been done in the church was immediately made known throughout that whole city. Noble and ignoble men and women alike began to run, and they strove competitively to seize him for their houses. Some offered estates and others money for constructing a monastery.

But God's servant, receiving none of these things, departed from the city, found a deserted place not far away, and constructed a humble dwelling for himself there. Many proceeded to him and gave themselves to God's service under his instruction.

When the disciples frequently and humbly suggested that for the monastery's use he should receive the possessions that were offered to him, the vigilant guardian of his poverty held a strong opinion, saying: “A monk who seeks possessions upon earth is not a monk.” Thus he feared to lose the security of his poverty as avaricious rich men are accustomed to guard riches that will perish. There he became illustrious in the spirit of prophecy and in great miracles.

On a certain day at evening he caused as many iron implements as we call spades to be cast into the monastery's garden, and said to the disciples: “Cast this many spades into the garden and return quickly.”

That same night, when according to custom he rose with the brothers to render praises to God, he said to them: “Go and cook pottage for our workmen, so that it may be prepared at first light.”

When morning came, he commanded the pottage to be carried. Entering the garden with the brothers, he found as many men laboring as he had commanded spades to be cast into the garden.

Thieves had entered to plunder, but, their minds changed by the Spirit, they took the spades they found and cultivated throughout the whole night the uncultivated spaces of that garden.

Approaching them in the morning, Isaac said: “Rejoice, brothers. You have labored greatly; now rest.” Thus he caused them to be refreshed with the prepared food. When they had been refreshed, he said: “Do not do evil. Whenever you wish something from the garden, come to its entrance, ask peaceably, and cease from the depravity of theft.” Thus he caused them to be laden with gathered vegetables.

At another time certain pilgrims came to him seeking mercy, with their garments torn so that they appeared nearly naked. When they sought garments, the man of the Lord heard their words and silently summoned one of the disciples. He commanded him to go to a certain wood and carry back to him the garments that he would find there in a hollow tree.

Fulfilling the commands, the disciple brought their garments and secretly presented them to the master. Isaac showed them to the pilgrims who sought them and furnished them, saying: “Come, because you are naked; take these and clothe yourselves.” Receiving them, they recognized the things they had placed there.

At another time, when someone sent him two baskets full of provisions, the boy who carried them hid one at a certain place on the journey so that he might retain it for himself. Isaac kindly received the other that was carried to him but admonished the boy to take cautiously the basket that he had hidden on the way, because a serpent was in it.

Confounded by these words and seeing his theft detected, when on the journey he cautiously approached the place for that basket in order to test the truth of the saying, he found in it a serpent, as the man of God had foretold.

Although this man was eminent in the spirit of prophecy and other virtues, there was one thing in him that appeared reprehensible: namely, so great a joy was sometimes in him that, if he were not known, he would not have been believed full of such virtues.

When Peter asked the cause why so holy a man could not restrain that excessive joy, Gregory answered: “Peter, great is the dispensation of almighty God. It frequently happens that he furnishes certain greater things to some men and does not bestow certain lesser ones, so that their mind may always have something for which to reprove itself.

“While they labor in that which they have not received and are unable to prevail, they do not exalt themselves in those things they have received by the Lord's grant.”

XIV. Eutychius and Florentius

At the same time, in the Nursian part of the province, two men lived in the life and habit of holy conduct. One of them was called Eutychius, the other Florentius.

Eutychius had grown in spiritual zeal and in the fervor of virtue and strove by exhortation to lead the souls of many to God. Florentius, however, had given himself to simplicity and prayer.

Not far away, when a certain monastery had been deprived of its ruler by death, Eutychius was elected by the monks of that monastery. Overcome by their entreaties, he received the office of the presider and exercised it diligently, leaving to Florentius alone the oratory in which he had formerly dwelt with him.

Florentius, prostrating himself in prayer, sought from the Lord that he deign to grant him some solace for dwelling there. When the prayer was completed, he departed from the oratory and found a bear standing before the doors.

When it lowered its head toward the earth and showed nothing of ferocity, it was openly given to be understood that it had come for the service of the man of God, which he himself recognized.

Because four or five sheep remained in that cell and there was no one to pasture or guard them, he commanded the bear, saying: “Go and lead these sheep down to pasture, and return at the sixth hour.” It began to do this without ceasing, and the beast itself, fasting, pastured the sheep that it had been accustomed to eat.

When the man of God wished to fast until the ninth hour, he commanded it to return home with the sheep at the ninth hour. It fulfilled everything unfailingly.

The fame of so great a virtue began to grow far and wide. Seeing this, four monks from the disciples of the venerable Eutychius, stung by envy because their master and abbot did not perform the signs that Florentius performed while left alone, lay in wait for that bear and killed it.

When the bear, whom Florentius from simplicity called his brother, did not return home according to custom, he began to be afflicted. On the following day he went into the field to seek the sheep and found the bear killed. Solicitously inquiring by whom it had been killed, he discovered them. He gave himself to lamentation, deploring the brothers' malice more than the bear's death.

The venerable man Eutychius caused him to be brought to himself and strove to console him. But the man of the Lord, inflamed by the goads of great grief, uttered an imprecation, saying: “I hope in almighty God that in this life, before the eyes of everyone, those who killed my bear, which injured them in nothing, will receive vengeance for their malice.”

Divine vengeance immediately followed his voice. For those four monks who had killed the bear were struck by elephantiasis, so that they perished as their members putrefied.

The man of God was greatly terrified by what had happened and feared that he had cursed in this manner. Throughout the whole time of his life he lamented because he had been heard, crying that he had been a cruel murderer in their death. We believe that this was done by the Lord so that a man of marvelous simplicity, moved by however great a grief, would not further presume to hurl back the dart of a curse.

When the fame of this Florentius increased, a certain deacon proceeded to him and strove to commend himself to his prayers. Approaching the cell, he found the whole place all around full of serpents. Greatly terrified, he cried, saying, “Servant of God, pray for me.”

At that time there was marvelous serenity. Florentius came out, lifted his eyes to heaven, and prayed that the Lord remove that plague as he knew how. At his voice the sky suddenly thundered, and that same thunder killed all those serpents.

Seeing them killed, the man of God said: “Behold, Lord, you have killed them. Who will remove them from here?” Immediately at his voice as many birds came as there were serpents killed. Carrying away the individual serpents, they rendered the place entirely clean of them.

When Peter asked, “By what virtue or merit was this man heard at his will in this way?” Gregory answered: “Peter, before the pure and simple nature of almighty God, purity and simplicity of the human heart have great power.

“For the very fact that his servants, separated from earthly actions, do not know how to speak idle things, and avoid scattering and defiling the mind through words, obtains for them a hearing from their Creator before others. To the extent possible, they accord with him in the very purity and simplicity of their thought as though by a certain likeness.

“But we, mingled with the crowds of people, frequently speak idle things and sometimes even gravely harmful things. Our mouth is made as distant from almighty God as it is near to this world. We are drawn greatly downward when through continual conversation we mingle with secular people.”

Eutychius, who had been the aforesaid Florentius's companion in the way of God, became more illustrious after death by the power of signs. Among the other miracles that the citizens of that city are accustomed to relate concerning him, this is chief: that even down to these times of the Lombards, the Lord deigns continually to work through Eutychius's garment.

For whenever rain is lacking and a long drought burns the earth with excessive heat, the assembled citizens of that city are accustomed to lift up his tunic and offer it with prayers in the sight of the Lord.

As it was carried through the fields, sudden rain was granted, sufficient to saturate the earth fully.

XV. Martin the Solitary

Recently, in the parts of Campania, a very venerable man named Martin led the solitary life on Mount Marsicus. He was enclosed for many years in a very narrow cave. I learned many things concerning him from his own narration, from Pope Pelagius of blessed memory, my predecessor, and from other most religious men.

This was his first miracle: as soon as he betook himself into a hollow of the aforesaid mountain, from the same rock that had made within itself a narrow cave there broke forth a drop of water that sufficed Martin, the servant of God, for daily use. Neither was more present than necessary, nor was it lacking for his need.

But the ancient enemy of the human race, envying his virtues, attempted by his customary art to drive him from that cave. Entering a beast friendly to himself, a serpent, he attempted by creating terror to cast Martin from that dwelling.

The serpent began to be found alone with him in the cave: when Martin prayed, it stretched itself before him; when he lay down, it likewise lay down. But the holy man, entirely unafraid, extended his hand or foot even to its mouth, saying: “If you have received permission to strike, I do not prohibit it.”

When this occurred continually for three years, on a certain day the ancient enemy, conquered by so great a fortitude of his, roared and cast himself, creeping along the sloping side of the mountain, over a precipice. By the flame issuing from itself, it burned all the shrubs.

This same venerable man had first resolved during the time of his enclosure that he would no longer see a woman, not because he despised the sex, but because from beholding the form he feared that he would incur the fault of temptation.

Hearing this, a certain woman boldly ascended the mountain and impudently broke through to his cave. But he, seeing her at some distance and perceiving the feminine garments of the one coming toward him, gave himself to prayer and pressed his face to the earth. He lay prostrate until the shameless woman, wearied, withdrew from the window of his little cell.

On that same day, as soon as she descended from the mountain, she ended her life, so that by the sentence of her death it was given to be understood that it greatly displeased almighty God that by her wicked boldness she had saddened his servant.

At another time, while many still gathered with religious devotion and a narrow path along the sloping side of the mountain led those hastening to his little cell, a small boy walking incautiously fell from that mountain and tumbled as far as the valley, which, situated beneath the same mountain, appeared as though in the depth.

In that same place the mountain itself rose to so great a height that the immense trees proceeding from that valley appeared like fruit trees to those looking from the mountain.

All who came were therefore disturbed, and with the greatest care it was sought whether the body of the fallen boy could be found anywhere. For who would believe anything other than that he was dead? Who would suspect that his body could have reached the earth whole, when it could have been torn into pieces by the rocks interposed everywhere?

But when the boy was sought, he was found in the valley not only living but also unharmed. Then it became manifestly known to everyone that he could not be injured because Martin's prayer carried him in his fall.

Above his cave an immense rock overhung. Since it appeared attached to the mountain by only a small part, it projected over Martin's cell and, threatening to fall, daily menaced both its own fall and his death.

A multitude of countrymen came to him and entreated the man of God to deign to leave the cave so that they might tear away the rock about to fall and he might thereafter live there more securely. He did not acquiesce in this matter.

Thus, while the multitude that had come attempted, if it could be done without danger to the man of God, to lift the immense stone that pressed above, suddenly, before everyone's eyes, an exceedingly marvelous thing occurred. The mass that the multitude attempted to tear away was suddenly uprooted by those laboring, leapt so as not to touch the roof of Martin's cave, and fell farther away, as though fleeing injury to God's servant. It is understood that this was done by angelic ministry.

When Martin first betook himself upon that mountain and dwelt in the cave before it had been closed, he bound his foot with an iron chain and fixed its other end to a rock, so that it would not be lawful for him to proceed farther than the chain's length extended.

When the venerable man of God Benedict heard this, he took care to send him this message through his disciple: “If you are a servant of God, let not a chain of iron hold you, but the chain of Christ.” At this word Martin immediately loosened that fetter. Nevertheless, even when free, he never extended his foot beyond the place to which the chain had extended. Afterward he began to have disciples, although they dwelt apart from his cave.

XVI. A Dead Man Raised and Other Signs

A certain man bearing the monastic habit and fulfilling it in his conduct dwelt on Mount Argentarius. Each year he was accustomed to come to the church of the prince of the apostles, and on the way he lodged with a certain subdeacon named Quadragesimus in the parts of Aurelia.

When on a certain occasion he lodged there, it happened that near the church and Quadragesimus's dwelling the husband of a particular poor woman died. While that woman lamented around the dead man's body throughout the whole night, in the morning, moved by great compassion for the man to be buried, the monk said to Quadragesimus, “Rise and let us pray.”

Proceeding to the church, they prayed for a long time. When the prayer was completed, the monk gathered dust from the edge of the altar and came with Quadragesimus to the dead man's body.

After he had also prayed there for a long time, with his left hand the monk uncovered the covered face of the dead man, and with his right he began to rub the dead man's face with the dust he had brought. The woman opposed this act, not knowing its cause.

Returning to life, the dead man began to yawn, open his eyes, lift himself, and sit upright as though rising from sleep. Seeing this, the woman began to weep still more for joy and to utter louder cries.

But the monk restrained her with a modest prohibition, saying: “Be silent, be silent. If anyone asks how this was done, say only that the Lord Jesus Christ has performed his works.” Departing thereafter from Quadragesimus, he never again appeared in those parts, fleeing temporal honor.

When Peter, upon hearing these things, said that to raise a dead man was greater than all miracles, Gregory answered: “If we attend to visible things, it is necessary that I believe so. But if we ponder invisible things, it is undoubtedly established that it is a greater miracle to convert a sinner by the word of preaching and the solace of prayer than to raise one dead in the flesh.

“In the latter, flesh is raised that will die again; in the former, a soul that will live eternally. Therefore it is less for someone to be raised in the flesh than in the soul, unless perhaps through the vivification of the flesh the mind also is restored to life.”

Gregory also relates concerning another monk in the parts of Campania who was called Benedictus. In the time of King Totila, certain Goths attempted to burn him with his little cell. After fire was placed beneath it, everything around it burned, but his cell could not be burned.

Seeing this and raging still more, the Goths dragged him from his dwelling and, seeing not far away a heated oven prepared for baking bread, cast him into it and shut him inside. But on the following day he was found unharmed, so that neither his flesh nor the extremities of his garments were burned.

When Peter asked whether the aforesaid holy men had endured any ambushes of the devil, Gregory answered: “Without the labor of combat there is no palm of victory. The malign spirit always presses upon our thought, speech, and work, to see whether perhaps he may find something from which he may stand as accuser before the examination of the eternal Judge.”

He introduces the example of a certain priest named Stephen in the parts of Valeria, a man of venerable life. One day, returning home from a journey and speaking carelessly to his servant, he commanded: “Come, devil, take off my shoes.”

At this word the laces of his boots suddenly began to loosen themselves with the greatest speed, so that it was openly shown that the devil himself, whom he had named, obeyed him in removing the boots.

When the priest saw this, he was greatly terrified and began to cry with a loud voice: “Depart, wretched one, depart. For I spoke not to you but to my servant.” Thus the laces remained loosened in great part.

When Peter added that it was laborious and exceedingly terrible to stand continually against the enemy's ambushes, Gregory answered: “It will not be laborious if we attribute our guardianship not to ourselves but to heavenly grace, yet in such a way that we ourselves too keep watch beneath its protection as much as we can.

“When the ancient enemy begins to be expelled from the mind, by divine bounty it frequently happens that not only is he no longer feared, but he himself is terrified by the virtue of the living.”

Hence Gregory adds the example of a certain nun who, despising the world, devoted herself to God in the city of Spoleto against her parents' will. Many women also gathered with her in religious habit in order to imitate her.

On a certain day, when a particular countryman had been seized by the devil and was greatly vexed, he was led to that nun. With loud cries and renewed resolve she commanded him: “Depart from him, wretched one! Depart from him!”

When the devil said through the possessed man's mouth, “If I depart, into whom shall I enter?” she answered, “Enter into this pig.” He immediately departed from the man, entered a certain little pig feeding there, killed it, and departed. From this it is also gathered that without God's permission no malign spirit has power against a man, since it could not enter the pig unless permitted.

XVII. Miracles of the Bones of God's Elect

The very bones of God's dead elect frequently live in miracles. In the province of Valeria this marvel occurred. A certain venerable priest led a life of holy conduct there with his clerics, and when he reached his end he was buried before the church.

Sheepfolds adjoined that same church, and the place in which he was buried lay across the way of those going toward the sheep. On a certain night, while the clerics sang psalms, a thief came, entered the sheepfolds, took a ram, and swiftly departed.

When he passed through the place where that priest was buried, he suddenly became fixed and could not move his step. He put the ram down from his neck and wished to release it, but he was unable to loosen his hand.

The wretched man therefore began to stand there with his booty, guilty and bound. He wished to release the ram but could not; he wished to depart with the ram but was unable. Thus, in a marvelous manner, the dead man held the one who had feared to be seen by the living.

In the morning the clerics, departing from the church, found a man unknown to them holding a ram in his hand. The matter came into doubt whether he was taking the ram away or offering it. But the guilty man quickly disclosed his punishment.

Everyone marveled that through the merit of the man of God he stood bound to his prey. Praying for him, they scarcely obtained by their entreaties that the one who had come to seize their property should merit at least to depart empty.

Likewise, upon the mountain that rises above the city of Palestrina there is a certain monastery established in honor of blessed Peter. In it there was a venerable abbot of holy conduct who, nourishing a certain monk, advanced him to reverend manners. Seeing that he had grown in virtues, the abbot caused him to be ordained priest in that same monastery.

When a little after his ordination his departure was revealed to him, he asked the aforesaid abbot to permit him to prepare a sepulcher for himself. The abbot answered: “I shall die before you. Nevertheless, go and prepare your sepulcher as you wish.” He departed and prepared it.

After a few days, the abbot, stricken by fever and coming to his end, commanded that priest: “Place me in your sepulcher.” The priest answered: “You know, father, that I am now about to follow you; it cannot hold us both.”

The abbot answered: “Do as I have said, because the sepulcher will hold both.” Thus the abbot died and was placed in that sepulcher which the priest had prepared for himself.

The priest immediately became infirm and ended his life. When he was carried to the sepulcher prepared for himself and it was opened, everyone saw that there was no place in that sepulcher where the dead man might be placed, because the body of the abbot laid there occupied the whole sepulcher.

When those present were situated amid the difficulty of the thing to be done, one of them cried out, saying: “Behold, father, where is what you said—that this sepulcher would hold both?”

At his voice, immediately before everyone's eyes, the abbot's human body, which had been there before and lay upon its back, turned itself upon its side and furnished the vacant place of the sepulcher for burying the priest's body. That place held both men as, while living, he had promised and, while dead, fulfilled.

Gregory also relates another example that occurred in the Roman city, in the church of Saint Peter. A certain man named Theodore, keeper of the said church, arose earlier than usual one night to improve the lights near the door. He stood upon wooden steps placed beneath a lamp and replenished the lamp's light.

Blessed Peter the apostle suddenly stood below upon the pavement in a white stole and said to him, “Fellow servant, why have you arisen so early?” Having said this, he vanished from the eyes of the one who saw him.

But so great a fear rushed upon Theodore that all strength failed in his body and he lay infirm for many days. In this matter the apostle wished to show that, whatever men performed for his veneration, he himself always and without interruption saw it for the reward of recompense.

When Peter asked why Theodore had become infirm from that vision, Gregory answered by introducing the similar example of Daniel the prophet, who trembled and languished for many days after seeing that terrible vision. As the reason, he said that flesh is unable to bear the things that belong to the spirit.

Therefore, sometimes when the human mind is led beyond itself to see, it is necessary that this vessel of flesh, which is unable to bear so great a weight, become infirm.

He also gives another example concerning a certain paralytic girl. While she prayed before blessed Peter that she might receive health, he told her in a vision to go to Acontius, the sacristan of his church, a holy man of great humility.

Approaching him and disclosing the vision and command of blessed Peter, she heard him say: “If you were sent by him, rise.” Rising, she was immediately healed.

XVIII. Menas the Solitary and the Two Kinds of Martyrdom

In the province of Samnium, a certain venerable man named Menas led the solitary life. He died nearly ten years ago. For his use he possessed nothing other than a few beehives.

When a certain Lombard wished to inflict robbery upon those bees, he was first corrected by this same man's word and immediately afterward vexed by a malign spirit before his feet. From this it happened that he had a celebrated name even among that same barbarous nation, and no one thereafter presumed to enter his cell except humbly.

Bears coming frequently from the neighboring forest attempted to eat his bees. When he caught them, he beat them with the rod that he was accustomed to carry in his hand. Before his blows the most monstrous beasts roared and fled, though they were scarcely able to fear swords.

His practice was to seek nothing and to possess nothing in this world. He inflamed everyone who came to him toward desires for eternal life; and if he recognized the faults of certain persons, he never refrained from rebuke but raged against them through his tongue.

The inhabitants of that place had established a custom that each should send his offerings week by week, so that he might have something to bestow upon those who came to him.

When a certain man named Carcerius, overcome by unclean desire, carried off a particular nun and joined her to himself in marriage, as soon as the man of God heard this, he took care to rebuke him through whomever he could.

Conscious of his crime, the man in no way dared to approach the man of God, lest perhaps, as he was accustomed to rebuke offenders harshly, he might accuse him. Nevertheless, he made his offerings and sent them among the offerings of others, so that Menas, at least without knowing it, might receive his gifts.

When they were presented to him, the man of God sat silently and strove to consider them all individually. Choosing and receiving all the others, he recognized through the spirit the offerings that Carcerius had sent, despised them, and cast them away, saying: “Go and tell him: ‘You have taken his offering away from almighty God, and do you send yours to me? I do not receive your offering, because you have taken his from God.’”

From this a great fear invaded all who were present, since the man of God judged so knowingly concerning those absent.

When Peter said that he suspected that the aforesaid saints would have been suitable for martyrdom if persecution had found them, Gregory distinguished in answer that there are two kinds of martyrdom, one in secret and another in public.

For although persecution is absent outwardly, the merit of martyrdom is present in secret when virtue ready for suffering burns in the mind. He proves this through the Lord's word spoken concerning James and John, the sons of Zebedee: “You shall drink my cup,” which signifies the cup of suffering. Nevertheless, although James fell in suffering, John ended his life in the peace of the Church.

But holy men also who endure the ambushes of the hidden enemy, love their adversaries, and resist all carnal desires, through the fact that they sacrifice themselves in the heart to almighty God, were martyrs even in a time of peace.

Even in our own times, it has happened upon an arising occasion that persons base and of secular life, concerning whom nothing heavenly appeared able to be presumed, attained to the crown of martyrdom.

He introduces the examples of forty countrymen who, nearly fifteen years earlier, were captured by the Lombards. Because they were unwilling to eat meat sacrificed to the Lombards' idols, as the latter required under threat of death, they were killed by them and made martyrs.

He adds concerning four hundred others captured by the Lombards, many of whom were killed and crowned with martyrdom because they were unwilling to adore the head of a goat that the Lombards sacrificed to the devil and themselves adored.

If, therefore, those who in the peace of the Church appeared to follow the broad ways of this age merited to receive the palm of martyrdom, much more could those who, by afflicting themselves in the peace of the Church, held the narrow way of martyrdom have become martyrs if persecution had arisen.

Nevertheless, we do not hold this concerning everyone as though it were a rule. For just as very many who appear contemptible in the peace of the Church can undergo martyrdom in open persecution, so sometimes those who were believed to stand strongly in the peace of the Church fall from fear of weakness.

But those concerning whom it is established that they persisted to the end of life in the hidden virtue of the mind could not have fallen even in open persecution.

Gregory adds, showing how divine mercy often opposed itself to those Lombards and exposed their error through many miracles: through blindness inflicted upon a certain Arian bishop of theirs because he wished violently to enter a church; through lights divinely kindled in a church; and, at the dedication of a certain church that had formerly belonged to the Arians, through the devil seen departing in the appearance of a pig, a noise made there in the night, a cloud appearing over the altar, and a marvelous sweetness of fragrance.

XIX. Eleuterius

Eleuterius, father of the monastery of blessed Mark the Evangelist situated in the orchards of the city of Spoleto, lived with me for a long time in the city in the midst of the monastery and died there. His disciples related that he had raised a dead man.

He was a man of so great a simplicity and compunction that there was no doubt that the tears brought forth from so humble and simple a mind could obtain many things before almighty God.

I shall relate a miracle of his that, when questioned by me, he confessed simply. On a certain day, while he undertook a journey and, with the day growing toward evening, lacked a place for lodging, he came to a monastery of virgins in which there was a certain small boy whom a malign spirit was accustomed to vex every night.

When the nuns received the man of God, they asked him to receive that boy with him that night. He kindly assented. When morning came, the nuns asked the man of God whether anything had happened to the boy that night.

When he answered that the boy had suffered nothing, he asked them the cause of this inquiry. They indicated that he was accustomed to be vexed every night. Therefore, since they could no longer see such vexation—they asked him to take him to his monastery. The man of God assented to this. When he had been in the monastery for a long time and the malign spirit had not presumed to approach him, the mind of that old man was touched rather immoderately with joy over the boy's deliverance.

For he said before the assembled brothers: “Brothers, the devil was playing with those sisters; but when he came to the servants of God, he did not presume to approach this boy any further.” After this utterance, in that same hour and moment, that same boy was vexed before all the brothers when the devil invaded him.

Seeing this, the old man immediately gave himself over to lamentation. When the brothers wished to console him as he wept for a long time, he answered, saying: “Believe me that today bread shall enter no one's mouth unless this boy has been snatched from the demon.”

Then he prostrated himself in prayer with all the brothers, and prayer continued until the boy was snatched from the vexation. And he was made so perfectly sound that the malign spirit did not return to him.

When Peter said concerning this matter, “I believe that a little self-exaltation had crept upon him, on account of which he wished his disciples to be assistants in that deed, that is, in the deliverance,” Gregory affirmed that it was so.

Gregory then adds how great the power of Eleuterius's prayer was, saying that he had experienced it in himself. For when Gregory himself, while dwelling in his monastery, suffered at a certain time from a cutting pain in the vital organs and, through repeated distresses at successive moments of the hours, drew near to death—a malady that the Greeks call syncope—and unless the brothers refreshed him with frequent food, his vital spirit seemed to be entirely cut off, the paschal solemnity arrived.

Since upon the most sacred Sabbath, on which even all little children fast, he was unable to fast, he began to fail more from sorrow than from infirmity. He brought the aforesaid man of God to his oratory, asking that through his prayer power to fast on that day might be granted to him by God.

When Eleuterius had accomplished this with tears, Gregory's stomach received such strength that both food and sickness were completely removed from his memory. He began to marvel who he had been and who he now was. When evening came, he found himself of such great strength that, if he had wished, he could have sustained the fast throughout the following day also.

Because Gregory had spoken of this man's compunction and tears, he adds, saying that there are two kinds of compunction, because a soul thirsting for God is first pierced by fear and afterward by love.

For at first it afflicts itself with tears because, while it recalls its own evils, it fears that it will suffer eternal punishments for them. But when fear has been consumed by the long bitterness of sorrow, a certain assurance of pardon now arises, and the mind is inflamed with love for heavenly joys.

It begins to weep most bitterly because it is deferred from that glorious kingdom of the vision of God; and because it is absent from those everlasting goods, it laments more than it had previously wept for its sins.

XX. Sanctulus

Sanctulus, familiarly known to Gregory, was from the province of Nursia and was accustomed to come to Gregory every year.

At a certain time, while the Lombards were pressing olives in a press so that they might be dissolved into oil, he was of so cheerful a countenance and spirit that he carried an empty skin to the press. He greeted the laboring Lombards with a joyful countenance, presented the skin to them, and, commanding rather than asking, ordered it to be filled for him.

But because those gentile men had already labored fruitlessly for the whole day and could not force oil out of the olives by pressing them, they received his words with annoyance and assailed him with insults.

The man of God answered them with a still more joyful countenance, saying: “Fill this skin for Sanctulus, and thus he will depart from you.” When he persisted all the more and they drove him away with greater reproaches, the man of God, seeing that oil would in no way come out of the press, asked that water be given to him. In the sight of all, he blessed it and cast it into the press with his own hands.

Immediately from this blessing so great an abundance of oil burst forth that the Lombards, who had previously labored in vain, filled not only all their own vessels but also the skin that the man of God had brought.

At another time a vehement famine lay everywhere. Wishing to restore the church of blessed Laurence, which had been burned by the Lombards, Sanctulus had brought together many craftsmen and the laborers who assisted them, to whom daily provisions were given. Bread failed them.

Those who were laboring began insistently to seek food, because they did not have strength for the work. Hearing this, the man of God consoled them with words by promising outwardly what was lacking; but inwardly he was gravely distressed because he was unable to furnish food.

As he went anxiously here and there, he came to an oven in which neighboring women had baked loaves the previous day. He looked inside to see whether perhaps loaves had remained behind when they baked. There he suddenly found a loaf of marvelous size and unusual whiteness.

He took it and first asked the neighboring women whether such a loaf had been left by any one of them. When they denied that it was theirs, he immediately gave thanks to God and joyfully distributed it to the craftsmen.

When they had been sufficiently and fully satisfied, he gathered from it more fragments than the loaf itself had been. On the next day he brought these to them for their refreshment, and after they had been refreshed, fragments of the bread remained over.

Thus it happened that for ten days all those craftsmen and laborers were satisfied from that one loaf, ate from it daily, and enough of it to be eaten remained over for the next day. For the same Lord who through himself satisfied five thousand men from five loaves satisfied many from one loaf through his servant; he who multiplies the innumerable grains of wheat of the crops from a few grains of seed and who also created all things together from nothing.

But lest you marvel too long at what the venerable man did outwardly through the power of the Lord, hear what manner of man he was inwardly through the power of the Lord.

On a certain day a particular deacon was held bound after being captured by the Lombards, and they were considering killing him. When the day was already drawing toward evening, Sanctulus asked those same Lombards that he should be released and his life granted to him.

When they utterly refused and had determined upon his death, he asked that the deacon should at least be given to him for safekeeping. They consented to his petition with this condition added: that if the deacon fled, Sanctulus himself should die. The man of God willingly promised this and received the deacon into his own pledge of fidelity.

At midnight, when Sanctulus saw all the Lombards oppressed by sleep, he awakened the deacon, saying: “Arise and flee swiftly. May the Lord deliver you.”

The deacon refused to do this, saying: “If I flee, you will without doubt die in my place.” At last Sanctulus compelled him to flee, saying: “I am in the hand of God. They will be able to do to me only as much as he himself permits.”

The deacon therefore fled, and the guarantor remained behind as though deceived. When morning came, the Lombards came to him and demanded back the deacon whom they had given into his custody.

The man of God answered that he had fled. Then they said, “You know what befits you.” But the servant of the Lord answered steadfastly, “I know.”

They said, “You are a good man; choose for yourself whatever death you wish.” But he said, “I am in the hand of God. Kill me by that death which he himself permits.”

Then it pleased them all that he should be beheaded. All of them, most cruelly joyful, assembled for the spectacle of his death. One was chosen who was more suitable than the others and concerning whom there was no doubt that he would cut off Sanctulus's head with one stroke.

When Sanctulus had been led into their midst, he asked that a little opportunity for prayer be given to him. When this had been granted, he prostrated himself upon the ground and prayed for a rather long time.

The executioner struck him with his foot, saying: “Arise, and, with knee bent, extend your neck.” He arose and, kneeling, extended his neck. Looking at the drawn sword held against him, he is reported publicly to have said this one thing: “Saint John, receive it.”

Then the selected executioner, holding the unsheathed sword, raised his arm high with a strong exertion in order to strike, but he was in no way able to lower it. For it suddenly stiffened, and his arm remained inflexible with the sword raised toward heaven.

Then all the Lombards who were present began to marvel and to venerate the man of God with fear. Thus, when he was asked to rise, he arose. When asked to heal his executioner's arm, he answered: “I shall in no way pray for him unless he first gives me an oath that with that hand he will not kill a Christian man.”

But the Lombard himself, compelled by the punishment exacted from him, was forced to swear that thereafter he would kill no Christian. Then the man of God commanded, saying, “Lower your hand,” and he immediately lowered it, having been delivered.

Sanctulus added to him, “Return the sword to its sheath,” which he also did.

Therefore, all who had recognized him to be a man of such great power wished eagerly to offer him as gifts sheep and oxen that they had plundered. He refused to receive them all, saying: “If you wish to grant anything to me, give me all the captives whom you have, so that I may have cause to pray for you.”

Thus it happened that all the captives were released with him; and because one man offered himself to death in place of one man, he delivered many from death.

Consider, therefore, what force of love possessed that heart, because he did not dread his own death for the salvation of one neighbor. We certainly know that this venerable man Sanctulus did not even know the elements of letters well and did not know the precepts of the law.

But because charity is the fullness of the law, what he did not know outwardly through cognition lived within him through love. Let us compare, if it pleases us, his learned ignorance with our unlearned knowledge. Where this knowledge of ours lies prostrate, there his discipline towers.

We, empty of virtues, speak about virtues and, as though placed among fruitful orchards, smell the fruit but do not eat it. He knew how to pluck the fruits of the virtues, although he did not know how to smell them in words.

XXI. Amantius

Gregory relates that Floridus, the holy bishop of Tibernia, told him that a certain priest named Amantius, a man especially of simplicity, had been with him. He was reported to possess this power: that, after the manner of the apostles, he would place his hands upon the sick and restore health, and that however vehement an illness might be, it would withdraw at his touch.

He said also that Amantius had this miracle: that in whatever place he found a serpent, even one of the most monstrous savagery, as soon as he marked it with the sign of the cross, he killed it.

Even if a serpent had sometimes fled into a hole in a rock, he blessed the mouth of the hole with the sign of the cross, and immediately the serpent was drawn out of the hole already dead.

I myself also took care to see this man of such great power. When he had been brought to me, I wished him to remain for a few days in the house of the sick, where, if any grace of healing were present, it could be proved more quickly.

There, among the other sick persons, a certain man lay bereft of mind, whose condition physicians call by the Greek term phrenesis. When one night this madman uttered loud cries and disturbed all the sick with immense clamors, so that no one was permitted to take sleep, that same venerable priest arose from his own bed and silently approached the bed of the frenzied man.

Placing his hands upon him, he prayed, and soon, when the man was in a better condition, he brought him with himself to the oratory in the upper part of the house. There he applied himself more freely to prayer for him and immediately brought him back sound to his own bed.

XXII. How Humanity Lost Knowledge of Invisible Things

The things that follow are taken from the beginning of the fourth book of the Dialogues. First, man through the sin of the first man lost the knowledge of invisible things, which he possessed in the state of innocence.

After the first parent of the human race, driven from the joys of paradise because his fault required it, came into the misery of this exile and blindness that we suffer, he could no longer see those joys of the heavenly fatherland that he had previously contemplated, because by sinning he was poured forth outside himself.

For in paradise man had been accustomed to enjoy the Word of God and, through purity of heart and loftiness of vision, to be present among the spirits of the blessed angels. But after he fell to this place, he withdrew from that light of mind with which he had been filled.

We, born of his flesh in the blindness of this exile, hear indeed that there is a heavenly fatherland; we hear that its citizens are the angels of God; we hear that the spirits of the just and perfect are companions of those angels.

But all carnal persons, because they are unable to know those invisible things by experience, doubt whether that which they do not see with bodily eyes exists.

This doubt could not have existed in our first parent, because even when excluded from the joys of paradise he remembered what he had lost, since he had seen it. But these persons are unable to perceive or recall the things heard, because none of them retains, as he did, even an experience from the past.

It is as if a pregnant woman should be sent into prison and there give birth to a boy, and the boy born there should be nourished and grow up in prison. If perhaps the mother who bore him should name for him the sun, moon, stars, mountains and fields, birds and running horses, the one born and nourished in prison would know nothing other than the darkness of the prison.

He would indeed hear that these things exist, but because he did not know them by experience, he would distrust that they truly existed.

So human beings, born in the blindness of this their exile, distrust whether the highest and invisible things are true when they hear of them, because they have known only these lowest visible things among which they were born.

Hence it happened that the Creator himself of visible and invisible things, the only-begotten Son of the Father, came for the redemption of the human race and sent the Holy Spirit into our hearts, so that, made alive through him, we might believe the things that we cannot yet know by experience.

Therefore, all of us who have received this Spirit, the pledge of our inheritance, do not doubt concerning the life of invisible beings. But whoever is not yet firm in this belief ought without doubt to give credence to the words of his elders and to believe those who now possess experience of invisible things through the Holy Spirit.

For the boy is foolish if he supposes that his mother lies concerning the light merely because he himself has known nothing other than the darkness of the prison.

When Peter, with whom Gregory speaks, adds that one who does not believe invisible things is assuredly an unbeliever, and that one who is an unbeliever does not seek faith concerning that which he doubts but reason, Gregory answers:

“I boldly say that not even an unbeliever lives without faith. For if I wished to ask that same unbeliever what mother or what father he had, he would immediately answer this one or that one.

“If I were at once to ask him whether he knew when he was conceived or saw when he was born, he would confess that he neither knew nor saw any of these things, and nevertheless he believes what he did not see. For he testifies without doubt that he had that man as father and that woman as mother.

“Unbelievers, therefore, also have faith—but would that it were in God! If indeed they had it, they would not be unbelievers.

“But from this they are to be reproved for their faithlessness, and from this they are to be summoned to the grace of faith: because, if they believe concerning this body of theirs that which they did not see at all, why do they not believe invisible things, which cannot be seen bodily?”

That the soul lives after the death of the flesh is plain by reason, but reason joined with faith.

XXIII. Three Kinds of Living Spirit

Almighty God created three kinds of living spirits: one that is not covered with flesh, another that is covered with flesh but does not die with the flesh, and a third that is covered with flesh and dies with the flesh.

For the spirit that is not covered with flesh is the spirit of angels. The spirit that is covered with flesh but does not die with the flesh is the spirit of human beings. But the spirit that is covered with flesh and dies with the flesh is that of beasts of burden and all brute animals.

For just as man was created in the middle, so that he might be lower than an angel and higher than a beast of burden, so he has something in common with an angel and something in common with a beast of burden: immortality with an angel, but the mortality of the flesh with a beast of burden.

This remains so until the glory of the resurrection absorbs that very mortality of the flesh and, by inhering in the spirit, the flesh is preserved forever, because the spirit itself also is preserved by inhering in God.

Yet this flesh does not utterly fail even among the reprobate amid punishments, because it always subsists while failing, so that those who have sinned in spirit and flesh, always living substantially, may die without end in both flesh and spirit.

But Peter asks: “Since he has thus distinguished the spirit of human beings from the spirit of beasts of burden, why does Solomon speak thus in Ecclesiastes?

“‘I said in my heart concerning the children of human beings, that God might prove them and show them to be like beasts. Therefore the death of man and beasts is one, and the condition of each is equal. For as man dies, so also do they die. All breathe alike, and man has nothing more than beasts of burden. All things were made from the earth and return alike to the earth.’”

Gregory answers that this question can be resolved from the title of that book. For that book is called Ecclesiastes, which in Latin speech is properly called “the preacher.”

In an assembly a judgment is put forward through which the sedition of a tumultuous crowd is restrained; and when many hold diverse opinions, through the reasoning of the one preaching they are led to one opinion.

This book, therefore, is called “the preacher” because in it Solomon assumes, as it were, the understanding of a tumultuous crowd, so that through inquiry he may say those things that perhaps an unskilled mind perceives through temptation.

For as many opinions as he raises through inquiry, so many persons of diverse people he assumes within himself. But the truthful preacher, as though with hand outstretched, calms the tumults of all and recalls them to one opinion when, at the end of the same book, he says: “Let us all alike hear the end of speaking. Fear God and keep his commandments. This is every man.”

Hence some things in that book are raised through inquiry and others give satisfaction through reason. Some are things that he brings forth with a tempted mind, as one still devoted to the delights of this world; but others are things that he discusses by reason and restrains the mind from delight.

Hence there also he says, “This has seemed good to me: that a person should eat and drink and enjoy gladness from his labor.” And much farther below he adds, “It is better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting,” statements that appear contrary.

From this circumstance it is shown that he introduced the former statement in the person of the weak, but added the latter from the determination of reason. The same applies to many other sayings contained in that book.

Therefore, when it is said above through Solomon that human beings are like beasts of burden and that man has nothing more than beasts of burden, he puts forward, as though from the mind of the weak, a judgment of human suspicion.

Yet afterward, from the determination of reason, he brings forth his own judgment, saying, “What has the wise man more than the fool? And what has the poor man, except that he should go where life is?”

Here he clearly shows that man has not only something more than a beast of burden but also something more than a fool, that is, an evil man—namely this: that he goes to life, that is, immortal life.

XXIV. How the Invisible Soul Is Known to Live

But, after the manner of Ecclesiastes, Peter assumes the person of the weak and inquires concerning many things that also pertain to the other life.

Because on one occasion, while Peter was present, a certain man who was speaking suddenly breathed forth his vital spirit, but Peter in no way saw whether his soul departed from his body or not, it seemed to him very difficult that things should be believed to exist that no one sees.

Gregory answered him: “What wonder is it, Peter, if you did not see the soul departing, when you do not see it while it remains in the body? Surely, while you speak with me now, you do not believe me to be without a soul merely because you cannot see my soul within me?

“For the nature of the soul is invisible, and it departs invisibly from the body just as it remains invisibly in the body.”

Peter answered him: “We can discern the life of the soul remaining in the body from the movements of the body itself, because, unless the soul were present in the body, the members of that body could not be moved.

“But in what movements or what works do I see the life of the soul after the flesh, so that from things seen I may gather that what I cannot see exists?”

Gregory answered: “I say this not in a similar but in a dissimilar manner: just as the soul vivifies and moves the body, so the divine power fills all things that it has created. It vivifies some by breathing life into them; to others it grants that they live; but to others it grants only that they exist.

“Because you do not doubt that the creating and governing, filling and encompassing, transcending and sustaining, uncircumscribed and invisible God exists, so you ought not to doubt that he has invisible attendants.

“For those who minister ought to be in the likeness of him to whom they minister, so that those who serve the Invisible One should not be doubted to be invisible. What else do we believe these to be but the holy angels and the spirits of the just?

“Therefore, just as you consider the movement of the body and perceive the life of the soul remaining in the body from the lesser thing, so you ought to discern the life of the soul departing from the body from the higher thing, because one whom it befits to remain in the service of the invisible Creator is able to live invisibly.”

Peter said: “Everything is said rightly, but the mind recoils from believing what it cannot see with bodily eyes.”

Gregory answered him: “Since Paul says, ‘Faith is the substance of things to be hoped for, the evidence of things not appearing,’ this truly cannot be believed which cannot be seen. For what can be seen can now be believed [read: this is truly said to be believed which cannot be seen. For what can be seen can no longer be believed].

“Nevertheless, to recall you briefly to yourself: no visible things are seen except through invisible things. Behold, the bodily eye looks upon all corporeal things, yet that bodily eye itself would not see anything corporeal unless an incorporeal thing sharpened it for seeing.

“For take away the mind, which is not seen, and the eye that was seeing lies open in vain. Withdraw the soul from the body, and without doubt the eyes remain open in the body. If, therefore, they saw through themselves, why do they see nothing when the soul departs? Hence gather that visible things themselves also are not seen except through invisible things.”

He also gives the example of great weights lifted by a man, because the body does not do this by itself, but the invisible soul that vivifies the body. For when the soul has been separated, all things remain motionless.

He adds: “In this matter it must be considered that in this visible world nothing is disposed except through an invisible creature.”

Peter said: “All that you say is pleasing. But just as I recognize the life of the soul remaining in the body from the body's movement, so I desire to recognize the life of the soul after the body through certain manifest attestations.”

Gregory answered him: “In this matter, if I find the heart of your affection prepared, I labor not at all in furnishing proof. Surely the holy apostles and martyrs of Christ would not have despised the present life and laid down their souls in the death of the flesh unless they knew that a more certain life of souls would follow.

“You say that you recognize the life of the soul remaining in the body from the body's movements. But behold, those who laid down their souls in death and believed that there was a life of souls after the death of the flesh shine forth in daily miracles.

“Living sick persons come to their extinguished bodies and are healed. Perjurers come and are vexed by a demon. Demoniacs approach and are delivered. Dead persons are brought and are raised.

“Consider, therefore, in what manner their souls live there where they live, when even their dead bodies live here in so many miracles. If, therefore, you comprehend the life of the soul remaining in the body through the movement of its members, why do you not discern the life of the soul after the body even through dead bones in the power of miracles?

“A little above you complained that you did not see the soul of a certain dying person when it departed, but this very thing was already a fault: that with bodily eyes you sought to see an invisible thing.

“For many of our people, purifying the eye of the mind through pure faith and abundant prayer, have frequently seen souls departing from the flesh.”

Concerning this matter he introduces several examples. First he speaks of Saint Benedict, who, while situated far from the city of Capua, saw at midnight the soul of Germanus, bishop of that city, carried to heaven by angels in a fiery globe.

Then he also gives the example of a certain abbot, a holy man called Spes, who dwelt not far from the city of Nursia. Although he had remained in bodily blindness for forty years with great patience, a fortnight before his death the Lord restored to him the light of his eyes, foretold his death to him, and sent him to preach among neighboring monasteries.

After this, having returned and received the Viaticum, he died while chanting psalms among the brothers. Those standing by saw his soul departing from his mouth like a dove and ascending to heaven.

XXV. Signs at the Departure of Souls

Gregory says in the aforesaid fourth book of the Dialogues that often, when the souls of the elect depart, the sweetness of heavenly praise is accustomed to burst forth, so that while they gladly hear it, they are not permitted to feel the dissolution of the flesh from the soul.

Hence I remember that I already related in a homily on the Gospel that in the portico that lies open to those going to the church of blessed Clement there was a certain man named Servulus. He was poor indeed in possessions but rich in merits, and a long illness had wasted him.

For from the time when we were able to know him until the end of his life, he lay paralyzed. Why should I say that he could not stand, when he was never able to rise in bed even to sit, never to bring his hand to his mouth, and never to turn himself onto his other side?

His mother and brother were present to serve him, and whatever he could receive from alms he distributed to the poor by their hands.

He did not know letters at all, but he had bought for himself books of sacred Scripture; and, receiving whatever religious persons he could in hospitality, he diligently caused them to read those books before him. Thus it happened that, according to his measure, he learned sacred Scripture fully.

In his pain he strove always to give thanks and to devote himself to the hymns and praises of God by day and night.

But when the time had now come for such great patience in him to be rewarded, the pain of his members returned to his vital organs. When he recognized that he was now near death, he admonished the foreign men whom he had received in hospitality to rise and chant psalms with him in expectation of his departure.

While he himself, though dying, chanted psalms with them, he checked the voices of those chanting, saying with the great terror of a cry: “Be silent! Be silent! Surely you do not hear what great voices resound in heaven?”

While he directed the ear of his heart toward those same praises that he had heard inwardly, that holy soul was released from the flesh. When it departed, so great a fragrance of odor was poured forth there that all who were present were filled with inestimable sweetness.

But just as blessedness gladdens the elect, so it is necessary to believe that from the day of their departure fire burns the reprobate. I do not doubt that the fire of Gehenna is corporeal, in which it is certain that bodies are tortured.

In the time of the Goths, a certain eminent man named Reparatus came to death. When his household was already mourning him as dead, he suddenly returned and said: “Send a boy very quickly to the church of blessed Laurence the martyr, which is called ‘of Damasus’ from the name of its founder. Let him see what is being done concerning Tiburtius the priest and hasten to report it.”

This Tiburtius was then reported to be subject to carnal desires. While the boy was going, that same Reparatus, who had returned to himself, related that he had recognized the place to which he had been conducted, saying: “An immense pyre had been prepared. Tiburtius the priest was brought and placed upon it, and, with fire set beneath it, he was burned.

“Another pyre, however, was being prepared, whose summit appeared to hang from earth to heaven. A voice was sent forth asking whose it was.”

Having said these things, Reparatus immediately died. The boy who had been sent to Tiburtius found him already dead.

The cauldrons of Vulcan in Sicily, as those who know them are accustomed to relate, increase daily as their boundaries are widened, so that as the end of the world approaches, in proportion as it is certain that more persons to be burned are gathered there, so also those same places of torments may appear more extensive.

Almighty God willed this to be shown in this world for the correction of the living, so that the minds of unbelievers who do not believe that the torments of hell exist may see the places of the torments that they refuse to believe from hearing.

The reaping angels bind the tares into bundles for burning when they join like persons with like persons in similar torments: the proud with the proud and the lustful with the lustful.

The mercy above also disposes, from the generosity of its great compassion, that some persons return to the body even after their departure and may at least fear the torments of hell after seeing them, when they had not believed them after hearing.

For an illustrious man named Stephen was accustomed to relate concerning himself to me that, while he was staying in the city of Constantinople, he died when an illness supervened for a certain reason.

When a physician and an apothecary were sought to open and embalm him and could not be found that same day, his body lay unburied during the following night.

Conducted to the places of hell, he saw many things that he had not previously believed when he heard them. But when he had been presented to the judge who presided there, he was not received by him, so that the judge said: “I ordered not this man to be brought but Stephen the smith.”

He was immediately brought back into his body, and Stephen the smith who lived next to him died at that same hour. Thus the words that he had heard were proved true when the outcome of Stephen's death demonstrated it.

XXVI. Whether All Children Enter the Heavenly Kingdom

Peter says in the same fourth book: “Since the human race is subject to many and innumerable vices, I think that the heavenly Jerusalem can be filled for the greatest part from little children or infants.”

Gregory answers him: “Although it is to be believed that all baptized infants who die in that same infancy enter the heavenly kingdom, nevertheless it is not to be believed that all little children who are now able to speak enter the heavenly kingdoms, because access to that heavenly kingdom is closed to some little children by their parents if they are badly reared.

“For a certain man very well known in this city had, three years ago, a son about five years old, as I judge. Loving him too carnally, he reared him indulgently; and that same little child—something grievous to say—as soon as anything had opposed his will, was accustomed to blaspheme the majesty of God.

“When, three years ago, he was struck in this mortality and came to death, his father held him in his bosom. As those who were present have testified, the boy, looking with trembling eyes and seeing malign spirits coming toward him, began to cry: ‘Keep them away, father! Keep them away, father!’

“As he cried, he turned his face aside so that he might hide himself from them in his father's bosom. When his father asked the trembling boy what he saw, the boy answered: ‘Moorish men have come who wish to take me away.’

“When he had said this, he immediately blasphemed the name of the Majesty and yielded up his soul.

“For in order that almighty God might show to what executioners and for what guilt he had been delivered, he permitted the boy at death to repeat what his father had been unwilling to correct while he lived. Thus the father might recognize his own guilt, because, being negligent toward the soul of his little son, he had nourished for the fires of Gehenna one who was not a little sinner.”

Here it must be noted that, since at such an age a little child is not ordinarily capable of culpable intent and hence not capable of moral desert either, it is necessary that the use of free choice had been accelerated in this child, since by sinning he was plunged into eternal fire.

XXVII. The Soldier's Vision of the Bridge

A certain soldier in this city, struck by the plague, came to his extremity. Drawn out of his body, he lay without life, but rather quickly returned and related to everyone the things that had been done with him.

For he said, as the event itself then became known to many, that there was a bridge beneath which flowed a black and dark river exhaling intolerable stenches in a mist.

But beyond the bridge there were pleasant and green meadows adorned with the fragrant flowers of herbs, in which there appeared to be assemblies of people clothed in white. So great an odor of sweetness was present in that place that the fragrance of that sweetness itself satisfied those walking and dwelling there.

There were individual mansions filled with a magnitude of light. There a certain house of marvelous grandeur was being built, which appeared to be constructed of golden bricks, but he was unable to recognize whose it was.

There were also some dwellings upon the bank of the aforesaid river, but some were touched by the mist of the rising stench, while the stench rising from the river did not touch others at all.

This was the trial upon the aforesaid bridge: whoever among the unjust wished to cross over it fell into the dark and fetid river. But the just, whom guilt did not obstruct, arrived by a secure and free passage across it at the pleasant places.

There he confessed that he had seen Peter, the chief officer of the ecclesiastical household, who died four years ago, placed below in most hideous places, bound and weighed down by a great weight of iron.

When he asked why this was so, he said that he heard those things that we who knew Peter in this ecclesiastical house recall from knowledge of his actions. For it was said: “He suffers this because, if anything was enjoined upon him for inflicting vengeance, he served more from a desire for cruelty than from obedience.” No one who knew him is unaware that this was so.

There he confessed that he also saw a certain foreign priest who, coming to the aforesaid bridge, crossed it with as much authority as the sincerity with which he had lived here.

He testified that on that same bridge he recognized this Stephen whom I mentioned above. When Stephen wished to cross, his foot slipped, and when half of his body was now cast outside the bridge, certain most hideous men rising from the river began to pull him downward by the hips, while certain men clothed in white and most beautiful began to pull him upward by the arms.

While this struggle was taking place, and the good men pulled him upward and the evil men downward, the one who saw this returned to his body and did not learn what was done more fully concerning Stephen.

In this matter it is given to be understood concerning that same Stephen's life that in him the evils of the flesh contended with the working of alms. For because he was pulled downward by the hips and upward by the arms, it is assuredly plain that he had loved alms and had not perfectly resisted the vices of the flesh that pulled him downward.

But in that hidden examination of the Judge, both we and the man who saw it and was recalled remain ignorant of what prevailed in him. Nevertheless, it is established that after this same Stephen, as I related above, saw the places of hell and returned to his body, he did not perfectly correct his life.

As for the house that appeared to be built of golden bricks in the pleasant places, this is to be understood not of material bricks but of works. For it is assuredly established that one who will merit the reward of eternal light through the generosity of alms builds his mansion with gold.

And because old people and young people, boys and girls, carried those same golden bricks for the building, as he had seen, it is given to be understood that those toward whom the kindness of alms had been exercised appeared there to be the builders themselves.

Likewise, a certain religious man named Deusdedit lived near us, who was accustomed to make shoes. Another man saw by revelation that his house was being built, but its builders appeared to work upon it only on the Sabbath day.

Afterward, carefully examining the life of that same man, he found that, from those things for which he labored on the individual days, Deusdedit was accustomed to carry whatever could remain over from food and clothing to the church of blessed Peter on the Sabbath day and distribute it to the needy.

Title XIII

Title XIII contains the deeds and vicissitudes of the supreme pontiffs and emperors through one hundred and eight years: namely, from Pope Sabinian, successor of Gregory I, to Gregory II, and from the emperor Phocas to Philippicus; also those of the doctors Isidore and Bede, who were of diverse nations; and matters concerning Muhammad, his most foul law, and his errors; and also concerning many saints who shone in life and miracles.

The title begins from the year of the Lord 605 and extends to the year of the Lord 713.

Within this span the following supreme pontiffs existed in successive order: Sabinian; Boniface III; Boniface IV; Deusdedit; Honorius I; Severinus; John IV; Theodore; Martin; Eugenius; Vitalian; Adeodatus; Donus; Agatho; Sergius; Leo II; Benedict II; John V; Conon; John VI; John VII; and Zosimus.

The emperors were Phocas; Heraclius; Constantine, son of Heraclius; Herodona, son of Heraclius, with his mother Martina; Constans, son of Constantine the son of Heraclius, who was also called Constantine; Maxentius, who usurped Constantine's empire; Justinian II, son of Constans; Leo, who was also called Leontius and usurped the empire; Hausimarus, who was also called Tiberius and usurped the empire for himself; the aforesaid Justinian, who had been exiled, recovered the empire from Gersone [i.e., Cherson] after Hausimarus and Leontius were killed; and finally Philippicus, after Justinian had been killed by him.

Chapter I

Sabinian

After the death of Gregory the Great, concerning whom something was said immediately above, Sabinian ascended the chair of Peter in the year of the Lord 604, the five-thousand-eight-hundred-and-second year from the beginning of the world. He was Tuscan by nation. He sat for one year and five months.

At the beginning of his pontificate, when a severe famine afflicted the whole province, religious persons and poor people to whom Saint Gregory had been accustomed to minister came to him and said: “Lord pope, may your Holiness not permit those whom our father Gregory was accustomed to feed to perish.”

Indignant at these words, the pope always answered thus: “If Gregory took care to receive all peoples for the sake of the fame of his own praise, we are not able to feed everyone.” Thus he sent them away empty.

Hence Saint Gregory appeared to him a third time, and for a third time gently reproved him concerning his disparagement, his stinginess, and the necessity of the poor. But he neither bent himself toward mercy nor restrained himself from disparagement.

Therefore, appearing to him a fourth time, Gregory reproved him terribly and, threatening him, struck him upon the head. Vexed by the pain of that blow, Sabinian died shortly afterward.

The Romans themselves, also burdened by the aforesaid famine, disparaged Gregory, though already dead, saying that he had dissipated the treasures of the Church through excessive liberality, as the same Vincent relates above.

Because there was no person against whom they might burn with anger, they wished to erase the memory of his name from his books.

When the Romans therefore wished to burn his books, Peter the deacon opposed them with this testimony: that he had often seen the Holy Spirit in the likeness of a dove above Gregory's head as he dictated. He proved the truth of his statement, as was said above.

Sabinian made twenty-six bishops throughout diverse places. When he migrated to the Lord, the episcopate was vacant for eleven months and twenty-five days.

The Romans and Lombards established a peace in which the daughter of King Agilulf, formerly captured by the Romans, was redeemed.

Agilulf himself, king of the Lombards, who had previously fought successfully against the Romans in many places and had taken Mantua and Cremona, made his son Adaloald king, gave him as wife the daughter of Theudebert, king of the Franks, and renewed perpetual peace with the Franks.

The Franks, fighting against the Saxons, were defeated with a great part of their stock.

At the same time, namely in the second year of the emperor Phocas, as Vincent relates above, a certain poor man asked alms from sailors and did not receive it. The shipmaster said, “Cease asking alms from us, for we have nothing here except stones.”

When the poor man replied, “Then let all things be turned into stones,” whatever was edible in the ship was turned into stones, while the color and form of the things remained.

I. Boniface III and Boniface IV

When Sabinian had been removed from the midst, Boniface III succeeded him in the supreme pontificate. He was number sixty-four according to John of Columna. He was Roman by nation and sat for eight months and twenty-two days. And he was the sixty-fifth.

After Boniface III, Boniface IV received the Roman Church to govern. As Vincent relates from the Book of Pontiffs in book twenty-four, chapter thirteen of the Historical Mirror, he was Campanian by nation and sat for five years. He was the sixty-sixth in the order of the supreme pontiffs.

He was the mildest and most merciful of all men. He loved the clergy and gave a complete toga to his clergy.

Through his decree this Boniface declared that monks, if they are appointed over parish or popular churches, can minister the sacraments to them, saying in Distinction Sixteen, question one:

“There are some, supported by no doctrine and most audaciously inflamed with a zeal more of bitterness than of charity, who assert that monks, because they are dead to the world and live to God, are unworthy of the power of the priestly office and can bestow neither penance nor Christianity, nor can they absolve through the power of the priestly office divinely enjoined upon them. But they are altogether mistaken.

“For blessed Benedict, the beneficent instructor of monks, was not in any way a prohibitor of a thing of this kind. He decreed only that they should be free from secular affairs, something that is strongly enjoined not only upon monks but also upon canons.

“For the Apostle says, ‘No one serving as a soldier for God entangles himself in secular affairs.’ We believe, therefore, that the office of binding and loosing is worthily administered by priests who are monks, if it happens that they are worthily raised to this ministry.”

He also established, as Vincent relates above, that no one should be dragged from a church and that no acolyte should presume to lift the relics of the holy martyrs.

He obtained from the emperor Phocas the Pantheon at Rome, that is, the temple now called Saint Mary Rotunda. It had been dedicated by the ancient gentiles in honor of Cybele, the mother of all the gods, and therefore was called Pantheon, that is, “to all the gods.”

After all the filth of idolatry had been removed, he consecrated that temple in honor of Saint Mary and all the martyrs.

Afterward, when the Christian religion had increased, it was instituted on the Kalends of November, not only at Rome but throughout the whole world, that on that day the feast of All Saints should be solemnly celebrated by the universal Church.

Later, in the course of time, the Church established that on the immediately following day the office or commemoration of all the dead should be celebrated.

According to what Jacobus de Voragine says in the legends of the saints, this was established on account of a particular vision of a holy man. While he was at prayer in the church of Saint Peter at Rome after Matins on the feast of All Saints, he saw in spirit a Mass solemnly celebrated by Christ and his saints.

Afterward, conducted to the place of purgatory, he saw souls in various punishments and different kinds of food being carried to different persons: more delicate food to some, moderate food to others, cheap and scant food to others, and none to still others.

It was declared by an angel that those refreshments were the suffrages made by the living for their dead. He was commanded to make such a vision known, so that such a general office for the dead might be instituted by the Church and those who had no persons performing particular suffrages for them might at least be relieved by those general ones.

From the council of this Boniface IV, the following was established in Distinction Seventy-nine: “No pontiff, while the Roman pontiff is living, or while the bishop of his city is living, is to presume to speak or to make parties for himself, unless on the third day after his burial.”

He also obtained from the emperor Phocas that the Roman Church should be the head and mistress of all churches, because the Church of Constantinople asserted that it was the first of all churches.

When the aforesaid Boniface died, at the beginning of the reign of Heraclius, Deusdedit succeeded him in the chair of Peter, having been nominated by the people and clergy.

II. Deusdedit, Honorius, Severinus, John, and Theodore

Deusdedit was Roman by nation and sat for two years and twenty days, but according to others for three years. He was the sixty-seventh.

Under this pontiff the emperor Heraclius sent the patrician Eleuterius to govern Italy. As John of Columna relates, Eleuterius defeated in war and killed near Naples a certain John who had called himself emperor in Italy, and he kept Italy in great peace.

But in the course of time, lifted up into pride, he called himself his own lord and king of Italy. Coming to Rome, he was killed by faithful servants of the emperor, and his head was sent to Heraclius at Constantinople.

This Pope Deusdedit was asked whether parents who hold their own children at baptism can afterward have intercourse with one another, that is, whether the father and mother of such children can make use of marriage.

He answers, as is contained in the canon It Has Come, in Cause Thirty, question one, and says that the holy fathers of blessed memory Julius, Innocent, and Celestine, with the consent of many bishops and priests, wrote and confirmed in prohibition of such things that men and women who for any reason received their own children should in no way receive one another in marriage, but should separate themselves, lest, at the devil's persuasion, such a vice become established. Thus it is written there.

But today that which is said in the second chapter of the title On Spiritual Kinship is to be held: namely, whether knowingly or ignorantly the father or mother holds a child at baptism, they are not therefore to be separated with respect to demanding or rendering the marital debt.

Hence what is said in the aforesaid canon It Has Come, that they are to be separated, is understood, as the Gloss says, if they can be induced to continence, or until they repent of the sin.

For such persons certainly sin by doing this, namely, by holding their own children at baptism or confirmation outside a case of necessity.

In his time Sisebut, king of the Goths, who had become a Christian, recovered for his own rule very many cities of Spain that had defected from the Romans, and by rather severe punishments brought to baptism the Jews who dwelt in his kingdom. Concerning this Sisebut there is a text in Distinction Forty-five, Concerning the Jews.

After him Honorius I, Campanian by nation and son of the consul Petronius, received the Roman Church to govern. He sat for eleven years, eleven months, and seventeen days.

He did many good things for churches. At Rome he built the church of blessed Agnes that is on the Nomentan Way and endowed it with many possessions; he also constructed other churches.

According to others, he sat for thirteen years, and he was the sixty-eighth in the order of pontiffs. He held three ordinations and ordained thirteen priests, ten deacons, and eighty-one bishops throughout diverse places. He was buried at Saint Peter's.

When he died, the episcopate was vacant for one year, seven months, and eighteen days. Before this Honorius, some place another Boniface V, but others do not, and thus it appears true.

When Honorius was taken from this light, Severinus, Roman by nation, was created supreme pontiff. He presided over the Church for only two months and four days. Others say two years. When he died, the episcopate was vacant for four months and twenty-two days.

While he was still pope-elect and the prince's assent was awaited, at the suggestion of Mauritius the chartulary, Isacius the patrician and exarch, who governed Italy at that time, came to Rome.

He carried away all the treasure that Honorius and other supreme pontiffs had gathered in the Lateran church, and that Christian emperors or patricians and consuls had left to blessed Peter for the redemption of their souls, so that it might be distributed to the poor through apostolic hands or used to redeem captives.

He sent part of it to the imperial city for the emperor Heraclius, but retained the other part for himself and the soldiers. Yet he ended his days by an evil death.

After Severinus, John, Dalmatian by nation, received the miter of the Roman pontificate. He sat for one year, eight months, and eighteen days.

Through Martin, a most holy and faithful abbot, he sent much money throughout Dalmatia and Istria for the redemption of captives who were held after being captured by barbarians. When he died, the episcopate was vacant for one month and twenty-three days.

When Pope John migrated to the fathers, Theodore, a Greek, presided as bishop at Rome. He sat for six years, five months, and eighteen days.

He was a lover of the poor and more merciful than all, and therefore expended everything he could possess upon the poor and upon redeeming captives.

This blessed pontiff raised the bodies of Saints Primus and Felicianus, which had formerly been buried in a sandpit, and honorably reinterred them upon the Caelian Hill in the church of Saint Stephen, constructing there a beautiful oratory in honor of the aforesaid saints.

Under this Pope Theodore the emperor Heraclius died, and Martin succeeded Theodore.

III. Martin I

Martin, from the city of Tuder in the province of Tuscany, was raised to the supreme pontificate as the seventy-second pontiff. He sat for six years, one month, and twenty-six days.

In his times Paul of Constantinople, inflated by a spirit of pride, boldly presumed, contrary to the definitions of the fathers, to publish a decree against the right doctrine of the holy Church.

Moreover, he strove by certain surreptitious means to cover his error, so that he might persuade the most clement prince, the emperor Constans—grandson of the emperor Heraclius, born from his son; the emperor Heraclius himself also fell into that error of the Monothelites at the persuasion and instruction of the patriarch of Constantinople, as Vincent relates after Hugh in book twenty-four, chapter eighty-four of the Historical Mirror and from the deeds of the pontiffs—to publish a Type by which he would destroy Catholic doctrine.

Paul himself asserted that there had been only one will and operation in Christ, although according to the truth of the faith there is a twofold will and operation, namely divine and human.

Paul himself carried his presumption so far that he overturned and plundered the consecrated altar of the Holy Apostolic See that was in the house of Placidia within a venerable oratory.

He prohibited our apocrisiaries from being able to offer there the holy and immaculate Host for adoration or to receive the sacraments of communion.

Because these apocrisiaries, by a command of apostolic authority, warned him to withdraw from such a heretical intention, he pursued them with diverse persecutions, together with other orthodox men and venerable priests. He thrust some of them into custody, deported others into exile, and subjected others to blows.

While these penalties disturbed almost the whole world, very many orthodox persons from diverse places are shown to have brought complaints to the Apostolic See, entreating that the invention of so great an evil and so great an overthrow should be cut away through apostolic authority, lest the harmful disease of their heresy be able to rupture the whole body of the Catholic Church.

This most holy Martin sent for and assembled one hundred and fifty bishops in the city of Rome and held a synod according to the statutes of the orthodox fathers in the church of Saint Savior beside the Lateran episcopal residence.

With the bishops seated and the priests, deacons, and entire clergy standing by, they condemned Cyrus of Alexandria, Sergius, Pyrrhus, and Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, who had presumed innovations against the immaculate faith, anathematizing them and their followers under necessity.

He made copies and sent them throughout every region of the East and West.

In those days the emperor commissioned Olympius the chamberlain as exarch in Italy to govern all Italy and commanded him, saying: “It befits your Glory, as Paul the patriarch has suggested to us, to act for the preservation of this God-protected city.

“If you find that province consenting to the Type published by us, have all the bishops who are there subscribe to it.

“But if you cannot persuade them, we command the army stationed there to seize Pope Martin and afterward to read throughout all the churches the Type that was made orthodox by us, and let all the bishops of Italy subscribe to it.

“But if you find the contrary in such a cause, keep the army quiet until you have obtained the province and have been able to gather to yourselves the army both of the city of Rome and of Ravenna, so that you may be able to fulfill as quickly as possible the things commanded to you.”

When the aforesaid Olympius came to the city of Rome, he found the holy Church united with all the bishops of Italy. Wishing to fulfill the commands given to him, he armed the army with him and wished to introduce schism into the holy Roman Church.

This was attempted for a very long time, but God did not permit them to accomplish what they strove to do.

Seeing himself overcome by the holy and apostolic Church, Olympius sought to accomplish by a surreptitious means what he could not do through armed forces.

During the solemnities of Mass in the church of Saint Mary Major, while the most holy pope was offering communion to him as to a Catholic, Olympius wished to kill the pope, as he had commanded his swordsman.

But almighty God, who is accustomed to surround his orthodox servants with protection, blinded the swordsman of Olympius the exarch himself. He was not permitted to see the pontiff when he gave communion to the exarch or offered him the peace. The aforesaid armor-bearer afterward confessed this with diverse oaths.

Perceiving that the Lord protected Pope Martin, Olympius the exarch had to come to agreement with him and disclose to him all the things that had been commanded.

After peace had been made with the Church, Olympius gathered an army and departed for Sicily against the nation of the Saracens who dwelt there. Because the demerits of men required it, a great destruction arose within the Roman army. After this the exarch Olympius himself also perished.

At last Theodore the exarch, surnamed Calliopas, was sent by the emperor together with another Theodore, an imperial chamberlain, with the command that they seize Pope Martin and send him to Constantinople. They did so.

While he was there, the emperor demanded that he assent to and approve the Type of Paul, patriarch of Constantinople. Because he consented in no way, the most holy man Martin was sent into exile at Gersone.

There at last he ended his life and migrated to the Lord, worn down by the martyrdom of a long exile. Through him the Lord works many marvelous things at his sepulcher.

His feast is celebrated in the month of November on the day preceding the feast of blessed Martin, bishop and confessor.

He held two ordinations during the month of December, ordaining eleven priests, five deacons, and thirty-two bishops throughout diverse places.

Many statutes of this Martin from his council are contained in the decrees. Hence, in Cause Twenty-five, question five, it is said from the council of Pope Martin:

“It is not lawful for Christians to hold to the traditions of the gentiles, to observe or venerate the elements, the courses of the moon or stars, or the empty deceit of signs for building a house, planting crops or trees, or joining marriages.

“For it is written: ‘Whatever things you do in word or deed, do them in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, giving thanks to God.’

“Nor is it lawful in gathering medicinal herbs to attend to any observances or incantations, except only with the divine Creed and the Lord's Prayer, so that God alone, Creator of all and Lord, may be honored.

“But if anyone, following the custom of pagans, introduces diviners and soothsayers into his house, as though they might cast evil outside and find acts of sorcery, or if he performs the purifications of pagans, let him do penance for five years.

“It is likewise not lawful for Christian women to observe vanity in their wool-working, but let them invoke as helper God, who gave them the skill of weaving.”

Likewise, from the council of this Martin, in Distinction Thirty: “If any priest, without some necessity, fasts on the Lord's Day out of a certain religious observance, as the Manichaeans do, let him be anathema.”

Likewise, from his council, in Distinction Forty-four: “It is not lawful for priests or clerics to hold banquets from contributions. Nor ought clerics or religious laypeople to enter banquets before the third hour of the sacred day. Nor are clerics ever to eat bread unless a hymn has been said, and after food they are to return thanks to God its Author.”

Likewise, from the council of Martin, in the second Distinction On Consecration: “It is not fitting that anything other than wine and water—and add bread—should be offered in the sanctuary for consecration. These are blessed in a type of Christ, because while he hung upon the cross, blood and water flowed from his body. These three are one in Jesus Christ, this sacrifice and oblation to God as an odor of sweetness.”

Likewise, from his council, in Cause Seventeen, question four: “If anyone teaches another person's slave, for the sake of religion, to despise his lord and to withdraw from his service, let him be most severely reproved in all things.” Understand that service is to be rendered in lawful matters.

Many other decrees of his are dispersed in diverse places throughout the book of decrees.

There is also found a certain decretal letter of Pope Martin himself to Saint Amandus, according to Vincent in book twenty-four of the Historical Mirror. In it he indicated that the same Amandus had wished to lay aside the pastoral service because of the disobedience of those priests or deacons who polluted themselves by a lapse after their ordinations.

The most blessed pope dissuaded him from that intention, urging him toward patience and commanding that he show them no compassion in their offense, but depose all who had lapsed from office and send them into perpetual penance.

“For,” he says, “if we seek for promotion to holy orders such persons as no wrinkle and no contagion of life would prevent from holy orders, how much more, if a person has fallen into a lapse after his ordination and is found liable even for the sin of transgression, must he be entirely prohibited from handling the mystery of our salvation with filthy and polluted hands?

“Let such a person therefore always remain deposed in this life according to the statutes of the sacred canons, so that he who searches the inward things of the mind and rejoices that none of the sheep goes astray may, when he sees the man's sincere penance, possess him as reconciled at the terrible judgment.” Thus he speaks.

The same Martin says in his council, in Cause Ten, question two: “Let the bishop have power over the goods of the church, so that he may distribute them to those who have necessity, with all reverence and fear of God.

“He ought also to share the things that are necessary, if he himself or the brothers who are with him should lack anything, so that they may in no way suffer necessity, according to the Apostle, who says: ‘Having only food and clothing, we are content.’

“But if the bishop wishes to give ecclesiastical goods into his own property, or gives them to his brothers, sons, or any of his relatives, or if the goods of the church are manifestly harmed through them, he ought to be answerable to the council.”

Likewise, from the council of the aforesaid Martin, in Cause Eleven, question one, it is said: “If any bishop has been excommunicated in a council, or a priest or deacon by his bishop, and after excommunication he presumes to make an oblation or to perform the morning or evening sacrifice as though acting in his office as before, it is not lawful for him either to have hope of reconciliation in another council or ever again to be reconciled.”

Likewise, from the council of Martin, in Distinction Fifty, it is said: “If anyone has married a widow or a woman abandoned by another, let him not be admitted to the clergy. If he has slipped in, let him be cast out. The same applies if after baptism he has been conscious of homicide by deed, command, counsel, or defense.”

IV. Eugenius, Vitalian, Adeodatus, Donus, and Agatho

Eugenius, Roman by nation, succeeded Pope Martin I, the precious martyr, in the chair of Peter. He sat for two years, nine months, and twenty-four days.

Under this pontiff Peter, patriarch of Constantinople, who had succeeded the heresiarch Paul, sent to Rome according to the ancient custom a synodal letter so obscure that what he meant could not be understood. In it he in no way declared the two operations in the Lord Jesus Christ.

When it had been read aloud, neither the clergy nor the people wished to receive it. When Eugenius died, the episcopate was vacant for one month and twenty-four days.

After Eugenius died, Vitalian was created supreme pontiff. When Constans, who was also called Constantine, the emperor and grandson of Heraclius, came to the city in order to cast the Lombards out of Italy—he was nevertheless unable to prevail but was turned to flight with his men—Pope Vitalian reverently met him at the sixth milestone from the city and led him as far as the thresholds of blessed Peter.

After the emperor had remained in the city for twelve days, driven by great greed, he carried diverse kinds of ornaments of bronze and marble down the Tiber so that he might transfer them to Constantinople.

Crossing by ship into Sicily, he was killed by his own men in the baths, so that posterity might take from this an example not to despoil churches.

This Vitalian arose in Campania, in the city of Signia, and sat for fourteen years and six months.

When Vitalian migrated to the Lord, a man named Adeodatus, Roman by nation and a monk, was placed in the chair of Peter. He presided over the Church for four years, two months, and ten days.

He was most mild and most generous to the poor. He restored the church of the Apostles on the Ostian Way.

In a certain monastery in the city of Rome called Boziana, he found Nestorianism among its monks. He divided those monks throughout diverse places and installed Roman monks in it.

He dedicated the church of Saint Euphemia at Rome. He enlarged the clergy with diverse orders and honors. He held one ordination in which he ordained ten priests, five deacons, and six bishops.

When he died, the episcopate was vacant for two months and sixteen days.

After Adeodatus, Donus received the Roman Church to govern. He sat for one year and five months.

In his time, beginning in the month of August, a star penetrating the heavens with its rays appeared in the east for three months from cockcrow until morning. Thereafter a very great mortality followed in those regions, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror after Sigebert.

He paved with great and broad marbles the atrium of blessed Peter at Rome that is called Paradise.

While he presided, the Church of Ravenna, which, filled with a spirit of pride, had separated itself from its mother the Roman Church, again subjected itself in humility to the ancient Roman Church.

Agatho succeeded Donus in the supreme pontificate. Around those times Æthelthryth, queen in England, shone forth. Although married to three men, she remained a virgin. Eleven years after her burial, her dead body was found incorrupt, as Vincent relates above after Sigebert.

Pope Agatho says in Distinction Nineteen: “Thus all sanctions of the Apostolic See are to be received as if confirmed by the divine voice of Peter himself.”

Agatho was Sicilian and sat for two years, six months, and four days in the time of Constantine III, great-grandson of Heraclius.

Through the action of Constantine as a most pious and Catholic emperor, the Sixth Universal Synod of two hundred and eighty-nine bishops was celebrated at Constantinople.

Certain legates sent by Pope Agatho presided there, because he himself was unable to go there on account of old age. After the matter had been examined most diligently, it was determined that in Christ there are two natures and hence also two wills and operations, namely divine and human.

George, patriarch of Constantinople, and the emperor himself assented to this determination. The error of the Monothelites, who asserted only one nature in Christ, was rejected and anathematized as heresy.

Remaining in this error, Macarius, patriarch of Antioch, was condemned and exiled. This synod is mentioned in Distinction Sixteen, chapter six, and concerning it there is also a text in Distinction Sixty-three, Agatho.

When the council had been dissolved, God gave so much grace to the legates of the Apostolic See in the sight of the Greek peoples that in the imperial city itself, namely Constantinople, on the holy day of Easter, John, cardinal bishop of Porto and then a legate, solemnly celebrated Mass in the presence of the patriarch of Constantinople, the emperor, and all the people.

When Agatho died, the episcopate was vacant for six months.

V. Leo II, Benedict II, and John V

When this Agatho had been taken away by the plague, which was then very great in the city, Leo the Younger, Sicilian by nation, succeeded him in the supreme pontificate. He sat for ten months and seventeen days.

As John of Columna relates, he was a most eloquent man, sufficiently instructed in both the Greek and Latin languages and very learned in the sacred Scriptures. He was also a lover of poverty and generous to the poor.

When the legates returned from Greece, Leo, who had now been made prelate, translated from Greek into Latin the synod written in Greek, that is, its chapters or decrees.

Among other things, he established that one who had been ordained archbishop should not, by any custom, be obliged to pay anything for the use of the pallium or to the diverse officials of the Church.

When he rested in peace, Benedict, Roman by nation, was raised to govern the universal Church. He sat for ten months and twenty-two days.

According to John of Columna, from his earliest age he had served in diverse offices in the Roman Church, and in him the grace of blessing truly abounded. For he was humble, dutiful, merciful, and gentle, and deserved to be worthily promoted to the supreme pontificate.

He received an imperial constitution written by the aforesaid emperor Constantine to the clergy, people, and army. It provided that whoever was elected to the Apostolic See at Rome should thereafter be ordained pontiff immediately and without delay, without awaiting the prince's command.

Under this pontiff Mount Lebius [read: Mount Vesuvius], which is in Campania not far from Naples, belched forth fire for many days in the month of March, so that all the surrounding places remained burned by sparks and ashes.

After Benedict died, John V, Syrian by nation and from Antioch, was created pope. According to John of Columna, he sat for one year and eight days.

He was a very energetic man and very learned in knowledge of letters. He had been one of the legates sent by Agatho to the synod in Greece.

At his prompting and prayers the dutiful prince Constantine reduced and removed the tax upon the patrimony that was exacted from the island of Sicily by imperial tax collectors.

VI. Conon, Sergius, the Two Johns, Constantine, and Zosimus

When the aforesaid Pope John died, no small contention arose at Rome between the clergy and the army. For the clergy inclined toward a certain Peter the archpriest, but the army demanded Theodore the archpriest, a wealthy man by whose gifts the commanders of the soldiery had been corrupted. Thus neither the clergy consented to the army nor the army to the clergy.

While responses passed from both parties and they made no progress toward concord, the clergy, by divine prompting, saw that the army was willing under no condition to consent to Peter's election and named a third person, namely a certain Conon, Sicilian by nation.

In him there were truly an angelic appearance, advanced age, a simple mind, quiet manners, and a religious life. Serving God, he had never polluted himself with secular affairs.

After this was made known throughout the city, the Roman nobles, together with the judges and leading men, immediately came to greet the pontiff, and all began to acclaim his praises.

When the soldiers and their commanders saw the clergy and people agree with one will in the creation of the pontiff, they too were at last persuaded after some days and subscribed to his decree with a devout mind.

After he had been consecrated pontiff, Conon sat for eleven months. He received imperial letters from the prince Justinian II in which he wrote to this pontiff and the clergy that he had found the acts of the Sixth Synod that Constantine of pious memory, his father, had assembled by God's inspiration.

He promised that this synod would remain inviolate forever. But he did not persevere in this intention, as is evident in the following chapter.

After a short time Conon lay down with a grave disease. Seeing his incurable infirmity, Paschal, his archdeacon, wrote to John the exarch at Ravenna, who presided there for the emperor, promising him many things if he should be elected pontiff after Conon's death.

At last, after a long bodily affliction, Pope Conon died. After his death the people were divided. One party followed Theodore the priest, but another favored Paschal the archdeacon.

Because neither wished by any means to yield to the other, but both persisted in obstinacy, certain members of the clergy, together with the judges and leading men, held counsel with God before their eyes. A great multitude of citizens followed them to the sacred palace.

While they deliberated among themselves about what ought to be done, by God's inspiration they elected a certain Sergius as supreme pontiff.

This Sergius was Syrian by nation, born at Antioch but raised at Rome from his childhood. Under diverse supreme pontiffs he had conducted himself very laudably in many ecclesiastical offices. At last Pope Leo the Younger appointed him cardinal priest of the Holy Roman Church.

Therefore, after he was named supreme pontiff, Theodore, one of those to whom a part of the people adhered, immediately consented and, humbling himself, proceeded to kiss his feet. Paschal, however, still refused to do the same, but at last was compelled to consent.

Pope Sergius was therefore consecrated and sat upon the chair for thirteen years, eight months, and twenty-three days.

By God's revelation to him, he found in the sacristy of Saint Peter, in a most obscure place, a silver casket of such great age that it did not appear to be silver. A seal was impressed upon it, and beneath the seal lay a wholly silken embroidered cloth that is also called a stauracium.

When this was removed, he found a cross ornamented throughout with precious stones. Having drawn out four metal plates in which gems of marvelous size were enclosed, he found placed within an ineffable portion of the wood of the Lord.

That wood is adored and kissed by all the people on the day of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross.

Sergius established that, at the hour of the breaking of the Lord's body in the sacrament, the Lamb of God should be chanted by the people and clergy. He also translated the body of Pope Leo I by divine revelation.

Likewise, in the second Distinction On Consecration, Pope Sergius says: “The body of the Lord is threefold. The portion of the oblation placed in the chalice signifies the body of Christ that has already risen. The portion consumed signifies the body still walking upon earth. The portion remaining upon the altar until the end of Mass signifies the body in the sepulcher, because until the end of the age the bodies of the saints will be in sepulchers.”

The Gloss there says: “Today that portion is not reserved, but the two dry portions are taken together, for the third is taken with the blood.”

John, Greek by nation, succeeded Sergius in the Roman See. He sat for three years, two months, and twelve days.

While he presided, Tiberius, who was called Hausimarus and who, after Justinian had been cast down, had usurped the empire for himself, sent Theophylact the patrician, his chamberlain, to the city of Rome.

When his arrival became known, the armies that were in Italy, stirred to sedition in hatred of Tiberius, sought to kill Theophylact. For his safety the dutiful pontiff placed himself in their midst and by salutary admonitions calmed their tumult and sedition.

At that time Gisulf, Lombard duke of the Beneventans, entered Campania with an army of Lombards. Disturbing everything there with plunder, fires, and slaughter, when there was no one able to resist him, he led away many captives with him.

Compassionating the calamities of that province, the aforesaid pontiff sent many honorable men with much money to the tyrant, both to redeem the captives and so that he might depart with his army.

Another John of the same name, John VII, Greek by nation, succeeded John. He sat for two years, seven months, and seventeen days.

He was a very learned man and fluent in eloquence. He renewed many things in the Roman churches and established many things anew, especially concerning the cemeteries of the martyrs.

In his time Aribert, king of the Lombards, restored to the proper right of blessed Peter the patrimony of the Cottian Alps, which pertained to the right of blessed Peter and which the Lombards had possessed and held for very long times, executing the donation in letters of gold.

In his time, after Justinian recovered his paternal empire, he sent honorable messengers to Pope John and a sacred letter through which he adjured the aforesaid pontiff to assemble the bishops and determine what was to be held.

John was slow concerning this matter and closed his last day.

Constantine, Syrian by nation, succeeded John in the See of the Roman Church. He sat for seven years and fifteen days. He was a most mild man.

In his time a great famine prevailed at Rome for three years. Afterward so great a fertility followed it that people forgot the preceding want.

At the request of the emperor Justinian, Constantine also went personally to Constantinople. He was received with the greatest honor, and all privileges granted to him and to the Roman Church were confirmed.

Concerning him, you have many things at the end of the chapter about the emperors of this title.

Some place before this Pope Constantine a Zosimus, Syrian by nation, who sat for only twenty days and who was so constricted by a gouty humor that he could do nothing. He made a bishop on the island of Corsica.

When he died suddenly, the episcopate was vacant for eight months. Because of the brevity of his tenure, some do not place him among the pontiffs.

Title XIII, Chapter II

During the reign of Heraclius, blessed Isidore, bishop of Seville, abounding in holiness and learning, shone in Spain around the year of the Lord 640.

As Vincent says in book twenty-four, chapter thirty-one of the Historical Mirror, he produced and left in writing many useful works: two books of Soliloquies, or Synonyms; three books of Sentences, a work otherwise called On the Supreme Good because it begins thus; twenty books of Etymologies; two books On the Origin of Offices; two books Against the Jews, addressed to his sister Florentina; two books to Bishop Orosius On the Difference between the Old and New Testaments; one book of allegories on Genesis; one on Exodus; one on Leviticus; one on the Book of Numbers; one on Deuteronomy; one on Joshua; one on the Book of Judges; one on the Book of Kings; one treatise On the Body and Blood of the Lord; and several others. He also wrote a book On the Birth and Death of the Saints.

There also exists among us a book of apostolic decrees that Isidore first compiled. He gathered into one great volume the decretal letters of the Roman pontiffs and the canons of councils that, in the succession of times, were celebrated in diverse places throughout the world by Catholic bishops.

It is evident that the decrees of Ivo and Gratian were excerpted from that volume or its parts, that is, from pontifical letters and councils, and also from the short works of Catholic doctors.

Many notable sayings of this Isidore, excerpted from his books and especially from the book of Etymologies, are contained in the decrees.

In the first Distinction of the decrees, chapter one, Isidore says from the fifth book of the Etymologies: “All laws are either divine or human. Divine laws consist by nature; human laws by customs. Therefore, they differ, since different laws please different nations. Divine right is divine law; juridical right is human law. To pass through another person's field is permitted by divine right but not by juridical right.”

The same Isidore says in the same book: “Right is a general name, but law is a species of right. Right is so called because it is just. Every right consists of laws and customs. A law is a written enactment. A custom is a long-standing usage, treating only of practices.

“Custom is a certain right established by practices, and it is received in place of law when law is lacking. It makes no difference whether it consists in writing or in reason, since reason also commends law.

“Furthermore, if law consists in reason, everything that consists in reason will then be law, provided that it accords with religion, agrees with discipline, and advances salvation. That which is in common use is called custom.”

The same author says in the same book: “Right is either natural, civil, or of nations.

“Natural right is common to all nations because it is held everywhere by the instinct of nature, not by any enactment: such as the union of man and woman, namely a legitimate one; the succession of children; the rearing of children; the common possession of all things and the one liberty of all; the acquisition of those things that are taken from the sky, land, and sea; likewise, the restoration of a deposited thing or entrusted money; and the repelling of violence by force. For this, or anything similar to it, is never held to be unjust but natural and equitable.

“Civil right is that which each people or city establishes as its own for a divine or human cause.

“Military right includes the solemnity of making war, the bond of making a treaty, departure against an enemy or joining battle when the signal has been given, and likewise withdrawal when the signal has been given; the punishment of military discipline if a post is deserted; the measure of stipends; degrees of ranks; the honor of rewards, as when a crown or torque is given; the adjudication of booty; its just distribution according to persons' ranks and services; and the prince's portion.

“Quiritary right is properly the right of the Romans, which none possess except Quirites, that is, Romans. It treats of lawful inheritances, curatorships, guardianships, and usucaptions—rights that are found among no other people but are proper to the Romans and established for them alone.”

In the second Distinction it is said in the decrees: “According to Isidore, Quiritary right consists of laws and plebiscites, senatorial decrees and constitutions of princes, and edicts of senators or responses of the learned.”

Isidore explains each of these, describing what a law is: “It is an enactment of the people by which the elders together with the plebeians sanctioned something.

“Plebiscites are those things that the plebeians alone establish. Those things are called plebiscites that the plebs resolves, or that it asks and requests to be done.

“A senatorial decree is that which the senators alone decree while taking counsel for the people.

“A constitution or edict is that which a king or emperor establishes or publishes.

“Responses are what the jurists are said to answer to those consulting them; hence the works called the Responses of Paul. For there were certain learned men and arbiters of equity who published composed institutions of civil law, by which they might settle the lawsuits and contentions of those in dispute.

“Certain laws are also named from those who established them, such as the consular, tribunician, Julian, and Cornelian laws.

“For under Caesar Octavian, the substitute consuls Papius and Pompeius enacted laws that were named Papian and Pompeian from their names and contained rewards for fathers for undertaking to have children.

“Under the same emperor, Falcidius, tribune of the plebs, also made a law that no one should bequeath so much to strangers by testament that a fourth part did not remain for the heirs. From his name it was called the Falcidian Law.

“A composite law is one that speaks about many matters at once, so called from the abundance of matters.

As Gratian says, all these kinds of secular laws are parts of laws.

In the third Distinction of the decrees, canonical law is treated. According to what Isidore says above, it is called canonical because the Greek word canon is translated into Latin as “rule.”

A rule is so called because it leads rightly and never draws a person elsewhere. Others have said that a rule is so called because it rules, provides a norm for living well, or corrects what is distorted and depraved.

The same author says: “A privilege is that which sometimes deprives a person of the common right or makes him immune from it. Privileges are laws of private persons, as though private laws, for a privilege is so called because it is enacted concerning a private person.

“Every law,” says the same Isidore, “either permits—and this either what is lawful, as that a brave man should seek a reward, or what is unlawful, as that a bill of repudiation should be given lest graver things occur—or forbids, as that no one should be permitted to seek marriage with sacred virgins; or punishes, as that one who commits slaughter should be punished with death; or commands, as, ‘You shall love the Lord your God.’ For human life is governed by its reward or punishment.”

Laws were made so that human audacity might be restrained by fear of them and innocence might be safe among the wicked.

The same author shows in the book of Etymologies the conditions that laws ought to possess in order to be just laws: “A law will be honorable, just, possible according to nature and according to the custom of the country, fitting to place and time, necessary and useful. It will also be manifest, lest through obscurity it contain anything as a trap; and it will be written for no private advantage but for the common utility of citizens.”

These words of Isidore are explained in the Gloss there, but much more perfectly in the First Part, in the treatise on laws, from the sayings of blessed Thomas in the First of the Second Part.

The same author says in the same book, in Distinction Seven of the decrees: “Moses was the first of all to explain divine laws to the Hebrew nation in sacred writings. King Phoroneus first established laws and judgments for the Greeks. Mercury Trismegistus first delivered laws to the Egyptians. Solon first delivered or published laws to the Athenians. Lycurgus first devised rights for the Lacedaemonians from the authority of Apollo. Numa Pompilius, who succeeded Romulus in the kingdom, first published laws for the Romans.

“Afterward, when the seditious people could not bear the magistrates, it created ten men to write the laws. They set forth on twelve tables the laws from the books of Solon after they had been translated into the Latin language; their names also are placed there.

“Pompey the consul was the first who wished to undertake to reduce the laws into books, but he did not persevere because of fear of detractors. Then Caesar began to do it, but he was killed beforehand.

“The ancient laws gradually passed out of use through age and neglect. Although there is now no use of them, knowledge of them nevertheless appears necessary.

“New laws began from Constantine and the others who succeeded him, and they were mixed and disordered.

“Afterward, the younger emperor Theodosius, in the likeness of the Gregorian and Hermogenian codes, arranged under the proper title of each emperor a code made from enactments issued since the times of Constantine. He called it the Theodosian Code from his own name.” Thus speaks Isidore.

But add that afterward Justinian I reformed and ordered the work of the laws for the better, and it is now in use.

Isidore says in the sixth book of the Etymologies that the canons of general councils began from the times of Constantine. For in the preceding years, while persecution raged, no opportunity at all was given for instructing the peoples.

Hence Christianity was divided into diverse heresies, because bishops did not have permission to assemble together until the time of the aforesaid emperor. For he gave Christians the power to assemble freely.

Under him the holy fathers, assembling from the whole world at the Council of Nicaea, published the creed after the Apostles according to the evangelical and apostolic faith.

Among the other councils, there are four venerable synods that principally embrace the whole faith, like the four Gospels or the same number of rivers of paradise.

The first of these was that of Nicaea, conducted by three hundred and eighteen bishops during the reign of the emperor Constantine Augustus. In it the blasphemy of Arian faithlessness, which Arius himself asserted concerning inequality within the Holy Trinity, was condemned; and through the creed it defined the Son as consubstantial with God the Father.

The second synod, of one hundred and fifty bishops, was assembled at Constantinople under Theodosius the Elder. Condemning Macedonius, who denied that the Holy Spirit is God, it demonstrated the Holy Spirit to be consubstantial with God the Father and the Son.

The third, the first Council of Ephesus, was published by two hundred bishops under Theodosius the Younger. It condemned with just anathema Nestorius, who asserted two persons in Christ, showing that the one person of our Lord Jesus Christ remains in two natures.

The fourth, that of Chalcedon, was held by six hundred and thirty priests under the prince Marcian. It condemned Eutyches, the abbot of Constantinople, who pronounced the Word of God and the flesh to be one nature, and Dioscorus, bishop of Alexandria, his defender, preaching that Christ God was so born of the Virgin that in him we confess the substance of the divine and human nature.

But if there are any other similar councils that the holy fathers, filled with the Spirit of God, sanctioned after those four, let all their authorities remain established with full force. This is in Distinction Fifteen, The Canons.

II. Clerics, Their Orders, and Their Manner of Life

Concerning the reason they are called clerics and the orders into which they are distinguished, Isidore says in the seventh book of the Etymologies, in Distinction Twenty-one:

“We believe that clergy and clerics are so named because Matthias was elected by lot, whom we read was the first ordained by the apostles. For the Greek word for clergy is translated into Latin as ‘lot’ or ‘inheritance.’

“They are therefore called clerics because they are of the Lord's lot or because they have God as their portion.

“Generally, all who serve in the Church of Christ are called clerics. Their grades and names are these: doorkeeper, psalmist, lector, exorcist, acolyte, subdeacon, deacon, priest, and bishop.

“The order of bishops is fourfold: patriarchs, archbishops, metropolitans, and bishops.”

Afterward he gives the etymology and interpretation of these orders. But concerning how the offices of psalmist and bishop are called orders and whether there are seven or nine orders, see the Third Part under the title on the sacraments.

What pertains to the office of each of these orders is explained by the same Isidore in Distinction Twenty-five, After Reading Through.

The same Isidore shows how clerics ought to live and conduct themselves in his work On the Life of Clerics and in Distinction Twenty-three, where it is said:

“It is therefore provided by the law of the fathers that, separated from common life, they should abstain from the pleasures of the world; that they should attend neither spectacles nor processions; that they should flee public banquets and cultivate private ones that are not only public but sober [read: cultivate private banquets that are not only modest but sober].

“They should in no way devote themselves to usury or to the disgraceful occupations of profits, nor seek by frauds the pursuit of any gain. They should flee the love of money as the material of all crimes.

“They should refuse, that is, flee, secular offices and affairs. They should not receive a degree of honor through ambition. They should not receive gifts for the benefits of God's healing.

“They should beware deceits and conspiracies. They should flee hatred, rivalries, detractions, and envy.

“They should not wander with their eyes, be unbridled with their tongue, or walk with a wanton and flowing gesture, but should show modesty and the reverence of the mind by simple clothing and gait.

“They should utterly execrate obscenity of members and of words just as they do that of works. They should flee frequent association with widows and virgins. They should in no way seek the company of foreign women.

“They should strive perpetually to preserve the chastity of an inviolate body. They should also furnish due obedience to their elders and should not lift themselves up through the pursuit of any boastfulness.

“Finally, they should apply themselves vigilantly to readings of doctrine and the exercise of psalms, hymns, and canticles. For those who strive to devote themselves to divine worship ought to be such that, while they give their work to knowledge, they minister the grace of doctrine to the peoples.” Thus he speaks.

III. Further Canonical Extracts from Isidore

Isidore says in Distinction Twenty-nine: “It must be known that very many chapters are to be considered according to cause, person, place, and time. Because the modes of these are not searched out inwardly, some persons become entangled and stumble into a labyrinth of error when they judge before they understand and blame before they seek out what has been read by reading it repeatedly.”

The same Isidore says in On the Difference between the Old and New Testaments, in Distinction Thirty-four: “It is not lawful for a Christian—I shall not say to have several, but not even two women at the same time—except only one: either a wife or certainly, in place of a wife if a spouse is lacking, a concubine.”

But this is to be understood in the sound sense in which Gratian explains it there and well in the preceding section. Here, according to the laws, a woman is called a concubine when, legal instruments being absent, she is the only one and nevertheless is joined with marital affection.

That he understood it thus is evident from what he says upon Exodus and in Cause Thirty-two, question five: “You shall not commit adultery,” he says, “that is, let no one outside the covenants of marriage join himself to other women to fulfill lust. For one who approaches another woman in addition to his own commits adultery.”

The same Isidore says in Cause Thirty-two, question seven: “Sin reigns in a man not only from fornication committed, but if it is still delighted in and holds the mind, it reigns without doubt.

“The fornication of the flesh is adultery; the fornication of the mind is the service of idols.

“There is also spiritual fornication, concerning which the Lord says: ‘If anyone looks upon a woman to desire her, he has already committed adultery with her in his heart.’

“Every unclean utterance is called fornication, although each person prostitutes himself with a different pleasure of turpitude. For from the delight of fornicating various shameful deeds arise, by which the kingdom of God is closed so that man is separated from God.”

The same author says in the book of Sentences, in Distinction Six: “It is not a sin when unwillingly we are deceived by nocturnal images. But it is then a sin if, before we are deceived, we are anticipated by thoughts and affections.

“For images of lust that we truly enacted often appear in the mind of those sleeping, but harmlessly if they do not occur through desire.”

The same author says: “One who is polluted by a nocturnal illusion, although he may perceive that he has been defiled by the memory of shameful thoughts, should nevertheless attribute the fact that he was tempted to his own fault and immediately cleanse his uncleanness with tears.”

But concerning the matter of pollution in dreams, you have a full treatment in the Second and Third Parts.

The same author says in the book of Sentences and in Distinction Thirty-seven: “A Christian is therefore forbidden to read the fictions of poets because through the delights of fables they excite the mind excessively toward the incitements of lust.

“For a person sacrifices to demons not only by offering incense but also by receiving their sayings too gladly.”

The same author says in Distinction Eighty-one: “A change of place is sometimes beneficial to converts for the salvation of their soul. For very often, when the place is changed, the affection of the mind also changes.

“It is therefore fitting to be bodily torn away from the place where one served enticements, for the place where anyone lived wickedly places before the mind's sight what that person always thought or did there.”

The same Isidore writes to Bishop Massanus in Distinction Fifty: “To the holy lord and brother Massanus, blessed in merits, bishop: Isidore, bishop.

“Your venerable Fraternity made known in letters that in chapter eighteen of the Council of Ancyra it is read that after a carnal lapse a degree of honor is to be restored after penance, while elsewhere it is read that after an offense of this kind the merit of the former order is in no way to be restored.

“This diversity is resolved in this manner. The canons command those persons to return to their former degrees whose satisfaction in penance or worthy confession of sins came first.

“But on the contrary, those who are neither corrected from the vice of corruption and who strive with a certain superstitious rashness to vindicate that very carnal offense which they commit receive neither the degree of honor nor the grace of communion.”

He proves this through the authority of Ezekiel, who speaks on the Lord's behalf under the figure of the transgressing Jerusalem. The Lord says: “Be confounded, O Judah, and bear your disgrace.” A little afterward he says: “You and your daughters, return to your antiquity.”

And through John in the Apocalypse, the Lord says to the angel of Ephesus, that is, its bishop: “Remember whence you have fallen, do penance, and perform your first works. Otherwise, I shall come to you and move your lampstand from its place.”

It must be noted that this chapter speaks concerning such a carnal lapse of clerics as introduces infamy, concerning which a man has been convicted in judgment or has confessed and on account of which he has been suspended from his office.

The bishop can restore him to his office and remove the infamy contracted if the crime is of the kind in which he can dispense; and he ought to do this if, according to outward signs, the man truly repents.

By this dispensation, one who previously could not do so because of infamy can afterward be assumed to the government of a church. But if he does not repent, the bishop ought not to dispense, as the Gloss says together with the text.

The same Isidore, in the book of Etymologies—also contained in Cause Twenty-four, question three, Certain Heretics—sets down seventy diverse heresies and their errors together with their authorities. Concerning these, you have material in the Fourth Part under the title on the gift of understanding.

The same author says in the book On the Supreme Good, which is otherwise called the book of Sentences, and in the third Distinction On Penance: “One who still does that of which he repents is a mocker and not a penitent. He does not appear to ask God as one subject to him, but proudly to deride him.

“Many pour forth tears without ceasing and do not cease to sin. I see some persons receive tears for repenting but not possess the effect of penance, because through inconstancy of mind, not through remembrance of sin, they pour forth tears. But when habit revives, they again commit the things they wept over.”

The same author says in the second Distinction On Consecration: “Those who live wickedly in the Church and do not cease to receive communion, thinking themselves cleansed by such communion, should learn that it profits them nothing toward amendment, for the prophet says: ‘Why has my beloved committed crimes in my house? Surely holy flesh will not take your evils away from you?’

“And the Apostle says: ‘Let a man prove himself, and thus let him eat of that bread,’ and so forth.”

The same author says in the book of Sentences and in the fourth Distinction On Consecration: “Those who are in their mothers' wombs cannot be baptized with their mother because one not yet born according to Adam cannot be regenerated according to Christ. For regeneration cannot be said to occur in one whom generation has not preceded.”

The same Isidore says in the fourth Distinction On Consecration: “The Roman pontiff judges that it is not the man who baptizes, but the Spirit of God who ministers the grace of baptism, even if the person who baptizes is a pagan.”

The same author says in the fourth Distinction On Consecration: “It is established that baptism was entrusted to priests alone. Its ministry—namely, outside a case of necessity—is not permitted even to deacons to fulfill without a priest or bishop, unless, when these are far absent, the final necessity of sickness compels it. This is also very often permitted to faithful laypeople.”

The same author says in the second book On Offices and in Cause Thirty, question five: “Women are therefore veiled when they are married so that they may know themselves always to be subject and humble toward their husbands.”

And below: “That in the beginning a ring is given by the bridegroom to the bride is done either on account of the sign of mutual affection or, still more, so that by that same pledge their hearts may be joined. Hence the ring is placed upon the fourth finger because in it, as is reported, a certain vein of blood reaches all the way to the heart.”

The same author says in the ninth book of the Etymologies and in Cause Thirty-two, question four: “Those who spring from a free marriage are called free children. For children from a free man and a female slave are of servile condition. For whoever is born always takes the inferior part.

“Natural children are called the children of freeborn concubines, whom nature alone, not the honorableness of marriage, begot. But those who are from legitimate marriage follow the mother rather than the father.” Concerning this, see the Gloss there.

The same author says in the eleventh book of the Etymologies and in Cause Thirty-five, question four: “When consanguinity, gradually separating itself through the orders of lines of descent, has withdrawn itself as far as the final degree and has ceased to be kinship, then for the first time the law will receive it into the bond of marriage and will in a certain manner recall it as it flees.

“Consanguinity was therefore established as far as the sixth degree of lineage so that, just as the generation and condition of man ends with the six ages of the world, so kinship of lineage might be bounded by the same number of degrees.” This is according to the ancient laws.

But now consanguinity and affinity extend inclusively as far as the fourth degree, as is evident in the final chapter of the title On Consanguinity and Affinity in the Decretals, and concerning this in the first title of the Third Part.

The same Isidore says in Cause Eleven, question three: “If one who presides does, or commands anyone to do, what the Lord prohibited; or if he passes over, or commands to be passed over, what was commanded, the judgment of Saint Paul the Apostle is to be cast against him: ‘Even if we or an angel from heaven should evangelize to you anything besides what we have evangelized to you, let him be anathema.’”

The same author says: “If anyone forbids you what the Lord commanded, or in turn commands that what the Lord forbade be done, let him be execrable to all who love God.”

The same author says: “If one who presides says or commands anything contrary to the will of God or contrary to what is clearly commanded in the holy Scriptures, let him be held as a false witness of God or a sacrilegious man.”

The same author says in Cause Twenty-three, question five: “Princes sometimes hold the heights of power allotted to them within the Church so that through that same power they may fortify ecclesiastical discipline.

“Otherwise, powers would not be necessary within the Church except so that what priests are unable to accomplish through the word of doctrine, power might command through the terror of discipline.

“Often through an earthly kingdom the heavenly kingdom advances, so that those placed within the Church who act against faith and discipline may be crushed by the rigor of princes.

“Let princely power impose upon the necks of the proud that very discipline which the usefulness of the Church is unable to exercise, and, so that it may merit veneration, let it impart that discipline by the strength of its authority.

“Let the princes of the age know that they will owe an account to God on account of the Church that they receive to defend for Christ. For whether the peace and discipline of the Church is increased through faithful princes or dissolved, he who entrusted his Church to their power requires an account from them.”

Likewise, from the Council of Seville at which Isidore was present, it is said in Cause Sixteen, question seven, In the Ninth Action: “It is unbecoming for a layman to be the vicar of a bishop and to judge ecclesiastical men.

“In one and the same office there ought not to be a disparate profession. This is forbidden in the divine law when Moses says: ‘You shall not plow with an ox and an ass together,’ that is, you shall not join a man of a different profession together in one office.”

The same author says in the book of Sentences and in Cause Eleven, question three: “While the poor man has nothing to offer, he is not only disdained from being heard but is even oppressed contrary to the truth. Justice is quickly violated by gold, and no guilty person fears a fault that he thinks can be redeemed with coins.”

The same author says in Cause Eleven, question three: “With an excommunicated person it is lawful neither to pray, to speak—except concerning things that pertain to that same excommunication—nor to eat. If anyone acts contrary to this, he will immediately contract with him the common penalty of excommunication, namely by incurring the lesser excommunication but not the greater, as the Gloss says.”

The same author says in Cause Eleven, question three: “One who consents to sinners and defends an offender will be accursed before God and men and will be corrected with a most severe rebuke. Hence a certain most holy father also says: ‘If anyone defends a sinner, let him be restrained more sharply than the one who sinned.’”

The same author says in the twentieth book of the Etymologies and in Cause Twenty-three, question two: “A war that is waged by edict for recovering goods or repelling enemies is just. A judge is so called because he declares right to the people or because he adjudicates according to right.”

The same author says in the second book of Sentences and in Cause Twenty-two, question five: “By whatever artifice of words a person swears, nevertheless God, who is the witness of conscience, receives it just as the person to whom the oath is sworn understands it.

“The swearer becomes guilty in two ways, because he both takes God's name in vain and ensnares his neighbor by deceit.”

The same author says in the book of Synonyms and in Cause Twenty-two, question four: “In evil promises, break faith; and in a shameful vow, change the decree. Do not do what you vowed incautiously. A promise that is fulfilled through crime is impious.”

The same author says in a letter to Mason, in Cause Thirty-three, question two: “The fact that the rigor of the canons commanded a penitent to return to his former condition after seven years was sanctioned by the fathers not by the choice of their own judgment but rather from the sentence of divine judgment.

“For it is read that Miriam, the sister of Aaron and a prophetess, when she incurred the offense of detraction against Moses, was immediately struck with the mark of leprosy.

“When Moses asked that she be cleansed, the Lord commanded her to go outside the camp for seven days and, after cleansing, to return to the camp.

“Miriam, the sister of Aaron, is understood as the flesh of the priest, which, when given over to pride, is stained by the most filthy contagions of thoughts. Let it go outside the camp for seven days, that is, let it be cast outside the Church for seven years, so that after cleansing from vices it may receive the merit of its place or former dignity.”

Gratian adds in the following section: “Although this appears to have been said specifically concerning priests, nevertheless it ought generally to be understood concerning all penitents.

“For in imitation of that sentence of the Lord, David, convicted of adultery and homicide, is read to have offered to God a fast of one week in satisfaction for the crime committed.” Thus it is written there, but I do not know where this is read.

In antiquity, as a rule, a seven-year penance was given for any mortal sin, as in Cause Twenty-two, question one, It Must Be Preached. Nevertheless, according to everyone, penances today are discretionary.

The reason why a seven-year penance was given is also that through penance the sevenfold grace of the Holy Spirit, lost through sin, is restored, according to the Gloss.

IV. Sayings from Isidore's First Book of Soliloquies

Likewise, Isidore says in the first book of the Soliloquies: “That which happens to many must be borne patiently by one person.

“You have followed the flesh; in the flesh you are scourged. Your own weapons are led against you; you are wounded by your own missiles. For through the things by which you sinned, through these you are also tormented.

“Alas, how difficult it is to conquer a depraved custom. Constant custom is turned into nature. Through constant use vice becomes natural.

“I seek to rise from the fall and am unable to oppose habit. I am drawn by love of the good; I am drawn back by the law of evil custom.

“Although with pain, strive to resist evil habit. Set before yourself, against the heats of the flesh, the fires of future punishment. The memory of the heat of Gehenna excludes the fire of lust.

“The more the heart is inclined toward the lowest things by humility, the more it advances on high.

“The first degree of humility is willingly to hear the truth, to retain it in memory, and voluntarily to advance. Truth flees a mind that it does not find humble.

“Descend that you may ascend; humble yourself that you may be exalted, lest after being exalted you be humbled.

“Be small in your own eyes so that you may be great in the eyes of God. For you will be the more precious before God, the more contemptible you are before your own eyes.

“Be equal in all things. Change your mind neither through joy nor through sorrow.

“Let no event find you unprepared; let there be no event that your forethought does not anticipate. Set before yourself that there is nothing that cannot happen, for forethought lessens future troubles. But unforeseen evils strike more severely.

“Learn to bear evils rather than to return them. Let what displeases you in another displease you in yourself.

“Prepare the shield of patience against a harsh word and the buckler of patience against the sword of the tongue.

“Do not return an insult. Do not repay a reproach. Maintain the patience of silence; by being silent you will conquer more quickly.

“With a tranquil heart disclose the pain of an injury. However grave a wound may be, when opened it exhales; but when enclosed, the wound consumes the mind greatly.

“Envy first harms itself; first it bites its own author. For it is the moth of the soul, which devours perception, burns the breast, afflicts the mind, and feeds upon the heart like a plague.

“Let neither favor seduce you nor reproach break you. One who does not seek praise does not feel reproach.

“Show your profession by clothing and gait. Let there be gravity in your bearing and honorableness in your gait. Let nothing of wantonness, disgrace, petulance, insolence, or levity appear in your gait.

“A man's tongue discloses his character. For as the speech is shown to be, so the mind also is proved to be.

“Do not tear apart another person's life. Do not defile your mouth with another's evil. Do not detract from one who sins, but grieve with him. Fear rather in yourself what you detract from in others.

“Do not listen to detractors either, for detractors and listeners are held by equal guilt.

“Those who have not fulfilled what they knew are counted among the unfaithful, because they do not discharge the faith of their promise.

“In evil promises, break faith. In a shameful vow, change the decree. A promise that is fulfilled through crime is impious.

“No punishment is graver than an evil conscience, for a mind conscious of evil is agitated by its own goads.

“Disclose your depraved thoughts, for a vice that has been disclosed is quickly healed.

“Often nature is changed by habits; it is overcome by custom. Continual use turns itself into nature. All things yield to use.

“What you began with difficulty, through use you will complete willingly.

“Teach the good that you have learned. Pour forth by your mouth the knowledge that you conceive by your ear. For wisdom becomes more abundant by giving and is diminished by retaining.

“Love hearing more than speaking. At the beginning hear; speak last. First be silent; speak afterward.

“The end possesses more honor, for in every matter the end is intended and the last things are sought. The end of a speech is better than its beginning.

“Not only the doer but also one conscious of a sin is held liable.

“Make yourself such toward your subjects that you are loved more than feared; for fear removes faith, but affection restores it.

“It is impious justice not to pardon human frailty. Your own law binds you. You yourself will bear the judgment that you place upon others.

“Beware honors that you cannot hold without fault. The loftiness of honors is the magnitude of crimes, and at a higher grade there will without doubt be a greater punishment.

“The powerful suffer torments powerfully. Therefore, the greater the honor, the greater the dangers.

“A tall tree is agitated more strongly by winds, and its branches are more quickly driven into ruin. Lofty towers fall with a graver fall, and the highest mountains are struck by frequent thunderbolts.

“A glorious man is quickly exposed to ambushes, for glory produces envy and envy produces dangers.

“Whoever shines with the glory of the age, however he may stand forth adorned with precious splendor, is nevertheless always in punishment and always in distress. He lies upon silken couches, but disturbed; he lies upon feathers, but pale; he lies upon golden beds, but troubled.

“Your work will be such as your intention has been.

“He who gives with weariness loses the reward.

“Do not take away from one person that from which you bestow upon another.

“The body cannot be corrupted unless the soul has first been corrupted; understand this concerning vicious corruption.

“For chastity joins a man to God and makes him a fellow citizen of the angels.

“Lust is always joined to satiety; but, conversely, lust is restrained by fasting, and luxury is overcome.

“When the veins are filled with wine, luxury sprouts in the members. For cups are the instruments of luxury.

“If you wish to be safe from fornication, be separated from a woman in body and in sight. For you will not long remain unharmed near a serpent. Standing before a fire and close to danger, you will not long be safe. Though you be made of iron, at some time you will be dissolved.

“Gladness quickly steals upon those given to idleness.”

Title XIII, Chapter III

The venerable Bede, priest and monk, shone in England in the year of the Lord 692, as Sigebert says, and Vincent in book twenty-four, chapter 132 of the Historical Mirror. When he was passing through the thirtieth year of his age, he was ordained a priest.

As William says, although he was born in the farthest corner of the world, he touched upon every land. In the eighteenth year of his life he was made a deacon, and in his thirtieth a priest. From that time until the last year of his age, he did not cease either to teach or to write. He had already produced thirty-six volumes, which he divided into seventy-eight books.

He wrote the works that follow, as Vincent notes in the Historical Mirror at the place cited above: one book on Genesis; three books On the Tabernacle of Moses; four books on Samuel; one book On the Temple of Solomon; three books on Ezra and Nehemiah; one book on Tobit; one book on the Psalms; five books on the Proverbs of Solomon; five books on the Song of Songs; four books on Mark; one book on Luke; seven books on the canonical epistles; one book on the Acts of the Apostles; one book on the Apocalypse; one book On Questions in the Books of Kings; and one book On the Holy Places. He also wrote On Times, On the Moon, and many other works.

It is also read concerning him, as Jacobus de Voragine reports, that, when he had become blind, he nevertheless did not on that account cease from preaching the word of God. Instead, he caused himself to be led by a certain boy to a place where a great people had assembled.

One day, however, the frivolous boy, in mockery of him, led him to a certain place where there was no one, but there was a great multitude of stones. The boy then informed the man of God that a great people had gathered to hear his word. Believing this, Bede preached fervently and cried out. When the preaching was finished, although no one was present, the stones answered, saying, “You have spoken well, venerable father.” And for that reason he is called the Venerable Bede in the homilies. Others say that angels gave him that answer.

Some assert, as Vincent notes at the place cited above, that Bede went to Rome so that he might discuss whether his books agreed with the doctrine of the Church, or might correct them at the command of the Apostolic See if they were discordant. I do not, however, affirm that he was at Rome, but I know that he was invited there by Pope Sergius.

Among other things, Sergius writes as follows to Etelfridus, abbot of the monastery where Bede was: “Without any delay, do not defer to direct the religious servant of God Bede, a priest of your monastery, to the thresholds of the apostles Peter and Paul, your beloved patrons and protectors, and into the presence of our mediocrity. With the Lord favoring your holy prayers, you should not doubt that he will return prosperously to you after the examination of certain chapters and ecclesiastical causes has been completed, in which there is need of persons imbued with the art of letters for the purpose of consultation. For we believe that whatever becomes clear to the universal Church through the contribution of his presence will surely profit all the faithful.”

William says that he was so celebrated by fame that Roman sublimity required him for resolving questions. He was unpolished, but of sweet eloquence.

Bede says in the book of Kings and in Distinction 37: “He troubles the understanding of readers and forces it to fail who thinks that they are in every way to be prohibited from reading secular books. If any useful things are found in them, it is lawful to take them as though they were one's own. Otherwise, Moses and Daniel together would not have allowed themselves to be instructed in the wisdom and letters of the Egyptians and Chaldeans, although they shuddered at their superstitions and delights. Nor would the teacher of the gentiles himself have inserted some verses of the poets into either his writings or his sayings.”

The same author says in Cause One, question three: “Not only are they sellers of doves, and do they make the house of God a house of commerce, who seek a price of money, praise, or honor by bestowing holy orders. Rather, so too do those who, by the Lord's bestowal, have received a spiritual rank or grace in the Church and exercise it not with a simple intention but for the sake of some human recompense, contrary to that saying of Peter: ‘Whoever speaks, let it be as the words of God; and whoever ministers, let it be as from the power that God supplies, so that God may be honored in all things.’”

The same author says on the second epistle of Peter and in Cause Two, question eight: “They followed the way of Balaam from Bosor, who loved the reward of iniquity, but received a correction of his madness: the mute beast of burden, speaking with a man's voice, restrained the foolishness of the prophet.”

He says: “Heretics very often put forward doctrines so foolish and so execrable that even pagans of dull understanding, who are altogether without the reason of divine knowledge, detest their madness and, thinking soundly, refute their distorted ways that are contrary to God. And, what is worse, sometimes many Catholics so greatly love the reward of iniquity that even the learned are reproved by the unlearned and clerics by laymen. They are rightly compared to the prophet who was rebuked by the words of an ass speaking contrary to nature, yet was not recalled from the purpose of his depraved journey.

“The interpretations of the names also agree with them. For Bosor is interpreted as ‘fleshly,’ and Balaam as ‘vain.’ These men plunge their hearers into the precipice, for they preach to them not salutary things that may correct them, but erroneous things that may delight them. Concerning them Peter adds: ‘These are wells without water,’ and so forth.”

The same author says on Matthew and in Cause Eight, question one: “Let us not judge that it suffices for our salvation if we are equated in faith or deeds with the shameful negligence of any ignorant persons. For in the sacred letters there is prescribed to them one rule alike for believing and for living.”

The same author, on Mark, treats the passage, “Judas went to the chief priests, and they appointed that money should be given to him.” He says: “Many today abhor, as monstrous and impious, the crime of Judas because he sold his Lord, teacher, and God for money, yet they do not beware of it. For when they give false testimony against someone for gifts, they certainly deny the truth for money: they sell God for money. For he himself said, ‘I am the truth.’

“When they defile the fellowship of brotherhood with any plague of discord, they betray God, because God is charity. Therefore, those who spurn the commands of truth betray God, who is both charity and truth, especially when they sin not through weakness or ignorance, but, in the likeness of Judas, seek an opportunity by which, in the absence of witnesses, they may exchange truth for falsehood and virtue for crime.” This is in Cause Eleven, question three, at the chapter He Went.

The same Bede says in Homily 43 and in Cause Twenty-two, question four: “If it should happen that something has been sworn too incautiously whose observance tends toward a worse outcome, let us know that it should freely be changed by a more salutary counsel. Under pressing necessity, we should rather commit perjury—that is, fail to observe what was sworn—than, for the sake of avoiding perjury, turn aside into another, graver crime.

“Thus David swore by God that he would kill Nabal, a foolish and impious man, and destroy all things that belonged to him. But at the first intercession of Abigail, a prudent woman, he immediately remitted his threats, recalled his sword to its sheath, and did not grieve that he had contracted any guilt through such perjury.”

The same author says in the following chapter: “Not only in swearing but in everything that we do, this moderation must be observed with care: if perhaps we have fallen into such a lapse or into the snares of a crafty enemy, from which we cannot rise without some contagion of sin, let us seek that means of escape by which we recognize that we shall suffer less danger.”

The same Bede says on the epistle of John and in Cause Twenty-four, question one: “‘If anyone comes to you and does not bring this doctrine’—namely, that of the faith of truth—‘do not receive him into the house, nor say to him, Hail. For he who says Hail to him shares in his evil works.’”

Saint John says this about avoiding heretics and schismatics. What he taught in words, he also showed in deeds. For the most valiant and holy martyr Polycarp, bishop of the Smyrnaeans, relates concerning him that once, when he had entered the baths at Ephesus for the sake of washing, and had seen Cerinthus there, he immediately leapt out and departed unwashed, saying, “Let us flee from here, lest the baths themselves in which Cerinthus, the enemy of truth, is washing should fall down.”

The same Polycarp, when Marcion once met him and said to him, “Recognize us,” answered him, “I recognize the firstborn of Satan.”

The same author says on the Acts of the Apostles and in Cause Twenty-six, question two: “It is not to be believed that lots may be used indifferently on the example of Matthias, or because Jonah the prophet was discovered by lot, since the privileges of individuals cannot make a common law. If, nevertheless, any persons, compelled by some necessity, think that God should be consulted by lots on the example of the apostles, let them see that the apostles themselves did this only when the assembly of the brethren had been gathered and prayers had been poured forth to God.” These are his words. And this is understood concerning divisory lots, not divinatory lots, which are commonly prohibited.

The same Bede says on John, in the second Distinction On Penance: “Meanwhile, it must be asked what special sign there was for recognizing the Son of God in the fact that the Spirit descended upon him and remained. What great thing is it for the Son of God that the Spirit is affirmed to remain upon him?”

He answers: “It must be noted that the Holy Spirit always remained in the Lord. But in holy men who, as long as they live, have borne a mortal body, he in part remains eternally and in part departs, intending to return.

“He indeed remains with them so that they may persist in good deeds, love voluntary poverty, attain meekness, mourn from a desire for eternity, hunger and thirst for justice, embrace mercy, cleanness of heart, and the tranquility of peace, and not fear to suffer persecution for the observance of justice; so that they may desire to persist in alms, fasts, prayers, and the other fruits of the Spirit.

“But he departs for a time so that they may not always have the power of healing the sick, raising the dead, casting out demons, or even prophesying. The Spirit always remains so that they may be able to possess virtues and live wondrously themselves; he comes for a time so that, also for others, they may shine outwardly through signs of miracles and disclose what they are within.”

The same author says from his Penitential, in the second Distinction On Consecration: “If anyone has vomited the Eucharist through drunkenness or voracity, let him do penance for forty days. Let clerics, monks, deacons, or priests do penance for seventy days, and bishops for ninety. If he has vomited it because of sickness, let him do penance for seven days.” These are its words. This, however, is a matter of discretion.

The same author says on Luke, in Distinction 31: “So that priests may always be able to stand at the altars, they are commanded always to abstain from their wives and always to observe chastity.”

Likewise Bede, in the book On Times, as contained in Distinction 16 in the canon The Sixth Synod, lists twenty-four councils celebrated at diverse times and places.

The venerable Bede died, as Vincent reports in book twenty-four of the Historical Mirror from the statements of Guilherinus, in the year of the Lord's incarnation 733 and the seventieth year of his age. For continuous days before his death, he rejected food with nausea because of a disorder of the stomach and drew breath with a constricted sigh. Nevertheless, he did not cast aside the work of literary study, but throughout all these days, beyond the required task of psalmody, he applied himself to it. He also translated the Gospel of John during these days into the evangelical language [read: into the English language].

He would say to his disciples, “Learn, little children, while I am still with you.” On the Tuesday before the Ascension, a slight swelling appeared in his feet. Then, when the congregation had been called, he was anointed and communicated. After bestowing a kiss upon all, he implored each of them to remember him in the future. Because of familiar acquaintance, he also bestowed upon some the little gifts that he had in his private stores.

On the day of the Ascension, lying down facing the oratory where he was accustomed to pray, with haircloth placed beneath him, with his senses unimpaired and his countenance cheerful, he said the words, “O King of glory, Lord of hosts, who as conqueror today,” and so forth, to the end. When he had said this, he sent forth his spirit. So great a fragrance followed that those who stood by said that they were in paradise.

Section II

There was a certain householder in the region of Nordabim that is called Incumennaum, as Vincent reports from Bede's statements. He died in the early part of the night, revived at dawn, and put those who were keeping watch over him to flight. His wife, however, although exceedingly afraid, remained.

He said to her, “Do not fear. I have risen from the death by which I was held, and it has been permitted to me to live among men again. But from now on I must live very differently from before.”

Immediately rising, he went to the oratory of the village and prayed until daylight. He then divided his substance into three parts, of which he gave one to his wife and another to his sons, but immediately distributed the third to the poor.

Not long afterward he came to the monastery at Aleos, which is encircled by the River Tindo. Having received the tonsure, he received a secluded dwelling from the abbot, and there, until his death, he remained in a wondrous manner of life.

He related the following: “A certain man, bright in appearance and splendid in clothing, was leading me. We walked in silence toward the rising of the sun at the solstice.

“We came to a valley that was exceedingly broad, long, and deep. It lay on our left and contained one lake exceedingly terrible with seething flames, but another exceedingly dreadful with boiling hail and cold blowing most violently through all things. Each was full of souls who were cast with force, by turns, from here to there. For when they could not endure one, they passed into the other.

“I thought within myself that this was hell. My guide, answering my thought, said, ‘This is not hell, as you think.’

“As we went forward, I saw places filled with darkness so dense that I saw absolutely nothing except the appearance and clothing of my guide. And behold, globes of flames ascended from a pit and fell again into the same place. Immediately my guide disappeared and left me alone. The peaks of the flames were filled with the spirits of men, ascending and falling back like sparks with smoke, and an incomparable stench boiled up with them.

“Meanwhile, a crowd of demons came and, insulting them, led three persons into the darkness. One of them had been shorn like a cleric, another was a layman, and the third a woman. They descended with them into the midst of the burning abyss.

“Certain spirits ascending from that abyss breathed putrid fire upon my eyes, nostrils, and mouth. With fiery pincers that they carried, they strove to seize me, but they could not touch me.

“And behold, behind me amid the darkness there appeared what seemed like the lightning of a shining star. This was my guide, who immediately put them to flight. Turning to the right, he began to lead me toward the rising of the sun.

“Soon, when I had been led out into serene light, I saw an exceedingly great wall to whose length and height no boundary seemed visible. No door, ascent, or window appeared in it; and immediately, I know not by what order, we were upon its summit.

“There was there a field exceedingly broad and joyful, full of blooming little flowers and the sweetest fragrance. It shone with a light like the midday sun. In it were many companies of people clothed in white and many seats of persons rejoicing.

“As he led me among them, I thought that this was the kingdom of heaven. Answering, he said, ‘This is not the kingdom of heaven, as you think.’

“Proceeding from there, I beheld a much greater grace of light, heard the sweetest voices of persons singing, and perceived a most magnificent fragrance. When I hoped that I was about to enter, my guide immediately turned his step backward by the way we had come.

“As we returned, he said: ‘The valley that you beheld is the place in which the souls of those who deferred confessing and amending their crimes until death are examined. Even these, departing from the body at the last as penitents and confessors, will all, through the mercy of God, come to the kingdom of heaven on the day of judgment. But alms, fasts, and the prayers of the living, and especially the celebration of Masses, free many before the day of judgment.

“‘The pit that you saw is the mouth of Gehenna; whoever has once fallen into it will never be freed.

“‘The flowery place is that in which the souls of those departing from the body with good works are received, though they are not of such perfection as to deserve to enter the kingdom of heaven immediately. All of them will enter it on the day of judgment.

“‘Whoever are perfect in word, thought, and deed, as soon as they depart from the body, come to that kingdom. Near it lies open the place in which you heard the sound of sweet song and drew in the sweetest fragrance.

“‘I departed from you for a time so that I might learn what ought to be done with you.’

“Although I abhorred living in the body again, I suddenly saw that I was alive among you; I know not by what order.”

That man related these things not indiscriminately to everyone, but only to those who either feared eternal torments or desired eternal joys.

In the neighborhood of his cell there lived a certain holy monk and priest named Englis, who is even now a solitary on the island of Ireland, sustaining his last age with common bread and water. Through him the things that this man had seen became known.

King Adiulfridus also, a most learned man in every respect, listened to him diligently. He too was at last made a monk in the aforesaid monastery. At that time, the abbot of that monastery was a holy man named Ediualdus, who is now bishop of Lindisfarne.

The brother who had seen these things was called Diotelinus. He very often immersed himself in the nearby river to restrain the heat of his body, so that even crusts of ice flowed away about him from his clothing. For he never removed the wet and icy garments from the river until they had lost their moisture and dried upon his body.

When he was asked why he endured so great a harshness of cold, he answered, “I have seen colder things.” When he was asked why he maintained so great a rigor of continence, he answered, “I have seen harsher things.”

Title XIII, Chapter IV

When the emperor Maurice had been killed and his entire progeny destroyed at the command of Phocas, Phocas himself, by the will of the army and through his own rashness, seized the Roman Empire in the year of the Lord 605, and in the four thousand five hundred sixty-eighth year from the creation of the world, as Sigebert reports. But according to another opinion, it was in the five thousand eight hundred fourth year from the creation of the world.

He held the empire for eight years. In his first year Gregory the Great, of whom above, died. When Phocas had been made emperor, he crowned his wife Leonticia as Augusta.

When the death of Maurice became known, the Persians on one side and the Huns on the other ravaged the provinces of the Romans.

According to John of the Column in his histories, the cause for which the king of the Persians rose against the Roman Empire was this.

During the reign of Maurice, the peoples of the Persians raised a sedition against their king, captured him, deprived him of his eyes, and consigned him to prison. The son of this king, called Cosdroe, fleeing the fury of his people, took refuge with the emperor Maurice. He was received most kindly by him, and Maurice treated him with paternal affection.

Furthermore, when some time had passed, Maurice gave him his only daughter, named Maria, as wife. Then, supported by Roman forces, he entered powerfully to recover the kingdom from which he had been expelled. When the Persians had been conquered, he received the kingdom owed to him by right, and he reigned for thirty-eight years.

At his wife's prompting, he also received baptism. He was exceedingly friendly to the Romans for as long as the emperor Maurice lived.

But after Cosdroe, king of the Persians, learned that his father-in-law Maurice had been killed treacherously by Phocas, he abominated the perfidy of the Romans. They had allowed so impious a man, still bloody with the slaughter of his lord, to reign over them, as though they were secretly guilty of association and accomplices in that crime.

He therefore entered the borders of the Roman Empire violently, raging against their possessions and desiring, at his wife's urging, to avenge the murder of his father-in-law. After many nations subject to the Romans had been subdued, he finally defeated them in war, entered Syria, and captured it and Jerusalem, as will appear above.

Lothair and Theodoric, kings of Francia, collided with one another in battle, in which more than thirty thousand are reported to have been killed. In the end, Theodoric obtained the glory.

As Vincent relates at the place cited above from the History of the Franks, this Theodoric, king of Burgundy, was handsome, vigorous, and exceedingly cunning. At the counsel of his grandmother Brunichild, he gathered a very great army from Burgundy and came against his cousin Lothair.

When Lothair heard this, he moved the army of the Franks and hastened against him. Coming together in the district of Sens upon a river, they joined in burning battles against one another. So great was the slaughter there from both armies that the very channel, filled with the corpses of men, was altogether unable to carry the water because of the multitude of blood poured out.

There, therefore, in that very combat, an angel of the Lord was seen above the people with a drawn sword.

But King Lothair, seeing his army wounded, slipped away in flight. He entered the fortress of Miclicon beside the River Seine and came from there to Paris. Theodoric, however, after devastating that region, returned with much spoil.

Brunichild repeatedly furnished worse counsels to her grandson Theodoric, saying, “Why are you negligent, and why do you not reclaim your father's treasures and his kingdom from the hand of Theodebert, since you know most certainly that he is not your brother? For he is the son of the harlot who was your father's concubine, and he was born in adultery.”

When Theodoric heard these things, being a king harsh in character, he moved a very large army against Theodebert, his full brother, and they came together at the fortress of Culpiacum. When they engaged one another, Theodebert, seeing his army wounded, turned in flight and entered the city of Cologne.

Theodoric then burned and devastated the whole Ripuarians' land. The people of that region submitted themselves to his dominion, saying, “Peace for us, most pious king. For we are now subject to you. Do not oppress us further.”

But he said, “Either bring Theodebert to me alive, or cut off his head and bring it to me, if you wish me to spare you.”

When they heard this, they entered the city itself and, falsely substituting one thing for another, said to Theodebert, “Thus your brother commands: ‘Return the treasure of your father that you retain with you, and after this he will withdraw with his army.’”

While they spoke this lie, he entered with them into the palace of his treasure. There one of them, with a drawn sword, struck him from behind on the neck and cut off his head. They carried it over the wall of the city of Cologne.

When Theodoric saw this, he seized the city itself with many treasures. After he had received oaths from the nobles of the Franks in the basilica of Saint Gereon the martyr, it seemed to him that he had been struck treacherously in the side. He said, “Guard the doors. I do not know which one of these perjured Ripuarians struck me.” When they had turned back his garments, they found nothing except a small purple mark.

King Theodoric then returned with much spoil, together with the daughter of his brother Theodebert and also his two little sons. When he came to the city of Metz, where Queen Brunichild then was, he killed the boys.

When King Theodoric saw that the daughter of Theodebert, his niece, was beautiful, he wished to join her to himself in marriage. Brunichild said to him, “How will you be able to take your brother's daughter?”

He said, “Did you not tell me that he was not my brother? Why, enemy of God, inventor of evils, and author of death, did you bring this sin upon me, so that I should kill my brother and my kinsmen?”

Drawing a knife, he wished to pierce her through, but she was snatched away by the bystanders and escaped.

After this, the murderess, in her exceeding hatred, sent him a poisoned drink by the hands of servants. Not knowing this deceit of the poison, he drank it, and then, failing, breathed forth his wicked spirit.

When he too was dead, the aforesaid queen wickedly slaughtered his little sons. She even killed his younger son while he was in white garments, dashing his brain against a stone.

When these kings had died, the Burgundians and Austrasians made peace with the Franks and established Lothair, the son of Chilperic, as monarch over themselves in all three kingdoms.

King Lothair, therefore, moved his army and came into Burgundy. He deceitfully pretended that he wished to join Brunichild to himself in marriage. When a pledge had been given, she hastened to come, adorned in royal attire.

When he saw her, he said, “Enemy of God, why did you wish to perpetrate such great evils, so that you did not fear to destroy so noble an offspring of kings by your evil deeds, and did not hesitate to commit so great a crime?”

Then, when the host of Franks and Burgundians had been gathered, the whole people cried out with a great voice that Brunichild was worthy of a most shameful death. At the command of King Lothair, she was then raised upon a camel and led through the whole army. Afterward, she was tied to the feet of untamed horses and died when her limbs had been torn apart. Finally, she was burned with fire and lacked a tomb.

The king, however, returned after peace had been made throughout the surrounding country.

As Sigebert says, while this Brunichild governed the kingdom with her son Childebert, she was intolerable to the Franks because of the insolence of her character, so that it was rightly believed that the Sibyl had prophesied concerning her: “A frost will come from the regions of Spain, before whose face nations, or the kings of nations, will perish. But she herself will perish, torn apart by the hooves of horses.”

Although she was so insolent, she honored the churches of God. She also founded many monasteries of saints and constructed benefices of wondrous workmanship, so that it was a marvel that so many things could have been done by her.

But Desiderius, bishop of Vienne, was also overwhelmed with stones and martyred by King Theodoric on Brunichild's counsel. And Saint Columbanus the abbot was expelled from Francia by the aforesaid King Theodoric at the prompting of Brunichild, his grandmother.

Concerning the Emperor Heraclius

When the emperor Phocas, as Vincent reports after Hugh in book twenty-four, chapter one of the Historical Mirror, raged cruelly against his own people, he too was killed at the command of Heraclius, the patrician of Africa. After his death, Heraclius claimed the commonwealth for himself and thus obtained the Roman Empire.

He found the commonwealth greatly dissolved and worn down, for the Avars had devastated Europe and the Persians Asia.

Heraclius assumed the empire in the year of the Lord 613 and in the four thousand five hundred sixty-sixth year from the beginning of the world, as Sigebert says; according to another computation, it was in the five thousand eight hundred tenth year from the beginning of the world.

According to John of the Column, this Heraclius reigned for thirty years. He was handsome in body, vigorous in arms, and learned in speech. Although he was devoted to military affairs and exceedingly fierce in mind, he nevertheless was Catholic in faith for a certain time, benevolent and devoted toward the servants of God. But at last he fell into heresy, as will be said below.

In the first year of his empire, the power and name of Saint John the Baptist were declared by miracles at the city of Maurienna in Gaul, which was wondrously distinguished by his relics, in this manner.

In that city, a certain woman exceedingly devoted to Saint John the Baptist begged the Lord that something from the relics of John the Baptist might be given to her. She persevered for three years in this urgency of prayer. Although any other person might have despaired in so long an expectation of this kind, she placed her hope in God and swore that she would not eat until she received what she sought.

Thus, after fasting for seven days, on the seventh day she saw a thumb of wondrous whiteness appear above the altar of the church where she was, and joyfully received the gift of God.

Three bishops came to venerate it. When they wished to draw a portion from this holy pledge, they marveled when three drops of blood dripped from it upon a linen cloth placed beneath. They rejoiced that each had merited one drop.

In the fifth year of Heraclius, Palestine was captured by the Persians, and in it up to twenty thousand men were killed in the holy city. Zacharias the patriarch was taken captive. The holy Cross was carried away by Cosdroe, king of the Persians, as Sigebert says.

As Hugh also says, Cosdroe captured Damascus, devastated Jerusalem, burned the venerable places that were in it, and took captive multitudes of the people together with their patriarch Zacharias. He carried with him into Persia the precious wood of Christ's Cross that Saint Helena, the mother of Constantine, had left there. By divine power, however, he was never permitted to enter or violate the Lord's sepulcher.

Heraclius sent to him, asking with great entreaties that he depart from that place until he determined the tributes. Cosdroe refused to do this and sent the envoys back to Heraclius without effect.

Therefore, in the sixth year of Heraclius, Cosdroe occupied all Egypt, Alexandria, Libya, and Carthage. When Heraclius heard this, he took his son Constantine and, having crowned him with the royal diadem, named him Augustus.

After gathering an army of men-at-arms, in April of the tenth year of his empire, on the second day of Easter, he undertook war against Cosdroe. He carried with him the icon of the holy Mother of God that is at Byzantium, which was painted not by the hand of man but, as is reported, by a divine miracle.

When he departed, he left his son Constantine in the city with the venerable patriarch Sergius and Bonosus the patrician, an astute and vigorous man. Taking the road through Syria, he came as far as the city of Gazote.

When Cosdroe learned this, he took to flight and burned with fire before him all the crops through which he fled. Heraclius, however, devastated the cities and regions through which he passed.

Cosdroe then appointed two generals, Sarabaga and Sarbaras, to contend with Heraclius. When Heraclius heard this, he sent wings of soldiers against them, while he himself crossed the Euphrates with the rest of the army, crossed Mount Taurus, came to the River Saron, and obtained the bridge together with the fortifications that were upon it.

Sarbarus also came to the same bridge and made camp before him. Many Romans then ran out across the bridge in disorder and brought battle upon the Persians. When Sarbarus saw this, after placing ambushes at a distance from himself, he showed himself to the Romans as though fleeing. In this way he drew many of them after him in pursuit, contrary to the emperor's wish.

Suddenly turning back from flight, he launched an attack against those pursuing him and immediately struck down many of them, who suffered the punishment of their disobedience.

Then a multitude of barbarians spread out along the bank of the river and sharply shot arrows at the Romans standing upon the bridge with the emperor. But the emperor resisted manfully with a few men, and in that battle he received many wounds, though none was dangerous.

Then a certain gigantic Persian man attacked the emperor in the middle of the bridge. The emperor pierced him with a lance and cast him into the waters of the river. When he fell, the terrified barbarians turned in flight.

After them, Cosdroe sent another general against him, named Say, whom Heraclius overcame through the intercession of Saint Mary. A violent hailstorm descended upon Say's army and destroyed many of them, while the battle line of the Christians remained undisturbed by that tempest.

After this, Cosdroe gathered soldiers and sent his general Razaces against Heraclius. Although Razaces fought fiercely against him, Heraclius overcame him with the aid of the Mother of God, killing him and the greater part of his army.

Around the same time, Adoloaldus, the son of Agilulf, was the fifteenth king of the Lombards in Italy. His mother Teutolinda reigned with him for ten years.

Section III

This Cosdroe dared to break forth into such great insolence that he commanded the inhabitants of the neighboring nations whom he had subjected to his impious empire to worship him as God and to call him king of kings and lord of lords.

He also made for himself a silver tower, in which he constructed a golden throne amid shining gems. There he had placed a four-horse chariot of the sun and an image of the moon and stars. Through subtle and hidden channels, he sprinkled water, so that he might seem to pour down rain from above like a god.

After he had subjugated Syria and Palestine, overthrown the churches of Christ, and carried away that portion of the wood of the Savior's Cross that Saint Helena had left there, the son of Cosdroe marched against Heraclius and took his position with his army beside the Danube.

At last, by the breathing of God's clemency, it pleased each prince that the two of them should fight singly upon a bridge in the middle of the river, and that the one to whom the lot brought victory should rule without injury to either army.

Why say more? The Lord, moved by the prayers of the Christians, granted his faithful Heraclius triumph over the enemy. So great a change of mind took possession of Cosdroe's army that they willingly submitted themselves to Heraclius with every household and offspring, both in authority and in faith.

The most Christian prince, traversing in every direction with only his own army the kingdoms that Cosdroe had invaded, came to Cosdroe's seat and found him sitting upon the golden throne.

When Cosdroe greeted Heraclius with trembling, Heraclius answered: “Because you have treated the wood of the holy Cross with honor, although you are unworthy, if you are willing to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and confess yourself to be his servant, I will nevertheless give you the kingdom of the Persians together with your patrimony and your life, after receiving hostages of peace from you. But if you are unwilling, you will immediately perish by my sword.”

When Cosdroe would in no way consent, Heraclius drew his sword and cut off his head.

He then received the wood of the holy Cross. All the peoples rejoiced: some went to meet it with hymns, candles, and songs, while others followed behind.

When the emperor descended from the Mount of Olives, he wished to enter upon a royal horse and with imperial ornaments through the gate by which the Lord had entered when he came to his Passion. Suddenly the stones of the gate descended, closed themselves against one another, and became one wall.

While they wondered in astonishment and were constrained by exceeding sorrow, they looked upward and saw the sign of the Cross shining in heaven with a fiery splendor. An angel of the Lord, holding that sign in his hands, stood above the gate and said: “When the King of heaven came to fulfill the mysteries of the Passion, he entered through this approach. He did not display himself clothed in purple or shining with a diadem, nor did he seek the conveyance of a powerful horse. Instead, humbly sitting upon the back of an ass, he left his worshipers an example of humility.”

When he had said these things, the angel immediately returned to heaven.

Then the emperor, rejoicing in the angelic visitation, arranged the insignia of empire [read: laid aside the insignia of empire]. Barefoot and immediately girded with a linen belt, he took the Lord's Cross in his hand and, his face bathed in tears and his eyes raised toward heaven, hastened to the gate.

When he too approached humbly, the hardness of the stones felt the heavenly command. The gate immediately raised itself and opened a free entrance to those entering.

A most sweet fragrance, borne by a divinely flying breeze, had also glided from the province of the Persians across long spaces of lands to Jerusalem at that same moment when the holy Cross, carried by Heraclius, had gone forth from the temple of Cosdroe. It then returned and poured itself pleasantly into their hearts.

Therefore, while the people of God praised his power, the glorious Augustus also broke forth in praises, saying, “O Cross, more splendid than the stars,” and so forth. When he had said these things, he restored that precious wood to its place.

At that time, in the month of August, there was a great earthquake. A calamity followed among the people, namely a scourge of scabs, so that no one could recognize his own dead.

Section IV

In the twenty-first year of the emperor Heraclius, war arose between the Romans and the Saracens for this reason.

When a certain eunuch of the emperor Heraclius was distributing military cloaks to the soldiers in the customary manner, Saracens serving as soldiers for the emperor's stipends came among the others to receive cloaks. When the eunuch saw those Saracens making importunate demands, he indignantly said, “It is scarcely possible for the emperor to give cloaks to his soldiers; how much less to these dogs?”

When they heard this, they were moved by shame and grief. Withdrawing from the court, they returned to their own people, where they stirred the whole nation of the Saracens against the Roman Empire.

They gathered their entire multitude and began to depopulate the regions of the Romans. They defeated in battle and put to flight the commanders of Heraclius who went to meet them.

But after so many and such great victories and immense triumphs, which he had obtained while divine grace favored him, the emperor Heraclius was seduced by Cyrus, bishop of Alexandria, and deviated from the Catholic faith, according to Vincent in the Historical Mirror, John of the Column, and Martin in the Chronicle.

He fell into the heresy of the Monothelites, who persistently assert that there is only one nature in Christ.

Furthermore, because he was most sufficiently instructed in letters, he became an astrologer and began to devote himself to divinations and the signs of the stars. Learning from the signs of the stars that the Roman Empire was to be devastated by a circumcised people, and judging that these people would without doubt be the Jews, he commanded everywhere throughout the empire that Jews who were unwilling to be converted should be killed.

Moreover, through messengers he asked Dagobert, king of the Franks, to order all the Jews in his kingdom to become Christians and to condemn those unwilling to death. Dagobert obeyed him. Therefore, at that time many of the Jews were converted to the faith, and many who were unwilling to be converted were killed.

But Heraclius was deceived in his astrology, according to John of the Column and Martin in the Chronicle, because the prediction extended not to the Jews but to the Arabs and Saracens, who receive circumcision at the command of that abominable prophet Machomet, as the outcome of the matter immediately proved.

For, as the histories of the ancients teach, and as the traditions of the eastern peoples also contain, Homar, son of Cathapa, the third successor in error and kingdom after the aforesaid seducer Machomet, entered Syria with infinite forces of Arabs. He first seized by force the distinguished city of the Philistines, Gaza, after besieging it.

Afterward, he entered the territory of Damascus with his legions and the infinite multitude that he drew with him. Breaking in by force, he captured the very populous city of Damascus.

When these things were reported to the emperor Heraclius, who was then in Sicily—namely, that the Arabs, raised into such great pride and presuming upon their multitude, were invading the borders of the Romans and did not fear to claim the provinces for themselves—he saw that he did not have sufficient forces to meet so great a multitude. He preferred to return safely rather than to commit himself, with unequal forces, to the doubtful chances of wars.

Thus, when the one who was bound to furnish protection to his afflicted subjects departed, the violence of the Arabs grew strong. Suddenly and within a short time they occupied all the provinces from Laodicea of Syria as far as Egypt.

It certainly furthered their purpose that, a few years before, Cosdroe, king of the Persians, of whom above, had entered that same Syria by force, plundered its cities, and burned its suburbs.

The Arabs therefore entered the land and, finding it empty of inhabitants, found for themselves a greater opportunity for taking it. Thus they seized Jerusalem, beloved of God, which was enveloped in similar calamities. They spared the few people who were there, after making them tributary to themselves so that they might serve under the most extreme conditions, while permitting them to have their own pontiff and freely to observe the Christian religion.

While the above-named prince Homar remained in that city, he began diligently to inquire of the citizens, and especially of a man named Sempronius who had succeeded Modestus, where the place was in which the Lord's temple had stood, which had been destroyed with the city by Titus, a Roman prince.

They showed it to him by certain signs of the ancient work that still remained. There, after craftsmen who could suffice for the work had been engaged and resources assigned for the expense, he began to rebuild the temple. When it had been successfully completed within a short time in the form in which it is known to be at Jerusalem today, he endowed it with many possessions.

Thus the city beloved of God and the holy of holies, subjected through the demands of men's sins to the dominion of unbelieving enemies, suffered the yoke of an undue servitude with continuous labors and under changing conditions for 490 years, until it was freed by the western peoples. But afterward it was again captured by unbelievers and is now possessed by them.

While Heraclius was still reigning, a certain Mauritius, a chartulary, had many adherents. At his suggestion, Isatius the patrician had taken away the treasures of the Church, sending one part to the emperor and retaining another part for himself.

This Mauritius conspired against Isatius, wishing to obtain for himself the kingdom of Italy. When Isatius heard this, he sent Donus, the master of the soldiers, to Rome with a large army. At his first arrival, all who followed Mauritius abandoned him and adhered to Donus, the master of the soldiers.

Mauritius, therefore, being afraid, fled to the Church of Blessed Mary at the Manger. He was violently dragged from it, bound with chains, and sent to Ravenna, to Isatius, who was there. But before he reached Ravenna, at the twelfth milestone from it, Mauritius, who had advised that the treasures of the Church be taken away, was beheaded at the command of Isatius.

But Isatius also, who had executed this deed, was struck by divine judgment not much later and perished, so that all who take away the property of the Church may learn from this example that they fare badly.

When Adoloaldus, king of the Lombards, had been cast out of the kingdom, Aroaldus, their sixteenth king, received their kingdom and reigned for twelve years.

Syroes was made king of the Persians. He was the firstborn son of Cosdroe. Because his father Cosdroe had crowned another, younger son of his as king, Syroes, being indignant, adhered to the emperor Heraclius to fight against his father.

Rocharius was the seventeenth king of the Lombards for sixteen years. He adhered to the Arian doctrine. Hence this King Rocharius wished there to be two bishops in his cities, one Arian and one Catholic.

He caused the codices of his laws to be written, which he called an edict. From that time, the Lombards, who had been without a written law, began to be reduced into writings. Hence the Lombard law is sometimes cited.

After him, Rodoaldus, the son of Rocharius, reigned over the Lombards for five years. He was seventeenth in the order of their kings. After him, Aripertus, the eighteenth, reigned for nine years.

Section V

In the thirtieth year of his reign, Heraclius was called from this world.

He was buried at Constantinople. He left two sons: Constantine, already grown, whom he had begotten from his first wife, and Herodana, the second, whom he had received from his second wife, named Martina.

Therefore Constantine, the elder by birth, the son of Heraclius, succeeded him in the empire. But in the fourth month after he had begun to reign, he was extinguished through the deceit of his stepmother Martina and of Pyrrhus the patriarch, poison having been given to him.

When he had died, Martina invaded the empire with her son Herodana. But Constans, the son of Constantine, assumed the empire with the favor of the nobles. He captured Martina, his stepmother, who had caused his father to be poisoned, and her son Herodana. He cut out Martina's tongue, cut off Herodana's nose, and sent them both into exile.

Constans therefore began to reign in the year of the Lord 644, and he reigned for twenty-six years. At the suggestion of Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, he fell into the heresy with which his grandfather Heraclius had been infected.

Furthermore, at the suggestion of this same heresiarch Paul, he either consigned to prison, relegated to exile, or even killed with blows extending to death all Catholics, and especially the Lord's priests, who did not consent to him in that perfidy.

Seeing this, Pope Martin, who then governed the Roman Church, without any fear gathered a council of 150 bishops at Rome and, with the consent of all, condemned as heretics Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, Cyrus, bishop of Alexandria, and Pyrrhus, as was said above.

At last the heretical emperor Constans sent Pope Martin into exile at Chersona, where the blessed man also ended his life.

While Constans, who was also called Constantine, the grandson of Heraclius, was reigning, Vindocus, the son of the king of the Britons, shone in the tenth year of his reign.

When his father had died, the paternal kingdom was owed to Vindocus by hereditary right. He refused to receive it. But when he was urged by the people to receive it, he sought and obtained a delay of seven days for deliberation.

Within that time, inflamed by the divine Spirit, he took a staff, left everything behind, and secretly fled under a pilgrim's habit. He joined certain pilgrims who asserted that they were going to Rome. After following them for some days, he arrived in the district called Pontinus.

At that place he was received as a guest by Duke Haymo. Seeing that the young Vindocus was elegant and adorned with good character, the duke entrusted to him for instruction the only son he had.

Remaining there and always advancing from good to better, Vindocus was ordained a priest. After he had laudably discharged the priestly office for seven years in the chapel of the aforesaid duke, he was pricked by heavenly love and humbly asked Haymo to grant him permission to live more privately.

With Haymo's consent, he came to the place that was called Chi. After a small cell had been built, he remained there for some time and began to shine with miracles. At last, after long service to God, he rested in peace.

In the eleventh year of Constans, fire fell from heaven and a great fear rushed upon men. A most grievous pestilence raged for three summer months.

A good angel and an evil angel were seen by many to go around the city. As often as, at the command of the good angel, the evil angel struck the door of any house with the hunting spear that he appeared to carry in his hand, so many persons from that house died on the following day.

At the same time, when the body of Blessed Vedast was being translated at Arras by Ubertus, bishop of that city, Lambert of Tongres, Abdemarus of Taurinum, and other bishops and abbots were present.

Abdemarus, who was blind from old age, was illuminated through the prayers of the holy bishops and the merits of Saint Vedast. Bearing it unwillingly that he had been freed from the blindness that he rejoiced had been sent by God for his salvation, he lost his sight again at his own prayers.

Section VI

In the eighteenth year of Constans, Clodoneus, king of the Franks, died. His son Lothair succeeded him in the kingdom and reigned in Francia for four years. Ebroinus was his mayor of the palace.

From that time, as the kings of the Franks degenerated from their customary courage and knowledge, the power of the kingdom was administered by the mayors of the palace, while the kings reigned in name alone.

It was their custom to be princes according to lineage and to remain at home, where they devoted themselves to bodily pleasures. But on the Kalends of May they went forth outside to greet the people. On that day they were accustomed to receive and return services and gifts, and thus they believed themselves to remain secure until the next May.

The mother of the aforesaid Lothair, king of the Franks, was Queen Bathildis. Having been seized as plunder from regions across the sea, she was redeemed by the venerable man Herchanoaldus, who then governed the palace as mayor.

This woman was beautiful in appearance, cheerful in countenance, grave in her gait, chaste, sober, prudent, humble, and gracious. She so pleased the aforesaid prince who had redeemed her, and everyone of his household, that after his wife had died he wished to take her as wife.

When she was called to the prince's chamber, she hid herself in a corner of the house. Because she was not found, the prince therefore took another wife.

Afterward, by God's will, she became the wife of King Clodoveus, the son of Dagobert, and deservedly so, for she herself was also of royal blood.

This venerable queen first extirpated the pest of simony from Francia and caused the impious exactions to cease. They had burdened the people so greatly that many preferred to die rather than to live.

This religious woman constructed many monasteries in Francia. Furthermore, she performed many good works in the churches and ministered necessities to the poor through the hands of Genesius the abbot, a most holy man whom this most prudent woman had taken to herself for this work. He was afterward made bishop of Lyon.

When her husband had died, she herself merited to fulfill her desired purpose. As soon as he had been buried, she transferred herself to the monastery of Hala, which she had constructed in the district of Paris, and there assumed the habit of holy religion. Dwelling there, she ministered humbly in the office of the kitchen like the other sisters. There, full of good works, she rested in peace.

Meanwhile, the emperor Constans, who was also called Constantine, heard that Italy was possessed by the Lombards. Wishing to join it again to his empire, he gathered great forces, departed from the royal city, and came to Athens. Crossing the sea from there, he invaded the territories of Benevento.

Grimoald, the duke who ruled in that city, met him and drove the defeated emperor's army into flight in battle. Therefore, when the Augustus saw that he could accomplish nothing against the Lombards, he turned aside to Rome.

Pope Vitalian, who had succeeded Eugenius, as was said above, met him at the sixth milestone from the city and led him to the thresholds of Blessed Peter.

After he had remained in the city for twelve days, he was drawn by great greed. He carried to the Tiber various kinds of ornaments of bronze and marble with which the Roman city was adorned, so that he might cause them to be transferred to Constantinople. Among these, he uncovered the basilica of Blessed Mary, which was formerly called the Pantheon and was covered with bronze and gilded tiles.

Departing from Rome, he went into Sicily, where he was killed by his own men in the bath. Behold the fruit of the spoliation and plundering of churches.

When he had died, the soldiers took a certain Maxentius from among the commanders and created him emperor for themselves. After he had been saluted as emperor by all the armies that were in Sicily, they swore allegiance to him, and he received the imperial insignia.

Section VII

When Constans, who was also called Constantine, had thus been killed, his son, the twenty-third emperor in the East, who was also called Constantine, received the empire at Constantinople.

He began to reign in the year of the Lord 670 and reigned for seventeen years. He sailed to Sicily, and when he came there he engaged in battle with Maxentius, defeated him, and killed him. When Maxentius had died, he killed all who had conspired in the death of his father. When this had been done, he immediately returned to Constantinople to strengthen the empire.

When he departed from Sicily, the Saracens again sailed to that island. After surrounding the city of Syracuse with a long siege, they captured it. All its inhabitants were either killed by the sword or taken captive. Carrying away whatever riches were in the city, they brought them with them to their ships.

For all those precious things that Constans had taken away from the city of Rome were still there. The Saracens carried them all to Alexandria.

After the emperor Constantine had arranged everything at Constantinople according to his will, he used wise counsel and first made peace with the nation of the Arabs, who had already occupied all Syria. Then he established peace and concord with the nation of the Bulgars.

When he had pacified everything throughout the empire, being a man Catholic in faith and modest, he recalled all who had been expelled by his father Constans or his great-grandfather Heraclius on account of the Catholic faith, and restored them to their former state. Thereafter he restored all the churches that had been destroyed in past times.

When Agatho, of whom above, had been created pope, this same emperor Constantine immediately sent imperial letters to the pope, asking him to send his messengers to Constantinople.

When this had been done, the emperor himself, beloved of God, summoned the Catholic bishops from all the East to Constantinople for a council, striving to overthrow the heretical opinions of the Monothelites. This was the holy Sixth Universal Synod of 289 bishops, of which it is said in Distinction 15, at the chapter The Sixth Synod.

This synod declared and showed from the sacred letters that there are two natures in Christ, namely the divine and the human, condemning those heretics who asserted that there is only one nature, will, and operation in Christ.

Because Pope Agatho, weighed down by old age, could not go there, he sent legates from his side approving the council: John of Porto, John of Regitana, and Habundanus of Panena, bishops; Theodore and George, priests; John, a deacon; and Constantine, a subdeacon. With them he sent religious servants of God, monks learned in every study and branch of knowledge.

When they came by ship to the royal city, they were received with the greatest honor by the religious prince.

Therefore, at the prince's command, they assembled in the Church of Blessed Peter. The Augustus was present and sat with the legates of the Apostolic See, together with George, bishop of Constantinople, and Macarius, bishop of Antioch, who dogmatized that there was only one operation in Christ, and with the other bishops who had come to the council, together with the priests of Constantinople.

First the emperor exhorted them to avoid philosophical assertions without tumult and clamor and to declare the truth of the faith by following the pure writings of the holy fathers.

After many disputes on both sides, they came to the codices of the holy fathers. So that the light of truth might appear, the codices of the holy and venerable doctors were brought forward, namely those of John Chrysostom, Cyril, Athanasius, Basil, Gregory, Dionysius, Hilary, Ambrose, Augustine, and Pope Leo. These assert that there are two natures, wills, and operations in Christ.

Afterward, the synodical letter of Pope Agatho was recited, in which the sayings of these fathers had been inserted. In that synodical letter, 120 bishops of the western regions had also subscribed themselves.

Macarius, patriarch of Antioch, was therefore asked whether he embraced the faith taught by the Apostolic Roman See according to the writings of Pope Agatho and the holy and venerable fathers. He answered that he wished to respond in writing with what seemed right to him.

Then on that day George, patriarch of Constantinople, professed that he believed and preached that there are two natures, wills, and operations in Christ, just as the Apostolic Roman See holds and preaches.

Thereafter, the council anathematized those who said that there was one nature, will, and operation in Christ. Macarius was admonished, together with his adherents, to express what he believed. He answered that he persisted in that faith, or rather perfidy, which he had proposed, and that he was in no way willing to assent to the orthodox faith.

When this had been heard, at the prince's command and by the authority of the holy council, the heretic Macarius was deposed from his throne and cast out of the synod as a heretic and excommunicate, together with the few who adhered to him.

When he had been expelled, the blackest web of spiders immediately fell in the middle of the council, in the midst of the people, so that all wondered and said that the filth of heresy had been expelled.

Thus, with God's aid, the two churches of the Greeks and Latins were united in the assertion of the true faith under this most pious prince. At the prince's command, Macarius and those who supported him with assistance were cast down to Rome.

When the council had therefore been dissolved, almighty God gave such grace to the legates of the Apostolic See in the sight of the Greek peoples that, in the royal city, John the cardinal bishop of Porto sang Mass in Latin in the Church of Hagia Sophia on the holy day of Easter, before the prince, the patriarchs, and the whole people; and with one accord they acclaimed the praises of the most pious prince in Latin words.

Under this Pope Agatho, the moon suffered an eclipse on June 18. This eclipse was followed in the city of Rome by a most grievous mortality, greater than any that is remembered at Rome, so that fathers were carried out together with their sons and sisters.

It first raged within the city itself. Afterward, spreading through the suburbs and fortresses, it took away a great people. Under it, the pious pastor himself also died.

In the time of this Constantine, Gundiberrus was the twentieth king of the Lombards. He reigned for one year and three months. Contending with his brother Bertarius, who held Milan, he called Grimaldus, duke of the Beneventans, with his army. Gundiberrus was killed by him a little afterward, and Bertarius fled into Pannonia.

Grimaldus then occupied the kingdom of the Lombards as the twenty-first king and reigned for eight years. He died at Benevento because of poison. After him his son Garibeldus, the twenty-second king, reigned for three months. Afterward Pertaritus, the twenty-third, reigned alone for ten years.

While the aforesaid Constantine was reigning, Pallinicus, an architect, fled from Heliopolis of Syria to the Romans. This Pallinicus, as is reported, invented marine fire. Using it, the Roman armies that were then waging war with the Saracens burned the ships of the Saracens. Thus, after many had been killed, captured, and submerged, they obtained victory.

Nevertheless, the prudent prince established peace with them for thirty years on this condition: the Saracens were to pay the emperor three thousand pounds of gold annually; furthermore, they were to return fifty noble captives and give fifty noble horses as tribute in each year.

The necessity for arranging peace with them after so great a victory was this. At that time, the nation of the Bulgars, having departed from Scythia under the leadership of Bachaias, was depopulating the regions of Thrace.

The army of Constantine unexpectedly met them and was shamefully defeated and put to flight. After this victory their incursion grew so powerful that the emperor was compelled, after establishing peace with them, to pay the annual terms.

From that time the kingdom of the Bulgars began, of whom Bachaias was the first. As Vincent writes at the place cited above, twenty years are assigned to him. After him reigned Tervellis, to whom twenty-six years are assigned; Cardamus, twenty-nine; and Crivinus, thirteen years. In him the narrative of this kingdom ends.

At first they were unbelievers, but in the course of time they were converted to the faith.

The aforesaid Constantine died. Justinian, the twenty-third emperor in the East, succeeded him.

Section VIII

When Constantine, the orthodox Augustus, had therefore died, his son Justinian II assumed the empire in the year of the Lord 686. This was the four thousand six hundred forty-ninth year of the world, but according to another computation, the five thousand eight hundred fifth year.

He reigned for ten years. He was seventeen years of age when he began to reign.

Bold with youthful lack of restraint, he broke, to the detriment and damage of the commonwealth, the peace that his father Constantine had made with Abimele, prince of the Arabs. Furthermore, disturbing the peace with the Bulgars, he dissolved all the things that his father, who was indeed a vigorous man, had ordained for peace.

Therefore, he disturbed his empire not a little. For barbarous nations began on every side to infest the Roman provinces. The emperor met them all with forces gathered together, manfully enough, and fiercely avenged the injuries inflicted.

First, therefore, he subdued through many battles the nation of the Slavs, which was nearer to him and had rebelled against his empire.

But when he was returning from there with victory, the Bulgars set an ambush for him on the road. Suddenly attacking his army from every side in a place suited to this purpose, they enclosed it. They attacked them everywhere from above with bows and missiles; and because the emperor's army was unable to approach them, many were killed.

The emperor, however, used the counsel of the princes who had followed him on that expedition. Surrounded by a wedge of his bravest men, because no other opportunity of escape was given, he made a sortie, cast himself into the midst of the enemies, and opened a road with the sword for himself and his men. Although he was struck with a grievous wound and lost many of his men, he nevertheless escaped.

Returning to Constantinople, he appointed as his treasurer a certain Stephen, a Persian by race and a man exceedingly wicked and cruel. Justinian conducted almost everything by his counsel. Using his depraved counsel and inflamed with the madness of cruelty, he intolerably afflicted those subject to him.

In the ninth year of his empire, this Justinian, corrupted by the counsel of evil men, attempted to infringe the holy Sixth Synod, which he had earlier promised the pope by his letters to preserve inviolate.

For this reason, he commanded that a council be gathered at the royal city. In it, the supporters of the heretics again asserted and published their errors. In it, the legates of the Apostolic See whom Pope Sergius had sent there were also deceived and subscribed to their decree.

Therefore, the three patriarchs who had come there, namely those of Constantinople, Antioch, and Alexandria, wrote a faith of perfidy in the aforesaid council. After it had been confirmed by the imperial hand, they sent it to Pope Sergius so that he, as the head of all the faithful and their pastor, might confirm it by his authority.

But when that most vigilant pontiff saw that the Catholic faith had been violated in the writing, he in no way consented. Nor did he permit the writing to be unfolded among the clergy in any manner. Instead, he rejected and cast it aside as invalid, choosing to die rather than to assent to such errors.

When the emperor learned this, he was inflamed with great fury. To dishonor the supreme pontiff, he sent Sergius the magistrian to Rome, commanding him to bring John, bishop of Porto, and Boniface, counselors of the Apostolic See, to Constantinople.

Not much later, he sent Zacharias the spatharius with commands to the city of Rome, so that he might carry Sergius, the supreme pontiff beloved of God, to the royal city.

When this minister of crime came to Rome, the army, clergy, and Roman people were suddenly moved against him, choosing to die before their pontiff should be carried to the royal city.

So great a disturbance and sedition arose in the city on that day that Zacharias the protospatharius, terrified and afraid that he would be killed by the crowd, fled trembling into the chamber of the blessed pontiff and implored with tears that the pontiff have mercy upon him.

The pious pontiff comforted him, saying, “Do not fear, son, because you will suffer no evil through this.” Going outside, therefore, by a gentle response he soothed the spirit of those who were crying out and seeking the death of Zacharias.

But the aforesaid Justinian, who had stirred all these things, did not escape unpunished. For Leo, or Leontius, a powerful and great patrician, conspired against the emperor Justinian with many adherents. Gallichinus by name, patriarch of Constantinople, also favored his conspiracy.

At that time, when Pertaritus had reigned among the Lombards for eight years, he made his son Iunipertus a partner in the kingdom, and he reigned with him for ten years. Iunipertus was the twenty-fourth king.

Before Justinian himself was handed over to exile, he recovered Africa, which the Egyptians had occupied, and established peace with them.

Limpertus, the son of Iunipertus, was the twenty-fifth king of the Lombards. He was a boy, and his father had given Asprandus to him as guardian. He reigned for eight months.

Laimpertus, the son of Guidopertus, overcame Asprandus and invaded the kingdom of the Lombards. He died in the same year and was the twenty-sixth.

Raipertus, the son of Raipertus, was the twenty-seventh king of the Lombards and reigned for eleven years.

Therefore, when an opportunity had been seized while the emperor was absent because of certain circumstances that had arisen, Leo, or Leontius, raised a sedition in the city. Armed and running with his men through the city so that he might reconcile the spirits of all to himself, he opened the prisons and brought out all the nobles as well as the others. He joined them all to himself, and especially the nobles whom Justinian had consigned there for diverse causes.

When this had been done and a great army had now been assembled for him, he attacked and captured the emperor Justinian. After Justinian's nose had been cut off, Leontius exiled him rather shamefully at Gersona and took the imperial dignity for himself.

Section IX

Leontius, therefore, or Leo, was made emperor by the consent of all, though by usurpation. As the twenty-fifth emperor in the East, he governed the empire at Constantinople vigorously enough.

When all now obeyed his empire, the Arabs, whose dominion God permitted to be spread far and wide throughout the East, also began to infest Africa. When the emperor Leontius learned this, he immediately sent John the patrician against them with great forces.

When John arrived at Carthage, at his first coming he engaged them in battle and turned them to flight. After they had been expelled, he wintered there.

But the Arabs returned to their own country, gathered a greater army, and again sought Africa. Landing their army on the land and relying upon their multitude, they devastated everything round about.

Because of the multitude of the enemies and the fewness of his own men, John the patrician did not dare to meet them. Leaving the army in Africa, he returned to the emperor at Constantinople and asked that his forces be increased.

Meanwhile, while the emperor was treating with John the patrician concerning the enlargement of the African army, the army that had remained in Africa suddenly created a certain Hausimarus emperor. He was named Tiberius by them.

As soon as he had been saluted by them as emperor, before news of his creation reached Constantinople, he placed the army in ships and sailed to Constantinople. Suddenly entering the city, he captured Leontius in the palace while Leontius contemplated no such thing. After cutting off his nose, he relegated him to exile.

When this had been done, Tiberius held the empire by the will of all for seven years, whereas the aforesaid Leontius had reigned for only two years.

Meanwhile, Justinian was still detained in exile at Gersona. Sometimes seriously and sometimes jokingly, he would say among the citizens that one day he would still recover the empire.

The inhabitants of that place, wishing to please the emperor Tiberius, frequently reported Justinian's words through messengers. Tiberius listened to them, fearing that, on account of Justinian's father Constantine, who had been exceedingly beloved by the people, the empire might one day be restored to Justinian. Hence he deliberated among his men that Justinian should be killed.

When he had already entrusted this to certain attendants, so that they should hasten to Gersona and slaughter Justinian, the former emperor, one of them, induced by a reward, disclosed everything to Justinian.

After Justinian learned this, fearing greatly for himself, he enticed the guards with many promises, secretly departed from Gersona, and fled to Canganus, prince of the Turks. Canganus received him with very great honor and gave him his sister as wife.

Then Justinian went to Trebellus, king of Bulgaria. After friendship had been established with him, Trebellus promised to aid him with great forces in recovering his paternal kingdom.

Therefore Justinian, supported by great forces and by the aid of the Turks and Bulgars, came to Constantinople with an equipped army from these nations. When he approached the city, several of the princes of the empire abandoned Tiberius and joined Justinian.

Hence, obtaining the city without battle, Justinian captured Tiberius, who was also called Hosmarus. He ordered Tiberius and Leontius, who had cast him from the citadel of empire, to be dragged before the people and slaughtered.

Furthermore, he blinded and relegated to exile the patriarch Gallinichus, who had favored them against Justinian.

Thereafter, he exercised so great a vengeance against his adversaries that, whenever he wiped away a drop of rheum flowing from the nose that Leontius had cut off, he ordered one of those who had conspired against him, from among those whom the prison held enclosed and who had survived slaughter, to be killed.

Justinian resumed the empire in the year of the Lord 706 and reigned a second time for seven years.

While John was presiding upon the pontifical chair, the aforesaid Justinian, after the tyrants had been cast out and killed and he had recovered his paternal empire, was immediately pricked by the divine Spirit. He sent two honorable messengers to Pope John and through them a sacred letter, by which he solemnly adjured and exhorted the aforesaid pontiff to gather a council of Catholic bishops and establish whatever seemed right to him concerning the orthodox faith.

He also exhorted him diligently to seek out the written tomes that, led by depraved counsel, he had sent to him at Rome together with his faith; to correct and amend them according to his will; and by apostolic authority to annul the things badly written against the orthodox faith.

But John, timid through human frailty, in no way amended them and sent them back to the prince.

When the pontiff John had died not much afterward, Constantine was created pope. When Justinian heard this, he sent an imperial letter, humbly asking him to deign to come personally to the royal city.

The pontiff assented to the entreaties of the Augustus and hastened by ship to Constantinople with a fitting retinue of clergy. When he came within the seventh milestone of Constantinople, Tiberius, son of the aforesaid emperor Justinian, met him with the patricians and all the nobles of the city, and they conducted him into the city with great reverence.

The Roman pontiff entered with those insignia with which he was accustomed to proceed at Rome.

Justinian, who was then in the city of Nicaea, was filled with immense joy when he heard of his arrival. When the pope came to him, Justinian, hearing this, met him at Nicomedia.

When they saw one another, the Augustus, distinguished by the imperial ornaments, prostrated himself on the ground before the pontiff and kissed his feet. When they fell into a mutual embrace, great joy arose among the people.

On the following Sunday, the supreme Roman pontiff solemnly celebrated Mass. The emperor received holy Communion from his hands and humbly asked him to entreat the Lord for his sins.

Then, at the pontiff's request, the emperor renewed all the privileges granted to the Church by former princes. When all these things had been completed, the pope returned to Rome and was received with great joy.

Although all things succeeded according to his desire after the emperor Justinian had recovered the empire and he administered the empire peacefully after subduing the rebels, he nevertheless remembered the injuries that he had received from the citizens of Gersona when he was there in exile. Bearing indignantly that he had been treated so inhumanly by them, he sent a numerous army and commanded that city, together with its citizens and the adjacent region, to be destroyed.

The executor of this monstrous edict was a certain patrician named Mauritius. Coming to the place with the army, he killed almost all the citizens by the sword and relegated some to exile.

He sent Tridinus, the prince of that city, together with forty other nobles bound in iron, to the emperor. He caused seven others of the leading men of Gersona, who perhaps had offended the emperor more greatly, to be fastened upon wooden spits and roasted by fire.

When the emperor's army returned from Gersona, it suffered shipwreck at sea. Almost all perished, and few escaped from seventy-three thousand men.

When Justinian heard of the misfortune of his men, he still did not consider satisfaction to have been made for his injuries if the name of that city remained upon the earth. He sent another army, commanding that all who remained in that city be killed, down to the innocent age, and that the city itself be set on fire and destroyed.

When the citizens who were there learned these things beforehand, they appointed as their leader a certain Philippicus, a very noble man and very well known to the imperial court, who was living there in exile.

Going out to meet the approaching army, Philippicus brought it about by entreaty, money, and promises that all should salute him as emperor with one voice.

Philippicus, therefore, having been made emperor by the army, immediately returned with that army to the royal city and received it without battle. After he entered the city, he commanded Justinian and his son Tiberius to be slaughtered. When they had been killed, he received the imperial ornaments under compulsion from the army. This was in the year of the Lord 713, and he reigned for two years.

This same emperor Justinian, because Felix, whom Pope Constantine had made archbishop of Ravenna, had not sent the customary pledge to the pope according to the custom of his predecessors, but sought judgment through power, sent Theodore the patrician with a fleet against the people of Ravenna, who had been raised into pride.

They seized Felix, the arrogant archbishop, bound him in a ship, blinded him, and sent him into exile. They also bound all the rebels in fetters, took away their riches, and sent them to Constantinople. Justinian condemned them to a capital sentence because of their rebellion.

Title XIII, Chapter V

In those times, while Heraclius was reigning, that Machomet, the firstborn of Satan, began to spread that law of the Saracens—or rather a swinish perfidy more than Epicurean—around the year of the Lord 640.

His pestilential doctrine and disseminated disease occupied many provinces, so that by exhortations, by preaching, and furthermore by sword and violence he compelled peoples, even unwilling ones, into his error.

Nor is it a wonder if that law, full of perfidy, was received by so many peoples, since it teaches things that are full of pleasures, to which men who commonly follow sensuality are inclined and devoted. They devote little or no attention to the sciences or at least to moral philosophy, and they cannot be taught to perceive clearly from reason the errors of their law.

For that accursed Machomet, full of a diabolical spirit, commanded in that very law of his that, if anyone preached or said anything against it, he should be killed without a hearing. Thus they remain in perfidy without anyone preaching against it.

As John of the Column says after Vincent in book twenty-four of the Historical Mirror, this Machomet was a most wicked magician, full of every deceit, and of the race of Ishmael.

From earliest youth, while he was a merchant, he frequently went with his camels into Egypt and Palestine. In those places, by associating with Jews and Christians, he learned a great part of the Old and New Testaments from them.

While he traveled here and there through diverse mercantile dealings, he set out for the province of Corozania. There he entered into familiarity with a certain very wealthy woman, and at last, through his incantations and magical deceptions, he took that woman as wife. She believed him to be the Messiah whom the Jews await.

Deceived by this opinion, many of the Jews and Saracens adhered to him. He began to fabricate new laws for them, taking some things from the Old Testament and some from the New. By his lies, he asserted that he was a prophet sent by God for the salvation of man, in order to temper the law that had been given to the Jews and the one given to the Christians, because it was excessively rigid.

In order that certain prodigies might seem to attest his commands in the likeness of Moses, he summoned the people who believed him so that he might give them a law sent amid prodigies and signs.

When all had assembled and he addressed the people, a white dove that was nearby, fraudulently trained for this purpose, flew to his shoulder and stood there. According to its usual custom, it took from his ear the grains placed there. Or else this appeared through the work of the devil, so that he might seem to have the Holy Spirit suggesting the law to him.

What is worse, he had ordained that if anyone contradicted or reproved him in these evil deeds and lies, either personally or through another, he should be killed treacherously.

He also did not blush to commit such a disgrace in his writing as to assert that God had given to his loins the power to equal in intercourse fifty men most powerful in the strength of lust.

He placed many other obscene and shameful things in his book. Hence that most wretched writing never pleased any prudent or moderately learned man, but only the most ignorant and wild men.

When this Machomet, given to wine and his belly, contracted the falling sickness, he fell dashed to the ground. His wife, observing this, was exceedingly sorrowful that she had married such a man. Wishing to placate her, he devised deceits and asserted that the angel Gabriel was then speaking to him and that he fell to the ground because he could not endure the angel's splendor.

Others, however, say, as Jacobus de Voragine reports in the legends, that there was a certain monk named Sergius who instructed Machomet concerning that law fabricated by him.

For this monk Sergius, after he had fallen into the error of Nestorius, was expelled by the monks from his monastery because of his error, and he came into Arabia.

Or, according to others, it is said that there was a certain archdeacon dwelling in the regions of Antioch who was a Jacobite. The Jacobites preach circumcision and affirm that Christ was only a man and not God, but that he was just and holy, conceived of the Holy Spirit, and born of a virgin.

The Saracens believe all these things. But they deny that Christ suffered and died, saying that, when the Jews wished to seize him, they seized another man similar to him in his place and fastened that man to the cross, while Christ ascended to heaven.

This Machomet, bereft of both parents, passed the years of his boyhood under his uncle's care. For a long time, together with the whole nation of the Arabs, he served the worship of idols, just as he testifies in his Alcoran that God said to him: “You were an orphan, and I received you. You remained long in the error of idolatry, and afterward I led you out. You were poor, and I enriched you.”

Because the entire nation of the Arabs worshiped Venus as a god together with Machomet, it is from this that the Saracens hold Friday in great veneration, just as the Jews hold the Sabbath and Christians the Lord's Day.

Machomet, therefore, enriched by the wealth of the aforesaid widow whom he took as wife, and having many adherents, sought to usurp the kingdom of the Arabs for himself. Seeing that he could not obtain this by violence, especially because he was despised by his fellow tribesmen, who were more noble than he, he fashioned himself a great prophet of God, so that he might at least attract by simulated holiness those whom he was unable to subject by power.

He therefore adhered to the counsels of the aforesaid Sergius, a very cunning man. Keeping Sergius hidden, he reported to the people what he drew from him and testified that he had received it from the angel Gabriel.

Thus, pretending himself a prophet of God, he obtained the principality of that region. By persuasion or by fear of the sword, he compelled everyone of that country to venerate him and observe his law.

Because that Sergius, his counselor, was a monk, he ordained that the Saracens should use what was, as it were, a monastic habit, namely a cowl without a hood. In the likeness of monks, he commanded in his law that many genuflections be made daily by everyone, establishing that his followers should pray turned toward the south.

He instituted many laws for them that the Saracens still observe, such as their frequent washing in the likeness of the Jews. Especially when they must pray, they wash not only their hands, arms, and mouth, but, what is shameful to say, even their private parts, as though God wished from man only cleanliness of body and not of heart.

When praying, they confess one God who has no equal or like. Hence they also deny the most holy Trinity and assert that Machomet is the distinguished prophet of God.

From this same law of theirs, they have a fast for one entire month. In this fast, throughout the whole day until night, they abstain from food and the use of their wives. But at night, that is, after sunset until the twilight of the following day, it is always lawful for them to use food, drink, and their wives. The sick are excused from that fast.

Once in each year, they are bound to go to the house of God that is at Mecca, where the body of Machomet is said to be, to worship it there, to go around in seamless garments, and to throw stones between their thighs for the purpose of stoning the devil.

They say that Adam built this house and that Abraham and Ishmael held it as a place of prayer.

Although these Saracens should properly be called Hagarenes, because they descended from Hagar, Abraham's handmaid and the mother of Ishmael, they nevertheless name themselves Saracens from Sarah, Abraham's wife.

They observe circumcision, although Machomet, as is said, was not circumcised, nor is this commanded or mentioned to them in his Alcoran. Rather, they do this on the example of Abraham and Ishmael, from whom they descend, deriving it from the Old Testament.

They cast stones naked, though with their loins covered, at the house of Machomet in Mecca. They do this in honor of Venus, deriving this rite from the Indians who, devoted to idolatry, venerated and worshiped Venus. They went naked around the temple of Venus, throwing stones.

They may eat all meats except pork, carrion, and blood. The eating of pork is prohibited for a fabulous reason.

It is lawful for them to have four legitimate wives and to repudiate and receive them again up to a third time, provided that they do not exceed the number four.

They may have as many purchased women and captives as they wish, and may sell them according to their insane law, unless they have made one of them pregnant. It is lawful to take them even from their own kindred, so that the bond of friendship among them may be held more strongly.

Concerning possessions or things to be reclaimed, they observe that the plaintiff proves his case by witnesses and the defendant proves himself innocent by an oath.

One caught with an adulteress is stoned together with her. One who has fornicated with another woman is beaten with eighty strokes.

Machomet says that it was granted to him by the Lord, through the revelation of the angel Gabriel, that he might approach the wives of other men, so that men of virtue and prophets might be begotten from him.

Once, when a husband had repudiated a certain beautiful woman, Machomet received her as a wife, though he had many others. When he feared that a murmuring of the people would be stirred by this, he fashioned a charter brought from heaven to him, in which it was contained that, when a man had repudiated a wife, she belonged to whoever received her. The Saracens observe this today.

A thief is punished with blows for the first and second offense. For the third, his hand is cut off; for the fourth, his foot is cut off.

They are commanded always to abstain from wine.

Vincent reports everything that follows concerning Machomet in book twenty-four, chapter forty and the following chapters of the Historical Mirror. He excerpted these things from a book containing a certain disputation conducted between two philosophers, one Christian and the other Saracen, concerning the law of Machomet.

Concerning the Paradise That Machomet Describes in His Law

“At God's command, the dead will be raised. He will judge them in justice, render good things to the good and evil things to the evil, and make into his people those who obeyed him, confessed his singularity, testified that Machomet is his prophet and messenger, and believed all the things that descended upon him from God by receiving the true law concerning paradise.

“In paradise many good things are prepared for them. They will have bracelets of gold and electrum, and their garments will be of silk. They will say, ‘Thanks be to God, because he has not taken our recompense away from us.’

“No oppression or molestation will touch them. They will have certain nourishment and fruits. They will be in a paradise of delights, exulting and encountering one another with honor. White vessels of silver will pass among them, from each of which they will drink and be delighted.

“There will be neither mourning nor sorrow there. They will have women with lovely eyes. They will have upper rooms and rooms above them, beneath which there will be rivers. God's promise to them will never fail.

“It will be said to them: ‘O worshipers of God, do not fear today, for sadness will not draw near to you. Enter paradise, you and your wives, and be secure.’

“Baskets and golden dishes will be carried among you, and you will have what souls desire and eyes covet, in a secure dwelling among gardens and fountains. There, first, the first death [read: after the first death]; another will not follow. He has made them secure from the torments of hell.

“The glorious and exalted God also said: ‘In the paradise that I have promised to those who fear me, there are rivers of waters in which there is nothing harmful. There are rivers of milk whose taste never fails, rivers of wine that delight those drinking, and rivers of the purest honey. In it they have all fruits and forgiveness from the Lord.’

“The glorious and exalted one also said: ‘It will be well in the last things for those who fear God. The gates of the garden of Eden will be opened to him. There, reclining together, they will command wine and an abundance of fruits to be brought to them, and they will have wives with most beautiful eyes. Their food will never fail. This is promised to them on the day of judgment.’

“Again, the glorious and exalted God said in the description of paradise: ‘In it are two flowing fountains. In it are trees of fruits, palms, and pomegranates.’”

“They learn in lofty green places [read: recline in lofty green places] upon apple trees and plum trees. Those who fear God will be led into paradise, assembled in troops and companies. When the gatekeepers open the doors for them, they will say: ‘Peace be to you. Enter sweetly, and be here forever.’

“And the glorious and exalted one said: ‘I caused them to encounter joys and delights, and I gave them paradise as a recompense because they had patience. In it they will recline upon cushions, and neither sun nor cold will strike them, and its shadows will remain over them. Silver vessels will also circulate among them, and likewise baskets, and they will be served with small vessels of silver and with boxes. He will cause them to carry a vessel [read: drink from a vessel] as though of a mixture of ginger. In it is a fountain that is called Clarity. They will hear neither guile nor falsehood there. This is the recompense of your Lord.

“‘For God will deliver them from the torment of the lower regions, saying to them: Eat and drink securely, reclining upon arranged couches. We have given them most beautiful wives, and nothing of their evil will be imputed to them; rather, each one will obtain what he desires. We have given them diverse fruits and whatever flesh they desire to eat.’

“This is the description of the paradise that God has prepared for those who believe in him and in his messenger. And like gold they gleamed, fragrant as new wine [read: fragrant as musk]; and there were various kinds of perfumes.”

Concerning Hell in the Law of Machomet, Accursed by God

“The unbelievers,” he says, as Vincent reports in the place cited above, “who make partners with God and attribute equals to him, who do not believe in the prophet of God, namely Machomet, who do not receive his epistle, and who have become rebels against the commandments of God in opposition to his prophet, will be assigned to the burning of Gehenna. They will be in torment and ineffable gnashing, and in an unquenchable fire without end. As often as their skin is consumed by the burning, so often it is renewed for new punishments.

“Their dwelling is the pit of the abyss. Their drink is more bitter than every gall. Their food is from the tree that is called Azachimi, and it is worse in taste than every most evil thing. They will be under the wrath of God with the devil and his angels.”

The glorious and exalted God also said: “Those who do not believe in the wonders of God, and the prophets, and those who preach the truth, will be in horrible torment. Their evil works, with no one helping them, will overflow upon their heads. They will die, and yet they will not be delivered from torment.”

And he said: “The tree Azachimi has been given for the delight of the impious. For it is the tree that grows in the depth of the abyss. Its fruit is like the heads of demons, and those eating from it will fill their belly. Finally, they will be subjected to all evils and will always be rolled back to the punishments of hell. Above and below are the gloom of fire and darkness.”

And he said: “On the day of resurrection, the faces of those who do not believe in God will be horrible and very black. For is not Gehenna the dwelling of the impious and of those who do not believe in our signs and are to be condemned?”

And he said: “Those who do not believe will be thrust together into hell. When they have come to it and the ministers have opened the gates, they will say to them: ‘Were not messengers from among you sent by God to you, who, announcing the commandments of God to you, made known to you the coming of this day? Enter, therefore, the gates of Gehenna to dwell there without end. These dwellings have been prepared for the proud.’

“Those who are submerged in the fire will say to the ministers: ‘We beseech you: pray to God for us, that he may lessen for us the torment of this day.’ The ministers will answer: ‘Pray for yourselves.’ But what is their prayer except error?

“From this time they will feel the weight of chains and bonds. They will be singing psalms in the fire [read: leaping in the fire] and again wearied in the fire. Then he will see them oppressed by affliction and looking furtively with swollen eyes.”

Again the blessed and exalted one said: “The impious will remain in the torment of Gehenna, where, once thrust down, they will no longer breathe. We have done nothing unjust to them, but they have shown themselves impious toward themselves.”

Then the impious will cry out: “How long are we to be condemned, O king?” Machomet said: “Thus you will remain without end.”

And again he said: “The tree Azachimi is the food of sinners. It boils in the belly like sulphur. Take him, and lead him to the horrible places of hell, and pour pains and torments upon his head. For these are the works that you used to do.”

And the glorious and exalted one said: “Bring bitter water that may burst their bonds [read: burst their bowels]. Woe to the unbelievers on the day when they will not even be permitted to speak so that they might have some excuse.”

Concerning the Death of Machomet

That which is ridiculous to us is lamentable to his people. As Vincent reports in the place cited above, Machomet had commanded them not to bury him when he was dead, because on the third day he was going to ascend into heaven. They observed the command and awaited this with great desire. Already wearied by a long wait from Monday, on which he died, until the evening of Wednesday, when they saw nothing else grow upon him except the magnitude of his stench, they finally cast him far from their dwellings.

Gumembra, the son of Hebazam, nevertheless says that he was washed, clothed in three garments, and buried by the hands of Hay, the son of Abitalib, and Alphadi, the son of Halahabet.

For it is reported that he was ill with a pleuritic disease for seven days and lost his senses. On the seventh day, however, he recovered. Hay, the son of Abitalib, was angry because he had lost his senses, and said this to him. But Machomet ordered that no one remain with him any longer in the house except Halahabet.

On the next day he died, his belly swelled, and his smallest finger was bent backward. His death was on Monday, the twelfth day of the month Rabeg, in the sixty-third year of his life, on the fourteenth day after he began to be ill.

His life, therefore, extended to sixty-three years, of which he spent twenty-three in prophecy: ten in Mecca and thirteen in the city.

When Machomet had died, all who had been deceived by him immediately returned, each one to the sect that he had previously held, whether idolatry or any other, except for a few of his kindred who expected that they would be his successors in the kingdom.

At that time there was a cunning man, Ebubeber, the son of Amichaath, who not long afterward obtained the kingdom. This greatly displeased Hay, the son of Abitalib, until the king so mollified him with deference and flatteries that he even designated the kingdom to him after himself.

By every art he also recalled those who had dared to withdraw from the sect of Machomet, and again subjected them to the same folly: some by fear, some by hope of honors and riches, and others for the sake of some other gain. All, however, returned feignedly and not from the heart.

On a certain day, when some persons complained before their lord about someone who appeared to be a Saracen but was not, that lord answered before everyone:

“I know that not only this man, but many others more noble than he, are Saracens in my palace as they outwardly show, and are not Saracens. But concerning this, what else ought I or can I do except what my lord Machomet used to do? For it happened even to him that almost all who appeared to be closest and most familiar to him held his law only feignedly and deceitfully. For he was so thoroughly despised by them, and they regarded whatever he said as nothing, hating him in their hearts.

“On a certain day, wishing to kill him, they awaited him in a certain valley so that, when he passed through, they might suddenly frighten his mule and he might die by falling headlong. Yet because of this he never showed himself angry.

“Therefore, after his example, I shall compel nothing else from all those in my kingdom who say that they are Saracens, whether they are from the Christians, the Jews, or the pagans, and are not Saracens. For I know that no Christian who became a Saracen through fear will remain in Saracenism. I think similarly concerning the others. What more, therefore, can I do? Let God see and judge. I shall do this alone: I shall always curse them.”

Against the Defenders of Machomet

Vincent, in the place cited above, says: If perhaps someone says that Machomet ought not to have been reproved if he sometimes avenged himself, since this is found in Joshua, Elijah, Elisha, and others, know that one thing is what is done at God's command and another what a man presumes to do.

For God commanded this to them, and concerning his command—whatever it may be, whenever it may be, and wherever it may be—it is not lawful for a man to judge.

“Therefore,” someone will say, “Machomet ought not to be reproved in these things either, provided that God commanded such things to him.”

But whence do you prove that God commanded such things to him? For that god, if he was God, ought in some matter to have shown himself to be God. But if he gave those things that we showed above neither by signs nor by miracles, we therefore believe that he was not God. For if he were God, would he ever give a law without miracles?

For what we believe concerning God in both the Old and the New Testament has been commended to us by signs and miracles. Nor will we ever hold another as God except that one and true God who, whenever he wished to give a law, confirmed it by divine signs and miracles.

As for the prophet Machomet, as he is called by the Saracens, I do not know who he was or whence he came, since it is said to us by the Lord Jesus Christ that the end of all the prophets is in John the Baptist.

By no means, moreover, are the sacrosanct and spiritual commandments of the Lord Jesus Christ to be abandoned. Through them he promises us, not that most filthy paradise which Machomet described, but the eternal life of the angels in the heavens.

Nor are we to approach the most unclean and bestial rites, urged not by God—far be it—but by the spirit of fornication and gluttony upon the most wretched and most unhappy slaves of carnal wantonness. Concerning persons like them the apostle Paul says: “Their god is the belly, and their glory is in their confusion.” They savor nothing except earthly and perishable things suited to the belly and lust, nor can they savor anything else.

For the spirit of uncleanness has blinded them. They will inherit eternal rottenness and immortal worms because, after the manner of swine, they always roll about in the dung and stench of lust.

For I cannot cease to wonder how anyone could have been persuaded—not, I say, any wise man, but even someone who thought that in a dream he possessed something of a human heart—that this man was a prophet, since both his life and his doctrine were contrary not only to divine religion but also to human honor, so that even brute animals themselves could almost understand this.

But, to say something milder again, who among the holy and divine messengers whom we know to have been sent by God ever asserted that he had been sent amid the terror of the sword? Who lived so criminally? Or who so prostituted the human race to the belly and lust?

Nevertheless, let us return again to examining his precepts carefully, which I do not know to what law they seem to belong. For we have received two laws from God, one of grace and the other of justice. The law of grace was given by Christ; the law of justice by Moses.

The law of grace commands such things as these: “Love your enemies; do good to those who hate you,” and so forth. The law of justice, however, says: “An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth,” and things of this kind, which seem to belong to the penalty of retaliation.

It is evident that the law of Machomet is neither of these two. For before he emerged, one was given by Christ and the other by Moses. Since, therefore, these two laws alone were given to men, one of which appears more human and the other divine, what else will this third law invented by Machomet be except diabolical?

For we recognize that, especially by the devil's inspiration, it suddenly emerged from I know not where. It is proved to be neither divine nor human, but, with a monstrous face between the two, it wishes now to appear this, now that, and feigns itself to be now the one and now the other. It imitates none other than the devil, who appeared to make himself a mediator between God and men.

But perhaps someone will say that the law of Machomet is thereby proved to be divine: because, since Machomet was an unlearned man without letters, he could in no way have written it or announced it to men except by divine power, especially since he himself says there that neither men nor demons could make it.

And again: “If we had made this law descend upon a mountain, the mountain itself would incline itself and adore it for fear of God”; and many other frivolous things possessing no reason, which the Saracens say are open and manifest signs of prophecy, so that it may be proved true.

O the signs and miracles in these things, says Machomet! O signs to be compared with the Red Sea, with the sun standing still at Joshua's command, and with Christ's command when he ruled over the dead! Indeed, there is truly a great dearth of both truth and power, which left there as its sole arguments—or rather ravings—things empty of all reason and power.

For thus was composed the book of the Alcoran, which is the law of the Saracens given by Machomet.

A certain monk Sergius, when he had sinned gravely in the monastery and had been excommunicated and expelled because of this, came to the region of Cuhene and, descending from there as far as Mecca, found two peoples there: one idolatrous, the other Jewish.

There he found Machomet, who worshiped idols. Wishing to do something whereby he might please those monks who had expelled him and deserve to be reconciled, for those monks were Nestorians who say that Mary gave birth not to God but only to a man, he strove with every effort and exertion to persuade Machomet, who already held dominion there, to withdraw from idols and become a Nestorian Christian.

When he had accomplished this, Machomet became a disciple in his doctrine. Thus it happened that, having been taught some things from the Old Testament and some from the New by that Nestorian monk, Machomet himself wove them into his Alcoran fabulously and mendaciously.

That monk also persuaded him to place in the Alcoran a saying from the Lord that Christian monks and priests ought to be more familiar to him because they are not proud.

But when the Jews learned that many people, and even Machomet himself, were following that monk toward some sort of shadow of Christianity, and that what was afterward accomplished by Machomet had already almost been brought to completion by that Nestorian, three Jews came forward. Fearing lest Machomet ever fall into true Christianity, they approached him and, with malicious cunning, said that they were his companions or disciples in this sect.

Persuading him to write all the things that are more shameful and wicked in the Alcoran, they always remained with him to the end of his life.

After Machomet's death, however, when each one, as was said, had returned to his own sect, Ebuber succeeded him in the kingdom. Although Hay was more noble than he, nevertheless by persuasions and promises Ebuber brought it about that Hay should be under him.

At the instigation of the Jews, this Hay mixed many fabulous things into the Alcoran. Hence that writing of the Alcoran, variously begun not only by the Jews but also by many others, understood in diverse ways, and expounded in manifold ways, was at last almost entirely torn apart.

Thus, some adding, some diminishing, some changing, and others corrupting, that book was made unworthy of all faith.

But afterward also, in the course of time, many contentions and quarrels, seditions and divisions, arose in that kingdom because of the diversity in the writing of this law of Machomet. Therefore, in order to remove the divisions, certain persons were commissioned to collect all the copies that were held and make one concordant volume from them wherever contradictions were found in the other books.

Again, after much time, when Elehegehi, the son of Vizes, had begun to reign in those regions, he ordered all the books, charters, and volumes of that law to be gathered. After one codex had been composed from them according to his own pleasure, and after he had added many things, removed many things, and also changed many things, he ordered all the rest, wherever they might be found, to be burned.

He made six copies of his own book. Of these he sent one to Egypt, another to Syria, another to the city, another to Mecca, a fifth to Mesopotamia, and a sixth to Albazara.

Even if no other cause for the variation of this writing were seen to have existed than that those from whom it was received—namely Hay, Ebuber, Orimen, and Gomar—were always discordant and enemies, this would suffice, since it is certain that each of them, according to his own intention and his own will, added, diminished, or varied whatever he pleased in that book for the advantage of his own cause.

Indeed, upright Saracens have often said that the whole writing of the Alcoran is so mixed and confused that everything in it appears to be without continuity, without composition, without any order of words, and finally without any meaning or reason.

Against the Doctrine of the Alcoran

It is a wonder that there should be anything there that can please a man, namely, one who uses reason. For if eloquence is considered, no one has written anything so shamefully in Arabic. For, in comparison with learned Arabic writers, what is the whole Alcoran but a barbarism unworthy of laughter?

But if its opinions are weighed, I see nothing good there, if indeed it is possible for anything good to be there. For there is no doubt that many evil things are found there, which any fool could fashion similarly, or certainly much more elegantly.

Suppose, nevertheless, that some things appear to be good there, such as, for example, that one should fast, pray, and give some alms. Were such things first invented by Machomet, things that no one had heard before him?

O how much more holily, how much more honorably, how much more reasonably did Moses and Elijah and many other prophets, and also John the Baptist, act! But even the Lord of all, Jesus Christ himself, fasted and prayed and bestowed alms. They also taught us to fast, pray, and give alms through innumerable ages before the monstrous prophecy of Machomet.

Let Machomet cease, let him cease, to wish to appear the first master of those things of which he was not worthy to be even the last disciple in any respect.

Far from us, far from us, be such a preacher of fasting, who commanded that after a monstrous fast such service be given to every lust and gluttony that he seems to have instituted the fast for no other purpose than that afterward the shamefulness of all lusts might be stirred up more pleasurably and more eagerly.

Now as for what he himself proclaimed in his writing, as was said above—that this writing is of such a kind that it could be made neither by men nor by demons—he certainly chose well those to whom he would say this: the most uncultivated and rustic men, who had also newly come from diverse sects and were ignorant even of the Arabic language itself.

But if we are permitted to expound this, we concede it to him entirely in this way: that it is truly so foolish, so dishonorable, so irrational a doctrine or writing that it could be made neither by demons nor by men. For I think that even demons would blush to write this.

Nevertheless, if Machomet wishes to glory so greatly in his Alcoran, many others also, who at the same time made their own Alcoran in accumulation of him [read: in emulation of him] so that they too might procure a name for themselves, wrote things much more honorable and at least plausible in some respect.

But because they did not entirely loosen the reins for the belly and lust, they were not able to draw such great asinine herds of bestial men after themselves.

Therefore, if anyone wonders why this writing pleased certain persons so greatly, hold it as certain that it never pleased any noble or wise man, but only the most wretched and most unlearned kind of common men. Gathered by him from woodland places, when they had heard these first writings, they were astounded by the novelty of the thing and believed sacrilegious fables to be the oracles of God.

Finally, when they had been worn out by poverty and the continual labor of rural works, they heard of the blessedness of food, drink, precious garments, shady pleasantness, splendid vessels, infinite intercourse with most beautiful wives, and the other most filthy delights of paradise. Hoping that by Machomet's promise they themselves would there now, even now, be blessed, those bestial men rushed to all things whatsoever he willed.

Hence it is that, when he went forth against the king of Persia, he was so aided by them that he conquered. For he had promised the delights of his paradise to all who chose to die for him in battle.

Some, however, are said to have fought more in order to obtain the excellent gardens that they had seen in Persia. For he had promised that after the victory he would give those gardens to them, so that both in this age and in the future they might always be in gardens. For the Arabs are said to be greatly delighted by the beauty of gardens.

And if it is said that not only rustics but many others afterward followed him: truly many others did, but they were the worst men and gluttons, men who, burdened by debt or about to die for their crimes, had found this as the sole way of escape.

For tell me, I beg you: what wise or noble or honorable man have you ever seen come to him?

As for those who pass from the Jews or Christians to the Saracens, far be it that they do this because they have been summoned by any honorable motive. Rather, because they are wretched and unchaste and cannot bear the rules of their own law, they turn themselves to the broad and spacious way taught by that most wicked Machomet, which leads to perdition.

This happens especially to Christians, whose spiritual and heavenly law commands that all things in the world be despised in the hope and love of the eternal vision of God. When it restrains the carnal and fluid minds of the unhappy, they immediately flee from it, because they neglect to fight against their concupiscences.

This, however, is known most certainly: neither Jews, pagans, nor Christians, however they may conduct themselves outwardly, if they pass over to the Saracens and assert, to whatever degree, that they belong to that sect and its law, are what they pretend themselves to be. They pretend to be what they are not so that they may escape some bodily adversity, such as captivity and things of that sort, or so that they may enjoy swinish pleasures, of which there is abundance among them.

Indeed, they regard whatever they do of their rites as nothing, to such a degree that, when speaking among themselves, they often curse Machomet and his law. Nor do they affirm that he was ever worthy of prophecy or of the law of God.

Section VII

That way which Machomet lays down is rejected as being the way of God; rather, that way is the devil's.

For that accursed man says that the way of God to which he exhorts his followers is made more unimpeded against the adversaries and unbelievers of his doctrine and those who share in it by the stroke of the sword, plunder, and devastation, until they enter into the faith of God and testify that there is no God except their God and that Machomet is his servant and messenger, or until they, made subject, pay tribute.

But, O imprudent and foolish man, how can these words be continuous and agree? For they greatly disagree and are contrary to your writing, which you say is from God. It says that Machomet was sent by God equally to all men in piety and mercy; yet there is an outpouring of blood, robbery, and plunder.

Certainly, either a statement of this kind is contrary to itself, or he lies that those things which he continually alleges were said to him were spoken by God. For what way is not God's but the devil's, if not murders, thefts, and plunder?

But if Moses is brought against us, because he himself fought against the worshipers of idols, let those prodigies and miracles which are read to have been done by him under the law be brought forward, and it will appear manifestly that it is just to believe that he did those things at God's command.

It is likewise with Joshua, the son of Nun, at whose word the sun and moon stood still. Since these miracles cannot be done except by God's elect, we believe that whatever he did, he did at God's command.

But what sign or miracle is Machomet shown to have done, from which we may believe him, when nothing was proper to him except to kill men, commit robbery, seize the property of others, and take parents captive together with their children? This is always evil, but much more so when it is done against the people of God, who have no other divinity except the worship of God.

Or is it not enough for you unless you call it the way of God? Far be this from God, that such should be the way of God, or that anyone who has commanded such things should belong to the people of God or to his elect, much less to the prophets.

Finally, he invites his followers to strike men with the sword, to seize their possessions, and to ruin everything, until men come violently to his faith, are subjected unwillingly to his laws and compelled, and, being coerced, testify to his testimony.

This is never read in divine Scripture: namely, that some were violently converted to God, or that men were seized by commands, the sword, plunder, and captivity, as that accursed Machomet did and commanded the coerced to obey.

Certainly there were many heretics in former times. Yet none of them tried to drag anyone to his sect by the sword or by any coercion, but by deceits. Whoever wished to lead a man into falsehood could not do this without some true, or at least plausible, preaching.

All are known to have acted in this way, namely, through teaching, except for that accursed Machomet. For he compelled men to his sect not only by the art of cunning or by ingenious eloquence, but by the sword, violence, oppression, and depopulation.

Has it ever been heard from anyone what that man said to men: “Whoever will not confess that I am a prophet of the Lord, I will strike him with the sword of the ages. All who are of my progeny will do likewise; I will plunder his house and afflict his entire household with captivity”?

It is also ridiculous that the Saracens say that before the ages were created God had written upon God's throne: “There is no God except God; Machomet is his messenger,” although this is not found written in the Alcoran.

But it is asked who wrote it. Not a creature, which did not yet exist. If God wrote it, it is asked for whom he wrote it. Not for himself, as though he feared that he would lose his name unless it had been written. If he wrote it for the angels so that they might afterward read it, this is false, since God speaks to the angels not through letters but through the illumination of his presence.

Section VIII

That Machomet Was a False Prophet, Not a True One, Is Proved

If one wife alone impedes a man from the love of God, how could one who had so many wives fittingly fulfill the office of a prophet?

For the office of a prophet is nothing other than to fast, pray, preach, and do good things similar to these. I wonder whether a man devoted to such great crimes could ever have leisure for God.

But if someone objects that many have lived badly and nevertheless taught well, let us also see how this man taught.

A prophet is one who proclaims things unknown, whether concerning the past or the future. We know, however, that in former times, when there were prophets, not everyone who usurped this name at once possessed authority. Rather, after he had been approved by the rulers and chief men of God's people through long and enduring holiness of life and also by signs and miracles, he obtained the glory of this name.

If it is said that Machomet narrated many past things, such as those concerning Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, and Christ, would that he had proclaimed them truthfully just as they stood among us, and had not, by raving through many lies, overthrown almost the whole truth of sacred Scripture.

Therefore, as regards the past, he has already fallen from the order of the prophets, because he corrupted the truth with so many lies. Certainly, if he composed at his pleasure some fables that had never been heard, he is by no means to be believed, both because this can easily be done by anyone and because he himself has already been found a liar in other matters.

As for the future, it is evident that he said nothing, since nothing of that kind is found in his whole writing. Hence, as regards the future also, he is excluded from prophetic grace. Now he will deserve to be counted among the prophets neither by signs, nor by miracles, nor by prophecy, nor by his life.

For that whole thing concerning paradise which he appears to have foretold compels us to nothing else except to say that he lies about future things just as he has been proved to have lied about past things.

Concerning signs and miracles, he himself is witness that they were not given to him by God, for he says that God spoke thus to him: “Unless we knew that they would not believe you, just as they did not believe others, we would give you signs and prodigies.”

Again, perhaps someone will say that, unless he had been a prophet, he would never have come to such power, especially since his companions were few in number when he fought against the king of the Persians, who was very strong and very powerful, and obtained a triumph.

For who would infer that those who overcome their enemies are worshipers of the true God, when it is found in sacred Scripture that a few idolaters routed many Israelites? Those who conquer do not always conquer because of their own merits, but because those against whom they fight are worthy of such a punishment.

For it is no wonder that the idolatrous and most filthy nation of the Persians was conquered by Machomet, not because he was better than they, but because they had deserved this: that they should be punished by a similar devil.

Finally, what he says God spoke to him—“Unless we knew that they would not believe you,” and so forth—what did this have to do with the Arabs, who had not seen a prophet and therefore could never have despised prophetic signs?

But what shamelessness it is to say that they would not believe his signs, when they believed a man of the worst life not only without signs but also without any evidence of any good—a thing than which they could not have done worse.

Since, therefore, we have proved by philosophical arguments, by divine authorities, and also by his own confession that he was a stranger to all prophetic grace, it remains for us to see what sort of fables there are in which, contrary to what he had said above, he asserts that he performed signs.

It is said there that once, when he heard a wolf howling, he told his companions that he understood from its voice that this wolf was greater than all the others and was the prince of wolves. O prophetic sign! Could he not likewise have said that the wolf, in that voice, signified that he was a prophet? For who could have composed from it whether he understood anything?

It is also reported there concerning another wolf that, when it had addressed Veheben, the son of Heu, he immediately became a Saracen. If that composer of fables had put a lion there in place of a wolf, the fable would have been much more elegant. But not without reason did he weave wolves into his fables, since, after the manner of a wolf, he always proceeded rapaciously and bloodily.

He also said that the ox of Zozai spoke to its lord and that he placed his hand upon the breasts of a woman named Humemabeth.

Likewise, he says that he gave an order to a certain tree and it immediately adored him, although the Saracens themselves testify that this is false.

Likewise, he says that when Zameth, the Jewish wife of Zeheninove, had placed poison for him in a roasted sheep, the shoulder of the sheep spoke to him, saying: “Do not eat me, because I have been prepared with poison.” For this reason he did not eat from it, but another of his companions who ate it died.

It is also narrated there that once he put his hand into a cavern, from which waters came forth. He himself, his companions, and his livestock drank from them. This, however, is held to be frivolous among the Saracens.

He himself also testifies that all these things are most false, since in his greater writing he says that signs were not given to him by God, namely, to perform them. And again he says: “I have not been sent except in the power of the sword. Let the one who does not receive my prophecy be killed, or let him pay tribute for his unbelief and be released.”

Whence, therefore, are all the aforesaid signs more openly and manifestly proved false than from his own words, in which he speaks thus in the Alcoran: “Whatever you find written by me, compare it with the Alcoran. If it does not agree with it, know that I am innocent of that writing and that it is not mine.”

Therefore, according to this rule of his, all things that are not found written in the Alcoran are to be rejected. Thus it is evident that he performed no miracles but was a thief and a robber.

After he had been strengthened by the counsel of a certain man and had become rich from the resources of a certain lady whom he took as wife, as was said above, he gathered to himself pestilential men, ambushers of roads, fugitives, and murderers. He sent such accomplices of his to hidden paths in the woods, to the summits of mountains, and to places near springs, to lie in wait for merchants and others making journeys, to despoil and kill them and seize their goods.

He also made as many expeditions as possible against diverse persons for killing and plundering.

It must therefore be considered whether expeditions of this kind ought to pertain to a prophet of God, in which there is nothing except fraud, violence, and the shedding of human blood.

He is, therefore, not a prophet but a son of perdition and a prince of demons; and his sect and law are most evil and full of all falsehood and filthiness.

Title XIII, Chapter VI

Concerning the Many Saints of Both Sexes Who Shone with Virtues and Miracles in the Times of the Aforesaid Emperors; and First Concerning the Holy Virgin Phara and Her Brothers, Saint Pharaon and the Other Two

In the time of the emperor Heraclius, Phara, a virgin of Christ, shone in Francia. Her brother Pharaon imitated her holiness, becoming a cleric from a count and, from a cleric, bishop of the people of Meaux, as Sigebert says.

But Vincent, in book twenty-four, chapter fifteen, of the Historical Mirror, records the following from their deeds.

Haguericus, their father, drew his lineage from the nation of the Burgundians and shone in no small degree among the foremost men and chief nobles in the court of King Theodobert. For he was known in royal counsels and fortified by nobility of wisdom.

He was devoted to hospitality and was a most devout receiver of holy men. By a penetrating inspection of eyes and mind, he recognized Christ in their minds.

He received as wife a woman not unequal to his own lineage, named Leodegunda, by whom he begot three sons—Pharaon, a most holy man, Walbert, and Calnoald—and a daughter of wondrous uprightness, Phara.

Calnoald was delivered by his father to the blessed Columbanus to be instructed, and became his devoted minister. While he dwelt in the vast solitude of the hermitage, a wild beast once obeyed him at the command of his master Columbanus.

This Calnoald, the brother of blessed Pharaon, afterward became a prelate and shone in the city of Lugdunum.

Blessed Walbert, however, together with his brother Calnoald and blessed Agilius, son of Agnoald, the brother of the above-mentioned Harguerich, was committed by Saint Columbanus in the monastery of Luxeuil to be instructed by Eustasius, a man of great learning, together with many others who afterward shone as distinguished prelates of the churches of God.

While Eustasius, the worshiper of God, was staying at the villa Papimisium, having been received most dutifully by the father of the aforesaid siblings, he learned that their sister Phara, consecrated by the blessing of blessed Columbanus, was afflicted by a grave blindness of the eyes. She had contracted it from the sorrow of continual weeping because her father intended that she should serve in the work of marriage and that the vows of holy life which she had lately resolved upon should be frustrated.

The father was rebuked with harsh words [read: Eustasius rebuked the father with harsh words], saying that this was his doing, because the virgin was afflicted by so great a crisis of danger.

To this the father, with a feigned statement, said that he would postpone the union of marriage for his daughter, but only so that she might deserve to be gladdened by bodily health.

Therefore the man of God, believing these words, went to the place in which the sick girl lay and asked whether she wished to live in the habit of a holy woman. Sighing, she said that she desired chastity, the companion of angels, and that she longed for a heavenly spouse rather than lamentably to cling to an earthly one.

In the morning, she saw standing before her a man of reverent countenance and burning eyes, saying: “Be certain, handmaid of God, and firm in my promises. Today a man will come to you who will restore you to health.”

When this vision had ended, blessed Eustasius entered to her a short time later. The virgin Phara narrated the order of the vision and said that she believed him to be the one through whom she had heard that sight was to be restored to her.

Then, after prayer had been made, Eustasius bestowed upon the virgin the promised help.

Seeing this, her father pursued the will of his heart in deeds. He summoned the bridegroom, confirmed the betrothal, and established the time of the wedding.

But she took flight. Entering the church of Blessed Peter with a fearful course and prostrating herself upon the ground, she struck her tender breast with her fists. Watering the earth abundantly with tears, she prayed with these words:

“O Peter, who opens the heavenly kingdoms to the just and closes them to the unjust, I have fled here to your thresholds, wishing to be your little virgin. And you, O Christ, who always bends to the prayers of the humble by remitting stains, preserve my virginity, offered to you for eternal ages.”

When her father learned this, he directed servants there, commanding that she be killed in that place. But the servants, with prudent counsel, stopped for a little while on the journey so that the father's savagery might be mitigated by the very interval of delay.

At length, when he came and raged fiercely, the ministers artfully held out the threat of death.

She said to them: “Such gifts are not owed to a daughter by her father. But it is more joyful for me to seek a beautiful death in this place than to lose the flower of youth. Moreover, let my father know this most certainly: that this resolve will never in this life be submitted to a marriage bond.”

When the servants therefore reported this to their lord, he was wholly unwilling to mitigate the fury of his mind without harm to his daughter. Assigning her to custody, he kept her for those things which he intended to do.

While these things were being done, by God's mercy it happened that blessed Eustasius returned from completing an embassy of King Lothair.

Learning that the father's so dire chastisement raged irrevocably against his daughter, he strove to darken the savagery of his mind with the hard goads of words [read: to temper the savagery of his mind with the hard goads of words] and to prick him into repentance.

He did not withdraw from there until he had adorned the girl with the desired habit of a holy woman through Gondoesenus, bishop of Meaux, and until the same Haugueric us, the girl's father, had constructed upon his own soil a monastery suitable as a dwelling for the handmaids of God.

Moreover, the holy man Walbert, shining with merits of life, succeeded Gondoald as the distinguished bishop of the people of Meaux.

The most distinguished Haugueric us therefore nourished his beloved son Pharaon during the time of his military training so that he might be exercised in the court of King Theodebert and succeed him in holding the dignity of honor that he possessed in the king's palace. We know that this was so accomplished with the favor of the omnipotence of the Deity.

For as long as Theodebert was elevated with royal honor, the holy youth Pharaon, clothed in a military toga, obtained with him a very great place of familiarity among the chief nobles of the palace.

Afterward, Clotharius, having been defeated by Cleodarius and Theodoric, when he had obtained the monarchy of three kingdoms, sublimely ennobled blessed Pharaon among the other chief nobles of his kingdom through familiarity with his friendship.

Relying upon this confidence, Pharaon personally admonished the king to trample the vain favors of this life under heavenly desires, to show himself lovable to all, and to have all his acts and morals well ordered.

He also most prudently ordered royal counsels, both public and private, with the munificence of the love of God. Since he persisted in works of mercy and delivered the guilty from death, he also persuaded King Clotharius to many good things.

He learned that his holy sister Phara was gravely afflicted by a desire to see him. When he came to her, her familiar conversation so moved the mind of blessed Pharaon that he despised the glory of palatine principality and royal friendship, restrained lawful marriages although placed in the flower of youth, joined himself to the ecclesiastical order, and consecrated his wife Blidechild with the sacred veil.

He endowed the church of Saint Stephen of Meaux, which great poverty oppressed, with the richest resources of estates. He afterward magnificently exalted by an addition the place of the virgin Phara.

He supported fellow citizens, strangers, and exiles from his resources, and the fragrant report of him, spread far and wide, resounded.

Therefore the nation of the English, ensnared by love of him, committed their own virgins to him to serve God in two monasteries, namely Cale and Phara.

The same man sent Saint Gillenus the Scot to the province of Arras, which Gillenus acquired for Christ by sound doctrine and drew there by illustrious miracles.

On a certain day, when this same Saint Gillenus took bodily refreshment with Saint Pharaon, the glass vessel from which wine was offered fell by chance while the cupbearer held it and was broken.

When blessed Gillenus saw the minister's face turned pale, he secretly indicated to him that the fragments of the broken cup should be given to him. After he had prayed over them, the glass vessel was made whole again.

Meanwhile, after the falling asleep of Walbert, bishop of Meaux, his brother Saint Pharaon was sought for the same episcopate, and the assent of King Clotharius, whom Pharaon had received from the sacred font, was requested.

With great gladness of heart, the king not only commanded that it be done but also judged that it should be done without any hesitation.

Truly admirable is the divine wisdom which, under the sacred number of the Trinity, proclaimed three siblings adorned with pontifical dignity and adorned their sister Phara with great merits of life.

After Saint Pharaon had been raised to the episcopal chair, the virtues which Christ deigned to work for the declaration of his merit testify how wondrously the works of holiness shone in him.

On Easter Day, when blessed Pharaon sanctified very many by the imposition of hands and, as is customary, a multitude of both sexes pressed closely upon him, a certain boy, deprived of the sight of his eyes, was brought among the others to be confirmed.

When the man full of God anointed his forehead with oil, he visibly merited to receive upon his forehead both the gift of the Holy Spirit and the light of his eyes.

Likewise, when the holy prelate, passing through the city, bestowed the piety of visitation upon those to whom it was fitting, it happened that he passed before the prison of the bound.

When many of them learned that he was present, they began to ask pardon for their crimes and release from their bonds.

The man of God said to them: “Go forth free, because you repent.” Immediately the bonds were loosed.

Nor must it be omitted with how great strength of mind his wife, named Blidechild, who had been committed to the sacred veil, repelled the temptations of the ancient enemy cast against her by his malice concerning the holy pontiff.

For while this holy woman served God in the pursuits of holy life, residing in a villa, the prelate Pharaon, remembering her love and beauty, was led even to this point: that he ordered her to come to him.

When the handmaid of God refused to do this at the first hearing, the prelate did not delay in repeating the command. But she added a second neglect to the first. When he had added a third to these two commands, she, understanding his obstinate mind, devised an ingenious counsel by which she might draw the pontiff away from his purpose and preserve her own chastity.

For, casting aside the adornment of her garments, she cut the hair of her head, clothed herself in a hair-shirt, and presented herself to be viewed by him.

When he gazed intently upon her, he recoiled from the unlawful crime that he had resolved in his mind. He marveled that he had been drawn away from the intended deed by the sagacious counsel of a prudent woman, who cast the scandal of her beauty away from herself lest a minister prepared for God be captured through the eyes of the body and violate a temple sanctified for the Holy Spirit.

On a certain day, this same holy pontiff went out from the city for the sake of praying at the oratory of Saint Remigius. As he rose from prayer, suddenly a lamentable cry was heard, with the roaring of mourners and of those repeatedly saying, “Alas!”

It was reported to him that a ship filled with a great multitude had sunk amid the waves. The bishop mounted the bridge, bent prone upon the cold ground, and cast his humble face down to the cold earth.

He had scarcely prayed for half an hour when he touched the river with the staff that he held in his right hand. Wondrous to relate: behold, he saw the driven ship return to the surface, without any rope creaking or oar cutting the water, and all who had sunk were brought back.

In the tenth year of the emperor Heraclius, Saint Columbanus died. He had many disciples who were holy men, and among the others was Saint Gall, who shone in Germany and was wondrous in the expulsion of demons from the possessed, as was said above.

Saint Eustasius, who gave sight to Phara as was evident in the preceding section, was also among his disciples. Sent to Italy by blessed Columbanus with paternal affection, he ruled the companies of monks subject to him with equal justice in the time of King Clothair.

Saint Attalus also, as Vincent reports in the place cited above, succeeded Saint Columbanus in the government of the monastery of Luxeuil. After Columbanus's death, while Attalus governed that monastery excellently, the devil stirred up against him the hearts of some of his subjects, who said that they could not bear the austerity of so great a fervor and the burdens of arduous discipline.

But he sagaciously strove to apply pious fomentations and soften their swollen hearts, persuading them to remember that the fathers possess kingdoms through contempt for the present life and mortification.

When he saw that he now profited nothing, he permitted the obstinate men to depart. After they had separated from him, while they lacerated the man of God with their disparagements, one of them was suddenly kindled by the fire of fevers. Amid the pains of the burning, he began to cry that, if he could come to blessed Attalus, he wished to anoint the damage of the crime he had committed with the medicine of repentance.

Scarcely was he permitted to say this when he became mute and in this way gave up his last breath.

Those who were present, seeing the injury to the man of God avenged by God, returned to him with repentance. He received them again with wondrous joy and restored them to their places when they acknowledged their faults.

But others, who despised the place of repentance that had been given them by not returning, were carried off by diverse deaths. One of them died when struck by an axe. Another, while crossing the bed of a small river, was drowned by the little wave when his toes became entangled [read: after his knees gave way]. A third was drowned after entrusting himself to a ship at sea.

At a certain time, when the little river Boblius, flowing violently and rapaciously with swollen masses of waters, strove to undermine the monastery's mill and submerge the entire workshop and its burden, the man of God, hearing this, caused the deacon Synoald to be summoned to him.

He said to him: “Take the staff by which I am supported, go to the Boblius, and, with the sign of the Lord's cross set forth, say in a commanding voice that it is to cease digging these banks and is not to fulfill the measure of its presumed audacity, but, proceeding through other places, is to permit these to remain unharmed. Let it know that it must withdraw at the Lord's command.”

When it had obeyed the man of God's command, the river immediately left its bed and gave way toward the sides of the hill. Its waters, proceeding through the steep sides of the hill, held their restrained streams like a living creature until the hollows of the channel lay open, through which they might flow liquidly when that which sustained them ceased.

One of the monks also, while working in the field, cut off the thumb of his left hand with an unexpected stroke of a tool. Placing a clod over it, he buried it as though it were a corpse. Continuing to the monastery, he disclosed the matter to the father.

When the man of God had ordered the portion of the severed thumb, hidden in the earth and buried in a furrow, to be brought to him, he joined it to the injured hand with his own spittle. The reunited thumb adhered by the glue of the flesh as it had before, and he commanded the monk to depart in silent secrecy.

When, in the final moments of the present life, Attalus discharged his last hour, he suppressed the roaring of his heart amid sorrowful sighs. Then, giving thanks and comforting the brothers in the Lord, he rendered his soul to heaven.

Another saint from among the disciples of Saint Columbanus was named Walaricus. Born formerly in the region of Alvernica, he pastured his father's sheep while still a little boy.

When he heard how the sons of nobles were customarily instructed in schools, he was moved by the same desire and made a tablet for himself. With the greatest reverence and most urgent prayer, he obtained from the teacher of the children that he should write the alphabet for him and show him the first elements.

When this had been done, he joyfully returned to the work enjoined upon him. Thus, in a short time, supported by God's help and without his father's knowledge, he commanded the whole Psalter [read: he learned the whole Psalter].

Then he began to frequent the church, and not long afterward followed his maternal uncle to a monastery named Autimium. His father followed him, but could not recall him by threats and terrors or by flatteries, although the abbot and brothers entreated him to return with his father and imposed fasts of two and three days upon him if he did not do so.

When he persisted firmly in his purpose, the abbot said to the brothers: “Let us not cast away what the Lord has sent to us.”

After this he began always to hasten toward higher things and to seek pilgrimage for the love of God. Then he proceeded to a monastery of a certain Macharius, bishop of Auxerre, where he was kindly received by the blessed pontiff. Living there also with the greatest strictness, he began to be praised by many.

When a certain rich and noble man named Bobo came to him and heard the word of God from him, he remained with him and did not return to the world thereafter.

These two proceeded together to Luxeuil, to Saint Columbanus. Under Saint Columbanus's instruction, Walaricus was made gardener. This office was enjoined upon him for the sake of proving his humility.

His vegetables could be harmed neither by worms nor by anything else, while the other vegetables round about were devastated. Walaricus attributed this to the merits of the brothers.

Then Saint Columbanus began to reckon him among the proven monks, while others still judged that he should be placed among those knocking at the door as though a novice.

When the brothers entered eagerly to hear the word of God from Saint Columbanus, and Saint Walaricus entered with the others at the very threshold, Saint Columbanus perceived an odor of great fragrance and sweetness coming to him.

After this, a certain brother named Wandolenus, inflamed with a holy desire, asked Saint Columbanus to grant him permission to preach among the nations and to permit Walaricus to depart with him for the consolation of fostering religion. He did so.

When they came together into Neustria, they requested from King Clothair a remote place in which to reside. When they came to a certain place of the people of Amiens called Gualimacus, it happened that a certain man had been suspended upon the rack because of the guilt he had incurred and had died.

When blessed Walaricus saw him from afar, moved in the bowels of piety, he came with swift course to the post. Although the executioners forbade him to touch the dead corpse, he fearlessly loosed the bond, placed the dead man's body upon the earth with his own hands, and prostrated himself with tears and prayer upon the man's supine limbs, so that he pressed his own face upon the other's face.

Thus, while all who stood by marveled, and while his limbs gradually grew warm as though from a deep sleep, the dead man revived unharmed.

The aforesaid king granted them the secluded place that they had requested. There blessed Walaricus shut himself in a certain little cell separated from the brothers so that, all care of the world set aside, he might persist in divine meditation alone in his customary manner. The other brothers, constructing a cell for themselves from the king's alms, appeared to possess sustenance there.

When a certain matron sent bread and flasks to the man of God through a boy, the boy, led by greed for food and drink, retained a part for himself and presented a part.

When the man of God knew this in the spirit, he said: “For what has been brought, we give thanks to God. But you, son, take care that you do not incautiously consume anything from that bread or flask which you hid for yourself, because there is a serpent in the flask and poison in the bread.”

Seeing that he had been discovered, the boy was astounded. Returning to the things he had hidden, he found them so. Returning from there to the servant of God, he sought pardon with repentance.

When the same servant of God was returning to the monastery from a certain place in wintertime, it happened that, because of the harshness of the cold, he turned aside with his companions into the house of a certain priest to warm himself.

Those men ought to have venerated so great a guest with distinguished honor so that they might be instructed, as was his custom, by the discourse of this holy man. Instead, together with the judge of that place, they spoke filthy, luxurious, and dishonorable words before him boldly and insolently.

As he had always been accustomed to do, he applied the healing medicines of God's word to the putrid wounds of men, saying: “Have you not heard in the Gospel that we shall render an account to God for every idle word on the day of judgment?”

But, despising his command more and more, they boiled over with the most unchaste speeches.

Then he said: “I wished to refresh my little body a little from the rigor of the cold by the fire, but I am prevented by your most criminal words, and now I am compelled to depart from you unheated.”

Going out of the house, he shook the dust from his feet there, and divine vengeance followed upon those unhappy and insolent men. The priest who had neglected to provide rightly for himself or others suddenly lost the light of his eyes, and the virile members of the aforesaid judge of that place suddenly withered.

Then, led by late repentance, they humbly entreated that the servant of God would enter that house again. But he did not consent. The priest remained in his blindness, and the other died with his genital members rotting.

Deservedly did the holy man stand out by such great virtues: he had remained a virgin from his mother's womb. His humility and kindness exceeded the human measure, and he was so full of divine grace and compunction that, as often as he preached to his disciples or looked toward heaven while singing psalms to God, he was accustomed to pour out tears.

So great was the gentleness in him that little birds took food from his hand without fear, and whenever he wished, he stroked them with his fingers, forgetful of their wildness and as though they were domesticated.

His little bed, woven from twigs, was covered with a cheap pallet. His face was very pale and wasted with leanness, because frequently throughout an entire week he took nothing as food except on the Lord's Day.

He drank neither wine nor strong drink. Nevertheless, at the coming of guests and in charity, he tasted beforehand from all these cups.

When the Lord through him conferred the grace of cures upon the sick, or when he announced future or hidden things, then his cheeks shone with a rosy color and excessive brilliance, so that all might understand openly that the things done or said through him were done with the Holy Spirit cooperating.

He very often spent the night in vigils and frequently made secret prayers amid dense thorn-bushes and through the enclosed places of valleys. He used only a tunic with a cowl.

After he had ordered some offender among the younger brothers to be flogged, he often prohibited this from being done. Instead, summoning him to himself, he gently admonished him, so that this shame alone might suffice for him, in order that he should not repeat that vice thereafter.

In the same time Hildeuntus flourished. As Vincent reports from his deeds in book twenty-four of the Historical Mirror, he was born in the city of Meaux and afterward was made bishop there.

When he was five years old, he was delivered to Saint Pharaon to be imbued with sacred letters. He bore the reproaches of his companions with the greatest patience. From the time when he was made a priest by Saint Pharaon, he always used a hair-shirt next to his flesh.

At Saint Pharaon's admonition he sought a monastery, and after Pharaon he was made bishop.

Near the city of Meaux there was a church of the Holy Cross in which the body of Saint Pharaon had once been buried. In the courtyard of this church the people of Meaux buried their dead.

It happened that certain malicious men asked blessed Hildeuntus that they might be permitted to build another church for themselves in that courtyard. This was done. But that same temple, constructed from the pursuit of avarice, collapsed to the ground on the night preceding the day on which it was to be dedicated.

Terrified by this fear and led by repentance, blessed Bildeuntus [read: Hildeuntus] went to Rome to Pope Boniface so that he might impose penance upon him for this sin.

After satisfaction had been made, he was sent to preach. Entering each house, he said: “Peace to this house, to those entering and to those departing.” Beginning the discourse in this way, he continued it to the end.

He did this as he journeyed to Jerusalem and returned. In the seventh year of his return he reported to the pope what he had done.

Returning to Gaul with the authority of the lord pope, at a place called Latimacus he found a monk named Fulseus, distinguished in holiness.

An angel of the Lord stood before this monk in a vision, saying: “Bishop Hildeuntus will come to you in the morning. Know that his sins have been remitted by the Lord. See, therefore, that you receive him with honor.”

When Saint Hildeuntus came to him, he cast himself at his feet. When Fulseus saw this, he fell upon his face.

Then Hildeuntus came to a place seven miles from the city of Meaux, where he had constructed a church and dedicated it in honor of Blessed Mary.

There, when he was about to celebrate Mass, he drew the gloves from his hands and placed them upon a ray of the sun, and they were sustained there for the space of three hours.

Then he raised a certain boy who had died without baptism. Baptizing him, he called him Aldebert after the name of his own father, and ordered that he should be buried beside him, since he himself was to die seven years after him.

Blessed Maviolus the abbot afterward raised the bodies of these two from the earth by an angelic revelation, with very many bishops accompanying him.

Section V

Around the same time Austregisillus also flourished, as Vincent reports in the place cited above. After Sigebert, he was archbishop of Bourges in Gaul. Under him were Sulpitius, Cuthbert of Cologne, and John of Tongeren.

Among the other wondrous virtues by which he shone in his life, this Austregisillus cured a certain miller. On the Lord's Day, with a rash spirit, the miller wished to repair the mill. Taking a double-edged iron tool, which in the common tongue they call a scoton, he began to work the millstone.

Because of this sin, the handle of that iron tool adhered to his hand, and no one could remove it from his hand. He was compressed by so great a constriction that blood had already begun to flow between his fingers and to cause disgust to those looking on because of the stench.

He came to the aforesaid man of God and sought God's help. Austregisillus took the hand to which the hammer adhered, first extended the fingers, removed that iron tool, and, drawing out the man's hand, expelled all pain. Thus the healed man departed.

After the death of this saint, when Pippin, prince of the Franks, wishing to fight against Eudo, prince of Aquitaine, came to the city of Bourges, barbarians from his army, against the opposition of the neighbors, surrounded completely with fire a certain house in the villa Carobria. It had belonged to the aforesaid saint, who had often come to it.

Immediately seized by a demon, one of them tore the door from that very house which was burning, cast himself into the flame, and ended his life there. Others also lacerated themselves with their teeth, and some cut off one another's limbs.

Not long afterward, when the aforesaid Eudo had ordered one of his chief men, named Aginus, to remain in the monastery of Saint Austrigillus [i.e., Austregisillus], Aginus delivered whatever he could find in that monastery to be distributed to his companions, so that no sustenance remained for the brothers.

When the abbot entreated him, saying, “Have mercy upon your servants, so that they may be able to live and pray for you,” the proud man despised his prayers. The monks approached the saint's sepulcher and began with tears to pray that the Lord would rescue them from the enemy.

But the unhappy Aginus, plundering all the estates of the holy man Austregisillus, led away with him the livestock and whatever else he found.

While he was making his journey, Saint Austregisillus appeared to him in a dream, saying: “Why have you plundered me so grievously and left those serving me so sorrowful?” Saying this, he struck him in the brain.

Awakening, Aginus cried out that he had been struck by Saint Austregisillus, and a little afterward expired.

Concerning Saint Sulpitius

This most illustrious man, as Vincent narrates from his deeds in the place cited above, was born of noble parents. In the flower of early youth, having broken the snares of the world, he undertook the service of Christ so ardently that, if the time of persecution had not been lacking, he would have cast himself voluntarily into dangers.

While still placed in a secular habit, he was seen to do nothing other than construct monasteries, restore churches, and bring help to the wretched.

In churches located far from his parents' home, secretly in the silence of night, clothed in the garments of penance, he was accustomed to spend the night in holy prayers. At dawn, adorned again in secular clothing, he concealed his holy purpose.

This was the sport of his childhood; such an affection toward God grew strong in him.

On a certain night, while he remained for a rather long time in contemplation in one church with two boys, two most hideous Ethiopians each seized one of the boys and strove to drag them from the church.

The man of God heard the boys behind his back wailing with great cries. He looked upon those black figures and, raising his hand against them, restrained them with the standard of the cross. The boys, suddenly released from them, remained unharmed.

From that time the cunning enemy, turning every effort against the servant of God, strove to terrify with fantastic threats the man whom he was unable to corrupt in mind.

When the report concerning him had spread far and wide and this had been urged upon Clothair by the faithful, the king asked Austregisillus, bishop of the city of Bourges, that the holy man, who had already attained the grade of the Levitical lot, should obtain the office of abbot in his camp.

Afterward, when that holy bishop migrated from this life, the same holy man Sulpitius, by the Lord's provision, merited the episcopal primacy of the see of Aquitaine.

Having obtained the pontifical dignity, he submitted to the burden, not to the honor. Made all things to all men, he delivered himself to incessant fasts and almost continual vigils.

Thus, if at any time natural necessity required a little sleep, he was found not upon the softness of a bed, which he had never been accustomed to use, but upon the surface of a mat and hair-shirt alone.

So great a grace of virtues increased in him that signs were wrought no less through him than formerly through the apostles. He drove away demons by a word, cured the sick by prayer, and even raised a dead man.

When certain chief men came to him for the sake of seeing him, and he showed them the kindness that he knew how to impart to everyone, while the servants were occupied elsewhere, a flame of fire began quickly to devour the roofs.

The entire structure, now scattered with sparks, began to shake, and, with collapse threatening, everyone despaired of help and took flight. The priest of God strove to resist the flames with his hand together with the standard of the cross.

While all marveled, the masses of flame were immediately restrained before the servant of God withdrew his hand, as though they had been surrounded on every side by the force of a great river of waters.

A certain illustrious woman had filled a great barn with ears of grain. In the dead of night, a wicked man entered, cast in fire, and stirred up tumult while the flame crackled.

The man of God, after the cause had been disclosed, ran there, went around the burning pile with spiritual canticles, and in a wondrous manner fixed with his staff a boundary that the fiery mound could not cross.

Therefore, although the flames touched all the neighboring houses, they turned back upon themselves from every side and fled the void that they did not dare to cross.

Far from the city he ordered an immense tree to be cut down. While it was being cut, it fell swiftly. One of the boys, intent and absorbed in something else, stood still and did not flee death. Immediately the priest, raising his hand with the sign of the cross, turned the tree toward the other side, and thus drew the boy away from the peril of death.

One of the wicked men forced himself by night into the holy man's storeroom. Striving to carry away what he had conceived in the crime of theft, when he hastened to depart no exit lay open to him; rather, as though enclosed by a prison, he was bound on every side. Thus, when the course of the whole night had been spent, in the morning the man of God summoned one of the guards and, sending him to a companion, commanded him to drag out the man whom he should find in the storeroom, wearied by wandering, confined as though by certain bonds, and thus discovered in the crime.

Without delay the servant went to his companion and called him. They found the wicked man inside and seized him in order to drag him out. But, slipping from between their hands, fearing that he had been caught in the crime and was surrounded on every side by crowds, and preferring to undergo a swift death rather than endure long torments, he cast himself into a very deep well. Yet, while the devouring earth received him, he was asking the saint's intercession.

Then the man of God ran swiftly to the place and ordered a certain boy to descend, bound with a rope, and to draw the wicked man out in his embrace. Although all cried out that he could not be alive and believed that he had already died, he was drawn unharmed from the well. Prostrate at the saint's feet, he sought pardon for his crime. The saint, full of compassion, forgave him and supplied the necessities for his use, often admonishing him to ask rather than seize.

When one of his disciples, who had now been made a deacon, had sought permission to return to his own country, Sulpitius refused to give it, lest something adverse happen to him on the way. At length he departed without permission on horseback; but after traveling throughout the whole night, in the morning he found himself at the place from which he had begun the journey. He sought and received pardon from Sulpitius.

When the same man on a certain night had completed the singing of psalms in the baptistery, he proceeded to the basilica of blessed Martin so that he might spend the remainder of the night until matins in divine praises. A demon, intruding in the shape of a most hideous bird, first tried to extinguish the light that the boy carried before him; then, rushing violently against the face and eyes of the holy man and flying around him at a distance this way and that, it made itself violent and troublesome.

The man of God, weighing what it did, said to it: “I know who you are, minister of the ancient serpent.” When he had made the sign of the cross, it vanished; but thereafter, from envy, it kindled its goads against the holy man.

When Sulpitius had commanded one of the boys to go to a certain place to furnish aid to the poor, the demon presented itself in his way, cast him from the vehicle, and, after grievously punishing him with blows, left him senseless. He was therefore carried home by those nearby, and no one reported it to the holy man.

At length Sulpitius himself perceived by the spirit of prophecy that the boy had remained mute and blind for ten continuous days; all his limbs were half-dead, and his teeth and mouth were so tightly closed that no one could pour even a drop of water inside. Then the holy man, shedding tears from affection and prostrating himself in prayer, ordered a morsel of bread with wine to be brought. As soon as those nearby, after forcing his teeth open with iron, poured in the drop of wine that Sulpitius had sent, the lost senses were restored and the limbs returned to their former vigor.

One of his companions also, when he was once proceeding to the church to spend the night, encountered the devil, who strove to hinder the good work. The devil afflicted him with blows and left him senseless; the man of God made him whole by prayer.

Not long afterward, when a certain peasant took an axe in hand and worked on the Lord's Day, his hand immediately withered and, adhering to the axe by its sinews, was opened [read: could not be opened]. Coming to the servant of God, he was restored to health by his prayer.

At last the holy man, full of days, rested in peace; and after his death he also shone through many miracles.

Section VII

At the same time there was Saint Saleberga the abbess, as Vincent writes in the place cited above from her deeds. She was born of noble and religious parents in a suburban town of the Leuci bordering upon the territory of Langres.

When blessed Eustasius, abbot and successor of Saint Columbanus, had hastened into Germany to eliminate the Bonosiac heresy, and on his return had come to Godonius, the father of the aforesaid girl, Godonius received him as a most welcome gift. Amid the most sacred words of exhortation, Eustasius caused inquiry to be made whether he had offspring.

Godonius presented two young sons to him to receive the grace of blessing. But the holy man asked whether any child still remained. The parents confessed to him that they also had a girl who had long been deprived of sight. “Let her too come,” he said.

Having therefore completed a fast of three days by himself, he poured the oil of blessing over the girl's eyes, and immediately she recovered her health.

Afterward her parents, thinking about the succession of children, joined her against her will in marriage to a certain nobleman. After possessing her for scarcely two months, he died.

Blessed Eustasius also, after many crises of affairs, after the storms of heretics and the deceits of schismatics, powerful in the greatest miracles, migrated to the Lord. In his place Saint Walbert was appointed over the brothers in their governance.

Therefore Saint Saleberga, widowed and under a lay habit, intent upon vigils, fasts, and alms, pondered in her mind the teaching that she had received from blessed Eustasius. But by command of King Dagobert, for the procreation of children, she was joined in marriage to a certain man named Baldwin, who lived at the royal court; she had five sons.

At length, when her husband had been converted and her children consecrated to God, with “your religion” accepted [read: after receiving the religious habit], and after taking counsel with Saint Walbert, with her husband's consent she built a monastery of girls in the suburb of Langres upon her paternal inheritance.

After these things, when civil war had arisen among the kings of the Franks around those borders, the neighboring places were depopulated and the bodies of the saints were also burned with fire. Then, after taking counsel with Saint Walbert—whom she afterward had both as a companion on the journey and as a partner in the labor—she left her paternal soil and proceeded to the city of Lugdunum with a very great company [read: proceeded to the city of Laudunum (Laon) with a very great company] and with the souls entrusted to her by God. A monastery was built there, and within a short time about three hundred handmaids of Christ were gathered to her.

On a certain day, while she awaited the arrival of the blessed man and Walbert [read: blessed man Walbert] and a supply of Falernian wine was lacking, she ordered beer to be made and placed in a barrel. But because the vessel had not been filled, the sister who guarded the cellar reported this to Saleberga, namely, that if it thus remained unfilled it would quickly turn sour. But by the merits of the saint the vessel was found full.

After a certain wondrous vision, it was revealed to her that one hundred days from then she would migrate from the body. Consequently, on each of those days she recited one Psalter; and at the term appointed for her she proceeded to the Lord.

When Lothair, king of the Franks, had died, his son Dagobert reigned, in the twentieth year of the empire of Heraclius.

This Dagobert, as Vincent narrates in the Historical Mirror, received the monarchy of three kingdoms. He was a nurturer of orphans, most kindly toward the Franks, just in judgment, and generous toward churches. He was the first who ordered an abundance of alms from the treasury of the palace to be distributed throughout his whole kingdom among the churches of the saints.

His reputation among the good, and at the same time dread and fear of him, reached every region round about. He established peace throughout his whole kingdom and, like the peaceful Solomon, quietly possessed the kingdom of the Franks.

This same Dagobert, once fearing the anger of his father Lothair because he had dishonored one of his counselors by having him beaten and shorn, fled at Paris to the church of Saint Dionysius. Because he could in no way be drawn from there, he always held that place in his heart.

When the day of the dedication of that church was approaching, namely the sixth day before the Kalends of March, on the night that preceded that day, the people were excluded from the church according to custom so that freer entry might be prepared for the bishops on the following day. A matter most worthy of remembrance occurred, which should become known to future ages by faithful report.

Whether this happened through the ignorance of the gatekeepers or through deliberate care, we do not know. A certain leper, however, not unknown to the chamber attendants, spent the night in the church of the aforesaid martyrs, full of faith, and alone occupied a secluded place for the sake of vigils. The rest of the people, as has been said, and the guardians of the church itself waited outside.

In the very silence of the night, so great a radiance illuminated that entire church that the brilliance of many wax candles yielded to that radiance, for the divine sun had illuminated it with his own radiance. The leper was passing that night without sleep. He was astounded by the ineffable brightness and began to wait most attentively to see whether anything would follow that light.

Behold, suddenly the Lord Jesus, pontiff of pontiffs, appeared with those intimate companions of his, the blessed apostles Peter and Paul; and he had joined to that holy company the glorious martyrs Dionysius, Rusticus, and Eleutherius. The leper did not see this vision in the manner of a dreamer, as frequently tends to happen; rather, with wakeful eyes he discerned every person and every thing.

For he saw the Lord Jesus himself, clothed in snow-white garments, going before them, plainly impressing upon those walls the signs of his dedication, and carrying out the episcopal office in due sequence. He saw that venerable procession of his faithful following him, among whom he observed especially those apostles and the aforesaid martyrs.

When the office of dedication had been completed according to custom, the Savior approached the leper and said to him in a voice that he could understand: “Hear without fear, and reveal to our bishops waiting outside what you have seen and what I shall command you. Let them no longer concern themselves with the office of dedicating the church, because we have applied our hands and, as you have seen, have completed the whole office of consecration.”

The leper, now more assured because of the order of the long-awaited vision, and now more joyful because the Savior had addressed him, said: “And who, my Lord, will lend a believing ear to my words? For I am the most wretched of all men and have been made the refuse of the people. I have no standing among men for giving testimony, since, as you see, I am hideously afflicted by the elephantine disease.”

Why say more? The Savior approached the man afflicted with elephantiasis and admonished his hand toward the man's face with a light touch [read: moved his hand lightly over the man's face], and passed his touch around his head. In a wondrous manner, after the skin had been removed together with those very horrible pustules and with the hair itself, the powerful physician restored the leper to health. He placed upon the nearest stone the very fleshy tunic that he had drawn from the man's head and caused it to remain fashioned just as it had been yesterday and the day before, together with those ulcers, so that one would think the flayed face itself to be a true face and would have no doubt concerning its leprous appearance.

He added: “Go. If they do not believe you, they will by no means disbelieve at least these signs.” When he had said these things, both that light which had obscured the radiance of many lamps departed and the blessed vision disappeared from the eyes of the beholder.

Day dawned, and certain of the matricularii entered the church and found the leper giving thanks. He asked to be brought to the king, saying, “For I have a secret matter for him.”

He was brought to Dagobert and recounted the course of the divine oracle: “I truly saw and heard that the dedication of this church was performed by the Lord God this night, and afterward I was restored to health in this manner.” Extending his finger, he said, “This is the window through which the Lord entered this hall. If you do not believe me, at least come and believe the works themselves.” He led them to the stone distinguished by the remarkable evidence.

The king marveled, because he was still doubtful concerning the truth. He saw that the man was a stranger and despised him as a mendicant and a pauper. At length the hair and scalp that had been drawn off satisfied the unbelieving man, and the leprous likeness placed upon the stone was the witness of the miracle.

For, to confess the truth, the outlines of the members of the head—I mean the ears, eyelids, mouth, and nostrils—remained shriveled in their places. Thus, with all uncertainty driven far away, stubborn unbelievers, if any had existed, were amazed, confounded, and believed concerning the truth of the miracle.

The report, spread abroad and confirmed, invited the bishops to wonder and thanksgiving and compelled the peoples gathered in a body to the dedication and praise. The walls, marked by divine hands, bore testimony to the deed performed.

That scalp was laid away in a suitable little casket, which the reliquaries of that church preserve among the relics even to the present day, since God's hand had touched it.

Dagobert, rejoicing not a little over this, considered how that church should be honored. Lest it thereafter be subjected to anyone except the Roman pontiff, he caused it to be protected by the privilege of blessed Peter and adorned it with royal gifts. Whatever he contributed to it from his royal treasuries was too little in his estimation.

In the times of this Dagobert, Saint Magnobodus, bishop of Angers, flourished. When King Dagobert learned the report of his goodness, he caused Magnobodus to be summoned to him at Paris.

When Magnobodus, entering the city, passed through the gates, the accused men who were being held in prisons, learning of his arrival, sought his assistance with insistent cries. Therefore, going to the judge, he began to ask him to grant pardon to the condemned men. But the judge, opposing his will, caused him to depart without effect.

Magnobodus entered the church that he occupied and prayed to Christ that the guilty men might be freed from their bonds. Immediately the fetters were worn away, and, when the manacles had been shattered, the entrance of the prison lay freely open to the bound men. Springing forth and casting themselves at the holy man's feet, they gave thanks.

The same man, going around and illuminating the diocese entrusted to him, came to an estate called Quartiniacus. Talkative boys were casting out unspeakable insults in play. When he looked upon them, one of them, suddenly mingled with the dust, was snatched up with such complete swiftness that he was carried this way and that through the vast spaces of the air like a ball.

Then his companions and parents, sorrowful and terrified, searched through every trackless place and the broken recesses of cliffs and valleys, but accomplished nothing. Already driven to despair, at last, growing weary through pathless places and divided tracks, they found the boy among dense thorn-bushes, half-dead and scarcely drawing a faint breath.

With great lamentation, the parents wrapped him in a cloak, nearly torn apart in all his limbs, and presented him in the holy man's presence. Taking him by the hand, Magnobodus raised him up and restored him to his parents alive and strong.

At a certain time, while making a journey, he required the aid of a boat to cross a river. A little boat was seen stationed on this side of the stream [read: on the other side of the stream], but no one was there who might attempt to bring it to him. When, according to his custom, he had recourse to prayer, suddenly its prow sprang from the place where it was held fast and, without a rower, the boat was carried floating to the bank where he stood waiting.

Giving thanks to God, he embarked in it with his whole company and arrived by a prosperous passage at the place toward which he was going.

At a certain time, when a multitude of the poor, deprived by hunger, flowed to the man of God from every side, as was customary, he, like a lavish giver, made an agape and refreshed them all to satiety. When his attendants investigated the sum of the coins that had been distributed for the food of the poor, they found doubled what they had used up in spending.

A certain abbot named Heraclius, envying his virtues, ordered through men who shared his malice that a cup of death be presented to him secretly. When Magnobodus saw them coming to him, he understood by divine aid their death-bearing deceits.

But, mindful of the evangelical command, he showed them every kindness in food and drink. Then, applying admonitions of salvation, he persuaded them to withdraw from so unspeakable a stratagem, lest they be punished more severely with a penalty in the abyss. Giving them the kiss of peace, he permitted them to depart unharmed.

Around the same time, Aldan, a bishop and disciple of Saint Columbanus, coming from Scotia, shone among the English in holiness and learning, as Vincent reports in the place cited above. When he delivered the word to the people in the Scottish tongue, if an interpreter was lacking, Odoaldus, king of England [i.e., Oswald, king of England], clothed in his royal garment, performed the office of interpreter. The king himself withheld food from himself for the sake of the poor.

At this time three brothers flourished in Francia: Ado, Indo, and Dado, who was also called Andoenus. They showed their devotion toward God by each founding a monastery of his own.

Of these, Dado was the referendary of King Dagobert. He was called the referendary to whom public writings were referred so that through him they might be confirmed by the king's ring or seal.

Eligius, already long distinguished in the court of King Lothair, had encouraged them toward this.

Section X

Then Saint Aurea the abbess also flourished. Saint Eligius placed her over a monastery of virgins that he had constructed at Paris.

This Saint Aurea, as Vincent notes in the place cited above, was placed over three hundred girls in the monastery at Paris. She was of the most noble birth and endowed with so great a virtue of patience that she returned evil for evil to no one, but loved even those who envied her all the more.

While the holy mother was once on the estates of the sisters, it was reported to her from the monastery that the cellarer and key-bearer of this holy mother, beloved by her and named Deda, had died. Aurea returned to the monastery only when the third dawn after Deda's death had already passed.

The sisters had not dared to bury Deda without the abbess, nor could they wrench the keys of the workrooms from her as she was now departing, for she asserted that she would give them to none of the sisters before the arrival of the exalted virgin Aurea.

Then Aurea approached her as she lay upon the bier, looked upon her, and called her by her own name. Immediately Deda sat up alive.

“What,” Aurea said, “have you done concerning the goods of the monastery entrusted to you and concerning the keys?” Immediately Deda rendered an account concerning all the goods and, after setting forth the keys, migrated to the Lord with the holy abbess's permission.

On a certain occasion, when the loaves with which the sisters were to be refreshed at the proper hour were lacking, Aurea, very sorrowful and fearing their murmurings, went around to find the monastery's ovens. Hurrying to one, she asked the baker whether he had bread prepared.

When he answered that it was ready if someone would make the oven clean with brooms, she immediately entered the oven and, thrusting the still-burning coals out together with the ashes by her own hands, made the furnace completely clean.

So that the miracle might be doubled and the praise of the holy virgin increased, the sisters and all the citizens dwelling round about heard the bells in the little tower ringing without hands, and all proclaimed God with exalted praises, singing, “We praise you, God.”

On a certain day, while she heard Mass and the deacon pronounced the Gospel incorrectly, because she was unwilling to hear falsehood in the Lord's words, she removed the stole from the deacon's shoulder, placed it upon her own shoulder, and read through the Gospel lesson.

For this she was reproved by an angelic rebuke. She shut herself in a certain oratory of Saint Quentin and removed herself from the sight of every human being for the course of seven years, leading a most severe penance there.

She continually sat in a chair that she had caused to be wondrously prepared for herself, having fifty nails on the right, fifty on the left, and fifty at the back. Thus she sang the Psalter daily—one hundred and fifty psalms—leaning against fifty nails on the right, another fifty on the left, and a third fifty at the back.

She never ate meat or drank wine or strong drink; instead of wine she drank liquid expressed drop by drop from ashes.

Certain of the sisters nevertheless thought that she drank something else. Consequently, one rash sister, wishing to test and disclose to the others what she drank, secretly entered the chamber where her drink was filtered through ashes.

When the temptress put it to her mouth, she was immediately struck with paralysis in the face, so that her cheek was joined to her little ear. Thus, recognizing herself as guilty, she sought pardon before the feet of the sacred virgin, and obtained both pardon and a cure.

At length blessed Eligius appeared in the church to a certain young man and summoned the holy virgin to himself. When the young man had announced this to her, she hastened there; but when she arrived, the vision had already vanished. From this she understood that she was being called from this world. Migrating to the Lord, she was buried honorably in the church of Paul the Apostle.

An angel of the Lord appeared in a vision to a certain abbess in Syria, in a city across the sea. She had eyes but could not see at all. He told her to cross the expanses of the sea and, going to Paris, to seek the basilica of blessed Paul, because if she raised from the earth the virgin Aurea—a pilgrim from those regions who had gone there and been buried there—and placed her in a more honorable place, she would immediately recover her sight through Aurea's merits.

When she had related this vision to the bishop of the city, she began the journey with him. But, exhausted on the way, she remained behind. The prelate said to her: “Remain in this place for the sake of constructing a shrine that will receive the holy virgin's body.”

He then went to Francia and narrated the vision to the bishop of Paris. Thus the two prelates, coming to the basilica with the clergy and people, found the holy body and, upon its breast, the book that she had brought with her from Syria. In the sepulcher they also found an epitaph of this kind: “Here lies Aurea the pilgrim.”

When the body had been raised, they gave one arm to the bishop of Syria. Blood began to flow from its veins when they separated it from the body. The bishop of Paris deposited the body with great honor in the monastery of Saint Eligius. The Syrian, rejoicing, carried the arm to the abbess and placed it in a most fittingly constructed shrine; immediately the woman recovered her sight. He too built a noble monastery in his homeland in honor of the virgin.

Section XI

Concerning Saint Romaricus

As Vincent reports from his deeds in book twenty-four, chapter seventy-two, of the Historical Mirror, Romaricus was once placed in the court of Theodebert, king of the Austrasians. He rendered to Caesar the things that are Caesar's and to God the things that are God's, and was lovable to everyone in the fellowship of the court.

While he abounded in many goods in the palace, he was joined in friendship to a certain most illustrious man named Arnulph. When they began to open their hearts to one another, they mutually confessed that the Lord's command, “Go and sell all that you have,” and so forth, had touched the ears of their hearts.

They therefore considered abandoning the mortal king and serving the eternal King. Accordingly, they thought of seeking the monastery of Limirense, but, because God disposed otherwise, they fulfilled their purpose differently. For blessed Arnulph, although he resisted with tears, was appointed bishop of Metz.

Romaricus, however, despised all things, granted liberty to many of his servants, and led very many with him. Under the guidance of Amatus, he sought the monastery of Luxeuil, then famous throughout the whole world. Devoutly receiving the habit of holy religion with those whom he had brought, he began to pursue humility and obedience to such a degree that, for the love of Christ, he strove to subject himself even to those by whose most dutiful service he had formerly been accustomed to be supported.

He not only showed himself to be more abject than everyone in the monastery but also believed himself to be so. He feared the reverence offered to him by others, loved secret prayers, and preceded the others to the work of God.

When the Lord had raised blessed Amatus to blessed rest, Saint Romaricus undertook the governance of the holy congregation. After this the man of God began to abound in the grace of signs, which he strove to conceal just as rich men are accustomed to hide their treasures.

When he was sometimes outside for the monastery's benefit, he often turned aside for lodging to the house of a certain man in the region of the Vosges. When he entered it according to custom on a certain day, the man's wife looked upon him and said: “O my lord, why have you come so late? Your maidservant had strong drink, which yesterday our godparents and neighbors drank when they came.”

When the man of God saw that she was anxious on his account, he said: “Do not fear, but, trusting in God, enter your chamber.” Therefore, when the holy man prayed, a certain vessel was found full of strong drink. This drink also benefited the infirmities of many.

Certain girls in the monastery were stricken with leprosy. One of them secretly took water from the bath in which the man of God had washed and poured it over her whole body. Having obtained a cure, the leprosy gradually withdrew from her.

On the Lord's Day, the Lord introduced him into the heavenly kingdoms. On that same night they suddenly saw a very dense cloud cover the whole mountain together with his cell. As the brothers sang psalms at the man of God's departure, a radiance of wondrous brilliance immediately shone forth and filled the mountain and the cell. They saw a globe of the whitest splendor ascend through the middle of the aforesaid cloud and penetrate the heavens; they understood this to be the holy man's soul.

Section XII

At the same time Saint Goericus, bishop of Metz, shone in Francia. At first, as Vincent reports in the place cited above, he was an excellent soldier from Aquitaine. Serving secular pursuits in body but not in intention, he flourished in great honor before God and men.

Although he pursued the things that belong to peace, whenever an assault of the pagans arose, he placed himself first before the battle line and, relying upon God's aid, most powerfully overcame the barbarian fury and carried back the most abundant spoils.

At length he was struck by the sudden loss of his eyes. Nevertheless, fortified on every side by the virtue of patience and giving thanks to God, he said: “As it pleased the Lord, so it has been done. Blessed be the name of the Lord.”

At that time Theodebert reigned in Gaul, and blessed Arnulph presided as pontiff in the city of Metz.

Then, while the holy man Goericus rested in the silence of night, an angel of the Lord appeared and said: “The time has come, exalted servant of God, when your grief is to be changed into joy and the light you lost is to be restored more brightly. Therefore, go to the city of Metz, devoutly enter the threshold of blessed Stephen the protomartyr, pour out prayers to God there, and hold most certain faith. Know that you will recover your sight and the health of your whole body.

“Moreover, Arnulph, who is related to you by flesh, presides there as pontiff. He will immediately foretell that you are about to be present [read: to him the Holy Spirit will foretell that you are about to arrive], and he will reveal whatever God's goodness in piety and mercy is to bestow upon you.”

Therefore, when the holy man had awakened, he summoned his soldiers and began the journey from Aquitaine to the aforesaid city. Saint Arnulph met him as he approached and, after offering holy prayer and giving a blessing, led him into the house. Through the favor of Saint Stephen, Goericus recovered his sight and bodily health.

After this, Arnulph, seeing by the spiritual perception of his mind that Goericus would be a most worthy successor to him, appointed him with the consent of the clergy and people; and he himself sought the hermitage that he had long desired.

Thus blessed Goericus, who was also called Albo, bound by pastoral care, formed others by his words and conduct. Before the episcopate he had worn away his body with the strictest fasts; it is not lawful to relate how much harsher he made the fasts, for he also passed a whole day and night in prayers and observed fasts of two and three days with joyful countenance and mind.

After the death of Saint Arnulph, when a year had been completed, Saint Goericus, to whom Arnulph himself had left the episcopate, chose solitude and diligently considered the translation of Arnulph's body to the very see over which he had presided.

After the bishops of Toul and Verdun had been summoned, the holy body was carried honorably with praises. As the sun inclined toward its setting, they encountered the estate of a wicked and incestuous man. When they desired to enter it and the bearers of the holy relics had almost gone in, they halted, fixed in place by divine power, and recognized the heavenly force upon them because they were compelled to do so.

For while blessed Arnulph still remained in life, by his pastoral authority he had often admonished the man whose estate it was to recover from his wickedness, but he had been unable to bring this about. For that reason Arnulph now disdained to enter his wicked lodging.

Because night was at hand and no other estate suitable for so great a multitude was available, Saint Goericus prayed to God to provide them a lodging for rest. A certain wise and rich man who was taking part in this journey came forward and said: “I have an estate in this country, although it is not sufficiently near to you. But I know that your God is present for every necessity; he can both shorten the long journey and bring us swiftly to the place toward which we are going.”

Hearing this, the saint, filled with faith and joy, ordered the holy body to be turned in that direction and everyone to follow. One could perceive so great a swiftness in their going that one would think them not to be running but flying like birds. One would believe that the journey could scarcely be completed in the space of one whole day, and would marvel that it was accomplished in two or three hours.

When they had come to the estate, because that country was not productive of wine, the man learned from the report of his servants that he had little beer. But, filled with faith once more, he committed himself to the merits and prayers of Saint Goericus. Goericus sought the accustomed aids and asked God to provide for their necessities. From the small quantity of drink, so great a multitude of people was most abundantly satisfied, a thing scarcely credible.

Section XIII

The aforesaid Saint Arnulph, who from being mayor of the household of Francia was made bishop of Metz, after he abandoned the world and, leaving the episcopate, became a solitary, migrated to the Lord in the twenty-eighth year of Heraclius.

As Peter Damian says, he was the father of Pippin and the grandfather of Charlemagne. He held a duchy in Lotharingia not far from Flanders.

When, setting aside affection for his wife and sons, he sought the hermitage, it happened that he made his crossing by the river Moselle. Coming to the middle of its bridge, where the river was deeper, he cast his ring beneath it upon this condition of a covenant: “When I recover this ring,” he said, “then I shall trust without doubt that I have been absolved from the bonds of my sins.”

When this had been done, he sought the hermitage, where for no short time he lived to God, dead to the world. Meanwhile, when the bishop of Metz died, he was elected.

Because he abstained from the use of meat, as he had been accustomed to do in the hermitage, a fish was presented to him. When the cook gutted it, he found the ring and joyfully offered it to his lord. Arnulph recognized it immediately. The journey from the bridge at which the ring had been cast to the place where it was presented was two days.

When, therefore, he recognized the ring, now giving thanks to God in faith for the release of his sins, he thereafter conducted his life better and constrained himself still more by fasts, vigils, and prayers. That ring is still kept in the palace.

In these things God can be wondered at and magnificently praised: how, by a present effect, the holy man merited to be certified concerning the remission of his sins while he was still subject to vicissitudes. This doubtless would not have happened unless he had been most worthy before God.

Immediately after he undertook the episcopate, so great and so profuse a munificence in alms to the poor increased in him that, because his fame traveled even from distant regions and cities, an innumerable throng of the poor hastened to Saint Arnulph to be refreshed.

He was continually solicitous and intent upon every good work, and most devoutly kept watch especially in the reception of monks or pilgrims. He washed with his own hands the feet of those whom he had received as guests; and, after clothing and refreshing them, he conducted them away and immediately received others to be refreshed.

Moreover, who can relate the rule of his abstinence, especially since sometimes, after fasts of three and four days, he sustained himself on barley bread or a cup of water? He continually wore a hair-shirt secretly beneath his garments, and thus inflicted a double torment upon his limbs already exhausted by vigils and fasts.

While he continually kept watch in these good works, at the time when the universal Church is accustomed to observe the fast of three days, the holy man went out from the church beyond the city with crosses and a mixed multitude of people to pray according to custom. Behold, in the midst of the crowds a woman seized by a demon began to cry out. When he saw her, he set the standard of the cross against her and immediately healed her, rescued from the adversary.

In the times of King Dagobert, when Arnulph was in the palace, a certain leper began to cry out to him, demanding food or clothing. Arnulph ordered him to be led immediately into the lodging. While he bestowed his customary compassion upon him according to his custom, he wished to inquire, because the man was a barbarian, whether he had been washed with the water of sacred baptism.

The man suddenly replied: “By no means, my lord. For I am an unhappy man, rejected among the people. Who would grant me the grace of baptism?”

Therefore, when he had received the sacrament of baptism from the holy man, the leprosy suddenly departed from his body. Thereafter he who had previously been a sinner and stained was made sound in both body and soul.

A certain wicked man named Vodeo, heated with wine, dared with his accomplices to disparage the holy man, saying that he was not a worshiper of God but rather a man given to pleasure. For, as though demanding counsel, not only the king but even the queen perpetrated his bed at the hours of night [read: hastened to his bed at the hours of night].

Therefore, when Vodeo had sought a bed together with his companion in disparagement, at the Lord's command it happened that a flame surrounding their garments enclosed them. Immediately leaping up, they demanded water for the flame with loud cries. But even water thrown upon it did not extinguish the flame sent by God.

Their shirts burned wickedly around their buttocks and genitals, and they could not strip the burning garments from themselves. Why say more? Unable to do anything else, they leapt about and, crying out, rolled themselves in mud after the manner of pigs; but the fire sent against them burned their genitals more and more.

Then, I believe, there was fulfilled upon them what is written: “Him who secretly disparaged his neighbor, I persecuted.” For not much later, the aforesaid Vodeo was caught in such great transgressions that the royal sword, as was just, cut off his crimes together with his life. Lest he die alone, his son soon perished, struck by the same sentence.

When these and very many virtues began to become frequent through him among the people, Arnulph immediately sought places more distant from the tumult of the crowd. For some time he used a cell not very far from the city, striking heaven with prayers by day and night.

It happened by chance that a devouring fire assailed the king's storeroom. Belching forth, the most towering flame threateningly licked the adjoining houses all around. The whole city suddenly arose and, seeing its own destruction, was turned to wailing and clamor.

When we heard this, we went with swift step to the holy man's house and found him sounding forth the melody of psalmody, as was his custom. Romaricus immediately took him by the hand and said: “Come out, lest, which God forbid, this fire consume you in this city.”

But he said: “By no means, most beloved. Rather, lead me there and place me near it. If God thus wills that I should burn, behold, I am in his hand.”

Then, holding his holy hands, we came to the fire. At his command, after we had prostrated ourselves in prayer and a chapter had been recited, we all arose. Raising his hands against the immense flames, he set against them the standard of the cross. Immediately, in a wondrous manner, as though struck from heaven and doing harm nowhere else, the whole fire turned backward upon itself and died within the walls.

Immediately a vision of this kind appeared to one of the brothers. Looking into heaven, he saw a flame of fire fashioned like the sign of a cross. At once a voice came from heaven, saying: “Do you perceive this sign? This night Bishop Arnulph, through it, freed the whole city from the fire.”

After these things blessed Arnulph, abandoning all the things of the world, hastened to the hermitage like a new Elijah. Leaving the pontificate, as was said above, and dwelling among beasts and wild animals of the forest, he sounded forth daily praises to God.

There he served in every matter the lepers and other infirm persons who came to him; and after his death he also shone through miracles. Clodulf, the son of the aforesaid Arnulph and bishop of Metz, imitated his father's holiness. Doda also, the mother of Clodulf himself, was enclosed at Trier and served Christ.

Section XIV

In the year of the Lord six hundred forty-three, and in the first year of the empire of Constantine II, son of Heraclius, Oswald, king of the Northumbrians, was killed by Penda, king of the Mercians.

As Vincent says in the Historical Mirror after Helinand, Oswald's right hand, the dispenser of many alms, lies even today incorrupt with its arm, skin, and sinews, although his whole body was dissolved into ashes.

When rebellion had been stirred up by Penda, king of the Mercians, Oswald himself, bearing a forest of iron in his breast, entreated God for the souls of his faithful men. After his death, the arms with the hands and the head were cut off by the insatiable wrath of the victor and hung upon a stake.

The arms with the hands, which were placed at the city of Lamburch by his brother Oswin, still endure inviolate and are displayed as a miracle. His head, buried at Lindisfarne by his brother, is now said to be at Durelin between the arms of Saint Cuthbert.

Queen Ostricula, the wife of Chelred, king of the Mercians, and the daughter of King Osum, led by affection for her paternal uncle, wished to carry the remaining bones of the king's body into her monastery of Hordonium, which is in the region of the Mercians. The monks repelled her, begrudging repose to the dead man's bones because he had received rule over them by right of war. But in the depth of night, because a lamp from heaven was sent forth over the relics, they voluntarily sought what they had previously rejected.

There the turf grew green again from the blood that fell, and by it a horse was healed. A little dust from the washing of his relics heals those powerless in mind. The stake that had received his fresh blood bestowed health upon those without hope through the water with which it was washed. His son Osum reigned after him for twenty-seven years.

Sigibert. At that time Judachail, king of the Britons, purchased Dagobert's favor for himself. Reginulpha, a virgin of Christ, shone in holiness in Gaul.

Haudmar the emir built a temple for himself at Jerusalem. Because the structure could in no way remain standing, at the suggestion of the Jews he ordered the cross to be removed from above the Mount of Olives, and thus the structure of the temple was able to stand.

In the year of this Constantine, the grandson of Heraclius, Dagobert, king of the Franks, died. It was revealed to someone through a vision that his soul was carried off to judgment. While many cried out against it because of the plundering of their churches, when evil angels already wished to seize it for the punishments of hell, it was freed from the punishments through the intervention of the holy martyr Dionysius, to whom Dagobert had been especially devoted.

In the following year Saint Remaclus was ordained bishop of Traiectum. Rodoald, the uterine brother [read: Modoald, the brother of Itta] and maternal uncle of Saint Gertrude, illuminated the archbishopric of Trier by his learning and holiness. His sister Severa, an abbess in the same city, did not fall away from her brother's holiness.

Around the same time, a certain Persian, pretending that he was worshiping Haumar, the emir of the Saracens, killed him with a sword thrust into his belly.

In the fifth year Saint Furceus shone in Hibernia. Undertaking pilgrimage for Christ, he came as far as Gaul and, honorably received by King Clodoveus, founded the monastery of Latiniacum. Not long afterward, his brothers Foillanus and Ulcanus followed him through Gaul with an equal resolve to make pilgrimage, and shone there.

Of these, Foillanus afterward founded the monastery of Fossae by the gift of the virgin Gertrude; there also, crowned with martyrdom, he rests.

In the following year Eligius at Novionium and Andoenus, who was also called Dado, at Rothomagus, shone as bishops; Philibert of the island of Herium, and Recharius of Portus and Geremarus of Flamacum, shone as abbots. Augaridrisina, a sacred virgin, shone near Belvacum. Augesilus also shone, to whom Begga, the sister of Grimoald, had been married.

Saint Andoenus wrote the life of blessed Eligius. Vincent sets forth at length the deeds of each of these in book twenty-four, chapter eighty-five, of the Historical Mirror.

Section XV

This Saint Eligius, therefore, according to Vincent in the place cited above, was born in the territory of the city of Limovica. His father was Eucherius and his mother Terrigia.

While his mother still carried him in her womb, she saw in a dream an eagle flying above her bed, calling to her three times and promising her something she did not understand. When she awoke at the eagle's cry, greatly terrified, she began to consider what the dream might be.

When she afterward came into peril in childbirth, they sent for a certain holy man so that he might come and pray for her. When he came, he said to her: “Do not fear, mother, because this boy will be holy and great in the Church.”

When Eligius was a young man, his father caused him to be instructed by goldsmiths. When he now knew that entire art, he came into Francia and joined himself to a certain goldsmith who made the king's works.

At a certain time, when the king inquired who might make for him a most beautiful saddle of gold and silver, Saint Eligius's master answered that he had found an artisan who would make for the king in the best manner whatever he wished. Receiving a great mass of gold from the king, he delivered it to Eligius.

From the same weight Eligius made two most beautiful saddles. Bringing one to the king, he retained the other with himself. When everyone marveled at the first, the king rewarded him abundantly.

Then Eligius brought forth the other and presented it to the king, saying that he had made it from the gold that remained. The king, still more astounded, asked him how he had been able to make both from the same weight. “Well done,” he said. And Eligius's fame increased in the king's court.

Blessed Eligius loved the poor to such a degree that he bestowed upon them whatever he could, even to his own nakedness. They loved and followed him to such a degree that, if anyone sought Saint Eligius, he would be directed to the house surrounded by the poor.

On a certain day, while he was giving alms with his own hand, one of them, having a contracted hand, extended the other for alms. Eligius said to him, “Extend the other.” When the man had extended it as far as he was able, Eligius began to feel it and stretch it; and thus, anointing it with oil, he healed it.

On another day, when he had bestowed all his gold and silver upon the poor, and other poor men came while he had nothing to give them, he bestowed one mark of gold that he had borrowed from a certain neighbor. Afterward, when still others came, not remembering what he had done before, he went to his purse, which he had previously searched carefully. He then found one mark of gold and, giving thanks to God, bestowed it upon the poor.

He was tall in stature, ruddy in face, beautiful in his head of hair, and curled in his locks. He had an angelic countenance and an appearance both simple and prudent.

Formerly he shone in a golden and jeweled habit, having belts adorned with gold and gems, linen garments gleaming with metal, the borders of his outer garments covered with gold, all his clothing costly, and several garments wholly of silk; to avoid ostentation, however, he wore a hair-shirt inwardly. He afterward spent all these things upon the necessities of the poor.

Thereafter he used cheap garments and was girded with a cord; very often he was even stripped for the sake of the poor. The king then gave him his own belt and garment, because he loved him as his own soul. Consequently, he had made his residence subject to Eligius. Whatever Eligius asked from him, he obtained without delay, and he spent everything upon the needy, captives, and disabled.

From the time of Queen Brunichild down to the times of Dagobert, the plague of simony flourished in Gaul. Eligius and Andoenus kept solicitous watch to remove it.

Eligius was then elected to the church of Noviomagus after Acharius, bishop of that city. Together with him, his companion Andoenus was elected to the church of Rothomagus. Eligius presided over the metropolis of Viromandensis, the former royal city of Tornacum, Noviomagus, Flanders, Gandavum, and Corturiacum.

He had an appointed place into which, on certain fixed days, he admitted the needy and disabled and devoutly served them. He washed their filthy heads and shaved their misshapen hair with his own hand, supplied drink and food to each, and sent the naked away clothed.

If others were present when these departed, he admitted them and refreshed them in like manner. If a very great crowd gathered, he sometimes did the same for them all. On each day, however, he refreshed twelve in this manner, eating with them at the proper hour, yet in such a way that he himself first poured water upon the hands of each and supplied wine and bread with his own hand.

In addition, he obtained from the king the right to take down and bury the bodies of all condemned men wherever he could find them throughout estates or cities, whether from gibbets, wheels, or nooses. From among his companions he appointed corpse-bearers who would devote themselves to this care.

Thus, when he was in the king's company in the regions of Austria at the city of Strasbourg, he found that a man had ended his life by the noose that very day. When burial was being prepared for him by his companions, Eligius approached more closely and began to feel the body from its highest parts to its lowest, stroking it.

When he perceived that the soul was present, courteously repelling from himself the glory of the deed, he said: “O what a great crime we could now have committed unless the Lord had assisted us: we would have covered this body with earth while his soul was in it.” He ordered the revived man to be clothed and allowed to rest.

When they heard this, the man's pursuers sought to put him to death again. Eligius scarcely rescued him from their hands. He withdrew himself from the man's company to avoid glory and obtained from the king a charter of security for him.

In his diocese there was a certain exceedingly infamous priest. Although Saint Eligius frequently rebuked him and invited him in every way to confession, the priest always concealed his crime.

Then Saint Eligius, seeing that he accomplished nothing, excommunicated him, so that he should by no means presume to celebrate until he publicly performed penance. The negligent priest, making little of the bishop's sentence, wished to celebrate after some days and stood at the altar; immediately he fell to the ground and expired.

Eligius performed many other miracles in his life and still performs them.

Section XVI

The same man built a monastery of the handmaids of Christ at Noviomagus. Through him the Lord revealed the body of Saint Quentin.

At Soissons he also found the holy martyrs Crispin and Crispinian. Bringing them forth from a certain crypt, he arranged them magnificently. Likewise, in the municipality of Belvacum, he found blessed Lucian, the martyr and former companion of Saint Quentin, translated him in like manner, and arranged his body. At Paris he gave sight to a blind man upon the bridge.

Again at Paris, the guardian of the church of Saint Columba reported to him that his church had been despoiled by thieves of all its ornaments during the night. Then Eligius proceeded to Saint Columba's oratory and said: “Hear, Saint Columba, what I say. My Redeemer knows that, unless you quickly bring back the ornaments stolen from this tabernacle, I shall have thorns brought and cause the door to be closed so firmly that no veneration will ever be offered to you in this place from this day forward.”

Having said this, he departed. On the following night, the guardian Mauricius arose and found all the veils restored as they had been before, down to the smallest pall.

These, moreover, are the sepulchers that he fashioned from gold, silver, and gems: those of Germanus, Severinus, Piato, Quentin, Lucian, Genovefa, Columba, Maximianus, and Julian, and especially that of blessed Martin of Tours, King Dagobert providing the expenses. He also fashioned the tomb of Saint Brictio and another in which the body of blessed Martin had formerly lain, as well as the mausoleum of blessed Dionysius the martyr in the city of Paris and, above it, a marble canopy decorated with gold and gems in wondrous workmanship.

He died in the seventieth year of his life. When, after the completion of a year, he was translated from his place, he was found so beautiful and incorrupt that he was thought always to have lived in the tomb. What is more wondrous, his beard and hair, which had been shaved at the time of his death, were seen to have grown wondrously in the tomb.

How the body of blessed Quentin was found through him will now be set forth.

A certain cleric named Maurinus was frequently accustomed to boast that he knew the martyr's location and could find it without hesitation. When, wishing to prove this to his hearers, he undertook the perilous test of his claim, he took a mattock and presumed to violate the pavement of the martyr's basilica. The mattock's handle, fixed in place, adhered to his hands. Because it could neither be released nor removed, his hands began to rot and swarm with worms. Punished by this penalty, he miserably ended his life on the following day.

From this so great a dread increased among everyone that no one thereafter, however proven his life might be, presumed to attempt a matter of this kind except Saint Eligius, bishop of Noviomagus.

This holy pontiff began to frequent the aforesaid martyr's place. Instructed by a divine revelation, he completed a three-day fast with tears and prayed attentively. In a place where there could be no suspicion that the body would be found, he began to dig with a hoe in his holy hands and, uncovering a most ancient tomb there, found the martyr's body.

When the tomb was pierced, so great an odor of paradise came forth from it with an immense light that the pontiff himself, dazed by the light's brilliance and the fragrance of the odor, was scarcely able to remain standing. For the globe of light that came forth from the mausoleum at the blow of the striker emitted so immense a brilliance that it turned that very dark night, of which half had already passed, into day throughout a very great part of the province. Consequently, many arose from their beds and hastened to servile work according to custom, as though it were day.

But as time advanced, the brightness that had shone for the sake of this sign withdrew after giving its sign. Then Saint Eligius, kissing the sacred body with tearful joy, separated for himself relics from whatever parts he wished. From these relics he also consecrated many places and, by distributing them, provided healing for various diseases.

For the healing of the sick he also removed teeth from the jaw. While he did this, a drop of blood came forth from the root of one tooth. Then, wrapping the holy body with the greatest care in cloth wholly of silk, he transferred it behind the altar and fashioned above it a tomb of silver, gold, and gems in wondrous workmanship. He also enlarged and adorned the church, which had been small.

A certain thief secretly stole a priest's horse. When found by the priest, he was reported to the judge; apprehended and bound, confessing his deed, he was condemned to the gallows.

But the priest, fearing that a man's soul might be taken away because of the loss he himself had suffered, entreated the judge to release the guilty man and grant him life. He said that satisfaction had now been made to him because, through so many kinds of torments, the thief had disclosed what he had done. The judge's severity, however, could be bent by no prayers; he sentenced the guilty man to the gallows.

Then the priest, prostrate at the blessed martyr's tomb, prayed suppliantly that the martyr would mercifully snatch from death the poor man whom the harshness of human wickedness had refused to absolve, lest it become a reproach to the priest if a man died through his accusation.

While he entreated these things with tears, the bonds of the gallows broke apart and the guilty man fell to the ground. Hearing this, the judge, terrified by fear and marveling at the divine power, presumed to harm him no further. Gregory of Tours narrates these things.

There was also a certain noble and rich man named Mulericus. Through pride and intemperance of conduct he offended God, but Saint Quentin, frequently admonishing him in dreams, rebuked his obstinacy. When he refused to heed his admonisher, Quentin afflicted him with blows on a certain night and commanded him to show the beating itself to all the people.

Then the man, although compelled, openly showed his wounds to everyone. Afterward, converted from his error, he bestowed many gifts upon that church.

Another false witness, named Bernuinus, gave false testimony concerning the property of that church of the blessed martyr, wishing entirely to take away a certain woodland from the estate of Nogaridum. The holy martyr rebuked him in dreams and, seizing his nose, proclaimed that he was a falsifier.

Awakened at this utterance, the man put on his shoes. When he was about to wash his face with water, his wife was summoned, and he began to cry out to her what he had seen in the dream. When he came to the point where the martyr himself, holding his nose, had called him a falsifier, he extended his hand and received his severed nose; it immediately fell into the vessel into which the water from his hands was flowing.

Greatly terrified, he postponed going to the palace that day concerning the aforesaid woodland. Nevertheless, not corrected by this punishment, because of the ostentation of pride he furthermore attempted to have a golden nose fashioned for himself and fitted with little golden chains.

The same saint admonished him again in a vision, saying: “Did I not remove your natural nose so that I might show everyone that you had given false testimony? And now through pride you have dared to place a golden one over it. Go now, cast it away from yourself, and strive to make known to everyone that you gave false testimony.”

Therefore, as a testimony to the judgment of faith, that nose of gold remained there for many days as a memorial for future generations.

Section XVII

Saint Andoenus, with his two brothers Ado and Rado, was offered by his mother to Saint Columbanus to be blessed. Columbanus, foreknowing the future, blessed the little children and predicted by a prophetic spirit that they would be distinguished by the virtues of the Christian religion and illustrious through the honors of the age.

Nor was this in vain. For as soon as they began to reach puberty, they were found most pleasing in every respect, first to King Lothair and then to Dagobert.

At length Ado, the firstborn, despising the world, sought the monastic life. Rado, however, was made procurator of the royal treasuries and distributed and guarded them in due order. Saint Andoenus, who was also called Dado, guarded the king's seal or ring; all the affairs of the palace were conducted at his direction.

He continually exhorted the king devoutly to worship Christ, the King of all, without whom no one reigns; to consider himself a companion rather than the lord of the subjected peoples; to spare his subjects; and to subdue the proud.

At that time Saint Eligius also shone with great virtues in the king's court. These two had one heart and one soul. From them all the chief men of the Franks took examples of the Christian religion and drew admonitions of saving doctrine. Beneath a secular habit they served the eternal King.

Thus Saint Andoenus very often outwardly used costly garments and was girded with a golden belt, while beneath he was covered with a hair-shirt. He persisted tirelessly in fasts, prayers, and divine reading; in the ministry of the poor and infirm; and in the reception of guests.

On his own patrimony he also constructed a monastery, which he devoutly filled with rich possessions, ecclesiastical ornaments, books, and various things pertaining to God's service. There he gathered a multitude of holy monks and appointed over them as abbot Saint Agilus, one of Saint Columbanus's disciples, concerning whom more appears below.

When Andoenus himself wished, after casting aside the dignities of the age, to serve God alone, the king and the chief men resisted, saying that he ought to take thought for the benefit of very many rather than satisfy only his own singular desire. Then, by royal command and with many religious men urging it, he received the clerical tonsure at the very same time that Eligius laid aside his hair.

Meanwhile, when the bishop of Rothomagus died, Saint Andoenus was elected by everyone's consent. Although he humbly refused, he was established upon the cathedra.

Knowing also under what great danger a neophyte is ordained, he did not presume to receive holy order immediately. Rather, leaving the see, he became an exile in order to preach the word to nations situated far away.

When he found in the regions of Spain that the peoples had already labored under excessive drought—for seven years had now passed without rain—he prostrated himself in prayer. Immediately so great an abundance of rain followed that it seemed to compensate for the earlier scarcity.

Therefore, having strengthened the people of Spain in faith by word and miracle, he returned to his own region. In the region of Andegavum he encountered a certain poor man who, contrary to ecclesiastical usage, was performing servile work on the Lord's Day. The hand with which he turned a mill suddenly became withered and useless.

Falling at the holy man's knees, he lamented his misery and confessed his guilt. Andoenus impressed the sign of the cross upon his hand and commanded it to serve its former use. He admonished the man to abstain from servile works on the Lord's Days and feast days and to visit the church.

When Andoenus had therefore come to Rothomagus, on one and the same day Andoenus was ordained bishop of that city and Saint Eligius bishop of Noviomagus.

Having undertaken the episcopate, Andoenus shone through many virtues: humble in heart, grave in speech, eminent in learning, armed with devotion, wise in conversation, prudent in counsel, vehement in correction, ardent in loving, and patient in adversities.

His pale face demonstrated the rigor of his abstinence. His cheeks, moistened with tears, indicated the contrition of his heart. Iron rings pressed his milk-white neck, and iron likewise bound his belly and arms. The pile of his bed was constructed not from soft feathers or embroidered tapestries but from rough branches.

His disciples very often saw an immense light sent from heaven in his chamber. They also heard angelic voices speaking with him.

Meanwhile, a certain man abounding in riches and secular dignity, struck by God's judgment with a bitter disease, was carried away in an ecstasy of mind, now nearly dead, and contemplated many torments of infernal punishment.

He was visited by blessed Andoenus, who poured out prayer over him and restored him to his former health. Andoenus commanded him to consecrate to God the place in which he lay. Lest the admonition of so great a pontiff be in vain, Saint Eulalia admonished him again to cause a monastery to be built on that same estate where he had formerly lain, in accordance with the pontiff's command. He merited to hear that he ought still to have twenty years in this world.

At a certain time, while the holy man was illuminating his parish by preaching and was journeying through the place now called the Cross of Saint Andoenus, he sat in a cart, for, wearied by extreme old age, he could not be carried on horseback. Those animals that drew the cart suddenly halted. Although the driver struck them, he could in no way move them from the place.

Perceiving that the animals remained immovable at a divine nod, the man of God immediately turned his eyes toward heaven and beheld a standard of the cross shining with great splendor. When, by the Spirit revealing it to him, he understood that the Lord had chosen that same place for his service, he suddenly found a certain man plowing, took his goad, and marked the sign of the cross. Fixing it in the earth, and placing relics of the saints upon it, he departed.

When the sun set, a fiery column was seen throughout the whole night in that same place. Its brilliance seemed to surpass the brightness of the sun, and it was perceived by the people of the whole province.

A multitude of peoples flowed there, offering their vows to the Lord; those held by various illnesses were healed there. Therefore blessed Leufredus constructed a church there, dedicated in honor of the Holy Cross and Saint Andoenus, where a multitude of monks living according to the rule serves God to this day.

When Andoenus visited the thresholds of the apostles at Rome, he prostrated himself at every memorial of the apostles and martyrs and offered prayers both for himself and for the peace of the Church. Yet he poured forth tears more than words.

Then, when he began the verse, “The saints shall rejoice in glory,” at the confession of blessed Peter, a response was made to him by divine power: “And they shall be joyful in their beds.”

He encountered a man who had been mute for eleven years and, impressing the sign of the cross upon his head, fully restored speech to him. Thereafter, having joined peoples who had formerly disagreed in a covenant of peace, he came to the city of Virdunum.

There, as he entered the church, a certain woman vexed by an unclean spirit, gnashing her teeth, strove with swift course to attack the man of God. He gripped her head with his hand and immediately put the demon to flight.

He governed the church of Rothomagus for forty-four years and migrated to the Lord as a man of ninety years.

Section XVIII

Saint Philibert also, as Vincent writes in book twenty-four, chapter ninety-four, was a youth of good character. When he was reported to King Dagobert, he was summoned to the palace; received into the rank of the nobles, he obtained the fellowship of Andoenus. Andoenus, loving God greatly beneath a golden belt, afterward, through the resplendent merits of his life, ascended the cathedra of the church of Rothomagus.

When Philibert was twenty years old, hearing the divine commands, he chose to become Christ's disciple. Having learned of Agilus, a soldier of God who presided over the monastery of Resbacum, he came there and disposed of his hair [read: laid aside his hair, receiving the tonsure]. After distributing all his possessions in alms, he undertook Christ's sweet yoke.

While he grew there to so great a summit of religion and abstinence that he became worthy of imitation by more perfect men, the ancient enemy, envying him, began to assail his mind so that he would take more ample foods. But, by God's providence, the enemy was disclosed and shown to the man of God through a dream. For when Philibert had been refreshed with food on a certain night, the enemy began to feel his belly and say, “Now it is well here.”

Then Philibert, recognizing the enemy's darts, began to triple the rigor of his abstinence and to implore God's aid against the tyrant's weapons.

When he frequented the church every night, the savage serpent burned against him in three temptations. First, in the shape of a bear, it tried to terrify him within the church. On another night it was seen to pierce him with the iron of a candlestick. On the third night, with arms spread out, it wished to bar the church door. But Philibert expelled all its devices by divine power through the protection of the Holy Cross.

When blessed Agilus died in Christ, Philibert undertook the care of governance with the brothers' consent. He began to govern vigorously the house entrusted to him, to show partiality toward no person, and to uproot completely the vices he found.

Then certain of the brothers, taking up rebellion, presumed to drag the saint of God from the church. But the avenging hand of the Lord did not allow this to go unpunished. One of them died from a lightning strike. Another, after the manner of Arius, deposited all his intestines in a dung heap and ended an unworthy life by an unworthy death.

The others, struck by fear, sought pardon, strove to recall him, and thereafter to serve with the zeal of charity.

When God had placed in his heart the desire to build the Lord's temple from his own labor, by humble entreaty he obtained from Clodoveus, king of the Franks, and Queen Bathild a place in the district of Rothomagus called Gemeticum, where he constructed a noble monastery.

When, for the monastery's business, he wished to send a certain monk to Ebroin, prince of the Franks, he found the monk prostrate with a severe fever. He enjoined the duty of obedience upon him in the power of Christ, saying: “Go and return, and do not be feverish any longer.” Immediately made well, the monk fulfilled the commands.

At another time Philibert proceeded to Paris, compelled by the cause of discord, in order to restore peace. Having obtained what he wished, he discovered the next day that a certain thief had presumed to steal his gloves. He bore this patiently.

But that unhappy man, struck by the Lord, revealed the theft he had committed. Crying out that he was burning, he shouted and could say nothing else; with arms extended, he displayed the fold in which the theft was hidden.

After that man had been punished with death, the citizens carried the stolen objects to the holy monastery.

The grace of an abundance of tears had been granted to Philibert. It was his greatest care not to take food before the Lord visited him through the grace of compunction.

When one of the monks had come to the extremity of life, he became mute in his lips. The man of God entered his presence and began gently to urge him that, if he had some hidden crime for which he had not done penance, he should squeeze his hand. When the monk had done this, the man of God entered the church of Saint Mary and began to beseech the Lord to restore a tongue to the sick man, lest the enemy submerge his soul in the abyss on account of a concealed crime.

When Philibert arose from prayer, another brother announced to him that the sick man could speak and was striving to make his confession. This also was done. For, after making his confession and receiving penance, he delivered his soul to God.

On a certain day, while the brothers were cutting the harvest and the sheaves lay scattered through the fields, a storm suddenly thundered with a roar. But, lest the brothers lose their labors, the man of God made prayer and removed the storm.

At another time, when he turned aside with his companions into the house of a certain religious woman, he blessed wine at that lady's request. Although many drank from it, the vessel was afterward found full.

He also constructed a monastery of nuns, which was nevertheless ten miles distant from his own. At length, after enduring many labors for the Lord, he rested in peace.

Section XIX

There was also another saint named Richarius in the province of Pontina, who from being a peasant became a most renowned religious man. He fed upon barley bread mixed with ashes and upon water tempered with tears.

He warmed lepers in baths and afterward entered those baths himself. He preached in Britain.

King Dagobert, while visiting him, commended himself to his prayers. Richarius strengthened him by the blessing of his holiness and, with priestly authority, chastised him in a free voice. He warned him not to grow proud in secular power, not to place hope in fugitive riches, and not to be exalted by the vain reports of flatterers, but rather to fear the power of God, to praise his immense glory, and to reckon human power as nothing, because it suddenly vanishes like foam upon water when the wind of elation blows.

But he warned him to consider this all the more fearfully: that the powerful shall powerfully suffer torments; that from him to whom more is given, more shall be required; and that one for whom it scarcely suffices to render an account for himself alone—how shall he be able to render one for so many thousands of the people committed to him?

Having received this chastisement most benignly, as a most prudent man, and rejoicing in Richarius's free confidence in the truth, the king asked Christ's priest to come with him to the banquet. In order that he might obtain an opportunity for preaching, Richarius came to table with the king. Throughout that whole day and night, amid the banquets of gladness, he ministered to the banqueters the saving feasts of the word of God.

Thereafter the saint of God, who was venerated by men, meditated upon fleeing men. Hence he also chose a solitary place in the forest. Content with a small little hut made by the cheapest workmanship, he caused his habitation to accord with his life.

There he chastised himself by so great a mortification of the flesh that the bones, with their joints loosened, scarcely held together, and he moved his trembling steps with difficulty while a staff directed them. Greater than the world in mind, he continually considered heavenly things alone, daily conquering in the wilderness him by whom Adam was formerly conquered in paradise.

People wearied by various infirmities flowed to the man from every direction, and he consoled them with the holy medicines of prayers.

At length, knowing beforehand the day of his calling, he fortified his journey with the saving viaticum of the body and blood of Christ; amid acts of thanksgiving and words of prayer, he breathed forth his spirit.

But, wondrous to tell, during his father's funeral rites a disciple, suddenly oppressed by sleep, saw in a vision that he had been carried away into a most splendid hall, most beautiful with every adornment. There he saw blessed Richarius dwelling with a glorious and joyful countenance and saying to him: “Behold, Brother Sigobardus, what a dwelling God has prepared for me: in place of the vile one that I had on earth, a most beautiful one in heaven; in place of a contemptible one, a glorious one; in place of a most obscure one, a most luminous one; in place of a smoky one, one resplendent with every sweetness.”

Awakening more joyful, the disciple completed the work of the funeral rites.

Many miracles take place at Richarius's tomb. On a certain day, some men in bonds and chains were being led along a road that was near the church in which his body rested. As they approached, they began to cry out: “Saint Richarius, release us.” Immediately, when their bonds broke, they were released.

Saint Augadrisma was the daughter of the illustrious Robert, who, sprung from noble stock, was the bearer of King Lothair's ring. The illustrious Siminus sought this most religious virgin from the aforesaid Robert, wishing her to be joined to his son Ausbert. When Robert gave his consent, therefore, the chaste maiden was betrothed to the chaste youth.

Then both, desiring chastely to preserve integrity of mind and body, entreated the Lord that he would deign to expel the poisons of pleasures from their hearts.

Thereafter, when the blessed virgin Augadrisma prayed that her beauty might be turned into deformity, the Lord immediately heard her prayers. For her face at once appeared so ulcerated and covered with the most unclean leprosy that whoever saw her judged that she should immediately be separated from human company.

A multitude of physicians then hurried to her; but the more insistently they applied their treatment, the more ulcerated and deformed Christ's bride appeared.

Then her father, understanding that this happened by divine action, asked her whether she had chosen to determine the course of her life by a vow of virginity. She said: “I desire it, my father, and pray for it with all my efforts. For Christ, whom I have desired as my bridegroom, inflicts this affliction of the body upon me so that he may grant brightness to my soul. This present life gives delight, pious father, but it deceives, because everything that is in the world is vanity.”

On hearing this, Robert summoned the illustrious Siminus and clearly disclosed what had happened concerning his daughter. To this Siminus replied: “One ought to follow the Lord's will in all things and not to wish in any way to oppose his nod.”

Blessed Ausbert also came when summoned. There he drew up a deed of separation, so that the holy virgin Augadrisma would be called not his bride but Christ's.

When this had been done, she was sent to the city of Rothomagus, to Bishop Andoenus, so that, after receiving his blessing and being covered with the sacred veil, she might merit to be consecrated in the profession of virginity.

When this had been accomplished, she was restored to her former beauty and graceful appearance, so that all who heard of it said that Christ had chosen her for himself as bride and handmaid.

She was then made governor of the monastery that is outside the walls of Belvacum. As she was placed over the others, so she was humbler than all: cheap in clothing, moderate in food, devoted from infancy to continual prayer, most adorned with chastity, radiant with gladness of heart and body, and most abundantly heaped with the virtue of patience, the service of charity, and distributions of alms. Adorned with these virtues, she shone like a lamp that had been kindled.

Section XXI

After these things the man of the Lord Ausbert, although brought unwillingly by his father into the king's court, began—since he was distinguished by keenness of intellect—to be a learned court scribe, a composer of royal privileges, and the bearer of the royal ring with which those same privileges were sealed.

When, in the customary manner before the king and the chief men, he heard various instruments of the musical art resounding upon strings and pipes, he said to himself: “O good Creator, what will it be for those who love you to hear in the heavens the unfailing song of the angels, if you grant even to mortals so great a skill that, by expertise in the art and by the sweetness of song, they stir the minds of their hearers?”

After these things he became a monk at Fontanella, where blessed Wandregisilus then presided, and was consecrated a priest by blessed Andoenus.

He foretold to the youth Theodoric that he would become king. As proof of this prophecy, the field in which he then stood produced green grass in the winter season, perpetually greener than the other parts of the field.

After blessed Andregisilus [read: Wandregisilus], who was abbot for nearly twenty years, Lambertus of Taverna was elected. He was afterward made bishop of Lugdunum after blessed Genesius. Blessed Ausbert was then made abbot of Fontanella. After blessed Andoenus, moreover, he was made bishop.

On a certain day, after the solemnities of the Masses had been completed, he ordered all the people of Rothomagus, both noble and ignoble, to be brought in to the anticipated banquets. When everyone had reclined in due order, the bishop sat down at the table of the poor.

The dues from public estates that, in canonical order, were customarily paid canonically to the bishop's portion, he remitted to the priests for the restoration of churches.

He gave the monks of Fontanella a privilege that they should always elect an abbot from among themselves. In that privilege, however, he bound them under the bond of excommunication if either they or their posterity departed from the Rule of Saint Benedict.

That privilege was made in the year of the Lord six hundred eighty-two, in the sixteenth year of King Theodoric and the fifth year of the episcopate of the said Ausbert, in a synod in the city of Rothomagus.

Accused before Prince Pippin, Ausbert was carried into exile at Altus Mons by that same prince's order. He bore this humbly, although no crime stood against him.

When he died and a waxed shroud was being placed upon his head, he appeared to open his eyes.

A lamp kindled before his tomb not only burned unceasingly but also overflowed, so that a vessel was placed beneath it into which its overflow might be poured back.

Section XXII

There was also in his time Saint Agilus, the son of Agnoald, a most noble man and counselor of King Sigibert. He was a boy of good disposition, whom his parents named Agilus because of the swift movements of his infancy, and they offered him to Saint Columbanus to be blessed.

After receiving his blessing, the boy was entrusted to Saint Eustasius, of whom mention was made above, a man of good religious life, to be instructed in sacred letters together with other sons of nobles who afterward became prelates in various places. Progressing from virtue to virtue, he was made abbot in the monastery of Resbacum.

Now when blessed Abbot Columbanus had been expelled from his monastery by King Theodoric through the counsel of the most wicked Queen Brunichild, and blessed Eustasius had been substituted in his place, it was decreed at that time, by the prudent consent of the brothers, that the upright Agilus should be sent to her. She had been especially hostile to blessed Columbanus because he kept women from gaining access to the monastery and had opposed her in this same matter, although she was queen.

Accordingly Agilus set out. While he was still far from the monastery, a nephew of Duke Wandelenus suddenly appeared with retainers who, under the pretext of hunting, were watching the monastery's exits after the manner of robbers.

Stretching out his arm, this man attempted to strike the most gentle man Agilus. But Agilus, fear cast aside, opposed to him the sign of the cross. Immediately the man's arm became rigid and, just as it had been extended, remained inflexible by God's power, so that no one was able to remove the sword from his fist, nor could he himself move a foot from the place.

While everyone stood astonished, that unhappy man, with head bowed, sought pardon and mercy from the holy man. Agilus made prayer; as soon as he touched the man's arm, its former strength returned. And although the sword's hilt still remained joined to the flesh of his hand, Agilus freed him even from this by prayer. The man was so greatly pierced by compunction that, abandoning the military cloak, he assumed the habit of religion.

When the fame of this miracle had filled the royal walls, Saint Agilus came and presented himself before the eyes of the king and queen. They received him with great honor. Both the king and the queen, pierced by compunction and prostrate at his feet, sought forgiveness for the rashness and the trouble they had inflicted upon the holy men.

After these things Lothair, raised to the throne of three kingdoms, decreed by synodal determination that learned men should be sent to recall the neighboring nations from error. From the assembly of many bishops and priests, therefore, the most prudent Agilus and Abbot Eustasius together were chosen for the aforesaid work. Going forth, they converted many to the faith of Christ.

On this very journey Saint Agilus shone through miracles. He healed a demoniac woman by a word and healed the virgin Sadaberga, of whom mention was made above, when she had been deprived of sight. He himself also, seized by a most violent fever, was freed in an angelic vision.

On a certain day, while the saint was traversing the boundaries of the wilderness, they came to a certain place beside a torrent. There the saint and his companions rested beneath the shade of an apple tree. When he had prayed there for a long time, he saw in the air a splendid cloud, flashing with rays and displaying the figure of a cross.

From its brightness so great a continuous light flashed for three days and nights that one could see everything there clearly, as at midday. For three days dew was also seen there in the form of a cross from morning until evening. From this it was revealed that a monastery was to be constructed there. When it had been built with the king's consent, the aforesaid Agilus was made abbot there.

On a certain evening, while he was going around the monastery's workshops and proceeding toward the guest-house that Saint Andoenus had established there by his ordinance, he heard at the monastery's gate a faint voice, as of a man lamenting.

Opening the window that was attached to the gate, he saw before the doors a poor man full of ulcers who asked to be received into the guest-house. Saint Agilus turned to his companion, Brother Brandolinus, and said: “Behold how, occupied with other useful affairs, we have neglected things of such importance. Go, therefore, more swiftly, and prepare refreshment for him.”

When Brandolinus had gone away, Agilus himself opened the door and said to the poor man: “Come, brother. Behold, we shall do for you what is fitting.”

When the man answered that he could not walk because of the pain of his ulcers, Agilus placed him upon his own shoulders and carried him into the house without feeling any weight. He placed him upon a seat beside the fire, for it was winter. Taking a pitcher and linen so that he might pour water upon the man's hands, he saw him suddenly disappear.

A great fragrance of pleasant odor filled that same house as though with perfumes.

The devil, envying this hospitality, came to him after Matins while he was praying according to custom, in the form of an enormous dragon, raising its head and emitting venom against him. But Agilus, fortifying himself with the shield of the cross, dispersed all these things.

At length, when he was ninety-eight years old and was beseeching the Lord to lead him out of the sojourn of this misery and perpetually guard the flock committed to him, a glorious young man appeared to him when his prayer was completed and said: “My dear Agilus, when two years have been completed, I shall receive you. Do what you are doing, and I shall not abandon you, but shall be with you.”

Accordingly, afterward completing his hundredth year, he happily migrated to Christ. At his passing, voices were heard of a choir of virgins singing: “Today Saint Agilus proceeds with the highest praises to his reward. He is exceedingly happy, because he preserved chastity, and as a hundred-year-old virgin he ascends to heaven.”

At his burial, some sick persons were healed.

In the place cited above, the same Vincent also narrates concerning a certain saint named Videbotus. While he was living alone in a certain cell with his disciple Miriuarus, and while he was praying in the church that stood beside his cell, a poor man at the door asked that alms be given to him.

When the man of God heard this, he commanded his disciple Miriuarus to cut into two parts the one loaf that alone remained to them for sustenance and to give half to the poor man.

When this had been done, another poor man came a little afterward, likewise seeking alms. The holy man commanded another quarter of the bread to be given to him.

A third poor man arrived, and he commanded a third part to be given to him. The disciple bore this resentfully and said: “Do you not wish at least half a loaf to be preserved for us?”

“Do not,” the saint said, “be anxious about food and drink, but remember the Lord's promise, which says, ‘Give, and it shall be given to you.’”

The poor man had scarcely departed from there when a fourth poor man arrived. The saint ordered the remainder of the bread to be given to him. When the disciple again murmured, he strengthened him in faith. He had scarcely finished his speech of exhortation when, behold, four little boats—according to the number of the poor men among whom he had divided all his sustenance—were sent to him, full of food and drink.

He shone through many miracles. When, after his death, his body had remained incorrupt for a long time, a certain man, insolently wishing to investigate whether it was true that his body was whole, caused the tomb to be opened by force.

When he had looked upon it without any reverence, he suddenly cried out in terror, “Ah, Saint Videbotus!” Immediately he became both mute and deaf and was weakened in his whole body. He remained so until the end of his life.

Section XXIII

Concerning Saint Forseus.

This saint was noble by birth but nobler in faith. Entrusted from infancy to priests through divine grace and instructed in sacred letters and monastic disciplines, he sowed the saving seeds of the sacred word among his relatives.

On a certain day, seized by the affliction of sickness, he moved to his paternal home. While he had begun the evening psalmody and was intent upon prayer not far from the house, he suddenly stood surrounded by darkness and, as though already dead, was carried to the nearest house.

Then he beheld four hands stretched down above him. They held him by the arms, raised him with their wings, and supported him on either side. He himself perceived the angelic bodies as though through a mist. He also saw a third angel, armed with a white shield and sword, going before him.

These three, shining with equal splendor, sang as one of them began: “The saints shall go from virtue to virtue; the God of gods shall be seen in Zion.”

He also heard another, unknown song of many thousands of angels, of which he could understand scarcely a few words, including these: “And they went forth to meet Christ.”

Then one from the heavenly hosts commanded the armed angel who went before him to return the soul to the body. The holy man, recognizing that he had been stripped from the body and being afflicted with aversion to separation from the angelic fellowship, said that he did not wish to be separated from them.

The angel answered him: “When your care has been completed, we shall return to take you up.”

Then they sang this half of the verse: “The God of gods shall be seen in Zion.” Gladdened by the sweetness of that song, his soul was unable to understand how it entered the body.

Then, around cockcrow, he heard the words of those who stood around him in amazement and said to them: “Why do you, standing astonished, utter troubled sounds?”

They related the sequence to him: how, from his passing that evening until cockcrow, they had kept his lifeless body in their midst.

He sat up, turning over in his mind the angelic brightness and sweetness. Reflecting upon the nature of the care about which he had been admonished, he was sorrowful because there was no one who might explain it clearly to him, and he feared lest the returning angels find him unprepared.

He sought and received communion of the sacred body and blood, and he lived in sickness on that day and the next. At midnight on Tuesday, however, his feet having been stiffened by cold and his hands extended in prayer, he recalled the most joyful vision and received death with gladness.

He saw two angels coming to him and carrying away his soul. He also beheld a third angel, armed with a white shield and flashing sword, going before him.

Then he heard demons crying out: “Let us advance and stir up battles before his face.”

When they had advanced, they hurled unknown missiles against him. The angel who went before him received them upon his shield and immediately extinguished them.

Then the demons, setting themselves against the angels, said: “He often spoke idle words, and therefore he ought not to enjoy the blessed life unharmed.”

The angels said to them: “Unless you bring forth principal vices against him, he shall not perish on account of the least ones.”

Then the devil said: “Just as he received evil from customary practice, so let him receive vengeance from the judge above.”

The holy angel said: “Let us be judged before God.” As the adversaries battled, they were crushed.

The devil said: “The servant who knows the will of his lord and does not do it shall be beaten with many blows.”

The angel answered him: “What did this man know concerning the will of his Lord and not do?”

The devil said: “He received the gifts of the wicked.”

The angel said: “He believed that each one had done penance.”

The devil said: “At times he ought to have proved the perseverance of their penance and whether they bore fruits.”

The angel said: “Let us be judged before God.” But the demon succumbed.

A third time the devil arose to fight against him. He said: “Until now we believed God to be truthful, who promised that he would eternally punish every offense that is not purged on earth. This man, therefore, once received a garment from a usurer and was not punished for it. Where, then, is the justice of God?”

The angel said to him: “Be silent, because you are ignorant of God's hidden judgments. As long as repentance is hoped for, divine mercy accompanies a man.”

The demon answered: “But here there is no place for repentance.”

The angel said to him: “You are ignorant of the depth of God's judgments.”

Then the devil struck him so severely that, after he was afterward restored to life, he always retained the mark of the blow. With God permitting it, he received this blow for having accepted that garment.

Another demon said: “There still remains that narrow gate at which we shall be able to overcome him, namely that commandment: ‘You shall love your neighbor as yourself.’”

The angel said to him: “This man assuredly performed good works toward his neighbors.”

The adversary answered: “This does not suffice unless he also loves himself.”

The angel said to him: “The fruit of love is to do good, because God shall render to each one according to his works.”

The demon said: “But because he did not fulfill the word concerning the love of God, he shall be damned.”

When the wicked crowd had fought against him, the holy angels were at length the victors.

Again the demon said: “If God is not unjust, and if the transgression of his word displeases him, this man shall not be free from punishments. He promised to renounce the world and its pomps, and, on the contrary, he loved the world, against that which is written: ‘Do not love the world, nor the things that are in the world.’”

The angels said to him: “He did not love the things that are of the world for himself, but loved them in order to distribute them to needy men.”

The devil said: “In whatever manner they are loved, it is contrary to the divine commandment.” In this accusation the adversaries were defeated.

Again the devil turned to crafty accusations, saying: “It is written, ‘If you do not announce his iniquity to the wicked man, I shall require his blood from your hand.’ This man did not duly proclaim penance to sinners.”

The holy angel answered: “When hearers despise the word, even the teacher's tongue is impeded when he sees that the preaching which was heard is held in contempt. Hence it belongs to a prudent man to know how to be silent when it is not the proper time.”

Thus there was a battle against every contradiction of the demons until, with the Lord as judge, the angels triumphed and the adversaries were defeated. The holy man was then surrounded by an immense brightness.

One of the angels, as Bede attests, said to him: “Look upon the world.” Looking, he saw a dark valley and four fires in the air, separated from one another by certain spaces.

The angel said: “These are the four fires that set the world ablaze. One is the fire of falsehood, when men do not fulfill what they promised in baptism, namely to renounce the devil and his pomps. The second is the fire of covetousness, when they place the riches of the world before the love of God. The third is the fire of dissension, when they do not fear to offend the minds of their neighbors over superfluous matters. The fourth is the fire of impiety, when they reckon as nothing the despoiling of the weaker and the committing of fraud against them.”

Then those fires approached, were brought together into one, and drew near to him. Being afraid, he said to the angel: “Lord, the fire draws near to me.”

The angel said to him: “What you did not kindle shall not burn within you. This fire examines each person according to the merits of men. For, just as the body burns through unlawful pleasures, so also shall it blaze through the punishment that is its due.”

He also saw choirs of angels holding together [read: amid choirs of holy angels singing]: “No labor should seem hard, nor any time long, through which the glory of eternity is acquired.”

Instructed by these and other words, he stood above the roof of the church among the holy angels. While he considered his own body, he was commanded to recognize and resume it.

Because he feared it as though it were an unknown corpse and was unwilling to approach, the angel said: “Do not fear to receive this body. Although it is feeble, you shall carry it without any resistance from infirmity or vices. For in this tribulation you have overcome unlawful desires, so that your former urges may not prevail against you.”

Then he saw the body opened at the breast and entered it. As though from the profound repose of death, therefore, he arose in the presence of a multitude of relatives, neighbors, and clerics, groaning over the magnitude of human foolishness and marveling at the arduous and difficult passage.

In a wondrous manner, his flesh displayed the burning that the soul alone had endured, namely upon the shoulders and face because of the garment that he had received from that usurer, concerning whom mention was made above.

Going forth from there, he preached the word of the Lord and announced to all the peoples of the Goths those things that he had seen and heard.

When, illustrious through divine powers and instructed again by the holy angel concerning those things that are suitable for the work of preaching, he had preached for a long time, he was unable to endure the multitude of the peoples rushing upon him. Perceiving also that certain men had been moved against him by envy, he departed.

He crossed foreign shores through Britain into Saxony. There he was received honorably by King Sigibert and hastened to construct a monastery in the place delivered to him by the king.

When this had been done, desiring to estrange himself from every care of the world and of the monastery itself, he left its care to his brother Foillanus and himself sought the wilderness, where he pursued wisdom with his other brother Ulcanus.

When, because certain circumstances arose, he had been summoned—indeed, compelled—by the people or the king to give counsel, he left the wilderness he desired for himself. Treating all matters with a vigilant mind, he sailed to the shores of Gaul.

There he was received honorably by Clodoveus, king of the Franks, and constructed a monastery in the place called Latiniacum.

Not long afterward, when the brothers had been set in order, he was seized by illness while journeying with the king and migrated to the heavenly kingdoms.

After four years, however, his immaculate body, without any decay, was translated by the reverend bishops Eligius and Ausbert.

His feast is celebrated on the fourth day before the Nones of March. Some say that this legend of Forseus was written by the venerable Bede.

Section XXIV

Saint Andomarus was born of noble and religious parents. As Vincent relates in book twenty-four of the Historical Mirror, from the accounts of his deeds, he was born in the Golden Valley, not far from the city of Constantia.

Religiously educated from his cradle, when his mother died, he and his father Fruilphus—different in age but alike in mind—left all things for Christ and proceeded together to the monastery of Luxovium, founded by blessed Columbanus in Burgundy.

There, under Abbot Eustasius, they devoted themselves to the sacred rule. Fruilphus persevered there laudably until the end of his life.

Thereafter, when Andomarus's fame had become widely known, he was called to episcopal honor to govern and teach the people of the city of Toruanum, and he received it with great humility of mind.

In this rank, sowing the word of God, curing the sicknesses of souls and bodies, and applying himself to works of mercy, he duly governed the people entrusted to him.

He again illuminated with the light of the Gospel those very people of Toruanum who had returned to idolatry after Christianity, and he entirely overthrew the worship of idols there.

When, on a certain night, he was beseeching the Lord according to his custom, the devil sent into him so inflammatory a temptation of the flesh that he did not remember ever having experienced its like. Calling to mind the example of blessed Benedict, he went outside stripped of every garment and immediately cast himself into the stings of nettles and thorns.

Having rolled there for a long time, he came out wounded in his whole body. When he burned painfully enough outwardly, he extinguished that which was burning unlawfully within.

Likewise, while proceeding to visit the places neighboring the city, he lay beneath a certain tree at one place, wishing to rest at midday. When he arose there from sleep, he fixed in that same tree a cross of the Lord fashioned from pieces of wood.

On the following night many lights appeared there. From that time Christ healed many infirmities there for the sake of his soldier, and displayed innumerable miracles there to increase the accumulation of his merits.

For very many years before his death he lost the light of his eyes. Thus, blind outwardly but illuminated inwardly, he beheld God as a true Israelite.

As was said above, when the body of Saint Vedastus was translated together with many bishops, among whom Andomarus himself was one, he, though blind, was illuminated by the merits of that saint.

Bearing this reluctantly, he asked to be returned to his former blindness for a greater exercise of his patience. This also was done.

When he recognized that his death was imminent, on that final day he arose from the bed upon which he lay seized by fever. Entering the church, he prayed at length with tears.

After delivering a divine exhortation to the clergy and people, he returned to his bed. Stretched out in his whole body after the customary manner of the dead, amid words of thanksgiving and divine praise, he breathed forth his spirit with joy and a glorious countenance.

Those who were present testified that at the passing of his holy soul so great a fragrance of odor was diffused through that house that the house seemed to have been filled with every perfume.

After his death, oil was seen by God's power to drip wondrously from the lamps hanging at his tomb. Through him the Lord also deigned to display many healings and other miracles there.

A certain wicked man had borrowed a silver solidus from his co-sponsor. Afterward, breaking faith, he denied with an oath that he had received the said money from him.

Then the man who had lent it said: “Swear to me upon the body of Andomarus, through his powers and merits, that you did not receive from me that which I require from you; and I shall acquiesce in your denial of the matter.”

When the other man raised his hands to swear with an audacious heart, divine vengeance followed immediately. For, in the place where he stood, both his eyes burst in a single moment; afterward, on the third day, he died a most miserable death.

When a certain shepherd entered during the vintage into a vineyard bestowed upon the glorious man and secretly filled the fold of his garment, he returned to his companions with the plunder.

His companions asked him to share with them some of the stolen grapes. When he put his right hand into the fold to supply them, both hands adhered so immovably that neither could his left hand, with which the fold was held enclosed, be withdrawn, nor could his right hand, thrust into the fold, be brought back out. His mouth also twisted backward, and he lost the use of his tongue.

At length his master, having compassion upon him, proceeded with him to the church while all who saw them stood astonished. Prostrate in prayer with tears, they obtained from the saint the grace of his former health.

Section XXV

Saint Praeiectus, bishop of the people of Arverna and illustrious martyr.

While he was still in his mother's womb, his mother saw in a dream that a son reddened with blood came forth through her side. When the mother told this to a certain servant of God, he disclosed to her that this boy would obtain the palm of martyrdom.

When the boy was born in the city of Arverna, he was instructed in letters. Because he was gracious in all things, he was entrusted to the archdeacon of the city to be raised.

Intent upon every virtue, when many poor people came to him on a certain day and sought alms, he learned through his servant that he possessed no more than two denarii. When he ordered the purse to be brought and invoked the Lord, as much money was found in it as the crowd of poor people standing before the doors required.

On a certain Easter day, while he sat at table with others, three among them abstained from meat. When the others mocked them, Saint Praeiectus admonished the mockers not to rebuke by ridicule those whom they ought to venerate.

But when they did not desist, the pavement of the upper room fell with the mockers. Praeiectus alone, remaining with those who abstained, remained at the table.

When, therefore, the blessed bishop of the city migrated to the Lord and the clergy and people chose Praeiectus, a certain archdeacon of the city usurped the episcopate for himself through payment. But he did not live beyond the limit of forty days.

When they wished, therefore, to elect another illustrious man, he resisted the election with all his ability and gave counsel and admonition that they should raise Praeiectus to the cathedra.

Praeiectus, therefore, having been elected, excelled in holiness and grace in all things.

At a certain time, when he wished to approach the king of Francia, he passed through a certain abbey where Saint Marinus was gravely ill. He immediately healed him by his prayer.

He then approached the king and obtained what he desired. When Praeiectus was returning, Abbot Marinus followed him, so that, just as they loved one another, they might together consummate martyrdom.

While they were praying together in a certain place, the chief men of the city who were pursuing them suddenly rushed upon them. After beheading Saint Marinus, they believed that they had killed Saint Praeiectus and began to return to their companions.

Saint Praeiectus called to them from the place in which he was praying, saying: “Behold, I am the one whom you seek. Do what you desire.”

Then one of them struck him in the breast with a sword. While Praeiectus still lived and prayed for his killer, the man struck his head with the sword and cast out his brain.

Certain men who had consented to the death, standing nearby, saw three stars shining above the house in which those saints lay slain together with one of their attendants.

Radebertus, who killed the saint, not long afterward expired while still alive, consumed by worms.

Another man, while hunting on a certain day, fell from his horse. His right arm was broken, and he incurred weakness in his other limbs.

When he could be cured by no medicine, he returned to himself and went with his wife to Saint Praeiectus. Seeking pardon, he repeatedly anointed himself at the saint's tomb with oil from the lamp.

Thus quickly healed, he presented to the holy martyr's church a certain silver vessel worth ten marks. When the others learned this, they likewise repented and offered a great quantity of gold and silver.

At the same time, as Sigebertus narrates, in the territory of Cameracum the virgin of God Maxcleudis, fleeing her lover Harduinus because of her vow of virginity, was martyred by him. He was immediately blinded and, after three years, was given sight by her.

Around the same time in Francia there were Saint Viuardus, archbishop of Remi, and Reolus his successor. There was also Bertharius the martyr, who was the first abbot of the monastery of Antillare, as Sigebertus notes.

As Vincent relates in the place cited above, this Bertharius, instructed in conduct and wisdom under the aforesaid Viuardus, pontiff of Remi, sought the monastery of Luxovium. There, under blessed Abbot Eustasius, he laudably led the monastic life. Afterward he was abbot of another place, namely the monastery of Antillare.

While this Saint Bertharius was ordering very many matters, he by chance decided that his godson Daguinus, whom he had raised from the sacred font and had determined should become a monk, ought to be struck with the rod of rebuke, as his faults required.

Daguinus, given over by his own desert to Satan with Judas, indignantly bore his father's rebuke. When the weary Bertharius reclined upon his little bed and gave his limbs to sleep, that same son of Satan rushed upon him and attacked him with a mortal wound.

Seizing the iron weapon with which he had struck him, Daguinus cast it into the fishpond that was within the monastery, as quickly as he could, so that it might be hidden. He then saw the liquid shrink from receiving the iron into itself, as though it were aware of so great a crime, and became terrified. For as soon as the weapon touched the water, it floated upon the waters like a feather of the lightest material.

The murderer himself, having become mad, sought the church and began to strike the signal with bloody hands.

The brothers arose in wonder at the unaccustomed hour. Hearing that the holy man had been killed, they ran as quickly as possible to his bed and found breath still in him.

They seized Daguinus and brought him before Bertharius, wishing to know what he judged concerning so great a crime that had been lost [read: so great a crime that had been committed].

But Bertharius, not unmindful of the Lord's commandment, said: “Strive, brother, to make God favorable to you; for, as far as concerns me, I release you free from every act of impiety against me.”

For a long time afterward, oil was seen to well forth and flow from his tomb, bringing health to all who were beset by disease.

Section XXVI

In the second year of Constantine the emperor, grandson of Heraclius, Amatus, bishop of Senomanum, as Sigebertus says, was long afflicted by Theodoric, king of Francia, with a grave and irrevocable exile.

In the fifth year of Constantine, Theodore, having held a synod in England, established many things useful to the Church.

He wrote a penitential book, distinguishing with wondrous and careful discretion the manner of individual faults in the penances to be imposed and the length of time for them.

For example, in distinction twenty-seven Theodore says: “If a man who has a vow of virginity is joined to a wife, he afterward does not dismiss the wife [read: let him not afterward dismiss the wife], but let him do penance for three years.”

The same Theodore says in cause twenty-two, question five: “If anyone, compelled for the redemption of his life or for any cause or necessity, swears falsely, because he loved the body more than the soul, let him do penance for three forty-day periods. Others adjudge three years, and one of these upon bread and water.”

Other similar things are found in various places. But it must certainly be held that, in offenses of this kind and in others, penances in the forum of conscience are discretionary according to all the authorities.

Around those times, as Sigebertus says, a rainbow appeared in the sky in the month of March, and all flesh was afraid, so that everyone said that the consummation of the age had come.

Childeric, king in Gaul, by the levity of his conduct kindled against himself the hatred of the Franks. Saint Leodegarius, bishop of Augustodunum, was shut up by him at Luxovium.

In Italy there were such rains and thunders as no age of men remembers, so that even men and livestock perished by lightning. Unless the Lord had been rendered favorable through the litanies that were performed daily, men would not have been able to thresh or to store grain in granaries. Indeed, the rains were so great that legumes sprang up anew from those same rains and came to maturity.

Lodilo the Frank, whom Hylderic had ordered to be beaten while bound to a stake, caught Hylderic while he was hunting and killed him together with his pregnant wife Blitild, and restored Theodoric to the kingdom.

In the sixteenth year of the empire of the aforesaid Constantine, King Theodoric received the most wicked man Ebroin back into favor. At his counsel he assembled a synod of bishops and, in it, deprived many of them of their episcopates according to Ebroin's judgment. He condemned some of them to irrevocable exile.

Under this stormy tumult of domestic persecution, Saint Lambertus also, removed from the episcopate of Traiectum, sought the harbor of monastic quiet in the monastery of Stabula. He dwelt there for seven years.

At the same time Saint Leodegarius, after being tormented for a long time by Ebroin, after hunger and the filth of prison, after the plucking out of his eyes, after the cutting of the soles of his feet, and after the excision of his tongue and lips, at length consummated his martyrdom by the cutting off of his head. These things are from Sigebertus.

Section XXVII

Vincent, however, sets forth the history of this Leodegarius more fully from the accounts of his deeds in book twenty-four, chapter one hundred twenty-four, of the Historical Mirror.

He was once commended by most noble and religious parents to King Clothar. He was instructed by Dido, his maternal uncle and bishop of Pictavum, and was made archdeacon.

He shone with so great a grace of every virtue that, adorning the nobility of his birth with a greater nobility of conduct, he also governed most vigorously a certain abbey of monks at the bishop's entreaties.

After these things, when Clothar died and his younger son Clothar succeeded to the kingdom, because the young king's judgment seemed less than sufficient for ruling, Leodegarius was compelled by the king himself, his chief men, and many bishops to remain in the palace for the counsel and providence of the kingdom.

There he had so great a solicitude for piety according to God that he merited to be promoted as pontiff of the church of Edua.

After ten years of his episcopate, when the younger Lothair died, the holy man was more gravely burdened with affairs. By the will of God and of the venerable chief men who conducted the matter together with the prelate, he made Childeric, the brother of King Clothar and a very suitable youth, king.

But Ebroin, great among the chief men of the kingdom, strove to place over the kingdom Theodoric, the full brother of Childeric himself. He did this not for the good of the kingdom, but because, cast out from power and hateful to everyone, he feared the wrath of the king and the chief men.

Frustrated, therefore, of his hope, Ebroin, from fear of death, sought from the king that, after leaving the world, he might remain in a monastery.

When the king granted this and kept his brother Theodoric in free custody lest he contrive anything against the kingdom, the commonwealth enjoyed so great a peace that all Francia rejoiced together in the bishop's holiness and the king's diligence.

But after one year the devil stirred up a whirlwind of adversity. At the suggestions of wicked men, the king was corrupted from great love for the man into great hatred against him. He assailed him with so concealed a hatred that he inquired most attentively into the opportunity and manner of his death.

But the bishop, bearing this gently and embracing all his enemies as friends, obtained from the king that he might celebrate Easter Day in the city over which he presided.

Behold, on that very day it was announced to him that the king had considered his death during the night and had decreed to accomplish it. Yet he trembled at nothing, but on that very day shared the king's table after the Lord's example.

At length he took refuge in the monastery of Luxovium, serving God. With complete charity he also served Ebroin, who was hiding there in the monastic habit.

Without delay, when the king had died and Theodoric reigned, the joyful citizens approached their bishop with many tears, beseeching him to return to his church, which had now long been left destitute.

Compelled, therefore, by the desire of his citizens and the abbot's command, he returned with honor to his see.

Immediately Ebroin apostatized and obtained from the king the dignity of seneschal. He who had formerly been evil to everyone afterward became worse. With his whole zeal he desired to kill blessed Leodegarius.

He therefore sent soldiers to drag him away from the city. When the man of God learned this, he admonished the people among whom he was then preaching not to be afraid.

Immediately he went forth from the city in pontifical attire and, surrounded by a procession of people weeping, was captured by the soldiers. Because they had not yet been commanded to kill him, they gouged out his eyes and confined him in a certain abbey until the command of the apostate Ebroin.

After two years Saint Leodegarius and his brother Garinus, whom Ebroin had exiled with many others, were brought to the king's palace. When Leodegarius answered Ebroin's mockeries with words of temperance and justice, that perfidious man ordered Garinus to be crushed with stones and the holy bishop to be led for the whole day with bare feet through a certain river that flowed over exceedingly sharp stones.

Hearing that the holy man praised God amid so great a torment, Ebroin caused his tongue to be cut out together with his lips and delivered him to a certain guard so that he might reserve him for new torments.

But the guard, unwilling to treat him indecently, placed him in a certain monastery of holy nuns. After remaining there a little while, Leodegarius recovered the office of teaching and preaching.

Meanwhile King Theodoric convened a council with Ebroin. In it, by God's judgment, those who had presumed to lay a hand upon the bishop first received this: one of them was exiled and at length beheaded; the other, to whom Ebroin had given a pontificate on account of this deed, was convicted of crime, scourged before everyone, and hanged himself with a noose.

After these things Leodegarius was ordered to be summoned. Lest he appear among the bishops, he was detained outside the council. But when, being questioned there concerning future things, he answered truthfully, he foretold concerning both himself and Ebroin when and how each would end this life.

Then Ebroin, seeing him glory in his own martyrdom and in Ebroin's eternal punishment, went forth from the council confounded and commanded a certain soldier to guard the bishop in the meantime.

While the soldier was leading him to his home, which was far away, one of the companions gave a drink to the thirsty bishop. Immediately an immense light in the form of a crown surrounded his head.

When many saw that it had come from heaven, they asked the bishop himself what this was. But, prostrating himself in thanksgiving, after prayer he raised his guides unharmed, who had collapsed half dead from fear, and obtained that they should thereafter conduct themselves religiously.

When Ebroin heard this, he sent four executioners and commanded that Leodegarius be beheaded.

When they had brought him out of custody and led him into the hidden places of the forests, he said: “There is no need, brothers, to be wearied any longer. Fulfill here the desire of the one who sent you.”

At these words three of them, divinely corrected, prostrated themselves and sought pardon from him. The fourth, insulting him, beheaded the saint after his prayer and cast his upright body to the ground with a thrust of his foot. But a little afterward that man himself, raging, was seized by a demon and cast into the fire; thus he ended as he had deserved.

Two years after the saint's passion, Ebroin heard that he was being made illustrious by many miracles. Tormented by envy, he sent a soldier there to report to him the certainty of this matter.

But the envious and proud soldier struck the saint's tomb with his foot and said: “Let him die who believes that a dead man can work miracles.”

Immediately Ebroin was seized by a demon. Raging and wasting away with envy, he desired to extinguish the saint's fame. In those same days, just as the saint had foretold in the council, Ebroin was killed by the sword.

At length, when Leodegarius's body had been raised and was being carried to the monastery of which he had been abbot, it shone through so many and so great miracles on the way that absolutely no one approached with faith who was not immediately cured of every affliction.

Section XXVIII

Around the same time Saint Vigilius, noble by birth and illustrious in holiness, occupied the episcopate of Antisiodorum for twenty-six years.

At his own expense he built a church of blessed Mary outside the city of Antisiodorum and immediately established in it a community of monks. There he also established a hospital for the poor, which is called the House of God.

Because of his holiness, he was hateful to the enemies of justice and was killed in the forest of Scotia by Vuaracho, seneschal of the king of Francia.

This Vuaracho succeeded in the same principate Ebroin, who had caused Saint Leodegarius to be killed. Ebroin himself was seen at his death to be carried into hell by demons.

When Saint Vigilius was being carried from Compendium to his own city, he was borne through the city of Senonica. As those carrying the body passed before a certain house in which prisoners were held, their chains broke and they suddenly came forth from the prison.

Celebrating blessed Vigilius's funeral rites, they carried their chains to the church of blessed Mary that he had constructed, and committed themselves and their posterity to blessed Vigilius in perpetuity.

Hugh of Fleury says that at this time the moon suffered an eclipse during the eighth indiction. The sun also failed at about the tenth hour of the day, on the fifth day before the Nones of May.

In the same year a great pestilence followed at Rome, namely in July, August, and September.

Pavia, which is also called Ticinum, was so greatly depopulated by this pestilence that, when the citizens fled along the mountain ridges, grasses and thickets grew within the aforesaid city.

But certain men in that same city were told by revelation that the pestilence would not cease before an altar of Saint Sebastian the martyr was constructed in the basilica of blessed Peter the Apostle called Saint Peter in Chains.

Thus it was done. For relics of Saint Sebastian the martyr were brought from the city of Rome, and as soon as the altar itself was established in the said church, the pestilence ceased.

At the same time there also flourished Euthbertus, the venerable archbishop of Limpharna, which is now called Londra. After eleven years his body was found incorrupt, as though he had died in that same hour, together with the garment in which it was covered, as Bede relates in his book On Times.

Bede also says concerning him that, made a prelate from an anchorite, he led his whole life from infancy to old age illustrious with signs of miracles.

Likewise, in the year of the Lord six hundred ninety-seven, Vuillibrordus was surnamed Clement by Pope Sergius and consecrated bishop to preach to the nations of the Frisians. By the gift of Prince Pippin, he established his episcopal see in the place called Vulthtaburch, which is now called Traiectum, as Sigebertus notes.

The same author says that Saint Kilianus, together with his disciples Colonatus and Totnanus, was secretly martyred. Gehilana, the wife of Gozbert, prince of the people of Würzburg, feared that she would be separated from her husband when Kilianus rebuked him because he had taken as his own wife the woman who had formerly been his brother's wife. Although their death lay hidden from everyone for a long time, it was made public by the confession of Gehilana and of his killers when they were seized by a demon.

Section XXIX

In the same year, as Sigebertus writes, Saint Lambertus dared to rebuke Prince Pippin because he had taken the concubine Alpiada in addition to his lawful wife Plectrude. He was martyred by Dodo, Alpiada's brother, and buried at Traiectum.

This Saint Lambertus, as Vincent relates in book twenty-four of the Historical Mirror from the accounts of his deeds, was born of noble and wealthy parents. Instructed in letters from his earliest age, he was so loved by everyone because of his holiness that he merited to be promoted as bishop of the church of Traiectum after his teacher Theodardus.

But when King Childeric, who had promoted him and, keeping him with himself, loved him above all the bishops and chief men, had been killed by wicked men, malicious men who envied Lambertus deposed him without cause, deprived him of his due honor, and established Pharamund in his place.

Lambertus entered a certain abbey with two boys and conducted himself there most excellently for seven years.

On a certain night, rising for prayer, he unintentionally made a sound upon the pavement. Hearing it, the abbot, not knowing who had done this, said: “Whoever made this sound, let him go to the cross.”

Then Saint Lambertus immediately leapt from his bed in a hair-shirt and with bare feet and ran to the cross. He stood fixed there beneath snow and ice for so long that, while the brothers warmed themselves after Matins, the abbot recognized that he was absent.

Hearing from one of the brothers that Lambertus was persisting beside the cross without shoes, the abbot remembered his order and commanded the brothers to hurry there, prostrate themselves before him, and humbly seek that he return.

Obeying their entreaties, he returned. He was received by the abbot and monks with the greatest humility. When they sought pardon, he not only granted it mercifully but also humbly preached to them concerning the good of patience.

After seven years Pharamund was expelled, and Saint Lambertus, at the entreaties of everyone and by command of King Pippin, was restored with honor to his own see.

Since he excelled, as before, in every holiness and converted many even among the gentiles by word and example, two wicked men rose up against him and began gravely to trouble him and his people. But the pontiff's friends, although already oppressed by many injuries, killed them as they deserved.

Dodo, a blood relative of those who had been killed and a household officer of King Pippin, heard of the death of his relatives and wished to avenge them upon Saint Lambertus.

Entering Leodium with an armed army, he so besieged the bishop's house that a boy from the house came outside and announced to the man of God, who had kept vigil in prayer throughout the whole night, that the house was besieged by enemies.

Trusting in the Lord that he might fight them, Lambertus seized a sword. But immediately returning to himself, he cast the sword from his hand, judging it better to conquer by standing firm and dying than to stain his consecrated hands with the blood of the wicked.

While he considered these things, many gained entry over the walls by planting their spears. But two nephews of the bishop seized clubs, struck them, and compelled them to retreat.

Then the man of God admonished his people to confess their sins and, as penance for them, patiently to bear the burning with which the enemies threatened them and the house.

Thus strengthened in the Lord, they asked Saint Lambertus to pray for them as he had begun to do. Immediately, while he lay prostrate in prayer with tears in the form of a cross, the wicked men rushed upon him and killed him with a spear directed at him.

When they had thus departed, a few of his servants who escaped conveyed his body by a hidden boat to the episcopal church. There, amid the city's great sorrow, after completing the offices they placed him quickly in a tomb because of the enemies.

Afterward the aforesaid Dodo, the killer of Saint Lambertus, as Sigebertus says, was tormented by a most grievous disease and consumed by worms. Because his stench could not be endured, he was submerged in the river Mosa.

All the accomplices in this crime were divinely punished within a year. The striker of the holy martyr met his own brother, and each was killed by the other.

Saint Cumbertus, his successor, admonished from heaven, translated Saint Lambertus's body from Traiectum to Leodium with a great glory of miracles.

In the following year Saint Oda, the wife of Bogis, duke of the Aquitanians, shone in holiness in Gaul.

Section XXX

Saint Leufredus shone around those times. As Vincent relates in the place cited above from the accounts of his deeds, he was born in the district of Ebroica of noble Christian parents. Despising the vain glory of the world, from adolescence he followed as a poor man the naked Christ.

While he dwelt in a certain cell near Ebroica, Desiderius, bishop of Ebroica, heard his fame, because many, kindled by him with the light of truth, followed the apostolic life.

Overcome by the zeal of envy because Leufredus had presumed to do such things in his diocese, the bishop on a certain day mounted his horse, took his officials with him, and proceeded to the man of God's cell. He exasperated him with the injury of words.

But when Leufredus remained immovable at these things, the bishop, still more agitated by fury, commanded that he be lifted upon a horse, although the man of God had determined within himself never to mount a horse.

When, therefore, the bishop led him toward the city so that he might there exercise more freely against him whatever he wished, the horse upon which the man of God sat suddenly collapsed to the ground, and all its entrails were ruptured.

While everyone marveled, the bishop fell at the saint's knees and sought pardon. Leufredus peaceably remitted every injury.

The pontiff caused him to be returned to his cell with the highest honor. There afterward for many years he shone through both word and miracles.

For a long time he governed in peace a company of monks whom he himself had gained for the Lord by examples and saving admonitions.

One of these, named Galeandus, was at one time struck by so great a malice of the demon that he believed he would suddenly breathe forth his soul.

When the man of God learned this, he poured forth prayer for him and blessed him, commanding that he be devoted to fasts. After these things he gave him the staff that he carried in his hand, saying: “Be steadfast, son; you shall not die now.” Immediately he was healed.

At another time during the night, when by chance the flame of a most powerful fire flew through all the dwellings of the monastery, consuming them, the man of God suddenly raised his hands to heaven, invoking the Almighty himself to break the strength of the flames, who caused the furnace of Nebuchadnezzar to avail nothing against the three boys.

When his prayer was completed, he restrained the onset of the fire with so great a command that it could touch nothing farther. Instead, the whole violence of the winds, rolled together into one, at length withered away within itself as though in an inundation of rains.

At length he migrated to God in peace.

When the empire had been recovered by Justinian II and Childebert held the monarchy of the kingdom of the Franks, the archangel Michael appeared to Authbertus, bishop of Abrinca, and admonished him once and again to build a church in his memory in a place in the sea which, because of its height, is called the Tomb. He wished such veneration to be shown to him in the sea as is shown upon Mount Gargano.

Meanwhile, a bull secretly taken by a thief was tethered in that place. Hence, when the bishop was admonished a third time, he was commanded to lay the foundation in the place where he found the tethered bull and to draw the circuit of the church just as he saw that animal had trampled the earth.

He immediately established a church there in honor of Saint Michael. Just as upon Mount Gargano in Apulia, so also in that place called the Tomb, amid the peril of the sea, veneration of the archangel began to be frequented.

Section XXXI

Around those times Saint Wandregisilus also was born in the region of Virdunum of noble and religious parents. His father was Walchisus, the son of Pippin, prince of the Franks.

In his adolescence under King Dagobert, he was nobly educated in military deeds and courtly disciplines. As the practices of a holy life increased within him, he was appointed by that same king as count of the palace.

He exercised the office he had received with a zeal for piety, always treating heavenly things in his mind: free in rebuking, humble in obeying, firm in faith, prompt in good works, most truthful in speech, just in judgment, provident in counsel, and illustrious in charity.

At length, at his parents' urging, although unwilling, he betrothed to himself a certain most noble maiden. But, celebrating a chaste marriage, he persuaded her to preserve her virginity, and she consented. Thus a most salutary consent to chastity was made on both sides.

For he assumed the clerical habit, and he delivered her, covered with the veil of religion, to a monastery of nuns.

But while he still lived in lay clothing and was making a journey surrounded by the services of his attendants, certain barbarians injuriously rushed upon him. He took up prayer in place of a sword. Immediately that crowd of wicked men stood so immovable, restrained by Christ's power, that it could not approach more closely.

At length, leaving all things, he transferred himself to the monastic life. At first he dwelt in the place called Mount Falcon with the holy man Balthfrid.

But the aforesaid king, by the counsel of his men, strove to cause him trouble because, without the king's permission, he had changed his habit and bound himself to the monastic religious life.

Ordered to be summoned by him, Wandregisilus hastened toward the royal buildings. Before the palace doors he suddenly found a certain poor little man with a cart sunk in the mud.

Although everyone passed the wretched man by, and some even oppressed him, the holy man gravely dismounted from the horse upon which he sat. Extending a hand to the poor man, he lifted him together with his cart from the mud.

Immediately an angel clad from heaven in a snow-white cloak appeared. Cleaning Wandregisilus's garment, he rendered it whiter than it had been before.

After these things, while the Lord protected his servant, the king commanded that no one should trouble him, but that, with no one resisting, he should maintain the observance of his purpose.

Thus secure, he returned to the place of his beloved habitation. But not long afterward, having left that place for a certain reason, he migrated into the territory of Helisgangium. There he constructed a monastery upon his own possession.

There also, even when sleep pressed him while he was occupied with divine praises, he prayed with bare feet and content with a simple garment, standing upon the ground with his knees bent.

Seeing this, the devil inflicted many disturbances upon him both in wakefulness and through dreams. He transformed himself into the appearances of beasts, birds, or serpents and presented himself as terrible to Wandregisilus's sight.

But Wandregisilus, with the banner of the Holy Cross, the rigor of abstinence, and continual prayer, manfully rendered the devil's attempts vain.

When, on a certain night, he had slept beyond his custom, the enemy appeared and said mockingly: “I was more vigilant than you this night.”

Wandregisilus said: “I do not doubt that you are vigilant everywhere for the ruin of others and the increase of your own damnation. But the flesh that drove me to this inertia of torpor shall be subdued.”

Rising, therefore, from the idleness of sleep, when there was the harshness of winter, he stood outdoors amid snow and ice, weeping, drawing long sighs, and singing psalms to the Lord with the greatest devotion.

He also applied himself to fasts in such a manner that throughout the whole week, except on the Lord's Day, Thursday, and Saturday, he took no food.

At length, admonished in a vision to revisit the western regions of Gaul, he came to Rothomagus. Saint Andoenus received him reverently and, although he resisted exceedingly, ordained him subdeacon and afterward deacon.

After this, through blessed Andomarus, pontiff of Toruanna, he also caused him to be ordained a priest.

But the holy man, desiring to lead a stricter life and seeking above all the secret places of the wilderness, obtained by the gift of the prefect Ortinoaldus a small portion of land, upon which, as a new inhabitant, he constructed the monastery of Fontanella with his nephew Godo.

Accordingly, he established monks in cells so that they might apply themselves to the divine services. When food failed them entirely, the cellarer disclosed this to him, and he persuaded the cellarer to trust in God.

Divine piety therefore admonished Queen Batild through a vision to minister necessities to Christ's servant in the wilderness. Awaking, she sent loaded carts to the servant of God, and he gave thanks to God.

Having also passed his ninetieth year of age gloriously, he remained so vigorous that he appeared to go before young men in the labor of his hands.

It is certainly known that he frequently foretold future things.

At length, established in extreme old age, he frequently entreated the Lord to snatch him from this vale of weeping and admit him to his presence.

Hearing his prayers, the Lord sent an illness upon him and, while he was carried away in an ecstasy of mind for three days and as many nights, showed him the open gate of heaven.

But the envious enemy, perceiving that the hour of his reward was at hand, stood by cruelly and strove to cast manifold fears upon him.

The brothers standing around him heard him, while placed in such a contest, say that he had been washed for Christ in the font of washing [read: washed in Christ's baptismal font] and that the demon impeding him had been divinely put to flight.

At length, fortifying himself with the sign of the cross, on the eleventh day before the Kalends of August he returned his spirit to heaven. At that same hour the sweetest heavenly song was heard by one of his disciples.

He was buried in the church of Saint Paul. But in the year of the Lord six hundred eighty-four, after many years, his body and also the bodies of Ausbert and Volframus were translated into the church of Saint Peter.

Then, when their tombs were opened amid the praises of hymns, an ineffable fragrant odor came forth. Their bodies, together with the garments in which they had been buried, were found so whole that they appeared to have been delivered to burial on that same day.

After his death Wandregisilus also shone through many miracles.

When a certain woman performed weaving work on his feast in the district of Caletum, although her neighbors forbade her, and in the swelling of her heart reckoned their rebukes as nothing, the hand with which she drew the weft through the web with rash daring immediately became rigid. The weft adhered in the middle of her palm and could in no way be pulled away.

Corrected by this miracle and pierced by compunction in her heart, she approached the saint's church, which was frequented by the people. Commending herself to the saint, she was healed when the weft fell from her hand.

Likewise, when King Charles subdued Germany and Saxony by warring against the gentiles, a soldier of the monastery of Fontanella named Sigemandus, while ravaging the possessions of those gentiles with the other soldiers, was captured by them.

As he was led to the place where he was to be beheaded and frequently invoked the aid of his patron Wandregisilus, a certain soldier of the Saxons named Abbo began diligently to inquire why he so frequently invoked Wandregisilus.

Sigemandus answered: “Because in truth I am his servant, and I believe that through the merits of his holiness I shall be freed from the danger of the present peril.”

Abbo said: “This night Wandregisilus stood beside me, admonishing me to inflict no evil upon you but to permit you to return to your people in peace, threatening that, if I did not do this, I would work against my own salvation. Therefore I permit you to depart unharmed.”

Abbo was afterward baptized.

Section XXXII

During the same time, as Hugh of Fleury narrates, Mimmolus, abbot of Fleury, forewarned by a divine revelation, sent one of his monks, named Argulphus, to Mount Cassinum so that he might bring to him from there the body of blessed Benedict.

For the monastery that Saint Benedict had once constructed there had been devastated by the perfidious Lombards and reduced to solitude. Nevertheless, the body of Saint Benedict was kept buried there in one tomb with the body of his sister Scholastica.

It also happened that certain persons from the Cenomanian city set out at the same time for the aforesaid place in order to bring away the body of Saint Scholastica. After they had come to the place of Fleury, they continually adhered to blessed Argulphus until they reached the thresholds of Saint Peter.

When they had arrived there, blessed Argulphus immediately left their company. He sought Mount Cassinum alone and determined also to spend the night there.

And behold, in the silence of the dead of night, he saw the tomb of the holy father Benedict so illuminated from heaven that it appeared to be surrounded by dense ranks of lamps. When the night had passed, that splendor disappeared.

Then the often-mentioned Argulphus reverently approached that place. Having broken open the tomb from the side, he emptied it and placed whatever he found there within the bosom of a single little basket that he had prepared for this purpose.

When these things had been accomplished, as Argulphus returned to his own country, he met his companions on the road and returned with them to the monastery at Fleury.

Before he reached it, however, he came to a place that they call New Village, which is one mile distant from the said monastery. There the aforesaid abbot Mimmolus, with a crowded throng of the people, reverently met them.

Taking up the little basket with fitting reverence, he drew from it the most sacred bones that lay there confusedly enclosed, separating the smaller from the larger.

When this had been done, behold, two bodies of deceased persons were being carried out for burial. One of them was of the male sex, but the other of the female. It therefore pleased them to apply this test to those bodies.

A wondrous thing: when the larger bones had been placed upon the male body, life was immediately restored to the dead man through the merits of blessed Benedict.

Then it also pleased them to place the smaller bones upon the body of the dead girl. When this had been done, the girl immediately revived.

It therefore became clear that those who had been brought together were brother and sister in merits. No small multitude of the people was present at this spectacle.

The Cenomanian citizens were also standing there. They therefore merited to obtain the body of the holy virgin, lest two great luminaries should be enclosed in one little coffin when separate places could suffice for each one.

Accordingly, the Cenomanian men, returning to their city, carried the body of blessed Scholastica with them. A new church was constructed in her name beside the walls of that city, where the body of blessed Scholastica was reverently brought in and entombed.

Thereafter, as the abundance of miracles increased daily, many women of holy devotion were gathered together there under regular discipline.

Meanwhile the venerable father Mimmolus began to turn over in his mind the place in which the body of the most holy Benedict might worthily be laid.

When, on a certain night beneath the open sky, he prayed to the Lord that this might be shown to him from heaven, behold, a light sent from heaven suddenly appeared to him like lightning and most clearly indicated the place where it ought to be placed.

That place to which he translated it was the oratory of the most blessed Mary, Mother of God.

Many years after this translation of blessed Benedict, namely in the time of Pippin, king of the Franks, when the monastery of Cassinum had been restored and enlarged, monks of that monastery of Cassinum came to Rome at the instigation of Charles the Great [read: Carloman], brother of the aforesaid Pippin, who had assumed the religious habit in the said monastery of Cassinum.

They asked Pope Zacharias to direct letters to Pippin, king of the Franks, so that the body of blessed Benedict might be returned to its tomb.

When this became known to the brothers of Fleury, they celebrated a three-day fast and prayed to blessed Benedict before his tomb with these words: “You are our sole hope after God. Do not abandon us as orphans, you who came here not through our merits but for the salvation of many souls.”

One would have believed that it was raining upon the pavement because of the exceedingly great abundance of their tears.

When they had spent the whole three days in these sobs and tears, behold, the aforesaid bishops arrived, desiring to fulfill the king's commands. They immediately ordered the doors of the church to be opened for them.

Then, having entered the church of Saint Mary, before they approached the tomb of Saint Benedict they were reduced to desolation and fear and were struck with such blindness that they could not recognize one another.

When they saw that they had been blinded by divine vengeance, they began to proceed wandering through the church. When they struck against the bell ropes, they began to pull them with great force, for they could not otherwise make their misfortune known to those who had remained outside.

Stirred by this sound, the brothers came forth from the already-mentioned church of the apostle Peter, expecting that they would see a sorrowful spectacle.

For the sake of investigating, some of them went in. When they saw those men wandering through the church, they came out and said: “The pious father Benedict has heard us and received our letters. Come and see the mighty works of God.”

When they had entered together, they saw and found them blind, crying out and saying: “Woe to us, because we came to violate the repose of the holy father Benedict, and therefore we have incurred blindness. Come, servants of God; deal more mildly with us, and do not repay us with retaliation according to our presumption, but pray for us to God that he may open our eyes. We promise you that we shall never presume such things again.”

At these words, prostrate upon the ground, they prayed more intently that divine piety might deign to restore light to them. As they prayed, their eyes were opened.

Returning to the king, they narrated what they had suffered, adding that Gaul ought not to be despoiled of such holy bones.

Concerning blessed Benedict himself, whose deeds we omitted above for a reason, we shall set them forth at length in the following title, together with the condition of the anchoritic and cenobitic life and the holy fathers who were hermits in Egypt.

Section XXXIII

Egidius, born at Athens from a royal stock and instructed in Latin letters from infancy, while proceeding to church on a certain day, gave his tunic to a certain sick man lying in the street and asking for alms. Clothed with it, the man immediately received complete health.

After these things, when his parents had rested in the Lord, he made Christ the heir of his patrimony.

On a certain day, while he was returning from church, a man who had been struck by a serpent met him. But when the holy man had prayed, the poison immediately fled.

Egidius also freed a certain demoniac who was standing in the church with the faithful and disturbing others with his cries, putting the demon to flight.

Fearing, however, the danger of human favor, he secretly sought the seacoast. Seeing certain sailors in danger at sea, he calmed the tempest by prayer.

When the sailors had come to shore and heard that he was making his way to Rome, they gave thanks on account of his merits and promised to carry him with them without payment.

When, therefore, he had come to Arelate and remained for two years with Saint Caesarius, bishop of that city, where he also cured a certain man who had suffered from fever for three years, he secretly departed, desiring the wilderness.

He remained for a long time with the hermit Veredimius, illustrious in holiness, and by his merits drove away the sterility of the land.

But because each of them shone with miracles, fearing the danger of human praise, he left him and penetrated the deeper wilderness.

Finding there a certain cave that had a little spring, he chose his habitation there. There he also had as his nurse a certain hind divinely prepared, which at fixed hours supplied him with the nourishment of her milk.

On a certain day, when the king's servants came into the said forest and saw the aforesaid hind, they disregarded the other beasts and pursued her with dogs.

When she was exceedingly hard pressed by them, she fled to the feet of the one whom she nourished. Marveling why she lowed in this way contrary to her custom, he went out and saw the hunters. He prayed to the Lord that he would preserve the creature whom he had granted to him as a nurse.

None of the dogs dared to approach within a stone's throw, but with great howling they returned to the hunters.

When night came upon them, they returned home. Returning there on the following day, they again went home after fruitless labor.

When the king heard the matter, suspecting, as was indeed the case, that something divine lay hidden there, he hastened to that place with the bishop and a multitude of hunters.

But when the dogs did not dare to approach, just as before, but all returned howling, they surrounded the place, inaccessible because of the density of the thorn bushes.

One man, however, carelessly directing an arrow so that he might drive the hind out from there, inflicted a grievous wound upon the man of God while he prayed, although he had not yet been seen by any of them.

The soldiers, opening a path with iron, came to the holy man's cave. They marveled when they saw the holy old man clothed in a monastic habit, venerable in gray hair and old age, and the hind also prostrate at his knees.

Of these men, only the king and the bishop approached him; they ordered the others to stand back. They asked him who he was, whence he had come, why he had sought so dense a waste of wilderness, and who had presumed to wound him so gravely.

When he had answered them concerning each matter and they had humbly sought pardon from him, they promised physicians for healing the wound and offered many gifts.

But he was unwilling either to employ medicine, and, scorning the gifts, did not even look at them. Rather, knowing that power is perfected in weakness, he prayed to the Lord that, for as long as he lived, he might not be restored to his former health.

Because the king visited him frequently and received from him the nourishment of salvation, he offered immense riches, which Egidius wholly refused to accept. He admonished him to construct a monastery there in which the discipline of the monastic order might flourish.

When the king had done this, Egidius, conquered by his prayers and tears after he had refused for a very long time, assumed the care of that monastery.

When King Charles heard his fame and had obtained his coming, the king received him reverently.

Among other conversations concerning salvation, he asked him to deign to pray to the Lord for him, because he had perpetrated a certain enormous crime that he never dared to confess to anyone, not even to the saint himself.

On the following Lord's Day, as Saint Egidius prayed for the king, an angel of the Lord appeared to him and placed a little sheet upon the altar. The king's sin was written upon it in order, together with the statement that it had been blotted out by the prayers of Egidius, if, being nevertheless contrite and confessing it, he wished to abstain from it in the future.

It was added at the end that whoever should invoke Saint Egidius for any crime whatsoever, if he nevertheless abstained from it entirely, should in no way doubt that it had been forgiven him.

When the little sheet was presented to the king, he recognized his sin and, humbly confessing it, sought pardon.

At length Egidius returned with honor to the monastery. Near the city of Nemausus he raised to life the son of a prince who had died.

There, after a little time, foretelling that his monastery would be destroyed by enemies not long afterward, he went to Rome and obtained from the pope privileges for his church and two cypress doors upon which images of the apostles were carved.

Sending them into the Tiber, he commended them to divine governance. Returning to the monastery, he restored his gait to a certain cripple at Crebreo.

When he arrived at the monastery and found the aforesaid two doors in the harbor, he gave thanks to God, who had preserved them unharmed amid so many dangers of the sea. He set them up at the entrances of the church and as a memorial of the compact of the Roman See for the memory of posterity.

At length the Lord revealed to him that the day of his death was imminent. Announcing this to his brothers and asking them to pray for him, he commended his spirit to the Lord. Many testified that they heard choirs of angels bearing his soul into heaven.

He shone around the year of the Lord seven hundred.

Section XXXIV

Saint Lupus, born near Aurelianum from a royal lineage, while he shone with all virtues, was elected bishop of Senonica.

Because he distributed almost all things to the poor, when on a certain day he had invited very many to a banquet and they had no wine by the middle of it, he thus answered his servant: “I believe that God, who feeds the birds, will complete our charity.”

Immediately a messenger arrived who announced that one hundred measures of wine were present before the doors.

Likewise, when everyone at the court vigorously disparaged him because he loved too immoderately the virgin of God who was the daughter of his predecessor, seizing the virgin herself in the presence of those who disparaged him, he kissed her, saying: “The words of others do no harm to a man whom his own conscience does not stain.”

For because he had known that she ardently loved God, he loved her with a most pure mind.

Certainly he can be excused here by a private law, namely that he was led to this by the Holy Spirit, for this is prohibited and reprehended by the law of the canons, Distinction thirty-four, Quorundam.

When Clothar, king of the Franks, entered Burgundy and directed his seneschal against the people of Senonica so that he might besiege the city, Saint Lupus entered the church of Saint Stephen and caused the bell to be rung.

When the enemies heard it, such terror invaded them that they thought they would not escape death unless they fled.

At length, when the kingdom of Burgundy had been obtained and the king had sent another seneschal to Senonica, blessed Lupus did not meet him with gifts. Greatly indignant, the seneschal so defamed him before the king that the king sent blessed Lupus into exile.

He shone exceedingly there in teaching and miracles.

Meanwhile the people of Senonica killed another man who had invaded the place of Saint Lupus and obtained the return of Saint Lupus from exile.

When the king saw him wasted away in exile, he was so divinely changed that, prostrate before him, he sought pardon. Having enriched him with many gifts, he restored him to his city.

As Lupus returned through Paris, a great crowd of prisoners met him, the doors having been opened and their bonds loosened.

On a certain Lord's Day, as he celebrated Mass, a jewel fell from heaven into his sacred chalice, which the king placed among his relics.

King Clothar, hearing that the bell of Saint Stephen possessed wondrous sweetness in its sound, sent for it to be brought to Paris so that he might hear it more frequently.

But because this displeased Saint Lupus, as soon as it was carried out of the city of Senonica it lost the sweetness of its sound.

When the king heard this, he immediately ordered it to be restored. With its subdued sound restored [read: Its sound being suddenly restored], it rang seven miles from the city, so that Saint Lupus went to meet it and honorably received what he had sorrowfully lost.

On a certain night, while he prayed, thirsting exceedingly at the devil's instigation, he ordered cold water to be brought to him.

Understanding the enemy's deceit, he placed his pillow over the vessel and enclosed the devil there within it. The devil began to howl aloud throughout the whole night.

When morning came, he who had come secretly to tempt him departed confounded in daylight.

On a certain day, when he had gone around the churches of the city according to his custom, returning home he heard his clerics quarreling because they wished to fornicate with women.

Entering the church, he began to pray for them. Immediately every stimulus of temptation departed from them, and, coming before him, they sought pardon.

At length, illustrious through many virtues, he rested in peace around the year of the Lord six hundred ninety.

Around that time, as John of Columna notes, Anastasius, a Persian, having been made a Christian from a magus, became a martyr for Christ with seventy companions.

Title XIV

Title XIV contains the deeds of the supreme pontiffs and emperors from the time of Pope Gregory II to the time of Pope Leo III, and from the time of the emperor Philippicus through the completed reign of Charles the Great, inclusively, a span of one hundred years.

Within this span the supreme pontiffs were Gregory II; Gregory III; Stephen; Paul, his brother; Constantine the antipope; Stephen; Adrian; and Leo III for part of the time.

The emperors during this time were Philippicus, who was also Barduanus; Anastasius II, who was also called Arthemius; Theodosius III; Leo II; Constantine, his son; Leo III, his son; and Constantine, his brother, with his mother Irene.

Afterward Constantine himself ruled alone. Irene, bearing it reluctantly that she had been deprived of the empire because he ruled alone, imprisoned and blinded her son and ruled alone.

After her came Charles the Great, the empire having been transferred from the Greeks to the Franks.

The period contained in this title therefore extends to the eight-hundredth year.

Gregory II

In the seven-hundred-and-thirteenth year of the Lord's incarnation, the four-thousand-six-hundred-and-seventy-sixth year from the beginning of the world, but according to the more common opinion the five-thousand-nine-hundred-and-eleventh year, Gregory II was the ninetieth in the order of the Roman pontiffs.

He is also called Gregory the Younger to distinguish him from Gregory the Great, who was the first of this name.

He was Roman by nation, born of his father Marcellus, and held the See for seventeen years and nine months.

From his very boyhood he was nurtured in the Church. Through the diverse ecclesiastical orders, he merited to be promoted to the rank of the supreme pontificate.

The care of the library had been committed to him by Pope Sergius. Thereafter, having been made a deacon, he departed for Constantinople with Pope Constantine, who had been summoned by the emperor.

Questioned by the emperor Justinian concerning certain questions, he resolved each one exceedingly well. For he was a chaste man, learned in divine Scripture, eloquent and steadfast in mind, a most ardent defender of the faith and a most powerful persecutor of heretics.

He restored very many churches and constructed monasteries.

He held ordinations in the month of September and in the month of June, and consecrated twenty-five priests, five deacons, and one hundred fifty bishops for diverse places.

At the beginning of his pontificate he ordered lime to be burned so that he might repair the walls of the Roman city. Beginning at the gate of Saint Lawrence, he completed some part, but he was afterward hindered from this work by diverse affairs that arose.

While he presided, Theodo, duke of the people of the Bavarians, was the first from that people to come to the thresholds of the apostle Peter for the sake of prayer.

Under him also, a certain citizen of Brixia, a man beloved by God, through divine inspiration and the exhortation of this blessed pontiff, laudably rebuilt the monastery of Saint Benedict at Mount Cassinum.

It had been destroyed by the Lombards one hundred ten complete years earlier. When it had been restored, he gathered many persons there to serve God.

This pontiff also preached the word of life in Germany through blessed Boniface and converted to the faith, by the teaching of light, the people sitting in darkness. Boniface, having been made a bishop there, was at last crowned by martyrdom among that people.

Hence the same Gregory the Younger writes thus to the aforesaid Boniface, Cause sixteen, Question one: “We command that, according to the statutes of the canons, where the multitude of the faithful has increased, by the authority of the Apostolic See you ought to ordain bishops, yet with pious consideration, so that the name of the episcopate may not become cheap.”

When Leo had assumed the empire, he was seduced by a certain apostate from the faith to such an extent that he commanded all images to be removed from the Church and burned with fire, as will be stated below.

By imperial letters he also ordered Gregory himself, the pope, to remove images from the churches of the entire Western Church.

But Gregory not only refused to do this; he also excommunicated him as a heretic on account of that deed.

Moreover, he caused the Roman city itself and all Italy to withdraw from his dominion, and forbade tribute to be rendered to him by the Italian cities.

Moved by the greatest anger on this account, the emperor labored greatly and often to cause Pope Gregory to be killed.

But when the Italians and Lombards resisted the emperor's attempts with one mind, all Italy together with Rome itself then formed a plan to choose an emperor for themselves, hasten to Constantinople with an armed force, cast the heretical Leo down from the summit of the empire, and possess the monarchy of the Roman Empire.

But Pope Gregory restrained such a plan, hoping that the prince's mind would return to better things.

The blessed pontiff himself did not cease to admonish the emperor by his letters to draw back from such execrable madness.

What this Gregory says, however, in Cause thirty-two, Question seven, What You Have Proposed, is this: “If a woman, stricken by infirmity, is unable to render the debt, what is her spouse to do? It would be good if he remained thus. But because this belongs to great persons, let him who cannot contain himself marry instead. Nevertheless, let him not withdraw the aid of support from her whom infirmity hinders but detestable fault does not exclude.”

This statement of Gregory is not to be understood as though it were lawful for a man, when his wife has become ill even with an incurable and perpetual disease, to marry another wife. For this is contrary to every divine and human law and to all the doctors.

But, as the gloss says there, this must be restricted to a woman betrothed for the future or to a woman physically too narrow for intercourse, yet only after prior judgment by the Church.

And what is said, that he should not withdraw the aid of support from such a woman, must be understood, namely, by restoring the dowry if he received it; or it speaks of counsel.

Or it can also be understood that Gregory permits this by a comparative permission, by which a lesser evil is permitted lest a greater be committed. I say “is permitted,” not by conceding it as lawful, but by not punishing such an evil temporally, just as repudiation was permitted in the law lest homicide follow.

He did this with respect to the Germans, who had then been newly converted to the faith.

At length, migrating from this world, Gregory was buried in the church of Saint Peter. The episcopate was vacant for thirty-five days.

Section I: Gregory III

When he had died, Gregory III was created pope, the ninety-first in the number of the pontiffs, in the year of the Lord seven hundred thirty-one. He was Syrian by nation, born of his father John, and sat for ten years and eight months.

This man was most mild and exceedingly wise, sufficiently instructed in divine Scripture and learned in the Greek and Latin languages.

He was exceedingly solicitous for the support of the poor and the redemption of captives, and moreover a defender of the Christian faith.

He was loved by the whole people and all the clergy to such an extent that, when he was following his predecessor's funeral procession, the whole people of both sexes, from the least to the greatest, moved by divine inspiration, carried him away by force and elected him pontiff.

After he had been consecrated pope, he immediately turned his mind toward the emendation and correction of the emperors Leo and his son Constantine, who had commanded throughout the whole empire that images of Christ and the saints be removed from the churches.

He wrote to them that they should recover their senses from this nefarious error. He did this not only once, but sent letters of admonition several times.

But when they persisted in their perfidy, he was kindled by ardor for the faith and convoked a council of bishops from all Italy.

In the presence of all the clergy of the city, and also of the nobles and consuls and the whole people, he established that if anyone thereafter should despise Catholic custom and faithful usage, and should become a remover, destroyer, or profaner of the venerable and holy images of God and our Savior Jesus Christ, of blessed Mary, of the apostles, and of the other saints, or should become a blasphemer, he should be deprived of the communion of the Holy Church.

The bishops confirmed this by their subscriptions. He sent this synodal constitution as far as the royal city through a certain man named Constantine.

By the emperor's command, Constantine was captured and committed to chains, was detained in prison custody for one year, and afterward, having been afflicted with many injuries, was permitted to return to Rome.

Concerning these images, Gregory, as I believe this same one, says thus when writing to Serenus, bishop of Massilia, in It Had Been Reported to Us, On Consecration, Distinction three:

“It had been reported to us with what inconsiderate zeal, being kindled, you broke the images of the saints under this supposed excuse, that they ought not to be adored. We entirely praised the fact that you prohibited them from being adored, but we reprehend your having broken them.

“Tell me, brother: from what priest have you ever heard that what you did was done? For it is one thing to adore a picture and another to learn, through the history in a picture, what is to be adored.

Under this pontiff, Luitprandus, king of the Lombards, desiring to obtain the city, hastened as far as Rome with a great army of his people assembled, and pitched his tents not far from it in the field of Nero.

Having captured many of the Roman nobles, he both tonsured and clothed them after the manner of the Lombards.

Thereafter, sending a part of his armies, he ravaged all Campania. Loaded with spoils, they returned to the king.

When this Luitprandus heard that the Saracens, after ravaging the island of Sardinia, had also defiled those places to which, long ago, because of the incursions of barbarians, the bones of the outstanding doctor Augustine had been translated from the city of Hippo in Africa, he sent his envoys there with all speed.

Having paid much money, they brought those most sacred relics with them to the king. Receiving them with great veneration, the king placed them at Pavia in the church of Saint Peter that he himself had built.

But the man of God Gregory, seeing that he could not resist so many imminent evils, since he was pressed on one side by the Lombards and on the other by the Greek emperors, sent the keys of the Roman city through Anastasius to Charles Martel, prefect of the king of the Franks, so that he might free them from so great an oppression of the Lombards.

Compelled by necessity, Gregory himself restored a very great part of the walls of the Roman city.

Section II: Zacharias

When Gregory III had been taken from this light, Zacharias, a Greek by nation, succeeded him in the See of Peter in the seven-hundred-and-fortieth year of the Lord. He sat in it for ten years and three months.

He was a most mild and gentle man.

At the beginning of his pontificate he found Italy greatly disturbed, and especially the Roman city, on account of the persecutions that Luitprandus, king of the Lombards, was inflicting upon the Romans because they favored Transimundus, duke of the people of Spoleto, and protected him within the walls of the city.

For this reason, the said king, pursuing him with his armies, besieged Rome. He took by siege many cities that were then subject to the city's dominion and, having captured them, removed them from Roman dominion.

But not long afterward, at the petition and admonition of this fostering pontiff, he promised the pope's messengers, whom the pontiff had sent to him concerning this deed so that he might restore those cities to the right of the Romans, that he would restore the cities themselves.

When he delayed restoring them according to his promise, this blessed pontiff did not hesitate to approach the said king in his own person.

Coming therefore to the city of Iteranna, where the said king was then present with his armies, when the king heard of his coming, he sent all the greater dukes of his armies as far as eight miles to meet him. The king himself also went out as far as half a mile to meet the supreme pontiff, and received him within the city with great joy and the highest reverence.

When both sat together in the church of blessed Valentine, the pontiff, filled with divine grace, so softened the king with sweet words and peaceful discourses that he obtained from him all things whatsoever that he sought.

For he first persuaded the king to cease from hostile commotion, abstain from the shedding of human blood, and always pursue those things that belong to peace.

Pierced by these holy persuasions, King Gaisculphus [read: King Luitprandus], at the pontiff's command, restored the cities that he had taken from the Romans.

Likewise he restored the Sabine patrimony, which the kings of the Lombards had taken from the right of the Roman Church and had already possessed for thirty years.

Moreover, he restored Narnia, Assisium, Ancona, and Cumae to the blessed pontiff and made peace with the Romans for thirty years.

He gave to the holy pontiff all the captives from the diverse provinces of the Romans whom he and his predecessors had captured in diverse places throughout all Italy.

Thus the solicitous shepherd, when he had obtained all things that he wished, returned to Rome.

At the time when Pope Zacharias returned to the city, Carlomannus, brother of Pippin, king of the Franks, and son of the renowned leader Charles Martel, was kindled with love for the contemplative life.

Wearied by the burdensome administration of a temporal kingdom, he betook himself to leisure at Rome.

There, through the hands of the supreme prelate Zacharias, his habit having been changed and having become a holy monk, he enjoyed his desired quiet for some time on Mount Syraptis, at the monastery constructed near Saint Sylvester, with religious men who had come together with him from Gaul.

But because many nobles coming from Francia to Rome for the sake of devotion were unwilling to pass him by as their former lord, they interrupted, by frequent visitation and greeting, the leisure in which he especially delighted and compelled him to change his place.

For this reason, leaving Mount Syraptis, he withdrew to the monastery of Saint Benedict at Mount Cassinum, in which place he completed the remainder of his religious life.

When Italy was now enjoying peace, the same beneficent pontiff Zacharias sent messengers to Constantine, the emperor at Constantinople, with a letter and admonition containing the orthodox faith.

The emperor received them kindly and granted two towns that were then under public jurisdiction, namely Nymphae and Norma, to be possessed perpetually by the Roman Church.

In those times also, after the death of Haisculphus [read: Luitprandus], when Rathchis had undertaken to govern the kingdom of the Lombards, he came with a great multitude of his men to occupy the city of Perusia. Surrounding it on every side, he vigorously assaulted it.

Hearing this, the most blessed pope, relying upon divine assistance, approached the city itself as quickly as possible. By his prayers he admonished the king himself and drew him away from assaulting it.

Afterward, remaining with him for some days, the pope so led him toward good works by his holy exhortations that, after a few days, the same King Rathchis abandoned royal dignity and pride and devoutly approached, with his wife and children, both to visit the thresholds of the apostles and to see the holy pontiff.

Having completed his prayer and abandoned worldly pomp, through the hands of the pontiff he assumed the habit of holy religion together with his sons.

Meanwhile Hylderic, king of Francia, who had already reigned for nine years, was so useless and negligent that he devoted himself only to his belly and lust. The administration of the kingdom and the disposition of affairs had at that time remained to Pippin.

This Pippin was the son of Charles Martel, a spirited and prudent man and exceedingly solicitous in the government committed to him.

This mayor of the royal household, therefore, considering the inertia of his king, sent solemn messengers to Pope Zacharias and consulted him as to who ought rather to be and to be called king: the man who undertook all the labors of the kingdom, or the man who, given to leisure and lust, was covered by the royal name alone.

The supreme pontiff is said to have sent back the answer that he deservedly ought to reign who knew how and was able to govern the commonwealth vigorously.

After the messengers had reported these things to the foremost men of the Franks, a council of princes and prelates was convoked. By the common consent and will of all, they deposed Hylderic, king in name alone, from the summit of the kingdom, clothed him in the monastic habit, and enclosed him in a monastery.

With everyone willing and rejoicing, they caused Pippin to reign over the Franks.

Accordingly, the Merovingian kings, who descended from King Mereneus, the first king of the Franks, and reigned successively over the Franks, were twenty-three kings. According to some, their first was Priam, but not that king of Troy; according to others, he was Marchomaris.

They all reigned together for three hundred twenty-four years, down to this Hylderic.

Pippin, who succeeded him in the kingdom of Francia, began to reign in the seven-hundred-and-fiftieth year of the Lord. His distinguished posterity thereafter possessed the kingdom of the Franks for many generations.

After Pippin had been declared king by decree of the nobles and princes, he was anointed and consecrated by apostolic authority by Saint Boniface, archbishop of Maguntinum, concerning whom something will be said below.

Concerning this deposition of Hylderic and institution of Pippin, it is stated in Cause fifteen, Question six: “Another Roman pontiff, Zacharias, deposed the king of the Franks from the kingdom not so much for his iniquities as because he was useless for so great a power, and substituted Pippin, father of the emperor Charles, in his place, and absolved all the Franks from the oath of fidelity.”

What is said, “useless,” the gloss explains as “dissolute in lusts and effeminate.” And what is said, “deposed,” the gloss explains as “he consented to those deposing him.”

Around that time Saint Caesarius, bishop of Arelate, flourished. We find that he published ten moral and useful homilies for monks, from which the spiritual teaching of the holy man is apprehended.

Section III: Stephen II

After Zacharias, Stephen II, a Roman by nation, was placed in the See of Peter in the seven-hundred-and-fiftieth year of the Lord. He sat for five years and twenty-nine days.

This most blessed pope was a lover of churches and especially a supporter and nourisher of Christ's poor.

For their support he constructed several guesthouses or hospitals in the city of Rome for the use of the poor. He gave them many possessions from which they could conveniently be sustained.

In the third month of his pontificate, when Haisculphus, king of the Lombards, inflicted great persecutions upon the Roman city and had taken many cities and fortresses pertaining to its right, the same most blessed pope sent Paul the deacon, his full brother and a most holy man, and Ambrose the primicerius, with many gifts, to Haisculphus to establish covenants of peace.

But the same insolent king, assailed by the cunning of the ancient enemy, spurned the covenants of peace. Inflicting many troubles upon the most holy man Pope Stephen and upon the Roman people, he attempted to subject the city with its adjacent province to his empire.

For this reason the most blessed pope was compelled to seek the aid of Pippin, king of Francia. Hence he undertook the journey into Francia with his clerics.

When King Haisculphus heard this, he feared a little. For he judged that, if the pope obtained the aid of the Frankish king, he himself could not easily possess Rome with the adjacent region.

Therefore, to impede this, he determined that Carlomannus, who had become a monk, should be sent ahead from Mount Cassinum to Pippin, so that, preceding the supreme pontiff, he might act with his brother Pippin to prevent him from furnishing aid to the Roman people and the supreme pontiff against Haisculphus.

But when Pippin heard that the supreme pontiff had come to his kingdom, filled with immense joy, he proceeded with his nobles as far as the boundaries of the kingdom to meet him.

When he saw him approaching, he dismounted from his horse at a distance of three miles and, with great humility, proceeded on foot with his wife and children until he came to the pope himself.

When he had reached him, prostrate upon the ground, he reverently kissed his sacred feet. Thereafter, acting in the capacity of a groom, he led him as far as the palace.

When they had both sat together within the oratory, after many words the supreme pontiff tearfully entreated the king to defend, through covenants of peace, the cause of blessed Peter and of the commonwealth of the Romans as the arm of the Church.

But Carlomannus, who had come there according to what he had been instructed by the wicked King Haisculphus, strove in every way and contended vehemently to subvert the cause of the Holy Roman Church.

Yet, by the favor of the Most High, he was unable to turn the mind of his full brother Pippin, the most Christian king of the Franks, away from the holy purpose. Rather, Pippin promised, and confirmed by his own oath, that he would defend the cause of the Church according to his ability.

Thereafter, at the suggestion of the supreme pontiff, he sent envoys to Haisculphus, asking that he restore those things pertaining to the right of the Roman Church and the Roman commonwealth that either he or his predecessors, the kings of the Lombards, had taken from them.

This was done at the pontiff's suggestion not only once and twice, but even a third time.

But he, persisting in his perfidy, like another Pharaoh, was entirely unwilling to restore them.

When the illustrious King Pippin saw him thus obstinate in his stubbornness, he assembled an army against him.

When he had now completed half the journey, the pious shepherd, lest he appear to be the cause of the shedding of Christian blood, again directed letters of entreaty and admonition to Haisculphus.

Through them he adjured that most impious king by all the divine mysteries and by the future divine examination to restore peacefully and without the shedding of human blood those things that pertained to the Holy Roman Church and the Roman commonwealth.

But, obstinate in his wickedness, he not only refused to desist, but also threatened the holy man and the Franks.

Wherefore Pippin, trusting in the mercy of Almighty God, entered Italy with his army.

Haisculphus, trusting in his multitude, did not hesitate to meet him. But, broken by divine power, he was overcome by the Franks, and his army was crushed even to the slaughter of his men. Thus the just judge gave victory to his soldiers.

Fleeing, Haisculphus withdrew into the strongly fortified city of Pavia. Pippin, coming there with the supreme pontiff himself, surrounded it on every side with a siege.

When those who were besieged were now failing from hunger and could no longer resist the attacking Franks, they sent envoys of surrender to the supreme pontiff and King Pippin.

At their arrival, the pious pontiff entreated the king to incline toward peace, lest Christian blood be shed further. Therefore the king assented to the pontiff's prayers.

Coming out of the city, Haisculphus first of all delivered hostages to the king of the Franks. Thereafter, with all his nobles and judges, under a terrible and most binding oath, he promised and confirmed by a written page that he would immediately restore first the city of Ravenna with its dependencies, and moreover whatever he and his predecessors had taken from the right of the Holy Roman Church.

When all these things had been duly completed, the said illustrious king withdrew with his army into his own kingdom, and the most holy pontiff returned to Rome.

But Haisculphus, an adversary and enemy of his own soul, touched inwardly by grief and turning over in his mind the losses he had received from the king of the Franks, fulfilled none of the things he had promised by oath.

Moreover, hastening to Rome with the entire people of his kingdom, he surrounded it on every side with a siege for three months and consumed with fire and iron all things that were outside the walls of the city.

Moreover, digging up the bodies of many saints, he overthrew their cemeteries.

Therefore, when King Pippin heard all these things, filled with great grief, he again assembled an army so that he might aid the Church. Entering Italy and sweeping everything before him like a river, and having taken certain cities by storm, he again besieged Pavia.

While Pippin besieged Pavia, envoys of the emperor Constantine came to his camp. On behalf of the said prince, they entreated him and promised many imperial gifts if he would restore the city of Ravenna or the other cities and fortresses of the same exarchate to imperial jurisdiction.

But the most Christian king in no way inclined his mind toward their gifts and promises. He asserted that by no reasoning did he wish to subject to the dominion of another those same cities that belonged by right to blessed Peter and the Roman Church.

He also asserted that no abundance of treasures could persuade him to take away what he had once recovered for blessed Peter from the hands of the Lombards by his own labor.

Having heard these things, the imperial messengers returned to their own country.

When, therefore, the king of the Franks vigorously attacked Pavia, and those who were besieged were now exhausted by hunger and labor and could no longer resist, Haisculphus sent his envoys to the king so that they might seek pardon in his name.

Thereafter he professed by every means that he now wished to restore to the Roman Church the same cities and fortresses that he had previously promised in the covenant of the agreements.

Assenting to this petition, the king sent his messengers to receive the said cities in the name of the Roman pontiff. When they had been received, he sent their keys to the pope at Rome.

Accordingly, the cities written below, which Haisculphus had taken from the right of the Roman Church, he restored: first Ravenna; Ariminum; Pisaurum; Fanum; Caesenae; Sinigallia; Hesium; Forum Popilii; Forum Olivii with the fortress of Sasibium; Mount Feltrum; Accevagium; Mount Locatus; Serra; the fortress of Saint Martin; Urbinum; Callis; Leuo Oculi; Egubium; Chomachium; and also the city of Narnia.

Thus the illustrious King Pippin and defender of the Roman Church, after he had restored to Peter's right all the things for which he had sustained so many labors, returned to Francia.

While Haisculphus was engaged in hunting on a certain day, however, he was struck by divine will and suddenly died.

When he had died, Desiderius, who among the princes of the Lombards had been directed by Haisculphus into Tuscia, assembled a multitude of his men and constituted himself king of the Lombards.

When the other princes of the Lombards who were beyond the Alps heard this, they were indignant and, assembling infinite forces of their men, set out to fight against him.

Desiderius, therefore, seeing that he could not retain what he had seized unless he used or was assisted by the favor of the Romans and Franks, directed his messengers to the supreme pontiff, promising by oath that he would always fulfill the entire will of the pontiff and would fight for the Roman people and the Roman Church if, by their favor, he could retain the kingdom that he had seized.

Then the prudent shepherd directed messengers to the princes of the Lombards, asking and beseeching them to abstain from the civil shedding of blood.

Softened by his words, the Lombards returned to their own lands. Thus Almighty God disposed that, without any clash of arms, the aforesaid Desiderius obtained the royal dignity.

With God thus disposing, he immediately restored to the same supreme pontiff the cities that he had promised, namely Ferraria with its duchy and Faventia with the fortress of Tiberiacum, that is, Bagna Cavallum.

At length Stephen, after the many good works that he had done and after the condition of the Church had been enlarged, rested in peace.

From a decree of Pope Stephen it is said thus in Cause three, Question eleven: “The license to accuse must be denied to the accused until they have cleared themselves of the crime with which they are charged, because the confession against others of those who are implicated in crimes is not to be believed unless they first prove themselves innocent.” The gloss, however, explains this, and also in the following chapter.

The same pope says in Cause three, Question five: “The accusers and accusations whom the laws of the world do not admit and whom our predecessors prohibited, we also remove.

“Let no foreigner become either their accuser or their judge. Hence it was said to Lot, ‘You entered as a stranger; surely not so that you might judge?’

“Let no servant or freedman be an accuser of our people, nor any suspicious or infamous person.”

The same pope says in Cause three, Question six, chapter Beyond: “Let every accusation be heard within the province and be concluded by fellow provincials, unless an appeal has nevertheless been made to the Apostolic See.”

The same pope says in Cause three, Question four: “Let none of the anathematized be received,” namely for making an accusation.

The same pope says in Cause two, Question eight: “Let no accusation of anyone be received in writing, but by his own voice, if the person of the accuser is legitimate and worthy, while the one whom he desires to accuse is, of course, present, because no absent person can accuse or be accused by anyone.”

Section IV: Paul

When Stephen had been taken from this light, Paul, his full brother, undertook to govern the pontifical chair in the year of the Lord seven hundred fifty-five. He sat for ten years and one month.

He was most mild by nature and exceedingly merciful toward the poor, to such an extent that, with a few persons familiar to him, he went around in the silence of the night through the homes of the sick, ministering necessities to them.

He translated to Rome the body of blessed Petronilla, daughter of the apostle Peter, and buried it in the church of the apostles.

Moreover, this man was a most powerful defender of the orthodox faith. Hence, often following the footsteps of his predecessor, he sent messengers with letters of admonition and threat to the emperor Constantine for the restoration of the holy images to their former condition.

But the emperor, persisting in his hardness, was unwilling to listen, and, remaining in his error, persecuted Catholics.

While this pope presided, Pippin, king of the Franks, died and was buried in the church of Saint Dionysius.

His son Charles the Great, fortunate in victories, succeeded him in the kingdom with his brother Carlomannus.

For, when Pippin had died, the Franks, after holding a great council of princes and prelates, declared them both kings, on this condition: that Charles, who from the greatness of his felicity is called the Great, should hold that part of the kingdom that Pippin had held, while Carlomannus should hold that portion of the kingdom that Carlomannus, their paternal uncle, namely Pippin's brother, had once possessed before he became a monk.

Such concord remained between the brothers Charles the Great and Carlomannus, although with great difficulty, to such an extent that some people plotted that the two should settle their dispute by war with each other.

But in this Carlomannus was blamed more than Charles. God so disposed matters that civil wars did not arise in that Catholic kingdom.

After a short time, when Carlomannus died from disease, Charles the Great held the monarchy of the entire kingdom of Francia.

In those days in which Charles obtained the kingdom, Pope Paul migrated from this light.

Constantine the Antipope

When he had died, a certain Dodo, duke of the city of Nepesina, who had accumulated great riches for himself and possessed many Roman supporters in the city, both from the nobles and from the people, assembled a multitude of soldiers and foot soldiers from the city of Nepesina and from other neighboring cities of Tuscia and came into the city.

There, through a diabolical suggestion, with certain persons from the people adhering to him, they elected as pope his brother Constantine, who was still a layman.

With arms and tumult they introduced him into the Lateran church. Having summoned George, bishop of Praenestina, they compelled him to tonsure the said Constantine as a cleric.

When George saw himself constrained by them, he prostrated himself at the feet of that most nefarious Constantine, adjuring him by all the divine mysteries to cease from so impious and nefarious a presumption, lest through him so unheard-of a temerity begin to sprout in the Church of God.

But because the armed men standing around threatened him unless he did this, after prayer he ordained Constantine a cleric.

On the following day Constantine was ordained a deacon by the same man. Afterward, on the next Lord's Day, hastening with a multitude of armed men to the church of blessed Peter, he was ordained and consecrated bishop by the same George, bishop of Praenestina, in the presence of the bishops of Albanum and Portus.

He held the Apostolic See for the space of one year.

Having seized the pseudo-papacy through tyranny, he fell into such madness that he even held ordinations and ordained eight priests and four deacons. During the course of that year he also appointed eight bishops in diverse places.

The aforesaid George, bishop of Praenestina, however, after a few days was seized by a most grievous illness and became wholly immobile, to such an extent that from the day on which he ordained Constantine he was never able to celebrate Mass.

His right hand withered, and thus, languishing, he ended his life.

While Constantine thus held the invaded Apostolic See, everyone, together with those who were moved by zeal for the faith, stirred up a tumult and deposed this Constantine from the episcopal chair.

With one mind and one consent, they all elected before the Roman people a certain Stephen, a Sicilian by nation, a most holy and wise man, in the year of the Lord seven hundred fifty-six.

Section V: Stephen III

When that Constantine, who had usurped the papacy for himself through tyranny, had therefore been deposed and degraded, Stephen himself, elected by all the clergy and people and consecrated in the Lateran church, remained in the supreme pontificate.

He sat for three years, five months, and twenty-eight days.

At the beginning of his ordination, after bishops from both Italy and Gaul had assembled, he celebrated a general council at Rome in the Lateran church.

In it, first, it was decreed under the bond of anathema that no one should ascend to the episcopal dignity unless he came to it through distinct grades.

Concerning the priests and deacons themselves, it was established in the council that those bishops among them who had previously been priests or deacons should return to their former grades in the accustomed manner and, after a decree of their election had been made, seek its confirmation from the Apostolic See.

The priests and deacons ordained by Constantine were in like manner to return to their former habit.

All other things that Constantine had done concerning divine worship were invalidated, except baptism and chrism.

In the same council it was also enacted and confirmed that the sacred images of the Lord Jesus Christ, of blessed Mary, and of the other saints ought to be venerated and honored by all.

They confounded, condemned, and anathematized that synod celebrated in the regions of Greece under the compulsion of the heretical emperor Constantine, which had decreed that the said images were to be removed.

After this sacred council, Pope Stephen, after many good works, rested in peace.

From the council of Pope Stephen it is said thus in Distinction seventy-nine: “It was fitting that this sacrosanct lady, our Roman Church, should be duly ordered according to what was instituted by blessed Peter and his successors, and that one of the cardinal priests or deacons should be consecrated to the summit of the apostolate.”

The same council says in the following chapter: “Let no one from the laity, or even from another order, ever presume to be promoted to the sacred pontifical order unless, ascending through distinct grades, he has been made a cardinal deacon or priest.”

The same council says: “If anyone from among the bishops, monks, or laymen, breaking through contrary to the statutes of the sacred canons and the fathers, should presume to enter the grade of the sons of the Holy Roman Church, that is, of the cardinal priests and deacons, and if anyone from those named above should attempt to invade this Apostolic See and should desire to ascend to the honor of the supreme pontificate, let there be a perpetual anathema upon him and upon those acting on his behalf.”

Likewise Pope Stephen says in Cause two, Question one, concerning a matter manifest and known to very many: “Witnesses are not to be sought for notorious matters.

“Thus Saint Ambrose, in the letter to the Corinthians, says concerning the fornicator, expounding the opinion of the apostle: ‘It is not for a judge to condemn without an accuser, because the Lord did not in the least cast away Judas when he was a thief, since he was not accused.

“‘But when the deed had become known, the apostle judged that he was to be driven from the assembly of the brotherhood. For everyone knew his crime and did not accuse him. He publicly held his stepmother in place of a wife. In this matter neither were witnesses necessary nor could the crime be concealed by any tergiversation, whence he delivered him to Satan.’”

Section VI: Adrian

When Stephen went to his fathers, Adrian succeeded him in the honor of the supreme pontificate. He drew his origin from the most noble princes of the Romans in the year of the Lord seven hundred sixty-nine.

He sat for twenty-three years, ten months, and seventeen days.

He was exceedingly steadfast in spirit, a most ardent defender of the Catholic faith and of the people committed to him by God, and exercised the most diligent care of the needy poor.

Scarcely two months had elapsed from his ordination when that wicked king of the Lombards took the city of Faventia, which pertained to the right of the Church. Thereafter he transferred Chomachium, with the entire exarchate of Ravenna, into his power.

Afterward, assailing the city of Ravenna itself on every side and taking away its farms and villages, he left nothing from which the people in the said city could live and be sustained.

Hence the archbishop of the city, who was called Leo, was compelled to direct messengers to Adrian at Rome concerning these evils.

Hearing this, like a true shepherd of Christ's sheep and sympathizing from his heart, he immediately directed his own messengers to the same King Desiderius, asking and humbly beseeching him to restore the cities and fortresses that he had taken from the right of blessed Peter.

The insolent king wrote back that, unless the supreme pontiff first approached him personally and held a conversation with him concerning these things, he would by no means restore those cities.

For the most deceitful king desired the pontiff's coming because he wished him to anoint as kings the sons of Carlomannus, who together with their mother had left Gaul after their father's death and had come to him.

He desired to sow discords in the kingdom of the Franks and to separate the holy pontiff himself from the charity and love of Charles the Great, king of the Franks, so that, when this had been done, he might more easily subject the Roman city itself, with all Italy, to his dominion.

But by no art could he lead the most wise pontiff to do this.

King Desiderius, therefore, seeing that he could in no way incline the supreme pontiff to come to him, was kindled with great anger.

Sending a numerous multitude of soldiers, he occupied Sinigallia, Hesium, Mount Feltrum, Urbinum, and Eugubium. In the capture of these cities, many perished by the sword.

Thereafter, having assembled a general army, he undertook the journey toward the Roman city, and on the journey itself he took the fortress of Utriculum and the city of Blera by storm.

When this became known, the supreme prelate, sympathizing with his sons from his heart, sent the abbot of Sabina, a most holy man, with ten of the elders of his monks to the same king.

Approaching him and prostrate before his feet, they entreated him with tears on behalf of Almighty God and of the same supreme prelate to recover his senses from such evils and to restore the aforesaid cities that he had taken from blessed Peter.

But they could in no way soften his iron breast and most hard mind. Hence they returned without effect to the supreme pontiff.

When the same pontiff had directed his messengers to him a second and a third time concerning this affair and accomplished nothing, compelled by necessity he sent solemn messengers to Charles the Great, the illustrious king of the Franks.

He entreated him that, just as his father Pippin of pious memory had once done, he also should assist the Roman Church against the tyranny of the Lombards.

Desiderius, however, since by no reasoning could he induce the pontiff to come to him to anoint the aforesaid sons of Carlomannus, went forth from his palace with a great and numerous army and, without the pontiff's knowledge, undertook the journey toward Rome, leading the aforesaid boys together with their mother.

When the prelate learned that his arrival was approaching, he first fortified the Roman city exceedingly well. Thereafter he wrote a letter of anathema, admonishing him and adjuring him by all the divine mysteries not to enter the territory of the Romans in any way.

When that most proud king had received it, he returned to his own lands with great reverence and did not dare to proceed farther.

After this, envoys of the most illustrious King Charles came to the pope at Rome, asking whether Desiderius had restored the cities taken from the Roman Church.

For the king of the Lombards had caused false letters to be circulated in Francia asserting that he had restored all the cities of the Roman Church to the supreme pontiff Adrian.

But when King Charles learned the truth, that he had not restored the said cities, he immediately sent his own messengers to Desiderius.

Through them he entreated Desiderius to restore the cities he had taken to blessed Peter and Pontiff Adrian, peacefully promising that fourteen thousand solidi would be given to him.

But because he was able to bend his ferocity neither by prayers nor by gifts, Charles assembled a multitude of warriors from his kingdom and moved his army against Desiderius.

When King Charles reached the borders of Italy, desiring, if he were able, to bring the cause of blessed Peter to the effect of justice without the shedding of blood, he again caused Desiderius to be asked through religious men to restore the rights of blessed Peter.

But because he could in no way bend his malicious mind, while Desiderius armed himself most powerfully to resist and, having fortified the passage of the Alps, prohibited passage to the Franks, it appeared that by human strength the king of the Franks could in no way descend with his forces to the plains of Italy.

God, who always resists the proud, humbled his obstinate pride by the right hand of his power.

For when Charles despaired that he and his men could cross the mountains and intended to arrange his return to his own country on the following day, suddenly the Lombards, struck by divine fear, abandoned during that same night the fortifications that could in no way have been captured by human force.

With no one pursuing, they fled and began to fortify themselves in their cities.

When morning came, Charles saw that the fortifications had been deserted by the Lombards. Gathering his army, he descended without opposition to the plains of Italy.

King Desiderius with his Lombards did not hesitate to meet him. But when battle was joined, by God's will he was defeated. After many of his men had been lost, Desiderius was put to flight.

Charles, having obtained victory, pursued Desiderius himself and surrounded on every side with a siege the city of Pavia, which Desiderius had entered while fleeing.

But hearing that the son of Desiderius had withdrawn with the wife and sons of Carlomannus to Verona, he hastened there with the strength of his army.

When he came to the place, the said woman, namely the former wife of Carlomannus, immediately came to the king of her own will with her sons.

Receiving them kindly, he returned to the siege at Pavia.

In those days he reduced into his power all the cities that were beyond the Po.

When he had now besieged Pavia for six months, desiring to visit the thresholds of the apostles, he left the army and departed for Rome.

When he approached the city on Holy Saturday, out of reverence for the apostles and the other saints who rest at Rome, he descended from his horse and entered on foot for one mile with great devotion.

When he came to the steps of the church of blessed Peter, as he ascended he kissed all the steps of the said church with many tears, and came to Pope Adrian, who was awaiting him with the clergy in the atrium of the said church.

Received by him with great solemnity, they both entered the church together.

After he had resided for some days at Rome and visited the thresholds of the apostles and of the other saints, he returned to the army.

At length, in the tenth month, when the Franks pressed fiercely outside the city while famine and pestilence raged within, the city was captured and Desiderius was seized with his wife and children.

By the command of King Charles the Great, they were carried into Gaul.

Thus the kingdom of the Lombards in Italy was ended, two hundred four years after they had begun to reign in Italy.

Agisulphus, however, the son of Desiderius, who was then at Verona, hearing that his father had been captured and thereafter despairing that he could resist Charles's people in Italy, fled with a few of his familiars to the Greeks at Constantinople.

Finally, when all Italy had been subjected, Charles returned to Rome. There he restored in full all things that the kings of the Lombards had taken either from the Church or from the right of the Romans, adding the duchies of Spoleto and Beneventum.

The supreme pontiff convoked a council of one hundred fifty bishops. In recompense for such great labors, with the whole synod consenting, he granted to Charles the Great the right of electing the pontiff and of ordaining the Apostolic See, and also granted to King Charles the dignity of the patriciate, as is clear below.

Concerning this Pope Adrian it is stated thus in Distinction sixty-three from the Ecclesiastical History:

“Pope Adrian requested King Charles to come to Rome to defend the possessions of the Church. Charles, coming to Rome, besieged Pavia. Leaving his army there, he was honorably received by Pope Adrian on the holy day of the Resurrection.

“After the holy Resurrection, returning to Pavia, he captured King Desiderius. Thereafter, returning to Rome, he established a synod there with Pope Adrian in the Lateran patriarchate, in the church of the Holy Savior.

“That synod was celebrated by one hundred fifty-three religious bishops and abbots.

“Pope Adrian, with the whole synod, delivered to Charles the right and power of electing the pontiff, granted to him the Apostolic See and the dignity of the patriciate, and moreover decreed that archbishops and bishops throughout the individual provinces should receive investiture from him.

“It also decreed that unless a bishop were invested by the king, he should be consecrated by no one. Whoever should act contrary to this decree it bound with the bond of anathema and, unless he recovered his senses, confiscated his goods.”

Under this Pope Adrian, the Felician heresy was condemned and, in Adrian's presence, was abjured by Felix himself, its author.

This heresy asserted that the Son of God was true God in the divine nature but nuncupative God in the human nature. Likewise, it asserted that he was the Son of God in the divine nature but adoptive in the human nature, dividing the one person of God and man into two persons, namely that of a true son and that of an adoptive son.

He also labored exceedingly to repress the madness of the heretics who execrated the images of God and the saints. By books published against them and strengthened by many authorities of the Scriptures, he weakened their errors and made the right faith firm.

Pope Adrian says thus in Cause twenty-five, Question one: “By a general decree we establish that whoever among kings, bishops, or powerful men shall henceforth believe or permit the censure of the decrees of the Roman pontiffs to be violated in any respect shall be under execrable anathema and shall always stand guilty before God as a violator of the Catholic faith.”

The same pope says in Cause six, Question one: “According to the people's deserts, bishops are sometimes depraved,” that is, depraved men are appointed, “so that those who follow them may fall more readily.

“When the head languishes, the other members of the body are infected. Those who corrupt the life and morals of good persons become worse than those who plunder the substance and estates of others.

“Let each person beware lest either his tongue or his ears itch,” that is, lest he disparage others or listen to others disparaging.

“‘Sitting,’ says the prophet, ‘you spoke against your brother by disparaging, and against your mother's son you placed a stumbling block,’ and so forth.

“Let each person spare himself from disparagement of the tongue and guard his own words. Let them know that when they speak concerning others they will be judged by their own sentence.

“No one willingly tells something to an unwilling hearer.

“Most beloved, let it be the duty of each person to preserve not only chaste eyes but also a chaste tongue. Let another house never learn through them whatever is done in anyone's house.

“Let all possess the simplicity of the dove and plot deceits against no one, and let them possess the prudence of the serpent lest they be overthrown by the snares of others.”

The same pope says in Cause five, Question six: “Everyone who brings falsehoods against others shall be punished and shall bear infamy for his falsehood. He who does not prove the calumny he has brought ought to incur the penalty that the accused would have sustained if the accuser had proved it.”

The same pope says in Cause five, Question six: “The tongue of an informer,” that is, of a false accuser, “shall be cut out, or, when he has been convicted, his head shall be cut off.”

Informers are those who betray others from envy, namely by accusing them falsely. And, as the gloss says, this teaches what a judge ought to do in such a case, not that the Church kills or mutilates.

The same pope says in Cause five, Question one: “He who has publicly composed a writing or insulting words to the infamy of another and, having been discovered, has not proved what was written, shall be scourged. And let him who first finds it tear it up if he does not wish to incur liability as the author of the deed.”

The same pope says in Cause five, Question three: “In criminal cases an accuser may accuse someone only in person, and an accused person is not permitted to defend himself through another person.” The gloss sets down certain exceptions.

The same pope says in Cause six, Question one: “We say that all those whom the laws of the world call infamous are infamous, together with all those who, because their faults demand it, cannot be promoted to the priesthood.

“For it is unworthy that they should accuse those who cannot be what they themselves are, because just as superiors are not judged by inferiors, so neither can they be accused by them.”

After Adrian, Leo was created pope, who gave the empire to Charles. But these matters will be discussed in the following title.

Section VII: Boniface

In the times of the aforesaid pontiffs, Boniface, archbishop of Maguntinum, shone.

Sent by Gregory II to preach in Germany, he converted the Teutons to Christ by his teaching and holy works. At length, crowned by martyrdom, he migrated to Christ.

Certain letters of his are found, from which his holiness and zeal for souls are apprehended.

In Distinction forty it is said thus from the deeds of Boniface the martyr:

“If the pope is discovered to be negligent concerning his own and his brethren's salvation, useless and remiss in his works, and moreover silent concerning the good, which harms himself and everyone more, he nevertheless leads innumerable peoples with him in crowds as the first slave of Gehenna, to be beaten with many blows with him for eternity.

“No mortal presumes to reprove his faults here, because he who is to judge everyone is to be judged by no one, unless he is discovered to have strayed from the faith.

“For his perpetual condition, the whole body of the faithful prays all the more earnestly insofar as it more attentively perceives that, after God, its own salvation depends upon his preservation.”

The same Boniface, writing to Pope Zacharias, says thus in Cause eleven, Question three:

“Gregory, the predecessor of your predecessor, of venerable memory, when he ordained me, though unworthy, and sent me to preach the word of God to the Germanic peoples, bound me by an oath that I should become a supporter and helper in word, deed, and consent to canonical and just bishops and priests. With divine grace, I strove to fulfill this.

“But false priests, hypocrites, and seducers of peoples I was either to correct toward the way of salvation, or to avoid and abstain from their communion.

“This I preserved in part and in part was unable to preserve. But I also fulfilled the oath spiritually, because my soul did not enter into their consent and counsel. Corporally, however, I was unable to abstain from them.

“For when I had come to the prince of the Franks, compelled by the necessity of the churches, I did not find there such men as I wished. Nevertheless, I was unwilling to communicate with them in holy communion.”

This chapter is understood concerning heretics, schismatics, and excommunicated persons with respect to avoiding them, as is clear from the following chapter, in which Zacharias answers Boniface himself.

The same Boniface consulted Pope Zacharias as to whether, because he was now old and weak, he could appoint another suitable man in his place in the church of Maguntinum, where he was archbishop.

Zacharias answered him that it would be exceedingly reprehensible for another to be substituted while he lived. But, by a singular grace on account of his holiness, he permitted him to assume a coadjutor for the ministry by ordaining him bishop, whom, when dying, he might appoint as his successor.

By law this is granted to no bishop or prelate, Cause seven, Question one, You Sought.

The same Boniface, writing to the king of the English, says thus in Distinction fifty-six:

“If the nation of the English, as has been divulged through these provinces and is cast against us as a reproach in Francia and Italy, and is cast against us in reproach even by the pagans themselves, has scorned lawful marriages and led a foul life by committing adultery and practicing lust after the likeness of the Sodomitic people, it is to be judged that from such a mingling with prostitutes peoples will all be begotten degenerate, ignoble, and raging with lust.

“At length the whole people will incline toward worse and more ignoble things, and finally it will become neither strong in secular war, nor stable in faith, nor honorable to men, nor lovable to God.

“Thus it happened to other peoples of the nation of Hispania, Provincia, and the Burgundians, who, departing in this way from God, committed fornication until the judge of such crimes permitted avenging punishments to come and rage through men ignorant of God's law and through the Saracens.”

But Helinandus also, as Vincent relates in book twenty-four of the Historical Mirror, says thus concerning this Boniface:

This Boniface, an Englishman by nation, wrote a letter of this kind to Ethobald, king of the English:

“To the most beloved lord Ethobald, Boniface the archbishop, Germanic legate of the Roman Church, sends perpetual salvation of charity in Christ.

“We have heard that, intent upon alms, you prohibit thefts and robberies, love peace, and are a defender of the poor and of widows; and for this we give thanks to God.

“But as to the fact that you scorn lawful marriage: if you did this for the sake of chastity, it would be praiseworthy. But because you take pleasure in lust and adultery and with nuns, it is reprehensible.

“Wherefore, most beloved son, repent, and remember how shameful it is that you, who exercise lordship in the house of God, should, to his injury, be a slave of lust.

“Moreover, we have heard that all the nobles of the people of the Mercians, through your example, abandon their lawful wives and defile adulteresses and nuns.

“Let the custom of a foreign people teach you how alien this is from honor. For in ancient Saxony, where there is no knowledge of Christ, if a virgin in her father's house or a married woman under a husband has committed adultery, they burn her after she has been strangled by their own hand and hang her corrupter over the grave of the buried woman.

“Or chaste matrons, her garments having been cut away as far as the girdle, scourge her and stab her with knives. Sent from village to village, she encounters new women who scourge her, until they kill her.

“The Winidi also, which is a most foul race of men, possess this custom: when her husband has died, the woman casts herself into his funeral pyre, to be burned together with him.

“If, therefore, peoples ignorant of God possess zeal for chastity, what is fitting for you, most beloved son, who are a Christian and a king?

“Spare, therefore, your own soul. Spare also the multitude of your people perishing through your example, concerning whose souls you will render an account.

“Reflect, I ask, how terrible a vengeance God exercised upon the former kings who were companions and sharers in that fault which we reprove in you.

“For an evil spirit seized your predecessor Celred, a debaucher of nuns and a breaker of ecclesiastical privileges, while he feasted splendidly with his soldiers. Without confession and viaticum, while he spoke with the devil and detested God's law, it tore out his soul.

“It likewise made Hosred, king of Deira and Bernicia and guilty of the same faults, so unbridled that by a contemptible death he lost both his kingdom and his young life.

“We therefore call you to witness and beseech you to remember how fugitive the present life is, and how fleeting is the delight of filthy flesh through which eternal torments are purchased, and how ignominious it is that you leave the evil examples of a brief life to posterity in perpetuity.”

“From these things,” says Vincent in the place cited above, “both the prudence of the blessed man and the freedom of his spirit can be weighed, since he publicly reproved the sins of kings and princes. Through this, together with the holiness of his present life, he merited happily to attain the crown and glory of martyrdom.”

Saint Lullus succeeded him, concerning whom there is this verse:

Bishop Lullus, than whom no one is holier,

Mighty in divine medicine granted by God,

Meets diseases, as the whole world proclaims.

The aforesaid Boniface was martyred with his companions in Frisia for the faith of Christ. He was buried in Thuringia in the monastery that he himself had founded.

Section VIII: Leo III

When Adrian had died, Leo, a Roman by nation, was placed in the See of Peter in the seven-hundred-and-ninety-third year of the Lord [read: the seven-hundred-and-ninety-fifth year]. He was the third of this name.

He sat for twenty years and three months.

He was a chaste man, eloquent in speech, steadfast in mind, liberal to the poor, a most fervent zealot for souls, a most severe rebuker of vices, and a defender and guardian of ecclesiastical possessions.

In the seventh year of his pontificate, namely in the eight-hundred-and-first year of the Lord, while he devoutly conducted the solemnity of the litanies through Rome with the clergy, a certain man named Paschalis, with certain sons of the devil adhering to him and a multitude of armed men assembled, suddenly seized the pope.

They stripped him of his sacred habit, cast him to the ground, cruelly cut out his tongue and tore out his eyes, and, after inflicting many wounds, left him rolling in his own blood.

But both his tongue and his eyes were divinely restored to him.

He was led by the faithful to the church of blessed Peter. All who saw and heard the wonders that Christ had worked in his vicar glorified God, saying: “Blessed be God, who alone performs great wonders.”

When the duke of the city of Spoleto heard what wicked men had perpetrated against the supreme pontiff, he came to the city with a multitude of armed men. Taking the blessed pontiff, he led him with him to Spoleto.

After Leo had remained there for some days, he took an honorable company of clerics and departed for Charles the Great, king of the Franks.

The king received him as he arrived, honorably and reverently, with hymns and canticles. Seeing the wonders that God had worked in him, he glorified God with tears poured forth.

Those who had committed so monstrous a sacrilegious crime against him, hearing that the pontiff had approached the king of the Franks, did not dare to follow him. Instead, fabricating many crimes falsely, they transmitted them to the king through their messengers.

Giving them no credence, as was fitting, the king sent the supreme prelate back to his See at Rome, accompanied by many nobles of the Franks.

Received by them as an apostle, he was placed in his own See.

When the pontiff had rested for a few days, so that he might clear himself of the crimes imposed upon him before the king, the nobles, and the whole Roman people, he assembled all the bishops of Italy.

Before the king himself and everyone sitting in the church of blessed Peter, the venerable pontiff, embracing the four Gospels, ascended the ambo and said under oath in the hearing of all: “Concerning those false crimes with which certain wicked men have defamed me, I have no knowledge, nor do I know that I have done such things.”

After examining the case of the conspiracy against Pope Leo, Charles condemned the guilty, some to death and others to exile.

Hence Leo says concerning himself, as is found in Cause two, Question four:

“It has been heard, most beloved brothers, how wicked men fabricated false crimes against me. Wherefore I, Leo, pontiff of the Holy Roman Church, purify myself in your sight before God and his angels, because I neither perpetrated nor ordered to be perpetrated those criminal and wicked things that they cast against me.

“In doing this, however, I do not prescribe a law for others that they be compelled to do it.”

Thus far there.

The manner in which Pope Leo crowned Charles himself with the crown of the empire will be stated in the following title.

Title XIV

Chapter II

Philippicus

Philippicus, therefore, who was also Bardianus, after usurping the empire for himself when Justinian and his son had been killed, reigned for two years.

He began to reign in the seven-hundred-and-thirteenth year of the Lord, the four-thousand-six-hundred-and-seventy-sixth year of the world according to one computation, but according to another, which gives a much greater number, in the five-thousand-nine-hundred-and-twelfth year.

In his first year Germoardus, praying at Leodium before the altar of Saint Lambert, as Vincent relates after Sigebertus, was killed by Mangarius, a soldier of Rabbodus, duke of the Frisians.

Theobald, son of Dogro, was appointed mayor of the household by his grandfather Pippin.

The aforesaid emperor Philippicus, as Vincent relates after Hugh in book twenty-four of the Historical Mirror, because he was a heretic, sent Cyrus, bishop of Constantinople, into exile and placed in the same See a certain pseudo-monk of his own persuasion named John.

Philippicus himself also sent to Pope Constantine at Rome letters of depraved dogma.

The holy man rejected them with the counsel of the Roman people and commanded that Philippicus's name not be placed in charters.

When Philippicus had ruled for one year and a half, Anastasius rose against him, deprived him of his eyes, deposed him from the imperial dignity, and claimed his empire for himself.

Section I: Anastasius

Anastasius, therefore, who was also called Arthemius, after usurping the empire for himself from Philippicus, ruled for two years.

He began to rule in the seven-hundred-and-fifteenth year of the Lord, the four-thousand-six-hundred-and-seventy-eighth year of the world, but according to another computation the five-thousand-nine-hundred-and-fourteenth year.

Because he was Catholic, he sent letters to Pope Constantine through Scholasticus the patrician, exarch of Italy, in which he declared himself a supporter of the Catholic faith and a preacher of the holy Sixth Council.

At length he directed a fleet to Alexandria against the Saracens.

The army of this fleet, turned toward another plan in the middle of the journey, entered the city of Constantinople, sought Theodosius, an orthodox man, elected him emperor, and placed him upon the imperial throne under compulsion.

This Theodosius overcame Anastasius in a grave battle near the city of Nicaea, according to Vincent after Hugh in the place cited above.

At that time Saint Albinus, bishop of Andegavum, flourished.

He was a native of the Venetic region bordering upon the British Ocean and descended from parents of no mean station.

From his youth he burned with so great a fervor of faith that he voluntarily left his parents for Christ, fled carnal affections as enemies of the soul, and planted his whole mind in the heavenly homeland.

Immediately, in the monastery of Tralacum, he humbly subjected himself to his superiors so that, already in the first training of his youth, he might be an example of old age to the others.

At length, while still a little boy, as he walked through the district in the service of his abbot, he came to a certain place where a tempest thundered with such violence and so great a rainstorm poured forth that even its roof could not protect the house in which he was.

Since the volume of rain left the house as exposed as an open field and drenched everyone lodged there, the rain feared to touch blessed Albinus alone; for where a drop perceived the flame of faith, it turned itself aside lest it inflict injury.

When he was thirty-five years old, he was elected rector and pious shepherd of the monastery, solicitous to cut away vices and circumspect in implanting heavenly goods.

Thus he happily governed the congregation committed to him in the office of abbot for twenty-five years.

Thereafter, when Andegavum had been deprived of a shepherd, although he humbly resisted, he was called to the pontificate by the whole people.

Having obtained the honor of the priesthood that was owed to him, he showed himself merciful in alms to the poor, in the defense of citizens, in the visitation of the sick, and in the redemption of captives.

Hearing that a deceased young man was being lamented by his parents, he came running. So that he might draw out the dead man alive, he prostrated himself in prayer and, bending over him, prayed for a long time.

While the priest lying in the dust grew pale, the vitality of the soul grew red in the body, until, heaven having been struck and Tartarus laid open, the young man was called back from the funeral and the priest from prayer.

Likewise, he illuminated a certain blind man with the sign of the cross.

Likewise, when this apostolic man had come to the Venetic city, one of the young men who served him, whom he loved especially because of the quality of his character, died and was buried in that place.

After a year he called for the young man's little body to be taken from there to his own country.

While Albinus was delayed for a useful reason, the servants wished to move the body before the priest arrived. But it was made so heavy that they could have weighed gigantic limbs sooner than carry forth the boy's body, until the prelate came and loosened by prayer what those gathered together could not move.

In the city of Andegavum, a tower adjoining the gate had been made a prison for condemned persons. As blessed Albinus passed by, a commotion arose from the voices of those enclosed.

Then he approached the judge as an intercessor, asking that he release them from custody for the sake of piety.

When the judge postponed the matter with a deaf ear, the pontiff immediately turned himself to God with a faithful petition and uttered such familiar words that, in the place where Saint Albinus poured forth his prayer, a square stone of wondrous size sprang forth and made an entrance through the gate for those in chains, because before his prayer the stone could not preserve its solidity.

Coming forth from there as living persons from a tomb, they prostrated themselves at his footsteps in the basilica of blessed Maurilio, rendering thanks to the Lord and to Albinus because he had caused those facing death to return to safety.

Making the sign of the cross over a certain demoniac woman, he also drove the demon away from her.

Indeed, he desired to become a martyr of God, if the right hand of a striker had not been lacking.

At length this holy man, adorned with the flowers of virtues, having governed the summit of the pontificate for twenty years and six months and happily completed the eightieth year of his age, migrated to the Lord on the Kalends of March.

Section II: Theodosius

Thereafter Theodosius deposed Anastasius from the empire, ordained him a priest, and ruled for one year.

He began to rule in the seven-hundred-and-seventeenth year of the Lord, according to Vincent after Sigebertus in the place cited above.

Because he was inactive and unlearned and a collector of public revenues, he was compelled by force by the army to assume the empire.

At that time Rathbodus, duke of the Frisians, was led by the preaching of Bishop Wolframus to seek to be baptized.

When he had dipped one foot into the font, withdrawing the other foot, he asked where the greater number of his ancestors were, in paradise or in hell.

Hearing that the greater number were in hell, he withdrew the foot that had been dipped and said: “It is safer that I follow the greater number rather than the fewer.”

Thus he was mocked by a demon, who promised him that three days from then he would give him incomparable goods. But on that third day he perished by a sudden and eternal death.

This Wolframus, as Vincent relates from his deeds in book twenty-four of the Historical Mirror, was bishop of Senonica and was from the territory of Vasconia.

His father Wulbert served in the court of King Dagobert.

Wolframus was admonished by a vision to preach the word of God to the nation of the Frisians.

In order to do this, he then went to the monastery of Fontanella, whose abbot was Ausbert, later bishop of Rothomagus. From this monastery he took fellow laborers with him for preaching.

While they sailed to Frisia and were in the middle of the sea adjoining the region of the Normans, the hour arrived at which Saint Wolframus was to sing Mass.

The ship remained immovable with its anchors cast.

At length, when the place in the Mass had come at which the minister ought to offer the paten to the holy prelate, the prelate awaited it with his hand extended.

But while the minister wished to wash it, it fell into the sea. Prostrate at the holy man's feet, he sought pardon.

Sending him to the place from which it had fallen, Wolframus brought it about that the paten, carried back from the bottom of the sea, adhered to the minister's hand.

After these things, a son of Duke Rathbodus, having been baptized by the blessed man, expired while clothed in white.

It was a custom among the Frisians that whoever was touched by the lot should be offered to the demons to be sacrificed.

A certain boy named Ouo was chosen by lot for such a thing.

When the holy man sought him, the duke answered: “If your Christ shall rescue this man from death, let him be yours.”

The boy was hanged upon a gallows. But while Saint Wolframus prayed, the bonds that constricted his throat were broken, and he fell unharmed to the earth.

Being held by the saint, he arose unharmed. Having been baptized, he was afterward, at a fitting time, ordained a priest.

After this, when Duke Rathbodus, as was said above, was to be baptized and was in great doubt whether he ought to do this, he sent to blessed Villibrordus, bishop of that people, consulting him as to whether he ought to be baptized.

Villibrordus answered him: “How will he believe me who does not believe our holy brother? I saw him this night bound with a fiery chain, whence it is established that he has already assumed eternal damnation.”

As he went to the prince's house, it was announced to him that the prince was already dead, and immediately he returned to his own place.

The manner in which this Rathbodus had been deceived by the devil, the aforesaid Ouo narrated, saying that the devil had appeared to him transformed into an angel, having his head covered with a golden diadem set with gems and wearing a garment woven with gold.

When Rathbodus gazed upon it, that angel, though an evil one, said: “Most powerful of men, who has so seduced you that you wish to withdraw from the worship of the gods?

“Do not do this. Remain in those things that you have learned, and you will come to the golden houses that I am going to give you eternally in the immediate future.

“Tomorrow, therefore, summon Wolframus, the teacher of the Christians, and ask him what that dwelling of eternal brightness is that is promised to you.

“When he is unable to show it to you, let envoys be sent from each party, and I shall be the guide of the journey and shall show them the golden house and the most beautiful dwelling that I promise you.”

Awakening, Rathbodus narrated all things to Saint Wolframus.

Wolframus told him that the deceitful devil wished to mock him.

Rathbodus answered that he wished to become a Christian if that beautiful dwelling were not shown to him by his god.

Immediately, therefore, a certain Frisian was sent on behalf of the duke, and a certain deacon on behalf of Saint Wolframus.

When they had proceeded a little way from the town, they met a certain companion for the journey.

He said to them: “Hasten quickly, for I shall show you the most beautiful dwelling prepared for Duke Rathbodus.”

Proceeding, therefore, along a very broad road and through unknown places, they saw a certain road adorned with polished work from diverse kinds of marble.

From afar they saw a house as though of gold and came to the square that was before that house, laid as though with gold and gems.

Entering the house, they saw that it was of wondrous beauty and incredible splendor, and in it was a throne of wondrous size.

Then the guide of the journey said to them: “This is the dwelling prepared for Duke Rathbodus.”

At this the astonished deacon said: “If these things have been made by God, let them remain forever; if by the devil, let them quickly disappear.”

And when he signed himself with the sign of the holy cross, that guide changed into a devil, and the golden house into mud.

The deacon and the Frisian remained in the midst of marshy places that were full of exceedingly long burned brushwood. [read: exceedingly long buckthorn thickets]

After completing for three days a journey of immense labor, they returned to the town and found the duke dead.

They narrated to Saint Wolframus what they had seen. The Frisian, moreover, having been baptized, followed blessed Wolframus to the monastery.

Saint Wolframus was also among the Frisians for five years. Afterward he returned to Fontanella and assumed the monastic habit, a bishop having been ordained in the city of Senonica.

Section III: Leo

According to Vincent in the place cited above, after Hugo, a most powerful man named Leo rose against the aforesaid emperor Theodosius. He indeed deposed him from the imperial summit, but permitted him to depart unharmed. Theodosius himself, having become a cleric, passed the remainder of his life in peace.

Leo began to rule in the seven-hundred-and-eighteenth year of the Lord, and in the four-thousand-seven-hundred-and-eighty-first year of the world, but according to another computation in the five-thousand-and-first year. He ruled for twenty-four years.

In the second year of this Leo, the Constantinopolitans strongly resisted the Saracens by assiduity in praying and constancy in fighting. Saracens without number perished by hunger, cold, war, and pestilence.

It is related, as Vincent writes in the place cited above, that they perished miraculously in this manner.

At Constantinople, in the monastery of the holy Mother of God beside the palace in the sea, near Saint Sophia, there was an image of blessed Mary who held the infant Jesus in her arm. Saint Luke, it is said, painted him on a panel while Saint Mary was still living.

This image is called Odigitria, that is, “Guide,” because Saint Mary appeared to two blind men, led them to her church, and gave them sight.

With this image they make a procession through the whole city every Tuesday.

Therefore, when the city was under siege, as was said above, and the citizens were fasting and praying and fighting at the same time, a certain citizen advised that the image be brought and that prayer be made to it by everyone in this manner: “Holy Mother of God, who have delivered us so many times, deliver us now from the enemies of your Son. And if you wish us not to sink your image in the sea, sink them.”

When he had said these things, he secretly held the image beneath the waves. Immediately a storm arose, and it either sank or shattered all the ships of the Saracens.

At that time, as Helinand writes, a certain wondrous vision was shown by an angel to a hermit in Britain concerning Saint Joseph, that noble decurion who took down the Lord’s body from the cross, and concerning that bowl or dish in which the Lord supped and dipped the morsel that he gave to Judas.

In the second year of this same Leo, Sigebertus says, Constantine, the son of this emperor, while being baptized by Patriarch Germanus, defecated in the holy font, giving a great presage that he would be a scandal to the Church of God, as indeed he was.

In Leo's third year the Saracens, confounded, abandoned the siege of Constantinople, their ships having been partly consumed by sea-fire, partly submerged, and partly devastated by a storm of hail, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror.

And when scarcely five ships remained from so great a multitude of ships, the power of God became known to all peoples.

Within the city, however, three hundred thousand persons perished from pestilence.

Haumar, persecuting the Christians, made many of them martyrs of Christ.

The Saracens crossed over from Africa into Spain under their leader Abdirama and claimed it for themselves.

Thus the kingdom of the Visigoths and Suevi was destroyed and brought under the Saracens after more or less three hundred and forty-six years had elapsed from the time when they were expelled from Scythia by the Huns.

But from the time when, after the Vandals withdrew and the Suevi were defeated, they began to rule in the Spains, about two hundred and fifty-six years had elapsed.

The kingdom of the third part of the Spains, however, which is called that of the Galicians, which neither the Visigoths at that time nor the Saracens afterward were able to subjugate, still flourishes unharmed and, with the faith of Christ protecting it, remains unconquerable.

After blessed Wolframus, Guericus, a man most resplendent in sanctity and learning and glorious for many miracles, presided over the church of Senonica.

Saint Ebbo, the nephew of this same Guericus, succeeded him. When he had formerly been orphaned of his parents and the castle of Tornodorum belonged to him by hereditary right, he fled secretly to Senonica.

There, in the monastery of Saint Peter, he long served Christ under the rule of the abbot.

Afterward, having been made abbot of that place and then promoted to bishop, he shone as greatly in signs as in merits.

In Leo's fourth year, Luitprand, king of the Lombards, who was very devoted to Saint Augustine, heard that the Saracens, after depopulating Sardinia, had also defiled those places where the bones of blessed Augustine had been translated and deposited because of the devastation of the barbarians. They had been brought from Hippo, where Augustine had been bishop and had first been buried.

He sent envoys there, namely to Sardinia, and, after much gold had been given, caused those relics to be carried away from there.

The aforesaid king of the Lombards went a long distance to meet these relics and, having seen miracles manifesting the saint's merit, devoutly adored them.

But when they came to a certain village situated in the diocese of Thordona and wished to lift the body from there, that body remained so immovable that no force and no human art could move it.

Seeing this, the king made a vow that, if the blessed confessor permitted his body to be lifted from there and conveyed to Papia, he would grant that village, with all its appurtenances, to the servants of the church of blessed Augustine to be possessed forever.

When the vow had been made, the most holy body was lifted with inestimable ease, was conveyed as far as Ticinum, and was placed in the basilica of Saint Peter called the Golden Heaven, which had been constructed by that king.

In the fifth year of this Leo, Leo himself labored greatly to have Pope Gregory killed, but he was frustrated in his desire because the Italians and Lombards defended the pope.

In Campania of Italy, burned wheat, barley, and legumes fell from heaven as though in rain.

In Leo's sixth year, Charles Martel defeated the Saxons.

Rogobert, bishop of Remi, was deposed from the episcopate by the aforesaid Charles, his son in baptism (that is, his godson), because, when Charles was going against Reginfredus, Rogobert, through fear of Reginfredus, refused to open the city of Remi to him.

Eucherius, bishop of Aurelianum, was likewise deprived of the episcopate for a similar reason and, exiled in the monastery of Saint Trudo, was consummated in sanctity.

In Leo's seventh year, a certain divining sorcerer, promising Gisitheus that he would rule for forty years, persuaded him to decree that the images of God and the saints be taken down throughout his whole kingdom.

Seduced by the hope of ruling for a long time, he issued the edict. Nevertheless, he himself died suddenly.

After him Eluelid ruled over the Saracens for twenty years.

In Leo's eighth year, Leo himself, seduced by a certain Bessoth, an apostate from the faith, declared war against the images of Christ and his saints and decreed that they be taken down and burned everywhere.

Concerning this he was reproved by Pope Gregory, as is clear in the preceding chapter.

In Leo's ninth year, Chilperic having died, Theodoric was substituted by Charles Martel in the kingdom. He ruled for fifteen years.

At this time, according to Vincent's Historical Mirror, book twenty-four, chapter one hundred and forty-nine, this same Charles, a most warlike prince, subjugated the Saxons by arms and, having defeated Lanfrid, duke of the Alamanni, made Alamannia tributary to himself.

He also defeated the Suevi and the Bavarians.

He routed Eudo, duke of Aquitaine, after defeating him in war, and gravely devastated Aquitaine.

But Duke Eudo, seeing that he was inferior to Charles in all things, invited the Saracens from Spain against him.

Eudo, nevertheless, having been reconciled to Charles, destroyed the camps of the Saracens and crushed their remnants.

Not long afterward this same Eudo rebelled, but Charles defeated him while he was rebelling in Vasconia and deprived him both of his principality and of his life.

He also fought against Eudo's sons Waifred and Waldo, defeated them, and subjected all Aquitaine to himself.

He also captured Lugdunum and other cities and subjected Burgundy.

Therefore, when a multitude of enemies and the constancy of wars pressed upon him, he granted ecclesiastical property, that is, tithes, to his soldiers to possess.

For this reason his soul was afterward seen by Saint Eucherius, bishop of Aurelianum, to be detained in the punishment of hell.

In Leo's tenth year the Constantinopolitans rioted because of the removal of images, and some were even crowned with martyrdom because of this.

In his eleventh year, because Pope Gregory saw that he was incorrigible, he caused Rome, Italy, and all Hesperia to withdraw from Leo's jurisdiction and prohibited the payment of tribute.

In his twelfth year Saint Germanus, because he opposed Emperor Leo on account of his impiety, was cast down from the episcopal see.

In his thirteenth year the Saracens, with all their households, crossed the Garonne as though intending to dwell in Gaul. They devastated everything and burned the churches of God.

Charles Martel, relying upon God's aid, met them and killed three hundred and seventy thousand of them together with their king Abdirama, while he lost one thousand five hundred of his own men.

In Leo's fifteenth year, Constantine, his son, took as wife Irene, daughter of Kaian, king of the Avars. Having been baptized, she held the right faith while her husband apostatized.

Not long afterward Theodoric, king of the Franks, died, as Vincent relates from the chronicles in the place cited above.

After him Childeric ruled for nine years, a useless and indolent man who possessed nothing of the kingdom's entire power except the name of king.

The king of the Saracens invaded Arelate with his men and devastated the province.

Charles Martel met him, captured Avignon, besieged Narbonne, destroyed Magalona and Nemausus after the Saracens had been defeated, and took hostages from the said cities into Francia.

Finally Charles Martel, a most victorious prince, died after the kingdom of the Franks had been pacified and enlarged.

His body was buried in the church of Saint Dionysius outside Paris. In his tomb, after some years, not his body but an immense serpent was found.

The Franks received Narbonne, long besieged, from the Goths, after the Saracens had been slain and Waiferius, who led them, had been put to flight. Nevertheless, an agreement was made with the Franks that the Goths should live there according to their ancestral customs and laws.

In the twenty-fourth year of his reign Leo was taken from this world.

Section IV: Constantine

His son Constantine succeeded him.

He began to rule in the seven-hundred-and-forty-second year of the Lord and in the five-thousand-nine-hundred-and-forty-first year of the world. He ruled for thirty-five years.

This Constantine, the successor alike of his father's empire and impiety, as Vincent notes after Hugo in the place cited above, was a persecutor of the laws handed down by the fathers.

Throughout the whole time of his life he always devoted himself to magical arts, sorceries, even bloody sacrifices, and lusts.

Many clerics, monks, and religious laypersons were also endangered under him for the right faith.

He likewise had the aforementioned Anastasius, the falsely named patriarch of Constantinople, consenting with him in all things because of love for earthly principality.

Consequently divine indignation came upon the citizens of that city, admonishing the impious emperor to restrain himself from the madness with which he burned. But he, like Pharaoh of old, remained uncorrected.

For a pestilential disease came, beginning from Sicily and Calabria and extending as far as the royal city, and so devastated it that even within the city many houses were shut up entirely because there was no one to inhabit them.

The corpses of the dead were also carried into the marshes.

The aforesaid patriarch Anastasius, moreover, exhausted by excessive suffering, miserably died while vomiting the excrement of his bowels, as he deserved.

A certain heretical monk named Constantine succeeded him.

In Emperor Constantine's third year, according to Sigebertus, ash fell from heaven.

In his fourth year Peter, bishop of Damascus, and Peter Mavimenus were martyred in Syria.

After the city of Aquae had been laid waste by the Saracens, the body of blessed Mary Magdalene was translated by Gerard, count of Burgundy, to the monastery of Vincelliacum that he had constructed, although some write that it rests at Ephesus, a claim having no supporting evidence.

Moreover, according to Vincent's Historical Mirror, when the holy body was translated from the city of Aquae, it was found in its tomb wholly intact in every part, covered with skin that was also wholly intact, lying extended in the customary manner with the hands placed upon the breast.

Afterward an odor of ineffable sweetness poured forth from it.

They placed it in the said monastery, in the church of the holy Mother of God. There, from that time, with the Lord cooperating, it became illustrious through the powers of diverse signs.

For near the city of Nivernum, a certain knight who had been imprisoned and bound with iron chains commended himself to the saint and came out unharmed after his chains had been loosed.

Likewise, in another place, another man bound with many chains went forth free by the merits of the saint to whom he had commended himself.

When certain persons were sailing on the sea and were being buffeted by a storm, and when the ship began to sink, they invoked the saint and were delivered from the danger of death.

A certain blind man also commended himself to her and received sight.

In Emperor Constantine's fifth year, Carloman, brother of King Pippin, pierced by divine fear after some years of his principality, went to Rome, sought and received the monastic habit from Pope Zacharias, and served God on Mount Siraptus and afterward in the monastery of Monte Cassino until the end of his life, as was said in the preceding chapter.

Attalongus the priest, admonished by the blindness inflicted upon him to seek the bodies of Saints Kilianus and his companions, recovered his sight when the bodies of the saints had been found.

When this matter had been reported to Saint Boniface, bishop of Maguntia, by Attalongus, Boniface decreed that the castle of Wirtzbugk be distinguished with the dignity of an episcopal see in honor of Kilianus the martyr, who had been ordained bishop by Pope Conon to preach there and there had received the place of his death and rest. He ordained Saint Burchardus as the first bishop there, as Vincent writes after Sigebertus in the place cited above.

In Constantine's seventh year there was an excessive pestilence and mortality of persons in Calabria and Sicily.

On people's garments and on the veils of churches there appeared little crosses marked as though with oil.

Pippin, mayor of the palace of Francia, who governed the kingdom, was created king of Francia by the will and assent of the magnates of the kingdom.

By the ordinance of Pope Zacharias, this Pippin was anointed king by Boniface, archbishop of Maguntia and afterward a martyr.

The man who had been king, namely Ilderic, because he was useless and effeminate, was deprived of the kingdom and tonsured as a monk. Concerning this, see above in the preceding chapter.

Pippin ruled in Francia for eighteen years. After him the mayors of the palace began to exercise principality over the kings of Francia.

In the tenth year, King Pippin improved the churches of the Gauls with chants of Roman authority under careful study.

When Haisculphus, king of the Lombards, rose against the Romans in order to subject Rome to himself, Pope Stephen, who had succeeded Zacharias, went personally into Francia to King Pippin and led him into Italy to defend the Church against the Lombards, which he also did, as was said above in the preceding chapter.

This Pippin also, as Sigebertus says, was anointed king by this Pope Stephen together with his sons Carloman and Charles, who was afterward called Charlemagne because of his virtues, and through them their generation was blessed forever into the inheritance of royal succession.

Anselm, an illustrious man whose sister was the wife of King Haisculphus, translated the body of Saint Sylvester the pope to the monastery of Monnatula that he had founded.

In Emperor Constantine's twelfth year there occurred a terrible earthquake in which some cities were overturned entirely and others in part, while other cities migrated more than six miles from mountainous places to the plains below, whole and unharmed, together with their walls and dwellings.

In Mesopotamia the earth was likewise rent for a distance of two miles.

Another earth, exceedingly white and sandy, rose from the depth, and from it came forth an undefiled mule-like animal speaking with a human voice and proclaiming an incursion of a nation from the desert against the Arabs.

These things are related by Sigebertus and Vincent in the place cited above.

In Emperor Constantine's thirteenth year, Carloman, Pippin's brother, who had become a monk and had gone into Francia to Pippin in favor of the king of the Lombards, died at Vienna.

In the fourteenth year of his reign, Constantine assembled at Constantinople a synod of three hundred and thirty bishops. In it the Church of God was greatly scandalized by an edict promulgated concerning the removal of the images of God and his saints, and the emperor tyrannized against the orthodox, as Vincent relates after Sigebertus.

King Pippin, having returned to Italy, confined and defeated at Papia Haisculphus, king of the Lombards, who, after breaking the covenant of peace, had besieged Rome, and compelled him to restore the lands and rights that he had taken from the Church.

Breaking forcefully through the fortifications of the Saxons, after great slaughter he brought them under tribute.

Then he destroyed the district of Auernicum, captured many castles and the city itself, and brought away Count Blandinus with many others.

He also captured Biturica and fortified it after its capture.

He devastated the Aquitanian cities of Agennum, Petragoricae, and Engolisma and subjected a great part of Aquitaine to himself.

In Constantine's fifteenth year, by divine will the head of John the Baptist was brought into Aquitaine under King Pippin and was received with honor. Afterward, when a noble church had been constructed in those same territories, it was deposited with fitting honor, as Vincent writes after Sigebertus in the place cited above.

Nevertheless, it must be known that at Rome, in the monastery of Saint Sylvester, which belongs to nuns, the head of John the Baptist is shown and is commonly held to be there.

Therefore God knows which is the truer, unless it be said that it was afterward translated from Aquitaine to Rome, which nevertheless is not found written.

In Emperor Constantine's twenty-first year the Turks, breaking forth from the Caspian Gates, harassed Armenia.

When in ancient times there had been a pestilence in their country, at the persuasion of Christians they shaved themselves in the form of a cross, and by this sign of salvation health was restored to the country. They retained this rite of shaving.

In Constantine's twenty-second year there was a great frost from the Kalends of October until February.

Thus the Pontic Sea, according to Sigebertus, for a distance of one hundred miles was turned by the severity of the ice into the hardness of stone, having thirty-one cubits from the surface to the depth.

Snow also covered it to a depth of twenty cubits, so that the sea was made firm by it and was trodden by feet.

But within the month of February, by the power of God, the ice was broken into diverse shapes in the likeness of mountains.

Stars also seen to fall from heaven so terrified everyone that they thought the end of the world was imminent.

In the twenty-third year of the aforesaid emperor, Bishop Chrodegangus translated from Rome into Gaul the bodies of the martyrs Gorgonius, Nabor, and Nazarius and placed them in diverse churches.

In Constantine's twenty-sixth year, the emperor Constantine, when he was about to fight against the Bulgars in a naval battle, lost almost his whole army when nearly two thousand of his ships were shattered by the force of the north wind.

In Constantine's twenty-seventh year, Constantine, who had usurped the papacy for himself while a layman, having been made a cleric, was deposed and deprived of his eyes.

Stephen was created bishop of the city. Pope Adrian succeeded him in the thirty-first year of Constantine's reign, as was said above.

He called Charlemagne into Italy to defend the Church from the hands of the Lombards, which he also did.

Finally, Emperor Constantine was divinely struck by the plague of a most dreadful burning and, crying out while still alive that he had been delivered to unquenchable fire, died.

Section V: Leo

Leo, his son, began his reign in the seven-hundred-and-seventy-seventh year of the Lord and in the four-thousand-seven-hundred-and-fortieth year from the beginning of the world, but according to another computation in the five-thousand-nine-hundred-and-seventy-sixth year. He ruled for five years.

In his first year, when certain persons were meditating rebellion in Italy, the powerful King Charles returned to Italy, captured the city of Forum Julii, and commanded its duke Irolandus, the instigator of the rebellion, to be beheaded.

Having captured the city of Trivisium, by the majesty of his name he struck fear into the others.

In the same year, Witigundus, duke of the Saxons, fled into Normandy.

The baptized Saxons agreed that they would lose their freedom and all their possessions if they should ever withdraw from fidelity to Christ and to the king.

In the second year, King Charles destroyed Caesaraugusta in Spain by ravaging it, besieged Pampilona, and, after the walls of the captured city had been destroyed, subjected the Vascones and two petty kings to himself.

He received other cities in surrender.

In the fourth year, Charles crossed the river Albia. There the Bardaganenses and Norditi were baptized in his honor.

In the fifth year, Madiamiras made many martyrs of both sexes.

King Charles went to Rome with his army. There his sons were anointed as kings: Pippin over Italy and Ludovicus over Aquitaine.

When Emperor Leo was raging with desire for precious stones, as he passed through a certain church and saw a certain crown adorned with its precious stones, he commanded it to be taken away.

When he had worn it upon his head for some days, carbuncles in the form of a crown came forth from his head, and, seized by fever, he died.

Around that time, after Charlemagne had put an end to the Italian war, as Jacobus de Columna relates, the Saxon war immediately followed.

No war was undertaken that was longer, more atrocious, or more laborious for the Frankish people.

For at that time the Saxons, like all the nations then inhabiting Germany, were devoted to the worship of demons and opposed to the Christian religion. Consequently they did not judge it dishonorable to transgress either divine or human laws.

This war was undertaken with great animosity on each side and, with greater loss to the Saxons than to the Franks, continued for thirty-three successive years, which is difficult to tell.

Frequently defeated, they gave themselves to the king as suppliants. They promised that they would do what was commanded. They frequently gave without delay the hostages who were demanded.

Sometimes they were so subdued and softened that they even promised to abandon the worship of demons and to be willing to surrender themselves to the Christian religion.

But just as at times they were inclined to do these things, so they were always headlong in overturning those same things.

Nevertheless, the magnanimity and perpetual constancy of King Charles could neither be overcome by any mutability on their part nor be wearied from those things that he had begun to do.

For he never permitted them to perpetrate any such thing with impunity without either avenging their perfidy himself or sending an army through his counts and exacting a fitting penalty from them.

At last the war was ended on this condition: that, casting aside the worship of demons and abandoning their ancestral ceremonies, they should receive the sacraments of the Christian religion.

Although this war was drawn out over a great length of time, Charles himself nevertheless engaged the enemy in a battle line no more than twice.

The Saxons were so routed in these two battles that they did not afterward dare either to provoke the king or to resist him when he came, unless they were defended by some fortification of a place.

Nevertheless, many men from the nobility of both the Franks and the Saxons, who had enjoyed the highest honors among their own people, met their end in that war. At length it was finished.

While this war endured, so many wars arose against the Franks from diverse parts of the lands, and were conducted by the skill of the prudent king, that it could rightly come into doubt for those who consider them whether it is proper to marvel at his patience in labors or rather at his good fortune.

For among all who ruled in his age, the king was the greatest in prudence and the most outstanding in greatness of spirit.

Indeed, in those things that either had to be undertaken or executed, he neither drew back because of labor nor recoiled because of danger.

For while he was fighting assiduously and almost continuously against the Saxons, after garrisons had been placed at suitable points along the frontiers, he also attacked Spain with the greatest preparation.

Having crossed the pass of the Pyrenean mountain and received into surrender all the towns and castles that he had approached, he returned with his army safe and unharmed, except that on the very ridge of the Pyrenees it befell him briefly on his return to experience the perfidy of the Vascones.

For when the army was proceeding extended in a long column, as the nature of the place and of the narrow ways permitted, the Vascones, stationed upon the summit of the mountain’s peak, rushed down from above upon the last part of the baggage train and upon those who, marching at the very rear of the column, guarded those proceeding before them, and cast them down into the valley beneath.

Joining battle with them, they killed them all to the last man. After plundering the baggage, protected by the benefit of the night that was now approaching, they fled with the greatest speed, fearing the main body of the king's army that had gone ahead, and dispersed in different directions.

The lightness of the Vascones' arms and the nature of the place where the battle was fought aided them greatly in this deed, for these things rendered the Franks unequal to the Vascones in every respect.

In this battle many of the Frankish nobles fell. Among them were Rothlandus, a most daring knight and prefect of the British frontier; Anselm, count of the palace; and Cagibardus, provost of the royal table.

He also subdued the Britons who inhabited the extreme part of Gaul toward the west upon the shore of the Ocean Sea.

Thereafter the Barbaric, or Bavarian, war suddenly arose but was completed with a swift end.

This war was stirred up by the pride and likewise the indolence of Duke Tassalio. At the urging of his wife, who was the daughter of Desiderius and thought that her father's exile should be avenged through her husband, he entered into an alliance with the Huns, that is, the Hungarians, who border the Bavarians on the east. They attempted not only to refuse to do what was commanded but also to provoke war.

The king's spiritedness could not endure his obstinacy, because it appeared excessive.

Therefore, having gathered forces from every quarter, before he entered the province the king determined to test the duke's disposition through envoys.

Considering the king's benevolent disposition, the duke surrendered himself to the king as a suppliant and furnished the hostages that were demanded, among whom he gave his son Theodo.

Thus the war that had been feared as though it would be the greatest obtained a very swift end.

The greatest of all the wars that he waged, apart from the Saxon war, was the one that followed the Bavarian war, which was against the Huns who inhabit Hungary. He conducted it with more spirit than the others and with greater preparation.

But in this war he personally made only one expedition; he entrusted the others to his son Pippin and to the governors of the provinces to complete.

Although it was conducted by them, it was nevertheless ended in its eighth year.

How many battles were waged in it and how much blood was shed is attested by Pannonia, emptied of every inhabitant.

The whole nobility of the Huns perished in this war, their whole glory fell, and all their treasures were plundered.

Indeed, human memory cannot recall any war that arose against the Franks by which they were enriched with greater resources, for until that time they seemed poor.

For the Franks justly took away from the Huns so many spoils and so many weights of gold and silver as the Huns in past times had unjustly taken from other nations.

What is greater than these things, this war was bloodless for the Franks. Only two of the leaders of the Franks died in this war, namely Henry, duke of Forum Julii, and Gerold, prefect of Bavaria.

He also fought against the Slavs, who had rebelled with the Saxons assisting them. He so subdued them in the single expedition that he personally conducted that they did not afterward refuse to do what was commanded.

He also subdued the Normans and Bohemians.

The Normans, first practicing piracy and afterward with a larger fleet, then began for the first time to devastate the shores of Gaul and Germany. Concerning them, namely the Normans, more will be said below.

Section VI: Irene and Constantine

While Leo was still a youth, he died without offspring. Irene, his mother, ruled with her other son, named Constantine. [read: When Leo died while still young, Irene, his wife, ruled with their son Constantine]

These two, namely the mother with her son, began to rule in the seven-hundred-and-eighty-second year of the Lord and in the four-thousand-seven-hundred-and-forty-fifth year of the world, but according to another computation in the five-thousand-nine-hundred-and-seventy-sixth year. They ruled for ten years.

In the first year of their rule, a certain person digging at Constantinople found beneath the earth a most ancient monument in which he discovered a dead body. Upon its breast was a golden plate on which he found this written in Greek letters: “Christ will be born of the Virgin Mary, and I believe in him. Under the emperors Constantine and Irene, O sun, you will see me again.”

In the sixth year a war arose between the Franks and the Avars.

In the following year Adelgisus, the son of Desiderius, who had fled to the Greeks after his father had been captured, came into Italy supported by the great assistance of the Greeks, either to recover the kingdom from which he had been expelled or to engage the Franks in war.

He was immediately met in battle by the leaders of the Gauls, and almost all his men were either captured or killed in the battle.

After a few days, while he was fleeing, he himself also was captured and killed.

In the fifth year of Constantine and the tenth of Irene, Constantine himself deprived his mother Irene of the empire and, after his mother had been cast down, ruled alone for seven years.

In the first year of his rule he was defeated by the Bulgars in a grave battle and was put to flight after many of his men had been lost. In this battle he lost almost all the treasures of the empire.

This same Emperor Constantine, holding many of his own leaders in suspicion, deprived them of their eyes.

In the same year Pippin, Charlemagne’s son by a concubine, who was deformed by a hump, was enticed by a promise from certain leading men of the Franks and conspired against his father.

Convicted of this conspiracy, he was tonsured as a monk at his father’s command and, after assuming the religious habit, served the Lord until the end of his life.

Of the accomplices in the same conspiracy, some were sent into exile, while some, though few, were killed by the sword.

At this time Pope Adrian died and Leo succeeded him, as is clear above.

In Constantine’s seventh year, Empress Irene, grieving greatly because her son had taken from her the power to rule, was filled with womanly fury. With many adhering to her in this deed, she first captured her son Constantine and then, after he had been thrust into prison, cruelly tore out his eyes. Thus she ruled alone.

In the first year of her rule, the sun was so darkened that even ships wandered at sea.

It was publicly said that, because of the cruelty that the mother had exercised upon Constantine, the sun had withdrawn its light from the lands.

This Irene ruled alone for four years.

Around that time King Charles of the Franks attacked the country of the Avars by land and sea and left them hope of escape only in flight.

Then, while there was war between the Franks and the Avars, blood flowed from heaven to the earth.

Cassilo, duke of Bavaria, was adjudged guilty of treason against King Charles. Consequently Charles had him shorn and banished him to a monastery with his son Theodo.

Tuelim, prince of the Avars, also surrendered himself and his country to Charles and received the grace of baptism.

Henry, duke of the people of Forum Julii, despoiled Yringus, prince of the Avars, in Pannonia and sent his inestimable treasure to King Charles.

King Charles, however, cultivating the Christian religion in a holy and pious manner, as Sigebertus says, honored the churches of God in every way and adorned them with sacred vessels and vestments, decreeing that not even doorkeepers were permitted to minister in church in common clothing.

He built at Aquaegrani a church of very great beauty. For its construction he caused columns and marbles to be brought from Rome and Ravenna.

King Charles himself, wholly intent upon ecclesiastical propriety, also corrected the law of God and the discipline of psalmody.

For, perceiving that the Gauls again differed from the Romans in singing, while the people of Metis differed somewhat only through the lightness of nature, he corrected the discordance of the chant through singers sent once more by Pope Adrian.

Solicitous also for the poor, he comforted Christian paupers by the liberality of alms not only in his own kingdom but also in Egypt, Syria, and Africa.

For this reason he sought the friendships of kings across the sea, especially so that there might be relief for the Christians dwelling under them.

When a powerful conspiracy had been formed by the Austrasians against King Charles under the leadership of Hardericus, it was uncovered, and many were either mutilated in their limbs or exiled.

Charles also constructed and fortified two bridges over the Rhine at Colonia, and, entering Slavia, subdued it.

At the urging of Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople, and Pope Adrian, the second universal synod was assembled at Nicaea from three hundred and fifty bishops.

In it the Catholic faith, in the presence of Irene and her son Constantine, was strengthened by the subscription of all, and the heresy of those who execrated the images of God and his saints was abjured forever.

Likewise, in the times of Constantine IV and Irene his wife, as Vincent relates in book twenty-four of the Historical Mirror, in the city of Derichum, which lay under Antioch, Jews found in the house of a certain Jew an image of our Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, which had been left there by a certain Christian who had stayed there.

They dishonorably took it down and inflicted upon the image itself all the reproaches that the Jews had inflicted upon Christ while he dwelt in the world.

They mocked it, spat in its face, accused it with insults, struck it, fastened its hands and feet with nails, and offered it vinegar and gall.

At length they opened its side, from which blood and water suddenly came forth.

Receiving these in a flask placed beneath it, in order to test whether the miracles that they had heard Jesus performed were true, they gathered all the sick into their synagogue and sprinkled them with this blood. All were healed from whatever sickness held them.

Consequently all the Jews at last ran to Deodatus, bishop of the city. After narrating the matter, they gave him the image together with the blood that had issued from it.

After they had been baptized, the bishop divided the blood among flasks and sent it far and wide, proclaiming the great works of God.

He adjured everyone that each year, on the fifth day before the Ides of November, the passion of the Lord’s image should be celebrated.

Section VII: Saint Gangolfus

Around the times of the said Constantine, Saint Gangolfus was illustrious in Burgundy.

This saint, as Vincent relates from his deeds in the place cited above, bought a certain spring in Gaul and caused it to rise in Burgundy.

When this same Gangolfus, hearing that his wife was an adulteress, reproved her for the infamy and crime of her adultery, she vehemently denied it.

But the saint proposed a very easy purgation to her, saying: “If you wish me to believe that you suffer falsely under this infamy, bare your arm and bring me a little stone from the bottom of that little spring. If you draw your arm back unharmed, I shall believe that you are innocent.”

Hearing this, she confidently immersed her arm in the spring and immediately drew it back burned.

Then the saint said to her: “Behold, the truth of your disgrace appears. Therefore, have what is yours and remain by yourself, or depart with your adulterer, for you will no longer be my companion.”

After giving her half of his substance, he remained by himself.

Not long afterward he was killed in his house by a certain cleric who was accustomed to commit adultery with her.

When his body was being carried on a bier to the tomb, many sick persons were healed by touching it.

When this was announced to his wife by her maid, namely that her lord, as a martyr, was working miracles, she laughed and said mockingly: “Gangolfus performs miracles just as my anus sings.”

Immediately her anus, whether she wished it or not, began to emit shameful and numerous sounds.

This afterward befell her throughout her whole life on the sixth day of the week: whenever on that day, on which her husband had been made a martyr, she brought forth any word from her mouth, she made a shameful sound from her anus.

King Pippin deigned to test this.

Title XIV, Chapter III

Vincent relates in book twenty-four, chapter one hundred and sixty-two, of the Historical Mirror, from their deeds, wondrous things concerning two boys, namely Amelius and Amicus.

Born in the times of Pippin, king of the Franks, they were in a wondrous manner alike to one another, one being the son of the count of Aluernum and the other the son of a certain knight of Berichanum.

When they were being carried to Rome by their parents for the grace of baptism, they found one another in the city of Luca. After a fellowship had been established between them, they entered Rome.

So great was the fellowship and identity of will between the little children that one would not take food without the other or rest in a different chamber.

When they had been presented to the supreme pontiff, they were baptized by him. He imposed the name Amelius upon the count's son, but Amicus upon the knight's son.

Many Roman knights received them with joy from the sacred font.

After this the pope himself gave them two wooden cups fashioned with equal capacity and adorned with gold, saying: "Receive this gift, which shall always be a sign to you that I baptized you."

Having received them gratuitously, they returned to their own homes.

The Lord adorned Amicus, the boy of Berichanum, with great wisdom, like another Solomon.

When he was thirty years old, his aged father, a noble and holy man, was seized by illness. He admonished him to practice the warfare of Christ, to preserve the faith of the Lord, to bring aid to companions and friends, to perform works of mercy, and, beyond all this, by no means to consign to oblivion his fellowship and friendship with the son of the count of Aluernum.

When he had finished these words, he migrated to the Lord. His son fittingly rendered him the honor of burial.

Soon, however, wicked men began to envy the young man and secretly to prepare snares and deceits for him.

But he loved everyone and patiently bore the injuries inflicted upon him.

Nevertheless, the malice of the wicked grew so great against him that it expelled him from the castle of his paternal inheritance together with his whole household.

Taking ten servants, he said to them: "Let us hasten to the court of Count Amelius, who is joined to me by fellowship and friendship. Perhaps he will enrich us from his goods. But if not, we shall go to Hildegardis, the wife of Charles, king of the Franks, who has always been accustomed to aid those who have been cast out."

Therefore, when they came to the count's court, they did not find Amelius.

For he had gone to Berichum to visit Amicus himself, whose father he had heard was dead.

Not finding him, he departed sorrowful and resolved that he would not return to his own country unless he first found him.

Amicus likewise did not cease to seek the count with his men, until he was received as a guest by a certain nobleman who, after hearing of the misfortune that had befallen them, willingly gave him his daughter in marriage.

After a year and a half had passed there, Amicus hastened to Paris with his servants to seek Count Amelius.

Amelius himself had now sought Amicus for two years.

When Amelius drew near to Paris, he found a certain pilgrim and asked whether he had seen Amicus, a knight of Berichanum who had been expelled from his country.

When the pilgrim answered that he had never seen him, the count took off his tunic and gave it to him, asking him to pray to the Lord for him, so that the Lord might put an end to the labor that he had now endured for two years.

Therefore, as the pilgrim continued his journey, he found Amicus around evening.

Amicus asked him whether he had heard anything concerning Amelius, the son of the count of Aluernum.

He answered: "Why do you mock me, a pilgrim? Are you not Amelius, who asked me today whether I had seen Amicus of Berichanum and gave me this tunic? But now I do not know why you have changed your clothing, your companions, your horses, and your arms."

Amicus said to him: “I am not Amelius but Amicus, and I do not cease to seek him.”

When the pilgrim had received coins as alms from him after being asked to pray for him, he said to him: “Hasten to Paris, knight. There I hope you will find the one whom you seek.”

Hastening, therefore, Amicus found him outside Paris beside Secharia, seated with his knights in a flowering meadow.

When they saw the armed men of Berichanum coming, they quickly arose, seized their weapons, and ran to meet them.

Amicus likewise roused the spirits of his men to fight, thinking that they were Parisian knights who wished to attack them.

Therefore, each party charged with loosened reins. They raised their spears and drew their swords, so that you would have believed that none of them would escape.

But God, who disposes all things well, caused both parties to stop unharmed.

Then Amicus said: “Where do you come from, most valiant knights, who wish to kill the exile Amicus with his companions?”

At this voice Amelius, turning pale, was astounded and recognized Amicus.

Immediately they dismounted from their horses, clasped one another in embraces, fastened kisses upon one another, gave thanks to God for such unforeseen joy, pledged faith to one another, and came together to Charles’s court.

Amicus was made the king’s treasurer, and Amelius his steward.

You would have seen moderate, wise, and most beautiful young men, equal in one manner of dress and in the same countenance, loved and honored by everyone.

Thus, after three years had passed, Amicus said to Amelius: “I desire to see my wife, and I shall return as quickly as I can. But while you remain in the king’s court, especially guard yourself against his daughter, because she is joined in deceitful friendship to the most wicked Count Hardericus.”

When Amelius had assented to his words, Amicus departed.

Amelius, however, cast his eyes upon the king’s daughter and violated her as quickly as he could.

Meanwhile the informer Hardericus, who rejoiced in wickedness and envied every upright person, addressed Amelius in this manner: “I do not know, dearest count, that Amicus stole the king’s treasure and thus fled. [read: Do you not know, dearest count, that Amicus stole the king’s treasure and therefore fled?] Therefore, now enter into a covenant of friendship with me and receive my pledge upon the relics of the saints.”

When this had been done, Amelius did not fear to reveal his secrets faithfully.

Therefore, while Amelius was standing before the king on a certain day to give him water for his hands, Hardericus said to the king: “Do not, O king, receive water from the hands of a criminal who is more worthy of death than of honor, because he has taken away the flower of your daughter’s virginity.”

At this Amelius fell trembling and, stupefied, did not answer.

The benevolent king raised him and said: “Do not fear, Amelius. Rise manfully and defend yourself against this infamy.”

Rising, he said: “Most just king, do not believe the lying words of the informer Hardericus, but grant me time for counsel, so that before you I may enter a duel with him concerning this infamy and, while the court stands by, convict him of falsehood.”

When the king had assented to this, Queen Hildegardis undertook to defend Amelius’s cause.

While he was seeking counsel, he found Amicus returning to the king’s court. Prostrate at his feet, he said: “O sole hope of my salvation, alas, I have badly preserved my pledge, because I have incurred a charge concerning the king’s daughter and, before the king’s sight, have appointed a duel with the false Hardericus.”

After Amicus had harshly rebuked him, he said: “Let us exchange clothing and horses, and go to my house. With God’s aid I shall fight the traitorous count for you. But take care not to touch my wife.”

When they had departed weeping, Amicus went to the king’s court under the appearance of Amelius, and Amelius went to his companion’s house under the appearance of Amicus.

When the wife of Amicus saw Amelius and believed him to be her husband, she wished to embrace him and give him a kiss.

But he answered: “Withdraw from me, because for me the time for weeping, and not for rejoicing, is at hand.”

At night, when they had entered the bed, he placed a sword between himself and her.

“See,” he said, “that you do not approach me, because you will die immediately.”

Thus they passed the remaining nights until Amicus returned.

Meanwhile Amicus, clothed in his companion’s garments, entered before the king and offered himself to fight against Hardericus concerning the infamy.

The king said to him: “Do not fear, count, because, if you are victorious, I shall give you this same daughter of mine, Bellixenda, as your wife.”

Therefore in the morning at the first hour, Hardericus and Amicus went armed into the field, while the king and the whole people of Paris stood by.

Then Amicus, fearing for his own conscience, addressed Hardericus in this manner: “O count, you have accepted exceedingly foolish counsel, because you so ardently desire my death and so imprudently commit yourself to the danger of death. But if you were willing to retract the false charge that you lay upon me and to abandon the deadly duel, you could always possess my friendship and service.”

At this the furious man answered that he did not care for his friendship and service but wished to take away his head.

Hardericus therefore swore that Amelius had violated the king’s daughter, while Amicus swore that Hardericus was lying.

Therefore, as they fought, Hardericus was defeated, and Amicus cut off his head.

The king, giving to him as wife his daughter who had been freed from infamy, according to custom gave them a certain city to inhabit.

Having received her, Amicus joyfully hastened to his own house, where Amelius was, and said to him: “Behold, I have vindicated you against the traitor Hardericus and have betrothed the king’s daughter.”

Amelius returned, received her, and lived with her in the aforesaid city.

Section II

Afterward God struck Amicus, who had remained there for a time with his wife, with the disease of leprosy, so that he could not rise from his bed.

His wife, named Obias, held him in such hatred that she often wished to suffocate him.

Calling two of his servants, he said: “Take me from the hands of my wife, secretly take my cup, and carry me to the castle of Berichanum.”

When they had done this, a crowd coming to meet them asked who the sick man was whom they were carrying there.

They said: “This is Amicus, our lord, struck with leprosy, who comes to you asking that you have mercy upon him.”

Immediately those impious men beat the servants and cast Amicus himself from the cart, threatening them with death if they repeated this statement.

Then Amicus burst into tears and said: “Most merciful God, either grant me death or now extend aid to a wretched man.”

After these things he caused himself to be carried to Rome, where Pope Constantine met him with many Roman knights who had washed him at the baptismal font, and they provided ample charitable support to him and his men.

But after three years so grave a famine arose in the city that even a father cast his son away from himself.

Then, at the urging of his servants, he departed from there and caused himself to be carried to the court of Count Amelius.

Before the count’s court he struck clappers after the custom of such sick persons.

Hearing him, the count said to a certain servant: “Take bread and meat, fill my cup with the best wine, and carry it to that sick man.”

When the minister had fulfilled the command, he returned and said: “By my faith, lord, if I were not holding the cup, I would believe it to be the one that the sick man possesses, because both appear to be of one beauty and size.”

Then the count caused the sick man to be brought to him and asked whence he was and how he had acquired such a cup.

He answered that he was born in the castle of Berichanum and at Rome had received both the cup and baptism from Pope Deusdedit.

Immediately the count therefore recognized that he was his companion, who had drawn him back from death and had given him the king's daughter as wife.

He therefore threw himself upon him, crying and weeping, kissing and embracing him.

His wife also ran to him and poured out tears over him, recalling how he had bravely overcome the informer Hardericus.

Finally they brought him into the house, placed him in an honored place, and shared all their goods with him.

One night Raphael, the angel of the Lord, appeared, and Amicus was called by Raphael. [read: One night Raphael, the angel of the Lord, appeared to call Amicus] Raphael commanded him to tell Count Amelius to kill his two sons and wash Amicus himself in their blood, and that in this manner he would recover health.

When he related this with great trembling, the count at first took it very hard.

But, remembering the benefits of the one who had offered himself to the king for him at the danger of death, he took a sword and went to the bed of his sleeping sons.

Bending over them, he wept most bitterly, saying: "Who has heard of a father willingly killing his sons? Alas, my sons, from now on I shall not be a father to you but a bloodstained butcher."

When his tears fell upon them, they awoke and, looking upon their father's face, began to laugh.

They were three years old, and he said to them: "Alas, your laughter shall be turned into mourning, because your innocent blood will now be poured out by your impious father."

Having said these things, he beheaded them and laid down their bodies covered together with their heads, as though they were sleeping.

With the blood that he had collected from them he sprinkled the sick Amicus, saying: "Lord Jesus Christ, who commanded that faith be kept with enemies and healed a leper by your word, deign to cleanse this companion of mine, for love of whom I did not fear to pour out the blood of my sons."

Immediately Amicus was healed and was clothed by him in his best garments.

While they ran to the church to give thanks to God, immediately, by the Lord's will, the bells sounded by themselves. When the people heard this, they ran from every quarter in wonder.

But when the countess saw both of them walking together, she began to ask which of them was her husband.

"I recognize the garments of both," she said, "but I am altogether ignorant which of them is the count."

The count said to her: "I am Amelius, and this is my companion Amicus, who has been made well."

Nevertheless, the count frequently drew sighs and revolved the death of his sons in his mind.

When the countess commanded the sons to be brought so that they might rejoice together, the count said: "Permit them to rest in pleasant sleep."

After this he entered the bedchamber alone to weep over them, and he found them playing in the little bed. Around their necks scars in the manner of a red thread appeared until their death.

Taking them up in his arms, the count carried them into the bosom of his wife and said: "Rejoice, wife, because your sons live, whom I killed through an angelic vision, and their friend has been cleansed by their blood."

From that time, therefore, the count and countess devoted themselves piously to God's service, preserving chastity until the end of life.

The wicked wife of Amicus, however, was seized by a demon and, falling over a precipice, expired.

Amicus therefore moved an army against the people of Berichanum and besieged them until they surrendered themselves as defeated.

He received them benignly, forgave them every fault of their offense, and, serving God thereafter, lived peacefully with them.

When Charlemagne came into Italy against Desiderius, king of the Lombards, having been summoned by Pope Adrian, Count Amelius and Amicus were with King Charles. They exercised their proper offices in the king's court and daily applied themselves to the works of Christ by fasting, praying, and giving alms.

When the army of the king of the Franks engaged Desiderius and his Lombard peoples at the entrance to Italy, in a place called the Beautiful Wood because it was delightful, no small multitude from each army, both Charles's and Desiderius's, died there.

Because of this slaughter that place was afterward called, even to the present day, Mortalis or Mortaria.

There also the king's son-in-law Count Amelius and his companion Amicus were killed.

God, who joined them in life by unanimous concord and discretion, did not will them to be separated in death.

After King Charles had defeated Desiderius, because he had greatly loved his son-in-law, namely Amelius, and his companion Amicus, he sent to Mediolanum and commanded two stone chests to be brought.

Amelius was placed in one of them at the church of blessed Eusebius, and Amicus in the other in the royal church, while the remaining bodies were buried here and there.

But when morning came, by divine disposition the body of Amelius was found with its sarcophagus beside the sarcophagus of Amicus in the royal church.

Concerning these things that have been said and written about Amicus and Amelius, it can be doubted whether this is a true history or a fiction composed to show the powerful vigor of friendship.

If it is a fiction, this is shown from the things that have been said: from the complete likeness of their bodies; their approach to identity of name, because they are Amicus and Amelius; and their delightful and constant life together.

This is according to that saying of the wise man, "A friend is another self," which a living faith coming upon it accomplishes most greatly and most perfectly, because these two were baptized together.

For, as is said in Acts 4, "The multitude of believers had one heart and one soul in the Lord." This faith also makes all things common, does not abandon one's neighbor in adversity, and contends for the justice of faith even to death.

But if it was a true history, although other historians do not include it, it is greatly to be marveled at and venerated, yet it is not impossible for him who can do all things when he wills.

Because in some things it is contrary to the common and public law of God and the private law of the canons, however, those things are not to be imitated.

For the law of God prohibits homicide, still more parricide, which Amelius perpetrated, even if for the healing of Amicus.

The law of the canons also forbids the duel that Amicus undertook for Amelius concerning the rape perpetrated by him.

The other things, however, are worthy of praise and imitation, such as assistance in sickness.

And these things could lawfully have been done outside all laws through the familiar counsel of the Holy Spirit, as with Goliath and David in the duel.

Certain histories hand down that this same Charlemagne, king of the Franks and afterward made emperor, repaired the city of Florence, which they relate had previously been wholly destroyed and demolished by Totila, king of the Goths, and thereafter had been desolate and scarcely inhabited for many years.

But Leonardus in his Florentine History opines that it was not thus wholly demolished and abandoned by its inhabitants. Rather, after great slaughter and plundering within it, only its walls were overthrown by Totila in vengeance for Radigasius, who, with a very great army of Goths, had been killed in those neighboring places, namely the hills of Faesulae, at a time long past.

This was nearly two hundred years before. Totila, in turn, was around another two hundred years before Charlemagne, namely before he was created emperor.

Therefore Charles himself did this at Florence: he caused the walls to be rebuilt and the ruined buildings to be repaired, and, exalting it in many ways, enlarged it and restored it as a city.

Title XIV, Chapter IV

Therefore Charlemagne, when he had now ruled over the Franks for thirty-three years, was the first of the Franks to receive the Roman Empire, Pope Leo conferring it upon him or confirming it.

He began to rule as emperor in the eight-hundred-and-second year of the Lord and in the six-thousandth year from the beginning of the world according to the greater computation of the ancients, but according to the lesser computation followed by Vincent in the Historical Mirror, in the four-thousand-seven-hundred-and-sixty-fifth year.

About four hundred and sixty-eight years had elapsed since the Constantinopolitan Empire was divided from the Roman Empire, from the time when Byzantium, a city of Thrace, was enlarged anew by the first emperor Constantine, raised up as the royal city, dedicated to it after all the glory of Roman dignity and of the empire had been transferred there, and called New Rome.

Concerning this Charlemagne, with respect to his bodily disposition, character, and strength, Turpinus, archbishop of Remi, speaks in this manner, as Vincent relates in book twenty-five of the Historical Mirror.

This Charles was comely in body, fierce in appearance, and eight of his own exceedingly long feet in stature.

He was exceedingly broad in the loins, proportionate in the belly, and thick in the arms and legs.

He was a most skilled and fierce knight and most powerful in all his limbs.

His face was one and a half palms in length, his beard one foot, his nose about half a foot, and his forehead one foot.

His leonine eyes flashed like carbuncles. His eyebrows measured half a palm.

Whomever he looked upon in anger with opened eyes was immediately terrified.

The belt with which he was girded extended eight feet, apart from the part that hung down.

He ate little bread, but he ate a quarter of a ram, or two hens, or one goose, or a shoulder of pork, or a peacock, or a crane, or one whole hare.

He soberly drank a little wine diluted with water.

He was of such strength that with one stroke of his own sword he cut an armed knight sitting upon a horse, together with the horse, from the crown of the head to the feet.

He easily stretched four horseshoes at once with his hands.

With one hand he swiftly raised an armed knight standing upright upon his palm from the ground as far as his own head.

He was exceedingly liberal in gifts, most certain in judgments, and lucid in speech.

According to the chronicler, his mother, Lady Bertrada, grew old in great honor with him.

He likewise determined that his children should be instructed in this manner: first, both the sons and daughters were to be educated in the liberal studies to which he himself also gave his labor.

As soon as their age permitted, he caused the sons to ride after the custom of the Franks and to be exercised in arms and hunting.

He commanded the daughters to become accustomed to working wool, to apply themselves to distaff and spindle lest they grow sluggish through idleness, and to be trained in every honorable practice.

Because he had always loved the study of letters, he himself also attempted to write and carried tablets, so that, when there was free time, he might accustom his hand to forming letters.

In his palace at Aquaegrani he built a basilica of wondrous beauty in honor of the blessed Virgin Mary, which he also exalted with riches and honors.

When after his father Pippin he had received the kingdom of the Franks, already strong and great, he so nobly enlarged and extended it that he added to it twice as much.

This Charles, as Vincent relates from the words of book six of Hugo's history in the place cited above, had Peter of Pisa as his helper in learning grammar and, in the other disciplines, Albinus, surnamed Alcuinus.

He cultivated the Christian religion with the highest piety and diligently frequented the church in the morning and evening, as well as during the night hours and at the time of the sacrifice.

He was also endowed with the greatest liberality toward the poor, so that he strove not only to assist them in his own kingdom but also to send much money into the regions across the sea—to Syria, Egypt, Africa, Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Carthage.

For this reason he especially sought the friendships of kings across the sea, so that some relief might come to the Christians under those kings.

He was of a large and robust body, of eminent stature, with the crown of his head rounded, his nose exceeding the mean a little, beautiful eyes, venerable gray hair, a joyful face, a clear voice, and prosperous health.

He very rarely held banquets, and his daily supper was supplied with only four courses, apart from roasted meat that hunters customarily brought in on spits, which he ate more willingly than any other food.

During supper he heard something from an entertainer or a reader. Histories and the deeds of the ancients were also read before him.

He delighted in the books of Saint Augustine, especially those entitled The City of God.

He was so sparing in drinking wine and every drink that at supper he rarely drank more than three times.

In summer, after the midday meal, he took some fruit and drank once. Having taken off his clothing and shoes, as he was accustomed to do at night, he rested for two or three hours.

At night he slept in such a manner that he interrupted his sleep four or five times, not only by waking but also by rising.

As Sigebertus says, in the first year of his empire Charles sent envoys throughout his whole empire to execute judgment and justice, and established twenty-three chapters of law.

In the Decrees, distinction nineteen, it is said in this manner from a chapter of Emperor Charles:

"In memory of blessed Peter the Apostle, let us honor the holy Roman Church and the Apostolic See, so that she who is for us the mother of priestly dignity ought to be the mother of ecclesiastical reason [read: ought to be the teacher of ecclesiastical discipline].

"Therefore humility must be observed by us with meekness, and although a yoke scarcely to be borne should be imposed by that holy see, nevertheless let us bear it and endure it with pious devotion.

"But if—which is unfitting—anyone, whether priest or deacon, should be convicted of having falsely presented a letter from the Apostolic See, or something else that did not come from there, by devising some disturbance and laying snares for our ministry, then, with faith preserved and humility toward the apostolic lord unimpaired, let it be within the bishop's power whether he confines him in prison or in another place, until through a letter or through suitable envoys of his own party he petitions the apostolic sublimity, so that it may deign to decide the matter especially by its holy legation and to define what Roman law establishes concerning such persons, so that he may be corrected and a measure imposed upon others."

There is a notable gloss there concerning forgers.

According to the chronicler, this same Charles sent messengers throughout the whole world to investigate the names, deeds, and deaths of the saints, and caused these things to be compiled into one volume by the monk Isuardus.

For Jerome, Bede, and Florus had done this before, but not completely.

Charles assigned them to the individual days.

It was found, however, that more than three hundred feasts occurred on individual days.

Therefore it was established that, when those who are placed there have been read in the martyrologies, there should be added: "And of very many other holy martyrs, confessors, and virgins."

He also had such concord in friendship with Aaron, king of the Persians, who held almost the whole East except India, that Aaron preferred his favor to the friendship of all the kings and princes who were in the whole world and judged that he alone should be cultivated with honor and magnificence.

Aaron, king of the Persians, sent Charles the only elephant that he possessed and, besides it, many gifts.

When Emperor Charles was leaving Spoletum, as Vincent relates after Helinand in the place cited above, on the day before the Kalends of May, at the second hour of the night, a very great earthquake occurred that shook all Italy.

In this earthquake the roof of the basilica of blessed Paul the Apostle fell in great part together with its beams, and in certain places cities and mountains collapsed.

In the same year certain places in Germany and Gaul trembled.

A pestilence also occurred because of the mildness of the winter season.

Envoys of Charles coming from the emir Aaron brought into Francia, among other gifts, the bodies of Saint Cyprian the martyr, bishop of Carthage, and of Speratus, the first of the Scillitan martyrs, and the head of the martyr Pantaleon. They were placed in the monastery of Compendium.

The patriarch of Jerusalem sent Charles as a blessing the keys of the Lord's sepulcher and of the place of Calvary, and the keys of the city and the mountain, together with a banner.

In the same year in which Charles assumed the Roman Empire, Empress Irene, concerning whom something was said in the preceding title, after she had held the Constantinopolitan Empire alone for many years, was deposed from the empire by Nicephorus, sent into exile, and died there.

Nicephorus himself assumed the Constantinopolitan Empire and ruled for eight years.

At length, after he had been killed by the Bulgars together with many of the senatorial order, his son Stauracius ruled for one year.

When he had been deposed, Michael ruled for two years, thereafter Leo for eight years, another Michael for nine, Theophilus for fifteen, Michael III and Theodora for eleven years, and then Michael alone for thirteen years.

When Michael had been killed by Basil, this same Basil ruled for seventeen years, and after him his son Leo for eighteen.

Then Constantine, Leo's son, ruled for one year with his paternal uncle Alexander, namely the brother of this same Leo.

After Alexander had died, Constantine ruled for thirty-nine years.

After these things Stephen and Constantine, taking it badly that they were restrained from youthful levity by their father's just severity, arranged an ambush in the palace, deposed their father from the throne of the palace, and, after his head had been shorn as was customary, sent him to a neighboring island in which cenobites practiced philosophy.

Not long afterward, when they had sat down together at a banquet by agreement and deliberately contended with one another concerning priority in sitting, a signal was given by the men of Constantine, the son of Emperor Leo. Both brothers were cast down from the throne and, after their heads had been shorn, were themselves also sent to the same monastery to which they had sent their father, to practice philosophy with the monks.

Thus, after the palace had been emptied of the usurping emperors, Constantine himself and his son Romanus ruled for sixteen years.

When he had died, Nicephorus ruled for ten years.

Because he was old, he feared that his sons would expel him from the empire, and he wished them to be made eunuchs.

Their mother persuaded John to kill him and to rule, and so it was done; and John ruled for six years.

From that point onward the Constantinopolitan Empire is passed over in silence, namely, from the nine-hundred-and-seventy-seventh year of the Lord.

The Constantinopolitan emperors, however, were indignant against Charles, according to the chronicler, because of their envy of the imperial title imposed upon him by the Romans. He bore with them with great magnanimity and patience.

And because they regarded his power with suspicion, through frequent embassies he reconciled them to himself by a most firm treaty.

How extensive a dominion he possessed, and with how great a devotion he honored bishops, is evident from what is contained in cause eleven, question one, where it says:

“We will and command,” says Charles, “that all who are under our rule—Romans as well as Franks, Alamanni, Bavarians, Saxons, Thuringians, Frisians, Gauls, Burgundians, Britons, Lombards, Vascones, Beneventans, Goths, Spaniards, and all the others subject to us—by whatever bond of law they may seem to be bound or joined by customary practice, shall all perpetually observe as law this judgment, which we have taken from the book of Emperor Theodosius and, with the counsel of all the faithful, have placed among our capitularies to be held as law.

“That law is as follows. Whoever has a lawsuit, whether he is the claimant, if either at the beginning of the suit or after the courses of time have elapsed, whether while the matters are being pleaded or when the judgment has already begun to be pronounced, chooses the tribunal of the prelate of the sacrosanct see, immediately and without any hesitation, even if the other party resists, let the matter be directed, together with the argument of the litigants, to the judgment of the bishops.

“And let all causes that are conducted by praetorian or civil law, when concluded by the judgments of bishops, be confirmed by the perpetual right of stability.

“Nor may the matter that is decided by the judgment of bishops afterward be reconsidered, namely through an appeal.

“Let all judges also receive without doubt testimony offered even by one bishop, and let no other person be heard,” and so forth.

The gloss there says, “And rightly,” because although the things said here have been abrogated by other contrary laws, nevertheless Innocent, in the title On Judgments, chapter Novit, argues from this law—not indeed in order that he may approve it, but in order that he may show how great an affection and devotion these emperors, Theodosius and Charles, had toward the priesthood.

Helinand relates, as Vincent reports in the place cited above, that at the time when the Roman Empire was given to Charles, the patriarch of Jerusalem, having been expelled from the city by the pagans, came to Constantinople to the emperor.

With him were John, a priest of Naples, and David, the archpriest of Jerusalem. The emperor sent them to Charles with a letter of John the patriarch written by the emperor’s own hand; and with the two aforementioned men there were also the Hebrew envoys Isaac and Samuel.

In the final part of that letter it was written:

“One night, having been placed in ecstasy, I saw a certain young man standing before my bed. Calling me gently, he touched me a little and said, ‘Emperor Constantine, you have asked for divine aid in this affair. Behold, receive Charlemagne, king of Gaul, for this undertaking; behold in the Lord a champion.’

“And he showed me a certain knight armed, greaved, and clad in mail. He had a red shield and was girded with a sword whose hilt was purple; he held a very tall spear whose point often emitted flames, and in his hand he held a golden helmet.

“He himself was an old man with a long beard, handsome in face and tall in stature. His eyes shone like stars, and his head was white with gray hair.

“Act now, Augustus. He who refuses to obey the commands of God will not be able to escape blame. Emmanuel, gem, Jesus, rejoice in the Lord; mindful of him, perform praise. Let the belt of justice and the crown gird your loins and head. Let Christ gird you perpetually and bind you with honor,” and so forth.

This same Constantine had seven times expelled the pagans from Jerusalem, but nevertheless at last they had prevailed.

These envoys found the king at Paris and delivered the letters. When they had been read, he began to weep for the sepulcher of the Lord.

The king commanded Turpinus the archbishop to read and expound these letters before all the people. When they had heard them, everyone entreated the king to set out.

Upon hearing this, the king at once promulgated an edict that all who were able to bear arms should go with him against the pagans, and that those who did not go, both they and their sons, should be slaves worth four nummi.

And so they gathered a greater army than he had ever had, and they set out.

When they had come to Jerusalem, they entered a certain forest that can scarcely be crossed in the space of two days and in which there were griffins, bears, lions, tigers, and various other wild beasts, for Charles thought that he could cross it in one day with the army.

When night came and the army was wandering, Charles began to establish a camp.

After the beginning of the night had passed, the king, reclining upon his bed, began the psalms. When he said this verse, “Lead me, O Lord, into the path of your commandments, because I have desired it,” behold, the clearly audible voice of a certain bird crying near his bed was heard at his ears. Those who were present, hearing it, awoke.

The king continued as far as that place, “Bring my soul out of prison.” When he said this, the bird cried out again, “Rise. What do you say, Frank? What do you say?”

The king followed this bird along a very small path until they recognized the track that they had lost on the preceding day.

When the pagans had been put to flight and the Holy Land recovered, the king sought permission to return from the Constantinopolitan emperor and the patriarch of Jerusalem.

The emperor retained him for one day at Constantinople, and meanwhile caused animals of diverse kinds and colors, and gold and gems, to be prepared before the gates of the city.

But Charles, lest he appear discourteous if he accepted nothing, sought counsel from his nobles as to what he ought to do. They answered that he ought to accept no gift from anyone for the labor that he had undertaken solely for the love of God.

Praising their counsel, he commanded all his men not to deign even to look upon any of the things placed before them.

At last, when he had been adjured and compelled to accept some gift for the love of God, he asked for some of the relics of the Lord’s Passion.

Therefore, when counsel had been taken, a three-day fast was proclaimed for all our men and for twelve Greeks who were chosen to divide the sacred relics.

On the third day Charles confessed his sins to Archbishop Ebronius. Then the clergy of both sides began psalms with a litany.

When Daniel, the bishop of Naples, had opened the chest in which was the crown of thorns, so great an odor came forth from it that everyone thought himself to be in paradise.

Then Charles, prostrate upon the pavement and full of faith, prayed to the Lord that for the glory of his name he would renew the miracles of his Passion and Resurrection.

When he had prayed, dew from heaven infused and soaked the wood, and caused it to put forth flowers; and so great a light was present together with the odor that everyone thought his garments to be heavenly.

When Daniel began to cut the hard wood with hooked forceps, it then began to flower more and more.

When these things had thus been done, behold, an infinite multitude entered the church violently and began to cry out, “Truly today is the day of the Resurrection.”

For the odor issuing from those flowers had filled the whole city and had healed three hundred sick persons.

After these things the aforementioned Daniel, with hands raised, gave the nail to the king.

There were given besides to King Charles a fragment of the Lord’s cross, the Lord’s sudarium, a shirt of the Blessed Mary, the band that wrapped the Lord Jesus in the cradle, and an arm of Saint Simeon.

He honorably laid up all these things and guarded them carefully.

Departing from there, when he was returning into Francia, he remained for some time in a certain castle. At the touch of the most holy relics a dead boy was raised and fifty sick persons were healed.

Finally, coming to Aquaegrani, he placed them there, where very many sick persons were also cured of various illnesses by the power of those relics, and a dead man was raised.

It was proclaimed throughout the world that the said relics had then first been brought from Jerusalem to Constantinople and afterward carried from Constantinople to that place.

What has been said, however, concerning the capture of Jerusalem by Charles and the said relics given by Emperor Constantine appears to have been done before Charles assumed the empire, and under Constantine the fifth of that name, who ruled with his mother Irene and afterward by himself alone.

After Charles had acquired many kingdoms, as Vincent relates in book twenty-five of the Historical Mirror from the words of Archbishop Turpinus, he determined to rest from battles.

Immediately he beheld in the sky a certain road of stars beginning at the Frisian Sea and extending between Teutonia and Italy, between Gaul and Aquitania, and passing directly through Gascony, Bascla, Navarre, and Spain as far as Galicia, in which the body of blessed James then lay hidden and unknown.

Charles beheld this road every night and considered what it signified.

While he was considering this, a certain man of the best and most beautiful form beyond what it is lawful to tell appeared to him by night in ecstasy and said, “What are you doing, my son?”

Charles said to him, “Who are you, lord?”

He said, “I am the apostle James, a disciple of the Lord, son of Zebedee, brother of John the Evangelist, whom Herod killed with the sword. My body rests unknown in Galicia, which is still shamefully oppressed by the Saracens. Hence I wonder why you, who have acquired so many and such great cities, have not yet liberated my land.

“Therefore I make known to you that, just as the Lord has made you more powerful than all earthly kings, so he has chosen you to prepare my road and to liberate my land from the hands of the Moabites, in order that he might thereby prepare for you the crown of eternal recompense.

“The road of stars that you saw in the sky signifies that you shall go with a great army from these regions as far as Galicia to attack the land of the perfidious pagans, to liberate my road, and to visit my sarcophagus; and after you all peoples shall go there from the present time until the end of the age.”

In this manner the apostle appeared to Charles three times.

Afterward Charles proceeded there with a great army. When he had besieged Pamplona for three months and could not take it because of its impregnable walls, he prayed to Saint James that, for the honor of his name, he would grant him to take the city.

And so it was done, for its walls fell down after the likeness of Jericho.

Those of the Saracens who wished to be baptized were preserved alive, but those who refused were killed.

When they heard of these wonders, all the cities surrendered themselves to him, and the whole land was made tributary.

Therefore the whole land of the Spaniards was then subjected to Charles: the land of Landaluf, the land of the Pardorum, the land of the Castellani, the land of the Moors, the land of the Navarri, the land of the Portuguese, the land of the Saracens, the land of the Alani, the land of the Biscaii, and the land of the Palargi.

Charles took some of their cities without battle and some with war and the greatest skill. He utterly destroyed all the idols that he then found in Spain.

From the gold that the kings and princes gave to Charles, Charles, while then dwelling in those regions, enlarged the church of blessed James. He established there a bishop and canons according to the rule of blessed Isidore, and fittingly adorned the church with bells, hangings, and books.

From the immense remainder of the gold and silver that he brought from Spain he built these churches: that of the Blessed Virgin Mary at Aquaegrani; that of blessed James in the same town; likewise another church of blessed James at the city of Biterrensis; another at Tolosa; another in Gascony; and that of blessed James at Paris; and besides these, innumerable abbeys throughout the world in diverse places.

When Charles had returned to Francia, a certain pagan king of Africa gathered armies and acquired Spain, after expelling and killing the guards of the strongholds whom Charles had left behind.

When Charles heard these things, he returned into Spain with great forces, and the leader of the armies was Milo of Angleris, the father of Roland.

When Charles’s army was quartered at Baiona, a city of the Blasci, a certain knight named Romaricus became sick and was near death. After receiving penance and the Eucharist, he commanded a certain kinsman of his to sell the horse that he possessed and to distribute the price to clerics and the poor.

When he had died, that kinsman sold the horse for one hundred solidi and quickly spent the price, not upon the needy, but upon food, drink, and clothing.

After thirty days had passed, the dead man appeared to him by night in an ecstasy, saying, “Because I entrusted my possessions to you for the redemption of my soul, to be given as alms, know that my sins were forgiven me by God, supported by penance.

“But because you retained for yourself the alms from my possessions, know that I have been for thirty days in the punishments of Tartarus. Tomorrow you are to be placed in the same infernal place from which I have departed, and I shall be in paradise.”

When he had said these things, he disappeared, and the terrified man awoke.

While on that same day he was recounting his dream to his companions, a sudden cry arose in the air like that of lions, wolves, and bears. And behold, he was suddenly seized by demons and carried to the place appointed for him by divine judgment.

After his companions had searched for him, only after twelve days was he found lying dead upon a very high mountain, his whole body crushed. That mountain is four days' journey distant from the place where he was seized; the demons had cast him there.

After these things Aygoland sent word to Charles that he wished to wage war according to his own will: either twenty against twenty, forty against forty, one hundred against one hundred, one thousand against one thousand, two against two, or one against one.

Therefore one hundred were sent by Charles against one hundred, and the Saracens were killed.

Then another one hundred were sent by Aygoland against one hundred, and all of them were slain.

Then he sent two hundred against two hundred, who were immediately killed.

Then Aygoland sent two thousand, of whom some were killed and others put to flight.

On the third day Aygoland cast his lots and learned of Charles's loss. He sent word to him that, if he wished, he should fight a full battle on the following day. This was agreed to by both sides.

Then certain Christians who, on the evening before the day of battle, were most diligently preparing their instruments of war, planted their spears upright in the earth before the camps, in the meadows beside the river that is called Ceya. In that place afterward, by the command and assistance of Charles, a great and excellent basilica of the blessed martyrs Facundus and Primitivus was built, together with a great and exceedingly rich town.

Early in the morning they found these spears adorned with bark and leaves—those men, namely, who in the coming battle were to obtain the palm of martyrdom in the faith of God.

Wondering greatly, they cut the spears near the ground; and the roots that remained in the earth afterward generated from themselves great thickets like poles, which still appear in the said place.

A wondrous thing, and a great joy to the souls, but an immense loss to the bodies.

What more is there to say? On the following day forty thousand Christians were killed. Duke Milo, the father of Roland, and Charles's horse were slain.

Then Charles, standing on foot with two thousand Christian foot soldiers, drew his sword named Joyeuse and cut many Saracens through the middle.

As evening approached, the Saracens and Christians returned to their camps.

On the next day four marquises came to Charles's aid from places in Italy with four thousand armed men. When Aygoland learned this, he turned in flight; and Charles then returned into Gaul with his forces.

In the third year of Charles's empire, as the chronicler attests, the Anares [read: Avars], who are also Huns, having been subdued in a long war against the Franks, were diminished so greatly in their strength and power that those who had been accustomed to assail others were now unable even to defend themselves from others.

For all their nobility and glory perished in this war, and whatever money and treasure they had amassed for themselves over so many ages by conquering the world now passed wholly to the victory of the Franks.

Never in any war was Francia enriched with so great a quantity of spoils.

In that same year the moon was darkened three times and the sun once, and battle lines of wondrous magnitude were seen in the air.

At the same time Thiomeith, the emir sent by Aaron to destroy Lycia, when he came to Myra, attempted to break apart the chest of Saint Nicholas, but instead of it he broke apart another. For his presumptuous rashness he lost his entire fleet when an unavoidable tempest pursued it.

Abdella, the envoy of the king of the Persians, brought gifts to Emperor Charles: a pavilion and tents of various colors and of wondrous size and beauty; many byssine cloths and silks; fragrances of spices, ointments, and balsam; a clock made of brass and wondrously constructed by mechanical art; and also two brass candlesticks of wondrous size.

In the sixth year of Charles's empire, which was the eight-hundred-and-sixth year from the Lord's Incarnation, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror in the place cited above, the translation of the body of blessed Bartholomew the Apostle from the island of Lipari to Benevento is read to have been accomplished in the following manner.

When the Saracens came upon the said island of Lipari, where the body of the Apostle rested, they laid waste that island. Approaching the sepulcher of blessed Bartholomew, which was held there in great veneration, they broke it open and scattered his bones here and there.

After they had departed, blessed Bartholomew appeared to a certain Greek monk who had been custodian of that church, saying, "Rise and gather my bones."

The monk said to him, "Why ought we to gather your bones or devote any honor to you, when you have permitted us and your sepulcher to be destroyed by the pagans?"

He answered, "Through a long course of years this place has until now stood secure by my prayers. But its evils have now multiplied so greatly that I was no longer able to obtain protection for it by prayers. Nevertheless, arise and do as I have said."

The monk said, "How shall I be able to do this, when I do not know where they have been scattered?"

The Apostle said to him, "Go by night to gather them, and pick up those that you see shining like fire, because those truly are my bones."

Immediately and diligently fulfilling the commands, he laid them up in a small chest and departed, leaving his companion behind.

When ships of the Lombards came there in search of Saracens, by the will of God they found the monk there, took the holy body of God's Apostle, and departed.

The Saracens, coming upon them, surrounded the ship in which the holy body was, so that they could not escape. But suddenly the densest darkness arose before the Saracens' ships, so that they did not know where they were going; and thus the others were freed, unseen by them.

Going out upon land in the regions of the kingdom, they carried the holy body to Benevento and honorably laid it up there in an altar in the year of the Lord 809, on the twenty-fifth day of the month of October.

The Romans nevertheless assert that they possess the said body in the City, which may be true concerning some part of it.

Concerning the Battles between Aygoland, the Pagan Prince of the Army of the Infidels, and Charles, King of the Franks

Aygoland therefore gathered innumerable peoples: Saracens, Moors, Moabites, Ethiopians, Parthians, Africans, Persians, the king of the Arabs, the king of Alexandria, the king of Bugia, the king of Agabia, the king of Barbary, the king of Malcloch, the king of Majorca, the king of Mecca, the king of Seville, and the king of Cordoba.

He came as far as Agennium, a city of Gascony, and took it.

He sent word to Charles that he should come to him peacefully with a small band of knights, promising him nine horses laden with gold, silver, and other treasures if he would submit to his rule.

He said these things because he wished to recognize him, so that he might afterward be able to kill him in battle.

Perceiving this, Charles came with only two thousand brave men as far as four miles from the city of Agennium, and left them there in secret.

He came with only sixty knights as far as the mountain that is near the city, from which the city can be seen, and left them there.

Having changed his excellent garments, without a lance and with his shield placed crosswise behind his back, as is the custom for messengers in time of war, he came to the city with only one knight.

They were conducted to Aygoland. When they had come to him, they said, “Charles sent us to you. He has come as you commanded with sixty knights, and he wishes to serve you as a knight and become yours. Therefore come to him peacefully with sixty of your men, if you wish to give him what you promised.”

He answered that they should return to Charles and tell him to wait for him.

Charles then became acquainted with Aygoland, explored the city of Agennium to learn on which side it would be easier to take it, and observed the kings who were in it.

He returned to the sixty knights and afterward with them to his own two thousand.

Aygoland suddenly followed them with seven thousand knights. But when they perceived this, they fled.

Charles, however, returned into Gaul and, having united his armies, returned to the city of Agennium and besieged it for six months.

In the seventh month, when engines and wooden castles had been fitted around the city, Aygoland with his possessions and his barons secretly went out through privies and caverns; and thus, crossing the river Garonne, which was beside the city, they escaped.

On the following day Charles entered the city with great triumph and killed ten thousand Saracens. The rest fled across the Garonne.

Aygoland came to Saintes. Charles, pursuing him, commanded him to surrender the city. He refused, but went out against him in battle under this condition: that the city should belong to the one who conquered.

In the evening before the day of battle, between the castle of Talaburgum and the city, beside the river named Caranta, the Christians planted their spears in the earth before their camps. On the next day they found their spears adorned with bark and leaves.

These, namely, were those who were to die in the battle and to become martyrs by falling for the faith of Christ.

Rejoicing at so great a miracle, after cutting down their spears, they were crowned with martyrdom for the faith of Christ. Charles’s horse was also killed.

There afterward the king of Agabia and the king of Bugia, while fleeing, were killed by Charles.

Aygoland, however, fled to Pamplona and sent word to Charles that he would await him there for battle.

When this had been heard, Charles returned into Gaul and commanded throughout all Gaul that all serfs who were held under the evil customs of clerics, after the servitude of their own persons had been released and their liability to sale laid aside, should remain free together with all their present and future progeny.

He also released all whom he found captive in workhouses; those whom he found poor he enriched; the naked he clothed; those at discord he reconciled; and the disinherited he restored to their proper honors.

All who were trained in arms, and the shield-bearers, he made knights.

Those also whom he had justly separated from his affection he recalled to friendship, having been moved to compunction.

Then, therefore, after gathering one hundred and twenty-four thousand fighting men, besides armor-bearers and foot soldiers of whom there was no number, he set out into Spain against Aygoland.

These are the names of Charles’s princes:

I, Turpinus, archbishop of Remi, who armed the faithful people with worthy admonitions and often fought the Saracens with my own hands and weapons;

Roland, count of Cenomanensis, Charles’s nephew, son of Bertha his sister and of Duke Milo, with four thousand armed men;

Oliver, count of Gebennensis, son of Count Rayner, with three thousand fighting men;

Arastagnus, king of the Britons, with six thousand, although there was then another king in Britain;

Engelerius, duke of the city of Aquitania, which Caesar Augustus first established in those regions, to which city he subjected Biturica, Lemovica, Pictavis, Saintes, and Engolisma with their provinces, whence that whole country is called Aquitania. This city, however, was reduced to desolation after the death of Eulegerius, because all its citizens were killed at Roncevaux, nor did it afterward have any other colonists;

Gaiferus, king of Bordeaux;

Gundebold, king of Frisia;

Oellus, count of Nantes;

Arnald of Bellanda, who afterward killed Aygoland in battle;

Naaman, duke of Bavaria;

Othgerus, king of Dacia;

Lambert, prince of Bituricensis;

Samson, duke of Burgundy;

Constantine, prefect of Rome;

and Garius, duke of Lotharingia.

Charles's army covered the whole land in length and breadth for two days' journeys.

Section VII

Concerning the Colloquy and Pact Made between Charles and Aygoland, and Aygoland's Promise to Receive Baptism, Which He Nevertheless Did Not Keep

Charles, therefore, as Vincent relates in the place cited above from the words of Turpinus, having learned the Saracen language at Toledo while still a young man, came to a colloquy with Aygoland after truces had been mutually granted.

They also entered into a pact that those whose knights were conquered should follow the law of the victors as the better law.

Therefore, under this pact, twenty Christian knights were sent against twenty Saracens, and the Saracens were killed.

Then forty were sent against forty, and the Saracens were conquered.

Then one hundred against one hundred, and the Christians fled.

Afterward two hundred were sent against two hundred, and all the Saracens were killed.

Finally one thousand were sent against one thousand Saracens, and all one thousand Saracens were killed.

Then Aygoland, affirming that the law of the Christians was better than his own, namely that of Machomet, determined to be baptized on the following day.

Therefore, on the next day, after security for going and returning had been given to both parties, Aygoland came to be baptized.

He saw Charles sitting at table and inspected the ranks of those sitting there. Among them were some in military garb, some in canonical garb, and some in monastic garb, and he asked about each rank.

Seeing, however, in a certain place twelve poor men sitting on the ground in the most wretched clothing, without a table or linens and using little food and drink, he asked who they were.

Charles answered, "This is the people of God, the messengers of our Lord Jesus Christ, whom we feed daily under the number of the twelve apostles."

To this Aygoland said, "He serves his lord badly who receives the messengers of his lord in this manner.

"Those who sit around you are happy and happily eat, drink, and are clothed, while the messengers of your God continually perish from thirst and cold and have been shamefully cast far from you.

"He does a great shame to his lord who serves his servants in this manner.

"You therefore said that your law was good; now you have shown it to be false."

Having received permission, he returned scandalized to his own men and, refusing to be baptized, announced battle to Charles for the following day.

Then Charles, understanding why he had refused to be baptized, diligently cared for all the poor whom he found in the army, clothed them very well, and abundantly provided them with food and drink.

On the following day, therefore, battle was joined between Charles's army on the one side and Aygoland's army on the other. So great was the slaughter of the pagans killed by the Christians, among whom their prince Aygoland himself also fell in death, that the Christians were swimming up to the soles of their feet in the blood of the slain.

Whoever was found in the city of Pamplona was killed. The king of Seville and the king of Cordoba fled with a few men.

Certain Christians, however, led by greed, returned to take the spoils of the slain. While they were returning laden with gold and silver, they were all killed, up to one thousand, by the king of Seville and the king of Cordoba, who were concealed in ambush.

On the following day the king of the Navarri, named Furra, announced battle to Charles.

Charles asked God to show who were to die in the battle; and on the next day the sign of the Lord's red cross appeared behind upon the shoulders of those who were to die, over their coats of mail.

Section VIII

Vincent relates in the place cited above, namely in book twenty-five of the Historical Mirror, concerning a certain giant named Ferracutus, whom the admiral of Babylon had sent with twenty thousand Turks to fight Charles, and who was said to possess the strength of forty strong men.

This giant, therefore, going out from the city of Nagera, sought single combat against anyone whatsoever.

When many strong men from Charles's army had been sent successively, and that giant easily captured them all and sent them into prison, at last Roland, the prince of the army, was scarcely able to obtain permission from King Charles.

When permission had at length been obtained, he went against him. The giant immediately seized him with his right hand, as he had done the former men, and placed him before himself upon his horse.

But while Roland was being carried away captive upon the horse, he seized the giant by the chin and overthrew him forcefully, and they both fell to the earth.

After they had fought together many times in single combat, both as horsemen and as foot soldiers, an interval was made and Ferracutus began to question Roland concerning the Christian law.

When Roland had explained it to him very well, the giant said, "I shall fight with you under this pact: that this faith which you assert shall be true if I am conquered by you, but false if you are conquered by me; and the reproach of the vanquished shall continually adhere to his nation, while praise and honor shall belong to the victor forever."

Therefore, when they joined battle, the giant, wounded in the navel by Roland, died. Roland returned unharmed to his own men.

Thus the Christians entered the city and took it; and, after the giant had been killed, they rescued from prison the warriors who had been conquered and imprisoned by him.

After this Charles went to Cordoba, where the king of Seville and the king of Cordoba awaited him in order to fight him.

When, at Charles's command, the first troop of our knights advanced against the first troop of pagans, before each of their horses there was a foot soldier holding a bearded and horned mask like those of demons, and each one held a drum that he beat forcefully with his hands.

As soon as our horses heard the sound of these and saw their terrifying likenesses, they fled in terror and could in no way be restrained.

When this had been done, Charles commanded that the heads of all the horses be covered with linens and cloths and that their ears be stopped.

Thus, advancing to battle, they killed their adversaries until midday, but not to the point of annihilation.

For all the Saracens had gathered around a wagon drawn by eight oxen, upon which their banner had been raised. It was their custom that none of them should flee from battle so long as the standard was seen standing upright.

When Charles learned this, he entered the midst of the battle lines as far as the banner, which he cut down with his sword. Immediately they fled, and eight thousand of them were slain.

On the following day the high mayor of Cordoba surrendered the city to Charles under this pact: that he himself should be baptized and should hold the city from Charles.

Then Charles left the lands of Spain to his warriors.

Afterward, having left his larger armies in Spain, he went to Saint James. He edified those whom he found to be Christians in that country, but he either killed the apostates or sent them into exile in Gaul.

He appointed bishops and priests throughout the cities, and I, Turpinus, with nine bishops, dedicated the church and altar of blessed James at Charles's request.

Concerning the Betrayal of Ganelon, the Very Great Slaughter of Christians in the Battle of Roncevaux, and the Passing of Roland

There were therefore at Caesaraugusta two Saracen kings, Marsirius and his brother Beligandus, sent by the admiral of Babylon from Persia into Spain. They were subject to Charles's empire and served him, but with feigned charity.

Charles commanded them through Ganelon either to receive baptism or to pay him tribute.

They sent him thirty horses laden with gold, silver, and other Spanish treasures; four hundred horses laden with the sweetest and purest wine for the warriors to drink; and one thousand beautiful Saracen women.

To Ganelon, however, they fraudulently offered twenty horses laden with gold, silver, and hangings, so that he would deliver Charles's warriors into their hands.

He accepted the money, consented, and confirmed with them a pact of betrayal.

The greater warriors accepted only the wine and no women at all, but the lesser men took the women.

Then, on Ganelon's advice, Charles crossed the Ciserian passes and formed the rearmost guard from his dearest princes, Roland and Oliver, with the greater warriors at Roncevaux, together with twenty thousand other Christians.

Then Marsirius and Beligandus, with fifty thousand Saracens, assembled at earliest morning from the woods and hills where, on Ganelon's advice, they had lain hidden for two days and two nights.

They formed two troops, one of twenty thousand and the other of thirty thousand.

The first, of twenty thousand, began first to strike our men. Turning upon them, our men killed them from morning until the third hour, and not one of the twenty thousand escaped.

Immediately, however, the other thirty thousand attacked our men, who were exhausted by so great a slaughter, and struck down our men from the greatest to the least.

This therefore befell them because on the preceding nights, drunk with Saracen wine, many of them had fornicated with the pagan women and also with Christian women whom many had brought with them from Gaul.

All the warriors were therefore killed there except Roland, Baldwin, and Theodric. Turpinus and Ganelon, however, were with King Charles.

After that battle had been fought, as Roland was returning, he found a certain Saracen hiding in a wood. He bound him firmly to a tree and ascended a certain mountain in order to reconnoiter them.

He saw that they were many, returned to the road of Roncevaux, and sounded his ivory trumpet. At its sound about one hundred Christians returned to him.

Returning to the Saracen whom he had bound, when he had released him Roland drew his sword and threatened him with death unless he showed him Marsirius.

Therefore he led this man with him as far as the battle lines of the pagans, and the man showed him Marsirius from afar upon a red horse and with a round shield.

Then Roland, having recovered his strength and been animated for the battle of God, rushed upon them. He saw there one man taller than the others, whom with one stroke he cut through the middle together with his horse, so that one part of the horse and knight fell to the right and the other to the left.

When the Saracens saw this, they immediately fled, leaving Marsirius in the field with a few men. Roland pursued Marsirius as he fled among the others and struck him down.

There one hundred companions of Roland were cut down. Roland, however, escaped after being struck by four thick lances and by stones.

Beligandus, the brother of Marsirius, withdrew with his men from those regions. Theodric and Baldwin were hiding among the woods.

Charles, however, had crossed the mountain with his armies and did not know what had been done.

Roland, greatly wearied and grieving greatly over the death of his men, came as far as the foot of the Ciserian pass. There, beneath a certain tree beside a marble stone that stood above Roncevaux, he dismounted from his excellent horse in a meadow.

He then had with him his sword called Durenda, which is interpreted “hard blow.”

Having drawn it because he wished to break it, he struck the stone three times; dividing the stone itself from top to bottom, he drew out the sword unharmed.

Then he sounded his trumpet so forcefully that its voice, by angelic conveyance, reached Charles’s ears, although Charles was eight miles distant from Roland.

Immediately Ganelon dissuaded the king, who wished to return to Roland, saying that Roland was blowing his trumpet for the purpose of hunting.

While Roland therefore lay upon the grass of the meadow, his brother Baldwin came upon him. Roland signaled to him to provide him water, because he was exceedingly thirsty.

When Baldwin sought it and could not find it, seeing Roland to be near death, he mounted his horse and went after Charles.

Soon Theodric arrived. Grieving greatly over him, he signaled that Roland should fortify himself with confession.

Roland, however, had received the Eucharist on that same day and had made confession of his sins before he went to battle, because this was always the custom among us for those about to fight: that they first confess and receive communion.

Therefore Roland, among the other words of his most sweet confession, holding the skin and flesh around his breasts and heart, said three times, “In this flesh I shall see God my Savior.”

Placing his hands over his eyes, he likewise said three times, “And these eyes shall behold him.”

Thus, surrendering his spirit, he said, “Now, by Christ’s gift, I behold what eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has ascended into the heart of man, which God has prepared for those who love him.”

He poured forth a prayer for all who had died in the battle.

Jacob of Columna asserts in his history that King Charles, after invading the regions of Spain, subdued many lands and subjected them to himself, and that, as he was returning victorious with his army, he suffered an ambush by the Vascones in the mountains.

Rising unexpectedly against Charles’s forces from the opposite side, they killed many of them, and especially Roland, a most daring knight and prefect of the British frontier; Anselm, count of the palace; and Engibard, overseer of the royal table.

Hence, because of this, that history of Roland appears doubtful.

Section X

On that same day, while I, Turpinus, was singing a Mass for the dead before the king in the valley of Charles, I was carried away in ecstasy and heard choirs singing in the heavens, not knowing what this was.

When they had passed on to the heights, behold, a crowd of hideous soldiers, coming as though from plunder and bearing spoil, passed before me.

I said to them, “What are you carrying?”

They said, “We are carrying Marsirius to hell. Michael your trumpeter, with many others, is carrying him to the heights. [read: The angel Michael is carrying your trumpeter, together with many others, to heaven]”

While I was relating this vision to Charles after Mass, behold, Baldwin came riding Roland’s horse and related everything and how he had left Roland.

Then, while everyone cried out and returned, Charles first found Roland lying lifeless upon his back, with his arms laid across his breast in the form of a cross.

Falling upon him, he roared with a great cry. He pitched his tents there that night, embalmed Roland's body with myrrh, aloe, and balsam, and throughout that whole night they all conducted great funeral rites with prayers, lamps, and fires kindled throughout the woods.

At earliest dawn on the following day they proceeded to our other slain brethren.

Oliver was found lying upon his back, extended in the form of a cross, firmly bound with four twisted cords to four stakes fixed in the earth, flayed with the sharpest knives from his neck as far as the nails of his feet and hands, pierced with javelins, arrows, lances, and swords, and crushed by great blows of clubs.

Then, while everyone wept, the king swore by the almighty King that he would not cease running after the pagans until he found them.

As he immediately ran after them with his men, he found them beside the river Ebro near Caesaraugusta, lying down and eating. Rushing upon them, he killed about four thousand and returned to Roncevaux.

Then the king began to investigate whether what was being said was true, namely that Ganelon had committed betrayal; Theodric accused him.

Against Theodric the king appointed Pinabellum on Ganelon's behalf. Theodric immediately joined battle with him and killed him.

Thereupon the king commanded Ganelon to be bound to four exceedingly fierce horses and four riders to sit upon them, driving them toward the four regions of the sky; and thus, torn apart, he perished.

At that time there were two principal sacrosanct cemeteries, one at Arelate and the other at Bordeaux, in which the greater part of the dead were buried.

Charles caused Roland, covered with hangings, to be carried as far as Blavium and buried him in the church of blessed Romanus, which he himself had built long before, placing Roland's sword point at his head and his ivory trumpet at his feet.

For the souls of those killed in the said battle, Charles gave as alms twelve ounces of silver, the same number of talents of gold, clothing, and food to the needy.

For love of Roland, who was buried there, he gave the entire town of Blavium, with everything pertaining to it, and also the sea that lies beneath it and the whole land around the basilica of Saint Romanus, in allodium for the uses of the said church.

He commanded the canons of that church each year to feed and clothe thirty poor persons and to say the same number of psalters and Masses for all who had died in Spain.

Constantine the prefect, with many other Romans and Apulians, was carried by sea; abundant alms were also given for them.

Section XI

Concerning the Revelation of the Body of Saint Salvius and His Deeds

At the same time the body of Saint Salvius was found; not long before, he had been martyred by Winegard.

In the time of King Hilperic, he occupied the episcopal chair of the city of the Ambianenses and was powerful in many virtues, so that, by the Lord's working, he restored sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, and walking to the lame.

During the same time the aforementioned king, inclining toward the Arian doctrine, wrote that the Holy Trinity should not be named in a distinction of persons, but should be named only God.

Hence he commanded this writing to be read to Saint Salvius, entreating him to become of one mind with him.

When Salvius heard it, he was so horrified that, if he could have touched the sheet that had been brought and upon which those things were written, he would have torn it into pieces.

Finally, in the time of Charles, he came into the territory of the fiscal estate of Haymonensis, which is called Valentiana, and began to preach there.

On a certain Sunday of the Resurrection, when he had celebrated Mass in the church of Saint Martin and had also instructed the people there, a certain Gonard, who administered the fiscal estate under his lord Abbo, invited him to a meal after Mass.

Saint Salvius possessed a set of golden liturgical vessels, vestments adorned with gold and gems, and a golden belt interwoven with gems and pearls. He knowingly carried all these things with him everywhere before everyone, so that in this manner he might attain the palm of martyrdom.

It appears, however, that this must be understood of the sacred vestments in which he celebrated.

Winegard, son of Genard, a frivolous and insolent man, coveted these things and caused them all to be taken away from Salvius. From the chalice and paten he caused a golden saddle to be made for himself.

He sent the man of God into prison, and, sending his servant, caused him and his disciple to be killed.

The servant nevertheless did not dare to do this until the saint commanded him.

These two saints were natives of the territory of the Arverni.

Winegard, who had commanded them to be killed, ordered both their bodies to be carried secretly to the enclosure of his herd and hidden there in excavated earth.

There was, however, a very great bull in the herd, which always kept the other animals from touching the place where the bodies of the saints had been placed.

If it happened that any dung had fallen there, the bull did not cease throughout the entire night until it had cleansed the place with its feet.

A certain woman keeping vigil by night saw an immense brightness around the place where the herd was, and, approaching the entrance, she saw two lighted lamps illuminating that whole place.

Showing this to the neighbors, and when this had occurred for several nights, they made it known to the priests.

It was also revealed to King Charles by an angel of the Lord that he should send to Valentiana and seek the bodies of Saint Salvius and his disciple.

When this revelation had occurred for three successive nights, he sent men there to search. The bodies of the saints were found through the disclosure of Gonard himself.

Gonard, his son Winegard, and Winegarius, the servant who had killed them, were brought to the king.

The king commanded the genitals of Genard and Winegard to be amputated and their eyes to be torn out, but only the eyes of Winegarius, the servant, to be torn out.

The bodies of the saints were placed upon a wagon so that they might be brought to the church of Saint Vedast, but they could not be moved even when a multitude of oxen had been brought.

Leaving only two oxen with the wagon, they allowed them to go wherever they wished. With the greatest speed those two oxen brought the bodies to the church of Saint Martin in which Saint Salvius had been accustomed to pray, and there they were honorably placed.

At the same time two sisters of a certain duke of the Franks came to King Charles, complaining of their brother because he was taking away their inheritance.

When the duke was summoned by the king concerning this, he answered that he was taking nothing from them.

The king caused him to swear upon the body of Saint Salvius that he owed his sisters nothing of the things they sought.

When he had sworn joyfully, he immediately burst through the middle; blood came out of his eyes, ears, nostrils, and mouth, and after two hours he expired.

Genard the father, although blinded bodily, received spiritual eyes. Giving whatever he possessed to Saint Salvius, he remained in his house and performed penance.

When Winegard his son came to the church in which the saint rested and prayed that sight might be given to him, the whole church was shaken.

Going out and turning in flight, he came to the monastery of Saint Amand and remained there, mourning his sin all the days of his life.

Winegarius the servant, however, prostrate before the body of Saint Salvius with a great shower of tears, received sight in one eye; and until the end of his life he tended the flocks in the service of Saint Salvius.

Section XII

Concerning the Parisian School and How It Was Established at Paris

Jacob of Columna relates in his history that in the time of Charlemagne, Alcuin, an Englishman by nation, was sent by the kings of England to Charles, king of the Franks, for the sake of peace. He was kindly received by him and remained with him in Gaul, a man most learned in every respect.

Chiefly through his teaching the king learned all the liberal arts, especially astronomy, in which he greatly delighted.

Therefore Alcuin, illustrious in knowledge, life, and the wisdom of letters, transferred the school from Rome to Paris; it had formerly been transferred from Greece to Rome by the Romans.

The founders of this school at Paris were four monks, disciples of Bede: Rabanus, Alcuin, Claudius, and John Scotus.

In the chronicles of the metropolis of Arelate it is read thus:

“The almighty disposer of affairs and ordainer of kingdoms and times, when he had crushed among the Romans the iron or earthen feet of that wondrous statue, raised among the Franks the golden head of another statue no less wondrous through the illustrious Charlemagne.

“When he alone had begun to reign in the western regions and the studies of letters were already everywhere in oblivion, and consequently the worship of the true divinity was growing cold, it happened that two Scottish monks from Hibernia landed with British merchants upon the shore of Gaul, men incomparably learned both in secular letters and in Holy Scriptures.

“Every day, although they displayed nothing for sale, they cried loudly to the crowds coming to buy: ‘If anyone desires wisdom, let him come to us and receive it, for with us wisdom is for sale.’

“These things were cried out for so long that, while people wondered at them or thought them insane, the matter was brought to the ears of King Charles, who was always a lover of wisdom.

“He quickly summoned them into his presence and asked whether they truly possessed wisdom for sale.

“They said, ‘We both possess wisdom and are prepared in the name of the Lord to give it to those who seek it.’

“When the king asked what they sought for it, they answered, ‘Only suitable places, ingenious souls, and the sustenance without which this pilgrimage cannot be passed.’”

When he heard these things, he was filled with immense joy. At first he kept both of them with himself for a short time.

Afterward, when he was pressed by military expeditions, he caused one of them, named Clement, to reside in Gaul, namely at Paris. He entrusted the noblest boys to him and commanded that provisions be supplied to them as was necessary.

He sent the other into Italy and assigned to him the monastery of Saint Augustine near the city of Ticinum, so that those who wished might assemble there for learning.

When Albinus, who is also called Alcuin, heard that Charles gladly received wise and religious men, he boarded a ship and came into Gaul. The king kept him with himself until the end of his life.

His teaching bore fruit to such an extent that the Franks have until now equaled the Romans in every branch of knowledge. More will be said below concerning Alcuin and his books.

Moreover, as the aforementioned Jacob attests, he was abundant in eloquence, for whatever he wished he could express very easily and elegantly.

Not content with his native language, he long devoted labor to learning foreign languages. Among these he learned Latin, or Roman, so well that one would think him a Roman. He could understand Greek better than he could speak it.

He cultivated the liberal arts most diligently. He also greatly revered their teachers, whom he pursued with great honors.

He cultivated the Christian religion most holily and with the highest piety, as has been said.

He built very many churches, enriched them with possessions, and adorned them with the richest ornaments. He wished the divine office to be celebrated perpetually in them.

Among the other sacred and venerable places, however, he especially cultivated the church of Peter the Apostle at the city of Rome, where he gave great gifts of gold, silver, and precious stones.

The illustrious emperor omitted nothing that was to be done so that the Roman city through his work and labor, and the church of blessed Peter through him, should not only be safe and defended but should also, through his zeal and diligence, be adorned and enriched before all others as the mother and mistress of all churches.

Besides those things that this most glorious emperor did with the greatest magnificence for the kingdom of Francia, after he attained the imperial dignity he accomplished so many magnificent deeds that they alone would require a special book.

For through his zeal and industry he restored to its ancient boundaries the Roman Empire, which had almost collapsed in the western regions.

He subdued Aquitania, Gascony, and everything from the ridge of the Pyrenean mountain as far as the river Ebro; then both Pannonias, Dacia, Histria, Liburnia, and Dalmatia, except for the maritime cities that, because of friendship and treaty, he had permitted the emperor of the Greeks to possess.

Afterward he subjected to the Roman Empire all those barbarous nations situated between the river Rhine, the river Musula, the Ocean, and the Danube, which were indeed nearly alike in language but very unlike in customs and dress.

Moreover, he subjected to the Roman Empire all Italy from Augusta Praetoria as far as lower Calabria, which touches the Sicilian Sea, in which it is agreed that the boundaries of the Greeks lie.

The remaining matters that pertain to his domestic and interior life were these, says Jacob of Columna.

After the death of his father Pippin, when the kingdom had been divided with his brother Carloman, Charles bore his brother's hostility with such patience that it appeared wondrous to everyone.

When Carloman died, the whole kingdom devolved upon Charles himself.

At his mother's urging, Charlemagne took the daughter of the king of the Lombards as wife, but repudiated her after a year. It is uncertain for what reason he did this.

He afterward took as wife Hildegard, born from the nation of the Suevi, a woman distinguished by the highest nobility.

By her he had three sons, namely Charles, Pippin, and Louis, and three daughters by the same wife, namely Rotrud, Bertha, and Gisla.

He also had concubines by whom he had children of both sexes.

He continually cultivated his mother with the highest honor, so that no discord ever arose between them except in the divorce of the daughter of King Desiderius.

Moreover, he governed the empire with such great kindness and clemency that discord against him never arose in the kingdom.

Only once was a conspiracy made against him in Germany. Of its authors, some were deprived of their eyes and some were sent into exile, yet none of them was killed by the sword except three.

Because they defended themselves with drawn swords against the king's attendants so that they might not be captured, they were killed, since they could not otherwise be taken.

The cause and origin of their conspiracy was the queen herself, his wife; for, conquered by love for her, he was excessively credulous toward her, to such an extent that he was believed to deviate from the kindness of his nature and his customary gentleness.

For the remainder of the whole time of his life, however, he conducted himself at home and abroad with the highest love and favor toward everyone, so that not even the smallest mark of unjust cruelty could ever be detected in him.

Section XIII

In the thirteenth year of his empire, says Jacob, the glorious Emperor Charles, when his kingdom and empire had been pacified and enlarged and the condition of the Church religiously ordered, also used his authority to cause the Gregorian office to be observed throughout the universal Church, leaving the Ambrosian office to the Milanese alone.

When he was already oppressed by disease and old age, he summoned to himself his firstborn Louis, whom he had established as king of Aquitania.

Having assembled the nobles from the whole empire, by their counsel and assent he declared Louis a partner in the imperial name, the future Augustus, and emperor of the Romans.

For he alone survived of Hildegard's sons, the other two having already died.

When this had been done, Charles returned to Aquaegrani, and there, although worn out by old age, he nevertheless exercised himself daily in hunting.

But while he was wintering there, he lay down in the month of January with a severe fever.

As soon as he was burdened with fever, as he was accustomed to do, he prescribed for himself abstinence from foods, thinking that the illness could be driven away or at least mitigated by this abstinence.

But when pain in his side was added to the fever, on the seventh day after he took to his bed, having devoutly received holy communion, he departed to the Lord.

He was in the seventy-second year of his age, and in the thirteenth from the time when he had begun to reign, from when at Rome under Pope Leo he had received the imperial dignity. [read: he died in the seventy-second year of his age and the forty-seventh year since he began to reign]

He died on the second day before the Kalends of February. [read: on the fifth day before the Kalends of February, 28 January]

He was buried at Aquaegrani in the most beautiful chapel in the whole world, which he had built for himself and wondrously adorned.

Above his tomb a gilded arch was erected with an inscription of this kind:

“Under this tomb is placed the body of Charlemagne, who nobly enlarged the kingdom of the Franks and happily ruled it for forty-seven years. He departed in the eight-hundred-and-fourteenth year from the Lord’s Incarnation.”

Pope Leo with the Roman princes was present at his burial. Many archbishops and bishops were also present, and very many dukes and counts were present.

They clothed the dead man’s body in imperial garments, placed a golden crown upon his head, and caused him to sit upon a golden chair as though alive.

They placed the codex of the four Gospels upon his knees, so that his right hand held the codex and his left hand held the scepter.

They also joined a small golden chain to the diadem, lest the dead man’s head incline to either side.

Moreover, they placed at his left the golden shield that the Romans had made for him.

At his death, however, as Archbishop Turpinus says and Vincent relates in the place cited above, I was at Vienna, praying in a church before the altar.

When I was carried into ecstasy while singing the psalm “O God, come to my assistance,” I saw infinite ranks of hideous spirits pass by and hasten toward Lotharingia.

A certain one resembling an Ethiopian followed all of them at a slow pace.

I said to him, “Where are you going?”

They said, “To Aquaegrani, to the death of Charles, so that we may carry his soul away to Tartarus.”

Then I said, “I adjure you by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ that, when the journey has been completed, you return to me.”

After a short delay they returned to me in the same order, scarcely when the psalm had been completed.

I said to the last one, to whom I had spoken before, “What did you accomplish?”

He said, “The Galician without a head placed so many stones and the innumerable timbers of his basilicas in his balance that his good deeds weighed more than his evil deeds, and therefore he took his soul away from us.”

When he had said these things, he vanished.

From that time when Charles departed from Spain until the day of his death, he was continually ill.

His son Louis succeeded him, as has been said.

Title XIV, Chapter V

As has been said, at the same time two singular men flourished: Albinus, who was also called Alcuin, a most learned man born in England and Charles's teacher in the liberal arts and Holy Scriptures; and Rabanus, first an abbot and afterward archbishop of Mainz.

Alcuin composed several books: three books On the Holy Trinity; one book To His Disciples; one book On the Epistle to the Hebrews; one book On Ecclesiastes; seven books On John; one book On the Nature of the Soul, to the Virgin Eulalia; and one book of dialogues On the Trinity, to Fredegisus.

He is also said to have produced the Ordinary Glosses upon all Holy Scripture, excerpted from the sayings or judgments of various doctors.

In the Decrees, distinction forty-five, Albinus says:

"There are three kinds of alms. One is bodily: to give the hungry whatever you can. The second is spiritual: namely, to forgive the one by whom you have been injured. The third is to correct one who errs and to bring delinquents back into the way of truth."

The same man says in cause twenty-three, question eight:

"At the exhortation and prayers of Adrian, bishop of the city of Rome, King Charles was entreated to undertake war against the Lombards. This war had indeed previously been undertaken with great difficulty by his father Pippin, when the pope, namely Stephen, entreated him."

The same Albinus, or Alcuin, says thus in a certain sermon on the feast of All Saints:

"The ineffable and immense goodness of God provided that he should not extend the time of labor and struggle, nor make it long or eternal, but brief and, so to speak, momentary, so that in this brief and little life there should be struggles and labors, but in that heavenly life the rewards of merits should be eternal.

"He provided that the labors should quickly end, but the rewards of merits should endure without end; that after the darkness of this world they should see the brightest light and should receive a beatitude greater than the bitterness of all sufferings, as the Apostle testifies: 'The sufferings of this time are not worthy of comparison with the future glory that shall be revealed in us.'

"Heavenly joy received with an open bosom those returning from battle and went forth to meet those bearing a trophy from the prostrated enemy.

"Women who overcame both the world and their sex come with the triumphant men; virgins together with boys, passing their tender years in virtues, come with the doubled glory of warfare; and the remaining multitude of the faithful entered the kingdoms of the perpetual court, who preserved the sincerity of faith in the unshaken disciplines of the heavenly precepts, in united peace.

"Therefore act, brothers: let us enter upon the road of life, and let us return to the heavenly city in which we are enrolled and ordained as citizens.

"For we are not strangers but fellow citizens of the saints and members of God's household, and his heirs, but coheirs of Christ.

"Fortitude will open for us the gate of this city, and confidence will provide a broad entrance.

"What is more blessed than that life, where there is no fear of poverty and no weakness of illness? No one is injured there; no one becomes angry, and no one envies.

"No cupidity burns; no ambition for honor presses; there is no fear of the devil there, no snares of demons; the terror of Gehenna is far away.

"There is death neither of body nor of soul, but a joyful life by the gift of immortality.

"There shall then be no discord anywhere, but all things are harmonious, all things tranquil, and the splendor perpetual.

"Yet above all is to be joined to the companies of angels and archangels and to enjoy the fellowship of all the heavenly and supernal powers;

"and to behold the battle lines of the saints shining more brightly than the stars, the patriarchs gleaming with faith, the prophets rejoicing in hope, the apostles judging the twelve tribes of Israel, the martyrs shining with the purple crowns of victory, and the choirs of virgins bearing gleaming garlands.

“But no voice would suffice to speak of the King who sits in their midst.

“For if it were necessary for us to suffer torments every day, if it were necessary to endure Gehenna itself for a short time, so that we might behold Christ in glory and be joined to the number of his saints, would it not be worthy to suffer everything that is grievous so that we might be accounted participants in so great a good and so great a glory?

“What shall be, dearest brothers, the glory of those just men, what the great joy of the saints, when the Lord shall begin to provide heavenly things for earthly, eternal things for temporal, and great things for small; to lead the saints with him into the vision of the Father’s glory and cause them to sit with him in the heavenly places; and to bestow upon his own the immortality to which he restored them by the vivification of his blood?”

It is also said of this Alcuin in the Martiniana that he was English by origin and most excellent in philosophy; he transferred the school from the City to Paris, which school had been transferred from Greece to the city of Rome by the Romans.

Charlemagne entrusted to this Alcuin the monastery of Saint Martin at Tours to govern.

For the monks, forgetful of their former religious observance, had declined so greatly that they walked about clothed in silken garments and gilded shoes, giving themselves to the delights of the flesh.

Hence, while one monk watched, two angels entered the dormitory and killed all the monks except the one who saw these things.

That monk scarcely obtained from those angels that he should not be killed but should be preserved to perform penance.

Therefore, after this deed, Alcuin was made abbot and governor of this monastery and an instructor in all holiness. After a praiseworthy life, the excellent doctor was buried there.

Rabanus, a philosopher and second to none of the poets of his time, says Vincent in the place cited above following Sigebertus, was abbot of Fulda.

He expounded many things from Holy Scripture and also composed, in a difficult and wondrous poem, a book On the Praise of the Holy Cross, distinguished by a variety of figures, and sent it to Pope Sergius.

At last, from abbot of Fulda he was ordained archbishop of Mainz, where, after a synod had been celebrated, at the command of King Louis he decreed many things useful to the Church.

At that time a certain false prophetess arose, saying that the day of judgment was imminent. She disturbed Mainz to such an extent that she even inclined some men of sacred order toward herself.

Corrected by the archbishop, she confessed that she had done this for gain at the suggestion of a certain priest.

When a severe famine had afflicted Germany so greatly that a father wished to devour his son, Archbishop Rabanus at that time showed much benevolence to the poor by giving many alms to the needy.

As Vincent says in the place cited above, he wrote many books: two books On the Praise of the Cross, partly metrical and partly in prose; one book On the Institution of Clerics; four books On Genesis; four books On Exodus; one book On Numbers; four books On the Book of Kings; four books On Paralipomenon; seven books On Judith; one book On Esther; three books On the Book of Wisdom; ten books On Ecclesiasticus; one book On Jeremiah; three books On the Books of the Maccabees; eight books On Matthew; and one book On the Acts of the Apostles.

Besides these things he wrote On the Natures of Things and several other works, as well as certain letters. One of these is the prologue placed before the Book of Maccabees.

Strabus was his disciple. He took down very many things while Rabanus dictated, produced certain short commentaries upon some books of the Pentateuch, and certain mystical expositions upon the Bible are ascribed to him.

The following things are contained in the Decrees from the books of Rabanus.

Rabanus says in On the Institution of Clerics, in On Consecration, distinction four:

“The office of catechizing ought to precede a person’s baptism, so that as a catechumen he may first receive the sacrament of faith.

“Christ himself first anointed the eyes of the man born blind with mud made from spittle and thus sent him to the waters of Siloam, because the one to be baptized must first be instructed in the faith of Christ’s Incarnation and thus, believing, be admitted to baptism, so that he may know of whose grace he is a participant and to whom he thereafter becomes a debtor.”

The same man says in the same work, On Consecration, distinction three:

“After the one to be baptized has entrusted himself through the confession of true faith to the dominion of another and has alienated himself through renunciation from the service of his former possessor, the savage power is blown out from him, so that through the pure ministry of the priest the evil spirit may flee, yielding to the Holy Spirit.”

The same man says in the same distinction:

“Afterward the one to be baptized is marked with the sign of the holy cross both upon the forehead and upon the heart, so that from that time the apostate devil, recognizing in his former vessel the sign of his own destruction, may know that it is thereafter alien to him.

“After this the prayers are now said so that he may become a catechumen.

“Then blessed salt is given into the mouth of the one to be baptized, so that through the typological salt he may be seasoned with the salt of wisdom, lack the stench of iniquity, and no longer putrefy from the worms of sins, but rather be preserved unharmed to receive greater grace.”

The same man says in the same distinction:

“Then the devil is exorcized again, so that, recognizing his own wickedness and fearing the just judgment of God upon him, he may withdraw from the person and no longer strive by his art to overthrow him lest he obtain baptism, but rather, showing honor to God his Creator, may return the work to its Maker.”

The same man says in the same distinction:

“Afterward his nostrils and ears are touched with saliva, and the Gospel saying is spoken to him that, when Christ healed the deaf and mute man, touching his tongue with spittle and placing his fingers in his ear, he said, ‘Ephphatha,’ which means, ‘Be opened.’

“For this sacrament is performed here so that, through the typological saliva and the priest’s touch, divine wisdom and power may effect the salvation of that catechumen; that his nostrils may be opened to receive the odor of the knowledge of God; that his ears may be opened to hear the commandments of God; and that his senses may be opened in his innermost heart to respond.”

The same man says in the same distinction:

“Then he is anointed by the priest so that he may preserve the sacred baptism received with faith.

“His breast is therefore then anointed with sanctified oil, with the invocation of the Holy Trinity, so that no remnants of the hidden enemy may reside in him, but that his mind may be strengthened in the faith of the Holy Trinity.

“He is also anointed between the shoulders with the same oil so that he may be fortified on every side and strengthened by the grace of God to perform good works.

“The font is consecrated so that the catechumen may approach it for baptism.”

The same man says in the same distinction:

“After the baptized person ascends from the font, he is immediately signed upon the brain, that is, upon the crown of the head, by the priest with sacred chrism, with the following sign and prayer, so that he may become a participant in Christ’s kingdom and may be called a Christian from Christ.”

The same man says in the same distinction:

“First let the pagan be asked whether he renounces the devil and all his damnable works, so that he may first cast away error and thus be able to approach truth; so that, according to the Apostle, he may put off the old man according to his former manner of life and, denying impiety and worldly desires, may live justly and piously in this world.”

The same Rabanus, writing to Heribaldus concerning the fallen, whether they ought to be promoted or to minister in the orders they had received, says thus in distinction fifty:

“Concerning those who possess sacred orders and confess themselves to have been contaminated by capital crimes either before or after ordination, it has seemed to us that this distinction ought to be written.

“As it appears to me, those who have been publicly detected or caught in theft, perjury, fornication, and other crimes of this kind should fall from their own grade according to the statutes of the sacred canons, because it is a scandal to the people to have such persons set over them when they are known to be vicious beyond measure.

“For on this account men disparage the sacrifice of God, as we read they formerly did when the sons of Eli sinned; and those who are rebellious and contrary become worse each day through their depraved examples.

“But those who confess before the angels of God through a secret confession, with the priest also present who is to impose penance upon them, that they have secretly committed the aforementioned sins, and complain that they themselves have sinned gravely—if they strive to purify themselves through fasts, alms, and vigils, the hope of pardon from God’s mercy is to be promised even to these while their grade is preserved.”

Thus he speaks. See, however, the gloss there explaining the matter.

The same man, upon Matthew and upon the words “He delivered him to the torturers,” says thus in On Penance, distinction four:

“It must be considered that he says ‘the whole debt,’ because not only the sins that a person committed after baptism will be imputed to him for punishment, but also the original sins that had been forgiven him in baptism.

“What he says in the plural, ‘original sins,’ refers to the several effects of original sin, although in itself it is one.

“Such forgiven things are imputed not through their return, but through a certain aggravating effect,” according to Thomas in book four.

The same man says in the book On Ecclesiastical Pressures, and in distinction thirty-seven:

“We read of blessed Jerome that, when he read a book of Cicero, he was rebuked by an angel because, although a Christian man, he attended to the inventions of pagans.”

The same man says in the same book, and it is contained in cause twenty-four, question three:

“We are not condemned forever when we are judged unjustly, for the Psalmist says, ‘Nor shall he condemn him when judgment is made against him.’

“Many profess that they pursue the faults of priests from zeal for God, but while this is done indiscreetly they incur the crime of sacrilege.

“And while, as though for correction, they rush headlong, they themselves fall much more grievously and much worse.”

Section II

The same Rabanus speaks excellently, skillfully, and devoutly in metrical verses in the book On the Praises of the Cross:

“O Cross, you who are dedicated by vow to the supreme trophy.

“O Cross, you who are blessed by Christ’s bright triumph.

“O Cross, you who excel and rule over all Olympus.

“O Cross, leader to the wretched and redemption for the broad world.

“The laudable action of the patriarchs signifies you, and the people of the prophets, commanded by divine utterance.

“The apostolic band duly extends your trophies, and the choir of martyrs itself by blood poured out with justice.

“Behold the nourishing citadel of the Cross; behold the structure made for salvation; behold here the throne of the King, this reconciliation of the world.

“The celestial seraphim display the signs of Christ’s Cross and, with wings extended, signify its outstretched arms.

“The sacred form of the Cross gleams in venerable raiment. A great honor clothes it; rejoicing, I speak this to the nation.

“Holy Cross, you are the victory of Christ, the eternal King. The Lord’s Passion is life for the whole world.

“Upon the Cross the law of the Lord is adorned with gleaming light; peoples and tongues are joined in sacred praise.

“Eternal Cross, you are the praise of God; you live in the citadel of the poles. Cross, you are pleasing to the heavenly beings; Cross, hence you are a navigator for the world.

“Merciful Christ, I pray, guard me, Rabanus. O pious one in judgment.”

The same man says:

“The Passion of Christ sustains heaven, rules the world, and pierces Tartarus.

“In it the angels are strengthened, the peoples are redeemed, and the enemies are crushed.

“The fear drawn from it frees the faithful from punishment. Salutary sorrow cleanses penitents from sin. Desire for the good germinates the fruits of virtues. Joy in the hope of life gladdens those who trust.

“The Creator of all things devised this instrument for himself and wished it to be constructed so that in it he might restore all things completely and unite all things through Jesus Christ our Lord.

“O truly good and holy Cross of Christ, who can duly describe you completely or praise you worthily? You are the pious revealer of heavenly secrets, the sacred guardian of God’s mysteries, and the suitable dispenser of Christ’s sacraments.

“In you the angels behold their accumulated joys. In you men recognize the laws of their salvation. In you those below receive the just recompense of their fraud.

“You renew things past, illuminate things present, and foretell things future. You seek things lost, guard things found, restore things fallen, and direct them into the way of peace.

“You are the victory of the eternal King, the joy of the heavenly host, and the power of earthborn men.

“You are the remission of sins, the exhibition of piety, and the increase of merits.

“You are the remedy of the infirm, the help of those who labor, and the refreshment of the weary.

“You are the care that heals the sick, the joy that consoles the sorrowful, and the health that gladdens those in pain.

“You are the state of those who believe rightly, the firmness of those who work well, and the disposition of those who persevere properly.

“Whatever can worthily be thought concerning the redemption of the world, whatever the tongue can rightly speak, can most fittingly be adapted to your praise, because whatever is praised in you is reckoned to Christ the King crucified upon you.

“To you, Lord Jesus Christ, I offer humble prayers and discharge the vows of my mouth, because you have deigned to inspire me, a sinner, to sing however little of the honor of your Holy Cross and to preach our common salvation to my fellow servants.

“The consciousness of my own offenses did not delay me from what I began, but rather gave me confidence, because I celebrate in this song that upon which you destroyed the reign of sin and gave pardon for all offenses to the whole world.

“Hail, venerable Cross of God, you who are the light of wisdom and teacher of the world; you who are also true praise, the friend of virtues, and illustrious philosophy, flourishing unceasingly among those who dwell in heaven and those born upon earth.

“You are more fittingly called an imperial throne than a servile instrument of torture, because Christ our Emperor and King acquired for himself upon you a kingdom and power in heaven and on earth. He overcame the enemies and reconciled the world to God.

“O standard of the Christian people, sword with which we undertake battle against the enemy, I beseech you to bless my infirm breast by your power, so that with worthy praises I may be able to sing the triumph of the eternal King upon you, by which you join heavenly and earthly things together in one treaty, confirm the pact, and dissolve the bonds of death.

“The chariot of the four cardinal virtues, by the four arms of the Holy Cross, fittingly displays the desired sacred series of forms proceeding from it, consecrated in the triumph of the victory of Christ the King and, through his Passion, profitable to the whole world for obtaining the fruit of piety and attaining eternal beatitude.

“For virtue is a disposition of the soul, the adornment of nature, the reason of life, the nobility of morals, and the moderation of life.

“O Holy Cross, you hand down all these things to religious persons, and together bring forth all things pleasing to God and salutary: a tree of sweetest odor, most broad in the spreading of its beautiful leaves; an incomparable garden of delights, overflowing with the most abundant fertility of the flowers of virtues and most pleasant in the leaves of words.

“The hope of the Holy Cross is a great consolation to the faithful; it supplies material for praise and causes us to know the goodness of the Creator.

“The Cross of Christ is the way of the just, the ascent to heaven, the wheel drawing us from the lowest things to the higher, the leader and gate of the kingdom.

“Its upright part commends divine love and its transverse part fraternal love. Christ showed us the integrity of this love and instructed us by his example: dying upon the Cross, he laid down his beloved soul for his friends and enemies, and taught us to do the same.”

Title XV: Entirely Concerning Religious Persons

First are excerpts from the twenty-four Conferences of the Fathers.

Then concerning anchorites and cenobites, namely Paul the first hermit, Antony, Hilarion, Paul the Simple, Macarius, Pastor, John the hermit, Moses the Ethiopian, Apollonius, Pachomius, and the sayings of the holy fathers.

Afterward concerning blessed Benedict, Maurus, Placidus, Romuald and the order of the Camaldolese; concerning Odo and the order of Cluny; concerning the order of Vallis Umbrosa and John Gualbert; concerning the order of the Cistercians and Carthusians; and concerning many other religious orders of monks.

Chapter I

We have treated above, as best we could, the deeds of our God and Savior Jesus Christ, just as the holy evangelists described them, although very briefly, since his works and signs are an immense sea that the whole world could not contain.

All who preceded him from the beginning of the world and all who follow him cry out, “Hosanna to the son of David.”

For he himself, and he alone, saves his people from their sins, and no others except his own people, namely those believing in him implicitly or explicitly.

For there is no other name given under heaven to men in which we must be saved.

And although he himself is the cornerstone placed in the foundation of the Church, thus joining both walls, of the Jewish and the Gentile people, nevertheless he asserted that he had been sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, because in his bodily presence he dwelt among them, leading the wandering sheep back to the fold by his wondrous teaching and immense prodigies.

But finally, having returned to the Father and sent the Paraclete from heaven, he sent his apostles into the whole world so that they might fill the face of the earth with the seed of the divine word, preaching the Gospel to every creature, in order that he might gather into the one fold of the Church the children who had been dispersed among the various rites of idolatry.

And they, as princes of the peoples and true lights of the world, founded the Church after Christ their teacher, with the mortar of doctrine moistened by their own blood.

Following them, the most unconquered martyrs of Christ, whose number cannot be counted because of their multitude, especially until the time of Constantine the Great, namely to the three-hundredth year of the Lord or thereabouts, defended the Catholic faith of the Church against kings and princes who strove with all their might to extinguish it and utterly destroy it.

They approved its truth and demonstrated it effectively not only by words but also by deeds, not only enduring every kind of torture most patiently but also desiring it joyfully and most eagerly.

Such were the words of Lawrence and Vincent to the tyrant: “Unhappy man, I have always desired these feasts and sought them with all my vows.”

When exterior peace had been granted to the Church, however, perfidious heretics arose with various errors. The chief of them, the one that infected the world most widely and lasted longest, was Arius.

Although they labored sufficiently with the devil their author to assault and cast down the truth of the orthodox faith, they were unable to do so; but the Lord cut down the necks of their pride through the most sacred doctors.

These doctors, exceedingly acute in intellect and excelling in every wisdom, divine as well as human, and most learned in Greek and Latin eloquence as well as Hebrew, refuted them by disputations and public sermons and reduced their cunning and fallacies to nothing by the strongest arguments, leaving most abundant writings on these matters to their successors, so that scarcely anything of those errors remained in the minds of men.

After them, in the succession of times, holy pontiffs and other clerics of lower grade illuminated the Church in many ways, governing the churches entrusted to them with the greatest solicitude in the fear of the Lord, having more care for the soul than for the wool.

Laypersons of both sexes also gave wondrous examples of uprightness.

Some of both these clerics and laypersons became illustrious through glorious prodigies, in order to confirm more and more the truth of the faith of Jesus Christ that they held and by whose power they did those things.

For the power of miracles has never been absent from the Church of God, although miracles have not been performed as abundantly as in the primitive Church, because then, as a new plant, it had to be watered more frequently by such things until its root was more firmly established and spread abroad.

But no sect or perfidy of Jews, Saracens, heretics, or pagans possessed this.

Nevertheless there was, and still exists, a certain kind of Christians cut off from the world that also greatly adorned the Church and sustained and assisted it by their merits and prayers: namely those who, leaving behind everything that belongs to the world, crucifying their flesh with its vices and desires, and renouncing their own will, dedicated themselves wholly to God.

There are three kinds of these, as John Cassian sets forth in the conference of Piamon.

The first, therefore, is that of the anchorites, who dwell alone in solitude. Concerning them it is said in cause sixteen, question one: “Those who truly and purely choose the solitary life are worthy of every honor.”

And in Lamentations three: “He shall sit alone and be silent and shall raise himself above himself,” namely through contemplation.

The second is that of the cenobites, that is, those living together in a congregation with others. Augustine expounds concerning them upon this psalm: “Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brothers to dwell in unity.”

And in cause thirty-three, question two, it is said in an admonition to a certain person: “Enter a monastery; humble yourself under the hand of an abbot; do with a simple spirit everything that is commanded you, so that you may be assisted by the prayers of many,” and so forth.

And in cause twelve, question one: “Do not call anything your own, but let all things be common among you.”

And below: “Since the brothers of this congregation of ours have renounced not only temporal possessions but also their own wills, it is evident that they possess nothing.”

The third kind is said to be that of the Sarabaites, which is called a reprobate kind.

These, established under no rule and under obedience to no one, run about through cities and castles beneath sheepskin, with religious dress and devout speech; they bear a wolfish heart, devouring the houses of widows and leading captive little women burdened with sins.

They are false prophets and apostles, divining concerning hidden matters; and through sweet words and blessings they deceive the hearts of the simple.

The Apostle speaks of them in his epistles. They are also reproved in the law in cause sixteen, question one, chapter Quidam, and the following chapter.

John Cassian asserts in the said conference that to this kind belong those who, dwelling either in solitude or in a congregation with others and under prelates, live carnally.

Leaving aside the Sarabaites, therefore, we shall now resume and repeat from higher up those things concerning anchorites and cenobites that we omitted for a reason in the preceding books, and shall discuss their origin, those who shone most brightly among them, and doctrines suitable to such a state.

Just as no degree of the faithful of the New Testament lacked a figure in the Old, so also there was a shadow there of this kind of persons most devoted to God.

For that Elijah, whose word burned like a torch and who was taken up into heaven in a fiery chariot, appears to have led the anchoritic life, dwelling alone upon Mount Carmel and being visited frequently by divine revelations.

His disciple Elisha appears to have embraced the cenobitic life, dwelling with the sons of the prophets. With them he also went to cut wood for constructing cells or huts, and he sweetened the exceedingly bitter colocynths cooked in error for those dining with him by mixing flour into them.

The company of prophets also, upon which Saul came and prophesied together with them as Samuel had foretold, is explained by glossators as having been a congregation of religious persons.

The glorious Baptist, the boundary of both Testaments, was the first and chief of the anchorites. From his tender years he fled the crowds of citizens and sought the caves of the desert, lest he be able to stain his life even with the slightest breath.

The camel supplied a hairy covering for his sacred limbs, a sheep supplied a girdle, water supplied his drink, and locusts supplied food joined with honey.

But because, while baptizing at the Jordan, he gathered disciples whom he also taught to fast and pray, he appears to have participated in the cenobitic state.

The Savior himself, the Lord Jesus, Lord and master of all perfection, both possessed and taught both forms of life.

He was as an anchorite when in his youth, until the thirtieth year of his age, he was unknown to men; and afterward, when baptized, he was led by the Spirit into the desert, where, dwelling with wild beasts, after a long fast he was tempted by Satan.

Later also he ascended a mountain alone to pray and passed the night in prayer to God.

He offered cenobites the form and example of every perfection when, calling the disciples whom he wished and leading them onto the mountain, he delivered a long sermon to them, opening his mouth and taking his beginning from the beatitude of poverty of spirit.

Afterward, advancing them from the cenobitic state to higher things, he himself maintained with them the mixed life, equally active and contemplative: by preaching, visiting the sick, and leading them to solitary places so that after the tumult of the crowds they might rest and have leisure for themselves; and upon Mount Tabor he caused the foremost of them to ascend to see him transfigured in glory.

True mendicants from their beginning embraced this state, namely the mixed life. Concerning them much will be said later.

Those newly converted to the faith in the primitive Church, gathered at Jerusalem under the holy apostles, are considered to have assumed the state of cenobites. The heart and soul of their multitude were one in the Lord, and no one said that anything was his own, but all things were held in common, as Luke relates in the Acts of the Apostles.

They were followed by the Bucholini, who, having been converted to the faith at Alexandria by Mark the Evangelist, soon attained, as it were, the perfection of monastic perfection. They dwelt by hundreds in caves and caverns, applying themselves together to prayers and vigils and living from the labor of their hands.

Jerome describes three kinds of monks as being in Egypt, as has been said, touching upon certain things concerning their customs.

First he sets down the kind of cenobites, that is, those living in common. I believe this should be preferred to the anchorites because it is the safer state, which he himself also counsels more strongly, especially for beginners.

In cause sixteen, question one, chapter Si clericatus, he says:

“First it must be considered whether you ought to live alone or with others in a monastery.

“It pleases me that you should have the fellowship of holy persons, that you should not teach yourself, and that without a teacher you should not enter a road that no one has ever entered.”

“The first agreement among them,” he says, “is to obey their superiors.

“They are divided into groups of ten and one hundred, so that a tenth man presides over nine men and a centenary has ten superiors beneath him.

“They remain in separate cells until the ninth hour.

“It is established that no one should go to another except the dean, so that if anyone is perhaps wavering in his thoughts, he may be consoled by the dean’s conversations.

“After the ninth hour they assemble in common. Psalms resound, Scriptures are recited, and, when the prayers have been completed and everyone is seated, the father in their midst begins to discourse.

“While he speaks, such silence is made that no one dares to look at another and no one dares to clear his throat. The praise of the speaker is in the weeping of the hearers.

“Tears roll down their cheeks for an hour, yet grief does not break forth into sobbing. [read: Tears roll silently over their faces, yet grief does not break forth even into sobbing]

“But when he begins to announce the kingdom of Christ and future glory, you may see them all, with controlled sighing and eyes raised to heaven, say within themselves, ‘Who will give me wings like a dove, and I shall fly and be at rest?’

“After this each group of ten proceeds with its parent to the tables, at which they serve by turns.

“They live upon bread, legumes, and vegetables, which they season with salt alone. Only the old receive wine; for them and for little children a meal is also often provided, so that the wearied age of the former may be sustained and the beginning age of the latter may not be broken.”

The fathers themselves, however, go around the cells of the individual monks at night and, placing an ear to them, diligently investigate what they are doing. The one whom they discover to be rather slow they do not immediately rebuke; but, concealing what they know, they visit him more frequently and, beginning first themselves, provoke him to pray rather than compel him.

And because it is not permitted for anyone to say, “I do not have a tunic or a cloak,” the steward regulates everything in such a manner that no one is found to ask for something that is necessary. But if anyone begins to be ill, he is transferred to a more spacious chamber and is cherished by the ministry of the old men with such care that he misses neither the delights of cities nor a mother’s affection.

The second kind is that of the anchorites, that is, solitaries, who, departing from cenobitic communities, carry nothing into the deserts except bread and salt. Paul was the author of this life, Anthony its illustrious practitioner, and—to ascend higher—John the Baptist was its prince.

The third kind is most foul and neglected. These dwell by twos or threes, and not many more, living according to their own judgment and authority. They contribute portions of what they have labored for into a common stock so that they may have common provisions. They dwell for the most part in castles and cities, and whatever they sell is of a higher price, as though their craft, and not their life, were holy.

Quarrels frequently arise among them, because, living from their own food, they do not permit themselves to be subject to anyone. Indeed, they are accustomed to compete in fasting and to turn what should be private into an occasion for triumph. Among them everything is affected: loose boots, puffed-out sleeves, coarser clothing, frequent sighs, the visitation of virgins, and disparagement of clerics. And if ever a feast day comes, they eat their fill even to vomiting.” Thus Jerome.

Modern religious, except for a few imitators of their earliest fathers, seem to belong to this most foul manner of living.

The same Jerome says in On Consecration, distinction five, chapter Never: “The monasteries of the Egyptians maintain this order: that they receive no one without work and labor, not so much because of the necessity of obtaining food as for the salvation of the soul, lest they wander through ruinous thoughts and, after the likeness of fornicating Israel, spread their feet to everyone who passes by.” And by examples in the said chapter Never he declares what works are fitting for monks.

And note that, as Gratian says in cause sixteen, question one, section By the Authority of the Superior, at the end, ecclesiastical history relates that down to the times of Eusebius, Zosimus, and Siricius monks were simply monks and not clerics. Hence Jerome also says that the monks in Scetis assembled together in order to find for themselves a priest who would celebrate for them the solemnities of Masses.

Therefore, when Jerome says in cause sixteen, question one, “A monk does not have the office of one teaching, but of one lamenting, who should mourn either himself or the world and await the coming of the Lord in fear”; and, “So live in the monastery that you may merit to be a cleric, and learn for a long time what you may afterward teach. But if the people or the bishop elects you to the clergy, do the things that belong to clerics,” this is not to be understood so generally that no monk is permitted to assume the office of teaching, since Gregory and Augustine, bishop of the English, and many men assumed to the episcopate did this.

Rather, Jerome wished to distinguish between the state of a monk and that of a cleric, showing what is fitting to each one. For one thing is fitting to him from the fact that he is a monk, and another from the fact that he is a cleric. For a monk, insofar as he is a monk, ought to lament, as has been said, not to teach; but a cleric, insofar as he is a cleric, ought to teach the people. Therefore, if a monk becomes a cleric and is lawfully appointed by his superior to the care of a church, he will be able to teach just as other clerics do. This is commonly done today.

Here, however, there will briefly be noted sayings and teachings of the fathers that are fitting for religious, so that they may advance perfectly in their calling; and afterward, because examples move more than words, there will also be examples of very many who illuminated the Church like great luminaries.

And because Vincent, in book twenty of the Historical Mirror, asserts that among the many little works of the ancients he found nothing of all that he read to be so powerful and helpful to one tending toward spiritual advancement and the summit of perfection as the teaching of John Cassian in the Conferences of the Fathers—a work that Benedict, the life-giving father of monks in the West, also directs one to examine and observe at the end of his Rule—we shall treat first of the clothing or habit of the monk.

From the book On the Institutes of the Cenobites, Cassian says thus:

“Let the monk’s clothing be that which merely covers the body, removes the shame of nakedness, and wards off injury from the cold—not that which nourishes seeds of vanity or pride—according to the Apostle’s proclamation: ‘Having food and coverings,’ that is, things that merely cover the body, not things that flatter through the glory of dress.

“Let these things be so cheap that they possess no distinction among the other men of this profession through any novelty of color or habit. Let them be so foreign to painstaking refinements that, on the other hand, they are not discolored by stains affected through negligence. Finally, let them be so separated from the adornment of this world that in all respects they continue to be common to the manner of dress of God’s servants.

“For whatever is presumed among the servants of God by one or by a few and is not held universally throughout the whole body of the brotherhood must be judged either superfluous or ostentatious and, for this reason, harmful.

“They therefore rejected a garment of haircloth as conspicuous and remarkable to everyone, as one that by this very fact can conceive vanity of spiritual elation and that is unfit and unsuitable for the performance of necessary work, in which the monk ought always to proceed vigorously and unencumbered.

“But if we read that certain persons clothed in this dress proved praiseworthy, a rule for monasteries is not therefore to be sanctioned by us from it, nor are the ancient decrees of the holy fathers to be disturbed. For the opinion of a few ought neither to be preferred nor to prejudice the general constitution of all.

“And although Joram, king of Israel, was seen in haircloth, he nevertheless had it concealed. The Ninevites also used it praiseworthily because everyone did so together and for the purpose of appeasing God’s wrath.”

Section IV

Concerning the manner of chanting psalms and praying, the same author says in book two of The Institutes of Monks:

“Throughout all Egypt and the Thebaid we have seen the lawful manner of prayer retained in the evening assemblies or nocturnal vigils.

“For in the beginnings of the faith, when certain few but most approved men were reckoned by the name of monks, who received from blessed Mark, the first to preside over Alexandria, their norm of living, they applied themselves with such fervor to reading, prayer, and the work of their hands by day and night that neither the appetite nor even the remembrance of food interrupted the body except at intervals of two or three days.

“And since, according to his own fervor and forgetful of another’s weakness, each man thought that the thing which he judged easiest through contemplation of his own faith and strength ought at once to be decreed—giving too little consideration to what was generally possible for the whole body, among whom it is necessary that the weak be found in the greatest part—they strove with diverse and extraordinary contention to establish the number of psalms according to the power of their own soul.

“And when there was among them, because of the rule of religion and a holy diversity of pious contention, a desire to celebrate the daily rites of prayers, one man rose in their midst to chant psalms to the Lord. While all were sitting, with the whole intention of the heart fixed upon the words of the psalmist, he chanted eleven psalms, separated by the interjection of prayers, in a continuous recitation of the verses; and, completing the twelfth under an Alleluia response, he was suddenly taken away from the eyes of all. By the manner of his departure he likewise imposed an end upon the ceremony.

“Hence the senate of the fathers, understanding that a general canon had been established for the congregations of brothers by the teaching of an angel, decreed that it should be observed in evening as well as nocturnal assemblies. To these psalms they added two lessons, that is, one from the Old Testament and another from the New.

“When a psalm has been finished, they do not immediately fall down upon a bending of the knees, as some among us do who think more about refreshing their weary bodies than seeking the benefit and advantages of prayer; but, standing in supplication, they spend the greater part of the time.

“But when they assemble to celebrate the solemnities that they call the synaxis, such silence is maintained by all that, except for the one who chants the psalm in their midst, no one would believe anyone to be present. This is especially so when the prayer is being completed: no spitting is emitted, no clearing of the throat makes a noise, no cough sounds among them, and no sleepy yawn is drawn through loosened jaws and gaping mouths.

“No groan or sigh that might hinder those standing by is uttered. No voice is heard apart from that of the priest concluding the prayer, unless perhaps one that has escaped the confinement of the mouth through an ecstasy of mind and has crept upon the heart insensibly, when the uncontrollable, namely intolerable, fervor of the spirit has been kindled, while it endeavors to exhale through a certain ineffable groan from the innermost chambers of its heart those things that the inflamed mind cannot contain within itself.

“But they pronounce that the one who, while his mind is in its ordinary state, supplicates with a cry, emits from his throat any of the things that we have mentioned above, or especially is overcome by yawning, sins doubly: first, because he is guilty in respect of his own prayer, in that he offers it negligently to God; second, because by his undisciplined noise he interrupts the attention of another who perhaps could have prayed more attentively.

“Therefore they command the prayer to be concluded with a swift ending and to be snatched rapidly, while it is still fervent, as it were, from the jaws of the enemy. Since he is always hostile to us, he then stands by most of all when he has foreseen that we wish to offer prayers against him to the Lord. Therefore they consider it more useful that prayers should indeed be brief, but very frequent.”

From book three: “It is fitting to preserve this observance in every way, lest the sleep that we have withdrawn from the night appear to be taken back during the day, when we have been driven by the weariness of the vigils and by emptiness; and lest we appear not so much to have withdrawn the body’s rest as to have changed the time of repose and nocturnal refreshment.”

Concerning the manner of receiving and instructing a novice, John Cassian says from book four:

“In the Thebaid there is a cenobitic community in which more than five thousand brothers are governed under one abbot. Such obedience is rendered by the whole multitude as one man among us cannot offer to one superior, nor can he preside over it even for a short time.

“Anyone desiring to be received within the cenobitic community is not admitted before, by lying at the doors for ten days or more, he has shown proof of his perseverance and desire, and likewise of humility and patience. Prostrate at the knees of all the brothers passing by, and deliberately rejected and despised by all as one who seeks to enter the monastery not from religious devotion but under the pretext of necessity, and also afflicted with many injuries and reproaches, he must give a trial of what manner of constancy he will possess in temptations, declaring it by his endurance of reproaches.

“And for this reason they do not consent to receive from him the money that he has for the uses of the cenobitic community: first, lest, puffed up by confidence in this offering, he should by no means deign to make himself equal to poorer brothers; then, lest, if afterward he should grow lukewarm in respect of those things which, inflamed by spiritual fervor, he had offered, he should attempt, with a sacrilegious spirit and not without injury to the monastery, to demand them back.

“Therefore, when anyone has been received, he is so stripped of all his former property that he is not permitted any longer to possess even the garment with which he is covered. Rather, by the hands of the abbot he is clothed in the monastery’s garments, so that he may know that he is now to be sustained not from resources maintained by himself, nor from resources criminally acquired or reserved from his former unbelief, but that from the holy and pious grants of the monastery he is to receive the wages of his righteousness [read: the wages of his service]; that from that time onward he is to possess nothing and, nonetheless, is not to be anxious about tomorrow; and that he is to be clothed and fed.

“Nor is he immediately permitted to mingle with the congregation of brothers. Instead, he is assigned to an elder who, dwelling apart, has care of pilgrims and devotes care and diligence to them with humility. When he has been imbued through this first instruction in humility and patience, he is handed over to another elder who presides over ten juniors, whom he instructs and governs because they have been entrusted to him by the abbot.

“This, however, will be his concern: first to teach him to conquer his own wills, by deliberately commanding him those things which he perceives to be contrary to his disposition. For, taught by many trials, they hand down that a monk, especially a younger one, is unable even to restrain the will of his own concupiscence unless he has first learned to mortify his own wills through obedience.

“Therefore they pronounce that one who has not learned to overcome his own wills is by no means able to extinguish anger or sadness, nor to retain true humility of heart, unity with the brothers, or firm and lasting concord; nor, indeed, can he long persevere in the cenobitic community.

“Consequently they are instructed to conceal absolutely no thoughts itching in the heart through harmful confusion, but, immediately when they arise, to disclose them to their elder; and to entrust nothing concerning the judgment of them to their own discretion, but to believe that to be evil or good which the elder's examination has determined. For they pronounce it to be a general and evident sign of a diabolical thought if men are ashamed to disclose it to an elder.

"After this, the observance of obedience is maintained by so great a rule that the juniors, without the license or permission of their superior, not only do not dare to go out of their cell, but do not presume on their own authority even to satisfy a natural necessity.

"And they hasten to fulfill everything that has been commanded as though it had been delivered from heaven by God, without any discussion. Out of reverence for the elder, they do not even measure the impossibility of a command.

"It is regarded as the highest delicacy if an herb seasoned with salt, which they call lapsana, and diluted with water is placed before the brothers for refreshment.

"When they hear a sound inviting them to prayers or to some work, they burst from their beds in eager rivalry, so that he who practices the work of a scribe does not dare to finish the letter that he is found to have begun, but leaves it incomplete. He pursues not so much the advantageous gains of the work as the virtue of obedience, which they prefer not only to manual work, reading, silence, and the quiet of the cell, but even to all virtues, in such a manner that they judge everything to be placed after it and are content to undergo every disadvantage, provided that they appear to violate this good in nothing.

"Among them no one pursues any private work—not merely in deed, but not even in thought.

"If anyone has by some accident broken or lost a little earthenware vessel, that is, a jar, or some other object of this sort, he wipes away his negligence in no other manner than by public penance. Likewise, if he has answered superfluously, harshly, or contumaciously; if, preferring reading to work or obedience, he has carried out the appointed duties rather sluggishly; if, after the synaxis has ended, he has not returned swiftly to his cell; if he has held another's hand; if he has presumed to converse, however briefly, with one who is not the cohabitant of his cell; if he has seen any of his parents or friends or has spoken with them without his elder; if he has received another's letter or attempted to write back without his abbot—in these and similar transgressions, I say, spiritual correction follows.

"But the remaining faults that are indiscriminately committed among us and are endured by us still more reprehensibly—namely, open insults, manifest contempt, familiarity with women, feuds and quarrels, the presumption of private work, the infection of avarice, attachment to and possession of superfluous things that the other brothers do not have, an extraordinary and furtive taking of food, and things similar to these—are corrected with blows or purged by expulsion.

"But the fathers established that sacred readings should be recited in cenobitic communities while the brothers are taking refreshment, not so much for the sake of spiritual exercise as for restraining superfluous and idle conversation, and especially contentions, which are generally accustomed to be generated at banquets.

"So great a discipline of silence is observed while they are eating that, with their cowls lowered beyond the eyelids of their eyes, lest, namely, their free gaze have the means of wandering more curiously, they look upon nothing more than the table and the food placed before them, so that no one observes in turn how or how much another takes for refreshment.

"With the utmost caution it is observed that no one presume to indulge his mouth with any food at all outside the table. Thus, when men walk through gardens and orchards, though fruits hanging abundantly and invitingly on the trees not only offer themselves to the breasts of those passing by, but even, strewn upon the ground, offer themselves to be trampled beneath their feet, it is considered sacrilege not only to taste anything from them, but even to touch it with the hand, except for that which is presented openly to all while they are taking their common refreshment and is publicly served for their consumption through the attendance of the brothers according to the steward's distribution.

"During a certain brother's week of service, when the steward, passing through, had seen three lentil grains lying upon the ground, which had slipped from the hands of the weekly server together with the water in which they were washed while he was hastening to prepare them for cooking, he immediately consulted the abbot concerning this. Judged by him as a squanderer and neglecter of sacred property, the server was suspended from prayer. The guilt of his negligence was remitted only when he had washed it away by public penance. For they believe not only that they do not belong to themselves, but also that all things that are theirs have been consecrated to the Lord."

There are added examples concerning the obedience of John. When commanded by his abbot to roll a very large stone that many men would not have been able to move, he attempted with all his strength and the excessive labor of his whole body, so that he was wholly drenched in sweat, to carry this out.

Likewise there is the example of Pafuntius, who, together with his little son eight years of age, had assumed the religious habit. In order to test his affection for his son and the sincerity of his obedience, the abbot had commanded the monks frequently to strike the innocent child without cause before his father, on account of which the boy's cheeks were stained with tears; yet his father was not moved in any respect.

Finally, on one of the days when the child was weeping, the abbot commanded the father to take him, proceed to a nearby river, and submerge him there. The father did this without delay. But the brothers whom the abbot had deliberately sent ahead to the river to draw him back did not permit him to perform this deed.

There is also the example of Abbot Pinufius's humility. Although he was abbot of a great cenobitic community and held in the greatest veneration, he secretly fled in altered, namely secular, clothing and went to unknown and remote places. At a monastery where a more rigorous life was being led, he asked to be received as an unknown layman. He was received with difficulty and, when tested by many reproaches, was accepted. At length he was made a gardener and applied himself to the most menial exercises. Finally, he was discovered by certain monks from his former monastery who came there to seek him, and by their entreaties he was compelled to return to his former monastery.

John Cassian says: "When afterward we sought this old man, namely Pinufius, most diligently in Egypt, he delivered the following exhortation to a brother whom he was receiving in his cenobitic community in our presence:

"'You know,' he said, 'after how many days of lying at the doors you are received today. First, you ought to recognize the cause of this difficulty. For just as in the future immeasurable glory is promised to those who faithfully serve God and adhere to the institution of this rule, so the most grievous punishments are prepared for those who execute it lukewarmly and negligently and who neglect to present to God fruits of holiness fitting both what they professed and what men believe them to be; for "cursed is he who does the work of God negligently," as Jeremiah says.

"'Therefore you were rejected by us for a long time, not because we do not desire with our whole heart your salvation and that of all, or because we do not wish even to run from afar to meet those who desire to come to Christ, but lest, by receiving you rashly, we make ourselves guilty of levity before God and make you yourself guilty of a more grievous punishment, if, after being easily received at present and understanding neither the weight of this profession, you should later prove either a deserter or lukewarm.

"'Take care, therefore, lest at any time you take up again any of those things which you cast away when you renounced them, and lest, contrary to the Lord's prohibition, you be found returning from the field of the Lord's evangelical work to be clothed again with your tunic, of which you had stripped yourself.

"'Take care lest you remember your parents or your former affection. Take care lest you ever contrive to revive pride—which now, as a beginner, you have trodden down by the ardor of faith and pious humility—when, after you have begun to taste a certain knowledge of the psalms or of your profession, you have gradually become elated.

"'In this humility and patience, likewise, in which you persevered for ten days before the doors in order to be received into the monastery, and which you implored with many tears, you must not only persist but also advance and increase. For it is pitiable enough that, when you ought to be carried forward from your rudiments and beginnings and to tend toward perfection, you should instead begin from those very beginnings to descend to lower things.

"'Narrow is the life that leads to life. [read: Narrow is the way that leads to life] Consider, therefore, that you have been made one of the few and the elect, and do not grow cold through the example and tepidity of the multitude. Rather, live as the few do, so that you may merit to be found with the few in the kingdom of God. For many are called, but few are chosen; and little is the flock to which it pleased the Father to give the inheritance.

"'Therefore know that it is no slight sin for one who professes perfection to pursue those things that are imperfect. The state of perfection is reached by these degrees and in this order.

"'The beginning of our salvation and likewise its guardian is the fear of the Lord. For through this both the beginning of conversion and the purgation of vices and the guardianship of virtues are acquired by those who are instructed for the road of perfection.

"'When it penetrates the mind of a man, it produces in him contempt for all things and begets forgetfulness of parents and horror of the world itself. By contempt for and deprivation of all possessions humility is acquired.

"'Humility is proved by these signs. First, if he keeps all his wills mortified within himself. Second, if he conceals nothing from his elder, not only of his deeds but also of his thoughts. Third, if he commits nothing to his own discretion, but all things to the elder's judgment, and listens to his admonitions eagerly and willingly. Fourth, if in all things he preserves obedience, gentleness, and constancy of patience. Fifth, if he not only inflicts no injury upon anyone, but also does not grieve or become sorrowful over one inflicted upon him by another.'"

"'Sixth, if he does nothing and presumes nothing which the common rule or the examples of the elders do not encourage. Seventh, if he is content with every lowliness and judges himself a bad and unworthy laborer in respect of everything commanded him. Eighth, if he declares himself inferior to everyone not by the surface of his lips, but believes it with the innermost affection of his heart. Ninth, if he restrains his tongue and is not clamorous in voice. Tenth, if he is not readily and quickly moved to laughter.'"

The same author says from book five:

"It is impossible to extinguish the burning fires of the body before the tinder of the other principal vices has also been cut out by the roots.

"The concupiscence of gluttony must first be trodden down by us, and the mind must be attenuated not only by fasts but also by vigils, reading, and frequent compunction, until, occupied and equally possessed by meditations of this kind, it recognizes the refreshment of food itself as something imposed upon it as a burden of life rather than granted for pleasure.

"For this is the foundation of all contests: that the incitements of carnal desires are first suppressed. For we do not merit, after the strength of mind has been acquired, to experience the more grievous struggles against celestial wickedness if we are unable to subject our frail flesh, which resists our spirit.

"For he who has not been able to restrain the superfluous appetites of gluttony, how will he be able to extinguish the heat of carnal concupiscence? And he who has been unable to restrain the passions placed in the open, and those which are small, how will he be able to defeat the hidden passions that itch without any human witness?

"For we have no adversary outside us who must be feared. The enemy is enclosed within us. An internal war is daily waged against us. When this enemy has been conquered, all the things outside will be rendered weak, and all things will be peaceful and subject to the soldier of Christ.

"Nor should we believe that fasting from visible foods alone can suffice for us unto perfection of heart and purification of body unless a fast of the soul has also been joined to it. For the soul has its own harmful foods, by which, when assaulted, it rolls down headlong into the precipices of lust.

"Disparagement is indeed a food, and a very sweet one. Anger is its food, although by no means light. Envy is a food of the mind, corrupting it with poisonous juices and not ceasing continually to torture it over the successes of another's prosperity. Vainglory caresses it with delightful food, but afterward renders it empty and stripped of every virtue. The nourishment and drink of avarice render it insatiable; and so it is with the other vices.

"Therefore one must always abstain from foods of this kind, and that food must be sought with every effort concerning which the Savior says, 'My food is that I should do the will of him who sent me.'"

Title XV, Chapter II

Now there follow in order the things excerpted from the twenty-four Conferences of the Fathers.

In the first conference, which is that of Abbot Moses concerning purity of heart, John Cassian says:

“When we sought out Abbot Moses in the desert of Scetis and likewise asked from him, with flowing tears, a discourse of edification—for we knew the rigor of his mind to be such that he by no means agreed to open the gate of perfection except to those who faithfully desired it and sought it with all contrition of heart, lest, namely, by disclosing it to the unworthy and to those receiving it with distaste, he should appear to incur either the vice of vainglory or the crime of betrayal—at length, wearied by our entreaties, he began thus:

“‘All arts and disciplines have a certain scopos, that is, an objective, and a telos, that is, a proper end. Looking toward it, the diligent pursuer of any art sustains all labors, dangers, and expenditures evenly and willingly.

“‘The end of our profession is indeed the kingdom of God, but its objective is purity of heart. If this is not continually set before our eyes, it will not only render all our labors various and unstable, but will also arouse thoughts diverse and mutually contrary.

“‘For a mind that does not possess something to which it may return and principally adhere must necessarily be altered at every moment by the variety of the things rushing upon it, and, because of the things that happen outwardly, be continually transformed into the state of the first thing that encounters it.

“‘Hence it is that we see certain persons who have despised the greatest riches of this world and the magnificence of estates afterward become agitated over a carving tool, a stylus, a needle, or a pen. Some guard a book with such zeal that they do not permit it even to be lightly read or touched by another, and from this incur occasions of impatience and death where they are moved to acquire the rewards of patience and charity.

“‘Although they have dispersed all their riches for the love of Christ, nevertheless, by retaining their former affection of heart in the smallest things, they are rendered unfruitful and barren in all respects. “If I distribute all my goods as food for the poor,” says the Apostle, “but do not have charity,” and so forth.

“‘From this it is clearly proved that perfection is not immediately attained by nakedness or by the casting away of dignities unless that charity whose members the Apostle describes is truly possessed, which consists in purity of heart alone. For what else is it not to envy, not to be puffed up, not to be provoked, and the rest, except always to offer a perfect and most pure heart to God and to preserve it untouched by all disturbances?

“‘Therefore all things must be performed and desired by us for the sake of this purity. For its sake solitude must be observed. For its sake we know that we must undertake fasts, vigils, and labors. We must not, because we are perhaps unable to fulfill these observances, fall into sadness, anger, or indignation. For the gain from fasting is not so great as the loss from anger, nor is the fruit received from reading so great as the harm incurred from contempt for a brother.

“‘It is therefore fitting for us to practice the things that are consequent—that is, fasts, vigils, readings, and so forth—for the sake of the principal objective, that is, purity of heart, which is charity, and not to disturb this principal virtue for the sake of those things. While it endures intact in us, it will do no harm if any one of them has been omitted through necessity; nor will it profit us to have done them all after this principal cause, for the sake of which all things must be performed, has been taken away.

“‘For these are not perfection, but the instruments of perfection. Therefore whatever can disturb this purity and tranquility of mind, however useful and necessary it may appear, must be avoided as harmful.

“‘It is indeed impossible for a man surrounded by the frailty of the flesh to adhere continually to God and to be inseparably joined to contemplation of him. Yet we ought to know where we must keep the intention of our mind fixed, to what objective we must always recall the gaze of our soul. When the mind has been able to obtain this, let it rejoice; but when distracted from it, let it grieve and sigh, judging even a momentary withdrawal from contemplation of Christ to be, as it were, fornication. Whenever our attention has wandered from him even a little, let us turn the point of the mind back to him again.

“‘For contemplation of God is conceived in many ways. God is known not only through admiration of his incomprehensible substance, which is still concealed in the hope of promise, but he is also perceived through the greatness of his creatures, through consideration of his equity or equality, or through the assistance of his daily dispensation.

“‘This occurs when, with the purest mind, we examine what things he has done with his saints throughout the individual generations; when with a trembling heart we marvel at his power, by which he governs, orders, and rules all things; when we marvel at the immensity of his knowledge and at the eye from which the secrets of the heart cannot be hidden; when we consider that the sand of the sea and the number of its waves have been measured and are known to him; when we consider the drops of rain and the days and hours of the ages; when, astonished, we contemplate that all past and future things stand before his knowledge.

"'It occurs when we consider his ineffable clemency, which with unwearied long-suffering endures the innumerable crimes committed by every person at every moment beneath his gaze; when we behold the calling by which the grace of his mercy adopted us without any preceding merits; and finally when, with a certain rapture of wonder, we behold how many occasions of salvation he granted to those who were to be adopted.

"'It occurs when we consider that he commanded us to be born in such a manner that from our very cradles the grace and knowledge of his law should be imparted to us; that he himself, overcoming the adversary in us, rewards us with eternal beatitude and perpetual prizes merely for the assent of a good will; and that, finally, he undertook the dispensation of his incarnation for our salvation and spread the wonders of his mysteries among all nations.

"'There are also other innumerable contemplations of this kind which arise in our senses according to the quality of our life and the purity of our heart, by which God is either seen or held with pure gazes. Certainly no one in whom any carnal affection still lives will retain them perpetually, according to that saying of Moses, "Man shall not see me and live," namely, while living sensually.

"'It is indeed impossible for the mind not to be interrupted by thoughts; but, by the grace of God, it is possible for everyone who is diligent either to receive or to reject them. Frequent reading and continual meditation upon the Scriptures are therefore employed so that an occasion of spiritual memory may thereby be afforded to us. For this reason there is frequent chanting of psalms, so that continual compunction may thereby be supplied to us. For this reason diligence in vigils, prayers, and fasts is employed, so that the attenuated mind may not savor earthly things but may contemplate heavenly things.

"'When these exercises in turn cease because negligence has crept in, the mind, hardened by the filth of the vices, must necessarily incline and soon fall toward the carnal part.

"'This exercise of the heart is not inappropriately compared to the likeness of mills, which a rushing course of waters turns with a violent impulse. Although they are whirled about by the pressure of the water and are by no means able to cease from their work, it lies in the power of the one who presides over them whether he prefers wheat, barley, or darnel to be ground. Without doubt, that which has been put into them by him will be ground.

"'So also the mind, whirled about by the torrents of temptations rushing upon it from every side through the assaults of the present life, will not be able to be empty of the surges of thoughts. But what sort it ought either to admit or to prepare for itself will be provided by the industry of its own diligence and effort.

"'We ought certainly to know that there are three origins of our thoughts: from God, from the devil, and from ourselves.

"'They are from God when the illumination of the Holy Spirit visits us and, by salutary compunction, chastises us concerning the things in which we have either made too little progress or have been overcome while acting slothfully; or when it reveals heavenly mysteries to us and turns our purpose and will toward better deeds.

"'They are from the devil when he strives to overthrow us both by delight in the vices and by hidden snares, transforming himself even into an angel of light.

"'They are from ourselves when we naturally remember the things that we have done, are doing, or have seen.

"'Therefore we must examine all the thoughts that arise in our heart with sagacious discernment, first investigating their origins, causes, and authors, so that from the character of those who suggest them we may be able to consider what reception we ought to give them. Thus we may be made approved money changers according to the command of the Lord.

"'The highest skill of such men is to test what is purest gold and what is less purified; whether, with a copper and base coin, it imitates a precious coin under the color or covering of shining gold; to distinguish not only coins bearing the faces of tyrants but also those that bear the image of the true king but are not lawfully formed; and then, by the judgment of the balance, diligently to inquire lest anything in them have been diminished from the lawful weight.

"'For the devil deceives when he has been concealed beneath the appearance of holiness. He hates the sound of caution, that is, the power of discernment. In this matter we know that even the blessed Abbot John was deceived, namely, concerning an excessive degree of abstinence.

"'Discernment will therefore be necessary for us in this fourfold manner. First, the material of true or gilded gold must not deceive us, that is, whether the thought is, in its general subject matter, evil or good. Second, we must reject, like counterfeit coins, those thoughts that imitate works of piety but contain an image of the king stamped unlawfully and falsely, as when, although something is pious in itself, it is nevertheless not truly good because of some circumstance.

“‘Third, we must be able to reject those things which, in the purest gold of the Scriptures, bear through a vicious and heretical sense the face not of the true king but of a tyrant. Fourth, we must reject those things whose weight and value, eaten away by the rust of vanity, are not equal in the judgment of the elders, namely, things not of just weight.’”

The second conference, which is likewise that of Abbot Moses, treats of discernment. This is the begetter, guardian, and moderator of all the virtues. According to John Cassian, it is called in the Gospel the lamp of the body and the eye; by the Apostle, the sun, when he says, “Let not the sun go down upon your anger”; and by Solomon, counsel, when he says, “Do all things with counsel.”

Cassian shows from the judgment of blessed Anthony that this is the principal virtue. For one day, when the fathers had assembled with blessed Anthony and were conferring with one another as to which virtue above the others would render one serving God safer from the devil’s snares and deceptions and lead him more unerringly to the summit of perfection, different men offered different opinions in their midst.

Some proposed a complete stripping away of possessions; others, abstinence and mortification; others, solitude and withdrawal; others, the largesse of alms.

At length blessed Anthony concluded that all the aforesaid things were indeed useful and necessary, yet none of them was what was being sought; rather, it was discernment. The Apostle teaches that true discernment can be possessed only from the Holy Spirit, saying, “To another is given through the Spirit the discernment of spirits.”

For by many examples Anthony proved that the things mentioned by the aforesaid fathers were not sufficient. There was Heron, who was of the greatest abstinence and was very solitary for a very long time. Because he lacked discernment, he was deceived by the devil to such a degree that, at the devil’s instigation and command when he had transformed himself into an angel of light, Heron cast himself into a very deep well. That spirit declared to him that he would receive no injury from it, as a sign of his perfection.

When the brothers learned this, he was drawn from the well as if by violence; yet not even in the three days for which he survived did he acknowledge his deception. Although the brothers exhorted him to penance, he believed that the thing which had come from the devil had been revealed by God.

There is another example concerning a man accustomed to visions, whose cell Lucifer frequently illuminated with his light. At his persuasion, the man undertook to kill a little son who dwelt with him in solitude and to offer him to God, so that he might please God after the manner of the patriarch Abraham. He would have done this had the boy not perceived it and fled from him.

Moreover, another man circumcised himself when the devil, under the appearance of an angel of light, commanded it on God’s behalf.

John Cassian himself declares from Moses’s words how this discernment is acquired on our part and how it is demonstrated, saying:

“True discernment is acquired only through true humility. Its first proof will be this: if all things, not only those that are to be done but also those that are thought, are reserved for the examination of the elders.

“For no one will be able to be deceived in any way if he lives not by his own judgment but by the example of his elders. And the most foul serpent, drawn by the power of confession from a dark and subterranean cave into the light and brought forth, as it were, dishonored, withdraws.

“Finally, this teaching is proved to be so pleasing to God that he would not instruct by himself the boy Samuel, whom he had chosen by his own judgment, but suffered him to run once and again to the old Eli, even though he had offended God, so that the humility of the one called to the divine ministry might be proved and, by this example, a form of subjection might be set before younger men.

“Christ also called and addressed Paul by himself. Although he was able to reveal to him the road of perfection, he preferred immediately to direct him to Ananias, and decreed that Paul should be instructed by Ananias’s teaching rather than his own.

“Therefore the good of discernment must be acquired with every effort through the virtue of humility, which can preserve us unharmed from both excesses, namely excess and defect, so that there may be neither excessive abstinence nor an excessive relaxation of abstinence; and so in the other things which we use.

“‘Question your father,’ says Moses, ‘and he will announce it to you; question your elders, and they will tell you,’ and so forth.”

Cassian adduces the example of Abbot Serapion. When he was a youth under the instruction of Abbot Theonas, instigated by the devil, he showed that he was fasting with the others while they fasted, but secretly took one loaf every day and ate it covertly in the evening. Yet afterward he was greatly tormented in conscience concerning this deed.

But on a certain occasion, when some men had come to blessed Theonas for the sake of edification and the old man had discoursed at length on how harmful to the soul the concealment of a thought is, Serapion, who was present, was pierced with compunction by his words. He disclosed his fraud publicly, casting into their midst with tears the loaf that he had already taken and was holding in his bosom.

Thereupon Theonas comforted him concerning the victory over the devil obtained by this disclosure. Hence also a sulfurous flame was seen to come forth from his bosom, leaving a stench behind, and he was freed from that temptation.

But we are not to follow the footsteps, receive the traditions, or accept the admonitions of all old men whose heads are covered by gray hair and whom length of life alone commends. We must accept those of the men whom we have learned to have marked their lives praiseworthily and most approvingly in virtue and to have been instructed not by their own presumptions but by the traditions of their elders.

For those who in their old age continue in the practice and sloth which they began in youth, and who as they grow old acquire authority for themselves not by maturity of conduct but by number of years, are not to be imitated, because discernment is not in them.

Cassian gives the example of a certain old man to whom a young man tempted by fornication had come to take counsel and receive aid. That old man rebuked him so harshly concerning such shameful thoughts that he drove him to despair.

When the young man, returning to the world, had set out upon the road, Abbot Apollo met him. Seeing him sad, Apollo asked where he was going and the cause of his sadness. After hearing these things from him, Apollo comforted and encouraged him to persevere and fight.

Going to that old man, Apollo asked God to send this temptation into his mind. When this had been done, the old man was so grievously tormented that, like a madman, he prepared to return to the world.

Pambo [read: Abbot Apollo], visiting him and understanding what had happened, rebuked him for his indiscreet speech to that young man, explaining that God had therefore permitted him to be so harshly tempted, so that he might learn to have compassion upon others. And when Apollo prayed for him, the temptation ceased.

Section II

The third conference is that of Pafuntius concerning the threefold calling and renunciation. He was priest of the congregation that dwelt in the desert of Scetis, in which he persevered to the end of extreme old age. He never moved, even to a nearer place, from the cell five miles from the church in which he had begun to dwell as a young man; nor, exhausted by his years, did he regard the distance of such a journey as burdensome when coming to the church on the Sabbath or the Lord's day.

But he was not content to return empty from there. Placing upon his shoulders a vessel of the water which he was to consume throughout the whole week, he carried it back to his cell, even when he had exceeded his ninetieth year.

He says that there are three orders of callings and three renunciations.

The first order of calling is from God: namely, whenever a certain inspiration sent into our heart sometimes arouses us even while sleeping to the desire for eternal life and salvation, and we are urged by a most salutary compunction to follow God and adhere to his precepts.

Such was the calling of Abraham, when it was said to him, "Go forth from your land." We know that blessed Anthony was also summoned in this manner when, hearing in the church that saying of the Gospel, "If you wish to be perfect, go, sell all that you have," and so forth, he left everything.

The second manner, which occurs through a human being, takes place when, instigated by the examples or admonitions of certain saints, we are kindled to desire salvation. By this order we read in the Holy Scriptures that the children of Israel were liberated by Moses from the affliction of Egypt.

The third is that which descends from necessity, when, bound to the riches or pleasures of this world, we are compelled—by temptations continually rushing upon us, which threaten the dangers of death, strike us with loss and confiscation of goods, or pierce us through the death of dear ones—to hasten, at least unwillingly, to the God whom we scorned to follow amid the prosperity of affairs.

This is according to the saying of the psalm: “When he killed them, they sought him and returned.” This is evident through the examples in the Book of Judges concerning the liberation of the people of Israel from the hands of tyrants, to whom the Lord had permitted them to be subjected because of their sins; but when they repented he liberated them through Daniel [read: he liberated them through Othniel], Ehud, Gideon, and others.

Although the first two of these three appear to begin from better principles, nevertheless we sometimes find that perfect and most fervent men have arisen even from the third and lowest degree. And again we find that very many have grown lukewarm from that higher degree and fallen back to a blameworthy end.

We perceive this in the very calling of the apostles. For it did not profit Judas to have voluntarily assumed the most sublime degree of the apostolate in the same order as Peter and the others through Christ’s teaching, since he consumed his glorious beginnings with the pestilential end of avarice.

Nor did it harm Paul that, when he was suddenly blinded, he appeared to be drawn as though unwillingly. The whole matter therefore consists in the end, according to whether a man has conducted himself more fervently or more negligently after his calling.

Now there must be a discussion of the renunciations, which the authority of the Scriptures and the fathers hands down as being three.

The first is that by which we despise all bodily possessions. The second is that by which we reject our former conduct and vices, and the former affections of soul and flesh. The third is that by which, summoning our mind away from all present and visible things, we contemplate only future things and desire the things that are invisible.

We read that God commanded Abraham that these three should be accomplished together: “Go forth from your land, and from your kindred, and from your father’s house.”

First he said, “from your land,” that is, from the possessions of this world and earthly resources. Second, “from your kindred,” that is, from one’s former manner of life, conduct, and vices, which, adhering to us from birth, are related to us, as it were, by a certain affinity and consanguinity. Third, “from your father’s house,” that is, from every memory of this world that meets the gaze of the eyes.

This occurs when our mind, dulled by no contact with carnal grossness but polished by the most thorough refinements from every earthly affection and quality, passes through unceasing meditation upon divine things and spiritual contemplations to the things that are invisible, to such a degree that, intent upon heavenly and incorporeal things, it does not perceive itself to be surrounded by the frailty of the flesh; and so that it regards all present things not as things that will pass away but as things already past, and beholds them as empty smoke dissolved into nothing.

The three books of Solomon are appropriately fitted to these three renunciations. Proverbs corresponds to the first renunciation, for in it the concupiscence of carnal things and earthly vices are cut away. Ecclesiastes corresponds to the second, where all things that are done beneath the sun are declared to be vanity. The Song of Songs corresponds to the third, in which the mind, transcending all invisible things [read: all visible things], is joined to the Word of God through contemplation of heavenly things.

Therefore those who renounce the world must take care lest they become like those of whom it is said, “In their heart they returned to Egypt,” and lest we be condemned with those Israelites who, while dwelling in the desert, desired after the food of the heavenly manna the fetid and filthy foods of the vices, saying: “It was well with us in Egypt, where we sat over the pots of meat and ate onions, garlic, cucumbers, and melons.”

Of these, very few entered the land of promise, namely only two, possessing, that is, the love of God and of neighbor, which embraces all virtues, as the Apostle shows to the Corinthians. No king and no enemy can confer or take away these riches of virtues.

For in the Scriptures riches are set down under a threefold kind. There are good riches, namely the merits of men acquired from acts of virtues, of which the psalm says, “Glory and riches are in his house,” and so forth. There are evil riches, namely sins, of which it is said in the Gospel, “Woe to you who are rich, who have your consolation.” There are intermediate riches, which a man can use well or badly, of which the Apostle says to Timothy, “Command the rich to do good, not to be high-minded, nor to hope in the uncertainty of riches.” True riches are acquired principally from grace and from free choice. Cassian treats extensively throughout the Scriptures concerning this free choice.

The fourth conference is that of Daniel concerning the concupiscence of the flesh and of the spirit. Among those who dwelt together in the desert of Scetis he was adorned with every kind of virtue, but especially with the virtue of humility.

Because of his purity and gentleness, he was ordained priest by Pafuntius, the priest of that solitude, at his command and with the intention that Daniel should preside over the congregation after him; yet Daniel died before Pafuntius.

John Cassian says:

“When we asked why, while remaining in our cell, we were sometimes filled with such ineffable joy and an abundance of sacred perceptions that a pure and ready prayer was poured forth and the mind, filled with spiritual fruits, perceived that its efficacious supplications reached God even through sleep; and why, on the other hand, when no causes existed, we were suddenly filled with so great an anguish and oppressed by a certain irrational sadness that we not only felt ourselves dry in respect of perceptions of this kind, but even the cell became abhorrent, reading became distasteful, and prayer itself was poured forth unstable and wavering, Daniel answered these things thus:

“‘A threefold account concerning this barrenness of mind of which you speak has been handed down to us by our elders. It descends either from our negligence, from the devil’s assault, or from the Lord’s dispensation and testing.

“‘It comes from negligence when, through our own fault, having behaved incautiously at an earlier time and, through sloth, having been fed with idle thoughts, we make the earth of our heart germinate thorns and thistles. When these sprout in it, we are consequently rendered barren and fasting from every spiritual fruit and contemplation.

“‘It comes from the assault of the devil when, although we are sometimes devoted to good pursuits, the adversary, penetrating our mind by cunning subtlety, draws us—either without our knowledge or against our will—from the best intentions to the lowest things.

“‘But there is a twofold cause of dispensation or testing. The first is that, when we have been left by the Lord for a little while and humbly behold the weakness of our mind, we may by no means be exalted over the preceding purity of heart that was granted to us by his visitation; and so that, when he tests us, after we have been abandoned by him, and we cannot by our groans and effort recover that state of joy and purity, we may understand that the former alacrity of heart was conferred upon us not by our own effort but by his gracious favor.

“‘The second cause of testing is that our perseverance or the desire for constancy of mind may be proved, and that it may be manifested in us with what intention of heart and insistence of prayers we seek the visitation of the Holy Spirit when it abandons us. And likewise, recognizing with how much labor that lost joy and gladness of purity is recovered, we may endeavor more anxiously to guard it when it has been found and to hold it more attentively. For whatever is believed able to be recovered easily is in a certain manner guarded more negligently. This appears to belong to the third cause of this divine dispensation.

“‘As has been said, this can also proceed from the devil’s temptation. Hence the psalmist says to the Lord, “Do not abandon me utterly,” as if he were to say in other words: “I know that you are accustomed usefully to abandon your saints so that you may prove them. For otherwise they cannot be tempted by the adversary unless they have been abandoned by you for a little while.

“‘“Therefore I do not ask that you never abandon me, because it is not expedient for me either never to perceive my weakness, so that I might say, ‘It is good for me, Lord, that you humbled me,’ or not to have the exercise of fighting. For the devil will not dare to tempt me unless you permit it, just as he was unable to tempt and afflict Job unless permitted by God.

“‘“Rather, I ask that you do not abandon me utterly, that is, unto excess. For just as it is useful to me if you abandon me a little, so that the constancy of my desire may be proved, so it is harmful if, on account of my merits and offenses, you permit me to be abandoned excessively. For no human strength, if deprived for too long of your help in temptation, will be able to persevere by its own constancy and not immediately succumb to the adversary’s power or action, unless you yourself do not permit us to be tempted beyond what we are able.”

“‘A figure of this is read in the Book of Judges: “Therefore the Lord did not destroy these nations,” namely, those hostile to the people of God, “but left them so that he might train Israel through them and they might possess experience of fighting with enemies.” Thus the occasion of harmful security and, arising from it, of negligence and sloth would be taken away from us.’”

This negligence and sloth of ours is the cause placed first of the barrenness of our mind. Hence Daniel himself afterward sets down a threefold state of souls: carnal, animal, and spiritual, which the Apostle identifies in the Epistle to the Corinthians.

For concerning the carnal person he says, “I gave you milk to drink, not food; for you were not yet able. For you are carnal.” And again: “While there are jealousy and contentions among you, are you not carnal?”

Concerning the animal person he says, “The animal man does not perceive the things that are of God, for it is foolishness to him.” Concerning the spiritual person he says, “The spiritual man examines all things.”

A man is called carnal who is devoted to pleasures and the other vices of secular persons. He is called animal who, having left the world and been withdrawn from carnal commingling, gives himself over to sloth and negligence, subject to various passions and to affections even for worthless things, and does not tend toward perfection. He is spiritual who, fervently exercising himself in advancement in every virtue and fervently panting toward the summit of perfection, subjects his passions and disordered affections.

Daniel therefore says that, when through renunciation we have ceased to be carnal—that is, have begun to be separated from the manner of life of secular persons and have ceased from that manifest pollution of the flesh—we must hasten and strive with all our strength immediately to apprehend the spiritual state.

Otherwise, perhaps, flattering ourselves because we seem to have renounced this world according to the outward man, or to have left the contagions of carnal fornications, as though for this reason we had apprehended the summit of perfection, we may thereafter be rendered more remiss and sluggish toward cleansing the other passions; and, detained between the two states, we may be unable to attain the degree of spiritual advancement, thinking it abundantly sufficient for us that in respect of the outward man we appear to be separated from the conduct and pleasures of this world.

Thus we shall know that in that lukewarm state, which is judged the worst, we are to be vomited from the Lord's mouth according to his sentence: "Would that you were hot or cold. But because you are neither hot nor cold, but lukewarm, I shall begin to vomit you from my mouth."

He is called cold who is carnal, namely, devoted to secular vices, or a gentile. He is called hot who, kindled by the ardor of the Spirit, tends as a spiritual man toward the summit of perfection. He is lukewarm who, having entered the road of perfection as one who has professed the monastic state according to the rule of discipline, has once withdrawn from that fire of spiritual fervor.

The danger of such a man is shown by this comparison. Whatever is cold, when taken even into our mouth, is changed into warmth and is received with salutary sweetness. But that which has once been cast out because of the vice of a harmful lukewarmness we are unable—not only to apply to our lips, but even to behold from afar—without immense horror.

Therefore it is most correctly declared that the lukewarm man is worse than the cold, because a carnal man, namely a secular person or a gentile, approaches salutary conversion more easily. But the lukewarm man, who entered upon the road of religious profession and has once been infected by his negligence and torpor and in a certain way dissolved in them, neither afterward savors perfect things nor will he thereafter be able to be instructed by admonition.

For he says in his heart, "I am rich and need no one." To him that which follows is applied: "And you do not know that you are wretched and pitiable, poor, blind, and naked."

John Cassian also sets down from Daniel's sayings the conflict of the flesh and the spirit from those words of the Apostle: "The flesh desires against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, so that you do not do whatever things you wish." He declares three things: what the concupiscence of the flesh is, what the concupiscence of the spirit is, and what the will placed between them is.

He says that by "flesh" is understood not man or the substance of man, but the will or appetite of the flesh and its worst desires; just as by "spirit" is understood not a substantial thing, but the good and spiritual desires of the soul.

Since both, that is, the desires of the flesh and of the spirit, are in one and the same man, an internal war is waged within us daily. The concupiscence of the flesh is carried headlong toward the vices and rejoices in the delights that pertain to present repose. The concupiscence of the spirit so opposes these things that it desires to adhere wholly to spiritual pursuits and wishes to exclude even the necessary uses of the flesh; thus it continually desires to be occupied with them and wishes to bestow no care at all upon the flesh's frailty.

The flesh delights in wantonness and lust; the spirit does not acquiesce even in natural desires. The flesh desires to be satiated with sleep and filled with food; the spirit is so fattened upon vigils and fasts that it would not wish to admit sleep and food even for the necessary use of life. The flesh desires to abound in all supplies; the spirit desires to be constricted by the daily sustenance of a little bread. The spirit rejoices in solitude and flees men; the flesh is cherished by the glory and honor of men.

Between both these concupiscences the will of the soul stands in a certain more blameworthy middle place, neither delighted by the disgraceful acts of the vices nor acquiescing in the pains of virtues. It seeks to be so restrained from carnal passions that it by no means wishes to sustain the necessary pains without which the desires of the spirit cannot be possessed.

It desires to obtain chastity of body without chastisement of the flesh; purity of heart without the labor of vigils; to abound in spiritual virtues together with the repose of the flesh; to possess patience without insults and humility without loss of honor. Finally, it so prefers to obtain future goods that it does not lose present ones.

This will would never cause us to come to true perfection, but would place us in a certain worst lukewarmness. For when, serving this will of ours, we wish gradually to relax ourselves into this remissness, immediately the goads of the flesh rise up and, wounding us with their vices and passions, by no means permit us to stand in that quality of purity in which we delight, but drag us onto a cold road of pleasures, full of thorns.

Again, if, kindled by fervor of spirit and wishing to extinguish the works of the flesh, we attempt to bear our whole selves away into immoderate pursuits of the virtues through elation of heart, without any consideration for human frailty, the weakness of the flesh intervenes and recalls and restrains us from that blameworthy excess of spirit.

This contention between the two excludes that more harmful will of the soul and places, as it were, a balance of equity in the scales of our body, which distinguishes the boundaries of spirit and flesh by a just examination.

While this conflict is usefully stirred up in us every day, we are compelled to come salutarily to a fourth thing that we do not wish: namely, that we should seek purity of heart not through leisure, security, and repose, but through continual sweat and contrition of spirit. Thus, when this slothful security that we desire has been drawn away from us and the labors and pursuits of virtues have been called forth, the best middle balance is maintained; and so, with a suitable moderation joined to diligent labor, one advances along the road of perfection, so that one may be truly spiritually hot, not carnally cold nor animally lukewarm.

The fifth conference is that of Serapion concerning the assault of the eight vices.

John Cassian says:

“In that gathering of elders there was a man named Serapion, adorned from his earliest age with the grace of discernment. When we entreated him to discuss something concerning the assault of the vices, whereby their origins and causes might be disclosed more clearly, he began thus:

“‘There are eight principal vices that assail the human race. These, as he says below, are figured by the eight nations that the children of Israel defeated in the land of promise: the Hittite, the Hivite, the Amorite, the Girgashite, the Perizzite, the Jebusite, the Canaanite, and Egypt; and by the seven spirits which the unclean spirit takes with him when entering the empty house, according to the Gospel.

“‘The operation of these vices is fourfold. Certain of them cannot be consummated without carnal action, such as gluttony and lust. Certain others are fulfilled without any action of the body, such as pride and vainglory, that is, empty glory. Some receive the causes of their agitation from outside, such as avarice and anger. Others are aroused by internal movements, such as sadness and acedia.

“‘Although these eight vices have diverse origins and dissimilar operations, they are nevertheless joined to one another by a certain kinship and chaining together, so that the abundance of the preceding vice becomes the beginning of the one that follows. For fornication must spring from an abundance of castrimargia, that is, gluttony; philargyria, that is, avarice, from fornication; anger from avarice; sadness from anger; and acedia from sadness.

“‘Therefore one must fight against them in a similar manner and by the same reasoning, and we must always enter the contests against those that follow by beginning with those that precede. For the harmful breadth or height of any tree dries up more easily if the roots upon which it rests have first been exposed or cut away.

“‘Therefore, for acedia to be conquered, sadness must be cut away; for sadness to be expelled, anger must be excluded; and so with the others.

“‘The remaining two are indeed joined to one another by a similar account, for an abundance of vainglory produces the tinder of pride. But they are completely separated from the seven preceding vices [read: the six preceding vices] and are not allied with them in a similar association. For when those vices have been plucked out, these two bear fruit more violently and, upon their death, sprout and grow more vigorously. For pride and empty glory assail the mind because of its victory over the vices and because of its good works.

“‘The manner of overcoming is also different in its method. For, in regard to the carnal vices, it is very helpful to those pursuing purity that they first remove from themselves the very materials of the carnal passions, by which either the occasion or the recollection of the same passions can be generated in a soul that is still sick.

“‘For a twofold cure must be applied to a twofold sickness. So that concupiscence may not break forth into effect in the body, the enticing appearance and material must necessarily be removed. And, likewise, so that the soul may not conceive it even in thought, more attentive meditation upon the Scriptures, vigilant solicitude, and the seclusion of solitude must usefully be applied.

“‘In the other vices, however, human companionship is no hindrance; indeed, it contributes very much to those who truly desire to be without them, because in the frequent company of men they are more greatly reproved and, while they are manifested more frequently when provoked, they arrive more swiftly at health through medicine.’”

Now the individual vices must be discussed.

There are three kinds of castrimargia. The first is that which presses a monk to hasten to food before the appointed hour. The second is that which rejoices in filling the belly and in voracity for any foods whatsoever. The third is that which desires more carefully prepared and more delicate foods.

There are three kinds of fornication or lust. The first is that which is accomplished through the mingling of both sexes. The second is that which occurs without the touch of a woman, on account of which Er [read: Onan], son of the patriarch Judah, is read to have been struck by the Lord; this is called uncleanness. The third is that which is conceived in soul and mind, according to the saying, “Whoever looks upon a woman to desire her has already committed adultery in his heart.”

There are three kinds of philargyria. The first does not permit those renouncing the world to be stripped of riches and possessions. The second persuades us to take back, with greater desire, the things that have been dispersed and given to the poor. The third compels us to desire and acquire the things we do not possess.

There are three kinds of anger. One blazes inwardly. Another breaks forth into word, deed, and effect. The third is not merely hot for an hour but is preserved for days and periods of time.

There are two kinds of sadness. One is generated when anger has ceased, or from a loss inflicted, or from a desire that has been impeded. The other descends from an irrational anxiety of mind or from despair.

There are two kinds of acedia. One casts those who are fevered headlong into sleep. The other encourages one to abandon and flee the cell.

Although vainglory is divided into diverse species, there are nevertheless two kinds of it. The first is that by which we are exalted over manifest carnal things. The second is that by which we are inflamed with the desire of empty glory over spiritual and hidden things.

Yet vainglory is usefully assumed by beginners in one matter: when a man is tempted by the vice of lust, since that vice takes away a man’s reputation, vainglory especially urges him to overcome that vice, lest by committing it he lose the praises of men.

There are two kinds of pride. One is carnal, by which a man exalts himself over riches, parentage, or some external thing. The second is spiritual and more harmful, when a person is exalted over his virtues and merits. This attacks especially those who appear to have advanced in virtues.

Daniel speaks [read: Serapion speaks] concerning the manner of defeating these vices:

“Therefore battles against them must be undertaken by us in such a manner that each person, examining the vice by which he is most greatly assailed, undertakes a special contest against it; fixes every care and solicitude of his mind upon assaulting and observing it; directs against it the daily darts of fasts; at every moment hurls against it the weapons of sighs of the heart and frequent groans; expends against it the labors of vigils and the meditation of his heart; and pours forth to God continual weeping in prayers, continually asking for its extinction.

“For it is impossible for anyone to obtain any triumph over any passion before he has understood that he cannot possess victory in the contest by his own effort or labor; although, in order that he may be cleansed, it is necessary for him to remain day and night in every care and solicitude.

“And when he perceives that he has been freed from that vice, let him again search the recesses of his heart for the passion which he perceives to be more savage than the others; and let him bring together against it all his spiritual arms, as has been said. Thus, when the stronger enemies have been overcome, he will have a swift and easy victory over those that remain, just as happens in bodily wars.”

Nevertheless, it must not be thought that someone who fights principally against one vice, and who, as though incautious, watches the darts of the others, can be wounded more easily by an unexpected blow. This will by no means happen. For it is impossible that one who, solicitous for the cleansing of his heart, has armed himself with focused attention against the assault of any one vice should not also possess a certain general horror and similar vigilance against the other vices. Nevertheless, let him never trust in his own strength.

Cassian also declares in the said conference that Christ, as the Apostle says, was tempted without sin, that is, without the carnal assault of lust.

Just as the first and earthly Adam was tempted in paradise by the ancient serpent concerning gluttony, when it said, “On whatever day you eat from it”; concerning pride, when it added, “You shall be as gods”; and concerning avarice, when it joined, “Knowing good and evil,” because avarice in a broad sense also includes a disordered appetite for knowing; so also the second and heavenly Adam, Christ, was tempted in the desert by the devil.

But Christ conquered concerning gluttony when the devil said, “Command that these stones become bread”; concerning pride, when it said, “Cast yourself down”; and concerning avarice, when it said, “All these things I will give you,” and so forth.

Those seven nations signifying the capital vices are said to be more numerous than the children of Israel because there are more vices than virtues, since the virtues have two extremes through excess and defect; whence also many other vices can proceed from them, which are called their daughters.

Those nations are also called stronger because, after the Fall, the delight of the carnal passions fights more powerfully in our members than the pursuits of spiritual virtues, which are acquired only through the greatest contrition of heart and body. These matters, however, are treated more fully and perfectly in the second part.

Section V

The sixth conference is that of Theodore. It treats of the prosperous and adverse things of this world and of the causes of God’s scourges.

John Cassian says:

“In the regions of Palestine near Tekoa there is an exceedingly vast solitude. In it monks of the highest sanctity, who had dwelt there for a very long time, were suddenly killed by bands of Saracen brigands running about. Their bodies were afterward eagerly taken up with great veneration by people from neighboring cities.

“Saddened by this, therefore, we went to Saint Theodore. When we poured out a complaint to him concerning the slaughter of the aforesaid men, wondering why God had permitted so great a crime against his saints, he answered:

“‘This question is accustomed to move the minds of those who, possessing little faith or knowledge, believe that the merits of the saints, or the rewards that are stored up for the future, are repaid in the brevity of this life.

“‘Therefore it must be known that all the things which exist in this world are three: good, evil, and intermediate. In human affairs nothing is principally good except virtue of the soul, and nothing is evil except sin.

“‘Intermediate things are those which can be directed toward either side according to the affection and judgment of the one using them: such as riches, power, honor, strength, health, beauty, life, death, poverty, sickness, injuries, and things similar to these. According to the quality and affection of the one using them, they can contribute either to the good side or to the evil.

“‘Therefore, when death has been inflicted upon a holy man, it must not be believed that evil has been inflicted upon him, but a certain intermediate thing, which, although evil for a sinner, becomes rest and release from evils for a just man.

“‘Nor will any impious or unjust person therefore be unpunished because his malice was unable to harm the just man. For the endurance and virtue of the just man does not profit unto reward the one who inflicted death or punishments, but the one who patiently received the things inflicted upon him.

“‘The patience of Job did not bring a reward to the devil; nor will Judas be given immunity from punishment because his betrayal contributed to the salvation of the human race. For the outcome of the work must not be considered, but the affection of the one doing it.

“‘We know that for those who love God all things work together unto good: not only things that are prosperous but also those that are thought adverse. For it belongs to the same virtue both to endure sadness bravely and to moderate favorable things. It is most certain that one who is overcome in either of these can bear neither of them.

“‘Nevertheless, one can be crushed more easily by prosperity than by adversity. For adversities sometimes restrain and humble even the unwilling and, through most salutary compunction, cause them either to sin less or to be amended. Prosperous things, however, through soft and harmful flatteries that exalt the mind, cast down those who are secure in the outcomes of their happiness with a greater fall.

“‘These, therefore, are ambidextrous persons, like that Ehud in the Book of Judges who used each hand as a right hand. We too shall be able to possess this virtue intellectually if we cause both the things considered prosperous and right-handed and the things that are adverse and called left-handed to incline, through good and right use, toward the right-hand side, so that whatever things are inflicted upon us may become weapons of justice, according to the Apostle.

“‘I would rightly call Joseph ambidextrous. In prosperity he is found more pleasing to his father, more dutiful to his brothers, and more acceptable to God; in adversity, chaste, faithful to the Lord, most gentle to his fellow prisoners, forgetful of injuries, and beneficent to his enemies.’”

When Germanus asked whether our mind can continually retain one state and always persist in the same quality, Theodore answered:

“According to the Apostle it is necessary that a person either advance each day, renewed in the spirit of his mind and always stretching himself toward the things that are before him, or, if he has been negligent, it follows that he goes backward and slips again into a worse condition.

“Therefore this will be an evident indication of loss in us: if we understand that we have acquired nothing more. Let us not doubt that we have been recalled backward in every respect on the day when we have not perceived that we advanced to higher things, because the human mind cannot continually remain in the same state. It is necessary either that something be added to the virtues or that something be diminished.

“In no creature can there be such perfection that it is not subject to mutability or suffering. For we confess that God alone is immutable.

“Therefore no virtue can be immovably possessed by a human being. Rather, for an acquired virtue to be retained, it must continually be guarded with the same diligence and effort by which it was acquired.

“A person who has fallen must by no means be believed to have collapsed through a sudden ruin. He was either deceived from the beginning by an evil formation or, through prolonged negligence of mind, gradually declined as the virtue of his soul diminished, according to the saying, ‘He who neglects the smallest things gradually falls away.’”

Concerning the causes of scourges he says thus:

“Although we said that temptation in affairs is twofold, namely, in prosperous and adverse things, nevertheless it must be known that all men are tempted or afflicted for three reasons.” To these three he afterward adds three other reasons, as is evident.

For this often occurs because of testing, sometimes because of correction, and at other times because of the deserts of offenses.

As regards the first, namely, testing, there are examples in Job, Tobias, Abraham, and many others, according to that saying of Deuteronomy: “You shall remember all your journey by which he led you for forty years, so that he might afflict and test you,” and so forth.

As regards the second, namely, cleansing, this occurs when God, humbling his just ones for slight and trivial sins or for pride in their purity, hands them over to various temptations in the present so that he may transmit pure, true gold to the future examination, according to the saying, “Like gold the Lord tested them”; and in the psalm, “Many are the tribulations of the just”; and the saying, “Do not neglect the discipline of the Lord, nor fail when you are corrected by him. For the Lord corrects the one whom he loves”; and the Apostle, “If you are outside discipline, then you are adulterers and not sons.” There is an example in Paul, who was struck by the devil.

As regards the third, for the deserts of sins, there is the saying of the psalm, “Many are the scourges of the sinner”; and the Lord says to the infirm man healed at the pool, “Behold, you have been made well; sin no more, lest something worse happen to you.”

We also find a fourth reason, which exists solely for manifesting the glory of God. We know that certain sufferings have been sent upon some persons for this purpose, as in the man born blind, concerning whom Christ, when asked the cause of his blindness, said, “That the works of God may be manifested in him”; and concerning the dead Lazarus he said, “This infirmity is not unto death, but for the glory of God.”

There are also other kinds of vengeance by which certain persons who have passed beyond the fullness of malice are struck in the present, namely, to begin here the commencement of their damnation, as Antiochus and Herod were struck, and Dathan and Abiram were swallowed by the earth. This accords with the saying of Jeremiah: “I struck them, and they did not grieve; I ground them down, and they refused to receive discipline”; and with that saying of Deuteronomy: “A fire has been kindled in my fury and will burn unto the lowest depths of hell.”

We are not ignorant of other causes of corrections, that is, punishments: when these are inflicted not to expiate the sins of those punished, but for the amendment and fear of the living. Examples are evident in Jeroboam, Ahab, Jezebel, and men of this kind, so that by the example of their punishment fear might be instilled and, through this lesson of severity, it might be recognized that the divine majesty is not careless of human affairs and daily dispensation.

Section VI

The seventh conference is that of Serenus concerning the nobility of the soul and spiritual wickednesses, that is, demons.

John Cassian says:

“Above all others we admired with singular veneration Abbot Serenus, a man of the highest sanctity and continence and a mirror of his own name. In addition to all the virtues which, by God’s grace, shone forth not only in his acts and conduct but even in his countenance, the gift of chastity had been infused into him by a particular benefit.

“Thus he perceived that he was no longer troubled even by the natural incitements themselves in repose or in sleep, nor was he thereafter struck by that simple and natural movement that is aroused even in little children. He obtained this through the internal chastity of the heart, prayers, and fasts, by the spiritual grace of God.

“For an angel came in a nocturnal vision and, as though opening his abdomen, tore a certain fiery swelling of the flesh from his entrails and cast it away, restoring all his internal organs to their places as they had been. ‘Behold,’ he said, ‘the incitements of your flesh have been cut away, and know that on this day you have obtained the perpetual purity of heart that you faithfully sought.’

“When he asked us concerning the quality of our thoughts and the state of the interior man, or what the habitation of the desert for so long a time had contributed to their purity, we addressed him with these complaints:

“‘The calculation of the times and the habitation of solitude have contributed this alone to us: that we have learned what we are unable to be. And what has it profited to learn what is highest if, after it is known, it cannot be apprehended?

“‘For when we have perceived the direction of the heart to extend toward its destined contemplation, our mind, having insensibly rolled back to its former wanderings, slides down with a more violent impulse.

“‘We are consequently led to this opinion of despair: that we believe these wanderings of the soul to belong to the human race not now through our own fault but through a defect of nature.’”

To these things Serenus answered:

“‘It belongs to dangerous presumption to define precipitately the nature of any matter when the issues have not yet been rightly examined, and to draw a conjecture from the consideration of one’s own weakness rather than to offer a judgment concerning the state and quality of the discipline itself or from the experience of others.

“‘For if someone ignorant of swimming, knowing that the liquid of the waters cannot bear the weight of his body, wished from the experience of his own lack of skill to define that no one surrounded by solid flesh can be sustained at all upon the liquid element, his opinion must not therefore be judged true because it appeared to him to have been derived according to his own experience.

“‘Accordingly, the mind is defined by the Greeks as “always mobile” and “very mobile.” By the condition of its nature, therefore, it can never stand idle. Unless it has something provided in which it may exercise its movements and with which it may continually be occupied, it must range about by its own mobility and fly through all things, until, made accustomed by long exercise and use, it learns around what materials it should circle in flight.

“‘Thus it may prevail to exclude the suggestions of the enemy by which it was being drawn away and to endure in the state and quality it desires.

“‘If, therefore, fighting manfully against disturbances and vices, we shall have been able to subject them to our authority and discernment, or to subjugate the unstable cohort of our thoughts beneath the command of reason, we shall be raised, by the merit of so many triumphs, to the rank of the spiritual centurion of the Gospel.

“‘Commanding evil suggestions to go, they will go; commanding good suggestions to come, they will come. To our servant also, that is, the body, we shall enjoin the things that pertain to chastity, and it will serve without contradiction, displaying every service to the spirit.

“‘Let us not be broken from the intention of this observance by harmful despair, because the kingdom of heaven suffers violence. For no virtue is perfected without labor, nor is it possible for anyone to ascend without immense exercise to that stability of mind which we desire, so that he may arrive at a perfect man, unto the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ.

“‘The Apostle describes the weapons of this spiritual centurion as not carnal: “In all things taking up the shield of faith, with which you can extinguish all the fiery darts of the enemy”; “put on the breastplate of justice,” which joins all the virtues to one another and is formed by charity; “and take up the helmet of salvation,” namely, of hope; “and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God.”

“‘Thus, desiring only one thing, doing one thing, and always directing toward one thing not only all his acts but also his thoughts, he may already hold in the present as a pledge that which is said concerning the blessed manner of life of the saints in the future: that God may be all in all.

“‘Those who have experienced the conflict of the interior man cannot doubt that our adversaries continually lie in wait for us. But we say that they oppose our advancement in such a manner that we believe them to be only inciters of evils, not also impellers. Otherwise no human being could entirely avoid sin if they had the power to compel just as they have the power to suggest.

“‘Therefore, just as the opportunity of instigation is in them, so the strength of rejection or the freedom of consent has been attributed to us.

“‘Although we fear their assaults and power, let us also set against them, on the contrary, the protections and assistance of God. For “greater is he who is in us than he who is in the world,” says John. His assistance fights for us with a power much more vehement than that with which their multitude contends against us.

“‘For God is not merely the suggester of good things, but also their maker and impeller, to such a degree that sometimes he draws even us who are unwilling and ignorant to salvation.

“‘It is therefore established that no one can be deceived by the devil except the person who gives assent to him. Hence Solomon in Ecclesiastes says: “For because a contradiction”—our translation says “sentence”—“is not quickly pronounced against the wicked, the hearts of the children of men are filled with evils,” that is, with sins.’”

Germanus said: “What, I ask, is this indiscriminate and intermingled fellowship of the soul with these wicked spirits, such that they are able not only to be joined, but united to it; to address it insensibly; to insert and inspire into it whatever things they wish; to have power to instigate it toward the things that please them; and to see and examine its thoughts and movements?”

To these things Serenus answered:

“It is not wonderful that spirit can be joined insensibly to spirit and exercise a hidden power of persuasion toward whatever things it pleases. For between them, as between human beings, there is a certain likeness and kinship of substance.

“But that they should be inserted into or united with one another in such a manner that one could be wholly capable of containing the other is utterly impossible. For this is most rightly attributed only to the deity, which alone is an incorporeal and simple nature.

“Nor is that which we see occur in demoniacs contrary to this definition, when those seized by unclean spirits speak or do the things they do not wish, or when they are compelled to utter things they do not know; although some who are thus inspired know and afterward remember them.

“It must not be thought that this occurs through an infusion of the unclean spirit in such a manner that it penetrates the substance of the soul itself and, united with it and somehow clothed in it, emits speech and words through the sufferer’s mouth. It must by no means be believed that this can be done by them.

“For it is manifestly understood that this happens not through any diminution of the soul but through weakness of the body. The unclean spirit settles in those members in which the vigor of the soul is contained and, imposing an unbearable and immense weight upon them with the foulest darkness, overwhelms and intercepts its intellectual senses. We see that this also sometimes happens through the supervening disorder of wine or fever.

“For even if a spirit is mingled with this gross and solid matter, that is, the flesh—which can happen very easily—it is not therefore to be believed that it can be so united to the soul, which is likewise spirit, as to render the soul similarly capable of containing its nature. This is possible to God alone.

“The Trinity, which is thus the penetrator of every intellectual nature, is of such a kind that it is able not only to encompass and encircle such natures but also to enter into them and to be infused into an incorporeal nature as though into a body.

“For although we declare that certain natures are spiritual, such as angels, archangels, and the other powers, and also our own soul or indeed this subtle air, they must nevertheless by no means be considered incorporeal. For, according to themselves, they possess a body in which they subsist, although it is much subtler than our bodies, according to that saying of the Apostle: ‘There are heavenly bodies and earthly bodies.’

“From these things it is evident that nothing is incorporeal except God. The divine nature alone can penetrate all spiritual and intellectual substances, because it alone, and wholly, is everywhere and in all things. Thus it views and examines the thoughts of men, their interior movements, and all the hidden things of the mind.”

Concerning how demons know the thoughts of men, Serenus says:

“No one doubts that unclean spirits can touch the qualities of our thoughts, but they gather them from perceptible indications outside: either from our dispositions, from our words, or from the pursuits toward which they have observed that we are more strongly inclined.

“But they are entirely unable to enter the thoughts that have not yet come forth from the interior of the soul. And whether the thoughts that they suggest have been received, or in what manner they have been received, they understand not through the soul’s own nature or through that interior movement lying hidden in its marrow, so to speak, but from the movements and indications of the outward man.

“For example, if they have suggested castrimargia, and if they see that a monk has raised his eyes more curiously toward a window or toward the sun, or has anxiously inquired concerning the hour; if the demon suggesting lust sees that he has been moved in the flesh or has gazed fixedly upon a woman; or if the one suggesting sadness or anger sees that he has sighed with a certain indignation or has changed his countenance to pallor or redness, they understand from these and similar indications.”

Different demons tempt concerning different passions and vices: one concerning lust, another concerning avarice; some punish with blasphemies, others with vainglory and pride.

And although it is a settled definition that among the evil there is no perpetual agreement in all things, nor can perfect concord stand even in the very vices in which they delight, nevertheless in certain matters, when either a partnership in the work or necessity demands it, or the fellowship of some gain invites it, they must lend one another temporary agreement.

We must by no means be ignorant that they are not all of the same ferocity and desire, nor indeed of one strength and wickedness. With beginners and the weak, only weaker spirits cooperate in the contest. When these spiritual wickednesses have been overcome, a stronger contest against the soldier of Christ always follows by degrees.

We believe, however, that they do not accomplish this struggle without their own labor. For in their own conflict they possess a certain anxiety and sadness, especially when they encounter stronger rivals, that is, perfect men. Hence the Apostle also calls it a wrestling. Elsewhere he says, “Thus I fight, not as one beating the air.”

As they rejoice when they overthrow us, according to that saying of the psalm, “Those who afflict me will exult if I am moved,” so they grieve when they are overthrown by us. Nor do they depart defeated without confusion, according to the saying, “Let those who seek my soul be confounded and put to shame.”

Demons do not tempt as grievously as formerly, and this for a twofold cause: either because of the power of the Cross, spread abroad and restraining them, or because human negligence has made them slower to attack, since otherwise they would not be able to conquer. As for persons who are handed over to Satan to be afflicted bodily by him, this occurs for the purgation of some sin, even a small one, as in Paul, a certain anchorite of great virtue.

From these things it is manifestly understood that we ought not to abhor or despise those whom we see handed over to various temptations or to these spirits of wickedness.

For we must believe these two things immovably. First, that without God’s permission no one is tempted or afflicted by them at all; there is an example in Job. Second, that all things which are brought upon us by God—whether they appear sad for the present or joyful—are brought by a most devoted father and most merciful physician for our benefit.

Finally, Serenus also says that sacred communion is not to be denied to those afflicted by unclean spirits or to demoniacs.

Section VII

The eighth conference, which is also in the name of the aforesaid elder Serenus, follows. After the completion of a certain solemnity, Serenus received the aforesaid John Cassian and Germanus as they returned to him from the religious men of that region, and refreshed them very sparingly, but most lavishly in relation to their custom. When the refreshment was finished, he began thus:

“Divine Scripture is very appropriately compared to a rich and fertile field. Although it generates and brings forth many things which are suitable for human food without any cooking by fire, yet there are some things which, unless they have first been tempered by the heat of flame and softened, and have laid aside all the harshness of their rawness, are found either unsuitable for human uses or harmful.

“Some things, however, are known to be suited to either use, so that neither do they displease or harm when uncooked because of their rawness, and yet, when cooked by the heat of fire, they are rendered more wholesome. But many things are brought forth only for the food of beasts of burden, wild beasts, or birds, and will be of no profit for the food of men.

“We perceive quite plainly that this principle is contained in the most abundant paradise of the Scriptures. In it certain things shine forth with so plain and clear a meaning of the letter that they do not need a more sublime interpretation, but abundantly feed and nourish their hearers by the simple sound of the letter alone, as in this saying: ‘Hear, O Israel: the Lord your God is one,’ and so forth; and this saying: ‘You shall love the Lord your God,’ and so forth.

“But there are certain things from whose apprehension harm rather than any benefit will follow unless they have been attenuated by allegorical explanation and softened by the testing of spiritual fire, as, for example, this saying: ‘He who does not have a sword, let him sell his tunic and buy one’; and this saying: ‘He who does not take up his cross is not worthy of me.’ Certain most rigorous monks, who indeed had zeal for God but not according to knowledge, understood this simply and made wooden crosses for themselves. By carrying these about continually, they occasioned not edification but laughter in those who saw them.

“There are also certain things that are taken so suitably according to both apprehensions—that is, both the historical and the allegorical—that either explanation supplies vital juices to the soul, as in this saying: ‘If anyone strikes you on the right cheek,’ and so forth.

“It also certainly produces hay for beasts of burden, namely, the simple and pure narration of history, by which all the more simple are rendered more vigorous and robust for the labor of the active life.”

No one among the faithful doubts that, before the creation of this visible creation, God made the spiritual and heavenly powers, that is, the angels, who, because they knew that by the beneficence of the Creator they had been brought from nothing to so great a glory of beatitude, rendered perpetual thanks to him and adhered unceasingly to his praises.

The lamentation of Ezekiel or Isaiah teaches that some princes from their number were fallen. From the indications by which it is gathered that the adverse powers are said to possess these distinctions after the likeness of the holy and heavenly powers, it must be held either that they still retain them from the rank of that order in which each one had been created, or certainly that, after they had been cast down from the heavens, they claimed among themselves, on the contrary side and in the likeness of those powers which persevered there, these ranks and the names of orders according to the degree of their wickedness, in which each one grew in evil.

For they do not cease likewise to exercise, in an unwearied contest, discords and conflicts over certain nations which they have assumed for themselves through a certain native affinity of wickedness. This also we read to have been figured in Daniel’s vision concerning the prince of the Persians and the prince of the Greeks opposing one another.

From these things it is clearly foreseen that the adverse powers also exercise against one another the discords, conflicts, and rivalries of nations which the nations conduct among themselves at their instigation; that they either rejoice in the victory of those nations or are tormented by their diminution; and that for this reason they cannot be concordant among themselves, while each one, with ever-restless rivalry, contends on behalf of those over whom he presides against the ruler of another nation.

That unclean spirits are ruled by more wicked powers and are subject to them is taught to us not only by that authority of the Lord, ‘If I cast out demons in Beelzebub, the prince of demons,’ and so forth, but also by many clear visions and experiences of the saints.

Serenus gives the example of a certain hermit who saw troops of demons, some going before and others following their prince, who was taller and more terrible than the rest. When they had assembled, that prince required from each one an account of the vices to which he had led men. He harshly rebuked those who had accomplished little evil, but extolled those who had accomplished much.

One of them reported that, after fifteen years during which he had tempted a certain holy hermit, he had at last led him into fornication. All praised him greatly and rejoiced.

There is another example concerning blessed Anthony. Certain persons, by magical arts, summoned stronger demons to induce him to depart from his place. Although he was much tempted, they nevertheless could not prevail.

That two angels adhere to each one of us, one good angel instigating us to good works and another evil angel inviting us to evil works, Serenus proves from the book of the Shepherd.

After the slaying of Abel, the descendants from the generation of Seth, who were sons of Adam, are called sons of God; and the descendants from Cain are called sons of men in Genesis. While they remained separated from one another, the sons of God, that is, the descendants from Seth, remained good. But when, conquered by lust, they mingled with the daughters of men, that is, with the descendants from Cain, they became evil; and those born from such a mingling were called giants, either because of the magnitude and strength of their bodies or because of the excellence of their wickedness and tyranny.

This is not to be understood in the manner in which certain persons have said that the angels who mingled with women are called the sons of God. For although demons are found as incubi, they nevertheless do not have semen from themselves. Rather, having first become succubi, they can receive the semen of a human man to whom they become succubi, and then, having become incubi, they transmit the man's semen to a woman to whom they become incubi.

Indeed, the Lord God gave to the first parent, Adam, the fullness of wisdom not only for knowing divine things but also for the knowledge of natural things. Hence he himself also imposed names upon all things, not only animals but also trees and herbs, so that he could say that saying of Wisdom: 'The Lord gave me knowledge of the things that are.' Through the successions of generations, the seed of Seth received this knowledge by paternal tradition.

But when, in the course of time, the seed of Seth had been mingled with the impious generation of Cain, by the instigation of demons it diverted the things which it had piously learned from divine and lawful matters to profane and harmful matters. That generation boldly instituted curious and harmful arts of sorceries, divinations, and magical superstitions, teaching its descendants that, after abandoning that sacred worship of the divine name, they should venerate and worship either the elements, such as fire, or aerial demons.

Moreover, as ancient traditions relate, Ham the son of Noah was instructed in these superstitions, sacrileges, and magical arts. Knowing that he could by no means bring into the ark, in which he was to remain with his father Noah and his other brothers, any book preserving such arts and profane inventions, he engraved them upon plates of various metals, which the inundation of the waters could not corrupt, and upon the hardest stones. When the flood was past, seeking with the same curiosity the things that he had concealed, he transmitted to his descendants a seedbed of sacrileges and perpetual wickedness.

Thus the sons of Seth, at the instigation of lust and because of the beauty of the daughters of men—that is, of those descending from Cain—transgressed that commandment which the Lord afterward commanded in the Law, saying: 'You shall not give your daughter as a wife to his son, nor shall you take from their daughters for your son, because they will seduce your hearts so that you depart from your God,' and so forth.

For although the Mosaic Law, which expressly prohibits this—namely, marriages with unbelieving nations—had not yet been given, they nevertheless possessed this from natural law. But because that natural law had been obscured in their hearts by the sins that supervened, so that they did not know how to read in it, God afterward gave the written Law through Moses, so that by it, as it were, they might recall the natural law, which contains at least all moral precepts.

When God says concerning the devil, 'He is a liar and the father of it,' this is not understood to mean that the devil has a father, but that the devil is not only a liar but also the father of lying, because he was the first creature to speak a lie: in his heart, when he said, 'I shall be like the Most High'; and to the first parents, when, speaking in the serpent with a human voice, he said, 'You shall be as gods.'

Section VIII

The ninth conference is that of Abbot Isaac, concerning prayer and its kinds. John Cassian says from the words of Isaac:

"The end of every monk and the perfection of his heart tends toward continual and uninterrupted perseverance in prayer. Insofar as it is granted to human frailty, it strives toward an immovable tranquility of mind and perfect purity. For the possession of this we unweariedly seek and continually exercise both the labor of the body and the contrition of the spirit. Between the two there is a certain reciprocal and inseparable conjunction.

"Therefore, so that prayer may be emitted with the fervor and purity with which it ought to be, first the solicitude for carnal things must be cut off generally. Then no care for any business or cause whatsoever—not even its memory—is to be admitted at all. Once the vices have been expelled and wholly cut away, the unshaken foundations of profound humility must first be laid, so that they may be able to sustain the tower that is to strike the heavens. Next, the spiritual structure of the virtues must be placed upon them, and the soul must be restrained from every wandering course and slippery roaming.

"For whatever our soul has conceived before the hour of prayer must necessarily occur to us as we pray through the instigation of recollection. Therefore we must prepare ourselves before the time of prayer to be such as we wish to be found when praying. For the mind is formed in supplication from its preceding state.

"Thus our mind will not be able to fulfill that apostolic command, namely, 'Pray without interruption,' and, 'In every place lifting up pure hands without anger and dispute,' unless our mind, purified from every contagion of the vices and devoted to the virtues alone as though to its natural goods, is fed by the continual contemplation of almighty God.

"For the quality of the soul is not inappropriately compared to a very fine feather or the lightest plume. If these have not been damaged or soaked by the corruption of some moisture falling upon them from without, then, by the mobility of their substance and with the aid of the slightest breath, they are naturally borne up to the heights and the heavens. But if they have been weighed down by an infusion of any moisture, they will not be able to fly, but will be pressed down to the lowest parts of the earth by the weight of that moisture.

“So also our mind, if it has not been burdened by vices and worldly cares, is raised up, as though by the benefit of its natural purity, and is borne aloft to the things above by the lightest breath of spiritual meditation. Hence the Lord also says in the Gospel: ‘Take heed lest your hearts be weighed down with surfeiting and drunkenness and the cares of this world,’ and so forth; ‘but pray,’ and so forth.

“Although these three things burden the soul, separate it from God, and press it down toward earthly things, nevertheless their avoidance is easy for those who dwell in the desert. But there is another spiritual surfeiting, drunkenness, and secular solicitude, concerning which the Lord says through the prophet: ‘Awaken, you who are drunk, and not from wine.’ Spiritual surfeiting is the abundance of vices, and drunkenness is the dominion of the passions within us.

“According to the rule of the elders, they defined as worldly care and solicitude whatever exceeds the necessity of daily sustenance and the unavoidable use of the flesh. For example, if the earning of one solidus can satisfy the necessity of our body, and someone wishes to labor for the acquisition of two or three solidi; if two tunics suffice, and he wishes to have three or four; if one cell suffices, and yet he builds several: this occurs at the instigation of demons.

“Hence Isaac gives the example of a certain hermit whom another man saw the devil helping to break a rock so that he might make a larger cell for himself.

“I judge that all the kinds of prayers cannot be comprehended without immense purity of heart and soul and illumination by the Holy Spirit. For they are as many as the states and qualities that can be generated in one soul, or rather in all souls.

“It is most certain that prayers of one uniform kind cannot always be emitted by anyone. For a person supplicates in one way when he is cheerful; in another when sad or weighed down by the weight of despair; in another when he flourishes in spiritual successes; in another when he is pressed down by the mass of assaults; in another when he asks pardon for sins; in another when he requests the acquisition of grace or of any virtue, or entreats for the extinction of a vice; in another when he is pierced by consideration of Gehenna and fear of the future judgment; in another when he is inflamed by hope of future goods and rewards; in another when he is in necessity or dangers; and in another when he is in tranquility.

“Now, however, a difficulty lies before us: that we should expound one by one the very kinds of prayers which the Apostle distinguished in a fourfold division, saying, ‘I entreat first of all that supplications, prayers, petitions, and thanksgivings be made.’

“First it must be investigated what is signified by these. Second, it must be investigated whether one praying ought to observe all these things in one and the same prayer, or should take up the several different kinds in different prayers of that same person, or whether these various kinds are to be adopted by the different states of men—namely, supplication by one, prayer by another state, and so with the others. Third, it must be investigated whether the very order handed down successively by the Apostle is to be observed in these things.

“As to the first: supplication is an imploration for sins or a petition by which each person, pierced by compunction, entreats pardon either for present or for past offenses.

“Prayers are those by which we offer or vow something to God. Hence also what is said in Latin in the Psalm, ‘I shall render my vows to the Lord,’ is said in Greek, ‘I shall render my prayers to the Lord.’ Therefore we pray when, renouncing this world, we promise that, mortified to all the acts of the world, we shall serve the Lord with the whole intention of the heart. We pray when we promise that we shall perpetually exhibit the purest chastity of body and immovable patience.

“In the third place are set petitions, which, while we are established in fervor of spirit, we are also accustomed to emit for others, either for those dear to us or when asking for the peace of the whole world, when, according to the Apostle, we supplicate for all men, for kings, and for those who are established in high rank.

“In the fourth place are set thanksgivings. The mind is instigated to pour forth ineffable thanks to God with immense joy of spirit when it recalls the past benefits of God, when it contemplates present benefits, or when it contemplates for the future what things and how great God has prepared for those who love him.

“From these four kinds, occasions of abundant supplications are sometimes customarily generated. For from the kind of supplication which is born from compunction for sins; from the state of prayer which, because of purity of conscience, flows from confidence in one’s offerings and the completion of vices [read: the fulfillment of vows]; from the petition which proceeds from the ardor of charity; and from the thanksgiving which is generated by consideration of God’s benefits and his loving-kindness, we know that most fervent and fiery prayers are very often found.

“And all these kinds are found necessary and useful for all men, so that in one and the same man now a supplication, now a prayer, now a petition, and now a thanksgiving is emitted.

“Nevertheless, the first appears to pertain more particularly to beginners, who are still stung by the pricks and memory of their vices. The second pertains to those who, through spiritual progress and an appetite for the virtues, already stand in a certain sublimity of mind. The third pertains to those who, fulfilling the perfection of their vows, are provoked to intercede for others by consideration of their frailty and by the zeal of charity. The fourth pertains to those who, once the penal thorn of conscience has been torn from their hearts, now securely consider the munificence of the Lord and the mercies of the Lord which he bestows in the present, granted in the past, or prepares in the future, and are carried away with a most fervent heart into that fiery prayer.

“Christ leads us to this by his own example. For he made a supplication when he said, ‘Father, if it is possible, let this cup pass from me’; or that saying of the Psalm, ‘God, my God, look upon me.’ He made a prayer when he said, ‘I have glorified you upon the earth. I have consummated the work which you gave me to do.’ He made a petition when he said, ‘Father, forgive them,’ and so forth. He made a thanksgiving when he said, ‘I confess to you, Lord, Father of heaven and earth,’ and so forth.”

Thereafter Isaac expounds the seven petitions of the Lord’s Prayer, or the Our Father.

He also sets forth several origins of compunction by which the inflamed mind is incited to pure and most fervent prayers. For example, sometimes a verse of some psalm has provided us, as we chant, an occasion for fiery prayer; at other times, the melodious modulation of a brother’s voice; no less, the measured phrasing and gravity of the one chanting. Moreover, the exhortation of a perfect man and a spiritual conference have frequently raised the affection of those who lay prostrate to most abundant prayers. We know that by the death of a brother or of any dear person they were no less carried away to full compunction. The recollection of our torpor and negligence also sometimes induced a salutary ardor of spirit.

And there, subsequently, Isaac sets forth the manifold kind of tears or of compunction.

Concerning the causes assisting the hearing of prayer according to the diverse state of souls, Isaac says:

“You have the fruit of being heard in the agreement of two, in that saying of the Gospel: ‘If two of you agree,’ and so forth. You have another in the fullness of faith, in this saying: ‘If you have faith as a grain of mustard seed,’ and so forth. You also have it in the assiduity and perseverance of prayers, in this saying: ‘And if he shall persevere in knocking,’ and so forth. You have it also in the fruit of almsgiving, in this saying: ‘Enclose alms in the bosom of the poor, and it shall pray for you.’ You have it in the amendment of life, as in this saying: ‘Loose the bonds of impiety,’ and so forth. Sometimes an excess of tribulations causes a man to be heard. Nevertheless, we must not cease if we have not been heard immediately, but must persevere.”

The tenth conference is that of the aforesaid Isaac, likewise concerning prayer.

First John Cassian recounts the custom that was observed in Egypt, namely, that on the feast of Epiphany the feast of the Nativity of Christ and of his Baptism was celebrated. On that day the beginning of Lent and Easter—that is, on what day it would be—was then announced throughout all the churches.

Because there had arisen in the minds of simple persons an error that God possessed a body and bodily members like a man, from that authority of Genesis badly understood—namely, ‘Let us make man according to our image and likeness’—and because in diverse places of Scripture one also reads concerning the eyes, ears, feet, and face of the Lord, Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, refuted that error by many arguments, since God is wholly incorporeal and incomprehensible. He anathematized as heretics those who held that opinion, who are called Anthropomorphites.

Many of those hermits were held by that error because of their simplicity and rusticity, and especially a certain man of great reputation named Serapion, who had lived in the desert for fifty years with great rigor.

At last, when through the arguments of certain persons who had visited him he had been led out of the error, it was declared that the members of the Lord which sacred Scripture describes are understood spiritually, not materially. When they went together to the church to give thanks that he had abandoned that error, the elder was confounded in mind because he perceived that the bodily image of the deity which he had been accustomed to set before himself in prayer was being abolished from his heart. Prostrate upon the ground in most bitter weeping and repeated sobs, he cried out with a great wail: ‘Woe is me, wretched man! They have taken my Lord from me, and I now have no one whom I may hold; or whom I should adore or address, I do not know.’

Concerning this, John Cassian asks how that man had been held in such an error for so long. Isaac responds:

“It is not to be wondered at that a most simple man, who had never been at all instructed concerning the substance and nature of the deity, could until now have been held or deceived by the fault of rusticity and the custom of ancient error, and—to speak more truly—could have persisted in his former error. This is introduced not, as you think, by a recent illusion of demons, but by the ignorance of former paganism, when, according to the custom of that error by which it worshiped demons composed in human form, he now also judges that incomprehensible and ineffable majesty of the true light to be adored within the circumscription of some image, according to that saying of the Apostle: ‘They changed the glory of the incorruptible God into the likeness of the image of corruptible man.’

“Through lack of skill and rusticity, under the appearance of that testimony which says, ‘Let us make man according to our image and likeness,’ this error has also been contracted in the souls of those who were never polluted by pagan superstition. This error must be avoided as heresy and blasphemy.

“But each mind is elevated or formed in its prayer according to the measure of its purity: namely, it withdraws from contemplation of earthly and material things only to the degree that the state of its purity has advanced it, and has caused Jesus to be perceived by the inner gazes of the soul either as still humble and in the flesh or as glorified and coming in the glory of his majesty.”

Only those who ascend from humble and earthly works and thoughts and withdraw with him upon that lofty mountain of solitude contemplate his divinity with the purest eyes. That mountain, free from the tumult of all earthly thoughts and separated from the mingling of all vices, sublimated by the purest faith and the eminence of virtues, reveals the glory of his countenance and the image of his brightness to those who merit to behold him with the pure gazes of the soul.

Jesus is also seen by those who dwell in cities, fortified places, and villages—that is, those who are established in active conduct without works [read: and engaged in works]—but not in the brightness in which he appeared to those who are able to ascend with him upon the aforesaid mountain of virtues, namely, Peter, James, and John. Thus he also appeared to Moses in solitude and spoke to Elijah. The Lord himself also taught us by this example of his when he ascended the mountain alone to pray.

This, therefore, is the purpose of the solitary; this is the end of all perfection: that the mind, attenuated from every carnal disposition, should daily be elevated to spiritual things until all its conduct and every turning of its heart becomes one continual prayer.

For possessing the perpetual memory of God, this formula of piety must be inseparably set before us: ‘O God, incline unto my aid; O Lord, make haste to help me.’

This verse, excerpted from the instrument of the Scriptures, receives all the affections whatsoever that can be brought upon human nature, and it is quite properly and suitably adapted to every condition and to all assaults. Against all dangers it possesses an invocation of God; it possesses the humility of a pious confession; it possesses the vigilance of solicitude and perpetual fear; it possesses consideration of one’s frailty, confidence of being heard, and trust in assistance ever standing by; it possesses the ardor of love and charity; it possesses contemplation of miseries and fear of enemies.

“This verse,” Isaac says, “is found necessary and useful for each of us living in any age.” He then descends to the particular circumstances in which the prayer of this verse is to be spoken. Let its chanting and meditation be with you in prosperity, in adversity, in any work, when established upon a journey, when sleeping, when awakening from sleep, and when taking refreshment. This formula, made salutary for you, will not only preserve you unharmed from every assault of demons, but, purging you of all the vices of earthly contagion, will also conduct you to those invisible and heavenly contemplations and to the ineffable ardor of prayer.

Isaac also sets forth three things which make the wandering mind stable, namely, vigils, meditation, and prayer. Assiduity and continual intention in these things confer stable firmness upon the soul. This prayer, however, ought to be brief, although frequent, lest through more prolonged delays attention be dulled and vanish.

Section X

The eleventh conference treats of charity. John Cassian dedicated this and the six conferences following it, written together in one volume, to the bishops Honoratus and Eucherius. He entitled them to three fathers who dwelt in the Thebaid desert of Egypt, namely, Chaeremon, Nesteros, and Joseph, whom he asserts that he visited and with whom he conferred.

When John Cassian himself and the companion whom he calls Germanus came to a certain Egyptian town named Panephysis, Archebius, the bishop of that place, met them and, receiving them with much humanity, led them to the aforesaid fathers.

This Archebius had been made bishop there from the anchoritic company because of the sanctity which he had displayed for thirty-seven years. He relaxed nothing of the purpose and humility of his former life, asserting that, as though unworthy, he had been expelled from that discipline of the anchoritic life.

First he led them to Chaeremon, who was already a hundred years old and held his back so bent by the antiquity of time and the continuance of his prayers that, as though reduced to earliest infancy, he walked with his hands lowered and extended as far as the ground. Nevertheless, although all his members were now exhausted and mortified, he had not lost the rigor of his former strictness.

When asked by us to bring forth a discourse of edification, Chaeremon said thus:

“There are three things which cause men to restrain themselves from the vices: either fear of Gehenna or of the present laws; hope and desire for the kingdom of heaven; or affection for the good itself and love of the virtues.

“For fear is read to execrate the contagion of evil in this manner: ‘The fear of the Lord hates evil,’ says Scripture. Hope also excludes the assault of all vices: ‘For all who hope in him shall not sin,’ says the Psalmist. But love fears no ruin from vices, because ‘charity never falls,’ and ‘charity covers a multitude of sins.’

“Therefore the Apostle, enclosing the consummation of all the virtues, says, ‘Now there remain faith, hope, charity, these three.’ For faith is that which causes us, through fear of the future judgment and punishments, to decline the contagions of the vices. Hope, withdrawing our mind from present things, contemns all the pleasures of the body through expectation of heavenly rewards. Charity, which kindles us toward the love of Christ and the fruit of spiritual virtues with ardor of mind, causes us to detest with a complete hatred whatever is contrary to them.

“Although these three appear to tend toward one end, since they provoke us to abstain from unlawful things, they nevertheless are separated from one another by great degrees of their excellence. For the first two properly belong to those men who, tending toward perfection, have not yet conceived affection for the virtues. The third belongs especially to God and to those who have conceived within themselves the image and likeness of God.

“For he alone performs the things that are good when no fear and no favor of remuneration provokes him, but solely from affection for the good operation. ‘For God,’ says Solomon, ‘has wrought all things for himself.’ For with regard to his own goodness he bestows every abundance of good things upon the worthy and the unworthy, because he can neither be wearied by injuries nor be moved passibly by the iniquities of men, always remaining perfect goodness and an immutable nature.

“Therefore, if anyone tends toward perfection, he will ascend from that first degree of fear, which we have properly called servile, by a progressing step to the higher path of hope. This is now compared not to a servant but to a hireling, who awaits the wages of recompense. As though secure concerning absolution from sins and servile fear, and conscious of his own good works, he appears indeed to seek the reward of approval; nevertheless he has not been able to arrive at the affection of that son who, trusting in the freedom of paternal indulgence, does not doubt that all things which are his father’s are his own.

“The prodigal who had now lost the name of son together with his father’s substance does not dare to aspire to this degree, saying, ‘I am now no longer worthy to be called your son.’ For after those husks of swine, of which even satiety was denied him—that is, the filthy foods of the vices—because, returning to himself and pierced by salutary fear, he began to abhor the uncleanness of swine and feared to undergo the punishments of hunger, he was made as it were a servant. Now thinking also upon the condition of a hireling and desiring the wage, he said, ‘How many hirelings in my father’s house abound in bread, while I perish here with hunger. I shall therefore return to my father and say, Father, I have sinned against heaven,’ and so forth.

“But when he spoke this humble utterance of penitence, the father, springing forward to meet him and traversing both degrees without delay, restored him to his former dignity of sons.

“There is a great difference between him who extinguishes the incentives of the vices through fear of Gehenna or hope of recompense, and him who, through affection for divine charity, abhors wickedness and uncleanness themselves and possesses the good of purity only through the love and desire of charity. No longer looking toward the promise of future remuneration, but delighted by the consciousness of present goods, he performs all things not from contemplation of punishments but from delight in the virtues.

“Through this charity, whoever has arrived at the image and likeness of God will now delight in the good will for the sake of the good itself. Possessing a similar affection of patience and gentleness, he will thereafter be angered by none of the vices of sinners, but rather, grieving with their infirmities, will implore pardon for them. He will remember that he himself was assaulted for so long by the stings of similar passions and was delivered from the assault not by his own zeal. He will be able to fulfill that commandment, ‘Love your enemies,’ and so forth, and he will arrive at that true adoption of the sons of God concerning which John says, ‘Everyone who is born of God does not sin.’

“This is to be understood not of every kind of sins, but of capital sins. For however greatly those who serve God guard themselves with circumspection, they cannot be immune from those sins which are declared not to be unto death, according to that saying: ‘If we say that we do not have sin, we deceive ourselves.’

“Why, then, is it said in the Psalm, ‘Fear the Lord, all his saints,’ and, ‘I have inclined my heart to perform your justifications because of the recompense’? It must be known that there are various degrees in these things, as in the other virtues. For the things said above concerning fear or hope are understood of these insofar as they are imperfect or without grace. But in the aforesaid authorities of the Psalmist they are understood of the perfect virtues which exist with perfect charity. For there is a servile fear, and there is also an unformed hope, which exist even without charity. And again there are a formed fear and hope, yet imperfect, which exist with imperfect charity."

Section XI

The twelfth conference is by the same Chaeremon concerning the perfection of chastity. When they asked him concerning it, he answered:

"The order of questioning has truly been observed rationally by you. For it is necessary that those immense rewards of perpetual chastity accompany so exalted a fullness of charity, and that there be equal joy in so great an equality of palms. For they are bound to one another by so great a fellowship that the one cannot be possessed without the other.

"This proposition of yours, therefore, has been completed: whether that fire of concupiscence, whose odor [read: heat] this flesh senses as though implanted within it, can be extinguished in full. Concerning this, let us first inquire more diligently what the blessed Apostle understood when he said, 'Mortify your members which are upon the earth.'

"It is certain that he speaks not of the material members of the body, such as hands, feet, and things of this kind, but of the members of the body of sin, concerning which the same Apostle says, 'That the body of sin may be destroyed.' It is its genus, whose members are the species of sin itself. These members are said to be upon the earth because they concern earthly things, not heavenly things.

"Distinguishing and touching upon those very members, he says: 'fornication, uncleanness, lust, and evil concupiscence.' Fornication is to be understood as that which is committed by carnal intercourse. Uncleanness is that which sometimes creeps upon those sleeping or waking, through lack of care, without any contact with a woman. Lust, growing strong in the recesses of the soul, can occur to anyone without a passion of the body. There is no doubt that lust is so called because it pleases, and it appears to consist in the consent of the mind or in lingering delight.

"Then as the fourth member he sets down evil concupiscence, which can be referred generally to all evil desires. For these things are contrary to chastity and exclude from the kingdom of God, as the same Apostle says: 'Neither fornicators, nor those serving idols, nor adulterers, nor the effeminate, nor those who lie with males,' and so forth, 'shall possess the kingdom of God.'

"Nevertheless, we ought to be certain that, although we undergo every rigor of continence—namely, hunger and thirst, vigils and continuity of labor, and the incessant pursuit of reading—we cannot attain the perpetual purity of chastity by the merit of these labors unless, while continually sweating in them, we are taught by the mastery of experience that its incorruption is granted by the largesse of divine grace.

"For this purpose alone, let each one know that he ought to persevere unweariedly in these exercises: so that, by obtaining the mercy of the Lord through their affliction, he may merit to be freed by a divine gift from the assault of the flesh and the dominion of the vices, not because he is to obtain through those exercises that inviolate chastity of body which he desires.

"Let him burn with as great a desire and love for acquiring chastity as the most covetous seeker of money, or as one who is carried away by an intolerable love of a beautiful woman desires with most impatient ardor that his desire be fulfilled.

"The farther he has driven away the passion of anger, the more tenaciously he will obtain chastity. For the heat of the body will not subside unless he has first restrained the movement of the soul. The Savior shows this when he says, 'Blessed are the meek, for they shall possess the earth,' namely, the earth of the body.

"There are many degrees of chastity by which one ascends to that inviolate purity. For according to the likeness of earthly bodies, which on individual days insensibly receive their increments and thus, while they are unaware, advance to the perfect habit, strength and maturity of chastity are also acquired by the soul.

"The first degree of modesty, therefore, is that the monk, while awake, should not be struck down by a carnal assault. The second is that his mind should not linger upon voluptuous thoughts. The third is that he should not be moved even lightly toward concupiscence by the sight of a woman. The fourth is that, while awake, he should not undergo even a simple movement of the flesh.

"The fifth is that, when reason, being about to discuss human generation, or the necessity of reading introduces its memory, the most subtle assent to a pleasurable act should not touch the mind. Rather, with a tranquil and pure gaze of the heart he should contemplate it as some simple work and as a ministry necessarily bestowed upon the human race, and should conceive nothing more from its remembrance than if he were considering in his mind the making of bricks or the work of any other workshop.

"The sixth degree of chastity is that, even while sleeping, he should not be mocked by seductive phantasms of women. For although we do not believe this deception to be subject to sin, it is nevertheless an indication of concupiscence still lurking in the marrow. It is established that this deception occurs in different ways. Those who do not know carnal union [read: those who have known carnal union] are deceived in one way, and those who are without experience of union with a woman in another."

Concerning the difference between continence and chastity, Chaeremon says:

"This is the consummation of true chastity: not that it struggles against a movement of carnal concupiscence, but that, detesting it with complete horror, it retains its continual and inviolate purity. This will occur when the flesh, now ceasing to lust against the spirit, consents to its desires and virtue, and they begin to be bound to each other in the firmest peace.

"Continence, however, is said to exist when someone suffers passions and strong temptations, but nevertheless neither assents nor is conquered."

When Germanus asked how or in how much time chastity could be acquired and perfected, Chaeremon answered:

"It is quite rash to define a certain measure of time for the consummation of this chastity, especially amid so great a diversity either of pleasures or of strength. Nevertheless, I can most confidently define an observance and a measure of time by which its possibility may be recognized.

"Whoever, withdrawn from all idle conversations and mortified to every anger and to worldly solicitude and care, is content with only two paximacia for his daily refreshment, abstains from satiety with water, and limits the repose of sleep to the space of three—or, as others have determined, four—hours, yet believes that he will obtain it not by the merit of these labors or of this continence but by the mercy of the Lord, should know within no more than six months that its perfection is not impossible for him.

"This is the consummation of chastity: that no delight of lust should touch the monk while he is awake, and no deception of dreams should delude him while he rests. But if, only through the heedlessness of the sleeping mind, a movement of the flesh creeps upon him as he sleeps, just as it was aroused without any titillation of pleasure, so also it should subside without any itching of the body.

"Accordingly, for each person sweating with all his strength against the spirit of fornication, the singular victory is not to hope for the remedy from the merit of his own effort."

Section XII

The thirteenth conference is by the same Chaeremon, concerning the protection and grace of God and free choice. On this matter Prosper censures John Cassian, as is said in certain places. Cassian says that the industry of the one laboring can profit nothing without God's assistance. Chaeremon declares this by the following example:

"When a farmer has expended all his efforts in cultivating the lands, he will not be able immediately to attribute the produce of the crops and the abundance of the fruits to his own industry. He has frequently experienced that industry to be ineffectual unless the seasonableness of the rains and the tranquil serenity of winter follow it. Thus we have very often seen fruits which had already grown and had been made solid by perfect maturity snatched, as it were, from the hands of those holding them, and that continual application of sweat conferred nothing upon those laboring because it was not directed by the assistance of the Lord.

"Therefore, just as divine loving-kindness does not confer this abundance of crops upon slothful farmers who do not subdue their fields with the frequent plow, so all-night solicitude will not profit those who labor unless the mercy of the Lord has prospered it.

"In this matter, however, let human pride in no way contend either to equal or to mingle itself with grace, and let it not strive to insert itself as a participant in the gifts of God by judging its own labor to be the author of divine largesse and boasting that the produce of the most abundant fruits has answered to the merits of its own industry.

"For let it consider, and weigh with the truest examination, that it could not have expended by its own powers those very efforts which it exercised with an intent desire for abundance unless the protection and mercy of the Lord had strengthened it for performing all the work of the countryside. Its will and strength would have been ineffectual unless divine clemency had also furnished the ability to accomplish the work, an ability which is sometimes thwarted either by drought or by excessive rains.

"For even when the strength of the oxen, health of the body, the inclination toward every work, and success in one's actions have been granted by the Lord, one must pray lest, as it is written, the heaven become iron and the earth bronze, and lest the cankerworm consume what the locust has left, and so forth.

"Nor does the industry of a laboring farmer need divine assistance in this alone, unless it also averts unexpected events. From these things it is plainly gathered that the beginning not only of good acts but also of good thoughts is from God, who both inspires in us the beginnings of holy will and bestows the power and opportunity to accomplish the things which we rightly desire. For ‘every best gift,’ and so forth, ‘is from above, descending.’ He begins, executes, and consummates within us the things that are good.

“Thus, if we are drawn, it is not ours that we follow, but his by whom we are drawn. But to resist and to refuse to follow is ours.

“As to the fact that certain pagan philosophers who lacked the grace of God appeared to maintain perfect chastity or even virginity, it must be believed,” Chaeremon says, “that the philosophers by no means attained such chastity of soul as is required from us, namely, even the exclusion of shameful thoughts and affections, but only abstinence from carnal acts.

“Hence, when a certain physiognomist, after he had gazed upon the face of Socrates, the greatest philosopher, was asked what his morals were, he answered: ‘The eyes are those of one who lies with boys.’ When the disciples of Socrates heard this response and reckoned it an insult, since they knew him to be continent, they wished to rise up against the man. But Socrates restrained them, saying, ‘Be quiet, O companions. For I am, but I fear myself.’ Here it is shown that he abstained from outward acts, but the desire and delight of that passion had not been excluded from his heart.

“God’s purpose—that he had made man not so that he might perish, but that he might live perpetually—remains immovable. When his kindness perceives that the smallest spark of good will has shone forth in us, or when he himself has struck it, as it were, from the hard flint of our heart, he nurtures and arouses it and strengthens it by his inspiration, ‘willing all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth.’

“Therefore divine protection always adheres to us inseparably. So great is the loving-kindness of the Creator toward his creature that his providence not only accompanies it but also continually precedes it. The prophet, having experienced this, confesses it, saying, ‘His mercy shall precede me.’

“When he has beheld in us a certain birth of good will, he immediately illuminates, strengthens, and incites it toward salvation, bestowing an increase upon that which either he himself planted or saw to have emerged through our effort. He not only benignly inspires holy desires, but also furnishes the occasions of life and the opportunity for a good affection or effect, and shows to those who wander the direction of a more salutary way.”

Chaeremon sets forth many authorities which appear contrary to one another, but are not so, concerning the matter of grace and free choice. For example: ‘If you are willing and listen, you shall eat the good things of the earth’; but, as though to the contrary, that saying of the Apostle: ‘It is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy.’ Likewise that saying of the Gospel: ‘He will render to each according to his works’; and, as though to the contrary, the Apostle: ‘Who works in us both to will and to accomplish according to good will.’

Likewise there is this saying: ‘Draw near to God, and he will draw near to you’; and, as though to the contrary, this saying: ‘No one comes to me unless he who sent me draws him.’ Likewise there is this saying of Proverbs: ‘Make straight steps with your feet and direct your ways’; and, as though to the contrary, the Psalmist prays: ‘Direct my way in your sight.’ Likewise: ‘Make for yourselves a new heart and a new spirit’; and, as though to the contrary, the Lord says: ‘I shall give you a new heart and a new spirit.’ There are many such sayings.

In all these both the grace of God and our freedom of choice are declared, and it is declared that a man can sometimes extend himself toward the appetite for the virtues even by his own movements, but always needs to be assisted by the Lord.

For a person does not enjoy health as soon as he has willed it, so as to be freed from the disease of sickness according to the desire of his own choice. What profit is there in desiring the grace of health unless the Lord, who grants the use of life itself, also imparts the vigor of soundness?

So that it may be plainly apparent that the beginnings of good wills sometimes proceed even through the good of nature, which was granted by the beneficence of the Creator, but nevertheless cannot arrive at the consummation of the virtues unless they are directed by the Lord, the Apostle is a witness, saying: ‘To will is present with me, but to accomplish I do not find.’

For Scripture confirms freedom when it says, ‘With every watchfulness guard your heart.’ But the Apostle manifests weakness when he says, ‘May the Lord guard your hearts and your understandings.’ The Psalmist displays freedom of choice when he says, ‘I have inclined my heart to perform your justifications,’ but its weakness when he says elsewhere, ‘Incline my heart, O God, unto your testimonies.’ We are also commanded solicitously to guard our souls, the prophet saying, ‘Guard your souls’; but in the same spirit another prophet says, ‘Unless the Lord guards the city, he who guards it watches in vain.’

Thus these things are mingled and in some manner confused without discrimination—that is, without distinction—so that a great question is discussed among many concerning which of them depends upon which: whether God has mercy upon us because we have supplied the beginning of good will, or whether we attain the beginning of good will because God has mercy.

For many, believing each one of these things and asserting it more than is just, have been enveloped in various errors contrary to one another. For if we say that the beginning of good will is ours, what occurred in Paul the persecutor or in the publican? One of them, intent upon the blood and punishments of the innocent, and the other violently intent upon public robberies, are drawn to salvation.

But if we say that the beginnings of good will are always inspired by the grace of God, what shall we say concerning the faith of Zacchaeus? What shall we say concerning the piety of that thief upon the cross? By their own desire, bringing a certain violence upon the heavenly kingdoms, they preceded the special admonitions of their calling.

But if we assign the consummation of the virtues and the execution of the commandments to our own choice, why do we pray, 'Confirm, O God, that which you have wrought in us,' and again, 'Direct the works of our hands'?

Joseph also says to his brothers: 'I was sent not by your counsel but by the will of God, who made me as a father to Pharaoh,' and so forth. And when his brothers feared after the death of their father, he said: 'Do not fear. Can we resist the will of God? You did that for evil, and God turned it to good, so that he might exalt me and save you and many peoples.'

It is as though both are to be received in this manner: that in some men the will precedes grace, while in others grace precedes the will, and not in such a way that in all men the will follows grace. For, according to those men, free choice is taken away if grace precedes it, and grace also is taken away if it is preceded by free choice.

Therefore these two things, namely grace and free choice, appear contrary to one another, yet both accord. We gather from the rule of piety that both alike must be received, lest, by subtracting one of them from the other, we should appear to have departed from the rule of ecclesiastical faith.

For when God sees that we will to turn toward the good, he meets, directs, and strengthens us. 'At the voice of your cry, as soon as he hears, he will answer you,' says the prophet. And again, if he has perceived that we are unwilling or have grown lukewarm, he admonishes our hearts with salutary exhortations, by which a good will may be restored in us.

For it must not be believed that he made man such that he could neither ever will nor be capable of good. Otherwise he would not have permitted him free choice if he had granted him only to will and be capable of evil, but had conceded that of himself he could neither will nor be capable of good.

It cannot therefore be doubted that the seeds of the virtues have indeed been inserted naturally into every soul by the beneficence of the Creator. Nevertheless, unless they are aroused by the assistance of God, they will not be able to arrive at an increase of perfection, because, according to the Apostle, 'Neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters, but God, who gives the increase.'

The book of the Shepherd also teaches that the freedom of choice lies with man toward either side, because each person has two angels: a good one instigating him to the virtues, and an evil one inciting him toward the vices. It lies with the man to choose which one he follows. Therefore free choice always remains in man, by which he can either neglect or love the grace of God.

Therefore God precedes man's will, because it is said, 'My God, his mercy shall precede me.' And again, when God delays and in some manner beneficially stands still so that our choice may be tested, our will precedes him when it says, 'In the morning my prayer shall precede you.' But this can be understood insofar as prayer belongs to the genus of good things which can also be performed without grace that makes one pleasing.

After very many authorities of sacred Scripture, in which the exercise of good works is sometimes attributed to the grace of God and sometimes to man's free choice, Chaeremon says thus:

"Through these things it is plainly shown that the judgments of God are unsearchable and his ways uninvestigable, by which he draws the human race toward salvation. We can also prove this from the examples of the evangelical callings.

"For Andrew, Peter, and their companions, while thinking nothing concerning the remedy of their salvation, he chose beforehand by the spontaneous favor of his grace. Zacchaeus, who faithfully stretched himself toward the sight of the Lord, he not only received but also illuminated with the blessing of his dwelling with him. He draws Paul when unwilling and resisting. To another who requests a very brief delay for the burial of his father he grants no respite. To Cornelius, who continually persisted in prayers and almsgiving, the way of salvation is shown as though in return for a recompense.

"Thus that multiform wisdom of God dispenses the salvation of men with a manifold and unsearchable loving-kindness. He also preferred to exercise the very healings of bodies not according to one uniform power of his majesty, but according to the measure of faith in which he found each person, or according as he himself distributed to each. This is apparent throughout the Gospels in the diverse infirm persons who were healed.

"The Apostle, considering in his mind this manifold largesse of the divine dispensation and perceiving that he had fallen into a certain sea of God's loving-kindness, exclaimed: 'O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How incomprehensible are his judgments,' and so forth.

“Finally, three things are to be held concerning this matter. The first is that each person should attend to desiring everything that is good, yet in such a way that the judgment of free will is not complete toward either part. The second is that it belongs to divine grace that he be able to accomplish the aforesaid exercises of the virtues, yet in such a way that the capability of choice is not extinguished. The third also pertains to the gifts of God: that the virtues acquired should be retained by perseverance, yet in such a way that freedom does not experience captivity with respect to those things.

“For thus the God of the universe is to be believed to work all things in all: that he incites, protects, and strengthens, not that he himself takes away the freedom of choice which he once granted.”

Section XIII

The fourteenth conference, which is called that of Nesteros, concerns the active and contemplative life. John Cassian says that when Nesteros perceived that we had committed some portions of the sacred Scriptures to memory and desired their understanding, he addressed us with these words:

“Since all arts, whether they are entirely useless or profit only the advantages of the present life, possess their proper order and method of teaching through which they can be attained by those who experience them, and are directed by their own certain and proper lines, how much more does the discipline and profession of our religion—which tends toward contemplating the hidden things of the invisible mysteries and seeks not present gain but the recompense of eternal rewards—subsist in a certain order and method?

“Its knowledge is twofold. The first is active, which is perfected by the amendment of morals and the purgation of the vices. The other consists in contemplation of divine things and consideration of the most sacred senses.

“Therefore, whoever wishes to arrive at the intention of heavenly things must first attain active knowledge with every zeal and virtue. For these degrees are so ordered and distinguished that human humility can ascend to the sublime. If they succeed one another in the manner that we have stated, one can arrive at a height to which one cannot fly over after the first degree has been removed.

“Therefore he strives in vain toward the sight of God who does not decline the contagions of the vices. For the Holy Spirit hates what is feigned and does not dwell in a body subjected to sins.

“This active perfection subsists in a twofold manner. Its first mode is that the nature of all the vices and the method of their cure should be known. The second is that the order of the virtues and their perfection should be so discerned, and our mind so formed by them, that it should serve them no longer as though compelled and subjected to a violent command, but should delight and be fed by them as by a natural good, and ascend that arduous and narrow way with delight.

“For how will he be able to attain either the account of the virtues, which is the second degree in the active life, or the mysteries of spiritual or heavenly things, which consist in the more sublime degree of contemplation, who was not able to understand the nature of his own vices and has not been seen to extirpate them?

“It must nevertheless be known that we must sweat with the intention of a twofold labor, both in expelling the vices and in acquiring the virtues. We receive this not by our own conjecture, but are thoroughly taught it by the knowledge of him who alone knows the powers and method of his own workmanship. ‘Behold,’ he says, ‘I have established you this day over the nations and kingdoms, that you may root out, destroy, dissipate, and scatter, and build and plant.’

“In the expulsion of harmful things, he indicated that four things were necessary, namely, to root out, and so forth. In perfecting the virtues, he indicated only two, namely, to build and to plant.

“This, therefore, which is called the active life and which subsists, as has been said, in two modes, is divided among many professions and pursuits. Certain persons establish the sum of their intention in the secrets of the desert and purity of heart, as Elijah and Elisha among those of the past. In our times we know that blessed Anthony and other followers of the same purpose have adhered to God most intimately through the silence of solitude.

“Certain persons have given every solicitude of their pursuit to the instruction of brothers in monasteries and to vigilant care, as did Abbot John. We have known some men of the same merit also to have shone with apostolic signs.

“Certain men delight in the pious service in hospitals and the reception of strangers, as Abraham and Lot, and now blessed Macarius. Certain men choose the care of the infirm; others execute the intercession which is expended for the miserable and oppressed; others devote themselves to teaching or give alms to the poor. By their affection they have flourished in this loving-kindness among great and eminent men.

“Therefore it is useful and fitting for each person, according to the purpose which he chose or the grace which he received, to hasten with the highest zeal and diligence to arrive at the perfection of the work undertaken. Although praising and admiring the virtues of others, let him by no means depart from the profession which he once chose, knowing, according to the Apostle, that there is one body of the Church but many members, and this saying: ‘Having gifts differing according to grace, whether prophecy,’ and so forth.

“Those who are not yet established in the profession which they undertook are customarily so inflamed by the praise of certain persons whom they have heard proclaimed in diverse pursuits and virtues that they immediately desire to imitate their discipline. In this matter human frailty necessarily renders their efforts ineffectual.

“For it is impossible for one and the same man to shine simultaneously with all the virtues which we have comprehended above. If anyone wishes to pursue them equally, he must fall into this: that, while he follows all, he attains none completely, and from this change and variety receives loss rather than progress.”

Nesteros introduces the example of a certain married countryman, at whose presence the devil departed from a possessed man, although he had been unable to be cast out by the adjurations of the holy Abbot John. Wondering at this, John questioned him concerning his manner of life. At length the man confessed that for twelve years he and his wife had remained in virginity. Certainly, whoever wished to imitate him in this would prepare ruin for himself.

Contemplation, or the theoretical life, insofar as it pertains to the understanding of the Scriptures, is divided into two parts: historical interpretation and spiritual understanding. The spiritual is divided into three: tropology, allegory, and anagoge. Concerning these it is said in Proverbs: ‘But you, describe these things for yourself threefold according to the breadth of your heart.’

History therefore embraces knowledge of past and visible things, as in this saying: ‘It is written that Abraham had two sons,’ and so forth. What follows pertains to allegory: ‘These are the two testaments.’ Anagoge ascends from spiritual mysteries to certain more sublime secrets of the heavens, as in this saying: ‘But the Jerusalem which is above is free, which is our mother.’ Tropology is a moral explanation pertaining to the amendment of life and active instruction.

Therefore, the aforesaid four explanations sometimes flow together into one, so that one and the same Jerusalem can be understood fourfold. According to history, it is the city of the Jews; according to allegory, the Church of Christ; according to anagoge, that heavenly city; according to tropology, the soul of man.

“Therefore, if you wish to prepare in your heart a sacred tabernacle of spiritual knowledge, purge yourselves from every contagion of the vices and strip yourselves of the torments of the present age. For it is impossible for a soul which is occupied even lightly by worldly distractions to merit the gift of spiritual knowledge, to become the begetter of spiritual senses, or to become retentive of the sacred readings.

“Observe first of all, especially you, John, whom youth still favors, lest the zeal of reading or the labor of your desire be made void by vain elation: impose the greatest silence upon your mouth. Receive the institutions and sayings of the elders with an attentive heart and, as it were, with a mute mouth; storing them diligently within your breast, hasten rather to perform them than to teach them.

“Dare to bring forth nothing in the conference of the elders unless either harmful ignorance or the reason of necessary knowledge has impelled you to ask it. Do not presume to teach anyone in words what you have not first done in deed, nor imitate those who have attained only skill in disputing and abundance of speech.

“For it is one thing to have facility of mouth and elegance of speech, and another to enter into the veins and marrow of heavenly sayings and to contemplate profound and hidden mysteries with the purest eye of the heart. This will be obtained in no way by human teaching or secular learning, but by purity of mind alone through the illumination of the Holy Spirit.

“Pursue humility of heart immovably. Once every earthly thought has been expelled, devote yourself to assiduous, or rather continual, sacred reading.”

Nesteros gives an example of the diverse manner of expounding the Scriptures from this saying: ‘You shall not commit fornication.’ In one exposition, bodily lust is prohibited according to the letter. In another exposition, one is to beware of every idolatry, the superstition of pagans, and divination, which are spiritual fornication. In a third, fornication in the observance of the legal practices of the Jews is prohibited. A fourth fornication is in heretical teaching. A fifth fornication, as reckoned by pure minds, is every thought that is not only shameful and without consent, but even an idle thought.

It is impossible for an unclean soul, however greatly it may have sweated in the application of reading, to acquire the spiritual knowledge of the Scriptures, namely, through taste; but unclean men devoted to the Scriptures appear to possess a certain image of knowledge.

Section XIV

The fifteenth conference is by the same Nesteros concerning spiritual charisms, that is, the grace of miracles. The order of the preceding disputation had reached the point at which Nesteros would bring forth an account of the spiritual charisms. We have learned by the tradition of the elders that it is threefold.

The first cause of healings is when the grace of signs accompanies certain elect and just men because of the merit of sanctity. Thus it is manifest, according to the authority of the Lord, that the apostles and many of the saints performed signs and wonders, for he said: ‘Heal the infirm, raise the dead, cleanse lepers,’ and so forth.

The second cause is when, for the edification of the Church, or for the faith of those who bring forward their infirm persons, or for the faith of those who are to be cured, the power of healings proceeds even from sinners and the unworthy. Concerning them the Savior says in the Gospel: ‘Many on that day,’ namely, the day of judgment, ‘will say to me: Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy in your name, and cast out demons in your name, and perform many mighty works? Then I shall confess to them: I never knew you. Depart from me, all workers of iniquity.’

And, to the contrary, if faith is lacking in those who offer the infirm or in the infirm themselves, it does not permit even those upon whom gifts of healings have been conferred to exercise the power of healing. Concerning this the evangelist Luke says: ‘Jesus was not able to perform mighty works among them,’ namely, those of Nazareth, ‘because of their unbelief.’ Likewise: ‘There were many lepers under Elisha the prophet in Israel, and none was cleansed except Naaman the Syrian.’

The third mode of healings is also simulated by the collusion and contrivance of demons, so that, when a man bound by manifest crimes is believed to be a saint and servant of God because of admiration for the signs, the imitation of his vices is also commended; and through this, once an entrance of disparagement has been opened, even the sanctity of religion is defamed. Or certainly it occurs so that the man who believes that he possesses the grace of healings, elevated by pride of heart, may be cast down more grievously.

Hence it is that demons, when the names of those whom they know to possess no merit of sanctity and no spiritual fruits are invoked, pretend that they are being burned by their merits and are fleeing from the bodies they have possessed. Concerning these things it is read thus in Deuteronomy: ‘If a prophet arises in your midst, or one who says that he has seen a dream, and predicts a sign and a wonder, and whatever he predicted happens, and he says to you, Let us go and follow foreign gods whom you do not know and serve them, you shall not hear the words of that prophet or dreamer, because the Lord your God tests you, so that it may become manifest whether you love him.’

Therefore we must never admire those who seek these powers, but rather consider whether they have been perfected by the expulsion of all the vices and the amendment of morals. This is granted by the dispensing grace of God not through the faith of another or through the diversity of causes, but through the zeal of each individual.

For this is active knowledge, which is also called charity by another name by the Apostle. It is preferred by the Apostle to all the tongues of men and angels, to the fullness of faith which even moves mountains, to all prophecy and knowledge, to the distribution of all one’s means, and finally to glorious martyrdom. For when he had enumerated all the kinds of charisms—namely, the word of wisdom, knowledge, prophecy, the grace of powers—he afterward added: ‘I show you a still more excellent way,’ namely, charity, concerning which he immediately adds: ‘If with tongues,’ and so forth.

Therefore we have by no means seen these works of signs sought by our fathers. On the contrary, although they possessed them through the grace of the Holy Spirit, they never wished to exercise them unless perhaps an extreme and unavoidable necessity constrained them.

To this Nesteros adds an example concerning blessed Abbot Macarius, who raised a dead man to confound the errors which a certain heretic was disseminating in Egypt through dialectical art. After mutual conversations and a disputation of words, blessed Macarius said to the heretic: ‘Let us demonstrate the truth of faith from our works. Let us go to the tombs of the dead, and let the doctrine of the faith of whichever one raises a dead man be believed true.’

The heretic offered himself for this, led by shame, but agreed that it should be carried out on the following day. On the following day Macarius stood ready, but the heretic did not appear, knowing that he could not do this, just as his faith was not true.

Nevertheless, Macarius spoke to the corpse of a certain pagan man and asked him whether that heretic had come and whether he would have raised the dead man. He answered that he had not, and that, while he lived, he had heard nothing concerning Christ in the world.

Finally, the very author of all signs and powers, when he called his disciples to the mastery of his teaching, said: ‘Learn from me, because I am meek and humble of heart.’ He did not say, ‘Perform miracles,’ and so forth.

Section XV

The sixteenth conference is that of Abbot Joseph concerning true friendship. When blessed Joseph perceived that we desired his instruction, he first asked one thing: whether we were natural brothers, namely, John Cassian himself and his companion who in the conferences is called Germanus.

Hearing from us that we were joined not by carnal but by spiritual brotherhood, he used the following salutary beginning:

“There are many kinds of friendships and companionship. For a preceding commendation first caused some persons to enter into dealings of acquaintance and afterward also of friendship. A certain contract, or an agreement concerning something given and received, joined others. Similarity and community in business, military service, an art, or study joined others; through this even savage hearts grow so gentle toward one another that even those who rejoice in robberies in forests and mountains and delight in the shedding of human blood embrace and cherish the partners of their crimes.

“There is also another kind of affection by which those of the same tribe, spouses, parents, brothers, or children are naturally preferred to others. This is also found to be present in all birds and living creatures, so that they frequently do not fear to expose themselves to dangers and death for their offspring.

“But just as we see all these kinds of friendship to be common to the good and the evil, and even to beasts and serpents, so it is certain that they cannot persevere until the end. For separation of places, temporal oblivion, an utterance, a cause, or the contracting of business frequently interrupts and divides them.

“There is one indissoluble kind of charity, which neither the favor of a commendation, nor the greatness of a service or of gifts, nor the account of any contract, nor the necessity of nature joins, but similarity of virtues alone. This is the friendship which is never sundered by any accidents, which intervals of places or times do not have power to separate or destroy, and which not even death itself tears apart. Once its covenant has been entered upon, neither diversity of desires nor contentious contrariety of will breaks it.

“Therefore this is the faithful and indissoluble union of friendship which is bound together solely by equality of virtues, concerning which the Lord says: ‘He makes those of one manner dwell in a house.’ Accordingly, affection can remain unbroken only in those in whom there subsist one purpose and will, one willing and one refusing.

“If you desire to retain this inviolate, you must hasten first to expel the vices and mortify your own wills, and, with one pursuit and purpose, fulfill this saying: ‘Behold, how good and how pleasant,’ and so forth. This must be understood not locally but spiritually.

“Therefore the perfection of this friendship is reached by six degrees. The first foundations of true friendship are established in contempt for worldly substance and disdain for all the things which we possess. For it is unjust and impious if, after renunciation of the world, the most worthless superfluous chattel is preferred to the affection of a most precious brother.

“The second is that each person should so cut away his own wills that, judging himself to be wise or well advised, he does not prefer to obey his own determinations rather than those of his neighbor.

“The third is that he should know that all things, even those which he judges useful and necessary, must be placed after the good of charity and peace.

“The fourth is that he should believe that he must never become angry at all, whether for just or unjust causes.

“The fifth is that he should desire to cure a brother’s anger conceived against him, even without reason, in the same manner in which he would cure his own, knowing that another’s sadness is equally destructive to him as if he himself were moved against another, unless, insofar as it lies in him, he expels it also from his brother’s mind.

“The last is that which without doubt is the general slayer of all the vices: that he should believe that he is going to depart from this world every day. Whoever has retained these things will be able neither to suffer nor to inflict the bitterness of anger and discord.

“But when these things cease, and that first rival of charity has gradually poured the poison of sadness into the hearts of friends, it is necessary that, through frequent quarrels and with affection gradually cooled, the hearts of those who love, ulcerated for a long time, should at some point be separated.

“For it will profit nothing if you assert that you are not angry, but with a stubborn heart despise the sadness of another which you could have soothed by your gentleness.

“Therefore, for preserving perpetual and indivisible charity, it does not profit to have cut off the first cause of dissension, which is accustomed to arise from perishable and earthly things, unless, by similarly cutting off also the second, which is accustomed to arise under the appearance of spiritual meanings, we have acquired in all things a humble understanding and harmonious wills. Preferring one another in honor, each should ascribe more knowledge and sanctity to his companion and should believe that the summit of true discretion stands in the judgment of the other rather than in his own.

“For it often happens, either by an illusion of the devil or by the intervention of human error—because there is no one in this flesh who, as a man, cannot be deceived—that he who is of sharper intellect and greater knowledge sometimes conceives something false in his mind, while he who is of slower intellect and lesser merit perceives something more correctly and truly.

“Therefore, however endowed with knowledge he may be, let no one persuade himself with vain swelling that he can have no need of another’s conference. For even if diabolical illusion does not deceive his judgment, nevertheless he will not escape the more grievous snares of elation and pride.

“It must also be known that he plays the stronger part who subjects his own will to the will of his brother, rather than he who is found more obstinate in defending and retaining his own determinations.

“Nevertheless, concerning observance of those principal commandments, one must determine most steadfastly, and death itself, if it should be necessary, must not be avoided for them; concerning these David ‘swore and determined,’ and so forth.

“But concerning those bodily exercises which are said to be useful for a little, such as fasts, silences, and things of this sort, one must determine in such a way that, if some occasion of piety should supervene which more certainly persuades that they be relaxed, we are held by no law concerning them, but, leaving them aside, pass freely to more useful things.

“For each person who establishes a law for himself while placed under the grace of liberty binds himself with a destructive servitude, so that, if necessity compels, he establishes himself as a transgressor in relation to those things which he could otherwise have undertaken licitly and laudably. For ‘where there is no law, neither is there transgression,’ says the Apostle.”

Section XVI

The seventeenth conference, which is the second of Abbot Joseph, concerns determinations, that is, promises, and whether they must always be kept.

When John and Germanus, seeking permission from the fathers and brothers of their monastery to visit those saints of Egypt so that, after seeing their manner of life and hearing their teaching, they might bring back from there a greater spiritual advancement for themselves and for their brothers of that monastery, had obtained the permission under this promise, that they would return within a certain time established for them, and when the time for returning was now approaching, they saw that they could not bring back that spiritual advancement which they intended and which they believed they would certainly obtain if they remained for a longer time in those regions in order to see and confer with those fathers. Doubtful and perplexed concerning which of these they ought rather to choose—either to return in order to discharge the promise and without that advancement for which they hoped, or, for the sake of that greater advancement, to break the pledge—they sought Joseph’s counsel and decision in this matter. He answered them thus:

“It is indeed sound and perfect and entirely fitting to our profession that we should efficaciously fulfill those things which we determine under some pledge. For this reason a monk ought to determine nothing abruptly, lest either he be compelled to fulfill what he incautiously promised, or, when it is revoked in consideration of something more honorable, he become a transgressor of his own pledge.

“But because our present purpose is to treat not so much the condition of health as the cure of infirmity, salutary counsel must be sought concerning how you can escape the dangerous shipwreck of this scruple.

“Therefore, when no bond constrains us and no condition restricts us, when a choice is proposed in a comparison between things of secondary rank, that which is of greater advantage should be chosen beforehand. But when some adversity of losses stands in the way, in a comparison of the damages that which is subject to lighter detriments must be sought, as it was said by someone: ‘Of the greatest evils choose the least.’

“Therefore, if you believe that greater gains are conferred upon your spirit by this delay than are those which arose for you from the manner of life of that monastery, and the condition of your pledge cannot be fulfilled without the loss of great advantages, it is better that you undergo this loss of a lie or of an unfulfilled promise—which, once past, will neither itself be repeated thereafter nor be able of itself to generate other sins—than that you fall into that through which, as you say, the daily condition of a more tepid life may pierce you and afflict you with interminable loss.

“For an incautious determination will be changed venially, indeed even laudably, if it passes to the more salutary side. Nor must it be believed a transgression of constancy, but an amendment of rashness, whenever a faulty pledge is corrected.

“In all causes one must consider not the outcome of the work but the will of the one working. It must not immediately be asked what each person did, but with what intention he did it, so that we find some condemned for deeds from which good things arose, and, to the contrary, some to have arrived at the summit of justice through blameworthy acts.

“Examples: what was more salutary than the Lord’s Passion? And nevertheless it harmed Judas the betrayer most greatly, who procured it. To the contrary, the patriarch Jacob brought back a blessing from a lie to his father.”

Because the breaking of a promise appears to pertain to a lie, and concerning a lie it is said in the Psalm, “You will destroy all who speak a lie,” namely, by eternal death, Germanus asks how it may be lawful to break a promise, since this is contrary to sacred Scripture. Joseph answers him, saying:

“Occasions and causes of perdition cannot be lacking to those who are going to perish, or rather to those who desire to perish. For the testimonies of the Scriptures must not therefore be cast away and altogether torn from their body, because the perversity of heretics is encouraged by them, or the unbelief of the Jews is hardened, or the swelling of pagan wisdom is offended. Rather, they must both be piously believed and immovably retained, and preached according to the rule of truth.

“Therefore one must think about a lie and use it in the same way as is natural to hellebore. If it is taken when a fatal disease is imminent, it becomes salutary; otherwise, if it is received without the necessity of extreme danger, it is of present destruction.

“Therefore, when some grave danger is imminent from the confession of truth, then refuge in lies must be received, yet in such a way that we are salutarily stung by the guilt of a humble conscience. But where no condition of supreme necessity presses, a lie must be avoided with every caution as something death-bearing.”

For this he introduces many examples in which holy men are found to have used a lie: David before Abimelech, Jacob before his father Isaac, Rahab of Jericho, and Hushai before Absalom.

He also introduces examples of simulations performed which appear to pertain to a lie: David, when he pretended to be a fool before Achish; and Paul, when, by the counsel of James in Jerusalem, he took part in the observance of legal rites, offering a sacrifice with his head shaved and entering the temple with others as though observing the law. And when he says, “I became to the Jews as a Jew; to those who are without the law, as though I were without the law. I became all things to all men, that I might gain all,” namely, conforming himself to their customs. Joseph the patriarch also told his brothers that they were spies, and Solomon pretended that he decreed that the infant should be divided.

He adds also that God, angels, and saints changed promises and did not fulfill them, as first in Nineveh, when he says, “Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overturned”; and concerning the proclamation of the death of King Hezekiah; concerning the angels who, when invited by Lot, said that they wished to remain in the street and nevertheless entered his house; and concerning Peter, who said, “You shall never wash my feet”; and concerning Paul, who promised the Corinthians that he would come to them and did not do so. From these things it appears that we also can fail to keep promises without sin.

Finally Joseph concludes that what was said above, namely, that a monk ought to determine nothing—that is, firmly to purpose—is not decreed concerning the principal commandments, without which our salvation cannot subsist, but concerning those things which we can relax or retain without danger to our condition: for example, concerning the relaxed rigor of a fast; concerning perpetual abstinence from wine or oil; concerning completely restraining departure from the cell; concerning the unceasing continuance of reading or meditation. These can both be practiced, when one pleases, without loss to our profession and purpose, and, when it should be necessary, be omitted without blame.

But concerning observance of those principal commandments one must determine most steadfastly, and death, if it should be necessary, must not be avoided for them. This must be done for the keeping of charity, likewise for purity of chastity, for faith, for sobriety, and for justice.

It must be noted that the conclusion is excellent. But certain things said above are not true according to the opinion of the saints; certain things were said defectively and confusedly.

For what he said, that sometimes because of great utility or necessity it is lawful to tell a lie, is not true. For it is always a sin according to Augustine, in The First, at the end, Cause XXII, Question II.

Nor can anyone truly be perplexed so that he is compelled to tell a lie, in Let Him Do, Cause XXII, Question II, and in the gloss on The Sinews, Distinction XIII.

Likewise Jacob, by saying that he was Esau, is excused of a lie in Cause XXII, Question II, in the section “Likewise, it is objected”; but this man says that it was a lie.

Likewise he appears to say that outside necessity a lie is a mortal sin. This is not always true, but only when it is pernicious, as in The First, Cause XXII, Question II.

Likewise, because he equates simulation with a lie, although these are diverse. For because simulation is in deeds, it can sometimes be without sin, namely, when it is done for some just utility, not for injury. But a lie is never without sin.

Among the examples which are set down, some were with sin; some were with sin [read: without sin] among the simulations and utterances which appear to be lies.

Section XVII

The eighteenth conference is that of Abbot Piamun, which treats the diverse kinds of monks. It must be known that John Cassian assigned and dedicated this conference together with the following six to Jovinian, Leontius, and Theodore.

Therefore, after that venerable father Piamun had humanely received John Cassian and Germanus, and the cause of their coming to visit those places had been perceived by him, namely, the desire for perfection, he began thus:

“Sons, whoever desires to attain mastery of any art, unless he subjects himself with all care and vigilance to the studies of that discipline which he desires to know, and observes the precepts and institutions of the most perfect masters of every craft or knowledge, vainly desires with empty wishes to attain the likeness of those whose care and industry he refuses to emulate.

“Therefore, if, as I believe, the cause of God drew you to emulation of our knowledge, entirely renounce all the institutions by which your beginnings there were formed. Follow with the greatest humility whatever you see our elders do or hand down.

“Nor should it move you, or turn, divert, and draw you back from imitation, even if the rationale or cause of some thing or deed is not clear to you at present. For those who think well and simply about all things, and who strive faithfully to imitate rather than to discuss everything which they have perceived to have been handed down or done by the elders, will consequently, through the experience of the work, attain even the knowledge of all things.

“But whoever begins to be instructed by discussion will penetrate the rationale of the truth [read: But whoever begins to be instructed by discussion will never penetrate the rationale of the truth], because the enemy, seeing that he trusts his own judgment rather than that of the fathers, will easily impel him to the point that even those things which are most useful and most salutary seem superfluous and harmful to him.

“Therefore, you must first know the order and beginning of our profession, how or whence it descended. There are three kinds of monks in Egypt. Two of them are excellent; the third is lukewarm and to be avoided in every way.

“The first is that of the cenobites, namely, those remaining in a congregation, who are governed under the judgment of one elder. The second is that of the anchorites, who, first established in cenobies and perfected in the active manner of life, chose the secret places of solitude. The third, which is blameworthy, is that of the Sarabaites.

“Thus the discipline of the cenobites took its beginning from the time of apostolic preaching. For such was that entire multitude of believers at Jerusalem, concerning whom it is said that ‘there was in them one heart and one soul in the Lord.’ ‘And all things were common to them,’ nor did anyone possess anything as his own.

“The anchorites had their origin from Elijah, afterward from John the Baptist, and then from Paul the first hermit and Anthony. But the Sarabaites had their origin from Ananias and Sapphira, whom Peter the Apostle punished with death.

“And because something was said about these three kinds in the preceding chapter, namely, concerning their morals, there is therefore nothing further here.”

When Germanus asks how patience and tranquility of mind can be acquired, Piamun answers:

“Patience and tranquility of mind are neither acquired nor retained without profound humility of heart. If patience descends from this fountain, it will need neither the benefit of a cell nor the refuge of solitude. But if we are moved when provoked in some matter, it is certain that humility is not firmly established in us.

“For no one is ignorant that those who endure are called patient from sufferings and endurance. Therefore, it is established that no one can be pronounced patient except him who has tolerated without indignation all things which have been inflicted upon him.”

He sets down two notable examples of this perfect patience.

The first concerns a certain noble matron who, greatly desiring to attain the perfection of patience, approached the blessed pontiff of that city, Athanasius, asking him to grant her one of the widows who at that time were supported by the Church as religious women, so that she might sustain her.

The bishop, assenting to her, caused one of them, who was more religious and humble than the others, to be granted to her. Finally, after the matron had taken this woman in and found her most obedient and humble in all things, she brought her back to the bishop, saying: “Holy father, I asked that one be granted to me whom I might sustain and whose needs I might serve. But I do not serve the woman whom you gave me.”

The bishop, understanding her holy purpose, caused a turbulent, proud, and undisciplined woman to be given to her. When this woman had been brought into her house, she did the contrary of what was commanded her, sometimes attacking that matron with reproaches and insults. The matron patiently, indeed joyfully, tolerated all things, giving thanks to the bishop because he had given her such a woman, by sustaining whom she might learn patience.

He sets down another example concerning Pannutius. While in his youth he was held in celebrated estimation among the elders because of his virtues, a certain man, led by the goads of envy so that he might blacken Pannutius’s reputation, entered his cell secretly after he had gone to the church and placed his own book among the palm leaves from which Pannutius made woven work, as though Pannutius had stolen it from him.

Thereafter that envious man went to the church, where all the fathers were gathered for the divine offices. When these had been completed, he brought a complaint concerning the book taken from him before the elders in judgment.

Because of this, when all held in horror that so great a crime had been committed, that malignant man urged that certain trustworthy men be sent to search in the cells of each person. When this had been done, the book was found where he had placed it and was brought before everyone in the church.

But Pannutius, seeing that a defense of his innocence would not be admitted, since the book had been found in his cell, sought pardon; and after a harsh rebuke, penance was imposed upon him by the abbot. He accepted it humbly, nevertheless asking the Lord, for the sake of removing the scandal from the minds of the others concerning so great a crime charged against him, that he would show his innocence.

This also was done. For within fifteen days that malignant man, seized by the devil, cried out that he had done it maliciously. Nor could he be freed from the demon through blessed Abbot Isidore, who had the grace of all men in this matter, namely, of expelling demons, nor through another saint, but only through the prayer of Pannutius. Thus Pannutius recovered his reputation.

Section XVIII

The nineteenth conference is that of Abbot John concerning comparison of the cenobitic life with the anchoritic life.

John Cassian says: After a few days, the desire for greater teaching drew us to the cenobium of Abbot Paul, and we proceeded with the greatest eagerness of spirit. Although a number of more than two hundred brothers dwelt there, we found a most ancient old man named John, whose words and humility, in which he excelled all the saints, we judge ought by no means to be passed over in silence. We knew that he flourished especially in this perfection, and that we cannot ascend to that sublimity, since we, content to sustain the yoke of subjection scarcely for two years—not to say until old age—immediately fly away to the presumption of a harmful liberty, so that we appear not to learn the fruit of patience but to await the time for acquiring license.

First admiring the man’s age and the grace with which he was endowed, with our faces cast down to the ground we began to entreat that he would deign to disclose to us for what cause, after abandoning the freedom of the desert and that sublime profession which had made him celebrated by fame above other men of the same life, he had wished to undergo the yoke of a cenobium.

As though unequal to the anchoritic discipline and unworthy of the sublimity of so great a perfection, he said that he had returned to the schools of the novices. When the humility of this response, by resisting us, attempted to exclude our entreaty, at last he began thus:

“I not only do not reject or flee from the anchoritic discipline which you marvel that I abandoned; rather, I embrace and receive it with complete devotion. I rejoice that I fulfilled another twenty years in it after the thirty years which I had also passed in the congregation of a cenobium, so that among those who pursued it even moderately I was not marked by the fault of complete sloth.

“But because the purity of that life, once tasted, was sometimes interrupted in solitude by carnal matters and became sullied [read: was sometimes impaired by concern for carnal matters and became sullied], it seemed more advantageous to return to the cenobium, both so that a readier completion of the more level purpose undertaken might follow, and so that there might be less danger to humility from not having presumed upon the more sublime profession. For it is better to be found devoted in lesser things than undevoted in greater promises.

“Accordingly, if perhaps I bring forth anything rather lofty, indeed rather free, I ask that you judge it to have been produced not by the vice of boasting but by zeal for your edification.

“Therefore, if anyone else, delighted by the secret places of the desert, was able to consign human fellowship to oblivion, I too confess that I attained it in the Lord, with his own teacher granting it [read: I too confess that, with the Lord granting it by his grace, I attained it], or certainly strove to attain it.

“Thus, by the pious gift of our Lord Jesus Christ, I remember that I was frequently rapt into ecstasies of this kind, so that I forgot that I was clothed with the burden of bodily frailty. My mind so suddenly rejected all the exterior senses and in every way became so exiled from all material things that neither my eyes nor my ears performed their proper office. I was so filled with divine meditations that frequently toward evening I did not know whether I had taken food, and on the following day I was entirely uncertain whether yesterday’s fast had been broken.

“But I shall encompass in a brief discourse the causes why I preferred to abandon that solitary life. For as long as, removed into more distant secret places, we were most frequently rapt into those heavenly ecstasies, and so great an invading multitude of visiting brothers did not, by the necessity of providing hospitality, burden our senses with the distractions of immense cares, I pursued the tranquil silences of solitude and that manner of life comparable to angelic blessedness with insatiable desire and with the whole ardor of my soul.

“But when, as I have said, a greater number of brothers began to fill the habitation of that solitude, and the freedom of the more extensive desert had been narrowed, not only did that fire of divine contemplation begin to grow cold, but it also hindered my mind in many ways with the bonds of carnal things. I chose to fulfill in some manner the purpose of this discipline rather than to grow torpid in that so sublime profession through provision for carnal necessities, so that, if liberty and spiritual eagerness for ecstasy are denied in it, nevertheless, once care for the following day has been entirely cast away, the fulfillment of the evangelical precept may console me. And may that which is withdrawn from me of that theoretical sublimity be compensated by this subjection of obedience. For it is miserable for anyone to profess the discipline of any art or study and never to arrive at its perfection.

“Therefore, I shall explain briefly what advantages I now enjoy in this manner of life. In this manner of life there is no provision for divine work [read: daily work], no distraction of selling or buying, no unavoidable care for the year’s bread, no solicitude for bodily things, because necessities are prepared not only for one’s own uses but also for those of many who come.

“There is no arrogance of human praise, which, being more unclean in the sight of God than all these things, is sometimes accustomed to empty even the great labors of the desert.

“A relaxation also of austerity in food, the concourse of brothers, the duties of receiving and escorting them, mutual visits, and the interminable care of diverse conversations and occupations cooled that liberty and eagerness of spirit belonging to the anchoritic life.

“Finally, although, while I am established in the cenobium, something of that anchoritic purity of heart has been diminished for me, I shall be content with the compensation of the one evangelical precept, namely, that I think nothing about tomorrow; and, subjected to the abbot until the end, I may be seen in some manner to emulate him of whom it is said, ‘He became obedient unto death,’ and may merit humbly to speak his words: ‘For I came not to do my own will, but that of the Father who sent me.’”

When he is asked what is the end of the cenobitic life and what is that of the eremitic life, John answers:

“We could have pronounced absolutely that one and the same man cannot be perfect in both professions, if the example of a very few did not restrain us. Indeed, it is a great thing to find anyone consummate in either one; how much more arduous, and I would say almost impossible, it is to perfect both to the full is manifest.

“Nevertheless, if anyone at any time has arrived at this, he cannot immediately be referred to a general formula. For a universal rule must not be proposed from consideration of a few, but from those things which are subject to the capacity of many, indeed of all.

“But if something is obtained very rarely and by very few, as though above the condition of human frailty and the nature granted to it, such things must be separated from general precepts and brought forward not so much as an example as a miracle.

“Therefore the end of the cenobite is to mortify and crucify all his wills and, according to the salutary commandment of evangelical perfection, to think nothing about tomorrow. Isaiah describes and praises this man when he says: ‘If you turn away your foot from the Sabbath, from doing your own will,’ and so forth.

“But the perfection of the hermit is to have a mind stripped of all earthly things and to retain it united with Christ insofar as human weakness permits. Jeremiah designates this man when he says: ‘Blessed is he who has borne the yoke from his youth; he shall sit solitary and be silent, and he shall raise himself above himself.’

“Nevertheless, we knew Abbot Moses, Pafuntius, and both men named Macarius to have possessed perfectly both lives, the cenobitic and the eremitic.

“But certain persons are accustomed to grow so savage through the long silence of solitude that they thoroughly dread the companionship of men. And when, with the visit of brothers intervening, they have departed even a little from the custom of their seclusion, they seethe with notable anguish of mind and evident indications of faintheartedness.

“This is especially accustomed to happen to those who, not perfectly instructed in cenobies and without their former vices having been thoroughly purged, transferred themselves to the solitary life with immature desire. Always imperfect and frail in either part, they are inclined in whatever direction a breeze of disturbance impels them.”

When Germanus asks how those dwelling in solitude may acquire the perfection of long-suffering and patience, and how it may be discerned whether these virtues are present or absent in us, John answers:

“To those truly seeking medicine, the remedies of cures cannot be lacking from that most true physician of souls, especially to those who have neither despised their infirmities through despair or negligence, nor concealed the dangers of their wounds, nor rejected the medicine with an insolent mind, but, for infirmities contracted through ignorance, error, or necessity, have at last fled humbly and with a cautious mind to the heavenly physician.

“Accordingly, we ought to know that, if we withdraw to solitude or other hidden places while our vices have not yet been cured, only their effect is restrained; their disposition is not extinguished. For the root of all sins which have not been extirpated lies hidden within us, indeed creeps within us. We perceive that it is still alive in us by these indications.

“For example, when, established in solitude, we receive the arrival of brothers or even their very brief stay with a certain anxiety of a seething mind, we should know that the most vigorous tinder of impatience is still present in us.

“Likewise, if, when a brother asks for a book to read or any other object to use, either his request saddens us or our refusal drives him away, there is no doubt that we are still fettered by the vice of avarice or by the snares of love of money.

“If either a sudden thought or the course of sacred reading has brought us the remembrance of a woman, and we sense ourselves struck by a certain titillation in it, we should know that the ardor of fornication is not yet extinguished in us.

“But if even the slightest elation tempts our mind at the comparison of our strictness with another’s laxity, it is certain that we are corrupted by the dreadful pestilence of pride.

“And thus each solitary who has striven to exhibit his purity not to men but to the sight of God will perceive by sure indications that the roots of each vice have been fixed within himself.”

When Germanus asks concerning the remedies of these passions, John answers, saying:

“When anyone perceives by those indications which we have stated above that he is attacked by disturbances of impatience or anger, let him always exercise himself by setting contrary things before himself. Let him propose to himself many kinds of injuries and losses as though inflicted upon him by another, and accustom his mind to submit with perfect humility to all things which depravity can inflict.

“Frequently setting harsh and intolerable things before himself, let him meditate with continual contrition of the whole heart upon how much gentleness he ought to meet them with. And thus, looking to those sufferings of all the saints or of the Lord himself, and pronouncing all kinds not only of insults but even of punishments to be less than his merits, he will prepare himself for endurance of every pain.”

When Germanus asks whether, just as the cure for anger and sadness was shown through setting contrary things before oneself, one must fight similarly against the spirit of fornication, John answers that one must not:

“For human fellowship not only does no harm to the remedies for the other vices but indeed contributes much. Hence, even when established in solitude, although the tinder and material of provocations cannot arise from men, nevertheless we ought deliberately to call back even their incitements, so that a readier cure may be conferred upon us as we fight against them in a continual struggle of thoughts.

“But against the spirit of fornication the account is diverse and the cause unlike. For just as the use of the body and the proximity of lust and flesh must be entirely withdrawn, so also must its memory be withdrawn from the mind.

“For it is sufficiently destructive for hearts still infirm and sick to admit even the slightest remembrance of this passion, so that sometimes even under remembrance of holy women, as though under the history of sacred reading, the goad of a harmful titillation is excited in them. For this reason our elders are accustomed most prudently to pass over readings of this sort in the presence of younger men.

“Therefore, for the perfect and those now consummate in the disposition of chastity, there will be a test concerning this passion of lust: so that he who knows that he has entirely extirpated the roots of this disease should, for the sake of testing his chastity, conceive in his mind some alluring image; and if, by thinking, he should fasten upon the enticement of the most flattering touches and perceive neither any assent of the mind nor any movement of the flesh excited in himself, he will receive most certain proofs of his purity.

“But it is not fitting for those who are still infirm to attempt this examination.” These are John’s words.

But it does not appear that the aforesaid test should be sought even by the perfect, for this would be to tempt oneself and seek for oneself an occasion of sin. Rather, when an occasion is offered to him—for example, because he must read or hear such things—or when such thoughts occur without his deliberately procuring them, then he will be able to make an experiment concerning himself.

Section XIX

The twentieth conference is that of Abbot Pinufius, which concerns penance and satisfaction and the many ways of procuring remission of sins.

This Pinufius was of such humility that, although he was a priest and presided over a great monastery in Egypt, most celebrated by reputation for perfection of virtues and for the grace of signs, lest the breeze of human favor empty for him the fruit of his labor, he secretly withdrew from his monastery. Putting on lay clothing, he approached a monastery of the strictest life situated in distant regions and asked to be received there as a monk.

There, after much rejection had been inflicted upon him at the gate, he was at last received and became the gardener’s servant. He not only diligently did all things enjoined upon him, but also secretly performed by night certain necessary works which the others avoided because of their loathsomeness.

Thus, after three years had passed, he was recognized and made manifest by a certain man of his former monastery who came there, and he was compelled to return to govern his own monastery. But not long afterward the same man went secretly to another monastery. There also, when he was finally recognized, he was brought back to his own.

Pinufius answers Germanus’s question thus:

“Because you inquire not about the quality of penance, but, being solicitous concerning its end and the judgment of satisfaction, investigate that which was passed over by others, so that the desire of your purpose may be satisfied with every brevity and compendium, the full and perfect definition of penance is that we by no means admit thereafter the sins for which we perform penance; that is, that we purpose not to commit them.

“But an indication of true satisfaction and indulgence is also to have expelled affection for them from our hearts. For each person should know that he has not yet been absolved from his former sins for as long as, while he applies himself to satisfaction and groans, an image either of those crimes which he committed or of similar crimes plays before his eyes, and not merely delight in them but even their remembrance assails the secret places of his mind.

“Accordingly, he who keeps vigil for satisfaction should know that he has then been absolved from his crimes and has received pardon for his past offenses when he senses that his heart is by no means struck either by the enticements or by the imagination of those vices.

“And, so that these same things which have been said may be expressed more meaningfully: only then must we believe that the past contagions of the vices have been remitted to us, when the desires and passions for present pleasures have been driven from our heart.”

Germanus raises a question and, as though objecting it against the foregoing, says:

“Whence will so salutary a compunction of humiliation be able to arise in us, which is thus described from the person of the penitent: ‘I have made my sin known to you’; and this: ‘Every night I shall wash my bed,’ and so forth, if we exclude the memory of our sins from our hearts, when, to the contrary, we are commanded to retain it tenaciously, the Lord saying: ‘I will not remember your iniquities; but you, remember’?”

Pinufius answers:

“Your question was proposed not concerning the quality of penance but concerning its end and the indication of satisfaction, and to this, as I judge, a fitting answer has been made.

“But what you have said concerning remembrance of sins is sufficiently useful and necessary to those still performing penance, so that with the continual bruising of their breast they may proclaim: ‘For I know my iniquity, and my sin is always against me,’ that is, before me.

“Therefore, while we are performing penance and are still bitten by remembrance of the acts of the vices, it is necessary that a rain of tears in us extinguish the fire of our conscience which arose from confession of faults.

“But when, in the case of anyone fixed in this humility of heart and contrition of spirit and persevering in this labor and groaning, their remembrance has been quieted and the thorn of conscience has been plucked from the marrow of his soul by the grace of the merciful God, it is certain that he has arrived at the end of satisfaction and the merit of indulgence and has been purged from the stain of the crimes committed.

“Nevertheless, this oblivion is not otherwise reached except through oblivion of the vices and former dispositions and through perfect and entire purity of heart. Without doubt, no one of those who through sloth or contempt has neglected to purge his vices will attain this, but only he who, continuing groans and sighs with such constancy, has thoroughly purged every stain of former defilements.”

Concerning the fact that sins are forgiven through many ways and means, Pinufius speaks thus:

“After that general grace of baptism and that gift of most precious martyrdom which is acquired by washing in blood, there are many fruits of penance through which one arrives at expiation of crimes.

“For eternal salvation is not promised only under that simple name of penance concerning which Peter says, ‘Repent and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out.’ Rather, the mass of sins is also covered through the disposition of charity, for ‘charity covers a multitude of sins,’ says Peter.

“Similarly, medicine is applied to our wounds through the fruit of alms, because, ‘as water extinguishes fire, so alms extinguishes sin,’ says the Wise Man.

“It is also applied through the outpouring of tears, according to this: ‘Every night I shall wash my bed,’ and so forth.

“Also, through confession of crimes, their abolition is granted, according to this: ‘I said: I will confess my injustice against myself to the Lord.’

“Through affliction of heart and body also, remission of crimes committed is obtained; hence the Psalmist says, ‘See my humiliation and my labor, and forgive all my sins.’

“And especially through amendment of morals: ‘Remove,’ says the Lord through Isaiah, ‘the evil of your thoughts from before my eyes; cease to act perversely; learn to do good,’ and so forth. And it is added: ‘If your sins are as scarlet, they shall be made white as snow.’

“Sometimes pardon for offenses is obtained by the intercession of the saints. ‘For he who knows,’ says John in the epistle, ‘that his brother sins a sin which is not unto death, let him ask, and the Lord will give life to him who sins.’

“Sometimes it is obtained by the merit of mercy and faith, according to this: ‘Through mercy and faith sins are purged.’

“It is obtained also through the salvation and conversion of those who are saved by our merits and preaching. ‘For those who cause a sinner to be converted from the error of his way,’ says James, ‘save his soul from death and cover a multitude of sins.’

“It is obtained also through forgiveness of offenses committed against a man. ‘If you forgive men their sins,’ says the Savior, ‘your Father also will forgive you your sins.’

“You see, therefore, how many approaches of mercy divine clemency has opened, so that no one desiring salvation may be broken by despair when he sees himself invited to life by so many remedies.” These are Pinufius’s words.

But these things must be understood soundly. For “sin” sometimes signifies the fault or offense itself, and sometimes the penalty owed for that sin.

With respect to the fault, principally and effectively God alone pardons: “I alone,” he says through Isaiah, “blot out your iniquities.” And Augustine says: “No one forgives sins except Christ, who is the Lamb of God,” and so forth, in No One, On Consecration, Distinction IV.

But on the part of the sinner, contrition alone does so through the mediation of grace, according to this saying of Ezekiel: “On whatever day the sinner is converted and groans, I will not remember all his iniquities,” says the Lord.

But with respect to the temporal penalty owed for sins, all the foregoing avail in this manner toward remission of sins, that is, of the penalties owed for sins. This must be understood if they are done in the state of grace. For deeds performed while in mortal sin do not avail toward this, but dispositively toward remission of mortal sins; that is, so that through them someone may be disposed and rendered fit for grace and true contrition, as is said in False, On Penance, Distinction V.

And below Pinufius says:

“If shame restrains you and you blush to reveal these things before men, do not cease to confess them in continual supplication to him from whom they cannot be hidden and to say to him, ‘For I know my iniquity.’”

This also must be understood soundly. For after that decretal Everyone of Either Sex, On Penance and Remission, was issued, it is necessary to confess if one has opportunity and is able. But in the time of John Cassian such a matter was a subject of opinion, namely, whether confession must necessarily be made to a priest. Or this can be understood concerning public confession, which used to be made by religious for mortification.

And Pinufius adds:

“Therefore, deliberately to call back the memory of past sins ought by no means to be done. Indeed, even if it should creep upon one violently, it should immediately be driven away.

“For while you recall those things which, according to the prince of this world, you committed either through ignorance or through wantonness, although I grant you that, while you are placed in this thought, no delight creeps upon you, nevertheless it is necessary that the mere thought of the ancient putrefaction should corrupt the mind with a foul stench and should corrupt the spiritual fragrance of the virtues, that is, the sweetness of a good odor.

“Therefore, when the memory of past vices strikes the sense, one must recoil from it just as an honest and serious man flees if he is accosted publicly with conversations or embraces by an immodest and insolent woman.

“For it is accustomed to happen frequently that, while someone inexperienced treats his own falls or those of others with the disposition of one who pities, he himself also is struck by the voluptuous assent of a most subtle dart; and the beginning which arose under the appearance of piety is concluded with an obscene and harmful end.

“For this reason we must strive to provoke ourselves to laudable compunction through appetite for the virtues and desire for the kingdom of heaven rather than through harmful remembrances of the vices.

“Nevertheless, let no one believe that he can obtain the cutting away of the movements and dispositions of sins from his heart unless with every fervor of his spirit he has cut away the causes, materials, or occasions because of which he fell into crimes. For example, if he fell into fornication through familiarity with women, let him avoid even the sight of them; and so concerning the others.”

But that aforesaid definition of oblivion is established only concerning capital crimes, and especially concerning carnal vices, because when such things are considered particularly, they excite the sensitive power toward concupiscence.

But there will never be a lack of repentance for these lesser things in which, as Solomon says in Proverbs, “the just man falls seven times in the day and rises.” “Seven times” is said because every day, either unwillingly or willingly, we frequently fall through ignorance, through oblivion, through thought, through speech, through sudden surreption, through necessity, or through the frailty of the flesh. For we fall into these things with so great a facility, as though by a natural law, that however great the circumspection and vigilance with which they are guarded against, they cannot be avoided.

Section XX

The twenty-first conference is that of Abbot Theonas concerning the fast of Lent and the remission of fasting in the fifty days after Easter.

This Theonas, as John Cassian says, while he was established in adolescence, took a wife by arrangement of his parents and remained with her for five years.

But on a certain day, when he together with other laymen had offered the tithes and firstfruits of their produce to Abbot John the deacon, the said abbot gave them many admonitions of salvation, showing that by offering or paying temporal tithes alone a person did not attain evangelical perfection. Among other things he said:

“Therefore, if even those who faithfully offer the tithes of their produce serve the more ancient commandments of the Lord, and still cannot ascend to the evangelical summit, you perceive most manifestly how far from it are those who do not even do these things. For how will those who scorn to fulfill even the light commandments of the law be able to be participants in evangelical grace, since those who do not fulfill them are declared accursed?

“Therefore, he who exhibits fruits worthy of the calling and grace of Christ, namely, of evangelical perfection, fulfills this: ‘Go, sell what you possess, and follow me.’”

These words so penetrated the heart of Theonas that, kindled by an inextinguishable desire for evangelical perfection, he thenceforth purposed to abandon the world. Returning home, therefore, he began to exhort his wife to a religious manner of life and to contempt of the world. But when, after many invitations to this, she in no way assented, he finally left her and flew to a monastery, although she was unwilling, and took up the religious habit.

John Cassian prudently adds:

“Let no one suppose that we composed these things to provoke divorces between spouses. We not only do not condemn marriage in the least; rather, following the Apostle’s opinion, we say, ‘Marriage is honorable among all, and the bed undefiled.’ But I have related them so that I might faithfully disclose to the reader the beginning of the conversion by which so great a man was dedicated to God. Therefore, let each person have his own judgment concerning him.”

According to that common evangelical law, “What God has joined, let man not separate,” and the canonical law, in Agatho, Cause XXVII, Question II, this was not lawful. But according to the private law of the Holy Spirit, which is more powerful than the common law, it was lawful. “For those who are led by the Holy Spirit are not under the law.”

But no one ought to follow such a private law of the Holy Spirit outside the common law unless he is certain concerning the inspiration of the Holy Spirit; otherwise he will frequently be deceived by the devil.

That what this man did was through the spiritual prompting of the Holy Spirit is evident from the fact that God afterward worked miracles through him, and what followed upon his perfection, which had not been attempted by any of the fathers, was not reproved. John Cassian also holds this opinion.

When Germanus asks why during those fifty days after the Resurrection they did not fast in those regions or bend their knees in prayer, although these things were done in other places, Theonas answers:

“It is fitting that we prolong the authority of the fathers and the custom of our elders down to our own time through so long a series of years, and now defer to them without having understood their rationale [read: defer to the authority of the fathers and the custom of our elders, prolonged down to our own time through so long a series of years, even when their rationale has not been understood], and guard that tradition with continual observance and reverence as handed down from antiquity.

“But because you desire to know the causes and rationales of this practice, receive briefly what we have learned was handed down by our elders. Nevertheless, first let us say a few things concerning the nature and quality of fasting.

“Divine Wisdom, through Ecclesiastes, designated that all things have their proper time, saying: ‘All things have a time: a time to be born and a time to die,’ and so forth in what follows, finally concluding that ‘for every matter there is a time and opportunity.’

“Therefore, it must be known that certain things are principally good or evil in themselves and can never be changed into the contrary, such as justice, prudence, fortitude, temperance, and the other virtues; or, conversely, the vices, whose definitions can by no means fall or be changed into the other part.

“But if certain things can sometimes pass to either disposition, so that, according to the quality of those using them, they are found to appear either good or evil, these are understood to be useful at one time or harmful at another, not absolutely through their nature, but through the disposition of the one performing them and the opportunity of the time.

“Therefore he determines well that fasting is not in the number of those things which are always good, as are the virtues, or evil in themselves, as are the vices, but that it possesses itself in an intermediate manner, because it is at one time laudable and at another blameworthy.

“For fasting is laudable and virtuous for restraining the vices of the flesh, making satisfaction for sins, and obeying the commandment concerning fasts. But through fasting to deprive oneself of the necessities of life, or for its sake to omit the duties of charity, is blameworthy and vicious.

“Just as a discreet fast, when kept, justifies, so it does not condemn when broken, unless perhaps transgression of a commandment rather than the taking of food is punished.

“But there ought to be no time empty of a principal good, namely, of the virtues, so that it is lawful for anyone to exist without it, because through ceasing from it the negligent person necessarily falls into evil. Nor, conversely, is any time granted to a principal evil, namely, to the vices, because it is always harmful and, if admitted, will never be able not to harm.

“And accordingly it is manifest that those things whose qualities and times we see to be established, and which, although observed, sanctify, yet when omitted do not defile, are intermediate things—for example, marriages, agriculture, riches, solitudes, withdrawal [read: withdrawal into solitude], vigils, meditation upon sacred things, reading of books, and the fasts themselves concerning which the discourse treats.

“Divine command or the authority of the sacred Scriptures did not decree that all these things must be obtained unceasingly or continually observed in such a way that to have interrupted them for a little while is wicked. For whatever is decreed by way of command denotes death if it is not fulfilled. But those things which are counseled rather than commanded profit when done; when not done, they are not punished.

“For this reason our elders commanded us to do either all these things, or certainly certain of them, circumspectly according to cause, place, measure, and time, and to observe them providently.

“Thus, if anyone who needs refreshment because of failure of the body does not consent to relax the rigor of abstinence, he will be judged cruel and the murderer of his own body.

“Likewise, when the season of festivity grants a fitting support of foods and indulgence of necessary refreshment, if anyone desires to retain the rigid observance of fasts without interruption, he must be regarded not so much as religious as uncultivated and irrational.

“Therefore, one must labor so that those virtues which are truly good may be acquired through fasts and their other means, not so that those exercises of virtues tend toward fasting as their end. Bodily affliction and other things of this kind are useful for this reason: that through them we may arrive at charity.

“That, therefore, is principally the best thing for the sake of which those things which are intermediate are done. But the chief good itself, because it is good through itself and not for the sake of another, is pursued not for another cause but only for the sake of its own goodness.

“Therefore the fathers instituted relaxation of fasts during the fifty days after the Resurrection so that they might fittingly conform themselves to the season. For the joyful feast of the Resurrection is celebrated, through which the Lord Jesus, rising and dwelling with his disciples, gladdened them by his presence. Hence he himself, while still mortal, had said: ‘The sons of the bridegroom,’ that is, the disciples, ‘cannot fast for as long as the bridegroom is with them.’ Therefore fasts were relaxed at that time.

“Ten days are added to the forty days extending to the Lord’s Ascension, because during those days the apostles joyfully awaited the coming of the Holy Spirit, so that there might be the number fifty of the jubilee, which is solemnly and joyfully celebrated in years under the Old Law, and Pentecost in days, when they offered the loaves of the firstfruits to the Lord in a figure. For on the fiftieth day the new bread, namely, of evangelical teaching, was offered to the people at the coming of the Holy Spirit for the glory of God, and through it five thousand men were refreshed when conversion had taken place.

“For this reason, therefore, because of the joy of the Lord’s Resurrection, fasting and bending of the knees are omitted during those fifty days and on all the Lord’s days, because these things pertain to humiliation and mourning, not to joy and festivity.

“But if we weigh all the things which we do by the rational examination of the mind, and concerning the purity of our heart consult not the judgment of others but always our own conscience, it is certain that this inward interval of refreshment cannot obstruct just strictness, provided that, as has been said, an equitable measure of indulgence and continence is weighed in an equal balance, that an uncorrupted mind similarly chastises excess in either direction, and that the weight of delights does not oppress our spirit.

“For our God wills nothing to be done for his worship and honor without moderation of judgment, because ‘the honor of the king loves judgment,’ says the Psalmist.

“Therefore, with every caution and skill, let the intention of a continually circumspect heart be examined, lest in any manner, with the judgment of discretion erring, either kindled by desire for inconsiderate abstinence or enticed by desire for excessive relaxation, we weigh the substance of our strength by the test of an unequal balance.

“But, placing purity of soul in one scale and strength in the other, let us so weigh both by the judgment of a true conscience that, with affection for one thing preponderating, we incline the balance of equity too far to neither side, either toward immoderate strictness or toward excessive relaxation, and this be said to us because of excessive relaxation or strictness: ‘If you offer rightly but do not divide rightly, you have sinned.’

“And this of the Psalmist: ‘The sons of men are liars in balances, that they may deceive.’ And this of Proverbs: ‘You shall not have diverse weights in your bag, a greater and a lesser. Let the scale be just and the weights equal.’

“These words can be understood not only with respect to our own works, namely, that we exercise ourselves neither more strictly nor more laxly in fasts and other exercises, but also with respect to others, namely, that we impose heavy burdens of commandments upon others and take up light ones ourselves. Or again, that we do not display to others works of greater sanctity from ourselves while secretly doing lesser works.

“Therefore, it must be provided most vigilantly that the vigor of our mind is never enervated by flattering seductions, lest through the repose and security of the fifty days we lose the purity of chastity sought by continual labor during Lent.”

When Germanus afterward asks why Lent is celebrated in six weeks, although in some places it is observed in seven weeks so that, when the Lord's days have been subtracted, the sum of forty days is fulfilled, Theonas answers that through this fast that commandment of the Lord is fulfilled: "You shall offer tithes and firstfruits to the Lord your God."

For since the year consists of three hundred and sixty-five days, the tenth part of the number three hundred and sixty is the number thirty-six. But from the six weeks of Lent, when the six Lord's days on which no fasting is done have been subtracted, thirty-six days remain.

For the number five which remains from the three hundred and sixty-five days of the year, the night of the Lord's Resurrection, as though half of a natural day, makes satisfaction.

But those who fast for seven weeks interrupt the fast not only on the Lord's day but also on the Sabbath; hence they also fast for only thirty-six days.

This fast received the name "Lent" because our Savior fasted for forty days, and Moses and Elijah in the Old Testament, and in a figure of the people of Israel, who walked through the desert for forty years while proceeding to the promised land and made forty stopping places there.

Add that afterward Gregory I added four days to the fast of the six weeks, so that by fasting for forty days we might thus imitate the fast of Christ, namely, of forty days.

But we offer firstfruits to the Lord every day when, scarcely awakened from sleep and rising with an eagerness as though restored to life after slumber, before they conceive in the heart a movement of any sense or admit memory or care of a household matter, men consecrate the origins and beginnings of their thoughts in divine whole burnt offerings.

What else, therefore, do these persons discharge except the true firstfruits of their produce through the high priest Jesus Christ for the use of this life and the image of the daily resurrection? And, awakened from sleep, similarly offering to God the sacrifice of their rejoicing, they sacrifice to their God the offices of their mouth by invoking him with the first movement of their tongue.

But when Theonas asserts that sin cannot exercise true dominion over him who faithfully subsists under the liberty of grace, the Apostle saying, "Sin shall not have dominion over you, for you are not under the law but under grace," Germanus asks how this is true when sin appears to have dominion in almost all the baptized.

Theonas answers:

"I judge it necessary that we first inquire what is the purpose or will of the law, or what is the discipline and perfection of grace, so that consequently from these things we may be able to recognize either the dominion of sin or its expulsion."

After he has set down many differences between the Mosaic law and grace—for example, that the law commands marriages while grace invites to virginity; the law commands that tithes be given, while grace commands that all things be distributed to the poor for Christ's sake; the law commands that an eye be rendered for an eye, while grace commands that enemies be loved and good done to them—he says:

"Therefore, whoever has ascended to this summit of evangelical perfection, elevated above every law by the merits of such great virtues, and not omitting all the things which were commanded through Moses but judging them as though small, knows that he exists only under the grace of the Savior.

"Therefore sin does not have dominion in him, because the charity of God which has been poured out in his heart excludes every affection for any other thing. Nor can he either desire forbidden things or despise things commanded, for his pursuit and desire, always intent upon divine love, is so little seized by delight in worthless things that he does not use even those things which have been permitted.

"But under the law in which the rights of marriages are observed, although the wandering of lust, having been restrained, is enslaved to one woman alone, nevertheless the goads of carnal concupiscence cannot fail to flourish.

"And it is difficult for the fire to which fuels are even deliberately supplied to be confined within the boundaries established for it in such a way that, when it wanders outside them, it does not also burn whatever it touches. Although its own object always meets it so that it is not permitted to seethe inwardly, nevertheless it also burns while it is restrained, because the will itself is culpable, and the custom of intercourse is swiftly carried away into the excesses of adulteries.

"But the grace of the Savior consumes with the fire of charity all the thorns of carnal desires in those whom it has inflamed.

"Therefore, whoever has retained the perfection of evangelical teaching, established under grace, is not oppressed by the dominion of sin. For to be under grace is this: to fulfill those things which are commanded by grace.

“But whoever is unwilling to be subjected to the fullness of evangelical perfection should not be ignorant that, although he may appear to himself to have been baptized and to be a monk, he is not under grace but is still fettered by the bonds of the law and weighed down by the burden of sin.

“The purpose of him who is under grace is also not to empty or destroy the Mosaic enactments, but to fulfill them. This must be understood with respect to moral matters.

“Certain persons, entirely ignorant of this and neglecting the magnificence of Christ’s counsels and exhortations, are so unrestrained by presumptuous security in liberty that they not only fail to attain Christ’s commandments as though they were arduous, but even scorn as antiquated those things which, as small commands for beginners, were commanded by the Mosaic law. They say with a harmful liberty what the Apostle execrates: that ‘we are not under the law but under grace.’ Thus, neither ascending to the summit of evangelical teaching nor fulfilling the small commandments of the law, they are oppressed by the double dominion of sins. Hence Peter says: ‘As free, and not as having liberty for a cloak of malice.’”

Section XXI

The twenty-second conference, which is also the second of Theonas, concerns pollution which occurs in sleep, proceeding from a threefold cause; when communion must be abstained from because of it; and the fact that no one except Christ is without sin.

When John Cassian and Germanus therefore returned to Theonas and asked why, when they sometimes fasted more laxly, they were titillated by lighter goads of the flesh, but sometimes, when they abstained more strictly and their body was afflicted and exhausted, they were driven by more grievous incitements, so that upon awakening they found themselves polluted in the flesh, Theonas answered, assigning the following rationale in this matter:

“Our elders handed down a threefold cause of this infestation, just as it breaks forth in untimely emissions at the appointed time [read: which breaks beyond the measure of the appointed time through untimely emissions]. For it is either accumulated through the excessive abundance of superfluous food, or discharged through carelessness of the mind, or provoked by the snares of the mocking enemy.

“Therefore, first, the vice of voracity or gluttony expels this superabundance of obscene humor. For even when it pollutes the condition of purity during a time of stricter abstinence, it is poured forth not from the present want of food, as you think, but from the abundance of former satiety.

“For that which had been congealed in the marrow through the voracity of gluttony must be discharged through itching, or certainly through ignorance, although the body has wasted away by a great fast.

“Therefore, one must abstain not only from richer foods, but even the cheaper foods must be moderated by equal continence. Indeed, satiety even from bread and water must be avoided.

“For although it must necessarily be confessed that certain persons, even without any exertion of the mind, either through the temperament of their bodies or because of the maturity of past age, are more rarely defiled or certainly are not polluted by the discharge of this flux, nevertheless he who obtains peace by an inert facility is of one merit, and he who merits triumph by glorious virtues is of another.

“The second cause of this impure discharge exists if the mind, made empty of spiritual studies and exercises and not instructed in the disciplines of the inner man, has contracted for itself through the habit of the continual body [read: continual sloth] a certain mold of sluggishness; or when, by failing to guard against the minutiae of defiled thoughts, it so sluggishly desires that most sublime purity of heart that it believes all perfection and the summit of chastity to consist in chastisement of the body alone.

“Although the body of such a person may be chastised by rigid fasting, nevertheless thoughts and passions disturb him while sleeping with alluring phantasms. Through their disturbance, before the course of the lawful time, obscene humors are elicited, not now from necessity of nature but from the deceit of wickedness. Therefore, first of all, the wanderings of the senses must be restrained.

“The third cause exists when, through an ordered and solicitous discipline of continence together with contrition of heart and body, we desire to acquire perpetual purity of chastity, but the most deceitful enemy, while we are excellently consulting the utility of flesh and spirit, so attacks us through envy that he attempts to cast down the confidence of our conscience and to humble us as though by some guilt.

“This occurs especially on the days on which we apply ourselves more to chastity, when, without any itching of the flesh or consent of the mind and without the illusion of any phantasm, he nevertheless pollutes us by the simple discharge of that flux, so that he may deter us from holy communion.

“Although in certain beginners this illusion is believed to occur by a diabolical operation for this reason: that, when he knows them to apply themselves to more intense fasts, he may overturn them in this respect, so that, when they see that, while devoted to stricter fasts, they are more disturbed by illusions of this kind, they relax the fasts from which they judge that they receive no help.”

When they afterward ask whether communion must be omitted because of this pollution, he answers:

“If that most wicked enemy has mocked the vigilance of a sleeping mind so that he may withdraw from us the medicine of the heavenly remedy—only provided that no blameworthy itching has intervened and it is contaminated by no assent of delight, but is driven forth by discharge, natural necessity, or certainly an assault of the devil without a sensation of pleasure, and he has done this to impede our sanctification—we can and ought confidently to approach the grace of the salutary food.”

“But if this congealed matter has been discharged through our own fault, let us address our conscience and fear that apostolic saying: ‘Whoever shall eat the bread and drink the chalice of the Lord unworthily shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord.’”

To show that this impurity is sometimes elicited by the operation of the enemy, he introduces the example of a certain man who fervently exercised himself in divine service and diligently applied himself to chastity. On those days on which communion was customarily made, such pollution happened to him by night.

When the fathers, investigating the matter subtly, perceived that this happened without his fault, they counseled him not to omit communion because of it. When this was done, the illusion ceased; whence it appeared that this proceeded from the operation of the devil so that he might remove from the man the benefit of communion.

“For those are the true and incorrupt virgins of Christ. Those are considered admirable and excellent eunuchs—not those who are afraid, but those who have no desire to fornicate; not those who restrain the reins of immodesty, but those who have overcome even the excessive titillation of the mind and the slightest incitements of lust.

“And they have attenuated that sense of the flesh, so to speak, to such an extent that not only is it touched by no delight arising from its disturbance, but not even by a slight titillation.

“But we ought to fortify our heart with so great a guard of humility that we hold this determination with perfect stability of the senses: that we can by no means arrive at so great a merit of purification. For even those who are slightly elated concerning the purity of their body are, by God’s permission, polluted through pride for their humiliation.

“And although through the grace of God we may obtain that perfect purity of heart and body, nevertheless let us believe ourselves unworthy of sacred communion.

“First, because the majesty of that heavenly manna is so great that no one here, surrounded by clayey flesh, receives that food by his own merit and not from the gratuitous largesse of the Lord.

“Second, because no one can be so circumspect in the conflict of this world that at least rare or light darts of sins do not strike him, for it is impossible that he does not sin either through ignorance, negligence, sudden surreption, thought, necessity, or oblivion. Hence the Apostle, after he had said, ‘I am conscious of nothing in myself,’ added, ‘But I am not justified in this.’

“Although we can call many men holy—for that which is dedicated to God is called holy, whence even the vessels of the Church are called holy—nevertheless no one can be called immaculate, that is, existing without the stain of any sin, except the Lord Jesus Christ. Concerning him the Apostle says to the Hebrews: ‘For we do not have such a high priest who cannot have compassion upon our infirmities, tempted in all things according to likeness, without sin.’

“By this sole exception he is distinguished from us all: because we are not without sin, but it is established that he was tempted without sin.

“For what man, however strong and warlike he may be, is nevertheless not generally shaken by hostile darts? But he alone, receiving the condition of human mortality together with all the frailty of the flesh, was never touched by the stains of any defilement.

“He was tempted in the desert concerning gluttony, avarice, and pride or vainglory, according to our likeness, namely, because we are tempted by these things, but without sin. For although in the temptations of these and other vices we do not succumb by consenting, nevertheless we are very frequently detained by some complacency of sensuality. But no delight of sin bit the Lord Jesus in his temptations.”

Section XXII

The twenty-third conference, which is the third of Theonas, extensively discusses and explains that authority of the Apostle to the Romans: “For I do not do the good which I will, but the evil which I hate, that I do”; or this: “But if I do what I will, now it is not I who work it, but the sin which dwells in me”; or this: “For I delight in the law of God according to the inner man, but I see another law in my members fighting against the law of my mind,” and so forth.

When Germanus said that these words of the Apostle were spoken by the Apostle not from his own person but from that of sinners, Theonas refutes such an exposition, saying:

“To the contrary, it is shown evidently that these words can in no way fit the person of sinners, but pertain only to those who have been pronounced perfect and fittingly to the sanctity of those who follow after the merits of the apostles.

“For in what way,” he says, “can that which is said, ‘For I do not do the good which I will, but the evil which I hate, that I do,’ fit the person of sinners?

“For who among offenders is unwillingly entangled in fornications, adulteries, thefts, homicides, and other evils? Rather, they desire so greatly to fulfill the evil desires of sins that with vigilant care they even hunt for an opportunity to commit the crimes conceived. And, as Jeremiah says, ‘They have labored that they might act unjustly.’

“Since, therefore, sinners do not hate but love evil things, it remains that the force of the sense of the Apostle’s words should be measured from the inward disposition of the speaker. Let us discuss what the Apostle called good, and what in comparison with it he pronounced evil, not by the bare signification of the words but with the same intention which he possessed.

“Let us also scrutinize his understanding according to the dignity and merit of the one pronouncing it. For then, with God inspiring, we will be able to comprehend the statements brought forth according to his purpose and will, when, weighing the condition and merit of those by whom they were promulgated, we put on an equal disposition not in word but through experience. According to the quality of this disposition, without doubt all meanings are conceived and opinions are brought forth.

“Therefore, let us diligently investigate what is the principal good which the Apostle was unable to perfect when he willed it.

“We know many good things which we cannot deny that the blessed Apostle and all men of the same merit both possessed through nature and acquired through grace. For chastity is good, continence laudable, prudence admirable, humanity generous, sobriety circumspect, temperance modest, mercy pious, and justice holy.

“We do not doubt that all these were so full and perfect in the Apostle Paul and his companions that religion was taught by them through mastery of virtues rather than through words.

“Since, therefore, Paul abounded in such great goods, we will not be able to recognize what was that good whose perfection he lacked unless we have advanced into that disposition in which he himself spoke.

“Indeed, all his aforesaid virtues, like precious gems, if compared with that evangelical pearl for the purchase of which that merchant sold all his possessions, become of little value and are despised before its excellence.

“Therefore we must see what is that one thing which is preferred to such great and innumerable goods as though the others had been despised. Certainly it is that best part, whose magnificence and perpetuity Mary preferred after the duty of receiving and providing hospitality had been abandoned, concerning which it was said by the Lord: ‘Mary has chosen the best part.’

“Therefore there is one and only contemplation, that is, contemplation of God, after which all merits of justifications and all pursuits of the virtues are deservedly placed.

“Indeed, all those things which we said were in the Apostle are not only good and useful, but also great and precious. But just as tin, a metal good in itself, appears most worthless when compared with silver; silver vanishes by comparison with gold; and gold by comparison with gems; so those merits of the virtues, good and useful at present and to be carried into eternity in the future, if compared with the merits of divine contemplation, will be judged worthless and, so to speak, things to be sold in order to possess it.

“The authority of the Scriptures also confirms this comparison. For Scripture says: ‘God saw all things which he had made, and they were very good.’ And Solomon says: ‘All things which God has made are good in their time.’

“Therefore, these things are not called good simply, but are pronounced ‘very good’ with an addition. For, while we dwell in this world, they are truly suitable to us either for the use of life, for medicine of the body, or for some cause of utility unknown to us. Or certainly they are very good in that through the things which have been made they cause us to behold, understood, the invisible things of God from the creation of the world, and to contemplate also his eternal power and divinity from so great an ordered construction of the fabric of the world and the subsistence of all things which are in it.

“Nevertheless, all these things will not retain even the name of good if they are compared with that future age, where there is no change of good things and no corruption of true blessedness to be feared. The blessedness of that world is thus described: ‘The light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun sevenfold.’

“Therefore, these things, great and excellent to sight and marvelous, if compared with future promises, will immediately appear vanity, David saying: ‘All shall grow old as a garment, and as a covering you shall change them, and they shall be changed; but you are the same.’

“Therefore, because nothing is stable through itself, nothing is good except the Deity alone. But all creatures, so that they may obtain the blessedness of eternity or immutability, attain it not through their nature but through participation in and the grace of their Creator; they cannot retain the merit of goodness conferred by their Creator.

“In the Gospel also many things are pronounced good, such as a good tree, a good treasure, a good man, or a good servant. And nevertheless, if we look to the goodness of God, none of them will be pronounced good, Christ saying: ‘No one is good except God alone.’

“Finally, just as our good things, compared with divine goodness, are turned into wickedness, so also our justice, compared with divine justice, is reckoned similar to a menstrual cloth.

“Therefore, although all the aforesaid merits of the virtues are good and precious in themselves, they are nevertheless darkened by comparison with the clarity of contemplation.

“For although saints are occupied by good works, those works nevertheless greatly draw them away from contemplation of that highest good by earthly pursuits. Hence, although great rewards of merit were prepared for the Apostle from preachings and other labors, nevertheless his mind, although holy and sublime, could not but sometimes be torn away from the intention of that heavenly contemplation by an earthly work.

“Finally, when he saw that he was enriched by such and so great fruits, and, to the contrary, weighed the good of contemplation in his heart, and placed, as though in one scale, the advancement of so many good things and, in the other, the delight of divine contemplation, here the immense rewards of labors delighted him; there the desire for unity and the inseparable fellowship of Christ invited him even to dissolution of the flesh. Anxious at last, he proclaims and says: ‘What I shall choose, I do not know. For I am constrained between two, having a desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ, for this is much better; but to remain in the flesh is more necessary for your sake.’

“Therefore, when he had preferred the excellence of this good even to all the fruits of his preaching, he nevertheless submits himself in contemplation of charity and, for the sake of his neighbors, does not refuse a separation from Christ harmful to himself but necessary to others.

“Those who cover the eyes of their heart with a thick veil of vices and, according to Christ’s saying, ‘seeing, do not see,’ believe that they can contract no fault from these idle and slippery excursions of thoughts; and, contemplating nothing except capital crimes, they believe that only those must be avoided.

“To the contrary, those who establish the sum of all their will, joy, and blessedness in contemplation of divine and spiritual things, when they are drawn from it even slightly and unwillingly by violent thoughts, punish it in themselves as a certain kind of sacrilege by the vengeance of present penance. Lamenting that they preferred to their Creator the most worthless creature toward which the gaze of the mind was deflected, they ascribe to themselves, I would almost say, a crime of impiety.

“And although they turn the eyes of their heart toward beholding the clarity of divine glory with the highest eagerness, nevertheless, not enduring the briefest darkness of carnal thoughts, they execrate whatever draws the gaze of the mind away from that true light.

“Although the saints disdain all things in which this world is occupied, nevertheless it is impossible that they are not carried away to them even by a brief excess of thoughts. No man except our Savior has continually retained the natural wandering of the mind so fixed in contemplation of God while dwelling in the present life that, being carried away from it, he never sinned by delight in any worldly thing, Scripture saying: ‘The stars are not clean in his sight.’

“Therefore, the saints, having experienced that they were unable by human strength to attain their desired end while the burden of the flesh resisted them, and that according to the desire of their heart they could not be joined to that chief and highest good but were led captive from its sight to worldly things, fly to the grace of God which justifies and declare with the Apostle: ‘Unhappy man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? The grace of God through Jesus Christ.’

“For they sense that they cannot perfect that good which they will, but fall into that evil which they do not will and which they hate, that is, the movements of thoughts and the care of bodily things.

“Indeed, they delight in the law of God according to the inner man, who, transcending all visible things, strives always to be united with God alone. But they see another law in their members, that is, implanted in the nature of the human condition, which fights against the law of their mind and carries their sense captive by the violent law of sin, compelling it, namely, to abandon that principal good and submit to earthly thought.

“Although this may appear necessary and useful when some necessity is expended upon the administration of a religious matter, nevertheless, by comparison with that good in which the gaze of all the saints delights, it is certainly judged by them evil and to be fled, because through it they are in some manner withdrawn for a time from the joy of that perfect blessedness.”

The more the human mind advances and arrives at a more sincere purity of contemplation, the more unclean it will inspect itself as though through the mirror of its purity. For no one can be content in that degree to which he has advanced. The more purified anyone is in mind, the more, seeing himself to be defiled, he will find causes of humility rather than of elation. And the more persistently he ascends to more sublime things, the more clearly he sees that more remains toward which he should strive.

Nevertheless, we ought not for this reason to suspend ourselves from the Lord’s communion because we recognize that we are sinners, but we must hasten toward it more and more eagerly for the medicine of the soul and purification of the spirit, yet with that humility of mind and faith by which we judge ourselves unworthy of so great a grace.

And it is much more just, while judging ourselves unworthy, to receive communion on each Lord’s day for a remedy than only once in the year, as certain persons do. They certainly incur a greater presumption of arrogance than they appear to avoid, because, even then when they receive it, from that delay they judge themselves worthy of receiving it.

Note that this authority of the Apostle, “For I do not do the good which I will,” and so forth, according to Thomas and the continuous gloss, can also be understood of the sinner who exists outside grace: namely, that what he wills to do as good according to the prompting of reason, yet with only a certain ineffectual wish, he does not do because the passion of sensuality overcomes him.

It can also be understood of one who has grace but is imperfect: because he would will to do good perfectly without the delight of sensuality in temptations, but cannot because sensuality attacks him.

Section XXIII

The twenty-fourth and final conference is that of Abraham concerning the dwelling of a religious near his relatives.

When John Cassian and Germanus ask what would be more advantageous for them—whether to dwell near parents and acquaintances whom they could frequently instruct in the way of salvation, and, being provided by them with necessities, could more freely devote themselves to reading and prayer; or to remain in solitude, removed from men—Abraham answers:

“Sometimes it is seen that examples of evil are taken from good things. For if anyone presumes to do the same things without the same disposition and purpose, or with dissimilar virtue, he certainly therefrom falls into a snare of deception and death whence for others the fruit of eternal life is acquired.

“For this reason it is fitting that each one of us consider the measure of his own strength. For because the anchoritic life is good, we do not prove that it is fitting for everyone. Nor, because we deservedly profess that the institution of cenobies and the care of brothers is holy and laudable, do we therefore judge that it must be sought by everyone.

“Accordingly, first the institutions of our region and of this one must be weighed against each other. Then the diverse strengths of men, gathered by continual assiduity either in virtues or in vices, must be weighed against each other in the balance. For it can happen that implanted custom has in some manner turned into nature for some what is arduous and impossible for another nation.

“Therefore, now search the secret places of your heart and prudently conjecture whether even near your parents you are able continually to retain such strictness of mind. And when you perceive that you are consistent in this mortification of the soul, then know that the proximity of parents and brothers will likewise not be harmful to you, namely, if, although placed as though in the neighboring house, you believe that you are dead to them.”

Nevertheless, it scarcely ever happens that religious, especially when their relatives themselves provide necessities, are not affected toward them beyond what is due.

Hence, when a certain anchorite had approached blessed Anthony and, when questioned by him, made known that he dwelt near his blood relatives, who provided him with necessities, from which he more freely devoted himself to God, blessed Anthony said:

“Tell me, son, whether you are saddened by their losses and adverse events and rejoice together concerning their prosperity.”

The man confessed that he participated in both. The old man said to him:

“Know that in the future you are to be reckoned in the lot of those with whom in this life, in fellowship of profit and loss, you are shaken either by joy or by sorrow.

“This manner of life and this most tepid condition strike you not only with this loss which I have mentioned—although you yourself do not now perceive it—namely, that, changing your mind each day according to the variety of events, they unceasingly submerge it in earthly things; but also because they deprive you of the fruit of your hands and the just reward of your own labor, not permitting you to prepare your daily food with your hands.”

“Now concerning the fact that you trust that you can also save others, and hasten to revisit your homeland in hope of greater gain, hear concerning this a certain fable of Abbot Macarius, most delightfully and most suitably fashioned, which he also presented to a certain man seething with similar desires.

“There was,” he says, “in a certain city a most skillful barber who, shaving each person for three denarii, after purchasing the necessities of life, laid aside one hundred denarii each day.

“But hearing that in another city one solidus, that is, twelve denarii, was given for a shave or haircut, he thought that, if he went there to practice his art, he would become rich in a short time. He therefore put that thought into execution.

“Going there and beginning his craft, when he had earned many solidi during the day, in the evening he expended all those solidi to prepare the necessities of life for himself, because all things there were in an expensive market. Thus the same thing happened for many days.

“Hence he said to himself: ‘I shall return to my city. For that number of denarii was more profitable to me than this number of solidi, from which not only does nothing remain for me to store away, but scarcely are the necessities of daily sustenance themselves maintained.’

“Therefore, ‘a little with justice’ is better than to desire those greater gains which, even if they should have been acquired by the most profitable conversion of many, are nevertheless consumed by the necessities of worldly conversation and the diminutions of daily distraction.

“Just as one and the same origin of harmful humor is distinguished by as many names as the parts of the members which it seizes, so that it is called gout, disease of the joints, or otherwise, in the same manner let us believe the force of each vice to be present in the parts of our soul.

“For if the pestilence of the vices infects its rational part, it will produce the vices of vainglory, elation, envy, presumption, pride, contention, and heresy.

“If it wounds the irascible part, it will give birth to fury, impatience, sadness, accidie, faintheartedness, and cruelty.

“If it wounds the concupiscible part, it will generate gluttony, fornication, love of money, and other harmful and earthly desires.

“Accordingly, if you desire to recognize the fountain of this vice, know that the rational portion of your mind is corrupted. From this the vices of presumption or vainglory are accustomed to spring, while you believe that you have not only arrived at the summit of perfection, but are also able to teach others.

“But you will be able to cut these things away without difficulty if, by contrition of your mind, you learn how difficult it is for each one of you to save his own soul, and, not only removed from that presumption of teaching others, recognize that you still need the aid of a teacher. Therefore, apply to this disease the medicine of true humility.”

Title XV

Chapter III

After the very useful teaching of the conferences which direct the religious life toward perfection, certain holy fathers who were more celebrated than others among the anchorites or cenobites by the reputation of their virtues must be noted, namely, concerning their manner of life and sayings.

Anthony surpassed the ascent of sanctity of them all and was most gloriously celebrated. He was filled with so great a wisdom concerning divine things and prudence of morals—not through human study, for he was ignorant of letters, but by a divine gift—that many persons flowed together to him from diverse parts of the world as though to a heavenly oracle, for counsel concerning things to be done, and the infirm returned with most complete health from various illnesses.

The magnificent emperor Constantine himself, in whose time Anthony flourished, when he earnestly sought letters from him, received them with much devotion and reverence, for they exhorted him to divine worship and to the exercise of justice.

It is read that Anthony sent seven letters to the churches of Egypt. At that time they were read in the churches like the epistles of Paul.

When a certain friend of Augustine came from Carthage, which is in Africa, and visited Augustine himself, then dwelling at Milan and teaching in the rhetorical art, he related the marvelous things which were told in those regions concerning Saint Anthony, who was then dead: concerning his miracles, the perfection of his life, and his divine wisdom.

Augustine, not yet converted to the faith, burned to imitate Anthony's examples; and, turning to Alypius his companion, he said:

"What do we suffer? What do we hear? The unlearned arise and violently seize heaven, while we with our learning are submerged in the abyss. Is it because they have gone before us that we are ashamed to follow, and are we not rather ashamed that, because they have gone before us, we do not imitate them?"

And, greatly pierced by compunction from this, he purposed to become a Christian.

Anthony was of such fervor in his youth that he followed the martyrs when, by command of Emperor Maximian, they were led to torments, and he was greatly saddened because martyrdom was not granted to him.

Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, wrote his life and manner of living in a lucid and extensive discourse, and Jerome in a briefer one.

His name was consonant with the reality, for it is said to derive from ana, which is "above," and "holding," as though "holding things above and despising earthly things."

Therefore, when he was twenty years old and in church heard that evangelical saying being read, "If you wish to be perfect, go, sell all that you possess, give to the poor, and follow me," he was not a deaf hearer of it. Selling all that he possessed, and giving part to his needy blood relatives and part to the poor, he took up the eremitic life.

And although in time he was an anchorite after Paul the first hermit, he nevertheless maintained a more cenobitic life, having been made the father of many monks and the first of those named in the Church whom not only religious persons but also laypeople, even the wicked, greatly venerate and honor.

When he first thought himself to be the hermit among monks, it was revealed to him in sleep that another man, much better than he, inhabited the desert. Taking up his journey, he inquired through forests and desert places who this man was.

He encountered a hypocentaur, a man mixed with a horse, to whom the opinion of the poets gave the name "centaur." This creature showed him that way with its right hand.

Afterward he encountered an animal bearing the fruit of palms, distinguished above by the form of a man and below by that of a goat. When Anthony adjured it by God to state what it was, it answered that it was a satyr, a god of the forests according to the error of the pagans.

At last he found a wolf which led him to the cell of Saint Paul. But Paul, sensing Anthony, locked the door with a bar. Anthony begged him to open to him, affirming that he would never withdraw from there but would even die there. Overcome, Paul opened the door, and immediately they rushed into one another's embraces.

When, after mutual divine conversations, the hour of the meal arrived, a raven which was accustomed to bring Paul food from heaven placed a doubled portion of bread in their midst. When Anthony marveled at this, Paul said that every day God supplied him with food in this manner, but that on that occasion he had doubled the allowance because of the guest.

A pious dispute arose between them as to which was more worthy to divide the bread. Paul deferred to the guest, and Anthony to the elder. At last both put their hands upon it and divided the bread into equal parts.

Thereafter Anthony departed from him. When on his return he approached his cell, he saw angels bearing Paul's soul into heaven and placing it among the prophets and apostles.

Returning swiftly, he found Paul's body erect with bent knees in the manner of one praying, so that he thought that he was alive. But when he learned that he was dead, he said: "O holy soul, what you performed in life you have shown in death."

But when he had no implement with which to make a grave, behold, two lions came and made a pit; and after Paul was buried, they returned to the forest.

Anthony took up Paul's tunic, which was woven from palms. Afterward he used it on solemnities.

Paul died around the year of the Lord 287. When the persecution of Decius against the Christians was raging, he, fearing that he would not be able to sustain the torments, withdrew into a most extensive desert. Remaining unknown to men there for forty years, he most devoutly served God in the wilderness.

On a certain occasion, when Anthony had overcome the spirit of fornication by the virtue of faith, the devil appeared prostrate before him in the form of a black boy and confessed that he had been overcome by Anthony. For Anthony had also obtained by prayers that he might see the demon which is the spirit of fornication, lying in wait for young men.

When he saw him in the aforesaid form, he said: "You have appeared to me in a most worthless form; I desire to see you no more."

Likewise, when Anthony was hiding in a certain tomb so that, secluded, he could more freely devote himself to God, a multitude of demons lacerated him so severely that his servant, coming and judging him to be as though dead, carried him on his own shoulders to the place where the brothers were assembled.

When all who had assembled were mourning him as though dead, and while all were sleeping, Anthony revived and caused himself to be carried by the servant to the aforesaid tomb.

While he lay there prostrate because of the pain of the wounds, through strength of soul he challenged the demons to conflict. Then they appeared in the various forms of wild beasts and again lacerated him most cruelly with teeth, horns, and claws.

Then a marvelous splendor appeared there and put all the demons to flight. Anthony was immediately healed. Understanding that Christ was present there, he said:

"Where were you, good Jesus? Where were you? Why were you not present from the beginning, that you might help me and heal my wounds?"

The Lord said to him: "Anthony, I was here, but I waited to see your contest. Now, because you have fought manfully, I shall cause you to be named throughout the whole world."

How truly this was fulfilled concerning him is evident in itself.

Likewise, when he was thirty-five years old and was proceeding into another desert, he found a silver dish and began to say within himself:

"Whence is this silver dish here, where no traces of men are seen? If it had fallen from a traveler, it could not have lain hidden because of its size. This is your artifice, devil; nevertheless, you will not be able to change my will."

As he said this, the dish vanished like smoke.

Afterward he found an immense mass of true gold, but he fled from the gold as from a conflagration. Thus, proceeding to a mountain, he remained there for twenty years, shining with innumerable miracles.

The devil once appeared to him with so great a height that he seemed as though to touch heaven with his head. When Anthony asked who he was, he answered that he was Satan, and added:

"Why do the monks thus attack me in vain? Why do all Christians curse me?"

Anthony answered: “They do this justly, for they are frequented by your molestations.”

But he said: “I do nothing. They trouble one another themselves. For I too have been reduced to nothing: Christ reigns everywhere; the name of Christ resounds everywhere.”

Anthony gave thanks to God, and the devil vanished like smoke.

Afflicting his body in many ways and shining with the glory of miracles, Anthony departed to a more unknown place as a precaution against glory. There, when he had sustained diverse snares of the demons, he was asked by the brothers to visit them. When his companions failed from thirst, he produced a spring by prayer. Thus, after his companions had been refreshed, he came joyfully to the monks who had invited him.

On the next day, when the brothers asked about the condition of souls, during the following night a voice came to him, saying: “Arise, go out, and see.”

Going out, he saw a certain tall and terrible figure raising its head as far as the clouds. Extending its hands, it hindered certain winged beings who desired to fly to heaven, but was unable to restrain others who flew through freely. Anthony perceived the greatest joy together with excessive sorrow from those overcome and those victorious.

He understood that the ascent of souls was shown to him, and that the devil was attempting to hinder it: that he retained with joy those who were liable to him and sorrowed over the flight of the saints whom he could not retain.

Section II

As Athanasius writes concerning him in his legend, Anthony was marvelous in the piety of the faith. He never mingled himself with the communion of schismatics, knowing their ancient perversity. He never granted even friendly words to Manichaeans or other heretics, except only such words as could call them back from error, declaring that the friendships and conversations of such persons were the perdition of the soul.

He so detested the Arians that he told everyone that one should not even approach near them.

When at one time Arians lied to Anthony so that they promised that they themselves believed, marveling at their boldness and moved to anger by just sorrow, he expelled them from the mountain to which they had come to him, affirming that they were worse than serpents.

Asked by the bishops and all the brothers, he descended to Alexandria and there condemned Arianism in a public discourse, affirming that this was the last heresy and a precursor of Antichrist.

He preached among the people that the Son of God was not a creature, not made from any things which existed, but proper to and of one essence with the Father. Nor should he be regarded as a creature, an adoption, or a mere designation. He said that it was impious even to conceive in the mind, “There was a time when he was not,” since the Word of God is God, always coeternal with the Father, because he was born from God the Father, who always is.

Hence he said:

“Let there be no association for you with the Arians. You who believe faithfully are Christians. But those who teach that the Son who was born from God the Father is a creature are separated by no interval from the pagans, who serve the creature rather than the Creator.

“Believe me, the elements themselves are angry, and all creatures groan together against the Arian madness, because they see their God, through whom all things and in whom all things were made, reckoned among themselves.”

It cannot be expressed how greatly the preaching of so great a man strengthened the people in the faith. All rejoiced that the hostile heresy which was the enemy of Christ was anathematized by Anthony, the column of the Church.

At that time no age and no sex remained at home. I pass over the Christians. Pagans and even the priests of idols flew together to the Lord’s sheepfold, saying: “We entreat that we may see the man of God,” for the name of Anthony was manifest among all.

They also desired at least to touch the fringe of his garment, believing that they would profit much even from the touch. How many were then freed from diabolical possession and various illnesses? How many spoils were taken away from images? How many, called back from the error of the pagans, were joined to our flock?

Moreover, when his companions repelled the invading multitude because they thought that the assembly of the people would be wearisome to him, he himself said with a tranquil spirit: “Is this gathering greater than the crowds of demons?”

He had also received this gift from the Savior: if someone ignorant of him desired to see him among a multitude of monks, with no one pointing him out, he would run past the others to Anthony. Anthony recognized the purity of a soul from the countenance, and through the mirror of the body beheld the grace of the holy mind. For, always bearing a cheerful face, he showed clearly that he thought about heavenly things. His eyes were gladdening and his teeth bright as milk. These things are from Athanasius.

Once, when he was working with the brothers, he looked up into heaven. When he had seen a sorrowful vision, he turned toward God and prayed that he would avert the future crime.

Hence, when all who stood by trembled and asked him to explain the vision, prevented by sobs and tears he told them that a great wickedness and unheard-of crime threatened the age:

“I saw,” he said, “the altar of God surrounded by a multitude of mules, which dispersed all things with their heels. By a very great whirlwind the Catholic faith will be overturned, and men similar to beasts of burden will seize the sacred things of Christ. This is the cause of my groans.”

When these things had been heard, the holy voice of the Lord came to him, saying: “My altar will be abominated.” This also came to pass. For two years later, when the Arians broke forth, the Church was subjected to so great a plundering that, after all things had been polluted, not only virgins and matrons and the baptistery itself were defiled, but Christians were also slaughtered like sheep beside the altars.

A certain Arian named Balachius, a commander of Egypt, so harassed the Church that he publicly beat stripped virgins and monks. Anthony wrote thus to him:

“I see the wrath of God coming upon you. Now cease to persecute Christians, lest the wrath of God seize you, which threatens your very near destruction.”

The unhappy man read the letter and laughed; and, spitting upon it, he threw it to the ground. Afflicting the bearers with many injuries, he sent back these words to Anthony: “Because you have such care for monks, our discipline will also come to you.”

But punishment so overwhelmed the threatener that within five days, while he rode with others upon a most gentle horse, he was cast to the ground by the bite of his own horse; and, with his legs gnawed and lacerated, he was carried to the city and died.

At another time, when Anthony was raised into the air by angels, demons came to prevent his passage, objecting against him his sins from the beginning of his birth.

The angels said to them: “You ought not to recount those things which have been blotted out by the mercy of Christ. But if you know anything from the time when he became a monk, bring those things forward.”

When they failed in their proof, Anthony was freely raised on high and freely set down.

Anthony related something concerning himself, saying:

“I once saw a devil lofty in body who dared to call himself the providence and power of God. He said: ‘What do you wish me to give you, Anthony?’ But I, repeatedly spitting into his face, hurled my whole self against him, armed in the name of Christ, and immediately he vanished.”

Once, when Anthony, rapt in spirit, saw the whole world filled with snares connected to one another, he exclaimed: “O who will escape these snares?” And a voice came from heaven: “Humility itself.”

Certain philosophers, hearing the reputation of his wisdom, and knowing that he had not devoted himself to the study of letters in the world, approached him in the desert to tempt him and test his wisdom. Finding him at leisure, they asked what he was doing. He answered that he was then reading.

When they asked in what book he was reading, he answered: “In the books which taught your teachers Aristotle, Plato, and the others: namely, in the creatures whose powers and properties they considered and left behind in their writings.”

But in the creatures Anthony contemplated their Creator by knowing and loving him, whereas the philosophers did so by inquiring curiously and thereby commending themselves. Marveling at this response, they recognized his true wisdom.

Other men skilled in magical art used their customary diabolical art, sending demons to harass him who, by their vehement suggestion, would cause him to withdraw from his cell. When they had repeatedly sent diverse princes of demons by conjuring them and had never overcome him so that they made him abandon that place, they came to him in wonder, asking whether beyond his custom he had been incited during those days to withdraw from that cell.

He indeed confessed that during those days he had been greatly vexed concerning this, but that he had overcome the temptation by the virtue of Christ. Confessing their sin, they were converted to God.

When a certain archer, who had heard the reputation of Anthony's sanctity, saw Anthony rejoicing with his monks, he was scandalized, imputing this to levity and dissolution, not to discretion.

Understanding this, Anthony said to him: "Place an arrow upon the bow and draw." He did so. When Anthony commanded this of him immediately a second and a third time, the archer said: "I shall be able to draw so much that I will grieve over its breaking."

Then Anthony said: "So it is in the work of God. If we wished always to stretch beyond measure, persisting in rigor of spirit and body, we would quickly be broken. It is therefore expedient that rigor be relaxed somewhat so that we may be able to persevere."

Edified by these words, the archer departed. Hence also, in the second conference of Moses, as was said above, when the hermit fathers similarly conferred with blessed Anthony concerning which virtue might conduct a monk more expeditiously and securely to perfection, when diverse persons said diverse things, Anthony concluded and proved by examples that it was the virtue of discretion.

When at one time Anthony was afflicted by weariness in the desert, he cried out to God, saying: "Lord, I wish to be saved, but my thoughts do not permit me."

Rising, he left the cell and saw a certain young man—this was an angel of the Lord—standing and working. After a little while he rose and sat down for prayer. After a short while he returned to the work, and, rising again, he prayed.

When he had done this repeatedly in alternating turns, the angel said: "Do this and you will be saved," and suddenly disappeared.

A certain man had renounced the world, but not perfectly, because he still retained certain things for himself. When he therefore came to Anthony for instruction concerning his salvation, Anthony said to him: "Go and buy meat, and when you have it, return to me."

When he had done this and carried it with him, dogs on the way greatly harassed and lacerated him because of the meat. When he came to Anthony, he related the molestation which he had suffered from the dogs on the way because of the meat.

Then Anthony said: "Thus those who renounce the world and retain money for themselves are torn apart by attacking demons."

A certain man questioned Anthony, saying: "What shall I observe so that I may please God?"

He said: "Wherever you go, always have God before your eyes. In the things which you think, always employ the testimony of the Scriptures, so that according to their teaching you may follow the thoughts if they are good or cast them away if they are evil. In whatever place you sit, do not move quickly from there, namely, without an urgent cause. Observing these things, you will be saved."

Another asked him what he should do to attain salvation. Anthony answered:

"Never trust in your own justice. Let there be continence for you concerning the belly and tongue. And do not repent concerning a matter that has passed: namely, if you did good; or, if it was evil, in such a way that you are swallowed up by sadness and desist from good things."

Likewise he said: "He who sits in solitude is rescued from three wars, namely, hearing, speech, and sight. He will have only one battle, but that of the heart through thoughts. Hence one must also keep watch concerning these things, lest they be received badly.

"Just as fish die if they remain for long upon dry ground, so monks who dwell outside the cell and converse with secular persons are dissolved from the purpose of quiet."

When certain brothers had sought a word of salvation from Anthony, he answered: "You have heard the Lord saying in the Gospel: 'If anyone strikes you upon the right cheek, offer him the other.'"

They said: "We can in no way do this."

Anthony said: "At least endure one blow patiently."

They said: "We cannot even do this."

Blessed Anthony said: “At least do not desire to strike more than to be struck.”

They said: “We cannot do even this.”

At last Anthony said to his disciple: “Prepare broths for these men, because they are exceedingly delicate.”

Section V

Athanasius also writes concerning blessed Anthony that, when several philosophers had already twice come to blessed Anthony to tempt and mock him because he was ignorant of letters, he nevertheless refuted them when they questioned him.

A third time, men blinded by the cloud of all secular prudence, and most learned in their estimation of all the arts of philosophy, came. When they demanded from him an account of the faith which we have in Christ, and endeavored by the argumentative questioning of sophisms to mock him concerning the divine cross, after he had for a little while restrained his voice within himself, first pitying their error, then through an interpreter who was accustomed diligently to express his words in the Greek language, he began thus, saying:

“Or to assign adultery, homicide, and incest to those whom you worship, since in the one the contempt of death is a distinguished mark of virtue, while in the other a shameful religion is the mistress of obscenity?

“Which is it better to say: that the Word of God, remaining what he was, assumed a human body for our salvation, so that by fellowship in mortality he might carry us up to the heavens and make us participants in the heavenly nature; or, as you yourselves assert, that something drawn from the divine Mind submits its head to earthly things that are to be worshiped and encloses a heavenly gift within the forms of cattle and serpents?

“With what face do you dare to ridicule the belief of Christians, who say that Christ the Son of God, without loss to himself, both began to be what he was not and remained what he had been, when you yourselves, dragging the soul down from heavenly things, are accustomed to enclose it within the bodies not only of human beings but also of cattle?

“Christian belief testifies that its God came for the salvation of the world. But you, proclaiming the soul to be unbegotten, transfer it hither and thither. The Christian faith, which reveres the clemency and omnipotence of God, says that this was possible for God, yet in such a way that his condescension did not empty his dignity. You boast that the soul, flowing from the most splendid fountain of God, fell shamefully; after its diminution you dare to assert that it is mutable and convertible.

“And now, with an impious tongue, through your insults against the soul you profane that sovereign nature. For the image which, according to you, retains a natural likeness of its author, with whom it possesses one and the same substance from which it flows, consequently refers the condition and injury of its humiliation back to its own origin. Therefore observe that, because of your blasphemy, insults against souls overflow to their Father, as you call him.

“The cross of Jesus Christ our Lord is brought forward against us. I ask: what obscenity of religion is here? Is it not better patiently to endure the cross, or death of any kind inflicted by wicked men, than to lament Isis and to wander after Osiris in uncertain and errant courses?

“Be ashamed, I beg you, of the snares of Typhon. Be ashamed of the flight of Saturn and his most cruel devouring of his children. Blush at the parricide and incest of Jupiter. Blush at his rape and intercourse with women and boys. He, as your poets invent, in order to fulfill the fury of his most monstrous lust, uttered tender lowings in love. He flowed into the bosom of Danaë. He was both lover and price. He, made a tuneful bird, sought the embraces of Leda. He, raging against his own sex, polluted a royal boy, with birds as his ministers. These things you believe; these things you worship; these are the ornaments of your temples.

“Weigh all our sayings, I beseech you for your salvation, with an equal judgment. Are all the books of the Christians to be believed, or none? If none, then you do not even acknowledge the name of the cross which you disparage. If all are to be believed, why, when in the same books the resurrection of the Crucified is joined to his crucifixion, do you rend the divine Passion with foolish speech and not immediately join to it the sight of the blind, the hearing of the deaf, the running of the lame, the cleansing of leprosy, the sea serving its God as he walked, the flights of demons, the resurrections of the dead, and the returns of the departed from the lower regions?

“All these things are inserted in the Scriptures which you attack, and the proclamations of majesty and of a dishonorable death are contained in the same volumes. Therefore, having cast aside the hatred with which you are imbued, you will immediately discover both that Jesus is true God and that, for the sake of human salvation, he assumed a fragile nature.

“Nevertheless, if it does not shame you, recount your religion to us. But what unhappy error could relate rites drawn from such great foulness and madness? Unless perhaps, as I hear, you assert that the obscenities, cruelties, and deaths of your gods are fables, and cover them with allegorical veils, interpreting the rape of Libera as earth; half-lame Vulcan as feeble fire; Juno as air; Apollo as the sun; Diana as the moon; Neptune as the seas; and Jupiter, the prince of lusts, as the ether.

“For even after this shameless excuse, you receive not God but creatures, the Creator having been despised. But if the beauty of the elements drew you to veneration of them, it was right to preserve a measure, and you ought only to admire them, not worship them, lest the veneration of the creature become an injury to the Creator. For, according to the inverted reasoning of this kind which you follow, the honor of the architect would migrate to the house, the physician's remedies would be referred to his science, and the merits or praises of all artisans would be transferred to their works.

“What do you say to these things, so that you may recognize how disgraceful your ridiculous confession concerning the cross is?”

At this disputation the philosophers turned their eyes toward one another and muttered together. Smiling, Anthony again said through the interpreter:

“It certainly appears difficult to every work when the just tenor of the whole matter has been trampled underfoot, and the merits of the labor are fastened to the things made rather than to their makers. The elements, indeed, as I have recalled, prove their servitude from their very appearance.

“But because by dialectical observation you draw together each necessary conclusion, as you suppose, and by this same art compel us to affirm our religion, answer me: in what way is knowledge of God more manifestly proved—through arguments of words, or through the operation of faith? And which is prior: the operation of faith, or disputation proceeding through arguments?”

They answered that operation was firmer than words and that it was a clear knowledge of God. Anthony agreed that they had spoken well, because an operation descending from faith generates dispositions of the soul, whereas dialectic received its beginning from an opposition, or from the artifice of those who compose the opposition.

He said: “Therefore, when anyone has the operation of faith established in him in every respect, a composition of words will be superfluous. Through such a composition you attempt to tear out the belief conceived in our understanding, and yet you are often unable to explain even our understandings. Thus the works of the mind are more solid than the deceitful conclusion of sophisms.

“We Christians have the mystery of our life placed not in the wisdom of the world but in the power of the faith which has been bestowed upon us by God through Christ. The order of the things which take place each day commends the truth of my speech. For us, who are unlearned and ignorant of the study of your letters, the words of God alone suffice for knowledge of him.

“Behold, although drawn away from so many flocks of paganism, we are extended daily throughout the whole world; but after the advent of our Lord the knotted subtleties of your sophisms have failed. Behold, by teaching the simple faith of Christ we conquer idolatry, and through the preaching of the dishonorable cross the gilded temples have fallen. If you can, show by what composition of words you have persuaded paganism to prefer Christ to itself.

“Throughout the whole earth Christ has now been acknowledged as the true Son of God. Neither the eloquence of the sophists nor the disputation of philosophy is able to impede the multitude of believers. We name the Crucified, and all the demons whom you worship as gods take flight and are driven from possessed bodies at the first sign of the Lord's cross.

“Where are those fabulous oracles? Where are the incantations of the Egyptians? What have the chants of the magicians accomplished? Certainly all these things were laid waste when Christ thundered forth to the world with his cross. Nevertheless, passing over the crowds of the debilitated who were healed, you endeavor to ridicule the glorious death of Jesus.

“And what of the fact that paganism, although never shaken by legal attack but rather upheld and sustained by secular care and the defenses of men, has now fallen? We servants of Christ rise up and flourish the more we are oppressed. Your images, once ornamented and enclosed by walls, have now collapsed from age. But although the doctrine of Christ, which appears to you folly and sport, has endured the assaults of tyrannical persecuting princes, although it has been attacked by various terrors, it is confined by no region of the earth and prohibited by no boundary of pagan barbarians.

“For when has so great a splendor of divine knowledge shone forth? When have so many virtues come together at once? Continence flourishes in marriage; virginity flourishes in the Church; and the glorious constancy of the martyrs for their Lord is strong. The cross of Christ is the beginning of all these things.

“Meanwhile, amid so many choirs of virtues, you spread the nets of syllogisms and endeavor to wrap the true light in dark arguments. Behold, as our teacher said, we persuade not by pagan persuasion but by most manifest faith, because faith is accustomed to precede the affirmation of words.

When he had brought them into the midst, he repeated these words, saying:

“Now expel these demons with your conjectures and with whatever maleficent chant you wish, by the gods whom you believe in. But if you are unable, submit your conquered hands. Flee for refuge to the trophies of Christ, and immediately embrace belief in the Crucified through the power of his majesty.”

He spoke, and, having invoked the name of Jesus, he impressed the life-giving sign upon their foreheads in the sacred number of the Trinity. Together with the expulsion of the demons, the vain wisdom of the philosophers who were present was confounded. They were terrified, being astonished at so great a man, to whom, after such great natural capacity, so great a liberality of signs abounded.

But he, ascribing to Christ all the things which he had cured, employed a reciprocal address and said:

“Do not think that I gave health to these men, but Christ does these miracles through his servants. Believe, and you also will see that faith devoted to God, not the vain swelling of eloquence, merits such signs. Flee to the law of the Crucified. Imitate his servants, and, content with this limit of knowledge, henceforth put away the arguments of secular imprudence.”

When Anthony had spoken thus far, the philosophers were struck with marvelous astonishment. Departing after he had saluted them honorably, they acknowledged among themselves that the sight of him had profited them greatly.

This also is marvelous: although the man had been placed at the farthest boundary of the world, both the favor of princes and every royal court celebrated him. For Emperor Constantine and his sons Constans and Constantius, knowing such things, often sent letters to him as to a father, entreating that he in turn would gladden them with letters.

Concerning this he was asked by all the brothers to illumine the Christian kings with his letters, lest they should be embittered by his silence. Although he responded with difficulty, saying, “What business do monks have with the letters of kings?” nevertheless, after receiving the letters, he answered what was fitting.

First he praised them because they worshiped Christ. Then he offered salutary counsel: that they should not think royal power great; that, being swollen by command over present flesh, they should not fail to know themselves to be men; and that they should not forget that they were to be judged by Christ. Finally, he also admonished them to have clemency toward their subjects and concern for justice toward the needy, and testified that the Lord Jesus Christ alone is the eternal King of the ages.

When the princes received these letters, they rejoiced exceedingly. Athanasius records all these things where cited above.

Blessed Anthony died in the year 360 from the incarnation of the Lord, in the one hundred and fifth year of his age.

Section VI

Because what is contained in the following noteworthy history pertains to blessed Anthony, it is inserted here.

Cronius, a priest of Nitria, related, as Vincent writes in the Mirror of History, book XVIII, that a certain Eulogius, a scholar seized by desire for immortality, renounced this world. After distributing his possessions, he nevertheless left for himself the few things which he might use, because he was unable to work by himself.

Therefore, since he could neither dwell with many persons in a monastery nor patiently endure solitude, he found a certain sick man lying in a public square, so filled with elephantiasis that he appeared to be without hands and feet. His tongue was immune from such great torments.

Then Eulogius, praying and solemnly making a certain covenant with the Lord, said: “Lord God, I shall take this man up and sustain him until the day of his death, so that I also may be able to be saved because of him.”

Thereafter, carrying him upon an ass to his lodging, he diligently served him for fifteen years. With his own hands he cared for him with medicines, foods, and baths, and the man bore all things with great patience.

But after these things, at the instigation of a demon and forgetful of Eulogius's benefits, he began to wish to depart from him. He assailed him with many insults and reproaches, saying:

“Runaway, who devoured your own house and stole another's substance, do you believe that in me you have found an occasion for your salvation?”

Eulogius, however, entreated him, saying: “Do not say such things, my lord. Instead, tell me, and I shall make amends if in anything I have saddened you.”

But the man said with fury: “Go away. I do not want those flatteries of yours. Cast me out into the public square. I do not need your refreshment.”

When Eulogius again entreated him, the sick man said: “I no longer endure your deceitful mockeries. Nor is this dry and meager life pleasing to me. I wish to be filled with meats.”

When Eulogius had supplied these, the sick man cried out: “You cannot satisfy my will, nor am I able to live alone with you. I desire to go into public and see the people.”

Eulogius said: “I shall bring you a multitude of brothers.”

“Woe is me, miserable man,” said the sick man. “I do not wish to see your face, and you bring me men like yourself, devourers of bread alone!”

Shaking himself and crying out with a restless voice, he said: “I do not wish it! I do not wish it! But I desire to go into public. O violence! Cast me there whence you took me up.”

So great was his insanity, and so thoroughly had the demon turned his understanding into bestial cries, that he might perhaps have hanged himself if he had possessed hands with which he could do it.

Therefore Eulogius, not daring to cast him out because of his preceding covenant with God, took counsel with the neighboring monks that he should bring him by ship to Saint Anthony. Thus, overcoming him with gentle words, he brought him to the habitation of Anthony's disciples. On the next day Anthony arrived there.

When Anthony came, he was accustomed to call Macarius and question him with these words: “Have any brothers come here?”

When Macarius answered that they had come, Anthony would say: “From Egypt, or from Jerusalem?” For Anthony had given him this sign: if any men came who were not sufficiently worthy of his conversation, they had come from Egypt. When Anthony said to him, “Make lentils for them, and let them eat,” he commanded them to depart after prayer had been completed three times. But spiritual and holy men were said to have come from Jerusalem, and, sitting with them throughout the whole night, he spoke things profitable for their salvation.

Therefore that night, as he sat with the brothers, a revelation having been made to him concerning Eulogius's deed, Anthony called Eulogius three times by his own name and commanded him to state before the brothers the cause of his coming.

When he had done so and said that he had wished to cast out the man with elephantiasis, Anthony answered in a stern voice:

“Will you cast him away from you, Eulogius? But he does not cast him away, because he knows himself to be holy [read: But He who knows that the man was made by Him does not cast him away]. Will you cast him away? God will find one better than you and will choose one who will gather up the destitute man.”

When Eulogius, terrified by these words, had fallen silent, Anthony also began to lash the sick man with words, saying:

“You man with elephantiasis, horrible with filth and mud, worthy neither of heaven nor earth, do you not cease to shout injury against God? Do you not know that it is Christ who ministers to you? This man has subjected himself to such service for the sake of Christ.”

After this, turning to them both, he said:

“My sons, do not be separated from one another, but return in peace to the cell in which you have lived so long, lest you be defrauded of your crowns; for now each of you will merit to be crowned. This temptation therefore befell you because you both have come to the end of life.”

When they had returned with peace restored, Eulogius died within fifteen days. After another three days the sick man also died, exceedingly sound in mind.

Cronius said: “I was the interpreter of these words, because Anthony did not know the Greek language, while I knew both Greek and Egyptian.”

Chapter IV

Anthony had many disciples who shone with sanctity and miracles, such as Paul the Simple, Hilarion, Macarius, and others, concerning whom something will now be said.

First, concerning Paul.

As Vincent relates in the Mirror of History, book XVIII, Paul was a simple rustic and a married man. When he found his wife in adultery, he simply said to himself, without any vengeance or rage, “From now on she will not be with me.”

Therefore, leaving the adulteress and going to the desert, he knocked at the door of Anthony's cell. When Anthony came out and asked what he wanted, Paul answered that he wished to become a monk.

Anthony said: “Since you are an old and feeble man, and are now sixty years old, you cannot become a monk here. Go instead to less rigorous monasteries. For I dwell here alone, and even after five days I take food in the greatest want.”

But Paul did not acquiesce and said, “Whatever you teach me, I shall do.”

Anthony shut himself within the cell for the whole of three days, yet Paul, although excluded from the doors, did not depart. After this, compelled by the necessity of nature, Anthony went out and said: “Depart, old man. You cannot remain here with me.”

But Paul said: “Certainly I shall either live or die here.”

Anthony observed that Paul had brought absolutely no food with him and had now remained in continual fasting for the fourth day. Fearing that Paul's death might leave a stain upon him, he at last received him and began to conduct himself more harshly and laboriously than usual.

He therefore offered Paul soaked date-palm fibers, saying: “Take these and weave ropes as you see me doing.”

When Paul had most laboriously woven fifteen fathoms by the ninth hour, Anthony said: “You have woven these badly. Undo what has been done and weave it again.” Thus he imposed so heavy a burden upon the old man during four days of fasting that, when he perceived himself unequal to so great a labor, he might be compelled by this necessity to depart from him.

Paul, however, fulfilled all things patiently and willingly, and by murmuring within himself he did not show a sorrowful countenance.

Then Anthony, pierced with compunction, said to him when the sun was already setting: “Come, old man, let us eat a portion of bread.”

Paul answered: “As it pleases you, abba.”

This reply again bent Anthony, because at the mention of food Paul did not immediately hurry toward it, but placed everything in the will of the one commanding.

Anthony said: “Set the table and bring the bread.”

When Paul had done so, Anthony moistened with water one of his hard biscuits, because they were dry, and placed three portions before him. But after saying the customary psalm, he made forty prayers in order still to test him in this way. Paul again prayed with him patiently and willingly.

Finally, deep in the night, Anthony took one biscuit and waited for the old man, who was eating more slowly, until he had consumed one whole biscuit. Then he said: “Eat another, old man.”

Paul answered: “I shall not eat unless I see you do the same.”

Anthony said: “This is enough for me, because I am a monk.”

Paul replied: “And this is enough for me, because I desire to be a monk.”

After these things Anthony rose, and, when twelve psalms had been said and the same number of prayers made, he rested for a little while. Rising again, he kept vigil from midnight until daylight, singing psalms and praying.

Seeing, therefore, that the old man was so ready for all things, he said to him: “Behold, brother: if you are able to live this life every day, you will remain with me.”

Paul answered: “If perhaps you command anything more, I do not know about it. For I am confident that I shall easily fulfill the things which I have seen.”

After some months, because Anthony had now proved Paul's soul to be perfect, he made a cell for him at the distance of the third or fourth milestone and said: “Because you have become a monk, you will now remain alone, so that you may also experience demons.”

There, therefore, within a year Paul merited divine grace both against the infirmities of human beings and against the powers of demons.

Accordingly, when a certain raging man, vexed by the prince of a legion of demons, was brought to Saint Anthony to be cured, Anthony answered that this work belonged to Paul the Simple, not to himself. For the most wretched and vilest of demons are accustomed to be expelled by great men through the strength of faith alone, but great demons flee from simple and humble men.

Therefore Anthony went with them to Paul and said: “Expel this demon from the man, so that he may bless God, for I have no leisure.”

When Anthony had left them and returned to his cell, Paul arose, prayed with the greatest concentration, and said to the demon: “Abba Anthony has said that you are to depart from this man.”

But the demon, shouting an injury against God, said: “I shall not go out, detestable old man.”

Therefore Paul took up the skin which covered his shoulders and struck him with it, repeating and saying: “Go out, because Abba Anthony has said this.”

Then the demon began to bring insults against them both, crying: “Detestable old men, whom your forgetfulness has passed over [read: whom our forgetfulness overlooked], insatiable men who are not content with your own things, why do you exercise your tyranny against us?”

At last Paul said: “If you are unwilling to depart from this man, surely woe will be yours, because I shall go and speak of this to Christ.”

When the demon again contradicted him with blasphemy, Paul, angered, left the cell in the midst of the day's heat, which in Egypt is compared in burning to the furnaces of Babylon. There upon the very rock of the mountain he stood immovable like a column and prayed with these words:

“You see, Jesus Christ, that I shall not descend from this rock or take food or drink; thus certainly he dies [read: thus certainly I shall die] unless you first free this man from the demon.”

He had not yet completed the words when the demon cried with a very loud voice: “Go, go! I suffer violence and am departing, nor shall I approach any further.”

“The simplicity of Paul presses and pursues me, and I do not know where I shall go.”

Thus, having gone out and been changed into an immense dragon seventy cubits long, he was immediately cast down into the Red Sea.

On one occasion, when a certain man had come to blessed Anthony for the sake of edification and was conferring with him concerning the Scriptures—namely, concerning Christ and the prophets—in the presence of Paul the Simple, Paul asked: “Father, which existed first, Christ or the prophets?”

As though blushing at this question, Anthony rebuked him, saying: “Be silent and go to your cell.”

Receiving this command, Paul went to his cell and did not come out from it for several days. When Anthony saw that Paul had not come to him as usual, and wondered whether he had fallen into excessive sorrow, he went to him. Paul opened the door of the cell to him but remained silent.

Anthony said to him: “Why do you not speak, and why have you not come to me according to your custom?”

Without any anxiety, Paul simply replied: “Father, you commanded me to go to my cell and be silent. I therefore wished to fulfill your command.”

Then, sighing, Anthony said to his companions: “The simplicity of this man condemns our sloth and disobedience. He observes the commands of men most fully, and we scarcely obey the commands of God.”

When a certain dead boy had been brought to blessed Anthony so that he might raise him, blessed Anthony, knowing that this had been reserved for Paul, ordered him to be carried to Paul. Going with them, Anthony told Paul to raise him.

But Paul, deferring to his teacher, said: “You, father, are more capable of accomplishing this.”

Anthony answered: “I am occupied with other matters; you perform this.”

Paul placed himself in prayer, asking for the raising of the boy. When the ninth hour, his customary time for taking food, had now passed and the boy still lay dead, Paul said to the Lord:

“Lord Jesus Christ, certainly I shall not eat until you raise this boy, just as Anthony commanded me.”

The Lord, unwilling to sadden his delight and satisfying Paul's simplicity, raised him.

The same Paul cut horned vipers and scorpions in two, saying: “If anyone possesses purity, all things will be subjected to him, as they were to Adam in paradise before sin.”

Likewise he saw of what sort of soul each person was, just as we see the faces of human beings. Thus, when certain brothers were entering the church with joyful and shining faces, and the angel of each one was rejoicing, he saw among them one man who was black and dark. Demons on either side held him and drew him toward themselves, putting a halter in his nostrils, while his holy angel followed far behind him in mourning.

Seeing this, Paul stood sorrowful and weeping and struck his breast. He was unwilling to enter the church, but sat at the door and waited for the brothers until they returned.

When they came out, he saw the same brother emerge with a bright countenance, his angel walking beside him and greatly rejoicing, while the demons followed at a distance in sorrow.

Paul therefore leapt up with joy, crying and saying: “O ineffable mercy and goodness of God! Come and see the works of the Lord, who wills all human beings to be saved and to come to acknowledgment of the truth.”

That brother was compelled to recount his life, and he said:

“I am a great sinner and have lived in fornication for a long time, even until now. But when I entered the church just now, I heard the Lord saying through Isaiah: ‘Wash yourselves; be clean,’ and so forth, as far as, ‘If you are willing and will listen, you shall eat the good things of the land.’

“Pierced with compunction by this discourse, I said with groaning: ‘Lord, who came to save sinners, fulfill these words in me, a sinner. Behold, I promise you that from now on I shall renounce every sin and serve you with a clean conscience. Therefore receive me, repenting in this hour, entreating you, and renouncing every sin.’

“Therefore I came out of the church with these promises.”

All who heard these things glorified God.

Chapter V

There was also another most holy disciple of blessed Anthony named Hilarion, whose life Jerome described. Vincent, however, thus abbreviates it in the Mirror of History, book XV.

Hilarion, born near Gaza in Palestine to parents devoted to idolatry, flourished like a rose from thorns. Entrusted by them to the study of grammar at Alexandria, he delighted neither in the frenzy of the circus nor in the luxury of the theater, but his entire pleasure was in the congregation of the Church.

Hearing the name of Anthony, which was then celebrated throughout all the peoples of Egypt, and inflamed with zeal to see him, he went into the desert. As soon as he saw Anthony, he changed his clothing and remained beside him for almost two months, contemplating the order of his life and the gravity of his conduct.

But no longer enduring the frequency of those who ran to Anthony because of various infirmities and assaults of demons, he returned to his homeland. When his parents had died, he bestowed part of his substance upon his brothers and part upon the poor, reserving absolutely nothing for himself. He was fifteen years old.

Thus, naked and armed in Christ, he entered a solitude not far from Gaza which turns to the left for those traveling along the shore toward Egypt. Therefore, covering his limbs only with sackcloth, having a leather upper garment which blessed Anthony had given him when he departed, and wearing a rustic cloak, he enjoyed the vast and terrible solitude between the sea and the marshes, eating only fifteen dried figs after sunset.

Because the region was infamous for robberies, he sometimes remained in the same place [read: he never remained in the same place]. But the devil, seeing himself conquered by a boy, and before Hilarion had been able to sin, titillated his sense, which had been restrained through age, and suggested to his adolescent body the customary fires of pleasures.

The novice soldier of Christ was compelled to think about what he did not know. Angry with himself and beating his breast with his fists, as though striking his thoughts and as though he could exclude them with his hands, he said:

“I shall make you, little ass, so that you will not kick. I shall feed you not with barley but with chaff. I shall burden your back with a heavy weight through heat and cold, so that you may think of food rather than wantonness.”

He suffered many snares of demons. Often naked women appeared to him as he lay down. Often, when he was hungry, most abundant feasts appeared to him. Sometimes, while he prayed, a howling wolf and a yelping little fox leapt across him. While he sang psalms, the contest of gladiators offered him a spectacle, and one of them, as though slain, fell before his feet and asked for burial.

Once he prayed with his head fixed upon the ground and, as the nature of human beings bears, his mind was drawn away from prayer and he was thinking about some other thing. A swift charioteer leapt upon his back, struck his sides with his heels and his neck with a whip, and said: “Ho! Why are you sleeping?” Laughing above him, he asked whether he had failed and whether he wished to receive barley.

Thereafter a small, narrow cell was constructed for him which remains to this day, four feet in width and five in height—that is, lower than his own stature—and in length only somewhat greater than his little body permitted, so that you would judge it to be a tomb rather than a house.

He cut his hair only on the day of Easter. Until death he slept upon a bed of rushes. He never washed the sackcloth garment with which he had been clothed, saying that it was superfluous to seek delicacies in haircloth.

When robbers came to him in the middle of the night, running about between the sea and the marsh from evening until morning, they were never able to find the place of his bedchamber. When the boy was found in clear daylight, they said to him as though in jest: “What would you do if robbers came to you?”

He answered: “A naked man does not fear robbers.”

They said: “Certainly you could be killed.”

“I could,” he said, “but therefore I do not fear robbers, because I am prepared to die.”

Then, marveling at his constancy and faith, they confessed their error of the night and promised him a more corrected life.

It happened that a certain possessed man was brought to him whose hands, neck, sides, and feet were laden with iron, and whose twisted eyes threatened the savagery of madness.

While the saint was walking with the brothers and interpreting some passage of Scripture, the man broke from the hands of those holding him, embraced Hilarion from behind, and lifted him into the air. A cry arose from everyone, lest he dash together limbs wasted by fasting.

But the saint smiled and said: “Permit me, and release my wrestler to me.”

Reaching his hand back over his shoulders, he touched the man's head. Grasping him by the hair, he brought him before his feet, bound his hands, and trod upon the soles of his feet. Repeatedly he began to say: “Be tormented, crowd of demons! Be tormented!”

He said: “Lord Jesus, release the wretched man; release the captive. It belongs to you to conquer both one and many.”

Thus cured, after a few days the man returned with his wife and children to the monastery, offering many gifts as though to render thanks.

The saint said to him: “Have you not read what Gehazi and what Simon suffered, of whom the one offered a price and the other received it?”

But the man, weeping, said: “Accept it and give it to the poor.”

The saint replied: “I, who left my own things behind, why should I seek the things of another? For many, the name of the poor is an occasion of avarice. Mercy does not possess artifices. No one distributes better than he who reserves nothing for himself.”

Hilarion used to say that the devil burned with so great a hatred of human beings that he desired not only that they themselves should perish, but also their possessions, such as draft animals and cattle. A sign of this is that, before he was permitted to tempt blessed Job, he had destroyed all Job's substance.

Hilarion especially detested monks who, through a certain faithlessness of their own, reserved things for the future. Hence a certain avaricious brother who lived nearby brought the brothers a bundle of green chickpea plants just as they were in the field.

When Hesychius placed them on the table toward evening, the old man cried out that he could not bear their stench and asked whence they came. Hesychius answered that a certain brother had brought the first fruits of his little field.

“Do you not perceive,” he said, “the most foul stench, and that avarice stinks in the chickpea? Send them to the oxen and see whether they will eat them.”

When he had placed them in the manger, the terrified oxen, lowing more than usual, broke their bonds and fled. For Hilarion possessed this grace, which God had granted him: from the odor of bodies and of things which anyone had touched, he knew whether the person was subject to a demon or to some vice.

When Hilarion, in the sixty-third year of his life, saw the great monastery and the multitude of brothers dwelling with him, and the crowds of those who brought to him persons occupied by various illnesses and unclean spirits, so that the solitude round about was filled with every kind of human being, he wept daily and recalled with incredible desire his former manner of life.

When the brothers asked what was wrong with him and why he afflicted himself, he said:

“I have returned again to the world and receive my reward in my life. The people of Palestine and the neighboring province think that I am of some importance, and under the pretext of a monastery and the administration of the brothers I possess paltry household goods.”

He was therefore guarded by the brothers, and especially by Hesychius, who was marvelously devoted to reverence for him.

When he had passed two years lamenting in this way, a certain woman came to him wishing also to go to Anthony. Weeping, he said to her: “I too would wish to go, if I were not held in the prison of this monastery and if there were any profit in going. For today it is two days since the whole world was deprived of such a father.”

She believed him and remained. A few days later, when a messenger came, she heard of Anthony's falling asleep.

Bishops ran together from one place, clerics, monks, and every kind of human being from another, so that they might receive bread or oil blessed by him. But he meditated upon nothing other than solitude, so much so that one day, when a little ass had been brought—for his body, consumed by excessive fasting, was scarcely able to walk—he endeavored to undertake a journey.

When this became known, as though devastation were being proclaimed for Palestine, more than ten thousand people of diverse sex and age were gathered to retain him.

Immovable before their entreaties and stirring the sand with his staff, he said: “I do not make my God false. I cannot see churches overturned, Christ's altars trampled, and the blood of my sons.”

Then all who were present understood that some secret had been revealed to him which he did not wish to confess, and nevertheless they guarded him lest he depart. Therefore he resolved, publicly declaring to everyone, that he would take neither food nor drink unless he were released.

After seven days of fasting, he was at last released. With an infinite multitude following him, he came to Betulium. There, after persuading the crowds to return, he selected forty monks who possessed provisions and were able to travel fasting and to take food after sunset.

Proceeding to the fortress of Tobaston, he visited Zachonas the bishop, who was in exile there. When Zachonas had been incredibly consoled by the presence of so great a man, Hilarion proceeded to Babylon in order also to visit Philo the bishop. For King Constantius, favoring the heresy of the Arians, had caused both to be deported to those places.

Then, after visiting the habitation of Saint Anthony, he returned from Aphroditon. Retaining with him only two brothers, he remained in the neighboring desert with such abstinence and silence that he said he had then first begun to serve Christ.

Now for three years the closed heaven had dried those lands, so that the people commonly said that even the elements mourned Anthony's death. Nor did Hilarion's reputation escape the inhabitants of that place. Men and women alike, with faces discolored and attenuated by hunger, competed in entreating for rain from the servant of Christ—that is, from Anthony's successor.

When he saw them, he grieved marvelously. Raising his eyes and his palms to heaven, he immediately obtained what they had requested.

But after that region had been watered by rains, it suddenly boiled forth such a multitude of serpents and venomous animals that innumerable persons who were struck would have perished unless they had immediately run to the holy man. Therefore, by touching their wounds with blessed oil, all the farmers and shepherds confidently recovered health.

Seeing, therefore, that he was being honored there also with marvelous honors, he departed from that place.

Section II

But the more he fled the glory of the world, the more it pursued him by reason of his very great miracles. Hence, when he came to Sicily so that he might remain hidden, a certain shield-bearer who was being tormented in the basilica of blessed Peter at Rome cried out, the unclean spirit within him saying:

“A few days ago Hilarion, the servant of God, entered Sicily. No one knows him, and he thinks himself hidden, but I shall go and betray him.”

Immediately, boarding a ship with his servants, the man landed at Pachynum in Sicily. With the demon leading him before Hilarion's hut, he prostrated himself and was at once cured. This was the beginning of Hilarion's signs in Sicily.

Thereafter it brought to him an innumerable multitude of sick persons. Among them, a certain man of the foremost rank who was swollen was brought and healed by him.

But Hesychius his disciple was seeking him throughout the whole world. When he heard that a prophet of the Christians had appeared in Sicily and was performing such great miracles that he was believed to be one of the ancient saints, he came to him. But he heard that Hilarion was now unwilling to dwell in those regions and wished to proceed to barbarous nations where both his name and report would be unknown.

Therefore Hesychius brought him to the town of Epidaurus in Dalmatia. Although Hilarion remained for a few days in a certain little field, he could not be hidden.

For there was a dragon of immense size which they call a boa because it devours oxen, and which swallowed not only beasts but also human beings. After prayer, Hilarion burned the said dragon upon a pyre of wood which he had ordered to be prepared and kindled.

Afterward, when the sea left its bounds, the people of Epidaurus, fearing that their city might be utterly crushed by the waters, took the old man and, as though going out to battle, placed him on the shore.

When he had drawn three signs of the cross in the sand and stretched his hands against the sea, the sea stood before him as though at a barrier, and, recoiling indignantly into itself, advanced no farther.

When the whole city marveled, he boarded a little ship and fled to Cyprus. When certain pirates who met them sought to seize the little ship, the holy man obtained by his prayer that they could not reach them but were unwillingly carried backward to the shore.

When he entered Paphos, a city of Cyprus, throughout that entire island all who had unclean spirits began to cry that Hilarion, the servant of Christ, had come and that they must hasten to him.

Within thirty days nearly two hundred sick men and women were gathered to him. Seeing them and grieving that they did not permit him to rest, and raging in some manner as though in vengeance upon himself, he scourged them with so great an insistence of prayer that all were cured within one week.

He remained there for two years, always thinking about flight in order to avoid the reputation of the world. Afterward he went to a certain island near the regions of Egypt, to a place almost inaccessible, which he could scarcely ascend by crawling with his hands and feet.

There he found a remote place surrounded by trees, possessing waters, a very pleasant little garden, and many fruit trees, though he never ate of their fruits. He lived there for five years. By day and night the voices of innumerable demons resounded there, so that you would have believed them to be an army. Hilarion was greatly delighted by this, namely because he had antagonists nearby with whom he might contend.

There he healed in the name of Christ a paralytic who had been brought to him.

Therefore, in the eightieth year of his age, while Hesychius his disciple and guardian was absent, Hilarion wrote with his own hand a short letter in the manner of a testament, leaving all his riches to him: namely, the Gospel book, the sackcloth tunic, the hood, and the little cloak.

Many religious men therefore came to him from Paphos, especially because they had heard him say that he was now about to migrate to God. There also came a certain holy woman named Constantia, whose son-in-law and daughter he had delivered from death by anointing with oil.

He adjured them all that he should not be kept for even a point of an hour after death, but that they should immediately cover him with earth in the same little garden, just as he was clothed in his haircloth tunic, hood, and rustic cloak.

Now only a little warmth was tepid in his breast, and nothing of a living human being remained except consciousness. Nevertheless, he spoke with open eyes:

“Go forth, my soul; why are you afraid? Go forth; why do you hesitate, O my soul? You have served Christ for seventy years, and do you fear death?”

Among these words he breathed out his spirit. Immediately those who had covered him with earth announced to the city that he had been buried before they announced that he had died.

When the holy man Hesychius learned this in Palestine, he went to Cyprus. Pretending that he wished to live in the same little garden, after almost ten months he stole Hilarion's body. The body was found whole, just as it had been on the first day when it was buried, and fragrant with marvelous odors.

Chapter VI

Concerning the two Macarii, disciples of blessed Anthony.

Vincent relates in books XV and XVIII of the Mirror of History that when the most wicked Lucius, an Arian, had intruded himself into the bishopric of Alexandria and had made a great persecution against the true faithful, he also pursued with an armed band three thousand monks scattered throughout the desert, killed many, and, among the others, delivered those two Macarii into exile.

On a certain day a man dried up in all his limbs, especially his feet, was carried before them. Having been anointed with oil by them, while they said, “In the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, whom Lucius persecutes, stand upon your feet,” he was perfectly healed. On another occasion a blind man was given sight.

Although Lucius heard of the aforesaid miracles and others, that most wicked man nevertheless caused the two Macarii to be transported at night with two attendants to a certain marshy island of Egypt, on which he knew there to be no Christian.

On that island was a certain temple held in the highest veneration by the inhabitants. When the old men's little boat first touched the shore of that soil, behold, suddenly the daughter of the priest of that temple was seized by an unclean spirit. With an immense cry she began to be driven through the midst of the people and up into the air. Uttering repeated howls, she gnashed and tossed her raging face this way and that.

The people ran together to the spectacle of so great a monster, especially because she was the daughter of the priest, who was held there in great honor. Following her as she was snatched through the air, they came as far as the old men's little boat.

There, cast at their feet and prostrate, she began to cry:

“Why have you come here, O servants of the Most High, to roll us out of our ancient and moldy dwellings? Driven from every place, we lay hidden in this place, but now we have been wholly unable to remain hidden. We yield our ancient seats. Receive your peoples and lands.”

As she said these things, the spirit, rebuked by them, was driven out. The girl, restored to health, lay together with her parents at the feet of the apostles of our time.

Preaching to them from such beginnings the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Macarii suddenly led them to so great a conversion that they immediately destroyed with their own hands that most ancient temple which had been held in the highest veneration, and built a church.

When Lucius feared this, lest perhaps even the just hatred of his own followers should rise against him, since he was now openly declaring war not upon human beings but upon God, he secretly ordered that the two men be returned to the desert.

These two Macarii were abbots distinguished by sanctity and miracles. One of them was a priest of Alexandria, with whom, Heraclides says in the Book of Paradise, he lived for three years. This Macarius performed certain miracles before his eyes. He held it as the purpose of his life that, if he learned of anything great being done in abstinence by any saints, he would fervently fulfill it.

Thus, learning that the Tabennesiots ate nothing cooked throughout the whole of Lent, he resolved for seven years to taste nothing cooked by fire but to be content with raw vegetables alone.

He used to say that on one occasion he had remained in the open air for twenty days, burning in the heat of the day and trembling in the cold of the night, so that in this way he might conquer sleep.

One morning, while he sat in his cell, he was wounded in the foot by a mosquito. In pain, he killed it in his hand, and even as it died it poured out much blood. Reproaching himself because he had avenged an injury to himself, he condemned himself to sit naked for six months in the marshes of Scetis, where mosquitoes resembling hornets pierce even the hides of boars. Thus he was wholly covered there with sores, so that, with swellings rising throughout all his limbs, he appeared like a man afflicted with elephantiasis. After these things he returned to his cell, and it was disclosed by his voice alone that he was Macarius.

At one time, as he was accustomed to relate, he desired to see the garden in which Jannes and Mambres, the magicians of Pharaoh, had been buried. Over a long period they had constructed that work from squared stones; they had hidden gold there, filled the place with various little trees, and also made a well, because they believed that after death they would remain there as though in paradise.

Because Macarius did not know the way, by a certain conjecture of mind he followed only the stars of heaven, as sailors are accustomed to do at sea, and walked through the desert. He also carried with him a bundle of reeds, so that he might plant one at every thousand paces and, recognizing these signs, be able to return more easily.

After completing a journey of nine days, he approached the aforesaid place. While he rested, a most savage demon collected all the reeds from their places and put them beside his head. Rising from sleep, he recognized there those which he had left elsewhere. I believe this happened with God's permission for the testing of the blessed man, lest he place any hope in the reeds, but rather in the grace of God, who in the cloud showed the people of Israel the way through the desert for forty years.

He used to say concerning the aforesaid garden that at his coming seventy demons leapt forth, crying out, flying around his face and eyes in the manner of ravens, and saying:

“What do you want, Macarius? Why do you enter our regions? Let your solitude suffice for you. Why do you seek to break into this possession, into which no living human being has entered since it was handed over to us by the brothers buried here by our own hand?”

Macarius answered: “I shall enter only to see it, and immediately I shall depart.”

At once the demons withdrew from his eyes. Therefore, after entering and seeing the place, he returned to his cell over twenty days.

When the water which he carried with the bread began to fail him and he was already almost overcome by the distress of want, someone covered in linen appeared to him, carrying a flask dripping with water. She remained separated from him by one stadium, so that he thought he was able to overtake her, but could not. Thus, he used to say, through hope of drinking he patiently sustained a journey of three days.

Then a multitude of buffaloes appeared, among which one female buffalo suddenly stood before him with her calf, and milk flowed from her udder to the earth.

He said: “Therefore I placed myself beneath her and put my lips to her teats as she pressed them into my mouth, until I was refreshed to satiety.”

The beast herself also followed him and offered him her udders, nor, out of contemplation for that saint, did she receive her own offspring.

On another occasion, while he was making a well for the refreshment of the monks, he was struck by the deadly tooth of an asp. Seizing it with both hands, he tore it in two lengthwise from its mouth, saying to it: “Since my God did not send you, why did you dare to come here?”

Macarius had diverse cells in diverse places, in which the distinguished works of his virtues were performed. One was without windows, in which he was said to sit throughout the whole of Lent. Another was narrower, in which he was unable to extend his feet. The third was broader, in which he was accustomed to receive those who came to him.

When he heard that the Tabennesiots possessed a great manner of life, he put on secular clothing and traveled as far as the Thebaid. Approaching the monastery of the aforesaid men, he first sought out Pachomius the archimandrite, who indeed possessed the grace of prophecy, although nothing concerning Macarius had been revealed to him.

When Macarius asked him to receive him as a monk, Pachomius said: “Burdened with old age, you are no longer able to be a monk or to live among brothers who have learned labors and abstinence from youth. Otherwise, not enduring the temptations, you will depart with an injured spirit and will begin to curse those whom you cannot imitate.”

He was unwilling to receive him throughout the whole week. When Macarius continually persisted in asking while fasting, at last he said: “Receive me, abba; and if you find me inferior to them in fasting or in work, immediately expel me from your monastery.”

Then Pachomius persuaded the brothers that he should be received. The number in one dwelling there comprised as many as one thousand four hundred men.

When Lent came after Macarius had entered this dwelling, he saw diverse men living in diverse ways: one took food in the evening hours, another after two days, others after five days; another stood throughout the nights and sat and worked during the day.

Macarius stood in a certain corner until the end of Lent, tasting neither bread nor water, neither bending his knees nor lying upon the ground, but taking only a few raw cabbage leaves on the Lord's day. He spoke nothing to anyone, but remained in the greatest silence, continually praying in his heart, holding soaked palm leaves and doing this work alone.

When the others observed him in so harsh and inimitable a life, they were moved as though by a certain sedition against their superior and said: “Whence did you bring us this man, who lives in this manner for the condemnation of us all, as though he were not in human flesh? Either remove him from us, or know that all of us will depart from this monastery today.”

Pachomius, however, prayed to God that it might be revealed to him who Macarius was. When this was immediately done, he seized him and led him to his oratory. Kissing him, he said:

“You are that Macarius, and you attempted to conceal yourself from me. I give thanks to you because you have struck blows upon our infants, lest they think themselves to be doing something great in the conduct of their life. Return, therefore, to the place whence you came, because you have sufficiently edified us all, and pray for us.”

Asked with these words by everyone, Macarius departed from there.

The same man also related to us, saying: “Whatever kind of life and abstinence I desired, I imitated and accomplished. But at one time a desire for a certain new thought occupied my mind: that for five continuous days I wished to make the awareness of my heart inseparable from God.

“Therefore, closing the doors so that no one could receive a response from me, I began to press on from the beginning of the week, saying to my understanding: ‘See that you do not wish to descend from heaven to earth. You have the angels there; above all, continually behold there God, the Creator of all.’

“Persevering in this manner for two days and nights, I perceived that I had so provoked and incited the demon that, suddenly changed into a flame of fire, he appeared to burn all things which I seemed to possess within the cell, even the mat upon which I was accustomed to stand, so that I believed that I was now entirely about to be burned.

“At last, struck by so great a fear, on the third day I departed from this purpose and descended again to secular thoughts, lest from the perpetual contemplation of divinity some kind of arrogance should arise in me.”

When I came to this Macarius on one occasion, I found a priest before the doors of his church who had come to be cured. His whole head had been eaten away by cancer, so that even the bones of the crown were exposed, and he had not yet been received or seen by Saint Macarius.

When I asked Macarius on his behalf to have mercy upon him, he answered: “This man is not worthy to be cured, for he received this punishment divinely because, polluted by fornication, he was accustomed to violate the mysteries of the Lord. Nevertheless, persuade him to suspend himself forever from the offering of the holy sacrifice, and thus, with God's aid, he will be able to receive a cure.” This was done.

On one occasion, while Macarius walked through the desert, he found the skull of a certain dead man. After he had prayed, he asked whose person that head had belonged to.

It answered that it had belonged to a pagan.

Macarius said to it: “Where is your soul?”

It answered: “In hell.”

When he asked whether it was very far in the depths, it answered: “As far as heaven is distant from earth.”

He asked further whether others were deeper than it.

It answered: “The Jews also.”

Macarius asked: “Are there others deeper?”

It answered: “Beyond the Jews are wicked and false Christians, who were redeemed by Christ's blood.”

At one time thoughts of vainglory incited this same Macarius, setting before him, as though it were a hope of a good work, that he should go to Rome to cure those vexed by demons.

When he was forcefully pressed, he suddenly cast himself upon the threshold of his cell, so that he put his feet outside the cell, and said: “Lead me, demons, if you can, and drag me, for I shall not go upon my feet where you wish.”

Thus he lay immovable for a long time and arose toward evening. When the demons harassed him again during the following night, he placed upon his shoulders a basket filled with sand and walked through the desert.

Theosebius of Antioch met him and said: “Abba, why do you carry so great a burden? Transfer to me instead what you are carrying.”

But he answered: “I vex the one who vexes me. For while I enjoy leisure, he compels me to make some journey.”

After he had thus walked laden for a considerable time and had worn down his body with that weight, he returned to his cell.

Likewise, when someone once complained to him with sorrow that various thoughts disturbed his mind, saying, “Depart from here, because you see that you are doing nothing,” Macarius answered: “Say to your thoughts: ‘For Christ's sake I guard the walls of this cell.’”

The same man also related this to me:

“I observed, when I was giving the holy mysteries to the brothers, that I never gave them to Marcus the monk, but an angel always gave him the holy things from the altar. I saw only the hand of the one giving them.”

Pafuntius related concerning this Marcus that a certain beast struck the door of his cell with its head and, after entering, cast its blind cub before his feet. Taking it, he spat into its eyes and prayed, and gave it sight. Its mother led it away, and on the following day presented the holy man with a sheepskin. He left it to blessed Athanasius, from whom Saint Melania afterward said that she received the same skin.

There was also another Macarius, an Egyptian by birth, who completed sixty years in the deserts, which he had entered when he was thirty years old. Against aerial spirits, in the curing of human beings, and in declarations of future things, he merited divine grace; and at last he also received the name of priest.

A certain Egyptian burned with a mad love for another man's wife, yet was unable to attain the effect of his concupiscence because she loved the companion of her virginity very greatly. He besought a sorcerer either to cause her to love him or to cause her to be repudiated by her husband.

The sorcerer, enticed by many gifts, by the customary artifice of his art caused her to appear to be a mare. Therefore her husband, distressed because he saw a mare lying in his bed, lamented and wept because, when he spoke to her, he could hear no response.

Having brought priests, he showed them what had befallen her, and not even in this way did he recognize the cause of the calamity. Therefore, having tied her in the manner of a beast of burden, he brought her to the desert.

When he was now approaching Saint Macarius's cell, the monks reproached him, asking why he came to the monastery with a mare.

He said: “This was my wife, but she has been changed into a mare. Today is the third day since she took food.”

When they related this to Saint Macarius, to whom the Lord had already made it known, he said: “You are horses and have the eyes of horses. For she is a woman. She has not been transformed into the nature of a mare, but appears so only in the eyes of those who are deceived by the emptiness of the illusion.”

At once, pouring blessed water upon her, after prayer had been completed he suddenly made her appear as a woman to everyone. He ordered that she be given food and return with her husband, saying: “Never withdraw from the communion of the holy mysteries or from the communion of the Church. For she suffered this because for five weeks she had not touched the divine mysteries.”

Concerning this holy man a report was also current in those deserts, and continued as true, that, when he wished to teach a certain heretic who denied that there would be a resurrection of bodies, he raised a dead man.

It is also read concerning Macarius that, while he was once walking through the desert, the devil appeared to him in the form of a physician. He had in his perforated garment many flasks of syrup and medicines, where the flasks were held.

When Macarius asked where he was going and what those flasks were intended for, he answered: “I am going to your monastery to administer potions to the monks, and to anyone whom one does not please, I shall offer another pleasing to him.”

Understanding this, blessed Macarius adjured him to return to him after his visit. When he returned, Macarius asked what he had accomplished and to whom he had given from the potions.

He answered: “I found one whom I gave a drink. While the others manfully resisted my malignant suggestions, I found one frail man whom I conquered by my temptation.”

Going to the monastery, therefore, Macarius called together the brothers and admonished them not to acquiesce in the devil's temptations, because no one is conquered by him unless willing. He recounted what he had seen, drew aside privately the brother who had been deceived, and admonished and encouraged him to resist temptations.

After a few days the devil again appeared to Macarius in a similar form with flasks as he approached the monastery. Macarius adjured him to return to him after his work, which he did.

When Macarius asked what he had done, he answered: “Badly, because I was unable to give any of my potions to anyone. Even the man whom I had made friendly toward me on the former occasion I found resisting me more greatly and so hard that he repelled me.”

Abba Macarius descended from Scetis and entered a tomb to sleep, where the bodies of pagans were buried. He took one of the corpses and placed it beneath his head as a pillow.

The demons, wishing to terrify him, called to one another as though calling a woman, saying: “Rise; come with us to the bath.”

Another demon, beneath him, answered as though from that dead man: “I have a certain stranger upon me and cannot come.”

Macarius was not frightened, but struck that body, saying: “Rise; go, if you can.”

Hearing this, the demons fled, crying: “You have conquered us.”

Once, while Macarius was returning from the marsh to his cell, the devil met him with a reaping sickle and wished to strike him, but was unable.

He said to him: “I suffer much violence from you, Macarius, because I cannot prevail against you. For behold, what you do I also do. You fast, and I eat absolutely nothing. You keep vigil, and I do not sleep. You sustain labors, and I sustain the burning of fire. There is only one thing in which you surpass me.”

Macarius asked: “What is it?”

The devil answered: “It is your humility, through which I cannot prevail against you.”

Chapter VII

There were also other holy fathers filled with the perfection of all the virtues and most celebrated for spiritual teaching. Among them was one called Pastor. Afflicting himself for many years with great abstinence in the desert, he was strong in great religious observance.

When his mother desired to see him and his brothers, who were serving God together with him, but could not, she watched for a day when she might meet them directly as they went to church. But when they saw her, they fled and entered the cell, shutting the door in her face.

Standing before the door with excessive weeping, she cried out. Pastor came to the door and said to her: “Why are you crying, old woman?”

Hearing his voice, she cried even more, weeping and saying: “I wish to see you, my sons. What harm is there if I see you? Are you not my sons, and am I not your mother, who suckled you? Now I am altogether full of gray hairs.”

Pastor said to her: “Do you wish to see us here, or in the other world?”

She answered: “If I do not see you here, shall I see you there, my sons?”

He said: “If you are able to bear with an equal mind that you do not see us here, without doubt you will see us there.”

She departed rejoicing and saying: “If I am to see you there, I do not care to see you here.”

When the judge of the province wished to see Abba Pastor but was unable, he seized the son of Pastor's sister as though he were a criminal and put him in prison, saying: “If Pastor comes and intercedes for him, I shall release him.”

Therefore the boy's mother approached the old man's door, weeping. When he answered nothing, she said: “Even if you have iron entrails and are moved by no compassion, nevertheless let the compassion of your own blood move you, and the fact that he is my only son.”

Pastor sent word to her: “Pastor has begotten no sons.”

When she departed in sorrow, the judge said to him: “At least let him command it, and I shall release him.”

Pastor sent word back to him, saying: “Examine the case diligently according to the law. If he is held worthy of death, let him die; but if not, do what pleases you.”

He taught the brothers, saying: “To guard oneself, to consider oneself, and to possess discretion are operations of the soul. Poverty, tribulation, and discretion are operations of the solitary life.

“For it is written: ‘If these three men, Noah, Job, and Daniel, should be in its midst, they themselves will save their souls.’ Noah bears the person of those possessing nothing; Job, of those in tribulation; and Daniel, of those possessing discretion.

“If a monk does these two things [read: hates these two things], he will be able to be free from this world: namely, carnal repose and vainglory.”

The same man said: “If you wish to find rest in this world and in the future, say, ‘What am I?’ and judge no one.”

When a certain brother from a congregation had offended, his abbot, upon the counsel of a certain solitary, expelled him. When the brother wept as though despairing, Abba Pastor caused him to be brought to himself. Comforting him kindly, he sent for that solitary, saying: “Hearing about you, I desire to see you. Exert yourself, therefore, to come to me.”

When he came, Pastor said: “There were two men who both had dead persons belonging to them. One left his own dead man and went away to mourn the dead man belonging to the other.”

Hearing this and understanding Pastor's discourse, the solitary was pierced with compunction.

When a certain man said to Pastor that he was disturbed and wished to leave the place because he had heard certain words concerning someone which had not edified him, Abba Pastor told him not to believe those words because they were not true.

But the man asserted that they were true, because a faithful brother had related them to him.

Pastor said to him: “He who told you these things is not faithful, for if he were faithful he would not have told you such things.”

The man said: “I saw it with my own eyes.”

Pastor asked him concerning the mote and the beam of which the Gospel speaks, what the mote was and what the beam was.

Then Pastor said: “Place it in your heart that your sins are the beam and that the sins of that man are the mote.”

A certain brother who had committed a great sin, wishing to repent, asked Pastor whether three years would be much.

He answered: “It is much.”

Then the brother asked whether he would command a year.

He answered: “It is much.”

Those standing by said: “Surely as many as forty days?”

He answered: “It is much,” and added: “I think that if with his whole heart a sinner repents for three days, does not enter again into the sin, and performs a penance of three days, the Lord will forgive him.”

Asked concerning the saying, “He who is angry with his brother,” he said: “In every matter with which your brother may wish to burden you, do not be angry against him, even until he plucks out your right eye. If you act otherwise, you are angry without cause. But if anyone wishes to separate you from God, be angry over this.”

The same man said: “If there are three men, and one rests well, another is ill and gives thanks, while the third ministers to him from sincere charity, these three are alike, as though they were engaged in one work.”

When a certain brother complained that, having many thoughts, he was endangered among them, Pastor led him out under the open sky and said: “Spread out your lap and catch the wind.”

He answered: “I cannot.”

Pastor said: “Neither can you keep thoughts from entering, but it is yours to resist them.”

When the same man was asked by someone what he should do with an inheritance left to him, he told him to return after three days. When the man returned, Pastor said:

“If I say, ‘Give it to the church,’ they will make banquets from it. If I say, ‘Give it to your relatives,’ there is no reward for you. If I say, ‘Give it to the poor,’ you are secure. Therefore do whatever you wish; I have no case in the matter.”

The same man said: “He who is querulous is not a monk. Likewise, neither is he who is irascible, or proud and talkative, or vindictive. But the true monk is humble and gentle, full of charity, and fearful lest he sin.”

Malchus by name, as Jerome writes, when he was being compelled by his parents to take a wife, did not consent, saying that he wished to become a monk. Therefore, as a fugitive from his parents, he came to the desert. There he found many brothers, with whom he remained, having now become a monk.

After some time, however, a thought occurred to him that he should go to his homeland so that, since his father had died, as he had heard, he might console his widowed mother. But when the abbot heard this, he said that it was a temptation of the devil and forbade his departure. Malchus, however, persistently asserted that he would set out. At last the abbot dismissed him with tears.

As he went, he saw a multitude of about seventy men and women, and accompanied them. But it happened that, while they were traveling, Saracen robbers on horses and camels encountered them, attacked them, and overcame them.

Malchus was led away captive together with the Christian wife of another captive. At last, when they had been led before a certain mistress, they were compelled to bow before her. What need is there of many words? He was made a keeper of sheep. And so that he might carry on the life or duty of a shepherd more safely and better, the gentiles compelled the captives to be joined carnally.

But Malchus, when the threat of death was imminent, led her into a cave, with sadness acting as his bridesmaid. There, taking up a sword, he said that he wished to kill himself before committing adultery with another man’s wife.

She said to him: “Do not kill yourself, because even if you wished to sin with me, I would die first. But hold me as the partner of your chastity rather than of your body. Let our masters believe you to be my husband; let Christ know you to be my brother. We shall easily persuade them that there is a marriage when they see us love one another in this way.”

And thus Malchus, hearing the woman’s virtue, consented to her and loved her more as a spouse.

But Malchus said: “Many days passed in such a marriage. I never saw her flesh, nor she mine. Likewise, we never touched one another.

“And when there was now no suspicion of flight, as I sat alone in the desert, I considered the sweetness of the hermits’ life. Turning my soul over in this thought, I could not conceal what I had conceived even in my countenance.

“While thus reflecting, I beheld a swarm of ants seething along a narrow path. I saw burdens greater than their bodies. Some dragged certain seeds of plants with the pincers of their mouths; others dug earth out of pits and shut off the channels of streams of water with embankments. Mindful of the coming winter, they cut apart the seeds they had carried in, lest the moistened earth turn the grain into shoots. These carried the bodies of the dead with solemn mourning. And, what was more marvelous, among so great a throng those going out did not obstruct those entering; rather, if they saw that one had fallen beneath its load and burden, they put their shoulders beneath it and helped.

“What need is there of many words? That day furnished me with a beautiful spectacle. From it, remembering Solomon, who sends us to the diligence of the ant, I began to grow weary of captivity, to seek the monastery’s cell, and to desire the likeness of those ants, among whom they labor for the common stock and, since nothing belongs to any one, all things belong to all.

“When I returned to the lodging, the woman met me. Unable to conceal my sadness, I asked why I was so dispirited. She heard the reasons; I exhorted her to flight; she did not reject it. I asked for silence; she pledged her faith. With continual whispering we fluctuated midway between fear and hope.

“What more? That same night, while the others were sleeping, we took two goats, cooked their flesh as provision for the journey, made little sacks for ourselves from their skins, and carried them. We ran; we always looked behind our backs.

“After the third day, behold, we saw two men following us, seated upon camels. Immediately, fearing, we understood that we had been betrayed by our tracks through the sand. But a cave presented itself on the right, and we put ourselves into it, although we feared within it the dangers of venomous animals.

“When those pursuing us, the master and his servant, called for us to come out, a lioness that was in the cave went forth and, suffocating first one and then the other by the throat, dragged them inside.

“Then we were placed between joy and fear, for we feared the lioness. But at the following morning hour the lioness carried her cub outside and yielded the lodging to us.

“We went out at evening and took the camels which they call dromedaries on account of their speed. Seated upon them, at last, on the tenth day, we came through the deserts to the Roman camp. Having been presented to the tribune, we related the course of events.

“At last, having received the price of the camels, I wished to return to my former abbey. But because the abbot was now dead, I gave myself over as a monk in Mesopotamia. I commended that beloved woman to the virgins as a sister, although I did not entrust myself to her as to a sister.”

Chapter VIII

John the hermit, as Vincent writes in the Historical Mirror, Book XVIII, chapter 4, after Jerome, remained upon the rock of a high mountain, enclosed and shut up in a monastery, and showed himself through a window to those who came so that he might be seen. No woman, however, came into his sight, but only men, and these rarely.

Thus no one had entered this man’s monastery from the fortieth year of his age until the one hundred and tenth, when he was seen by Jerome. But, as has been said, he showed himself through a window so that those who came might see him.

When a certain tribune had come to him, he entreated him to permit his wife to enter to see him. For he said that she had endured many dangers so that she might see his face. When John refused, saying that it had never been his custom in the monastery to see women, the tribune persisted in entreating, affirming that unless she saw him she would without doubt die from excessive sadness.

He said to him: “Go. Your wife will see me this night. She will not, however, come here, but, while remaining in your house and in her own bed, she will see me there.”

Then the man departed, turning the ambiguity of the response in his breast. When he had announced this to his wife, she likewise was wearied by the uncertain utterance. But after the time of sleep came, the man of God was present in a vision, standing beside the woman.

He said: “Great is your faith, O woman, and therefore I have come to satisfy your desire. Nevertheless, I admonish you not to desire the bodily face of God’s servants, but to contemplate their acts and deeds through the spirit. For it is the spirit that gives life; the flesh profits nothing.”

When a certain cleric came to him and, being questioned by him concerning his order, lied by saying that he was not a cleric for the sake of humility, although he was a deacon, John kissed him and said: “My son, do not deny the grace of God, lest you tell a lie for the sake of humility; for whether it is uttered for good or for evil, it is a sin.”

He also did not permit the infirm to be carried to him, but, blessing oil, he gave it to them, and those anointed from it were healed.

To one of the brothers who suffered from a tertian fever and wished to be cured, he said: “You desire to cast away a thing necessary for you. Just as bodies are cleansed of filth by natron or other things of this kind, so souls are purified by sicknesses and other chastisements of this kind.” Nevertheless, blessing oil, he gave it to him and healed him.

He ate no food prepared by fire. His body was thin and dry because of abstinence. His hair and beard were sparse and slender as though from excessive illness. He lived in the year of the Lord 387.

When the brothers had assembled before him, he said in instructing them: “The vice of vainglory is grievous and exceedingly dangerous, and it casts souls down even from the very summit of perfection. It has two species.

“For it happens to certain persons that immediately at the beginning of their conversion, when they have expended some small amount of abstinence or distributed some money, they think of themselves as though they were more eminent than those upon whom they have bestowed something.

“Others, when they have arrived at the summit of virtue, attribute the whole not to God but to their own filth [read: their own exertions]. And while they seek glory from human beings, they lose that which is from God.

“But if we stand before God clean of heart, we shall be able to see God insofar as it is possible to see him. For we shall see him who is invisible with the mind, not with the body; with the understanding of knowledge, not with the sight of the flesh.

“For let no one think that he can behold the divine substance itself as it is, so that he should fix for himself some shape or bodily image in his heart. For in God there is no form and no circumscription, but sense and mind, so that he can indeed be perceived and touched by the mind’s affection, yet cannot be comprehended, described, or narrated.

“And therefore it is necessary to approach God with all reverence and fear, and we ought so to pour out the mind’s gaze upon him that, whatever of brilliance, splendor, and majesty the human mind is able to behold, it may always perceive him to be above all these things.

“But it is necessary to be at leisure, whence the Psalmist says: ‘Be at leisure and see that I am God,’ and so forth. And the purer the mind has been in him, the more things he will reveal to it, and it will recognize his mysteries.

“Even water or bread, if they are taken with craving—that is, to satisfy not the body’s necessity but the mind’s desire—constitute, within abstinence, the vice of delicacies. And therefore the Lord, wishing the soul to resist pleasures, said: ‘Enter through the narrow gate.’ The soul’s way is broad when it satisfies any desire of its own, but narrow when it fights against its pleasures.

“For obtaining these things, a more secluded habitation profits greatly, because sometimes, through the occasion furnished by brothers coming, going, and returning, the reins of abstinence are loosened. And thus even perfect men are sometimes taken captive. Therefore David said: ‘Behold, fleeing, I have gone far away.’”

The same John spoke against the presumptuous. There was a certain monk in a cave, a man of the highest abstinence and flourishing in all the virtues of the soul. Since, trusting in his advances, he attributed the whole not to God but to himself, the tempter, observing this presumption, transformed himself one evening into the appearance of a woman wandering through the desert.

As though weary, she cast herself inside the entrance of the cave, feigning exhaustion, and, clasping his knees, entreated him to have mercy upon her. She said: “Night has overtaken me. Order me to rest in a corner of your cell, lest perhaps I become prey to beasts.”

At first he received her into the cave under the pretext of mercy and asked the reason why she was wandering through the desert. She carefully invented a reason and meanwhile inserted the poisons of blandishments throughout the course of her narrative. Showing herself now as pitiable, now as worthy of protection, with the elegant sweetness of her speech she bent the man’s disposition toward enticing love.

Thereafter more flattering conversations were mingled with jokes and laughter. Her wanton hand was even extended toward his chin and beard as though venerating him, and then to stroke his neck and caress his shoulders more softly.

What more? At last the woman led captive the soldier of Christ. For immediately, burning with waves of lust, forgetful even of his former labors and of his profession, he now attempted to enter into obscene embraces.

But she, emitting a most hideous howl, because she was a thin shadow, slipped through the hands of the one embracing her. She abandoned him as he pursued empty ears [read: empty air] with disgraceful motions, mocking him with the foulest derision.

Then a multitude of demons, gathered in the air for this spectacle, said with a mighty shout: “O you who raised yourself as far as heaven, how have you been submerged in hell? Learn, therefore, that he who exalts himself shall be humbled.”

Then he became like a madman and, unable to bear the grave shame of his deception, was more grievously deceived by himself than he had been deceived by the demons. For when he ought to have repaired himself with all his strength and renewed the contest, despairing, he handed himself over to every kind of shamelessness and impiety.

There was a certain man leading a most wicked life who, pierced by God’s compassion, enclosed himself within a certain tomb and washed away the pollutions of his former crimes with fountains of tears. Always prostrate, he refused to lift his eyes to heaven or even to name the name of God, but persisted in groans alone.

At night the demons came to him, crying: “What is this that you are doing, O most impious and most criminal man? After you have been sated with every filth and impurity, and your strength is now insufficient for crimes, do you wish to appear a Christian, prudent, and patient, as though any place could now be given to one sated with evil other than that which is owed to you with us?

“You are one of us and cannot be another. Return to us, and do not lose what remains for you in the enjoyment of pleasure. Why do you hand yourself over to punishments before the time? For what else will you suffer in hell than what you now procure for yourself? If punishment delights you, wait a little and you will find it prepared. Meanwhile, now enjoy our gifts, which you have always considered welcome and sweet.”

But he lay silent. Although they often repeated the same and harsher things and he was not moved, the demons, seeing their words despised, fell into fury and began to cut him with blows, so that they left him half-dead. Nevertheless, he could not be moved from the place in which he lay for the sake of prayer.

On the next night they suddenly tortured him with heavier blows. Not even then could he be moved, saying that it was better to die than to obey the demons.

On the third night, without any mercy, they rushed upon him and afflicted him with every punishment and torment. Although his body now failed under the tortures, nevertheless his last breath resisted the demons' command.

After the impious ones saw this, they cried with a great voice, saying, "You have conquered, you have conquered," and departed, driven away as though by some power from heaven.

There was also a certain monk in the desert, adorned with every flower of the virtues. Since in the body he performed the duties of a life like that of the angels, the Lord displayed care for his daily sustenance. For every day, upon entering his cave, he found a table prepared and bread placed upon it, of marvelous sweetness and marvelous whiteness. Refreshed from it, he gave thanks to God and turned to prayers and hymns.

When he began to glory in his merits, immediately a certain sloth of soul entered him, so slight that he could not perceive it. After this, a greater negligence grew, so that he became slower for prayer. When he had performed a small service of psalmody, his soul, as though wearied by excessive labor, hastened to rest, because his understanding had become reprobate. For a certain secret, shameful, and unspeakable thought was now in his heart.

When after prayer he sought food as usual, he found bread darker than usual placed upon the table. He was refreshed from it, but took no care to amend anything that was turning within his heart, and did not understand that, by scorning the least things, he would fall little by little.

When he was now being incited by the fire of grievous lust, after prayer he entered to take food and found bread, but somewhat filthier. Becoming astonished and sad, he understood that this very thing had regard to that kind of monstrosity; nevertheless, after taking the food, he was refreshed.

After the third day he began to be pressed by goads tripled in force. For his thoughts had taken possession of him as though the image of a woman were now present and reclining with him, whom he seemed to embrace and to have laid beneath him for shameful uses.

Nevertheless, on another day he went forward to the customary offices of psalmody. But he stood with wandering eyes and a captive mind. When at evening he was about to receive food as usual, he found bread most filthy and dry, and as though gnawed on every side by mice or dogs.

Then he groaned and poured out tears, but not so copious that they could extinguish the flame of so great a conflagration. Nevertheless, he took the food, but not as much as he was accustomed to take.

Therefore, when thoughts surrounded him on every side like a barbarian cohort, rising at night, he took up a journey through the desert, making his way toward the city. When day came, he saw a certain cell of brothers, where he rested in his weariness.

When he had been refreshed and had rested a little, in the customary manner they began to seek a word of edification from him as though from a most learned and prudent father, and to ask how someone might escape the snares of the devil and expel the shameful thoughts sent by him. He taught this sufficiently.

Then, turning upon himself, he said: "How do I admonish others while I myself am deceived? Therefore first do, wretch, what you admonish others to do." Understanding that he had been wretchedly tripped, he bade farewell to the brothers and returned at a most rapid run to his cave.

Prostrating himself in prayer, he said: "Unless the Lord had aided me, my soul would little by little have dwelt in hell." He enclosed himself in the cave and lay in sackcloth and ashes with tears, until an angel of the Lord stood by him and said to him: "The Lord has received your penance and has again been made propitious to you. But take care that you are not deceived by pride hereafter."

The things that have been said concerning this John the hermit are attributed to Jerome in the Lives of the Fathers.

Section II

At that time, says Sigebert, it is believed that there were two praiseworthy abbesses, namely Sarah and Syncletica.

Of these, Sarah was forcefully attacked for thirteen years by the spirit of fornication. She prayed to God that a struggle of this kind would not withdraw from her, but said: “Lord, give me fortitude.”

While she prayed upon her little bed, that spirit appeared to her, saying: “You have conquered me, Sarah.”

She said: “I have not conquered you, but my Lord Jesus Christ has.”

She lived above the channel of a river for sixty years and never bent down to look at the river.

But I do not remember having read who that Syncletica was or where she lived. Yet many things wisely said by her are found, among which are these:

“Just as those who wish to kindle a fire are first smoked, so we also ought to kindle the divine fire within us by tears.

“Foolish is the chastity that looks indecently or laughs inordinately.

“Just as sharper medicines expel poisons, so prayer with fasting expels filthy thoughts.

“Just as strong garments, trampled underfoot and turned over repeatedly, are made white, so a strong soul is more greatly strengthened through voluntary poverty.

“Our adversary is more easily overcome by those possessing nothing, for he has nothing with which to wound them.

“Just as a hen deserting her nest causes her eggs to come forth without chicks, so also a virgin passing from place to place grows cold and is put to death.

“When placed in tribulation, if you are iron, expect fire to be applied to you to remove the rust. But if you are gold, expect it for the increase of your brightness.

“Those who sin in the world are cast into prison and punished even against their will; therefore let us voluntarily reduce ourselves to custody so that we may escape eternal punishments.

“Those who begin to sail first have a prosperous wind, but afterward often a contrary one. Yet just as sailors do not immediately unload the ship, but endure the storm and fight and afterward find a straight course, so also, when adversities overtake us, let us raise the cross as a sail in our purpose, and through patience we shall swiftly overcome.

“Treasure that is exposed is quickly lost; so also is virtue that is known and published.

“Do not expend your weapons suddenly and all at once, lest, naked in battle, you be easily taken captive.

“Our soul is a soldier; our body is our weapons.

“We sail upon a tranquil sea, secular persons upon a stormy one; we sail by day, they by night. Nevertheless, we for the most part are endangered through negligence, while they, fearing and solicitous, are saved.”

Section III

Abba Arsenius, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, Book XVIII, while he was still a great man in the palace, asked the Lord to direct him into the way of salvation. And a voice came to him: “Arsenius, flee human beings, and you will be saved.”

Descending to the monastic life, he again prayed to God as before. He heard in turn: “Arsenius, flee, be silent, and be at rest, for these are the roots of not sinning.”

When this man was renowned at Rome, serving gloriously in the emperor’s court until the fortieth year of his age, from a senator he became a monk; and, remaining in the desert for fifty-five years, he shone before all by the example of his sanctity.

When a certain brother, wishing to see him, had come to visit him, he knocked at his door. Arsenius, thinking that it was his disciple, opened it to him. But after he saw that it was another, he immediately cast himself upon his face on the ground.

When the man asked him to rise, Arsenius answered, saying: “I shall not rise from here unless you depart.” For some hours he did not consent to rise, until the man departed.

Abba Daniel used to relate concerning him that on the evening of Saturdays he left the sun shining behind his back and, extending his hands toward heaven, did not cease to pray until on the following day the sun, rising again, filled his eyes with light. But he passed the other nights entirely awake; and near dawn, when on account of the frailty of nature he wished to rest a little, he said to sleep: “Come, wicked servant.” Then, closing his eyes, he snatched a little sleep while seated and immediately arose.

Arsenius used to say: “We who have been occupied with the disciplines of worldly learning possess nothing. But these rustic Egyptians have acquired virtues for themselves from their own labors.”

One of the brothers said to Arsenius: “Behold, father, I hasten to meditate upon the sacred Scriptures which I have learned, and I do not feel compunction in my heart, because I do not understand the power of Scripture.”

He answered: “Those who are accustomed to charm serpents do not understand the words which are spoken; but the serpents, hearing them, understand their powers, acquiesce, and are subjected to them. Therefore let us also do thus. For although we are unable to understand the power of the divine Scriptures, nevertheless the demons are terrified and flee away from us, being unable to endure the utterances of the Holy Spirit.”

A certain matron sent word to Arsenius that she wished to see him. When he refused, she said: “I believe in God that I shall see him.”

When she came to his cell, she found him outside the cell and prostrated herself at his feet. But he raised her with indignation and, looking at her, said: “If you wish to see my face, behold, see it.”

Because of shame, however, she did not look upon his face. He said: “Do you not know that you are a woman and that perfect men are seduced through women? Is it not enough for you to have heard of my works?”

She said: “I do not wish to see your face, but pray for me.”

He said: “I pray God that the memory of you may be erased from my heart.”

But she departed groaning and was so saddened that, after returning home, she became feverish. Hearing this, the bishop came to console her. She said to him: “Behold, I am saddened because of such words of Arsenius the elder.”

The bishop said to her: “Do you not know that you are a woman and that the enemy attacks holy men through women? For this reason the elder said those things. For he always prays for your soul.” And thus she was consoled concerning the matter.

When the time of Arsenius’s death approached, his disciples said: “What shall we do, father? For we do not know how to bury a man.”

He answered: “Do you not know how to put a rope around my feet and thus drag me to the mountain?”

Therefore, while he was dying, he began to weep. When the brothers questioned him, saying, “Why are you weeping, father? Surely you too are afraid?” he answered: “In truth, I am afraid. And this fear which is now with me has always been with me from the time when I became a monk.”

When Abba Poemen heard that he had passed away, he said: “Blessed are you, Arsenius, because you have wept for yourself so greatly in this world. For he who has not wept for himself here will mourn there perpetually.”

On one occasion a voice came to him, saying: “Come, and I shall show you the works of human beings.”

It led him to a certain place and showed him an Ethiopian cutting wood and making a great bundle which he could not carry. Thereafter he cut other pieces of wood and added them to the bundle, and he did this for a long time.

Again it showed him a man drawing water from a lake and pouring the water into a perforated cistern. The water flowed back into the lake, and in this manner he wished to fill the cistern.

Again it showed him a temple and two men on horses carrying a piece of wood crosswise. They wished to enter the temple but could not, because they were carrying the wood crosswise.

It explained these things to him, saying: “These are those who carry what is, as it were, the yoke of justice with pride and do not humble themselves. Therefore they remain outside the kingdom of God.

“But he who cuts the wood is a man in many sins, and instead of doing penance he does not withdraw from his sins but adds iniquities to iniquities.

“He who draws the water is a man who possesses good works; but because he has grave evil works mingled with them, he loses those good works of his.”

Throughout the entire time of his life, Arsenius held a cloth in his bosom because of the tears which frequently flowed from his eyes.

When the father of Saint Arsenius, a most noble senator at Rome, ended his life and, making a testament, left a great inheritance to Arsenius, an imperial official brought the testament to him in the desert. Receiving it, Arsenius wished to tear it apart, but the official, prostrate at his feet, asked him not to do this, because his head would be cut off.

Arsenius said to him: “I died before he did. Therefore, since he has only now died, how has he made me his heir?” And he sent back the testament, wishing to receive nothing.

Abba Isidore related concerning a certain virgin who was another man’s servant, as Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, that her master, frequently attempting by various promises to violate her, was unable to do so. Because of this, he handed her over to the prefect of Alexandria, a persecutor of Christians.

Preparing diverse tortures before her and also heating a bronze vessel filled with pitch, the prefect said: “Either go and obey your master, or know that you will be cast into this vessel.”

She answered: “Let there never be another such judge who orders chastity to be added to lust.”

She said: “By the head of your emperor, whom you revere, I adjure you that, if you have resolved to kill me with these tortures, you order me to be put into them not all at once but little by little, so that you may see how great a patience Christ, who is unknown to you, has given me.”

After she had been lowered into the glowing bronze vessel over the space of one hour, she expired when the boiling pitch first reached her neck.

Vincent also relates in the Historical Mirror, Book XVIII, concerning a certain girl whose name was Alexandra, that, having left the city, she settled beside a certain tomb, receiving the necessities of life through a small opening and seeing neither men nor women for ten years.

Concerning her, blessed Melania the Roman used to say that she was indeed unable to see her face, but, standing at the opening, asked her the cause of her enclosure.

She answered: “The mind of a certain man had once been wounded on account of me. When I saw him saddened, I preferred to enclose myself in a tomb for as long as I live rather than to harm a soul made in the likeness of God.”

When Melania again asked her, “How are you able in such solitude to maintain so continual a struggle against weariness or thoughts?” she answered: “From the beginning of the day I am at leisure for prayer while making a work from linen. Afterward, in thought, I pass through the holy patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and martyrs. During the remaining hours I take bread as food. As evening approaches, with the greatest quiet I glorify my Lord and patiently await the end of my life with good hope.”

Concerning blessed Ammon, the same author relates that, when he had been left as a boy by his parents and had reached twenty-two years of age, he was compelled against his will by his uncle to undergo the solemnities of marriage.

But after everyone had withdrawn from the bridal chamber, he rose from the bed, closed the door, brought forth a little book from his bosom, and read it to the girl. He also expounded the manner of life of chastity and virginity, so that she, filled in an instant with the grace of God, said that she willingly embraced a chaste life.

Thus, therefore, he lived with her in the same little cell, upon a separate bed, for eighteen years, and afterward in solitude for another twenty-two years. At his death blessed Anthony saw his soul being borne into heaven by angels.

Concerning Saint Pambo, holy Melania related, as the same Vincent narrates above, that Saint Melania herself offered him three hundred pounds of silver. While he sat weaving wicker, he said only this: “May God give you your reward.”

Then he said to his steward: “Receive these things and divide them among the needy brothers.”

When she stood there expecting a blessing or praise for the gift she had given, and heard nothing further from him, she said: “Know, lord, that there are three hundred pounds in this silver vessel.”

Again, without even looking upward, he said: “If you were offering it to me, O daughter, you would appropriately say this. But since you offer it to him whom we know not to have despised but rather to have honored the woman who gave two small coins, be silent and be at rest. For he who weighed the mountains in a balance has no need to learn the measure from you.”

A little afterward, wearied by a certain fever, he called her while sewing a little basket and, when he was soon about to rest, said: “Receive this little basket from my hands, because I have nothing else to leave you by which you may remember me.” After his body was buried, she kept it with her until her own end.

Section V

His disciple Ammonius, when he was sought for the episcopate and seized by a multitude of citizens so that he might be led to a certain Dorotheus to receive the blessing, said that he was wholly unable to consent to leave the desert.

When he saw that he could not escape, in everyone's sight he cut off his left ear at the root with an iron blade, saying: "At least now prove that what you desire cannot be accomplished, because no one whose ear has been cut off can be ordained."

To this Bishop Dorotheus answered: "That law is observed by the Jews. But if you give me someone mutilated in his nostrils yet upright in morals, I do not doubt that I shall make him a bishop."

Therefore, when they still attempted to use force against him, he answered in anger: "If you compel me further, I shall also cut off my tongue, on account of which you are troubling me." Then they released him.

Concerning this man, blessed Evagrius also said that he had seen no one who so conquered the bodily passions. Thus, when a certain carnal delight vexed his little body without any interruption, he lacerated his own members with a glowing iron so that he was full of ulcers on every part.

Concerning this Ammonius, Jerome says thus in the Lives of the Fathers: "Among those fathers we saw Ammonius, a most wise man. His monastery was surrounded by a wall, which in those places is easily made from unbaked bricks."

This man, as Socrates says in the Tripartite History, was most learned, a disciple of Origen and Didymus, and from youth until death he ate nothing except roasted bread.

He was so free from curiosity that, when he came to Rome with Athanasius, he viewed none of the works of the city, but sought only the church of Peter and Paul.

He was seen by no one to be angry, to swear, to lie, or to utter a vain, harsh, or weak word.

There was also upon the same mountain Saint Benjamin, who, having attained the highest grace through eighty years in the virtues of abstinence, healed from every illness anyone upon whom he laid his hands or to whom he gave a blessing of oil.

We saw this man distended by so great a swelling of his body that the joined fingers of both our hands were unable to encircle the smallest finger of his hand.

He himself said: "Pray, sons, that my inner man may be free from that sickness. For this body neither raises me up by its health nor casts me down by its pain."

Thus for eight months a very broad chair was made for him, in which he sat continually because he was unable to rest in a bed. Nevertheless, he healed any others who were vexed by illness.

Section VI

"When I first reached the city of Alexandria," says Heraclides in the book called Paradise, as Vincent relates above, "in the second consulship of the elder emperor Theodosius, I found Saint Isidore, a priest, the receiver and provider of poor brothers.

"He was seventy years of age and used neither linen nor meat, nor was he filled with bread. Yet, through the grace of spiritual nourishment, his little body was so stout that all who did not know his life attributed this to feasting and pleasures.

"He was so humble and so peaceful that even his enemies were ashamed before his shadow.

"He is also said to have possessed so great a knowledge of divine doctrine that even during the brothers' meals he became entranced, his mind being changed and his senses also being spiritually occupied.

"I also knew him to have wept while he took food. When I wondered why he wept, he said: 'I am ashamed to take irrational food, since, having been made rational by the Lord, I ought to dwell in the delight of paradise and to be filled with divine food.'

"When I, a young man, came to him and asked him to instruct me in the life and conduct of monks, for which there was necessary not so much teaching in words as continual labor and fatigue of the body, like a good tamer of horses he led me out to the places of solitude and commended me to a certain Dorotheus, a Theban monk sixty years old living in a cave, who was of the harshest manner of life.

"For every day, amid the greatest heat, he gathered stones around the shores of the sea and, constructing one cell each year, offered it to those who were unable to build.

"When I said, 'Why, father, do you, so old a man, kill your little body in the cruel heat?' he answered: 'It kills me; I kill it.'

"He ate a little bread and the cheapest vegetable and also drank a little water. I never saw him extend his feet or rest upon a mat or in a bed. But, sitting throughout the whole night, he wove rope from the date-palm tree, by whose price he was accustomed to obtain food. And, as I learned from his other disciples, he had lived in this way even from his earliest age.

“He never slept voluntarily, unless he was overcome by labor or while taking food. For frequently, while he ate, the excessive force of sleep caused his head to nod and bread fell from his lips.

“When he was compelled by me to lie upon a mat for a moment, he said: ‘If you can persuade the angels to rest, you will also persuade him who hastens to please God.’

“On a certain day I was sent by him to the well to draw water. When I was greatly horrified upon seeing an asp at the bottom, I brought back the vessel empty and explained the cause of my fear.

“But, smiling, he said: ‘If it pleased the devil to make himself a serpent in every well, would you never be able to obtain drink?’

“Immediately going out, he drew water from the well, and, being the first to drink it after making the sign over it, he said: ‘Where the cross is present, there the enemy’s malice has no power.’”

Apelles the Egyptian was converted from being a smith. One day, while he practiced this work, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, Book XV, he struck in the face with glowing tongs a demon who was tempting him in the appearance of a woman. Shrieking and groaning, the demon fled far away.

But Jerome says that with his bare hand he struck the devil with a piece of glowing iron when it had been transformed into the appearance of a beautiful woman. From that time he held it as a practice to grasp glowing iron with his bare hand and not be injured.

This man used to relate concerning a certain John who prayed standing beneath the overhanging rock of a certain crag for three continuous years, never sitting down or lying down, taking only as much sleep as he could take while standing.

He never took food except on the Lord’s day, when a priest came to him and offered the sacrifice for him. This was both sacrament and sustenance for him.

His feet split apart, and pus came forth from them. When the three years had been completed, he was healed by an angel, was filled with knowledge and teaching, and edified many.

The priest always returned to that place on the Lord’s day for the sake of the sacraments. On the other days, John worked with his hands, weaving the harness-straps of beasts of burden from palm leaves, as is the custom in those places. By these straps the illnesses of beasts of burden were healed.

He also possessed this grace: he wrote to each of the brothers concerning the sin or work of virtue in which each surpassed the others.

Chapter IX

Moses, an Ethiopian by race, black in color, was said to have been a public robber and murderer, according to the Tripartite History. When he was a slave, he was said to have been a murderer; and, as it is said, he was expelled by his master on account of his offenses. Devoted to robbery, he committed many murders.

Once, when he had crossed a certain river so that he might carry off something from a certain flock of sheep, he took from it a certain ram or castrated sheep, killed it, tied his garments about his loins, and crossed the river by swimming. After he cooked and ate it, because he was being sought unto death for his thefts, he became a monk from that fear. In the course of time his servile or human fear was changed into filial fear, and he served God with great fervor.

On one occasion he seized four robbers together, bound them, placed them upon his shoulders, and brought them to the church, leaving it to the will of the monks what they wished to do with them.

Having been made a priest in Scetis, he lived for almost seventy-two years, terrible to demons.

As Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, Book XVIII, once, pierced by the danger of some necessity, he betook himself to the brothers’ monastery and vigorously embraced the life of penance. By his example he converted many of the robbers.

As he himself used to relate, when the demons urged him to return to his former fornication, he was tempted in so many and such great ways that he almost withdrew from his purpose.

When he related these attacks to Saint Isidore, Isidore answered: “Do not be saddened, because these are still your beginnings. Therefore thoughts of this kind rise vehemently against you, seeking the old habit.

“For just as a dog does not withdraw from the meat-market in which it is accustomed to be fed, but departs if it is closed and no one remains in it from whom it may hope for something, so also, if you persist in abstinence, you exclude the entrance of gluttony, which is the incentive of fornication.

“For the demon, wearied and conquered because you do not furnish him the fuel of foods, will cease to be troublesome to you hereafter.”

From that time Moses, vigorously taking care of himself, abstained above all from food, eating nothing except bread. Nevertheless, devoting himself to the greatest labor, he consumed his little body in this manner. Yet not even thus did the vanity of dreams concerning him cease.

Again he consulted another most tested man about this. He answered: “You still suffer these things because you have not yet separated your mind from thoughts of this kind. Therefore, if you are willing to occupy yourself a little with vigils and to persist in pure prayers, you will easily be able to be freed.”

Then he resolved to pray standing in the middle of his cell, neither bending his knees nor closing his eyes. He fulfilled this there for six years, and not even thus could he be free from that evil.

Again he embraced another kind of life. For throughout entire nights he went around the dwellings of old monks who carried water for themselves from distant places, filled their flasks, and brought them back without anyone perceiving it.

Therefore, when the demon could no longer endure his contests, one night, while Moses was bent forward drawing water from the well, he struck his loins from above with a heavy club and left him half-dead, while Moses did not perceive what he had suffered or by whom.

Found on the next day and carried to the monastery, he labored under that sickness for an entire year.

Then Saint Isidore said to him: “Cease, Moses, to provoke the demons to such an extent and to contend against them so obstinately. For there is also a fixed measure of the monastic life, within which it is fitting that we exercise our strength.”

He answered: “I shall not withdraw from the intention of this purpose until I see dreams and vain thoughts separated from me.”

Then Isidore said to him: “In the name of Jesus Christ they have now withdrawn from you. Therefore approach faithfully the communion of the holy mysteries. But know that the demon appeared stronger than you for a time for this reason: lest you be able to boast that you had easily overcome so great a temptation.”

Thus, returning to his own cell, Moses said that from that hour when the servant of God prayed for him he endured nothing further of this kind. Indeed, he merited so great a grace against demons that we are more greatly frightened by flies than he was by demons.

When a certain old man, having become infirm, wished to go into Egypt so that he would not burden the brothers too greatly, Abba Moses said to him: “Do not go, because you are going to fall into fornication.”

Saddened, he said: “My body is dead, and do you say these things to me?”

Therefore, when he had gone and a certain virgin served him from devotion, upon recovering his health he violated her, and she conceived by him.

When she had borne a boy, the old man, carrying him in his arms on a great feast day which was being celebrated in Scetis, entered the church before the multitude of brothers. When all wept, he said: “Do you see this infant? He is the son of disobedience. Therefore beware for yourselves, brothers, because I did this in old age, and pray for me.” Returning to his cell, through penance he returned to his former state of virtue.

When a certain brother had sinned, the brothers sent for Abba Moses, consulting him about the matter. Taking a basket full of sand, he came to them.

When the brothers asked what this was, he answered: “My sins run behind me, and I do not see them. But today I have come to judge another’s sins.” Hearing this, the brothers spared the man.

When Abba Moses had been made a cleric and the bishop placed the shoulder-cloth upon him, he said to him: “Abba, you have been made white.”

Moses answered: “On the outside, lord pope; but what of the inside?”

Wishing to test him, the bishop said to his clerics that, when Moses approached the altar, they should drive him away with abuse and follow him to hear what he said.

Therefore, casting him outside, they said: “Go outside, Ethiopian.”

As he went out, he said: “They have treated you well, O pot-black man. Since you are not a man, why did you presume to place yourself among human beings?”

Section I

Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, Book XV, concerning the aforesaid Moses that, when at that time Mavia, queen of the nation of the Saracens, began in vehement war to strike the towns and cities of Palestine and the Arabian frontier and at the same time to devastate the neighboring provinces, and had worn down the Roman army in frequent battles, she sought peace and promised that she would embrace it in no other way unless Moses the monk were given to her nation as bishop.

He led a solitary life in the desert near those regions and had become widely known through the merits, virtues, and signs which God performed magnificently through him.

Moses, therefore, was seized so that he might receive the priesthood. By no argument did he permit himself to be ordained by Lucius, because Lucius was a heretic or an intruder; instead, he was ordained bishop by those whom Lucius had sent into exile. Having done this, he both maintained peace with that most ferocious nation and preserved the faith undefiled.

It was said to this Moses: “Go, sit in your cell, and it will teach you all things.”

The same man said: “A man who flees human beings is like a ripe grape, but one who associates with human beings is like a sour grape.”

Before he was a bishop, when he heard that a judge was coming to him, he fled into a marsh. When the judge met him and asked him where Moses was, he said: “Why do you wish to speak with him? He is foolish and a heretic.”

Zacharias, the disciple of Serapion, said to this Moses, having taken off his hood, cast it beneath his feet, and trampled upon it: “Unless a monk has been trampled upon in this way, he cannot be a monk.”

To this Zacharias, when he was dying, Moses said: “What do you see?”

He answered: “Nothing is better than to be silent, father.”

The same Moses said to seven brothers dwelling with him in Scetis: “Today the barbarians are coming here. Flee.”

They said: “And are you not fleeing?”

He answered: “For so many years I have awaited this day, so that the word of the Lord may be fulfilled which says, ‘Everyone who takes the sword will perish by the sword.’ Behold,” he said, “the lamias have drawn near.”

The barbarians immediately entered and killed him. But one of the seven, terrified, hid beneath the beds and saw seven crowns descending and crowning Moses and six brothers.

The same Moses said to Pigmenius: “It is folly for a man, after leaving his own dead man, to mourn another’s.”

The same man said: “To die to your neighbor is to mourn your own sins and to be without thought concerning every person, that this one is good and that one evil.”

The same man said: “Passion is engendered through these four things: through abundance of food and drink, through satiety with sleep, through idleness, and through jesting.”

When, around the beginning of Abba Moses’s conversion, the devil laid upon him so very grave an attack of fornication that he was unable to remain in his cell, he went to Abba Isidore and related to him the violence of the attack.

When Isidore consoled him from the sacred Scriptures and asked him to return to his cell, he refused. Isidore therefore ascended with him to the upper part of his little cell and said to him: “Look toward the west.”

He saw a multitude of demons as though prepared for battle.

Isidore then said: “Look toward the east.”

He saw a glorious multitude of holy angels, shining like the light of the sun.

Isidore said: “Behold, those whom you saw in the west are they who attack God’s holy ones. But those whom you saw in the east are they whom the Lord sends to aid his holy ones. Know, therefore, that more are with us, as the prophet Elisha said, because greater is he who is in us than he who is in the world.”

Therefore, strengthened by these words, Moses returned to his cell.

The monastery of this Isidore, as Jerome says, was near the Thebaid, surrounded by a wall and possessing one thousand monks. An elder sitting at the gate received those entering under this law: that they should not go out again.

From this, Vincent says above, it is shown that stability of place in religion was firmly established even then, although Benedict is afterward said to have invented it, that is, to have been the first to confirm it in writing.

For receiving guests, this Isidore had another cell adjoining his own.

This saying belonged to Isidore: “From the time when I became a monk, I have not permitted anger to ascend as far as my throat.”

Whenever a thought said to this Abba Isidore, “You are great,” he answered within himself: “Surely you are not such as that man,” namely, some great saint.

But when a demon, troubling him, suggested despair to him, he said: “Although I may be cast into torments because of my sins, nevertheless I find you beneath me.”

Abba Pambo, since he was without letters, approached a certain man so that he might learn from him the first verse of the thirty-eighth Psalm, namely: “I said, I shall guard my ways, that I may not offend with my tongue.”

He refused to hear the second verse. He said: “It is enough. If I fulfill this one, it suffices for me.”

When afterward his master asked why he had not returned in six months, he answered: “Because I have not yet been able to fulfill that verse.”

When, after a long time, he was asked again whether he had yet fulfilled it, he said: “I have scarcely been able to fulfill it in forty-nine years.”

Section II

“In the region of Arsinoë,” says Heraclides in the Lives of the Fathers, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, “we saw Serapion, father of three thousand monks who lived from their own labors, which they obtained chiefly at harvest time by the payment for their hands.

“This is the custom not only among them but among almost all Egyptian monks: at harvest time they hire themselves out for reaping, and from this payment each obtains about eighty modii of grain. From it they not only feed the needy of that region but also send ships laden with grain to Alexandria for those confined in prison or other needy foreigners. For within Egypt there are not enough poor people able to receive the fruit of their merciful generosity.”

This Serapion was he who, when he was a young man, stole a small loaf each day and secretly ate it. When his Abba Theonas gave a discourse to certain men on the usefulness of revealing their thoughts, Serapion, pierced by compunction, confessed his sin. As he brought into the midst the bread which he had hidden in his bosom, a flame of fire came forth from his bosom, as was said above in the Conferences.

The aforesaid Theonas, as Socrates says in the Tripartite History, was father of three thousand monks, was most learned in Greek and Latin letters, and is said to have kept silence for thirty years.

Concerning him Jerome also says: “We saw another holy man, Theonas, a solitary enclosed in his cell, concerning whom it was said that he had kept silence for thirty years.”

Vincent says that from this it appears that he did this before he was abbot. For he could not lawfully have maintained silence for so long a time while existing as a prelate.

Dorotheus, a Theban by race, as Socrates says in the Tripartite History, gathered stones from the sea each day, and each year built a lodging and gave it to those unable to build. At night, however, he made baskets to sell for their food.

He was never seen sleeping upon a bed or extending his feet for rest. Often, when he fell asleep while eating, food slipped from his mouth. On one occasion, weighed down by sleep, he fell into dung and, waking, said sorrowfully and in silence: “If you persuade the angels to sleep, you will also persuade me to sleep.”

To a man who asked why he wore down his body in such labor, he answered: “Because it kills me.”

His food was wholly without the work of fire.

When robbers, thinking that he possessed gold, once invaded his little cell, they were so fixed to his doors by his prayers that they were utterly unable to move until the customary multitude of people came. When they saw the robbers, they attempted to hand them over to be burned with fire.

Then the holy man, compelled by necessity to speak, said: “Permit them to depart. Otherwise the grace of healings will flee from me.” For by the imposition of his hand alone he conferred health from every infirmity.

When the robbers heard these things, they also became monks and penitents and were permitted to depart.

Whenever this holy man answered people, he wrote upon tablets. It is said that when he went forth into the desert at night, he also used a very great company of beasts, for whom, as the reward for their labor, he drew water from his well.

Piamon the priest, as is contained in the Tripartite History, while he sacrificed, saw an angel of God standing opposite the altar, writing in a book the monks who were present and erasing those who were absent.

At the time when the brothers approached to communicate, this Piamon saw an angel of God standing before the altar and writing the names of certain men in a book, but not writing those of others. Examining each of these separately, he found a mortal sin in each; and he wept with them until they were inscribed with the others.

Marcus, called an antiquarian scribe, while he wrote an O, left it incomplete as a C, as is said in the Lives of the Fathers. And, as certain persons add, when he returned to the cell because of obedience, he found the completion of that letter made from gold.

This Marcus was clothed in sackcloth that had been torn and sewn back together, his face stained with soot from the roof. Therefore, when at his superior's command he came out before his mother, who had come to see him, he was not recognized, although he was seen by her.

Abba Silvanus was for a long time placed in an ecstasy of mind. Rising, he wept bitterly. When the brothers asked the cause of his weeping, he said: "I was carried away to judgment, and I saw many from our habit going to torments and many secular persons going to the kingdom."

The elder, mourning, did not wish to leave his cell. But when he was compelled to go out, he covered his face, saying: "What necessity is there to see this bodily light, in which there is nothing useful?"

When Abba Silvanus and his disciple Zacharias came to a certain monastery of theirs, the monks caused them to eat a little. But after they went out, the disciple found water and wished to drink.

The abbot said to him: "Today is a fast."

He answered: "Father, did we not eat today?"

He said to him: "That food was the food of charity, my son. But let us again keep our fast."

A certain foreign brother came to Abba Silvanus on Mount Sinai and, seeing that the brothers were working, said: "Why do you labor for the food which perishes? But Mary chose the best part."

Then the elder said to his disciple Zacharias: "Give him a book to read and put him in a cell which possesses nothing."

At the ninth hour that brother looked about to see whether perhaps the elder would call him to eat. But when the hour had passed, the brother came and said to Silvanus: "Abba, did the brothers not eat today? Why did you not call me?"

The abbot answered: "You are a spiritual man and have no need of this food. But we, being as it were carnal, need to eat, and therefore we work. You, however, have chosen the best part."

When he heard this, he began to repent and to say: "Forgive me, abba."

Then Silvanus answered: "Therefore Martha is necessary for Mary."

The disciple of this Silvanus was Zeno, who said: "Never remain in a celebrated place, nor sit with a man who possesses a great name."

The same man said: "The brothers have abandoned recognition of their sins and pursue heavenly things."

When this same man had a cucumber, he said within himself: "You are a thief; you are going to torments. Test whether you can bear torments." And he stood in the burning heat for five days, scorching himself in the sun.

There was another holy father called Or, near the Thebaid, who, as Jerome says, was ninety years old, had a very long beard, and was most joyful in countenance and appearance.

At first he did not know letters, but grace was divinely given to him; and when a book was offered to him by the brothers, he began to read as though he had long known letters.

It was his custom not to take bodily food before the spiritual communion of Christ.

The same Or said to his disciple: "See that you never bring another person's word into this cell."

When this Or had spent many years in the desert, an angel of the Lord appeared to him, saying: “Whomever you convert to salvation while placed in this life, you will receive rule over so many in the future.”

Many thousands of human beings were converted to God through him. Whenever any brother wished to remain in the desert, he prepared a cell for him and gave him furnishings.

On one occasion, as he himself related, demons came to him beneath another appearance, namely, like soldiers of the heavenly army conducting a great king in a chariot. The one who was regarded by the others as the king said to him: “Behold, man, you have fulfilled all things. It remains only that you adore me, and I shall transfer you into heaven like Elijah.”

Hearing this, he thought: “What is this? Do I not adore my Savior and King every day? If this were he, he would not ask from me what he knew me to do without ceasing.”

Then he said: “I have my King, whom I adore every day without interruption. But you are not my king.” Immediately the demon vanished.

This man lived for three years upon the bread of angels.

Chapter X

Jerome narrates concerning Saint Apollonius, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, Book XV, saying: “We also saw Saint Apollonius in the borders of Hermopolis, to which they hand down that the Savior fled with Mary and Joseph.

“There was there a temple in which, when the Savior entered, all the idols fell and were shattered.

“In those borders Apollonius was father of five hundred monks and was almost eighty years old. He was still fifteen years old when he withdrew into the desert. He lived there for forty years.

“When the Lord said to him, ‘Apollonius, through you I shall overthrow all the idols of Egypt; I shall destroy the wisdom of the wise,’ Apollonius said: ‘Lord, take vainglory away from me.’

“The Lord said to him: ‘Put your hand to your neck, and whatever you seize, bind it and bury it beneath the sand.’

“Putting in his hand, he seized what was like a little Ethiopian and plunged it beneath the sand while it cried: ‘I am the demon of pride.’

“Then the divine voice said: ‘Whatever you request hereafter, you shall obtain.’”

These things happened in the time of Julian the Apostate.

When a certain one of Saint Apollonius’s brothers had been seized by Julian, Apollonius went and consoled him so that he might bear patiently the things inflicted upon him.

Then a tribune came and, finding the holy man, was moved with anger against him and ordered him also to be enclosed with the others. This was done.

But at midnight a great light appeared in the prison, and an angel, opening the doors, wished to lead out all the prisoners. Apollonius, however, resolved that there should be a delay until morning.

Then the guards, prostrate at the feet of the holy men, asked them to depart. When morning came, a centurion came and ordered them to depart, because in that same night his house had fallen in an earthquake and the chosen among his servants had died. And thus the saints returned with hymns and praises.

After these things, preaching to the gentiles, Apollonius converted many thousands of people to the faith by infinite signs and miracles.

In a time of persecution he went out to visit Christian captives. While he consoled certain of them, he was found by the judges, seized, and imprisoned.

A certain gentile named Philemon, a very handsome man, afflicted him with reproaches and insults.

Apollonius said to him: “May God have mercy upon you, my son, and may God impute none of the things which you have said to you as sin.”

Hearing this, Philemon was pierced by compunction and immediately confessed himself to be a Christian.

When the judge heard this, he ordered a great fire to be kindled and them to be cast into its midst. This was done.

Meanwhile, while the saint prayed that the fire might be extinguished for the glory of Christ's name, the fire was immediately extinguished when dew was sent from heaven. Seeing this, the judge, pierced by compunction, was converted to the faith.

At last they were led in chains before the prefect. But those who led them were struck with contrition, adhered to the name of Christ, and were also bound for Christ.

At the prefect's command, since he refused to hear them, they were cast into the sea. Thus the water of their passion became for them the water of baptism.

The sea cast the bodies of them all together upon dry land. Buried together, they heal illnesses.

The holy man completed one hundred prayers with bent knees by day and one hundred by night.

His garment was a tow tunic and a linen cloth with which he wrapped his neck and head. These are said to have remained in the desert without ever becoming old.

Near this saint there was a temple and an image which the priests carried around, as though on behalf of rainwater. By praying he caused them all to stand motionless, and not even when oxen were applied could the image be moved. Thus they stood for an entire day and night, burned by the most rapid heat.

At last, knowing that this had happened to them through the saint, they burned the image and believed in the Lord.

In the first days when he had begun to dwell in a cave, the holy day of Easter was at hand. They possessed only a few dry loaves and vegetables of the kind which they customarily stored among themselves after sprinkling them with salt.

Therefore he ordered the brothers each to ask from the Lord whether there was anything which he would gladly have on the feast day. They ordered him also to do this.

When he had completed the prayer and all had answered "Amen," behold, they suddenly saw wholly unknown men standing before the doors of the cave with a great abundance of foods. Among them were certain kinds of fruit never seen at all in the regions of Egypt, grapes of incredible size, nuts, figs, pomegranates, an abundance of honeycomb and milk, very large kernels, and white and clean loaves which nevertheless appeared to belong to a foreign province.

The men who had brought these things, as soon as they handed them over, returned hastily, as though to him by whom they had been sent.

So great was the abundance of these things that it sufficed for daily provision until the day of Pentecost. They were certain that they had been sent to them by God for the sake of the solemnity.

One of the brothers asked him that humility and the grace of gentleness might be given to him. When Apollonius prayed, this was fulfilled.

When a famine arose, all the inhabitants of the place came to him with their wives and little children. He ordered them to be fed until he had nothing except three baskets of bread which ought to have furnished one day's sustenance for the monks. He also ordered these to be brought into the midst and, raising his hands to God, said: "Can the Lord's hand not multiply these things? As the Holy Spirit says, bread shall not fail in these baskets until we are all filled from the new fruits."

Therefore bread did not cease to be distributed from the baskets for four months, nor could it ever fail.

A certain man named Dionysius, moved by this, said to him: "Are you Elijah or another of the prophets or apostles, that you have dared to do these things?"

He answered: "What follows from that? Were not the apostles and prophets, who handed their faith and grace down to us, human beings? Or was God present then, but is he not present now?"

It was the custom among his brothers that they should not take food before receiving the Lord's communion around the ninth hour. After this they sometimes remained thus until evening, hearing the word of God.

After taking food, some withdrew into the desert, recalling the divine Scriptures from memory throughout the whole night. Others, having received Christ's grace, departed immediately, content with this spiritual food alone. They did this for many days.

He ordered the brothers always to rejoice, saying: "Let the gentiles be saddened; let the Jews mourn; let sinners lament without ceasing. But let the just rejoice.

"It is altogether unfitting that there be sadness among those whose salvation is in God and whose hope is in the kingdom of heaven. For those who love earthly things rejoice over fragile and perishable things. But why should we who possess the hope of so great a glory and the expectation of eternity not glory with every exultation?"

He said further: “It has been handed down that brothers who arrive are to be adored, so that it may be certain that in their arrival the arrival of the Lord is possessed. For thus Abraham also received the angels, who appeared to be men, while the Lord was understood in them.

“Sometimes we also ought to compel brothers to bodily rest against their will.”

He admonished that, if it could be done, monks should communicate every day, because he who makes himself far from these things becomes far from God.

He said that the fasts of the fourth and sixth weekdays were not to be relaxed, because on the fourth weekday Judas considered the betrayal of the Lord, and on the sixth weekday the Lord himself was crucified.

Thus he who without any necessity relaxes the prescribed fasts on these days will be seen either to betray the Savior with the betrayer or to crucify him with the one crucifying.

These things are held as canonized in On Consecration, distinction III, The Fasts. Nevertheless, they are matters of counsel, not of a precept of the Church.

Apollonius adds: “If anyone arrives on these days, a table is to be set for him alone; but if he is unwilling, he is not to be compelled.”

The holy Abba Copres related, as Vincent reports in Book XV of the Historical Mirror, that in that desert there was a certain most holy man, Mutius, who at first had been a very great robber, a violator of tombs, and most notorious in every crime.

One night, when with certain machines he wished to break in through the roof upon a certain virgin consecrated to God, wearied by the difficulty of the work, he was overcome by sleep. In a vision he saw standing beside him someone in royal apparel who said: “Now cease from these crimes, from this shedding of human blood, and from detestable thefts. Turn your vigils toward religious labor and undertake the angelic and heavenly soldiery. I shall make you leader and prince of this army.”

Behold, an army of monks was shown to him, and he was ordered to hold command over them.

Awaking, he saw the virgin standing nearby and asking who he was and why and whence he had come. Made as though senseless, he answered nothing except only that she should show him a church.

She led him to the church and presented him to the priests. Prostrate at their feet, he asked to be made a Christian and to be given a place of penance.

They handed him the first three verses of the first Psalm. He said that these were sufficient for him. Remaining with them for three days, he set out for the desert, where he remained for a very long time, taking food from the roots of plants.

Returning to the priests, he rendered back his verses both in words and in deeds. Remaining with them for one week, he returned to the desert, where, dwelling in every grace for seven continuous years, he attained the fullness of grace, so that he retained almost all the Scriptures in memory.

He took food only on the Lord’s day, brought to him divinely, and it sufficed for him until the next Lord’s day.

When Mutius most diligently prepared garments for burying the dead, a certain young man, his disciple, said to him: “I wish that, when I am dead, you would clothe me in this manner.”

He said: “Certainly I shall do it, and I shall clothe you so abundantly until you say, ‘It is enough.’”

Not long afterward the young man died. When he had been clothed, Mutius said to him before everyone: “Are these things sufficient for your burial, O little son, or do you wish us to add something further?”

But he, his face now wrapped and his countenance bound, said while everyone heard: “It is enough, father. You have fulfilled what you promised.”

On one occasion, while Mutius was going to visit the brothers whom he had instructed, it was revealed to him by the Lord that a certain sick man nearby was about to die. It was already evening. When he saw the sun now sinking, he said to it: “In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, stand for a little while upon your course and wait for me until I reach the village.” This was done.

Entering the house of the brother for whom he had hastened, he found him already dead. Having made a prayer, he approached him, kissed him upon the bed, and said: “What do you desire more: to depart and to be with Christ, or still to remain in the flesh?”

Then, recovering his spirit, the man sat up a little and said: “Why do you recall me, father? It is better for me to depart and to be with Christ. To remain in the flesh is not necessary for me.”

Mutius said: “Sleep in peace, son, and pray for me.” Immediately, reclining upon the little bed, he fell asleep.

When he saw another brother lying ill and accepting death with difficulty, he rebuked him, saying: “Why are you unprepared for your departure?”

The man said: “Father, I ask that you intercede for me, so that the Lord may grant me a little time for penance.”

The saint said to him: “Now, when you have completed the time of life, do you seek a period of penance? What were you doing during this whole time of your life? Were you not able to care for your wounds? Indeed, you were always adding more recent ones.”

When he persisted in entreating, Mutius said to him: “If you add no further evils to your evils, I shall pray to the Lord for you.”

When he had prayed, he said: “Behold, the Lord has granted you three years.” Rising without any delay, the man followed him into the desert.

When the three years had been completed, Mutius led him back to the place from which he had taken him and set him in the midst of the brothers. From him, as from material, he produced for the brothers a discourse concerning the fruits of penance. While Mutius spoke, that brother began as though to sleep a little and immediately rested perpetually.

This Mutius often crossed the Nile upon his feet, with the water reaching only to his knees. He frequently entered among the brothers when the doors were closed. And he was carried in a moment of time to whatever place he wished, however far away it was.

When Abba Copres related these and many other things, one of us began, through disbelief in the things which were being said, to grow weary and from weariness to fall asleep. Behold, in a vision he saw a book written in golden letters in the hands of Copres, from which the elder’s narrative appeared to be drawn, and heard the voice of a certain man venerable with gray hair saying to him: “Why do you not listen attentively to the things recited to you, but sleep in disbelief?”

The people of that region sprinkled through their fields the sand which the saint had trodden and blessed, so that the sterility of the land might be removed. Thus far are the words of Copres concerning Mutius.

This Copres, finding a Manichaean enemy seducing many and being unable to confound him with words, said to the people: “Kindle a very great fire, and then let us both enter the flame. The faith of whichever one is not burned is true.”

When this had been done, the elder seized the Manichaean and began to drag him toward the fire.

But he said: “Not so. Rather, let each of us enter separately. Nevertheless, you who proposed this ought to enter first.”

The elder, signing himself in the name of Christ, entered the flame. Divided this way and that, it did him no harm, and he stood there for almost half an hour.

Seeing this, the people compelled the other man to enter. But he began to resist and withdraw himself. They seized him, cast him into the fire, and afterward drove him away with disgrace.

The same Copres related that in a certain desert in the Thebaid there had been a man named Elias, one hundred and twenty years old, of which he had passed seventy in solitude.

He said: “Whatever vice of your own passion you cast out of yourself, you will also be able to drive the demon of that vice from possessed bodies.”

The same Elias said: “Pallor with humility and leanness is the adornment of a monk.”

The same man said: “I greatly fear three things: one, when my soul is about to depart from my body; another, when I am about to meet the judge; the third, when sentence is pronounced concerning me.”

When this Elias was unwilling to receive a sinner, Anthony said: “A ship suffering shipwreck at sea lost what it was carrying and scarcely reached land empty. Why, therefore, do you wish to sink upon the land one who has been delivered?”

Among the other miracles which he related, blessed Copres also added one concerning blessed Syrus, Paul, and Isaiah. When on one occasion they met one another at the bank of a river so that they might visit a certain brother named Anub, as they entreated the Lord that they might not be hindered upon the way, a little boat appeared to them. Entering it, they completed in one hour a journey which was of three days.

When they landed, blessed Isaiah said: “The Lord has shown me the man to whom we are going meeting us and telling each of us the secrets of our heart.”

Paul said: “The Lord has shown me that after three days this man will die.”

As they made their way from the river to the monastery, Anub met them, blessed them, and afterward disclosed the merits of each one.

Paul said to him: “Since we know that after three days you will depart from the world, relate to us, for the memory and strengthening of the faithful, the deeds by which you have pleased God.”

He said: “I have never done anything great. Nevertheless, I have always preserved this: in persecution I confessed the Savior’s name. I have never lied. I never wished to desire earthly things.

“Christ’s grace has never failed me, but angels brought me every food which I desired. The Lord concealed from me none of the things which happen upon the earth. I never sought sleep, but an angel of God always stood by me and showed me all the things which are done in the world.

“I also saw the companies of the just, of martyrs, and of holy monks, whose work is always to praise God and to bless him in simplicity of heart and faith. On the other hand, I saw Satan and his angels handed over to eternal punishment in fires.”

When he had related these and other things to them, he gave up his spirit into the hands of angels, while they saw it being borne into heaven and praising God with the angels.

Concerning Saint Helenus, Copres says that, when Helenus had lived for a long time in the desert, he wished to visit the brothers and brought them provisions. When in the middle of the journey he was weighed down by the burden, he saw wild asses running through the desert.

He called one of them, saying: “In the name of my Lord Jesus Christ, let one of you come and carry this burden.” Immediately one approached and carried him, together with the burden, most swiftly to the brothers.

At another time, when visiting the brothers, he found that they were not celebrating the Lord’s day as solemnly as they ought. He learned the reason, namely, that they had no priest, because the priest lived across a river in which there remained a certain animal on account of which no one could cross, namely, a crocodile which killed people in the midst of the passage.

Then the elder said: “I shall go for the priest.”

Coming to the water, he saw the crocodile approach and place itself beneath him. He mounted it and was quickly carried to the priest’s cell. He led the priest with him to the water so that he might cross.

When the priest objected that no vessel was present, Helenus answered: “Do not fear; it is prepared.” With a great voice he called the crocodile and mounted its back. But the priest, terrified merely by the sight of the beast, fled and refused to mount.

Then the holy man crossed alone. When he descended from the beast, he said: “It is better for you to die than to be entangled in the guilt of so many crimes.” Immediately it expired.

When a certain young man who had followed Helenus into the desert was greatly troubled by demons with shameful thoughts, which he disclosed to the saint, Helenus drew a circle with his finger in the sand around the young man’s cell and forbade the demons, in the name of the Lord Jesus, to cross the appointed boundary. Thus he was delivered.

When brothers came to him and he had nothing to set before them, he was accustomed to see a young man who brought him whatever provisions he desired. When these had been set down before the cell, the young man disappeared.

“We also saw the monastery of Paphnutius, who was an inhabitant of the uttermost desert in the regions of Heracleos near the city of the Thebaid.

“After he had led the angelic life for a long time, he made a prayer to the Lord that he would show him to which of the saints he was similar. An angel came to him, saying that he was similar to a certain musician who sought his livelihood nearby by the art of singing.

“Then the man of God, having found that man, examined his life. He found that he had first been a robber and, among his other evils, had performed two praiseworthy deeds.

“The man said: ‘Once, when my companions and I had seized a certain virgin and my companions wished to violate her, I snatched her from their hands and restored her untouched to her own home.

“‘At another time I found in the desert a woman of honorable appearance wandering about. When she told me that her husband was imprisoned with her two sons because of a fiscal debt, that she herself was being sought for similar punishments, and that she wandered for this reason, I had compassion, led her to my cave, refreshed her soul after it had collapsed from three days’ hunger, and gave her three hundred solidi, with which she afterward freed her husband and sons.’

“Hearing these things, the holy man said that he himself had never done such a deed, adding: ‘Because, therefore, you will not be held in the least place before God, follow me.’

“Then that man quickly cast the pipes from his hands, followed Paphnutius, and continued for three years in the greatest abstinence. Thus he gave up his spirit into the hands of angels.

“Then Saint Paphnutius prayed as he had done before. The angel answered that he was similar to the chief man of a certain village.

“When the man of God came to him, he was received by him with great reverence. When his manner of life was sought, Paphnutius could scarcely obtain that he reveal it to him.

“At last he said: ‘Because you are a holy man of God, I disclose to you things concealed from all others, although they are very small. I took a wife only for the sake of offspring, from whom I received three sons. Thirty years have now passed since the last was born, and afterward I knew neither her nor another woman. Likewise, she knew no other man.

“‘I have not ceased to receive guests, never dismissing a guest without provisions for the journey. I have never accepted a person in judgment. I have never passed by litigants unless I reconciled them. My flocks have never harmed the crops of others. I have never prohibited anyone wishing to sow in my field, but left the better fallow lands to them.

“‘Insofar as it was in me, I never permitted a more powerful man to oppress an inferior. I always strove to sadden no one. And what more? Insofar as I was able, or insofar as I heard that a person had performed any work of mercy, I fulfilled it insofar as it was in me.’

“Hearing these things, the holy man said: ‘I have done no such thing. Therefore this remains for you: that naked, you imitate the naked Christ.’

“Hearing this, the man immediately departed and wholly abandoned the world.

“Not long afterward the holy man, sitting in his cell, saw that man’s soul being borne by angels. He immediately went to that man’s cell, which was not far from his own, and, finding his body dead, buried it and gave himself to greater exercises.

“A third time the holy man prayed as before. Then an angel showed him a way by which, as he went, he would find one similar to himself.

“Proceeding, the holy man found a merchant possessing two ships, in which he had merchandise worth thirty thousand solidi.

“When the saint saw him, he said: ‘Abandon these things which are of the earth, and join yourself to heavenly things.’

“He immediately consented, abandoning all things. After some time he was consummated and gathered to the company of the saints.

“Not long afterward an angel stood beside Paphnutius, saying: ‘Come, blessed man; enter the eternal tabernacles owed to you.’

“Then, continuing for one further day, when priests came to him, he said: ‘No one, whether thief or merchant, ought to be despised, because in every nation God possesses some souls pleasing to himself.’

“After he had related the powers given to him by God, he ended the present life and entered the eternal one.”

The same Paphnutius, at the request of robbers seeking this contrary to his purpose, drank wine and thus gained them.

There was at that time a certain girl named Thaïs, exceedingly beautiful, whom her mother placed in a brothel from childhood. She became a most famous prostitute.

Many came to her from distant regions, and many, after selling their possessions, became extremely poor. Her lovers also, contending among themselves in quarrels because of jealousy, filled her thresholds with blood.

When Abba Paphnutius heard this, he put on secular clothing, took one solidus, and went to her. As soon as he saw her, he offered her the solidus.

Having received the price, she said: “Let us enter the house.”

When he had entered, she invited him to ascend the bed spread with costly coverings.

The saint said: “Is there some more secret place here?”

She said: “There is.”

The elder said: “Let us enter it.”

She said: “If you fear a human being, no one can see you in this place. But if you fear God, wherever we enter, God sees us.”

The elder said to her: “Do you know that God exists?”

She answered that she knew God, his future kingdom, and also the torments of sinners.

The elder said: “If, therefore, you know these things, why have you destroyed so many souls? And why are you now to render an account not only for your own perdition but also for theirs and to be condemned?”

Hearing this, she fell at his feet and with tears sought a delay of three days, after which she would do whatever he commanded her.

When he appointed for her a place to which she should come, she collected everything which she had gained from sin, brought it into the middle of the city, and burned it while the people watched. Afterward she went to the place which the abbot had appointed for her.

Having found a monastery of virgins, he enclosed her in a small cell, sealed the door with lead, and left her a small window through which a little food might be brought to her. He ordered that a little dry bread and a very little water be ministered to her each day.

When she asked how she ought to pray to God, he answered: “You are not worthy to name God. But, lying toward the east, look toward it and frequently repeat this utterance: ‘You who formed me, have mercy upon me.’”

When she had been enclosed for three years, Abba Paphnutius had compassion upon her. He went to Anthony, asking whether God had forgiven her sins.

At Anthony’s command, the disciples of Anthony, each separately, prayed without ceasing that night so that God might reveal this matter to one of them.

Soon Abba Paul saw in heaven a bed adorned with precious coverings, which three virgins of bright countenance held while guarding three lamps before it. Upon the bed was an unfading crown.

When Paul said to them, “This glory belongs to none other than my father Anthony,” a divine voice answered: “This does not belong to your father Anthony, but to Thaïs the prostitute.”

When Paul related this in the morning, Paphnutius, recognizing God’s power, departed with joy for the place, broke open the door which he had sealed with lead, and said to the blessed sinner: “Come out, because God has forgiven your sins.”

She said: “I call God to witness that from the time when I entered here, I made for myself, as it were, a bundle from all my sins and set it before my eyes. And just as breath did not withdraw from my nostrils, so not even for one moment until this hour did my sins withdraw from me.”

Section IV

“In a certain city of Egypt,” says Heraclides, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, Book XVIII, “there are twelve monasteries of virgins. Among them I saw a certain beloved woman named Amata, an old woman said now to have been eighty years in her monastery.

“With her lived sixty women, living in purity of abstinence beneath her instruction.

“In this monastery there was a certain virgin named Thaor, her disciple, who, having been in the monastery for thirty years, never wished to use a new tunic, head-covering, or shoes, saying that perhaps on account of this she would be compelled to go outside.

“All the others went to church according to custom on the Lord’s day alone, but she, clothed in cheap rags, remained alone at home.

“She was of so elegant a form that even a most chaste and most steadfast man could have been enticed by the beauty of her face, had she not been so adorned in her conduct that she possessed within herself a certain inestimable guardian of her own chastity, who compelled the eyes of anyone desiring shameful things to immeasurable shame and fear.”

Another woman, also dwelling nearby, is said never to have gone out of the monastery. In it she completed forty years with her mother.

At last the blessed martyr Colluthus stood by her, saying: “Today you will go to your Lord. Come, therefore, to the basilica of my martyrdom so that you may dine with me.”

Then, going out in the morning for the first time after the course of so many years, she came to the martyr’s shrine, that is, to that church. She carried bread and vegetables with her.

When the prayers had been completed there and everyone had withdrawn from the place, she sat and invoked the martyr, saying: “Bless my food, Saint Colluthus, and deign through your intercessions to set out with me.”

After taking food and making a prayer, she returned to the monastery around sunset and said to her mother: “I am setting out for my Lord.”

That very night, feeling neither pain of the head nor heat of the body, she arranged herself as she was to be buried and commended her spirit into the hands of God.

Moreover, the younger Melania, granddaughter of the aforesaid Melania, lived with her husband for twenty years, converted that husband of hers to contempt of the world, and renounced the world.

First, indeed, she distributed her silk garments for the adornment of churches. She sent her silver and gold by ship through the priest Paul to the East, and there he distributed it through diverse provinces. But in the western region she herself ministered necessities to all the needy whom she knew.

She set free as many as eight thousand servants of both sexes. She sold all the possessions which she had in Aquitaine, Gaul, Tarragona, and Spain. She reserved for herself only the estates which she possessed in Sicily, Campania, and Africa, so that thereafter she might feed and support monasteries from them.

She was accustomed always to take food after every other day. For in the beginnings themselves she ate even on every fifth day. Observing this, she also performed in turn the daily services of ministry with her maidservants, whom she regarded as sisters. Pinianus, her husband, lived a similar life with thirty monks.

There was a certain virgin in Alexandria, seventy years old, concerning whom all the clerics there said that long ago, when she was a very beautiful young woman, she was accustomed to avoid the sight of everyone, lest because of the extraordinary beauty of her countenance she be marked by suspicion or stain.

At that time, when the Arians under the emperor Constantius stirred up a persecution against blessed Athanasius, Athanasius, avoiding their accusations and a corrupt judgment, entrusted himself neither to friend, relative, nor cleric.

But when officers suddenly entered his house, clothed in a tunic and a cloak, he fled at midnight and came to this virgin. Terrified by the novelty of so unexpected a matter, she heard the holy bishop say: “I am troubled by the Arians and assailed by slanderous charges. Therefore, lest I be disfigured by an irrational mark and those who are unjustly prepared for my punishment fall rather into sin on my account, I believed that I ought to flee.

“God revealed to me this night that I can be saved with no one as with you.”

Then she, rejoicing in the Lord and casting away vain thoughts, secretly concealed that holy man within her cell for six years, for as long as the aforesaid Constantius lived. She washed his feet, prepared and ministered all necessities to him herself, borrowed the books which he sought, and handed them to him to read.

Nevertheless, no one in the city where he remained could find him until, after Constantius died, he was again clothed at night in his own garments and suddenly appeared in the church while all were astonished. For they believed that they saw him as one raised from the dead.

He satisfied his intimate friends, saying: “For this reason I did not betake myself to your hiding places: so that you might safely swear that you did not know where I was staying. And because it was necessary that I be sought everywhere, I lay hidden in the cell of that virgin, where no one would suspect that I was concealed because she appeared young and beautiful. Thus, therefore, I benefited both you and my reputation or glory.”

At Corinth there was a certain most noble and most beautiful maiden who lived under a vow of virginity. Certain persons brought charges against her before a pagan judge—as Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, Book XVIII—as though she had uttered insults against their own gods and the sacrilegious emperors.

But the judge, mad with love for the woman, after he had been unable by various devices and artifices to persuade her to do what he wished, raged against her with a new fury. He did not sentence her to death or to some punishment, but commanded that she be exposed in brothels, which was more grievous and cruel. He enjoined upon the procurer of those shameful acts that he should pay him three solidi each day from intercourse with her. Understanding, namely, that this money was to be demanded from the procurer by himself, he gave her into the power of all who wished to have her.

When those who sought such prey had learned of this perilous circumstance, they went to and watched the workshop of perdition; and, having paid the price, they spoke with her of the beginnings of the pleasures they desired for themselves. But she said that she had a certain wound in her inward parts, whose stench, if those coming to her should perceive it, would make them flee in horror of contagion. She entreated each one piteously to grant her rest for a few days.

Meanwhile, while she offered perpetual and very great prayers to God, God, the guardian of human salvation, so moved the mind of a certain young man, good in countenance and conduct, that, kindled by divine love, he desired to perish for her. Accordingly, entering under the appearance of perpetrating the shameful act, in the depth of night he gave the procurer five solidi, stripped himself of his own garments, clothed the maiden in them, covered her head with his cloak, and sent her uncorrupted out of the brothel.

On the following day, when this deed had become known to all, he was delivered to the judge and torn apart by the savagery of beasts, so that the demon might remain confounded in this respect also when he saw him crowned with a double martyrdom, both for his own salvation and for that of the virgin.

The same Vincent, in the place cited above, relates concerning another virgin, a handmaid of God, that, after preserving great abstinence for nine years, she was solicited and corrupted by a certain singer. Conceiving immediately, after she had completed the birth, her mind was pierced by the excessive sorrow of penance, to such a degree that she wished to kill herself by starvation. She continually importuned God with tearful prayers, saying: “You, great God, who have been accustomed to bear the malice of the whole world, because it is your will that all be saved, show in me also, though lost, whether you will restore me to salvation: cause that which was created from the perdition of my sin to be taken more swiftly from this light, lest I be compelled to resort either to the sword, or to the noose, or to a precipice.”

Immediately, when the offspring had by divine action been removed through death, she delivered herself to the greatest hardships of penance and served women afflicted with elephantiasis for thirty years. God did not reject her humble prayers. For God revealed to a certain holy priest, saying: “That virgin pleased me more in her penance than in her virginity.”

At Caesarea of Palestine, as the same Vincent reports in the place cited above, the daughter of a certain priest fell into fornication. Her corrupter persuaded her to transfer her own deed falsely onto a certain lector. When she was now visibly pregnant and her father compelled her to disclose the author of the crime, she laid it upon the lector.

Hearing this, the bishop caused him to be summoned by a priest into the assembly of all the clergy. When questioned by him, he could not confess that he had done any such thing. But when the bishop, exceedingly angry, heaped insults upon him as upon one who shamelessly denied his own sin, he said: “I have indeed said what was in my conscience. But if you wish to hear what is not there, I committed this crime.”

Immediately the bishop deposed him from the rank of lector. Then he said: “Command, therefore, that she be given to me in marriage, because neither is she now a virgin nor can I now be a cleric.” Then the bishop gave her to him, thinking that he loved her and could not be separated from her.

Therefore, after she had been delivered to him by both the bishop and her father, he entrusted her to a monastery of women, asking the abbess to keep her there and support her until she gave birth. He himself, however, enclosed himself in a narrow cell in the aforesaid monastery and undertook exceedingly difficult abstinence. With tears and groans and fasts he approached Christ, saying: “You, Lord, to whom all things are known and to whom nothing unjust is pleasing, manifest my cause also by your judgment.”

While he therefore persevered continually in these things, the woman, when she had fulfilled her days, began to be pressed violently by the pain of childbirth. And when, by God’s judgment, she could not free herself from the anguish of childbirth, and endured so great a torment until the seventh day, the slanderer, now about to die, beheld the infernal regions. Unable any longer to eat, drink, or sleep, she cried out in intolerable pain: “Woe is me, wretched woman, because I have come into this peril in two ways: first, because I lost my virginity; then, because I laid a false charge upon that lector.”

When her father heard these things, fearing that he would be reproved as a slanderer, he kept still and remained silent. But when the bishop heard them, he sent a deacon to the lector and gave him this message: “Pray that your slanderer may give birth.” But he gave no answer and did not even open his door. Prayers were again made for her in the church, yet not even thus did they perceive any remedy in her.

Then that bishop came to the lector, knocked at the door, and, entering, said: “Rise, Brother Eustace, and loose what you have bound.” At that very moment, when the lector together with the bishop had bent his knees, the woman gave birth. And the continual prayer of such innocence availed so greatly that the slander both perished and the slanderer endured punishments for her correction.

Section VII

“I saw many women,” says Heraclides, as Vincent reports in the place cited above, “who possessed manly and honorable conduct. Among them was Paula of the city, the mother of Doxotius, a prudent and spiritual woman, whose daughter Eustochium, a most chaste virgin, dwells to the present day in her monastery at Bethlehem, having fifty virgins with her.” But this woman was discussed above.

Saint Melania also was a woman of the city of Rome, the daughter of Marcellian the proconsul. Widowed in the twenty-second year of her age and perpetually joined to the eternal bridegroom by the love of divinity, she disclosed to no one the secrets of her mind. She placed the movable goods which she appeared to possess, together with certain boys and girls, on a ship and thus, hastening, sailed to Alexandria.

There, after everything had been sold and reduced to money and gold, she reached Mount Nitria. There she saw the venerable fathers Pambo, Arsisius, Serapion, Paphnutius, Abbot Isidore, and Dioscorus. Remaining with them in desert places for only six months, she went about and visited all the holy men who were there.

After this, however, when the Augustal prefect at Alexandria had condemned Isidore, Pambo, Paphnutius, Ammonius, twelve bishops and priests, and certain others—up to one hundred and twelve in number—to exile around Palestine and Diocaesarea, she followed them and supplied her service to them from her own resources.

When she was prohibited by the guards from doing this, she then took a boy’s clothing and, around the evening hours, carried to them all the necessities of life. When this became known, the consular governor of Palestine, thinking that he could fill his own coffers with her money by means of some terror, ordered her to be seized and thrust into prison.

She then sent him these words through intermediaries: “I was the daughter of such a man and the wife of such a man, but now I am a handmaid of Christ. You have no power to frighten me in any respect, nor to take anything whatever from my possessions. Do not think that I am to be despised on account of the cheapness of my clothing, because, if I wished, I could easily exalt myself. But lest, through ignorance of this, you incur danger or guilt, I have therefore sent you these words.” Thus, certainly, against the proud and imprudent it is sometimes necessary to employ arrogance, if I may call it that.

Terrified by these words, the judge excused his deed, honored her as she deserved, and gave her permission to approach the aforesaid men. When they had been recalled from exile, she made for herself a monastery at Jerusalem, in which she completed a period of twenty-seven years, having fifty virgin sisters with her.

With her also was Rufinus, an Italian citizen from the town of Aquileia, a wise man of noble and courageous conduct, who afterward also merited to attain the priesthood. Therefore, throughout twenty-seven years she was accustomed to receive and cherish at her own expense all the saints at Jerusalem and foreign bishops, monks, and virgins, and she made all who came to her better by such an example.

She also restored to the holy Church four hundred monks who had separated themselves from the Church on account of Paulinus. By continually persuading and teaching the truth, she recalled to the Church many other persons of a perverse sect.

There is also in the city of Panos a monastery containing four hundred men. “Among them,” says Heraclides, “I found blacksmiths, carpenters, saddlers, camel-drivers, and fullers, each laboring in his own craft. From those things which could remain beyond their daily sustenance, they furnished every necessity to monasteries of women and to nearby prisons.”

Among them there is also a monastery of four hundred women living according to the same customs and the same order, with the sole exception of a covering of skins. The women dwell across the river, but the men on the hither side of the river. When any woman has died, the other women carry her, clothed according to custom, and place her upon the bank. The men then carry her across from there in a small boat and, with psalms, lay her in their own tomb. No man crosses over to their monastery except the priest and the deacon, and this only on the Lord’s day.

In that same monastery there was a certain virgin who made herself a fool for Christ, so that she might fulfill her purpose of virtue. Since she humbled and cast herself down beyond measure, she was such an object of horror to all the others that they would not even take food with her. She was shunned by all; she endured the curses of all; she never withdrew from the kitchen, but fulfilled the duty of the entire monastery there as a maidservant, obeying everyone.

She never sat at table, but, wiping away the crumbs from the tables and washing the pots, she lived content with these provisions alone. Never using shoes, she kept her head wrapped in rags, and thus she served everyone. And certainly, although she suffered from everyone, she never did injury to anyone, and no murmuring of hers was heard.

Amid these things an angel of the Lord stood by Piterium, a most proven man who always lived in desert places, and said to him: “Why do you believe yourself to be something great in your way of life? Go to such-and-such a monastery of women, and you will find there one of them who has a torn cloth upon her head; know that she is better than you.”

Immediately he went to the said monastery and, having entered, caused all the sisters to be summoned. But that one alone on whose account he had come was not present. Then the holy man said to them: “Bring everyone, for one is absent whom the angel showed me.”

But they said: “We are all here except one fool who is in the kitchen.”

When he had commanded that she be brought, as she approached, the holy man cast himself at her feet, saying: “Bless me, spiritual mother.” She, in turn, prostrated herself before him, seeking his blessing.

When the sisters marveled, saying, “Do not endure such an insult, Abba, for this woman whom you see is a fool,” he said: “You are the fools, for she is better than both me and you. I beseech God that on the day of judgment I may merit to be found worthy of her crown.”

Then all cast themselves at the feet of holy Piterium, seeking pardon for the injuries inflicted upon her. One said: “I mocked her.” Another: “I despised her abject clothing.” Another: “While washing a dish, I poured the filth over her,” and other things of this kind. They all sought pardon from her and received it.

When she saw that she was held in esteem and veneration among the sisters, fearing human praises and the exaltation arising from them, she secretly withdrew from that monastery; where she went is entirely unknown.

Section IX

There was in Alexandria a virgin named Euphrosyne. When her father Paphnutius wished to give her in marriage, she approached a certain monk and asked to be taught by him those things which belong to God.

He said to her: “If you are able to bear the temptations of the flesh, abandon everything and flee.”

When she asked him to fulfill her desire, namely, for contempt of the world, he made a prayer, cut off her hair, clothed her in an honorable habit, and imposed upon her the name Smaragdus. After praying for her, he departed.

But, thinking within herself, she said: “If I enter a monastery of maidens, my father will seek me; and, finding me, he will drag me from there by force on account of my bridegroom.” For he was a great and powerful citizen.

Therefore, casting away her woman’s clothing, she took that of a man and went to the monastery where her father was very well known. Pretending that she was a eunuch from the emperor’s palace, she sought and received the habit, saying that she was called Smaragdus. The abbot entrusted her to a certain holy man among the monks, named Agapitus, to be instructed, saying: “This is your son and disciple. Instruct him in such a manner that he may surpass his master.”

But when Smaragdus came into the church, the devil stirred many to sin through evil thoughts on account of the beauty of her countenance, so that they all troubled the abbot because he had introduced such beauty into the monastery for the temptation of the brothers.

For this reason the abbot said to Smaragdus: “Son, your face is beautiful and is a ruin to the weak brothers. Therefore, I wish you to remain alone in your cell, to sing psalms there and eat there, and never to go out.” This she also did.

Therefore Smaragdus entered the cell and remained there in solitude, not going out from it but devoting herself to vigils, prayers, and fasts, so that her master Agapitus marveled and reported her constancy to the brothers.

Paphnutius, however, her father, considering what had become of his daughter, was exceedingly sorrowful, because she was his only child, and he had received her from a barren wife through the assistance and prayers of monks. For he had sought this from God: that he should give him an heir who might suitably dispose of his substance.

Likewise her bridegroom, coming to Paphnutius his father-in-law, grieved with him, saying: “Perhaps someone seduced her and departed with her.” Immediately, therefore, servants were sent throughout all Alexandria and Egypt to seek her, searching even the monasteries of maidens and the caves of the desert. Finding her nowhere, the father mourned his daughter and the bridegroom his bride as though she were dead.

The father, unable to bear his grief, came to the monastery where his daughter was, although she was unknown to everyone, and fell at the abbot’s feet, asking and saying: “You must pray to the Lord so that the fruit of your prayers may be found. For I do not know,” he said, “what has become of my daughter Euphrosyne.”

The abbot commanded all the brothers to show charity to Paphnutius in this matter by praying for the discovery of his daughter. Grieved through compassion on this account, they all gave themselves more earnestly to fasts and prayers. She herself, however, prayed that she might not be revealed during her life. Accordingly, since nothing concerning her was revealed to anyone, the abbot said to the father: “I believe that she has chosen the good part, and therefore nothing concerning her is revealed.”

On the next day, when the father came to the monastery, the abbot, seeing him greatly afflicted, said to him: “Do you wish to speak with a very spiritual brother who came from the palace of Theodosius?”

He said: “I do.”

The abbot therefore told Agapitus to conduct him into the cell of Smaragdus. When Euphrosyne saw her father after he had been brought in and recognized him, she was entirely filled with tears. The father, however, did not recognize her, both because of the change of clothing and because of the alteration of her face from abstinence and tears; he thought that this weeping proceeded from compunction. She had also covered her face with a cowl lest she be recognized.

After prayer had been made, therefore, they sat down. Smaragdus began to speak to her father concerning future blessedness and the fact that such glory is not attained except through almsgiving and patience; she also spoke concerning contempt of the world, and that children were not to be loved more than God, nor a father more than him who is the maker of all.

Wishing to console him still more in his affliction, she said: “If your daughter were in perdition, God would have revealed this. Yet God is able even now in this world to manifest her to you. Only give thanks to God, despairing of nothing. For I also, hearing from my master Agapitus of your grief and having great compassion, prayed to God that he grant you endurance and accomplish concerning you and your daughter that which is expedient.”

The father, marvelously consoled by her words, said to the abbot: “My soul has been edified by this brother, and I have been made as joyful as if I had found my daughter.” And he returned home.

But when Smaragdus had completed thirty-eight years in her cell, she finally fell into a grave illness. Hearing this, Paphnutius approached and visited her. He began to kiss her, crying out and saying: “Alas for me! Where are your sweet words by which you promised me that I would see my daughter? Behold, not only shall I not see her, but I am also losing you, by whom I was consoled.”

Smaragdus said to him: “Now set an end to sorrow. Remember that God manifested Joseph, whom he believed dead, to his father Jacob.”

When the day of her falling asleep in the Lord was now at hand, she said to her father: “Because God has fulfilled my desire and has brought me through to the end while I contended manfully, do not, therefore, now be solicitous concerning your daughter Euphrosyne. For I am that wretched woman, and you are my father. Do not permit my body to be stripped and washed by another, but do this yourself. And because at my entrance I promised the abbot that I possessed many properties and would be able to convey them to him if I persevered in this monastery, fulfill what I promised, and pray for me.”

Having said these things, she surrendered her spirit. When Paphnutius heard and saw this, his inward parts were moved, and he fell as though dead. Agapitus ran to him, strengthened him, and raised him from the ground. Rising, he began to lament, saying: “Alas for me, my sweetest daughter! Why did you not reveal yourself to me before, so that I might willingly dwell with you?”

These things were announced to the abbot and the brothers. While all marveled and wept, the abbot said: “Euphrosyne, bride of Christ, do not forget your servants, but pray for us to the Lord Jesus Christ.” Her body was delivered to burial with great honor. One of the monks, who had lost an eye, kissed her face and recovered his sight. The father, having become a convert in the said monastery, bestowed upon it a great part of his substance and survived for ten years in a praiseworthy manner.

It is read concerning another woman called Marina that her father, having entered a monastery, afterward also introduced her under the name and clothing of a male, calling her the little Marinus. He instructed her to disclose this to no one.

Having become a man in appearance and conducting herself very devoutly and obediently, after her father's death she went outside at the abbot's command on the business of the monastery. On one occasion she lodged in a certain place where there was an innkeeper who had a daughter. When this daughter had conceived through fornication with a certain man, her parents, perceiving this, asked by whom she had conceived. She falsely blamed Brother Marinus.

When they had announced this to the abbot, and she had been questioned by him about it, Marina groaned and said: "I have sinned, father. I do penance; pray for me." But the abbot, after correction, cast her out of the monastery.

Nevertheless, she did not depart from the monastery's gate, but lay there and received a morsel of bread. The girl's mother brought to the monastery the son who had been born from her and weaned, as belonging to them. The virgin Marina nourished him from that which was given to her by the monks.

When the abbot and the monks saw Marina's humility and patience, they granted pardon and brought her into the monastery, nevertheless imposing upon her all the most abject tasks.

But when, not many days afterward, she fell asleep in the Lord, the abbot said: "Wash his body, but bury him far from the monastery." When, in washing the body, they saw that she was a woman, they, together with their abbot, mourned and did penance for the hardships unjustly inflicted upon her.

At that same hour, the girl who had falsely accused her, seized by a demon, came to the monastery, confessing her sin and declaring the man by whom she had conceived. At last, through Marina's merits, she was healed.

Concerning Saint Mary the Egyptian, who is called the sinner. She led a most rigorous life in the desert for forty-seven years. This became known as follows.

A certain holy abbot named Zosimas, after he had crossed the Jordan and was traversing the great desert to see whether he might perhaps find some holy man, saw a certain person walking with a naked body, black and burned by the heat of the sun. This was Mary the Egyptian. She immediately took flight, and Zosimas began to run after her.

Then she said: "Abba Zosimas, why do you pursue me? Forgive me, because I cannot turn my face toward you, for I am a woman and naked. But extend your cloak to me, so that I may be able to see you without shame."

When Zosimas heard himself called by name, he was stupefied, gave her the cloak, and, prostrating himself upon the ground, asked her to bless him.

She said to him: "The blessing belongs rather to you, father, whom the dignity of the priesthood adorns."

But when he heard that she knew his name and office, he marveled still more and earnestly entreated that he be blessed.

Then she said: "Blessed is God, the redeemer of our souls."

When she prayed with her hands extended, he saw her raised from the ground by a space of about one cubit. Then the old man began to doubt whether perhaps she was a spirit.

She said to him: "May God forgive you for judging me, a sinful woman, to be an unclean spirit."

Then Zosimas adjured her by God that she ought to recount her condition to him.

She said to him: "Forgive me, Abba, because, if I recount my condition to you, you will flee as one terrified by a serpent, your ears will be contaminated by my words, and the air will be polluted by filth."

When he insisted vehemently, she said: "Father, in the twelfth year of my age I came from Egypt to Alexandria. There for seventeen years I publicly subjected myself to lust; I denied myself utterly to no one.

"But when the people of that region were going up to Jerusalem to adore the holy cross, I asked the sailors to permit me to set out with them. When, however, they required the fare from me, I said: 'Brothers, I have no fare, but in place of the fare have my body.' Thus they received me and had my body as the fare.

"When I had come to Jerusalem and had reached the doors of the church with the others to adore the cross, suddenly and invisibly I suffered myself to be driven back, nor was I permitted to enter within. Again and again I came to the threshold of the door, and suddenly I suffered the injury of being driven back, although everyone else had free entrance and encountered no impediment.

"Therefore, returning to myself and considering that this was happening to me on account of the enormity of my crimes, I began to beat my breast with my hands and to sigh grievously from the depth of my heart. Looking about there, I saw an image of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Then I began tearfully to entreat her to obtain pardon for my sins and to permit me to enter to adore the holy cross, promising that I would renounce the world and thereafter live chastely.

“When I had prayed this and received confidence in the name of the Virgin, I again approached the doors of the church and entered the church without any impediment. After I had most devoutly adored the holy cross, someone gave me three coins, from which I bought three loaves. I heard a voice saying to me: ‘If you cross the Jordan, you will be saved.’

“Therefore I crossed the Jordan and came into this desert, where I have remained for forty-seven years, seeing no human being at all. Those three loaves which I brought with me hardened like stone over the course of time, and they sufficed me for seventeen years as I ate from them. My garments, however, rotted away long ago.

“For seventeen years in this desert I was troubled by temptations of the flesh, but now by the grace of God I have conquered them all. Behold, I have recounted all my deeds to you, and I ask you to pour out prayers for me to the Lord.”

Then the old man, prostrated upon the ground, blessed the Lord in his handmaid.

She said to him: “I beseech you to return to the Jordan on the day of the Lord’s Supper and to carry the body of the Lord with you. I will meet you there and receive the sacred body of Christ from your hand, for from the day on which I came here I have not received the communion of the Lord.”

The old man therefore returned to the monastery. When the year had passed and the day of the Lord’s Supper was approaching, he took the body of the Lord and, coming to the bank of the Jordan, found the woman standing on the other bank. Making the sign of the cross, she walked upon the waters and came all the way to the old man.

Seeing this, the old man was stupefied and humbly prostrated himself at her feet.

She said to him: “See that you do not do this, since you have the sacraments of the Lord with you and shine with the dignity of a priest. But I beseech you, father, that you deign to return to me in the following year.”

Then, making the sign of the cross, she walked upon the waters of the Jordan and sought the solitude of the desert. The old man, however, returned to his monastery. In the following year he came to the place where he had first spoken with her and found that she had expired there.

He began to weep and did not presume to touch her. He said within himself: “I indeed wished to bury the little body of the holy woman, but I fear that it might displease her.”

While he considered these things, he saw letters written in the earth above the holy woman’s head, containing these words: “Zosimas, bury the little body of Mary. Return her dust to the earth, and pray for me to God. At his command, on such a day of April, I left this world.”

Then the old man knew for certain that, immediately after she had received the Lord’s sacraments from his hand and returned to the desert, she ended her life. And that desert which Zosimas had scarcely traversed by walking for a period of thirty days, she crossed in one hour and happily passed to the Lord.

When the old man wished to dig into the earth but could not, he saw a lion coming toward him, which, and so forth. He said to it: “This holy woman commanded that her body be buried, and I, because I am old, cannot dig, nor do I have a tool suitable for this. You, therefore, dig the earth so that we may be able to bury the most holy body of this woman.”

Then the lion began to dig and prepared a suitable pit. When this had been completed, the lion departed, gentle as a lamb, and the old man returned to his monastery, glorifying God and recounting what he had found.

Section XII

There was also a certain John, a carpenter, as Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, Book XVIII. Renouncing the world and dwelling for five years in diverse monasteries, he finally betook himself alone to Mount Lycus. When he had now completed his thirtieth year enclosed there, he merited the grace of prophecy.

For he foretold future events to the emperor Theodosius: first, concerning the tyrant Maximus, that he would overcome him and return from the regions of Gaul; afterward, concerning Eugenius, that he would be victorious over him but would end his life in that same place. Therefore there was great fame concerning him among all, on account of which Theodosius was also accustomed to honor him with prophetic honor.

“Therefore, I also, desiring to know his virtue, went there, completing the journey in eighteen days, partly by walking and partly by sailing. After the first greeting, he said to me through an interpreter: ‘From where are you, and why have you come here? I know that you are one of the companions of Evagrius.’ I also assented to this.

“Meanwhile, while we were speaking, the governor of that province, named Alypius, entered. When John, abandoning the conversation which he was having with me, turned to him, I withdrew a little from them and stood fasting. Bearing their prolonged conversation with difficulty, I reproached that old man within myself because, having despised my conversation, he had instead honored the governor.

“When, therefore, I was thinking of departing with that man likewise despised, he called Theodore, his interpreter, and said: ‘Tell that brother: “Do not be fainthearted, because I shall speak with you presently.”’ From this, therefore, I knew that he was a spiritual man and foresaw hidden things, and thus I began all the more to remain.

“But immediately after the governor had departed, he called me and addressed me thus: ‘Why,’ he said, ‘have you injured your soul by reproving me? Why did you think in your thoughts that which I do not recognize in myself and which I know does not befit your conduct? Do you not know that it is written that it is not the healthy but those who are ill who need a physician?

“‘You may indeed be with me whenever you wish, and I am able to find you; and if perhaps you can obtain no consolation from me, you will nevertheless be able to obtain some from the other brothers and fathers. But this man, wholly delivered over through secular affairs to the power of the devil, was scarcely able to breathe for an hour, and now he has come seeking, like a servant fleeing his harsh master, to find here the assistance of salvation.

“‘It would therefore be an ill-considered and importunate thing if, abandoning him, I remained with you, who have been accustomed to devote yourself continually to the advantages of your salvation.’

“Then I earnestly entreated him to deign to pray for me, because he had most certainly persuaded me by this that he was a spiritual man.

“Now more cheerful, he struck me lightly on the left side of the face, saying: ‘Many tribulations await you, and you will become a bishop and will have very many labors. The demon, presenting to you pious and seemingly reasonable occasions, attempts to gnaw at you, suggesting both the longing for your father and the conversion of your brother and sister.

“‘But I announce to you: know that both have been saved. For they have both renounced secular affairs, and your father will live another seven years. Persist, therefore, and live in desert places as you began; do not hasten to return to your native country on account of your relatives, because no one putting his hand to the plow and looking behind is fit for the kingdom of God.’

“Finally, he said that he had dwelt in that cell for forty-eight years, affirming that he had never seen the face of any woman, nor had he been seen by another while eating or drinking.”

Section XIII

Serapion, who was also called the Sindonite because he used no garment other than a linen cloth, was also called impassible, because, through his extreme abstinence from all things, he suffered no desire to possess anything. Because of his continual meditation upon the divine books, his heart could not be content with the quiet of a single cell but was drawn through diverse places.

The holy fathers related concerning him that, in a certain town, he sold himself to pagan mimes for the price of twenty solidi and remained in their servitude, even to the point that he washed their feet, until he made them Christians and separated them from theatrical performances. He was accustomed to take no food except bread and water, nor did he cease to read the divine Scriptures.

When they had been converted to a pious and chaste life, they offered him freedom, saying that through him they had been liberated from shameful servitude. He returned to them the twenty solidi which he had received for himself and had kept with him, saying: “Because God through me has accomplished in you that which I wished, now receive the gold which you gave for me, so that I may find others whom I may also be able to assist.”

When, although entreated, he refused to consent to remain with them as their father and master, they said: “Then give this gold to other poor persons, because we know that we gave it as a kind of pledge for our salvation.”

But he said: “Give it yourselves, for I do not give away the money of others.”

They said: “At least we ask this: that after the course of a year you seek us again at Athens.”

Accordingly, the servant of Christ, frequently journeying as a pilgrim, came to Greece. Remaining at Athens for three days, he received bread to eat from no one. He possessed neither money, nor a bag, nor a skin, nor anything whatever which he carried with him except the linen cloth in which he was wrapped.

When, therefore, he had come fasting to the fourth day, he began to hunger severely. For nothing is worse than that fast which is exacted from one unwilling, from the necessity of which perfidy also often proceeds.

Therefore he stood upon a little hill of the city where the leading men of that same town were accustomed to hold council. There, striking his hands together, he cried out that he was suffering the greatest violence, saying: “Men of Athens, come to my aid!”

Accordingly, all came running, whether dressed in cloaks or in hooded mantles, and asked from where he had come or what he said he was suffering.

He answered: “By race I am an Egyptian; by manner of life, a monk. Since I departed from my true native country, I have fallen into the hands of three moneylenders. From two of them, indeed, I was somehow able to escape by paying the debt, but the third still holds me, and I have no means by which I may satisfy him.”

When they asked who that man was, or where he dwelt who was troubling him, and promised themselves as helpers in every respect if he disclosed this to them, he said: “The love of money, the desire for pleasure, and the voracity of the belly: these three have always troubled me from the beginning of my youth. Of them, I seem now to have satisfied two, and they trouble me no longer. But I cannot bear the third. For, when I now fast by necessity on the fourth day, the most severe moneylender presses me, demanding the debt and threatening death unless I repay it.”

Then certain philosophers offered him one solidus. Having received it, he gave it to a certain man who sold bread, received only one loaf from him, immediately departed from the city, and never afterward returned.

When, however, coming to the region of Lacedaemon, he learned that one of the leading men of the city, a man good in other respects, together with his entire household, was a Manichaean, he sold himself according to the example above. Within two years, having drawn both the man himself, his wife, and his whole family away from the execrable sect, he delivered them to the Church.

Chapter XI

Concerning Saint Pachomius of Scetis

Heraclides speaks as follows, as Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, Book XVIII:

“When I was once pressed by a severe temptation of the flesh, I disclosed nothing of this either to my neighbors or to Evagrius my master, but secretly went to the interior parts of the desert. Finding Pachomius, a man seventy years old, dwelling among the other monks at Scetis near a palm tree, I related my anxiety to him.

“He said to me: ‘Let this thing which you suffer not be new to you. For the nature of the places, the want of all things, and the absence of women offer you testimony that you have not fallen into it through negligence or sloth of mind. Rather, you labor under this temptation because of your zeal and desire for chastity.

“‘For sometimes our flesh, if it is excessively healthy, becomes wanton. Sometimes this malady proceeds from various thoughts. At other times, however, a demon who envies us fights against us.

“‘For I also, as you see, though very old, dwelling for forty years in this cell and exercising the greatest care for my own salvation, am troubled by this temptation even to the present. Certainly, for twelve years after my fiftieth year, this malady never withdrew from me by day or by night, so that I suspected that I was deprived of God’s assistance. Nevertheless, I preferred then to perish by some irrational death rather than to succumb to such obscenity of the body.

“‘Wandering through solitary places, I cast myself almost naked into a certain cave so that I might be devoured by the beasts coming out from it. When I had lain thus until evening, a male and a female lion came out, were led to me by my scent, and licked me from head to foot with a caressing tongue. Thus they left me unharmed.

“‘Therefore, thinking and believing that God had spared me, I immediately returned to the cell. The demon rested for a few days, but again assailed me more violently than he had been accustomed, so that he almost compelled me to blaspheme.

“‘For he was transfigured into a certain maiden whom I remembered seeing in my youth gathering reeds at harvest-time. Suddenly sitting upon my knees, she moved me so greatly throughout all my members that I thought she had almost lain with me. Therefore, angered, I struck her with my right hand, and immediately she vanished. And certainly, for two whole years I was unable to bear the stench of the hand with which I had struck her.

“‘Therefore, anxious and despairing, I went wandering into desert places. Finding a small asp, I held it in my hand and applied it to my genital members so that at least its bite might bring me death. I also crushed the serpent’s head by rubbing it upon my private parts, as though the cause of temptation proceeded from them. Yet it did not bite me even thus, because divine grace, as I believe, provided otherwise.

“‘Then I heard this voice descending to me: “Go, Pachomius, persist in your contest. For on this account I permitted you to be overcome by the demon’s power, lest you grow proud as though you were stronger than he. But, recognizing your weakness, flee for refuge to divine assistance.”

“‘Thus, therefore, returning to my own secret place, thereafter I sat with confidence and lived with entirely peaceful senses. And when my enemy saw himself despised, he withdrew utterly confounded.’”

In the province of the Thebaid there is said to be a place called Tabennesis, in which was Pachomius, a just man, as Vincent reports in the place cited above from the sayings of Heraclides. He was wholly devoted to God, to such a degree that by divine grace he both knew future things and enjoyed an angelic vision. He was perfectly merciful and humane, and loved the brothers with an ineffable love.

An angel of the Lord came to him as he sat in a cave, saying: “You are perfect in all things which pertain to your purpose; hence you now sit superfluously in a cave. Come, therefore, and gather all the younger monks, establish them according to the rule of life which you will learn from me.”

The angel gave him bronze tablets upon which it was written: “You shall make diverse cells within the enclosure of the house, and you shall command three men to remain in each one. Nevertheless, let the food of all be made in one place, and you shall prohibit no one either from fasting or from eating. Nevertheless, you shall enjoin heavier work upon the stronger and upon those who eat more.

“They shall not take sleep lying down, but shall rest sitting upon prepared and slightly reclining chairs covered with their cloaks. They shall be covered with goatskins, which they shall remove neither to take food nor to take sleep, but only when they enter for communion. Then each one shall loosen his belt, remove his skin, and approach wearing only his cowl.

“If any pilgrim belonging to another rule arrives, he shall not eat with them, nor drink, nor be brought into their dwelling, unless perhaps he has been joined to them on the road. But you shall not receive into the more secret places of the monastery anyone who wishes to enter to remain with them unless he has fulfilled three entire years while performing laborious and more difficult work.

“While eating, they shall cover their heads with their cowls, lest one look upon another as he eats, but only upon the dish or table; nor shall it be permitted to say anything while they eat.”

Furthermore, he established twenty-four orders of brothers and assigned to each a Greek letter by which it might be distinguished as though by its own sign or designation. He also ordained and commanded that they offer twelve prayers throughout the day, the same number in the evening at the lamp, and the same number of prayers in the nocturnal vigils.

Then Saint Pachomius said to the angel: “These things are few.”

But he said: “I commanded these few to be performed so that even the younger men may be able to fulfill without sadness the rule of life imposed upon them. Those, however, who are stronger and more perfect do not need to be constrained by another’s rule, because they have wholly given their entire life to the vision and worship of God.”

When these things had thus been arranged, the angel departed from him. There are therefore very many monasteries in which more than seven thousand men follow these institutions. But that monastery in which Pachomius himself dwelt is regarded as the greatest and the first, from which the others appear to have proceeded.

He died in the ninth year of Arcadius and Honorius, having one hundred and ten years of life, as Sigebert says.

This Pachomius, however, as Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, Book XIX, from his deeds, taught the monks the rule of life, as has been said, which he had learned at the angel’s dictation. He commanded the bakers, when they baked the sacred offerings, to meditate upon the Psalter and to speak nothing vain.

When this command was violated on a certain occasion in the monastery of Tabennesis, it was immediately revealed by divine action to Pachomius. He immediately sent Theodore, caused this negligence to be corrected, and treated the transgressor of the divine command as guilty.

The devil appeared to the same Pachomius in the form of a most beautiful woman. Seeing her and knowing her to be a phantasm, he prayed at length that she might vanish.

Standing closer to him, she said: “Why do you labor in vain? I received from the Lord power to tempt those whom I wish.”

The holy man said to her: “Who are you?”

She said: “I am the poison of the devil, and I envelop mortals in the darkness of death-bearing pleasure. But I cannot approach either your followers or you, on account of Christ who became man. Yet it will not always be so. The time will come after your death when I shall sport as I please among those whom you now fortify with your prayers.”

Then the holy man said: “And who knows whether there will then be better men who may strengthen them? For you are entirely unable to foreknow anything, which belongs to God alone.”

But she said: “Nevertheless, I know many future things from those which precede them.”

The holy man said to her: “And how?”

Then she said: “The beginning of every thing tends first toward increase; afterward it inclines toward decrease. So also in this profession of yours will communication occur [read: So also, as I conjecture, will it happen in this profession of yours]. For in its beginnings it increased, strengthened by signs and virtues. But when it begins to grow old, whether failing through length of time or declining through the negligence of the age, it will be diminished from its proper increases.”

After these things Pachomius prayed insistently that the Lord would reveal to him what the condition of the monks would be after him. By a vision made to him, he was taught that the monasteries would indeed be multiplied and enlarged, and that some would live piously and continently. Very many, however, would be negligent and would lose their salvation, especially through the negligence of the superiors, who, holding the primacy, would contend in ambitious strife over which of them should preside. Good superiors would be rejected, and evil ones chosen. Then they would exchange for human allurements almost everything that is supported by divine rules.

Then Pachomius, crying out, said to the Lord: “Woe is me, because I have labored in vain. For if those who are to preside are so perverse, what will their subjects be like?”

Then there appeared to him in marvelous splendor a certain figure bearing a crown of thorns, saying to him: “Take courage, Pachomius, because your posterity will not fail even to the end; and whoever among those who are to come will live piously and continently, amen I say to you, shall obtain rest.”

Section II

Concerning Saint Evagrius, Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, Book XVIII, that he was first ordained lector by Saint Basil and afterward deacon by blessed Gregory Nazianzen. Though tempted while in secular life, at length, through the zeal of blessed Melania, he changed his garment, set out for Egypt and Mount Nitria, and completed two years dwelling there.

In the third year, however, he went to the inner solitary places and lived for fourteen years in abstinence, taking a little bread and oil, though previously amid great abundance he had always maintained a luxurious life.

The spirit of fornication always assailed him violently. Hence, as he himself also related to us, throughout an entire night in winter he stood naked in a well so that the ice also might constrict his flesh.

At another time the spirit of blasphemy began to press him and compel him to utter sacrilegious words against God. On account of this he remained continually without shelter for forty days, so that certain pustules broke out over his entire body. He experienced the demons so violently that he was beaten by them innumerable times.

On a certain day three demons stood before him together in the appearance of clerics, desiring to dispute with him concerning the faith. One of them said that he was an Arian, another a Eunomian, and the third an Apollinarian. By discoursing wisely and briefly, he overcame them all.

When the keys of the church had been lost, invoking the name of Christ he signed that part of the door where the lock was and, striking the doors with his hand, opened them. He also foretold to a certain one of his disciples, by prophesying the individual matters, all the things which would happen to them after eighteen years.

When a certain man announced the death of his father, he answered: “Why do you blaspheme? I know my Father, the immortal God.”

He used to say: “Since I came into solitude, I have not touched lettuce or anything green; I have not touched fruit or meat, and I have not seen baths.”

Finally, in the sixteenth year of such a life, during which he ate nothing that was cooked, when it was necessary on account of weakness of the stomach that he take something of this kind, he never touched bread, but, tasting vegetables, resin, and lentils for two years, he thus departed from the world.

Near the very end of his life, he related that he was in the third year since he understood that he had been freed from carnal desire. After such a life of his, after so many labors, and after those prayers so continual, he knew the differences between good and evil spirits and showed the arts by which demons could be subdued.

A certain priest named Innocentius, with whom I lived for three years, says Heraclides, was the simplest of men. Having formerly served as a soldier under the emperor Constantius, he renounced the world.

He cursed his son Paul because he had corrupted the daughter of a certain priest. He entreated God, saying: “Lord, give him such a spirit that in his flesh he may never find time for sinning.” For he perhaps believed it more right that Paul should struggle with the savagery of a demon than with the impurity of bodily pleasure.

As he said it, so it happened. For even to the present that same Paul remains bound with iron chains on the Mount of Olives, tormented by a demon. These are the words of Heraclides.

“I knew,” says Heraclides, “a certain brother who lived with me from the beginning of his youth until today, who was conquered by no desire of mind or body and was always accustomed to give thanks to God for his being despised. He desired even to undergo danger for true friends.

“He had experienced the power of demons a thousand times, and perhaps more. Hence on a certain day the devil wished to make a bargain with him, saying: ‘Promise me that you will sin even once, and I will present to you whatever woman you wish in this world.’ But he despised him.

“At another time, while the demon contended with him for fourteen nights, it dragged him from his cell with its feet and said to him in a human voice: ‘Do not adore Christ, and I shall never approach you again.’

“He said to it: ‘For this very reason I adore him and always shall adore him, because you are greatly distressed and tortured by the fact that I do so.’

“He had no experience of any woman, not even in dreams, except in a vision of contest and conflict. I know that he also received food from angels three times. On a certain day, when he did not have even a crumb of bread in a very vast solitude, he found three paximadia in his skin cloak. At another time he found wine and bread together.

“Frequently, when he saw certain people laboring under grave want, he wept greatly and gave them whatever he could possess apart from his own body. Therefore I shall glory especially concerning him, because he lived with me and was such a man.”

“There was also another most noble combatant,” says Heraclides, as Vincent reports in the place cited above, “named Nathanael. Having suffered acedia through the deceit of a demon, he is said to have withdrawn from his former cell and to have built another near a certain village.

“When he had begun to dwell there, a demon approached him by night, fashioned in the form of an executioner. Covered with rags, it was hideously filthy and appeared to make a sound with scourges.

“The holy man said to it: ‘Who, then, are you, who attempt to do such things in my lodging?’

“It answered: ‘I am the one who drove you from your former cell and who have now come to expel you from this one also.’

“Then the holy man, seeing that he had been mocked by the demon, returned to his former dwelling. Completing thirty-seven years there, he never wavered from his purpose. He did not even go out across the threshold, while contending with the demon that wished to overcome him. It vexed him with so many devices, so that by any means whatever he might be compelled to leave the cell, that I cannot relate them individually.

“Among these things, even when the occasion of the arrival of seven bishops presented itself—who came to seek him, whether by the providence of God or by the temptation of demons—after prayer had been made, he did not accompany them even by a single step.

“When the deacons said, ‘Abba, you do an exceedingly proud thing because you do not escort the bishops,’ he said: ‘I venerate the bishops, my lords, but I profess that I am dead to them and to the whole world. God knows my hidden purpose.’

“On another occasion the demon contrived another artifice against him. It suddenly became like a little boy ten years old driving a donkey that carried bread in a basket. When in the depth of night it had come to his cell, it pretended that the donkey had fallen to the ground and cried out, saying: ‘Abba Nathanael, have mercy upon me and extend your hand.’

“Hearing the voice of the boy, he stood inside the door, part of which he had opened, saying: ‘Who are you?’

“He said: ‘I am the boy of that monk, and I am carrying bread to him because tomorrow he is to make an agape. I beseech you, therefore, not to despise me as I lie here and deliver me to the bites of wild beasts.’

“But the holy man stood like a man of bronze and, anxious, made a prayer and said: ‘Boy, I believe in him whom I serve, who rules over every spirit, that, if you need assistance, he himself will furnish it to you. But if this thing is a temptation, may the Lord God see it and not permit me to be injured by it.’

“The demon, therefore, defeated and confounded in this, was dissolved into a whirlwind.”

Chapter XII

Certain Teachings and Moral Sayings from Diverse Holy Fathers

Certain teachings and moral sayings from the words of diverse holy fathers, which Vincent reports near the end of Book XVI of the Historical Mirror, for instruction in the spiritual life.

When Abba John was dying, the brothers asked him to tell them something concise as an inheritance. Groaning, he said: “I never did my own will, nor did I teach anyone what I had not first done.”

Abba Sisoes said: “Make yourself contemptible, cast your will and secular cares behind your back, and you will have rest.”

The same man said: “Do not have friendship with a woman, nor with a boy, nor with heretics.”

The old man was asked: “How do I find God: whether in fasting, in labor, in vigils, or in mercy?”

He answered: “In these things and in discretion. For I tell you that many afflicted their flesh and, because they did so without discretion, went away empty. Our mouth stinks from fasting, we have learned all the Scriptures, yet we do not possess that which God seeks, namely humility and charity.”

A certain brother asked Abba Agathon, saying: “I wish to remain in a congregation with the brothers. How shall I conduct myself with them?”

He answered: “As you are on the first day when you enter, so also pass the remaining days in humility.”

A certain old man said: “Every day, morning and evening, a monk ought carefully to inquire within himself what he did throughout the whole day of those things which God wills, or which he did not do.”

Abba Lucius said: “I both labor and pray at the same time, saying while I labor, ‘Have mercy upon me, O God.’ And I sleep and pray at the same time, giving alms from my labor to a poor man who prays for me when I sleep.”

A certain man was conducted to Arsenius, and the old man, according to his custom, remained silent after prayer. Afterward the same man was conducted to Abba Moses, who had been converted from being a robber. Moses received and addressed him kindly.

The brother prayed to the Lord, saying: “Lord, one of these men, on account of your name, flees from seeing all people; the other, however, on account of your name, is familiar with all. Which of them does better?”

Two boats were shown to him upon a river. In one Arsenius sailed with silence and rest; in the other was Moses, into whose mouth and teeth angels poured a honeycomb of honey.

A certain brother who possessed a Gospel sold it, saying: “I sold the very word which commands: ‘Sell everything that you possess and give to the poor.’”

A certain nobleman, renouncing the world but nevertheless reserving a few things for himself, came to Basil. Hearing this, Basil said to him: “You have both ceased to be a senator and have not made yourself a monk.”

A certain man asked an old man to receive money for his necessities. When he refused, the man said to him: “Receive it for the use of the poor.”

The old man said to him: “Then there is a twofold reproach for me: because, although I am not in need, I receive it, and, by giving away the possessions of another, I gather vainglory.”

A certain man offered money to an old man because the old man was leprous and infirm. Refusing it, he said: “After seventy years, do you come to take away my nourisher from me?”

A certain Gelasius possessed a codex worth eighteen solidi, for it contained the New and Old Testaments. It lay openly in the church so that whoever wished might read it.

When a certain man had stolen it, he offered it for sale. The buyer, however, told him to leave it with him so that he might show it to another concerning the quality of the book and whether it was worth so much. By chance he showed it to the said Gelasius, who said: “Buy it, because it is good and is worth so much.”

When the buyer had reported this to the seller, the latter, pierced by compunction, returned the book to Gelasius. Gelasius did not wish to receive it, though he knew that it was his own, but the thief compelled him to receive that which was his.

Arsenius gave his monk gold and coins, and whatever he wished, provided only that he would not steal. But when that man did not restrain himself, the old men commanded that he be expelled, saying: “A brother suffering an infirmity of the flesh must be sustained. But one who steals and does not cease after being admonished must be expelled.”

An old man said to a certain person who was laughing: “Before heaven and earth we are to render an account of our whole life, and you laugh? Just as we carry the shadow of our bodies everywhere with us, so we ought to have weeping and compunction with us wherever we shall be.”

A certain man related, as Vincent reports in Book XVI of the Historical Mirror, that three men who diligently loved one another became monks. One of them chose to restore those who quarreled to peace; the second, to visit the sick; the third, to rest in solitude.

The first, therefore, laboring amid the disputes of people, could not please everyone. Overcome by weariness, he came to the second and found him likewise failing in spirit and unable to fulfill his charge. These two, agreeing together, came to the third, recounted their tribulations, and asked him to say what he himself had accomplished.

Remaining silent for a little, he poured water into a cup and said: “Look into the water.” It was turbid. After a little while he said: “Look at how the water has become clear.” When they looked into the water, they saw their own faces in it as though in a mirror.

Then he said to them: “So it is with one who stands in the midst of people. Because of the crowd he does not see his own sins, but when he has become quiet, and especially in solitude, he then beholds his own offenses.”

Two brothers, assailed by the spirit of fornication, went away and took wives. Afterward one went to the other, saying: “What have we gained in this uncleanness, from which punishment and eternal damnation follow, while we have abandoned the life of angels? Let us therefore return to the desert.”

They therefore returned to the old men, who enclosed them for one entire year, while they received bread by equal weight. When the year had passed, they came out. One of them was seen to have a pale and emaciated face, but the other a beautiful and corpulent face.

When the fathers asked the first the cause of his pallor, he answered: “I believe this to be the cause: during this time I frequently meditated upon the Gehenna owed to me on account of my crimes unless I did penance, and that meditation thus deprived me of color through sadness and fear.”

When they asked the other the cause of so beautiful a color in his face, since the other, by contrast, was so pale and the food of both had been the same, he answered: “During this time I continually remembered the immense benefit of God bestowed upon me and his love toward me, because he drew me from the mire of dregs and from the depth of hell. In this I rejoiced and was glad.”

The fathers declared that their penance had been equal and equally acceptable to God.

At another time very many brothers, sitting together, were discoursing about the holy Scriptures, and then the angels of God stood around them, rejoicing in the word of the Lord. But when they spoke of something else among themselves, immediately the holy angels withdrew farther away, indignant against them, while demons delighted in their vain and superfluous speech.

The blessed elder, seeing these things, went to his cell and throughout the whole night bewailed our miseries with groaning. He admonished the brothers throughout the monasteries, saying: “Restrain yourselves, brothers, from much speaking and from idle words.”

A certain man asked Abba Sisoes, saying: “When I read in the Scriptures, my thought wishes to adorn my discourse so that I may be prepared to answer questions.”

The old man said to him: “There is no need; rather, provide for yourself from purity of mind.”

A certain man asked Abba Theodore for a saying for three days. When Theodore said nothing, the man departed sorrowful. Asked why he had answered him nothing, Theodore said: “Because he is a merchant and glories in the words of others.”

Abba Hyperichius said: “It is better to eat flesh and drink wine than, through detraction, to eat the flesh of brothers.”

A certain old man did not drink for forty years. But whenever burning heat arose, he washed a small bottle, filled it with water, and hung it before his eyes.

When the brothers asked why he did this, he answered: “So that, seeing what I desire, I may endure a greater burning thirst and thus obtain a greater reward from the Lord.”

The brothers related concerning a certain man that the demons assailed him so that immediately at the first hour of the day they caused such hunger and weakness in his body that he was utterly unable to endure it.

Nevertheless, he said in his heart: “In whatever manner, I must wait at least until the third hour.” At the third hour he said the same: “Even now I must forcibly endure until the sixth.” At the sixth hour he put bread into water, saying: “While this is being soaked, I must wait for the ninth.”

When the ninth hour had come, according to custom he completed the prayers and psalmody according to the rule and placed the bread so that he might eat. He therefore sustained this for very many days.

On a certain day, however, when at the ninth hour he had sat down to take food, he saw a great smoke rise from the basket where the bread, that is, the paximadia, had been placed, and go out through the window of his cell. Thus from that day he did not hunger, but his heart was so strengthened that even after two days it did not delight him to take food.

When Abba Poemen was asked how one ought to fast, he answered: “I wish a monk to eat a little every day in such a way that he is not satiated, for fasts of two or three days are occupied with vainglory.”

Natura, the disciple of Silvanus [read: Netras, the disciple of Silvanus], before he became bishop in Pharan, lived with moderation; but after he became bishop, he lived most rigorously. For he said: “If I now fall into illness, very many will come to my aid; but then no one came to my aid.”

When a certain priest had visited a bishop, the brothers asked him how that city was constituted. He answered: “Believe me, I saw the face of no one there except the bishop alone.”

Theodore, having been made a deacon in Scetis, did not consent to minister. When he was compelled by the old men, he asked that a place and a period for prayer be given to him so that the Lord might show him whether he ought to minister or not.

A pillar of fire extending from earth to heaven was shown to him, and a voice sounded, saying: “If you can become like this pillar, go and minister.” Thereafter he did not consent to minister at the altar.

Mothois and his brother, ordained priests by the bishop of Gebalon, never consented to offer sacrifice. The old man said: “This office belongs to those who live without complaint.”

The same man said: “The nearer a man approaches God, the more he sees himself to be a sinner.”

Abba Sisoes said: “If I possessed one thought of Anthony, I should become as though entirely fire.”

The same man said: “It is not a great thing that your mind should be with God; rather, this is the great thing: that you see yourself beneath every creature.”

The same man said to a dead boy whom his father had cast before his cell, thinking that the boy was doing penance: “Rise, go outside.” Rising, he immediately went out.

The same man, when Abraham his disciple was tormented by the devil, said: “God, whether you will or not, I shall not release you unless you heal him.” Immediately he was healed.

On the day of his death, Sisoes shone in his face like the sun. He said to those standing by: “Behold, Abba Anthony comes.” A little afterward he said: “Behold, the choir of prophets.” Again his face shone still more, and he said: “Behold, the choir of apostles comes.” Again his face shone twice as much.

He spoke with those who stood by and said: “Behold, the angels have come to receive me, and I ask them to permit me still to do a little penance.”

When those standing by said, “Abba, you do not need penance,” he answered: “Truly, I do not know that I have received the beginning of penance.”

Again his face became like the sun, and he said: “Behold, the Lord comes, saying: ‘Bring to me the vessel of election of the desert.’” The whole place was filled with splendor and fragrance as he rendered his spirit to the Lord.

A certain brother who came to the cell of a certain old man used to enter and steal his food. Although the old man saw him, he did not rebuke the one whom he knew to be stealing from him, but labored still more, saying: “I think that brother is necessary to me.”

For the old man endured great tribulation from scarcity of bread. But when he was dying and the brothers surrounded him, seeing the man who used to steal his bread, he took his hands and kissed them, saying: “I give thanks to these hands, brother, because through them I believe that I shall enter the kingdom of heaven.”

Pierced by compunction because of this, that man himself became a strenuous monk through the deeds of the old man which he had seen.

A brother asked Abba Sisoes, saying: “If robbers or barbarians fall upon me wishing to kill me, and if I am able to prevail over them, do you command me to kill them?”

He answered: “Do not do so at all, but commit yourself entirely to God. For whatever adversity happens, profess that this has occurred on account of your sins.”

Section III

Abba Poemen used to say: “If anyone does evil to you, render good to him so that through goodness you may conquer malice.” Hence, when anyone injured or mocked a certain brother, he himself ran to him, saying: “These are those who furnish us an occasion for our advancement, for those who praise and call us blessed themselves deceive us.”

When Abba Hilarion visited a certain bishop, the bishop offered him some birds. The abbot said to him: “Since I received this habit, I have never eaten anything killed.”

The bishop said to him: “Since I was made a bishop, I have not permitted anyone who held anything against me to go to sleep, nor have I slept while holding anything against anyone.”

The abbot said to him: “Forgive me, father, because your manner of life is better than mine.”

A certain old man said: “If anyone speaks with you concerning the Scriptures or any other matter whatever, do not contend with him. If he speaks well, consent to him. If he speaks badly, say to him: ‘You know how you speak.’ By preserving this, you will always know yourself to be in humility and will possess rest.”

When a certain infirm man, on account of excessive abstinence, was coughing up phlegm, some of the phlegm fell unwillingly upon another brother. When that brother was compelled in his thought to say to him, “Stop now, and do not cough upon me,” in order to overcome his thoughts he took what the man had coughed up, put it into his own mouth, and ate it. He said to himself: “Either do not say to the brother that which would grieve him, or eat that which you abhor.”

Abba Theodore said to a brother who complained that he was troubled: “How many years have you been in this order?”

He answered: “Eight.”

The abbot said: “Believe me, I have been in this order for seventy years, and not for one day have I been able to have rest; and you wish to have peace in eight years?”

Another brother asked him: “If the sound of some sudden collapse occurs, do you experience fear, Abba?”

He answered: “If heaven should adhere to the earth, Theodore would not be afraid.” For he had sought from the Lord by prayers that he would take fear away from him.

A certain father related that the ancients did not quickly move from their place except for three causes: either if someone held something against another and, though he made satisfaction to him, could not appease him; or if he was praised by many; or if he had fallen into a temptation of fornication.

A certain old man had water far from his cell. Once, while going to it, he failed on the way and said: “What need have I to labor thus? I shall remain near the water.”

When he had said this, he saw a certain young man following him and counting his footsteps. He said to him: “Who are you?”

The young man said: “I am an angel of God, sent to count your footsteps and render you a reward.”

Then the old man, made strong in spirit, moved his cell five miles farther away.

Section IV

The disciple of a certain old man was accustomed to come to him as to the father of his soul and his master, so that he might receive some teaching from him. On a certain day he found him sleeping. After he had waited a long time, he himself was inclined to sleep or to return to his cell. Nevertheless, he drove sleep from himself and resolved neither to depart nor to awaken the father. Seven times he was assailed concerning this and always resisted such a thought.

At last, when the old man awoke, he recited the office with him. After he had afterward sent him back to his cell, the old man, placed in prayer and carried into an ecstasy of mind, saw a glorious place and, above a seat, seven crowns. When he thought that so glorious a place had been prepared for Anthony, a voice came from heaven, saying: “This has not been prepared for Anthony, but for your disciple, and the seven crowns were acquired for him through seven temptations.”

A certain brother, placed amid the tribulation of temptations, lost the monastic rule, that is, the observance of the rule. Unable through negligence to begin the monastic work again, he was afflicted.

When he explained this to one of the fathers, that father exhorted him to resume vigor of spirit by this example: “A certain man had a fruitful field, but through his negligence that land was filled with thorns and thistles. When afterward he wished to cultivate it, he said to his son: ‘Go and clear that field.’

“When the son had come there, failing in spirit before the multitude of thorns and thistles, he said within himself: ‘When shall I clear all these things?’ Casting himself upon the ground, he began to sleep. He did this many times. For when he had slept and then, awakened, began to wish to clear the field, considering the magnitude of the laborious work, he failed in mind and abandoned what he had begun.

“The father came upon him and found the field uncultivated and uncleared. When he heard the cause from him, the father strengthened him for labor, saying: ‘Son, each day work an area equal to the breadth of the ground upon which you lie and which you occupy. You will gradually advance and clear the whole field.’

“Doing this, in a short time he cultivated the whole field. So also you: work gradually at those things which you were accustomed to do, and God through his grace will restore you to your former condition.”

Section V

When a certain anchorite came to Abba Poemen, the old man received him with joy. The anchorite began to discourse about the holy Scriptures and about heavenly things. Then the old man turned his face toward another brother and gave the anchorite no answer. The anchorite went out sorrowful.

The disciple entered and said to the abbot: “This great man came on account of you, possessing so great a glory among his companions, and you do not wish to speak with him.”

The old man answered: “He belongs to the higher things and speaks of heavenly matters. I, however, belong to the lower things and can scarcely speak of earthly matters.”

The disciple therefore went out and told this to the anchorite. Pierced by compunction at this saying, the anchorite entered to the old man and said: “What shall I do, Abba, because the passions of my heart rule over me?”

Then the old man looked upon him rejoicing and said: “Today you have come well, father. Open, therefore, my mouth [read: I open, therefore, my mouth], and fill it with your good things.”

Assisted by this saying, the anchorite said to him: “In truth, this way which you hold is good and upright.” Giving thanks to the old man, he returned to his own region.

John, short in stature, told his brother that he wished to be secure and free like the angels of God who continually serve him. Taking off his garments, he went away and remained naked in the desert for a week. At last he returned and knocked at the door of the cell.

His brother asked who he was.

He said: “I am John.”

His brother said: “If John has become an angel, he has no need to dwell among human beings.” And he left him to be afflicted for a long time.

At last he opened to him, saying: “If you are a man, it is necessary for you to work again so that you may live. But if you are an angel, why do you seek to enter the cell?”

He said: “Forgive me, brother, because I have sinned.”

A certain monk at Constantinople in the time of Theodosius dwelt in a small cell outside the city. Hearing of him, the emperor went to him alone. The monk did not know that he was the emperor. He put out water, salt, and morsels of bread, and they ate together.

Then he said to him: “I am the emperor Theodosius, and I came here out of devotion to you. Blessed are you who are secure and free from the affairs of the world and enjoy a tranquil and quiet life. Certainly, I was born in a kingdom, and now I dwell in a kingdom, yet I never take food without solicitude.” Thus he returned from him.

That same night, however, the servant of God began to consider within himself, saying: “Not only from the people, but also from the palace, very many, following the emperor’s example, will come to see me, and they will not cease to render honor to me as a servant of God. I fear lest perhaps the evil spirit steal in upon me, I begin willingly to receive them, my heart delight in their praise and honor, and through this I now begin to lose the virtue of humility.”

That same night, therefore, he fled from there and went to Egypt, to the holy fathers in the desert.

A certain old man said: “He who is more highly honored by people suffers no small injury to his soul.”

The same man said: “When a thought of pride or vainglory assails you, examine yourself: whether you preserve all God’s commandments; whether you love your enemies; whether you rejoice in the glory of an enemy or are saddened by his affliction; and whether you hold within yourself that you are a useless servant, knowing that an exalted thought dissolves all good things. As wax melts before the face of fire, so one is emptied by praises and loses the vigor of the virtues.”

A certain brother asked Abba Poemen: “How can I consider myself lower than one who is a murderer?”

He answered: “Say within yourself: ‘That man indeed committed this one sin, but I commit murder every hour, killing myself through sins.’ For this alone is the justice of a person: that he reprove himself.”

At one time brothers went out from a monastery to visit the fathers who dwelt in the desert. When they came to a certain hermit, he received them with great joy. Seeing that they were weary from the journey, he caused them to take refreshment before the ninth hour and set before them whatever he had in his cell.

In the evening they completed the prayers and psalms according to custom, and likewise at night. The said elder rested separately and heard them above him speaking and saying to one another: “How much better these hermits eat than those who dwell in monasteries.” Hearing this, he remained silent.

When day dawned, they took the road to another who dwelt nearby. As they departed, the old man said: “Greet him on my behalf and say to him: ‘Observe, and do not water the vegetables.’”

When the brothers turned aside to him and reported the word imposed upon them, he understood the reason for this matter and kept them. He gave them work, weaving baskets, and, sitting with them, he himself did not cease from the work of his hands.

In the evening, after the prayers had been completed, he said to them: “We indeed are not accustomed to eat supper every day, but on account of your arrival we ought to eat supper today.” He set dry bread and salt before them, saying: “On account of you, we ought to eat something more for supper.” He added a little vinegar and a little oil.

When they had risen from the table, he began again to sing psalms until near dawn and said to them: “On account of you we cannot finish the entire canon of psalms; therefore rest a little, because you are weary from the journey.”

When morning had come, at the first hour they wished to depart from him, but the elder did not permit them, saying: “For the sake of charity, I shall keep you another three days.” But they arose at night and secretly departed, unable to bear that austerity.

A certain brother, wishing to cross a river with his mother, took his mother upon his shoulders and wrapped his hands in her cloak as he grasped his mother’s hands.

After the river had been crossed, his mother asked him: “Why did you do this, wrapping your hands in cloth?”

He answered: “Because the body of a woman is fire; and from the very fact that I touched you, remembrance of other women came to me.”

A certain old man kept with him in his cell a son who had been raised in the monastery and did not know what women were like. When he had become a man, demons sent into his mind the appearances and clothing of women through dreams. When he reported this to his father, the father marveled at the malice of the demons.

When he once descended into Egypt with his father and saw women, he said: “Father, these are those who came to me at night in the desert.”

The father, marveling at the deceitfulness of the demons, said: “Son, these are secular monks who use a different habit from the hermits.” And they returned to the desert.

A certain young man, assailed by the spirit of fornication, wished to return to the world. But, assenting to the admonitions of another father, he went to the inner desert. When he had remained for twenty days, resisting the temptation manfully, God had mercy upon him and showed him the work of the demons.

For a certain Ethiopian woman, bearing lust, stood before him. Unable to bear her because of her stench, he cast her away and found himself freed from the temptation, giving thanks to that old man.

Section VII

Certain wicked men induced a certain dishonorable woman to approach the cell of a certain solitary, agreeing to give her a specified sum of money if she induced him to sin. She offered to do this.

Going to the desert, therefore, at a late hour she arrived at his cell. Knocking, she asked the man of God, since she had lost her way, to have mercy upon her and bring her into the cell, lest she become food for wild beasts that night. Moved by mercy, he did so.

When she had been brought in, the devil began violently to inflame him with desire for the woman. But the man of God lit a lamp and began to place one finger against the flame of the lamp so that it might be burned, saying to himself: “He who does such things descends into eternal fire. Test, therefore, whether you are able to endure it.”

So great was the ardor of the temptation of the flesh that he scarcely felt the burning. When one finger had been burned and the temptation did not cease, he placed all the fingers of his hand successively against the flame, and they were burned. Seeing these things, she died from horror.

In the morning, the young men came to whom she had promised that she would cast that old man out of his cell. When they asked whether any woman wandering from the road had turned aside to him, he answered: “Come and see how badly that daughter of the devil has burned all the fingers of my hand. Behold, she sleeps there.”

When they roused her, she answered nothing because she was dead. But by the prayer of the servant of God she was raised, converted to penance, and those men also lamented their guilt.

A certain brother was assailed by the spirit of fornication. Coming into a village of Egypt, he saw the daughter of a certain priest of the pagans and sought her from her father as a wife.

The priest said: “I wish first to consult my gods.” The priest therefore went away, consulted his god the devil, and said: “A monk wishes to have my daughter. Shall I give her to him?”

The devil answered: “Do not give her to him unless he first renounces his God, baptism, and the profession of a monk.”

When the priest reported this to that brother, he consented to everything. Then he saw what was like a dove going out from that monk’s mouth and ascending into heaven.

Again the priest consulted the demon as to whether he ought to give her to him.

The demon answered: “Do not give her to him, because his God still assists him.”

Returning, the priest told all these things to the monk. Then the monk, pierced by compunction, said: “Woe is me! My God has rendered good to me for evil.” Led by the counsel of a certain old man, he did penance and merited to see the dove which he had previously lost—that is, the grace of the Holy Spirit—enter again into his mouth.

A certain old man used to say: “Unless a miller covered the eyes of the animal going around the mill, the animal would turn itself and eat its own labors. Thus we also receive a covering according to the dispensation of God, lest we see our good works and lose our reward through those who call us blessed. Sordid thoughts are a covering for our small good work.”

A certain old man said: “God permits his own to labor so that they may remember the labors of tribulations; hence they guard themselves, fearing lest they lose such great labors. For he also led the children of Israel around through the desert for forty years so that, remembering their tribulations, they would not return backward.”

One of the fathers said: “There is no worse passion than confidence, namely, in oneself.”

A certain old man was asked: “What shall I do? A sordid thought kills me.”

He answered: “When a woman wishes to wean her son, she smears something bitter upon her breasts. When the boy wishes to suck according to custom, he perceives the bitterness and flees. Therefore place in your heart the bitter thought of death and of the future torments which are prepared for sinners in the future, and those thoughts will flee from you.”

Abba Poemen said: “In nothing does the enemy rejoice so much as in this: that someone does not wish to disclose his thoughts to his spiritual father.”

Evagrius said: “Reading, vigils, and prayer make firm a wandering and wavering mind. Hunger, labor, and solitude weaken burning concupiscence. Long-suffering and mercy repress anger.”

There was a certain Greek youth in a cenobium who could extinguish the flame of the flesh by no continence and by no greatness of labor. When his temptation had been brought to the father of the monastery, he preserved him from it by this artifice.

He commanded a certain stern and harsh man to persecute the youth with rods and insults and, after inflicting the injury, to come first to the abbot to lodge complaints against him. When that man carried out the commands, witnesses who had also been summoned spoke on behalf of the one who had done the young man injury.

But the youth began to weep against the falsehood and sat alone, deprived of every assistance; he lay at the feet of Jesus. Why say more? Thus a year was completed.

When it had passed, the abbot asked him about his thoughts.

He answered: “Father, I am not permitted to live, and how should it please me to fornicate?” Thus he was cured of the temptation of the flesh.

The aforesaid venerable fathers, therefore, religious anchorites or cenobites, conspicuous in holiness and most celebrated for miracles, shone forth as worthy of reverence in their sayings from the time of the emperor Diocletian until the time of Chosroes, king of the Persians.

Certainly, in those things which exceed the common rule or the powers of the body, as in abstinences and vigils, they are to be admired rather than imitated. In the interior virtues, however, beyond those named above, very many others, taken from the religious manner of life to govern churches as bishops and to instruct peoples as most excellent teachers, were illustrious in those times: Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, John Chrysostom, John Damascene, John Cassian, and the most glorious Jerome.

Augustine also, when made a priest, immediately established a monastery of clerics and began to live according to the rule established under the holy apostles, as do the canons regular. Martin, Gregory the Great, Cassiodorus, and many others, concerning whom it was said above in other titles and will be said below, were also illustrious.

It must also be noted that the greatest power of the Christian empire, and the wisdom and eloquence of the word in the sincerity of the faith, existed first from the time of Constantine in the East among the Greeks. But, gradually weakened and diminished through the sloth of their successors and through heresies arising from the patriarchs of Constantinople, they were at length transferred and devolved to the West among the Latins.

For the empire was transferred from Greece into Francia, to Charlemagne, king of the Franks, under Pope Adrian I and Leo; and afterward from Francia into Germany, under Otto I, duke of the Teutons, under Pope John.

The patriarch of Constantinople, with his clergy and the people of the Greeks, withdrew themselves from obedience to the Roman Church and from the truth of the faith concerning the procession of the Holy Spirit, and in other matters. They returned several times to the true faith, but afterward relapsed.

Their final return to the faith and to the Roman Church was under Eugene IV, at the general council celebrated at Florence, when the patriarch and the emperor of Constantinople came to Florence for the council.

At length, in the year 1453 from the Lord’s Incarnation, after the city of Constantinople had been besieged and captured by Mehmed, the most savage king of the Turks, the empire of the Greeks failed entirely. Their emperor was killed together with many nobles of that city; the churches were most disgracefully profaned by that most wicked man; the images and remaining relics of the saints were profaned; and the people were taken captive and dispersed.

Thus also the perfection of the regular life of anchorites and cenobites, which once flourished in Greece or the East, as is evident from what was said above, was transferred into the West among the Latins and was variously renewed from time to time, as will be shown, life permitting.

As Basil is called the father of monks in the East, so also the most blessed Benedict is the father of monks in the West. For he himself, as Gregory says, wrote a rule distinguished by discretion, lucid in expression, and directive, as I may say, in each individual matter beyond the others.

For the rule of Basil is rather intricate. The Rule of Augustine is very general and descends little into particulars, but through constitutions added to it by the diverse religious orders which profess it, it is adorned with austerities and ceremonies. The Rule of Saint Francis is brief, and for that reason many precepts there are full of scruples.

But the rule of the most holy Benedict clearly describes each individual thing. It is also cited as approved in the Decretum, Cause XVI, Question I. All the monks of the West hold this as their foundation, except the Carthusians. But they are distinguished by habits, added constitutions, and ceremonies.

Gregory the Great wrote his life, full of virtues, throughout the second book of the Dialogues. Gregory himself also drew from that rule and, as a monk and an abbot, served under the said rule before he became pope. Because that life is sufficiently well known and widespread, I shall abbreviate it; afterward I shall say some things concerning certain of Benedict's disciples.

Title XV

Chapter XIII

There was a man venerable in life, blessed by grace and by name, says Gregory in the second book of the Dialogues, bearing the heart of an old man from the very time of his boyhood. According to Hugh of Fleury, he died in the year of the Lord 536.

Surpassing his age in conduct, he gave his soul to no pleasure; but while he was still upon this earth, where he could have made free use of temporal things, he despised the world with its flower as though it were already withered.

Born of a rather noble family in the province of Nursia, he had been sent by his parents to Rome for the study of the liberal arts. But when he saw many there going over the precipices of vices, he drew back the foot which he had set, as it were, at the entrance of the world, lest, if he attained anything of its knowledge, he himself should afterward go wholly into an immense precipice.

Therefore, despising the study of letters and leaving his father's house and possessions, he sought the habit of holy religious life, desiring to please God alone. Thus he withdrew, knowingly ignorant and wisely untaught.

I did not learn all his deeds, but the few which I narrate I knew through the reports of four of his disciples: Constantine, who succeeded Benedict in the government of his monastery; Simplicius, who succeeded the aforesaid Constantine; Valentinian; and Honoratus.

When this Benedict, having now abandoned the study of letters, had determined to seek desert places, the nurse who loved him more tenderly followed him alone. When he had come to the place called Effide, and many honorable men detained him there by charity, he remained in the church of blessed Peter.

The aforesaid nurse of his asked the neighboring women to lend her a winnowing tray for cleaning wheat. It was carelessly left upon a table and, by an accident, was broken, so that it was found divided into two parts. When his nurse returned to the house and found this, she began to weep most bitterly, because the vessel which had been lent to her was seen to be broken.

But Benedict, a devout and pious boy, when he beheld his nurse weeping, had compassion upon her grief. Taking both parts of the winnowing tray with him, he gave himself to prayer with tears. Rising from prayer, he found the vessel beside him so sound that no traces of the fracture could be found upon it.

Then, gently consoling his nurse, he returned the winnowing tray to her sound. This event became known to everyone in that place and was held in such great wonder that the inhabitants of the place hung that same winnowing tray at the entrance of the church, so that all, both present and future, might know from how great a perfection Benedict the boy had begun the grace of religious life.

But Benedict the boy, desiring rather to suffer the evils of the world than to be raised up by praises, and rather to be wearied by labors than exalted by the favors of this life, secretly fled from his nurse and sought the retirement of a desert place called Subiaco. It is about forty miles distant from the city of Rome and sends forth cold and transparent waters. There the abundance of waters is first gathered into a broad lake and at last is conducted into a river.

While he was proceeding there in flight, a certain monk named Romanus found him and asked where he was going. When Romanus had learned his desire, he both kept the secret and furnished assistance; and, giving him the habit of holy religious life, he ministered to him insofar as he was able.

When the man of God reached that place, he confined himself in a very narrow cave and remained there for three years unknown to men, except for the monk Romanus.

This Romanus lived not far away in a monastery under the rule of the father Adeodatus. But he piously stole hours from this same father of his, and on appointed days he carried to Benedict the bread which he was able to take secretly for him to eat.

There was no path from Romanus's cell to that cave, because a lofty rock rose above it. But Romanus was accustomed to lower the bread from that same rock on a very long rope. He also attached a little bell to the rope, so that at the bell's sound the man of God might know when Romanus was bringing him bread, and, coming out, might receive it.

But the ancient enemy, envying the charity of the one and the refreshment of the other, when on a certain day he beheld the bread being lowered, threw a stone and broke the bell. Romanus nevertheless did not cease to minister in suitable ways.

But when God wished both to give Romanus rest from his labor and to show Benedict's life to men as an example, so that the lamp placed upon the lampstand might shine and give light to all who are in the house, the Lord deigned to appear in a vision to a certain priest dwelling far away, who had prepared a meal for himself on the feast of Easter, saying: “You prepare delicacies for yourself, and my servant in that place is tormented by hunger.”

He immediately arose and, on that very solemnity of Easter, set out with the food which he had prepared for himself. He sought the man of God through the steep places of the mountains, through the hollows of the valleys, and through the excavations of the earth, and found him hidden in the cave.

When they had prayed and, blessing almighty God, had sat down after sweet conversation concerning life, the priest who had come said: “Arise, and let us take food, because today is the Lord’s Passover.”

The man of God answered and said: “I know that today is the Passover, because I have merited to see you.” Indeed, being placed far from men, he did not know that the solemnity of Easter was on that day.

But the venerable priest affirmed: “Today truly is the solemnity of the Lord’s resurrection, and therefore it is by no means fitting for you to abstain. I also have been sent here by God so that we may take the gifts of God together.”

Therefore, blessing God, they took food; and, when the meal and conversation had been completed, the priest returned to his church.

At that same time shepherds also found him hidden in the cave. When they saw him clothed in skins among the bushes, they thought that he was some beast. But, recognizing the servant of God, many of them were changed from a bestial mind to the grace of piety.

His name, therefore, became known throughout the neighboring places, and from that time he began to be visited by many. He received food from them, while they carried back in their breasts nourishment from his mouth.

Section I: On Benedict’s Temptation by the Devil and the Death Contrived for Him by the Brothers

On a certain day, therefore, while he was alone, the tempter came. For a small black bird, commonly called a blackbird, began to fly around his face and importunately to press upon his countenance, so that it could have been caught by hand if the holy man had wished to hold it. But when the sign of the cross was made, the bird departed.

So great a temptation of the flesh followed upon the departure of that bird that the holy man had never experienced one so great. For at some time he had seen a certain woman, whom the malignant spirit now brought back before the eyes of his mind. He inflamed the soul of God’s servant with so great a fire at the sight of her that the flame of love could scarcely be contained within his breast, and, nearly overcome by pleasure, he was already considering leaving the desert.

But suddenly, regarded by heavenly grace, he returned to himself. Seeing dense thickets of nettles and thorns growing nearby, he stripped off his garment and cast himself naked among the points of those thorns and the fires of the nettles. He rolled there for a long time and came out from them wounded over his whole body.

Through wounds of the skin he drew the wound of the mind out of his body, because he transformed pleasure into pain. When he was burning well in punishment outside, he extinguished what was unlawfully burning inside. Thus he conquered sin, because he changed the burning.

From that time, as he himself afterward testified to his disciples, the temptation of pleasure was so subdued that he felt nothing of this kind in himself. Afterward many began to leave the world and hasten to his instruction. For, being free from the vice of temptation, he had rightly now been made a master of virtues.

Therefore, through the praise of his excellent religious life, his name was celebrated. Not far from his cell there was a monastery. When the father of its congregation died, that entire congregation came to the venerable Benedict and begged him with great entreaties that he ought to preside over them.

He delayed for a long time by refusing, and foretold that his own conduct could not agree with the conduct of those brothers. But, overcome at length by their entreaties, he consented.

When he maintained the observance of the regular life in that monastery and permitted no one, as formerly, to deviate through unlawful acts either to the right or the left from the straight path of religious life, the aforesaid brothers, raging insanely, began first to accuse themselves because they had asked that he preside over them.

When they perceived that unlawful things were not permitted to them and grieved that they had to abandon their accustomed practices—for the life of good men is always grievous to those of depraved conduct—they attempted to devise something concerning his death.

After taking counsel, they mixed poison with wine. When the glass vessel in which that deadly drink was contained was presented, according to the monastery's custom, to the father reclining at table so that it might be blessed, Benedict extended his hand and made the sign of the cross over it. The vessel, which was being held at some distance, was broken by that same sign; and it was so shattered as though, instead of a cross, he had cast a stone into that vessel of death.

The man of God understood that it had contained a drink of death, because it could not bear the sign of life. Immediately rising, with a calm countenance and a tranquil mind, he called the brothers together and addressed them, saying: "May almighty God have mercy upon you, brothers. Why did you wish to do these things to me? Did I not tell you beforehand that your conduct and mine would not agree? Go, and choose a father for yourselves according to your conduct, because thereafter you can by no means have me."

Then he returned to the place of his beloved solitude and dwelt alone with himself beneath the eyes of the heavenly watcher.

I would say that this venerable man dwelt with himself because, always circumspect in guarding himself, always seeing himself before the eyes of the Creator, and always examining himself, he did not scatter the eye of his mind outside himself.

But when Peter asked Gregory whether Benedict ought to have abandoned them in this manner, Gregory answered—and this is also contained in Cause VII, Question I: "The wicked are to be borne with equanimity where some good persons are found who may be helped. For where fruit from the good is wholly lacking, labor over the wicked is sometimes superfluous, especially if causes are available nearby which may render better fruit to God."

Therefore, for whose protection would the holy man have remained, when he saw them all unanimously persecuting him?

And something often occurs in the mind of the perfect which must not be passed over in silence: when they consider that their labor in one place is without fruit, they migrate to labor with fruit in another place. Hence also the Apostle Paul, who desired to be dissolved and to be with Christ, when he suffered persecution at Damascus, sought a wall, a basket, and a rope by which he might be lowered, preserving himself for the conversion of others, and not precisely on account of fear and love of his own life.

Section II: On His Construction of Several Monasteries and the Discipline of Correction

When the holy man had grown for a long time in virtues and signs in that same solitude, many were gathered there by him for the service of almighty God, so that he constructed twelve monasteries in that place. Appointing fathers over them, he assigned twelve monks to each; but he retained a few with himself whom he judged still fit to be instructed in his presence.

At that time Roman nobles and devout men also began to come to him and to give him their sons to be reared for almighty God. Then Equitius gave his son of good promise, Maurus, and Tertullus the patrician gave Placidus. Of these, Maurus, being older in age than Placidus and excelling in conduct, began to serve as the master's assistant; Placidus, however, still bore the years of a boyish disposition.

In one of the monasteries which he had constructed round about, there was a certain monk who could not remain standing at prayer. As soon as the brothers had applied themselves to the work of prayer, he went outside and, with a wandering mind, thought about earthly and vain things.

After he had often been admonished by his abbot, he was at last brought to the man of God, who vehemently rebuked his foolishness. After returning to the monastery, he scarcely kept the man of God's admonition for two days.

When this was reported to Benedict by the abbot—namely, that the monk was not corrected—blessed Benedict said: "I shall come and correct him myself."

Therefore, when the man of God came to that monastery and, at the appointed hour, the psalmody had been completed and the brothers had given themselves to prayer, he beheld that a certain little black boy was drawing outside by the fringe of his garment the monk who could not remain at prayer.

Then he said secretly to Pontianus, the father of that monastery, and to Maurus, the servant of God: "Do you not see who it is that draws this monk outside?"

When they answered, "No," he said: "Let us pray that you also may see him."

After they had prayed for two days, Maurus saw that little black boy. Pontianus, the father of the monastery, did not see him.

Therefore, on the following day, when the man of God went out after prayer and found that monk wandering outside, he struck him with a rod because of the blindness of his heart. From that day the monk suffered none of the little black boy's persuasion, but remained immovable at prayer with the others, as though the malignant spirit himself had been struck. Concerning this, see Distinction XLV, section Solomon.

When those places were fervent in the love of Jesus Christ and many, abandoning secular life, subjected themselves to him beneath the yoke of obedience, a priest of a neighboring church named Florentius, struck by the ancient enemy's malice, began through envy to emulate the holy man's works, to disparage his religious life, and to restrain as many as he could from visiting him.

When he now perceived that he could not obstruct Benedict's advances and that the reputation of his religious life was increasing, he became worse, kindled more and more by the torches of envy. He was led to such a point that he sent God's servant bread infected with poison, as though for a blessing.

The man of God received it with thanksgiving, but the plague which lay hidden in the bread did not lie hidden from him. At the hour of his meal, a raven was accustomed to come to him from the neighboring forest. The man of God cast before it the bread which had been sent to him and commanded it, saying: "In the name of Jesus Christ, take this and cast it into such a place that it can be found by no one."

Then the raven, with open beak and extended wings, began to run around the bread and to croak, as though openly saying that it wished to obey but was unable to fulfill the commands.

The man of God commanded it again and again, saying: "Take it, take it without fear, and cast it where it cannot be found."

At last the raven bit it, lifted it, and departed. After the space of three hours it returned without the bread and received its allowance from the hand of God's servant, as it was accustomed.

But the venerable man of God, seeing the priest's soul blazing against his life, grieved more for him than for himself.

The aforesaid Florentius, however, seeing that he could not kill the master's body, was inflamed to extinguish the souls of his disciples. Thus he sent seven naked girls into the garden of the cell in which Benedict was, before the disciples' eyes. Holding one another's hands in their presence and playing for a long time, they were to inflame the disciples' minds to the perversity of lust.

When the holy man beheld this from his cell and feared a fall for his still more tender disciples, and when he considered that this was being done solely because of persecution of himself, he yielded place to envy.

He ordered the oratories which he had constructed by setting superiors in his place and joining brothers to them; then, taking a few monks with him, he changed the place of his habitation. Thus the man of God humbly withdrew from that man's hatred.

When Benedict departed, the aforesaid priest stood upon an upper chamber and, learning that Benedict had withdrawn, exulted. Although the whole structure of the house remained standing, that very upper chamber upon which he stood fell, crushing and killing Benedict's enemy.

Maurus, the holy man's disciple, immediately thought that this should be reported to the venerable father Benedict, who was scarcely ten miles distant from that place, saying: "Return, because he who persecuted you is dead."

When Benedict, the man of God, heard this, he gave himself to grievous lamentations, both because his enemy had perished and because his disciple had exulted over the enemy's death. For this reason he imposed a penance upon that same disciple.

A certain monk, sent by him to admonish certain consecrated women, was asked by them to accept a certain small cloth. He took it from them and hid it in his bosom.

When he returned to the monastery, he was reproved with a most bitter rebuke by blessed Benedict, who said: "How has iniquity entered your bosom?"

When the monk did not understand concerning what he was being reproved, the man of God said: "Was I not present when you received the little cloth from the handmaids of God and placed it in your bosom?"

Recognizing his transgression, he fell prostrate, sought pardon for it, and received it.

Two consecrated women, born of a rather noble family, lived a religious life in their own place. A certain devout man provided them service for the use of their exterior life. But in some persons nobility of birth is accustomed to beget ignobility of mind, so that those who remember that they were something more than others despise themselves less in this life.

The aforesaid consecrated women had not yet perfectly restrained their tongues beneath the bridle of their habit, and they often provoked to anger with incautious words that same devout man who provided them service in their exterior necessities.

After he had borne this for a long time, he went to the man of God and related to him their insults against him. The man of God sent them this command: "Correct your tongue, because, if you do not amend it, I shall excommunicate you."

He did not impose that sentence of excommunication by pronouncing it, but by threatening it.

They changed nothing from their former conduct, and within a few days they died and were buried in the church.

When the solemnities of Mass were celebrated in the said church and the deacon, according to custom, cried out, “If anyone does not communicate, let him go outside and give place to others,” their nurse, who was accustomed to carry an offering to the Lord for them, saw them come out of their graves and leave the church.

When she had very often seen them leave the church at the deacon’s words, “Go out,” and so forth, she recalled to memory what the holy man had said while they were still living. When this was reported to God’s servant with grievous sorrow, he immediately gave an offering with his own hand, saying: “Go, and cause this offering to be made for them, and they will no longer be excommunicated.”

When it had been offered for them in sacrifice, they were no longer seen to leave the church when the deacon cried out according to custom.

Section III: On Blessed Benedict’s Preaching on Mount Cassino and Placidus’s Deliverance by Maurus from Submersion in the River

But the holy man, says Gregory in the place cited above, migrating to other places did not change his enemy. He suffered things afterward that were the more grievous, inasmuch as he found the very master of malice openly fighting against him.

For the fortress called Cassino is situated upon the broad side of a high mountain. The mountain receives this same fortress in its extended bosom, but, rising upward for three miles, it stretches its summit as though toward the air.

There was a most ancient temple there in which Apollo was worshiped, according to the ancient custom of the gentiles, by the foolish populace of the rustics. Groves had also grown round about for the worship of demons, in which, even at that time, an insane multitude of unbelievers devoted itself to sacrilegious sacrifices.

Therefore, when the man of God came there, he shattered the idol, overturned the altar, and cut down the groves. In the very temple of Apollo he made an oratory of blessed Martin; and where the altar of Apollo had been, he constructed an oratory of blessed John the Baptist. By continual preaching he called the multitude dwelling round about to the faith.

But the ancient enemy, not bearing these things silently, did not thrust himself before that father’s eyes secretly or through a dream, but in an open vision; and with great cries he complained that violence was being inflicted upon him by Benedict, so that the brothers also heard his voice although they by no means saw his image.

For, as that same venerable father told his disciples, that most foul and inflamed ancient enemy appeared to his bodily eyes, seeming to rage against him with flaming mouth and eyes. All now heard what he was saying. At first he called him by name. When the holy man answered him in no way, he immediately turned to insults against him.

For when he cried out, saying, “Benedict! Benedict!” and perceived that Benedict answered him in no way, he immediately added: “Accursed one, and not blessed one, what have you to do with me? Why do you persecute me?”

Hence Gratian also says this same thing in Cause XVI, Question I, section This Same Thing: that blessed Benedict, admonished by divine grace, led the people of Mount Cassino to the faith, namely by preaching. This is said for the reason that monks do not regularly have authority to preach unless it is granted by their superiors.

But now new contests of the ancient enemy against God’s servant must be awaited. He willingly brought battles upon Benedict, but unwillingly supplied occasions of victory.

For on a certain day, while the brothers were constructing the dwellings of that same cell for themselves, a stone lay in the midst which they had determined to lift into the building. When two or three could not move it, more were joined to them, but it remained so immovable that it seemed to be held by roots in the earth. By this it was given to be understood that the ancient enemy sat upon it.

When the difficulty arose, they sent for the man of God. He came, prayed, and gave a blessing, and the stone was lifted with such swiftness as though it had had no weight.

Then it pleased them, in the sight of the man of God, that the earth should be dug in that same place. When the brothers penetrated more deeply by digging, they found a bronze idol there. When by chance it was cast into the kitchen for the moment, it suddenly seemed to burst forth into fire and, in the eyes of all the monks, appeared to consume the whole building of that kitchen.

While they made an uproar by throwing water and, as it were, extinguishing the fire, the man of God, struck by that tumult, came. Considering that the same fire was in the brothers’ eyes but was not in his own, he immediately bowed his head in prayer.

He recalled to their own eyes the brothers whom he found being deluded by the imaginary fire, so that they might perceive the building of the kitchen to be sound and might not see the flames which the ancient enemy had fashioned.

Again, when the brothers were building a wall somewhat higher because the matter so required, the man of God remained within the enclosure of his cell in the work of prayer. The ancient enemy appeared to him, insulting him, and indicated that he was going to the brothers who were working.

The man of God quickly made this known through a messenger, saying: “Brothers, act cautiously, because at this hour the malignant spirit comes to you.”

The one who carried the command had scarcely completed the words when the malignant spirit overturned the wall which was being built. By its fall it crushed and shattered a young monk, the son of a certain court official.

All were saddened, not by the loss of the wall but by the brother’s death, and with grievous lamentation they hastened to report as quickly as possible to the venerable father Benedict what had happened.

Then the venerable father ordered the mangled boy to be carried before him. They could carry him only in a sack, because the stones of the fallen wall had crushed not only his limbs but also his bones.

When the boy had been brought, the father ordered that he be placed in his cell upon the mat in the place where he was accustomed to pray. Sending the brothers outside, he closed the cell and applied himself to prayer more intently than usual.

A marvelous thing: in that same hour he sent him back whole and as strong as before to the same labor, so that the boy himself might also complete the wall with the brothers. The ancient enemy had believed that through his death he might insult Benedict.

Section IV: On the Spirit of Prophecy Which He Possessed Abundantly, Manifesting Hidden Things and Foretelling Uncertain Future Things

One of their customs was that, as often as the brothers went out to do anything, they should by no means take food or drink outside the cell. When this was observed more carefully according to the practice of the rule, on a certain day they went out because a circumstance had arisen and, being compelled by the business to delay until a later hour, took food in the dwelling of a certain devout woman.

Returning rather late, they sought a blessing from the father. When he asked, “Where did you eat?” they denied that they had eaten anywhere.

The holy father said: “Why do you lie? Did you not enter the house of such a woman? Did you not eat such foods and drink so many cups?”

Recognizing that all the things which he had said were true, they fell trembling at his feet and confessed their sin. He spared them, judging that they would not do such things thereafter in his absence, since they perceived him to be present with them in spirit.

It is also related concerning a certain layman who was accustomed each year, out of devotion, to visit the servant of God while fasting. On a certain occasion, when he had undertaken this journey, the devil in human form joined himself to him.

After a little space of the journey, that fellow traveler, the devil, having something with him to eat and drink, began to invite his companion to take some refreshment so that they might be stronger on the journey. In order to observe his customary devotion, the layman did not wish to do this. When they had advanced farther, the devil invited him again, but he refused.

At last, when for the third time they found upon the road a meadow, a spring, and a pleasant place, the devil for the third time persuaded him concerning refreshment. Consenting to his suggestion, the layman refreshed himself with him.

But when he arrived at the monastery and visited the saint, the father disclosed to him what had occurred on the road: that once and again he had resisted the devil when he suggested eating, but, overcome by the tempter on the third occasion, he had broken the fast. Recognizing this in himself, the man fell prostrate, sought pardon, and received it.

Moreover, when Totila, king of the Lombards, had heard that Benedict knew hidden things through the spirit of prophecy, he wished to test the truth of the matter. On a certain day he sent his sword-bearer, dressed in royal ornaments and accompanied by a great retinue, pretending that he was King Totila.

But when he came before Benedict, the saint of God immediately told him that he was not the king. At the sight of Benedict, both the man himself and his companions fell trembling to the ground.

When King Totila learned this, he came to Benedict and, upon seeing him, fell prostrate upon the ground. He was unwilling to rise until the saint raised him from the ground.

Benedict rebuked him concerning his deeds and in a few words foretold the things which were to come upon him: that he would reign for ten years and would die in the tenth year, and other things of which it was said above.

But when the bishop of the church of Canusium, conspicuous in holiness and familiar with blessed Benedict, said to him in conversation, “This city of Rome will be destroyed by that King Totila so that it will no longer be inhabited,” the man of God said: “Rome will not be exterminated by the nations, but, wearied by storms, lightning, whirlwinds, and earthquakes, it will wither away in itself.” The mysteries of this prophecy are shown to have been fulfilled.

He also foretold that it had been revealed to him by God that the entire monastery which he had constructed and all things which he had prepared for it would be handed over to the nations. He had obtained from God, however, that none of the brothers would be taken. This was fulfilled when, after some years, that monastery was captured and destroyed by the Lombards. He disclosed this with many tears to a certain intimate friend of his.

Likewise, when a certain monk who had been noble in the world was holding a lamp before the father as he ate supper, that young man began, through the spirit of pride, to say within himself in thought: “Who is this for whom I stand holding a lamp and to whom I render service? Who am I, who serve this man?”

The blessed father, seeing his thoughts through the Spirit, began to rebuke him, saying: “Sign your heart, brother. What is this that you are saying?” Calling the brothers, he ordered them to take the lamp from him. When that brother was asked by his companions what he had been thinking, they clearly understood that the thought of his pride had not been hidden from the blessed man.

When two flasks of wine were to be offered to the blessed man and had been entrusted to someone as a messenger, that man, overcome by the vice of gluttony, presented only one and hid the other at a certain place on the road.

As he departed, Benedict said to him: “See, son, that you do not drink from that flask which you hid; but tilt it carefully, and you will see what is inside it.”

Confounded because his theft was manifest to Benedict, he departed from him. When he reached the place and tilted the flask, a serpent came out of it.

A certain cleric of the church of Aquinum, possessed by a demon, was brought to the man of God, who freed him after prayer. When the cleric had been healed, Benedict commanded him, saying: “Go, and do not eat meat; and never presume to advance to sacred order. For on whatever day you presume to receive an order, you will again be subject to the devil’s dominion.”

He observed this for many years. But a long time afterward, when he saw clerics inferior to himself placed before him in order, he received sacred order lest he appear contemptible. Immediately the malignant spirit, as the saint had foretold, invaded him and held him until death.

Section V: On His Miracles

In addition to the dead brother raised to life, concerning whom it was said above, he restored life to another also.

On a certain day, as Gregory says in the place cited above, when the holy man had gone out to a field with the brothers, behold, a certain peasant came to the monastery of the man of God, carrying in his arms the body of his dead son and lamenting, and he sought Benedict.

When he was told that Benedict was in the field with the brothers, he left the dead body before the monastery and cast himself into a run to find the father. But when Benedict was already returning from the field with the brothers, the peasant met him and began to cry out: “Give me back my son! Give me back my son!”

The man of God stopped and said to him: “Surely I did not take away your son?”

The peasant said: “He is dead. Come and raise him.”

Hearing this, Benedict was greatly saddened and said: “Withdraw, brothers, withdraw. These things are not ours, but belong to the holy apostles.”

But the peasant persisted in his petition, swearing that he would not withdraw unless Benedict raised his son. “Behold,” he said, “the infant’s body lies at the monastery’s door.”

When Benedict reached him, he bent his knees and lay upon the dead body. Afterward, rising and extending his hands to heaven, he said: “Lord, do not regard my sins, but the faith of this peasant who demands that his son be raised; and restore to the little body the soul which you have taken away.”

The boy immediately rose before them all, as though trembling, and Benedict thus delivered him unharmed into his father’s hand.

On a certain day, when Placidus, a boy monk, had been sent to the river to draw a vessel of water from it, he handled it incautiously and fell into the river. The river’s current had already drawn him a considerable distance beyond its bed.

The father, knowing this in spirit, suddenly called Maurus and told him to go as quickly as possible and draw Placidus, who was submerged in the water, out of the river.

Immediately receiving a blessing, Maurus set out. Reaching the river and seeing that the current had already drawn Placidus far from the land, he attended to the father’s command so that he might lead him out of the water. He proceeded with dry steps upon the river’s water as far as the place to which the boy had already been carried, grasped him with his hand, and led him back to land.

Then, perceiving that he had walked upon the waters, Maurus approached the father Benedict in the monastery with Placidus. He expressly attributed the miracle to Benedict’s blessed holiness, but Benedict attributed it to Maurus’s simple obedience.

At that time, when a lack of food gravely afflicted Campania, the man of God distributed all the possessions of his monastery to the various needy, so that almost nothing remained in the cellar except a little oil in a glass vessel.

Then a certain subdeacon named Agapitus came and earnestly asked that a little oil be given to him. The man of the Lord, who had determined to distribute all things on earth so that he might preserve all things in heaven, ordered that the very little oil which remained be given to him.

The monk who kept the cellar heard the words of the one giving the order, but delayed fulfilling them. When Benedict inquired a little later whether what he had commanded had been given, the monk answered that he had by no means given it, because no oil would remain for the brothers.

The father, angered, commanded others to cast that glass vessel with the oil through the window, lest anything remain in the cell through disobedience. Thus it was done.

Below that window there was a great precipice, rough with a mass of rocks. The glass vessel was cast down and struck the rocks, but it remained unharmed, so that it could neither be broken nor could the oil be spilled from it.

The man of God commanded it to be lifted up and all of it to be given to the subdeacon who sought it. Then, gathering the brothers, he rebuked that brother for unbelief and pride.

When the rebuke had been completed, he gave himself to prayer with the brothers. There was a covered empty vessel for the use of oil. While the saint persisted in prayer, the lid of the vessel began to be lifted, and the oil from it poured out upon the pavement. When Benedict finished the prayer, the oil ceased to pour out.

He then admonished the distrustful and disobedient brother that he should learn faith and humility.

After prayer, blessed Benedict gave a slap to a certain elder among the monks who was possessed by a demon, and immediately shook the malignant spirit out of him. By his prayer he also perfectly cleansed a certain boy brought before him who was struck by the elephantine disease of leprosy.

At another time, when a great famine distressed Campania, wheat was already lacking in Benedict’s monastery, and all the loaves had been consumed, so that no more than five could be found for the brothers at the hour of refreshment.

When the venerable father saw them saddened, he sought to correct their faintheartedness with a moderate rebuke and then to raise them up with a promise, saying: “Why is your spirit saddened by the lack of bread? Today, indeed, there is little; tomorrow you will have an abundance.”

On the following day, two hundred measures of flour were found in sacks before the doors of the cell. It remains unknown through which persons almighty God sent them and who the messenger was. Seeing this, the brothers gave thanks to God.

On a certain day, one of his young monks loved his parents beyond what he ought. Going to their dwelling, he left the monastery without a blessing. On that same day, as soon as he reached them, he died.

After he was buried, his body was found outside on the next day. They took care to give it to burial again, but on the following day they again found it cast outside.

Then, running to the blessed father's feet with great groaning, they begged that he deign to grant the youth his grace. The man of God immediately gave them Communion of the Lord's body with his own hand, saying: "Go, and with great reverence place this body of the Lord upon his breast, and thus commit him to burial."

When this was done, the earth held his received body and cast it out no more.

A certain fickle monk did not wish to remain in the monastery. Although the man of God frequently corrected and admonished him, he assented in no way to remain in the monastery and importunately insisted with entreaties that he be released.

Affected by weariness at the excess of his importunity, the venerable father angrily ordered him to depart. As soon as he went out of the monastery, he found on the road a dragon standing before him with open mouth.

When the dragon which had appeared wished to devour him, he began, trembling and palpitating, to cry out with a loud voice, saying: "Run, run, because a dragon wishes to devour me!"

The brothers ran to him and found no dragon, but they led him back to the monastery trembling and palpitating. He immediately promised that he would never withdraw from the monastery, and he did this. For through the holy man's prayers he saw the dragon standing before him which he had previously followed without seeing it, namely, the devil.

A certain man who owed someone twelve solidi, and was being gravely afflicted by his creditor, came to the man of God asking for them. The saint, consoling him with gentle speech, said that he did not have the solidi, but nevertheless told him to return to him after two days.

The man returned on the third day. After the holy man had prayed for his assistance, thirteen solidi were found upon a chest filled with grain. The man of God gave them to him, saying: "Give twelve to the creditor, but retain one for your own expenses." Thus he departed.

A certain man whose skin had been changed and mottled like leprosy by poison given to him was brought to Benedict and perfectly healed.

Section VI: On His Sister Saint Scholastica, Whose Passing into Heaven He Saw, and Also That of Blessed Germanus, Bishop of Capua

His sister, says Gregory in the place cited above, named Scholastica, dedicated to the almighty Lord from the very time of infancy, was accustomed to come to him once each year. The man of God descended to her not far outside the gate, upon a property of the monastery.

Therefore, on the day when she came according to custom, her venerable brother descended to her with his disciples. Spending the whole day in praises of God and sacred conversations, when the darkness of night was now falling, they took food together.

While they were still sitting at the table and the later hour prolonged itself amid their sacred conversations, that same consecrated woman, his sister, asked him, saying: "I beseech you, do not leave me this night, so that we may speak until morning concerning something of the joys of heavenly life."

He answered her: "What is this that you say, sister? I can in no way remain outside the cell."

There was such serenity in the air that no cloud appeared in the sky. But when the consecrated woman heard her brother's words wholly refusing her, she placed her interlaced fingers upon the table, inclined her head into her hands, and prayed to almighty God.

When she raised her head from the table, so great a force of lightning, so great a thunder, and so great an inundation of rain burst forth that neither Benedict nor the brothers who were present with him could move a foot outside the threshold of the place where they sat.

For the consecrated woman, inclining her head into her hands, had poured forth immense rivers of tears, by which she drew the serenity of the air into rain. That inundation did not follow a little later after the prayer; rather, there was such agreement between prayer and inundation that she raised her head from the table together with the thunder, so that raising the head and bringing down the rain were one and the same moment.

Then the man of God, amid the lightning, thunder, and inundation of the immense rain, seeing that he could not return to the monastery, began sorrowfully to complain, saying: "May almighty God spare you, sister. What is this that you have done?"

She answered him: "Behold, I asked you, and you were unwilling to hear me. I asked my Lord, and he heard me. Go out now, if you can; and, leaving me, return to the monastery."

But he was unable to go out from beneath the roof. He who was unwilling to remain of his own accord remained in that place against his will. Thus it came about that they passed that whole night awake and satisfied one another by mutual narration in sacred conversations concerning the spiritual life.

It is no wonder that the woman who desired for a long time to see her brother was able to do more at that time. For, according to John's saying, God is charity; by a very just judgment, she was able to do more because she loved more.

On the next day, when that same venerable woman returned to her own cell, the man of God returned to the monastery. And behold, after three days, while Father Benedict stood in his cell with his eyes raised into the air, he saw the soul of that same sister of his depart from her body and penetrate the secret places of heaven in the form of a dove.

Rejoicing with her in so great a glory, he rendered thanks to almighty God in hymns and praises and announced her death to the brothers. He also immediately sent them to carry her body to the monastery and place it in the tomb which he had prepared for himself.

When this was done, it came about that the sepulcher did not separate the bodies of those whose mind had always been one in the Lord. Gratian also places this in Cause XIII, Question II, section I, Sister.

At another time, while the brothers were still resting in the monastery during the night, the man of the Lord, Benedict, anticipating the hours appointed for the vigils of nocturnal prayer, stood at a window and prayed to almighty God.

Suddenly, looking out in the depth of night, he saw a light poured down from above drive away all the darkness of the night. It shone with such splendor that the light which radiated in the darkness surpassed the day.

A very marvelous thing followed in this contemplation, because, as he himself afterward related, the entire world also was brought before his eyes, gathered as though beneath one ray of the sun.

While the venerable father fixed the intent gaze of his eyes upon the splendor of this shining light, he saw the soul of Germanus, bishop of Capua, carried into heaven by angels in a sphere of fire.

Then, desiring to have a witness for himself to so great a miracle, he called two and three times with a great cry for a certain deacon named Servandus, who had come to visit him. When he ascended, because he had been lying below in the house, he looked and saw a now-small portion of the light.

To the astonished deacon, the man of God related the miracle in order. Sending a monk to Capua, he found that Germanus had departed from this life at that hour at which Benedict had seen this.

When Peter therefore asked how the whole world could be seen by a man beneath one ray, Gregory answered: "Hold firmly what I say: to the soul that sees the Creator, every creature is narrow. For to anyone who has beheld even a small part of the Creator's light, everything that has been created becomes small.

"When the bosom of the inner mind is enlarged by the very light of the vision, it is expanded so greatly in God that it stands above the world. The soul of the one seeing is also made above itself. When it is caught up in God's light above itself, it is enlarged in its inward parts.

"Therefore, the man of God who beheld the fiery globe and the angels returning to heaven could doubtless discern this only in God's light. What wonder is it, then, if he saw the world gathered before him, when, raised in the light of the mind, he was outside the world?

"But when the world is said to have been gathered before his eyes, it was not heaven and earth that were contracted, but the soul of the one seeing that was enlarged. Caught up in God, he was able without difficulty to see everything that is beneath God."

Section VII: On His Happy Passing

Gregory says: In the same year in which he was to depart from this life, he announced the day of his most holy death to certain disciples dwelling with him and to certain others dwelling far away. He commanded those present to conceal what they heard in silence, while he indicated to those absent what sort of sign would be given to them when his soul departed from the body.

Six days before his departure, he ordered his grave to be opened. He was immediately seized by fevers and began to be wearied by a fierce heat. As his weakness grew heavier on each successive day, on the sixth day he caused himself to be carried into the oratory by his disciples. There he fortified his departure by receiving the Lord's body and blood.

Supporting his feeble limbs between the hands of his disciples, he stood with his hands raised to heaven and breathed forth his final spirit amid words of prayer.

On that same day a revelation of a single but dissimilar vision [read: a single and identical vision] appeared to two brothers, one placed rather far away and the other remaining in his cell. They saw a road spread with cloths and shining with innumerable lamps, extending in a straight easterly course from his cell as far as heaven.

A man of venerable appearance, radiant from above, asked them whose road it was which they beheld. They professed that they did not know. He said to them: “This is the road by which Benedict, the man beloved by God, ascends to heaven.”

Thus, just as the disciples present saw the holy man’s death, so also those absent recognized it from the sign which had been foretold to them.

He was buried in the oratory of Saint John the Baptist which he himself had constructed after Apollo’s altar was destroyed. In the cave at Subiaco in which he formerly dwelt, he shines with miracles even now, if the faith of those present requires it.

For the thing which I narrate occurred recently. A certain woman, captive in mind, had wholly lost her senses and wandered through mountains, hills, forests, and fields by day and night, resting only when weariness compelled her to rest.

One day, while wandering too far, she came to the cave of the blessed father Benedict and, not knowing what it was, entered and remained there. When morning came, she departed with a mind so sound as though madness of the head had never held her. Afterward, throughout the whole time of her life, she remained in the health which she had received.

When Peter asked why saints sometimes perform greater miracles in places where their bodies do not lie than in places where they are buried, Gregory answered that this happens because weak minds can doubt whether they are present to hear prayers in places where it is certain that they are not present in their bodies.

It is necessary that greater signs be shown where a weak mind can doubt their presence. But the mind of those fixed in God has so much the greater merit of faith inasmuch as it knows that they do not lie there in the body and yet are not absent from hearing prayers.

Section VIII: On His Rule

This holy man, Gregory says, shone in no small degree by the word of doctrine, for he wrote a rule for monks, distinguished by discretion and lucid in expression. If anyone wishes to know his conduct and life more subtly, he can find in that institution of the rule all the acts of his teaching, because the holy man could in no way teach otherwise than he lived.

Pope Boniface, however, in Cause XVI, Question I, chapter There Are Some, rejects the opinion of certain persons, as of the malignant, who assert that monks, because they are dead, can neither grant penance nor Christianity—that is, baptism—nor absolve through the power of the priestly office divinely enjoined upon them.

He adds: “For neither was blessed Benedict, the life-giving teacher of monks, in any way a forbidding authority concerning this matter; but he decreed only that they should be free from secular business.”

From the rule itself, the following is held concerning the ceremonies of life: they are to abstain from eating meat except in infirmity. From the September feast of the Cross until the Resurrection they are to observe a fast, except on Sundays, and also on every Friday. They are not to use linen garments next to the flesh, but woolen ones. They are to sleep clothed, with belt and shoes.

They are to maintain silence at certain hours and places and are to refrain even from good words, for they are always to abstain from idle and vain words. At midnight they are to arise to confess to the Lord, that is, for Matins. In all things they are simply to obey. They are to be clothed in cheap things. They are to preserve modesty in countenance, gait, and all things.

He concludes that perfection is not acquired through the observance of these things, but rather its beginning and a disposition toward it.

He instructs the abbot to be cautious, but not excessively suspicious, for otherwise it will never be well with him, nor will he have rest of mind. He is to preserve the vigor of discipline in observing the rule, not lightly dispensing without a great cause, knowing that he will render an account to God concerning every dispensation of his own, whether it was reasonable.

In receiving persons into religious life, he is not to believe every spirit, but the spirits are to be tested to see whether they are from God. Beyond the things contained in the rule, he is not to compel them to things more austere or more perfect than their condition requires.

He introduces the figure of Jacob, who was unwilling to continue the journey with Esau and his companions as they journeyed vigorously, lest his flocks be wearied or miscarry from excessive labor, but went slowly with them.

He is to exhibit charity toward guests. In all things he is to act with counsel, summoning even the lesser persons in more difficult matters, because God sometimes reveals through such persons what must be done. So that an apostate may not perish while wandering in error, the abbot is to receive him back for pardon with penance, if he returns humbly, up to the third time.

In chapter VII of the Rule, treating that evangelical saying, “He who humbles himself shall be exalted,” he sets down twelve degrees of humility, figured in the steps of the ladder which Jacob saw in a vision.

The first is always to have the fear of God before one’s eyes and to be mindful of all his commandments.

The second is that, if anyone does not love his own will, he is not delighted to fulfill his own desires.

The third is that, for the love of God, one subjects oneself to a superior in all obedience.

The fourth is that, if hard and adverse things, or even injuries of any kind, are inflicted in that obedience, one embraces patience with a silent conscience and, enduring, neither grows weary nor withdraws.

The fifth is that one does not conceal from one’s abbot, through humble confession, all evil thoughts coming to one’s heart or evil deeds secretly committed by oneself.

The sixth is that the monk is content with every lowliness or extremity and, concerning all things enjoined upon him, judges himself an evil and unworthy workman.

The seventh is that he not only pronounces himself lower and more worthless than all with his tongue, but also believes it with the inward affection of his heart.

The eighth is that a monk does nothing except what the common rule of the monastery or the examples of the elders exhort.

The ninth is that he restrains his tongue from speaking and, possessing taciturnity, does not speak until questioned.

The tenth is that he is not easy and ready for laughter.

The eleventh is that, when the monk speaks, he speaks gently and without laughter, humbly and with gravity, says few and reasonable words, and is not loud in voice.

The twelfth and last is that he always indicates his humility to those who see him, not only in heart but also in body: at work, in the garden, in the oratory, on the road, in the field, everywhere, whether sitting, walking, or standing, always with head inclined and eyes fixed upon the ground, judging himself at every hour about to render an account for his sins.

Title XV

Chapter XIV

After Benedict, all the monks of the West serve under the Rule of blessed Benedict and have him as their father, except the Carthusians, who have special constitutions of their own.

But, as blessed Bernard says in a sermon concerning him, Benedict was like a tree planted beside the courses of waters which flow with force from Lebanon, that is, of spiritual graces, which produced fruit in its own time and will produce it manifoldly.

Just as one tree is one in root and trunk but manifold in branches and fruits, which nevertheless have their moisture and vigor from the root and trunk, so the monastic state in the West is one, deriving from one father and possessing vigor from the root of Benedict's Rule.

Nevertheless, in the passage of time it was divided into many branches: the diverse monastic religious orders agreeing in the Rule but differing in the various constitutions added to the Rule and in customs and habits.

Hence came the Order of Cluny, the Order of Prémontré, the Cistercians, the Camaldolese, Vallombrosa, the Humiliati, Monte Oliveto, Saint Justina, Montefano, and others.

But among the others blessed Benedict had two disciples who were holy men, namely Maurus and Placidus, concerning whom it was said above. First, therefore, something will be said concerning Saint Maurus.

He was sent by blessed Benedict into Gaul to construct a new monastery of his religious order. The cause of this was that the blessed man Berticranus, bishop of Le Mans, hearing the fame of the most holy Benedict and of his religious order, sent two venerable men to blessed Benedict—Flodegarius, his archdeacon, and Arderadus, his vicedominus—with great gifts.

He earnestly entreated Benedict to send him perfect men from among his monks who would build a monastery upon the land of his church according to the observance of the regular life. The bishop himself would furnish the expenses for constructing and providing it.

Although blessed Benedict knew that his death, already revealed to him, was approaching, nevertheless, to satisfy the bishop's pious petition for the glory of God and the enlargement of the religious order, he determined to send Maurus for this work, whom he loved beyond the others because of his eminent uprightness.

When all the monks heard this, they were greatly saddened. They intended, after the father's passing, to place Maurus over themselves as abbot so that he might be a rule of holiness for all.

But the venerable father consoled them, exhorting them to have confidence in the Lord and, just as he deprived himself of the consolation of Maurus's presence so that the salvation of others might be provided for, that they also should seek not the things that were their own but those of their neighbors.

Therefore, the holy father sent Maurus with four other monks, over whom he placed him, then thirty-two years old. He gave him the Rule which he had written with his own most holy hand. He also ordered that a pound weight of bread and a bronze vessel holding a fixed measure of wine be carried, to be given to each at dinner or supper.

Therefore, undertaking the journey with the bishop's envoys, Flodegarius and Arderadus, on the first day they arrived at a certain lodging belonging to a monastery, where two of blessed Benedict's monks dwelt. They received them honorably.

While they were there, blessed Benedict sent two other monks to Maurus and his companions so that they might give him, on the father's behalf, a certain ivory casket with relics and also a short letter containing these tender and prophetic words:

"Receive, most beloved, the final gifts of your teacher, which both testify to a long love and provide to you and your fellow soldiers a perpetual protection against all impediments of evils.

"After the whole course of three times twenty years has been completed from the time when you entered monastic perfection, you are to be brought into the joy of your Lord, as was revealed to me yesterday after your departure."

He also foretold that Maurus would have difficulty in constructing the monastery, but that the Lord would assist him.

From there, continuing the journey they had begun, on the fifty-fifth day they arrived at Vercelli. They remained there for two days, exhorted to do this by the clergy, who received them most courteously.

But while the aforesaid Arderadus, one of those sent by the bishop, was walking upon the steps of a certain very high tower, through the devil's working he fell headlong downward. He was so crushed and broken that his life was despaired of. On account of his infirmity, they remained in the aforesaid city for thirteen days.

When Maurus saw Flodegarius the archdeacon greatly afflicted by his companion's fall and was urged by him with tears to obtain health for him from the Lord by his prayers, he was moved by mercy. Touching the broken body with the holy relics which he had brought with him, he restored free and complete health to him.

When this miracle had been performed and made known, the fame of his holiness grew and went forth into the whole region, so that everyone ran to see him. Being perfectly humble, however, he attributed the whole deed to the power of the Cross and to the merits of Father Benedict.

Afterward, while they continued the journey near the ridges of the Alps, one of their servants named Sergius fell from his horse to the ground and broke his foot. Maurus also healed him perfectly.

When they came to the church of blessed Maurice, they entered the church with their companions for the grace of prayer. There a blind man called Linus cried out that Maurus should have mercy upon him. When he persisted with poured-out entreaties, Maurus prayed to God for him and gave him sight.

Proceeding farther from that place, they turned aside to a certain lodging on the road and remained there that night. Adjoining the lodging was the house of a certain widow, who did not cease to mourn her son, sick unto death and awaiting the hour of his departure, and to cry out because of the pain of her dying son.

Hearing this and having compassion, Maurus approached the sick man's bed together with a companion named Simplicius. Praying for the man, who had now been without sense and speech for two days, he restored him unharmed to his mother.

On the Lord's Supper, which is before Easter, they came to a village of Auxerre. It pleased Maurus to approach the monastery of Romanus constructed there, Romanus having gone there by a revelation of the Lord.

This was the Romanus who for a time provided sustenance for Benedict when, as a young man, he sought solitude, as was said above. He received them honorably and with exceeding charity, and they celebrated holy Easter with him.

Maurus disclosed to Romanus and the others that the blessed father Benedict had migrated to the Lord on that day. At his passing they shed pious tears together. Nevertheless, they received great consolation because Maurus showed them the road by which the saint had ascended into heaven.

After this, when they had reached Orléans and heard of the death of the blessed man Berticranus, bishop of Le Mans, who had sent for them, a most grievous sorrow invaded their guides, the archdeacon and Arderadus. The brothers also were affected by weariness because of this.

Maurus comforted them, recalling the prophecy of Father Benedict, who had foretold that the monastery would be constructed with difficulty.

By common agreement they remained there, waiting until the aforesaid archdeacon and Arderadus went to the bishop who succeeded Berticranus, learned his intention and purpose concerning the construction of the monastery, and reported it to them.

When they came to him in person and questioned him about it, he answered that he had to attend to other things and could not fulfill it.

Therefore, as quickly as possible, Arderadus sent a messenger, namely his nephew, to make these things known to Maurus and his companions. They were not cast down in spirit because of this, since it was being brought about by divine dispensation so that a more suitable place might be provided for them. Arderadus told them to pass into the territory of Anjou, where he himself would meet them.

When these things had been carried out and they had met one another, Arderadus disclosed to Maurus that a certain cousin of his named Florus, one of the foremost among the leading men of the kingdom of Francia, had formed the purpose of constructing and endowing a monastery for God's servants upon his possessions, of which he had an abundance.

He appeared sufficiently to fear God and to act vigorously in matters entrusted to him. For this reason he was very dear to Theoderic, king of Francia. He had an only son by his wife, whom he also desired to offer to God as a monk. Hence Arderadus would make known to him Maurus's arrival with his companions and its cause, and would bring back his responses.

Therefore, when Florus learned these things from Arderadus, he rejoiced greatly that the time had come for fulfilling his desire. He sought from King Theoderic permission to accomplish these things.

The king most kindly granted him authority for a monastery to be built upon his possessions and for the holy monks who had come to be placed there.

Therefore, Florus went to the territory of his possessions to complete this work. Blessed Maurus met him there with his companions and Arderadus.

Before Maurus, Florus leapt down from his horse, prostrated himself upon the ground with great veneration, kissed his right hand, and embraced him. For he had already heard of the holiness of his life and of the mighty works which the Lord had performed through him on the road. Hence he had conceived an extraordinary affection and devotion toward him.

When Florus explained his will and the king's assent, Maurus said: "The observance of our order demands the greatest quiet and security. Therefore, if it is not contrary to the nobility of your generosity, we ought first, riding together in a wagon, to inspect all the properties which you desire to hand over to God and his servants for the remedy of your soul.

"Then, after a testament has been made and you have delivered them to us before witnesses, it is fitting that we receive them into our dominion."

Florus carried out all these things. Moreover, he offered his only son, named Bertulfus, eight years old, to be reared and instructed by the teaching and doctrine of Maurus.

Florus said: "And I promise that I myself also, if life accompanies me, when the work has been completed and all things which are in the world have been abandoned, am to be bound to divine services in this same place."

He committed to execution all the things which he had said.

Therefore, they began to construct a monastery beside the River Loire, making, among the other buildings, an oratory in honor of Saint Martin.

While the work was being done, with many great men skilled in the art hired for the building, on a certain day Florus was sitting with Maurus while inspecting the workmen. Maurus was engaged in reading and at times explained something from it to Florus.

A certain man who was in charge of the mason's art fell backward from the very high place where the building was being raised and fell upon a gathered heap of stones. He was so shattered that everyone believed him dead, while blood flowed copiously through every passage of his body.

Maurus ran there with Florus and caused the man to be carried to the oratory of blessed Martin. Sending everyone out and remaining alone, after prayers he restored the man to complete health by the sign of the cross and sent him to continue the building.

Seeing this, Florus said: "Truly you are a disciple of that Benedict concerning whom we have frequently heard such things." From that hour he held Maurus in such veneration that he scarcely dared to approach him.

When the healed man had returned to the work, certain of the workmen began to disparage blessed Maurus. They said that he had left his monastery, not under the pretext of religion but for the sake of greed, so that he might be held in greater honor in other regions; and that the signs which he performed were worked not by God's power but by certain enchantments.

While they were saying these things among themselves, the malignant spirit suddenly invaded three of them and began to torment them so fiercely that one of them expired and the other two mangled one another with their teeth.

When the man of God heard this, lamenting out of compassion for them, he approached the oratory of blessed Martin. Praying for the space of three hours, after a time he freed those two who were possessed by demons.

He caused the dead body to be carried into the church's portico and passed that night without sleep, entreating God to deign to restore the soul to the body, lest the devil who had torn it away should triumph over it any longer.

In the morning, when he had caused Mass to be celebrated for the man by Simplicius, monk and priest, he went with him to the place where the dead man lay. After prayer was made over him, the man rose, restored to life.

Maurus commanded him, if he wished to live, never to enter that place. He commanded this out of humility, lest by such a deed he should appear to seek the applause and favors of men or to be delighted by them.

Therefore, in the eighth year after their arrival at that place, the monastery was completed in all its construction and dedicated by the bishops of the province.

Florus, not forgetful of his promise, went to King Theoderic and sought permission from him to receive the regular habit, so that he might be able to redeem by fasts, prayers, and other pious works the many sins which he had contracted in the world.

The king could not deny this permission, although he was greatly saddened over it because Florus was being separated from him, for he bore a special affection toward him.

When the king asked him about the life and miracles of Saint Maurus which were being reported, Florus narrated everything in order.

King Theoderic then went with his retinue and Florus to the monastery. Visiting blessed Maurus, the king prostrated himself at his feet, beseeching with tears that he pour forth frequent prayers to the Lord for him, and that among the brothers, who were now forty, he might have both the king as one and his son Theobald. He commanded his son always to be a helper and defender of the congregation of the said monastery.

Going through each of the monastery's offices, the king questioned Maurus about his companions. He bestowed upon him a royal estate called Boscus, with its revenues and villages, and also granted many ornaments in gold, silver, and gems to their church.

He confirmed every donation which Florus had made to the monastery by documents drawn up and sealed with the royal ring.

At last Florus, before the altar in the presence of the king, his leading men, and blessed Maurus, laid aside the belt of military service and received the habit of religion. First blessed Maurus, then the king, and afterward those of the leading men who wished to do so cut the hair of his head. The king himself was unable to contain his pious tears.

When these things had been completed, the blessed man led the king to see the guesthouse. There blessed Maurus, prostrate before the king, earnestly entreated on behalf of everyone that the king with his retinue receive the meal prepared there. When the king refused, one of his wisest counselors persuaded him to accept it, and he did so.

When the meal had been completed and the king was about to depart, he caused the aforesaid Florus, whom he loved greatly, to be called to him and said to him with tears: "We give thanks to God for your conversion. But you must take earnest care that, just as you conducted yourself vigorously in the secular habit, so also in this most holy religious life which you have sought you strive to please God without reproach."

On the following day, however, after the king's departure, Maurus went to inspect and receive the royal estate conferred upon him by the king, and in that villa he healed a paralytic who was presented to him.

When he had returned to the monastery, carefully examining, after the manner of his master, the character and life of each of those dwelling with him, proclaiming to them publicly and privately the word of life, and uncovering the snares of the ancient enemy, he exhorted them daily to advance toward better things.

Nobles also began to come to him to serve God. Others offered their sons. Hence it came about that, in the twenty-sixth year of its foundation, a congregation of one hundred and forty brothers had been united there.

This number was fixed by the blessed man, both by his authority and with the consent of the congregation, and it was established that thereafter no one should dare either to exceed or to diminish this number.

The aforesaid Florus, however, after he had lived religiously for twelve years in the said monastery, rested in the Lord, his son Bertulfus, a monk, surviving him.

When King Theoderic had migrated from this world, his son Theobald succeeded to his kingdom. He loved both blessed Maurus and his monastery very greatly, sometimes visited it, and also gave it two villas.

When he had shortly afterward been taken from their midst, King Lothair succeeded him. Having heard the fame of the holiness of the man of God, he too loved him greatly and sometimes made use of his most wise counsels.

One day, when the archdeacon of Anjou came with many persons to visit him, after holy conversations Maurus invited him to a collation. There was in that place only a small vessel of wine and one loaf among those brought before the holy man. At his prayer God so multiplied them that seventy men drank from it three times, and the vessel was still full.

From that time blessed Maurus did not readily go out of the monastery. Having appointed provosts and other administrators, he gave himself to God alone, applying himself to prayer and reading.

When he now saw that the end of his life was drawing near, according to the prediction of blessed Father Benedict, he chose for himself a more secluded life in a little house built beside the oratory of blessed Martin.

Because the flock of that congregation could not be without a ruler, he treated with the brothers of the congregation concerning the appointment of an abbot. When they all entrusted the decision of this matter to him, the holy father designated as abbot Bertulfus, formerly the son of Florus, as most noble in birth but still more perfect in conduct in every form of religious life. They all assented to this choice.

When he had completed two and a half years in this austerity, one night, as he wished according to his custom to enter the church of blessed Martin to pray, the great devil, surrounded by a throng of attendants, barred him from the entrance to the basilica, saying: “Ah, Maurus, why do you hope to drive us from our own seats? Now, by seeing and experiencing it, you will endure the devastation of our assault. For, raging as I please, I shall now triumph over your people by inflicting the slaughter of various deaths, so that scarcely any will appear to remain from so great an assembled multitude.”

When the saint answered, “May the Lord rebuke you, Satan, because you are a liar and the father of lies,” he vanished like smoke, making an exceedingly great crash, so that it seemed to the man of God that the whole monastery had collapsed. The brothers were awakened by that sound and struck with fear.

Meanwhile blessed Maurus, grieving with excessive affliction over the things which he had heard, entered the oratory and entreated the Lord that those things which the malignant spirit had told him might be revealed more certainly.

An angel appeared to him, clothed in white, and said to him: “Why, soul most beloved by God, are you afflicted with grief over those things which have been ordained to be done by God? For although the devil is the head of every lie, nevertheless by conjecturing from those things which he frequently experiences he foreknows many things.

“But know this also: the devil disclosed what he revealed to you, not by his own will, but by God’s command. For the greater part of this monastery will within a short time be gathered to the Lord, as it has been appointed by him. But the devil will triumph over none of them, as he lied. When you have sent before you to God all those who will die in this manner, you will follow them, more blessed.”

When morning had come, the holy man expounded the revelation to the entire assembled congregation, exhorting them to prepare themselves for the time when they should be called away by God. At his words they all prepared themselves, awaiting with joy the final hour of their life.

Thereafter it came about that within five months one hundred and sixteen died in that monastery, and no more than twenty-four monks remained.

When that number had been taken from this world, a violent pain in the side assailed blessed Maurus. As his illness grew worse, stretched upon haircloth before the altar of blessed Martin and fortified by the life-giving sacraments, he happily flew to the Lord and was buried there.

Bertulfus, whom he had appointed abbot, survived him by two years. Those who remained, however, endured many persecutions.

Blessed Maurus was twelve years old when he received the habit from blessed Benedict. He lived with him for twenty years. Afterward, having been sent into Francia, he lived for forty years in the monastery constructed by him in the territory of Anjou.

Hence, when the aforesaid numbers are added together, he died in the seventy-second year of his life, as blessed Benedict had foretold, and in the year 576 from the Incarnation of the Lord.

Placidus was a disciple of Saint Benedict, crowned with martyrdom in Sicily at the port of the city of Messina. Gordianus wrote his history and martyrdom together with that of several others.

Therefore, at the time when Theoderic reigned in Italy in elder Rome, Justin and Justinian held the scepters of the empire in new Rome, and Popes John I and Felix sat in the apostolic see, Tertullius was a most noble and distinguished man. In both courts of the Roman Empire, second to none after the Augusti, most illustrious and exceedingly rich, he held the reins of the patriciate in elder Rome.

Deriving the line of his descent from the blood of the Anicii, he flourished in such wisdom and prudence that he was called Father of the Fatherland by the emperor and the entire Roman Empire.

He took a wife from a family deriving from the stock of the Octavii, a woman most beautiful in body and in conduct, and from her he received good fruits from a good tree. For he had Placidus as his first son, Eutychius as his second, and Victorinus as his third. When she had borne a girl in the fourth place, because she descended from the stock of the Octavii and the Flavii, they named her Flavia.

When she had borne these children with the said patrician Tertullius, she taught them to honor and follow the way of the Lord, patience, humility, sobriety, chastity, and the other virtues.

Although the spirit of the patrician himself was entangled in imperial affairs, he was nevertheless always intent upon churches and monasteries, always seeking the things that are God's.

At that time, when blessed Benedict shone like the morning star among the stars at Subiaco, many began to flow together to him and, beneath the Lord's sweet yoke, to serve Christ in the religious life under his discipline.

While the fame of so great a father flew throughout the Roman Empire and the report, filling the city also, reached the ears of Tertullius the patrician, he was drawn by devotion toward so great a man and resolved to visit blessed Benedict with many nobles.

Approaching the monastery there, as soon as he saw the holy man of God coming to meet him, he descended from his horse, fell upon his knees before him, and with tears begged that pardon for his transgressions be obtained from the Lord on his behalf.

The man of God raised him from the ground, received him most humanely, and instructed him sufficiently concerning the things pertaining to salvation.

After familiar conversations, Tertullius the patrician, greatly delighted by the teaching of the most blessed man, on that day offered and entrusted to God and to the same Father Benedict his seven-year-old son Placidus, to be reared and instructed according to the regular norm of his institution. Having received a blessing, he returned to the city.

Therefore Placidus, although a boy in age, nevertheless bearing the heart of an old man, began to grow under the regular teaching of the most blessed father and in all things to observe a holy life so pleasing to God.

When the man of God saw him ascend from virtue to virtue toward the heights, he loved him uniquely as his own son.

While Placidus was still a boy, he was sent to draw water from the lake. Having fallen into it, he had already been carried by the wave the distance of a bowshot from the land when his companion Maurus, at the command of Father Benedict, who saw this in spirit, drew him out of the water and brought him unharmed back to land, as was made clear above.

When the glorious father ascended Monte Cassino to construct the monastery, he brought with him Maurus and Placidus, now grown and adorned in character.

When it reached the ears of Tertullius that a monastery was being constructed upon his possession of Monte Cassino, he rejoiced greatly. One day, taking with him the most noble men of the city of Rome—namely Boethius, Symmachus, Vitalianus, Gordianus, and Equitius—with a suitable mounted retinue, they set out for Monte Cassino, to the place where the monastery had been begun, which had come to him from his paternal inheritance.

When this had been announced to the blessed man, he met them with Maurus and Placidus before the monastery's gate, raised Tertullius and his companions prostrate upon the ground, and led them into the church.

Having been kindly received with a holy kiss, Tertullius the patrician asked Father Benedict that both he and the other brothers deign to receive him into their fellowship.

When the father had done this, Tertullius thereupon offered to God and to the same Father Benedict the whole of Monte Cassino in its entirety, together with all its appurtenances. Severing it from his own right, he delivered it to the same father to be possessed in perpetuity.

Summoning to himself the primiscrinius of the commonwealth, he caused a testament or instrument to be drawn up according to the Roman custom.

In the same manner he conferred upon the same father the castles, villas, and possessions which belonged to him by hereditary right, together with all their appurtenances, describing their boundaries.

He also granted entirely to Father Benedict the house in the city of Rome on the Caelian Hill in which Placidus had been born, afterward dedicated in the name of blessed Erasmus.

On that same day he offered to God and to his saints one half of Lake Lucrine; the island Capraria, situated in Neapolitan territory; the ports of Traiectum and Vulturnum; and the whole fishery of Lesina with its mouth.

Likewise he granted in the same manner the three islands of Diomedes, and also Parascia, which he possessed in Apulia, at the request of his son, where many possessions and villas are contained.

In the territory of Capua, in the territory of Cassino, in Abruzzo, in Liguria, and in Salo Gadditano, he conferred upon blessed Benedict and his brothers the many possessions and goods which he held there, to be possessed in perpetuity. He also gave them the very many estates which Tertullius possessed in Sicily.

Section IV

At the same time, the procurators of the estates in Sicily which Tertullius the patrician had granted to Benedict and his monks sent messengers to Monte Cassino to the blessed father, because the estates were being devastated by certain persons to such a degree that they could scarcely be defended by the procurators and administrators, nor could the rent due be exacted from their possessors.

When the blessed father had heard these things, he summoned the entire congregation and set forth in order what had been reported to him from Sicily.

Finally, by the counsel of the Cassinese congregation, judging Placidus, his most holy disciple, most suitable for sustaining so great a labor, since he had now become a man—and especially for this reason, that no one could defend and guard those same possessions as he could, since he was the son of so great a man and the goods had belonged to him—he chose, appointed, and sent him for the work, saying:

“To undertake this labor, most beloved, gird your loins like a man. Christ, the King of all, who became obedient unto death for us, now gives it to you through me. Nor let the harshness of the long journey disturb you.

“Remember that apostolic saying: ‘The sufferings of this time are not worthy to be compared with the future glory which shall be revealed in us.’ May Christ Jesus always be with you and lead you to fellowship in eternal life.”

He gave Gordianus and Donatus to him as fellow soldiers, kissed him, blessed him, and permitted him to depart from him.

Undertaking the journey, they first came to the city of Capua, where he was kindly received by blessed Germanus, then its bishop.

The primicerius of that city, named Zoffus, was suffering from a most grievous infirmity of the head. Approaching Placidus, he earnestly asked that, after prayer had been made, he touch his head, because he hoped thereby to obtain health.

Terrified by these words, Placidus answered: “Depart, because this is not mine, but belongs to our most blessed Father Benedict and to those who have pleased the Most High God. I am a sinner in need of the intercessions of most perfect men.”

But blessed Germanus the bishop, with his clergy, asked him to satisfy the faith of the man requesting this. Therefore Placidus, judging that the supplication of so great a father ought not to be contemned, raised his eyes to heaven, prayed for the man, and obtained complete health for him. In the same city he also gave light to a blind man.

Departing thence and continuing his journey, near another city he perfectly restored to health the paralytic son of a certain widow, who was already laboring at the point of death.

By his prayers he freed a certain lame and mute man presented to him from lameness and muteness. He made a certain sufferer from quartan fever healthy. After prayer had been offered, he healed a man afflicted with gout entirely by the sign of the cross.

He restored a certain deaf, blind, and mute man to soundness, so that the mute man spoke, the blind man saw, and the deaf man heard. By his prayers he freed another man who was possessed by demons and cruelly tormented.

A dropsical man was so greatly swollen in body that the physicians despaired of his life. When they had presented him before Placidus, the man of God, his garments were removed before him and he was fortified with the sacred sign of the cross. The enclosed fluid, neither remaining within nor issuing outward through any passages of the body, was dried up by divine power.

Afterward, when he approached the Caudine Forks, he caused a blind man who met him and asked for mercy to see heaven, and he did other things. He drove violent fevers from a certain man, so that he rose joyful and sound from his bed. He gave strength to a man who had a withered hand, so that he was able to perform every work with it.

In the city of Benevento, afterward in the city of Venusia, and in the region of Calabria, he performed many miracles.

Section V

At length, boarding a ship and crossing the strait of Messina, he came to a city of Sicily.

When he had disembarked upon the land, he sent his servant Gordianus to the city, commanding him to summon to him Messalinus, a Roman citizen and very close friend of his father Tertullius. This man was exceedingly rich and devout.

When Messalinus came to the harbor and saw Placidus, whose countenance was very like his father's, he recognized him and, having heard the fame of his holiness, fell at his feet.

Placidus raised him from the ground, kissed him, embraced him, and blessed him.

The man of God explained the reason for which Father Benedict had sent him there. Receiving all these things joyfully, Messalinus led him into his house and treated him and his companions with all humility and honor.

At Placidus's request, Messalinus also made his arrival known to all the friends and acquaintances of his father Tertullius. He likewise ordered the procurators whom his father had placed over those estates to be summoned to him, so that they might acknowledge that they possessed and held from his father as tenants those goods which his father had bestowed upon the monastery. This was done without anyone contradicting it.

But Placidus said to Messalinus: "It is not fitting for a monk to have his dwelling in the houses of laymen, because it is contrary to our order. Therefore, if it does not displease you, let us go and provide a place among my father's possessions in which we may construct a monastery. For I have not determined to lay a foundation upon that of another."

Coming with him, with his assent, to the seaport, he found a place suitable for constructing a monastery. With the staff which he carried in his hand he marked out the place in which the oratory of blessed John the Baptist, their dwelling house, and all the workshops of the monastery could be constructed.

Collecting much money from the revenues of the estates and the dues of the ports, they brought the work to completion within a short time.

Blessed Placidus strove in every way to fulfill the things which he had learned from his master, chastising his body with abstinences and vigils and reducing it to servitude, lest his servant, delicately nourished, should grow insolent against the Lord.

He frequently applied himself to prayer and reading. Constant in meditations, he poured forth copious tears from a spirit of compunction.

At every time he led a Lenten life and never drank wine. During Lent, however, he was content with bread and water only on the Lord's Day, Tuesday, and Thursday, taking absolutely nothing on the other days.

He always wore haircloth against his flesh. When wearied by prayer or genuflection, he took sleep sitting rather than lying down.

No one ever saw him disturbed in any action, but always modest, humble, grave, meek, kind, and pious.

He never spoke to anyone unless necessity compelled it or reasonable usefulness in providing for the monastery and others required it.

His discourse to men was scarcely anything other than that they should despise the luxuries of this world, avoid the burdens of vices, and imitate Christ poor and crucified.

Although he increased daily in the perfection of every virtue, he did not esteem himself equal to others, but the servant of all and inferior to them.

Nothing was more pleasing to his mind than not to prefer the powerful to the poor. He bore such compassion toward the needy and furnished them such assistance that he also effectively exhorted the rich to distribute to them the things conferred upon themselves by God.

When the monastery had been constructed and completed within four years, in a short time thirty brothers, dedicated to the service of God, were gathered to him. The church and the monastery were solemnly dedicated by the bishop of Messina.

Nor were miracles lacking which, even if men had been silent, would themselves have made manifest far and wide the holiness of the man of God.

For in Sicily, and especially in the city of Messina, many blind men were given light; demons were driven from possessed bodies; those having withered limbs were restored to health; paralytics were cured; lepers were cleansed; and a straight gait was restored to the lame.

To the mentally deranged or foolish the complete use of reason was restored, something which is read to have been accomplished rarely by saints.

Very many persons occupied by various illnesses were freed by the power of his prayer, so that throughout Sicily, Africa, and Tuscany the fame of his holiness and his power in performing miracles were spread abroad.

Section VI

Meanwhile, when these things also were being proclaimed in the city of Rome, Placidus's brothers, namely Eutychius and Victorinus, together with their sister Flavia, led by a desire to see Placidus and inflamed beyond measure with love for him, departed from the city upon the counsel of their parents and boarded a ship.

Giving their sails to the winds, they sailed to Sicily. Putting in at the port of the city of Messina, they disembarked upon the land and set out for the monastery of Saint John, over which blessed Placidus presided.

When they first saw him, they did not recognize him. For they had not seen him since he had been offered by his father to Benedict the abbot. After so long a period he had become a man, had been clothed in the monastic habit, and, his body almost wasted away by excessive abstinence and vigils, had changed his appearance.

But when he had been made known to them, he received them with great joy.

While they remained with Placidus their brother for several days, at that time among the pagans who inhabited Spain there was a most impious king named Abdala, a persecutor and enemy of Christ, who administered the kingdom in Spain. He sought to eradicate entirely from the land the worship of the Christian religion and to increase the worship of Molachrepham.

Although he inflicted many evils upon the faithful, of whom he dispatched very many to heaven by martyrdom, he nevertheless did not prevail, but the enemy was at last brought to nothing.

He therefore assembled an expedition of one hundred ships and, appointing over them a certain most cruel commander named Mamucha, directed it against the Roman Empire. He commanded him to burn cities and castles with fire, destroy churches, compel Christians to worship the demon Molachrepham, and kill with diverse torments those who did not consent.

When the aforesaid men had therefore entered Sicily with sixteen thousand eight hundred men, Victorinus, Eutychius, and Flavia could not safely depart from Messina.

At length the enemies of God reached that city and approached the monastery of Placidus. Breaking down the doors at night, they ordered everyone found there to be bound in chains.

Of the companions of Placidus who had come with him from Monte Cassino, Donatus, who was now an old man, was immediately beheaded by them. Gordianus, however, being a young man, fled through a rear door of the house and escaped.

Therefore Saint Placidus, with his brothers Eutychius and Victorinus, his sister Flavia, and thirty monks, bound with chains, were presented before Mamucha.

When the tyrant, upon questioning Placidus concerning his name, heard him say that he was a Christian, the impious commander said: "Deny Christ, speak insults against him, and according to the rite of our King Abdala adore our god, and I shall release you."

Placidus answered him: "I shall never deny the Lord Jesus Christ, and I desire to die for his name."

Then the wicked commander said to Eutychius, Victorinus, Flavia, and the thirty monks: "What do you say? Will you obey the commands of our King Abdala, so that, abandoning Christ, you may adore our god?"

The saints answered: "Accomplish what is fixed in your mind. There is one mind among us, one faith, one order of living. Therefore consider what you heard from the first to have been said by all. For the love of Christ we are prepared to lay down our life."

At these words the commander, inflamed with fury, ordered them all to be stripped and beaten most severely with clubs, saying, "Let words yield to blows."

But the saints of God rejoiced because they were accounted worthy to be beaten for the name of Jesus.

When the martyrs said, "You will be able to change us neither by your flatteries nor by the harshness of your threats," the commander, raging again, caused them to be stripped and most cruelly tortured in all their members.

When the judge could not bend Flavia, a most beautiful virgin and Placidus's sister, he also ordered her to be stripped and suspended with her head downward.

The tyrant said to her: "Most foolish of women, are you not ashamed amid the disgrace of your nakedness?"

The virgin answered him: "There is one Creator of male and female. For this reason no injury will be ascribed to me because of my sex, on account of the fact that I am naked. Nor am I prepared to endure only the nakedness of my body, but also the sword and fire for the sake of him who willed for my sake both to be stripped and to be scourged and crucified."

Afterward he ordered her to be scourged most sharply and also her forehead, breasts, and arms to be torn apart.

Again, when he saw them all fixed in the faith of Christ, he commanded that they all be beaten with clubs until they should fail beneath the hands of the torturers.

When the ministers of crime had done this for a long time, they left them, judging them to be dead. But the Lord sent his angel, who immediately healed them of every wound.

When they did not cease to invoke the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, the commander, drunk with fury, caused Placidus's mouth to be battered with a stone and then his tongue to be cut out by the roots.

Nevertheless, with his tongue cut out, he cried: "Blessed is the name of our Lord Jesus Christ and his supreme power."

When the tyrant delivered Flavia his sister into the hands of procurers to be violated, the virgin made prayer and remained untouched. For whoever wished to approach her immediately had his limbs become rigid and withered and was afflicted with great pain.

Thereafter the aforesaid Mamucha, son of Satan, turned himself to other cruelties. For he caused the saints of God to be bound tightly, anchors to be placed upon their legs, and great stones to be placed upon the anchors, so that by such torment they might either deny Christ or be consumed. But they remained unharmed.

At last the most wicked commander pronounced sentence that they should be punished by beheading and that their unburied bodies should remain to be devoured by wolves and birds.

Thus the saints of God obtained the palm of martyrdom. They suffered on the third day before the Nones of October at the port of Messina in Sicily. The monastery constructed by them was utterly overthrown by the aforesaid Saracens.

When these things had been accomplished, Mamucha their commander, after the storm of the sea had subsided, commanded them all to board the ships in order to go to the royal court. Boarding, they began to traverse the high seas.

When they were in the midst of the sea, a violent tempest arose, so that they could proceed neither forward nor backward. Their one hundred ships were submerged, and all those Saracens descended into the depth of the sea, drowned by the waters.

The bodies of the saints Placidus, Eutychius, Victorinus, and Flavia their sister, together with the thirty monks, were found unharmed, fragrant with a wondrous odor, and were honorably buried.

The most blessed Placidus suffered with his companions in the year of the Lord 541. He was crowned with martyrdom in the twenty-sixth year of his age. Many miracles were afterward performed at his tomb.

For he was seven years old when he was offered to blessed Benedict, with whom he lived as a monk under his teaching for fourteen years in the monastery at Subiaco and afterward in the Cassinese monastery. Sent into Sicily, he remained for four years, and afterward, as has been said, he was beheaded for the faith of Christ by Mamucha, commander of the Saracens, in the thirteenth year of Justinian's empire.

Title XV

Chapter XV

Saint Romuald is held to have been famous and distinguished in the year of the Lord 1000. He died around the year of the Lord 1030.

He was the founder and institutor of the Order of the Camaldolese, which was extended and enlarged in many monasteries in the regions of Tuscany and Lombardy. Their principal monastery is in the diocese of Arezzo and the dominion of the Florentines.

The most eloquent man Peter Damian, bishop and cardinal, described his life in lucid discourse, which, however, we shall abbreviate. At the beginning, in place of his prologue, he speaks thus:

“Against you, unclean world, we complain. You have an intolerable crowd of fools who are wise, eloquent to you but mute to God, who through vain eloquence and empty philosophy know how arrogantly to exalt themselves upon the horns of pride.

“You have no one who wishes, by careful annotations, to commit to the memory of posterity something profitable for the edification of his neighbors.

“You have, I say, those who in the tribunals of secular judges, as soldiers of affairs, are able to plead the quarrels of causes with continual declamations. You have no one who can describe in the holy Church the virtues or illustrious deeds of even one of the saints.

“For they are wise that they may do evil, but they have not known how to do good.

“Behold, almost three lustra have now passed since blessed Romuald, having laid aside the burden of the flesh, migrated to the ethereal kingdoms, and no one among wise men of this kind has yet arisen who might set out, at least briefly and in historical order, some of the many praises of his marvelous life and, satisfying the devotion of the faithful, write them down to be recited for the common benefit of the Church.

“For us, however, sitting in the narrow corner of a little cell, it would have been more useful, as we had resolved, continually to recall our own sins before the eyes of the mind than to weave the history of another’s virtue.

“But since throughout the year, and especially on his feast, a multitude of the faithful comes from distant regions to his tomb, beholds the miracles divinely performed through him, and eagerly seeks to hear the history of his life, we fear, not without reason, that his most celebrated fame, which is still uttered by the mouth of the whole people, may, as the course of time slips away, be entirely erased from the memory of men.

“Therefore, struck by this fear, overcome by the prayers of many brothers and by brotherly charity, I shall undertake, with God as author, to describe what I learned concerning the aforesaid venerable man from his excellent disciples.

“But I desire my reader to know this one thing first: I shall not collect in this little description the many miracles performed through him, but rather I shall endeavor to relate the order of his manner of life, which pertains in every way to edification.

“For the blessed man guarded himself beneath so great a covering of humility from the wind of vainglory that, by the most studious concealment, he suppressed whatever could in any way make him appear marvelous to men.

“Nevertheless, even if he had not performed those miracles while leading a marvelous life, he would not have been worthy of less veneration. For neither is the Lord’s forerunner read to have performed miracles, yet Truth itself bears witness that no one greater than he arose among those born of women.

“Some indeed think that they are showing honor if, in extolling the virtues of the saints, they invent a lie. Such persons, plainly ignorant that God does not need our lie, abandon the truth, which he himself is, and think that they can please him with a fiction of falsehood.

“For those who could easily have related the material offered to them without passing beyond the simple truth sweat in vain labor in composing things which they do not know.”

Therefore Romuald, that we may undertake his history, was a native of the city of Ravenna, born from a most illustrious lineage of dukes.

When he had reached adolescence, he began to be inclined toward the sin of the flesh, with which vice that age is accustomed to attack men, especially the rich, more violently.

Nevertheless, devout to God in mind, he frequently proposed some great thing against himself. For even if he sometimes devoted himself to the pursuit of hunting, wherever he could find a pleasant place through the forests, his spirit was immediately kindled toward desire for the hermitage.

He had a father named Sergius, exceedingly intent upon the world. When Sergius was exercising hostilities against a relative of his because of enmities which had arisen over the possession of a meadow, he saw his son Romuald grow hesitant in the conflict and inwardly dread the crime of fratricide. He caused it to be threatened that he would disinherit him if he persisted longer in that purpose, namely, in not persecuting the enemy.

At length each party of the enemies broke forth into the substance of the quarrel. They took up arms and joined a civil battle. While they fought hand to hand on both sides, the enemy was killed by the hand of Sergius.

Although Romuald had inflicted no wound upon the slain man, nevertheless, because he had been present, he accepted penance for so great a guilt. He immediately made ready to remain in mourning for forty days, according to the custom of murderers, at the monastery of blessed Apollinaris at Classe.

There, continually afflicting himself with strict penance, he was frequently admonished by a certain lay brother dwelling there to assume the religious habit.

One day that lay brother promised that he would show blessed Apollinaris to him in bodily form. Romuald bound himself to abandon the world if he did this.

Therefore, while they both passed the night in prayer in the church for this matter, around the cockcrow of the night blessed Apollinaris, as the two of them watched, visibly came out from beneath an altar which is seen to have been constructed in the middle of the church in honor of the Blessed Virgin.

Immediately a marvelous splendor like that of the sun filled the whole church. Then the blessed martyr, marvelously adorned in priestly vestments and carrying a golden thurible in his hand, incensed all the altars of the church. He immediately returned whence he had come, and the splendor ceased.

When the lay brother demanded that Romuald fulfill his promise, Romuald first asked that this be done again. In the same manner they saw it openly a second time.

At length Romuald devoutly sought the habit of holy religion from the monks. When they refused, fearing the savagery of his father and the troubles he would cause, he went to the archbishop of the city. From him he received the habit, and the archbishop commanded him to be numbered among the company of those monks.

But when Romuald saw that some there, walking upon the broad way, lived too laxly, and that he was not permitted to seize the arduous path of perfection for himself, he began to apply himself vehemently to rebuking their vices.

They, however, regarded the words of a younger man and a novice as nothing. At length, unable to bear this reproach, they began to deliberate concerning his death.

They determined that, because he rose by night earlier than the others and hurried to the church, they would cast him down headfirst as he passed through a certain raised gallery sufficiently elevated above the ground. When he learned this from one of those conscious of the conspiracy, he avoided the danger.

Romuald, panting after the more perfect heights of the religious life, heard the fame of a certain holy hermit named Marinus who lived in the region of the Venetians. Having most easily obtained consent from the abbot and monks, because he was burdensome to them even to behold, he departed from there, went to that venerable man, and subjected himself to his discipline.

This Marinus was a man of simple spirit and most sincere purity, taught by no master in the eremitical way of life. He had this manner of living: throughout the continuous course of the year, on three weekdays he ate half a morsel of bread and a handful of beans; on three other days he received wine and cooked food with discreet sobriety.

He sang the whole Psalter each day. Frequently leaving his cell with his disciples, he walked here and there through the breadth of the hermitage while singing psalms, now chanting twenty psalms beneath one tree, and now thirty beneath another.

Romuald, however, because he had left the world an unlettered man, could scarcely make out syllable by syllable the written signs of the verses when the Psalter lay open. This excessive fixing of his eyes gave him an intolerable occasion of listlessness.

Marinus, holding a rod in his right hand and sitting opposite Romuald, very frequently struck the left side of his head.

After many blows Romuald, compelled by grave necessity, humbly said: “Master, if it pleases you, from now on strike me upon the right temple, because I am already losing completely the hearing of my left ear.”

Then Marinus, admiring his great patience, moderated the discipline of his indiscreet severity.

Concerning the austerity of his life and his temptations.

Romuald thereafter advanced from virtue to virtue with marvelous speed. Surpassing all the brothers, he was brought into such favor with them all that whatever he decided among the brothers, whether concerning spiritual or bodily matters, all willingly allowed his judgment to prevail in every way, and even Marinus himself acquiesced.

For one continuous year he had nothing else as food, but lived each day solely upon one handful of boiled chickpeas.

For three years he and a certain John lived by the labor of their hands, breaking the earth with hoes and sowing wheat. While they practiced agriculture, they plainly doubled the burden of their fast.

Nevertheless, the devil attacked Romuald with these and various assaults of temptations, especially at the beginning of his conversion.

At one time he brought before him what and how much so vigorous a man could have acquired in the world. At another, he recalled how much inheritance Romuald had left to ungrateful relatives. At another, he accused the things which he was doing as too small and of no merit. At another, inspiring horror of so great a labor, he promised him a long life.

Oh, how often, striking his little cell when Romuald had scarcely yet fallen asleep, he awakened him and caused him to spend the whole night in vigil as though the dawn were already imminent.

For almost five continuous years the devil lay upon his feet and legs at night and, lest he easily turn himself this way or that, weighed him down under the appearance of a fantastical weight.

Who can explain how many roaring beasts of the vices he endured, and how frequently he drove away present wicked spirits with most severe rebukes?

It happened that, while he was reading a book concerning the lives of the fathers, he came upon the passage in which it is related that certain brothers, fasting individually throughout the entire week, came together on the Sabbath day. On that day and on the Lord’s Day they interrupted the rigor of the fast and lived more leniently.

Romuald immediately adopted this order of life and remained in it with continual austerity for almost fifteen years or more.

A certain Peter, who had been duke of Dalmatia, had acquired that duchy through a certain betrayal and through the occasion of the death of a certain lord. Therefore, to do penance for so great a crime, he had abandoned the world upon Romuald’s counsel and lived the eremitical life with Romuald, Marinus, and others.

Because he had been accustomed to be reared amid many delicacies in the world, he was sinking beneath the burden of so strict a fast. Hence he humbly prostrated himself at the feet of blessed Romuald and said with shame: “Father, because I have a large body, I am not able to sustain myself upon this half of a dry biscuit.”

Romuald, having compassion upon his frailty, added a quarter to the former measure. Thus he extended the hand of mercy to the failing brother, lest he perish.

To fast altogether is to pass the day without any food. Although Romuald himself did this very frequently, he wholly forbade it to others.

For he said: “This is supremely fitting for one tending toward perfection: that he eat every day and always hunger, so that through custom the flesh may make light that which appears burdensome to novices at the beginning of conversion.”

He counseled that vigils should be performed moderately and with great discretion, lest it perhaps happen to someone that, when the night offices had been completed, he yield to sleep.

Indeed, the holy man held this sleep in such hatred that if anyone confessed to him that he had fallen asleep after the vigil of twelve psalms, especially near daybreak, he could by no means celebrate the solemnities of Mass that day with Romuald’s permission.

He also said that it was better, if possible, to sing one psalm from the heart and with compunction than to run through a hundred with the mind engaged in wandering discourse. But where the intention has been raised to God, a thought coming against the will is not greatly to be feared.

When he was in the regions of Gaul, he had a certain familiar husbandman who sometimes charitably rendered services to him.

It happened that a certain proud count sent his parasites to take away a cow which that rustic possessed and caused meats from the slaughtered cow to be prepared for himself to eat. Concerning this matter that rustic made a complaint before Romuald.

Romuald sent word to the count that he should cause his animal to be restored to the rustic. The count, however, contemned this.

At dinner, while he put into his mouth a morsel from the cooked flesh of the calf prepared for him, the morsel so adhered to his throat that he was able neither to bring it out nor to swallow it, but was suffocated among the hands of his people.

Meanwhile Sergius, the father of blessed Romuald, became a monk. But a little afterward, persuaded by the devil and repenting of the conversion he had made, he attempted to return to Egypt.

The monks of the monastery of the village of Saint Severus, which is situated not far from the city of Ravenna, where Sergius dwelt in body but not in heart, immediately took care to inform blessed Romuald of this through a messenger.

Struck by the baleful report, Romuald determined that it was necessary for him to come as quickly as possible to the aid of his perishing father. Romuald then dwelt in the regions of Gaul with Abbot Guarinus and John Grandenicus.

When the inhabitants of that region, who had conceived great devotion toward him, heard that Romuald intended to depart, they were disturbed by excessive grief.

Considering among themselves how they might restrain him from this intention, at last it seemed good to them that, sending killers, they should slay him in pious devotion, so that, because they could not retain him alive, they might at least possess his lifeless corpse as a protection for their land.

When these things became known to him, Romuald shaved his head on every side. When the executors of this deed were already approaching his cell, at nearly the first light of dawn he began to eat as though out of greed.

Seeing this, they believed it to be madness and, judging that his mind had been injured, disdained to injure his body.

Thus the prudent spiritual David, by a madness foolish in carnal appearance, overcame the craftiness of those carnally wise.

Therefore, having been permitted to use his freedom, supported by no horse but carrying only a staff in his hand, he came with bare feet from the innermost borders of Gaul to Ravenna.

There, finding his father wishing to return to the world, he tightly bound his feet in the stocks and subdued his body with pious severity until, with God healing him, he brought his mind to the state of salvation.

Afterward Sergius served God in the monastery with great devotion and, after a little time, fell asleep in the Lord.

Marinus, who for some time had been Romuald's master, went toward Apulia a little afterward. Subsequently dwelling there in solitude, he was killed by Hagarenes and brigands.

Romuald established a cell in the marsh of Classe and dwelt in a place called Peter's Bridge, neither fearing bodily sickness nor shrinking from nausea at the stench.

But lest, on the occasion of weakness, he relax even slightly from the rigor of abstinence, he migrated to the estate of Classe, where the church of blessed Martin stands.

One day, while he was singing Compline there, behold, malignant spirits suddenly entered his cell, immediately cast him to the ground, afflicted him with a savage beating, and inflicted most severe blows upon his limbs, which were exhausted by long fasting.

At length, amid the blows of that beating, visited by a regard of divine grace, he broke forth into this cry: "Dear Jesus, beloved Jesus, why have you forsaken me? Have you altogether delivered me into the hands of my enemies?"

At these words all those malignant spirits were driven away, and he immediately rose from the ground sound and strong.

Frequently, while he sat in his cell, wicked spirits seemed to stand beside him like most hideous ravens or vultures. Frequently they showed themselves in the forms of Ethiopians and in the shapes of diverse animals.

The illustrious champion of Christ taunted them, saying: "Behold, I am prepared. If there is any strength in you, show it. Have you now altogether failed?" At these words they were immediately put to flight.

Therefore the devil, seeing that he could not prevail by himself against the servant of God, turned to cunning devices. Wherever the holy man went, he stirred up the spirits of his disciples against him in malice, so that, because the devil could not restrain him from the impetus of his kindled fervor, he might at least hinder him from care for the salvation of others.

At one time he passed to a place called Balneum, situated in the territory of Saxena. Remaining there, he constructed a monastery in honor of the Archangel Michael.

Marquis Hugh sent him a certain sum of money to distribute. But when Romuald heard that the monastery of Palatiolus had been consumed by fire, he assigned part of that money to its repair.

When this became known, the monks of Saint Michael were moved against him with bestial fury, both because he was opposed to their depraved conduct and because he did not spend upon them all the things brought to them, but bestowed some upon others.

Therefore, having formed a conspiracy, they entered his cell unanimously with clubs and poles, afflicted him with blows, dishonored him, and expelled him from those territories.

But divine vengeance did not abandon them. For while they insulted him, rejoiced together over the expulsion of the servant of God, and prepared a banquet, one of them, who was the senior, went to the river for a certain reason and was drowned there.

A building collapsed upon others under the mass of snow then descending. Some were crushed in the head, some in the legs, and some in diverse members, and they were sharply punished.

At another time he stayed in another region called Percum, twelve miles distant from Ravenna. A great fire invaded the cell in which he lived with one companion, but by the power of prayer he extinguished the crackling globes of fire.

At the same time, when the younger Emperor Otto intended to regulate the abbey at Classe, he gave the brothers the choice that they might without hesitation elect whomever they wished. They immediately sought Romuald.

The emperor, however, doubting that the blessed man could be summoned to the royal court, wished to go to him in person and reached his cell at sunset.

Because Romuald had received a great guest in a small cell, he deigned to give him his own little bed for repose.

When morning had come, the king led him with himself to the palace and at last began with many entreaties to press him to undertake the government of the abbey.

When Romuald resisted and entirely denied assent to the king’s petition, the king in response threatened excommunication and anathema from all the bishops and the whole synod. At length, yielding to the necessity pressing upon him, Romuald was compelled to undertake the government of souls.

Therefore he governed the monks under the strict discipline of the Rule, and no one was permitted to deviate from it in any respect with impunity, neither a noble nor one educated in letters.

Indeed, fixing the eyes of his heart upon heaven so that he might obey God in all things, the holy man did not fear to displease men.

Considering this too late, those brothers first accused themselves because they had demanded that he be placed over them. Then they greatly tore him with detractions and whisperings and vexed him with the harsh stings of scandals.

Therefore Romuald, seeing both that his own perfection was in some measure diminished and that their conduct was being turned toward worse things, went promptly to the king. Although the king resisted him not slightly, Romuald, in the presence of both the king and the bishop of Ravenna, cast down the staff and left the monastery.

The king, moreover, was then besieging the city of Tivoli. For its citizens had killed Mazolinus, his renowned commander, and, taking up arms, had driven the king himself away from their walls.

Hence there is no doubt that blessed Romuald was sent by divine providence. By mediating peace, he removed the imminent danger of so many souls.

This agreement was made between them: the Tiburtines were together to demolish the walls of the city in honor of the king, give hostages, and send the killers of the commander in chains to his mother.

Although she had been cruelly offended, she was softened by the holy man’s poured-out prayers, forgave the crime, and permitted them to return unharmed to their own homes.

In the aforesaid city the most blessed man Romuald converted a certain Teuton named Tammus, who was so familiar and dear to the king that one dish often joined the two of them in a common banquet.

For Crescentius, a Roman senator, incurring the king's indignation, sought refuge upon the mountain called Saint Angelo. Because the fortification was impregnable, he confidently prepared to defend it against the besieging king.

At the king's command Tammus gave him an oath guaranteeing safety. Thus deceived, Crescentius, whom Pope Clement opposed, underwent capital sentence as though guilty of treason. Afterward the emperor took his wife as a concubine.

Therefore, because Tammus was both conscious of the fraud and bound by perjury, blessed Romuald commanded him to abandon the world. He immediately sought permission from the king and received it.

The aforesaid Tammus was very favorably disposed toward the monastic order and affected with excessive devotion toward the servants of God.

The emperor himself confessed the same crime to the holy man of God. For the sake of penance he went forth from the city of Rome with bare feet and proceeded as far as Mount Gargano to the church of Saint Michael.

Throughout Lent he remained in the monastery at Classe with a few persons adhering to him. There, intent upon fasting and psalmody, he wore haircloth against his flesh and was covered over it with gilded purple. Beneath himself, upon a mat woven from papyrus, he wore away the tender limbs of his delicately nourished body.

He promised blessed Romuald that he would abandon the empire and assume the monastic habit.

Departing thence with the aforesaid Tammus, with Boniface, who afterward became a martyr, and with other converted Teutonic and Tiburtine nobles, Romuald returned to Percum, where he had already dwelt.

Because he became infirm upon the road, he willingly rode not a horse but an ass, imitating Christ.

There many other brothers were gathered and stationed in individual cells. Romuald maintained the rigor of the eremitical way of life in himself and in others with such fervor that their life was held marvelous by all.

They performed works with their hands: some made spoons, some spun, some wove nets, and some made haircloths.

Section IV

Among the others, however, the manner of life of Boniface surpassed them. He had been a blood relative of the king, whom the king, on account of extraordinary affection, was accustomed to call his own soul.

From his earliest age he had been educated in the teachings of the liberal arts and was especially approved in the studies of musical modulation.

When he saw in the royal chapel the ancient church of the martyr Boniface, immediately, by the example of the one bearing the same name, he was called to martyrdom and said: "I also am called Boniface. Why, therefore, ought I not also to be a martyr?"

After he became a monk, he bound himself by such abstinence that he often ate only on the Lord's Days and on Thursday during the week.

Sometimes, if he saw the toothed growth of nettles and thornbushes, he threw himself upon it and rolled about.

At length, after a long life in the eremitical way, when he intended to go to preach in Sclavonia, or Russia, which was then unbelieving, he first hastened to Rome, not only on foot but also with bare feet. On the journey he was content with bread and water, while on feast days he added apples and the roots of herbs.

When he came to the gentiles, he began to preach with such constancy of fervent heart that no one any longer doubted that he demanded martyrdom.

At length he addressed the king of Russia. After many words, the king, who was a gentile, said to him: "If you wish the things which you assert to be believed to be true, let two high piles of wood be erected, separated from one another by a very small space. When fire has been placed beneath and they have burned so that both piles seem to be one fire, pass through the midst.

"If you are harmed in any part, we shall deliver you to be consumed completely by those same fires. But if, what cannot be believed, you emerge unharmed, we shall all believe in your God without difficulty."

When this covenant had pleased not only Boniface but also all the gentiles who were present, Boniface, clothed as though he were about to celebrate the solemnities of Mass, first sprinkled the fire with sanctified water and incensed it. Entering the crackling globes of flame, he passed through unharmed, so that not even the smallest hair of his head was seen to have been burned.

Then the king and the others who were present at this spectacle threw themselves in troops at his feet, tearfully sought pardon, and most urgently asked to be baptized.

So great a multitude of the nations began to flow together for baptism that the holy man Boniface went to a certain spacious lake and baptized the people in that abundance of waters.

The king determined that he would abandon the kingdom to his son and that, for as long as he lived, he would by no means be separated from Boniface.

The king's brother, however, who lived with him, refused to believe and, while Boniface was absent, was killed by the king himself.

Another brother, who was already separated from the king's dwelling, as soon as the venerable man came to him, refused to hear his words. But, inflamed with excessive anger against him because of his brother's conversion, he immediately seized him.

Then, fearing that if he kept him alive the king would snatch him from his hands, he ordered him to be beheaded in his presence while no small multitude of men stood around.

Immediately he himself was made blind, and so great a stupor oppressed him and all who stood by that they were able neither to speak, nor to perceive, nor to perform any function of humanity in any way, but all remained motionless like stones.

When the king heard this, struck by excessive sorrow, he intended to slaughter with swords not only his brother but also all who had been supporters of so great a guilt.

But when he came there immediately and saw the martyr's body still placed in their midst and his brother standing stupefied, without sense or motion, together with all the others, this course pleased him and all his people: first prayer should be made for them; then, if they consented to believe, they should live with the crime forgiven, but if not, they should perish by the avenger's sword.

When prayer had therefore been made for a long time by the faithful, not only were sense and motion restored to them, but also the counsel to demand true salvation.

Hence, doing penance, they all humbly sought baptism for so great a crime with tears and received it with great joy among them all. They constructed a church over the body of the blessed martyr.

Section V

Meanwhile, while Romuald still dwelt at Percum, King Buscanus directed entreaties to the emperor that he send him spiritual men who would call the people of his kingdom to the faith.

Immediately the emperor approached Romuald and entreated that some of his monks who could profitably be sent there be granted to him.

Romuald, however, did not wish to command this of any of his monks, as though by authority of prelacy, but, placing the choice in their will, he gave to all the option either of remaining or departing.

For he did not know God's will concerning so fearsome a business, and therefore he committed it not to his own judgment but to the will of the brothers.

At length only two were found who voluntarily offered themselves ready to go. One of them was called John and the other Benedict.

Therefore, going to Buscanus, they first took up residence in a hermitage, with the king supporting them. So that they might afterward be able to preach, they learned the Slavonic language.

In the seventh year, when they now knew the speech of the land perfectly, they sent one monk to the Roman See. Through him they earnestly sought from the supreme pontiff permission to preach.

They also enjoined upon the messenger that, if he could obtain any of blessed Romuald's monks, he should lead them there to dwell.

Buscanus, wishing to receive the crown of his kingdom by Roman authority, began with earnest supplication to ask the aforesaid venerable men that they carry his many gifts to the pope and bring back a crown for him from the Apostolic See.

Entirely refusing assent to the royal petition, they said: "We have been constituted in sacred orders. It is not permitted to us to transact secular affairs." Thus, leaving the king, they returned to their cell in the hermitage.

Certain men of the king, however, knowing his plan, judged that they carried with them an abundant weight of gold which was to be sent to the apostolic lord.

Then they agreed among themselves, formed a compact, secretly entered the hermitage at night, killed the monks, and took away the money. They executed the deed, but when the monks had been killed they found no money.

In order to cover the crime of so great a wickedness, they wished to burn the cell with fire and consume the bodies of the saints. But the fires applied, having lost the powers of their nature, could consume absolutely nothing, neither the wood nor the bodies.

Therefore the frustrated thieves attempted to turn in flight. But throughout the whole night they were distressed, seeking a path through the thickets, across the breadth of the woodlands, and through the dark places of the forests, and they did not find it.

Nor were they able to place their daggers in their sheaths, because their arms had withered.

Where the bodies of the saints lay, an abundant light did not cease to shine until day, nor did the sweetness of a most delightful angelic song cease to resound.

When day came, what had been done could not remain hidden from the king. He hastened to the hermitage with a numerous multitude.

Those guilty of the manifest crime were found, still bound to their swords by divine vengeance.

The king, considering and deliberating what he should do with them, at last determined that he would by no means order them to be killed as they deserved, but would send them, bound with iron chains, to the tombs of the martyrs, so that either they might remain there miserably in chains until death, or, if it seemed otherwise to the holy martyrs, the martyrs themselves might free them by their mercy.

When at the king's command they had been dragged to the tomb of the saints, they were immediately released as their bonds broke.

Afterward a basilica was constructed over their bodies. Innumerable prodigies are performed there by divine power, not only then but also now.

While Romuald still remained at Percum, Emperor Otto, at his suggestion, constructed a monastery in honor of Saint Adalbert.

He conferred upon it the adjoining estates of the monastery at Classe and compensated the latter from a fiscal possession in the regions of the March of Fermo.

When an abbot from Romuald's disciples had been established there and brothers had been gathered, Romuald began to hold them under great watchfulness and taught them to live under regular discipline.

He also commanded the abbot that, departing into the hermitage, he should remain in a cell throughout the whole week, but on the Lord's Days should come to the monastery and visit it.

Contemning the holy man's commands, the abbot began to live in a secular manner. Once the foot of his conduct had wandered from the path of rectitude, he now declined still farther.

Therefore, seeing that he could no longer labor there according to the ardor of his desire, Romuald immediately went to the king and, as exactor of the promise he had received—for the king had promised him that he would become a monk—began to press more vehemently that the king become a monk.

The king asserted that he would indeed do what was required, provided that he first attacked Rome, which had rebelled against him, and, after subduing it, returned with victory to Ravenna.

Romuald said to him: "If you go to Rome, you will not see Ravenna again." Because he could not call him back, he announced to him most openly that his death was very near.

Therefore, when the king had set out for Rome and afterward began to return from the city, he was immediately seized by illness and died at Paternum, according to the prophetic saying of the holy man.

Section VI

This glorious saint was adorned with many kinds of virtues, especially the spirit of compunction and the grace of tears.

When he dwelt in the borders of the city of Parentium, in a certain monastery constructed by him in which he remained for three years, one day, while he sang psalms in his cell, he came upon this verse of the Psalter: "I shall give you understanding and instruct you in this way in which you shall walk," and so forth.

So great an outpouring of tears arose in him that from that day onward, for as long as he lived, abundant tears flowed for him most easily whenever he wished.

Frequently so great a contemplation of the divinity seized him that, as though wholly dissolved into tears and seething with an ineffable ardor of divine love, he cried: “Dear Jesus, dear; my sweet honey; my ineffable desire; sweetness of the saints; delight of the angels,” and so forth.

For this reason Romuald never wished to celebrate Mass before many persons, because he could not restrain himself from an inundation of tears.

Judging this grace to be present in others also, he used to say: “Take care not to pour forth many tears, because they both diminish the sight and injure the crown of the head.”

Although he had departed from the world an unlettered man, his mind was nevertheless so illumined for understanding the meanings of divine Scripture that very many mysteries of the Scriptures did not lie hidden from him.

Hence one day, beginning to offer sacrifice, when he had reached the second secret prayer of the Mass, he was seized in ecstasy and remained silent for so long a space of time that all who were present marveled.

When he was afterward asked why, in offering the sacrifice, he had made so great a delay beyond what was customary, he answered: “Seized and carried into heaven, I was presented before God. Immediately I was commanded by a divine voice to expound the Psalms according to this understanding which God imparted to me and, according to the measure of my understanding, to commit them in order to sheets.

“But I, constrained by excessive and ineffable fear, could answer nothing else except only this: ‘Let it be so.’”

He lucidly expounded certain songs of the prophets. Although the rule of grammar was corrupted, he nevertheless preserved a sound meaning everywhere.

Nor was the spirit of prophecy lacking to him. For he openly made known very many things hidden from men and future events which he had foreknown, as was made clear above and in many other ways.

Hence also, on a certain solemn day, while he sat with the brothers in chapter and satisfied them with the foods of saving doctrine, suddenly interrupting his discourse, he began to exclaim with a certain distraction of mind and to say: “Act now, act, and hasten as greatly as possible, because the cell of Brother Gregory is now being broken into.” This Gregory was afterward consecrated archbishop.

They immediately sprang up, ran swiftly to Gregory’s cell, and found a thief already breaking through the walls.

Seizing him, they dragged him to the master and asked what should be done with so sacrilegious a plunderer.

The saint began to say to them cheerfully: “What we ought to do with him I do not know either. If we gouge out his eyes, afterward he will not see. If we cut off his hands, he will not be able to work. But send him inside and first set food before him.”

When this had been done, he permitted the thief, manifestly corrected and admonished with gentle words, to return to his own place.

He also abounded in the grace of miracles. Hence, when he wished to transfer himself by ship from the region of Parentium to the city of Pola, and a certain ship had been brought, as he had prophetically foretold, Romuald and several others entered it and began to sail, Romuald urging them although the sailors, because of fear of the disturbed air, thought the contrary.

Around daybreak, however, the winds suddenly raged, a tempest arose, and the sea was churned from its lowest depth. Furious waves now flew over the rowers on every side and, striking the ship from here and there, loosened nearly all its planks.

When, in so great a crisis, shipwreck now undoubtedly threatened and all had despaired, Romuald ran to his customary armaments of prayer. When he had completed them, he caused it to be announced to the sailors that without any doubt they would escape every danger.

A little after this, behold, beyond the hope of all and without any human effort, the ship righted itself and soon entered swiftly into the port of Capreola. It was manifest to all that by Romuald’s merits they had been snatched from the jaws of death.

Likewise, while he sat in his cell in the Camaldolese hermitage which he himself had built, he ordered a certain large beech standing near his cell to be cut down.

The beech leaned and hung so directly over the cell that, according to human judgment, if it fell it would undoubtedly crush the whole building immediately.

When the workmen wished to fulfill the command but feared the fall of the tree, he pressed them not to fear in any way.

The tree itself, struck by axes, now undoubtedly threatened to fall upon the blessed man. Therefore all began to cry out that, even if he disregarded the cell, he should at least come out from there and preserve himself.

He did not acquiesce. Instead, having made the sign of the cross, when it was about to fall he turned it toward another direction, so that, while all marveled, the cell remained wholly unharmed.

Likewise, a certain man suffered from insanity of the head, so that, having lost the sense of reason, he was wholly ignorant of what he did or said.

Romuald did nothing else to him except give him only a kiss, and immediately restored him to his former soundness.

At another time a demoniac boy was carried to the blessed man. Romuald did nothing else to him except give him a small piece of bread as a blessing. As soon as the boy had been refreshed by it, he was freed.

At another time, when bread was lacking to him and to his companions, and when, because of an inundation of waters, there could be neither access to them nor departure by them from the monastery to other places, three men came laden with bread and wine, asserting that they were from remote regions.

In Istria also, from a certain little stream in which a fish was accustomed to be found, a fish was drawn out by him for eating.

The servant of Christ also thirsted for martyrdom as the hart thirsts for streams of waters. Therefore, when the man of God heard that Boniface, of whom above, had been crowned with martyrdom, he immediately determined to go to Hungary, so that by preaching there he might be able to attain this triumph.

Accordingly, after permission had been received from the Apostolic See and two of his disciples had been consecrated as archbishops, he undertook the journey with twenty-four brothers.

So great an ardor for dying for Christ seethed in them all that the saint could only with difficulty go to so great an undertaking with a few.

Therefore, as they went and had reached the borders of the Pannonians, Romuald was suddenly seized by illness and could not go farther.

When he had suffered this for a rather long time, whenever he determined to return he immediately recovered from his illness. But if he attempted to go farther, immediately his whole face swelled, and, because his stomach was weak, he could not retain food.

Then he said to the brothers: “I perceive that it is not of the divine will that I should proceed farther. Nevertheless, because I am not ignorant of the resolve of your intention, I compel none of you to return. Let it be left to the judgment of each one of you who wishes to go and who wishes to return with me.”

Therefore, fifteen proceeded into Hungary, while seven remained with the master.

Of those who went, however, some were flogged, others were sold, and they underwent several masters; nevertheless, as the saint had foretold, they did not attain martyrdom.

At last he endured very many persecutions, chiefly from his own monks, because he restrained their irreligious conduct.

In Istria, among the others, he had a certain disciple named Romanus, who had indeed been noble in birth but degenerate in conduct.

Because the holy man restrained him for the uncleanness of his flesh, not only with words but also with most severe blows, that diabolical man dared to fasten upon him the charge of the same guilt and shamelessly to bark with sacrilegious mouth against the temple of the Holy Spirit, saying that the holy man had sinned together with him from the same contagion.

Immediately all the disciples, angered against him and all hostile, cried out. Some said that the impious old man ought to be suspended from a noose; others judged that he ought to be burned in the cell itself.

It was exceedingly marvelous, especially that spiritual men could have believed so nefarious a crime to have been committed by a decrepit old man more than a hundred years old.

But it must be believed that so grave a scourge of adversity befell him for the increase of the holy man’s merit. And, as he later asserted, although in the hermitage from which he had recently departed he had truthfully known beforehand that this would happen to him, nevertheless he had come cheerfully to this reproach of dishonor.

Therefore, the disciples imposed penance upon the holy man as though for a crime committed and wholly took away from him permission to celebrate the sacred mysteries.

He willingly embraced this judgment and observed the penance as though liable for the crime. For six months he did not presume to approach the celebration.

But afterward, as he related to his disciples, it was divinely commanded to him that, if he feared to lose divine grace, he should now wholly set aside his undiscerning simplicity and confidently celebrate the sacred mysteries.

That reprobate Sarabaite, however, who had fastened the crime upon the holy man, acquired the bishopric of Nuceria through simony. In the first year he saw his church burned with its books and the other sacred ornaments. In the second year he miserably lost his dignity together with his life.

He also built a monastery in the diocese of Camerino, in the place called Vallis Castri, where he began to dwell.

Who could describe with a pen or utter with a tongue how many fruits of souls the Lord acquired there through him?

For men began to flow together from all sides, taking occasion to do penance. Some distributed their possessions to the poor; others, having wholly abandoned the world, flew to the religious life.

Among the others, he rebuked with especially harsh severity secular clerics who had been ordained for money, and he asserted that they were heretics and damned unless they voluntarily laid aside their order, namely, by not exercising it.

Hearing this new thing, they attempted to kill him. For throughout that entire March, down to Romuald's times, scarcely anyone knew, because of the customary practice made common, that the simoniacal heresy was a sin.

He said to them: "Bring me the book of the canons, and, with your own pages bearing witness, prove whether the things I say are true."

When these had been diligently inspected, they recognized the crime and lamented their errors.

The holy man set in order many canons and clerics who were living secularly after the manner of laymen, and taught them to obey provosts and to live in common.

Some bishops who had invaded sacred sees through simony ran to him for penance and the salvation of the soul. They promised both to abandon the episcopate at the appointed time and to assume the monastic habit. Nevertheless, I do not know whether the holy man was able to convert even one of them during his lifetime.

He also constructed a monastery of maidens in those regions.

Moreover, when the soldier of Christ heard that a certain Venetian had invaded the abbey of Classe through simony and, in addition, was sinning wickedly against his own body, he zealously hastened to go there immediately.

He attempted in diverse ways to purge him from that monastery. But the reprobate man, while he feared to lose the abbey, did not fear to perpetrate homicide.

For in the dead of night, while Romuald rested securely upon his little bed, that man entered secretly and began to constrict his throat with impious fingers, striving cruelly to suffocate him.

But while the holy man, his breath wholly cut off and a gasp scarcely struggling out, made a hoarse sound, Ingelbert, immediately awakened by the master's sobs, suddenly entered and drove the minister of the devil away from the crime he had begun.

But a certain monk of his also, inflamed against him with mad fury, secretly sharpened a javelin and, putting it aside in order to kill the blessed man, began to await the occasion of a suitable time.

At night, however, while he rested oppressed by sleep, he saw a malignant spirit rushing savagely upon him and seeking to strangle him with a certain twisted cord.

Then the monk, placed at his last breath, implored Romuald to succor him. Romuald immediately appeared to him and snatched him from the hands of the ancient enemy.

Afterward, having confessed his sin at the feet of the saint, doing penance, he received pardon.

Section VII

After these things Romuald returned to the monastery of Vallis Castri. Immediately he exhorted the abbot so to rule others that nevertheless he did not neglect himself.

Moreover, he wished that the abbot should not abandon, on account of governance, the cell which he had used.

But that man, made worse instead of better by the venerable man's preaching, went to the countesses who were ladies of the place and suggested to them that they should command the timbers from which Romuald's cells were to be constructed to be cut into small pieces. Thus he was cast out of the place.

For this manner of life of abbots, such as we behold, was so hateful to the blessed man that he would rejoice no less if he could tear an abbey out of anyone's hand than if it were granted him to summon any most powerful man among the laymen to the religious order.

At that time life in the monastery in Istria was such that, from the likeness not only of the name but also of the work, a second Nitria seemed again to be seen.

For all walked with bare feet; all were unkempt and pale and content with the utmost extremity of all things.

Some, indeed, were enclosed with their doors sealed, so dead to the world that they seemed as though already placed in a tomb.

No one there knew wine, not even if anyone suffered a most grievous illness.

But why do I speak about the monks, when even the servants of the monks themselves, and the keepers of the livestock themselves, fasted, kept silence, exercised discipline upon one another, and demanded penance for any idle words whatsoever?

In this Istria the holy man remained enclosed for almost seven years and inviolably preserved continual silence.

With old age now approaching, he lived exceedingly strictly, although all who are perfect are then accustomed to live more leniently.

For throughout the space of one Lent he took nothing else either in food or in drink, but lived by making little soups from a small quantity of flour and a few herbs.

For five weeks he constrained himself, eating nothing else except a small quantity of soaked chickpeas.

He also had three or two hairshirts because of the rising importunity of the body.

He never allowed a razor to ascend upon his head, but he himself was accustomed to cut away with shears the excess growth of his locks and beard.

If at any time the vice of gluttony tickled him with more excellent food, he immediately commanded that it be carefully prepared; he placed it before his mouth and nostrils and, taking in its odor, said: "O gluttony, gluttony, how sweet this prepared food would be to you. But woe to you: you shall not taste of it."

Meanwhile Emperor Henry, coming to Italy from the regions beyond the mountains, sent a letter of entreaty to the blessed man, asking that he deign to come to him and promising that he would do whatever Romuald commanded.

When he had been entreated by the brothers, he acquiesced. Therefore, going to the emperor, he was received by him with great honor.

The whole crowd of Germans ran together eagerly, anxiously plucking the hairs of the fur garment in which he was clothed, to carry them back to their homeland as sacred relics.

The man of God was so saddened by this veneration that, had his disciples not opposed him, he would have returned to his cell.

He admonished the emperor concerning the rights of the Church that were to be restored and concerning the oppression of the poor by powerful men.

Finally, when he sought one monastery for his men, the emperor handed over to him the monastery of Monte Amiata.

Romuald himself cast out the abbot because he was liable to many evils. There too he endured many adversities, both from the one cast out and from the disciple whom he himself made abbot there.

Finally, having fallen ill in Vallis Castri, in the one hundred and twentieth year of his life he migrated to the Lord. He had become a monk in the twentieth year of his age, and his body rests buried in the monastery of Vallis Castri.

Title XV

Chapter XVI

In the eighth year of Emperor Arnulf, around the year of the Lord 900, there lived a certain venerable man called Odo.

As Sigebert writes, although he was a cleric of Tours and a musician, he became a monk under Abbot Berno.

And, as Vincent relates from the chronicles in book twenty-five of the Historical Mirror, this man was of marvelous sanctity, incomparable in monastic discipline, fervent, and almost singular in his age.

By his fervor and industry the tepidity of the monks of that time was turned into ardor and into devotion to the faith and religious life.

For through him and under him monastic devotion, already dried up, flourished again exceedingly, and the praiseworthy institution of blessed Benedict, restored, revived and grew strong in many diverse monasteries.

He also composed antiphons and hymns concerning blessed Martin, and wrote the life of blessed Gerald.

He was first instructed by Remigius of Auxerre in music and dialectic.

Vincent, however, in the place cited above, relates from Odo's deeds that, while he dwelt in the city of Tours, he was asked by the brothers to compress the Moralia of blessed Pope Gregory within the compass of one volume.

He declared that he could not do this, adding that, even if the faculty for doing it were present to him, he nevertheless ought not to do it, lest he seem to alter the labor of so great a man or to take anything away from it.

But when they persisted in their petition, one night, while he applied himself to his customary prayer in the church of blessed Martin, sleep suddenly stole upon him.

In a vision he saw a choir of saints coming from above descend into that same church, and, after them all, blessed Pope Gregory, more splendid and adorned in countenance and bearing than all who had preceded him.

Immediately, as he came, all arose and, with necks bent, sought a blessing.

Gregory did not descend all the way among them, but stopped above the ambo of the church and called blessed Odo, who lay prostrate upon the ground, saying: "Rise, Brother Odo; do not fear."

When he had risen, he saw that Gregory had above his ear, after the manner of a scribe, a quill drawn out to a sharp point and split at its tip.

Blessed Gregory took it and, handing it to him, said: "Act securely and complete the work enjoined upon you. The book which you compose will not be destroyed, but mine will stand forever."

Immediately awakening, he at once understood what he had seen.

Then, taking that work, he read it diligently and arranged within one volume the sounder portion which he selected. Thus he restrained their murmuring.

A certain brother named Adegrinus, however, seeking the place of a more secluded monastery in which he could rest, came into the borders of Burgundy, where there was a monastery constructed by Abbot Berno.

Having been received there most dutifully by him, he remained there for some time in the manner of a guest, so that he might be able to learn the conduct of its inhabitants.

The institutes of Father Euticius were observed there. Perceiving this, Adegrinus took care to announce the whole matter to Father Odo.

Odo, taking one hundred volumes of books with him, immediately migrated to that monastery.

There Brother Adegrinus, confining himself within one cell with the permission of Abbot Berno, remained in it for three years.

But because Father Odo, then thirty years old, was a learned man, they imposed upon him the laborious mastership of the school.

In the year of the Lord 913, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror in the place cited above, the Cluniac Order began.

For Abbot Berno, when about to die, appointed Odo, formerly a musician, abbot of the monastery of Cluny, upon this condition: that the church of Cluny should pay annually to the church of Gigny a rent of twelve denarii.

As has been said, in that monastery constructed by Berno the institutes of Father Euticius were observed. He lived in the times of Louis the Great and was a man dear to the king and lovable to all.

For although he was a layman and instructed in foreign studies, he abandoned those things from which human frailty is accustomed to become proud and gave himself wholly to the rules and institutes of the Fathers.

From these he also took diverse customs and bound them together in one volume.

Not long afterward he became a monk, and he was held in so great affection by the king that the king constructed a monastery for him within his palace.

When the course of his zealous life had been run, with the brothers standing around him, he suddenly gave up his spirit.

While his disciples prepared the funeral rites, he returned alive.

To them, astonished and marveling, he said: “Thanks be to God. Know that in these forty years I do not remember a single day on which I took food without first having wept.

“Today, however, sorrow having been taken away, God has consoled me, and the Lord has granted me a place of rest among the choirs of angels.”

Having said these things, he rested forever.

He was the institutor of the customs which were observed in monasteries down to that time.

At length Abbot Berno, lying sick with a deadly disease, summoned the neighboring bishops and, deposing himself from his order, cried with a tearful voice that he was guilty and unworthy to have presided over such a monastery.

Then Brother Odo, seized by the brothers’ hands, was brought by force before his abbot, all crying out that he should be ordained.

When even thus he was unwilling to yield and to assume the place of pastor, he was at length overcome by the bishops’ excommunication.

One night, when the keepers of the horses had fallen asleep and a certain brother named Godfrey kept vigil in prayer, a thief came, mounted a stolen horse, and fled.

The aforesaid brother, however, preferred to lose the horse rather than break silence. He went and awakened one of the keepers by touching him, and showed him by a sign what had happened.

When morning came, however, they saw from afar the thief seated upon the horse, fixed in one place.

They seized him and sent him bound to Father Odo.

Odo immediately commanded that five silver solidi be given to him, saying that it was unjust to dismiss him without a worthy reward, because he had endured much labor throughout the space of the whole night.

At the time when the most savage nation of the Normans was devastating the territories of Poitiers and Tours, two brothers from the said congregation were sent to Tours.

While they undertook the journey and turned aside into a certain place for the sake of resting, they were captured at night by those same Normans.

The Normans were indeed able to seize them, to bind their hands, and then to threaten them, but they were not able to break their silence.

When morning had now come and they had arrived at the appointed place, the brothers, just as they were, bound, withdrew themselves a little from them and prostrated themselves upon the ground, so that, after completing the course of the Psalms, they might impose an end upon their silence.

Before the prayer had been completed, the remainder of the Normans came with much captured booty.

Their leader, seeing the brothers lying upon the ground and hearing that they could in no way make them speak, swollen with barbarous ferocity, rushed upon them with his lance inclined as though to strike, instilling in them the fear of death, while the others also clapped their hands after the barbarous custom.

But they, just as they were steadfast in mind, so remained immovable in body.

This indeed was done by the right and observance of the holy rule, under which they desired both to die and to live.

But the hand of the Almighty turned their joyful spectacle into mourning.

For immediately, when that barbarian drew near them, the caparisoned horse upon which he sat leapt sideways, threw its rider to the ground, and crushed him.

A fatal fever immediately followed that crushing.

All fell silent and, turned to astonishment, began to ask among themselves what they ought to do.

At length, when a plan had been found, they judged it fitting that one of the said brothers should be surrendered for the life of their leader.

Then they began to seek by lot which of them ought to be killed. But the diabolical lot could in no way fall upon men of virtue and those numbered in the lot of Christ, so that the Normans were astonished, saying that they were more than men, since their lot could not fall upon them.

Then they swiftly loosed their hands and began to entreat them most urgently through an interpreter for the life of their leader.

At a certain time, while Odo crossed the channel of the Rhône by boat with many persons, one horse wished to strike another with its hoof.

The plank of the little boat received the blow of the striking hoof, namely at the very place from which a branch had been cut away while the wood was being dressed.

As soon as the piece was torn out, so great an inundation of water entered the ship through that hole that the ship was suddenly filled up to the surface.

Nevertheless, thus full, with God governing, it reached the other bank; and Father Odo remained standing inside until all had gone out.

At last, when he too had gone out, the ship went into the depths.

At the same time he went to Rome for the sake of prayer.

While he returned from the city to his homeland among the Alps, his road was preoccupied and shut off by the immensity of snow.

When they wished to pass that most terrible and dangerous place, the horse upon which Odo sat stretched its foot sideways, and both together were plunged toward a precipice.

Then Father Odo, abandoning the reins, raised both hands toward heaven as he fell, and immediately found a branch of a tree between his arms.

He suspended himself upon it until those who had gone ahead returned at his cries and took him up.

That branch, however, was seen no more, because no tree is ever seen or grows there; and the horse appeared nowhere afterward.

One day, while he journeyed near the borders of Pardonus, a certain most notorious young robber, beholding the affability of his countenance, was immediately pierced in heart with compunction and, falling at his feet, humbly entreated that he take pity upon him.

But Odo said: “Go, and first correct your conduct, and afterward seek the monastic life.”

When the young man persisted, Odo commanded him to precede him to the monastery. This was done.

Therefore, having become a monk, he was subjected to obey the cellarer.

And because he was unlettered, both things were imposed upon him, namely, the yoke of obedience and the study of letters.

He performed this so devoutly that with one hand he applied himself to service, while with the other he carried the Psalter by day.

When he labored at the extremity of life, he called the pious father, humbly requesting a private conversation.

When he sought pardon from him, Odo asked whether he had fallen into any sin after becoming a monk.

He replied: “Without your knowledge, through my fault I gave our tunic to a certain naked man. And I took from the cellar a rope woven from threads.”

When Odo asked what he had done with it, he said: “To restrain the gluttony which I contracted badly long ago, I bound my belly round with it.”

Then the astonished father wished to loosen it from his belly, but the skin which had adhered to it came away together with the rope.

After these things he added and said: “This night, father, I was chosen in heaven through a vision, and a woman of most glorious person met me.

“She said: ‘Do you know me?’

“I answered: ‘Not at all, lady.’

“And she said: ‘I am the Mother of Mercy.’

“I said to her: ‘What do you command me to do, lady?’

“She answered: ‘After three days you will come here at such an hour.’”

This also was done. For on the third day he died at the hour which she had said.

At a certain time, while he was at Saint Paul’s in Rome, Abbot Baldwin asked him to correct for him, and elucidate with little glosses, the book concerning the life of blessed Martin which Gallus and Postumianus had composed in the manner of a dialogue.

He immediately gave assent to his wish and, Brother Othezarius having been summoned, applied his labor to emending it.

Meanwhile, when the signal for the evening hour was struck, they immediately, according to the rule, left everything which they held in their hands and entered the church.

They had left the codex open where they had been sitting and, occupied in prayers, forgot it.

That place, however, was so arranged that the water which slipped down from its own roof, and which was gathered from three other roofs in one convergence, fell like a torrent into that one place.

There the book remained open until morning, and so many inundations of water fell round about it that the margin of the book was washed on every side, but the writing remained untouched.

When morning came, the book was opened before the brothers.

As they marveled in astonishment, the provident father said: “Why do you marvel, brothers? Know that the water feared to touch the life of blessed Martin.”

Thus he turned those things which God did on his account to the praise of Martin.

Section II

This holy Odo also, as Vincent relates from his deeds in the place cited above, while he instructed his disciples in regular disciplines, related the miserable excess and departure of many monks, so that he might restrain youthful impulse in them.

“In these days,” he said, “two brothers were carried off by a most rapid death, not in one place nor on one day.

“One of them, coming into the house of a certain sister of his, said that he was exceedingly hungry and sought refreshment.

“She immediately said to him that she had fish in abundance, so that he might eat whatever kinds he wished and at whatever hour he wished.

“He answered as though indignant that he disdained fish and could no longer bear to see them.

“Then he commanded that the limb of a certain animal be roasted for him. But, not enduring the delay of roasting, he cut off a little portion and threw it upon the coals.

“Then he commanded wine to be brought to him and avidly took a morsel of the flesh.

“But after he took it, it neither passed through his throat nor could he cast it out, but he ended his life together with the food.

“Another brother, coming to the house of a certain relative of his, immediately sought something to eat.

“When they told him that the hour for eating had not yet come, he added with indignation: ‘Alas, I labored by riding throughout the whole night after the obedience enjoined upon me, and now you compel me to fast. Therefore bring me something if you have anything.’

“When they told him that they had fish, he began indignantly to cast his eyes here and there.

“A flock of hens was going about his feet. Then, as though raging, he seized a staff and struck the one which pleased him.

“With a mouth as though furious he said: ‘This is fish for me today.’

“Those who stood by said to him with a kind of blush: ‘It is permitted to you to eat meat, father.’

“But he said: ‘A bird is not meat. For birds and fish have one origin.’

“Therefore, the hen which he had killed, now roasted, was set before him. He tore away its thigh and bit it.

“He could neither vomit nor swallow that bite, but it deprived him of life.

“Nevertheless, before he died, he received blows of the fist and slaps upon the neck, as the reward of his wickedness, unto reproach.”

A certain brother from the congregation of the aforesaid Father Odo applied the treatment of bloodletting to himself at an unlawful time.

Odo’s mind was moved by this deed, because, although necessity had compelled him, nevertheless he ought not to have presumed to do it without his permission.

Immediately the vein through which the blood had previously flowed burst open, and it was restrained by no one until he gave up his soul.

In the monastery of Saint Elias, Father Odo appointed as provost one of his brothers named Theodard.

But because it is difficult to meditate upon new things in an old mind, the monks who were found there could not be withdrawn from eating meat.

Seeing this, Theodard began to buy fish from the neighboring regions, so that at least in this way he might satisfy their wish. In seeking them he had great labor.

When he had announced this to Odo, through Odo’s merits he obtained by the power of God that a lake should be made there, whence they had fish in abundance.

At length blessed Father Odo, the first abbot of the Cluniac Order, died.

Adamar, or Heymard, succeeded him, as Vincent relates in the place cited above, a man who was indeed a son of simplicity and innocence.

He was zealous in the enlargement of estates and the acquisition of temporal advantage, and devoted in regular observance.

He most patiently bore the loss of temporal sight and whatever adversity could befall him, without any murmuring and indignation.

In his time blessed Mayeul, archdeacon of Mâcon, nobly nourished from infancy by noble parents, imbued with spiritual letters, and adorned with the title of virginity, was converted to the love and observance of the monastic habit.

In the sixth year, as is related, of his conversion from the world, Abbot Heymard being now deprived of all bodily strength and deprived of the sight of his eyes, Mayeul, although resisting greatly, was substituted in the place of abbot after counsel had also been held.

He was grave in his gait, elevated in voice, eloquent in speech, angelic in countenance, and honorable in every act or movement of the body.

He was firm in faith, certain in hope, filled with twofold charity, illustrious in wisdom, and robust in fortitude.

There was in him honor in action, sobriety in custom, humility in prosperity, and patience in adversity.

He was affable to the meek, terrible to the proud, sparing when he ought to be, and profuse when it was fitting.

He was not diverse in habit nor confused in action, but, so far as belongs to a man, always one and the same: always a devoted imitator of the saints and an attentive hearer of them.

He thus strove to please men so that he did not displease God.

How manifestly the memory of this man and of his disciples exists in blessing, let the monasteries answer: some constructed by them from the foundations, others brought back from corruption to a better state with an increase of virtues.

Many of the faithful also, as the most faithful report bears witness, constrained by diverse infirmities and even despairing of life, were healed by the grace of God when visited by him.

Some were given light; others were freed from a demon; others, harmed by the venom of serpents and by the bite of wolves and dogs, were restored to health.

Extinguished candles before his bed were divinely kindled.

He died, full of days and sanctity, on the fifth day before the Ides of May. At his tomb also many miracles occur.

Section III

In the year 1000 of the Lord's Incarnation, and in the sixteenth year of the reign of Emperor Otto III, Odilo, abbot of Cluny, began to shine in Burgundy.

From being a cleric of Bernacum, he was professed as a monk and became abbot at Cluny after Mayeul, of whom mention has been made immediately above.

He ruled the monastery for fifty-six years with a marvelous fervor of religious life.

Peter Damian relates concerning this Abbot Odilo, as Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror in the place cited above, that Peter Damian himself, compelled by the command of Hugh, abbot of Cluny, to treat succinctly the life of blessed Odilo, his predecessor, and to pluck out the more useful things in a brief compendium, attempted this, not hunting after the elegance of brilliant eloquence, but serving pure truth.

"For the life of the saints itself," says the same Peter, "when faithfully narrated, so shines by itself that it does not require the splendor of careful discourse in order to illuminate the hearts of the faithful.

"To this is added the fact that the rusticity of uncultivated discourse is accustomed to purge away the suspicion of falsehood.

"For one who is scarcely sufficient to bring forth at least polished eloquence: in what manner does he know how to fabricate a fiction?"

Therefore, this Saint Odilo, sprung from equestrian stock in Auvergne, while he was still an infant, was suddenly constrained by so great an affliction of almost all his limbs that he wholly lost the ability to walk.

It happened that his nurse left him before the door of a certain basilica of the Mother of God, while she, intent upon her own business, went far away through diverse places.

Therefore, the boy, perceiving that he had been left without a keeper and incited by a certain divine prompting, began to attempt whether by any exertion he could reach the doors of the church.

Thus, creeping upon his hands and feet, he scarcely arrived there and, gradually advancing, entered.

Now made stronger by hope conceived, he grasped the cloth of the altar and began thus to raise himself by whatever efforts he could.

At length he felt the aid of divine power and, every weakness having been laid aside, was made whole, and he stirred the minds of those who beheld him to render thanks to God.

When he reached adolescence, he first became a cleric at Saint Julian the Martyr.

Thereafter he became a monk of Cluny under blessed Mayeul. While there he humbly persisted, quiet and simple, in holy conduct, and a certain standard of perfection shone forth in that very beginning, when scarcely four years had elapsed Mayeul rested in the Lord.

Before this, however, with the wishes of all the brothers concurring upon blessed Odilo, Mayeul substituted him for himself in the pastoral care of them all.

The unfailing flame of divine love had now so heated Odilo's heart that the solicitude of so many cares and so many pressing affairs could not restrain him from offering the saving sacrifices daily.

Hence, when he lay upon the bed of death, he commanded his disciple Adrald to collect by a computation of the calculating board what might be the sum of the Masses which he had celebrated throughout the space of the fifty-six years during which he ruled the monastery.

In distributing alms he was so generous that some, when they beheld him dispersing everything, judged him not a steward but a prodigal.

In a time of famine, when the treasuries had now been emptied for the use of the poor, he even broke very many sacred vessels of ministry and sold the distinguished ornaments of the church.

He did not spare even the crown which Emperor Henry had sent to him as a memorial of himself.

He was accustomed not only to attenuate his body with hard fasts and to tame it with most rough hairshirts, but also to constrict it with certain iron bands.

In beginning meals, however, he so moderated himself that, touching each thing set before him and serving, with dispensation, only natural necessity, he both escaped the vanity of superstition and preserved the continence of sobriety.

Moreover, in promulgating judgments and fixing measures of penance, he was so pious and sympathized with offenders with so great a humanity that nowhere did he display the strict command of a father, but rather a maternal affection.

Hence, to those who reproved him, he was accustomed elegantly to reply in words of this kind: “Even if I am to be damned, I prefer nevertheless to be damned for mercy rather than for hardness or cruelty.”

Among the other saints, however, he burned with most ardent devotion toward the blessed Mother of God.

Finally, he who was illustrious in uprightness of conduct was also illustrious in the manifestation of signs.

When he was in a certain villa belonging to him which is called Besomacum, he beheld a certain boy beautiful in form but blind from birth. Piously sympathizing with him, he called him to himself.

He traced upon his forehead the health-bearing sign of the cross, and immediately the boy received the sight which nature had denied him.

Once, at the beginning of the fast, as the brothers rose from the table, the holy abbot secretly filled his fist with ashes and reclined when bread had been set before him.

As he ate the ashes as though they were bread, he signaled to a brother to bring him water secretly.

When this had been done and the water was applied to his lips, he perceived the sharpness of wine.

Therefore he drew back his hand, cast away the cup, and commanded the minister to bring him water.

At this the minister was astonished and was terrified with wonder that he was carrying wine back from the table, although he had offered water.

But behold, when the water was sought again for drinking, wine was found entirely in the cup.

Accordingly, when the holy man perceived that God was mercifully granting indulgence to him, he did not refuse to partake with thanksgiving.

Meanwhile, while he was in the city of Ticinum, a certain man secretly stole the covering of his table and offered it for sale in the market.

But the divine disposition so opposed him that the sacred booty could not be sold, for, although it was exposed for sale three times, he could not agree with buyers concerning the price.

Meanwhile divine vengeance seized the author of the crime. Drying up the hands and feet of the sacrilegious man, it constrained him with intolerable pain.

Thus, immediately compelled by his affliction, he was carried by the hands of others to the church of Saint Mayeul, and the stolen tablecloth was displayed before all while the guilty man repented.

Thus, through the merits of blessed Mayeul and the prayers of the brothers, having been made whole he returned the covering that belonged to another and received himself back. He proved what reward one who offended blessed Odilo deserved.

The same holy man, when a cause dictated that he hasten to cross the river Ticinus with his companions, without a boat, which was then lacking, was transported through the water without hindrance to the farther bank of the channel.

Certain men, marveling at this, when they afterward wished to follow, would have been submerged by the gulf of the water had they not been aided.

Turning aside from there to a lodging, he was invited by a certain man out of devotion.

When the lamp had been extinguished in the night, that man implored God that, for love of Odilo, he drive away the darkness. Immediately the splendor of a flashing light shone forth and illuminated the whole house.

When the same saint crossed a river at another time and the water reached the others up to their thighs, not even the strap of the man of God's foot was drenched by the inundation of the waters.

When he was received at the monastery of Saint Martin, although many monks flowed together to him and little fish was available, when that little was divided at the meal, it was multiplied in the hands of those eating through the merits of the saint, so that many pieces of fish even remained.

On another occasion he multiplied a little wine offered to him when ten brothers were present, so that it sufficed for them all.

A feverish man, drinking water in which Odilo's hands had been washed and which had secretly been taken out of devotion, was delivered.

Ascending the precipices of Mount Jovis, when he saw poor men whom he met weary and thirsty, he commanded that whatever wine his companions had in their little vessels be given to them without any reservation.

When this had been done, as he reclined with his companions, the wine was found in the vessels without any diminution.

Emperor Henry, reclining at table, sent to the holy man as a gift a precious little glass vessel fashioned by the art of Alexandrian workmanship, with pounded relishes brought to him in it.

Then, as is the custom of human curiosity, the monks began to handle that vessel with a gaze of admiration and, carefully inspecting it, to pass it from hand to hand.

When the vessel itself slipped carelessly from the hands of those holding it, it was broken.

Odilo, fearing the emperor's indignation against the brothers because of this breakage, entered the church and restored the vessel itself to wholeness by his prayer.

Thus this Saint Odilo, a distinguished governor of twofold stewardship, both shone before the divine gaze in spiritual zeal and was no less illustrious in the industry of earthly labor.

When he was now living his last time, he was tormented by a most grievous affliction for almost five years.

When he had begun to go around his monasteries to visit them for the sake of admonition, he came to Silvinia and there foretold that he would migrate from the world around the feast of the Lord's Circumcision.

Moreover, when he was now placed in the anguish of the agony, he beheld the devil standing by and rebuked him terribly, by the name of the Judge who is to be feared, that he should depart.

Therefore, in the year 1048 of the Lord's Incarnation, in the eighty-seventh year of his age, and the fifty-sixth of his ordination, after receiving the sacrament of the Eucharist on the night preceding the solemnities of the Circumcision, he rendered his blessed spirit to God.

Section V

A certain religious man, returning from Jerusalem, while he crossed the sea and the terror of the winds drove him with many others, came to a certain island or rock where a certain holy man remained enclosed.

Therefore, while he waited there for some time with the others for tranquillity of the sea and frequently had conversation with that enclosed man, when he was asked, he answered that he was an Aquitanian by homeland.

He was asked further whether he knew the monastery which is called Cluny and Odilo its abbot. He affirmed that he knew them very well.

When he asked why the servant of God inquired this of him, the latter said: "There are places neighboring us from which most grievous conflagrations of flames are vomited forth.

“In these places souls also pay diverse torments according to the quality of their merits.

“Innumerable demons are assigned always to aggravate their punishments. They renew their intolerable penalties daily and restore them without end to punishments reviving again.

“Nevertheless, I have frequently heard them wailing in querulous lamentations because, by the prayers and alms of certain persons, the souls of the damned—namely, those in purgatory—were being snatched from their hands.

“Among other things, they also make a very great complaint concerning the community of the Cluniacs and their abbot, because very often through them they lose the servants of their own jurisdiction.

“Therefore, I adjure you by the name of God that you faithfully relate to those holy brothers these things which I have told you.

“On our part also announce that they should apply themselves more and more to prayers and alms, especially with regard to this intention: that they bring out of the hands of demons those who are tormented there.”

Therefore, when that man had returned to his homeland and had related this to Abbot Odilo and the brothers, Father Odilo established a general decree throughout all his monasteries: just as on the first day of November the feast of all the saints is celebrated, so on the following day, with psalms, alms, and the solemnities of Masses, the memory especially of all who rest in Christ should be celebrated.

Pope Benedict, while he lived, loved this holy man affectionately and often supplied the necessary expenses to him when he frequented the thresholds of the apostles.

When Benedict had died, he appeared to John, bishop of Porto, and to two others in the form of a nocturnal vision, and disclosed to them that he had been placed in penal darknesses.

He added this also: that, because of the merits of blessed Odilo, the heavenly judgment had decreed to free him from the torments.

Immediately that same Bishop John came to Pavia and, through the monks of the monastery of blessed Mayeul, disclosed the whole course of the vision to the holy man Odilo.

Odilo immediately commanded that psalmodies and prayers be made by all in the monastery of Cluny, that alms be distributed, and that the sacrifice of the saving mystery be offered for Benedict.

He also sent edicts of the same ordinance through all the monasteries under his rule.

While the brothers performed this with most urgent devotion, Eldebert, the monk who exercised this office of obedience, namely, that he nourish the needy and minister necessities to them, saw during sleep a certain man beautiful and serene in countenance, surrounded by a great company of those clad in white, enter the cloister.

He entered the chapter where Odilo sat with the brothers, humbly bowed his head to Odilo’s knees, and gave him thanks.

When that Brother Eldebert asked who he was, it was answered to him that he himself was Pope Benedict, who therefore gave thanks to the man of God because through his pious prayers and those of the holy brothers he had escaped the Tartarean torment and had merited to enter the heavenly Jerusalem, there to rest with the blessed citizens.

The same Saint Odilo, as Vincent writes in the Historical Mirror in the place cited above, elegantly produced certain festal sermons which are regularly used by monks of his order.

On the very night on which he migrated to the Lord, he also appeared to a certain simple and innocent man among his monks, named Gregory, as he was beginning to sleep.

When Gregory asked how he fared, he answered that he was well and was in the presence of Christ.

But he said that at the very hour of his death he had seen a certain savage and terrible figure attempting to strike into him the horror of its most hideous appearance; yet, because the power of Christ strengthened him, it could harm him by no assault.

Section VI

After Odilo, a very venerable man, Hugh, succeeded in the governance of the Cluniac Order.

For, as Vincent relates from his deeds in the Historical Mirror, he was a native of Augustodunum, of noble stock, his father being Dalmatius, a consular man intent upon military deeds.

When his mother, pregnant with Hugh, labored gravely in childbirth, she caused a certain religious man to celebrate Mass for her deliverance and the safety of the one to be born.

While he most devoutly celebrated the solemnities of the Mass for this, he is related, while suspended in contemplation, to have seen above the chalice the form of an infant radiating marvelously beyond human measure.

In this sign Hugh's future sanctity was shown, because from his adolescence, as an imitator of the Lord's Passion in the austerity of regular life, he took the chalice of salvation.

For, when he was still placed in the years of wardship, avoiding childish trifles and bearing an aged heart, under the habit of religious life he delivered himself as a disciple to blessed Odilo in the monastery of Cluny.

Advancing in every virtue, he was made prior; and, when Odilo died, although resisting, he was made abbot by the will of all.

Thus he was good in knowledge, better in conscience, and best in temperance; angelic in form, ordered in conduct, sweet in speech, and conspicuous in all other graces.

At that time Emperor Henry II most vigorously governed the summit of the kingdom. Because his father Henry had greatly loved the Cluniac monastery and its abbot, he, imitating him, bound Hugh more closely to himself in love.

He invited Hugh, abbot of Cluny, to himself, received him gloriously when he came, and gladly obtained that he should raise his son Henry III from the sacred font.

Hugh's grace did not escape Pope Stephen either.

When the pope lay constrained by illness in the city of Florence, he declared to those standing around that, when Saint Hugh came, the enemy departed, and when Hugh went out, the enemy approached.

Therefore, lest he be pressed by the assaults of the irreconcilable enemy, the pope continually implored Hugh's assiduous attendance, for the ambusher was confounded by his presence.

The father's tears had now driven the malignant assaults far away when the apostolic man breathed forth his soul into the bosom of the one present. Having been worthily composed by Hugh's hands, he was delivered to burial.

It also became most manifest to the most reverend Hildebrand, who, his name and rank afterward changed, was called Gregory, that Father Hugh possessed much spiritual grace.

For Hildebrand, not yet adorned with the cope, declared that in the chapter at Cluny he had seen Hugh beside the Judge of the world himself. Sitting at the Judge's right hand, Hugh promoted regular discipline by his favor.

When made pope, Hildebrand was accustomed gently to call Hugh a tyrant, because he had found him a lion toward the meek and a lamb toward the fierce, not unaware of the saying, "to spare the subjected and to subdue the proud."

In the time of Saint Leo IX, pope, the body of Saint Remigius was translated at Rheims.

The apostolic man was present at so great a translation and especially celebrated a general council against the simoniacs.

Father Hugh, armed with faith, attended, and a great company of illustrious men followed him.

But so great was the multitude of the perverse that the good scarcely dared to reprove the evil; and, if they had dared, the outcry of those living wickedly would have broken forth more readily than the free voice of those who thought more soundly.

Hugh delivered the synodal exhortation laudably at the command of the lord pope and at the persuasion of a certain most renowned Saint Constantius, a canon of Rheims, and of others; and he provedly confuted the tergiversators who were accustomed to stand with falsehood against truth.

Ildefonsus, king of the Spains, also honoring the holy father above all others, obtained with ardent desires that he merited to see him: first, because through Saint Hugh's prayers he escaped from the captivity of his brother Sancho; and then because he intended to bind more strongly the union of his father Ferdinand and the Cluniacs, lest otherwise he should be found disobedient to blessed Peter and ungrateful for the benefit.

For when Ildefonsus was held in most narrow custody and the Cluniacs applied themselves to prayer for him, blessed Peter made known to him through a certain bishop that, moved by the urgency of Saint Hugh's prayers and those of his men, he would shortly restore him to his own power and advance him even to the scepter.

Without delay the key-bearer of heaven, appearing terribly by night to Sancho, who had usurped the kingdom, threatened him with death unless he immediately released his brother.

The thoroughly terrified tyrant arose and, after emancipating him from his chains, returned to bed.

Thus it happened that the liberated king, doubling the paternal tribute, sent two hundred ounces of gold annually to his intercessors and left the day of his liberation celebrated among us.

Saint Hugh, bestowing many things for the uses of the poor and regarding them as though they were worthless burdens, often suffered their plundering without anger.

Moreover, he observed such a measure that neither excessive leniency nor severity appeared to go beyond bounds.

By the spirit of prophecy he was accustomed to discern among the novices which were to be made solid with the firmness of wheat and which were to be winnowed like chaff by a malignant spirit.

At a certain time, while he was at Martiniacum with the illustrious Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, joined to him—Anselm having been removed from his archbishopric on account of justice—Hugh was delighted by the consolation of his company.

Admonished by divine revelation, he foretold the near death of William, king of England, and it happened as he had foretold. For while William, hunting through the woods, strove to shoot the fleeing stags, he suddenly received in his heart the arrow by which his knight was aiming at a stag.

At another time, when the same father slept, he saw in a dream a multitude of serpents and wild beasts lying beneath his head.

Immediately shaking out the pillow and searching what lay beneath it, he found there a book of Maro, placed there by chance. He immediately cast it away and rested in peace.

He knew that the nature of the book's subject agreed with the vision, for, being full of obscenities and rites of the gentiles, it was unworthy to be laid beneath the holy man's little bed.

Section VII

A certain brother named Durranus, formerly appearing unlettered at Predon, afterward a not unsuitable abbot of Moissac, and thence promoted to the bishopric of Toulouse by the prerogative of wisdom, was distinguished among the laborers in the Lord's agriculture by the merit of solicitude and industry.

Although circumspect in other matters, he often rather incautiously uttered words that provoked laughter.

For this reason the venerable Father Hugh frequently reproved him and, not sufficiently profiting, admonished him thus, threatening concerning the future by prophecy: "Behold, dearest brother, unless while living you wholly abandon frivolous words forbidden to a monk, you will appear monstrously after death."

It is established that this prophecy was fulfilled when he died.

For, appearing with a foaming mouth to a certain Singuinus, the father's chaplain, he tearfully sought the aid of Father Hugh, whom he had been unwilling to obey while living.

When Singuinus related these things to the lord abbot, Hugh commanded that seven brothers maintain silence of the mouth for one week for the deceased.

Seven brothers having been chosen for this and the others obeying, one of them, a contemner of the vow, interrupted the silence.

Again Bishop Durranus was revealed anew to that same man, complaining greatly concerning Brother Fido, who, by not keeping silence, had impeded his soundness.

Hearing this, most pious Hugh commanded that the breach of silence which had occurred through one brother be made good by the silence of another seven days.

When this had been done, the bishop's soul, revealed a third time, displayed itself in an apostolic state to its aforesaid purger, giving thanks to the Hugh who is both mentioned and to be remembered.

As the solemnity of the Lord's Nativity approached, the monks prepared themselves and all their things in the customary manner.

The venerable Father Hugh, now old, entered chapter and brought forth these words to all: "Know, brothers, that the benign Jesus has determined to be present at your solemnities. But on the contrary the wicked enemy labors through envy that he may be able to mingle some darkness with so great a splendor.

"For a certain brother"—plainly indicating himself—"this night saw the Mother of Mercy holding in her sweetest bosom the very Son whom she bore on the present night, while a multitude of holy angels stood by him with immense light.

"The same God as a boy exulted, and showed the joy of his heart by a gesture of the body and clapping of the hands.

“Turning to his mother, he said: ‘Do you see, Mother, the night of my Nativity which approaches, to be illuminated with joys, in which both the oracles of the prophets and the proclamations of the angels will be renewed, and all things celestial and terrestrial together will rejoice in my birth from you?

“‘Where now is the perfidy of my damned enemy? Where is his power by which, before this singular joy, he ruled the world?’

“The shameless one, hearing this, came out from his hiding place, presented himself from afar, and, ignominiously cast down, begged with much weeping and howling that he be admitted.

“‘Even if,’ he said, ‘I am admitted into no part of the church, I ought at least to be received in some place among the remaining monastic buildings.’

“But the Virgin’s Son said: ‘Go, Lucifer, and, lest you lament that you are prejudged by my power, attempt what you can.’

“Released, he sought the entrance to the chapter and, attempting to enter, could not. For he found himself so swollen and the entrance to the chapter so narrow that he was in no way able to enter.

“Truly, inflated by the old abscess of pride, he could not pass through the humble entrance.

“From there he directed his progress toward the brothers’ dormitory and, confident that he could disturb them with his customary phantasms, attempted to enter. But, repelled from the door by the same thickness of his body, he withdrew.

“At last he carried his hope of doing harm to the refectory. There, because of some small care for the body, he suspected greater carelessness of mind.

“There also he found so many obstacles from the reading of divine words, so many beams from the devotion of those hearing, and so many bars from the charity of those serving one another that, wholly unable to proceed farther, he was compelled to retreat.

“Thus, rejected from all the buildings of the monastery and from the sight of the most pious Redeemer and of the most glorious Virgin Mary his mother, that pestiferous one departed with the confusion which he deserved.

“Therefore be cautious, O brothers, and give thanks to the omnipotent and most merciful Lord, because he has repelled the most wicked enemy from us and himself remains to celebrate the feast with us.”

A certain man—to whom Saint Dionysius had appeared, admonishing him to go to Cluny because Abbot Hugh was about to migrate suddenly from this world—saw in spirit the beings above mingled with mortals, and, amid the company of monks, the Mother of God, the Star of the Sea, shining more brightly.

Her presence so terrified and put to flight certain figures appearing as archers, as a strong wind is accustomed to cast down autumn leaves.

Among these, Martin, the jewel of priests, and Benedict, the sun of abbots, leading Hugh’s spirit, placed it within a certain beautiful and most fertile vineyard, so that it might rejoice there and remain for a little while.

There Saint Hugh himself repeatedly invited me as I watched: “Eat, dearest one, of the white clusters which abound beyond measure for us, and make a solemn fellowship with me.

“For I shall rest here a little while, until a certain swelling which, as a dusty traveler, I contracted in my feet from a long circuit of lands subsides. But immediately, my steps having been healed and worldly dust shaken off, I shall pass freely to better things.

“Tell my successor Pontius to guard the treasures of humility and innocence, to apply himself to mercy by regarding the necessities of all as his own, and wisely to order the zeal of the monastic order by my example.

“For thus, acting manfully, he will obtain aid from God, who does not abandon those who hope in him.”

On the night on which Hugh died, a certain abbot saw two beds becomingly adorned raised to heaven by the hands of angels, and it was said to him that these were Hugh of Cluny and the archbishop of Canterbury.

Around the year of the Lord 1080, as Vincent relates in book twenty-six, chapter fifty-one of the Historical Mirror, after Sigebert, in the time of Pope Gregory VII and Emperor Henry, the Order of Canons Regular, first regularly instituted by the apostles and afterward by blessed Augustine, bishop and eminent doctor, began to flourish again in the church of blessed Quentin at Beauvais, under Master Ivo, the venerable provost of that same church and afterward bishop of Chartres, who after Isidore made the ancient compilation of decrees.

In diverse regions, however, this order and way of life is found dispersed, concerning which there is also a note in the law, as in On the State of Monks and Canons, chapter That the Fear of God.

Of this order were those distinguished men and doctors Hugh of Saint Victor, Richard of Saint Victor, and Hugh of Fouilloy, of whom mention will be made below.

Although in the course of time it had greatly collapsed, it flourished again in the regular life around the year of the Lord 1380, as will be said below.

The Order of Premonstratensians, of which mention will also be made below, seems also to belong to this Order of Canons Regular.

Chapter XVII

Around the same time, namely in the year of the Lord 1040, blessed John Gualbert was illustrious, the founder and institutor of the Order of Vallombrosa, serving under the Rule of blessed Benedict with certain constitutions of its members added above it and in a gray habit.

This religious order has many monasteries in Tuscany and also in upper Lombardy.

This glorious saint, therefore, was a native of the city of Florence, born of noble parents. His father was called Gualbert, a military man.

When John was a young man placed in the world, his father had mortal enmities with a certain man because that man had unjustly killed his kinsman; on account of this both John and his father sought vengeance.

It happened that one day blessed John Gualbert, together with his armor-bearer, undertook the road toward Florence, and that mortal enemy of his unexpectedly met him on a road so narrow that neither could turn aside to the other side.

Seeing this and, because he was unarmed, awaiting his death as it were, the enemy, suddenly trusting in John's clemency, leapt down from his horse and, prostrate upon the ground, with hands crossed at his breast, humbly asked that pardon be granted him for love of the Crucified.

Therefore John, pierced with compunction when he heard the name of the Crucified, resolved to spare him for love of Christ, who prayed for his crucifiers lest they perish.

He commanded him to rise from the ground and not to fear, because John had now forgiven the offense from his heart, so that God might forgive him his debts; rather, he might go safely wherever he wished.

Proceeding farther, blessed John entered a certain church of monks that he came upon, and, when he was before an image of the Crucified, he saw it incline its head toward him as though giving thanks to him because, out of reverence for it, he had spared his mortal enemy.

To this day that cross, as evidence of so great a miracle, is preserved with great veneration and care in the church of Saint Minias on the mountain near Florence, where there was formerly a monastery of black monks, but now of white monks, namely, those of Mount Olivet.

Therefore, drawn by a divine calling, John resolved to abandon the wicked world and to contemn all that was to perish, so that, naked, he might follow the naked cross of Christ.

Going to that monastery which was called Saint Minias, he humbly asked the abbot and brothers that the habit of holy religious life be granted to him.

When he had been received in the habit of a layman for some experience of religious conduct, as is customary, meanwhile his father Gualbert, hearing that his son was to be made a monk, came to the monastery demanding that his son be sent to him.

When John, questioned about this by the abbot, did not assent, the abbot feared that violence would be brought upon him by his father, who was an austere man, and it did not seem just to him that John should be compelled and exposed to danger.

Carried away by fury because his son was not sent to him, the father threatened that he would bring many evils upon the monastery if they received his son as a monk.

Therefore the monks feared greatly that, if they granted John the habit of religious life which he urgently sought, his father would inflict some notable harm upon the monastery.

When no one dared to deliver it to him, John himself, moved by fervor of spirit, cut the hair of his head by himself, then, seeing one of the brothers' cowls, took it and, setting it upon the altar in the church, joyfully put it on, while all the monks marveled and rejoiced.

Although his father, when he first saw him in the habit, grieved greatly and, made as though mad, cried out that he himself was abandoned and desolate, at length, consoled by the abbot and by his own son, he returned to himself, received consolation, and granted him his blessing, exhorting his son to perseverance.

Having therefore become a religious, John began to act not sluggishly, but to tame the flesh with fasts, abstinence from food and drink, and vigils; greatly to avoid idleness, the sewer of vices; and to apply himself to prayers and devout meditations.

He was fragrant to all with the perfection of humility, patience, obedience, and all virtues.

But when, a little afterward, the abbot migrated from this light, the brothers, coming together as one, unanimously elected the aforesaid John as abbot.

The man of God humbly refused this office, desiring rather to be subject than to preside, not being ignorant that the higher the place in which someone is found, the greater the danger in which he is engaged.

Not so the impious, not so: with ambition spurring and simony working, through right and wrong, seeking ascent through steep places, they rush into the precipice.

Hence a certain man from the said monastery, moved by cupidity, procured for himself from the bishop of Florence, through money, governance of the said abbey.

When the man of the Lord learned this, he secretly departed thence with another monk who favored him.

Entering the city, they came to a certain great old man named Teuzo, who had enclosed himself in a certain little cell beside the monastery of Saint Mary in the city of Florence, and to whom very many flowed together for counsels expedient to salvation.

This man of God greatly detested the vice of simony, which then, like leprosy, had infected many in the Church of God.

Therefore John sought counsel from him whether he ought to serve under a simoniacal abbot in his monastery, or what it was fitting for him to do.

He gave John this counsel: that with his companion, in the public forum of the city and before all, they should proclaim the bishop and abbot to be simoniacs, and thereafter yield the place to powerful fortune.

Although this counsel was contrary to the common laws, John nevertheless simply put it into execution.

When this had been done, he brought great and fearful horror upon many, certain supporters of the bishop crying out that such a defamer of so great a man was guilty of death, while others excused him; and, rescued from the tumult, he scarcely escaped secretly from the hands of the bishop's friends.

After these things, on the counsel of that recluse, he departed from his homeland and, traveling about with his companion, sought what better place might have them for serving God.

On the road, he commanded that the one loaf which alone his companion had preserved for their refreshment be presented as alms to a poor man who met them and sought alms, casting his thought upon the Lord, who gives food to all in due season.

His confidence was not frustrated, for when they reached a certain castle, abundant provision was made for them by many persons.

Coming to the Camaldolese hermitage, they remained there for no little time, contemplating the conduct and life of the inhabitants, which was holy but eremitical.

When those who had received them exhorted them to that religious life and to remain, blessed John, desiring the cenobitic life more, as being safer than the solitary life, determined to depart thence and to institute a new congregation in another place under the Rule of blessed Benedict.

Hence, coming with his companion to Vallombrosa, he was devoutly received by two religious men who served the Lord there.

Taking pleasure in the place, he fixed upon dwelling there, a poor wooden house having been constructed.

The Lord did not suffer the lamp to remain long beneath a bushel; rather, the fame of John's sanctity, gradually diffused through neighboring places, caused many laymen and clerics to begin to flow together to that religious life for the sake of visitation, and some also for the sake of conversion.

Among them were Herizo, Albert, Teuzo, Rudolph, Peter also, who afterward was cardinal bishop of Albano, and many others.

A certain abbess of Saint Hilary in those regions, to whose monastery the right and lordship of the said place belonged, having heard of the virtues of blessed John and his companions and conceived devotion toward them, sent them some assistance of books and provisions.

Afterward, with the consent of her chapter, she gave them the place by a public document, together with many good possessions.

When those monks had now sufficiently increased both in number and in merit, it pleased all that they should set blessed John himself over them as abbot.

Although unwilling and resisting greatly, they placed him in the higher seat to rule them. At length, lest he seem to resist the will of God, he acquiesced.

Having assumed the office, he began diligently to inspect the meaning of the Rule of blessed Benedict which they had professed, and to apply himself with all his strength to its observance.

He forbade the monks ever to go outside the limits of the cloister except for the necessities of the monastery and with due permission.

He established that at night a light should never be lacking in the dormitory any more than in the oratory.

Leading them to cheapness and fewness of garments, and also exhorting them to bear hairshirts, he commanded mixed cloth to be made from the various wool of their sheep, so that garments might be formed from it.

What he taught others he himself strove to fulfill first and more perfectly.

For he was assiduous in prayer, expansive in charity, gentle in humility, constant in patience, rigid in rebuking vices, kind toward penitents, and mature in gravity of conduct in all things.

He was preeminent in abstinence, content with the smallest quantity of food and drink, which might ward off death, not minister delights.

From the excessive austerity of his life he incurred so great a weakness of body that, his stomach broken, he fell into that fainting sickness which we read blessed Gregory to have suffered, and, unless the brothers frequently refreshed him, he seemed about to give up his spirit.

Those who knew him know that he endured this illness until his death. Ascribing it to his own sins, he tolerated it most patiently.

It is believed that this was perhaps done by divine dispensation, so that, taught by experience from his own weakness, he might learn how he ought to pity others.

For whereas previously, because of his austerity, there was scarcely anyone who could observe his institutes, when thus weakened he was made of so great discretion and so great mercy toward all that no one seemed more humane than he.

He received very many oblates and converts, whom he sent to exterior works so that the monks might have less occasion to wander about and more opportunity to be free for prayer.

At that time, King Henry, coming to Florence, when he had heard many distinguished things concerning blessed John's virtues, conceived affection toward him and, at the exhortation of the aforesaid Teuzo, sent a catholic bishop to the said monastery of Vallombrosa to consecrate the greater altar.

After some years Ubertus, cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, consecrated the whole church together with two other altars.

During the same time, many noble faithful, drawn by the odor of their sanctity, offered places for constructing other monasteries.

Others asked him to take dissolved monasteries under his governance and reform them according to the aforesaid standard.

Then he newly constructed the monastery of Saint Salvius, another at Moscheta, another at Razzuolo, and a fourth at Monte Scalario.

He also received the already ancient monastery of Passignano to be reformed, and another of Saint Reparata in Romagna.

He made provosts for each of these and frequently visited them, correcting the things which required it.

Concerning his love of poverty and humility: he was a true lover of poverty, displaying and teaching it in all things.

Hence, when he visited the monastery of Moscheta and saw houses grander and more beautiful than seemed to accord with their poverty, he said with a most severe countenance to Lord Rudolph, abbot of that place: "In this place, from your own will, you have fashioned palaces at great expense with which very many poor people could have been refreshed."

Turning toward a certain small stream flowing nearby, he said: "Omnipotent God, who has been accustomed to make great things from the least, may I soon see, through the smallness of this stream, vengeance upon this enormous building."

Having said these things, he departed without delay from the place as though he abominated it.

Immediately after the saint departed, the stream began to increase and, gathering most abundant currents of waters, left its own channel, rushed headlong from the mountain, drew ledges of rocks and trees with it, and overturned the aforesaid houses from their foundations.

Hence, the abbot of the said place, disturbed with the brothers, determined to move the monastery from that place.

The pious father kindly consoled them, saying: “Do not fear, nor move the place, because the stream will harm you no farther.”

This prophecy of his has indeed remained true and firm down to the present.

On another occasion, when he heard that a certain man coming to conversion had written his whole patrimony into a charter, depriving his successors of their inheritance, and had brought it with him to the monastery, he immediately went to that monastery and commanded the abbot who had received the charter to bring it to him without delay.

When he had received it, he tore it into small pieces and cast its fragments upon the ground.

It seemed more just to him to live with scant things than to become proud with multiplied riches.

Then, greatly moved by zeal for holy poverty, he invoked God and his apostle that they avenge him upon that monastery, and immediately departed in anger.

When he had not gone far, fire suddenly began there and burned a great part of that monastery.

When his companion saw the conflagration and announced it to him, he neither looked back nor returned to the place, but pursued his journey to Vallombrosa, his own place.

Furthermore, when he resided in the said monastery and Pope Stephen passed through neighboring places, the pope, having heard his celebrated fame, sent honorable persons as messengers to him, asking that he present himself before the apostolic sight.

But because John was ill and could not go to His Holiness, the apostolic man sent the messengers back after the incapacity had been explained to them, perhaps doubting whether through humility John considered himself unworthy to appear before him or wished to remain hidden.

He commanded that, if John could not go otherwise, he should cause himself to be carried upon a bed.

Blessed John, hearing the intention of the lord pope, entered the church, asking the Lord that without scandal and disobedience he provide in some manner that John not have to be presented before the Supreme Pontiff.

Therefore, rising from his bed before the apostolic messengers, he commanded certain converts to come to him so that they might carry him before the lord pope.

But when they had departed a little distance from the monastery, the air was immediately greatly disturbed, and an excess of winds and an immensity of rains burst forth together.

The legates, seeing this and ascribing it to a miracle of God, judged him to be a true man of God and caused him to be carried back to the monastery, reporting this to the most blessed pontiff.

The pope did not cause him to be summoned any farther on this account, but commanded that he be left in his repose and pray to the Lord for the happy state of the Church.

Section II

The grace of the discernment of spirits was also not lacking to him, and he abounded in the prophetic spirit, pronouncing and manifesting by revelation secrets of men known to God alone.

When someone approached the monastery, before he was received John knew from his appearance whether his spirit was from God.

When he was in the monastery of Passignano, a certain man came to him asserting that he wished to abandon the world.

John first repelled him; but at length, overcome by the insistence of the man seeking mercy, as a most pious father he received him.

When the man, as is customary at the beginning of conversion, made confession, he confessed certain sins but was ashamed to confess greater ones. He was called Gerard.

One day the father said to him: “Brother Gerard, why have you presumed thus to deceive me?”

He replied: “In what have I deceived you, holy father?”

Calling him aside, John said to him secretly: “In this you have deceived me, but you have deceived yourself more: you did not confess completely. For on the day of the Lord’s Epiphany and its vigil you committed adultery with the wife of such a man, which you concealed in confession.

“And, what is worse, not content with these things, you resolved to repeat the crime.”

Recognizing his sin, which he understood to have been divinely revealed to the man of God although it was hidden, Gerard prostrated himself at his feet and with tears sought pardon, doing penance.

Likewise, when a certain noble and rich man named Ubald, very familiar with the servant of God, had fallen ill unto death, his wife, expecting her husband’s passage from this world, sent one of her household named Benzo to the man of God to intimate to him her husband’s imminent departure.

Coming swiftly to John, who then remained at Monte Scalario, when he had disclosed the things entrusted to him, blessed John, turning his eyes toward the east and making prayer for the sick man, said to the messenger: “Return to your own place, because the man whom you left laboring at the extremity of life you will find sound and joyful.”

By this deed he both healed the sick man and manifested the hidden matter.

When the man of God then resided in the monastery of Passignano, Pope Leo, passing with his curia beside the aforesaid monastery, halted so that they might take refreshment.

Then blessed John asked his steward whether he had fish to offer to the most blessed pontiff.

When he learned that none were present, he commanded certain converts to go fishing at a certain river or lake nearby.

Although all asserted that fish were not found there, he nevertheless commanded them to go and to believe entirely that the Lord’s protection would be present.

This followed: while they fished, two great pikes were caught, and blessed John himself presented them, when brought, to the lord pope amid the wonder of all.

The lord pope received this gift most gratefully.

Section III

Concerning his generosity toward the poor: clothed with the inward parts of piety, he himself, though poor, succored the needy in many ways.

For compassion had grown with him from infancy.

Hence, when the venerable Father John returned from visiting others to his monastery of Vallombrosa, mindful of the need by which very many were oppressed, he called the steward Godfrey and the procurator named Rusticus and said to them: “Let us inspect our granary to see in what condition it is.”

When he found it abundantly filled, he said: “Very many are oppressed by hunger under present necessity, but you abound.”

Therefore he commanded that a certain vessel holding five modii, or thereabouts, be brought and filled with grain.

From the third hour until the ninth he himself distributed it with grateful generosity to the poor who came, and nevertheless the granary from which it was taken remained full as before.

When the want of famine also pressed vehemently, the blessed father, standing before the doors of the monastery of Deramvolo and seeing the monastery’s herd of cows grazing upon the mountain ridge, and having nothing to distribute to the poor who sought sustenance, prayed, saying: “O Saint Paul, if you will grant one of the cows for the poor—”

Immediately one of them fell dead below, and he commanded that its flesh be given to the poor.

When it had been distributed, he prayed in like manner that a second, third, and fourth be given to him, all of which he distributed to the poor.

For this reason the herdsmen, made sad by their death, led the herd from the other side of the mountain.

But the man, desiring to succor the petition of the poor and having no source from which to do so, prayed with tears, saying: “Saint Paul, these men seek to flee you by changing place, but they cannot flee you, who are the patron of this place.

“You who preached mercy and the distribution of alms, grant me a source from which I may be able to sustain the poor.”

Immediately five of the cows fell, and the father commanded that the dead animals be distributed to the poor.

But the herdsmen, observing this, began to complain harshly against him because of this loss, saying that he would do better to return to his monastery of Vallombrosa than to remain there with so great a loss to them.

He answered them placidly: “I see that you have been made sad over this matter. But do not fear, because no more of them will perish.”

This also was done.

On another occasion, when he did not have loaves to give, he commanded that all the milk of the animals be distributed to the poor.

He also sold the copes offered to the abbey of Vallombrosa in a time of necessity and distributed the price to the poor.

He was abundant in miracles, for he restored many sick persons to health.

Hence, when a certain sick man named Florentius had a son near death from illness, he came to the venerable Father John, who was then at Saint Salvius, seeking health for his son.

The saint answered him: “These are not his works, but those of the apostles.”

But when the man persisted in pressing with prayers, John, overcome by compassion, prayed for him with the brothers, and immediately he was healed.

At a certain time, when the brothers were oppressed by extreme want, so that only three loaves were present in the monastery, the blessed father commanded them to be divided and a piece given to each.

Nevertheless, considering that necessity has no law, he arranged with the cellarer that one ram be killed and, when cooked, given to the brothers.

“Today,” he said, “we are in want, but tomorrow we shall abound.”

Therefore, sitting at table during the meal, each ate the small piece of bread placed before him.

All were horrified at the meat placed before them to be eaten, and they were unwilling to touch it out of reverence for the rule that was to be observed.

On the following day, according to the blessed man’s prophecy, certain men came to the monastery of Saint Salvius with several animals laden with grain and flour, asserting that they had been sent by noble persons; but who those persons were could not be discovered.

The same thing happened on another occasion.

For when bread was lacking to the brothers he had commanded cooked beef to be set before them, and they did not dare touch it.

As Saint John prayed, a certain man knocked at the door of the monastery. The cellarer, going to him, found him bringing many loaves in cloths.

Taking them, he carried them to the brothers’ table, while they gave thanks to God, who gives food in due season.

When the cellarer returned to the bearer to inquire the name of the sender, he was found no more.

For that baker had sent him who furnished bread from heaven to the Hebrews in the desert.

A certain man full of insanity, when he was being sent to Passignano so that treatment might be applied to him, crossed the river Arno in a little boat with others and, compelled by madness, cast himself into the middle of the river.

But by the power of God and the merits of the saint he reached the riverbank unharmed.

When a certain brother had fallen ill in the monastery of Vallombrosa, the man of God delivered with his own hand the medicine appointed for him.

When this had been done, another cause arising, he hastened to another place.

But the sick man, not guarding himself carefully, grew worse and expired after a few days.

As is customary to act for the dead, the subprior announced his death by letters throughout the whole congregation, for the sake of his commemoration.

Meanwhile, the man of God, returning to the place and hearing of the brother's passage, sought to know the cause of his death.

When it had been explained to him, he commanded that the brother's memory be erased throughout the whole congregation because of his disobedience in not carefully guarding himself.

While this was observed and no one prayed for him, after the passage of some days the deceased appeared in clear daylight to another brother.

When he had declared himself to be the one who had migrated and was asked concerning his condition, he answered: "I am excommunicated and segregated by Father John from the fellowship of the faithful"—which is to be understood with regard to suffrages.

The other said: "In what manner, brother, can we help you?"

He said: "If Saint John reconciles me."

When he disappeared, the brother to whom he had appeared went to Saint John and related what he had seen and heard.

The pious father, tempering severity with mercy, commanded that the office and alms be performed in the monastery and throughout the whole congregation.

When these had been completed, after thirty days the deceased again appeared to the same brother, cheerful and festive, giving thanks to John, who had reconciled him; and, freed from penalties, he passed to the company of the saints.

A certain other man named Florentius, of urbane and civil eloquence, who had been greatly stained by simoniacal perfidy through his defense of a certain bishop, when held by a most grievous illness asserted that he was altogether near death.

Amid grievous lamentations and frequent sobs, however, he sought the habit of the Order from the holy man through his friends.

John granted him the habit of probation without much delay.

When, after receiving it, he had now recovered and walked about the monastery cloisters supported by a staff, his former illness returned, so that he appeared near death.

When the holy man heard this, he came with several brothers to the sick man's bed, commending to the Lord the man who was about to die very soon.

The sick man began to cover his face with the cloak with which he was covered.

When the saint asked the reason for this, he answered, fearing and trembling: "Because I behold the devil standing nearby, from whose mouth issues a flame of marvelous magnitude, and from his nostrils sulfurous smoke."

Saint John said: "Where is he? In what part?"

When the sick man indicated the place, blessed John took the cross from the hand of the one holding it and struck the devil forcefully with it. He immediately vanished like smoke.

Hence the sick man cried out, saying: "Thanks be to God. Behold, the devil flees; behold, he has departed. And behold, blessed Mary and Saint Peter and Saint Benedict."

Having said these things, he breathed forth his spirit.

Section V

Concerning the greatest persecution which blessed John suffered with his monks because of the crime of simony perpetrated by the bishop of Florence, who was called Peter, a native of Pavia, and had obtained that dignity through simony.

Blessed John, with his brothers, asserted that Peter, bishop of Florence, was not only a simoniac but also a heretic because of that vice, and that therefore abstention must be made from his sacred rites.

Hence a most powerful contention arose among the clergy and people of Florence, some defending the bishop, while the others commended the monks for the liberty with which they detested that vice.

Because sedition frequently arose among men on that matter on both sides, the wicked Peter thought that he could repel from himself so great a wheel raised against him if he caused those monks to be killed, so that by their example others opposed to him might be terrified.

Therefore, in the night, an armed multitude of foot soldiers and horsemen was sent to the monastery of Saint Salvius, where they believed blessed John to reside, although on the preceding day he had departed thence for Vallombrosa.

The ministers of darkness violently entered the place and attacked the monks whom they found, cruelly wounding them, leaping upon the lambs like wolves.

Neither murmur nor complaint sounded from the monks, but they patiently bore the injuries inflicted, giving thanks to God, the infallible Truth, who had made them worthy to suffer for him.

Not content with these things, the bishop's retainers plundered the monastery and set fire to it.

But from the source from which the enemy believed that he would acquire victory and his own exaltation, he found loss and confusion.

For many who had formerly been supporters of the bishop, seeing so great an impiety, became helpers of the monks.

Therefore, on the following day, when their crime had been made known, many came to the place and, seeing its desolation, provided for the monks in many ways.

Blessed John also, after a report of this had been made to him, came himself and, seeing his brothers scourged, naked, and beaten, said: "Now you are truly monks. But why did you wish to suffer these things without me? For I grieve greatly because I did not merit to become a participant in your crowns."

Therefore the monks, proceeding to Rome with their friends and steadfastly proclaiming Peter, the Florentine prelate, publicly to be a heretic and simoniac, offered to enter fire to prove this crime.

But Pope Alexander, who then presided in the chair of Peter, was willing neither to depose the accused man nor to receive proof by fire from the monks; for the greater part of the bishops who had assembled for the general synod favored the bishop and opposed the monks.

Hildebrand the archdeacon, however, afterward Pope Gregory VII, favored John's party and stood forth as his defender.

A certain Duke Godfrey supported the bishop's party to such a degree that he even threatened the monks with death.

Thus, while this controversy endured, those who adhered to John, both laymen and clerics, suffered many injuries from their adversaries.

Among them was the archpriest of the greater church and prior, who, because he adhered to John, was expelled from the city.

At length the monks offered to those zealous for their bishop that they would pass through fire; and if, as they trusted, they escaped unharmed, those men should agree with them concerning the bishop's simony. But if not, they too would venerate the bishop with the others and profess him immune from simony.

The proposal pleased all. A place and day were appointed so that those who wished might be able to behold what was to be done.

The place determined for this proof was the monastery of Settimo, which then belonged to the said Order but now belongs to the Cistercians. The appointed day was the Wednesday after the first Sunday of Lent.

The manner of the proof was that two piles of wood should be placed beside one another in a public place, each ten feet long, five wide, and four and one-half high; and that between the two pyres a path one arm's breadth wide, strewn with burning coals, should remain, through which one of the monks should pass.

When the appointed day and hour came, the bishop was invited by his supporters to come and behold the trial of so great a matter, lest the city labor so long under so great a dispute.

He wholly refused this; indeed, he forbade those who loved him to go there.

But all the people of both sexes and the greater part of the clergy proceeded to the place.

Those adhering to the bishop pledged that, if the result of the offered proof followed, so that one of the monks passed through the fire unharmed, they would hold with the monks and abandon the bishop.

Litanies and other prayers were made by the monks. Mass was solemnly sung by one of them, an abbot, with clerics and monks assisting.

When they came to the Agnus Dei in the Mass, one of the monks brought holy water for sprinkling, another a thurible for incensing, a third torches for kindling the wood, and a fourth an image of the Crucified.

The Lord Jesus Christ and his mother were invoked by all with full voice, that he might show the truth of the matter.

When Mass had been completed and the chasuble laid aside, the priest who had celebrated, an abbot called Peter, carried the cross of Christ in his hand.

After the litanies had been said, one of the abbots was chosen to explain everything to the people in a sonorous voice: the condition of the petition and of the promise.

When these things had been completed, that aforesaid Peter the monk, with the cross in his hand, while Saint John standing there prayed, entered through the midst of the masses of fire, the flame rising on high, and trod the burning coals kindled in the path between the piles of wood.

Before entering, however, he made this prayer while all heard:

“Lord Jesus Christ, true light of all who believe in you, I seek your mercy; I implore your clemency: if Peter of Pavia, who is called bishop of Florence, seized the Florentine see through the intervention of money, now you, Son of the eternal Father, my salvation, hasten to aid me in this fearsome judgment.

“Preserve me unharmed, without any mark of burning, just as formerly you saved the three boys unharmed in the furnace of burning fire at Babylon.”

Thus he passed without any sign of burning upon his body or garments.

When he had reached the extremity of the burning fire and wished to return by the same path, he was seized by the people lest he return, since they had been openly instructed by the power that had been demonstrated.

They could not be satisfied with his presence, some kissing his hands, others his feet, and the rest his garments. The one who could touch even the fringe of his garment judged himself blessed.

Thus Simon Peter was raised up with great praises, but Simon Magus was trampled by all like dung; and Peter, not the apostle but the simoniacal bishop, was proclaimed by all and avoided as a heretic.

By solemn letters the community signified the whole course of the deed to the Supreme Pontiff Alexander, humbly supplicating that, just as Simon Peter condemned Simon Magus with a curse, so he should depose Peter, bishop of Florence, from that dignity and His Holiness deign to grant another.

This also was done, justice requiring it, to remove the scandal, and provision was made for the city of Florence with another bishop.

After these things the blessed father, worn out by old age, fell ill unto death.

The abbots having been assembled from diverse places, he foretold his departure from this world and exhorted all to observance of the rule, unity, and brotherly love.

Having devoutly received the holy sacraments, he rendered his uncontaminated spirit to heaven in the year of the Lord’s Incarnation 1073, on the fourth day before the Ides of July.

On the third day he was buried in the church of the monastery of Passignano.

After his passage omnipotent God performed many miracles through him.

Chapter XVIII

The Order of Cistercians, serving under the Rule of blessed Benedict but with many other constitutions added, approved by the Church, greatly privileged, and diffused through the world, had its beginning in 1098 under a certain Abbot Stephen.

But a little afterward it was marvelously enlarged through blessed Bernard, of whom extensive mention will be made in another title.

Its beginning occurred in this manner.

Certain venerable and devout men, relying upon the counsel of Hugh, archbishop of the church of Lyon and then legate of the Apostolic See, of the religious man Walter, bishop of Chalon, and also of the most illustrious prince Odo, duke of Burgundy, and strengthened by their authority, began to establish the wilderness which they had found as an abbey.

Robert having been appointed abbot and receiving the care and pastoral staff from the bishop of that diocese, namely the bishop of Chalon, the others under him confirmed their stability in that same place.

But after not much time it happened that this same Abbot Robert, sought by the monks of Molesme, was restored to Molesme by command of Pope Urban II, with the permission and assent of Walter, bishop of Chalon, and Alberic, a religious and holy man, was substituted in his place.

This mediator of peace was retained between the two churches and confirmed by apostolic authority: from that time neither of them should receive any monk of the other to dwell there without regular commendation.

When this had been done, the new monastery, by the solicitude and industry of its new father and with God cooperating, shortly advanced not moderately in holy religion and conduct, became illustrious by reputation, and increased in necessary goods.

In the time of William II, king of England, as Vincent writes in the place cited above, the Cistercian religious life began.

It pertains to the glory of the English that England bore so great a man, who was both author and mediator of this religious life.

He was named Harding, who is otherwise called Stephen. A monk at Sherborne from boyhood, afterward, having cast off those garments, he immediately went to Scotland and then to France, where he studied for some years.

Thereafter he went to Rome with a clerical companion. Going and returning, they sang the whole Psalter every day.

Then, returning to Burgundy, he was tonsured in the new and great monastery at Molesme.

When certain things were proposed there to be observed which were not from the Rule, he began to inquire into their rationale and disputed so long with one and another concerning certain superfluous things that he brought the abbot himself and seventeen others into his opinion.

Therefore they came to Cîteaux, a place formerly saline, and remained there through the support of the archbishop of Vienne, who afterward became pope.

At length the abbot who had come with them, being sought by his monks, returned to them as though compelled.

All who had come with him from Molesme returned with him except eight, who appointed a certain Alberic from among themselves as abbot and made Harding, who is also called Stephen, prior.

Vincent in the place cited above relates these matters somewhat more fully, namely, that the monastery named Molesme, situated in the bishopric of Langres, is known to be most celebrated in fame and conspicuous in religious life.

From its beginning, in a short time divine clemency illuminated it with great gifts of grace, ennobled it with illustrious men, and rendered it no less ample in possessions than illustrious.

But because there is not usually a lasting fellowship between possessions and virtues, wise men from that holy congregation, understanding more deeply, chose rather to be occupied in heavenly studies than to be entangled in earthly affairs.

Hence, as lovers of virtues, they immediately began to think concerning poverty fruitful in men; and at the same time they observed that, although life there was holy and honorable, nevertheless the very Rule which they had professed was observed less than accorded with their desire and purpose.

They spoke to one another of what moved each individually, and considered together how they might fulfill that verse: “I shall render to you my vows which my lips have uttered.”

Why say more? Twenty-one monks, together with the father of that monastery, Robert of blessed memory, went out by common counsel and strove to complete by common assent what they had conceived in one spirit.

Therefore, after many labors and excessive difficulties, which all who wish to live piously in Christ must suffer, having at length obtained their desire, they came to Cîteaux, then a place of horrible and vast solitude.

But the soldiers of Christ, judging that they ought not to distrust the harshness of the place because of the strict purpose which they had already conceived in mind, held the place as pleasing as though truly divinely prepared for them, just as they held their dear purpose.

In the first year of Emperor Henry V and in the year 1107 from the Lord's Incarnation, as Vincent relates from the sayings of Sigebert in book twenty-seven of the Historical Mirror, the Charter of Charity was made by Stephen, abbot of Cîteaux, and twenty abbots, and confirmed by the authority of the apostolic seal.

From that time they cast out from the Order fleeces and pelisses, woolen fabrics, hoods, breeches, combs, bedcovers and bedding, diverse courses of foods in the refectory, fat, and all things which opposed the purity of the Rule.

They also renounced churches, altars, offerings, tithes, burials of other men, ovens, mills, villages, and rustics, because neither in the life of Saint Benedict nor in his Rule did they read that the same saint possessed things of this kind, that women entered his monastery, or that dead women were buried there, except his sister Saint Scholastica.

They said that tithes were divided by the holy fathers into four portions: one for the bishop; another for the priest or cleric; a third for the guesthouse, for those coming to the church, or for widows and the sick, or the poor who had no other sustenance; and the fourth for restoration of the church.

Because in this reckoning they did not find the person of the monk who possesses his own lands, whence they might live by laboring both themselves and through their livestock, they refused to usurp this for themselves unjustly as the right of others.

The said Abbot Stephen was a most ardent lover and most faithful emulator of religious life, poverty, and regular discipline even before he was abbot.

Hence Helinand says in book forty-seven of his history: "I remember that I heard Master Peter the Chanter of Paris, a most just and learned man, relate concerning Stephen, abbot of Cîteaux, that when one day his cellarer announced to him that nothing was held in the monastery whereby the brothers' poverty could be sustained even for one day, he answered: 'Saddle two asses for us.'

"When they had been saddled, he caused his lay brother to mount with him and commanded him to beg bread from door to door in a certain village for the brothers' use, while he himself did likewise in another village.

"After they had done this and came together at the one place which he had designated, it happened that, as they were now returning, they met at the aforesaid place.

"Behold, the abbot saw that the lay brother's sack was much fuller than his own and said, smiling: 'Where did you beg? As I see, you gathered in thicker straw than I. Where, I pray, did you gather? Who gave you more?'

"The lay brother answered: 'That priest whom you know very well almost alone filled my whole sack.'

"Hearing this, the abbot groaned and said: 'Woe to us! Why did you receive anything from him? Did you not know that that priest was ordained simoniacally, and that whatever he receives from his church is leprosy and robbery?

"'The Lord lives: we shall taste absolutely nothing of all that he gave you. Far be it that we eat his sin and incorporate it into ourselves.'

"Having summoned the shepherds of sheep who were not far away, he emptied the whole sack of the lay brother into their bosoms."

Fifteen years thereafter blessed Bernard entered this Cistercian Order and marvelously exalted and multiplied it, so that 160 monasteries of the said Order were built during his lifetime.

But mention will be made of him below in another title.

Chapter XIX

In the year of the Lord 1120 the Order of Premonstratensians began.

The man of God Norbert stood forth as founder both of the place and of the Order, as Vincent writes in book twenty-seven, chapter twenty-eight of the Historical Mirror.

He was a native of the regions of Lotharingia, distinguished by lineage, riches, and eloquence, familiar and very well known even to the highest princes.

Inflamed with divine fervor, the pomp of the world having been set aside, he was suddenly ordained deacon and priest together according to his vow, put on the tunic of Christ's poverty, and, applying himself most fervently to the word of preaching and bearing his own cross, naked followed the naked Christ.

Having also examined the conduct of certain religious men, he undertook a purpose of stricter life and a rigor unheard of in those times; and for some time, walking with bare feet even in wintry cold and scattering the word of God, he converted many from error.

Finally, when Pope Gelasius had come into Gaul and conducted synodal causes in the province of Saint Giles, the man of God Norbert, walking with bare feet as he was, came to him and, disclosing the purpose of his mind, received from him license and authority to sow the word of God.

At length, specially commended by Pope Calixtus to Bartholomew, bishop of Laon, when the church of blessed Martin was offered to him by that bishop, he abandoned it both because of the nearness of the city and because the clerics set over that church abhorred his purpose and the austerity of his life.

When diverse places in that province suitable for religious life had been shown to him by the bishop, at length, divinely inspired, he settled in the place of Prémontré and there began to lead a solitary and religious life.

In the time of Lent, going out alone to gather companions, he returned before Easter with thirteen companions and with these began to serve together in the place of Prémontré according to the standard of the canonical institution and the tenor of the Rule of blessed Augustine.

In the Premonstratensian church, while a certain brother at Matins thought too deeply concerning the ineffable Trinity which is God, a demon stood by him and appeared bearing three heads, declaring that it was the Trinity and affirming that, because of the merit of his faith, he was worthy of a vision of the Trinity.

But the brother, recognizing the deceit of the enemy, compelled it by abuse to depart from him.

While Norbert preached the word of God at Vingella and exorcised a demoniac girl brought before him, the demon, mocking, uttered the Song of Songs through the girl's mouth from beginning to end and interpreted it word for word first in the Roman and then in the German tongue.

But when the servant of God pressed more closely, it at length went out.

When Norbert came to Cologne to seek relics of saints and his men applied themselves to prayers during the said fast, one of the eleven thousand virgins, specially designating her name and the place where she lay, was solemnly raised on the following day and was translated by him with other relics of saints to the place of Prémontré.

On the following day, keeping vigil in prayer at Saint Gereon, when morning came he commanded digging in the middle of the church, where no trace of a burial appeared.

He found the complete body of Saint Gereon without the brain, honorably and carefully placed, just as it is read concerning him that a part of his head and not the whole was cut off.

It was raised with honor and reverence by the clergy and people, and a part of it was given to the man of God.

Returning thence to Prémontré and now having forty clerics with him together with many laymen, he taught them to make profession according to the apostolic institution and the canonical Rule of blessed Augustine, and diligently instructed them in voluntary poverty and the other instruments of spiritual warfare.

In the aforesaid year, in the church of Vincelliacum, on the vigil of the passing of blessed Mary Magdalene, by an uncertain but just judgment of God, innumerable persons of mixed sex, age, and order were burned when the church suddenly caught fire in the very twilight of night and day.

Chapter XX

At this same time also, as Vincent writes in the place cited above, namely in the year 1120 from the Incarnation, the Order of the Templar soldiery began, who are called the Knights of Saint John of Jerusalem.

They live under the Rule of blessed Augustine, having a black habit in the lay manner but with a white cross upon the breast; they are commonly called brothers and are appointed to fight bodily against the infidels.

Their principal place is the island of Rhodes. All the other oratories dispersed throughout the world, which are many and wealthy, are subject to it, namely to the Grand Master of Rhodes.

Because few of them are clerics, although they are religious and enjoy the personal and real privilege of clerics, they commonly say their Hours or Office by means of the Lord's Prayer, that is, the Our Father.

Bernard, in his sermons, first commends so great a religious life, teaches what manner of conduct they ought to have and from what things they ought to abstain, and finally inveighs against those who do not preserve things congruent with their state.

For thus he says, writing to the Knights of the Temple:

"A new kind of knighthood is heard recently to have arisen in the lands, one unexperienced in all ages, which fights tirelessly in a twofold conflict together: both against flesh and blood and against spiritual things of wickedness in heavenly places.

"What should one fear, whether living or dying, for whom to live is Christ and to die is gain?

"Rejoice, strong athlete, if you live and conquer in the Lord; but exult and glory still more if you die and are joined to the Lord.

"If those who die in the Lord are blessed, much more are those who die for the Lord.

"O secure life, where there is a pure conscience! O truly holy and safe knighthood, altogether free from that twofold danger by which this race of men is accustomed frequently to be endangered in the soldiery of the world, where Christ is not the cause of fighting.

"For whenever you who serve in secular warfare engage in battle, it is wholly to be feared either that you may kill the enemy in body but yourself in soul, or perhaps that you may be killed by him both in body and soul.

"For either the danger or the victory of a Christian is weighed from the affection of the heart, not from the outcome of the battle."

And below the same Bernard says:

"For the confusion of soldiers who plainly serve not God but the devil, let us speak briefly of the life and conduct of the knights of Christ, so that it may become manifest how greatly the soldiery of God and the soldiery of the world differ from one another.

"For they live in common under the obedience of one man, without wives and children and without any property of their own.

"At no time do they either sit idle or wander curiously anywhere. Rather, whenever they are not marching forth, lest they eat their bread without cost, they mend what is torn or repair what is old in their arms or garments, or put in order what is disordered, and finally do whatever the will of their master and the common necessity declares must be done.

"There is no acceptance of persons among them. Deference is shown to the better man, not to the more noble.

"An insolent word, a useless deed, immoderate laughter, murmuring, even if slight, or whispering is in no way left uncorrected wherever it is detected.

"They detest chess and other such things. They abhor hunting, nor, as is customary, do they delight in that sportive plundering by birds.

"They reject and abominate mimes, magicians, storytellers, scurrilous songs, and spectacles of games as vanities and false insanities.

"They cut their hair, knowing according to the Apostle that it is a disgrace for a man if he nourishes long hair.

"Never groomed and rarely washed, but rather bristling with neglected hair, foul with dust, and darkened by armor and heat, when battle threatens they fortify themselves inwardly with faith and outwardly with iron, not gold, so that, armed and not adorned, they may strike fear into their enemies and not provoke avarice.

“They desire to have strong and swift horses, yet not brightly colored or caparisoned ones, for they think of battle, not pomp, of victory, but not vain glory, and strive to be an object of fear rather than of admiration.

“But when they have come to the contest, their former gentleness having been put aside, as though they were saying, ‘Did I not hate those who hated you, O Lord?’ and so forth, they rush against their adversaries, reckoning them as sheep; for they have learned not to presume upon their own strength, but to hope for victory from the might of the Lord of Hosts, for whom they trust it is easy, according to the saying of the Maccabees, for many to be enclosed in the hands of a few, because victory in war is not in the multitude of an army, but confidence is from heaven.

“Thus, in a certain wonderful and singular manner, they are seen to be both gentler than lambs and fiercer than lions. Neither the gentleness of the monk nor the fortitude of the soldier is lacking in them.

“What must be said concerning this except that this was done by the Lord and is wonderful in our eyes? For God chose such men for himself and gathered ministers from the strongest of Israel out of the ends of the earth, that they might vigilantly and faithfully guard the bed of Solomon, that is, the sepulcher, all holding swords in their hands and most highly trained for wars.”

But the same Bernard inveighs against them concerning their pomps and desires, saying:

“What is this, O soldiers, so astonishing an error and madness: to serve as soldiers with such great expenses and labors, but with no wages except either death or crime?

“You cover your horses with silks and put I know not what hanging little cloths over your coats of mail. You paint your spears, shields, and saddles; you ornament bridles and spurs all around with gold and silver; and with such great pomp you hasten to death in shameful madness and shameless stupor.

“Are these military insignia, or rather womanly ornaments? Will the enemy’s blade perhaps revere gold, spare gems, and be unable to penetrate silk?

“Finally, you yourselves have very often and very certainly learned by experience that three things are especially necessary for one who is to fight: namely, that the soldier be vigorous, industrious, and circumspect in preserving himself; unencumbered in running about; and ready to strike.

“You, on the contrary, burden your eyes with hair in the manner of women; with long and flowing shirts you wrap your own garments; and you bury delicate and tender hands in ample and flowing sleeves.

“Nor does anything else among you move wars and stir up quarrels except either the impulse of irrational anger, the appetite for vain glory, or desire for some earthly possession. Certainly, for such causes it is safe neither to kill nor to fall.

“But the knights of Christ fight securely in the battles of their Lord, in no way fearing either sin from the slaughter of enemies or danger from their own death, since indeed death for Christ is either to be suffered or to be inflicted.”

Chapter XXI

In the year of the Lord 1076 the Order of Grandmont began under Father Stephen, as Vincent relates in book twenty-six, chapter forty-six of the Historical Mirror, from his deeds.

He was the son of Stephen, a most noble man from the regions of Auvergne. In his boyhood he was taken by his father to Benevento, where, having been educated for twelve years by Saint Milo the archbishop, he learned a rule of living well.

Finally, departing and traversing many hermitages, and commending to memory what things from the life of canons, monks, and hermits were to be imitated, he came under Christ's guidance to Aquitaine, near Limoges, to the wooded mountain which is called Muret.

There he found springs and rocks, a deserted and trackless land which was entirely woodland and sterile, unaccustomed to men but accustomed to beasts. Offering its new guest a most cold drink and a house exposed to the winds, it promised by manifest indications affliction of the body and rest of the mind.

Then Stephen, rejoicing, vowed that he would serve God there for all time; and with a certain ring, which alone he had from all the substance of the world, he betrothed himself to the most chaste Virgin, saying: "I, Stephen, renounce the devil and all his pomps, and I offer and render myself to God the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit."

Writing his profession, he placed it upon his head and poured out prayer to the Lord Jesus Christ and to his mother the Virgin in a small hut constructed from twigs.

In the year 1076 from the Lord's Incarnation, being in the thirtieth year of his age, he made the hermitage his habitation, serving God in fasts, vigils, and continual prayers.

His food was bread and water, and sometimes a little broth of wheat flour, which, less savory than other foods, served both necessities and not pleasure.

He also went armed with an iron coat of mail against the temptations of the flesh and the wantonness of the mind, until, his whole body having been dried out, he obtained a complete victory over himself.

The garments with which he was clothed over the coat of mail were increased at no time. Rather, in winter and summer, the same equal garments sufficed to repel cold and heat.

The bed to which, after excessive bodily fatigue, he betook himself for a little rest was so hard and contrary to repose that, sleeping in it, he could be tormented, not comforted.

For it was made of wooden boards fastened together in the earth in the likeness of a tomb, lacking all straw and all bed furnishings except that iron tunic which he always wore against his naked flesh, and also the most worthless habit with which he was clothed over it.

Thus, when he was absent, his bed was bare and empty; when he was present, it was adorned with such mattresses and sheets.

Besides the canonical Hours and regular obligations, he humbly performed innumerable genuflections, kissing the earth and striking it with his forehead and nose.

Thus, from their continual performance he had contracted calluses on his hands and knees after the manner of a camel, and had bent his nose sideways.

He loved psalmody and prayers and the grace of divine contemplation so greatly that, intent upon their sweetness, he frequently went for two or three days without bodily food.

And because a lighted lamp could not lie hidden under a bushel, the reputation of his holiness was spread far and wide. Many came to him and heard admonitions of salvation from him, but few joined themselves to him, since the others feared the austerity of his manner of life.

Nevertheless, he himself imposed the rule of his discretion upon no one. Rather, though harsh toward himself, he was kind toward others and far more moderate.

But after, by God's ordering, the number of his disciples increased, he was made together with them not as one of them but less than all of them.

For while they sat at table and ate, he sat humbly apart, and by reading the passions of the saints and the lives of the fathers, or some other edifying scripture, he prudently instructed them, being solicitous for their salvation, and helped them with his prayers. These had such power before God that by them he could free men captured from the very jaws of demons and from their depraved machinations.

For a certain noble knight, guilty of an immense crime, when he stood among others who had come to visit Stephen, said: “I beseech you, servant of God, do not pray to God for me. For I love a certain sin so greatly that in no way do I wish either to hate it or to abandon it. But if you pray for me, I fear that this may happen to me. Therefore assist others with your prayers, but by no means me.”

Having said these things, he departed joyful, while the holy man remained sorrowful and anxious.

Entering the chapter, Stephen gathered the brothers and, scarcely able to speak because of the force of his tears, at length exhorted them to pray to God with him for the most foolish knight.

Without delay the sinner returned and, seeking pardon for his foolishness, renounced his iniquity with heart and mouth.

A certain rich man was accustomed to carry the provisions which the faithful people sent in charity to the holy man dwelling in the hermitage.

But because he lived far from Stephen’s cell, he had procured for himself lodging on the road, in which he might be received as a guest when going and returning.

Because the lord of that lodging had learned that the man possessed riches, he delivered him to two robbers. In order to compel him to ransom himself, they hid with him in caves and caverns of the earth, holding him bound and captive.

After some days it was reported to the servant of God that this familiar friend of his had been secretly captured on the road by which he came to him, by unknown men, and had been taken no one knew where.

Then, when the brothers complained and grieved over this, he said: “Why are you anxious? I know one to whom it is manifest concerning the man both where he is and how he fares. Therefore, with our feet bare, let us go into the oratory and implore the aid of the blessed Virgin, the Mother of the Lord, in whose service he was captured.”

When they had done this, behold, at dawn on the next day the treacherous host with the two robbers and the man whom they had captured stood knocking at the door of the cell.

The man who had been captured and bound was loosed and free; the thieves and the betrayer were bound with chains.

When the brother doorkeeper saw this, he rejoiced and made it known to the father, who after his custom was instructing the disciples.

Stephen, concealing the joy of his mind in his face, did not omit the discourse which he had begun, giving the brothers an example that they should glory not in miracles but in God alone.

Then, when the discourse had been completed, the thieves and the betrayer were released from the bonds with which they had been bound; and, giving thanks to God and blessed Mary, he permitted them to depart safe and free.

Those who spoke with him and stood around him perceived a fragrance of wondrous odor proceeding from him, as from one in whom the author of sweetness rested.

Moreover, when he was set in the illness from which he died and admonished them most ardently, those standing by said with one accord: “Most holy father, for as long as we have been with you, God has furnished us the necessities through his love for you; but after your death, how shall we be able to live?”

To this he, most firm in faith, replied: “I leave God alone to you, to whom belong all things and for love of whom you have likewise left all things and your very selves.

“If, by loving poverty, you adhere to him steadfastly, he, by the providence with which he governed all things, will bestow upon you what he knows to be expedient.

“But if, which may it not be, by loving temporal things you depart from his love, I do not wish to leave you anything from which you might rise up to assail him.”

Thus, after the Viaticum and extreme unction, he passed to the Lord in the eightieth year of his age, established in the order of the diaconate.

His passing was miraculously revealed in many regions, and many afterward came to the place; his joyful ascent to the glory of the fatherland was likewise revealed.

Therefore the brothers, deprived of their pious father, chose for themselves as prior one of their convent, namely Peter of Limoges, dear and lovable to God and men.

While the brothers advanced under his government, the monks of Saint Augustine began to lay claim to the aforesaid place of Muret in which they served God, maintaining that it belonged to their right.

But since they wished rather to surrender their cloak also to one taking their tunic than to be drawn thence into the custom of litigating, they sought to obtain another place where they might establish the head of their religious life.

When no suitable place had been found, they at length entered upon the counsel that the prior should humbly and devoutly celebrate Mass and, with all the brothers, supplicate God that he would not delay to indicate what they sought.

When he did this and the Lamb of God had now been sung three times, a heavenly voice was heard saying: “At Grandmont, at Grandmont, at Grandmont.”

The prior and some of the brothers heard it. Therefore, when Mass had been ended, they came to the place revealed to them, sufficiently near Muret, and made a church and houses for habitation.

When both had been completed with an inexpensive form, they returned to Muret, and, receiving the holy body, they transferred it to Grandmont and, with few knowing, concealed it beneath the presbytery before the altar.

A certain knight who was paralytic was carried there so that he might be received into the prayers of the brothers. He was carried before the altar.

After he held his feet upon the stones of the sepulcher before the altar, he freely cried out, saying: “Release me, for now I have been made sound, in this place upon which I hold my feet. And I tell you that some holy man lies buried here, for whose merits and love God has bestowed health upon me.”

When the prior rebuked him and vehemently forbade him to say this, the man cried out more strongly for joy: “Here I have been made sound.”

A certain disciple of Stephen who had lost his sight also prostrated himself before his sepulcher and, praying, recovered his vision.

The cloth in which his sacred relics had been wrapped, cast into the fire once, and again, and yet again, could not be burned.

Observing these miracles, the prior feared that peace would be diminished for himself and the others, and that the sweetness of inward delight would be experienced more slowly, if crowds of peoples frequented the place to which they had come for the sake of the miracles.

Coming to the sepulcher, he spoke thus: “Servant of God, you showed us the way of poverty and taught us to walk in it with our whole endeavor. But now by your miracles you wish to recall us from the narrow way to the broad and spacious way.

“You who preached solitude now wish to gather markets and fairs in solitude.

“We are not led by curiosity so that we should wish to see miracles. We sufficiently believe in your holiness.

“Take care, therefore, that henceforth you do not perform miracles which exalt your holiness and deprive us of our humility. Do not so provide for your own praise that you are forgetful of our salvation.

“But if you act otherwise, we tell you, and steadfastly declare through the obedience which we promised you, that we shall draw your bones out from here and scatter them in the river.”

Chapter XXII

In the year of the Lord 1086, according to Vincent in book twenty-six, chapter eighty-two of the Historical Mirror, who relates this from sayings taken from the history of Sigebert, the Order of Carthusians had its beginning.

For he says that Bruno, a German by nation from the city of Cologne, instructed in letters from his earliest age, a canon of the church of Reims and master of the scholars, having left the world founded the hermitage of Chartreuse and instituted a sufficiently arduous purpose of monastic conduct.

Hugh, bishop of Grenoble, of blessed memory, standing forth as a cooperator of his holy purpose, received the monastic habit from the same Bruno and furnished an eminent example to all who dwelt there.

Concerning this Hugh, Vincent writes thus in book twenty-eight, chapter eight of the Historical Mirror:

Guigo, prior of Chartreuse, wrote down the religious and holy life of this holy man Hugh.

When Hugh's mother was pregnant with him, as she related to others, it seemed to her in a dream that she had conceived an elegant boy whom saints, among whom was blessed Peter, were carrying into heaven to be presented before God.

Hence it happened that, when he had been born and became a boy, he was applied to learning letters. For it was hoped, and not in vain, that he would be of singular grace and merit before God.

Divine grace gathered in him very many ornaments of the virtues, which, if distributed among individuals, could sufficiently make many men illustrious and conspicuous.

For if chastity is praised, who was purer than he? If truthfulness of speech, who was more cautious in speaking? If love of God, who was more fervent? If love of neighbor, who was more benign? If humility, who was more abject? If almsgiving, who was more generous? If prayer, who was more devout? If rivers of tears, in whom were they poured out more abundantly? If contemplation, who was more sublime? If endurance, who was stronger in tribulation? If justice, who was more strict? If prudence, who was more circumspect? If temperance, who was more moderate?

Besides these, there were the good things that came through him to the clergy and the people.

The hermitage of Chartreuse, the abbey of Chalais, the hermitage of Écouges, a house of the regular canons, and houses at Saint Misenus and at Saint Gregory began with his approval and were completed with him fostering them spiritually and bodily.

As is read, he saw in a dream in the solitude of Chartreuse God constructing there a habitation for his own condescension, and seven stars presenting themselves to him as guides for the journey.

And behold, drawn to him by the odor of his sanctity, seven men came to him, all of whom, inflamed by one desire, were seeking a place suitable for the eremitical life and had not yet found one.

The first of these, as has been said, was Master Bruno, a man most renowned for religious life and learning; the other four were learned men and two were laymen.

Saint Hugh received them gratefully and made them possessors of their vow. For with him counseling, helping, and accompanying them, they entered the solitude of Chartreuse and built it up.

Thus began the Carthusian Order, singular in purity of minds and in the study of contemplation.

This holy man, as the aforesaid Guigo relates, although adorned with many virtues and very useful to the Church of God, nevertheless, always thinking upon his perfection, desired to put off the episcopal burden entirely and be free for the repose of the soul.

He did not lack this desire from the beginning of his promotion even to his death. Hence he also sent a legation concerning this to Pope Honorius.

When he had not obtained what he sought, although weighed down by diseases and old age he himself went to that pope, asking and adjuring that permission to rest be given to his old age; but he could not obtain it.

Honorius having died and Innocent II succeeding him, when Peter Leonis, supported by the protection of his relatives—for certainly both he and his father had formerly shown many acts of reverence and service to Saint Hugh—raised his head against Innocent, nevertheless the same holy man Hugh was neither bent by friendship nor terrified by power, but, led by zeal for God, although consumed by diseases and age, proceeded to Avicium so that with other bishops he might excommunicate that Peter as a schismatic.

But when Innocent, avoiding the persecutions of the same Peter, entered Gaul, Saint Hugh met him with tears, asking and adjuring what he had sought from his predecessor. Yet he did not obtain it even thus.

For it was believed that by his authority and example alone, weak and sick though he was, he could benefit the people subject to him more than any other healthy and robust man.

From this time he began to fail more day by day and, with his troubles increasing, to approach death.

Religious men from Chartreuse and from the houses of Chalais and Écouges were present to serve him, and no secular person at all was admitted to his service.

If he needed anything, he did not seek it from any of those serving by commanding as lord of the house, but by humbly asking for God's sake.

He by no means endured his successors laughing or occupying themselves with idle words, but immediately restrained them by a most severe rebuke from his own mouth, declaring that the times were owed to weeping and were to be occupied with laments, not consumed in guffaws or the relating of trifles.

He died in the year of the Lord 1132, being at least eighty years of age.

His consecration lasted fifty-two years. He was also enrolled by Innocent II in the catalogue of the saints.

This religious order had its beginning from the following astonishing event.

When a flourishing course of study abounded in the city of Paris, both in the multitude of scholars from various regions and in a numerous company of distinguished doctors in every faculty, among the others there was one man singular in eminence of learning and especially renowned for probity of life.

When he had died, solemn obsequies were prepared in the church where he was to be delivered to burial. To honor him there assembled the university of masters and students of Paris, and very many others.

Therefore, when the corpse had been carried upon a bier into the church according to custom and the office was being celebrated, the dead man who lay there rose and, sitting up in the coffin, cried out in a loud voice while all heard: "By the just judgment of God I have been accused."

Having said this, he lay down as before. All were terrified and stupefied by this utterance, and they decreed that he should not be delivered to burial on that day, but that all should assemble again on the following day.

When this had been made known throughout the city, many more came on the following day for that spectacle. While they performed the office around his bier, the dead man again sat up on the bed, crying: "By the just judgment of God I have been judged."

All who were present and heard this were dismayed by the event. In order that they might know its outcome, they arranged that his burial should be deferred until the following day.

On the third day, therefore, almost the whole city flowed together. In the continuation of the office for his soul, that dead doctor rose and now for the third time cried out, saying: "By the just judgment of God I have been damned."

This rendered them all almost lifeless with astonishment. Thus, his damnation having been made manifest to all, he was judged unworthy of ecclesiastical burial and was buried with the burial of an ass.

Bruno, of whom mention was made at the beginning of the chapter, a distinguished master of scholars, was present at this spectacle. Having seen these things, he said to his companions and disciples: "Behold, dearest ones, how this great doctor, reputed holy by all, has perished. Do we also wish to perish, and not rather to be saved? There is no place of salvation for us unless we flee the world. If this has been done in the green wood, what will be done in the dry?"

He said many other things of this kind. Thus, being pierced in heart, as has been said, they left the world.

Around the year of the Lord 1175, this astonishing and notable event occurred in the principal house of Chartreuse.

One of those monks passed to the Lord. He had been of such a life that very many miracles made his holiness known. When they were multiplying daily and his fame went out through that whole region, a very great multitude began to come to the place: some, indeed, were sick and came for healing, because very many were cured; others came to see the wonderful works of God and to commend themselves to the saint.

This frequenting of men, however, began to be very troublesome to the priors and monks because their quiet was impeded.

Therefore Jancelinus, prior of Chartreuse, a man of great holiness and discerning intelligence, seeing the quiet of the monks broken by so great a concourse and many crimes perpetrated by the laymen who gathered there, approached the tomb of the man of God and, making pious complaints, said:

“Dearest son, is this the recompense with which you have repaid us? You have ascended to glory, there to rest perpetually; but by your miracles you inflict upon us the warfare of so great a disturbance.

“It shall not be so, son; it shall not be so. Rather, it is necessary to assail you with the same dagger by which you conquered the adversary of God, namely that of obedience.

“Therefore, my son, by the power of holy obedience I command you that, just as in life you always obeyed me, so also now you shall do, and that henceforth you shall not presume to perform any miracle.”

And so it was done, for no miracles were performed thereafter. I read these things in the chronicles of that order.

Certainly that religious order is exceedingly venerable, for down to the present day it has preserved the rigor of its observances for around four hundred years.

It is austere in many respects: in abstinence, indeed, because its fasts are prolonged and every Friday is kept on bread and water. They always abstain from eating meat, even in the gravest illness, so that anyone who wishes to eat it cannot afterward remain in enclosure with the others.

With respect to clothing, they always wear a hairshirt next to the flesh. With respect to solitude, they never go out, except for the prior and the procurator; and they remain alone in their cells with strict silence. They have great vigils because of the length of the office.

Hence Bernard, who wrote to them the letter called To the Brothers of the Mount of God, commends them greatly, saying among other things: “It is yours to enjoy God.” Nevertheless, at the end he reproves them for the excessive costliness and size of their buildings.

From this religious order was taken that venerable man Nicholas of Bologna, unwillingly to the bishopric of Bologna and afterward to the cardinalate by Pope Martin V. Always preserving the rigor of his religious order, he was a spotless mirror to all courtiers and prelates, a father of the poor, a restorer of peace among the discordant princes of the world, and a preventer of schism.

Finally, under Pope Eugenius, he passed to Christ at Siena from the sickness of the stone. When he was opened, a stone as large as an egg was found in the bottom of his bladder, as though embodied in its flesh.

Chapter XXIII

In the year of the Lord 1017, as I have found in writings, the Order of the Humiliati had the first beginning of its existence. Nevertheless, in the course of time it was varied in a threefold manner of living, as will appear.

It must therefore be known that, when the most serene Emperor Henry III had come into the regions of Lombardy in the aforesaid year, he had certain Lombard nobles under suspicion, from certain reports and indications, lest perhaps they were devising some wicked thing. He therefore relegated them, and especially those originating from Milan, into Germany, or delivered them into exile.

As they journeyed, seeing themselves so greatly humiliated, they humbled themselves in the sight of God, making a virtue of necessity; and their affliction gave understanding to their hearing.

For they began not to love earthly things immoderately, to avoid vices, and to walk in humble clothing, namely cloth of a brownish-gray color. Although they lived individually in their own houses with their wives and servants, procuring sustenance for themselves from the labors of their hands, especially from the practice of working wool, they nevertheless held certain congregations, frequently exhorting one another to the things that are of God and to advancement of the spirit, applying themselves to fasts, alms, and prayers, and loving one another with the love of brotherhood.

The odor of their pious manner of life began to be spread through that region, and from this very many more were gathered into their number.

When the fame of their humility became known, the lord emperor absolved them from their relegation and permitted those who wished to return to their own soil.

Having returned, therefore, to the regions of Lombardy, they began to live more strictly and to approach more nearly to complete religious life.

Hence the men, separated from their wives by common consent, understanding that no consideration is worthy of a continent soul, and that chastity, especially virginal or widowed chastity, is that which alone can present our souls to God, decreed that the men should dwell separately in one place and the women separately, as in monasteries, and that they should apply themselves more earnestly to prayers, vigils, and abstinences.

They had certain men, though few, dwelling under the care of one of them and serving them in divine matters, while they continued their bodily exercises, especially in the working of wool and the weaving of cloth. This was called by them their second manner of living.

Finally, when they had multiplied in number and merit, and especially in clerics, a third manner of living followed so that they might have the completion of religious life. It was, however, first in dignity and religion.

Diminishing manual exercise, they applied themselves more to readings and divine offices. They were clothed in a uniform but humble habit: a tunic and scapular, with a mantle or cape of white color over it.

They took as their norm of living a part, but not the whole, of the Rule of blessed Benedict, calling their superiors provosts.

Having greatly multiplied, they constructed for themselves many monasteries, both of brothers and of nuns, throughout the regions of Tuscany and Lombardy, especially at Milan.

Around the year of the Lord 1200, this order and manner of living was approved and confirmed by the Church through Innocent III. Afterward it was exempted from the diocesan bishops by his successors, fortified with many privileges, and placed under the government of one principal and general provost.

From the convent of All Saints at Florence, which belonged to the said order, there flourished a certain venerable father named Lucas, a professor of sacred theology, renowned by fame and illustrious for probity and learning. Having been made bishop of Fiesole by Pope Gregory XII, he was promoted by the same pope as far as the cardinalate. He died in a good old age, full of days, around the year of the Lord 1410.

But all the religious orders mentioned above are today so relaxed and lukewarm that the saying of Jeremiah can plainly be applied: “How the gold has grown dark; the finest color has been changed.”

And Bernard says against the relaxed Cluniac monks:

“Whence could so great an intemperance have grown among monks in foods, in drinks, in clothing, in bed furnishings, in riding horses, and in constructing buildings, so that where these things are pursued more studiously, more pleasurably, and more lavishly, there the order is said to be better observed and there religion is thought to be greater?

“For behold, frugality is thought to be avarice; sobriety is believed to be austerity; silence is accounted sadness. Conversely, relaxation is called discretion; lavishness, liberality; talkativeness, affability; loud laughter, cheerfulness; softness of garments and the pomp of horses, dignity; and the superfluous adornment of beds, cleanliness.

“And when we bestow these things upon one another, it is called charity. This charity certainly destroys charity. This discretion confounds discretion. Such mercy is full of cruelty, for it so serves the body that it slaughters the soul.”

Nevertheless, under this abuse these things are now maintained almost everywhere as though belonging to the order. They are now observed by almost everyone without complaint and as though irreproachably, although in different ways.

For some use all these things as though they did not use them, and therefore with no offense, or with very little. Some, indeed, do these things from simplicity, some from charity, and some from necessity.

For certain men simply maintain these things because they are so commanded, being prepared to act otherwise if otherwise commanded. Others do so lest they live discordantly from those with whom they dwell, pursuing in these things not their own desire but the peace of others.

Others, however, do so because they cannot resist the multitude of those who contradict them. These certainly defend these things with free voice as belonging to the order; and whenever the former begin to restrict or change them otherwise, as reason dictates, the latter immediately resist with their whole authority.

Who at the beginning, when the monastic order began, would have believed that it would come to so great an inactivity of monks?

O how far we are from those who were monks in the days of Antony! For when they visited one another from time to time out of charity, they received the bread of souls from one another with such eagerness that, having wholly forgotten bodily food, they often passed the entire day with fasting stomachs, but not with fasting minds.

And this was the right order, when the worthier part was served first. This was the highest discretion, when he who was greater received more.

But when we now come together, it is not to eat the Lord’s supper. Nothing from the Scriptures is discussed, nothing concerning the salvation of souls; rather, trifles and laughter and words are uttered into the wind. During the meal, just as much as they feed their throats with dishes, so much do they feed their ears with rumors.

The use of meat, which by the discretion of the Rule is scarcely conceded only to the sick and altogether weak for the restoration of their strength, is not, indeed, used to repair for need the ruins of a failing body, but to fulfill in desire the care of luxuriating flesh, when, namely, the use of meat is given to young men and to others who have no need of it.

I would say that absurdities of this kind ought to be laughed at rather than praised.

Thus Macarius lived. Thus Antony taught. Thus Basil instituted. Thus the fathers in Egypt conducted themselves. Thus Saint Odo, Maiolus, Odilo, and Hugh, whom the Cluniacs glory in having as the princes and instructors of their order, either observed or judged that it ought to be observed.

Section II

All the aforesaid monastic and regular religious orders, which had their beginning with great fervor and holiness of life, by neglecting the smallest parts of their ancestral traditions gradually declined in the course of time and were emptied out as far as their foundations, namely the substantial vows in them. The Order of the Carthusians alone was excepted, for it still perseveres in its vigor.

But through divine mercy, during the last seventy years they have put forth shoots and blossomed again in a few men who reformed themselves to regular life, God turning the hearts of the fathers to the sons in order to prepare for the Lord a perfect people, multiplied in merit and number. And flowers appeared in our Florentine land.

For the canons regular, who are said to have had their beginning from the jewel of the doctors, Saint Augustine, with his rule, had become relaxed and deformed. But they were reformed by the Lord through two eminent men, illustrious in learning and life, and now they have been spread through Italy, dwelling as brothers and in monasteries in regular observance.

The first place of these was, and is, near Lucca and is called Fregionaia. Hence that congregation, which is governed under one head, is called the Congregation of Fregionaia. They also possess the abbey of Fiesole.

After them, certain other religious men of the Order of Hermits, separating themselves from that order in order to live more strictly, took the state and habit of canons regular of the Rule of blessed Augustine, adding certain constitutions. They were approved by Gregory XII and exempted by him from the diocesan bishops.

They had their beginning around the year of the Lord 1410 under a certain venerable man of Siena named Stephen. Their first convent was near Gubbio, and their second was the convent of San Donato di Scopeto near the walls of Florence.

Thence they multiplied in brothers and convents in several cities of Tuscany and Lombardy. That congregation is called the Congregation of Scopeto from the said place, but more properly the Congregation of the Holy Savior, just as those of Fregionaia are also more suitably named.

The Cistercians were indeed a great pillar of the Church under blessed Bernard, and afterward for a hundred years they were adorned with learning and holiness. But they too, declining from the footsteps of the fathers, became useless.

Around the year of the Lord 1436, however, certain monks of the Florentine abbey under Eugenius IV passed to the Order of the Cistercians in regular observance. The monastery of Settimo near Florence, belonging to the said order, was conferred upon them by the lord Eugenius himself, at the procurement of the most reverend lord Cardinal of Fermo. From a little flock it has been increased not a little.

The black monks, such as the Cluniacs are believed to be, when they had grown thick and fat and had been enlarged by innumerable abbeys, wandering everywhere through the lands at pleasure, were restricted in some measure by the Clementine decree Lest in the Field. They were restricted in outward things, but in inward things they remained black.

But God, who renews things grown old and makes black coals shine when they have been kindled by fire, inspired certain monks who were noble according to the world and nobler in mind to fulfill the Rule of Father Benedict in its entirety, with certain constitutions added to the Rule.

It had its beginning around the year of the Lord 1400 in the abbey called Santa Giustina. Eugenius IV was a supporter of and greatly devoted to and a promoter of the congregation called the Congregation of Santa Giustina.

When they had multiplied in a short time, that same pope gave them many great monasteries, and among others Saint Paul Outside the Walls and the Florentine abbey. He also exempted them from diocesan bishops and other prelates and supported them with great privileges.

From this religious order also, through that pope, the venerable man and zealot of religion, Lord John the Sicilian, abbot of Saint Paul, was given the red hat.

The white monks serving under the Rule of blessed Benedict, such as the Camaldolese, having degenerated from their father Romuald, have been turned backward, except for very few of their monasteries and enclosed hermitages.

But around the year of the Lord 1370, as I heard from certain religious men who maintained a life almost eremitical and praiseworthy in the diocese of Arezzo but in the territory of Siena, the bishop of Arezzo at that time gave them a similar habit and the Rule of Benedict himself.

When these men had grown in the grace of God and in number, the order called the Order of Monte Oliveto was established, named from the church. It was itself approved, multiplied in monasteries throughout Italy, privileged, and made exempt from diocesan bishops. Those religious men place one general abbot from among themselves over their heads from one three-year period to another.

The gray monks, such as the Vallombrosans, also limped away from the paths of John Gualbert, the first founder of their order, likewise under the Rule of Benedict, so that there was scarcely anyone who did good.

Under the same habit and rule were certain men called Sylvestrines, because Sylvester was called their first author. He began that order at Monte Fano near Fabriano in the March of Ancona. Having multiplied, they built for themselves several monasteries in various cities, including Florence.

The convent of San Marco belonged to them, but it was taken from them by Eugenius IV because of their dissolute life and was conferred upon the Order of Preachers. The said religious order has now almost entirely failed through lack of brothers.

But the hand of the Lord was not shortened from mending the gray monks, who bear the mortification of the cross in their habit.

For around the year of the Lord 1430, when certain black monks had been taken from the Florentine abbey into the abbey of Santa Flora at Arezzo, and afterward were transferred by Eugenius IV from the said Aretine abbey to the monastery of San Salvi by way of exchange, the fallen religious order of Vallombrosa, to which the said monastery of San Salvi outside the walls belonged, was restored to regular life.

The convent of San Gregorio at Florence was added to them by annexation, and the monastery of Passignano by union, their number being multiplied.

With the religious men who had been deformed, the women and nuns agreed in the relaxation of religion in the aforesaid orders. For the Cistercian women, the white Camaldolese women, the black nuns in various monasteries, the gray nuns of Vallombrosa, and the Augustinian women walked along the broad and spacious way.

But some monasteries have been renewed in the narrow and constricted way of regular life, and others have recently been erected, such as the monastery called San Donato in Polverosa and the newly constructed monastery of Santa Monica under the Rule of Augustine.

But above all the others, the monastery of the Annunciation, which is commonly called Le Murate, completed in these days in its buildings under the Rule of blessed Benedict and the black habit, gives forth a wondrous fragrance of holiness.

The women dwell in the greatest poverty; and although they are a hundred in number and more, they have no possessions or revenues, but live from the labor of their hands and from alms sent to them but not solicited by them. They serve one another in great quiet and mutual charity.

Beyond the canonical Hours devoutly discharged, some of them always remain in the church day and night, without interruption, singing the Psalter in alternating turns.

Section III

The religious order instituted by Saint Bridget was also established in our days under the Rule of blessed Augustine and with constitutions added to that holy rule, in double monasteries, that is, of brothers and nuns remaining in one monastery but in entirely separate dwellings and under great enclosure, so that the brothers cannot approach the sisters.

Although double monasteries of this kind were first instituted by Saint Basil, they were nevertheless afterward separated and not permitted.

For this reason a lengthy dissension and contention also occurred in the Roman Curia under Martin V, some of the said order procuring the separation of the brothers from the sisters, while others contradicted them out of reverence for the saint who had instituted it thus and for the Church, which had already approved the said religious order.

Finally, through Eugenius it was decreed that that religious order should remain as it had been instituted from the beginning. The monastery of the said religious order near Florence is called the Paradise. Those religious men are under the care of the diocesan bishops.

I omit the religious orders of Saint Anthony, whose brothers are ordained for hospitality; of the Holy Spirit; of Saint James of the Sword, which is ordained for military service; of those of Mercy, which is ordained for redeeming captives from unbelievers; of the Crosiers; and of Saint Mary of the Teutons.

I also omit the religious order of Paul the First Hermit under the Rule of Augustine, and that of Saint John under the gray habit.

Concerning the mendicants, however, comprehending among them the Preachers, the Minors, the Hermits, the Carmelites, and the Servites, and concerning their saints and doctors and their relaxation and renewal, a full account will be given below and in another title.

Title XVI

The following title, the sixteenth, contains the deeds of the supreme pontiffs and emperors, and also of doctors and most holy men, and wondrous occurrences and destructions in diverse parts of the world, through three hundred years or thereabout, namely from the year of the Lord 813 down to the year of the Lord's Incarnation 1100.

Within that span were the following supreme pontiffs: Pope Leo III; Stephen IV; Paschal I; John VII, the English pope, who was a woman; Benedict III; Paschal II; Eugenius II; Valentine; Gregory IV; Sergius II; Leo IV; Nicholas I; Adrian II; John VIII; Martin II; Stephen V; Formosus; Boniface VI; Pope Romanus; Theodore; John IX; Benedict IV; Leo V; Sergius III; Anastasius III; Lando; John X; Leo VI; Stephen VII; John XI; Leo VII; Stephen VIII; Martin III; Agapetus II; John XII, most wicked; Leo VIII; John XIII; Benedict VI; Boniface VI; John XIV; John XV; Gregory V; Sylvester II the Great; John XVI; John XVII; Benedict VIII; John XVIII; John XIX; Benedict IX; Gregory VI; Clement II; Damasus II; an intruder; Leo IX; Victor II; Stephen IX; Benedict X, an intruder; Nicholas II; Alexander II; Candullus the schismatic; Gregory VII; Clement the schismatic; Victor III; and Urban II.

Then there is treatment of the emperors of those times, namely: Louis, son of Charlemagne; Lothair, his son; Louis II; Charles II; Charles III; Charles IV; Arnulf; Louis III; Conrad; Henry I; the three Ottos who reigned successively; and Emperor Henry II, who was the first made emperor by election, it then being ordained that this was thereafter to be done by three archbishops and four princes.

There is also treatment of Emperor Henry III; of the origin of the Turks; of Henry IV, who was excommunicated by Gregory VII and afterward by Urban II; of certain holy bishops of England; of Peter the Damascene and his sayings; of Childebert and his sayings; of Lanfranc; of Anselm and his sayings; of Peter Alfonso against the Jews; of the conquest made by the faithful against the Holy Land; and of how it was captured by Godfrey.

Chapter I

In pursuing the history of the supreme pontiffs, emperors, doctors, and others, we digressed through the preceding title interposed in its course. In that title there was extensive treatment especially of the most holy anchorites, cenobites, and founders of diverse monastic religious orders who shone in the Church, from the year of the Lord 280, namely from the time of the emperors Diocletian and Maximian, down to the year of the Lord 1100, at which time Henry reigned.

We resume that history at the place where it was left, namely with Pope Leo IV and Louis I, emperor and son of Charlemagne.

Charlemagne therefore having been removed from this light, and his son Louis succeeding him in the empire, Leo IV presided in the city.

He, himself a Roman, had been badly and ignominiously treated and ejected from his see. After he had cleared himself before Charlemagne himself and the council assembled before him, he was honorably restored to his see, as was said above.

He was raised to the summit of the supreme pontificate in the year of the Lord 796, and held it for twenty years, five months, and sixteen days.

He crowned Charlemagne in the Roman Empire. He himself made the portico of the church of Saint Peter in the city, which is still called the Leonine City, so called from him, and surrounded it with a wall because of the incursion of the Saracens, as a refuge from their raids.

He ordained the litanies for the three days before the Ascension of the Lord in this manner: on Monday the supreme pontiff, going forth with the clergy and people from the church of the Mother of God at the Crib, was to proceed with hymns and canticles to the church of the Holy Savior called the Constantinian; on Tuesday, from the church of Saint Sabina to the church of Saint Paul; and on Wednesday, from the church of Jerusalem to Saint Lawrence Outside the Walls. This is found in the Martinian Chronicle.

He also wrote as follows to Louis Augustus, whom he crowned emperor after the death of his father Charlemagne, when the Romans were being harassed by the Saracens, as is found in cause twenty-three, question eight:

“Therefore, since adverse reports from the regions of the Saracens have often reached us, saying that the Saracens were about to come secretly and furtively into the harbor of the Romans, for this reason we commanded our people to be assembled, decreed that the maritime people should descend to the shore, and went forth from Rome.”

The same pope wrote to the same emperor:

“You ought to know that we never permit our men to be oppressed by anyone; but if any necessity occurs, we avenge it in person, because in all things we ought to be the avengers and principal helpers of our flock.”

The same pope said to the army of the Franks:

“Having laid aside every fear and terror, endeavor to act manfully against the enemies of the holy faith and the adversaries of all religions. For the Almighty knows that, if any one of you should die, he died for the truth of the faith, the salvation of the fatherland, and the defense of Christians; and therefore he will obtain from Him a heavenly reward.”

All these things are found there.

The same Leo IV says to the Augusti Louis and Lothair, in distinction sixty-three: “It was established and confirmed between you and us by the course of a pact that the election and consecration of a future Roman pontiff ought to be made only justly and canonically.”

Likewise, from the council of this Leo IV, in cause twelve, question two, it is said thus:

“We admonish and irrefragably affirm that none of the bishops or priests shall presume to usurp the property of his title, nor attempt to take away the payment offered by Christians to holy places because of friendship, fear, or reward, lest the Church of God be reduced to nothing.

“Any bishop or priest who has presumed to do this shall without doubt undergo canonical vengeance and shall be compelled to restore to the church what was unjustly taken, so that thereafter he can have no power to litigate or possess in relation to these things.”

Finally, after very many holy works, he rested in the Lord and was buried in the church of Saint Peter.

The same Leo IV writes thus to the bishops of Britain, in cause twenty-six, question five:

“The lots by which you distinguish all things in your provinces, which the fathers condemned, we decree to be nothing other than divinations and sorceries. Therefore we desire them to be condemned altogether and no longer named among Christians; and under prohibition of anathema we forbid them to be practiced.”

Pope Leo says in cause twenty-four, question three:

“I signify that this assuredly displeases me very greatly: that certain clerics are said to belong to your jurisdiction who communicate with the depravity and madness of the adversaries, and that vessels are mingled with vessels of mercy.

“Your diligence ought vigilantly to apply itself to investigating them and restraining them with fitting severity, so that amputation shall not spare those whom correction could not benefit, according to this: ‘If your eye causes you to stumble, pluck it out,’ and so forth.

“This pestilential tolerance, by which a man does not spare himself by sparing the sins of others, must be cast entirely away from priestly vigor.”

Leo having been removed from this light, Stephen IV was created bishop in the city in the year of the Lord 815. He was a Roman by birth, the son of Julius, and sat for seven months. Thereafter he was placed with the fathers and buried in the church of Saint Peter. According to the Martinian Chronicle, the papacy was vacant for eighteen days.

According to John of Colonna in his history, after this Stephen attained the pontifical dignity, in the same year, namely, in which Louis I, son of Charlemagne, received the Roman Empire, being a most holy man kindled with zeal for the faith, he went personally into Gaul to the most serene Emperor Louis concerning the affairs of his church.

He was received by him with as much honor and reverence as the tongue could scarcely relate. The angelic man found so great favor in the sight of the prince that he obtained everything he sought.

Imitating the example of the Savior, whose place he held on earth, who prayed for his crucifiers and commanded prayer for persecutors, this saint asked that all the Roman exiles who had offended in the cause of Pope Leo and for this reason had been relegated there by Charlemagne should be absolved, and also others who, because of great crimes that they had perpetrated against the Holy Roman Church, were being held more closely in various prisons in France. He asked that they be able to be led back to Rome with him. All of this was granted to him. Returning to the city, he rested in peace.

He wrote thus to Count Guido, as is found in distinction sixty-three:

“When the letters of your sagacity were read, it was confessed that, after the bishop of the church of Rieti died, the clergy and people of that church elected for themselves a future bishop who was directed to us through your effort to be consecrated by us, lest that church remain long without its own pastor.

“We, grieving over the death of the former bishop, omitted to ordain most quickly the man now elected by the unanimity and canonical election of that church, as you commanded, because he had by no means brought us, as is the custom, the imperial letter of absolution, for which reason the matter is doubtful to us.

“Therefore we delayed obeying your will, lest the august mind should in any manner take this most harshly.

“But knowing that the Church of God ought not to remain long without its own pastor, we command your glory—because we ought not to have acted otherwise—that, when permission has been received from your imperial sagacity as ancient custom dictates, and an imperial letter has been directed to us, as we believe you know, we shall then obey your will concerning this and, with the Lord assisting, shall consecrate the same elect.

“Dearest son, do not in any way receive this with displeasure.”

These things are found there. Perhaps that man was a courtier, and therefore the emperor’s assent was awaited.

Section II

Paschal I, a Roman by birth and the son of Maximus, succeeded Stephen in the chair of Peter in the year of the Lord 817. He sat for seven years and seventeen days.

This holy man, seeking many bodies of saints, found them outside the walls of the Roman city. Gathering them diligently, he placed them with the greatest reverence in various basilicas within the walls of the city.

Moreover, he either constructed many new churches at Rome or renewed those worn away by long age. Among these was the basilica of blessed Cecilia, virgin and martyr, which had been shaken by excessive antiquity and had now almost fallen. In the same place, however, he began to construct a church with magnificent workmanship.

Therefore, on a certain day, as John of Colonna testifies, while he was celebrating vigils in the church of Saint Peter in the customary manner, he was suddenly overcome by sleep and saw a certain maiden of virginal appearance adorned in angelic garments, who said to him:

“We render you many thanks because, lending your ears to deceitful reports that had been published, you abandoned the undertaking that you had taken up concerning me. You have been of such standing with me that we could speak to one another with our own mouths.”

Hearing this, the blessed pontiff asked who she was who spoke such things. She replied: “I am called Cecilia, the handmaid of Christ.”

The pontiff said to her: “How can I believe this, when it was long ago made known by report that the body of the venerable martyr Cecilia was secretly carried away by Aistulf, king of the Lombards, while he himself was residing at Rome?”

But she replied: “They certainly sought me with desire so that they might find me; but, through the assisting grace of my Lord Jesus Christ and of his most blessed mother, they could neither find nor carry me away.

“As you have sought my body, do not cease to seek it diligently, because it pleases Him for whose love I endured martyrdom that you should find me and lay me away in the church that you are now newly constructing.”

Saying this, she was withdrawn from the eyes of him who looked upon her.

Then the blessed pontiff, after Matins had been completed, solicitously began to seek where the most sacred body of the virgin lay buried, because of the indication of so certain and indubitable a revelation.

By God’s granting, he found it outside the Appian Gate in the cemetery called that of Praetextatus, in golden garments, together with the body of her spouse Valerian and linen wrappings stained with her blood.

Examining all these things with his own hands, he gathered them and laid them with the greatest veneration in the church that he had constructed, together with Valerian her spouse, Tiburtius his kinsman, and Maximus, who, seeing their souls ascend into heaven at their beheading, believed and was crowned with martyrdom. He also placed them with Pope Urban and the martyr Lucius. He located all those remains beneath the sacred altar.

When Lothair had been sent into Italy by his father, Emperor Louis, and consecrated emperor at Rome by Pope Paschal, certain nobles were killed because they appeared to be more inclined than was right toward fidelity to Emperor Lothair.

When such a crime was laid against Pope Paschal, the pope excused himself before the emperor and purged himself of this crime by oath before the people and the emperor’s legates at Rome, together with a great number of bishops. Vincent relates these things in book twenty-five of the Historical Mirror.

Emperor Louis, son of Charlemagne, made the following pact with this Pope Paschal, which is found in distinction sixty-three:

“I, Louis, Roman Emperor Augustus, establish and grant by this pact of our confirmation to you, blessed Peter, prince of the apostles, and through you to your vicar, Lord Paschal, supreme pontiff, and to his successors forever, just as you have held and disposed from our predecessors down to the present in your power and dominion: the Roman city with its duchy, all its suburbs and villages and territories, its mountains and maritime shores and ports, and all the cities, towns, castles, and villages in the regions of Tuscany.”

And he held the chair of Peter for sixteen years.

The same emperor says:

“When, by divine calling, the pontiff of this most sacred see shall migrate from this world, no one from our kingdom, whether Frank or Lombard, or a man of any nation established under our power, shall have license to come publicly or privately against the Romans or to make an election.

“Nor shall anyone therefore presume to do any evil in the cities or territories belonging to the power of the church of blessed Peter the Apostle. Rather, let the Romans be permitted, with all reverence and without any disturbance, to furnish an honorable burial for their pontiff.

“And let them canonically celebrate, without any ambiguity or contradiction, the man whom by divine inspiration and the intercession of blessed Peter all the Romans, with one counsel and concord and without any promise, shall have elected to the order of the pontificate.

“And when he has been consecrated, let envoys be directed to us or to our successors, the kings of the Franks, who may join friendship, charity, and peace between us and him.”

Thereafter Benedict III was created, and after Benedict, Paschal II.

This Paschal, writing to Victor, bishop of Bologna, says thus in cause sixteen, question one:

“It has come to us—whence we greatly marvel—that certain monks and abbots in your parish arrogantly claim for themselves episcopal rights and offices contrary to the decrees of the holy fathers, namely, to give penance and remission of sins, the reconciliation of penitents, tithes, and churches, although without the permission of their own bishop or the authority of the Apostolic See they ought by no means to presume this, as was ordained in the Council of Chalcedon.

“We therefore command your affection that you summon them and altogether forbid them to presume such things.”

The same pope says in cause sixteen, question seven:

“Just as the garment of the Lord was not torn but lots were cast concerning it, so the Church ought not to be torn apart, because it consists wholly in unity.

“Therefore let the churches be brought back under the power of their own bishop and be ordered by him as was established in the sacred canons. Otherwise, those churches and their clerics shall be deprived of the divine offices,” namely through an interdict, according to the gloss.

The same pope says: “If any cleric, abbot, or monk has obtained churches through laymen, let him be subject to excommunication according to the canons of the apostles and the chapter of the Council of Antioch.”

The same pope says: “Let none of the laity occupy or dispose of churches or the goods of churches.”

The same pope says in cause sixteen, question one:

“The authority of the divine law has decreed that tithes are to be rendered by the people to priests and Levites. Furthermore, no reasoning permits that soldiers, bishops, or any persons should extort tithes from monks or clerics living in common out of their own labors or livestock.”

Finally, when he died, the papacy was vacant for eighteen days.

Section III

Eugenius II, a Roman by birth and the son of Boemund, succeeded Paschal in the chair of Peter in the year of the Lord 824. He sat for three years and two months.

According to the Martinian Chronicle, he was blinded by Roman laymen and crowned with martyrdom. He had formerly been cardinal of Santa Sabina, which church he adorned with a silver ciborium over the altar and ornamented with solemn painting.

From this Pope Eugenius, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror after Sigebert, Hilduin, abbot of Saint-Denis and archchaplain of the sacred palace, having sent to Rome, received the body of blessed Sebastian and placed it in the basilica of Saint Medard in the city of Soissons.

While it still lay unburied in the coffin in which it had been brought, so great a grace of signs and mighty works shone forth in the name of that martyr that it could be neither numbered nor narrated by any mortal. Certain of them are said to be of such great wonder that they exceed human belief, were it not certain that God, for whom that martyr suffered, can do all things.

Around the same time the bodies of the holy martyrs Marcellinus and Peter were taken from Rome, transferred into France, and glorified by many signs.

The body of Saint Gregory the pope is also said to have been transferred to the city of Soissons. It is nevertheless more commonly believed to be in Rome.

Eugenius having been called to the Lord, Valentine, a Roman by birth, succeeded him. He sat for forty days in the papacy and died. According to the Martinian Chronicle, the pontificate was vacant for three days.

Section IV

After him Gregory IV, a Roman by birth and the son of John, was created supreme pontiff in the year of the Lord 827, and he held the chair of Peter for sixteen years.

He built with new fabric the church of Saint Martin on the Mount, which had been destroyed from its foundations.

At the prompting of this Gregory, according to Vincent in the place cited above, and with all the bishops assenting, Emperor Louis established that the feast of All Saints should be solemnly celebrated in France and Germany on the Kalends of November. It had been instituted by Pope Boniface I and was celebrated by the Romans.

In his time, as Martin says in his chronicle, a great tribulation arose for Christians. For certain wicked Romans sent to the sultan of Babylon, asking him to come to Rome and possess Italy.

So great a multitude of Saracens entered through the port of Centumcellae and filled the face of the earth that they appeared to be locusts. Rome having been besieged, the Leonine City was captured, the church of Saint Peter was despoiled and made a stable for horses, and not only the Roman city but all Tuscany was reduced to solitude.

At length, at this Pope Gregory's petition, Marquis Guido came with the Lombards, and afterward King Louis with the Gauls; with much shedding of Christian blood they drove the Saracens from Italy. At that time the Saracens also devastated Apulia and Sicily.

This pontiff, as Jacob of Colonna testifies, was a vigorous and benign man, Catholic in faith and a most diligent investigator of the sacred Scriptures, a lover of the poor, coveting nothing earthly and nothing transitory, but always wholly intent upon those things that know no end.

Kindled therefore by the fire of divine love, this blessed pontiff raised from the place where it had first been buried the body of the great Pope Gregory, through whom the grace of the Holy Spirit brought an inextinguishable light of wisdom throughout the whole world, and transferred it with great veneration into the church of blessed Peter the Apostle.

In that place he dedicated an oratory to his name, where the body itself and also that of Sebastian were placed upon the altar.

Certain chronicles nevertheless assert that the said bodies were transferred into Gaul, as was said above. But the Romans believe them to be in the church of Saint Peter, which appears closer to the truth.

At this time the relics of Vitus the martyr were transferred from Paris into Saxony. Hence the Franks themselves testified that from that time the glory of the Franks had been transferred to the Saxons.

Section V

After Gregory IV, Sergius II, a Roman by birth and the son of Sergius, undertook to govern the Church in the year of the Lord 844. He sat for three years and two months. When he migrated, the papacy was vacant for fifteen days.

As Martin says in his chronicle, he had formerly been called Pig's Snout. Because this was a shameful name, he was called Sergius.

From that time onward it was established and has been observed down to the present day that, when a supreme pontiff is created, he sets aside the name by which he was called before his creation and is called by a new name that he himself pleases to assume from the names of those who have already been inscribed and named in the chair of Peter.

Beyond this reason, namely lest it happen that he be called by some shameful name, the Archdeacon adds two other reasons: first, because Christ also changed the name of the first supreme pontiff, Peter, when he was formerly called Simon; and secondly, to signify that he ought to exist as an entirely new man.

Thus, just as he is changed in name, leaving the first behind, so let him be changed in conduct, leaving all passions behind; and, putting off the old man, let him put on the new, who was created according to God in justice and holiness of truth.

This pontiff, as Jacob of Colonna testifies in his history, was distinguished in origin, pure in faith, freer in preaching, humble before God, very lovable to men, and a consoler of the poor and needy.

To confirm, or rather to honor, his election, Emperor Lothair sent his firstborn son with a great retinue of princes and prelates. He was received by the supreme pontiff with great glory and was anointed and crowned by him king of the Lombards.

Almost all the bishops of Lombardy and Tuscany were present at this coronation. When this had been done, the princes petitioned in the name of the said Louis that the Roman nobles should swear fidelity to that Louis. The most solicitous and prudent pontiff refused this most steadfastly.

He nevertheless granted to those petitioning that, as it was customary to do for the Roman emperors, the Roman princes and the foremost men of the city should promise and swear fidelity to Lothair as Roman emperor.

Section VI

Sergius having been called to the Lord, Leo IV, a Roman by birth, was enthroned in the chair of Peter by the common assent of all in the year of the Lord 847. He sat for eight years, three months, and five days.

According to John of Colonna, this man was very holy, applying himself greatly to vigils and prayers, very rigid in preserving justice, and most skilled in the divine Scriptures.

From infancy he was reared among holy monks because of the study of letters. Among them he not only learned letters, but also remained among them in the pursuit of holy conduct, not as a boy but as a perfect monk.

After he was made pope, although he changed his place and order, he nevertheless never changed his holy and humble life or conduct.

This blessed pontiff decreed by canonical authority that, while the sacred solemnities of Masses are celebrated, none of the laity ought to stand, sit, or enter.

While he presided, so horrible an earthquake occurred that all the elements appeared to be shaken.

This pontiff established that the octave of the Assumption of blessed Mary should be celebrated in the Roman Church, which had not been done before.

While he presided and Lothair reigned, that wicked race of Saracens, carried by ships around the coasts of the Tuscan sea, inflicted very great losses upon certain cities.

Then, putting in at the Roman port, it disembarked upon the land and proceeded toward Rome in the hope of possessing the city. But when the Romans had foreknown their arrival, they fortified the city.

Therefore, confidence in obtaining the city having been set aside, that race plundered everything outside the city. They despoiled churches, and after despoiling them they set them on fire.

Among these the church of Saint Peter, which was then outside the enclosure of the city, was wholly plundered; and, after the sacred altar had been profaned, they scraped away everything that belonged to the adornment of the church and, burdened with spoils, returned to the ships.

Therefore, when that church which is the head and mother of the churches had been thus profaned by the wicked men, the senate and Roman people approached Leo their pontiff, beseeching him with tears that through his effort that sacred place, venerable to the whole Church of Christ, should thereafter be so fortified that it would not again fear the course of that most wicked race.

The blessed pontiff, diligently hearing their voices, immediately adopted the following counsel: that, with the Lord assisting him, he should bring to completion the work which Leo III, his predecessor, had begun, when he had started to build walls around the church of blessed Peter and had already placed foundations in many places.

When he had made this counsel of his known to Prince Lothair and to his brothers, kings of the Franks and Germans, they were filled with great joy. Through their messengers Emperor Lothair and his brothers Louis and Charles sent a great sum of money for completing that work.

Therefore, in the second year of his pontificate the work was begun with great rejoicing of the Roman people. Not only the Romans but also the peoples from the surrounding cities contributed so greatly that in the sixth year of that pontificate the work was completed in every part by the faithful.

That city, or part of the city, was called Leonine from the name of its author.

When this had been completed through the zeal and industry of this pontiff, the same pious father was afflicted with great grief when he saw daily the altar of the prince of the apostles profaned and stripped of all its adornment, to such a degree that the people now ceased to frequent it.

Assisted by divine aid, he adorned the confession of blessed Peter and his altar fittingly and honorably, surrounded the front of the altar itself with golden and jeweled plates, cleansed the church, and restored everything to its former condition.

Moreover, he granted for habitation the city of Portus, which had been abandoned for a long time, to the Corsicans who had come fleeing to the Roman city from the harassment of the Hagarenes.

Furthermore, this pontiff, eminent in devotion, sought with immense effort and found many bodies of saints that for a very long time had lain without care in various places of the city. Having found them, he placed them in their own places with the greatest reverence.

He also buried beneath the altar of the church that he himself raised from its foundations the bodies of the Four Crowned Ones. With them he also placed many other bodies of saints, namely those of Claudius, Nicostratus, Symphorian, Castor, Simplicius, Marius, Audifax, and Abachuch; Felicissimus and Agapitus; Hippolytus with his household, eighteen in number; Aquila, Priscus, Arseus, Aquinus, Narusus, Marcellinus, Felix, Candidus, Paulinus, Anastasius, Felix, Apollonius, Felix, Benedict, and Venantius.

He also placed there the head of Saint Protus, of Saint Alexander, of Saint Sixtus, and of Saint Praxedes the virgin. He honorably restored many other places and churches that the Saracens had devastated and despoiled a little before.

For the Neapolitans fighting the Saracens at sea, he made the collect in prayer: “O God, whose right hand raised blessed Peter,” and so forth.

Those Saracens had come with a very great multitude to capture the city. When, after despoiling the churches of Peter and Paul, they were returning in ships to Africa, they were battered by a storm on the deep sea and submerged by the power of God.

After this Leo, Martin places John, an Englishman by birth, in his chronicle.

Section VII

He sat in the year of the Lord 850, upon the chair of Peter for two years, three months, and six days. When he died, the papacy was vacant for one month.

Martin says that, as is asserted, this person was a woman. In girlhood she was taken to Athens by a certain lover of hers in male clothing, and advanced so far in diverse sciences that no one could be found equal to her.

Thus afterward, lecturing upon the trivium at Rome, she had great masters as disciples and hearers. Since in the city she was of great reputation for learning and life, she was unanimously elected pope after Leo.

But during her papacy she was impregnated by one familiar to her. Not knowing the time of her delivery, while proceeding from Saint Peter’s to the Lateran, she was distressed by labor and gave birth in the road between the church of Saint Clement and the Colosseum.

She died in childbirth and is said to have been buried there. Because the pope always turns aside from that road when he approaches the Lateran, it is believed by many that he does this from detestation of the deed.

She is not placed in the catalogue of the supreme pontiffs because of the female sex.

Truly this is greatly to be marveled at, and one must cry out with the Apostle: “O depth of the wisdom and knowledge of God, how incomprehensible are his judgments,” and so forth—if what is commonly said was true, as this author relates. A certain sign of marble sculpture is said to have been placed on the road where this occurred in memory of the event.

Vincent in the Historical Mirror and John of Colonna, however, relate nothing about this.

But even if it was true, no prejudice to anyone’s salvation arose from it, because the Church was not then without a head, who is Christ, from whom it receives the inflowing of grace.

Nor were the ultimate effects of the sacraments that she conferred, namely grace, lacking to those who received them devoutly from her.

Although she, just like other women, was not capable of receiving the character of any order, could not confect the Eucharist even if in fact ordained, and could not absolve from sins, those ordained by her had to be ordained again, because they had received nothing from her.

Nevertheless, Christ supplied the grace of the sacraments in those who received worthily, their invincible ignorance of the deed excusing them from fault.

Section VIII

When this person was removed by death, Benedict III, a Roman by birth and the son of Patrodus, was created supreme bishop in the year of the Lord 853. He sat for two years and five months. When he died, the papacy was vacant for fifteen days.

As Martin says, he established that clerics should walk in an orderly manner and live honorably.

Among the other good things that he did, he restored the portico from the gate of the city as far as Saint Paul, and another portico from the gate of the city as far as Saint Lawrence. When he died, he was buried at Saint Peter’s.

John of Colonna relates this notable thing about Benedict: when he was cardinal priest of Saint Sixtus and had been elected pope by the consent of all, he was pressed by the people and clergy and also by the Roman nobles to give his assent to the election made concerning him.

Bending his knees with many tears, he said in a mournful voice: “I beg you, brothers, do not lead me into the church, because I am not sufficient to bear the burden of so great a summit.”

Nevertheless, while he resisted thus, they led him to the Lateran church and placed him upon the pontifical throne.

In distinction ninety-six of the Decrees, Pope John says:

“If the emperor is Catholic, with his peace be it said, he is a son, not a prelate, of the Church. In what belongs to religion, it is fitting for him to learn, not to teach.

“He has the privileges of his own power, which by divine grant he has obtained for administering the public laws. Let him not be ungrateful for its benefits and usurp anything contrary to the ordering of the celestial order.

“For God willed that the things which are to be disposed concerning the Church should belong to priests, not to the powers of the world. If those powers are faithful, he willed them to be subject to the priests of his Church.

“Therefore let him not claim for himself another’s right and the ministry deputed to the altar, nor strive to break away from him by whom all things are established, lest he appear to fight against the benefits of him from whom he obtained his own power.

“Almighty God willed the clerics and priests of the Christian religion to be ordained and examined, and to receive correction from error, not by public laws or by the powers of the world, but by pontiffs and priests.

“The Church alone ought always to judge concerning pontiffs. It does not belong to human laws to pronounce sentence concerning such men without the pontiffs principally established over the Church.

“Christian princes have been accustomed to obey the decrees of the Church, not to place their own power before them. Princes have been accustomed to submit their head to bishops, not to judge concerning their heads.”

These things are found there.

Section IX

When Benedict III departed, Nicholas I of this name, a Roman by birth, was canonically raised to the summit of the pontificate in the year of the Lord 857. He held the chair of Peter for nine years, two months, and twenty days. His father was called Theodore.

As Martin says, he was a most holy man. After the great Pope Gregory, scarcely anyone appeared in the Roman See who could be compared with him. Emperor Louis confirmed his ordination by his presence.

As John of Colonna writes from the Chronicle of the Pontiffs, he was a very holy man who, fleeing the honors of the world, desired to be free for God alone.

Hence, when he heard that he was to be assumed as pope, he fled and hid. But when he was found and forcibly dragged away, he was made pope by the consent of all.

He was handsome in appearance, learned in speech, humble in utterance, illustrious in action, and greatly intent upon fasts, vigils, and prayers.

Under this pontiff Michael, emperor of Constantinople or of the Greeks, sent envoys to Rome, through whom he also sent most precious gifts to the church of Saint Peter. Among them was a golden chalice of wondrous weight and workmanship, adorned with most precious stones.

Nicholas, as a fearless man of great authority yet not alien to clemency, deposed John, archbishop of Ravenna, because, when summoned, he had disdained to come to the Curia.

When John afterward came and humbled himself at the feet of Pope Nicholas, acknowledging his error, he was restored to his office at the prayers of Emperor Louis.

The same pope also excommunicated King Lothair, brother of Emperor Louis, because, after repudiating Theutberga his lawful wife, he had joined Waldrada his concubine to himself.

The Roman See bore and detested this enormous crime of adultery so greatly that two archbishops who, contrary to the order of law, had celebrated or assented to this divorce by their authority were excommunicated and thereafter deposed from their offices.

Hence concerning this matter and other notable things done by him, decrees issued by him are contained in the Decrees.

Writing to emperors in distinction ninety-six, he says:

“Where have you read that your predecessors, the emperors, were present at synodal assemblies, except perhaps at certain ones where the faith was treated, which is universal, which is common to all, and which pertains not only to clerics but also to laymen and to all Christians altogether?”

The same pope says in the same distinction:

“It is shown sufficiently clearly that a pontiff can neither be altogether loosed nor bound by secular power. It is established that he was called a god by the pious prince Constantine, since it is manifest that God cannot be judged by men.

“The younger Theodosius also, writing to the holy synod of Ephesus, first said: ‘The most magnificent Count Candidian, commander of the valiant household troops, has been appointed to proceed as far as your most sacred synod, and in no matter to communicate in the questions or expositions that are to be made concerning pious doctrines. For it is unlawful that one who is not in the order of the most holy bishops should meddle in ecclesiastical proceedings.’

“Therefore, these things being manifestly found, it appears that the fellow minister Ignatius could in no way have been expelled solely by an imperial sentence. In his condemnation, because the assent of certain prelates followed, it appears that this was a crime of flattery, not of lawful sanction.”

Pope Nicholas speaks concerning Ignatius, patriarch of Constantinople, who had been deposed by his suffragans at the urging of Michael, emperor of the Greeks. He greatly detests this deed and shows that it could not have been done.

In distinction twenty-one, in many chapters, he says:

“Ignatius is submitted to the deliberations of inferiors and subjects, contrary to the sacred canons which command, and the examples of the holy fathers, that one must always go where there is greater authority, and that in all controversies recourse should be directed to the judgments of the more powerful see. It is established that this was observed not only by Catholics but even by heretics themselves.

“Otherwise a council is clearly headless when it acts concerning so great a person and does not await the sentence of superiors.”

The same pope says in the following chapter:

“The holy fathers at Chalcedon so greatly detested this presumption that, among other things, for this especially they condemned Dioscorus, bishop of Alexandria, without any restoration, because, placing his mouth in heaven while his tongue passed over the earth, he dictated a sentence of excommunication against holy Pope Leo.”

In the chapter beginning “But Now,” in the same distinction, he brings forward for the same point the example of blessed Marcellinus, pope and martyr. Although in the time of Diocletian he had placed incense upon the coals in veneration of an idol, when a council of bishops had been assembled and he confessed his sin, no one dared to pronounce sentence against him.

They said: “The first see shall be judged by no one. Judge your cause from your own mouth.”

And when Pope Sixtus II was defamed concerning certain matters in a council of bishops where Emperor Valentinian was present, the emperor himself arose and placed the judgment of his own cause in the decision of Sixtus himself.

Concerning that same matter the pope says: “An inferior see cannot absolve a superior, for only the superior can fittingly absolve the inferior. Hence it is clearly foreseen that an inferior, who cannot absolve the superior, cannot bind him by judgment.”

Therefore the prophet also says: “Shall the axe glory against him who cuts with it?”

The same Nicholas, writing to Louis, emperor of the Romans, says in distinction ninety-six:

“In the Scriptures it is related that Emperor Constantine said: ‘Truly, if I saw with my own eyes a priest of God, or any one of those who are clothed in the monastic habit, sinning, I would spread out my cloak and cover him, lest he be seen by anyone.’

“In these matters, therefore, most beloved son, you are necessarily admonished that, just as you appear to be made equal to him in faith, religion, and equality of honor, so you should nevertheless aspire to be made equal in humility and devotion, so that in nothing you may be found inferior to him, but rather superior.

“We have said these things, desiring to render you cautious, so that, if it should happen that you hear anything concerning the priests of the Lord, who are rightly called fathers of souls, which may bring confusion to pious minds, you should not rashly expose it, but, imitating the sons of Noah, should henceforth cover the shame of your fathers with reverence, so that, just as they did, you may deserve to be filled with blessing under the Lord’s governance.”

The same pope writes thus to King Lothair, brother of Louis, in cause eleven, question two:

“Above all, avoid communion with Waldrada your concubine, who was formerly repudiated by you. For she has been excommunicated and, until she comes into our presence, separated from all fellowship of Christians.

“Therefore care must be taken lest you be struck together with her by the equal edge of the sentence, and, bound and fettered by passion for one little woman, be drawn into everlasting destruction.

“For prelates sin more grievously among the peoples, and by this they are punished more cruelly than others. As Gregory says: ‘Prelates ought to know that, if they ever perpetrate perverse things, they are worthy of as many deaths as the examples of perdition that they transmit to their subjects.’”

The same Nicholas, against King Lothair, brother of Emperor Louis, because after repudiating his wife he took another, writes thus to the bishops and archbishops established throughout Gaul, Germany, and Italy, in cause two, question one:

“The crime which King Lothair—if indeed he can truly be called a king, since he restrains the appetite of the body with no salutary governance but through slippery enervation yields instead to its unlawful movements—committed with two women, namely Theutberga and Waldrada, is manifest to all.

“Almost the whole world, flowing from every side to the thresholds or Apostolic See, reported that long before this the bishops Theutgaud and Gunthar had been his protectors and supporters in such a deed.

“Therefore, with the holy synod decreeing together with us, in their presence they were deposed, excommunicated from the priestly office, and unquestionably removed from episcopal governance.”

The sentence pronounced against these great archbishops, namely Theutgaud of Trier and Gunthar of Cologne, is found more fully in cause eleven, question two.

He writes thus to King Lothair himself, the adulterer, in cause twenty-four, question three:

“Are you not to be struck with strict vengeance, you who are recognized to have imitated the adultery and crime of Lamech in two wives? Our Lord did not erase this until his saving advent after seventy-seven generations, whereas the fratricide of Cain was abolished in the seventh generation by the waters of the cataclysm, that is, of the flood.”

The same Nicholas says in cause twenty-seven, question one:

“Queen Theutberga wrote to us that she wished to be stripped of royal dignity or the marriage bond and desired to be content with the private life alone. We wrote to her that this could not be done otherwise unless her husband Lothair chose the same life.

“For although it is written, ‘What God has joined together, let man not separate,’ nevertheless marriages are sometimes dissolved from regard for divine love and by the consent of both spouses, namely as to the marriage bed, not as to the bond; and then man does not separate them.

“We forbid your mutual separation to be made otherwise.”

The same pope says thus in response to the consultations of the Bulgars, who had recently been converted to the faith, in cause fifteen, question eight:

“You ask whether you ought to receive communion from a priest who has been caught in adultery, or concerning whom report alone has spread this, or whether you ought not.

“We respond: No one, however polluted he may be, can pollute the divine sacraments, which are the purgation of every contagion. Whatever sort the priest may be, the things that are holy cannot be defiled.

“Therefore communion is to be received from him until he is condemned by the judgment of the bishops, because evil men, by ministering good things, harm themselves alone.

“A wax torch when lit indeed brings loss to itself, but supplies light to others in the darkness; and from the same thing by which it furnishes advantage to others, it brings loss to itself.

“Therefore receive the mysteries of Christ fearlessly from every priest, because all things are purified in faith.”

This is to be understood, as the gloss says, and well, unless such a priest has been cut off by sentence, or unless he is a notorious fornicator or simoniac.

The same pope says concerning the matter of custom, writing to Michael, emperor of the Greeks, in distinction eleven:

“It follows that what is decreed by full authority by the governors of this see, namely the Apostolic See, should not be removed under the hindrance of any custom by merely following individual wills, but should be held more firmly and unshaken.”

The gloss there says: “Unless there is such a custom as can prejudice law.”

The same pope says to the same emperor in distinction twelve:

“The holy Roman Church knows that diverse customs according to place and time do no harm to the salvation of believers, if canonical authority does not stand against them, on account of which we should oppose them. Hence we judge that nothing ought or can resist them.”

The same pope says: “It is ridiculous and a sufficiently abominable disgrace that we should permit the traditions which we received of old from the fathers to be infringed.”

In his time the king of the Bulgars was converted to Christianity with his nation. Hence, ministers having been sent to him from the Apostolic See and assistance also having been received from King Louis, he was so strengthened in the faith that not long afterward, when his elder son had been established in the kingdom, he himself renounced the world and became a monk.

But thereafter his son, acting youthfully, wished to return to the worship of paganism. Having resumed the military belt and royal insignia, the father left the monastery, pursued his son, captured him, put out his eyes, and thrust him into prison.

After placing his younger son in the kingdom, he resumed the habit and ended his days well.

The same Nicholas, in response to the consultations of the Bulgars, says in distinction twenty-eight:

“Although priests are greatly reprehensible, namely when they are evil and incontinent, it is nevertheless fitting that you imitate God, who makes his sun rise upon the good and the evil.

“You ought not to cast them away from you, because the Lord did not cast even Judas, when he was a deceitful disciple, from the number of the disciples.

“But concerning priests, you who are laymen ought neither to judge nor investigate anything concerning their life. Whatever it may be is to be reserved for the judgment of the bishops.”

The same pope writes concerning a certain man whom his father, when he was around the tenth year of his age, caused to be clothed in the monastic habit against the will of the boy himself, and who afterward did not consent to be a monk, that he should be dismissed as free. He says thus in cause twenty, question three, in the chapter beginning “The Present”:

“Wisely recalling the words of the Psalmist, in which he declares that he sacrifices himself to God voluntarily and prays that the voluntary offerings of his mouth may be well pleasing in the sight of God, we judge that the present cleric named Lambert ought by no means to be considered to have become a monk under such violence.

“For what someone does not choose or desire, he assuredly does not love; and what he does not love, he easily despises. Therefore no good exists unless it is voluntary.

“For this reason the Lord also commanded that a staff by which violence might be inflicted upon anyone should not be carried on the way.

“Therefore you act advisedly if by pious persuasions, by preaching contempt of the world and love of God rather than by inflicting violence, you kindle him toward that heavenly love.”

The same pope says in response to the consultations of the Bulgars, in cause twenty-three, question eight:

“If no necessity presses, one must abstain from battles not only in the Lenten season but at every time.

“But if unavoidable necessity presses, even in the Lenten season preparation for wars for the defense of oneself and the fatherland or of paternal laws must without doubt not be spared, lest, namely, man appear to tempt God if he has what he may do and does not take care to provide for his own salvation and that of others and does not guard beforehand against losses to holy religion.”

The same pope says to King Charles, in cause twenty-three, question eight:

“It is established to be highly reprehensible that you have alleged that the greater part of all the bishops, together with your other faithful men, keep watch day and night against maritime pirates, and that for this reason the bishops are impeded from coming, since it belongs to the soldiers of Christ to serve Christ.

“But let the soldiers of the world serve the world, as it is written: ‘No one serving as a soldier for God entangles himself in secular affairs.’ If the soldiers of the world apply themselves to military service, what belongs to the bishops and soldiers of Christ except that they should be free for prayers?”

The same pope says in cause twenty-four, question two, in the chapter beginning “Those Who Are Pilgrims”:

“Let that peace which we call the Truce of God be so observed as it was established by the archbishops and bishops of each province. Let anyone who breaks it be subjected to excommunication.”

The same pope says in cause twenty-four, question four:

“We do not adopt single combat into law, because we do not find that it was commanded. For although we read that certain men entered it, just as sacred history records that Saint David went against Goliath, nevertheless divine authority nowhere decreed that it should be held as law, since those who do this and follow it appear to tempt God alone.”

The same pope says thus to Bishop Unifredus, in cause seven, question one:

“You ask concerning the priest Guadagarius whether, when you have been driven from the bishopric by the Normans, you ought thereafter to dwell in the monastery.

“In this matter you should know, dearest brother, that it is pernicious to abandon a ship placed in calm, how much more so amid the waves.

“We do not say that we should not flee persecutors, and especially the snares of pagans, when they rage for a time and by reason of the multitude of our sins are divinely permitted to obtain power to harm, especially since we ought not voluntarily to betray ourselves to them.

“But because we, although we are rams, furnish leadership to the flocks—and rather, by God’s authorship, are their shepherds—it is certainly fitting that we remain with them in dangers according to our strength.

“And when tranquility has been restored by divine mercy and the furious harassment has been quieted, we ought immediately to seek the flock, gather it into one, and, after the peace and especially the security of the heavenly fatherland has been preached, lift its souls upward.

“We ought to be solicitous for their protection for so long that, if by the judgment of God they should perhaps lose the advantages of the present time, they may hope without doubt to receive the eternal joys of the future life.”

The same pope says in cause nine, question three:

“It is certainly evident that the judgment of the Apostolic See, than whose authority there is none greater, is to be reconsidered by no one, and no one is permitted to judge concerning its judgment.

“According to this, Pope Innocent, writing to Rufus and the other bishops established throughout Thessaly, says: ‘No one ever boldly laid opposing hands upon the apostolic summit, concerning whose judgment it is not permitted to reconsider. No one stood rebellious in this matter except one who wished judgment to be made concerning himself.’

“And blessed Pope Gelasius says: ‘The canons never commanded judgment to be made concerning its judgment, that is, the judgment of the Roman Church. They established that its sentence ought not to be dissolved, but rather commanded that its decrees ought to be followed.’”

The same pope says in distinction forty-three:

“The stewardship of the heavenly seed has been entrusted to us. Woe if we do not scatter it; woe if we are silent. Since the vessel of election fears this and cries out, how much more is it to be feared by anyone small?

“Therefore, just as no slight danger rests upon pontiffs for having kept silent about what is fitting, so there is no moderate peril for those who, although they ought to obey, despise doing so—which may it not be.”

The same pope says in distinction ten:

“The law of emperors is not to be used in all ecclesiastical controversies, especially when it is found sometimes to oppose evangelical and canonical sanction.

“The law of emperors is not above the law of God, but beneath it. Ecclesiastical rights cannot be dissolved by imperial judgment.

“To show this, the testimonies of two men, namely Innocent and Gregory, suffice. For Saint Innocent says in his decretal letter to Alexander, bishop of Antioch: ‘Concerning what you ask, whether, when provinces have been divided by imperial judgment so that two metropolises are made, two metropolitans ought to be named, it has not seemed good to us that the Church of God should be changed according to the mobility of worldly necessities or should undergo honors or divisions which the emperor has seen fit to make for his own causes.’

“Blessed Gregory, writing to Theotista the patrician, says among other things: ‘If marriages are said to have to be dissolved for the sake of religion, it must be known that, even if human law granted this, divine law nevertheless forbade it.’”

There the gloss says that Emperor Justinian, who established this, erred. Or it can also be said that he permitted this to avoid a greater evil, namely the killing of a wife.

The same pope says in distinction ninety-seven:

“The most noble and vigorous man, the envoy of your sublimity, although he had brought no letter from you to our pontificate according to custom, and although it was never the custom of the Apostolic See to receive an embassy from any quarter without sealed letters, nevertheless, honoring you in him and recognizing his gravity and the truthful assertions of his speech, we received him as was fitting and believed him as was honorable.”

Note there in the gloss that credence is not to be given to envoys without letters. Many notable things concerning this matter of letters are also found there.

In the time of this Nicholas, Saint Cyril, apostle of almost all the Slavs because he converted them—who, as I believe, are elsewhere called Bulgars—sought the body of Saint Clement the pope where it had been cast into the sea and remained covered by the waters of the sea together with the temple, because that miracle, namely the drying of the sea, had ceased for a long time.

When Cyril prayed with the people for the finding of the body, the sea was dried as far as the place where that body lay in the temple. Entering it, he carried the body from Cherson to Rome.

Section X

When Nicholas, complete in every holiness, died, Adrian II, a Roman by birth and the son of Talarus the bishop, was made bishop of the city and the world in the year of the Lord 867, the one hundred and ninth in the number of pontiffs. He held the chair of Peter for five years and eleven months.

As John of Colonna testifies, he was a man of great almsgiving.

When he was a cardinal priest and had once received forty denarii from Pope Sergius, gold coins, I believe, or silver ones, he returned home and found a very great multitude of pilgrims before his house.

Calling his steward, he said to him: “Take this money and give three denarii to each pilgrim.”

When the steward affirmed that it could not suffice even for a third part of the pilgrims, the saint began personally to give three denarii to each one.

Therefore, when the steward marveled that, after three denarii had been given to each, money still remained, the holy man again bestowed three upon each person of his household. When six still remained, Adrian said: “You see how generous the Lord Jesus Christ is, who from that quantity which you said could not possibly suffice has reserved three for me and three for you also.”

Vincent omits this, perhaps because he did not notice it, but Martin places it in his chronicle.

Concerning this Adrian it is said thus in distinction sixty-three:

“When Adrian II was being drawn from the church of the Mother of God our Lady, which is called At the Crib, to the Lateran patriarchate, he was carried there in rivalry by the people, clergy, and nobles.

“When the envoys sent by Emperor Louis II heard this, they took it with displeasure and were indignant that, although they were present, they had not been invited and had not deserved to be present at the election of the future prelate desired by them.”

Having accepted the explanation that this had been done not from contempt for the emperor, but from foresight for future times, lest through this kindling the custom of waiting for the envoys of princes in the election of Roman prelates should take root, they thoroughly quieted all indignation. They too approached humbly to greet the man elected.

Concerning this matter it is also said thus in the same distinction, from the Eighth Synod:

Pope Adrian II sent to Basil, emperor of the Greeks, and to his sons Constantine and Leo, the emperors, at Constantinople, those whom Nicholas his predecessor had arranged to send as his representatives, namely Donatus, bishop of Ostia, Stephen, bishop of Ephesus, and Martin, deacon of the Holy Roman Church.

With them went Anastasius, librarian, that is, chancellor, of the Roman Church, skilled in both languages, namely Greek and Latin.

When a synod had been assembled, which those gathering there called the eighth universal synod, they quieted the schism which had arisen from the deposition of Ignatius and the ordination of Photius, anathematizing Photius and restoring Ignatius.

In it the following was established:

“In agreement with the earlier councils, this holy and universal synod has defined and established, and has promulgated as law, that the consecrations and promotions of bishops are to be made by the election of the clergy and the decree of the college of bishops.

“No lay prince or powerful man is to insert himself into the election or promotion of any patriarch, archbishop, metropolitan, or any bishop whatsoever, lest an irregular and improper dispute or confusion should arise from this, especially since it is fitting for no powerful man or any other layman to have any power in such matters.

“Rather, he is to be silent and attend to himself until the election of the future pontiff receives its conclusion regularly from the college of the Church.”

And in chapter one of the same distinction a threat of anathema is made by Pope Adrian himself against those acting to the contrary.

King Lothair, whom Pope Nicholas had excommunicated for adultery, as was said above, came to this Adrian, as Martin relates in his Chronicle. Coming to Rome in order to excuse himself concerning the said adultery, both he and his nobles were invited by the pope to communion in the body and blood of Christ as a demonstration of their innocence. Because they received it unworthily, they all died within the year. King Lothair also died at Piacenza on the road while returning.

Section XI

After the passing of Adrian II, John VIII, a Roman by nation, was raised to the supreme prelacy in the year of the Lord 872. He sat for ten years and two days.

As Martin says in his Chronicle, he anointed Charles, son of King Louis, as emperor. In his time the Saracens, ranging through Italy, destroyed the church of Saint Benedict on Monte Cassino.

For this Pope John, John, a deacon of the Roman Church, laudably composed the life of blessed Pope Gregory in four books.

He suffered injury from the Romans, so that he was held in custody, because he did not favor Charles when he was in Francia. For he remained for almost a year with Louis the Stammerer, who was opposed to him.

He gave to the venerable man who was archbishop of Sens the head of blessed Pope Gregory and the arm of Saint Pope Leo, which he deposited as relics at Sens.

Under this pontiff John, Anastasius, librarian, that is, chancellor, of the Roman Church, flourished at Rome. He was very learned in the Greek and Latin languages, fluent in eloquence, and very accomplished in every science.

According to John of Colonna, at the command of Pope John he translated the seventh universal synod from Greek into Latin. In addition, he also translated the Hierarchy of Dionysius the Areopagite, which he sent to Emperor Charles, the son of Louis. Moreover, he translated from Greek into Latin the Passion of Peter of Alexandria, that of Acacius and his companions, and that of Saint John the Almsgiver, and he produced several other short works.

This John VIII says thus in cause twenty-three, question five:

“The administrators of secular dignities, who without doubt ought to have been appointed for the protection of churches, the defense of orphans and widows, and the restraint of plundering, whenever they have been approached by bishops and ecclesiastical men, are to hear their complaints very attentively, and, according as necessity shall require, are to examine them without negligence and correct them with diligent care.

“But if, not having the fear of God before their eyes, they are found negligent after a second and third admonition, let them know themselves deprived of all communion,” namely after sentence has been rendered against them.

The same man, writing to Duke Mago in cause twenty-three, question eight, says thus:

“Furthermore, we exhort the zeal of your devotion that you be stirred up all the more vehemently against the maritime robbers who rage against Christians under the pretext of your name, inasmuch as you recognize that the reputation of your name has been obscured by their wickedness.

“For although it may be believed that they lie in wait for those sailing without your consent, nevertheless, because they are said to be capable of being suppressed by you, unless you restrain them you will not be held innocent.

“For it is written: ‘He who does not correct crimes which he can amend commits them himself.’”

The gloss says that this holds when someone is the judge of such matters; then he is bound to do this.

The same man says in cause seventeen, question four:

“Whoever shall be found guilty of sacrilege shall pay thirty pounds of the purest tested silver to the bishops, abbots, or persons to whom the complaint of sacrilege shall justly have pertained.

“Sacrilege is committed if someone breaks into a church, or into the thirty ecclesiastical paces which are around a church, or into houses which are within the aforesaid paces, by plundering or carrying something away from there; or if someone inflicts injury or the taking away of property upon those who do not bear arms, or upon monks, those devoted to God, or any ecclesiastical persons.”

The same man says in the same question:

“If anyone violates the house of God and removes anything from it without the permission of the one to whom it is known to have been entrusted, or inflicts injury upon ecclesiastical persons, let him know himself deprived of communion until, having been admonished in the assembly, he makes lawful satisfaction.”

The same man says:

“Those who break into monasteries, places dedicated to God, and churches, and remove deposits or any other things from them, shall repay the damage ninefold and the immunity threefold, and, as sacrilegious persons, shall be subjected to canonical sentence.”

Those who break into or burn churches and monasteries are today excommunicated. Those who merely carry property away from them, however, are not.

Pope John says thus in cause sixteen, question three:

“But if anyone perhaps raises an objection concerning the number of years, know that among Christians and those who are of one faith a fixed number has been assigned, namely for prescription.

“But wherever the fury of pagans and unbelievers is involved, however much time may pass, it does not prejudice the right of churches, which, knowing no bodily weapons, patiently await only the Lord and their defender, when it shall please him to have mercy upon them.

“But if length of years should be an impediment in such matters, God himself is to be reproved, who after four hundred and thirty years freed the children of Israel from the harshest servitude of Pharaoh and from the iron furnace; and so is the Redeemer himself, who through himself snatched the human race from the prisons of hell after thousands of years.”

The same John VIII, writing to King Louis, says in cause sixteen, question three:

“Let no one presume to take grounds for objecting from the number of years, because the Holy Roman Church, which by God’s authorship we serve, is restricted by no periods of time and prejudiced by no divisions of kingdoms in regard to the privileges which it received, established upon the firm rock of Peter.

“Rather, the venerable laws of the Romans, promulgated by divine agency through the mouths of princes, admit prescription of its property only through one hundred years.”

Section XII

When the Lord called John VIII from this world, Martin, the one hundred and eleventh, ascended the chair of Peter in the year of the Lord 882. He sat for one year and two months.

After him Martin in his Chronicle places Adrian III. Others place Agapetus, a Roman by nation, who held the pontificate for one year and three months.

About this time Rollo, who was duke of the Normans, received baptism. Because the count of Paris received him from the sacred font, he was called Robert; therefore Rollo was afterward called Robert.

And thus, when the Normans had been converted to the faith, peace was made between them and the Gauls, whereas previously the Normans, raging through Gaul, had inflicted many evils upon them.

After Rollo, who was also Robert, had been baptized, he bound himself to divine service with marvelous fervor, and above all the princes of his time he loved and fostered justice and strove to have it observed in his land. He even ordered bracelets and rings to be hung on the great public roads so that they might mock the greed of travelers, since there were none who would seize them.

He avenged with such severity the injuries committed by the greater against the lesser without cause that the lesser lived more safely and freely than the greater. Hence even now in the kingdom of the Franks, when injury or violence is inflicted upon someone, they are accustomed to cry out in their language: “O Rollo, would that you were alive!”

Therefore the wrath of God was turned into mercy toward the Gauls, who had been plundered by the Normans and Danes for forty years and more and had been reduced almost to nothing, when those peoples, as has been said, were converted to the faith and peace was restored throughout Francia.

The body of blessed Martin, which for fear of the barbarians had been carried away from Tours to Auxerre, was brought back to Tours. At its return or bringing back, so many and such great miracles were performed that whoever was afflicted by any illness or infirmity whatsoever was healed upon encountering it, even without having been carried there, even without asking, indeed even against his will.

Hence, among the others, two infirm men who received many alms by making a livelihood from their infirmity, upon hearing the wonders that were being performed, fled before those sacred relics of the body, fearing to be healed lest through this they lose their customary gain. But, encountering them against their will, they were suddenly healed.

Moreover, when the body of the blessed man entered the boundaries of the parish in wintertime, all the thickets and shrubs were clothed with leaves and flowers. Candles and lamps throughout the churches were also kindled by divine light, especially in the two basilicas dedicated in his name. The bells themselves also rang with no one touching them. Hence the whole province of Tours celebrates this feast solemnly every year.

Section XIII

When at length the Apostolic See was vacant, Stephen V, a Roman by nation, was made pontiff of the city, the one hundred and twelfth. His father was Adrian of the Via Lata. He was the vicar of Christ for six years and eight days. He presided in the year of the Lord 885.

Some place a Basil here, but that is not commonly held. No Basil is found in the catalogue of pontiffs.

This Stephen writes thus to the bishop of Mainz in cause two, question four:

“You have consulted us concerning infants who, sleeping in one bed with their parents, are found dead: whether the parents ought to purify themselves by hot iron, boiling water, or any other ordeal in order to prove that they did not crush them.

“For parents are to be admonished and warned not to place such little children with themselves in one bed, lest through some negligence they be suffocated or crushed and the parents themselves thereby be found guilty of homicide.

“For the sacred canons do not judge that a confession is to be extorted from anyone by an ordeal of hot iron or boiling water. What was not established by the teaching of the holy fathers is not to be presumed through a superstitious invention.

“For it has been committed to our governance to judge, with the fear of God before our eyes, offenses made public by voluntary confession or the attestation of witnesses. Hidden and unknown matters, however, are to be left to him who alone knows the hearts of the sons of men.”

It should also be noted that certain others place Adrian III immediately before this Stephen, sitting for one year and three months. But this is not commonly held, and therefore he is not placed in the number of pontiffs.

Section XIV

Upon the death of Pope Stephen, Formosus, the one hundred and third, was made prelate of the Roman Church in the year of the Lord 891. He remained in the pontificate for five years, six months, and eighteen days.

As John of Colonna relates, he was made pope against the will of certain Roman nobles. These men favored the Roman Sergius and wished him to preside over the supreme pontificate, but, being unable to prevail, they remained quiet.

When this Formosus at one time had come under adverse suspicion before Pope John VIII, of whom above, he fled, leaving the bishopric of Porto. And because, having been recalled by the same pope, he refused to return, he was excommunicated.

At length, when Pope John was setting out for Gaul on the affairs of the Church, Formosus approached him. Degraded by him as far as the lay habit, he swore that he would no longer enter Rome, nor seek again the bishopric of his city, and, furthermore, that he would remain in lay communion. He confirmed all these things in writing with his own hand.

Afterward, however, he was restored by Martin, John's successor, to his own bishopric contrary to the oath he had given. He not only entered Rome, but in the course of time, when Stephen, who had succeeded Martin, died, he received the papacy of the Roman See. On account of this matter, much controversy subsequently arose in the Roman Church. Agitated long afterward, it variously generated great scandal in the hearts of many, as will appear below.

Therefore, when the Romans gravely harassed this Pope Formosus and did not permit him to govern the Church, he was compelled to summon from the Franks to his aid Arnulf, then emperor of the Romans.

Arnulf, after rapidly assembling an army, came to Rome. But, not being admitted within, he besieged it on the side which looks toward Tuscany.

During this siege, when a little hare, suddenly found by the dogs, fled toward the city, the army followed it with a very great shout. The Romans who were standing guard on that side, thinking that the city had been captured by the emperor's army on the other side, abandoned the walls and fled.

Seeing this, the enemy applied ladders and entered the city; the gates having been opened, the emperor entered with his entire army. Thus Rome was captured for the first time by an army of Germans under Emperor Arnulf.

When the emperor had entered the city, Pope Formosus received him with much honor. Afterward, having received the imperial blessing from him, he was solemnly crowned. When these things had duly been completed, the emperor ordered all those who had injured Pope Formosus to be summoned before him and beheaded as an example to others.

Scandal and dissension therefore arose from this concerning Pope Formosus. Some proclaimed that his consecration and the ordinations made by him ought to be invalid. Others, on the contrary, judged by sounder counsel that, whatever Formosus may have been, all the ordinations or consecrations ought to be valid, both because of the dignity of the priestly office and because of the faith of those who had been ordained, especially since Formosus himself had been absolved by Pope Martin from the perjury of the oath.

Boniface VI, a Tuscan by nation, succeeded Formosus in the papacy. He sat for only twenty-five days and is described as the one hundred and fourteenth in the number of pontiffs.

After Boniface, Stephen VI, a Roman by nation, received the Church of God to govern in the year of the Lord 897, the one hundred and fifteenth in the number of pontiffs. According to certain men he sat for one year and three months; according to others, as Vincent says, for four months.

In his time, as John of Colonna relates, the entire Lateran church fell down from the gate which looks toward the east as far as the high altar.

Although this Stephen had been greatly loved by Pope Formosus and had been ordained bishop of Anagni by him, nevertheless, after he was made supreme pontiff, he persecuted Formosus and decreed that all his ordinations were invalid. Moreover, he perpetrated against him other things wicked even to speak of.

For it is read that he caused the body of Formosus to be taken from the tomb and brought into a council which he had assembled; first he caused it to be stripped of the pontifical habit and clothed in lay garments. Then, after two fingers of the right hand had been cut off, he ordered it to be cast into the Tiber.

When Stephen died, a man named Romanus, a Spaniard by nation, succeeded him. He sat for a little less than four months and was the one hundred and sixteenth in the number of pontiffs.

When Romanus had been taken from this life, Theodore, a Roman by nation, ascended the chair of Peter. He sat there for twenty days.

Holding a position contrary to Stephen, he reconciled those ordained by Pope Formosus, whom Stephen, as Vincent relates in the Mirror of History, had forcibly disordained within Rome and not outside it, and had not presumed to consecrate them again. After these men had been reconciled, Pope Theodore returned the books of renunciation and ordered them to be burned with fire.

When Theodore had completed his life, John, a native of Tivoli, the one hundred and eighteenth, presided over the universal Church. He sat for two years and three months.

To confirm the ordination of Formosus, whom Stephen had deposed, he appointed a synod of seventy-four bishops at Ravenna, in the presence of the archbishops of the Franks and the king. Before them the synod was burned, that is, the acts of the synod which Stephen had held for the condemnation of Formosus.

When John died, Benedict IV, a Roman by nation, succeeded to the papacy in the year of the Lord 902. He sat for three years, or, according to others, for four years and six months. The chroniclers write nothing about him.

After Benedict, Leo V, a native of Arezzo, is described. Thirty days after his ordination, Christopher, his priest, seized him and thrust him into prison, and himself seized the prelacy by invasion. But after seven months Christopher was cast out of the papacy and became a monk.

Section XV

Thereafter Sergius III, a Roman by nation, was created supreme pontiff in the year of the Lord 906. He held the See of Peter for seven years and three months.

He rebuilt from the ground the Lateran basilica, which had wholly fallen down in the time of Stephen VI, as has been said, and enriched it with various gifts and ornaments, as could be read in letters engraved on both sides of the walls before those bronze columns which stood before the altar, up to the time when the church itself was burned.

This Sergius, as Vincent relates in the Mirror of History and Martin in the Chronicle, had previously been a deacon and, on account of Formosus, had been rejected from the papacy, he who had been made a bishop by that same Formosus. Nevertheless, he went to the Franks and, with their aid, captured Christopher, the invader of the papacy, and thrust him into prison, as has been said. Entering Rome secretly, he invaded the papacy and drove the Romans by threats and terrors to hold all the ordinations of Formosus invalid.

In vengeance for his own rejection—which is a wicked thing to speak of—he ordered Formosus to be drawn from the tomb, placed in the pontifical chair clothed as a priest, and beheaded. Moreover, after three fingers had been cut off, he caused him to be cast into the Tiber. He unjustly disordained all whom Formosus had ordained and still more unjustly reordained them.

When Formosus was found by fishermen and carried in a coffin into the basilica of the Prince of the Apostles, certain images of the saints were seen openly by everyone to adore him and greet him reverently.

After Sergius, Anastasius III received the Roman Church to govern in the year of the Lord 913. He sat for two years and two months.

He was succeeded by one named Lando, a native of Sabina, who held the chair for four months and twenty-two days. The papacy was vacant for thirty days.

When Lando had been called to the Lord, John X, a Roman by nation, held the chair of Peter in the year of the Lord 917. He sat for thirteen years and two months. According to John of Colonna and Martin, he was a son of Pope Sergius.

By his counsel the Saracens who were devastating the territories of the Romans were defeated in war. For when the Saracens were, as it were, dominant in Italy, they were first defeated near the city. Then Pope John, entering Apulia with Marquis Alberic against the Saracens at Garigliano and waging a hard war with them, became victorious. Returning thence together to Rome, they were received by the Roman people with great joy and honor.

But afterward, when discord intervened, the marquis was expelled from the city. Building a fortress at Orte, he took refuge there and sent messengers for the Hungarians so that they might possess the land of the Romans. Upon coming, they plundered all Tuscany and carried men, women, and whatever they could take away into Hungary. Moved by this, the Romans killed the marquis. The Hungarians, however, were afterward accustomed to devastate the territories of the Romans every year for a long time.

Pope John was afterward captured by the soldiers of Guido, sent into prison, and strangled when a pillow was placed over his face.

Another John was put in his place upon the chair of Peter. Because that John had entered badly, he was therefore cast out and is not commonly placed in the number of pontiffs.

In the year of the Lord 930, Leo VI, a Roman by nation, was assumed as bishop of the city. He sat for almost three months.

After the passing of Leo, Stephen VII, a Roman by nation, was made supreme prelate. He sat for two years, one month, and fifteen days.

When he departed, John XI, a Roman by nation, was created pope. He sat for four years, ten months, and fifteen days. In his first year, as Martin relates in his Chronicle, a fountain in the city of Genoa poured forth blood most abundantly, perhaps portending its imminent destruction. For in that same year it was captured by Saracens coming from Africa and emptied of men and treasures.

He was followed by Leo VII, a Roman by nation, in the year of the Lord 936. He held the papacy for three years, six months, and ten days.

After him was Stephen VIII, a German by nation, for three years, six months, and ten days. He was mutilated by the Romans.

Martin III, a Roman by nation, succeeded the aforesaid man. He sat for three years, six months, and fourteen days.

When Martin passed to the Lord, Agapetus II, a Roman by nation, was placed in the Roman See. He remained in it for eight years, six months, and ten days. He began to preside over the Church in the year of the Lord 945.

The chroniclers or historiographers say almost nothing about all the aforesaid men.

Section XVI

Pope Agapetus was joined to his fathers. At that event a certain Alberic, one of the most powerful of the Roman nobles, labored sufficiently with the clergy, both by entreaties and gifts and also by threats, that his son should be elected pope.

Before his election this son was called Octavian, but afterward he was named John, the twelfth of that name. He was very youthful in his conduct. Given over solely to the care of the flesh, he devoted himself to hunting and lust, and had cast chastity so far from himself that women entered publicly to him, as John of Colonna and Vincent note.

This monster in conduct sat for nine years and three months.

When Emperor Otto I entered Italy, summoned by the pope through his envoys and by the peoples of Italy so that he might free it from the tyranny of Berengar, who was greatly harassing it, he sent that Berengar into exile. He was also received with great honor by the clergy and Roman people and was solemnly crowned by Pope John himself.

After receiving the crown, he remained at Rome for some time. Having spoken several times with this most wretched Pope John, he urged him to recover from his most unclean life. But when he accomplished very little, the emperor, detesting his conduct, withdrew into the regions of Spoleto.

Alberic, the son of the said Berengar, came to Pope John and, drawing him to himself by promises and gifts, sought to attempt something against the emperor. When this was perceived by certain Romans and cardinals who wrote to the emperor, the pope on that account caused the nose of one cardinal deacon to be cut off, as though he had been an adviser in this deed, and the hand of the subdeacon who had written the letters, as Martin relates in his Chronicle.

The emperor returned to Rome. But Pope John, fearing his coming, fled into Campania, where he hid in the woods and mountains like a beast.

Therefore, arriving at Rome, the emperor sought and received hostages from all the nobles of the city. He feared that they might contrive something in favor of Pope John, for that most wretched pope was sprung from the lineage of Roman nobles.

With the common consent of all, the emperor sent an embassy to Pope John and urged him to lay aside fear and return safely to his see. When he was unwilling to return, all the Romans, clergy and people, begged the emperor to provide the Church with a worthy pontiff.

The emperor is said to have answered them:

“You yourselves, Quirites, to whom the election of the pontiff of the city belongs, choose, with God before your eyes, one who is worthy, and I shall most gladly confirm the man whom you elect.”

Having heard this, all the Romans with one voice and one consent elected before the emperor as supreme pontiff Leo, a venerable man, the chief notary of the Apostolic See, a Roman by nation. He was solemnly conducted to the Lateran church and consecrated.

But whether this could lawfully have been done—whether a pope, even if a notorious sinner and one scandalizing the Church, could have been deposed, even by a synod, except for the vice of heresy, and another could have been created while he was living and had not voluntarily resigned—is a great question. It belongs to the present work not to determine it, but only to weave together the history.

When affairs in the city had been settled, the emperor went into Tuscany. While he was there, certain Romans, after taking counsel, recalled Pope John, whom the emperor had cast out of the papacy on account of his crimes by the counsel and assent of a synod, the clergy, and the people. They restored him to his see with no small solemnity. The emperor, as has been said, had deposed him in an assembled synod of bishops before the election of Leo.

When Leo perceived this, he feared for his person, fled from the city, went to the emperor, and related the course of the matter. Hearing it, the emperor angrily resolved to return to Rome.

But in those days, while the most wretched Pope John was most shamelessly taking pleasure with a certain man's wife, he was struck by the devil in the bedchamber and suddenly expired without penance and the viaticum.

Concerning that Pope John and Otto I before Otto's coronation, the chapter beginning "To You, Lord," in distinction sixty-three says:

"To you, Lord Pope John, I, King Otto, cause promise and oath to be made by the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, by this wood of the life-giving cross, and by these relics of the saints, that, if the Lord permitting I come to Rome, I shall exalt the Holy Roman Church and you, its ruler, according to my power.

"You shall never lose your life, your limbs, or the honor itself which you possess by my will, my consent, my counsel, or my exhortation.

"In Rome I shall hold no court or make any ordinance concerning all those matters which pertain to you or to the Romans without your counsel; and whatever from the land of Saint Peter shall come into our power, I shall return to you.

"Whomever I shall entrust with the kingdom of Italy, I shall cause him to swear that he will be your helper in defending the land of Saint Peter according to his power."

From these words it is evident that he made this promise before Otto himself came to Rome.

Thus, when John had died miserably, Leo VIII remained in the See of Peter. He was in it for one year and four months, in the year of the Lord 963.

But as soon as the aforesaid John had died, the Romans elected as pope Benedict V, then a cardinal of the Roman Church. When he had been elected, they sent messengers to Otto, begging him concerning this matter that he should approve Benedict himself with his consent and confirm the election, as John of Colonna relates.

But the emperor, filled with anger and accusing them in many matters, refused to hear them. As they withdrew, he answered them as follows:

"Go and announce to the Romans: I shall cease seeking to restore Lord Pope Leo to his see, from which he was wickedly cast out by them, when I shall have laid down my sword."

The emperor, therefore, angry both over Leo's expulsion and over the election of another, namely Benedict, assembled great forces, came to Rome, and surrounded it on every side with a siege. By thoroughly plundering everything outside the walls, he brought the Romans to such wretched hunger that asses and horses were eaten within the city.

Wearied by so many evils and unable to endure any longer, the Romans opened the gates to him. They handed Benedict, whom they had ordained, a simple and innocent man, over to the judgment of the emperor, and restored Leo to his see with solemnity.

After all these things had been completed according to the prince's judgment, he was reconciled to the Romans at Leo's entreaty.

Otto I therefore remained at Rome for some time. While he was there and the solemnity of the Lord's Nativity was approaching, he caused his son Otto to be crowned by Pope Leo and joined to him in marriage Theophania, daughter of the emperor of Constantinople. Departing from there, he returned to Germany, taking with him the aforesaid Benedict, who had held the papacy for only two months. According to some, he caused Benedict to be strangled in prison.

As Martin says in his Chronicle, this Leo, on account of the wickedness of the Romans, established that no one should be made pope except with the assent of the emperor.

This is contained in distinction sixty-three, where it is said:

"In a synod assembled at Rome in the church of the Holy Savior, according to the example of blessed Adrian, bishop of the Apostolic See, who granted to Lord Charles, the most victorious king of the Franks and Lombards, the dignity of the patriciate, the ordering of the Apostolic See, and the investiture of bishops, I Leo likewise, servant of the servants of God and bishop, together with all the clergy and the Roman people, establish, confirm, and corroborate, and by our apostolic authority concede and bestow upon Lord Otto I, king of the Germans, and upon his successors in this kingdom of Italy in perpetuity, the power to choose a successor and to ordain the pontiff of the supreme Apostolic See, and through this to ordain archbishops or bishops, so that they may receive investiture and consecration from him, excepting those whom the emperor has conceded to the pontiff and the archbishops.

“And let no one hereafter, of whatever dignity or religious condition, have the power to elect either the patrician or the pontiff of the supreme Apostolic See, or to ordain any bishop, without the consent of the emperor himself. Nevertheless, let this be done without any money, and let the emperor himself be patrician and king.”

At the end of the chapter he imposes the penalty of excommunication upon those acting to the contrary and, unless they recover their senses, the penalty of exile or death.

Section XVII

When Leo was called to the Lord, Pope John XIII, a native of the city of Narni, was elected and consecrated. He spent six years, eleven months, and five days in that dignity.

While he was governing the Church in tranquility, the prefect of the city, together with Geoffrey, count of Campania, and certain other Romans, made a conspiracy against him and captured him. Having been captured, he was most disgracefully committed to imprisonment in the Castel Sant’Angelo. He was detained there for almost eleven months.

When this came to the emperor’s knowledge, he immediately assembled his forces and hastened to Rome. But before he reached the city, that Geoffrey was killed by a certain John together with his son.

After Geoffrey’s death, the Romans feared the emperor’s coming, which was already near, and restored the supreme pontiff to his place with great solemnity.

But when Otto arrived at Rome, he summoned the Romans, diligently examined the pontiff’s case, and afflicted with various punishments all whom he found culpable in the pope’s capture. He sent some into exile and deprived others of their goods. He caused twelve men who had been the principal figures in the capture of Pope John to be hanged in the middle of the city. He caused Geoffrey and Stephen, who had done this and were already dead, to be dug up and their bones scattered.

The emperor handed the prefect over to the pope to be punished at his judgment. As an example to others, the pope caused him to be stripped of his clothes and to stand for the entire day suspended by his hair from the horse of Emperor Constantine. Afterward he caused him to be placed upon an ass facing backward, with a bladder placed upon his head, and scourged through the city. He then caused him to be sent to prison and afterward into exile in Germany.

After John XIII ended his last day, Benedict VI, a Roman by nation, received the miter of the supreme prelacy in the year of the Lord 971, while Emperor Otto I was still surviving. He remained in it for one year and six months.

He was captured by a certain Cynthius, son of Theodora, and placed in custody in the Castel Sant’Angelo. He is then said to have been strangled by that same man.

About this time, a certain savage people called the Danes, worshiping Jesus and idols at the same time, disputed at a banquet with a certain notable cleric named Poppo concerning the worship of the true and supreme God and of idols, as Vincent relates in the Mirror of History and John of Colonna.

The Danes asserted that Jesus Christ was indeed God, but that the other gods whom they worshiped were greater and older than he. Poppo, on the contrary, affirmed that Jesus Christ was the true God and the only God, and that the true God was one in substance and three in persons.

Harald, king of the Danes, told the cleric Poppo to prove by a testimony of truth the faith which he had set forth. When the said cleric agreed to this, the following proof ensued.

A glowing iron of immense weight was placed upon his hands to be carried. When the cleric bore it without any injury to the satisfaction of all, the king, thoroughly moved, cast aside idolatry and converted himself and his people to worship the one true God.

When Benedict died, Boniface VI was made archbishop of the city. He sat for one year and one day.

Before this Boniface, however, Martin in his Chronicle places a certain man called Domnus, who presided over the whole Church for one year and six months. After him this Boniface is described.

As John of Colonna relates after Martin, Boniface, being unable to remain safely in the city, stripped the church of blessed Peter of all its precious ornaments and fled to Constantinople.

When Boniface had thus departed, the Romans made another pope in his place. They called him John XIV, a native of Pavia, and he sat upon the papal throne for eight months.

But the aforesaid Boniface, who had fled to Constantinople, returned to Rome with much treasure. Drawing the Romans to himself by gifts and promises, he captured the aforesaid Pope John and placed him under guard in the Castel Sant'Angelo. Wasted away there by hunger and want, John ended his life after four months; and, as some think, he was killed by the pope.

After John's death Boniface again invaded the see. But not long afterward divine vengeance raged against him, for he was taken away by sudden death.

He was so hateful even to all his own men that they pierced even his dead body with lances and poles, tied ropes to its feet, and cast the corpse into the Lateran square. But it was gathered up by clerics and buried.

After Boniface, John of Colonna places John XIV as governing the Church for only four months.

About his time Elfrida, queen of the English, through whose deceit her stepson, the king of England, had been killed so that her son, namely Elfrida's, might possess the kingdom, returned to herself and did harsh penance.

For although she was a most beautiful and delicate woman, she abandoned the world and entered a monastery of nuns. There, clothed against the flesh in a harsh hair shirt, without any pillow, she lay upon the ground with a little straw placed beneath her, fasting on bread and water.

But Martin in his Chronicle does not place this John. Rather, he places another whom he names Benedict VII. After him he places the aforesaid John XIV, whom he asserts to have held the chair of Peter for eight months and, after being afflicted by hunger for four months in the Castel Sant'Angelo, at length to have died.

After this man he places another John XV, who remained in the papacy for four months, and after him John XVI, who governed the little ship of Peter for ten years, six months, and ten days.

But John of Colonna, omitting two, namely Benedict VII and John XV, describes this John XV, who sat for ten years and more. According to him, he was a Roman by nation and very learned. He composed many books and was very experienced in military affairs.

Crescentius, the patrician of the city, began to persecute him gravely in many matters, so much so that the supreme pontiff abandoned the city and fled into Tuscany.

But when Crescentius heard that the pope had summoned Emperor Otto III to his aid and for the defense of the Church, Crescentius himself and the entire senate, fearing the emperor's severity, approached the pope's feet. Having humbly sought pardon, Crescentius was reconciled with him, and the pope returned to the city.

At that time a venerable man named Rodulf was made archbishop in the church of Reims in Francia. He was descended from the lineage of Charlemagne, which had now ceased in the kingdom of Francia.

Hugh, then king of Francia, who was sprung from another lineage, bore hatred against him. Summoning the bishops and alleging that Rodulf had been made archbishop unlawfully, he procured his deposition and installed Gilbert, a monk and philosopher, or rather a magician and necromancer.

Hearing this, the supreme pontiff sent a legate to Reims. Having summoned a council, the legate deposed Gilbert and restored Rodulf to his see.

After being deposed, Gilbert went to Emperor Otto, whom he had instructed in knowledge. Otto, seizing the opportunity, caused him to be made archbishop of Ravenna. Afterward, as will be said below, he was pope.

When John XV ended his last day, Gregory V, a Saxon by nation, ascended the chair of Peter in the year of the Lord 992. He sat for two years and five months.

He had formerly been called Bruno. Since he was a blood relative of Emperor Otto III, he was made pope at the emperor's instance.

But Crescentius the consul, in hatred of the emperor, deposed him from the papacy and, corrupted by money, procured John XVI, then bishop of Piacenza, to be elected pope by intrusion by the cardinals and clergy.

When the emperor heard this, he was inflamed with anger, came into Italy and then to the city, defeated Crescentius and his men in battle, and fastened him to a gallows before the city gate. He blinded that intruded John, who had usurped the papacy for ten months. When Gregory V died, the emperor procured the assumption as pope of Gilbert the magician, concerning whom what follows is said.

Section XVIII

In the year of the Lord three less than one thousand, when Emperor Otto III, having punished Crescentius together with the Romans adhering to him in rebellion, could now dispose of the Roman clergy and people according to his judgment, he chose Gilbert, archbishop of Ravenna, for promotion to the papacy—a man whom I would call not the supreme philosopher, but the worst magician. He caused him to be consecrated and named Sylvester II. He was a Gaul by nation.

This Aquitanian, as John of Colonna testifies, was a monk from boyhood in the monastery of Fleury in the diocese of Orléans.

Afterward, going out from the cloister at the prompting of demons, he sought Spain. Coming to Seville, which is now called Sevilla, he remained there a long time. For this city was then held in the possession of the Saracens, who devoted themselves solely to divinations and incantations.

There Gilbert therefore learned the whole art of astrology, divination, and necromancy. He also drank in the quadrivium so deeply that he restored in Gaul those arts which are called liberal and which had long been obsolete there.

He lodged with a certain Saracen philosopher who possessed a single book in which were contained the rules and characters of the whole art of necromancy. Gilbert could extract that book from his master by no art.

At length, with the aid of the philosopher's daughter, whom Gilbert knew familiarly, he stole that book. As he fled, he did homage to the devil on condition that the master who was pursuing him should by no means find him. Thus, with the devil's aid, he came into Francia, where he professed in the public schools.

He had as fellow philosophers and companions in his studies Constantine, abbot of Saint Maximin, for whom he composed a rule concerning computation by the abacus, and Adibolbus, bishop of Vinziburg, whose letter to that same Gilbert concerning the question of the diameter in Macrobius is extant.

He also had as disciples men of praiseworthy character and noble lineage: Robert, son of Hugh Capet, and Otto III, son of Otto II.

Hugh, as was said above, made him archbishop of Reims. In that church Gilbert himself made by mechanical art a marvelous clock.

After Otto III was raised to the empire, he first made Gilbert archbishop of Ravenna and afterward, in the course of time, caused him to be elected pope.

Gilbert himself pressed forward his fortunes in his mind, with the devil as his supporter, so that he wished to leave nothing which he had conceived unfinished. By necromantic art he found treasures which had once been buried by peoples, and when they had been found he entangled them in his desires.

At that time there was in the Field of Mars, or Martian Field, a certain marble statue which bore written upon the finger of its right hand: "Strike here." Men of an earlier age, thinking that there was treasure in its head, had cut off its head with many blows.

But Gilbert, observing at the midday sun the point to which the shadow of the statue's finger extended, fixed a stake there.

When night came, accompanied by his chamberlain as a companion, he went to that place. There, causing the earth to gape by his customary arts, he opened a broad entrance.

Having entered it, they saw there a golden people, golden walls, golden coffered ceilings, golden statues, and golden vessels of great weight and price.

In the opposite corner stood a boy holding a bow with its string drawn. As soon as anyone prepared his hand to touch something, all those statues or images seemed to spring forward and make an attack upon the presumptuous intruder.

Induced by this fear, Gilbert touched nothing. But his chamberlain, who was with him, thinking it a small theft amid so much booty, took one knife of marvelous workmanship and value.

Immediately the boy holding the bow shot an arrow into the carbuncle which illuminated that house with its splendor, and brought on darkness. Unless the chamberlain, at Gilbert's warning, had hastened to replace the knife, perhaps they both would have felt a grave punishment.

Nevertheless, I do not see how this could have been known unless those very men who alone were there disclosed it to others.

Therefore this greatest magician, having been made pope, was in the See of Peter for one year. Forgetful of his salvation, he asked a demon whom he had as a familiar how long he was to live and enjoy the honor of the papacy.

The devil answered him that he would live until he celebrated Mass in Jerusalem. Gilbert therefore rejoiced at the answer, because the wretched man believed himself to be far from his end, just as it was far from his intention to make a pilgrimage across the sea to Jerusalem.

But he was deceived by the devil in his equivocal speech, as is the devil's custom, which Gilbert did not understand. For at Rome there is a church called Holy Cross in Jerusalem, in which Carthusians now reside. In that church the pope was accustomed to celebrate during Lent, and the station is entitled "At Holy Jerusalem."

Therefore, when on one of those days that wretched man had gone there to celebrate Mass and had already begun the Mass, he was suddenly seized by a grave fever. After this he perceived a very great tumult of demons.

Wondering, he recalled to mind that the church was called Jerusalem and recognized that he had been deceived by the devil.

As his illness increased, he caused all the cardinals to be summoned to him. Before them he disclosed his crimes with weeping. Although he had been most criminal, nevertheless he did not despair of the mercy of God.

But, contrite while he was still living, he commanded that after his death all his members with which he had rendered service to the devil should be cut off piece by piece. He ordered that his trunk be placed upon a cart and buried wherever the horses drawing that cart should carry it of themselves.

By divine direction, as a sign of his perfect contrition and that the merciful and most compassionate Lord had spared him, the horses carried it to the Lateran church.

He would have been numbered among the men illustrious for knowledge of letters in his age if he had not defiled his knowledge with diabolical art. Hence certain men do not place him in the number of pontiffs, because this Sylvester is believed not to have entered through the door. Omitting him, they describe a certain Agapetus in the catalogue.

Moreover, certain writers, also writing about his death, assert that he died after being struck suddenly by the devil. John of Colonna relates these things about him at such length.

After Sylvester had been taken from this life, Martin in his Chronicle places John XVIII, who sat for five months and twenty-five days, and after him John XIX, who sat for five years. The papacy was vacant for one month. After him he places Sergius.

But John of Colonna makes no mention of those two men who were called John. After the aforesaid Sylvester he places Sergius IV, who held the See of Peter for two years and seven months and was of holy life and honorable conduct.

About that time, according to Vincent in the Mirror of History, John of Colonna, and Martin, Robert, the son of Hugh Capet, succeeded to the kingdom of Francia. He was a most devout and most religious prince, most affectionate toward the divine office, and not moderately instructed in ecclesiastical chant.

For he composed that devout sequence which begins, "May the grace of the Holy Spirit be with us," which is sung on the day of Pentecost, and that responsory, "O Judah and Jerusalem."

It is also related that, when on the vigil of the apostles Peter and Paul he had come to visit the thresholds of the apostles, after he had prayed for some time before their altar during Mass, he rose and placed a certain slip upon the altar.

Certain persons thought that he had offered some great gift. The ministers of the altar found the said slip, upon which was written with musical notation that responsory, "Cornelius the centurion," together with its verse, which the king himself had composed with its chant.

He is said to have possessed such great devotion toward the divine office that he always wished to be in some monastery on great feasts. He not only sang with the monks in choir, but, clothed in a silk cope, also directed the choir.

Hence, when he had once besieged a certain fortress which had rebelled against him, he left the army on account of the feast of Saint Amandus and came to Orléans. While on that same day he was singing the Lamb of God in a loud voice during Mass, at that same moment the walls of that fortress, which appeared impregnable, fell down.

At that time there also shone in Francia Philibert, bishop of Chartres, and Odilo, abbot of Cluny, concerning whom above.

After the passing of Sergius, Benedict VIII, a Tusculan by nation and the son of Gregory, was invested with the supreme pontificate in the year of the Lord 1011. After his creation he lived twelve years less ten days. The papacy was vacant for one year.

He was expelled from the papacy and another was made, whence a great schism followed, according to Martin and John of Colonna.

As Peter Damian relates, a certain bishop known to this Pope Benedict saw him after his death sitting upon a very black horse. The bishop said to him, “Are you not that Pope Benedict whom we know to be already dead?”

“I,” he said, “am that unhappy Benedict.”

The bishop asked, “How is it with you, father?”

“I am gravely tormented,” he answered. “But if aid is furnished to me, I do not despair of the ineffable mercy of God. Therefore go to my successor, Pope John, and tell him that he will find a certain sum of money in such a chest. Let him distribute it to the poor, because whatever was previously given for me profited me nothing, since it came from plunder.”

The bishop faithfully fulfilled what had been entrusted to him. Terrified by this vision, he yielded his bishopric and became a monk in a certain monastery, where he happily completed his life.

When Benedict was joined to his fathers, John XX, a Roman by nation and the son of Gregory, was called to the summit of the supreme dignity in the year of the Lord 1022. He remained in it for eleven years. He had a war with the Romans.

The people of the Hungarians, given over to the worship of idols until those times, was perfectly converted to the faith through Gisela, sister of Emperor Henry I, who was married to the king of the Hungarians.

For this holy woman by her insistence led her husband the king to this, that he should humbly and devoutly ask Emperor Henry to baptize him and his whole people. The king was called Stephen in baptism. His merits are commended by many miracles down to this day.

When John died, Benedict IX, nephew of the aforesaid Pope Benedict and therefore also a Tusculan by nation, succeeded in the government of the universal Church.

He was expelled from the papacy, and another was made, namely the bishop of Sabina, called Sylvester III, who sat for only fifty-six days. When Sylvester had been deposed, the expelled Benedict recovered his see and the dignity taken from him. Benedict sat in the chair of Peter for fourteen years.

After his death, according to John of Colonna and Martin, he appeared near a mill in the form of an animal whose body had the tail of an ass, while the rest was like a bear.

When the man to whom he appeared fled in terror, the monster cried after him, saying: “Do not be terrified of me. Know that I was a man just as you are, but by the will of God I wander in such a form on account of my sins, because I lived not as a pope but as a beast.”

John of Colonna says that after this Benedict recovered the see from which he had been expelled, with the more powerful men supporting him in this and after many gifts had been given, because he was an uneducated man and ignorant of almost all letters, he caused the said Sylvester to be consecrated with him to perform the duties of the ecclesiastical office.

Because this displeased many, a third was brought in who alone would fulfill the duties of the two. He had formerly been called Gratian, but in the papacy he was called Gregory VI.

Gregory VI gloriously ascended the chair of Peter after Benedict IX. He had been priest of Saint John Before the Latin Gate. He remained in the chair for two years and six months.

As John of Colonna writes at length concerning him, this Gregory found the condition of the Roman pontificate greatly diminished in the curia through the actions of his predecessors, so that apart from a few towns near the city and the offerings of the faithful he had nothing with which to sustain himself and his cardinals.

For the cities and possessions which belonged to the right of the Roman Church had been taken by noble tyrants, both Roman and those established round about. Moreover, the public ways and roads throughout almost all Italy were beset by robbers and plunderers, so that pilgrims could not come to Rome to visit the thresholds of the apostles without danger unless gathered into a great multitude.

For this reason people from almost every province had ceased to approach the city for devotion. In the city itself hired killers wandered in the middle of the forum. Anyone desiring to see the church of the Prince of the Apostles, if by chance he fell among that kind of men, by no means returned home without loss of property or life.

At first the supreme pontiff Gregory began to oppose such great evils mildly, as became a pontiff. He therefore first ordered them to cease harassing pilgrims and plundering sacred things, so that they would allow the offerings of the faithful to pass to the use of Christ’s ministers. He promised to provide for them in some way if they were driven to plunder by want. Those whom greed agitated were themselves, for fear of God and the honor of the world, to impose a limit by withdrawing themselves from it.

He invited the invaders of ecclesiastical patrimony by mandates and letters either to return what was not owed to them or to prove in the Roman senate that they held it by right. If they did neither, they were to recognize that they were not members of the Church.

Having frequently addressed assemblies with such words, he accomplished almost nothing. Then he excommunicated all who did such things and those who shared food or conversation with them.

The excommunicated men raged in return and began to surround the walls of the city with arms, so that they attempted the pope's death.

Then the supreme priest, judging that the iron of amputation must be used, sought arms and horses from every quarter and assembled soldiers and horsemen. First occupying the church of blessed Peter, he either destroyed or put to flight the plunderers of the offerings. After those who resisted him had been killed, he restored to their ancient right the estates and towns lost for a long time.

Meanwhile the Romans, accustomed to live by plunder, called him that bloodthirsty man and unworthy to offer to God, being conscious of so many killings. The cardinals themselves seemed to hold the same opinion and to bring accusations against him, so much so that, while he lay in the illness from which he died, after first taking counsel among themselves they dared to admonish him not to order himself buried in the church of the Prince of the Apostles with the other pontiffs, since he had defiled the pontifical office by the deaths of so many men.

Having heard this, he is said to have recovered his spirit and, threatening them with fierce eyes, delivered this speech:

"If there were in you even a spark of human reason or a spark of divine authority, you would not approach your pontiff with such a rash persuasion. For as long as I lived, I poured out my patrimony for your advantage and disregarded my reputation for your liberation.

"If others whom you cut to pieces with words had attempted this, it would have been fitting for you to resist them and to soothe the opinions of fools by better interpretations.

"Whose treasures, I ask, did I save? Perhaps treasures for myself? Or did I possess the treasures of my predecessors, which would suffice for any man's greed? For whom did I obtain safety? To whom did I restore liberty? You will indeed refer these things to me.

"But I was adored by the people, and freely did whatever I wished. They applauded me with all their vows. Consideration of your poverty took these praises and this applause from me.

"I turned my mind toward you and judged that I must act more severely. An impious plunderer had occupied the titles to your fortunes. You were leading a destitute life. They bought precious silks for themselves from your offerings; you, in common and tattered clothing, moved my eyes. Therefore, since I could not endure this, I declared war upon others so that at the cost of harm to citizens I might purchase glory for the clergy.

"But, as I now experience, I have lost the benefits conferred upon ungrateful men. For the sons harass their dying father concerning his burial. Will you deny me the common house of mortals? A prostitute is not barred from entering the church, nor a usurer, nor a robber, and you forbid a pope to enter.

"Therefore, sons of such reckless audacity, do penance, for you have spoken foolishly and bitterly.

"But lest you think that I prevail by authority alone, receive also the reason. Every act of men must be examined according to reason, so that the judgment of the deed may tend toward the point from which the intention of doing it proceeded. For, as the Truth says, 'If your eye is simple, your whole body will be full of light,' and so forth.

"A wretched poor man repeatedly entreated me to relieve his want. Ignorant of future events, I not only did not refuse, but sent him away laden with much money. Departing, he encountered a robber, who, seeing him carrying money, struck him with the club he bore and killed him. Am I therefore to be judged because I had given to the pilgrim, whence he incurred death?

"In ecclesiastical and civil laws the same deed is both praised and punished in different respects. It is condemned in the robber that he killed a man secretly; it is approved in the soldier that he struck down an enemy in war. Thus homicide in the latter is praiseworthy, in the former blameworthy.

"Our predecessor Adrian of praiseworthy memory was once praised because he granted the investitures of churches to Charlemagne, so that no man elected should be consecrated by a bishop unless he had first been distinguished by the king with ring and staff. For the mind of Charles was unconquered by avarice, and no one would easily have found access then unless he entered through the door.

“Moreover, across so many intervals of lands the Apostolic See could not be sought so that it might furnish assent to each man elected, while the king was near and would arrange nothing through avarice. Now luxury and ambition have occupied all the palaces of kings. Therefore the bride of Christ deservedly asserts her liberty, lest a tyrant prostitute her to an ambitious usurper. It is praised in the pontiffs of our age that they took these grants away from princes.

“Certainly it is not the office of a bishop to command battle to be joined. But it pertains to the duty of a bishop that, if he sees the shipwreck of innocence, he run to meet it with hand and tongue. Ezekiel accuses the priests because they did not stand in opposition or set themselves as a wall or shield for the house of Israel.

“There are two persons established in the Church for cutting away vices: one to sharpen speech, the other to bear the sword. As you are witnesses for me, I did not neglect my part. Where I hoped to profit, I armed my tongue. I informed by a messenger the one whose concern it is to conduct the matter with the sword, namely the emperor.

“He wrote back that he was occupied in war against the Vindelici, asking that I not be burdened by my labors and his expenses in overthrowing the assemblies of robbers. If I had refused, what excuse would I offer to God, since the emperor had poured his own part back upon me? Would I see the slaughter of citizens and the losses of pilgrims and slumber? Whoever spares a robber kills the innocent.

“But it is objected that it does not belong to a priest to stain himself with anyone’s blood. It is true; but the man who punishes the guilty and frees the innocent does not stain himself. Indeed, blessed are those who preserve judgment and perform justice at every time.

“Priests were famous with the greatest praise: Phinehas and Mattathias, who took vengeance upon transgressors with their own hand. For the one pierced those joined in venereal embraces with a dagger; the other mingled the man sacrificing to idols with the blood of the sacrifice.

“The priest Zechariah drove the king who was burning incense from the temple and doubtless would not have hesitated to kill him if God had not hastened the slaughter. The divine stroke forestalled the episcopal hand, so that leprosy fed upon the corpse of the man whose soul had usurped unlawful things. The devotion of a king is cast down, and shall the greed of a robber not be cast down?

“It is too little that I excuse what I did; what I did is even to be praised. For I conferred a benefit upon those to whom I seem to have brought destruction. I diminished their punishment when I hastened their death. These are the things I had to say for myself in order to empty your assertions of force.

“But because both my reasonings and yours can be deceived, let us commit all things to divine examination. Place my body, prepared in the manner of my predecessors, before the doors of the church, and let the doors be made fast with locks and bars. If God wills that I enter, applaud the miracle. If not, do whatever shall please you with my corpse.”

Thus it was done. Immediately the dead man’s body was placed before the doors of the church of blessed Peter, which had been shut with locks. When this had been done, a mighty whirlwind sent forth by divine power broke the obstacles of the bars and, suddenly opening the doors with repeated force, drove them against the walls with a great crash.

All who were present, astounded by the miracle, delivered the pontiff’s body to burial with great reverence.

After Gregory VI was buried, Clement II, an invader, seized the supreme pontificate by force, as Martin relates in his Chronicle. But he discharged it for a short time, namely nineteen months and seven days. The papacy was vacant for twenty days.

When he died, Damasus II was enthroned in the See of Peter. He sat for only twenty-four days and, dying, was buried with his fathers. Martin in his Chronicle asserts that this man too was an invader of the Apostolic See. Hence he was also swiftly taken away.

After him, in the year of the Lord 1052, Leo IX, a German by nation, was set over the Roman Church. He governed it for five years, two months, and six days.

Martin writes thus concerning him in his Chronicle. When the Romans, from wicked custom, had asked Emperor Henry that a pontiff be given to them, and the emperor could induce no German to accept this, he inclined Bruno, bishop of Toul, to it.

Coming to the city and having a conscience concerning this, Bruno resigned completely. Afterward, elected by the clergy and people, he maintained a praiseworthy life, so that, buried in the church of blessed Peter, he became illustrious through miracles.

But John of Colonna relates more fully, saying that, while this most holy man was setting out for the city to undertake the Apostolic See, he heard the voices of angels singing in heaven: “The Lord says, ‘I think thoughts of peace and not of affliction,’” and so forth.

This learned and devout man composed chants for many saints and wrote many things and did things useful to the Church.

Moreover, when during his papacy he found a leper before the doors of his house, he led him into his chamber and carefully placed him in his own bed. When afterward he did not find him there after the door had been opened, he was astonished that in the poor man he had received Christ.

Under his pontificate, as the same John of Colonna testifies, the Normans held a great part of Apulia occupied and rendered nothing to the Roman Church in any respect.

For this reason Pope Leo obtained from Emperor Henry by many entreaties that he should assist the Church in driving the Normans from Apulia. Assenting to his wishes, the emperor sent a great army of his men to Rome to the pope.

With them the supreme pontiff set out into Apulia against the Normans. In the borders of Samnium, near a city named Civitate, he joined hard battle with the said Normans. Defeated by them, he lost a great part of the Germans of his nation, and the pope himself was captured with many others.

But when the prince of the Normans wished to release him, the pope refused, saying that without his men, whose cause of calamity he had been, he would never return to his own country.

In that year Winifred of the Normans ended his last day. Finally, after many holy works, Leo commended his spirit to the Lord.

The same author says that, although Leo was holy and had done this with a pious intention, nevertheless, because it did not belong to his office to proceed personally to war with armed hand, and because it had been said to the first shepherd, Peter, “Put your sword into its sheath,” therefore, by the Lord’s dispensation, the army was cut down in his sight.

Section XX

After Leo’s death, Victor II, a German by nation, was placed in the See of Peter in the year of the Lord 1057. He presided over the Church for two years, three months, and thirteen days.

He was made pope through fear of the emperor and was received gloriously by him. On account of the affairs of the Church, the pope set out for Germany. While he remained there, Emperor Henry III died.

This pope also celebrated a universal council at Florence, the principal city of Tuscany. In it he deposed many bishops on account of simony and fornication.

For the city of Florence itself had now begun to flourish in wisdom, power, and riches. Hence also came its reputation: first its name, namely Fluentia, was changed to Florentia, and it became such a city that a universal council was held there.

At that time, while Henry III was emperor, one named Edward began to reign in England. He was so gentle and mild that he did not know how to injure even base men. Nevertheless, among his household there was immense reverence for him, and among strangers vehement fear. For God favored his simplicity, so that one who did not know how to become angry could be feared.

This king shone with the spirit of prophecy and with miracles, as Vincent relates in the Mirror of History and John of Colonna.

For on the holy day of Easter, while he sat at table crowned with the diadem and surrounded by a company of nobles, and while the others ate eagerly, he, with his mind stretched toward heavenly things, beheld something divine and broke into laughter.

When the tables had been removed, certain of his magnates asked why he had laughed. After delaying a long time, he at last answered, saying:

“The Seven Sleepers rest on Mount Celion. For seven hundred years and more they have lain upon their right sides, but at the very hour of my laughter they turned themselves onto their left sides. It shall be that they lie thus for seventy-four years.

“This is assuredly a dire omen for wretched mortals. For in those seventy-four years all those things shall come which the Lord foretold concerning the end of the world: nation against nation, kingdom against kingdom, pestilences and famines, terrors from heaven, and wars of the gentiles against Christians.”

Having heard these things, Count Harold, who was one of those asking, sent a certain knight to the emperor of Constantinople so that inquiry might be made concerning the Seven Sleepers.

The emperor received him kindly and sent him with his own messengers to the bishop of Ephesus. Coming there and making inquiry together with the bishop, they found matters just as King Edward had foretold.

Moreover, in the course of time all those things followed which the same king, moved by the divine spirit, had told his people would come in the world. For the Hagarenes, Arabs, and Turks plundered Syria, Cilicia, Asia Minor, and many cities of greater Asia, among them Ephesus and Jerusalem. Especially did the people of the Turks, going out from their territories, subject to themselves a great part of the East.

On account of this, our eastern peoples, kindled by the divine spirit to aid their Christian brothers who in the eastern regions were oppressed under the yoke of unbelievers, took up arms, fought the unbelievers, and reached as far as Egypt.

When Pope Victor had been conquered by death, Martin in his Chronicle asserts that a certain Stephen IX, a Lotharingian by nation and formerly abbot of Monte Cassino, succeeded him. He says that Stephen died after nine months and was buried at Florence.

Martin places as his successor Benedict X. He had been bishop of Velletri and was called Mutius. Because he had been made pope by violence, after the nine months during which he stood as an intruder he finally yielded the papacy and returned to private life.

Thereafter, as Martin and John of Colonna relate, the cardinals unanimously elected as pope in the city of Siena Nicholas II, a Burgundian by nation and then bishop of Florence. He sat for two years and seven months, less five days.

He celebrated a council at Rome in the year of the Lord 1059. There a decree concerning the election of the supreme pontiff was established, as is contained in distinction twenty-three, in the chapter beginning “In the Name of the Lord.” In the council assembled and celebrated in the Lateran church, Nicholas himself says:

“Your blessedness knows, most beloved brothers and fellow bishops—and the lower members also have not been unaware—how many adversities this Apostolic See, which by God’s authorship I serve, endured after the death of our predecessor Stephen of pious memory; and how many repeated hammer blows and frequent beatings it underwent at the hands of the money-changers of the simoniacal heresy, so far indeed that the column of the living God already seemed almost to totter and the net of the supreme Fisherman was compelled by swelling waves to be submerged in the depths of shipwreck.

“Hence, if it pleases your fraternity, with God’s aid we ought prudently to meet future events and to take precautions for the ecclesiastical state, lest recurring evils—which God forbid—prevail.”

And below:

“Because the Apostolic See is placed before all churches throughout the world, and therefore cannot have a metropolitan over itself, the cardinal bishops without doubt perform the office of the metropolitan. They are to advance the elected bishop to the summit of the apostolic eminence to be consecrated.

“Let him be elected from the bosom of that same Church if a suitable man is found; but if he is not found in it, let him be taken from another, with the honor and reverence due to our beloved son Henry being preserved. He is presently regarded as king and is hoped to be the future emperor, just as we have already granted to him and to those of his successors who shall personally obtain this right from this Apostolic See.”

And below it is added:

“But if this cannot be done in the city, let it be done elsewhere. And let the man elected, even before consecration, possess authority as pope to govern the Roman Church and dispose of all its resources, as blessed Gregory is known to have done.”

Finally, many curses are invoked against transgressors of this decree.

In the time of this Nicholas, and in the said council before one hundred and eighteen assembled bishops, Berengar abjured his error and heresy. For he said that the body of Christ was not really present in the sacrament of the altar, but only in a sign.

His abjuration concerning this is placed in distinction two, On Consecration, where it says thus:

“I, Berengar, unworthy deacon of the church of Saint Maurice of Angers, recognizing the true, apostolic, and catholic faith, anathematize every heresy, especially that concerning which I have hitherto been defamed, which attempts to assert that the bread and wine placed upon the altar are, after consecration, only a sacrament, that is, a sacred sign, and not the true body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that they cannot sensibly, except in the sacrament alone, be handled or broken by the hands of priests.

“But I consent to the Holy Roman Church and the Apostolic See, and with mouth and heart profess that concerning the sacraments of the Lord’s table I hold that same faith which our lord and venerable Pope Nicholas and this holy synod, by evangelical and apostolic authority, delivered to be held and confirmed to me: namely, that the bread and wine which are placed upon the altar are after consecration not only a sacrament but also the true body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ; and sensibly, not only the sacrament but also the true body, is in truth handled and broken by the hands of priests and ground by the teeth of the faithful.”

The gloss intends this to mean not that the body of Christ is broken in itself, but that the body of Christ is really present under those appearances of bread and wine which are broken and handled.

And it follows: “Swearing,” and so forth.

When that abjuration had been made, as it says there, Pope Nicholas sent it through the cities of Italy, Germany, and Gaul, and to whatever places the report of Berengar’s depravity had reached, so that the churches which had formerly grieved over him as perverse and turned away might afterward rejoice over him as converted and returned.

Through this Berengar of Tours the Gallican Church was disturbed. For although he was very learned, he erred greatly, asserting, as Vincent testifies in the Mirror of History and John of Colonna, that the Eucharist which we receive upon the altar was not the true body and blood of Christ, but was a figure of the body and blood of Christ.

Many men disputed much against him in speech and writing. Among them Lord Guido, abbot of the Cross of Saint Leufredus, produced an elegant book against him concerning the body and blood of the Lord. Pope Leo VIII [read: Pope Leo IX] assembled a council against this Berengar at Vercelli, and Lanfranc, the most learned archbishop of Canterbury, also wrote against him.

In other respects this Berengar was a good man, full of almsgiving and humility, and possessed of great estates, all of which he dispersed for the uses of the poor. Moreover, he permitted no woman to be admitted into his sight.

Although he had erred in the faith, as has been said, nevertheless he acknowledged his error and abjured that heresy before Nicholas. Yet he was unable to recall those whom he had infected with this pestilence.

As Vincent relates in the Mirror of History, concerning this man, when Fulbert, bishop of Chartres, was at the end of his life and many were visiting him, while the capacity of the house scarcely sufficed to contain those flowing together, Fulbert, after searching with his eyes far among the assembled crowd for Berengar, judged that he should be expelled by whatever effort he could. He declared that an immense demon stood near Berengar and, with a beckoning hand enticing many to follow him, immediately corrupted them with his breath.

But Berengar himself, dying on the night of Epiphany and remembering how many wretched men he had once, as a young man and in the first heat of his error, infected with his sect, brought forth a groan and said:

“Today, on the day of his manifestation, the Lord Jesus Christ will appear to me: on account of my penance, as I hope, for glory; or on account of others, as I fear, for punishment.”

Hence William, speaking about him, says: “So exceedingly evil is it to weaken others from the good by example or word, because perhaps another’s sin will weigh you down when your own has been blotted out.”

When Nicholas II passed from this world, Alexander II was canonically created pope by the cardinals. At that time he was bishop of Lucca, but Milanese by nation. He sat for eleven years, six months, and twenty-five days from the year of the Lord 1063.

Against him, a certain man named Cadalus, bishop of Parma, was elected by all the bishops of Lombardy, as it is said, with Emperor Henry willing and consenting. The bishops asserted that the pope ought not to be elected except from the paradise of Italy.

As John of Colonna and Martin write, this Cadalus came to Rome twice with a great army and strove to usurp the papacy for himself by violence. But, repulsed by Alexander’s supporters, he could not obtain what he had wickedly hoped for.

Alexander came into Lombardy at the emperor’s entreaties and celebrated a council in the city of Mantua. When all had been pacified and quieted, he returned to the city.

At that time the portion of the Normans which had occupied Apulia began to devastate the territories of Campania. Godfrey, duke of Spoleto, and the illustrious woman Countess Matilda expelled them.

This Countess Matilda, who caused herself to be called a daughter of blessed Peter, was so powerful that she even joined most severe battle with the emperor, together with her people, in favor of the Roman Church. Since she abounded in very great possessions and had no sons, she offered her entire patrimony upon the altar of blessed Peter. Hence, down to the present day, what she conferred upon the Roman Church is called the patrimony of blessed Peter.

This Alexander established the following against the vice of simony, as is contained in cause one, question three, writing to the church and clergy of Lucca:

“We have learned that for a long time this detestable evil has taken root within your church, so that an ecclesiastical benefice was never granted to any cleric, however religious and however endowed with knowledge and conduct, except to him who strove to buy it with the profane gift of money.

“Thus the Church and its property became saleable, as though some earthly and vile merchandise exposed by merchants for sale.”

And below:

“Wherefore I, Alexander, bishop—or rather unworthy minister—of the Holy Roman and Apostolic See, beholding so many and such great evils being done in the churches, have decreed to extirpate and utterly uproot them, lest the blood of the wicked be required from our hand by the strict Judge.

“We therefore establish and confirm by the present decree, as our predecessors are known formerly to have done, that no bishop shall hereafter dare ever to confer upon clerics for any price or gift a benefice of the Church, which certain men call canonries or prebends or even orders.

“Rather, let them take care to ordain all ministers and servants of the Church freely and without any venality in the holy Church.

“Let not those who offer larger sacks of money be elected in the house of God, but those who, rich in conduct, discipline, and knowledge, are able according to their office to sustain the Church itself.

“We establish and confirm in the same manner that no cleric of whatever rank shall dare to offer anything for a benefice of the Church, either for the fabric of churches, among the gifts of churches, or even as something to be distributed to the poor.”

Finally, he imposes a penalty upon those acting to the contrary. But concerning this more fully in the second part.

Section XXI

When Alexander died, Gregory VII, a Tuscan by nation from the city of Soana, was elected and enthroned in the See of Peter in the year of the Lord 1074. He had previously been called Hildebrand. He sat for twelve years, one month, and three days.

This man was religious and feared God, a lover of justice and equity, constant in adversities, moderate in prosperity, and also very prudent. He was a most vigorous defender of the rights of the Church and, apart from God, feared nothing in accomplishing those things which pertained to justice.

As Vincent relates in the Mirror of History, when he was established in lesser orders as a legate in Francia, he terribly pursued simoniacs, deposing from their offices those convicted of this vice.

When, among others, a certain bishop infected with such a stain had been denounced to him, and that bishop, being cunning and sagacious, could not be convicted in judgment, although he labored under infamy concerning it, the aforesaid legate Hildebrand convicted him by this miracle.

The legate commanded him, for his purgation from this infamy, to say, “Glory to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit.” Thinking that by this proof he had escaped, the bishop began to speak and readily and promptly uttered, “Glory to the Father, and to the Son.” But he was unable to express the rest, namely, “and to the Holy Spirit.”

Wishing to pronounce it again and again, he always failed at the pronunciation of “Holy Spirit” and was unable to name him. This was deserved, because through simony the Holy Spirit is especially offended, since he appears to be sold like a vile servant when the sacrament in which the Holy Spirit is conferred is sold. Convicted by this, the bishop was deposed.

When Gregory had now been created supreme pontiff, because of his virtues, as Martin writes in his Chronicle, while he was singing the first Mass on the night of the Lord’s Nativity in Saint Mary Major, a certain Cintius, son of the prefect, seized him and confined him in his tower.

But on that same night the Romans destroyed the tower, freed the pope, and sent Cintius outside the city.

In the second year of his pontificate, as John of Colonna relates, Gregory celebrated a council at Rome for the reformation of conduct. Among the other things which he did there in a holy and pious manner, he excommunicated as simoniacs and as usurpers and possessors of the rights of the Church certain nobles from the household of Emperor Henry who were then at Rome and by whose counsel churches were being sold.

In the third year of his pontificate, the same Gregory, kindled by the divine spirit, suspended from his office Siegfried, archbishop of Mainz, who attempted to cut off and separate the bishops and abbots of the kingdom of the Germans from the Holy Roman Church, their special mother. He excommunicated all who had subscribed or should subscribe themselves by consenting to his schism.

Moreover, he bound with the bond of anathema King Henry, who favored that same Siegfried and persecuted those obedient to the Church.

When Henry heard that he had been excommunicated, he was vehemently terrified. Hearing that the lord pope had descended into Lombardy and was residing at Canossa, he came to him with a few men and with great humility to seek absolution.

For three days he remained before the gate of the said fortress, having laid aside all royal attire, barefoot and clothed in wool, with many tears and weeping. Those present were moved to implore the supreme pontiff's mercy and compassion and persisted before him, praying that Henry might be loosed from that bond.

While Gregory still delayed with just severity to remove the bond, all marveled at his unusual hardness. At length, overcome by the persistence of Henry's compunction and humility, and also by the prayers and supplication of all who were present, Lord Gregory absolved him from the bond of excommunication, first receiving from him an oath that he would obey the commands of the Roman Church in all things.

When peace between the priesthood and the kingdom now appeared to have intervened, again, at the devil's persuasion, a most grave schism arose between pope and emperor.

The cause of this schism appears to have been the following. A custom had taken root, especially in the empire, that when prelates of churches died, the ring and pastoral staff were sent to the lord emperor. Thereafter he sent any one of his household and chaplains to the vacant church to perform the office of pastor there, without waiting for the election of the clergy.

The lord pope, considering that this was done contrary to all honor and perceiving that ecclesiastical rights were trampled underfoot in this deed, admonished the emperor once, twice, and a third time to desist from so detestable a presumption.

When he could not recall the emperor, though admonished by salutary precepts, he assembled at Rome on account of this matter a council of one hundred and ten bishops. In it he first excommunicated Emperor Henry himself as perjured, a persecutor of the Church of God, and its subverter. Moreover, he anathematized all ecclesiastical persons who received investiture from the hand of any secular person.

Furthermore, in that council he anathematized all simoniacs, removed married priests from the divine office, and forbade laymen to hear the Masses of those priests and of persons notoriously living in fornication.

This was done by a new example and, as it appeared to many, by an ill-considered judgment. For from it arose grave scandal, so that, as John of Colonna says, at the time of no heresy was the western Church divided by a more grievous schism.

Sigebert and Vincent in the Mirror of History, book twenty-six, relate this same thing after him, adding:

"Some acted for justice, others for injustice. Some did not turn aside from simony. Others covered the stain of avarice with an honorable name when they sold under the name of charity what they boasted that they gave freely. And, as Eusebius says concerning the Montanists, under the name of an offering they craftily received gifts.

"Moreover, few maintained continence. Some feigned it for the sake of gain and boasting, while many heaped incontinence upon perjury or manifold adultery.

"In addition, through this importunity laymen rose against the sacred orders and shook themselves free from all ecclesiastical subjection. Laymen profaned the sacred mysteries and disputed about them; they baptized infants, using filthy moisture from their ears in place of sacred oil and chrism.

"At the end of life they disdained to receive the Lord's viaticum and the customary service of ecclesiastical burial from married priests. They burned with fire the tithes appointed for priests.

"And that you may perceive the rest in one thing: laymen often trampled underfoot the body of the Lord consecrated by married priests and voluntarily poured out the blood of the Lord. Many other things contrary to law and divine right were done in the Church.

"On this occasion many false teachers arose in the Church and turned the people away from ecclesiastical discipline by profane novelties, although the judgment of the holy fathers who wrote is that the sacraments which are performed in the Church—baptism, chrism, and Eucharist—are true sacraments whether dispensed by good men or evil, the Holy Spirit secretly working their effect, and therefore are not to be despised."

As William writes that Hugh, the holy abbot of Cluny, said, this Hildebrand announced the thoughts of others by a prophetic intuition of the mind. Pope Alexander had therefore appointed him chancellor of the apostolic men. In view of this office Hildebrand, as chancellor, traveled through the provinces so that he might correct things wrongly done.

One day, while Hildebrand rode with a great crowd of attendants, Abbot Hugh, as his familiar companion, followed with his monks at the end of the column. Seeing from afar a man held in such honor, he began to think in his mind whence so great an honor came to a little man of short stature and contemptible parentage. Without doubt, he thought, this happened to him from pride, because he had so many attendants walking around him.

He had scarcely turned this over in his mind when Archdeacon Hildebrand turned his horse around, spurred it on, and, calling Abbot Hugh from afar, cried: “You have thought wickedly. I do not ascribe this glory to myself—if that can be called glory which swiftly passes—nor do I wish it to be ascribed to me by others, but to the blessed apostles, by whose privilege it is shown to me.”

Blushing, the abbot answered only this: “I ask you, lord, how did you know my thought?”

“It was conducted,” he said, “from your mouth to my ears as though through pipes.”

On another occasion the aforesaid abbot and the said archdeacon entered a church together to pray. Prostrate with their sides continuous and joined, they prayed for a long time.

Then the archdeacon looked at the abbot with a disturbed gesture, gnashing his teeth. When the abbot had gone outside, he asked the cause of his agitation. Hildebrand said to him:

“If you wish to love me, take care that you do not hereafter assail me with this injury. For my Lord Jesus, beautiful above the sons of men, stood visibly beside me at my petitions, looking intently upon my words and favoring me with serene eyes. But, cast off by the violence of your prayer, he deserted me and turned toward you. I think it a kind of injury to withdraw from a friend the author of his salvation.

“Moreover, know that mortality threatens men and destruction threatens this place. For I saw an angel of God standing over the altar with a drawn sword, and a thick and cloudy air circles this province. I shall therefore flee as quickly as possible.”

Having said these things, they entered the lodging and sat down to care for the body. As soon as the dishes had been set before them, lamentation arose in the house because several members of the household suddenly died. When the plague raged through the neighboring houses, they soon mounted their mules and fled.

Concerning the same Gregory, Emperor Henry, as John of Colonna says after Vincent, after he learned that he had been publicly excommunicated, began to persecute the Roman Church no longer secretly or in hiding.

In order to multiply quarrels and scandals against Lord Pope Gregory, he arranged with the bishops of Lombardy, who for the greater part had been given over to a reprobate sense, that at the aforesaid emperor’s request they should elect as pope Guibert, archbishop of Ravenna, a learned and wealthy man upon whom they imposed the name Clement.

Henry himself came to him and showed the highest reverence to that idol as though to a true pontiff.

That unhappy man, presuming upon Henry’s favor and trusting in the multitude of his riches, violently excluded the venerable Gregory and invaded the Apostolic See. He was so delirious and so deprived by ambition of sound understanding that he believed himself to be what he was falsely called.

The unhappy world, set in wickedness, followed dangerous ways on account of this schism. Declining toward worse things, it cast behind it every reverence for God and men, following harmful things and turning away from salutary ones.

Pontiffs and all sorts of prelates of churches were seized and committed to custody as though guilty of homicide, their goods being confiscated, if they did not consent to the emperor in this perversity of his. Injuries were not only inflicted upon them for a time, but after they had been excluded, successors were intruded in perpetuity.

The pope also fought against the emperor with every effort in word and deed, sending letters everywhere, and turned away from him as many men as he could. Moreover, he absolved the princes of Germany from the oath of fidelity which they had rendered to Henry and deposed Henry himself from the empire.

For this reason the Saxons rebelled against the emperor. Drawing certain other German princes after them and assembling a council, after much deliberation they elected Rudolf, king of Burgundy, against Emperor Henry.

The pope sent Rudolf a golden crown of marvelous workmanship, upon which was written: “The rock gave the diadem to Peter; Peter gave it to Rudolf.”

At the pope’s command, the archbishop of Mainz solemnly crowned this Rudolf. Having assembled great forces of his own and of the Germans, he entered Germany and, with many adhering to him, contended with Henry for the empire for a long time.

At last, God so permitting, Rudolf was killed by Henry in battle together with many princes of the Saxons.

Having obtained this victory, Henry first afflicted with many calamities the Saxons, who had been the head of the rebellion. Then, entering Swabia and demolishing cities and fortresses, he compelled them to return to him. By threats and gifts he also brought back to himself others throughout the empire who had defected from him through despair of his affairs.

Thus, when Rudolf, whom he had greatly feared, had been killed by Henry and the Saxons had been routed in many battles, he now appeared to possess the empire peacefully.

Being therefore lifted up above himself, Henry dared to attempt a wicked deed. On the feast of Pentecost, after a great council of princes and prelates had been assembled at Mainz, all who adhered to Henry judged that Hildebrand, who was also Gregory, ought to be deposed.

When this had been done, the emperor came into Italy with a great army. After he arrived, certain men interposed themselves so that he and the supreme pontiff might meet together and treat with one another concerning peace.

When they had met, after many negotiations no agreement concerning peace could be made in any way. Many bishops and barons of Italy who had first favored the pope abandoned him and turned themselves toward the emperor.

Encouraged by their favor, the emperor came to Rome and besieged it. At this time that illustrious Godfrey, duke of Lotharingia, who afterward was the first of the Latins to reign at Jerusalem and concerning whom many things must be said later, served under the emperor.

During that siege, when the portion of the wall which had fallen to him to attack had been broken, Godfrey was the first to burst into the city. Wearied by excessive labor that day, he fell into a grave illness.

When he saw himself near death, he vowed that, if God restored him to health, he would personally visit the Holy Land of Promise. When this vow had been made, he was immediately restored to his former health.

Therefore, after the Romans perceived that the emperor's army was within the walls after they had been broken, those who had previously favored Henry secretly no longer did so in hiding. Abandoning the pope, they passed openly to the emperor. Meeting him in crowds as he entered, they acclaimed imperial praises to him and received him in the imperial manner.

The supreme pontiff, seeing himself deserted by the Roman people, in whom he had placed his greatest hope, and having no path open for flight, took refuge with his cardinals in the fortress of Crescentius, which is called Castel Sant'Angelo.

After the Romans thought that they had found an opportunity by which they believed they could recover the emperor's favor, they besieged on every side the fortress in which the pious pontiff had taken refuge, so that entrance or departure was open to no one without danger.

The emperor entered the city and ascended the Capitol. The Germans, meanwhile, pouring themselves through the city in the manner of barbarians, inflicted many evils upon the citizens.

While the emperor dealt with the city according to his will and disposed all things according to his judgment, a messenger came to him asserting that Duke Robert Guiscard was coming to the pope's aid with an innumerable multitude of both horsemen and foot soldiers.

Hearing this, the emperor was vehemently terrified, for he did not trust that he could resist Duke Robert within the city. He ordered the Roman people to be assembled and, making no mention of the duke's coming, asserted that the affairs of Lombardy pressed him and that it was therefore necessary for him to hasten his journey there with all speed.

Leaving the city, Henry therefore fled, to speak more truly, with his armies into Tuscany and then Lombardy.

Not many days after his withdrawal, the pious duke approached Rome to free the pope and signified his coming to the supreme pontiff through secret messengers.

When the Romans heard of his arrival, they encouraged one another and went out to meet him with a multitude of armed men. Battle having been joined, they were defeated and put to flight by him.

After the Romans had been put to flight, Duke Robert entered Rome as an enemy through the Flaminian Gate. Attacking as an enemy the part of the city which looks toward Saint Lawrence in Lucina and Saint Sylvester, he exposed it to plunder and fire.

Then, after the Romans had everywhere been routed, he went to Castel Sant'Angelo. Bringing Lord Pope Gregory out from there with great glory, together with the cardinals and the nobles who had followed him, he conducted him through the middle of the city, brought him to the Lateran, and remained there for some time.

Afterward, when the pope, upon the deliberation of his men's counsel, did not believe that he could remain safely with the Romans, and domestic affairs called the duke back into Apulia, the pope left the city with the few who followed him and set out with the duke for Salerno. He remained there for some time as a catholic shepherd and, after enduring many tribulations for the liberty of the Church, rested in the Lord.

Vincent in the Mirror of History, book twenty-six, chapter eighty-two, says thus after Sigebert:

"Pope Hildebrand, who was also Gregory VII, died while in exile at Salerno. Concerning him I found this written:

"'We wish you who are solicitous for ecclesiastical care to know that Lord Apostolic Hildebrand, who was also Gregory, now placed at the end of life, summoned to himself one of the twelve cardinals whom he loved above the others.

"'He confessed to God, Saint Peter, and the whole Church that he had sinned greatly in the pastoral care which had been entrusted to him to govern, and that, at the devil's persuasion, he had stirred up wrath and hatred against the human race.

"'Afterward he said that he had begun the sentence which had been poured out throughout the world for the increase of Christianity.

"'Then at last he sent the aforesaid confessor of his to the emperor and to the whole Church so that he might ask indulgence for him, because he saw the end of his life and was now soon putting on the angelic garment.

"'He remitted and dissolved the bonds of all his bans for the emperor and for the whole Christian people, living and dead, laymen and clerics. He ordered his men to leave the house of Theodoric and the emperor's friends to ascend it.'"

These things are said there. Nevertheless, I do not believe them to be true for many reasons, nor does John of Colonna place them.

Note certain constitutions made by this Gregory in the Decretals. In cause sixteen, question seven, he says:

"Sitting in a general council, I decree that if anyone hereafter receives a bishopric or abbey from the hand of any lay person, he shall in no way be held among the bishops or abbots, nor shall any hearing be granted to him as bishop or abbot.

"Moreover, by the grace of blessed Peter we forbid him entrance into the Church," that is, we suspend him, "until by recovering his senses he abandons the place which he took under the crime both of disobedience and of ambition, from which the crime of idolatry takes its beginning. We establish the same concerning the lower dignities."

Likewise:

"If any emperor, king, duke, marquis, count, or any secular power or person shall presume to give the investiture of bishoprics or of any ecclesiastical dignity, let him know himself bound by the bond of the same sentence."

The same Gregory, writing among other things to Dukes Rudolf and Berthold in distinction thirty-two, in the section beginning "But Gregory," says:

"In no way knowingly receive the office of simoniacs and of those lying in notorious fornication, and, so far as you can, prohibit such persons from sacred ministries wherever it shall be necessary."

The same Gregory VII says to all those established throughout the kingdoms of Italy and of the Germans in distinction eighty-one:

"If there are any priests, deacons, or subdeacons who lie in the crime of fornication, by the authority of Almighty God and Saint Peter we forbid them entrance into the church until they repent and amend.

"But if they prefer to persevere in their sin, let none of you presume to hear their office, because their blessing is turned into a curse and their prayer into sin, the Lord testifying through the prophet: 'I shall curse,' he says, 'your blessings.'

"Those who refuse to obey this most salutary precept shall incur the sin of idolatry, Samuel testifying and blessed Gregory instructing, because not to obey is the sin of divination, and not to acquiesce is like the crime of idolatry.

"Therefore, whoever, while asserting himself to be a Christian, disdains to obey the Apostolic See incurs the sin of paganism."

These things are said there. It is to be understood concerning notorious fornicators who are suspended both with respect to themselves and with respect to others. Nevertheless, they still confect and confer the sacraments.

Their blessing, that is, their office, is said to be turned into a curse because both they themselves and those who knowingly hear their offices sin, since they act contrary to the precept of the Church commanding this, namely that their offices are not to be heard.

The same man says to the most beloved citizens of Rome in distinction three, On Consecration:

"It has come to me that certain men of a perverse spirit have sown among you things contrary to the holy faith, so that they forbid any work to be done on the Sabbath day.

"What else shall we call these but preachers of Antichrist? When he comes, he will cause the Sabbath and the Lord's Day to be kept from every work. For because he feigns that he dies and rises again, he wishes the Lord's Day to be held in veneration; and because he compels the people to Judaize, so that he may recall the rite of the exterior law and subject to himself the unbelief of the Jews, he wishes the Sabbath to be observed."

He also adds that if anyone wishes to wash on the Lord's Day for bodily necessity, he is not forbidden. But if for luxury and pleasure, it is permitted neither on the Lord's Day nor on any other day whatsoever.

The same man says in cause eleven, question three:

"Because, our sins requiring it, we see many perish daily on account of excommunication—some through ignorance, some through excessive simplicity, some through fear, and some even through necessity—overcome by mercy, we temper the sentence of anathema for the time being as far as we can, and show that it has been tempered.

"Therefore we withdraw from the bond of anathema, that is, of minor excommunication, wives, sons, male servants, female servants or slaves, peasants and servants, and also all others who are not so much courtiers that crimes are perpetrated by their counsel.

"We also withdraw those who in ignorance communicate with excommunicated persons, or those who communicate with persons who communicate with the excommunicated.

"But if any man praying, pilgrim, or traveler comes into the land of excommunicated persons and there cannot buy, or does not have the means to buy, we give him permission to receive from the excommunicated.

"And if anyone wishes to give something to excommunicated persons, not for the support of pride but for the sake of humanity, we do not forbid it."

See the notable gloss there.

The same man says that offerings are to be made at the altar in distinction one, On Consecration, in the chapter beginning "Every." According to the gloss, this is counsel.

There he says that one must first flee to the Lord, who can heal the passions of our soul. But men, by an inverted order, first summon aid from men for themselves. When human aids fail, then they judge that the grace of divine favor is to be sought.

Section XXII

When Gregory VII died in the year of the Lord 1088, Victor III was created pope by the cardinals. He had formerly been called Desiderius, abbot of Monte Cassino.

According to Martin in his Chronicle, he presided over the Church of God for one year, four months, and seven days. But according to John of Colonna he lived in the pontificate for only four months and seven days.

He was a religious man who feared God and is said to have been killed by poison placed in the chalice.

In the same year the sun suffered an eclipse, and there was an intolerable famine throughout almost the entire world. There was also an excessive inundation of waters in many places, with damage and danger.

For in Italy there was so great a flood that liquefied rocks destroyed several villages by their fall. Domestic birds—peacocks, hens, and geese—withdrawing themselves from houses all became wild.

Augustine in book three of The City of God relates that a similar portent occurred before the Latins stirred up the Social War against Rome, as a sign of a great evil.

About the same time, as Sigebert says, while the Venetians planned to remove the body of blessed Nicholas from Myra in Lycia, which had been laid waste by the Turks, the citizens of Bari anticipated them.

Forty-seven in number, coming from Antioch to Myra, they compelled the four monks alone found there to show them the tomb of Saint Nicholas. Breaking it open, they drew out the bones of Saint Nicholas, complete in number and floating in an oily liquid, and brought them to Bari with glory.

This translation was made in the seven hundred and forty-seventh year from his deposition or death, and many infirm persons were healed in this translation.

When a certain man of the palace had drawn a tooth from the tomb so that from great devotion he might carry it with him, and afterward did not find it, Saint Nicholas revealed that it had been returned to the tomb because he did not permit even the smallest part to be separated from his body.

About that time the order of the Cistercians is said to have had its beginning. Its institution was discussed above in the preceding title.

Section XXIII

After the passing of Pope Victor, when the cardinals had assembled as one, Urban II was elected supreme pontiff with one mind. He had formerly been a monk of the Cluniac order, called Odo.

According to John of Colonna, he was raised to this dignity of supreme prelate in the year of the Lord 1089, in the thirty-second year of the reign of Henry IV. He sat for twelve years, four months, and nineteen days.

He was a vigorous man and very learned in the divine Scriptures.

From this time scandals increased between the Church and the empire, and disagreements grew while the one distrusted the other and each excommunicated the other: namely, on the side of the pontiffs, the true, holy, and legitimate Urban and the apostate called Clement, whom the emperor had intruded. But each despised the other's excommunication, either because of prejudice concerning the cause or concerning the person.

After these things Pope Urban, avoiding the fury of the aforesaid Emperor Henry, and deservedly placing very little trust in the Romans, lay hidden among his faithful men in more fortified places, secure almost nowhere.

After the pope had celebrated a general council at Piacenza, fleeing the aforesaid emperor's indignation he left Italy and entered the kingdom of the Franks. He caused a general council to be summoned at Clermont in Auvergne.

In that place, during the month of November, a sacred assembly of archbishops, bishops, and abbots gathered from all the regions beyond the Alps, with certain princes of those regions also present.

There, by the counsel of the prelates, the lord apostolic ordered in that council many constitutions which appeared to look toward raising up the declining state of the Church, as will appear below.

Among other things it was established that the Hours of blessed Mary should be said; hence this is also under precept like the office of the Lord. It was also ordained that the office of the Lady should be solemnly celebrated on Saturdays.

As regards the Mass, this is observed sufficiently when the day is free. As regards the office of the Hours, however, that the whole office of the Virgin should be performed on Saturday, the curia does not observe it, but certain churches or religious orders do.

In the same council the pope excommunicated Philip, king of the Franks, Emperor Henry, and the antipope.

Finally, he delivered a sermon to the people, exhorting them to take up the cross and aid the Holy Land. At the end of his sermon he concluded thus:

"Trusting in the mercy of God and the authority of the blessed Peter and Paul, we remit to faithful Christians who shall take up arms against the pagans holding the Holy City and the other venerable places all the penances imposed upon them for their offenses.

"Meanwhile, we receive under the defense of the Church and the protection of the blessed apostles Peter and Paul, as sons of true obedience, those who in the ardor of faith shall undertake this labor to attack them. We establish that they shall remain secure from all disturbances, both in their persons and in their property."

By ending with these words, God gave his faithful servant the grace of evangelizing with much power.

Although his command appeared exceedingly arduous and difficult, both greater and lesser embraced it with every eagerness. The fervor of this word not only animated those present, kindled by his speech, but that same discourse, going forth far and wide, inflamed those absent, burning with an equal vow, toward the same undertaking.

Moreover, the bishops, as they had received in command, showed themselves faithful fellow workers by inviting their peoples to it. Divine grace working, not one stroke fell upon the earth without fruit, so that the Lord's saying could truly be spoken: "I came not to send peace upon the earth, but a sword."

For husbands were separated from wives and fathers from sons. At that time there was no bond of affection which could impede this fervor, so that many monks went out from the cloisters, from the prisons in which they had enclosed themselves voluntarily for the Lord.

Nor was there anyone in the western kingdoms who wished to be mindful either of age, sex, condition, or rank, or who, detained by any persuasions, desisted from the undertaking. But all without distinction committed themselves. For that which is written in Tobit was seen to be fulfilled to the letter: "Jerusalem, city of God, nations shall come to you from afar and, bearing gifts, shall adore the Lord in you; and they shall inhabit your land in sanctification, invoking the great name in you."

Those present, therefore, who had been at the council affixed the cross to their shoulders as an earnest of the future pilgrimage. The first was the lord Adhemar, bishop of Le Puy, otherwise called Haimar, who afterward, exercising the authority of the apostolic legation, presided over the same expedition. The lord bishop of Orange did likewise.

Many barons and princes from each kingdom affixed the cross to their shoulders: namely, the lord Hugh the Great, brother of Philip, king of the Franks; Robert, count of Flanders; likewise another lord Robert, duke of the Normans, son of the elder lord William, king of the English; Stephen, count of Chartres and Blois; Raymond, count of Toulouse and Saint-Gilles, a man likewise distinguished and vigorous; Godfrey of Bouillon, duke of Lotharingia, and with him his two brothers, namely Baldwin and Eustace; likewise Baldwin of Bourg, their kinsman, son of the count of Royscost; Warner, count of Grees; Baldwin, count of Hainaut; Isuard, count of Die; Raibuld, count of Orange; William, count of Forez; Stephen, count of Aumale; Rotold, count of Perche; and Hugh, count of Saint-Pol. Many other princes and barons who were not counts offered themselves for this service pleasing to God.

On this side of the Alps, however, there were the lord Bohemond, prince of the Tarentines, son of the lord Robert Guiscard, duke of Apulia, and Tancred, his sister's son, a man practiced and vigorous in arms. There were also on this expedition certain nobles from the cities of Italy, and especially from the city of Rome.

All these, awaiting a suitable time, set out upon this road of pilgrimage, some by a sea route and others by a land route. For so many and such countless thousands of peoples could not find the necessary things in any single region. Therefore it was carefully arranged that each of the greater princes should lead his own legions separately and that they should not set out along the same path.

Nowhere among all the provinces that the West possesses was there even one idle household, while here the father of a family, there the son, and there the whole household prepared itself to migrate. With sobs and sighs they were separated from one another; the embraces of dear ones were parted, as they said a final farewell to one another.

In the year of the Lord 1086, a certain noble Walter, a prudent man and vigorous in arms, passed through the kingdom of the Germans with an immense multitude of companies of foot soldiers and descended into Hungary. Having traversed it, he entered Bulgaria. Emerging from the forests of that region, he reached Stralitia, the distinguished metropolis of inland Dacia. There, after guides for the road had been received from the duke of that city, he arrived unharmed after some days.

Upon arriving, he was introduced into the presence of the lord emperor and obtained from him that, until the arrival of Peter the Hermit, at whose command he had taken up the journey, he should be permitted to dwell in places adjoining the city.

This Peter the Hermit was the instigator of this work and of the undertaking for recovering the Holy Land. Having received a revelation, he came from Jerusalem to Pope Urban. But this matter, the wars on its account, and the acquisition of the Holy Land will be discussed fully below in the following title.

Concerning the decrees of this Urban II, Urban II says thus in the synod at Melfi, in distinction 32:

"Let no one be admitted to sacred order unless he is either a virgin or of proven chastity, and unless up to the subdiaconate he has had one wife, and she a virgin."

The same man, in the preceding chapter of the same distinction, writing to Dominic, father and patriarch of Grado, says:

"Let the impious be ashamed and understand openly that, by the judgment of the Holy Spirit, those established in the three sacred grades—namely, the presbyterate, diaconate, and subdiaconate—who have not put away their women and have not lived chastely are to be excluded from the dignity of those same grades.

"For we speak concerning manifest things. God, however, is the knower and judge of secret things."

The same man says in cause 1, question 1:

"If any have been ordained by simoniacs, but not simoniacally, and if they can prove that, when they were ordained, they did not know them to be simoniacs, and that at the time they were regarded as Catholics in the Church, we mercifully sustain the ordinations of such men"—namely, with a dispensation—"provided, however, that a praiseworthy life commends them.

"But those who knowingly have permitted themselves to be consecrated by simoniacs—rather, to be execrated—we decree that their consecration is altogether void."

The gloss explains this.

Likewise, in cause 8, question 3, it is set down thus. Artald, bishop of Arles and suffragan of the church of Narbonne, came to Rome to be consecrated by the lord Urban, namely Pope Urban II. His archbishop was unwilling to consecrate him because, on account of his election, he had sworn to the canons that the goods of the Church were to be preserved.

He was therefore consecrated by the lord Pope Urban, after first being cleared concerning an oath of this sort, saying that he had taken the said oath after the election, but had made no agreement beforehand in order that he might be elected. Therefore, as the gloss says, the promise was not simoniacal.

Concerning simony in dignities, see the same Urban in cause 1, question 3, in the chapter beginning “The Savior.”

The same man says in distinction 56:

“We remove the sons of priests from sacred ministries unless they have lived religiously either in monasteries or among canons,” namely canons regular.

The same man, writing to the archbishop of Tours, says in the same distinction:

“We do not reject the elect of Le Mans because he is said to be the son of a priest, if the other virtues concur in him; rather, his merits supporting him, we receive him patiently. Yet let this not be assumed as a rule hereafter; rather, provision is made for a time against the danger of the Church.”

Hence, according to the gloss, the pope dispenses with this.

The same man says in cause 9, question 1, in the chapter beginning “Ordinations”:

“Those who were consecrated by bishops once ordained in Catholic manner but separated from the Roman Church in schism, when they return to the unity of the Church, we command to be mercifully received while preserving their own orders, if life and learning commend them.

“Henceforth, however, whoever permits himself to be ordained by the aforesaid schismatics and adversaries of the Holy Roman Church shall in no way be considered worthy of this pardon.

“Although, in consideration of mercy and under the compulsion of great necessity, we have established this dispensation in sacred orders, we nevertheless desire that no prejudice be done to the sacred canons, but that they retain their own force.

“And when the necessity ceases, let that also cease which was done on account of necessity. For where the slaughter of many lies, something of severity must be withdrawn.”

The same man says in cause 11, question 3:

“Do not communicate with those with whom bishops do not communicate; and do not receive those whom they have cast out,” namely by excommunication. “For the sentence of a bishop is greatly to be feared, although he binds unjustly.”

The same man says in cause 12, question 1, in the chapter beginning “We know”:

“Whoever among you has undertaken the common life and has vowed that he will possess nothing of his own, let him see that he does not render his promise void, but let him faithfully preserve for the Lord what he has promised, lest he acquire damnation for himself rather than a reward. For it is holier not to vow than not to fulfill a vow as well as one can.

“For those who have made a vow or received the faith and have not fulfilled the vow, or have ended their lives amid evils, are punished more grievously than those who died without a vow or faith and nevertheless did good things.”

From the council of this Urban it is said in cause 12, question 2:

A question was raised concerning laymen who, when bishops or other clerics die, seize and steal the goods of the deceased from the Church and the poor. Against them the common anathema of the entire council was pronounced, the pope himself promulgating a sentence of this sort:

“If anyone, after knowledge of the present prohibition, invades the goods of bishops, presbyters, or other clerics, let him be excommunicated until satisfaction has been made.”

The same man, writing to the bishop of Gap, says in cause 15, question 6:

“I prohibit the sworn knights of Count Hugh from serving him for as long as he is excommunicated. If they put forward their oaths, let them be admonished that they ought to serve God rather than men.

“For they are constrained by no authority to discharge the fidelity which they swore to a Christian prince when he opposes God and His saints and tramples upon their precepts.”

The same man says in cause 16, question 7:

“Let monks not receive tithes and churches from laymen without the consent and will of the bishops. But if anything has been presumed otherwise, let them be subject to canonical vengeance.”

The same man says in cause 17, question 4:

“All must take heed lest estates dedicated to the uses of the heavenly mysteries be harassed by certain men rushing upon them. If anyone does this, after the harshness of the punishment that must justly be imposed upon sacrilegious persons, let him be condemned to perpetual infamy and delivered to prison or exile.”

The same man says in cause 19, question 2:

“There are two laws, one public and the other private. Public law is that which was confirmed in writings by the holy fathers, such as the law of the canons, which was handed down on account of transgressors.

“For example, it is decreed in the canons that a cleric ought not to pass from his own bishopric to another without commendatory letters from his bishop. This was established on account of criminals, so that infamous persons might not be received by any bishop. For formerly, when they could not perform their offices in their own bishopric, they were accustomed to pass into another and to celebrate in another’s bishopric. This is detested by lawful precepts and writings.

“Private law, however, is that which is written in the heart by the prompting of the Holy Spirit, just as the Apostle says concerning certain persons: ‘When the gentiles, who do not have the law, naturally do those things that belong to the law, they are a law to themselves.’

“If any one of these remains in his own church under a bishop, holds a people, and lives in secular fashion, but, inspired by the Holy Spirit, wishes to be saved in some monastery or regular canonry, because he is led by private law no reason requires that he be constrained by public law.

“For private law is worthier than public law. The Spirit of God is indeed a law, and those who are led by the Spirit of God are led by the law of God. And who is there who can worthily resist the Holy Spirit? Therefore, whoever is led by this Spirit, even if his bishop contradicts him, let him go free by our authority.”

The same man says in question 3:

“We establish that no one under canonical profession, after in place of God he has placed a man over his own head, shall dare, at the prompting of some levity or under the pretext of a stricter religious life, to depart from the same cloister without the permission of the father and of the entire congregation.

“Let no abbot or bishop and no monk receive one who departs without the common security of letters.”

The same Urban says in cause 18, question 2:

“The service which monasteries or their churches have rendered from the time of Gregory VII down to the present time, we also concede.”

See the gloss there.

The same, from the synod of Urban II held at Piacenza, is set down thus in distinction 70:

“By a sanction consonant with the institutions of the holy canons, we decree that an ordination made without a title shall be held void. And in whatever church anyone has been given a title, let him remain in it perpetually. It is altogether unlawful, however, for anyone to be given a title in two churches.”

The notable gloss there, at length after many things, concludes well: namely, that with respect to several churches having the cure of souls, or several dignities, the pope alone dispenses, in the Extravagants, On Prebends, in the chapter beginning “Concerning many.” But bishops can dispense with respect to holding several simple benefices. Yet if anyone does this without a reasonable cause, both the one dispensing and the one dispensed with sin gravely.

The same man says in cause 23, question 8:

“The tribute was found in the mouth of the fish while Peter was fishing, because the Church renders tribute from her exterior things, which are openly visible to all. He was not commanded to give the whole fish, however, but only the stater that was found in its mouth, because the Church ought not to be given to the emperor.

“The pontifical summit, which stands preeminent in the mouth of the head of the Church, cannot be subjected to kings. But certainly, as we have said, what was found in the mouth of the fish is commanded to be given for Peter and the Lord, because what was established of old from the exterior things of the Church for the tranquility and peace for which emperors ought to protect and defend us must be paid to the emperors.”

The same man, writing to the bishop of Brescia, says in cause 30, question 4:

“That a wife ought not together with her husband to receive a child in baptism is found prohibited by no authority. But, so that the purity of spiritual parenthood may be preserved immune from every blemish and infamy, we have decreed it worthy that the two together should by no means presume to aspire to this.”

The same man says in cause 24, question 3:

“Admonished by the examples of paternal traditions and discharging the debt of the pastoral office, we establish that churches with their goods, both persons and possessions—namely clerics and monks, and their lay brothers or those committed to them—and all worshippers whatsoever, likewise with the goods which they carry, shall be safe and without molestation.

“If anyone presumes to act against these things, if he does not make amends, let him be barred from the thresholds of the Church.”

The same man says in the same question, from his own letter:

“It must be noted that certain persons say that we act against the evangelical parable in which the Lord commanded that the tares not be uprooted, when we subject to excommunication certain persons worthy of excommunication.

“But the Lord Himself, who narrates this in a parable, elsewhere commands that excommunication be done, saying: ‘A brother who is corrected by the Church and does not obey, let him be to you as a heathen and a publican.’

“Hence it appears clearly that excommunication is one thing and uprooting another. For one who is excommunicated is excommunicated for this purpose, that his spirit may be saved on the day of the Lord. Excommunication is discipline, not uprooting, unless perhaps uprooting proceeds from the pride and contempt of the excommunicated person.

“Moreover Augustine, whose words they introduce for their own proposition, together with the holy legates of the Roman Church and other holy bishops, excommunicated the heretics Pelagius and Celestine. He also held the Donatists excommunicated.”

The same man says:

“He who defends the error of others is far more damnable than those who err, because not only does he himself err, but he prepares and confirms stumbling blocks for others.”

Title XVI

Chapter II

After the history of the supreme pontiffs from Leo IV through Urban II inclusively—that is, from the 813th year of the Lord through the year 1100—it now falls to us to speak concerning the emperors who existed in those times and concerning other secular princes.

Therefore, when Charlemagne, the first emperor from the Franks, died, his son Louis, surnamed the Pious, succeeded him in the empire. He began to rule as emperor in the year of the Lord 814, but in the 6,024th year from the beginning of the world, or, according to another opinion, in the year 4,877. He ruled as emperor for twenty-seven years.

Before he received the empire he begot three sons, namely Lothair, Pepin, and Louis. As Vincent and Jacob of Colonna relate, he made Lothair, as the firstborn, Caesar and left Italy together with Rome itself to be governed by him. He established the second, namely Pepin, as king of Aquitaine. He declared Louis king of Germany and Bavaria.

This Louis was always a most fervent executor of the commandments of the Lord and a most vigorous propagator of the Catholic faith. Although he was established in great eminence in the world, he nevertheless stood forth more loftily in humility.

At the beginning of his empire, considering the condition of the churches with diligent care, he established a law that the ministers of Christ should not be subject to human service. He also established that each church should have its own expenditures for living in common, lest anyone's avarice abuse ecclesiastical ministry for gain, or divine worship be neglected on account of poverty. Likewise, he established stipends for the monks in each monastery.

For this reason, in the sixth year of his empire he commanded that a synod of all the prelates, abbots, and other clerics of his empire be assembled at Aachen for the condition and advantage of the faith, with Pope Gregory IV presiding.

Among the other things piously and holily established in that council, it was decreed that bishops and clerics should use neither costly nor silken garments, nor belts of gold and gems. For it is said to be like a monstrosity and is judged a crime of impiety if one deputed to the ecclesiastical household attempts to aspire to this pomp of secular glory.

The aforesaid Emperor Louis, however, was most merciful by nature and ordered the commonwealth in a holy manner according to the gentleness of his conduct. His sons, despising what they themselves called their father's inactivity, like fickle, unruly, and irreverent men, stirred up a grave sedition against him with many princes of the empire and kingdom and even with prelates.

The author and head of this conspiracy was Bernard, king of Italy, son of the younger Pepin and nephew of the emperor. The emperor, considering that it would be dangerous if he dissembled so dangerous a conspiracy raised against him, rose with great spirit against those who had conspired against him.

First he deprived Bernard, king of Italy, as one guilty of treason against the majesty, first of his kingdom, then of his eyes, and finally of his life. After this deed many, both nobles and others, were afterward punished by him with various penalties. Some were deprived of authority, others delivered into exile, others deprived of their substance, and some were even killed.

For this reason he stirred his sons' hatred more sharply against himself and alienated from himself the hearts of the other princes. When the prelates of the churches interposed themselves so that the material of so many evils might be quieted, by their counsel Emperor Louis dismissed from himself Judith, his second wife, by whom he had already begotten his son Charles, as though she were the origin of all the evils. Yet on account of this he could not mitigate the spirits of his sons and the other princes.

While Louis was being tossed about in this tempest, at last he was betrayed by his own men into the power of his sons, in favor of the sons who were persecuting their own father. Detained by them, he was compelled in the presence of the princes to lay aside every imperial dignity, and he is said to have been enclosed in a monastery to perform penance, even by the judgment of the prelates.

But, God so disposing, in the following year, which was the twentieth year of his empire, he was released, received his arms, empire, and wife, and compelled his son Lothair, who had come from Italy with a numerous army, to return to Italy. Moreover, the archbishop of Reims, who had conspired in Louis's deposition, was deposed from the archbishopric and relegated into exile.

In the tenth year of this Prince Louis, envoys of Michael, emperor of Constantinople, came to him. Among other gifts they brought him the books of Dionysius the Areopagite On the Celestial Hierarchy, written by Dionysius himself.

These books were sent to Paris on the feast of the holy martyr himself and were received in the monastery with immense joy. The power and merit of the said martyr augmented this joy, for on that very night nineteen sick persons were healed of diverse infirmities.

In the twenty-third year of the empire of the said Louis, the nation of the Normans, going forth from its own borders, began to harass Gaul. The Normans, however, are originally Danes; in their barbarous tongue “Normans” means as much as “northern men,” because they came from that part of the world.

Under this prince also, Ariold, king of the Danes, was baptized at Mainz with his wife and sons and a great part of the Danish nobles. He was honored by the emperor with gifts and with a portion of Frisia given to him as a benefice.

In the twenty-fifth year of the same Louis, he was reconciled to his son Lothair, who was reigning in Italy and came to him under pledge. To him, as the firstborn, he gave the crown of the empire and kingdom.

In the eighth year of his empire, according to what Vincent relates in book twenty-five of the Historical Mirror after Hugh, in Thuringia a piece of turf fifty feet in length, fourteen in width, and one and a half feet in height was cut from the ground and lifted up without hands, and was moved more than twenty-five feet.

In Saxony the earth swelled in the manner of an embankment for the extent of one league. An earthquake also occurred. Many villages and houses were devastated by heavenly fire. With the hail itself, true stones of immense weight fell. A mortality of human beings followed these prodigies of hail.

In the territory of Toul, in the village of Commerciato, a twelve-year-old girl, after receiving Holy Communion from a priest at Easter, abstained first from bread for ten months, then from all food and drink for three years, and afterward returned to the common life of human beings.

In Gaul, before the summer solstice, when the air had turned into a tempest, an immense fragment of ice suddenly fell with the hail. It had a length of fifteen feet, a width of six, and a thickness of two feet.

The sun and moon failed through an eclipse in the fifteenth year of Louis’s empire. In the final year of his empire a comet appeared in the sign of Aries, and for several days very many small fires, like stars, were seen running through the heavens. Louis died in the twenty-sixth year of his empire.

Section I

When Louis I died, Lothair his firstborn, usurping the empire for himself alone, ruled as emperor for fifteen years. He began to rule as emperor in the year of the Lord 841, but from the beginning of the world in the year 4,094 according to the lesser computation, and in the year 6,051 according to the greater.

In the first year of his empire, Charles and Louis, sons of the emperor, grieving that they had been deprived by their brother Lothair of the portion of the kingdom owed to them, prepared to rise against him.

In the second year of his empire a comet appeared in the sign of Aquarius. When the three brothers were in discord concerning the division of the kingdom, a battle was joined between them in the territory of Auxerre, in the village called Fontenay. So great a slaughter was made among them that no age ever remembered so great a destruction to have been made among the nation of the Franks. Their strength was so weakened there that they were no longer able even to defend their own borders from foreigners. The victory at length fell to Louis and Charles.

When the kingdom had been marked out in three parts, the brothers came to the city of Verdun in Gaul and were reconciled with one another. Oaths having been given and received among them, each returned to defend the parts of the kingdom marked out for him.

Charles received the western kingdoms from the British Ocean as far as the river Meuse, in which part from that time down to the present the name of France remained. To Louis fell the eastern kingdoms, namely Germany as far as the streams of the Rhine, and certain cities beyond the Rhine with their adjoining districts because of the abundance of wine.

Lothair, however, who was greater by birth and was called emperor, held all the kingdoms of Italy together with Rome itself, and also Provence and the middle part of Francia between the Scheldt and the Rhine, which, its name being changed, was named Lotharingia from him.

After this division was made, Charles reigned in Francia for thirty-four years. Louis his brother reigned in Germany for thirty-three years.

It is held from the chronicles that this Louis caused fourteen dukes of the Bohemians to be baptized with their people. The Normans, however, gravely attacked the kingdom of his brother Charles, surnamed the Bald, and came by ship as far as Paris. They fought three battles with the Frisians and came forth victorious in the first two.

At that time Saint Radulphus, archbishop of Bourges, died and was buried in the monastery of Saint Sulpicius.

In the twelfth year of Lothair's empire, Charles, king of the Franks, captured Pepin and Charles, the sons of his brother King Pepin, who were disturbing the kingdom, had them tonsured as monks, and thrust them into a monastery, as Sigebert and Vincent write in the Historical Mirror.

At that time the cities of Bordeaux, Périgueux, Saintes, Limoges, Tours, and Orléans were captured by the pagan Normans. They had indeed broken forth from Dacia, as has been said, but, turning at length toward the maritime part of Gaul, they settled there; it is called Normandy from them.

Those Normans, passing through the British sea and entering by the mouth of the Loire, invaded the city of Nantes. On Holy Saturday they slaughtered the bishop as he consecrated the baptismal water and killed the clergy and people. From there they occupied Angers and afterward Tours, and like a tempest they destroyed all things. They even burned the church of Saint Martin.

In the fifteenth year of the same emperor, an earthquake, an unusual commotion of the air, whirlwinds, hailstorms, tempests, and many thunderbolts inflicted manifold injuries upon human beings. A certain man was also consumed by heavenly fire while his garment remained unharmed.

Around those times, according to Vincent after the chronicle, Adeulphus, king of the English, who first held the monarchy of all England, went to Rome and before Pope Leo offered to Saint Peter the tribute which is paid in England down to the present day: namely, one silver coin each year from every house.

At length Emperor Lothair, after dividing the kingdom among his sons, renounced the world. Having received the monastic habit in the monastery of Prüm, not long afterward he slept in the Lord, as Vincent testifies in the Historical Mirror in the place cited above.

As Vincent relates, when there was a contention between angels and demons concerning his soul, the angels sought the soul of the monk, but the demons the soul of the emperor. When the brothers prayed, however, the demons who were tearing his body were put to flight.

While the said Lothair was ruling as emperor, when Pope Sergius had been created at Rome, Lothair sent his firstborn son Louis with a great company of princes and prelates to honor Sergius in his election and consecration. Received by the supreme pontiff with great glory, Louis was anointed and crowned by him as king of the Lombards. Almost all the bishops of Tuscany and Lombardy were present at his coronation.

Rabanus also, having been made archbishop of Mainz from being an abbot, at the command of Louis, king of the Germans and brother of Emperor Lothair, assembled a synod of the bishops of Germany at Mainz, in which many things useful to the Church were ordained. Rabanus and his books were discussed above.

During the reign of the said Lothair, that abominable nation of Saracens, conveyed by ships around the coast of the Tuscan sea, inflicted very great damage upon certain cities. They violated especially the church of blessed Peter and carried off everything, because at that time that part was without walls. Afterward they withdrew, as was said in the preceding chapter.

Section II

When Lothair migrated to the Lord, his son Louis II succeeded him in the empire. He had formerly been anointed king of the Lombards by Pope Sergius. He began to rule as emperor in the year of the Lord 856, and in the year 4,919 from the beginning of the world according to the lesser number, but in the year 6,066 according to the opinion of the greater number. He held the empire for twenty-one years. His brother Lothair, however, held Lotharingia.

In the third year of the empire of this Louis, the Franks complained before his brother Louis concerning the cruelty of their King Charles and invited him to reign over them against Charles, according to Vincent after Sigebert. Louis undertook this without counsel, but shamefully withdrew from another's borders.

In his eighth year Hubert, abbot and duke, brother of Queen Theberga, the wife of King Lothair, rose against Lothair because, after repudiating his wife Theberga, he had taken in addition a certain woman named Waldrada.

Because the two archbishops of Mainz and Trier had consented to and cooperated in this repudiation, they were convicted of it, excommunicated by Pope Nicholas I, and deposed. The concubine Waldrada herself was also excommunicated by the apostolic legate.

Seeing that excommunication was also being threatened against him, Lothair received his wife Theberga and rejected Waldrada. But this profited little, because not long afterward, after repudiating Theberga again, he took back the concubine as his wife and thereafter refused to be separated from her by any manner of correction.

In the twelfth year, when the Saracens were raiding the region of Benevento, Emperor Louis manfully met them. His brother Lothair, hastening to his aid, indeed waged many battles vigorously with him. But his army was exceedingly burdened by illnesses and by the bites of spiders on account of the intemperateness of the air, and he returned with great loss to his men.

In the thirteenth year of the same emperor, Michael, emperor of the Greeks, diminished in sense, so departed from his mind that he commanded his familiars to be killed. Yet, returning to himself, he required them to be presented to him.

Hence in the following year Basil—whom Emperor Michael had taken to himself as a poor man from the household of a certain abbot, had made chamberlain, and had advanced to such honors that he was called second after the emperor—had often been commanded by the emperor in his insanity to be killed. Fearing that he would be killed on such an occasion, Basil chose rather to kill the emperor himself than to be slain by him. Basil ruled as emperor in Greece for seventeen years.

In the fifteenth year of Louis's empire, when Pope Nicholas migrated to the Lord, King Lothair went to Rome to excuse himself before Adrian his successor. Both Lothair and his chief men were invited by Adrian, for proof of their innocence, to the examination and reception of the body and blood of the Lord. All who received Communion with him died within a year, Lothair himself also dying at Piacenza on his return.

In the seventeenth year of the empire of the aforesaid Louis, as Vincent relates, King Heldred, who had been a son of Ethenulf, died. After him reigned Elfred, brother of Ethenulf, who had received the royal anointing and crown from Pope Leo V. He reigned for twenty-eight years and six months and fought with enemies for nine continuous years.

As Vincent relates after Helinand, when on a certain day Elfred was enclosed on an island and was alone at home, his companions having dispersed along the bank of the river to fish, he gave his body, sick with cares, to sleep. Behold, Saint Cuthbert, formerly bishop of Lindisfarne, addressed him as he slept:

"I am Cuthbert, if you have heard of me. The Lord sent me to announce prosperous things to you. England has long paid the penalties for its sins; now at length, through the merits of its native saints, it has been regarded by the Lord. You are miserably driven from your kingdom; after a little time you will be restored gloriously to the throne.

"And this shall be a sign to you: today your fishermen will come bearing a great multitude of fish in baskets, which is marvelous since, with the water of the river frozen, nothing of the sort is hoped for. Moreover, the cold season frustrates every art of fishermen. Then, when you are master of your fortune, remember your liberator and his messenger."

This same thing was seen by his mother in a dream. When they awoke, both related their dreams. And behold, the fishermen arrived with a great abundance of fish.

Not long afterward he dared to leave the prison in which he was held by the Danes and undertook a venture of great cunning. For he entered the tents of the king of the Danes in the appearance of a minstrel, with only one most faithful man sharing his knowledge. There, as one professing the entertainer's art, he was admitted even into the more secret parts of the dining hall and perceived with eyes and ears all their secrets.

Having remained there for several days, he returned to Elingia. After explaining everything to his companions, he suddenly rushed upon the idle barbarians. Very many of them having been killed, the rest with their king gave hostages that they would become Christians and depart from England.

This was done. Their king Gudrum, whom our people call Gurnund, was baptized with thirty leading men and almost the whole people, and was received as a son by King Elfred. The rest of the Danes who were unwilling to become Christians crossed the sea with Hasting.

In the aforesaid year of the said emperor, as Vincent says after Sigebert, a domestic calamity afflicted Charles, king of the Franks and brother of the said Louis, in his sons. The father himself captured and blinded Karlomann, who had advanced in the clerical state as far as the office of the diaconate, because, having turned to apostasy and disturbing the kingdom by every manner of doing harm, he had become another Julian the Apostate.

His other son Charles, however, when he had rashly wished to test the tested strength of the soldier Albuin and had engaged him alone in single combat, was killed by that same Albuin, who did not know who he was.

Around that time, according to Vincent from the chronicle, the nation of the Danes, raging greatly, disturbed England. It also condemned Eadimund, that land's most Christian and most pious king, to death.

What was marvelous, a savage wolf took up the severed head of this saint unharmed and, carrying it into the forest, placed it most carefully clasped between its forefeet. When it was afterward sought by many, it is said to have uttered a voice of this sort: “Her, her, her,” which in interpretation means, “Here, here, here.”

Afterward, when this king’s martyrdom had been made manifest, the joyful people of the English hastened there, where very many miracles were accomplished.

Among other gifts, Basil, emperor of the Greeks, sent to Louis, king of the Germans, a crystal of marvelous size adorned with gold and gems, together with a considerable portion of the holy Cross.

Charles the Younger, son of Louis, king of the Germans, was gravely vexed by a demon in the presence of his father and his father’s chief men. During that very vexation he confessed that this had happened to him because he was attempting to make a conspiracy against his father.

Concerning the marvels that occurred in the time of this Louis: in the first year of his empire a tempest arose at Cologne, and when the people fled into the basilica of Saint Peter, suddenly a thunderbolt like a fiery dragon split and penetrated the basilica and cast three men down to death in different places, but with one stroke. By the same violence it left six others half alive.

In the parish of Mainz a malignant spirit gave evident proof of its wickedness. First by throwing stones and striking the walls of houses as if with hammers, then by speaking openly, also by revealing thefts and sowing discords among neighbors, it disquieted human beings.

At length it moved the minds of all against one man, as though the others suffered such things on account of his sins. It set fire to his crops, which had been heaped together in one place. Wherever he entered, that house was immediately burned, so that there was now no place for him to remain except in the fields.

For this reason, when the priests performed litanies and sprinkled blessed water, the enemy, by throwing stones and bloodying many, at length rested for some time. When the priests withdrew, the enemy howled mournfully. At last, naming a certain priest explicitly, it declared that when blessed water was being sprinkled it had hidden beneath his cope as though it were his familiar, accusing him of having lain with the daughter of the procurator.

It persisted thus for three years, until all the buildings there were consumed in a conflagration of fire.

Around that time, when Numeneus, king of the Britons, was pressing on to devastate the kingdom of the Franks, it seemed to him that Saint Maurilius, formerly bishop of the city of Angers, stood beside him. Struck on the head by him with a staff, Numeneus experienced the wrath of God in death.

In a year of the empire of the aforesaid Louis, as Vincent relates after Sigebert, it is narrated that blood rained from heaven at Brescia in Italy for three days and three nights.

Innumerable locusts devastated Gaul. They were larger than other locusts, had savage coverings of wings, six feet, and two teeth harder than stone. Flying in bands like the battle lines of camps, they sent leaders with a few others a day’s journey ahead to measure out places for the multitude that was to come. Arriving at the place sent ahead around the ninth hour, they waited there for sunrise.

For the space of one day’s journey they covered the air, obscuring the very ray of the sun. With a broad mouth and extended intestine, they gnawed away everything green among grasses and trees, extending a day’s journey over four or five miles.

Advancing with this miserable spectacle as far as the British sea, they were at length plunged into the depth of the sea by a blast of winds. But, cast back to shore by the tide of the ocean, they corrupted the air with their putrefaction and caused many to perish.

A severe famine also followed and consumed many by starvation, so that almost a third part of the people was consumed in Gaul. In the following year the winter was harsher and more prolonged than usual, so that snow and ice remained upon the ground from the Kalends of November until the vernal equinox.

His father, formerly emperor, appeared in a dream to Louis, king of the Germans, adjuring him by the name of the Holy Trinity to deliver him from the torments in which he was held, so that at length he might merit to have eternal rest.

For this reason the son earnestly succored his father by assigning alms to diverse monasteries. From this it was given to be understood that, although the same emperor had done many things pleasing to God and human beings, he nevertheless consented that more things contrary to God should be done in his kingdom.

Among these the more serious things appeared to be that he did not resist the heresy of the Nicolaitans, and that he did not strive to observe the admonitions of the archangel Gabriel, comprised in twelve chapters, which Marcus offered to him to be read and observed.

The Normans occupied the city of Angers with their people as though they would dwell in it. To conquer it, Charles, having summoned Salomon, king of the Britons, besieged it for many days. But when the Normans had been brought to despair, the king, against the will of his army, accepted money from them and allowed them to depart. By this compact he gave them opportunity to do worse things.

Section III

When Louis II died in the twenty-first year of his empire, his uncle Charles, king of the Franks, went to Rome. Having won Pope John and the Romans to himself by gifts, he was created emperor in the year of the Lord 877 and ruled as emperor for two years.

But war was immediately prepared against him by his brother Louis, because, without consulting him, Charles alone had usurped the empire of their cousin. A comet appeared brighter than usual.

A sudden and excessive inundation of waters occurred in June, so that in Saxony a certain village far removed from torrents and rivers was completely swallowed up in a moment, together with human beings, beasts, trees, buildings, a church, and its altar, so that no trace of habitation remained.

After the death of their King Salomon, the Britons clashed among themselves in an internal war because of a contention over ruling. Thus, unwillingly, they ceased from the destruction of Gaul.

In the first year of Charles's empire, Louis, king of the Germans and his brother, died, leaving three sons: namely Louis the Younger; Charles, who not long afterward ruled as emperor; and Charles the Great, father of Emperor Arnulf.

Charles, however, rejoicing over his brother's death and preparing to complete against his brother's sons the injustice which he had conceived against his brother, attacked their kingdom with fifty thousand men and more and came as far as Cologne, the other sons of Louis being occupied elsewhere.

Louis the Younger, sending an embassy to his uncle, asked for those things that belong to peace. When he could not obtain them, he manfully received him in battle and compelled him, defeated and with excessive loss to his army and much disgrace, to flee.

In the times of this Charles the Bald, the county of Flanders took its beginning. For Flanders was not then of so great a name and opulence as it is now seen to be, but was governed by the foresters of the king of the Franks. Of these, Lideric, Ingelram, and Audacer were governors of Flanders under Pepin, Karlomann, and Louis, nor were they then called counts.

Baldwin, son of Audacer, abducted Judith, daughter of Charles the Bald. On account of this he was excommunicated by the whole Church with the consent of the bishops, at the command of Charles.

Afterward, by the counsel of his bishops and chief men, Charles was reconciled to Baldwin and Judith. He gave them Flanders to be possessed perpetually as a county by them and their heirs.

At this time, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror after Helinand, John Scotus flourished, a man of penetrating genius and honeyed eloquence. Amid the clashes of wars resounding on all sides, he had previously crossed into Francia to Charles the Bald.

At Charles's request he translated the Hierarchy of Dionysius the Areopagite from Greek into Latin word for word. He also composed a book which he entitled On the Division of Nature, very useful for resolving questions, provided that he is pardoned in certain matters in which he departs from the path of the Latins while fixing his eyes keenly upon the Greeks.

In succeeding years this man, attracted by the munificence of Elfred, came to England. At the monastery of Malmesbury he was, as is reported, pierced with writing-styluses by the boys whom he taught and was regarded as a martyr.

This was his epitaph:

> Enclosed in the tomb is Saint John the sophist,
> Who, while already living, was enriched with wondrous doctrine.
> By martyrdom at last [he merited] to ascend to Christ's kingdom,
> In which all the saints reign through all ages.

These verses, however, are rough and lack the polish of modern times.

Vincent adds in the place cited above that this John Scotus the philosopher, as Lanfranc says, became foolish in the faith. Hence his book on the Eucharist, read in the synod of Vercelli celebrated under Pope Leo IX, was condemned in the same year in which Lanfranc also cleared himself of the error of Berengar. The same John made a commentary upon the Hierarchy of Dionysius.

Emperor Charles the Bald, as Vincent writes in the place cited above after Sigebert, after obtaining the empire was lifted up beyond himself. Despising the customs of the Franks, he affected Greek glories and unusual modes of dress. Clothed in a long dalmatic and girded over it with a belt hanging down to his feet, with his head wrapped in a silken veil and a diadem placed above it, he walked about.

Although he was more timid than a hare and more ready to flee enemies than to put them to flight, he provoked his brother Louis, threatening that he would lead so many forces that, after the river had been drained by the horses, he himself would enter the kingdom of Germany through the dried Alpheus [read: through the dry riverbed].

This Charles the Bald, as Helinand says in his histories, founded and completed the monastery of Saint Cornelius at Compiègne. He had planned to make this stronghold in the likeness of Constantinople and to name it Karlopolis after himself.

Because he had seized in the church of Saint Dionysius many things which others had given, he brought there the Lord's crown of thorns, one of the nails, a piece of the wood of the Cross, and certain other things. He left a shroud at Compiègne, which I understand not to be the shroud shown at Rome, but that which remained in the tomb after Christ had risen.

Before these relics were shown to the people, there was customarily so great a famine in Francia that they ate asses and horses. Afterward, by the mercy of God, it ceased.

Sigebert says that this Charles died at Mantua. Elsewhere it is read that, while going to Rome, he died on the journey and was buried at Lyon in the monastery of Antonay.

But after a long time Charles himself appeared in a vision by night to a certain monk of Saint Dionysius named Erchengar and, on the same night, to a certain cleric of Saint Quentin. He told each that he was Charles the Bald and had appeared to them at God's command so that he might tell them that it displeased God and Saint Dionysius that his body was not buried in the church of Saint Dionysius, to which he had conferred so many gifts for the love of God.

He therefore commanded them to go and tell Louis his son and the chief men of the kingdom to carry his body there. This was done, and he was buried in the church of Saint Dionysius before the altar of the Holy Trinity.

Concerning this Charles, Sigebert says that, having set out for Rome a second time, he gave to Boso, brother of his wife, his niece, the daughter of Emperor Louis, as wife. Having given him Provence, he crowned him king, so that he appeared even to command kings.

Hearing that his cousins Karlomann and Charles were leading an army against him, he was dissolved by fear and prepared his return. On his return he was given a harmful potion by a certain Jewish man named Zedechias and died at Mantua.

His son Louis, surnamed the Stammerer, reigned second after the division in Francia for two years.

Section IV

Charles III, the younger son of Louis, king of the Germans, obtained the empire, certain Roman nobles assenting to him, although Pope John strove to transfer the empire to Louis the Stammerer, son of the recently deceased Emperor Charles.

The aforesaid Charles III began to rule as emperor in the year of the Lord 879, but in the year 4,842 from the beginning of the world according to Jerome and the Hebrews, whom Vincent in the Historical Mirror and John of Colonna follow. According to another computation, however—namely the computation of the seventy, which Eusebius and Bede follow—it was the year 6,002.

Because Pope John did not so favor the aforesaid Emperor Charles, the Romans inflicted injuries upon him, even detaining him in custody. But, finding an opportunity, he departed from Rome and went to Louis the Stammerer in Francia, remaining there for a year.

More than five thousand Normans were slain by the Franks in Gaul.

At that time Milo flourished, a monk who composed the life of Saint Amand in meter and wrote a book on sobriety to Charles the Bald. Under this Milo his nephew Hucbald grew up. Distinguished by knowledge of the seven liberal arts, he flourished beyond the others especially in music and composed chants concerning many saints with sweet and regular modulation.

At that time, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror after Helinand, Hasting, driven from England by King Elfred, crossed the sea with his men. After emptying Paris, Tours, and other cities of their citizens, he ranged as far as the Tyrrhenian Sea.

After devastating the upper parts of Gaul, this Hasting besieged Tours. When its wall was repeatedly struck by a ram, the people ran to the body of Saint Martin and carried it to the weaker place, making the dead man a defender for the living, as Vincent says after Saint Odo.

Immediately the Danes fled. The men of Tours pursued them as far as the sixth milestone, where the church of Saint Martin was built in the place at which the holy body had stopped.

Three lustrums after Hasting's flight, Rollo came from the same regions. After defeating the Britons and Flemings and setting fire to their cities and towns, he came to Le Mans and besieged it. He sent the leaders of his army toward Tours, but then by divine providence the rivers Cher and Loire had so overflowed that they could not approach Tours.

Marmoutier, not far from Tours, was utterly destroyed. One hundred and sixteen monks there were struck down by the sword. The abbot and twenty-four others, hiding in caves, escaped. They had been reserved for this purpose: that they might follow the body of their patron.

Nevertheless Abbot Herbern, dragged from hiding, could be compelled by no torments either to betray the treasures of the Church or the monks in hiding. None of these remained whom Martin did not afterward set over the governance of a church.

When the Danes withdrew, the abbot and those twenty-four were received reverently by the canons of Saint Martin, brought to the city, and fed there.

After six months had passed, Rollo captured Le Mans, and then the body of Saint Martin was sent to Orléans. Its guardians were Abbot Herbern with twenty-four monks, twelve canons, and twelve burgesses of Châteauneuf, who provided them with all necessary things.

Thereafter, because of the wars in that region, they carried the saint's body to diverse places, and finally to Auxerre, where innumerable miracles were accomplished through him in the church of Saint Germanus.

Among the others, William relates this notable one. When people coming to that holy body conferred very many things for the sake of remedies, a dispute arose between the canons and the people of Auxerre concerning the division of the money.

To resolve this dispute, a leper was placed between the bodies of the two saints, namely Martin and Germanus, and was guarded there by human watch for the whole night. As dawn grew light, that part of the leper which had been nearest Martin appeared entirely healed, while the other still remained leprous.

The body was turned, and they turned the diseased side toward Martin. On the next morning the man was found entirely healed, Germanus yielding to the honor of his guest.

Section V

Concerning the studies and deeds of Elfred, king of England, Vincent in the Historical Mirror writes after William as follows.

At the same time the Danes harassed Gaul for thirteen years, until at length, defeated by Emperor Arnulf and the Britons in many battles, they fled back into England. In that interval King Elfred had subjected to himself the whole island except that which the Danes possessed.

He gave London, the capital of the kingdom of the Mercians, to a certain leading man together with his daughter Agelfreda. From her that same leading man, named Egelred, begot the children Echelmund and Edward, who reigned after him.

This Elfred, though already twelve years old, was devoid of all learning. But then, invited to a kindly game by his mother so that he would receive as a gift something which she held in her hands if he learned quickly, he entered upon letters in play and drank them in with thirsty eagerness.

He translated these books into the English language: Orosius, Saint Gregory's Pastoral Rule, Bede's Deeds of the English, and Boethius On Consolation.

He divided the time of the day in this manner: he spent eight hours in reading, writing, and praying, eight in the care of the body, and eight in dispatching the affairs of the kingdom. For this purpose there was in his chapel a candle of twenty-four parts, and by the manner in which the candle burned the king was admonished concerning each office.

He bequeathed half the portion of all his revenues—only those justly acquired—to monasteries. He divided all his revenues, moreover, into two parts. He divided the first again into three: one he gave to his court ministers, the second to workmen whom he kept continually in the construction of new buildings by a marvelous manner unknown to the English, and the third to strangers.

The second part of the revenues was so divided that the first portion was given to the poor of his region, the second to monasteries, the third to scholars, and the fourth to churches across the sea.

He always carried in his bosom a little book in which the daily course of the Psalms was contained, so that whenever he had leisure he might take it up and run through it.

He gave his daughter Echelsunda as wife to Baldwin, count of Flanders. From her Baldwin had Arnulf, from whom the counts of Flanders descend, and Adulf, who received from his father the county of Boulogne—not the city that is in Lombardy.

This Elfred, as Vincent says after William, was a most learned man who was always of adverse health. He was always troubled either by a fistula or by some internal disease. They say that he had demanded this from the Lord by prayers so that he might embrace worldly allurements less.

He instituted hundreds and tithings, and infused so great a peace into his country that he commanded golden bracelets to be hung even upon the public embankments where paths spread into a crossroads. These mocked the greed of travelers, since there were none who would seize them.

He sent many gifts to Rome and to Saint Thomas in India. A certain bishop named Sigelin of Sherborne was sent as legate for this purpose. Penetrating into India, he brought back from there many gems and spices, and a portion of the Lord's wood, which had been sent to the king by Pope Martin.

He constructed one monastery at Adelingia, where he had once lain hidden as a captive; another at Winchester, where he established Gerbald as abbot so that by his industry he might revive the study of letters, now almost buried in England; and a third monastery, which he filled with nuns and in which he established his daughter Elsegina as abbess.

After him reigned Edward, whose sister or mother Echelfreda, having experienced the difficulty of her first childbirth, abstained perpetually from her husband, declaring that it did not befit a king's daughter to commit herself to so great a danger.

This Edward reigned for twenty-three years and gave his daughter Edith to Charles, king of the Franks, son of Louis the Stammerer. He caused his own daughters first to be instructed in letters and immediately afterward to be exercised with the distaff, spindle, and needle. He likewise caused his sons first to be imbued with letters and afterward to learn the governance of the kingdom.

Elfred was buried at Winchester in his monastery. To provide sufficient ground for its workshops, he purchased space from the bishop and canons and paid for each foot with a mark weighed according to the public standard.

The Rollo discussed above was indeed noble, but descended from an ancient and obsolete lineage of the Noricans. Driven from his country by command of the king, he brought with him many whom either another's debt or consciousness of crimes harassed, having enticed them with great hopes.

Having undertaken piracy, he drew near to Chartres. Its citizens, trusting neither in arms nor in walls, adored the garment of blessed Mary—that is, her tunic—which Charles the Bald had caused to be brought from Constantinople with other relics.

They exposed this garment like a standard upon the battlements, stretched by the winds upon the breasts of the guards. The enemies, seeing it, began to laugh and to direct arrows against it. Their eyes were immediately darkened, so that they were able neither to retreat nor to advance. Seeing this, the townspeople satisfied themselves with a great slaughter of them.

Rollo nevertheless escaped, whom God reserved for His faith. Not long afterward he obtained Rouen and the neighboring cities.

Section VI

In the second year of the aforesaid Emperor Charles III, as Sigebert writes, the sun was so darkened at the ninth hour of the day that stars appeared in the heavens.

Louis the Stammerer, king of the Franks, died, leaving his wife pregnant by him. The Franks held diverse opinions concerning his kingdom: some judged that it was owed to the sons of Louis the Stammerer by a concubine; others assented to Boso, a petty king of Provence, unjustly invading it; and others wished to associate it with the kingdom of Germany.

Meanwhile a son was born from the lawful wife of Louis the Stammerer and was named Charles after his grandfather. Nevertheless the sons of Louis the Stammerer by a concubine, called Louis and Karlomann, divided the kingdom of Francia between themselves in the meantime, reigned for five years, and continually pursued Boso.

Therefore, as Vincent says in the place cited above from the chronicle, Charles, after his brother Karlomann had died and not long afterward his other brother Louis had been seized by an untimely death, triumphed over his enemies and obtained the kingdom of Germany.

After two years he obtained at Rome that he should be blessed emperor by Pope John, and he ruled as emperor for ten years.

In the Carbonarian Forest of Francia, as Vincent relates after Sigebert, more than nine thousand Normans were slain by the Franks.

In the fourth year the Normans, having joined the Danes to themselves and ranging through Francia and Lotharingia, devastated with iron and fire Amiens, Arras, Corbie, Cambrai, Thérouanne, the territories of the Noricans, Menapians, and Bracarians, all the land around the river Scheldt, and the monasteries of Saints Valery and Riquier.

In the same year Godfrey and Sigefrid, kings of the Normans, settled with an incalculable multitude near the Meuse at a place called Haslon. They burned Liège, Maastricht, Tongeren, Cologne Agrippina, and Bonn with the adjoining strongholds. Stabling horses in the palace at Aachen, they burned the town and palace. Moreover, they burned the monasteries of Stavelot, Malmedy, Inda, and Prüm.

Ministers of holy order and those of each sex serving God hid wherever they could do so more conveniently, and concealed the bodies and relics of the saints in safer places. Malahug, son of Lothair by the concubine Waldrada, was still acting as a tyrant in Lotharingia, and the aforesaid Boso in Burgundy.

In the sixth year, Emperor Charles, having summoned both Gauls and Germans to the aid of the kingdom, besieged the Normans. King Godfrey made a compact with him that the province of Frisia and Gilla, daughter of King Lothair, should be given to him as wife; he was baptized and received from the sacred font by the emperor. Charles also gave money to King Sigefrid and caused them to depart from his kingdom.

They soon sought Francia again and, after many incursions, exacted from Karlomann, king of the Franks, twelve thousand ounces of silver as tribute. Thus, promising peace for twelve years, they sought the sea again.

At this time a certain Rodulph transferred the body of Saint Callixtus, pope and martyr, from the city of Rome into Francia.

In the seventh year, when Karlomann, king of the Franks, died—his brother Louis having died in the preceding year—the Normans sought Francia again, saying that they had struck a compact of peace only with the king of the Franks, not with the Franks.

Hence the Franks, compelled and inviting Emperor Charles to their aid, subjected Francia to him. He sent an army once and twice against the Normans encamped near Leuven, but accomplished nothing. Charles therefore also reigned in Francia for five years, and in his eighth year Pope Marinus presided over the Roman Church.

Hugh, son of King Lothair by the concubine Waldrada, hoping to obtain his father's kingdom of Lotharingia by rebellion, promised half of the kingdom sought to Godfrey, king of the Normans, to whom his sister Gilla had married. He persuaded Godfrey to seek from the emperor that the imperial fisc should be added to him at his own pleasure.

By this he thought to circumvent the emperor from either side. For if the emperor granted it, Norman enemies of the kingdom would be admitted into the bowels of the kingdom; if he refused, they would appear to have a just cause for rebelling.

By command of the emperor, Duke Henry and Godfrey came by agreement to Batavia to discuss this. During the proceedings Godfrey was killed with his men. Not long afterward Hugh also was blinded by Henry and finally was tonsured as a monk at Prüm.

At Constantinople, after Emperor Basil died, his son Leo ruled as emperor for almost eighteen years.

In the ninth year the Normans, leaving Leuven, besieged Paris. Duke Henry, leading an army against them, rode incautiously into a pit which the Normans had made and covered with refuse; falling into it, he was slaughtered.

In the tenth year of this Charles, when Charles himself was unable to expel the Normans, he at length entered into a compact and conceded to them the regions beyond the Seine whose inhabitants were rebelling against him. This part of Francia was named Normandy from the Normans.

Section VII

This Charles IV, king of the Germans, Franks, and Romans and emperor, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror from the sayings of William, on a certain Sunday night, when he had given himself to sleep, was caught up in spirit. Led by a certain most radiant being in the appearance of a man, namely an angel, he was conducted to the penal places of the other world.

First he was brought to the deepest fiery valleys, which were full of pits burning with pitch, sulfur, lead, wax, and fat. There he found the pontiffs of his father and of his uncles.

When he asked them fearfully why they suffered such grievous torments, they answered:

"We were bishops of your father and your uncles. When we ought to have admonished them and their people concerning peace and concord, we sowed discords and were kindlers of evils. Therefore we and other lovers of homicides and plunder are now burned in these infernal punishments.

“Your bishops and attendants who similarly love to do such things will also come here.”

When the blackest demons wished to draw Charles to themselves with iron hooks and immerse him in those pits, the angel defended him and delivered him from their hands.

Then, ascending with the angel over fiery mountains, he saw from them boiling rivers arise, with every kind of metal bubbling. There he found innumerable souls of human beings and of the princes of his father and brothers cast headlong, some as far as their hair, some as far as their chins, and some as far as their navels.

They cried to him with wailing:

“While we lived with you, we loved to commit plunder, homicides, and battles with your father, your brothers, and your uncles, on account of earthly greed. Therefore we are tormented here.”

He heard behind him voices saying: “The powerful shall powerfully endure torments.”

After this he descended into a valley that was on one side dark and burning like an oven of fire, and on the other most pleasant and most splendid. Turning toward the dark part, he saw there certain kings of his own lineage in great punishments. Being exceedingly distressed, he thought that he would immediately be plunged into those punishments by the blackest giants who were setting that valley aflame with diverse kinds of fires.

On the other side of the valley he saw fountains flowing, one exceedingly hot, the other temperate and clear. There were two casks there, and upon one he saw his father Louis standing in water as far as his thighs.

When Louis was burdened by excessive pain, he said to him:

“Charles, do not fear. God has permitted you to come here so that you may see for what sins I and all whom you have seen endure such torments. For on one day I am in this bath of the boiling cask, and on the next day I am transferred into that other most pleasant cask of water.

“This is done by the prayers of Saint Peter and Saint Remigius, by whose patronage our royal lineage has reigned until now. But if you assist me promptly—you, my bishops and abbots, and the entire ecclesiastical order, by Masses, offerings, prayers, vigils, and alms—I shall quickly be delivered from this cask of boiling water. For my brother Lothair and his son Louis have now been rescued from these punishments through the prayers of Saint Peter and Saint Remigius and led into the joys of paradise.”

He also said to me, “Charles, look toward the left side.” When Charles had done so, he saw two very high boiling casks. Louis said, “These are prepared for you unless you amend yourself and perform penance for your abominable offenses.” Charles began to be gravely horrified by this.

Then the angel led him toward the right side of the most radiant valley of paradise. There he saw his uncle Lothair and Lothair’s son Louis sitting with immense brightness and with glorious kings, crowned with a precious diadem.

Lothair said to him, “Charles, my successor, now the third under this name in the empire of the Romans, know that our genealogy will now cease to reign and rule as emperor. The power of the empire will soon be taken from your hand, and afterward you will live for a very short time.”

Louis said to him, “The empire which you have held until now ought by hereditary right to be received by Louis, the son of my daughter.” Thus he seemed to restore to him the entire monarchy of his empire.

After this vision Charles survived scarcely two years, as Sigebert says. Charles, being jealous of his wife because she behaved more familiarly than was just with Liutward, bishop of Vercelli, declared in an assembly that he had never had intercourse with her. She, however, glorying that she was a virgin, received a repudiation and sought a monastery.

Section VIII

In the twelfth year of his empire, this Charles, failing in body and mind, was repudiated by the chief men of the kingdom. Arnulf, son of King Karlomann and his cousin, was raised to the kingdom, according to Vincent and Sigebert, in the year of the Lord 891, the year 4,854 from the beginning of the world, but according to the other, greater computation, the year 6,014. He reigned for twelve years.

This Arnulf assigned estates in Germany to his uncle Charles, a former emperor who now lacked even necessities. Charles died in the following year, and the Roman Empire and kingdom of the Franks were miserably torn apart. In Italy, Berengar and Wido contended for the kingdom. The Franks, however, neglecting Charles, the son of Louis the Stammerer and a boy scarcely ten years old, set over themselves as king Odo, son of King Robert, whom we said above was killed by the Normans. Rodulph, a crown having been placed upon him, was established king of the Burgundians; that kingdom endured for a long time.

In the first year of Arnulf's empire, the Normans, unable to conquer Paris, attacked Burgundy, as Vincent says in the place cited above after Sigebert. They assaulted the city of Sens but did not conquer it. From Sens they sought Paris again. Driven from there, they burned the city of Troyes by way of the river Marne and devastated everything as far as the cities of Verdun and Toul.

For one year Stephen presided over the Roman Church. The Normans, seeking Lotharingia again, fought near Liège and defeated the Christians. Sunderold, archbishop of Mainz, was martyred by the Normans at Worms.

Hearing of the slaughter of his men, Arnulf hastened from Bavaria with a strong army to fight the Normans. Attacking them in an infantry battle above the river called the Dyle, he made so great a slaughter of them that from the innumerable multitude scarcely one survived who, having returned to the fleet, might bear the report. The remaining Normans crossed the Meuse and, ranging about while devastating Brabant and the Ardennes, withdrew across the sea.

At that time Remigius of Auxerre flourished, who was diligent in expounding divine and human writings. At that time Berno also flourished in Burgundy, formerly a count and now abbot of the monastery of Gigny which he had founded. From the gift of his grandmother, a countess, he also constructed the monastery of Cluny.

At length the anger of God toward Francia was turned into mercy. The Normans and Danes, who for forty years and more had reduced the kingdom of the Franks almost to nothing, were so defeated by Richard, duke of Burgundy, and Robert, count of Paris and brother of the former King Odo, that they themselves implored the mercy of God so that they might be made Christians.

At that time there were two kinsmen as leaders of the Normans, namely Rollo and Gello. Therefore, after taking counsel with his chief men, King Charles gave his daughter Gilla and all Neustria to Rollo upon receiving his pledge that he would receive baptism. Robert, count of Paris, received Rollo from the font. From Rollo he was called Robert according to Robert's name. He was the first duke of the Normans and begot William.

William begot Richard II, and this Richard begot Richard III and his brother Robert, who acquired Apulia, Sicily, and Calabria and defeated the Venetians and Alexius, emperor of the Greeks. This is Robert Guiscard, father of the renowned William the Bastard, who killed Harold, king of the English, in battle. These are the dukes of the Normans and kings of the English who proceeded from Rollo's lineage.

To Gello his kinsman, King Charles handed over the hill of Blois, upon which he built a stronghold and dwelt there. Having received a noble wife, he begot Theobald the Old. Theobald begot Odo the Campanian from the daughter of Emperor Conrad; Odo was called Campanian because he was born in Champagne. Odo begot Odo; Odo begot Theobald and Stephen; Stephen begot Count Theobald. This is the genealogy of the counts of Blois descending from the progeny of Gello the Norman.

When Charles, king of Francia and son-in-law of Edward, king of England, had summoned Rollo and made him a Christian, he gave him Normandy with his daughter Gilla so that he might be a vessel of peace, in such a manner that Rollo should hold Normandy from the king of the Franks as from his lord.

Then, when the counselors standing by told him to kiss the king's foot, Rollo, disdaining to bend at the king's knees, took hold of his foot and, while standing, drew it to his mouth. When the king fell backward, the laughter of the Normans followed, while the Franks rebuked them. Rollo excused the deed by alleging that such was the custom of his province.

The same Charles also gave Rollo the Norman county and Brittany, which are appendages of Normandy.

Arnulf, who had succeeded Charles III in the empire as has been said, was invited by Pope Formosus, concerning whom many things were said in the preceding chapter. He came to Rome, besieged and captured it, and caused all the Romans who had injured the pope to be beheaded. He was blessed as emperor by the pope himself.

In the following year King Wido, unable to endure Emperor Arnulf pursuing him everywhere—for neither cities nor strongholds fortified by nature were able to resist him—protected himself by flight. The emperor besieged Wido's wife. Now distrusting her circumstances, through one of the emperor's familiars whom she corrupted with much money she gave him a deadly cup.

After drinking it he could not be roused for three days; although his eyes were open, he was able neither to speak nor to perceive anything. This forced him to retrace his steps. Wido pursued him as he withdrew and died from him. Or, as some report, this Arnulf, dissolved by a long illness or afflicted by the tiniest worms called lice, which swarmed in such numbers upon his body that they could be diminished by no physician, at length died.

Section IX

Arnulf was succeeded by his son Louis in the year of the Lord 903, but in the year 4,866 from the beginning of the world, or, according to the greater computation, the year 6,026. He reigned for ten years.

Concerning this Louis I find nothing except that, because of the insolence of the tyrants in Italy and the onset of many evils, he did not merit the imperial blessing. In the tenth year of his reign he died as king of Germany.

When a certain Adelbert, one of the foremost Austrasians, had been in rebellion against Louis for seven years, he was brought to the king through the deceit of Hatto, archbishop of Mainz, and was beheaded.

Louis was succeeded by Conrad in the year of the Lord 913. He reigned for seven years and likewise lacked the imperial blessing. In his time Saint Odo flourished, having been made abbot of Cluny, concerning whom it was said above.

In the second year of this Conrad, when the more powerful princes of the kingdom had contemplated rebellion against him, they were brought back to his favor both by the wisdom and by the strength of the king. Arnald of Bavaria alone fled to the Hungarians with his wife and sons and remained there until the king's death.

In the fourth year of the same emperor, the Saracens, going forth into Gaul, occupied Calabria and Apulia, Benevento and the kingdom of the Romans, and most grievously oppressed Italy, but were afterward expelled.

King Conrad incited Hatto, archbishop of Mainz, through whose deceit Adelbert had perished, against Henry, duke of the Saxons, because Conrad suspected his power. For this purpose the archbishop had fashioned a golden chain, which he would deceitfully place around the neck of the duke as they dined together. When the deceit was betrayed, he was frustrated. Three days later he died by disease and infirmity, or, as others say, by a stroke of lightning. The duke also expelled the accomplices in the counsel from their country.

When the king sent an army against Henry, the Saxons raged among them with so great a slaughter that it was declaimed by minstrels where so great a hell could be that it might contain so great a multitude of the slain.

In the following year, when King Conrad was dying before the princes of the kingdom, he designated Henry, son of Otto, duke of the Saxons, as king.

John of Colonna says that in this Louis, father of Conrad, was the end of the empire in Francia as regards the posterity of Charlemagne, and the Italians began to reign again. For the kings of the Franks who in the time of Charlemagne and of his father Pepin had assisted the Roman Church in many difficult cases and rescued it from the persecutions of tyrants merited, by the judgment and authority of the Church, that the Roman Empire, which was among the Greeks, should be transferred to their posterity.

But after, through the inactivity of this Louis, king of the Franks, the Frankish kings did not assist the Roman Church, the empire began to be divided. Some ruled as emperors in Germany and others in Italy down to the time of Otto I, who ruled as emperor in Germany and Italy, being of the German nation.

For during the reign of this Louis, a certain Berengar, powerful among the Italians, invaded the Italian kingdom. He reigned for four years, a prudent man and vigorous in arms.

Although this Louis, entering Italy with a large army, put Berengar to flight, nevertheless, after Verona was captured by him, Louis was betrayed by his own men, captured, and blinded; and Berengar was restored to the kingdom of Italy.

Nor did Conrad, succeeding Louis, free Italy from the tyrants, nor Henry I, succeeding Conrad in the empire. Hence neither of them received the imperial blessing or crown from the pope. But Otto I, Henry's son and a Saxon, freed Italy from the tyrants Berengar and his sons and received the imperial crown from the pope, as appears below in the following chapter.

Section X

Henry I began to reign in the year of the Lord 920, but in the year 4,883 from the beginning of the world, or, according to another computation, the year 6,042. He ruled for eighteen years.

In Henry's third year, when the Hungarians were devastating Francia, Alsace, Germany, and Saxony, King Henry engaged them near the city of Merseburg, vowing to God that, for obtaining victory, he would eradicate the simoniacal heresy from his kingdom. With an inestimable slaughter he almost destroyed them to extermination.

Whenever King Henry saw that any thieves, robbers, or hired killers were strong in hand and fit for war, he gave them pardon, fields, and arms. Making a legion from them, he exposed them to fight the barbarians, commanding absolutely that only the citizens should be spared.

Charles, king of the Franks, with the aid of the Lotharingians fought near the city of Soissons against Robert, brother of King Odo, who was invading the kingdom of the Franks against him, and killed Robert with many others. Charles submitted himself and Francia to King Henry. As a pledge of perpetual compact and love, he sent him the hand of the precious martyr Dionysius of Paris enclosed in gold and gems.

The Africans who were tearing apart all Italy were so ground down in a battle joined with them by the soldiery of Pope John and with the aid of the Roman emperor of the Greeks that not even one survived who was not either captured or slaughtered. Many testified that Peter and Paul were seen in that battle coming to the aid of the Christians.

In the following year King Henry established peace with the Hungarians for nine years.

Charles, king of the Franks, was captured by Count Herbert and thrust into custody at Péronne because of the killing of Duke Robert, who had been slain by him. This Herbert, as is held from the chronicle, had already taken the sister of the said Robert as wife. Therefore by deceitful words he deceived Charles so that he turned aside to Herbert's lodging at Péronne. Thus he kept him, deceitfully captured, in prison, where at length he died as an exile and martyr.

His wife fled with her little son Louis to her father, the king of England. After Charles, however, Rodulph, son of Richard, duke of Burgundy, was elected king by the Franks and reigned in Francia for thirteen years.

Rodulph, king of the Burgundians, as Sigebert says, was invited by the Italians to reign against Berengar, who called himself king of Italy. A battle having been joined with Berengar, Rodulph defeated and expelled him and held the kingdom of Italy for three years.

Pope John, captured by Wido's soldiers and sent into custody, was most wickedly strangled, a cushion having been placed over his face.

Ziptneus, duke of Bohemia, having been converted to the faith of Christ, ruled justly and religiously in Bohemia. After him his son Watislaus was illustrious for justice and sanctity. His brother Bolizlaus opposed him exceedingly.

In Henry's seventh year, as Vincent relates in book twenty-five of the Historical Mirror after Sigebert, Simeon the Bulgar, who had become a monk from being a philosopher and a soldier from being a monk, ruled the Bulgarians and grievously wore down the Greeks. But Romanus, emperor of the Greeks, mitigated his madness by making a compact.

In his tenth year, a lance of marvelous workmanship, sanctified by a nail of the crucified Jesus Christ and said to have belonged to the first and great Emperor Constantine, was given by Count Samson to Rodulph, king of the Burgundians and of Italy. By prayers, threats, and gifts, with a portion of the province of the Suevi also added, King Henry extorted the lance of Christ from Count Rodulph. He left it to his posterity as an insignia and safeguard of the empire.

In the fifteenth year of Henry's reign, Otto, son of the aforesaid king, took as wife the daughter of Edward, king of the English.

In the sixteenth year of the same king, a fountain of blood flowed most abundantly in the city of Genoa, perhaps portending the ruin of the city itself. In the same year it was captured by Africans arriving there with a fleet, all the citizens except little children and women being captured and killed, and it was emptied even of its treasures.

In his seventeenth year Niger, king of the Russians, knowing that the armies of the Greeks had been led against the Saracens and dispersed for the guarding of the islands, came to conquer Constantinople with a thousand ships and more. He was now so secure of victory that he commanded that the Greeks should not be killed but captured.

Romanus, so named, emperor of the Greeks, manfully met them with a few men and, casting Greek fire all around, burned almost all of them with their ships, a few escaping. He commanded all the captives to be beheaded.

In the eighteenth year prodigies appeared. Not only was the sun darkened in a clear sky, but through the windows of houses it emitted rays as though bloody. The left hand of a certain man, amputated with iron, after almost a year was restored whole to him while he slept. As a sign of the marvel, a line as though of blood was marked at the place of conjunction.

At length King Henry died. Although he had been glorious in overcoming enemies, because he was nevertheless peaceful he gave no effort to receiving the imperial blessing after the tyrants who, as though hired wage earners succeeding one another, were tearing the empire apart had been driven from Italy. The mountain where King Henry was buried afterward vomited flames in many places.

Section XI

Concerning Echelstan, king of England, who began to reign around the beginning of Henry's empire. Therefore, after Edward, who had reigned in England for twenty-three years, his son Echelstan reigned for sixteen years, as Vincent notes in the place cited above after William. They report that he was born from a concubine.

Scarcely an ancient monastery existed in all England which he did not adorn with buildings, ornaments, books, or estates. He made recent monasteries into ancient ones, as if by design.

He gave one of his sisters as wife to Sitric, king of the Northumbrians. When Sitric died after a year, Echelstan subjected that province to himself and expelled Widual, king of the Welsh, and Constantine, king of the Scots, from their kingdoms. Nevertheless, afterward, moved by pity, he permitted them to reign beneath him in their former state.

Afterward he had a war with Adalan, son of Sitric. Fearing the king who was coming against him with an army, Adalan pretended to be a minstrel. Taking a harp in his hand, he came to King Echelstan's tent. Singing at the entrance, he was easily admitted. While singing between the psalms, he scrutinized all things with his eyes.

After the banquet he was ordered to leave and received the price of his song. Disdaining to carry it away, he buried it in the ground beneath him. This was noticed by a certain man who had formerly served him and was immediately told to Echelstan.

When the king accused the man because he had not betrayed the enemy placed before his eyes, he received this answer: "The same oath which I recently made to you, O king, I formerly made to Adalan. But move your tent from here until the forces left behind arrive tomorrow, so that with restrained delay you may break the enemy who insolently exults."

Adalan therefore came by night and killed a certain bishop, who had come to the army in the evening, with his entire household. Advancing farther, he found the king unprepared, for he had thought that the enemies would dare nothing of this sort.

Shaken from his bed, when the king urged his men to battle, his sword happened to fall from its sheath. Calling upon God and Saint Adelin, who was his kinsman from an ancient lineage, he put his hand back toward the sheath and found a sword which to this day is preserved in the royal treasury as a miracle. It is cutting on one part and never receptive of gold or silver.

Trusting in this gift of God, throughout the whole day until evening he tirelessly put Adalan and his army to flight. Constantine, king of the Scots, fell there, a man of treacherous boldness and vigorous old age, as did five other kings, twelve counts, and almost the whole multitude of barbarians. The few who remained were preserved to receive the faith of Christ.

The petty kings of the North Welsh—that is, of the northern Britons—paid him each year, under the name of tribute, twenty pounds of gold, three hundred of silver, twenty-five oxen, and as many hunting dogs and hunting birds as he wished. He took the city of Exeter from the Cornish and fortified it with towers and a wall of squared stones.

A certain Arold, king of the Norwegians, sent him a golden ship having a beak and a purple sail, surrounded within by a dense covering of gilded shields.

When Echelstan's father died, rivals wished to blind him in the city of Winchester. Their leader was a certain Elfred, who, having been apprehended, was sent to Rome so that there he might defend himself by oath before Pope John. When he had sworn before the altar of Saint Peter, he fell. Carried by the hands of servants to the school of the English, he died on the third day.

Rabod, provost of Samson the archbishop, sent to this Echelstan the bones of Saint Senator, Saint Paternus, and Saint Scubilion, who had been the master of the same Saint Paternus and migrated to the Lord on one and the same day and hour with Saint Paternus. These saints had been transferred from Lesser Britain and Normandy to safer places. Many other relics were also transferred when the Normans were then harassing Gaul.

This Echelstan is said to have been born from a concubine in this manner. In a certain village there was a most beautiful daughter of a shepherd. In a nocturnal vision she saw the moon shining from her womb and illuminating all England with its light.

When she related this to her companions, and they related the same thing to the female steward who nurtured the king's sons, the steward took her and held her in place of a daughter. Edward, son of King Elfred, afterward loved her in the steward's house and begot Echelstan from her.

Henry, son of Conrad, king of the Germans and emperor of the Romans, sent to this Echelstan seeking Echelstan's sister as wife for his son Otto. Louis, prince of the Aquitanians and a survivor from the lineage of Charlemagne, had another of his sisters as wife.

Chapter III

Concerning Otto I, emperor.

When Henry died, he was succeeded in the empire, as Vincent relates in the place cited above, by his son Otto, born of Matilda, daughter of Theoderic, king of the Saxons. Otto began to rule as emperor in the year of the Lord 938, but in the year 4,901 from the beginning of the world, or, according to the other computation, the year 6,060. He ruled as emperor for thirty-six years.

In this Otto I the empire was transferred from the Franks to the Germans, and it has remained among them until the present, namely the year of the Lord 1456.

In his first year, Wenceslaus, prince of Bohemia, a holy man, was killed by his brother Boleslaus, who had been seduced by ambition to seize the principality. In vengeance for him King Otto declared war upon Boleslaus, and a long contest between them was carried on for fourteen years.

In the same year, as is held from the chronicles, the king of the Franks died at Auxerre, and his body was buried in the church of Saint Columba at Sens. After his death the Franks, having gathered in one council, sent William, archbishop of Sens, into England to a certain Edina, queen of the Franks, so that she might send back her son Louis to his paternal kingdom. After hostages and oaths had been furnished, the aforesaid prelate received Louis and brought him into Francia. He was anointed and crowned king at the city of Laon and reigned for nineteen years.

In the following year, as Sigebert says, the heresy of the Anthropomorphites—that is, of those saying that God has a bodily form—was troubling Italy. Ratherius, bishop of Verona, protested against it both in words and in writings.

In the third year of his empire King Otto overcame Boleslaus in war. But Boleslaus, surrounding the leaders of the king's army when they were secure because of the victory, slaughtered them with many others. The king, however, devastated Bohemia.

In the same year, as Vincent relates after William, Edmund, the eighteen-year-old brother of Echelstan, reigned. He reigned for six and a half years. He endowed the church of Glastonbury with great estates and honors and confirmed his donation by a privilege written in golden letters in a Gospel book elegantly fashioned, which he gave to that church.

This Edmund had threatened a certain robber named Leof. After six years the robber returned on the day of Saint Augustine, archbishop of Canterbury, and unexpectedly sat down among the king's fellow diners at Pucklechurch, for the English were then accustomed to feast festively in memory of the preaching of the aforesaid Saint Augustine. This robber happened then to be reclining next to a duke whom the king himself had deigned to serve with portions from the supper.

When he had been recognized by the king alone while the others were foaming with wine, the king, kindled with anger, seized the aforesaid man by the hair and dashed him to the ground. The man secretly drew a dagger from its sheath and drove it into the king's breast, and the king immediately expired. The robber, however, was torn limb from limb by the attendants running up, after first wounding some of them.

Blessed Dunstan, then abbot of Glastonbury, had foreseen this end of the king, having been instructed by the gestures and buffoonish clapping of a demon dancing before him. Mounting a horse at once and hurrying to the court, he received in the middle of the journey the report of the deed that had occurred. Edmund was buried in the church of Glastonbury.

In these days the chief men of the Franks rebelled against King Louis, and above all Hugh the Great, count of Paris, who was the son of the tyrant Robert, killed by King Charles in the battle of Soissons. King Louis, therefore, surrounded by his own dukes, was captured by the Normans and, by Hugh's counsel, was sent to Péronne and handed over to public custody. Karlomann, however, his elder son, having been brought by the Normans, died at Rouen.

Hearing this, Emperor Otto attacked Francia with twenty-seven legions to liberate Louis, and through fear of him Louis was released from custody.

Moreover, Eberhard, count palatine, and Gilbert, duke of Lotharingia, who had Gerberga, the emperor's sister, as his wife, rebelled against Emperor Otto. These two, therefore, captured Henry, the emperor's brother, after besieging him, and by their deceit separated him from fidelity to the emperor and attached him to their faction, suggesting that the kingdom was more fitting for the one born while his father was reigning than for Otto, who had been born before the reign.

In Otto's fifth year Gilbert and Eberhard, with the aforesaid Henry, were preparing war against the emperor near the Rhine when they encountered the emperor's soldiers. The many engaged the few, while the emperor lay prostrate in prayer on the other bank of the Rhine before the nails of the Lord affixed to his lance. They were defeated and turned their backs, Henry having been incurably wounded in the arm.

In the same year a dissension arose among the princes because of the diversity of laws: whether, while grandfathers survived, the sons of sons ought to inherit after their fathers had died, or whether, the cousins having been disinherited, the inheritance ought to return to the paternal uncles. By the judgment of King Otto and all the princes, knowledge of the truth was committed to a trial by combat. Victory was granted to those who said that brothers' sons ought to inherit together with their paternal uncles.

In the following year King Otto besieged the town of Breisach in Alsace, which King Louis held through the soldiers of Eberhard and Gilbert. During this siege, at the persuasion of Frederick, archbishop of Mainz, who had already in spirit defected from the emperor, many defected from the emperor. While others were terrified by this circumstance, the king alone remained unterrified.

Meanwhile the king's faithful men, namely Odo and Conrad, brother of Herman, duke of the Swabians, unexpectedly attacked Eberhard and Gilbert near the Rhine while they were securely intent upon plundering the kingdom, and fought them most fiercely. Eberhard was killed by swords, while Gilbert was submerged in the waters of the Rhine; scarcely anyone among the others was not either slaughtered or captured. At this report the king's unfaithful men were broken in heart, Louis departed from Alsace, and the king and his faithful men rejoiced with him.

In the same year, as William and Vincent write, William, son of Rollo and duke of the Normans, was treacherously killed in Francia by Alzo, surnamed the Short. A key was found at his belt belonging to the lock of a private chest, in which monastic garments were found. Amid wars he had always contemplated wearing them at Jumièges. His son was Richard.

In Otto's seventh year Stephen and Constantine, sons of the emperor of the Greeks, namely Romanus, as they are called according to Sigebert and Vincent, complaining that they had been restrained from youthful age by the just severity of their father, arranged an ambush in the palace. Without the knowledge of the other Constantine, son of Emperor Leo, they deposed their father from the throne of the palace and, having shorn his head according to custom, sent him to a neighboring island upon which cenobites practiced philosophy.

The sun suffered a horrible eclipse on Friday at the third hour of the day. On that day in Spain Adamar, king of the Saracens, was defeated in battle by Ramiro, the most Christian king of Galicia. In Italy a comet of marvelous magnitude appeared, portending the famine that followed. King Otto transferred the body of Saint Innocent the martyr to the city of Magdeburg.

In the eighth year Otto subjected all Lotharingia to himself, only Adalbero, bishop of Metz and brother of Duke Frederick, resisting him.

Stephen and Constantine, sons of Emperor Romanus, seeing that after their father's expulsion Constantine, son of Emperor Leo, was preferred to them by everyone and that they themselves were now scarcely held in second place, deliberated about doing to Constantine what they had done to their father. Their counsel was made public by Diabolinus, who was aware of the purpose of this counsel. When they had sat down together at a banquet by agreement and were contending among themselves after consultation about priority in sitting, at a signal given by Constantine's men both brothers were cast down from the throne. Their heads were shorn, and they too were sent to philosophize with the monks in the same monastery to which they had sent their father.

Thus, after the palace had been emptied of the usurping emperors, Constantine himself and his son Romanus, born of the daughter of Emperor Romanus, ruled as emperors for sixteen years.

Section I

Concerning the second Romanus, emperor of the Greeks, and his capture, together with many provinces, by Belfech, prince of the Persians and also of the Assyrians, an unbeliever, John of Colonna writes that, in the age when Conrad was ruling as emperor in Germany, Romanus, surnamed Diogenes, was ruling as emperor among the Greeks.

At that time, when he had administered the empire of Constantinople with every prosperity, a most powerful prince of the Persians and Assyrians named Belfech came forth from the farthest eastern regions, drawing with him so great a multitude of unbelieving nations that it was said to exceed number and cover the whole surface of the earth.

Advancing in chariots and on horses and with an exceedingly magnificent array, he entered the borders of the empire of Constantinople. He subjected everything to himself, from the open suburbs as far as walled cities and the most heavily fortified towns. There was no one who resisted him, and therefore everything was plundered at will.

Meanwhile the threatening sword was announced to the emperor of the Greeks. Solicitous for the commonwealth, he summoned expeditions and gathered as many forces of horsemen and foot soldiers as the pressing necessity compelled and as the whole empire could supply.

Why say more? When the legions and an abundant retinue had been gathered, the emperor advanced to meet the enemies. He encountered with a strong hand those who were already holding the inner parts of the empire, but he was destitute of divine aid.

Battle having been joined, they fought most fiercely on each side, with forces almost equal but with greater hatreds, such as the grief of sacrilege and zeal for the faith are accustomed to suggest. To make a long account shorter, the Christian people perished and, God permitting it, the lines of the faithful were laid low. What was more lamentable, the emperor was captured. What portion of the army had escaped returned, reporting the confusion that had occurred.

Meanwhile that unbelieving but magnificent man, the pagan prince, elated by so great a victory, commanded the emperor whom we said had been captured to be presented to him. In contempt of the name and Christian faith, while sitting upon the royal throne, he commanded the emperor to be placed beneath his feet. Ascending and descending in the presence of the princes, he used the imperial body in place of a footstool. At length, in return for so great a service, he restored him to liberty and permitted him to depart with the few of his magnates who had been captured with him.

The aforesaid pagan prince, freely fulfilling his purpose, occupied all the provinces from Laodicea of Syria as far as the Hellespont, which flows past Constantinople—thirty days' journey in length and fifteen in breadth—after the people of the whole land had been taken captive. Among them Antioch, the noble and distinguished ruler of many provinces and the first see of the Apostle Peter, was captured and made tributary under the unbelievers.

Thus within a short time he took under his jurisdiction both Coele-Syrias, Cilicia, Isauria, Pamphylia, Lycia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, Sichaonia, Cappadocia, Galatia, both Pontuses, Bithynia, and parts of Asia Minor—noble provinces distinguished by every advantage and filled with faithful peoples. He took the peoples captive, cast down churches, and with exterminating fury persecuted Christian worship. If he had possessed an abundance of ships, without any doubt he would have occupied the royal city of Constantinople itself.

When Emperor Romanus returned, however, the princes of the Greeks placed another over themselves, judging it unworthy that one who had suffered such indignities in his own body should exercise the imperial dignity. Therefore, after depriving him of his eyes and treating him ignominiously, they scarcely permitted him to live a private life.

By the just judgment of God this Romanus suffered this, for, rising against his lord and benefactor, Emperor Constantine, he had cast him down from the summit of the empire, and Constantine sought his livelihood by practicing painting, the work of his own hands.

It should be noted, to remove equivocation concerning this name Romanus, that there were two Greek emperors called Romanus. One was the father of Stephen and Constantine; he burned the fleet of the king of the Russians and was afterward cast out of the empire by his sons, as was said above according to Vincent and Sigebert. The other was the one of whom John of Colonna has now spoken. He was the son of Constantine, who ruled in Greece after the sons of the first Romanus. It nevertheless appears that this man belonged rather to the time of Emperor Otto than to that of Conrad.

Section II

In the ninth year of Otto I, Henry, the emperor's brother, having been besieged at the city of Merseburg by his brother, cast away his arms, fell at his feet, and implored his mercy; he was enclosed in custody. Frederick, archbishop of Mainz, was also shut out by the citizens.

In the same year, as Guillerinus testifies, Edred, the third of Edward's sons, reigned in England, and he reigned for nine and a half years. When news was heard that he was sick and blessed Dunstan was hastening there on horseback, Dunstan heard a voice sounding from above: "Now King Edred has fallen asleep in the Lord."

In Otto's twelfth year, as Vincent says after Sigebert, Taxus, king of the Hungarians, came into Italy and received from Berengar ten measures of money for his return.

In his thirteenth year, very many great earthquakes occurred throughout places in Gaul and Germany.

In his sixteenth year, when Wifrid died, the glorious man Bruno, brother of Emperor Otto, received the archbishopric of Cologne. How great a man he was before God and human beings the reader may learn from his life, which Roger described lucidly. Through his effort the bodies of Saints Elisius and Patroclus, together with the staff of Saint Peter, were transferred from Rome to Cologne.

In his eighteenth year, when Louis, king of the Franks, died, his son Lothair by Gerberga, the emperor's sister, reigned in Francia for thirty-one years. Under King Lothair himself Hugh the Great was made duke of the Franks. Not long afterward the said Hugh died and was buried in the church of Saint Dionysius; his sons Hugh, Otto, and Henry succeeded him. Of these, Hugh obtained the duchy of the Franks in place of his father.

In the same year also, as William writes, Edwy, son of King Edmund, began to reign in England while still an adolescent, wanton and lustful. When Saint Dunstan rebuked him, he exiled all the monks throughout England and afflicted them with calamities. He expelled Dunstan himself into Flanders, as will be said in the following chapter.

In his nineteenth year, as Vincent writes in the place cited above after Sigebert, a stone of marvelous magnitude, cast from heaven with thunder and a violent storm, presented a great marvel to those who saw it. In many places churches were shaken by a powerful tempest; priests of both orders perished by a lightning strike, and many other portents horrible to relate were shown.

In the twenty-second year, a prodigious event terrified many and restrained them from vices: signs of the cross appeared upon the garments of very many, while the garments of some were soiled as though with leprosy.

In the twenty-fourth year Otto himself was summoned by Pope John XI [read: Pope John XII] and the people of Italy through legates to liberate Italy from the hands of Berengar, who as a powerful tyrant was molesting it in many ways. He entered Italy and, after defeating Berengar, sent him into exile. Otto was received with the greatest honor by Pope John and by all the clergy and Roman people, and was solemnly crowned emperor by Pope John himself. But this pope was wicked and scandalized both the emperor and everyone because of his abominable life.

In Otto's twenty-sixth year, a council of bishops from all Italy having been assembled, after the pope had been summoned a third time to answer concerning the crimes charged against him and, fleeing, had scorned to come to Rome, he was condemned by all. Leo was substituted as pope by the election of all and the emperor's consent. Presiding over the apostolic see, this Leo did things worthy of an apostle.

But not long afterward, as Vincent says after Sigebert, the Romans, having changed their fidelity, with the aid of certain men of the emperor—because Pope John himself was of noble stock—and also with the help of Alberic, son of the aforesaid Berengar, recalled John and restored him to his see. He ended his life most miserably and most shamefully, as is evident above in the preceding chapter.

When John died, Pope Leo, who had withdrawn from the city when John had been restored to the papacy by the Romans, went to the emperor. The Romans themselves chose a certain man as pope whom they named Benedict. Emperor Otto, angered by this outcome, both because they had cast out Leo and because they had acted contrary to their oath—for they had sworn to him that they would never elect a pope without his and his son's consent—suddenly approached the city with his forces.

After besieging it he so afflicted it with slaughter and hunger that they promised to receive the aforesaid Leo as pope. This they did after Benedict had been rejected. Benedict was deprived not only of the papacy but also of the priesthood and, according to some, was strangled in prison by Otto.

In the twenty-eighth year of his empire, Otto celebrated the feast of Pentecost at Aachen. His sisters came there from Francia: Gerberga, queen of the Franks and mother of King Lothair and Duke Charles, and Hadwig, wife of Hugh, count of Paris. There the whole royal lineage was affected by so great a jubilation of mutual rejoicing that scarcely any joy and gladness in all their lives could be compared with it.

In the thirty-second year of this Otto I, a certain count, a familiar of Emperor Otto, was seized by the devil at Rome before everyone's eyes, so that he tore himself with his teeth. By the emperor's command he was brought to Pope John XIII, who had succeeded Leo, so that the chain of Saint Peter might be placed around his neck.

When deceitful clerics once and twice applied another chain furtively and no remedy proceeded from it because no power was present in it, at length the true chain of Saint Peter—the one with which he had been bound under Nero—was brought and placed around the raging man's neck. The devil departed, foaming and crying out greatly.

Theoderic, bishop of Metz, seized this chain and said that he would not release it unless his hand were cut off. At length the emperor, after quieting the dispute, obtained from Pope John that the bishop should merit to have a ring cut from this chain.

After Otto had been reconciled to the Romans at the insistence and prayers of Pope Leo, the emperor remained at Rome for some time. When the feast of the Lord's Nativity arrived, Otto caused his son Otto to be crowned by Pope Leo, and joined to him in marriage Theophania, daughter of the emperor of Constantinople. When this had been done, he returned to Germany.

After Pope Leo died, however, John, a native of Narni, succeeded him, and certain Romans imprisoned him. On hearing this Otto again returned to Italy with his forces. After freeing John from prison and entering Rome with him, the emperor subdued in various ways those who had been the cause of his capture, as was stated above in the chapter concerning the pontiffs.

In Otto's thirty-third year Theoderic, bishop of Metz, joined more closely than others to the emperor by blood, affection, and familiarity, collected, in whatever way he could, many bodies and relics of saints from different places in Italy while he campaigned under him for three years in the Italian expedition, as Vincent says in the place cited above.

First he obtained Saint Elpidius the confessor from Marsia, whose companion, Bishop Eutychius, the emperor himself had already carried away. From Amiternum he obtained Saint Eutyches the martyr with the relics of Maron and Victorinus, his companions; from Foligno, Felician, bishop and martyr; from Perugia, Asclepiodorus the martyr; from Spoleto, Serenus the martyr with Gregory the martyr of Spoleto; from Cordino, the relics of Vincent, martyr and levite, which had once been brought from Spain to Capua by two monks and conveyed from Capua to that place; from Mevania, another Vincent, bishop and martyr; from Vicenza, Leontius, bishop and martyr; from Florence, Minias the martyr; from the city of Todi, Fortunatus, bishop and confessor; from Corfinium, Lucy, the virgin and martyr of Syracuse, once transferred there from Syracuse by Faroald, duke of the Spoletans; and from the Sabine region, portions of the bodies of the martyrs Protus and Hyacinth.

All these things, together with a portion of Saint Peter's chain, hairs of the same saint, blood of blessed Stephen the first martyr, and a piece of Saint Lawrence's gridiron given to him by Pope John, along with many other relics of saints, Bishop Theoderic transported into Gaul and placed in the church of Saint Vincent the martyr which he had constructed on the island of the city.

Concerning the aforesaid relics and others, since many people make many contrary claims—namely, that they are in one place rather than another, and that they are these rather than those—everyone is free in spirit to believe that they are those relics or that they are not, without prejudice to salvation. Nevertheless, it is pious to believe what is commonly said.

At length this Otto I died. The monk Widukind wrote his life and also composed the history of the Saxons down to him.

Concerning these three Ottos there is the verse: "Otto reigned after Otto, then the third Otto." Jacob of Voragine briefly relates the following things in his chronicle.

Concerning the first, he relates that when the said Otto had prepared a banquet for the princes on the solemnity of Easter, before they sat down the son of a certain prince, at a boy's prompting [read: on a childish impulse], took a dish from the table. The steward struck him down with a staff. Seeing this, the boy's tutor immediately killed the steward.

When Caesar wished to condemn him without a hearing, the man cast Caesar to the ground and began to choke him. When he had been torn from the man's hands, Otto caused him to be spared, crying out that he himself was blameworthy because he had not shown reverence for the feast; therefore he permitted the man to depart freely.

Concerning the second Otto, Jacob relates that, when the Italians had violated the peace rather often, he came to Rome and made a great banquet for all the chief men, magnates, and pontiffs at the steps of the church. While they were feasting he secretly caused armed men to surround them. Then, making a complaint concerning the violated peace, he commanded the guilty men to be read out from a written list. He caused them to be beheaded immediately in that place, while he took care that the others should feast.

Concerning the third, it is read that he had a certain wife who wished to prostitute herself to a certain count. But when he was unwilling to perpetrate so great a crime, she, indignant, so defamed the aforesaid count before the emperor that the emperor caused him to be beheaded without a hearing.

Before he was beheaded, he asked his wife to prove his innocence after his death by the judgment of glowing iron. The day came upon which Caesar declared that he would render judgment for orphans and widows. The widow was also present, carrying her husband's head with her in her arms.

Then the woman asked the emperor what death one who had unjustly caused someone to be killed deserved. When he declared that such a man deserved deprivation of his head, she added: "You are that man, O emperor, who killed my innocent husband at the suggestion of your wife. And so that you may prove that I speak the truth, I shall prove it by this judgment of glowing iron."

Seeing this, Caesar was astounded and gave himself into the woman's hands to be punished. Through the intervention of the pontiffs and chief men, however, he received from the widow a delay of ten days, then eight, afterward seven, and finally six.

Then the emperor, after the truth had been examined and learned, caused his own wife, found guilty and the cause of so great an evil, to be burned alive. For his own redemption he gave four strongholds to the widow. These strongholds are in the bishopric of Limoges and are called from the delays of days: Tenth, Eighth, Seventh, and Sixth.

What was said above concerning the second Otto appears more likely to have occurred in the time of Otto III, who came into Italy several times.

Section III

Therefore, in the year 974 from the Lord's Incarnation, but in the year 4,933 from the beginning of the world, or, according to the computation of the greater number, the year 6,096, Otto II, son of the first, began to rule as emperor. He ruled as emperor for ten years.

In the second year of his empire there was a great frost from the Kalends of November until the vernal equinox.

In Otto's third year Saint Udalric, bishop of Augsburg, died. The glory of miracles soon disclosed what manner of life he had led.

In the fourth year Saint Withech, bishop of Prague, surnamed Adelbert, was illustrious in sanctity and teaching among the Wends. Martyred among the Prussians, he was glorified by many miracles.

In the fifth year, when the kingdom had been pacified on every side and Emperor Otto was remaining at Aachen, Lothair, king of the Franks, suddenly came to invade Lotharingia. When the emperor withdrew because he was unprepared for battle, the king returned to his own land after much devastation.

The emperor pursued him with an inestimable army and, on the appointed day, namely the Kalends of October, entered Francia. Ranging through it until the Kalends of December, he devastated the territories of Reims, Laon, Soissons, and Paris with various slaughter, but granted every immunity to the churches of God. On his return, however, he lost part of the baggage near the river Aisne. Concerning these events a certain recluse predicted that all the instigators of this evil would die before seven years had passed.

In the sixth year fiery armies were seen in the sky throughout the whole night on the fifth day before the Kalends of November.

In the seventh year the bodies of Saints Laudoald, Adrian, Amantius, and others were transferred from the village of Ventre-Sono-Habania to Ghent, with the glory of many miracles.

In the eighth year Emperor Otto II attempted to transfer Apulia and Calabria, provinces of Italy belonging to the jurisdiction of the kingdom of the Greeks, to the Roman Empire, chiefly because of the affinity which he had with the emperor of the Greeks through his wife Theophania.

In the ninth year the Greeks, hostile because Emperor Otto was invading the provinces of the Greeks, hired the aid of the Saracens for themselves and met the emperor in battle in Calabria. In that battle almost all the forces of the Romans were destroyed, as though to annihilation.

The emperor, striving to escape by swimming, was captured by sailors who did not know him. He was recognized by one of them who was a merchant of slaves but was not betrayed. Through him the matter was reported to the empress and to Theoderic, bishop of Metz, who were awaiting the outcome of the affair in the city of Rossano. With difficulty he was liberated through the bishop and the slave.

For while the sailors were intent upon the money brought to redeem him, the emperor mounted a horse and scarcely escaped. While everyone was cast down in spirit because of the misfortune of the commonwealth, the empress alone, with feminine and Greek levity, taunted them because the Romans had been defeated by the army of her own nation; through this she began to be held in hatred by the chief men.

In the tenth year Emperor Otto, failing from weariness and anguish of spirit, died at Rome, as Vincent writes after Sigebert. There was dissension among the chief men concerning the emperor to be substituted: some contended that the empire was owed to Otto's own son, while others, through hatred of the empress, wished to transfer the empire from her son to Duke Henry, son of the Henry who had been the brother of Otto I.

This Henry held the boy Otto in custody after factiously seizing him. But the princes, wresting the boy from Henry's hand, raised him to the kingdom and the empire.

Around that time the body of Saint Mederic the abbot was raised at Paris on the day of his deposition, namely the fourth day before the Kalends of September. As Vincent relates from his deeds, he was born of noble stock in the territory of the city of Autun. When he had completed thirteen years of age, he went to the monastery of that city against his parents' will.

After entering the monastery, he practiced so great an abstinence that he took some food only twice in the week. He did this with nothing but barley bread, or whatever cheaper thing could be found, and a little water. He secretly covered his body with a very rough hairshirt and outwardly was like the other brothers in clothing.

At length, when the abbot died, he succeeded him. Considering that he had received not an honor but a burden, he strove to show himself a true father to all entrusted to him.

At that time a certain monk of the same place was grievously burning with the heat of lust. When he revealed this to the pious father, Mederic sent him the tunic with which he was clothed so that the monk might put it on. As soon as he put it on, the devil, the kindler of that evil, fled and hid himself, crying out in a loud voice and saying: "Saint Mederic, why do you burn me with your prayers? You have taken from me a vessel which I long possessed and have consigned me to an unquenchable fire."

Then the saint rebuked him with a divine voice, and he departed. The monk afterward remained in so great a sanctity that many miracles were subsequently worked through him.

Another disciple of the aforesaid father was so overcome by a diabolical delusion that he could not apply himself to the divine work, namely the office in the church. He was frequently admonished by Mederic but nevertheless was not corrected. The holy father, however, took bread and offered it to him, and he was freed from the said delusion.

When people from different regions, having heard the fame of his sanctity, hurried to him, he sought a deserted place and enclosed himself in the condition that he had long desired, so that he might labor with his own hands for whatever was to be taken as food.

The brothers, saddened by his departure, searched for him far and wide through the vast wilderness. At length they found him, and, since they could not bring him back, they approached the bishop. Going with them, the bishop found the saint in the wilderness and, binding him with the bond of excommunication, led him to the monastery, where he flourished in great sanctity and cured many infirmities.

At length he wished to go to Paris for the sake of prayer. On this journey the Lord worked many miracles through him. Finally, arriving at Paris, he served the Lord for two years and nine months in a cell which had been consecrated in the name of the Apostle Peter. Having summoned his disciples, he indicated the day of his death. On that day, after completing all things and bidding them farewell, he migrated to the Lord amid words of prayer.

Section IV

In the year of the Lord 984, when Otto II died, his son Otto III succeeded him in the empire. This was the year 4,947 from the beginning of the world, but, according to the greater computation, the year 6,116. He reigned for nineteen years.

In the fourth year of this Otto III, when Louis, king of the Franks, died, the Franks wished to transfer the kingdom to Duke Charles, brother of King Lothair and paternal uncle of Louis himself. While he deferred the matter for counsel, Hugh, son of Hugh of Paris by Hadwig, sister of Emperor Otto I, usurped the kingdom of the Franks and reigned for nine years. This Hugh was surnamed Capet; his genealogy and posterity now reign among the Franks.

But William says, as Vincent relates, that this Hugh took as wife a daughter of Edward, king of the English, and sister of King Echelstan, who had reigned long before this time, namely in the time of Henry, king of the Germans and father of Otto I. Otto I took one sister of this same Echelstan as wife; Louis, prince of the Aquitanians, took another sister; and this Hugh took the third, who was the most beautiful.

For her he sent most ample gifts to her father: spices and precious gems, especially emeralds; very many swift horses with trappings; and a certain vessel of onyx so carved that in it fields of grain appeared to wave, vines to germinate, and images of human beings to move. It was so bright and polished that in place of a mirror it returned the images of those looking into it.

He also sent the sword of Constantine the Great, upon which the name of its ancient possessor was read in golden letters. In its hilt, above thick plates of gold, an iron nail was also affixed, one of the four which had been driven into the Lord’s body.

He likewise sent the lance of Charlemagne, with which that most unconquered emperor, leading an army against the Saracens, returned victorious as often as he hurled it against the enemy; and the standard of the most blessed martyr Maurice, leader of the Theban legion, with which the same King Charles had been accustomed in the Spanish war to break and put to flight the compact ranks of any enemies whatsoever.

He also sent a diadem of much gold and precious gems, whose splendor beat back the eyes of those looking upon it; a particle of the holy Cross enclosed in crystal; and a small portion of the crown of thorns enclosed in the same manner so that it could be seen. The leader of this embassy was Adulf, son of Baldwin, count of Flanders, by the daughter of King Edward.

In the fifth year of Otto III, Duke Charles reclaimed against his nephew Hugh the kingdom of the Franks owed to him by paternal and ancestral succession. Pursuing him in war, he captured the city of Laon. Hugh besieged Charles in Laon, but in the second month of the siege those besieged sallied forth and burned the camp of the besiegers. After very many were killed, the king scarcely escaped in flight.

In Otto III’s sixth year, as Sigebert and Vincent say, a frequent and long-lasting flood of waters occurred beyond what was customary. The summer afterward was most fervently hot and destructive to very many; hence the crops also were diminished.

Duke Charles stormed Montaigu and advanced by devastation as far as Soissons. From there he attacked Reims and returned to Laon with much booty. There was a great spring drought; hence the early sowing was hindered and a great famine followed. Excessive snow fell and afterward continuous rain, so that it entirely prevented the autumn sowing. It is reported that grain rained from heaven at Alba. Others also said that small fish rained from heaven.

In the seventh year Duke Charles occupied at Reims the lands of the archbishop whom Hugh had appointed; he captured certain chief men and relegated them to Laon.

In the eighth year Duke Charles died. His son Otto succeeded him in the duchy of the Lotharingians.

In the ninth year a synod of all Francia was assembled at Reims. Arnulf, nephew of Duke Charles, whom Charles himself had installed as bishop at Reims, was deprived of orders and condemned by everyone's judgment. The priest Adelgarius, who had betrayed the city and opened its gates to Charles, was excommunicated irrevocably. Gilbert was substituted as bishop.

But when certain persons argued the case that Arnulf could not have been degraded without the knowledge and authority of the Roman pope, Gilbert was deposed and betook himself to Emperor Otto III. The emperor received him and first established him as archbishop of Ravenna and afterward as Roman pope.

Although Gilbert was very skilled in the liberal arts, he was nevertheless devoted to the magic art and was an enchanter of demons. His pupils in knowledge had been this Otto III and Robert, king of Francia. Therefore, by Otto's agency, he was assumed to the papacy and was called Silvester, concerning whom there is a full account above in the chapter concerning the pontiffs.

When Hugh, king of the Franks, died, his son Robert succeeded him in the kingdom and reigned for thirty-four years. He was very devout, as was said above.

In the sixteenth year of this Otto, which was the year 1000 from the Lord's Incarnation, many prodigies were seen, according to Vincent in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-five, final chapter. For there was a very great earthquake. A comet appeared on the nineteenth day before the Kalends of January.

Around the ninth hour, when the sky was clear, something like a burning torch with a long trail in the likeness of lightning fell toward the earth. It had so great a splendor that not only those who were in the fields but even those beneath roofs were struck by the lightning that burst in. As this cleaving of the sky gradually vanished, meanwhile a figure like a serpent was seen, with its head growing and with blue feet.

In the eighteenth year of this Otto, a certain Crescentius, a Roman patrician who had a following of certain Romans, expelled from the papacy Gregory V, a Saxon by nation, the emperor's kinsman, who had been created according to his pleasure. For money and in hatred of the emperor, Crescentius caused a certain John, bishop of Piacenza, to be made pope.

Hearing this, Emperor Otto, kindled with anger, entered Italy. Advancing toward the city, he joined battle with Crescentius and his followers and defeated him. Crescentius, fleeing, was drawn back from his flight and captured. He was placed backward upon a vile beast and led around; then, his limbs having gradually been cut off, he was finally hanged before the city. Otto deposed and blinded that John who had been intruded into the papacy. When Gregory V meanwhile died, he caused the aforesaid magician Gilbert to be made pope.

In the nineteenth year Emperor Otto, while dwelling at Rome, acted rather leniently with the Romans as he considered how he might reform the rights of the kingdom and the Church to their ancient condition. Brought by this to contempt for him, the Romans conspired against him. After killing some of his soldiers, they besieged him in the palace.

Through the industry of Henry, duke of Bavaria, and Hugh, marquis of Italy, he was scarcely extracted by means of a feigned pact of peace and departed from Rome with Pope Silvester, who had formerly been called Gilbert.

Because the wife of Crescentius had enticed the emperor to her love with the hope of reigning, grieving at his departure, she sent him poison. After drinking that cup, he died in Italy while returning.

The transalpine soldiers, carrying the body of the dead emperor with the insignia of the empire into Gaul and harassed by frequent attacks of the Italians, made a path for themselves by arms. But when the matter was now thought to be secure, Henry, duke of Bavaria, after wronging Herbert, archbishop of Cologne, from whose mouth all depended, violently extorted from him the insignia of the kingdom as though they belonged to him by hereditary right. For he was the son of Duke Henry, who had been begotten from Henry, brother of Emperor Otto I.

John of Colonna gives a different end for this Otto. He says that, coming to Rome near the end of his life, because the air of the city pleased him greatly, he thought to place his seat there, as it had formerly been in ancient times. When he began to construct a new and noble palace in the place where until then the palace of Julian the Apostate had stood, he ceased from the work when the Romans protested. Returning to Saxony not long afterward, he rested in peace.

Title XVI

Chapter IV

Concerning Henry II, emperor.

When Otto III died, Henry, duke of Saxony, obtained the Roman Empire in the year of the Lord 1003. This was the year 4,866 from the beginning of the world, but, according to the other computation, the year 6,125. He ruled as emperor for twenty-two years.

Having won over to himself the minds of certain princes of the kingdom, he was anointed king by Willigis, archbishop of Mainz, according to Vincent in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-six. He swiftly defeated the more powerful men of the kingdom who wished to stir up wars against him. He also made tributary to himself the kings of the gentiles dwelling in inner Germany who are called Wends.

But, as John of Colonna writes, it should be known that this Henry was not elected emperor immediately after the death of Otto III. For when Otto died the empire was vacant for a year and more because the princes of Germany did not agree concerning the election of an emperor.

For although the three preceding Ottos had ruled as emperors by succession of lineage, after the death of the last, as Martin says in the chronicle, it was established that the emperor should be elected by the provision of the princes, namely by the seven officers of the empire.

These are the three chancellor-archbishops: the archbishop of Mainz, vicar of Germany; the archbishop of Trier, vicar of Gaul; and the archbishop of Cologne, vicar of Italy. The margrave of Brandenburg is the emperor's chamberlain; the count palatine is the steward; the duke of Saxony bears the sword before the emperor; and the cupbearer is the king of Bohemia. "These establish the lord supreme over all through the ages."

Therefore, after their minds had been won over to him, this Henry was elected emperor by them. Among the emperors of the Germans he was the first emperor of this name. For before him there had been another King Henry, of whom above, who was the father of Otto I, but he did not receive the imperial crown or blessing. Yet, because he is called emperor with respect to this man, the one of whom the present account treats is called Henry II.

He was a magnanimous man and very fortunate in wars. For he suppressed certain more powerful men who had rebelled against him at the beginning of his empire, as has been said.

Moreover, the nation of the Hungarians, which until that time had been devoted to the worship of idols, was converted to the faith through Gilla, this Henry's sister, who had married the king of the Hungarians. For by her insistence this holy woman brought her husband the king to the point that he humbly asked to be baptized by Emperor Henry, together with his entire nation. In baptism he was called Stephen, whose merits are commended to this day by many kinds of miracles.

After many wars had been prosperously waged in Italy and Germany, this Henry, being most devout and wishing to devote himself devoutly to God, founded the monastery of Bamberg, endowed it with many estates, and adorned it with diverse ornaments.

His wife was most holy, to such a degree that, although she was young and most beautiful, she brought her husband to the point that by a common vow they preserved perpetual virginity between themselves. Thus, persevering in holy works and perpetual virginity until the end of life, they migrated to the Lord. They were buried in the monastery which they had built from the foundations, and they shine with miracles. At that time Sergius, a holy and pious man, was bishop in the city of Rome.

Once, when this Henry II had gone hunting, as John of Colonna relates, and his companions had dispersed here and there in a certain forest, he came to a certain church. When he had entered it, he found a priest who was then about to begin Mass.

When Mass had begun, the emperor began to look curiously at the priest. He was short in stature, very black in color, and deformed in his limbs, so that he appeared a monster rather than a human being. After the emperor had looked at him for a long time, he began to think and wonder how God, from whom all beautiful things proceed, permitted so deformed a monster to perform or handle His sacred rites.

While he was turning these things over more attentively in his mind, they came to the verse of the tract: "Know that the Lord Himself is God; He Himself made us," and so forth. When the priest's minister sang discordantly in these words, the priest, with a more forceful voice and as though roaring at the emperor's thought, said: "He Himself made us, and not we ourselves."

Struck by this saying, the emperor considered that man prophetic. Afterward, when he had come to know him familiarly, he made him a bishop.

In the time of this Emperor Henry, Gerard, bishop of Cambrai, and Adelbold, bishop of Utrecht, were held to be great men in the Church and in the emperor's palace.

In his third year a comet appeared horribly, which was seen scattering flames here and there. In the following year a horrible famine and mortality followed. It grew so strong throughout the whole world that, because of the weariness of those burying them, living people who still drew breath were often buried with the dead.

I have frequently observed that whenever that star which is called a comet appears, famine or mortality or some great destruction follows from it, or the death of some great man, of whose event it is a prognostic.

While this Henry was ruling as emperor, a marvelous event worthy of preaching occurred in a village of Saxony named Kalb, in the diocese of Magdeburg, where there was a church of Saint Magnus the martyr.

As Vincent in the place cited above and John of Colonna relate, when a certain priest was celebrating Mass on the vigil of the Lord's Nativity, eighteen men together with fifteen women were dancing in a ring and singing in a loud voice in the cemetery of the church where he was celebrating. They impeded the priest himself as he celebrated.

The priest sent word to tell them to be silent or withdraw from there. Mocking the priest's words, they were unwilling to cease. Embittered, he said in imprecation: "May it please God and Saint Magnus that you remain singing in this manner for a year." And thus it happened that they danced in a ring and sang throughout that whole year without any interruption.

Marvelous to relate, during that whole time neither dew nor rain fell upon them. Neither weariness nor hunger affected them, nor were their garments or shoes worn away during that whole time.

When the year had revolved, Archbishop Herebert, in whose diocese this marvel occurred, came to the place, absolved them from the knot by which the priest had bound them, and reconciled them before the altar of the said church. Emperor Henry had unjustly expelled this archbishop from himself after afflicting him with injuries; but when the emperor celebrated the Lord's Nativity at Cologne, he appeased him by humble satisfaction.

The priest's daughter with two others immediately expired. The others slept throughout the following three continuous nights. Some afterward died, while the others displayed their punishment by a trembling of their limbs. Hubert, who was one of them, left these things written in this manner.

In the twenty-second year of his empire, which was his last, Henry, perceiving that he was approaching death, designated Conrad, an excellent man born of royal stock, as his successor to the kingdom and empire while he was still living, with the consent of the princes to whose authority the election pertained.

This Henry and his wife Cunegund were of holy life and remained in virginity until the end. But once, when Henry, at the devil's instigation, held his wife suspected concerning a certain knight, he caused her to walk fifteen paces with bare feet over glowing plowshares.

As she stepped upon them she said: "As You, O God, know me to be untouched by Henry and by all others, so help me." A voice was heard saying to her: "The Virgin Mary will liberate you, a virgin." She traversed the whole glowing mass uninjured.

When Caesar Henry was approaching death, a very great multitude of demons passed with a great noise before the cell of a certain holy hermit. Opening the window, the hermit asked the last demon who they were. He answered: "We are a legion of demons hastening to the death of Caesar, to see whether perhaps we can find in him anything belonging to us."

The hermit adjured the devil to return to him. Returning to him afterward, he said to the hermit: "We accomplished nothing. For when his good and evil deeds had been placed in the balance, that burned man Lawrence brought an immense golden pot of enormous weight. When we seemed to have prevailed, it was cast onto the other part of the balance, in which the good deeds were placed, and weighed very heavily. Then, angered, I broke one handle from the pot."

The devil called the chalice a pot, which the emperor had caused to be made for the church of Merseburg in honor of Saint Lawrence. Because of its magnitude it had two handles. It was discovered both that Emperor Henry had then migrated from this life and that one handle of the chalice had been broken.

After Henry II, Conrad II of this name ruled as emperor, but he was the first Conrad after Otto. He assumed the Roman Empire in the year of the Lord 1026. This was the year 4,988 from the beginning of the world, but, according to the greater number, the year 6,147. He ruled as emperor for fifteen years.

On his mother's side this Conrad was descended from the first kings of the Franks. He was vigorous in arms, provident in counsel, and especially flourishing in wisdom and knowledge of law. He was also very devoted to the Catholic Church and generous to the poor.

Because, when Henry died, a certain duke named Cuno was seeking the empire, he was at length rejected. For this reason the election of Conrad was prolonged for two years, although Henry had left him as successor to the empire; hence the empire was then vacant for two years. Conrad himself received the imperial crown from Pope John.

At that time Wenceslaus, duke of Poland, whose kingdom Henry II had made tributary to the Roman Empire, assumed the royal name for himself without consulting Conrad and disdained to be subject to anyone. Since he was very vigorous in arms and exceedingly powerful in riches, after the death of Henry, whom he had greatly feared, he aspired with great force of arms to complete a rebellion. Prevented by death, he could not accomplish it.

His son Miso, while arranging to fulfill his father's will in this matter, expelled his only brother from his homeland because he believed that his brother opposed him in this. Fleeing to the aid of Emperor Conrad, the brother came into Germany. Kindly received by him and aided with treasures and arms, he entered Poland with a great army of Germans. Conrad immediately followed him with a strong body of soldiers and threw all things within Poland into confusion by arms.

Miso, seeing that he could resist Conrad by no means, left Poland and fled to Ulric, duke of the Bohemians and enemy of the empire. Ulric, believing that he could recover Emperor Conrad's favor, which he had lost, resolved to hand over to Conrad the duke of the Poles whom he had received as an exile and suppliant, and revealed this very thing through a secret messenger.

But the magnanimous emperor, detesting his perfidy, rejected the offer of the betrayer and caused Miso to be told through a secret messenger to seek safety somewhere other than in Bohemia. Marveling at the emperor's goodness, he secretly left Bohemia and returned to his own lands. Casting aside the insignia of royalty which he had previously assumed and content with a modest retinue, he came voluntarily to Emperor Conrad and subjected himself to his will. He humbly resigned to the emperor the crown which he had proudly placed upon himself. From that time Poland was made tributary to the Roman Empire.

Therefore, when Germany had been pacified, Conrad, intending to descend into Italy to receive the crown, caused his son Henry to be elected king of Germany. When this had been done, he gathered a great army of his men into one body and entered Italy powerfully. There he was received with great honor by the Roman people and was anointed and crowned by the supreme pontiff.

While he was there, he heard that Duke Ernst had rebelled and was molesting those faithful to the empire with a great army. On hearing this, the emperor immediately returned to Germany and, attacking Ernst with all the forces of the empire, compelled him to flee to the recesses of the forests. Not long afterward he was killed there by the emperor's faithful men. His brother Herman received his duchy.

While Conrad was in Germany, a great part of the Lombards rebelled. For almost all the cities of upper Lombardy had sworn together that, mindful of their liberty, they would permit no one to reign over them. On hearing this, the emperor suddenly came into Italy with a great army. Terrified as though by his unexpected arrival, all the cities subjected themselves to the emperor.

After receiving them at his command and carrying out a diligent inquiry, he cast all the instigators of this rebellion into chains and committed them to prison. He also captured the archbishop of Milan, who was said to have been the instigator and author of the whole conspiracy, and committed him to prison. Coming to Milan, he besieged it and burned its suburbs.

While he stood crowned at Mass beside the city in a certain small church on the day of Pentecost, such grievous thunders and lightnings occurred that some went out of their minds and others even breathed out their spirits.

Bruno, archbishop of Cologne, a most holy man who was solemnly celebrating Mass that day, asserted that amid the solemnities of the Mass he openly saw Saint Ambrose threatening the emperor with an indignant countenance because he had committed his successor to prison.

Therefore, after some days, the emperor, having received the city of Milan, went to Cremona. There he met the Roman pontiff. After dismissing him with much honor, he remained for some time in Lombardy. When affairs had been settled and the matters of the empire ordered, he went to Rome for the sake of prayer. Going from there into Apulia, he planned to return to Germany by the Adriatic Sea. But while he was there he lost many of his princes because of the intemperance of the air. Finally he returned to Germany.

Section II

At the same time in which the aforesaid Conrad ruled as emperor, Rodulph, king of Burgundy, dying, left his kingdom by testament to Henry, son of Emperor Conrad. But Otto, count of the Celts, asserting that the kingdom of Burgundy and Lugdunese Gaul belonged to him, gathered an army and invaded it.

Therefore the indignant emperor entered that kingdom with great forces of Germans and, after afflicting the said Otto with many wars, compelled him to surrender. Thus he obtained the entire kingdom of Lugdunese Gaul. Lugdunese Gaul is that part of the province which lies beyond the Rhône toward the east.

In the sixth year of Conrad's empire, that renowned king of the Franks, Robert, son of Hugh, died. While alive he was so devoted to clemency and mercy that on feast days, when he dressed or undressed himself in the royal garments, he would distribute those very garments to the poor if he had nothing else at hand, unless the diligence of the keeper of the wardrobe kept the needy away. When he died, his son Henry reigned in Francia for thirty years.

During his reign a certain bishop of the Gauls asserted in a council celebrated by the bishops of the Gauls that letters had been given from heaven to certain persons which taught how peace was to be renewed upon earth. He wrote the matter to the other bishops and commanded that the people observe the following things.

No one was to bear arms. Things taken away were not to be reclaimed. No avenger of his own blood or that of any relative whatsoever was to arise; he was to be compelled to pardon those who struck him. They were to observe a fast on bread and water every Friday. On Saturday they were to abstain from meats and fat. Content with this fast alone for the remission of all sins, they were to know that no other penance was to be added for them. They were to bind themselves by an oath to observe all these things.

Whoever was unwilling to do so was to be deprived of Christianity; when he was dying, no one was to visit him as one alien to the faith, nor was his body to be handed over for burial.

Many who were desirous of novelties embraced this novelty of commands more willingly than was just. Many also contradicted it, especially Gerard, bishop of Cambrai. He asserted that from the beginning the human race had been divided threefold: into those who pray, those who fight, and those who cultivate the fields. One needed the aid of the other two, and two needed the aid of one.

Therefore arms ought to be borne. Plunder ought to be restored by the authority of law and owed to grace [read: restored by the authority of law and grace]. The avenger of one struck was not to be provoked by compulsion, but was to be reconciled to him according to the Gospel.

One fast on Friday or Saturday was not to be imposed upon everyone, because there is not one capacity in all. Nor were all to be content with this fast, because there is not one quality of repentance in all. To confirm this by an oath, or to increase violation of the oath by perjury, was not useful. To excommunicate those contradicting these things, deny visitation to the sick, and deny burial to the dead was altogether detestable. The decrees of the holy fathers were sufficient, and, when they were neglected, a suitable measure of penance was to be imposed.

At this time Guido of Arezzo was also illustrious, supreme among musicians. In this he is to be preferred even to philosophers, because he discovered unknown chants. He also found a rule through which children learn chant more easily than by the voice of a master or by the use of any instrument. This rule today is called gamma.

In the time of this Conrad, Drogo, count of the Normans, an outstanding man in arms, pious in religion, vigorous in action, and famous, came into Italy with four of his brothers and a great army of his men. Passing through Lombardy and Tuscany, he entered Apulia. Three times in one day he fought with the Greeks who held it. He emerged victorious and, after putting the Greeks to flight, obtained the greater part of Apulia.

At length, after many victories, Conrad ended his last day in the fifteenth year of his empire.

Section III

When Conrad II was taken from human affairs, his son Henry, the third of this name, succeeded him in the empire. He began to rule as emperor in the year of the Lord 1040, the year 5,003 from the beginning of the world, and ruled as emperor for seventeen years.

While his father was still living, he took as wife a daughter of the king of the English. She was a most beautiful maiden and, coming to her husband, remained with him for a long time.

At length she was accused of adultery. Since no one dared defend her through fear of her husband, she opposed to her accuser, a man of gigantic bulk, a certain boy, a ward of her own jester, whom she had brought with her from England, to fight in single combat.

When the duel was joined, the boy, trusting in divine aid, obtained victory. He defeated the man who had unjustly accused his lady and, cutting the tendon behind his knee, deprived him of his strength.

Guivilda, for this was the maiden's name, after the victory gave repudiation to her husband. Afterward she could not be induced by threats or blandishments of any kind to remain with him. Taking the habit of holy religion, she ended her life in the service of God.

This Henry was like his father in every virtue. After his first wife gave him repudiation, he took as wife a daughter of William, duke of Poitou. This nevertheless could not have been done according to the common law unless there was some diriment impediment.

When the nuptials were celebrated in imperial fashion, he commanded all the entertainers, mimes, and stage performers who had come to that solemnity to be expelled. He ordered that everything which, according to the custom of princes, was to be given to them in garments, horses, and money should be bestowed upon the poor.

This prince was also very cheerful by nature and affable to human beings, humble toward everyone, terrible to enemies, and very pious and generous toward the poor.

Once, when he was solemnly celebrating the feast of Pentecost in Germany at Mainz and, shortly before Mass, places were being prepared next to the imperial throne, at the devil's persuasion a dispute arose among the servants of the archbishop of Mainz and of the abbot of the monastery of Fulda concerning which of their two lords ought to sit nearer to the emperor.

For this abbot is said to have been of so great power among the Germans in Saxony that he could furnish the emperor with sixty thousand armed men against enemies. He had an ancient privilege that on great feast days he should sit at the emperor's right hand.

Therefore, after many words among the servants of those prelates, they came to a fight. When German fury threw everything into confusion, the pavement of the church was filled with blood. But when the bishops and others ran together, peace was reestablished among those in dissension, the church was purified, and Mass was celebrated with much devotion.

When they came to that verse of the sequence, "You have made this day glorious," a voice fell from the air, saying: "I made this day warlike." On hearing this, everyone stiffened with fear.

The emperor, attentively perceiving the joy of the devil who had procured this disturbance, said: "You, at once the inventor and kindler of every evil, have made the day warlike and sorrowful to the arrogant. But we, through the grace of God who made it glorious, shall render it gracious to the poor and needy."

At once, after the sequence had been begun again, they invoked the grace of God with solemn weeping. When Mass had been completed with much devotion, all the indigent and needy were summoned through a herald. All the precious foods that had been prepared for the emperor and the courtiers were consumed for their use, while the pious emperor himself, together with the other prelates and ministers, served them with his own hands.

When this same Henry was still a boy during the life of his father Conrad, he received as a gift from a certain cleric a silver tube of the sort with which boys at play are accustomed to spray water at one another. Receiving it, he said: "When I am emperor, I shall give you a most wealthy bishopric."

When he had grown to manhood and assumed the empire, he promptly gave what the man requested according to the promise. But not long afterward he was struck by a bitter and grievous illness and lay sick. For three days and nights he remained as though lifeless. The bishops, having proclaimed a three-day fast, supplicated the Lord for his life.

Afterward, when by God's will he recovered from the illness, he summoned the bishop whom he had made on account of the tube and deposed him by sentence in an assembly of all the prelates.

He confessed that throughout that three-day period he had seen demons hostile to him hurling a flame of fire at him through the tube. I say a flame so persistent that in comparison with it our fire would be regarded as a jest and a breeze.

Meanwhile, however, he had seen a half-burned young man carrying at his side a golden chalice of immense magnitude, full of exceedingly cold water. By the sight and sprinkling of it he had escaped the burning heat inflicted upon him. This was blessed Lawrence the martyr, whose church roof, dissolved by long age, the emperor had caused to be repaired and whom, among other gifts, he had honored with a golden chalice.

They also report concerning this Henry that, when he was fleeing enemies, a certain white doe, like a domestic animal, carried him upon its shoulders across an impassable river.

The same Emperor Henry had a certain cleric who was sufficiently learned and had a good voice, but who loved a base little prostitute rather ardently. When on a certain solemn night he slept with her for the sake of pleasure, in the morning he stood at the emperor's Mass.

The emperor, concealing his knowledge of this, commanded him to prepare himself to read the Gospel, since, namely, he delighted in his melody. For the cleric was a deacon. Conscious of his evil, he refused. The emperor pressed him in order to test his constancy. When at last he refused to obey, the emperor commanded him to go into exile from his homeland. Embracing this sentence, he withdrew immediately.

Someone was sent after him when he had already gathered all his possessions, arranged them in bundles, and taken to the road. Therefore, forcibly brought back, he was set before the emperor. Smiling joyfully, the emperor said: "You have acted uprightly, and I congratulate your uprightness, because you valued the matter of God more than your homeland and feared God's anger more than mine. Therefore, have the first bishopric that falls vacant in the empire, provided that you renounce your indecent love, namely that woman." These things are from Helinandus.

When this same magnificent Emperor Henry now possessed the whole empire peacefully in Italy and Germany, desiring to enlarge the name and worship of the Christian faith, he brought war upon the Wends, who border upon the Swabians and worship idols and images.

As Guillerinus relates in his chronicle, these peoples worshiped Fortune. Erecting her idol in a most renowned place, they placed in her right hand a horn full of that drink which is made from water and honey and is called hydromel by a Greek word, and left it there.

On the last day of November, sitting in the same place, they tasted it. If they found that cup full, they applauded with a great noise because there would be abundance from a full horn in the coming year. If the contrary occurred, they mourned as though scarcity would come.

Emperor Henry made the kings of these nations tributary. But when he promised great immunities if they would receive the Christian faith and they could not be bent, he imposed this rule of compulsory service upon them: on all solemnities upon which the emperor was accustomed to wear the crown, two of their four petty kings were to carry a cauldron in which meat was seasoned, suspended from a pole.

Pope Leo VIII [read: Pope Leo IX] of this name asked Emperor Henry that the Normans, who then held a great part of Apulia occupied and rendered nothing to the Roman Church in any respect, should be driven from those seats. Assenting to him, the emperor sent his armies to Rome to the pope. Advancing personally with them, the pope joined battle with the Normans. But that army was defeated and the pope captured, as above in the chapter concerning the pontiffs.

Around the same time Vinifrid, count of the Normans, ended his last day. His son Baiolard succeeded him in the duchy, a man strong in spirit and vigorous in war. But he did not hold the lordship for long.

For Robert called Guiscard, Vinifrid's brother on his mother's side and a son of Tancred, cast him down from the honor and obtained the duchy of the Normans in Apulia.

Tancred, father of Guiscard, begot twelve sons, all most prudent men and vigorous in arms. Among them this Robert, son of Guiscard [read: Robert called Guiscard, son of Tancred], was seventh in order. He was a prudent, magnanimous, generous man, most practiced in arms, but desirous of ruling; hence he acquired Apulia, Calabria, Campania, and Sicily for his dominion. He always governed military discipline most severely and rigorously.

He had as wife Silregarta [read: Sichelgaita], daughter of the prince of Salerno. Though a woman in sex, she surpassed men in counsel and prudence. By her he begot three sons, namely Roger, Robert, and Wido, and five daughters. By another wife named Alberada he had a fourth son named Boamund, concerning whom many things will be said below.

At that time the intact body of Pallas, son of Evander, was found at Rome in a certain tomb. A burning lamp was found at his head. The epitaph of this tomb was:

> Pallas, son of Evander, whom the lance of the warrior Turnus
> Killed in its accustomed manner, lies here.

I would not believe that these verses were made at that time, although Carmentis is said to have invented Latin letters, but rather that they were made either by Ennius or by some other ancient poet.

That corpse had a wound in the middle of its breast, the opening of which measured four and a half feet. The burning lamp that was found could be extinguished neither by the sprinkling of any liquid nor by the violence of blowing. But a certain man of subtler ingenuity made a hole with a stylus beneath the flame. When this had been done, as soon as air entered from below, the fire vanished.

The body was of so great a size that, when it was placed against the wall, it surpassed the height of the walls. But as the days passed, after it had been infused by dripping moisture, it experienced the common corruption of mortals: the skin dissolved and the sinews flowed away.

Section IV

In the eighth year of Emperor Henry III, as John of Colonna writes, the church of the Lord's Resurrection at Jerusalem, which had been destroyed by the Arabs, was rebuilt by the faithful. But because many do not know how, by whom, or at what time it was destroyed by the unbelievers, I have therefore considered it necessary to write out the order of the event.

It should be known that, after the power of the Egyptians began to grow strong against the Persians, before the coming of the Turks, the dominion of the Egyptians increased so greatly in the East that they occupied all the provinces and regions from Egypt as far as Antioch. Among these the holy city Jerusalem, with the adjoining region, came into their power.

Under this principality, just as more indulgent times are customarily granted to captives, the faithful who dwelt in that city began to be relieved of their distresses, until a caliph named Eques was set over that same kingdom of the Egyptians.

He exceeded alike the wickedness of both his predecessors and his successors and became a celebrated tale to posterity and to those reading of his madness. For he was so singular in every impiety and wickedness that his life, hateful to God and human beings, demands a special treatise.

Among the many exceedingly destructive things that he commanded, he ordered the church of the Lord's Resurrection to be cast down to its foundations. It had been built by the venerable man Maximus, bishop of that place, at the command of the great Emperor Constantine, and afterward rebuilt by Modestus in the time of Emperor Heraclius. That venerable church was destroyed in the year 1018 from the Lord's Incarnation.

At that time a venerable man named Herestus presided over that church. He was the maternal uncle of that most wicked tyrant, being his mother's brother. The tyrant is said to have done this so that he might give the unbelieving peoples an argument for his perfidy. For the designation of Christianity was objected against him because he had been born from a Christian mother. Wishing to repel this as though it were a crime, he dared to perpetrate the aforesaid crime.

From that same day the condition of the faithful in that city began to be worse, both from the most sorrowful grief which they received from the fall of the church of the Holy Resurrection and from multiplied distress through increased compulsory services. For besides the enormity of the tributes exacted from them contrary to custom and the privileges granted by his predecessors, he had also forbidden their solemnities.

Nevertheless, divine mercy was present, bringing no small consolation to desperate affairs. When the aforesaid tyrant was taken from human affairs, the shaking partly ceased, and his son named Daber obtained the kingdom.

At the request of the lord emperor of Constantinople, who was surnamed Heliopetanus, Daber repaired the treaty which his father had violated and contracted friendship with him. He granted to the faithful the power to rebuild the aforesaid church.

When this permission had been granted, the people of the faithful who dwelt at Jerusalem, recognizing that their strength was insufficient for the restoration of so great a work, sent messengers to Constantinople. Extending prayers to the lord emperor Constantine Monomachus, they humbly signified the great desolation in which the people of the faithful had sat after the church was destroyed. They entreated most affectionately that he extend the generous hand of imperial munificence for the rebuilding of the church.

A certain John surnamed Chariamitis, a Constantinopolitan by nation, managed their embassy. He appeared noble according to the flesh, but was much nobler in morals. Having set aside the dignity of the world and followed Christ by assuming the religious habit, he lived poor for Christ at Jerusalem.

Being sent, therefore, and not sluggish in due persistence and solicitude, he labored faithfully before that same lord emperor and obtained that the God-loving emperor should command the necessary and sufficient expenses for the work of the said building to be supplied from his own treasury. The venerable patriarch Nicephorus then presided over the said church.

Thus, after permission had been obtained and expenses supplied from the imperial treasury, they rebuilt at Jerusalem the church of the Holy Resurrection which now exists, in the year 1048 from the Lord's Incarnation, twenty-five years before the liberation of the city and seven years after it had been destroyed.

Section V

Concerning whence the Turks had their origin and how they were tributaries of the Persians.

Since many things will be said below concerning the nation of the Turks, it is therefore not foreign to the purpose now to relate briefly the origin and progress of this nation, how it came to this rank in which it is read to have stood for many years, and now stands in a greater one, Constantinople having been captured by them and their emperor killed with his magnates.

Therefore the nation of the Turks, or Turcomans, was northern from the beginning. They are called Turks, as they themselves assert and as the same is contained in our chronicles, from a certain duke of theirs named Turcus. Under him, after the destruction of the Trojans, they transferred themselves to the Hyperborean regions.

There, having abandoned the use of arms, they gave their labor to tending flocks and herds. They were an entirely uncultivated nation and had no fixed seat. For they wandered and were borne about in every direction, following the convenience of pastures, and had neither cities nor towns.

When they wished to set out, those who were of the same tribe traveled together. They had as though a prince some tribesman from among their elders, to whom all questions or anything else that arose in the same tribe were referred.

When migrating they drew their entire household with them: horses, flocks and herds, male and female servants. For all their property consisted in these things. They nowhere gave labor to agriculture and, ignorant of the commerce of buying and selling, acquired the necessities of life for themselves by exchanges alone.

In the course of time it happened that a very great multitude of that people traveled separately from the others and entered the borders of the Persians, where they found a most agreeable region. They gave tribute to the king who ruled at that time according to what had been agreed between them from the beginning, and for some years had a rather long stay there.

Their people increased immeasurably, and there was no number to their multiplication, so that their increase became suspect to the king of the Persians and to the natives. Hence it happened that, after counsel had been taken among them, they decreed to expel them violently from the borders of the kingdom.

At length, however, changing their purpose, it seemed more expedient to weary them by multiplying compulsory services until they should withdraw voluntarily without compulsion. When they had already endured for many years the burden of injuries and the enormity of tributes, they were unwilling to tolerate it longer. The king sent forth a herald’s voice and commanded them all to depart within a fixed time.

Therefore, crossing the river Chobar, which bounded the kingdom on that side, they saw more freely than usual the infinite multitude of their own people. For previously, dwelling separately, they knew neither their number nor their power.

They marveled at how so great and so marvelous a people could ever have tolerated the pride of any princes and borne the bitterness of compulsory services and tributes. It appeared to them without doubt that they were inferior neither in number nor in strength to the people of the Persians or to any other nation, and that nothing was lacking to them for violently obtaining the neighboring regions except that, after the custom of other peoples, they did not have a king for themselves.

Therefore, wishing with harmonious vows to create a king for themselves, they registered the entire multitude of their people and found among them one hundred families more illustrious than the others. They commanded each of these to bring one arrow and, according to the number of the families, bound a bundle of one hundred arrows.

After covering the bundle, they summoned an innocent little boy and commanded him to put his hand beneath the covering under which the aforesaid bundle of arrows lay hidden and draw out only one. The condition was that the king should be taken only from the family whose arrow came out by lot.

It happened by chance that the aforesaid boy drew out the arrow of the family of the Heldüceans. Therefore it was established among everyone, as had previously been ordained, that the future prince should be created from that tribe.

Again it was commanded that from the same tribe one hundred men should be chosen who surpassed the others in age, morals, and virtue, and that each should bring one arrow bearing the inscribed name of the one offering it.

When another bundle had been made from them and carefully covered as before, the innocent boy was summoned again and told to draw one from them. He drew one upon which the name Selduch appeared.

That man was exceedingly handsome and noble, illustrious in his tribe, but was among strengths [read: advanced in age but sound in strength], and had much experience in military affairs. In his entire bodily bearing he displayed the elegance of a great prince.

Therefore, setting him over them by common decree, they raised him to the royal throne. They showed him the reverence owed to kings and bound themselves by an agreed covenant and furnished bodily oaths to fulfill his commands.

Immediately using the power conferred upon him sufficiently for command, he sent out a herald's voice and commanded it to be publicly proclaimed that, after crossing the river, they should violently occupy the borders of the Persians from which they had previously departed and claim the adjoining kingdoms for themselves, lest henceforth they be compelled to wander through foreign regions and endure the intolerable arrogance of other nations.

It happened that within a few years they subjected to themselves not only the kingdom of the Persians but also all the eastern kingdoms, after the violence of the Arabs and other nations had been subdued.

Thus a vile and abject people suddenly flew up to so great a summit that it occupied almost the whole East. This occurred scarcely thirty or forty years before our western people undertook the journey of pilgrimage to the Holy Land, concerning which there will be an account in what follows.

Add that now, in the year of the Lord 1453, the king of the Turks himself, called Mahumeth, at length captured Constantinople after besieging it with his men and seized the surrounding region, as will be said below.

After the eastern kingdoms had been subdued, they also proceeded to invade the most powerful kingdom of the Egyptians. Descending into Syria, they violently subjected Jerusalem with certain other neighboring cities to themselves. They burdened the faithful whom they found dwelling in it with harsher afflictions than usual and wearied them by a multitude of compulsory services.

Chapter V

Concerning Henry IV, emperor.

When Henry III was taken from this light, his son Henry IV of the same name obtained the Roman Empire. He began to rule as emperor, as John of Colonna writes after Vincent, in the year of the Lord 1067, the year 5,020 from the beginning of the world, or, according to the other computation, the year 6,179. He ruled as emperor for fifty years.

This Henry was eloquent in speech, acute in intellect, generous in alms, and most fortunate in military affairs. For, as is read, he fought sixty times with standards joined.

And although, led by the counsel of evil men, he was a persecutor of the Holy Roman Church, nevertheless for so long a time he was a very glorious and fortunate prince. Yet near the end of his empire, by the just judgment of God in recompense and punishment for the cruelties of the punishments and persecutions which he had inflicted upon the clergy, he suffered many calamities not only from the princes of the empire but even from his own son.

This Henry remained very young after the death of his father and was governed by the counsel of his mother Agnes. She was a most prudent and God-fearing woman. Therefore, while he obeyed his mother's admonitions, he governed the empire with great peace.

But afterward, deceived by counsel, he despised his mother's counsels, became wholly estranged from her, and began to conduct the affairs of the empire by himself.

The empress, a religious and prudent woman, seeing that her son was not only estranged from her but was using the counsel of wicked men to contrive things against her, and being unwilling to be enveloped in waves of disturbances, chose the religious life.

Then, going to Rome for the sake of prayer and captured there by devotion to the holy places, she devoted herself to holy works and alms and rested with a holy end. Her body was buried in the church of blessed Peter beside the altar of blessed Petronilla.

Not long afterward Conrad, his second-born son, whom his father while still living had set over Italy, died and was honorably buried at Florence.

At that time the renowned Duke Robert Guiscard, summoned by the citizens of Troia, received their city into his dominion with the will and consent of all. Not long afterward he suddenly set out into Calabria with an army, stormed the city of Reggio, and from that time was called duke.

When he had already obtained the greater part of the region and wished to perpetuate the dominion also for his posterity, he went to Rome to Pope Nicholas II, who had formerly been bishop of Florence but was a Burgundian by nation. From the lands which he himself had acquired and which belonged to the jurisdiction of the Roman Church, he became a vassal of that Church.

He swore fidelity to the same pontiff, promising that he would preserve fidelity to the Roman Church and to that pope and his successors entering canonically. When this had been done, Pope Nicholas himself immediately invested him with the honor of his duchy through a standard. This occurred in the year of the Lord 1060.

When Pope Nicholas died and Alexander II canonically succeeded him in the papacy, a schism followed when Cadalus, bishop of Parma, was made antipope in Lombardy, as is said, by the will of Emperor Henry.

When he could not prevail, Pope Alexander, at the prayers of the emperor returning to him, celebrated a general council at Mantua, where all things were quieted. Concerning these matters there is an account above in the chapter concerning the pontiffs, and there also concerning Countess Matilda.

Section I

Concerning William, duke of the Normans, who afterward took the kingdom of England for himself.

In the tenth year of Emperor Henry IV, William, magnificent duke of Normandy, occupied the kingdom of England, as John of Colonna writes after Vincent. This William was the son of Robert, son of Richard II.

For once, at a certain feast, Robert saw a most beautiful and noble maiden dancing decorously with others in a certain ring. Captivated by her beauty, he wished her to lie with him the following night. Thereafter he loved her uniquely and for some time held her in the place of a lawful wife. By her he begot a son named William.

The mother foresaw his future greatness in a dream. For while sleeping she beheld her entrails extending throughout all Normandy and England. Moreover, at the very hour in which the boy was born, he first touched the ground and filled both hands with the dust which covered the pavement. The midwife also cried out with a favorable omen that he would be a king.

As soon as he reached adolescence he received the insignia of knighthood and took as wife Matilda, daughter of Baldwin, count of Flanders.

This religious and God-fearing man and duke magnificently built the monastery of Saint Stephen at Caen and endowed it. In it he established Lanfranc as abbot. Lanfranc afterward became archbishop of Canterbury, a man to be compared with the ancients in all knowledge and religion, concerning whom there is an account above.

William was of so great a severity that, while still a boy, he removed his paternal uncle Mauger from the archbishopric of Rouen because, forgetful of the profession of his birth, he repeatedly devoted himself to hunts and contests of birds and consumed ecclesiastical treasures in banquets and lavish expenditures.

As the report of this affair grew, Mauger lacked all use of the pallium, because the apostolic see denied the privilege of this honor to one who neglected the sacred office.

After the renowned William had governed the duchy of the Normans for a long time, he gathered a great army both of Normans and of Gauls and entered the kingdom of the English in order to occupy it. When he left the ship, his foot slipped, and he heard the nearest soldier cry out to him: “You hold England, count who will be king.”

At that time Harold, king of England, was returning from the war in which he had defeated the king of the Norwegians. Hearing that William had landed in England with a great army, he sent scouts to examine his camp.

When they were discovered within the camp, William commanded that they be led around through the tents and inspect everything without concealment. When this had been done, they were fed generously and sent back unharmed to their lord.

Returning, therefore, they reported the magnificent confidence of the duke and asserted that almost everyone in that army appeared to be a priest.

William sent a certain monk as legate to Harold, bearing three proposals: either Harold should relinquish the kingdom according to the conditions, or he should reign under William, or certainly, while both armies watched, the two of them individually should contend in battle. Harold did not deign to give an answer and expelled him with a troubled countenance.

The English spent that whole night which preceded the battle engaged in drinking, drunkenness, and songs, and passed it sleepless. The Normans, however, devoted themselves to confession of sins and in the morning communicated in the Lord’s body and blood.

Therefore, in the said battle the duke asked for his armor and by chance put on his hauberk reversed. When the servants who were arming him became alarmed, he rebuked their laughter and said: “Today my county will be turned into a kingdom.”

Battle having been joined, each army fought fiercely. At length the English turned their backs and sought safety in flight. Harold became a companion of their flight. While he strove to withdraw himself from the battle by the speed of his horse, he fell after being struck in the brain by the blow of an arrow.

While he lay there, one of the soldiers pierced the thigh of the dead man through with a lance. William marked him with disgrace because of this and deprived him also of the military belt.

In the same battle William’s strength shone forth. For on that day, by fighting, running about, and encouraging his men, he lost three very strong horses.

Therefore, after victory had been obtained, he returned the body of the slain King Harold to his mother when she requested it, without a price. On the day of the Lord’s Nativity he was crowned at York.

He sent King Harold’s standard to Pope Alexander at Rome. That standard was fashioned in the figure of a fighting man and woven with gold and stones by a costly art. From that time the Normans began to reign in England until the present day.

Section II

In the seventeenth year of this Henry IV, when Alexander II died, Gregory VII, a holy man, was created pope. Holding a council at Rome in the second year of his pontificate for the reformation of morals, he excommunicated certain nobles of Henry’s household because churches were sold by their counsel and the rights of the Church were usurped.

Afterward, in the following year, he excommunicated Sigifrid, archbishop of Mainz, because he sought to make a schism in the Church, and then Emperor Henry as his supporter. Henry was afterward absolved by him and reconciled to the Church.

But not long afterward, when the said emperor did not cease to usurp the rights of the Church, namely by making the investitures of bishops himself, and, though admonished several times, did not desist, Gregory again assembled a council and excommunicated the emperor himself.

Because of this Henry himself made a persecution against the Church and Gregory, applying himself to a new schism and making the archbishop of Ravenna [i.e., Guibert] pope, or rather antipope.

Because of this, certain men from among the Saxons and the princes of the Germans rebelled against Henry and elected Rodulf, king of Burgundy, as emperor. Gregory sent him a crown. But when Rodulf himself fought in battle against Henry with a very great army, Rodulf was defeated and killed by Henry. Henry afterward punished in manifold ways all who had rebelled against him.

Afterward, when Emperor Henry had entered Italy, approached Rome, and besieged it, Pope Gregory fled with his cardinals into the fortress of Saint Angelo. After taking the city, Henry besieged the aforesaid fortress.

But at the pope's request Robert Guiscard, duke of Apulia, was summoned to the city and arrived as quickly as possible with a very great army. Henry, however, having first heard of his arrival, fled from the city into Lombardy.

The aforesaid Robert, after taking the city, led the pope and his men out of the fortress of Saint Angelo with great glory. After being liberated from there, Gregory did not trust the Romans and went with Duke Robert himself into Apulia, where at length he died. But these matters were treated more fully above in the chapter concerning the pontiffs of this title.

During those same times the aforesaid renowned Duke Robert Guiscard received the city of Bari in Apulia into surrender after it had been worn down by a long siege. When he had now taken all Apulia and Calabria into his power, he began to aspire to dominion over Sicily.

Therefore, after ships had been gathered from every direction, he left his firstborn son Roger in Apulia and himself sailed with a great army into Sicily. With no one resisting him, he besieged Palermo, that most noble city of Sicily. After it had long been worn down by famine and frequent assaults, certain agreements intervened, and the citizens at length surrendered themselves to him. In that city the same duke caused a most beautiful church to be constructed in honor of the most blessed Virgin.

Returning to Apulia after the island had been occupied, he carried with him to Troia, as a token of his victory, bronze gates and marble columns.

After his return from there he began to persecute the duke of Salerno, his kinsman. After besieging him at Salerno by land and sea, he captured the city in the seventh month and committed the captured Duke Gisulf to prison. After taking the city he built there a most beautiful church in honor of the blessed apostle Matthew.

Section III

At that time there came into Apulia a certain man conspicuous in appearance and distinguished in eloquence. He asserted that he had formerly been Michael, emperor of Constantinople, and complained that he had been unjustly deprived of the empire. For this reason he earnestly sought the duke's aid in recovering the empire.

At first the duke was somewhat astonished. But when he saw elegance of conduct and prudence in speech in the man, he retained him with himself and treated him most honorably.

Therefore, after assembling his council, he gathered his army for the recovery—or rather for the acquisition—of the Constantinopolitan Empire. Thus, when the fleet had been assembled, he entered the sea at Otranto together with his son Boamund and his wife, and after two days landed at Avlona.

When Emperor Nicephorus heard of his arrival, he united a great army of his men and set Alexius, surnamed Mega, over the army. He assigned to him a great part of his treasury, commanding him to gather against the arriving Latins forces not only of Christians but also of Turks and gentiles.

Obeying the emperor's command, Alexius came to Adrianople and drew together a great army from every nation. Enticing it with gifts and rewards, he won the hearts of all to himself, so that some were already saying that he was most worthy of the empire.

When Alexius saw the hearts of everyone inclined toward him, being most deceitful, he conceived a nefarious design. For he said among the soldiers that he did not have money, but that he had written several times to the emperor so that money might be sent to him for supporting the army. He said that he wished to go personally to the emperor, lest so great an army and one so devoted to the empire perish from want.

Therefore he came to Constantinople. After he had spoken with the emperor about many things which appeared necessary for waging the war, he secretly departed from the city by night without the emperor's knowledge. Coming to the army, he said: "See, fellow soldiers, how grateful the imperial majesty is toward those of you who expend your strength in defense of the empire. For when with well-deserved urgency I sought your stipends from the emperor, he threatened me with death. Therefore I fled to you, fellow soldiers, imploring your fidelity. But if you will be men and will choose to follow my counsels, I shall heap riches and benefices upon you all. Therefore let us wrest the empire from this useless man, who languishes in idleness and sloth, and let us transfer it to whomever you yourselves shall decree."

On hearing these words as though they were true, the army inclined its ears. Raising a tumult, they proclaimed Alexius emperor with one voice, clothed him in purple, and obeyed him as lord.

When this had been done, Alexius returned to Constantinople with the very army which the emperor had given him to oppose Duke Robert. When Emperor Nicephorus heard of his approach, he was exceedingly stupefied. As much as the brevity of the time allowed, he fortified the city of Constantinople and commanded forces of soldiers to be gathered from every direction against the traitor.

Alexius therefore came and pitched camp not far from the city. But because he distrusted his ability to obtain by violence a city so well fortified, he turned to fraud and cunning.

At that time there was at Constantinople a certain mercenary of the emperor, a German by nation, a noble man and very dear to Emperor Nicephorus because of his experience in military affairs. His name was Armo. Alexius corrupted him with money and induced him by promises to betray to him that part of the city which the emperor had entrusted to his custody.

Attracted by his promises, Armo opened to him by night the gate which is called the Gate of the Bulgars and admitted the traitor Alexius with his army within the city.

Having entered the city, Alexius exposed it to plunder by his army on the very day which is called the Lord's Supper. His army was composed of diverse nations, among whom there was a very great multitude of Turks and other unbelievers. Gaping after booty and plunder, they spared no age or sex. Churches and monasteries were despoiled; crosses and chalices were broken; and violence was inflicted upon virgins dedicated to God. But, what it is impious to say, priests lying upon the very altars were mutilated.

When Emperor Nicephorus saw that the enemies had entered the city and that he had been betrayed by his own men, he abandoned the palace, fled, and became a monk.

After Alexius had obtained all things within the city, he caused himself to be solemnly crowned emperor on the day of the Lord's Resurrection. On that day he commanded the army thereafter to abstain from plunder and booty. But, so that he might show that he had invaded the empire not by violence but by cunning, he took Michael, the son of Emperor Nicephorus, to himself as a partner in the empire.

Meanwhile the aforesaid Duke Robert was laying waste all things like a tempest around the regions of Dalmatia with his army. For after many towns and municipalities had been captured, he was now penetrating into the interior of the empire.

After affairs within the city had been arranged, Alexius hastened to battle against the duke together with the son of Nicephorus. Coming with an innumerable army, he fortified a camp not far from Durazzo. Since the army of the Latins was not far from that place, the battle lines were arranged on both sides and battle was joined.

For some time the contest remained doubtful. At length, when the Greeks turned their backs, the emperor was defeated, and his army was laid low everywhere throughout the whole field like animals. A great multitude of Greeks perished there. Among them also died the young Michael, son of Emperor Nicephorus, whom Alexius had placed in the front of the battle for this purpose alone; he perished pierced by swords.

In this battle Emperor Alexius had sixty thousand armed soldiers from the Greeks alone and ten thousand Turks with bows and arrows, whereas there were scarcely seven hundred mailed knights in the duke's army.

Therefore Emperor Alexius fled with those who had escaped from the battle and returned to Constantinople, where he either deprived of their eyes all whom he found of imperial stock or delivered them into exile.

After the flight of Alexius, Duke Robert stormed Durazzo and reduced the whole surrounding region to his power. But when he heard that Emperor Henry had besieged Pope Gregory VII, as was said, he left his son Boamund to guard the lands which he had occupied, returned with his wife to Apulia, and liberated the pope.

While his father was absent, Boamund fought twice with Alexius, emperor of the Greeks. In the first battle he drove the emperor and his men from the field after a great number of the enemy had been killed; in the second he was surrounded by the emperor through ambushes and was defeated.

In the following year the magnanimous duke collected an army of most valiant men, crossed the sea, and invaded the regions of the Greeks. When the emperor learned this, he marveled at the man's boldness, because with so small a company he had dared to invade so great an empire.

Therefore the emperor gathered a multitude of ships, among which there was no small multitude from Italy, and especially of the Venetians, and commanded them to meet Duke Robert at sea. A naval contest was therefore joined, and battle was waged for a long time by both sides. At length, by the duke's skill, the valor of his men, and their perseverance in fighting, the imperial fleet was defeated and put to flight after a great part of its men had been lost. Many were captured in that battle and bound in chains.

Having gained this victory, the duke set his forces ashore, repaired the ships, and increased the army. When, after defeating the Greeks by sea and land, they wished to lead the army toward Constantinople, the magnanimous duke ended his last day at the island Cassiopola, which lies between Thessalonica and the island of Vallis Compatris, which is now called Jerusalem. This was in the year of the Lord 1086, in the sixty-second year of his age.

He was truly vigorous and strong in war, distinguished in body, constant in spirit, moderate, civil, provident, and cunning; a corrector of morals and a most vigilant guardian of military discipline, but a seeker of lordship beyond human estimation.

His son Roger succeeded him in the duchy. After his father's death he ruled the duchy most prudently and nobly enlarged it, but more by the munificence of benefactions than by the severity of power.

In the second year of his duchy his brother Boamund brought war upon him. Battle was joined not far from Benevento, and Boamund was driven from the field by his brother. Yet, by God's will, no one died in that battle except one man. Many, however, were captured. But when friends interposed themselves, the brothers were reconciled to one another, and Roger gave to his brother Boamund and his heirs the principality of Taranto to possess perpetually.

This Roger took as wife the daughter of Robert the Frisian, count of Flanders, who had been queen of the Danes. By her he begot in succession two sons, namely Louis and Guiscard, who died at a tender age. After their death he also begot a third son, William, who succeeded his father in the duchy but afterward placed a crown upon himself.

Section IV

In the thirty-second year of Henry IV, which was the year 1089 from the Lord's Incarnation, after Gregory VII and Victor, Urban II was created pope. Although he was a holy, religious, and vigorous man, because the emperor remained in his obstinacy, usurping the rights of the Church, such as the investitures of prelates, Urban also excommunicated Emperor Henry himself. Because of this the Church was persecuted, as was said above in the chapter concerning the pontiffs.

This Henry twice besieged Florence because it held the party of the supreme pontiff—and Florence did this justly and holily—namely, in the year of the Lord 1080, in the time of Gregory VII, and again in the year 1088, during the pontificate of Urban II, because it favored the party of Urban himself and did not cease to follow it. But he was able to harm it little or not at all, because the Lord and justice protected it, since Henry persecuted the Church as a tyrant.

In England, when William, who had subjected England to himself and made himself king, died, his son of the same name, namely William, succeeded him in the kingdom. He was wicked and criminal, very unlike his father, neither fearing God nor revering human beings.

He was so prodigal that within a short time he consumed all that his father had amassed. At length, when his money had been exhausted, he turned his mind to robberies. A certain man named Ranulf impelled him to this crime. He was sprung from a very low family but so mastered the king's mind that all things to be done in the kingdom were disposed according to his judgment.

At his instigation the sacred honors of churches were sold when bishops died. For when the death of a bishop or abbot was heard, a clerk of the king was immediately sent there. He took down in writing everything found, so that all revenues thereafter might be paid into the royal treasury. Any persons whatever were substituted in place of the deceased, not after an examination of morals but after an examination of money.

It pertains to the disgrace of that time that the venerable man Anselm, who had succeeded Lanfranc in the archbishopric of Canterbury, when he had tried to correct the king, voluntarily departed after he saw himself deprived of the fellowship of his suffragans, yielding to the wickedness of the time. When he was waiting at the port for the wind because he was now about to sail, he was stripped at the king's command as a public robber.

Moreover, when the Jews whom his father had transferred from Rouen to London approached him at a certain solemnity offering gifts, he dared to encourage them to a contest against the Christians, swearing by the Face of Lucca that, if they prevailed, he would pass over into their sect.

Therefore the affair was conducted with great fear on the part of bishops and clerics who, with pious solicitude for the Christian faith, were afraid. But, by God's will, the obstinate nation of the Jews carried away nothing from that contest except confusion.

In the second year of his reign an earthquake terrified all England with a horrible marvel, so that all buildings sprang apart at a distance and immediately settled again into their former state. A scarcity of all fruits followed, with a late ripening of the crops, so that the harvests were scarcely stored away on the feast of Andrew.

In the fourth year of his reign there was a tumult of thunderbolts, movement of whirlwinds, and violence of winds so great that many churches were cast down. Moreover, in his time there were famine and an unheard-of pestilence everywhere.

At that time there was also Fulk the Elder, count of the Angevins, who, already an old man, went as a pilgrim to Jerusalem. There he bound two servants by oath to do what he commanded. He ordained that, after a twisted rope or cord had been put around his neck, one of them should drag him, naked as he was, as far as the Lord's Sepulcher, while the other should drive him on by striking his back with the harshest scourges as the Turks watched and marveled.

Amid these things he cried: "Receive, O Lord, wretched Fulk, Your perjurer, Your fugitive." Nevertheless, this pious prince returned home against his desire.

After some years a son was born to him named Geoffrey and surnamed Marcellus [i.e., Geoffrey Martel]. He had appropriated this name for himself from Marcellus, the Roman consul, because he appeared to crush with a certain felicity all who resisted him.

For in open war he defeated and captured his lord, the Poitevin, who was superior in number and strength. After binding him in iron chains, he compelled him to ignoble conditions of peace: namely, that he should cede the city of Bordeaux and its territories and pay an annual tribute from his other lands.

But afterward that conquered man, overcome by want, iron chains, and their weight, died in prison. Geoffrey took that man's stepmother as wife and received his brothers into his guardianship.

Soon he entered the territories of Theobald, count of Blois, and besieged him in the city of Tours. After the city had been violently broken open, he captured Theobald himself. While captive, Theobald swore away the city to him and his heirs in perpetuity.

When this Geoffrey died, he left his county to Geoffrey, his sister's son. But because he was unwarlike and simple, his brother Fulk took the county away from him and committed him to perpetual custody.

This Fulk had a wife who left him and married Philip, king of the Franks. He was so captivated by love of her that she commanded him in all things. Finally, when he had become everyone's tale because of this deed, he suffered himself to be excommunicated from the whole Christian world because of his lust.

In the forty-third year of Emperor Henry IV, after the council which he celebrated at Piacenza, Pope Urban celebrated another with the prelates at Clermont in Auvergne. In it, after many holy ordinances, as was said above in the chapter concerning the pontiffs, the pope excommunicated not only the aforesaid Philip, king of the Franks, but also those who called him king or their lord, and that accursed de facto wife, until they should amend themselves and one should depart from the other. He also excommunicated Gilbert, archbishop of Ravenna, who named himself pope, and Emperor Henry, who maintained him.

At length the pope exhorted all the prelates and princes to take the cross for the recovery of the Holy Land. But concerning this there is a fuller account above, and below in another title there will be an account concerning the pilgrimage to the Holy Land.

Title XVI

Chapter VI

Concerning Saint Dunstan, abbot and afterward archbishop of Canterbury, and certain kings of England.

This Saint Dunstan began to become illustrious around the year of the Lord 940, in the time of the first Otto. He was born in the regions of England of parents noble in lineage, faith, and morals.

While his mother's womb was swelling with the sacred offspring, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-five, from Dunstan's deeds, it happened that she came with her husband and a multitude of the people to the church of the blessed Virgin Mary at Glastonbury on the day of her Purification. With lamps lit, she was present at the solemnities of the Masses.

They had already begun to recite how they brought the boy Jesus into the temple when suddenly the majesty of the Lord appeared, extinguished all the lights, and covered the entire building with darkness. While everyone stood senseless from excessive fear and indicated their astonishment by looking at one another, immediately a light sent from heaven shone within the church and lit the candle which the childbearing woman, namely Dunstan's mother, held in her hand.

If the people had marveled at the light that was lost, they were then held by still greater wonder and exultation. Everyone hastened to that candle, and from it light was extended to all.

When the infant had been born and had now begun to speak, he was carried with offerings to that same church. While they spent the night there in prayer, there appeared a man having an ethereal countenance, who said that the boy, soon to be raised to great height, was to be left there to God and proclaimed blessed throughout the ages.

While he was afflicted in his tender body by a most severe illness and death was already believed to be at the threshold, heavenly medicine visited him in the dead of night, which Christ provided to him through angelic ministry.

Immediately rising from his bed of pain, he ran to the church to give thanks to God. Those who had charge of him in his sickness were stupefied; following his footsteps with a slow pace, they investigated the outcome of the matter.

He had not yet completed half the journey when the malignant spirit met him, surrounded by a multitude of barking dogs, and strove to block the way of the one who was going. Terrified by fear, the boy cried out to Christ. Fortified by His protection, he seized a staff and, brandishing it into the face of the opposing apparition, drove it into flight with its entire company.

Coming to the church and finding its door barred, by the power of God he found himself within the church.

As an adolescent he strove to preserve chastity and flee wantonness, always to have God as the beginning of acting well, and to commend the end to Him. To his good morals he also added the study of sacred reading. Although he excelled magnificently in various arts, he claimed for himself with a certain special affection the art which is practiced upon musical instruments.

Finally, by his paternal uncle Athelin, archbishop of Canterbury, he was commended by familiar attestation to King Echelstan. Most graciously received by him in the palace, he conducted himself wisely in all things: now rising to pray to God, now sitting to judge the causes of human beings. When he saw the king wearied by secular cares, he sang to the harp or to some other musical instrument. Thus he gladdened the hearts both of the king and of the princes.

Compelled by the frequent request of a certain matron to portray a priestly stole skillfully for her, which she would afterward fashion for divine worship by transforming it into goldsmith's work, he took up his harp and went to her house. He hung the harp upon the wall and diligently began the work for which he had come.

While he applied his hand to the work but prepared his heart and lips for God, the glory of the Lord appeared in the house. Without the impulse of any human being moving it, the harp which had been fastened to the wall sounded with a most distinct modulation the melody of this antiphon: "The souls of the saints rejoice in heaven," and so forth.

Then the stupefied girls leapt up and summoned the mistress of the household and every little servant of the house, crying out that he knew more than was expedient.

The devil also inflamed certain persons with the goads of envy so that by a fabricated falsehood they might injure his reputation before the king. They asserted that he was imbued with evil arts and that whatever he did was worked not by divine aid but, for the most part, by the illusion of demons.

Perceiving that the king's countenance was not toward him as it had formerly been, he prepared to depart from the palace, preferring to abandon him rather than to be abandoned by him.

When this was discovered, his rivals blocked his way with ambushes. They cast him from his horse, afflicted him with torments, and at length, entangled in bonds, cast him into a cistern which was nearby. There he was found by certain human beings who were passing by, and by their compassion he was transferred to a village to be cared for.

He therefore understood that this was the beginning of the contest of which the divine harper had lately forewarned him.

Section I

Departing from there, he went to Elphege, his kinsman, bishop of the church of Winchester. Elphege frequently asked him to put on the monastic habit, so that he who had the beginnings of an angelic manner of life might demonstrate perseverance in the habit.

Dunstan answered that he was of more excellent grace who had grown old in the world and nevertheless had done the things worthy of a monk than he who had given himself to a monastery and after this could do nothing other than what had been prescribed for him. “The one,” he said, “is of necessity; the other, of liberty.”

To this the bishop said: “There is one common necessity for all: that whoever wishes to escape the fire of Gehenna should strive to extinguish the fire of concupiscence. It is not greatly extinguished if its fuel is not withdrawn from the human senses. As for that which is chiefly desired in the world, it is the liberty of the human being; for when this is given up, the other things cannot be possessed. Therefore, so that you may give to God what you love most, you cease to have it.”

While the bishop pressed upon him daily with words of this kind, a most severe fever invaded Dunstan while he remained in doubt and brought him to despair of life. At length, growing warm again beyond hope, he said: “I renounce the laws of pleasure. The Son of the Virgin has preserved me a virgin until now; the Queen of Virgins shall have me a virgin.”

Immediately summoning the bishop, he asked that the blessing of religion be given to him without delay. Then the bishop, filled with joy, advanced him by monastic and priestly grace, attaching him to the church of the blessed Virgin Mary, to whom the betrothal of his parents had dedicated him from the beginning.

When he had instructed him against the wiles of the devil, he dismissed him as he proceeded to the place where his life had begun. There he dwelt in the church of the blessed Virgin Mary, doing those things which the pious rule of religion required.

By his own labors he built a cell, or rather a cave, adjoining it. It bore not so much the form of a human habitation as that of a sepulcher. For, as I who have seen it judge, its length was not more than five feet, while its width measured two and a half feet. Its height, moreover, expresses the stature of a human being if one stands in the excavated earth; otherwise it scarcely reaches to the middle of the breast. A little window opened in the middle of the small door, through which light shone upon him as he worked.

But the devil, who had formerly not permitted him to dwell in the palace, now also strove to drive him from the hut. The deceiver, therefore, having assumed the deceptive appearance of a human being, approached the young man’s cell beneath the darkness of evening. Putting his head inside, he leaned upon the window. Seeing Dunstan occupied with smith’s work, he asked that some work be fashioned for him.

Dunstan did not perceive his cunning and applied his mind to the work that was requested. Meanwhile the enemy began to arrange words in a perverse composition, to insert the names of women, and to recall acts of lust. Then he displayed religion, and again repeated the same things.

Then the athlete of Christ, understanding who he was, began to heat strongly the pincers with which he held the iron and to invoke Christ with compressed lips. Then, moved by holy fury, he quickly snatched the glowing pincers from the fire, enclosed the spectral face within them, and, straining with all his strength, dragged the monster inward.

He was already drawing strength by standing when the one who was being held tore away part of the wall and escaped from the hands of the one holding him, uttering such howls with an immense roar: “Oh, what has that bald man done?” Dunstan had thin but beautiful hair, and therefore the demon cried such things about him.

In the morning a multitude of the neighboring people gathered to him, asking what that cry had been which had terrified them as they slept with so great a violence. He said: “It was the fury of a demon. Act cautiously against him, because if you could not bear the voice of the one when angry, how will you endure the fellowship of the damned one?”

After these things, fighting against the enemy with fasting and prayer, together with chastity of body he obtained so great a purity of heart that scarcely anything which the sinister spirit had attempted could be hidden from him. His fame also ran through the whole region and kindled the hearts of everyone to see him.

When King Echelstan died, his brother Edmund assumed the monarchy of the kingdom. Having received from him power over the royal residence which was called Glaston, Dunstan began to lay the foundations of a narrower church and to construct workshops according to the model once shown to him by an angel measuring the building itself. He also gathered a great flock of monks there.

Having been made their first abbot, he brought them to so great a perfection of justice that bishops did not cease to be chosen from among them and abbots taken for all the churches round about.

When the man of God, overcome by royal entreaties, proceeded to visit the church of Bath, while he prayed there alone he was suddenly caught up to the things above. He beheld the soul of a certain disciple, whom he had nobly educated at Glastonbury, surrounded by an innumerable company of angels, suffused with immeasurable light, and carried to heaven. He immediately commended it into the hands of divine mercy.

On his return, as he went to the king who very eagerly desired to speak with him, he caught sight of the devil dancing like a jester before those who were riding and glorying as though over some future gain. When he had announced his presence to the people who were with him and by command had disclosed to all his horrible form, he was afterward asked what the petulant joy of that monster portended. He announced that the death of the king and a change of kingdom were near.

The truth of events immediately answered his prophecy. For within seven days the king was killed, and the distinguished Edred, pious and just, succeeded to the kingdom by his brother's right. Thereafter Dunstan became as it were the king and the emperor of the king.

Section II

When Elphege, bishop of Winchester, had passed from the life of the present age to the spiritual life, the king approached Dunstan and asked him to receive as its pastor the church deprived of pastoral consolation. But when he saw that he could not persuade Dunstan to this, he imposed upon the queen mother Cadina, who was very dear to him, the task of persuading him.

When she urged this and he refused, she still pressed him with arguments. Somewhat moved, he said: "Hold it most certain that in the days of your son I shall not be raised by the pontifical infula."

Then, bearing a wavering mind, he gave himself to his chamber. While he turned many things over with himself there, sleep stole upon him. And behold, Christ's apostles Peter, Paul, and Andrew were present, by whom he was most gloriously greeted.

He looked upon Andrew nodding with a cheerful countenance and declaring in placid words: "Take My yoke upon you and learn from Me, because I am meek."

Then, commanded by blessed Peter to extend his left hand, he received a light blow from a cracking rod, hearing this from him: "Let this be to you both the punishment for the rejected episcopate and the sign that a pontificate is not to be rejected hereafter."

Waking at the touch of this little rod, he gave thanks to God, by whom he perceived that he had been so honored. When he had related to the king what he had seen, he was glorified by the sign of the divine foretelling and, moreover, by the king's own interpretation was designated as the future pontiff of Canterbury.

The king was afterward seized by a deadly illness and sent messengers to summon him, so that Dunstan might be the hearer of his confession and his faithful intercessor before God. Grieved in soul, he hastened swiftly toward the palace and tirelessly wearied limbs spent by fasts.

Because God did not permit him to be afflicted any longer, a voice fell from heaven: "Behold, King Edred has fallen asleep in the Lord." At the utterance of this voice the horse upon which he sat was struck and died.

Those accompanying him trembled, hearing indeed the trembling of one thundering but not understanding who thundered. Dunstan disclosed the matter to them and commended the soul of the dead king into the hands of the eternal King. Entering the palace, he discharged the office of burying him.

After him arose Edwy, son of King Edmund, a foolish youth, flourishing in no grace for ruling. Like another Rehoboam, he despised the elders, followed the counsels of boys, and burned unceasingly with lust.

Gravely offended by these things, the holy man began frequently and sharply to rebuke him. Edwy laughed at the one rebuking him and threatened him with many evils. When Dunstan saw that his diligence prevailed not at all, he decreed to abstain entirely from conversation with him. Therefore, leaving him, he withdrew to the monastery.

In that place there was a tower which no covering yet enclosed at its summit. While the people strove to set upon the highest walls the beam that supported the whole work, suddenly the ropes broke and it began to fall. When all the people cried out for Dunstan, he flew to them at their repeated shouts.

The holy man, more swiftly than speech, traced the sign of the cross opposite the machine. The holy hand had not yet drawn back its fingers when the beam, neither bound by cords nor raised by machines, was seen to be carried back to the place from which it had begun to fall.

Moreover, envying this glory, the devil, transformed into the appearance of a bear, attacked him as he prayed with gaping jaws. Casting in his claws, he embraced the pastoral staff which Dunstan held in his hand and strove to draw it toward himself.

But Dunstan, strengthened by the Spirit of God, drew the staff back toward himself, raised it on high, and did not cease beating the fleeing beast until the staff appeared to have been broken into three parts upon its back. Defeated in himself, the devil sought to defeat his victor in others.

For the aforesaid Edwy, king of England, on the very day on which he had been consecrated, publicly rolled himself in shameful couplings. Because the entire senatorial order was offended by this, Dunstan was compelled by the common wish of all. He went and violently dragged the king away from the adulteress and the adulterous bed and led him before the supreme pontiff, namely Odo, archbishop of Canterbury.

Therefore the devil instigated the concubine's spirit; the concubine heightened the king's anger; and both attempted exile against Dunstan. When he had come to Glastonbury and had been proscribed at the urging of the king's edict, amid the tears of the monks reared under his hands, amid the lamentations of friends, and amid the groans of the poor refreshed by him, there was heard in the court of the church the voice of the applauding devil, as though of a laughing young woman.

Looking up at him with a severe brow, the saint said: "You shall glory in nothing over my exile, because there is more for you to grieve over when I return than anything over which you can rejoice while I am an exile." When this had been said, the malignant one departed.

Nor did the madness of the furious woman thus cease. After those who had sheltered the exiled man of God had been searched out, proscribed, and condemned, she sent ministers to tear out their eyes.

But the mercy of Christ, looking upon the people of the English deprived of so great a shepherd, aroused their hearts against the impious king. Gathered into a crowd, they pursued with arms the king as he fled with the adulteress. They cut the sinews of the woman when she had been captured, drove the king himself, as he wandered through diverse places, beyond the river Thames, and established his brother Edgar as king.

After celebrating a council of the kingdom, Edgar annulled all things which had been decreed by his brother through iniquitous laws. He also restored everything violently taken away by him and recalled from exile with great glory the man of God Dunstan, who was then abbot.

Finally, when the most impious King Edwy had died and passed into the lot of demons, Dunstan did not know what had been done concerning him and was intent upon devout meditations in the church over which he presided. And behold, before his sight the infernal cohort exulted as though it were leading a dance.

When the saint inquired into the cause of their gladness, he heard that the king had died and that his soul was immediately to be delivered to the punishment of Gehenna, but that first this was to be announced to Dunstan by divine command.

Immediately moved by compassion, he cast himself upon the ground and, weeping copiously, did not cease praying to God until he learned that the king had been liberated.

After a short delay the infernal legion returned in sadness, breaking forth into these cries: "O man alien to fidelity and always ungrateful for our benefactions! We came to avenge your injuries, and behold, confounded by your hostile rebukes, we return."

When he commanded the demons to bring forth the truth, he learned that the king's soul had been taken from them by angelic power and had passed into the lot of penitents.

Then, exulting in the Lord, he restrained their furies by this reasoning: "If," he said, "this man sinned against Christ, he also sinned against me. What therefore Christ and I have deigned to forgive, with what temerity do you dare wickedly to censure?" Struck by this sentence as though by a Parthian arrow, the foul spirits scattered after the manner of flies carried away by the wind.

Section III

After the death of Saint Odo, archbishop of Canterbury, Edgar wearied Dunstan with entreaties. At length Dunstan was overcome by the importunity of the king himself and of all the bishops, and Edgar established him as primate and patriarch of Canterbury, the first metropolis of the English.

He immediately proceeded to Rome for the strength of apostolic authority. Pope John merited to see him and, after adorning him with the pontifical insignia, sent him back like a pillar of light to illuminate the land of the English people.

On the first day of his arrival, while he stood at the sacred altars and reached out to distribute the life-giving bread to the people of God, suddenly the building was covered by a cloud. The dove once seen by John in the Jordan appeared and remained over him until the sacrifice had been consumed.

But the devil, wishing to disturb the joys of the Church, induced the king's mind to love a certain virgin consecrated to God. For once, when he was a young man, he came into the monastery situated at Winchester. There a certain maiden sprung from the nobles of the English was being raised among the holy nuns in their common habit. Seeing and desiring her, he sent for her.

In her fear, she placed upon her own head a veil snatched from a certain nun and so came to the king. On seeing her he said: "How suddenly have you been made a nun?" Removing the veil, he inflicted violence upon her.

When this sin had been perpetrated and brought to the public hearing of the people, Dunstan, perceiving these things, was afflicted with great sorrow. The devil had been unable to cast him down and therefore attempted to cast him down into sorrow through the one whom he loved most, namely the king, after he had thus fallen into a crime.

Dunstan, therefore, affected with bitterness over the offense against God, went intrepidly to rebuke him, like another Nathan to another David. Rising to Dunstan, the king extended his hand in order to lead him to the royal throne. Dunstan refused to give his hand, turned his eyes upon him with indignation, and said: "Do you dare to touch the hand of a pontiff, you who did not fear to seize a virgin betrothed by the gift of divinity? I do not wish to be the friend of one to whom Christ is an enemy."

Terrified by the thunder of his words, the king immediately prostrated himself at his feet, tearfully confessed the crime, and humbly begged pardon. When the pontiff saw this, he was astonished. Suffused with tears himself, he raised from the ground the king who was drenched with tears.

Then, after he had set forth the magnitude of the sin by amplification and rendered the king ready for every satisfaction, he imposed upon him a penance of seven years: throughout this whole period he was not to wear the crown of the kingdom; he was to pass a two-day fast each week; he was to distribute treasures generously to the poor; and, moreover, he was to found at Flensconia a monastery for virgins consecrated to God, so that he who had taken one from God through sin might gather many to Him through a religious congregation.

He enjoined many other things upon him also. There was nothing which the king carried out either less fully or more sluggishly than had been commanded by the ruler of his life.

In the seventh year, when the time of penance had been completed, the sacred prelate summoned all the princes, bishops, and abbots of the English Empire and placed the crown of the kingdom upon the king before the multitude of the people, as all rejoiced and praised God in Dunstan.

He also lifted from the sacred font the boy begotten from the sinful woman. Giving him the name Edward, he adopted him as a son.

This Edgar was so severe in his holiness that there was no private thief or public robber there, unless someone preferred to make an attack upon the fortunes of others at the cost of his own life.

Moreover, he resolved to exterminate from the kingdom beasts of every kind greedy for blood. Hence he commanded Widualus, king of the Welsh, to pay him each year a tribute of three hundred wolves. After he had done this for three years, he ceased in the fourth, professing that none could be found any longer.

Edgar was of a most slender body and immense strength, so that he challenged any bold man to a contest. Fearing above all lest he be considered afraid in such a clash, throughout every summer after Easter he commanded ships to be assembled along all the shores. With the eastern fleet he sailed to the western part of the island; after traversing it, he sailed with the western fleet to the northern part; and from there he was accustomed to sail with the northern fleet to the eastern part, so that he might ascertain whether any pirates disturbed navigation.

In winter and spring he rode through all the provinces, examining the judgments of the powerful, lest they violate justice.

Once the king had gone hunting and asked Dunstan, who happened then to be with him, to delay Mass until he returned. As the third hour approached, the man of God, clothed in sacred vestments, waited for the king, standing with his elbows resting upon the altar and given to tears.

Then, suddenly overcome by a light sleep, he was caught up into heaven. Mingled with the angels, he heard them sing of the Holy Trinity in measured voices: "Kyrie eleison. Christe eleison. Kyrie eleison."

Retaining their chant, he returned to himself and asked whether the king had arrived. The answer was, “No.” He therefore prayed again and was again caught up into heaven, and there heard it said with a most exalted voice: “Go, the Mass is ended.”

When he answered, “Thanks be to God,” the king’s clerics ran in, saying that the king was present. Dunstan answered them that he had already heard Mass and was neither to hear nor to celebrate another on that day.

When he was asked why, he disclosed the vision. Taking instruction from this discourse, he prohibited the queen from going hunting thereafter on the Lord’s Day. He taught the clerics the “Kyrie eleison” which he had heard in heaven, and today it is sung in many places throughout England.

Section IV

This Edgar, king of the English, son of Edmund and brother of King Edwy, began to reign, as Vincent relates in the place cited above after William, around the year of the Lord 1000. At his birth Dunstan is said to have heard an angelic voice: “Peace to England for as long as this boy shall reign and Dunstan shall live.”

He reigned for sixteen years, and there was scarcely any year of his reign in which he did not found a new monastery.

He bound to himself by a perpetual oath the king of the Scots, Kinadius; Malcholinus of the Cumbrians; the chief pirate Mascesius; and all the kings of the Welsh, five in number. When they met him at the City of the Legions, he led them through the river in the pomp of a triumph, placed together in one boat. He himself sat at its prow, and they rowed.

The Saxons came, stirred by his fame, to see him, as did the Flemings and the Danes. From them the English at that time learned an uncultivated ferocity of spirit from the Saxons, enervated softness of bodies from the Flemings, and drinking from the Danes.

At that time Dunstan flourished in England: first a monk of Glastonbury, afterward made abbot of Glastonbury, afterward made bishop of Winchester, and soon archbishop of Canterbury. He possessed much power in the world and great grace before God. After King Alfred, concerning whom above, he was a marvelous promoter of the liberal arts and a magnificent repairer of royal places.

In order to restrain the drinking of his fellow countrymen, he commanded golden or silver nails to be affixed to drinking vessels, so that, while each person recognized his own limit, out of yielding shame neither would he himself seek more nor compel another to seek it.

His disciple was Athelwold, who from being a monk of Glastonbury became abbot of Abingdon and afterward bishop of Winchester. As bishop of one city he did as many and as great things as the king of the whole of England would scarcely appear able to do. He expelled the clerics from Winchester and placed monks there in their stead.

Oswald also flourished at that time. He was a nephew of Archbishop Odo, who had preceded Dunstan. From being a monk of Fleury he became bishop of Worcester and afterward archbishop of York. He built the monastery of Ramsey in a certain marshy place. He expelled the clerics from Worcester and placed regular monks there in their stead.

Once this same Edgar, king of England, was wearied in the hunt and, dissolved in sleep, lay beneath a wild apple tree. Then behold, a pregnant female hunting dog was pursuing a beast. Lying down beside his feet, she awakened him as he slept. For although she herself was silent, the pups enclosed in her womb gave forth manifold and sonorous barking.

Astounded, the king directed his eyes toward the top of the tree and saw one apple and then another fall into the river. When they collided and watery bubbles curled against one another, an articulate voice sounded forth in this manner: “Vuelhiste,” that is, “It is well for you.”

Not long afterward, amid the silver coils of the waves, a small ewer appeared upon the water, and after the small ewer came a pitcher overflowing with water, for the former smaller vessel was empty. Although the larger one repeatedly pressed upon the smaller one by the impulse of the whirlpool so that it might pour its waters into it, it was never able to prevent the empty small ewer from withdrawing. Then the pitcher, as though with a proud gesture and as victor, attacked the small ewer again.

After this vision the anxious king returned home and disclosed everything to his mother, to whom, as to a holy woman, God was accustomed to reveal many things. She was called Elfiga and was so pious and so gentle that she would secretly redeem from the palace even accused persons whom a judgment had condemned. Whenever she saw a poor person, she immediately gave him any precious garment. She was most beautiful in body, most prudent in the craft of her hands, and intent upon every good work.

At length, therefore, in the morning she said to her son: “The barking which the pups gave while their mother rested signifies that after your death, while those who now flourish are at rest, scoundrels not yet born will bark against the Church of God.

“That one apple followed the other in such a way that at the collision of the second with the first the voice ‘Vuelhiste’ appeared to have sounded signifies this: from you, who after the likeness of a great tree overshadow all England, two sons will proceed. The supporters of the second will extinguish the first. Then the instigators of the different parties will say to the boys of both sides, ‘Vuelhiste,’ because the dead one will reign in heaven and the living one in the world.

“That the larger pitcher could not fill the smaller one signifies that the northern peoples, who are more numerous than the English, will attack England after your death. Although by the frequent arrival of their fellow countrymen they may fill up their own losses, they will never be able to fill this corner of the world; but our English, when they appear most defeated, will expel them.”

In the twelfth year of Henry III, the year 1050 of the Lord’s Incarnation, Abbot Adilpardus found the body of this Edgar, king of England, who was buried at Glastonbury, incorrupt. Because the small resting place which Edgar had prepared was narrower than the size of the body, as Vincent relates in the place cited above, the abbot dared to violate the royal remains with iron. Immediately blood spurted forth in waves.

Then the royal body was placed in the shrine which he had given to the church, above the altar, together with the head of Saint Apollinaris and the relics of Saint Vincent, which Edgar had bought at a great price.

The abbot who had violated the sacred body immediately lost his courage, and not long afterward death found him when he had departed from the church. At the saint’s body a mad and blind man was healed.

Nowhere among the nations, as I think, will you find so many bodies of saints uncorrupted after death as in England. They present an appearance of the future incorruption. I believe this was done divinely so that a nation situated almost outside the world might be animated to hope for the resurrection by considering so many bodies which endure incorrupt.

These are Saint Etheldreda and Saint Wiuburga, virgins; King Eadmund; Archbishop Elphege; and Eutbert, an ancient father. All these, with skin inviolate and joints flexible as reeds, retain a certain vital appearance of sleeping persons.

Section V

Concerning the constancy of Dunstan, archbishop of Canterbury, and the severity of his justice.

At that time a certain count had married his kinswoman. Corrected by Dunstan, he was unwilling to obey by leaving her. He was excommunicated. The count approached the king, complaining about Dunstan. The king commanded the archbishop to absolve him. Dunstan was unwilling, but excommunicated him more gravely.

The count sent to Rome with many gifts. The apostolic pontiff commanded Dunstan to absolve him. Dunstan said: “Far be it that, for the sake of any mortal human being, I should despise the law of my God.”

Seeing this, the count repented and repudiated that wife. With bare feet, clothed in wool, and carrying rods in his hand, he fell at the feet of Dunstan while he was celebrating a general council, and then for the first time he was absolved.

Once three makers of false money were captured. They were immediately adjudged to undergo the penalty promulgated throughout England for such a crime, namely the cutting off of their hands.

Dunstan was not unaware of this. Therefore, when he was about to celebrate Mass on the day of Pentecost, he asked whether that law had been fulfilled. The answer was that, out of reverence for the feast of Pentecost, the penalty had been delayed until the next day.

“By no means,” he said. “Today I shall not approach the altar until they have undergone the penalty owed, for the matter pertains to me.” The men themselves were in his power.

He said these things, and by weeping greatly for those who were about to lose their hands he revealed with what affection he had spoken them. When they had been punished, he ascended to the altar with a joyful countenance, saying: “Now I trust that the Lord will receive the sacrifice from my hand,” and so forth.

During that Mass, while he said, “Your Church, which You deign to pacify, guard, aid, and govern,” a snow-white dove descended over him as many looked on. With its wings spread above his head, it remained thus in silence until he completed the sacrifice.

When it had been completed, the dove turned toward the tomb of the aforesaid Odo, his predecessor. It embraced the tomb with its wings and kissed it with its beak. For this reason, whenever Dunstan afterward passed before his tomb, he always bent his knees and afterward called him “Odo Sodo,” that is, “Odo the Good.”

When Dunstan departed from the altar, the ministers were going in different directions because of the sign which had occurred. There was no one to receive his chasuble. It hung in the air and did not touch the ground, lest it disturb the servant of God from his intention.

Once he was dedicating the church of a certain nobleman. When water was lacking for the ministry and that nobleman was disturbed, the man of God first offered prayer, struck the ground with his staff, and a spring burst forth. Flowing to this day, it makes his name celebrated.

At another time he was dedicating a certain church. When he perceived that it was not turned toward the east, he pressed it a little with his shoulder, and immediately it is said to have turned toward the east.

Meanwhile, in certain places the clerical order was conducted in so great a confusion that not only did it possess nothing more excellent than the life of secular persons, but it lay far beneath even wicked persons in evil deeds. Troubled by this, the shepherds of the churches approached Dunstan as their own primate and set forth the matters badly conducted.

Against the nefarious men he pronounced the sentence of his authority: either one must live canonically or depart from the churches. From this it happened that very many clerics of churches, when they disdained to be corrected under the proposed condition, were expelled by the authority of the pontiff.

When they accused him of injury, professing themselves to be lovers of virtue, Dunstan assembled a council and came to Winchester. There, by the sentence of the whole council, he gained victory over his adversaries.

When they saw that nothing remained for them by right, they used royal assistance and that of the princes and turned to prayers. By these they demanded of the bishop that the persons introduced into the churches should be expelled and those expelled should be restored.

While the man of God remained doubtful and answered nothing to what was requested, behold, the form of the Lord's body, fastened to the standard of the cross and placed in a higher part of the building, expressed human speech and checked the voices of all, saying: "Far be it that this should be done. Far be it that this should be done."

At this voice the king and all the elders were terrified and together filled the hall with shouting and praise of God. With these adversaries looking on, an end was indeed made to the contentions, until through succession the discord was renewed.

Then they departed and, taking as defender of their iniquity a certain bishop of the Scots who was ingenious and eloquent, went to the man of God and proposed the scandal with a swelling spirit.

But Dunstan, broken by long old age and the labors of the Church and now setting aside all things except prayer, hurled this weapon of an answer at the enemies: "Why," he said, "did you not put forward the cause of your calumny when so much time had elapsed? But now you compel me, growing old and giving my effort to silence, to serve old quarrels. I confess that I do not wish to conquer you. I commit the cause of His Church to Christ the Judge."

The judgment of the angered God confirmed what he said. Immediately the building was shaken, and the upper room was dissolved beneath their feet. The enemies were cast to the ground and crushed by the weight of the falling beams. But where the saint reclined with his men, there was no inundation of ruin.

Section VI

Concerning Dunstan's prophecy against the royal house, the killing of the king, and Dunstan's passing.

King Edgar, taken by an untimely death, left his son Edward as successor both of the kingdom and of his morals. When certain palatine princes were unwilling to acquiesce in his election, Dunstan seized the standard of the cross which by custom was carried before him, placed Edward in their midst, displayed him to them, elected him, and consecrated him. As long as Edward lived, Dunstan expended upon him the affection of a father and master.

But after three years he was killed through the deceit of his stepmother in this manner. For Dunstan had made Edward king, as has been said, contrary to the will of the stepmother, Queen Elfrida, because she herself wished to make king her son begotten from Edgar, a boy not yet seven years old, so that she might reign for him.

Angered because of this, she planned Edward's death with her accomplices. Hence, one day when the still-adolescent Edward was returning from the hunt and his companions had dispersed here and there, because he was very thirsty a certain man offered him a cup, and while he drank another attendant, induced by Queen Elfrida, pierced him with a dagger.

Miracles testified to his innocent death and the probity of his life. Lights from heaven were shown there; a lame man recovered his gait, a mute man speech, and a blind man sight.

When Queen Elfrida came there, her horse standing there could be moved by no spurs. The horse was changed, but the second also could not be moved.

After the sacred body had been raised from the ignoble place and honorably committed to burial, a certain cleric named Elpherius, who was contrary to Saint Dunstan's ordinances, had destroyed almost all the monasteries which Ethnold [i.e., Athelwold] had built. Together with other clerics who, because of their dissolute life, had been expelled from their churches when Dunstan substituted honorable and suitable clerics, he stirred up wars. As though rejoicing over Edward's killing, he discharged the royal funeral rites at Scestonia. But after a year he was consumed by the worms which are called lice.

Echelred, son of Edgar and Elfrida, succeeded his slain brother Edward in the kingdom of England and reigned for thirty-six years. When he was recently born and was being baptized, he defecated in the sacred font in the presence of the bishops, as Vincent says after William, and polluted the sacraments. Troubled, Dunstan said: "By God, this man will be slothful."

When he had become ten years old and heard that his brother had been killed, by crying with raging lamentation he so moved his mother that, because she did not have a whip at hand, she seized candles and beat the innocent boy. She did not cease until he was almost lifeless and she herself was drenched with tears.

For this reason he so abhorred candles throughout his whole life that he never permitted their light to be brought before him.

When this matter was known to Dunstan, Echelred was hateful to him because of so great a crime. Nevertheless, it was not his counsel to resist because Echelred was the king's son and appeared then to be the nearest heir.

Yet on the day of his consecration, when Dunstan was present to place the diadem upon his head, he said before everyone standing around: "Because through your brother's death you have aspired to the kingdom, therefore hear the word of the Lord. Thus says the Lord God: The sin of your infamous mother and the sin of the men who took part in her wicked counsel will not be blotted out except by much blood of the wretched provincials. Evils such as it has not suffered up to the present time will come upon the nation of the English."

The aforesaid Queen Elfrida afterward returned to herself and greatly repented of the crime perpetrated. She maintained an austere life in a monastery and devoutly migrated from this light, furnishing to those who truly turn to God confidence not in doing evil but in obtaining pardon for crimes perpetrated.

At length, when the day of the Lord's Ascension was at hand and the vigils had been completed, Saint Dunstan remained alone in prayer in the church. He looked, and behold, an innumerable multitude of persons clothed in white, bearing golden crowns upon their heads and flashing with an inestimable splendor, burst in through the church's door, gathered in a mass before him, and greeted him with one voice in this manner: "Hail, our Dunstan, hail. The Son of God, whom you piously desire, commands you that, if you are ready, you should come and celebrate with us this day for whose joy you sigh."

Remaining unafraid at this, he asked who they were. They said: "We are Cherubim and Seraphim. Answer what you wish."

He answered: "Today is a most solemn day, and it falls to me to refresh the people with the bread of God's word and to show them how they may be able to attain this joy. For this reason many have assembled, and I ought not deceive them. Therefore I cannot come."

They said: "Come now, be prepared, so that on the coming Sabbath you may be ready to come hence to Rome with us and to sing eternally before the supreme Pontiff: 'Holy, holy, holy.'" After these things they departed.

Therefore, when the Gospel had been read at Mass on that day, he spoke to the people such things as he had never spoken before. Returning to the altar, he celebrated the mysteries.

When the blessing over the people was reached, he again withdrew from the altar to preach, so that you would think not a human being but an angel was speaking. Again he returned to the altar, and after giving the blessing he again returned to the people, as all were astonished.

As soon as he opened his mouth to speak, his face shone with so great a brightness that no one could look upon him. He foretold that his death was at hand, promising them that he would never fail them. Then he returned to the Lord's table.

On the same day, after he had risen from the table upon taking food, he went to the oratory and designated the place in which he wished to be buried. Soon illness invaded him. On Friday he lay down upon his bed and incited all who came to follow the footsteps of Christ.

On the Sabbath he communicated again. While he awaited his hour, he was suddenly raised together with the bed upon which he lay as far as the upper parts. With the beams preventing him from being raised above them, he was gently lowered to the earth. This happened three times.

Then he said to those standing around: “You see that I am called. If you wish to come with me, go by the way by which I have walked. God calls me. May He Himself direct your hearts and bodies toward His will in peace.” When everyone had answered, “Amen,” he passed from this world to the Father.

The blessed passing of this saint occurred in the year of the Lord 989, the thirty-third year of his patriarchate, and about the seventieth year of his age.

Osbern, cantor of Canterbury, described his life. As Vincent relates after William, he was second to no one in our time in style and first of all in music.

After Dunstan’s death the Lord glorified His saint through many prodigies. A certain woman blind from birth received sight; another person, lame from the womb, was perfectly healed. A certain man excommunicated by his bishop because of pleasures, and for this reason delivered to Satan and made foolish for seven years, was liberated at Dunstan’s tomb.

A paralytic who had been healed by him was afterward seized immediately by his former disease because of his ingratitude. In a banquet, as though insulting Dunstan, he had said: “Even if Dunstan had not existed, I would have been healed.” Crying out miserably, he died.

It was the custom in the same monastery where Dunstan had once been abbot and was afterward buried for all the boys in the schools to be beaten before the fifth day preceding the Lord’s Nativity. This was done not, however, for faults, but merely from custom, perhaps so that they might become accustomed to bear patiently, even without reasonable cause, the commands of masters and prelates.

The masters were asked to pardon them on that day. They were unwilling, but all prepared themselves for the rods. That night Saint Dunstan appeared in a vision to one of them, saying: “Why are you so afraid, O boys?”

“Because, lord,” he said, “the fury of the masters cannot be calmed.”

“Do not be afraid,” Dunstan said. “I shall calm them. I am Dunstan, father of this monastery. This will be the sign to you that I shall liberate you. Go and tell the custodian of the church to remove from the church the body of Harold’s son, whom the hateful flattery of certain persons has dared rashly to bury beside me, although he was a pagan. If he does not do this quickly, this whole church will suffer grave damage.”

Dawn was now breaking, an hour terrible to the boys, and the masters stood armed with knotted straps, awaiting the boys who were to pass before them. And behold, suddenly all the masters fell asleep, and there was no one to touch the boys as they passed through their midst.

The youth carried the command to the custodians, who despised it. Afterward Dunstan was seen by certain monks to depart from the place. When they detained him and asked why he was withdrawing, he answered that he could not bear the stench of the pagan flesh and the iniquities of certain persons living there.

“If this matter,” he said, “is not amended, this whole city and this church will pay the penalty.” Not long afterward the city was burned, together with the whole church and its workshops, except for the dormitory, the refectory, and the cloisters which adjoined them.

Chapter VII

There flourished in England another archbishop of Canterbury named Elphege—not the one who had been Dunstan's kinsman and a bishop. From being a bishop he was translated to be archbishop, or patriarch, of Canterbury, and at length was crowned with martyrdom in the year of the Lord 1003, in the time of Emperor Henry II.

As Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-six, chapter one, from his deeds, he was once sprung from most splendid ancestry and was handed over to be imbued with letters. After he had read and thoroughly read those things which appeared sufficient for salvation, he turned the whole study of philosophy toward loving God.

When he wished to enter the path of a stricter life, he came to the place which is called Bath. There he constructed a dwelling and enclosed himself, restraining himself with marvelous rigor.

Without delay all the nobles flowed together to seek his spiritual counsel. Many also came under his discipline, intending to imitate his life and habit.

When there was a very spacious residence, he himself imposed upon the disciples the law of perfect sobriety and taught them to moderate carnal passions. He withdrew into a most confined little house, after appointing a provost to bring him provisions. Nevertheless, the causes of the highest affairs were brought to him.

Many of his disciples, however, despised his admonitions, forgot their profession, and possessed nothing of a common life. In the middle of the nights they were accustomed to eat stolen food, devote themselves to drunkenness, act wantonly, and perpetrate altogether dishonorable things insofar as their hidden boldness permitted.

But the anger of God killed the man who was chief in this crime, enveloping him in a horrible and sudden judgment.

On the night which followed the day of his burial, while Elphege celebrated the sacred vigils according to custom and offered sacrifice to the Lord, it happened that strong voices were heard within the enclosure of the monastery. Therefore he hastened quickly toward the monastery. With his ears stunned, he caught the sound and distinguished words. He burst into the house.

And behold, the man who had recently died lay miserably afflicted upon the ground. Human beings of horrible appearance stood over him and scourged him with ox-hide thongs and fiery serpents. While he howled because of the anguish of pain, they reproached him with this: "Neither you to God, nor we to you." Repeating the same words several times, they dragged the captive from the place.

Then the saint withdrew and passed the remainder of the night sleepless in weeping. When the sun had risen, he gathered the disciples together and related what he had learned through God's manifestation. He saw some chant psalms, others weep, and all tremble.

But those who had held the dead man as an associate in crime sprang into their midst. They confessed their error and asked that their evil deeds be punished, lest they remain liable to divine vengeance. When they were asked where they had held the place of their feasting, they pointed out to him the place in which the wicked spirits had tortured the dead man's soul.

Thus pious God, because of the excellent merits of the man, while He was unwilling for the crime of one to lie hidden, wished the evils of all to be uncovered; and while He was unwilling to spare one, He wished the diseases of all to be healed.

Meanwhile, when the bishop of Winchester had died, Saint Dunstan, bishop of Canterbury, who presided as primate over all the cities established in England and also over the other regions subject to the kingdom of the English, learned that a great dissension of parties had arisen over the election of a bishop of Winchester. Fearing that this would become a scandal to many and a loss of souls, he prayed the Lord to deign to show what suitable shepherd ought to succeed in governing the church.

Although the clerics and monks, and he himself likewise, multiplied their prayers to the Lord, behold, Andrew the Apostle appeared and employed this oracle: "Why, dearest one, are you saddened, and why do you utter such mournful complaints with tears? Arise and lay your hand upon Abbot Elphege, and establish him as priest of the desolate church. Nor let the power of any persons hinder you, for this sentence has proceeded not from man but from God."

Then the pontiff, made exceedingly joyful, explained this to the ears of the palace. When an assembly had been held, all passed to the same opinion, crying out that they wished what God wished and what the pontiff of God should determine.

Elphege, Section I

Elphege was therefore made pontiff. He conducted himself so vigorously in all things that no one doubted who sat as moderator of his heart, by whose election he had been promoted. He adorned himself with all virtues in such a way that he was dear to all and no one—which is rare—envied his glory.

Although he was of the highest mercy and beneficence toward everyone, he appeared cruel and impious toward himself. Even in wintertime, when the earth was stiff with icy cold and deep sleep held the others, he was accustomed secretly to rise from his bed and, seeking an outdoor place, to spend the night there in prayer, with bare feet and clothed in a single garment.

Even when he entered the dining hall as though about to eat, he arose from the table truly as empty as he had approached it, so that those dining with him could accuse him neither of having eaten nor of not having eaten.

He assisted all the poor so thoroughly that he permitted neither anyone of his parishes to beg publicly nor a poor stranger to the place to depart empty. He reckoned it a horrible impiety if a man should wish to usurp as private to himself that which nature established as common.

But when those things which by the right of the Church could belong to the service of the poor had failed, he ordered the Church's treasures, of which he had prepared many, to be distributed. He taught that churches possessed all their most ornate things for this end: that in a time of prosperity they might serve for honor, but in a time of necessity for utility.

The aforesaid defender of justice, Dunstan, therefore, when he had received a report of the manner in which blessed Elphege preached among the people, rendered lofty praises to God and entreated His mercy that, after his own death, which he had foreknown, He would leave Elphege as heir of his patriarchate. What he asked was immediately promised to him, although it was not immediately fulfilled, but only after time had run its course.

For the pontiffs Dunstan and Elphege lived together for five years. After Dunstan had passed into the joy of his Lord, three succeeded him in order before Elphege.

Accordingly, in the year 1006 of the incarnate Deity, Elphege was translated from Winchester to Canterbury and elevated there as archbishop. Within a few days he resolved to go to Rome.

When he had now entered Ausonia and, wearied by the journey, was resting in a certain town, the townspeople, regarding him as an unknown man and consulting their own avarice, broke into the house. They plundered his possessions and, having deprived him of all his household goods, forced him to leave with words and blows.

But he bore his own insults lightly, while grieving over the poverty of his companions, and began to return by the road on which he had come. Yet he had not gone far from the town when, behold, dreadful cries seized the walls, threatening the buildings and citizens with reduction to ashes. Fire sent by God seized the town and began to race headlong through everything.

When the inhabitants of the place saw this, considered whether it was happening to them because of the injuries inflicted upon the man of God, and feared their own destruction, they were pierced with compunction. They went out of the town, sought the man of God, and asked pardon, restoring all his possessions and offering their own.

While he prayed for them, the fire departed beyond the walls and left them unharmed. He also admonished them not to injure their neighbors.

After this, when pirates—the worst kind of robbers—with their leader Thurkill, a prince of the Danes, wandered about the harbors of the sea, that people spread throughout all England and destroyed with both slaughter and fire whatever opposed it. Therefore, with the land deserted by its inhabitants, refuge was taken in the neighboring cities; and the land lay exposed to the fury of the robbers, blessed by no cultivator.

For Ethelred, king of the English, because he was weak and unwarlike, displayed by his conduct a monk rather than a soldier. But amid so great a crisis of affairs, Elphege went to the enemies, preached the word of life to them, redeemed captives by paying a price, and fed those whom hunger oppressed. Divine grace granted him so great a power of pleasing the enemies that he freed not only captives from temporal servitude but also their captors from eternal servitude, when he recalled those who were without the faith to the faith.

On the Constancy of This Saint and the Persecution by the Danes and the English, Section II

A considerable part of the Danes, therefore, held fast by the error of unbelief, envied the salvation of their companions and contemplated killing the author of their salvation. They feared that, if those whom they were accustomed to employ as auxiliaries in war were removed, they would have less license to do harm or less power to resist.

But when the devil, on account of the multitude of the faithful, could not impel the small number of unbelievers to the unjust killing of the just man, he undertook another way of perpetrating the crime.

For Edric, prefect of the entire kingdom, had a brother whom the nobility of Canterbury had attacked and killed because, in the king's presence, he had insulted it without cause and had invaded the goods of certain persons; it had also burned his house. Edric demanded vengeance for his brother's blood from the king.

But the king denied what was requested, declaring that the brother had rightly been killed, since he had presumed to assail so great a nobility in the royal palace. The prefect, his color changed, departed from the palace. Having joined to himself ten thousand armed men, he attempted to avenge his brother.

But when he perceived that, because his adversaries resisted, his efforts had profited him little, he was carried into anger, sought the councils of the Danes, and solicited their aid. He promised that, after victory, the kingdom would be divided in equal shares: he himself would rule over the eastern English, while they would possess the north.

Why say more? They gave and received their right hands; they demanded and tendered oaths. The enemies threatened the pontiff, the prefect threatened the nobility, and all threatened Canterbury with destruction.

When the report of this affair had greatly disturbed the city, the whole nobility which had exercised vengeance against the violator of the law immediately surrounded the pontiff with tearful lamentation. It begged him to depart from the city and to take counsel for his own life, which surpassed the lives of all persons on earth.

But he said: "I think that I must walk by another way. For we have not committed the evil deeds of wicked men, so that on their account we should fear the punishments of death. Moreover, I shall be able to be called a hireling if, seeing my sheep being devoured by wolves, I begin to contemplate flight. Therefore, all those whom God has inspired to be willing to undergo good things and evil things alike should patiently await here the things that have been prepared for us."

Then, while some transferred themselves to other places and others approached the Danes for the sake of appeasing them, Elphege summoned the poor of his people. He exhorted them to be of good courage, to hold God before their eyes, to fear nothing except Him, and to take the example of Christ's humility and patience. Although Christ was Lord of all, He not only refused to avenge Himself upon His enemies, but also restrained Peter's fervent love from vengeance.

He also set before them the constancies of the martyrs and their victories. Having instructed them with these discourses, he rendered them most ready for whatever torments the persecutor might drive them toward. Then, after pouring an episcopal blessing over them and tasting the holy communion of peace in a kiss, when he had made them participants in the divine banquet, he commended them to the Lord, the protector of all.

When the city was surrounded by the enemies, the citizens standing upon the walls did not so much display boldness in resisting as simulate it. When all that they had prepared for the use of life had now been exhausted, someone was sent by the pontiff to advise the Dane to desist from what he had begun and to fear the judgment of God.

But the English, who were more inclined toward impiety, urged on the Danes, made fiercer by it, to strike the walls with battering rams and to cast fiery torches into the city. Thereafter a deadly fire, kindled among the adjoining houses, spread itself by extending into every place.

Then there was a pitiable hesitation among the citizens: whether, after abandoning the fortifications, they should fly to their own homes, or, neglecting them, persist in the defense. Sweet remembrance of their children and an inborn compassion to protect their family prevailed. Headlong with frenzy, they ran and snatched their wives and dear children from the midst of the fires, only for them immediately to be butchered by the enemy's sword.

But while they were more intently occupied amid the ashes of the buildings, the city was broken open and the army entered. Some were slaughtered; others were consumed by flames; but many were cast headlong over the walls. Women of the nobler class, while forced to disclose treasures which they did not possess, were dragged by their hair through the streets; at last they were thrown into the flames and died. Little children torn from their mothers' breasts were either received upon spears or crushed piece by piece beneath a wagon driven over them.

But the pontiff Elphege, unable to endure so great a devastation of his people, ran to a place filled with corpses. He thrust himself among the densest formations of the enemies, crying out: "Spare them, spare them, if you recognize yourselves to be men. Cease to persecute innocent age. This is not a victory in which nursing infancy is destroyed. Woe is me, who, in order that I might increase the Christian people, deprived you of many a soldier! Woe is me, who always condemned your crimes with a free voice, who fed, clothed, and redeemed captives! If it pleases you to be evil without payment, let your anger rage chiefly against me, since it is certain that I have offended you in so many ways."

Immediately the athlete of God was seized by innumerable hands, and, his throat being gripped, the voice of the speaker was impeded. His palms were fastened with bonds; his cheeks were cut apart by fingernails; his sides were pounded with fists and heels.

Amid these things, the servant of God, like a mute man, was driven by the hands of the impious to the atrium of the church. He was forced to stand as a spectator of a new outrage, so that he might see death before death and no kind of death might exist that passed him by, whether as one suffering it or as one grieving with his own people.

The ministers of the devil therefore approached and set fire to the vessels placed above, so that they might burn the roof from them. The lead, now dissolved by the fire, began to flow inward, when the holy company of monks, their heads covered by their cowls and their faces streamed with tears, came out, intending to expend for the Savior what He had deigned to expend for all. A savage executioner, running to meet them with the sword, received them and devastated them in a pitiable slaughter.

Accordingly, out of the entire number, which was reckoned to extend to eight thousand persons, we have learned that only four of monastic profession and nine hundred men of an inferior order remained. After furrowing them cruelly with blows, the enemies either judged them worthy of redemption for money or led them away with themselves by assigning them to servile works.

When the people had now been slaughtered, the city burned, and the church violated, searched, and despoiled, the saint, bound over his whole body, was being dragged toward the northern gate. Behold, those whom I said had survived the ruin were being held under military guard with their feet inserted into beams. When they saw the pontiff and what was being done against him, they raised their hands to heaven and cried out with a roar, asking God to be the inspector of so great a cruelty.

But when the pontiff halted so that he might strengthen their broken spirits with an address, he was suddenly wounded by those driving him onward with a severe blow across the shoulders, so that, as a stream of blood flowed forth, his shoulder appeared divided from his body. The shackled men shuddered at the deed; the Danes also shuddered.

The saint was led to a prison, which was made foul by the horror of darkness, the confinement of its walls, and the importunity of frogs. For they kept him there for seven months, thinking that he would despoil the patrimonies of the Church and give them the proceeds for his own liberation.

Meanwhile, the anger of God began to rage against the murderous people to such a degree that, in a short time, two thousand of them were laid low by dreadful torments of the bowels, and the rest of the multitude, struck by a similar disease, awaited a similar destruction.

At last they all ran to him and sought his supplication to God. Then, honorably borne forth in public by their hands and placed in a carrying chair, he said: “Even if your unceasing cruelty leaves itself no place for meriting pardon, nevertheless it belongs to our office to consider not so much what it is fitting that you should suffer as what it becomes us to do.”

Therefore, after invoking Christ, the Creator of the world, and giving them bread blessed by himself, he freed them all from the deadly plague.

The aforesaid enemies then send envoys—that is, four princes. Having approached the pontiff, namely Elphege, they first give thanks for the benefit bestowed. Then they propose the condition that, if he wishes to possess freedom and life, he must pay sixty talents of silver, each talent being weighed at the weight of fifty pounds.

He is reported to have answered them thus: “If you think that, to fulfill your greed, I shall despoil ecclesiastical possessions, you are deceived, for it is not the part of a Christian to give the flesh of Christians to be crushed by pagan teeth. But if blessed Lawrence laudably concealed the treasures which he had received, shall I cruelly seek out those which I have received and betray them still more cruelly?”

Then, at these words, the furious enemies began to raise their clamor with a grinding of teeth. The condition of affairs was pitiable: on the very day on which all the elements of the world rejoiced over the Lord’s resurrection, the blessed man was punished with unheard-of examinations of torments. But because of the hope which he had in God, he delighted in all these evils as though in banquets.

At last he was afflicted with great blows by the crowd of executioners; his brain having been injured, he was shut half-dead in a prison. There they kindled a fire, cast into it everything most foul-smelling, and closed the doors.

But the dreadful house began to receive participation in celestial grace, to breathe the fragrant substances of eternal life, and to resound with honey-sweet hymns modulated by the voices of saints. Looking upon them, the saint recognized among the others Saint Dunstan, the formerly glorious archbishop, standing there.

Dunstan said to him: “We have come to you, soldier of Christ, to honor you with our service, sent by Him who has given you victory and prepared a crown for you in heaven.”

Amid these things, the knots of the bonds were loosened, the gaping wounds closed, and every wound of his body was restored to wholeness. Elphege, chanting psalms with those chanting psalms, exulted. When the guards of the prison perceived this, they were terrified.

At last Elphege, placed upon a beast of burden, was led to the council of fury amid the immense lamentation of the faithful. He was stoned and made a martyr. As his blood dripped, dry wood immediately came to life again.

Then, on account of so great a miracle, the Danes permitted his body to be carried to London, where it was buried. After ten years it was found incorrupt and endures until this time, its blood fresh and the integrity of its body unviolated.

On Ethelred, King of England, of Whom Above, and on Certain Others, Section III

At that time, as Vincent relates in the place cited above, Ethelred, king of England, fleeing the Danes, came to Normandy to Richard, the brother of his wife Emma and the son of Duke Richard. Richard completed the monastery of Fécamp which his father had begun.

At night he evaded the watch kept by his servants and went to the monks' matins. Bending his knees, he remained in prayer until daylight. One night, while doing this, he found the monastery door barred. When he violently knocked out the bolt, he disturbed the sacristan's sleep.

The sacristan, rising from sleep and seeing Richard dressed in a commoner's garment, flew upon his hair and gave him many slaps. Richard, with incredible patience, gave no answer.

On the following day he lodged a complaint in the chapter and commanded that monk to meet him at the village of Argentias, threatening to avenge himself in such a way that all Gaul would speak of it. On the appointed day the monk was condemned by the judges.

Richard immediately absolved him and assigned that same village, which is renowned for excellent wine, to the office of the sacristan. He declared him to be an excellent monk, one who had guarded well the duty entrusted to him and had not broken silence even when angered.

This Richard died after twenty-eight years of his duchy. He ordered his body to be buried before the door of the church so that it might be trodden upon by everyone and rained upon. Abbot William afterward removed him from there and placed him before the altar.

His brother Robert became archbishop of Rouen. Abusing that honor, he committed many outrages; but afterward, declining into old age, he erased certain of them by almsgiving—which, namely, was sufficient for satisfaction, if he truly repented.

This Richard had a son of his own name, who was duke for one year and is said to have been poisoned by his brother Robert. Therefore, after eight years, Robert sought Jerusalem. While returning home, he was killed by poison at Nicaea, a city of Bithynia. The boy William succeeded this Robert.

In the year noted above, Durand became bishop of the people of Liège. As Sigebert says, this was like a tale upon the theater of the world: that a man from a most humble and most impoverished family of servile condition exercised lordship over his carnal lords.

At Aachen, about those times, a general and synodal assembly was celebrated for several days. So great a drought and intemperance of the air grew hot that many failed through excessive heat and many animals also suddenly perished. The pavement and the marble columns were damp with so much sweat that those who did not know believed water to have been scattered upon them.

About that time ecclesiastical religious life flourished through renowned abbots: in France and Burgundy through Odilo of Cluny, distinguished for the piety discussed in the preceding title, and through William of Dijon, revered for severity; in Lotharingia through Richard of Verdun, discerning in pious gravity and grave piety; through Poppo of Stavelot; through Helias of Cologne; through Olbert and Stephen of Liège; and through Berno of Reichenau.

In the year of the Lord 1025 there was a king in England named Cnut. He set out for Rome and, returning thence by ship to England, immediately subdued Malcolm, the rebellious king of the Scots.

There was in England a most wise man, Egeuold [i.e., Egelnoth], archbishop of Canterbury, the second after Lining [i.e., Living] but the third after the martyr Elphege, of whom it was said in the preceding section. From being dean, he was taken up into the episcopate. He brought the body of Saint Elphege back from London to Canterbury.

Returning from Rome, he sent to Canterbury an arm of Saint Augustine, the great Doctor, which had been purchased at Pavia for one hundred talents of silver and one talent of gold. At his admonition King Cnut also sent money to churches across the sea, and especially to the church of Chartres.

There Fulbert, a bishop most renowned for holiness and prophecy, was then flourishing. He laid the foundations of the church of the Holy Mother of God and completed it with marvelous stone paneling. He is also said to have been visited by the blessed Mother of God in his sickness and to have been refreshed with her most holy milk.

The author, however, does not accept these things. For it is not lawful to sell or buy relics of saints, because that is simoniacal. But when they have been offered freely, it is lawful, out of gratitude, to bestow something liberally upon the donors, or even to buy the gold or silver vessels themselves.

What is added concerning the Virgin's milk is not to be understood of true and natural milk, since a dead body has no milk, and a body raised in glory—as is commonly held concerning the Virgin—remains incorruptible. Rather, it was a certain liquid miraculously procured.

After the aforesaid king of England named Cnut, Edward, the son of the Ethelred mentioned above, reigned in England about the year of the Lord 1043. This Edward was crowned with great pomp at London on the holy day of Easter by Archbishop Eadsige.

He took as wife Edith, the daughter of Godwin, in whom almost all the liberal arts had flowed together. She lacked neither suspicion of disgrace while her husband lived nor after he had died. But, dying at last in William's time, she gave satisfaction concerning her integrity by an oath.

The king treated her in such a way that he neither removed her from his bed nor knew her in the manner of a man.

This Godwin, once sitting at table beside the king when conversation arose concerning Alfred, the king's brother, said: "You, O king, look at me, as I see, with a wrinkled countenance at every remembrance of your brother. But may God not permit me to swallow this morsel if I was conscious of any matter which concerned his danger or your injury."

When this had been said, he was choked by the morsel which he had placed in his mouth, turned his eyes upward, and died. He was then pulled away from the table by his son Harold, who was standing beside the king.

This Godwin had first had as wife Cnut's sister, from whom he begot a boy. While the boy gloried in childish boastfulness upon a horse, he was carried by that same horse into the river Thames, was drowned, and perished. His mother also was killed by a stroke of lightning.

She was said to be accustomed to send bands of slaves purchased in England to Denmark, especially beautiful girls.

This King Edward, however, was a holy man, illustrious in miracles and in the spirit of prophecy. It was said above concerning him, in the chapter on pontiffs, that in the spirit he saw the Seven Sleepers turn themselves upon their other side.

In the Island of England at Another Time, Section IV

At the village of Beverley, a certain woman, a diviner and sorceress, when at her death she had been buried in a church as she had arranged, placed in a stone sepulcher, firmly closed, and bound with chains, was visited by demons at night. They opened the closed church, broke all the bonds and fastenings, drew the body of that sorceress out from there, and placed it upon a very black horse. Beating the horse, they disappeared from the eyes of men.

At Rome, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-six, in the times of Emperor Henry III, there was a certain wealthy and noble young man who had newly taken a wife and had made a well-attended banquet for his companions.

After the meal, when he was about to go into the field to play, the king of the banquet, the standard-bearer in the game, demanded the ball. Meanwhile, the young man placed his wedding ring upon the outstretched finger of a bronze statue of Venus which stood nearby. When almost everyone was striking toward the ground, he, sighing as his inward parts grew hot, was the first to withdraw himself from the game.

When he asked for his ring again, he found the statue's finger bent as far as the palm. After struggling there for a long time, he was able neither to pull out the ring nor to break the finger. Departing in silence, he concealed the matter from his companions.

Returning with a servant in the dead of night, he found the finger extended and the ring stolen. Concealing his loss, he returned to his bride.

When he had placed himself in bed beside her, he perceived something cloudy and dense rolling between himself and her. It could indeed be felt but could not be seen. He was prevented from embracing her by this obstacle.

He also heard a voice saying: "Lie with me, because today you espoused me. I am Venus, upon whose finger you placed that ring. I shall not return it."

Terrified by so great a prodigy, he dared not—or could not—relate anything. He passed that night sleepless, deliberating much within himself. For a long time it happened in this way: at whatever hour he wished to lie with his bride, he perceived and heard that same thing. In other respects he was certainly vigorous and fit both at home and in military service.

At last, admonished by his wife's complaints, he brought the matter to his parents. After taking counsel, they disclosed the matter to a certain suburban priest named Palumbus. He, however, was a necromancer and powerful in sorceries.

Enticed by many promises, he gave the young man a prepared letter, saying: "Go at that hour of the night to the crossroads where four roads meet, and, standing silently, observe. Figures of human beings of both sexes, of every age and condition, will pass there: horsemen and footmen, some joyful and some sad. Whatever you hear, do not speak.

"A certain one taller in stature and more corpulent in form, sitting in a chariot, will follow that crowd. Silently hand this letter to him to read, and immediately that which you seek will be done."

The young man fulfilled everything as he had been instructed. Among the others passing there he saw a woman in the dress of a prostitute riding a mule, with her loosened hair tossed over her shoulders and bound higher up with a golden band. She bore a golden rod in her hands, with which she guided the mule. Because of the thinness of her garments she appeared almost naked, performing shameless gestures.

Last came the lord of the crowd. Sharpening terrible eyes upon the young man from his lofty chariot, fashioned of emeralds and pearls, he asked him the reasons for his journey. The young man answered nothing, but, stretching out his hand, offered him the letter.

At last, not daring to despise the familiar seal, he read what had been written. Immediately, raising his arms to heaven, he said: "Almighty God, how long will You endure the wickedness of the priest Palumbus?"

Without delay he sent attendants from his side to wrench the ring from Venus. After much evasion, she at last returned it with difficulty. Thus the young man, having obtained his desire without obstacle, possessed the embraces for which he had long sighed.

But when Palumbus heard the demon's cry to God, he understood it to concern himself and that the end of his days had been announced to him. Therefore, after all his limbs had been voluntarily cut off, he died by a pitiable punishment, having confessed unheard-of outrages before the Roman people.

At that time there were two old women dwelling in a single hut upon the road by which one goes to Rome. They were imbued with one sorcery, by which they changed a guest, if anyone arrived alone, into a horse, an ass, or a pig.

Understand this soundly, reader: that change was not according to nature but according to appearance. The imagination of the observers was so altered and the eyes of the observers so deluded by magic that it appeared thus to themselves and to others.

About the Same Time, Section V

Renels [i.e., Kenulf], king of the Mercians, had entrusted Chenelin [i.e., Kenelm], his seven-year-old son, to the fidelity of his sister Quandrida [i.e., Quendreda] to be reared. Falsely foretelling the kingdom for herself, she ordered a retainer, who was the boy's fosterer, to remove the little child from their midst. Taking the boy hunting, he slaughtered him among the thickets.

What had been concealed in England was immediately made known at Rome by divine means. For a parchment, fallen from above upon the altar of blessed Peter, borne by a dove and written in English characters, disclosed both the killing and the burial in order. It was interpreted by a certain Englishman.

Thereupon a letter of the pope indicated the compatriot martyr to the kings of England. Hence the body of the innocent boy was raised with great solemnity for frequent veneration.

When it was being carried to Winchcombe amid the song of clerics and the applause of laypeople, Quendreda, the parricidal woman, was stirred up. From the window of the upper chamber in which she stood, she put out her head. By chance she held a psalter in her hands and, through continuous reading, had reached the psalm, "O God, be not silent concerning my praise."

Reciting it backward from the end by some enchantment unknown to me, she attempted to weaken the joy of those singing. Then, however, by divine power, the sorceress's eyes, torn from their hollow sockets, polluted with blood that verse, "This is the work of those who speak evil of me before the Lord." Marks of the blood remain to this day, breathing forth the woman's savagery and the vengeance of God.

A pestilence arose in the monastery of Selsey and killed many. A three-day fast was proclaimed. On the second day of the fast, Peter and Paul the Apostles appeared to a boy lying ill with the same sickness. They said that he ought not fear death, which is both the end of sickness and the entrance into everlasting life, but that no one else from that monastery would die from that pestilence.

God had granted this through the merits of the aforesaid King Oswald, who was supplicating on that same day for his compatriots. For this was the day on which that same king, killed by the faithless, entered the court of heaven. The day of his death was sought and was found to be so. From that time onward he was numbered among the martyrs.

While Hingwar and Ubba, leaders of the Danes, were devastating the province of the East Angles, the first of them beheaded King Edmund after certain torments, when the king did not resist but had cast aside his arms, prostrated himself upon the ground, and prayed.

The head was thrown among the thickets by the executioner. When the citizens sought it, they heard the voice of the head inviting them all to itself. A wolf, embracing it between its forelegs, was guarding it. The wolf also followed the bearers from behind as far as the tomb, injuring no one and injured by no one.

At first a wooden chapel was erected over his body. When thieves wished to despoil it, it entangled them in their very undertaking with invisible thongs.

His head, joined to the rest of his body, displays the sign of martyrdom in a scarlet scar. The hair and nails of that same saint gradually grow. A certain holy woman named Oswen was accustomed to cut and trim them annually, so that they might profit posterity in sacred veneration.

When a young man named Leofstan menacingly ordered that this saint's body be shown to him, desiring, as he said, to investigate with the trustworthiness of his eyes what was uncertain by report, he became insane as soon as he saw it. A little afterward he died, swarming with worms.

As Bede testifies, Etheldreda remained a virgin although married to two men. Her father was Anna, king of the East Angles. He also had two other daughters, Ethelburga and Sexburga.

The first was initially a nun in the monastery in Gaul which is called Brie and afterward was its abbess. She was incorrupt before death and after death, as was her sister also.

The other was given as wife to Earconbert, king of the people of Kent, from whom she bore two daughters: Ercongota, concerning whom Bede wrote many things, and Ermenilda, who was given in marriage to Wilsio [read: Wulfhere], king of the Mercians, from whom she had a daughter, the virgin Werburga.

The mother was abbess at Belinum [read: Ely] after her mother Sexburga. The daughter rests at Chester, and she is believed especially to hear the prayers of women and children.

There was also in England a holy virgin named Edith, daughter of King Edgar, who lies in the monastery of Wilton. When blessed Dunstan was consecrating the church of Saint Dionysius, which he himself had built in England out of love for the martyr, he saw this young woman repeatedly stretch out her right thumb and imprint the sign of the cross upon her forehead.

Delighted by this sign, the bishop said to her: "May this finger never decay." Immediately, amid the solemnities of the Mass, he began to weep. When asked the cause, he said: "Soon this flowering rose will wither; soon the bird beloved of God will fly away."

Thus it happened. She died on the day foretold, six weeks from that day, when she was twenty-three years old.

Not long afterward, the same Dunstan saw in a dream Saint Dionysius holding that same virgin by the hand and, by a divine oracle, steadfastly commanding that she be honored on earth by the servants of God just as she was honored in heaven by her Bridegroom and Lord.

Even in her profession as a nun she wore garments ornamented with gold, whence she was openly rebuked by Saint Aethelwold the bishop. She answered: "The true and unshakable judgment of God is covered only by the conscience of mortals. For vainglory can also exist beneath filthy mourning garments. Therefore I think that a mind can be as incorrupt beneath these garments as beneath your torn skins."

When her virginal body was raised to a higher place, it was found to have been entirely reduced to ashes except for the right thumb, the abdomen, and the parts beneath the abdomen.

While certain persons were discussing this, the virgin herself stood in a dream beside one of those who had seen it, saying: "It is no wonder if those other parts of my body decayed, for dead bodies customarily fall away in this manner, and I myself, as a girl, sinned with those members. But justly the belly, which lust did not touch, was not corrupted. I was free from gluttony and carnal intercourse."

On Certain Marvels of That Time, Section VI

As Vincent relates in the place cited above, Paderborn, a city of Germany, was burned together with its greater church. In the monastery of the monks, however, a certain Scottish monk named Paternus, who had been enclosed for a long time, had often foretold this fire. Unwilling to go out because of his purpose of enclosure, he suffered himself to be burned.

Peter Damian, relating it more fully, speaks thus: “In a certain Teutonic city there was a certain servant of God living enclosed in a cell beside a monastery. It was revealed to him that, unless the people quickly appeased God through penance, the whole city would perish by fire within thirty days.

“The vision was made public, but they were unwilling to be converted. He ordered the monastery’s precious things to be removed so that they might be safe. At last fire suddenly arose from seven districts of the city and came as far as the cell of the man of God. When men asked him to come out, he refused. Committing all things to the judgment of God, he was burned together with his cell.”

In the district of Bracara near Tournai, as Sigebert writes, multitudes of serpents gathered from opposite sides and ran together against one another in a prodigious battle. After many on both sides had been killed, the defeated party fled and hid itself in the hollow of a tree. The other party, pursuing in the manner of victors, made a hissing din around it until men surrounded them with fire and all were burned.

Not long afterward a comet appeared, continually trailing long and fiery hair, as Helinand says. Concerning it a certain monk of Malmesbury named Eilmer said: “You have come; you have come, an object of lamentation to many martyrs [read: mothers]. It is long since I saw you, but now I behold you much more terrible, threatening the destruction of this country.”

He was mature in age and well imbued with letters. In his early youth he had attempted a deed of immense daring. For by some art unknown to me, he fastened wings to his hands and feet so that he might fly in the manner of Daedalus, embracing a fable as truth.

Having gathered the breeze from the top of a tower, he flew for the space of one stadium and more. But, trembling because of the violence of the wind and whirlwind, and at the same time because of consciousness of his rash deed, he fell. Thereafter he was permanently disabled, his legs having been broken. He himself, however, maintained that the cause of his fall was that he had forgotten to fit a tail to his rear part.

About that time Marianus the chronographer flourished. Coming from Scotland into Gaul, he became a monk at Cologne and was enclosed first at Fulda and afterward at Mainz.

About those times, as Vincent relates after William, a portent was seen on the border of Normandy and Brittany in one—or two—women. In such a body there were two heads and four arms, and all other things were double as far as the navel; below it all things were single.

One laughed, ate, and spoke; the other wept, hungered, and was silent. Food was eaten with a double mouth but was directed through one passage. When one had died, the other survived for nearly three years, carrying the dead one, until she too failed from both the weight of the mass and the stench of the corpse.

It was asserted by certain persons and handed down in writing that these women signified Normandy and England, which, although divided, were nevertheless united under one lord. Whatever money these had swallowed with greedy throats flowed down into one drain, which is either the avarice of princes or the ferocity of the surrounding peoples. England sustains with immense sums of money a Normandy that is dead and almost exhausted, until perhaps she herself succumbs to the violence of the tax collectors.

Not long afterward, according to Sigebert, many faithful persons, as many as seven thousand, seeking Jerusalem with a vow of prayer, were besieged by the Arabs on Good Friday in a certain fortress. So many were killed and wounded that, out of seven thousand and more, scarcely two thousand returned.

Three years afterward a comet appeared throughout the whole week of Easter.

Harinuth [i.e., Harald Hardrada], king of the Northumbrians [read: Norwegians], came to England with almost one thousand ships, intending to reign. In the city of York he killed more than one thousand laypeople and one hundred priests from among the English. Harold, king of the English, came upon him with seven legions and killed him together with many others.

But afterward William, count of the Normans, entered England with the French. After joining battle with the English, he killed Harold together with many thousands and reigned in England, as was said above.

Mauger, archbishop of Rouen, was often admonished that he was neglecting his office. His nephew urged this against him, and Mauger nevertheless acted still more irreverently. Compelled by extreme necessity, he was deposed.

But certain persons say, as Vincent writes after William, that the secret cause was that this same Mauger had excommunicated his nephew and his wife Matilda because they were joined as blood relatives. For that reason the nephew devised grounds for deposition against the persecutor of his outrages.

For the expiation of this crime, that same William afterward built the monastery of Saint Stephen at Caen, and Matilda built the monastery of the Holy Trinity.

Chapter VIII

In the year of the Lord 1068, Peter Damian, distinguished in life and learning, was in Italy. He published many sermons in an elegant style on diverse subjects. He renounced the episcopate with which he had been adorned so that he might be at leisure for God more freely.

He also wrote several smaller works: namely, one On the Perfection of Monks; another entitled Most Welcome, Against the Simoniacs; a book On Contempt of the World; a little book entitled The Lord Be with You; a book On the Customs of the Church, addressed to Pope Leo; an eremitical rule and a work On the Order of the Eremitical Life; a book in the manner of a dialogue Against the Jews; a little book of narratives; a book On the Dissolution of Marriages; a book of disputation On the Canonical Hours; and an invective against a certain bishop who was recalling monks to the world.

He also relates many examples of things which happened in his times, very notable in diverse places. Some of them are placed in this chapter.

In his apology—that is, his defense concerning his relinquished episcopate—Helinand speaks of him thus. This Peter wrote to Pope Hildebrand, who was Gregory VII, giving a reason why he had relinquished the episcopate. For he was a man most renowned for wisdom and religious life.

He says: “Because I refused ecclesiastical government, a penance of one hundred years was imposed upon me according to the remedy of the monastic rule.” Perhaps he speaks here of remedies of the kind concerning which he says there:

“Dominic was clothed next to his flesh with an iron cuirass. He was girded upon his body with two iron circles and with two around the upper parts of his arms. With each hand armed with scourges and his garments removed, he passed the whole night wakefully through twelve Psalters; on the following day he completed from the thirteenth as far as ‘Blessed are they whose.’”

Through the example of this man, the custom became established in those regions that not only men but also noble women eagerly undertook this kind of purgatory. For the widow of Cechaldus, a woman of great family and great dignity, related to me that through the discipline prescribed by this rule she had completed a penance of one hundred years, three thousand strokes of discipline being counted as one year.

Such a penance of one hundred years was therefore imposed upon him because he had relinquished the episcopate and returned to the monastery for love of religious life, although he was very suitable for the government of the Church.

But in giving his reason, he himself says that many saints before him had done this same thing. “Valerius of Hippo,” he says, “established Augustine as his successor. Lucidus of Citoclenum, when death was imminent, flew to a monastery. As Gregory says in the Register, blessed Andrew appeared to him and announced the hour of his death.

“Adalbert, bishop of Betuwe, taking the monastic habit, merited to win the palm of martyrdom. Likewise, a certain holy penitent, after relinquishing the episcopate, was at length visited by an angel and ordered to return to the episcopate. But he refused until, at the admonition of that same angel, blessed Remigius swiftly came and commanded this of him; only then did he obey.”

And below: “It is better to cast away the burden than, to the loss of the Lord whose servant I am, to perish with a broken neck.”

Hence it is written: “Why did you not give my money to the bank, so that, when I came, I might indeed have exacted with interest that which is mine?”

Jerome likewise says: “You should have deposited at the altar what you could not carry. For while you, a slothful merchant, retain the denarius, you have occupied the place of another who could have doubled the money.”

Are there not among certain bishops royal feasts every day, preparation every day, a wedding banquet every day? Soldiers are refreshed from that by which the needy ought to have been relieved; and strangers feed at their tables, which overflow with delicacies, while those whose entire substance it is, shut outside, waste away from lack of food.

And, in what appears to equal diabolical malice, after estates have been squandered in military service, together with every possession of lands, tithes and congregations are moreover added to the benefice of secular persons. This most wicked liberality both takes from the needy the means by which they live and deters the diocesan people from paying tithes, killing the diocesan people in soul and the needy in body.

The bishop of the city of Florence presided over a game of chess. Rebuking him for this while I was still a bishop, I imposed upon him that he should go through three Psalters, wash the feet of twelve poor persons and feed each one, and give a single denarius to each, so that with his hands he might wash away that which he had polluted with his hands.

On Certain Marvelous Occurrences Which the Same Peter Relates in His Diverse Smaller Works, Section I

In the monastery of Saint Vincent, established not far from the monastery which is called the Pierced Rock, we had established a regular decree that during Lent, every third day, all should take nothing except a little bread with water; that they should utter no words; that there should be no disobedience concerning prayers or readings; that they should walk with bare feet; and that, when the Psalter had been completed, they should purify themselves by mutual chastisement with scourges.

A certain brother violated this rule by eating. He was skilled in writing, notation, turning, and manufacture—an augur, a cenobite, a great physician; he knew everything. In the middle of Lent, this fat, sleek, and corpulent man was suddenly made ill.

I had heard, however, that because of his sins he had been separated from the celebration of Masses. I admonished him concerning the matter, but he denied it.

On the second day, while sitting anxiously in bed, he demanded the Lord's body from me. The abbot, who was standing there present with us, rebuked him concerning this because no signs of death appeared in him. Nevertheless, he persisted.

When the priest was now standing there with the Sacrament, he drew one of the brothers to himself and whispered into his ear some grave sin unknown to me. Astonished and not knowing what penance to impose upon him, that brother at last imposed fifteen years of penance upon him.

As soon as the sick man received the Lord's body, he vomited forth his soul together with bile. That bile did not cease to flow until his burial.

In the aforesaid monastery it had been established, and had now been observed for three years, that the offices of blessed Mary should always be said at the canonical hours. A certain monk named Gazo, of a reprobate life but of biting and polished eloquence, began to murmur about this. By his complaints he obtained that the hours of the Blessed Virgin should no longer be said.

Immediately adversities began to rise against that monastery: depredations, robberies, conflagrations, and the slaughter of the servants and households of that place. They went to the Teutonic emperor, but in vain. They came to me, and I told them this had happened because the monastery had cast away from itself the emperor—or empress—of peace.

Immediately the messengers, prostrate upon the ground, said that henceforth they would never omit the praises of the Blessed Virgin. Observing this, they recovered peace within a short time.

An angel of the Lord was accustomed to come to a certain priest of the city of Faenza and to receive the Sacrament of the Lord's body from the hands of the one offering it, while a prince looked on.

At length that same priest fell into lust. Behold, while he offered as usual, the angel of the Lord came and, as the prince watched, squeezed a sponge filled with water over the priest's head. He poured back again upon all his limbs all the filth and foulness which he had previously drawn from the priest's body.

The astonished prince secretly admonished the priest. At first denying it, the priest afterward confessed that on the preceding night he had fallen upon a certain chambermaid of the prince.

When a certain priest of Salerno one day saw flames erupting from Mount Vellinus, he immediately said: "Beyond doubt, some wicked rich man is about to die very soon and descend into hell. For there is such a custom in those regions that, when the death of some reprobate rich man is imminent, that mountain vomits forth pitch-black and sulphurous flames."

After he had said these things, during the following night, while that same prince of Salerno lay securely with a prostitute, he expired. As she afterward related, she endured him for a considerable time, not knowing what had happened. At last, with difficulty, she cast away from herself not a man but a corpse.

A certain priest of Naples, wishing to learn with greater certainty that which it was not lawful to learn, presumed to approach the place where the infernal abyss belched more fiercely. After the solemnities of the Mass, he proceeded in his vestments as though armed. When, as a rash investigator, he approached farther than people were accustomed to go, he was unable to return and afterward was never seen.

Another priest, promising conversion and delaying it, fell from his horse into a small stream and was drowned.

A Certain John, Section II

As the same Peter relates, a certain John took a widow's pig. Weeping as she sought its return, she was not heard. But when he ate the pig, he was struck in the throat. While he lived, physicians were unable to heal that wound.

He therefore then converted to the religious life which he had promised long before but had been unwilling to fulfill. Nevertheless, he lived a long time afterward in conversion, laboring under so great an affliction of the throat that he received food with great difficulty.

A certain man named Arduin had promised me with a sure devotion that, if he could not do so earlier, at least when ten years had elapsed he would pass into the religious life in the monastery of Saint Vincent, which is situated in the territory of Arpinum.

When the term had elapsed, he began to evade it. The abbot of that monastery favored his desires and dissuaded him from being converted, because the abbot was supported by Arduin's necessary assistance.

Meanwhile, seized by sickness, Arduin confessed and bestowed many things upon the poor and upon churches. As though all things had been well arranged and he was secure, he bound the relatives and kinsmen standing beside him by this adjuration: "I beseech you by Charity, which is God, that no one ask that I be restored to this mortal life, lest an unforeseen death—which may it not be—overtake me unprepared."

He therefore died, and some time after his death he appeared to that abbot. One night the abbot saw in a vision, and behold, in the spacious level ground of a field, an emperor—or some other exalted power—was coming with the numerous army of the entire kingdom.

While the astonished abbot directed his eyes this way and that, behold, Arduin was being led swiftly by certain guards. "Alas," said the abbot, "halt your step for a little. Will you not speak to me, Arduin? Come, brother, what is happening to you? Do you rejoice, or do you suffer? Are you in punishment, or in glory?"

Then Arduin, sad and tearful, said: "Why do you question me concerning glory, when I am afflicted by unceasing punishments?"

The abbot said to him: "What, then, has blessed Vincent done for you?"

"For a long time," he said, "the saint caused me to hope for an audience. But because, wearied for so long, I did not merit to obtain it, I have now lost this hope entirely, having been frustrated."

Thus plainly was he frustrated by promises by the one whom he had similarly frustrated by making promises.

Desiderius, abbot of Monte Cassino, who afterward became pope, related this to me, says Peter Damian. A servant of God in the region of Naples lived as a solitary upon a precipitous rock beside a public road.

While he chanted psalms at night and opened the window of his cell as an observer of the hours, he saw many Ethiopians undertaking a journey and driving along, in a long train, beasts laden with hay.

When I asked them who they were and why they were carrying this fodder for beasts, they said: "We are malignant spirits. We prepare these things not as fodder for feeding cattle, but rather as fuel for fires with which men are to be burned. For very soon we await the prince of Capua, who is already lying ill, and John, master of the soldiers of the city of Naples, who is still living in health."

Immediately the man of God hastened to John and related what he had seen and heard. At the same time Otto II was going into Calabria against the Saracens.

When he had heard these things, John said: "Now it is necessary for me to meet the emperor and to treat carefully concerning the condition of this land. After his departure, I promise that I shall forsake the world and become a monk."

To test whether what the solitary related was true, John sent a messenger to Capua, who found Pandulf already dead. John himself, the master of the soldiers, survived scarcely fifteen days and died before the emperor reached those regions.

Martin, who dwelt in the hermitage of Camaldoli, a man of many virtues and especially of the grace of tears, related the following.

There was a monk of the maritime territory in the monastery which is called Ad Pinum, entangled in many bonds of sins. When a great and lengthy penance had been imposed upon him, he sought assistance from a certain familiar friend in carrying the burden of the penance.

That friend devoutly received the burden and instructed him to remain secure concerning the discharge of so great a portion. The man thus obligated died not long afterward. Among the brothers, however, he had been of irreproachable life and honorable reputation.

Not many days afterward he appeared in a dream to the penitent monk. When asked how he fared, he said: “Badly and harshly, but because of you. For I was free of my own bonds, but I bound myself with yours; and because I did not discharge another’s surety, I am worn down by harsh scourges. But I ask you to keep watch for yourself and free me. Go, therefore, and beseech the community to discharge what I promised and rescue me.”

When this had been done, he appeared again to the aforesaid monk with a serene and joyful countenance, saying that through the prayers of the brothers he had been rescued from the punishments and joined to the saints.

In Parts of Gaul, Section III

In parts of Gaul a great contention arose between an abbot and a certain secular potentate concerning a particular possession, so that, after long disputes, the supporters of both parties brought matters to arms.

That secular potentate, surrounded by companies of armed men, entered the field to fight. The abbot, however, forbade the company of all those who had come to fight for him. He placed only his monks upon horses, ordered them to cover their heads with cowls, and thus armed came to the place of combat.

Immediately the adversaries were struck with so great a horror that they promptly leapt down from their horses, cast away their weapons, humbly prostrated themselves upon the ground, and begged pardon.

If it is objected that Pope Leo waged war, I answer that Peter was not made prince of the Apostles because he denied Christ, nor David a prophet because he committed adultery. Good or evil things ought to be judged not from the merits of those who possess them but from their own qualities.

Gregory suffered many robberies and acts of violence from the Lombards; Ambrose suffered them from the Arians. Each fought by patience alone.

Dusinus the bishop, on the Wednesday at the beginning of the fast, caused a sumptuous banquet and a bath to be prepared for himself and his soldiers. Paralysis suddenly seized his face, and he lived for a long time afterward with such a disease.

A certain bishop, being very thirsty, ordered wine to be brought to him. When the cupbearer had emptied everything that was in the vessel into a cup and brought it to the bishop, behold, an importunate poor man asked that it be given to him, saying that if he did not drink immediately he would promptly expire.

The bishop ordered it to be given to the poor man. When the bishop thirsted even more than before, he ordered the wine vessel to be inspected again, in case anything perhaps remained, and it was found full.

A certain father of a household had only one coin in his purse for buying something to eat with bread. Meanwhile a poor man came and sought mercy. He gave that coin to him and returned home.

Behold, a certain unknown man whom he had never seen before, hurried and anxious, placed in his hand twenty shillings of denarii bound in linen. He said that they had been sent to him by his lord and, as though someone awaited him, immediately withdrew.

It is reported that in the region of Puteoli in Apulia, among black and fetid waters, there is a rocky and craggy promontory. From those waters, in the customary manner, extremely foul little birds are seen suddenly to arise and to appear to human sight from the evening hour of Saturday until the dawn of Monday.

As though released from bonds, they range about freely, extend their wings, and comb their feathers. They are never seen to eat and cannot be caught by any fowler’s skill.

On Monday morning, an immense raven like a vulture pursues them and croaks after them. They immediately immerse themselves in the waters and do not appear again until the evening of the following Saturday.

Certain persons assert that these are the souls of persons assigned to Gehenna, but that on the Lord’s day, together with the adjoining nights, they obtain relief for the glory of the Lord’s resurrection.

Prudentius agrees with this assertion in a hymn, saying: “For guilty spirits also there are often holidays from punishments on that sacred night on which God returned victorious from the depths of Acheron.”

But Desiderius, abbot of Monte Cassino, utterly denies that the matter is so. Nevertheless, in the presence of Desiderius, Archbishop Humbert related that he had heard this from the inhabitants of Apulia.

Take note, reader, that the first assertion cannot be true, because in hell there is no redemption—not only no liberation, but no interruption, diminution, or relief from or within those punishments—according to Thomas and others. But whether the reported phenomenon is so and what its cause may be, God knows.

Archbishop Humbert related that in the monastery of Saint Sylvester in the territory of Urbino, a certain monk died. From the beginning of the nocturnal hour of cockcrow until the second hour of the day, the lifeless corpse lay while the brothers chanted psalms round about it.

When “Lamb of God” was said for him at Mass, behold, the dead man suddenly arose. When the astonished brothers approached more closely to hear words from his mouth, he began to vomit curses and blasphemies against God, to spit upon a cross offered for him to kiss, and to lacerate the undefiled Mother of God with shameful reproaches.

He said: “Why do you chant psalms for me or offer sacrifices? I was in the very flame of Tartarus. There my master and lord Lucifer placed upon my head his crown, always glowing with inextinguishable heat, and clothed me with a cloak of the same metal with which he was clothed. The cloak was so long that it flowed as far as the ankles, and so fiercely ignited that it appeared to emit drops.”

When the brothers admonished him to do penance, he pronounced anathemas and with sacrilegious mouth despised all the mysteries of our Redeemer.

Then the monks prayed for him with their whole heart, beat themselves after removing their garments, pounded their breasts with their fists, and labored in every kind of prayer of which they were capable.

Behold, that desperate man returned to himself. He praised the omnipotence of the Savior, renounced the mockeries of Satan, adored the cross, and begged for penance.

He confessed that after renouncing the world he had fallen into fornication, which he had concealed until then. Praising and blessing God, he lived until the following day and departed in holy confession.

In parts of Babylonia, the Apostolic See possessed an estate from which it annually received so great a revenue of balsam that it sufficed for the illumination of a lamp suspended before the altar of blessed Peter and always burning.

Having received money, a pope sold this estate and lost the due measure of aromatic substance which he was accustomed to receive.

Some time afterward, while that same pope stood praying before the holy altar as though devout, behold, an aged and terrible old man, whose face even showed the marks of beard-shaving, raised his arm and struck him forcefully with a slap, saying: “You extinguished my lamp before me, and I extinguish your lamp before God.”

He immediately disappeared. The pope fell and died a little afterward.

When certain merchants of Venice had put into port, they saw a lion not far from the shore, enveloped in the coils of a dragon and being dragged violently by the dragon into a cave.

The merchants, who suddenly assembled at this spectacle, boldly attacked the dragon and freed the lion. Not ungrateful, while the merchants remained there for several days, it brought them one hide from an animal which it had captured.

A certain man was going with his fellow villager to cut wood when, behold, a serpent of the magnitude of a beam, lifting up two necks with two heads, made an attack upon them.

One of them, who held an axe, cut off one of its heads, and immediately his axe fell to the ground. The angry serpent at once seized him with bites by its other head, enveloped him in its coils, and dragged him into its cave.

As he was being dragged, he cried to his companion to defend him or to give him the axe which he held in his hands. Afraid, the companion refused and fled. For this reason he was compelled by the priests to undergo exile as one guilty of the man’s death.

When certain persons returning from Jerusalem, wearied, rested beside the road at night, a terrible lion came upon them as they slept. Passing over the others, it attacked only the priest and carried him as prey to other lions. They immediately devoured him while his companions heard him roaring.

These things are from the sayings of Peter Damian, who also wrote the lives of Saint Romuald and Odilo.

Title XVI

Chapter IX

About this time, namely in the year of the Lord 1100, Hildebert, bishop of Le Mans, flourished. He was a disciple of Berengar of Tours, an excellent composer of verse and prose, who magnificently wrote an epitaph for that same Berengar in fifty-two verses, as Helinand writes.

That same Hildebert endured tribulations and bonds for Christ. For, as he himself relates in a certain general letter to all the sons of the Church—Vincent writing this in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-six—when Count Heotrocus was held in bonds in the tower of Le Mans, the bishop himself, having been summoned, approached the count as he trembled from fear of death.

Having confessed to him, the count arranged the affairs of his household, made his testament, and distributed his goods to the Church. So that this might remain unviolated, he obtained by entreaties from the bishop that the bishop should approach his mother and bear witness concerning the testament, forbidding anyone to presume to diminish it or attempt to reduce it to nothing.

When the bishop therefore came, the count's mother received him in peace. She approved the testament, giving thanks that he had approached by the count's favor.

On the same day a council was begun against him, and on the following day hands were laid upon him. Thus he was shamefully captured and placed in public custody. They also divided his garments among themselves, his horses having already been distributed among those who freely ran to the crime.

At that time the venerable bishop of Chartres was in the fortress in which these things were done. In a contrite spirit, he first indeed addressed Hubert, namely, the leader of those criminals, but the beast admitted no reason. Thereafter he freely accused him of sacrilege and finally delivered him to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, bound by the chain of anathema by which he deserved to be bound.

Religious abbots also and anchorites of consummate reputation came to him, but they found him like a hard stone. "And in all these things his fury is not turned away."

Hildebert was first bishop of Le Mans and afterward archbishop of Tours.

While the aforesaid bishop was now placed in bonds, he wrote several letters. He also composed certain elegant verses concerning his exile; a beautiful book On the Weariness of This Life, containing a complaint of himself, concerning himself, addressed to himself, partly in verse and partly in prose; a most beautiful prayer to the Holy Trinity; and certain verses concerning the Eucharist.

Some extracts from these works are those which follow. But first a certain event concerning another matter of the same time must be noted.

In the monastery of Fulda a deadly pestilence, raging violently, first seized the abbot and soon killed many of the monks. At first each of the survivors feared for himself, said prayers, and made more generous alms. But as time passed, as is the nature of all, they gradually began to omit these things when fear had been removed.

The cellarer did so especially. He openly cried out that the storehouse could not possibly suffice for so many expenses, that he had always hoped for some relief on account of so many removals by funerals, and that no further hope remained if the dead consumed that which they had been unable to consume while alive.

Accordingly, when one night he had long postponed sleep because of necessary duties, at last, having disentangled the knots of his delays, he proceeded into the dormitory. Behold, in the chapter house he saw the abbot and all who had died in that year sitting in the order in which they had departed.

Trembling and desiring to flee, he was forcibly dragged back, rebuked, and flogged in the monastic manner. He heard the abbot's words to this effect:

"It is foolish to gape after profits from another's death when the lot of each hangs beneath the same fate. And it is impious, when a monk has spent his entire life in the monastery's service, that he should lack at least one year's stipend after his death.

"Know, therefore, that you will die very soon, but whatever is done for you will be turned to the benefit of the others from whom you have taken it. Indeed, correct by example those whom you corrupted by word."

He departed, and demonstrated by wounds so recent and by his approaching death that he had seen nothing vain.

Sayings of the Aforesaid Hildebert in Verse, Section I

Recently I was wealthy and blessed with many friends, and my own fortunes smiled upon me for a long time.

Often I said to myself, “What are such prosperous conditions of affairs?
What does so great and silent a field of riches intend [read: What does so great and so swiftly gathered a heap of riches portend]?”

Alas for me, there is no trust and no constancy in things; things themselves teach what they are by their changeability.

A light breeze turns the affairs of men and men themselves from hour to hour, and the greatest ruin comes from the highest step.

All mortal things hang beneath a two-edged chance, and by their own mortality promise flight.

Whatever you possess today will perhaps leave you tomorrow, or even now, while you speak, it ceases to be yours.

Fortune plays these alternations and permits neither proud kings nor humble slaves to remain such for long.

That deceitful companion, faithful only in fickleness, neither favors without punishment nor oppresses without end.

She who once caressed me with a serene countenance changed her faces into cloudy fortunes.

That new and grievous tyrant was added to my losses, under whom, as consul of the people of Le Mans, law perished.

His ancestors were ashamed to have begotten a patron of crimes, one equal to Fortune in changeability and deceits.

He, the shame of the country, expelled me from my country—not without punishment—as I defended the laws of justice.

Thereupon I climb a ship and commit my life to storms;
the sails draw, and the little vessel is aided by a double labor.

The world and the enemy heap almost all that can do harm as their rage upon the fragile pinewood.

Behold, a ravening whirlwind, raising waves to the stars, has driven the ship, now without a stern, to the shore.

Thus, wretched yet fortunate, with the ship shattered and my possessions taken away,
I have escaped winds, seas, rocks, and Jupiter.

Behold what belongs to man, what he may rightly call paternal, and with what endowment that wretched man may applaud himself.

This is man’s: always to slip away with time and always to die under some condition.

It is man’s to be born naked and to return naked, unable to carry his riches to his mother.

It is man’s to decay in the earth and confess through putrefaction, and by miserable steps to be reduced to ashes.

Man, you are heir to this property,
and no rewards more certain than these await their lord.

Things and riches are lent and serve for an hour, and one rich in the morning will be poor in the evening.

No one can assign to things a right to remain, for they have not learned to follow man's nod.

God assigned their right to them and established that they be held by laws, and that they stand or go at His nod.

He once, simultaneously, and alone foresaw and acted all things;
He neither saw them otherwise nor acts otherwise.

As He saw the things to be made, He makes and governs them without labor;
He distinguishes them by forms, time, or place.

He measures out to things the course of growing, determines them, and, Himself remaining, turns them by laws.

Himself remaining while He moves all things, He counsels sick mortals and teaches where hope is to be placed.

He is the mighty order and concord of mute things [read: He, the mighty one, is the gentle course and harmony of things].
Whatever He wills concerning me, He swears [read: let Him dispose concerning me]; I shall be His.

In that same work of complaint, the soul speaks about itself to itself:

As the guest of a narrow and fragile house, and of one falling,
I am oppressed under a servile condition.

I bear a sorrowful yoke upon my neck and am held by heavy chains;
alas for grief, though I shall not die, I am dragged toward death.

Alas for me, how easily I was deceived, how ready to undergo shameful things, how swift toward my own losses.

The Bridegroom had constructed the lodging with marvelous art; received into it, I remained chaste for a short time.

For a cunning adulterer, though illustrious in origin, deceived me when the maidservant opened the doors.

He mutters, speaks against me, and commands me to use present things;
by pleasures, riches, and the name of mistress he entices me.

Corrupted by these means, the maid perverts the honorable beginning and imperiously drags the wretched woman wherever she wishes.

This is the law of my lodging: as an exile, I am bound to these things for an hour;
a bitter day will dissolve this covenant.

I must depart, but I know neither where nor when,
and perhaps this very day will be the last.

The house must therefore be laid aside so that, once free,
I may by right be without an eternal and sorrowful prison.

Alas, how shameful the impiety, how much it must be repressed, how discordant to the soul and how impious!

Care of the world, stirring the heat of the heart, teaches one to attack what is right and honorable.

Peace is a thing too abject and a source of shame;
virtue is a burden and crime an honor.

Virtue is cheap, eminence an endowment without fruit.
You are a saleable good, sluggish toward heavenly things, burdensome and sluggish, yet ambitious for heavenly things.

Easy to lay aside, hard to take up again,
I vanish like a little column of smoke.

There is no one whom you please with a simple desire, who grieves when you are injured if the witness is removed,

who loves or protects you freely,
or who promises patronage.

Praise is lofty, riches are praised, crime is exalted, poverty despised;
outrage prevails and honesty is made foul.

Alas, now laws threaten the innocent.
Does outrage thus gain scepters?

Alas, with what anxious labor each hastens to the physician through love of the flesh!

There is no complaint concerning the morals of the soul;
after it has departed, a tardy remedy follows.

The leaders of Latium endured many things for liberty;
they exposed offspring to exile and their head to the sword.

Happy would they be if the sorrowful yoke were cast off thus and nothing more miserable followed the wretched.

But grievous servitude oppressed necks that were wrongly free, and each person bore his own crimes as a hundred masters.

If it truly pleased one to live under liberty,
one would be ashamed to serve not man but sin.

For the former passes and is at least relieved by death;
the latter is eternal and gains no end by an end.

On the Seven Acts of the Soul, Section II

The same author speaks thus:

The power of the soul claims seven acts more properly for itself:
it gives life, senses, embraces various arts, corrects excesses, presses on by virtues into its very self, directs its gaze toward Deity, and rejoices in Him.

The first act also inheres in seeds; brute animals participate in another; two are properties of yours [read: are peculiar to us].

Three also belong to those above, though those above are preferred.
By the first act bodies vegetate and grow.

From it come vigor, union, completion of motion, condition, form, and a certain fittingness.

By another it touches, sees, hears, tastes, smells, hates, loves, seeks, and avoids things contrary and suitable to itself.

It is relaxed into sleep unless it wanders through all things in the mind [read: It sinks into sleep and wanders in dreams with the mind];
moreover it remembers [read: remembers the past], attends to future things, and does many things,

For they are carried out by sensation and also by reason [read: which are carried out by sensation and not by reason].
The third act traverses the liberal and other arts, whatever either natural ability or discipline supplies;

it gathers them and inheres in minds with varied advancement.

The fourth recalls one from unlawful things and teaches one to renounce the remaining guilt and then to know oneself.

It begins, I say, to strive toward and pass into a new beauty.
From the fifth we learn to be held by the law of nature, to guard against forbidden things through love of virtue, and sometimes to abstain from permitted things even without a witness.

The sixth, into the sight of the sun and of heavenly light, snatches the immaculate soul, almost equal to those above.

The seventh binds it and confines it with steadfast love [read: betroths it with steadfast love], and sets it beside God. What dowry it now beholds, what bridal chambers, what adornment and what festivals make it serene!

Who can say, "Come, beautiful one"? The blessed and greater souls have spoken, yet even they had neither such power nor such a tongue

by which it would be lawful to disclose these things here.

The reward laid up for merit exceeds sense.

Our first act, therefore, is vivification; the second, sensation; the third, art; the fourth, correction; the fifth, virtue; the sixth, contemplation; the seventh, rest.

If you deny that these acts are impeded by desires of the flesh, you have certainly either fallen entirely below man or advanced above man.

You alone are so freely blessed that you do not know that concupiscence which fights against the aforesaid acts both in a numerous army and triumphs with diverse affection. For it does not have equal license in all souls; nor are all the acts themselves assailed at the same time by the same affliction.

Some, like a crop in grass at its rising, are suffocated. Others, now advanced like grains in ears, become empty because an excessive heat burns them. There is also something which fattens them inwardly and something which empties them outwardly.

The first of these acts, the more pleasing it is to the flesh, is the safer from the flesh's disquiet. For the flesh loves the office of vivification and has made so great a peace with it that, if it knows anything contrary to it, it both abhors it with implacable hatred and averts it with attentive solicitude.

Hence it is that even those who cry with Paul, “I desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ,” nevertheless fear death, because the flesh delights in this office of the soul. Christ had come to die, and nevertheless He said, “Father, if it can be done, let this cup pass from Me.” Disturbed by the anxiety of the Passion, He also reached the point of a sweat of blood.

In these words nothing else is to be understood than a certain joint vivification of the flesh, which so inhered in Him by the law of nature that it nevertheless did not impede the good of obedience.

Although these things are so, afflictions that frequently supervene rupture so great a love, as though it were a fraternal covenant. The flesh, stirred by them to hatred of vivification, solicits the spirit toward consent, because it is moved not only by desire for enticements but also by the ruinous anxiety of cares.

While that huntress of delights fears to be subject to these for a long time and to be wearied for a long time, she gradually begins to be weary of life. It becomes pleasing to renounce the grace of vivification, whose services grow bitter when mixed with disadvantages.

From this is born a shameful and ridiculous appetite for death, a wicked offspring which, in the manner of a viper, frequently suffocates and extinguishes its own parents.

For your times also had certain persons whom grief over lost money drove either into the waters or to a noose. Do you not remember that you attested the same thing in these little verses?

> Although it pleases the flesh that it is vivified > and it loves this service of the soul,
>
> it happens that, broken by prolonged evils, > it loathes life and renounces its years.
>
> The final will prefers to die once rather than repeatedly, > and to be seized by death rather than survive so many dying things.

But although the flesh presses upon these things, the will is not murderous until the uxorious spirit inclines and favors it. The spirit, subdued by these goads and by the flesh’s flattering strife, commits the excess, because when the flesh cries out and the spirit hears it, guilt is created by consent. In creating this impiety, the flesh becomes the husband and the spirit the wife.

His Devout Prayer to the Holy Trinity, Section III

Alpha and Omega, great God, Eli, Eli, my God, whose power is all ability, whose understanding is all knowledge, whose being is the highest good,

whose work is whatever is good;

above all things, beneath all things, outside all things, within all things;

beneath all things, yet not laid beneath them;
above all things, yet not elevated;

within all things, yet not enclosed;
outside all things, yet not excluded;

wholly above by presiding,
wholly beneath by sustaining, wholly outside by embracing,

wholly within by filling.

Within, You are never confined;
outside, You are nowhere extended;

beneath, You are wearied by nothing;
above, You are supported by nothing.

Moving the world, You are not moved;
holding place, You are not held;

changing time, You are not changed;
stabilizing wandering things, You do not wander.

No external force or necessity alters Your being.
Our yesterday, tomorrow, and the day before are always for You now and the same.

Your Today, O God, is indivisible and everlasting;
in it You foresaw all and simultaneously perfected all.

According to which exemplar of the supreme mind,
You give form to the elements.

Son coequal with the Father,
consubstantial with the Father, splendor and figure of the Father,

Maker made a creature,

You put on our flesh;
You assumed our flesh.

Everlasting, made temporal;
immortal, about to die;

true man, true God,
man and God without mixture.

The Godhead was not turned into flesh here,

nor diminished because of the flesh;

humanity was assumed into God here,
yet not consumed because of God.

Equal to the Father in deity, lesser in the reality of the flesh;

God the Father is Father only of God, the Virgin is a mother, but the mother of God also.

In so new a joining, each nature thus stands so that it preserves whatever it was, having nevertheless been made something that it was not.

This is our Mediator; this is our Lawgiver:

circumcised, baptized,
crucified, buried.

He slept and descended;
He arose and ascended.

Thus, raised to the heavens,
the One who was judged will judge.

The Paraclete is uncreated, neither made nor born;

consort of the Father and of the Begotten,
He proceeds thus from both,

lest He be lesser in power or distinguished in quality.

As great as They, so great is He;
as They are, so is He.

From when They are, from then is He;
as much as They are, so much is He.

The Father is another by begetting, the Son another by being born,

the Breath another by proceeding from Them;
the Three are one by subsisting.

Each of the Three is fully God,
yet not three gods but one God.

In this God, the true God, I affirm Three and One, giving unity to the essence and Trinity to the Persons.

Among the Persons none is prior,
none lesser, none greater.

Each one is always itself,
so constant and fixed that it is neither varied in itself nor changed into any other.

This is the orthodox faith;
this is neither error nor guilt.

As I speak, so I also believe,
nor do I yield toward a perverse part.

Therefore come, good God,
lest I despair, although guilty.

Guilty of death, I do not despair,
but in death I seek life.

I offer nothing by which I may appease You except the faith which I defend.

You see the faith; by it I implore You:
lift the burden under which I labor.

Through this sacred plaster,
let the sick clay grow well.

His Prayer to Christ, Section IV

Already carried outside the gate, already fetid, already buried,

a band binds me and a stone presses me;
but if You command, this man will rise again.

Command, and the stone will be rolled away;
command, and the band will be broken.

He who is to come out knows no delays
after You cry, “Come forth.”

In this war of the sea my ship is assailed by pirates;
from here assaults, from there waves;

from here and there, death and mourning.
But You, good Sailor, come;

press down the winds, calm the sea,
make these pirates withdraw;

lead the ship to port;
save the ship.

My fig tree is unfruitful,
and its branch stands dry;

it will be cut down and burned
if You pronounce what it deserves.

But let it be left this year;
let it be dunged and dug around.

If it has still not rendered an account,
I speak these things weeping: then it will burn.

The ancient enemy rages against me;
he submerges me in waters and burns me in flames.

Therefore, languishing and afflicted,
I am left to You alone.

So that this enemy may vanish,
so that the sick man may recover,

grant to the weak man the strength to fast;
grant him the strength to pray.

Through these two, Christ being witness,
I shall be freed from this pestilence.

Release the mind;
make the penitent devout.

Give fear, for when it is cast away
I conjecture nothing concerning salvation.

Give hope, faith, and charity;

give discerning piety.

Give contempt of earthly things and desire for heavenly things.

God, I hope entirely in You;
God, from You I seek everything.

You are my praise, my good;
all my things are Your gift.

You are consolation in labor,
medicine in pain;

in mourning You are my lyre;
in anger You are a soothing remedy.

In straits You are a liberator;
for the fallen You are a restorer.

You furnish fear in advancement;
You preserve hope in failure.

If anyone injures me, You repay;
if anyone threatens, You defend.

What is doubtful, You resolve;
what must be covered, You enfold.

Do not permit me to enter the workshops of hell,
where there is sorrow, where there is fear,

where there is languor, where there is weeping,
where disgraces are uncovered,

where the guilty are confounded,
where the torturer is always striking,

where the worm is always eating,
where all this is everlasting,

because there is the death of Gehenna.
Let that Zion receive me,

Zion, David's tranquil city,
whose Builder is the Author of light,

whose harbor is the wood of the Cross,
whose keys are the tongue of Peter,

whose citizens are always joyful,
whose wall is living stone,

whose guardian is the festive King.
In this city there is solemn light, eternal spring, everlasting peace;

in it fragrance fills the heavens,

in it festive melody is perpetual.
There is no corruption there,

no failure, no complaint;
none are diminished, none deformed;

all are conformed to Christ.
Heavenly city, blessed city,

established upon a rock,
city in a sufficiently safe harbor,

from afar I greet you.
I greet you, I sigh for you,

I desire you, I seek you.
How greatly do your people rejoice;

how festively do they feast together!
What affection binds them,

or what gem paints the walls?
Which is chalcedony, which jacinth?

Those who are within know.
Joined to the pious companies in the streets of this city, may I sing a pious alleluia with Moses and Elijah. Amen.

Chapter X

In the year 1057 of the Lord's Incarnation, in the first year of the empire of Henry V, Lanfranc flourished as prior of the monastery of Bec.

To his excellent teaching there hastened from Burgundy Anselm, a man afterward adorned, as will be said below, with much virtue and learning. He succeeded Lanfranc in the office of prior under the excellent man Herluin, the first abbot, who founded that monastery of Bec from his own possessions.

As Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-six, chapter thirty-six, from Lanfranc's deeds, Lanfranc was a native of Pavia, a city of Italy, and was perfectly imbued with every secular science.

Having crossed the Alps, he came into Normandy and taught for some time in the city of Avranches. Then, considering the pursuit of mortal favor to be vanity, he seized upon the counsel of salvation and resolved to leave all things for the sake of Him who made all things.

When, in the evening, he wished to go to Rouen, he fell among robbers in a forest beyond the river Rille. Taking everything that he possessed, they bound his hands behind his back, drew the hood of his cloak before his eyes, led him away from the road, and left him among the dense thickets of the woodland.

Seized by such straits and not knowing what to do, he lamented his misfortune. At last, returning to himself amid the silence of the night and turning to God, he said: "Lord God, I have spent so much time in learning and have worn away both body and soul in the studies of letters, and still I have not learned how I ought to praise and pray to You. Free me from this tribulation, and I shall take care so to correct and order my life that I may know and be able to serve You."

When dawn arose, he heard travelers undertaking their journey and began to cry out for their assistance. Approaching and unbinding him, they led him back to the road.

He asked them to show him the humbler and poorer monastery which they knew in the region. For he was unwilling to approach a place where there were learned men who would hold him in honor and reverence.

Accordingly, on their counsel, he approached the monastery of Bec. There the venerable Abbot Herluin, founder of that monastery and recently promoted from being an aged soldier into the clergy, received him with joy.

Having become a monk, Lanfranc expended the greatest care in learning the offices, so that he might know how to render praises to God just as he possessed knowledge.

Thus for three years he lived as a solitary, rejoicing that he was unknown, nearly unknown to everyone, content with every kind of lowliness and extremity in the monastery.

As is reported, he was unwilling to read a lesson in church unless the cantor had first heard it.

One day, while reading at table, he pronounced a certain word as it ought to be pronounced. This did not please the presiding officer, who ordered him to pronounce it otherwise—as if Lanfranc had pronounced the word "to teach" with the middle syllable lengthened, as it is, and the presiding officer ordered him to shorten it.

That prior was not a learned man. But Lanfranc, a wise man who knew that Christ ought to be obeyed more than Donatus, abandoned what he had pronounced correctly and said it in the manner which seemed to be incorrect.

When report and fame had grown widely throughout distant regions, clerics hastened to him. With the permission of his abbot, he maintained a school. Powerful and noble laypeople also bestowed many things upon that church out of love for him.

After this, having been made archbishop of Canterbury from being abbot of Caen, he did many good things in the churches of England.

One day, when he was celebrating Mass and had come to the hour at which he received the body of the Lord in his hands, the deacon who was ministering to him, persuaded by a demon, seized him by the shoulders with his hands. The venerable prelate, disturbed in no respect, bent back his right hand, grasped him by the hair, and drew him before his feet.

When the Mass had been fully celebrated, he ordered that man to be taken into the house of the sick, where for some days he remained in madness. He said certain abominable things about some of the brothers of that place.

Then they named a certain man, saying that he would have nothing to say about him. But the demoniac began to affirm that the man would never dare to come into his presence.

When the brother heard this, he feared lest the demoniac should reproach him with something wrongly done by him. Then the wise brothers gave him counsel that, by speaking with the archbishop, he should make a pure confession, and thus, confidently, with his absolution and blessing, should go with them to the demoniac.

When he had done this, those who were present said to the demoniac: “Behold, the man whom you threatened is here. Say whether you know anything about him.”

But the demoniac, looking upon him with a savage eye and laughing loudly, said: “Who has so boiled you again and made you white?” He said nothing more. From this it was given to be understood that the power of confession and absolution takes from the devil either the memory of sin or, at least, the power of accusing.

After some days, however, by God’s mercy, he was freed from that plague by blessed Lanfranc, with the prayers of the brothers assisting.

When it was reported to Lanfranc himself that Abbot Anselm, coming to his bed one night after Matins, had found a gold ring upon it, he answered the one reporting it to him: “Know most certainly that he will be archbishop after me.” And so it was done.

Berengar of Tours, who asserted that the Eucharist which we receive at the altar is not truly the body and blood of Christ but only in a sign, sent letters to this Lanfranc. When the bearer of these letters did not find him in Normandy, he delivered them to certain clerics. From this a suspicion arose concerning Lanfranc himself, as though he supported and favored the things that were said by Berengar.

Therefore, when a reader read at Rome the letters brought by a certain bishop of Reims, Pope Leo presiding over the synod, and it was understood that Berengar exalted John Scotus, condemned Paschasius, and held an opinion contrary to the common faith concerning the Eucharist, a sentence of condemnation was promulgated against him, depriving him of the communion of the Church.

At the pope’s command Lanfranc expounded his faith before everyone and wiped away from himself the stain of the evil report. Thereafter he wrote against that same Berengar, in the manner of a dialogue, On the Body and Blood of the Lord, showing there that there is not only a figure or sign, but also the reality of the body and blood of Christ.

Section II

When Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, came to Rome, the man who was pope at that time, namely Alexander, rose respectfully for him, professing that he had rendered that distinguished mark of reverence not to the honor of the archbishop but to the love of the teacher.

At a Mass of this Lanfranc, a certain young monk had read the Gospel. When, after the Lord’s Prayer, he offered the paten to the pontiff, he saw before him certain most hideous faces of malignant spirits. Terrified at their appearance, he tightly embraced with both arms the pontiff as he held the sacred elements in his hands, crying out horribly and saying: “Christ conquers; Christ commands; Christ reigns.”

All who were present were terrified, and after Mass the man was carried by soldiers into the pontiff’s chamber. They assembled in chapter; the man, full of a demon, was brought in, strongly bound. Lanfranc delivered an address concerning him and ordered prayer to be made for him in common.

As soon as he appeared to have been made sound, he was brought to the tomb of Saint Dunstan to give thanks. While Compline was being sung, the man, snatched from his stall, ran to Prior Henry. Henry immediately seized him and led him into the dormitory, and he passed a sleepless night before him.

At midnight he disturbed everyone by crying out. He was led to the tomb of Saint Dunstan, resisting greatly. When he had come there, he began to rage, and until day he poured forth innumerable blasphemies against Dunstan and against Christ.

In the morning he was carried back to the house of the sick, where he was tormented for many days. Whoever approached him, if they had any crime which they had not yet confessed, he disclosed it publicly and said that they were to be joined to him in everlasting punishments.

Hence some, being ashamed, confessed purely. When they presented themselves to him again, he asked who they were, whence they came, and how they had been washed so suddenly and had lost his fellowship.

After these things, when he had been placed amid holy relics, leaping with the bed upon which he lay, he wished to flee from the saints. When he was held there, the demon ran through his belly like a little cat, now toward the mouth, now toward the lower parts, seeking an exit.

While the brothers were taking refreshment, the brother who had been left to guard him, being greatly devoted to Saint Dunstan, trusted in God's help. He took the cross which Saint Dunstan, according to the custom of archbishops, was accustomed to have carried before him, and placed it upon the demoniac, crying with tears: "Saint Dunstan, come to our aid."

Immediately the demon went out. Then the sick man, raising his eyes to heaven and suffused with tears, said: "I give thanks to you, holy father Dunstan, and to you, dearest brother, because by your merits, holy lord, and by your charitable prayer, dearest brother, I have been freed from the enemy."

After this the bishop of Bayeux, who was earl of Kent, raised certain calumnies against Lanfranc concerning the lands and customs of the church of Canterbury. When the day of the plea was at hand, Lanfranc earnestly invoked Saint Dunstan.

That night Saint Dunstan stood before him in a vision, saying: "Lanfranc, do not be troubled; I shall be with you. And if you do not conquer them, know that it is not I who speak with you."

And thus it was done, so that on the following day all the things that were alleged against Lanfranc were reduced to nothing, to the astonishment of all.

Chapter XI

Concerning Saint Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, His Deeds, and the Books Published by Him; He Flourished in the Year of the Lord 1061

As Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-six, chapter sixty-six, Anselm, born on the border of Lombardy and Burgundy, was entrusted to letters, learned, and in a short time made great progress. He had not yet reached the fifteenth year of his age when he was already considering in his mind how he might best order his life according to God.

After some time had elapsed, he left his homeland. When, in crossing a certain mountain, he failed from bodily weariness, he tried to restore his strength by eating snow, for at that time nothing else was at hand for him to eat.

His servant, observing this, grieved and began carefully to search whether perhaps anything to eat was contained in their bag. Immediately, contrary to expectation, he found in it a most white loaf of bread. Refreshed and restored by it, Anselm was returned unharmed to his journey.

After three years had therefore been spent, partly in Burgundy and partly in France, he proceeded to Normandy. Since the fame of Master Lanfranc, concerning whom above, had become widely celebrated everywhere, and since he taught the most noble of the clerics who came to him from all parts of the world, Anselm came to Bec and submitted himself to his teaching.

Because on account of his studies he wearied his body with vigils, fasting, and cold, it came into his mind that, if he became a monk, it would not be necessary for him to suffer harsher things than he was suffering, while he would then not lose the merit of his labor, concerning which he did not at that time know whether it would remain for him.

Having conceived this in his mind, he considered thus within himself: “Behold, I shall become a monk—but where? If at Cluny or at Bec, I have lost all the time which I have spent in learning letters. For both the strictness of the order at Cluny and the surpassing wisdom of Lanfranc at Bec will prove me either to be of use to no one or to be worth nothing. Therefore I shall accomplish what I propose in such a place that I may both display my knowledge and benefit many.”

For, as he himself was accustomed to relate, contempt of the world did not yet flourish in him. But afterward, returning to himself, he said: “What is it to be a monk? Is it to wish to be set before others, to be honored before others, and to be magnified? No. Therefore, immediately laying aside obstinacy, become a monk where, as is fitting for God, you may be set after all and may be considered more abject than all. And indeed at Bec I shall be of no weight, since there is one there who, conspicuous in the light of preeminent wisdom, is sufficient for all and is honorable and acceptable to all.”

Having therefore become a monk there, he served religion in all things in such a way that whoever in the whole congregation wished to live religiously would find in his life enough to imitate. When Lanfranc was assumed to the governance of the monastery of Caen, Anselm himself discharged the office of prior.

It happened on a certain night before the night vigils that, lying in bed, he tried to examine within himself how the prophets had long ago known past and future things together as though present, and had put them forth without doubt in speech or writing.

While he was wholly occupied in these things and desired to know this, directing the rays of his eyes, he saw through the intervening walls of the oratory and dormitory the monks whose office this was going around the altars and the other places of the church in preparation for Matins, lighting the lamps, and one of them, after taking the rope, striking the bell. At its sound he marveled to see the assembly of the brothers rising from bed.

He therefore conceived within himself that it is a very easy thing for God to show future things to the prophets in spirit, since He had granted him the ability to see with bodily eyes the things being done through so many obstructions.

A certain young man in the community had resolved within himself that on no occasion whatsoever would he place his hand upon his genital members. Envying his resolution, the devil caused him to feel such pain and distress in those same members that the young man could not bear himself. For the flesh itself was felt to be of such weight as if a most heavy mass of lead hung in that part of the body.

When he could no longer conceal his distress and was asked by Anselm what afflicted him, he could no longer hide the matter itself. Admonished, therefore, to ascertain the extent of the sickness by applying his hand, he modestly refused, fearing lest he violate his resolution.

Then Anselm, taking with him an elderly and religious brother, led the languishing young man into a more private place, so that he might learn the extent of that infirmity and bring aid according to his ability. What more? The flesh was found perfectly sound. Immediately all that diabolical vexation fell away and did not weary the young man further, whom the mere sight of Anselm rendered immune from so great a calamity.

Concerning Certain Notable Deeds Performed by Anselm, Section I

As Vincent relates in the place cited above, a certain one of the older brothers, who through an ancient hatred was exceedingly hostile to Anselm and could in no way look upon him with a straightforward eye, was pressed by infirmity and brought to his last extremity.

While the brothers at midday rested in their beds according to custom, he, lying in the house of the sick, began to utter pitiable cries and, as though desiring to escape the sight of certain horrible things, to turn his pale and trembling face now this way, now that, while hiding it.

The terrified brothers who were present asked what afflicted him. But he said: “You see two enormous wolves holding me confined between their forelegs and now, with their teeth driven in, suffocating my throat—and you ask what afflicts me!”

When this was heard, one of them hurried to Anselm, who was occupied in the cloister with correcting books. Having led him outside the cloister, he disclosed what was happening to the sick brother.

Then Anselm withdrew into a more private place. After a little while he went out of [read: entered] the house in which the sick man lay, raised his hand, and made the sign of the cross, saying: “In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit.”

At this act the sick man immediately became quiet and, with his countenance gladdened, began with the deepest affection of his heart to give thanks to God. He said that, when Anselm entered the doorway and, extending his hand, made the sign of the cross, he saw a flame of fire in the likeness of a lance proceed from his mouth. Hurled against the wolves, it terrified them and drove them far away in swift flight.

Then Anselm, speaking more privately with the brother concerning the salvation of his soul, inclined his heart to penance and confession. Finally, having absolved him by paternal authority, he said that he would depart from the present life at the hour when the brothers rose for None. And so it was done.

Birulbus, sacristan of the same monastery, one night, while going through the cloister at the hour when he was to awaken the brothers for the vigils, observed Anselm, whom at that hour he thought to be occupied with sleep rather than prayer. He saw him standing in prayer in the chapter house, surrounded by a vast globe of shining flame.

One day, while Anselm was on a journey, a certain monk of Bec met him. Anselm asked what counsel concerning lodging he brought him. He answered: “We have lodging not far away, but there is nothing to be set before us and the brothers except bread and cheese.”

Smiling, Anselm said: “Do not be afraid, good man, but go swiftly, and when a net has been cast into the neighboring river, you will immediately find a fish sufficient for us all.”

Having received the command, the monk flew to tell the fisherman, who declared that what he said would be more a thing to laugh at than to attempt. At last, compelled by the brother, he cast the net contrary to expectation and immediately caught a trout of unusual size together with another small fish.

At another time, a certain man detained Anselm for a meal while he was passing through his land. When the man complained about the scarcity of fish, having only certain worthless things to set before Anselm and his monks, Anselm said to him in jest: “Behold, a sturgeon is being brought to you, and your spirit complains about a lack of delicacies.” And so it was done.

When a certain abbot who was considered exceedingly religious was speaking with Anselm concerning matters belonging to monastic religion, and among other things discussed the boys being reared in the cloister, he added: “What, I ask, will become of these? We do not cease to beat them day and night, and they continually become worse, for they are dull and beastlike.”

Marveling, Anselm said to him: “You have indeed expended your nourishment well, since from human beings you have reared beasts. Tell me, I ask you, Abbot: if you planted in your garden a sapling of some tree and immediately enclosed it on every side so that it could extend its branches in no direction, what sort of tree would come from it?”

“Certainly a useless one, with bent and entangled branches.”

“Surely this is what you do with your boys. They have been planted through oblation in the garden of the Church so that they may grow and bear fruit for God. But you constrain them so greatly on every side with terrors, threats, and blows that they are permitted to use no liberty at all.

“Hence it happens that, because they perceive in you no love, piety, or sweetness toward themselves, neither afterward do they have faith that any good is in you. Instead, they believe that all your actions toward them proceed from hatred and envy.

“And it happens in a pitiable manner that, as they afterward grow in body, so hatred and suspicion of every evil grow within them, and they are always inclined and bent toward vices. Since they have been reared by no one in true charity, they can look upon no one except with downcast brows or a sidelong eye.”

A Narrative of the Same Anselm, Section II

The same Anselm relates in the book On Similitudes that, when he had already been made archbishop of Canterbury and was making a journey with a fitting company, they met a certain boy who had one sparrow tied with a thread and was playing with it in this manner.

For sometimes the boy let out the thread, and the sparrow began to fly as though free from restraint; but the boy very quickly pulled back the thread, and the sparrow fell to the ground. The boy rejoiced in this and laughed at the fallen sparrow.

After a little delay the boy again let out the thread. The sparrow began to fly so as to escape, but the boy, ready at hand, pulled it back by the thread and cast it to the ground, rejoicing over this. Anselm therefore fixed his attention upon this sight.

After many repetitions of the boy’s action, Anselm commanded one of his men to break the thread. When this was done, the sparrow flew away, and the boy could no longer catch it. From this the boy received great grief and wept over the loss of the sparrow, but Anselm began to laugh.

When his companions marveled that so great a man should laugh at this deed, he turned it to a moral meaning: “This boy signifies the devil—a boy in foolishness, a hundred years old in experience and long malice. The sparrow, however, is the sinner, for the Psalmist says, ‘Our soul is like a sparrow.’

“The long thread is the habit of sin by which the devil keeps the sinner bound beneath his dominion. But sometimes it happens that the sinner begins some good deed, as though, having been freed, he wished to depart from the devil’s hands.

“The devil, however, by the evil thread of an old habit, casts him to the ground through the repetition of sins. This happens not once but many times. Hence the boy, the devil, rejoices over the sinner’s relapse, while the sinner, after the sin, is saddened as his conscience bites him.

“At length, sometimes by the work of the prayer or admonition of some holy man, the habit of evil in the sinner is broken, so that he does not relapse but flies fully to heaven through works of virtue.

“Seeing this, the boy, the devil, grieves and is saddened at the loss of the sinner, because he has been plucked from his hands; but holy men rejoice and exult.”

In that book On Similitudes, Anselm presents many beautiful examples or similitudes concerning spiritual things in diverse subjects. In this matter of similitudes he appears in his books to surpass other doctors, so beautiful are the similitudes he presents.

Anselm wrote the Prologion [i.e., Proslogion], that is, an address concerning God. A certain foolish man, desiring to refute this work, composed a writing against it. When it had been sent to him by a certain friend, Anselm considered it and published his response to it in one book.

He also wrote the Monologion, that is, a soliloquy concerning the Holy Trinity, in one book; On Truth, in one book; On the Procession of the Holy Spirit, in one book; On the Harmony of Free Choice and Divine Foreknowledge, and also of Predestination and Grace, in one book; On the Fall of the Devil, in one book; On Original Sin, in one book; On the Incarnation of the Word, in one book; On the Sacrament of the Altar, in one book; On Unleavened Bread, in one book; Why God Became Man, in one book; Meditations or Prayers, in one book; On the Grammarian, in one book; Parables or Proverbs of Anselm, in one book; On the Song of Songs, in one book; and his Letters to Diverse Persons, in one book. Certain extracts from these books are placed here.

Anselm, Section III

In the Prologion [i.e., Proslogion], Anselm exhorts himself to the secrecy of contemplation, speaking thus:

> Come now, little man, hide yourself for a little while from your tumultuous thoughts. Cast aside now your burdensome cares. Exclude everything except God and those things which assist you in seeking Him; and, having closed the door, seek Him.
> Come therefore, You, Lord my God: teach my heart where and how it may seek You, where and how it may find You. Lord, if You are not here, where shall I seek You when You are absent? But if You are everywhere, why do I not see You when You are present?

Yet certainly You inhabit inaccessible light. And where is inaccessible light, or how shall I approach inaccessible light? What will Your servant do, anxious in his love of You and cast far away from Your face? He longs to find You and does not know Your place. He desires to seek You and does not know Your face.

You made me and remade me, and You have conferred all my good things upon me, and I do not yet know You. Finally, I was made to see You, and I have not yet done that for which I was made.

O miserable lot of man, when he lost that for which he was made! O that hard and terrible fall! Alas, what he lost and what he found; what departed and what remained! He lost the blessedness for which he was made and found the misery for which he was not made. That without which nothing is happy departed, and there remained what in itself is nothing but miserable.

Then man ate the bread of angels, for which he now hungers. Now he eats the bread of sorrows, which he did not then know. Alas, the common mourning of humankind, the universal lamentation of the children of Adam! He belched with fullness; we sigh with hunger. He abounded; we beg. He happily possessed and miserably abandoned; we unhappily lack and miserably desire, and alas, we remain empty.

Why did he not preserve for us, when he could easily have done so, that whose absence weighs so heavily upon us? Grave loss, grave sorrow, the whole grave thing! But alas for me, miserable, one among the other miserable children of Eve, alienated from God! What have I begun? What have I accomplished? I was striving toward God and stumbled upon myself. I was seeking rest in my secret place and found tribulation and labor in my inmost parts. I wished to laugh from the joy of my mind and am compelled to roar from the groaning of my heart. Joy was hoped for, and behold, from where do such dense sighs come?

And You, O Lord, how long? How long, Lord, will You forget us? How long will You turn Your face away from us? Restore Yourself to us, that it may be well with us, for without You it is so evil with us. Have mercy upon our labors and endeavors from You [read: endeavors toward You], for without You we have no strength.

You invite us; help us. I beseech You, Lord: let me not despair by sighing, but breathe again by hoping. My heart is embittered by its desolation; sweeten it by Your consolation. Hungry, I began to seek You; let me not cease while fasting from You. Famished, I approached; let me not depart unfed. Poor, I came to the rich One; miserable, to the merciful One; let me not return empty and despised.

And if I sigh before I eat, after my sighs You will give me something to eat. Teach me to seek You and show Yourself to the one seeking You, because I can neither seek You unless You teach me nor find You unless You show Yourself.

Let me seek You by desiring You; let me love You by finding You.

I confess to You, Lord, and give thanks, because You created in me this Your image, so that, mindful of You, I may think of You and love You. But it has been so effaced by the abrasion of vices and so darkened by the smoke of sins that it cannot do that for which it was made unless You renew and reform it.

Concerning the Inquiry into Divine Power, Mercy, and Justice, Section IV

Anselm:

Lord, I do not attempt to penetrate Your sublimity, because I in no way compare my understanding with it; but I desire in some measure to understand Your truth, which my heart believes and loves. For I do not seek to understand so that I may believe, but I believe so that I may understand. For I also believe this: that unless I believe, I shall not understand.

Therefore, Lord, You who give understanding to faith, grant me, insofar as You know it to be expedient, to understand that You are as we believe and that You are what we believe. Indeed, we believe You to be something than which nothing greater can be thought.

But how are You omnipotent if You cannot do all things? Or if You cannot be corrupted, cannot lie, cannot make the true false—so that what has been done has not been done—and cannot do many similar things, how can You do all things?

Or is the ability to do these things not power but impotence? For he who can do what is not expedient for him and what he ought not to do can do something such that, the more he can do it, the more adversity and perversity can prevail against him and the less he can prevail against them. Therefore, he who can in this manner can not by power but by impotence.

Therefore, Lord God, You are the more truly omnipotent because You can do nothing through impotence and can do nothing against Yourself.

But how are You at once merciful and impassible? For if You are impassible, You do not suffer with another; if You do not suffer with another, Your heart is not miserable from compassion for the miserable—which is to be merciful.

Lord, You are merciful according to us because You save the miserable and spare sinners, but not according to Yourself because You do not suffer with another. For Your heart is not made miserable by compassion for the miserable. You are merciful not because You feel the affection, but because we experience the effect.

But how do You spare the evil if You are wholly and supremely just? When You punish the evil, it is just because it agrees with their merits. And when You spare the evil, it is just because it is fitting to Your goodness. Therefore, by sparing the evil You are just. Thus, without contradiction, You both justly punish and justly spare.

Whatever You are, however, You are not through another but through Yourself. You are the very life by which You live, the wisdom by which You are wise, and the very goodness by which You are good to the good and the evil; and so concerning similar things.

Have you found, my soul, what you were seeking? You were seeking God, and you have found Him to be something supreme over all, than which nothing better can be thought.

Concerning the Inquiry into Divine Goodness, Truth, and Eternity, Section V

Anselm:

Lord my God, my maker and remaker, tell my desiring soul what else You are than what it has seen, so that it may see purely what it desires. It strains itself so that it may see more, and it sees nothing beyond that which it has seen except darkness. Indeed, it does not see darkness, because there is none in You; rather, it sees that it cannot see more because of its own darkness.

Why is this, Lord? Why is this? Is its eye darkened by its own infirmity, or is it beaten back by Your splendor? Certainly it is both darkened in itself and beaten back by You. It is surely both obscured by its own littleness and overwhelmed by Your immensity. Truly it is both contracted by its own narrowness and conquered by Your breadth.

For how great is that light from which every truth that shines upon the rational mind gleams! How broad is that truth in which is everything that is true, and outside which is nothing except nothingness and falsehood! How immense is that which, with one gaze, sees all things that have been made, and by whom, and through whom, and how they were made from nothing!

What purity, what simplicity, what certainty and splendor are there! Certainly more than can be understood by a creature.

Therefore, Lord, You are not only that than which nothing greater can be thought, but You are also something greater than can be thought. Truly, Lord, this is the inaccessible light in which You dwell. Therefore I do not see it, because it is too great for me; and yet whatever I see, I see through it. It shines too greatly.

The eye of my soul does not receive that light, nor does it endure looking into it for long. It is beaten back by its splendor, conquered by its breadth, overwhelmed by its immensity, and confounded by its capacity.

O highest and inaccessible light! O whole and blessed truth! How far You are from me, who am so near to You! How remote You are from my sight, though I am thus present to Your sight! You are wholly present everywhere, and I do not see You. In You I move, and in You I am, and I cannot approach You. You are within me and around me, and I do not perceive You.

Still, Lord, You lie hidden from my soul in Your light and blessedness, and therefore it still moves about in its own darkness and misery. It already hoped for satisfaction and is again overwhelmed by need. I was already longing to eat, and behold, it happens that I hunger more.

I was striving to rise to the light of God, and I fell back into my darkness. I have sought Your countenance; Your countenance, Lord, I shall seek. Do not turn Your face away from me. Reveal me, Lord, to You [read: Raise me from myself to You]. Heal, sharpen, and illuminate the eye of my mind, that it may behold You. Let my soul gather its strength and with its whole understanding strive again toward You, Lord.

You therefore fill and embrace all things. You are before and beyond all things. Indeed, You are before all things because You are before they were made. But You are not beyond all things. [read: But how are You beyond all things?] Is it because they can be thought to have an end, whereas You cannot in any way?

For in some manner they have an end, but You in no manner. You alone, Lord, are what You are, and You are He who is. You are sufficient to Yourself in every respect, needing nothing, while all things need You in order that they may be and that they may be well.

You are this good, God the Father. This is Your Word, that is, Your Son. For in the Word by which You speak Yourself there cannot be anything other than what You are, or anything greater or less than You, because Your Word is true in the same manner as You are truthful. Therefore He is the very truth, as You are, not a truth other than You.

And You are so simple that nothing other than what You are can be born from You. This very thing is the one love common to You and Your Son, that is, the Holy Spirit proceeding from both. For that same love is not unequal to You or to Your Son, because You love Yourself and Him, and He loves You and Himself, as greatly as You and He are.

Nor is that which is not unequal to You and Him other than You and Him. Nor can anything proceed from supreme simplicity other than that from which it proceeds. Moreover, this is that one necessary thing in which is every good—indeed, which is every good, and the one, whole, and supreme good.

Concerning the Inquiry into the Supreme Good in Which Are All Good Things, and Concerning Full Joy, Section VI

Anselm:

Now awaken, my soul, and raise up your whole understanding, and consider as much as you can what sort of thing and how great that good is. For if individual good things are delightful, consider attentively how delightful is that good which contains the delightfulness of all good things—not such as we have experienced in created things, but differing as greatly as the Creator differs from the creature.

O you who will enjoy this good, what will there be for him, and what will there not be for him? Certainly, whatever he wishes will be, and whatever he does not wish will not be.

Why, then, do you wander through many things, little man, seeking the goods of your soul and the goods of your body? Love the one good in which are all good things, and it is sufficient for you.

What do you love, my flesh? What do you desire, my soul? There is whatever you love; there is whatever you desire.

If beauty delights you, "the just shall shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father." If speed, or strength, or liberty of body which nothing can resist, "they shall be like the angels of God." If a long and wholesome life, there is sound eternity and eternal soundness. If satiety, "they shall be satisfied when the glory of the Lord appears." If drunkenness, "they shall be made drunk from the abundance of the house of God." If melody, there the choirs of angels sing together. If wisdom, the very wisdom of God will show itself to them.

If friendship, they will love God more than themselves and one another as themselves; and God will love them more than they love themselves, because they love Him, themselves, and one another through Him, while He loves Himself and them through Himself.

If power, they will be omnipotent concerning their own will, as God is concerning His. For just as God will be able to do through Himself what He wills, so they will be able to do through Him what they will.

If honor and riches, God will set His good and faithful servants over many things; indeed, they will be heirs of God and fellow heirs with Christ. If true security, they will be certain that never and in no way will those things—or rather, that good—be lacking to them.

But what sort of joy, and how great, is there where there is such and so great a good? Human heart, needy heart, heart experienced in afflictions—indeed, overwhelmed by afflictions—how greatly would you rejoice if you abounded in all these things? Ask your inmost self whether it can contain its joy from so great a blessedness.

But certainly, if someone else whom you loved entirely as yourself possessed the same blessedness, your joy would be doubled, because you would rejoice no less for him than for yourself. If, however, two or three or very many more possessed the very same thing, you would rejoice as much for each of them as for yourself, if you loved each of them as yourself.

Therefore, in that most perfect charity of innumerable human beings, blessed angels, and human beings [read: innumerable blessed angels and human beings], where no one will love another less than himself, each will rejoice no differently for every other than for himself. If, therefore, the human heart will scarcely contain its joy from so great a good of its own, how will it be capable of so many and so great joys?

And since, in proportion as anyone loves another, he rejoices in that one's good, just as in that perfect happiness each will love God beyond comparison more than himself and all others with himself, so he will also rejoice beyond estimation more in the happiness of God than in his own and that of all others with himself.

My God and my Lord, my hope and the joy of my heart, tell my soul whether this is the joy of which You tell us through Your Son: "Ask, and you shall receive, that your joy may be full."

For I have found a certain full joy, and more than full. For when the heart, the mind, the soul, and the whole human being are full of that joy, that joy will still remain beyond measure. Therefore not all that joy will enter into those who rejoice, but those who rejoice will enter wholly into joy.

But eye has not seen that joy, nor has ear heard it, nor has it ascended into the heart of man. Therefore, Lord, I have not yet said or thought how greatly those blessed ones of Yours will rejoice. Surely they will rejoice as greatly as they will love; they will love as greatly as they will know.

I pray, O God, that I may know You and love You, so that I may rejoice in You. Let knowledge of You advance in me here and there be made full. Let Your love increase and there be made full, so that here my joy may be great in hope and there may be full in You.

Meanwhile let my mind meditate upon it. Let my tongue speak of it. Let my heart love it. Let my mouth discourse upon it. Let my soul hunger for it; let my flesh thirst for it. Let my whole substance desire it until I enter into the joy of the Lord.

Concerning Lamentation over Present and Future Misery, Section VII

Anselm says in the book of Meditations:

My life terrifies me. For, when diligently examined, almost my whole life appears to me to be either sin or sterility. And if any fruit is seen in it, it is either feigned, imperfect, or corrupted in some manner, so that it can either fail to please or displease God.

Certainly my whole life is either in sin and damnable, or unfruitful and contemptible. But why do I separate the unfruitful from the damnable? Surely, if it is unfruitful, it is damnable. For every tree which does not bear good fruit shall be cut down and cast into the fire.

My soul is weary of my life. I am ashamed to live; I am afraid to die. What therefore remains, O sinner, except that throughout your whole life you lament your whole life, so that the whole of it may lament its whole self?

But in this also it is wondrously miserable, because it does not grieve as greatly as it knows itself, but thus, secure, it lies torpid as though it did not know what it suffers. Why do you sleep, lukewarm soul, worthy to be vomited out? Tree worthy of the axe and worthy of fire, worthy to be cut down and burned!

What are your fruits? Surely they are piercing thorns and bitter sins. Would that in repenting they so pierced you that they might be broken, and became so bitter that they might vanish!

O dry and useless wood, worthy of eternal fires, what answer will you give on that day when an account will be exacted from you, even to the blink of an eye, of all the time granted you for living and of how it was spent by you?

For then whatever is found in you will be condemned: work or idle speech and silence [read: work or idleness, speech and silence], down to the smallest thought, even what you commanded [read: even the very fact that you lived], if it was not directed toward the will of God.

Woe! How many sins will spring forth there suddenly and unexpectedly, as though from ambush, which you do not now see! How many evils you do not think to be evils! How many things you now believe to be good! With face unveiled, they will appear to you as blackest sins, then, when penance will no longer be received and amendment will not be promised.

Woe, wondrous hardness, for breaking which such heavy hammers are light! Insensible torpor, for rousing which such heavy goads are blunt! Alas, deadly sleep, for awakening which so terrifying a thunder is hoarse!

For if I say whatever I shall be able to devise, I shall not yet be able to reach what the reality is. Add terror upon terror, wailing upon wailing. For He will judge you against whose insult every disobedient man or transgressor sins. He who is now most patient will then be most strict.

Woe, woe, wrath of God, may You not rush upon me! There is nothing in the whole of me that could endure it. O distress! On this side will be accusing sins; on that, terrifying justice. Below, the horrid chaos of hell lies open; above, the angered Judge. Within, conscience burns; outside, the world burns. Scarcely will the just man be saved.

In what direction will the sinner, thus caught, press himself? Being constrained, where shall I appear? Where shall I hide? To hide will be impossible; to appear, intolerable. I shall desire the former, and it will be nowhere; I shall abhor the latter, and it will be everywhere.

Who will rescue me from the hands of God? Whence will counsel come to me? Whence salvation? Who is He who is called the Angel of Great Counsel? He is Jesus; He is the very Judge in whose hands I tremble.

Breathe again, O sinner; breathe again, lest you despair. Hope in Him whom you fear. Flee for refuge to Him from whom you fled. Call importunately upon Him whom you proudly provoked.

Jesus Christ, on account of this Your name, deal with me according to this Your name. Forget the proud man who provokes You; look upon the miserable man who invokes You. Sweet name, delightful name, name comforting the sinner and of blessed hope!

Therefore, Jesus, be Jesus to me on account of Your name. You who created me by Your goodness, do not let Your work perish through my iniquity. Most kindly One, recognize what is Yours and wipe away what is alien.

Jesus, Jesus, have mercy while it is the time for mercy, lest You condemn me in the time of judgment. For what profit is there for You in my blood if I descend into everlasting corruption? For neither will the dead praise You, Lord, nor all those who descend into hell.

If You admit me into the broadest bosom of Your mercy, it will not be made narrower because of me, Lord. Therefore admit me, O most desired Jesus; admit me among the number of Your elect, so that with them I may praise You, enjoy You, and glory among all who love Your name.

Concerning the Invocation of the Son of God and the Memory of His Passion, Section VIII

Anselm says in a prayer:

Lord Jesus Christ, my redemption, my mercy, my salvation, I praise You and give thanks to You. Although they are very unequal to Your benefits, although they are greatly devoid of worthy devotion, nevertheless my soul renders to You what it is able to strive to render.

Hope of my heart, strength of my soul, aid of my infirmity, may Your most powerful kindness fulfill what my most trembling weakness strives to do. My life, end of my intention, even if I have not yet merited to love You as greatly as I am bound, nevertheless I certainly desire to love You as greatly as I ought.

If that which You inspire is good, Lord—indeed, because it is good that I should wish to love You—grant what You cause me to will; grant that I may merit to love You as greatly as You command.

I render praises and thanks to You for the desire which You have inspired. I offer praises and prayers to You, lest Your gift, which You gave of Your own accord, be fruitless in me. Most mercifully turn my lukewarmness into the most fervent love of You.

Still, most clement One, this prayer of mine, this meditation and remembrance of Your benefits, strives to kindle Your love in me.

Your goodness, Lord, created me. Your mercy cleansed me, once created, from original sin. After that cleansing of baptism, Your patience has until now tolerated, nourished, and awaited me as I wallowed in the filth of other sins.

Lord God, my Creator and my nourisher, be my helper. I hunger for You; I thirst for You; I desire You; I sigh for You; I yearn for You.

And like an orphan deprived of the presence of a most kindly father, insofar as I am able, mindful of Your Passion, mindful of Your blows, mindful of Your scourges, mindful of the cross, and mindful also of Your wounds, I lament the afflictions of my exile. I hope for the consolation of Your coming alone. I burn for the glorious contemplation of Your countenance.

Alas that I could not see the Lord of angels humbled to the society of human beings, so that He might exalt human beings to the society of angels, when the offended God died of His own accord so that the sinner might live!

Why, O my soul, did a sword of most piercing sorrow not transfix you when you were present, since you could not have borne the side of your Savior to be wounded by a lance, or the hands and feet of your Savior and Maker to be violated by nails? Why were you not made drunk with the bitterness of tears when He was given the bitterness of gall to drink?

Why did you not suffer together with the most chaste Virgin, His most worthy mother, your most kindly Lady? My most merciful Lady, what fountains shall I say burst forth from your most modest eyes when you beheld your only innocent Son scourged before you, bound, slain, and the flesh from your flesh cruelly cut apart by the impious?

With what sobbings shall I judge your most pure breast to have been vexed when you heard, "Woman, behold your son," and the disciple, "Behold your mother"?

Would that with blessed Joseph I had taken my Lord down from the cross, embalmed Him with spices, and placed Him in the tomb, or at least had followed Him, so that none of my service might be lacking at so great a funeral!

Would that with the blessed women I had been terrified by the shining vision of the angels and had heard the announcement of the Lord's Resurrection—the announcement of my consolation, the announcement so greatly awaited, the announcement so greatly desired!

Most kindly, sweetest One, when will You make up to me for my not having seen that incorruption of Your flesh, for my not having kissed the places of the wounds, the punctures of the nails? For my sorrow does not contain itself within me so long as I am a pilgrim from my Lord.

Where or when shall I find Him? Whom shall I ask? Who will announce to my beloved that I languish with love? My flesh and my heart have failed; God is the God of my heart and my portion forever.

My soul refuses to be consoled except by You, my sweetness. For what is there for me in heaven, and what have I desired upon earth apart from You? I desire You; I hope in You; I seek You. My heart has said to You: "I have sought Your countenance; Your countenance, Lord, I shall seek. Do not turn Your face away from me."

Most kindly lover of human beings, the poor man is abandoned to You; You will be a helper to the orphan. My safest advocate, have mercy upon the abandoned orphan. My soul has thirsted for You; in how many ways my flesh also thirsts for You!

O if I shall ever see my joy which I desire! O if I shall be satisfied when Your glory appears! If You will give me to drink from the torrent of Your delight, for which I thirst!

Meanwhile, Lord, let my tears be my bread day and night until it is said to me, "Behold your Lord," until I hear, O my soul, "Behold your Bridegroom." Meanwhile feed me with my sobbings. Meanwhile give me my weeping to drink.

Perhaps in the meantime my Redeemer will come, because He is good; nor will He delay, because He is loving.

Concerning Lamentation over One's Own Fall and Future Punishment, Section IX

Anselm:

Bring back to your heart, my wretched soul, your enormous crime, and bring forth from your heart an immense roaring. You, I say, who once, whitened by the heavenly laver, endowed with the Holy Spirit, and sworn in Christian profession, were a betrothed virgin!

Alas, memory of lost delight, why do you thus increase the burden upon the pressure of the unhappiness now possessed? How miserable is the lot of your shameful man! Both the good and the evil equally become torment.

For an evil conscience torments me, and so do the torments in which I fear that I shall burn. The memory of a good conscience and of its rewards torments me, for I know that I have lost them and shall recover them no more.

Woe, miserably to betray; grievously to lose; to lose irrecoverably that which ought to be preserved without end!

O my virginity, now no longer my beloved but my lost one, now no longer my joyous one but my despaired-of one, where have you gone? In what foul, in what bitter filth have you abandoned me? From this comes inconsolable loss; from this, intolerable torment.

For you, my treacherous soul, perjured to God, adulteress of God and of Christ, have willingly and wondrously plunged from the sublimity of virginity into the abyss of fornication. You, once betrothed to the King of the heavens, have ardently become the harlot of the tormentor of the hells.

O most miserable and more than most miserable change! Alas, from what height you have fallen! Into what depth you have collapsed! Woe, how kindly a one you have despised; to how malignant a one you have joined yourself!

What have you done, O madness of mind, mad filth, filthy wickedness? What have you done? In heaven you abandoned your chaste lover, and into hell you followed your hateful corrupter; and in the abyss you prepared not your bridal chamber but your brothel.

Plunge, miserable little man, into the dark depth of immoderate sorrow, you who of your own accord plunged into the abyss of horrible wickedness. Be overwhelmed, unhappy one, by the mass of terrible sorrow, you who willingly fell into the filth of infernal stench. Roll yourself in the mire of shame.

Horrible terror, terrible sorrow, inconsolable grief, gather yourselves over me; rush upon me; overwhelm me; disturb me; envelop me; possess me. It is just; it is just. By shameless boldness I despised you and by shameful delight I provoked you—indeed, I provoked God, not you—and now in miserable penance I desire you.

Torment the guilty one; vindicate God. Let the fornicator repent of the infernal torments which he has merited. Let him taste beforehand what he has prepared; let him become accustomed to what he is to suffer. Be rolled and rolled again in the same whirlwind of bitterness, you who so often were rolled in the same whirlpool of lusts.

Consolation, security, joy: I do not desire you; I refuse you unless forgiveness of sin brings you back. Be far away—far away before death—if perhaps forgiveness may restore you to me even after death.

Let continual, bitter penitence be the companion of my age. Let sharp sorrow be the insatiable tormentor of my life. For if I am not worthy while praying to raise my eyes to heaven, surely I am not unworthy to blind them by weeping.

If my soul fears to be displayed before the sight of its God, it is just that it should have before its own sight the torments of its crime. Let my heart therefore think and think again what it has done, what it has merited.

Let it descend into—what? Let it descend to the dark land covered by the shadow of death. Let my mind strive toward it and contemplate; let it see and be troubled.

What is it, O God? What is it that I perceive in the land of misery and darkness? Alas, confusion of wailings, tumult of gnashing teeth, disordered multitude of groanings! Woe, woe—how many and how many and how many woes!

Sulfurous fire, Tartarean flame, dark billows, with what terrifying roaring I see you revolve! Worms living in the fire, what wondrous greed for gnawing so kindles you whom that fiery thing does not kindle! Demons burning together, roaring with heat, grinding their teeth with fury!

Are these, great God, the things that have been prepared for fornicators and those who despise You? My soul, be terrified; my mind, fail; my heart, be torn apart. To what do You hand me over, my God?

If I acted so that I became guilty before You, surely I could never act so that I was not Your creature. If I took my chastity away from myself, surely I did not take Your mercy away from You.

Lord, Lord, if I committed that for which You can condemn me, You have forgiven me from that from which You are accustomed to save me [read: have You then lost that by which You are accustomed to save?]. Do not, Lord, do not so attend to my evil that You forget Your good. Do not remember anger against the guilty one, but remember mercy toward the miserable one.

It is true that my conscience has merited condemnation and my penitence does not suffice for satisfaction; but it is certain that Your mercy surpasses every offense.

These are the words of Anselm.

Chapter XII

Around the year of the Lord 1100 Peter Alfonsi flourished. He had formerly been a Jew and was called Moses, as Vincent relates in the Historical Mirror, book twenty-six. Leaving the Jews, he disputed excellently against the Saracens, but first he expounded the manner of his conversion.

“Almighty God,” says Peter Alfonsi, “inspired me by His Spirit and directed me to the right path, first removing the thin white film from my eyes and afterward the heavy veil from my corrupted mind.

“Then the enclosures of the prophets lay open to us and their secrets were revealed. Then we weighed both what is to be understood and what is to be believed from it.

“When, therefore, by the impulse of divine mercy I had arrived at so exalted a degree of this faith, I put off the cloak of falsity and was clothed in the tunic of iniquity [read: was stripped of the tunic of iniquity]; and I was baptized in the episcopal see of the city of Hostia [read: Huesca], in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, by the hands of the glorious Stephen, bishop of that same city, in the year 1106 from the Lord’s Nativity, on the feast day of the Apostles Peter and Paul.

“Hence, for the veneration and memory of that day and of the apostle, I imposed upon myself his name, which is Peter. Moreover, my spiritual father was Alfonso, the glorious emperor of Spain, who received me from the sacred font. And on this account, adjoining his name to my aforesaid name, I imposed upon myself the name Peter Alfonsi.

“When it became known to the Jews who had known me before, and had proved me skilled in the books of the prophets and the sayings of the doctors, that I had accepted the Christian law and had become one of the Christians, some judged that I had done this only because I had cast aside all shame and despised the law and God.

“Others, however, said that I had done this because I had not rightly understood the words of the prophets and of the law. Others imputed it to vainglory and slandered me as having done this for the honor of the world, because I perceived the Christian people to surpass all the others.

“Therefore I have now composed a little book so that all may know my intention and may hear the argument in which, namely, I proposed the destruction of the cruelty [read: belief] of all other peoples. Afterward I concluded that the Christian law is more excellent than all others.

“Finally, I also set down all the objections of every adversary of the Christian law and, after setting them down, destroyed them, according to my understanding, with reason and authority.

“I divided the whole book by means of a dialogue, so that the reader’s mind might be more ready to understand. In defending the arguments of the Christians, I used the name which I now have as a Christian, namely Peter. In refuting the arguments of the adversary, however, I used the name which I had before baptism, namely Moses.”

Peter: “Truly, Moses, I concede even now that Amram’s son was a true prophet of the Israelite people, was truly sent by God, and faithfully announced whatever he prophesied in God’s name.

“I also concede that all the prophets who came after Moses came to confirm his law. For that same law was translated long ago by our doctors, to whom we give credence, and it is preserved in writing among us.

“And now, as I ought, I preserve complete faith in it with the right understanding, and proceed with a right step along its most right paths. But I see the Jews, the worshipers of the law, attend only to its surface and expound the letter not spiritually but carnally.

“Therefore they exist as strangers to its right intention and have been deceived by the greatest error in its exposition.

“For remember, O Moses, your doctors, who wrote your teaching upon which, according to you, your whole law rests: how they assert that God has a body and a form, and apply to His ineffable majesty things which it is impious to believe and absurd to hear, since they are supported by no reason.

“Concerning Him they have also put forth such opinions that they seem to be nothing other than the words of people jesting in the schools of boys or of women gossiping in the streets.

“Likewise, while you expound the law according to the capacity of our understanding [read: your understanding], you hope to escape captivity in a manner in which it cannot happen. Likewise, you hope that an unprecedented miracle will be done for you by God in your escape from captivity: that your God will raise your dead, who may begin again to inhabit their lands as before.

“Moreover, while you exist in captivity, I perceive you to observe scarcely the smallest part of all the precepts of your law, even according to your own exposition. Yet you believe that the very thing which you do pleases God and is acceptable to Him. Concerning that which you omit, however, you trust that He will by no means blame you. This evidently holds the greatest place of error.”

Behold Your Doctors, Section I

“In the first part of your teaching, which is called Blessings [i.e., tractate Berakhot], your doctors said that God has a head and arms, and that in His hair He bears a box bound by a strap, the knot of that strap being fastened at the back of the head beneath the brain.

“Within the box, however, are four parchments containing the praises of the Jews. At the top of His left arm He bears another box bound in a similar manner with a strap, and in it there is a parchment containing all the praises said to be written in the four aforesaid parchments.

“Concerning the box which He bears in His hair and the knot of its strap, they draw an authority for themselves from the place where the Lord says to Moses: ‘You shall see My back parts, but you shall not see My face.’ For then, as they say, Moses saw the knot of the strap. But the knot itself must necessarily belong to some box.

“Concerning the box which He bears upon His arm, they introduce the authority of Isaiah, who says: ‘The Lord has sworn by His right hand and by the arm of His strength.’ By the arm of strength they wish the left arm to be understood, in which is the power of that box.

“I indeed remember that I have read that passage, but that authority gives them no support. For since the law reports that God said to Moses that he would see His back parts, and since it is established that He cannot lie, we do not doubt, although Scripture afterward remains silent, that it occurred. Yet nowhere does the law mention that Moses saw anything among His back parts.

“How, therefore, do you teach that he saw there the knot of a strap, which can scarcely be said without laughter? Likewise, since not only the neck but also any part of the body can suitably be understood by ‘back parts,’ you prove your assertion that Moses saw His neck not by reason or the authority of the law, but by your will alone.

“And even if I were to grant that God has a neck—which to a person of sound wisdom both seems impious and is impious—I could nevertheless suppose that Moses saw nothing in Him except the neck. Or, if we imagine that he saw something else, he could have seen the cap or the knot of the strap upon His crown, which you say the angel Micraton [i.e., Metatron] places upon God’s head every day.

“But to employ the reasoning of nature: you contend or concede that God has a head and arms and the whole form of a body. If this is so, God must therefore consist of the dimensions of length, breadth, and height. If He is enclosed by these three dimensions, He is bounded by bodily parts. This is plainly proved to be unfitting.

“Concerning the strap which you say He has upon His head, I now set two alternatives before you. That strap is either from Him or from elsewhere. If it is from Him, God is now divided from Himself. If it is from elsewhere, it is either a creator or a creature.

“If it is a creator, there are therefore two creators. If it is a creature, then some creature is greater than a certain part of the Creator, which is unfitting.

“Moreover, I ask you whether He bears that which you say He bears upon His head or arm because of some necessity or without necessity. If because of necessity, then the Creator needs a creature, which is unfitting. If without necessity, then God bears something superfluous upon Himself.”

Which is another unfitting thing.

“Moreover, your doctors say in the book of teachings that He is only in the west. They confirm this by the authority of Ezra, who says: ‘The host of heaven supplicates You.’ They expound it thus: ‘When all the stars go down in the west, then the host of heaven supplicates God.’ Because this supplication of the stars takes place in the west, they therefore assert that God is in the west.

“Again, your doctors in the third book of teaching assert that God is in a place bounded by six parts. They affirm this by the testimony of Daniel, who says: ‘When I was going out, behold, the prince of the Greeks entered.’ For from this they conclude that God is in such a place as has an entrance and an exit. If this is so, it is therefore evident that He subsists in a place bounded by six parts.

“But if He is circumscribed by a bounded place, then some place is empty of God. If this is so, how does He know what is in another place, where He Himself is not, or how does He act in it?

“But you say that He can possess such wisdom and will that by wisdom He knows, and by will He effects, what is elsewhere. I therefore wish you to answer me whether that wisdom and will are in Him and always with Him, or outside Him and thus sometimes without Him.

“For if you say that they are not outside Him but in Him, the same difficulty will arise concerning them as concerning Him, because He will be in every place [read: because He will not be in every place]. How, therefore, will He be able to know or to effect what is elsewhere? But if you say that they are outside Him and fill every place, then they are separated from Him. For they know something which He does not know, and by themselves effect what He does not effect. They therefore are creators, and the world has no need of God.

“But you say that they are indeed in Him, yet shine forth into every place by knowing and acting, just as the sun, although it remains in one place, nevertheless diffuses its rays everywhere by warming and illuminating. If this is so, it therefore follows that that wisdom and will do not subsist equally everywhere. For whatever is diffused in this manner does not have at its furthest point the same force that it has at its beginning, which by no means befits God.

“You also ascribe the accidents of a body to God, although He is only a spirit. For you say that He grows angry every day, bringing forward as testimony the saying: ‘The Mighty One is angry every day.’ You also say that He grows angry in the first hour of the day, asserting the cause of this anger to be that, in that hour, kings of iniquity arise, place a diadem upon themselves, and adore the sun.

“You now see how absurd this speech is, and how foolish were those who uttered it, since they did not understand the definition of anger. Had they known it, they would not have thought this about Him. For anger occurs when, upon hearing something displeasing in word, bile, or red choler, boils, spreads over the liver, and is mingled with the blood. From this a man grows hot and becomes pale in the face. But this befits no thing unless it is composed of the four elements, whereas God is not subject to such lineaments.

“No less abhorrent is what they say, that He is angry at a thing for which He cannot avenge Himself. If He could avenge Himself, His anger would surely cease.

“They say, moreover, that no one has ever known the point of the hour in which He grows angry except Balaam son of Beor. In this you contradict yourselves, since on the one hand Moses calls him a soothsayer, and you also call him unjust, while on the other hand you signify that he was more prudent concerning God than Moses, because he knew the point of the hour that was hidden from Moses.

“Nor is it enough for them to say this about God, for they also say that He weeps once every day, and that two tears proceeding from His eyes fall into the great sea. They affirm that these are the flash which at night is seen to fall from the stars.

“But this account shows God to be composed of the four elements. For tears are not produced except from an abundance of moisture descending from the head. If this is so, therefore, the elements are the matter of God. But all matter is prior to and simpler than every form. Therefore these things too are prior to God and simpler than He, which assuredly it is impious to believe.

“Moreover, since, as you say, God enjoys neither food nor drink and emits two tears from Himself every day, He must necessarily decrease, unless perhaps He continually drinks from the waters that are above the heavens, which it is foolish to say.

“Finally, from their words I perceive that they do not understand what that flash is. For it is not what they say, but a certain smoky and exceedingly dry vapor which rises from the earth, passes through the regions of the clouds, and comes to a place where there is not much heat, because it is far removed from the motion of the firmament. When it has arrived there and has gathered abundantly in one place, it is gradually burned by the heat of that place, and, once burned, vanishes. This is what we say is the thing that we see coursing through the air.

“They also say that the captivity of the Jews is the cause of the weeping which they unworthily ascribe to God. Indeed, they assert that because of His sorrow He roars like a lion three times a day, and they report that on this account He strikes the heaven with His feet in the manner of those treading in a winepress. They say also that, like a dove, He makes a certain murmuring sound, and sometimes moves His head and says in the voice of one grieving: ‘Alas for Me, alas for Me! Why did I reduce My house to a desert, burn My temple, and transfer My sons among the nations?’ They say, according to some of them, that He prays every day that His mercy may be among His people and may be over His anger [read: that His mercy may prevail over His anger and that He may go among His people in mercy].

“But all these things are not only errors and heresies but also follies, since they show God as corporeal and affected by human passions, as praying and consequently in need of the help of another to whom He prays, and as having something happen which He does not will and cannot remove, together with many other absurd and foolish things.

“But someone says to me: ‘Since those Jews confirm their statements by the authority of the prophets, why do you inveigh so gravely against them and say nothing against the prophets? Do you not know that the prophets said that God has a head, eyes, nostrils, hands, arms, and all the lineaments of a body? They also said that God grows angry and roars, according to that saying of the Psalm: “The Lord was angry in fury against His people,” and that of the prophet: “The Lord will roar from Zion,” and many other things of this kind.’

“To this it is answered that the sayings of the prophets are obscure and not sufficiently plain to everyone. Therefore, when we find in them such statements as, if accepted according to the letter, depart from the path of reason, they must be interpreted allegorically, not according to the surface of the letter, and be brought back to the path of rectitude. Necessity compels us to do this, because otherwise the meaning of the letter would not stand.

“But if you wish to know that certain words of the Scriptures cannot stand when expounded according to the letter, that is, according to the outer covering, see what is written in the book of Numbers concerning Dathan and Abiron: ‘The earth, opening its mouth, devoured them.’ Does the earth have a mouth? David says: ‘The fields shall rejoice, and all things that are in them’; and again: ‘The rivers shall clap their hands.’ Does it belong to fields to rejoice, or do rivers have hands, or can mountains exult? And Habakkuk the prophet says: ‘The stone shall cry out from the wall,’ and there are many similar sayings.

“Finally, the corporeal things that you ascribe to God agree only with a corporeal substance and an imaginary thing. It is indecent to believe that God is such a thing. It is therefore fitting that the things which Scripture says of Him as though He were corporeal be understood not literally but tropically.

“For if we say that God has any image or likeness, we contradict many authorities of the prophets. For example, Moses says to the children of Israel: ‘Guard your souls carefully. You saw no likeness on the day when the Lord spoke to you in Horeb from the midst of the fire, lest perhaps, being deceived, you make for yourselves a carved image,’ and so forth.

“When he had forbidden them to liken God to composite bodies, he also feared lest perhaps they conform Him to simple bodies, and added: ‘Lest perhaps, lifting your eyes to heaven and seeing the sun and the moon and all the stars of heaven, you be deceived by error and adore them.’ Do not suppose that Moses, in commanding these things to the people, feared that they would adore the figures or images of the aforesaid bodies, since they already had no doubt that they were creatures. Rather, he feared that they would believe God to have the image of one of these, and therefore would adore likenesses of this kind made for Him.

“Isaiah the prophet also says: ‘To whom have you made God like, or what image will you place for Him?’ David also proves by his words that God is not local, and thereby consequently signifies that He is not corporeal. For he says: ‘Where shall I go from Your spirit?’ and so forth. And Solomon says: ‘If heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain You,’ and so forth. And Jeremiah says: ‘Do I not fill heaven and earth?’ Therefore, if we expound superficially the Scriptures that say God has a body and all the members of a body, we contradict all the aforesaid testimonies.”

Now Concerning the Image, Section II

“As we are about to recline in the palace of reason, let us strew its floor with flowers of certain opinions, so that afterward we may sit there and reason more delightfully. These opinions will be for us certain steps toward proving that God exists and toward knowing what He is.

“For we must first prove that God exists, and afterward show that nothing is like Him. For a certain part of mankind both denies that God exists and affirms that the world has existed from eternity and without a creator. Therefore necessity compels us first to show, even by physical reasons, that the God who created the world exists. For if I show that the world, with all the things that are in it, was created, then I shall necessarily conclude that God is its creator. And when we have proved Him to be the creator of the world, we shall consequently show by reason that God Himself has no likeness.

“Thus nearly all the philosophers agree on this: that perfect wisdom is the principle of all things, a brilliant light, the substance of substances, and the argument of all things. After this is soul, and afterward matter. These, as it were, are two simple things and the first principles of all creatures, and the origin and cause of every composite thing. From them the firmament, with all the variety of images and forms that it possesses, was made by degrees.

“For the firmament, with all the things that it contains, is truly composite, although with respect to the things that lie beneath the lunar circle it is called simple. For it is thus in all things: something is called composite with respect to that from which it was made, but simple with respect to that which is made from it.

“And because all matter is simpler than that which was made from it, and does not have in itself the form or image of its composite, it is evident that the matter of the firmament has no corporeal form in itself and is therefore wholly simple. But if we say that there is something composite in it, there must also be some other matter of which it is composed, which is simpler than

it. Yet if we call that matter composite too, we shall also acknowledge another and simpler matter. We shall thus proceed to infinity. To avoid this, it is necessary that we confess that matter, namely the matter of the firmament, to be simple.

“And because that matter newly received within itself various forms which it had never before possessed, it is established that it had them not from itself but through the addition of another thing which was both simpler and more powerful: that is, a thing which produced diverse forms and images within it, especially since there was no necessity upon it that such forms or images should be made in it. This was done rather from the desire of the soul, which wished to be mingled with a thing with which it had never been mingled, so that its power might be manifest in that thing. Thus, after the soul had been mingled and at the same time glued to that thing, matter was informed with new forms from the new mingling.

“Since, therefore, according to the philosophers, there is no doubt that the firmament, with all that it possesses, is composite, it must be believed to have a beginning. For every composite must have a composer, because nothing can create itself. Therefore there must be a creator of the world, who is God. It is necessarily fitting to believe that He was neither created nor made new, but is eternal. Otherwise the number of things created or made new would have no end.

“He must be understood not as composite but as simple, because every composition is a motion and act of a simple thing. Moreover, that which is the first cannot have a principle, whereas every composition has some principle. Accordingly, He is not corporeal, because every corporeal thing is composite. Likewise, He is not movable, because everything that is moved consists of parts, and every such thing is composite.

“Again, He is neither changed nor corrupted, because both belong to things subject to death, whereas the first of all things is immovable. Likewise, He neither grows of Himself nor is increased from elsewhere, for everything that receives growth or increase is undoubtedly composite. Nor is He shown to decrease, because that which decreases is corrupted.

“Again, He has no likeness to any creature in any respect, because likeness belongs to quality. But He is subject to no quality, and therefore not to likeness. Moreover, the likeness of two things makes one equal to the other, but nothing can be made equal in any respect to Him, namely to God. Finally, since matter, which was created, has in itself no form or image, much less should God, the creator of its nature, who is of a simpler and subtler nature, be thought to have any likeness.

“Behold, by these physical reasons we have proved to those who do not believe the Scriptures that God is the maker of all things and has no likeness to any creature.

“Furthermore, according to the same philosophers, all things were made by degrees from the conjunction of the universal soul with matter. For they say that, when the soul was joined and glued to matter, first of all the greatest firmament was formed and composed. In it there are no stars; it is the first movable and that which causes all the circles to move.

“After it was formed the sign-bearing circle, in which the twelve signs shine. In the third place was made the circle of the stars, which, always preserving their position, remain fixed in their places. In the fourth place was made the circle of Saturn. In the fifth the sphere of Jupiter was placed. The sword of Mars claims the sixth place for itself. In the seventh the circle of the sun shines. The globe of Venus possesses the eighth. Mercury obtained the ninth. The tenth and lower place gives its regions to the moon.

“When all these circles and the other things that are in them had been completed, that circular motion which is called simple and perfect then began.

“That motion generated in matter the heat which was poured through it, and matter itself received the heat. From this were made the four elements, namely fire, air, water, and earth. For when some force or motion proceeds from a source, the closer the things it reaches are to that source, the greater force and strength they receive from it.

“The heat proceeding from the motion of the firmament grew much hotter in the nearer places and became fire, of a hot and dry nature. But because that heat withdrew a little farther from the firmament, now losing some of its strength, it became somewhat warm and weaker, yet it also moved itself this way and that. Hence arose the nature of air, which is hot and moist. For all heat, so long as it remains very strong, dries and burns; but when it grows warm, it causes a thing to become soft and liquid.

“But when it withdrew still farther from the firmament, the source being far distant, it lost its vigor, and therefore a cold nature flowed forth. It became liquid and weighty, namely water. And because it withdrew even farther from the firmament than it had been, the nature of cold, because of its very great distance, became stronger, denser, more congealed, and harder. It became cold and dry, and it is earth.

“When the creation of the elements had thus been completed, the nature and force of the firmament moved it to perform the will and command of God. When the force of the firmament had thus moved them toward one another, all things were mixed and joined together, and from their very mixture were generated other, smaller bodies, namely inanimate and animate bodies.

“The inanimate are stones, metals, and the other things that are contained in the earth and do not grow, such as quicksilver, sulfur, and other things of this kind. The animate are herbs and trees; irrational animals are brute beasts; and the rational animal is man, who was made after all the others.

“Although all these things are diverse, divine power so restrains them that they seem in no respect utterly contrary or discordant with one another. But each lower thing is called simple with respect to a higher thing, and composite with respect to a lower thing. The human body, however, which is lower than all things, because there is nothing beneath it in the order of things, is not undeservedly called composite. Thus man was made from that which is altogether simple, namely the soul, and from a body altogether composite.

“The philosophers say that the rational soul proceeds from the universal soul. The Jews, however, assert that all souls were created together at the beginning of the world and stored in one place, and that the day of judgment will not come until they have all been incorporated. But when they have been incorporated, the end of the world will immediately come. Christians, on the other hand, maintain that new souls are created every day and, once formed, are infused into new bodies.

“Whatever anyone may believe concerning the soul, undoubtedly He who gave reason made all things and is the cause of all things. He therefore flooded and illuminated man with the wisdom of His own loftiness, by which man might know and discern all things. Thus the species of man was made better and more elegant among the species of animals, and more excellent in all things; hence it is justly called the lesser world.

“He also says that the delay of so many days elapsed in the creation of the world for no other reason than that some creatures were slower to receive form, and that this did not result from the impotence of the Creator.”

Attend diligently, reader, because this Peter Alfonsi perhaps sets down the things that he says from the opinions of Jewish philosophers not by asserting them but by reporting their opinions. Even after presupposing these opinions, he proves from them his principal intention, namely that God is not corporeal and that no likeness to a creature befits Him.

The aforesaid opinions nevertheless contain many errors against the faith. For prime matter does not have a soul; nor were the heavens with the planets created successively, nor the elements in the aforesaid manner, nor the things made from the elements. Nor were souls created from the beginning, nor were some things made later because of a disposition of created things.

Rather, as Solomon says, “He who lives forever created all things together,” at least with respect to the matter and substantial forms of things, especially of the heavens and the elements. But because the unlearned people to whom Moses spoke were not capable of understanding that God created all things suddenly from nothing, God was spoken of according to the likeness of a man at work, who performs many and diverse works at diverse times. Or, if those things are held to have been created literally within the six days, as certain of the saints hold, this nevertheless was by the work of almighty God and not according to the aforesaid manner of the philosophers.

Peter reports many other fables, or rather follies, from the book of the Thalmuth [i.e., Talmud], a book which the Jews greatly venerate as most true. I omit them for the sake of brevity. One is that when God made the firmament, being unable to complete it, He left the space of a certain great opening in the northern part, so that if anyone should at some time arise and set himself against Him as His equal, He might answer him: “If you are God as I am, close, if you can, that place which I left open.”

Likewise, they say that when the sons of Jacob were bearing Jacob’s body to the tomb, the sons of Esau met them, also carrying their father to burial with a very great company. While they were contending over the tomb, Dan ascended a mountain, cut off a stone of such great size, and placed it upon his head, that it would have been sufficient to prostrate that whole great company with one blow. But when he found them now reconciled, he cast it into the sea, and by its magnitude the waters of the sea, overflowing, overturned two cities by their outpouring.

Likewise, they say that Moses ascended into heaven to receive the law. Then the angels disputed with him, saying that they ought to possess it first. But Moses answered that that law contained precepts for the governing of bodies, and therefore, since the angels themselves did not have bodies, it did not befit them. Thus, after the angels had been defeated by Moses by this reasoning, they say that God laughed.

Likewise, they say that, when Moses was leading the people of Israel through the desert, Korah, one man, namely, from the tribe of Levi, had three hundred laden camels bearing nothing other than the keys of that people’s treasure, made from the hides of cows.

Likewise, they say that an angel appeared to a certain man named Josue, of the tribe of Levi [i.e., Rabbi Joshua ben Levi], and told him that he was about to die and that the angel had therefore come to receive his soul. Josue answered that he was by no means willing for this to happen unless the angel first showed him paradise. The angel carried him upon his wings into paradise. Afterward, when Josue would not leave paradise at the angel’s command in order to die, the angel laid a complaint concerning this before God. But Josue was unwilling to leave even at God's command. God told the angel that, when Josue's entire life had been examined through all its course, if the angel found that he had perjured himself even once, he must leave paradise altogether; but if not, he should remain there unharmed. Thus, when this was not found, he remained there.

Likewise, they say concerning Og, king of Bashan, that when the people of Israel were passing through the borders of his land, he took upon his head a mass of unheard-of magnitude, so that by casting it upon the passing people he might prostrate them all with it. But a hoopoe, flying over the aforesaid mass, made so great a hole in its middle with its beak that it would have fallen upon his neck, had his teeth not suddenly grown so greatly that they supported it. But when Moses struck him with his rod, he expired. They set down many such things worthy of laughter, as manifestly false and foolish.

Section III

"The cause of the final captivity brought about by Titus, and of the dispersion of the Jews themselves throughout the world, was not the same as the cause of the Babylonian captivity. Rather, the suffering inflicted by them upon Christ Jesus, and their perseverance in their perfidy, namely that Christ was not the Messiah and true God, are the cause of the continuance of their captivity and servitude.

"For the cause of the former captivity, namely the Babylonian, which was prolonged for only seventy years, was idolatry, usury, false testimonies, homicides, adulteries, and other sins which it would take long to recount. These had then increased to such a degree that the prophet heard from the Lord: 'Go about in the ways of Jerusalem, and seek in its streets whether you may find a man who performs judgment and seeks faith, and I will be propitious to them.'

"But you Jews will be able to establish by no authority that this was the reason and cause of your final captivity, which had already endured for a thousand years and more in the time of this Peter, but has now endured for one thousand four hundred and eighty-four years and more. For during the three hundred years before the overthrow of Jerusalem, there was no prophet in Israel who foretold or wrote this. Therefore, not all the things which were the causes of the former captivity were the causes of the final one. And although they say that there were many who performed new miracles beyond custom or nature, naming some such persons, they can prove none of these things.

"Indeed, in the first captivity, when they were led to Babylon in the manner of other captives, they sustained no punishment there except servitude. For they cultivated fields, planted vineyards, built houses, and lived securely with their wives and children.

"But in the second captivity their enemies inflicted upon them so many and such great disgraces that things similar or equal to them have been neither heard nor seen. For they were killed, burned, and sold in the manner of captives. That sale increased so greatly that thirty captives were offered for one piece of silver, yet buyers were not found, just as Moses had foretold: 'You shall be sold to your enemies as male and female servants, and there shall be no one to buy.' Ships also were filled with them and were sent to wander over the sea without any rower or pilot.

"Moreover, after you had been cast down into this captivity, intolerable commands were given to you, namely that you should not read your law, nor any longer teach it to your sons. If anyone was found doing this, he was either burned or combed with the sharpest iron combs. Likewise, anyone found celebrating the Sabbaths or the Passover, or practicing circumcision, was most severely punished. And many other very grave things occurred through the succession of times.

"Behold, therefore, you have now been in captivity for more than one thousand four hundred and eighty-four years, and you still have no certainty from any writing how long it ought to endure.

"Forensic justice indeed requires that, once those who have committed some crime have been punished or have died, their successors ought to be free from captivity. Thus, when the scouts sent to the Promised Land murmured together with the rest of the people, they remained in the desert for forty years. In that space all those transgressors died, and their children, who were innocent of their fathers' crime, entered that land promised to their fathers. Likewise, in the Babylonian captivity, after those whose sins had been the cause of that captivity had died, their children were freed from that yoke. But in this captivity, which was brought about by Titus, innumerable generations have passed, and they do not yet have an end.

"For the saying, 'The children shall not bear the iniquity of their fathers,' is understood thus: if the children have not committed or imitated their iniquities. For elsewhere also children are said to bear their fathers' crimes, namely when they are their imitators, as the Lord says to Moses: 'I am the Lord, mighty and jealous, visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation, of those who hate Me.'

"Therefore all the following generations are detained in the captivity of their fathers because they carry out their works insofar as they are able. If they abandoned the works of their fathers, they would also depart from captivity.

"Thus, O Jews, your ancestors sinned against the Son of God, saying that He was a sorcerer and was born of a harlot, and they led your whole nation into error. They proclaimed these and similar things until, having made the whole people a partner of their depraved will, they led a just man to a very unjust judgment, crucified Him, and killed Him. The magnitude of so great a guilt was therefore the cause and origin of so prolonged a captivity. And for as long as you remain in both the will and the faith, or rather the perfidy, of your fathers, for so long you will undoubtedly remain in the same tribulation of condemnation.

“For you ought to know that, when forty years had been completed after the death of Christ, Jerusalem was destroyed by Titus. And for forty years before it was destroyed, as the books of your teaching also testify, signs and wonders were seen in it which plainly indicated that this destruction of the temple and city would come about.

“Josephus also, together with other doctors of yours, understood that the very death of Christ was the cause of this captivity of yours. Nevertheless, they said not that death, but the malevolence and envy of men, to be the cause of so great a captivity, and they were silent concerning its true cause. For the envy and malice of the Jews were the cause of Christ’s death, but the death of Christ was the cause of the captivity.

“But perhaps one of you will say: ‘If it were established that that man, as you say, was the Son of God, and that His death was the cause of our tribulation, none of us would be worthy to live. For since such a sin is greater than denying God, this crime was not undeservedly greater than that which the Jews committed in the desert when they adored the calf as God. Yet God then wished to destroy that whole people for so great a crime, and He would have destroyed them had Moses not turned away His anger by prayer and fasting. Therefore, if that people had presumed to commit this deed, which is much greater than the former one, and there had been no one to intercede for it, none of them ought to have lived. But now God both permits us to live and shows every day how greatly He loves us, since He grants us favor in the sight of our enemies, enriches us with resources, and exalts us with honors, just as He foretold through the mouth of Moses, saying: “Nevertheless, even when they shall be in a hostile land, I did not utterly cast them off.”’

“To this I answer steadfastly: By no means, O Jews, does God permit a remnant of your people to live because He is well pleased with it, but only so that you may serve all nations and may be a reproach, a tale, and a curse in the eyes of all, just as Moses the lawgiver promised, saying: ‘You shall be a proverb and a tale among all the peoples to whom the Lord shall lead you.’

“For if, at the time when that sin was committed by you, He had utterly destroyed the entire Jewish race, after the courses of many ages had passed that fault would already have been erased by oblivion and would be known to no mortal, according to that saying of the Psalm: ‘God shows me concerning my enemies: do not kill them, lest at any time my people forget.’

“There is also another cause for which God did not will the whole Jewish nation to perish and fail. For He saw that some from that race would at some time believe in Him unto salvation, and therefore, for their sake, He did not will to destroy that whole race.

“But as for the promise concerning the book of the law which you brought forward from Moses, it is evident that it looks not to the present captivity but to the former Babylonian captivity, from which He was going to lead you out, as is evident from the things preceding the aforesaid authority.”

“The Jews misunderstand the article concerning the final resurrection. Peter Alfonsi says: As for the fact that, after your escape from captivity, you believe an unprecedented miracle will be performed for you, namely that your dead will be raised by God so that they may inhabit the lands again, I judge that you believe an error which you can prove by no authority.

“For if you wish to rely upon this testimony of Scripture, ‘I will kill, and I will make alive; I will strike, and I will heal,’ God shows His omnipotence by this; it does not show that He will raise the dead in the manner which you describe. Nevertheless, I do not deny that He can raise the dead, since I confess and believe that all men will be raised by Him on the day of judgment. But what you add, namely that they will inhabit the lands, I do not believe. For none of the prophets who were before Christ foretold that this would happen.

“Your doctors, however, invented this error so that the Jewish nation might persist in its unbelief. For when Isaiah says, ‘Your dead shall live; the slain shall rise,’ he by no means shows that your dead will be raised to inhabit the land. For if we diligently consider what is said there, we do not find that the resurrection of the dead is plainly signified there. Otherwise the prophet will seem to be contrary to himself, since a little earlier he said: ‘Let the dying not live; let the giants not rise.’

“Therefore, that which departs from the usage of nature and introduces a contradiction into the prophet’s meaning ought by no means to be expounded in that manner when it can be understood with some sound meaning. We can, however, understand that word of the prophet in two ways: either that he said this concerning the raising at the last judgment, or that by the word ‘resurrection’ he signified escape from captivity.

“This latter meaning appears to belong more closely to the letter, since, a little earlier, the prophet had lamented the captivity of his nation and immediately introduced the consolation of the divine promise and loving-kindness, saying: ‘The dead shall live;

the slain shall rise.' He indicates that this escape will occur not at any particular distant time but after a short time, saying: 'Go, My people, into your chambers,' and so forth. These words are fittingly understood as referring to captivity.

"Moreover, it is read in Ezekiel that, when he had raised several dead persons by divine power, he also prophesied concerning future things in these words, saying: 'Thus says the Lord God: Behold, I shall open your tombs,' and so forth. Your doctors indeed endeavor to assert that he caused them to rise not in a dream but while awake.

"But he by no means restored to them a true and perfect resurrection. For the spirit which is commanded to come from the four winds is by no means the rational soul, but that spirit which is produced by the conjunction of the four elements. For it is a very light and very subtle body, which is made in the human heart from the four elements, as has been said. From that place it is spread into all the veins and bestows upon the body itself life and action, and upon the arteries a continual pulse, producing the motion natural to man.

"The rational soul, however, does not proceed from the union of the elements, but is a substance subsisting through itself. For if it arose from their conjunction, when the strength of the body failed, the power of the soul ought to fail; and when the dissolution of bodily vigor began, the power of the soul would likewise be dissolved. If this is granted, it follows that when the body is corrupted, the soul also is corrupted.

"But the contrary is now proved to occur by the eye of faith. For it happens frequently that the more the body is weakened and approaches death, the more the soul grows strong; and a man dies at the very moment when the soul thrives better. Thus we find that many old men, when there is already no bodily strength in them, then excel the more in counsel and in all wisdom by means of their souls.

"Therefore, when all bodies which possess a soul had been produced, the vegetative soul adhered to all of them and exercised its functions in them, namely by growing, nourishing, and generating. But the animal soul was joined to the subtler bodies, so that in them it might exhibit its functions, namely by granting them sensation and motion from place to place. The rational soul associated itself with that which among them was most subtle, most light, most tempered, and most fitted to receive reason. There it freely exhibited its functions, namely by meditating, remembering, discerning, and doing similar things.

"Therefore I recognize that the spirit which Ezekiel commanded, at God's order, to come from the four parts of the world ought to be understood as a bodily spirit, which is said by some to be like the most subtle blood. And concerning the dead who were then raised, although many believe that they received a rational soul, I find no authority for it.

"Nevertheless, in whatever manner that resurrection was accomplished, I say and believe that it was a sign of the future resurrection, and that God will assuredly raise your dead too at some time, just as the prophet shows in the same place, saying: 'And you shall know that I am the Lord when I have opened your sepulchers and brought you out of your sepulchers, My people, and have led you into the land of Israel, and have given My spirit within you, and you shall live; and I shall make you rest upon your soil.'

"As for the statement, 'I shall make you rest upon your soil,' it can be understood as signifying that the soul rests in the body, which is not undeservedly called by the name of earth, since it was taken from the earth.

"Therefore, because your exposition concerning your dead being raised and inhabiting the lands of the world is found to be contrary both to Scripture and to reason, it must be rejected by the judgment of equity. Hence Solomon also says in Ecclesiastes: 'The dead know nothing more, nor do they have a part in this age and in the work that is performed under the sun,' namely, so as to do the things which those living here used to do.

"That your exposition also disagrees with reason is established by many arguments. For you believe, just as your doctors have said, that when the point of this resurrection of yours arrives, Adam, Seth, Methuselah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Aaron, and the other patriarchs and prophets, and all the just who died before its arrival, will rise together with them; that they will perform all the functions of the human race, observe the former rites of things, and inhabit the lands anew; and that Aaron and his sons will be clothed by Moses in priestly vestments and will offer sacrifices as before.

"But who, I ask, will then be the supreme pontiff? Will Aaron and Eleazar and Phinehas and the others who succeeded them all exist at one time? If you say that while Aaron is alive the others cannot exercise the supreme priesthood, then that resurrection will be more to the disgrace and disadvantage of the other supreme pontiffs than to their honor and glory. If you grant that all will be equals in the supreme priesthood, we shall then take away each one's honor, because no one among many equals can possess a preeminent honor.

"Moreover, many things are necessary for many pontiffs, including temples and similar things. Thus there will be a destruction of the law, which commands that there be only one temple.

"Furthermore, will you have several kings, or only one? You will answer that you will have one, since Ezekiel says: 'All shall have one shepherd.' For if there were several, they could not be in concord and would destroy the peace of the kingdom. There will therefore be one. But who will that king be? They say: ‘The Anointed One, at whose coming we shall escape captivity. Our dead, who are to be raised, ought to have the governance of his empire [read: The Anointed One, at whose coming we shall escape captivity and our dead are to be raised, ought deservedly to have governance of our empire].’

“Well indeed, O Jews, what you say could be so if that Anointed One were God and man. But if, as you believe, he will be only a man, what then will become of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, and the other prophets? When such and so great men are subjected to one anointed man, would it not have been better for them not to be raised?

“Moreover, your faith also holds that, just as they will possess the other functions of humanity, so they will have the nature of generating, to such a degree that you believe a woman will conceive and give birth every day, which human ears can scarcely bear to hear. For if this were so, the earth would certainly not be able to contain them, even if it were twice as great or if the sea itself were made land. They would be confined by such narrowness of place that there would be none who could cultivate the fields.

“Likewise, if all who have died will be raised, will they all return to their wives? If so, what, therefore, of those who had several wives? And of the woman who had several husbands: whose wife will she be?

“Likewise, when such persons have been raised, and so many have afterward been born from them, will those who are born be immortal or mortal? Your faith indeed holds that they will have the nature and use of eating, drinking, and generating, and that after the courses of a thousand years have passed they will be transferred without any death into the kingdom of perpetual beatitude.

“If you say that they will be immortal, you return to the former unfitting consequence. For within a thousand years their multitude will be propagated to such a degree that they cannot be enclosed within the compass of the earth. Finally, since a man will eat, drink, and generate, he must be composed of the four elements. Whatever is composed in this manner must also be corrupted. Therefore, since they will be composed in this manner, they must be subject to corruption and death.

“But if you concede that they will die, I ask whether that resurrection is for them a punishment or a crown. They say: ‘For honor and glory, so that they may behold the kingdom and glory of their Anointed One.’

“Now, therefore, I wish to hear from you what you think about the interim state of the good who have died until they rise: whether, namely, they remain in punishments or in rest. You say that it is most certain that they enjoy the beatitude of rest with God. From this it follows that their future resurrection will be for them a punishment rather than a crown and glory.

“For since they now glory in the gift of eternal life, why will they again be enclosed in the prisons of bodies, unless so that they may be agitated anew by hunger and thirst and various and innumerable torments? Indeed, according to your aforesaid opinion, they will sustain the punishment and possess the fear of a second death; and their parents too will suffer punishment because of their deaths.

“But perhaps you say that although the good who have died now live in rest and delights, from which they will return to the constraints of bodies in that resurrection, nevertheless so great will be their exultation from the presence of their Anointed One, that is, Christ, and from seeing him and exulting in Jerusalem, dwelling in the temple as of old, and sacrificing according to the former rite, that the punishment of their bodies will be nothing to them, and the rest which they now possess in the other life will afterward be regarded by them as very little.

“But this departs from the path of truth. For no honor or glory of the present world bears any comparison with the delights and rest of eternal life, because no one will be able to enjoy the delights of this world for even one moment without labor and pain. But the glory of that blessed life remains perpetual and continuous, with no distress intervening, especially since your own doctors testify that all the honor and glory of this world is, in comparison with the delights of that life, as one is to forty.

“Moreover, it is evident to everyone who is not devoid of all reason that the joy of beholding God is incomparably greater than the joy of beholding such an earthly man as you say your Anointed One will be. You see, therefore, if you consider the matter, that the path of reason and escape is closed to you on every side, so that the resurrection of the dead will in no way take place in the manner you describe.”

Section V

“But what I said, that you observe not even the least thing among the commandments of the law, needs no proof from either authority or reason, since it is plainly evident. For you neither sacrifice the lamb as a victim morning and evening, nor celebrate the burnt offerings of Sabbaths, new moons, and ceremonies, nor observe the other sacrifices and ceremonies.

“But you say: ‘We are not to be reproved concerning the precepts of the law which we do not observe at all, since we are exiles from our homeland and lack a temple and lawful priests.’”

"'For because we sinned in His sight, He grew angry and cast us out of the land where we cannot observe His precepts. Therefore our inability will neither be imputed to us nor charged against us until the time comes when we return to our land. Then we shall fulfill His precepts, and our sacrifices will be acceptable to the Lord.'

"I answer: Certainly, if your sacrifices had been acceptable to God, He would not have cast you out of the land so that you could not fulfill the things which He had commanded you to do. Rather, that which the Lord foretold through many of His prophets has been fulfilled: namely, that these legal or ceremonial observances of yours would cease at the coming of Christ, whom you still expect to come. But it is now one thousand four hundred and eighty-four years since He whom you believe will be a mere man has already come. And Scripture says: 'Behold, God and man shall come.'

"But in you will be fulfilled what the Lord Jesus Himself, true God and man, foretold to you, preaching to you: 'I came in the name of My Father, and you did not receive Me,' namely as your Messiah and Christ. 'Another will come in his own name,' namely Antichrist, seeking his own glory; 'him you will receive,' namely as Christ.

"The Jews therefore err in many things. For they fashion God as corporeal and deny the Trinity of persons. They proclaim that the Christ, whom they say has not come but will come, will be a mere man, and that Jesus Christ our Lord was born from the seed of Joseph and Mary. They posit no purgatory and deny that original sin is contracted, but say that circumcision was given only as a sign distinguishing that people from the others; that their Messiah will confer liberty upon them and restore to them the land of promise; and that a future resurrection of bodies will endure for a thousand years for bodily delights.

"They have no scruple of conscience about taking usury from those to whom they lend. Many of them apply themselves to divinations. They make no matter of conscience for themselves concerning sins of thought. Moreover, by observing their ceremonies because they are commanded in the law, they Judaize, and consequently they sin mortally.

"For after Christ, true God and man, the Messiah promised to them in the law, had come, He revealed the secrets of the prophets and, when the veil of the law had been removed, disclosed the spiritual meaning that lay hidden. From that time the legal institutions ought to have been observed not according to the letter that kills, but according to the spirit that gives life, since the same One who had given the law understood it better than those who had been its hearers. Because they neglected to do this, God refused to receive the ancient observances. I give thanks to Him because He freed me from their error."

As for why Peter Alfonsi himself, after abandoning the law of Judaism, did not accept the law of Muhammad rather than that of Christ, although he had lived and been reared among them and knew their language and law, he answers that he did not adhere to it because that law is Epicurean, and its inventor Muhammad was not a prophet but a most wicked man. In composing it he was aided by certain heretics, namely Georgians and Jacobites, who observe circumcision; therefore he commands circumcision in that law.

Muhammad was most lustful and full of deceptions. He was distinguished by neither prophecy nor miracles, but falsely contrived certain things. Those to whom he first gave it, namely the people of Arabia, were rustic and devoted to bodily vices and idolatry; therefore he permitted several wives. So that he might appear to have some religion, he imposed the performance of certain fasts and prayers and abstinence from drinking wine.

Peter sets down in summary the precepts of that law and shows them to be irrational. It promises paradise to those who observe that law, but a paradise full of corporeal things and pleasures. Nevertheless, it does not say that anyone is to be compelled to adopt that law. Because these matters were discussed above in another title, I now say nothing further.

Chapter XIII

In the year of the Lord 1099, Jerusalem was captured by the worshipers of Christ and wrested from the hands of the Turks, who had captured and held it for a hundred years or thereabouts. This was accomplished while Godfrey, commander of the army, fought marvelously and indefatigably against the Turks with his brothers Baldwin and Eustace.

Because of the great virtues which Godfrey exercised in this undertaking, by the will of all he was made the first king of Jerusalem. In that kingdom there were successively seven kings, one after another. At length the faithful who dwelt in those regions were afflicted by many battles and devastations, both in Jerusalem and in the other cities captured by the faithful, while aid from the western peoples failed.

After the eighty-eight years during which the faithful held it, Jerusalem was again captured by the Turks, and it has been possessed by the Saracens until the present, together with the other cities of those regions, which the faithful entirely abandoned.

The preparation of the faithful to capture those lands was made over three years. For after a certain Peter the Hermit, visiting the Holy Land out of devotion, saw and understood the oppression of the faithful there, he returned from there and reported it to the lord Pope Urban. At a council celebrated at Clermont, Urban exhorted the prelates and princes who were present to furnish aid for the recovery of the Holy Land.

From that time many took up the cross, as was said above. That Peter the Hermit also encouraged them and the peoples as well.

Therefore, in the year of the Lord 1096, as Vincent relates after Sigebert, the western peoples grieved that the holy places were profaned by the nations and that the Turks had already invaded a great part of the territories of the Christians. Almost innumerable persons, moved by one inspiration, with many signs shown to them and each encouraged by the others—commanders, counts, powerful men, nobles and persons of no nobility, rich and poor, free and servile, bishops, monks, clerics, old men and young men, boys and girls—all ran together from every quarter with one mind, no one compelling them.

They came from Spain, Provence, Aquitaine, and Brittany; from Scotland and England; from Normandy, France, Lotharingia, and Burgundy; from Germany, Lombardy, Apulia, and other kingdoms. Signed and armed with the power and sign of the cross, they prepared to go and avenge the injuries done to God upon the enemies of the Christian name.

The more each person had hitherto been inclined to exercise the malice of the world, the more ready he now became to undertake voluntarily the warfare of God, while in the meantime the firmest peace was established everywhere.

First they attacked the Jews in the cities in which they lived and compelled them to believe in Christ. Those who refused to believe they deprived of their goods, slaughtered, and expelled from the cities. Some of the Jews, led by zeal for preserving the law of their fathers, slaughtered one another. Others pretended for a time that they believed and afterward returned to Judaism.

Prominent in this army of God were Godfrey, duke of Lotharingia, and his brothers Eustace and Baldwin; Anselm of Ribemont; Baldwin, count of Mons; Robert, count of Flanders; Stephen, count of Blois; Hugh the Great, brother of Philip, king of the Franks; Robert, count of the Normans; Raymond, count of Saint-Gilles; Bohemond, duke of Apulia; Tancred, his nephew; and several other counts.

By apostolic authority an excellent man, Haymar [i.e., Adhemar], bishop of Le Puy, undertook the care of them all. By his counsel and teaching he was very useful to them until Antioch was captured. The aforesaid Peter the Hermit was also the instigator of this journey, and he remained usefully with the army of God in many circumstances until Jerusalem was captured.

As William says, never were so many nations seen to come together in one purpose. Their number surpassed human estimation, although it was estimated that sixty times one hundred thousand persons were all proceeding toward Jerusalem.

All these, awaiting an opportune time, undertook the path of that pilgrimage, some by sea and others by an overland route. For so many, as though infinite, thousands of peoples could not find necessities in any one region. It was therefore diligently arranged that each of the greater princes should lead his legions separately and that they should not depart by the same route.

Nowhere among all the many provinces which the West possesses was even one house idle, while from one a father of a household, from another a son, and from another the whole household prepared to migrate. The embraces of loved ones were separated from one another with sobs and sighs, and they said their final “Farewell” to one another.

Therefore, in the year from the Lord’s Incarnation 1096, a certain nobleman named Walter, a prudent man and vigorous in arms, passed through the kingdom of the Germans with a vast multitude of companies of foot soldiers and descended into Hungary. Having traversed it, he entered Bulgaria and, passing through the forests of the Ernenian region, reached Stralicia, the eminent metropolis of inland Dacia. There he received guides for the road from the duke of the aforesaid city, and after some days arrived unharmed at Constantinople.

When he arrived there, he was introduced into the presence of the aforesaid lord and obtained from him permission to winter in places near the city until the arrival of Peter the Hermit, at whose command he had undertaken the journey.

But Peter the Hermit followed him after no great interval of time with an innumerable army which he had gathered from many nations, whose number was said to reach forty thousand armed men. Because of the people's disobedience and stubbornness, he suffered many adversities on that journey. For in Bulgaria, because of the robberies, depredations, and other enormities which they committed, that people became intolerable to the inhabitants, and nearly ten thousand were killed.

Moreover, Peter lost all the money which he had collected from the generosity of the faithful princes so that he might supply from it the necessities of the poor and needy on the journey. Having suffered this misfortune, they hastened their journey and reached Constantinople. Finding Walter there, they joined their armies at the emperor's command and awaited the greater princes.

When they had rested there for some days, refreshed by provisions, at the command of the emperor of Constantinople they crossed the Hellespont in prepared ships and passed into Bithynia, which is the first province of Asia. There they encamped not far from the sea, in a place called Civitos. The aforesaid place was situated on the frontier of the enemy.

When the pilgrims' army had remained there for almost two months amid an abundance of many things, they did not lack a supply of goods for sale, which were carried to them daily from the city of Constantinople. Enervated by this abundance of things and by idleness together, they began, against the will of their magistrates, to form separate bands and to ravage the region for ten or more miles, carrying away flocks and herds with them.

When they had often done this prosperously, at last about three thousand Germans and two thousand cavalry left the camp for this purpose. They were surrounded in ambushes by Solimann, who ruled the Turks in that region, and were all killed to the last man.

After this was heard in the camp, everyone ran to arms, and all with one accord, both cavalry and infantry, advanced to avenge the blood of their slain brothers. When the elders of the army and those who had greater experience wished to restrain them and to moderate the indiscriminate fury of the raging people, the untamed populace rose against them, ascribing to cowardice rather than prudence the fact that they did not pursue the killers of their brothers with an avenging sword.

Therefore, having drawn up their battle lines, about twenty-five thousand foot soldiers and about five hundred excellent armored cavalry hastened toward those regions. They had scarcely advanced three miles when, behold, the aforesaid Solimann arrived with an innumerable multitude of Turks. When he arrived, our men, compressing themselves together, received the advancing Turks manfully with their swords.

At last our men, oppressed by the multitude of the enemy, broke ranks and turned in flight. The Turks pursued them as far as their camp and killed almost all of them. Among them the aforesaid Walter was also killed. Thus the stubborn and intractable people, because they could not acquiesce in the counsels of their betters, fell by their own impulse and descended into destruction, consigned to the swords of the enemy.

After these things, a certain priest named Gondecalcus [i.e., Gottschalk], a German by birth, undertook the journey with fifteen thousand armed men and entered the borders of Hungary. There, when goods for sale were most abundantly supplied to his army at the king's command, they abused the abundance of food, gave themselves to drunkenness, and turned to inflicting enormous injuries upon the natives, even to the point of practicing plunder.

When this became known to the lord king, he was inflamed with just anger. Summoning his military forces for vengeance upon such great injuries, he rushed upon them and carried out a most savage slaughter, making no distinction between the just and the impious. Nevertheless, some escaped the common peril and, through the exceedingly great mercy of the Lord, avoided the swords of the Hungarians and returned to their own lands.

At the same time, after a short interval, innumerable crowds had assembled from the western regions with the same purpose. They proceeded everywhere imprudently, without commander or ruler. There were, however, some noble men among them, but the people, impatient of discipline, submitted to them in nothing. Disregarding the teaching of the prudent, they ranged freely everywhere and without guidance through every unlawful act.

Hence it came about that, although they ought to have completed the journey they had begun in the fear of the Lord, they turned to madness and cruelly slaughtered the Jewish people, who had done no such thing to them, in the cities and towns through which they passed.

All these, having traversed Germany, reached the borders of the Hungarians. When they came to a place called Zaborthg and found the passage closed, they encamped on this side of the bridges. For that place was a very strongly fortified stronghold, protected by the very great rivers Danube and Linthace, and surrounded besides by deep marshes.

The king of Hungary had commanded that passage be denied to those wishing to cross, fearing that, mindful of the injuries which he had recently inflicted upon Gottschalk's legions, they might begin to arm themselves against him if admitted within his kingdom.

Therefore, when they saw themselves excluded from entrance into the kingdom, presuming upon their multitude, they repaired their arms, made a bridge over the river, and attacked the stronghold from every side. While they labored more intently in its assault and had already pierced the walls of the town in many places, so that entrance lay open to the pilgrims, suddenly, because their demerits demanded it, terror was divinely sent upon them. Abandoning the assault, they turned in flight, entirely ignorant of the cause of their flight.

No other cause is said to have existed except that by their manifold sins they had provoked God to wrath. For, according to the word of the wise man, "The impious man flees when no one pursues." When the Hungarians saw that the enemy's ranks had turned their backs, they pursued them and made a great slaughter among them.

Their number, as it is written, had been about two hundred thousand foot soldiers and three thousand cavalry. The greater part of them, despairing of the journey, returned to their own lands. The others, however, turned through Italy and, arriving in Apulia, afterward reached Greece by ship. At Durazzo they joined their forces to certain princes who had already arrived there.

Section I

In the same year, in the month of August, on the fifteenth day, the magnificent lord Godfrey, duke of Lotharingia, undertook the journey. The noble men who joined his camp were the lord Baldwin, his brother; Iecerinus, count of Annonia; the count of Saint-Pol; the count of Grees; the count of Toul; Baldwin of Bourg; and many other nobles and barons who followed his camp.

All these, proceeding together in one undivided company, reached the borders of Hungary. Having with difficulty obtained entrance into it, because they were prudent men and held God before their eyes, they traversed it with complete peace, passed through Bulgaria, overcame the passes which are commonly called those of Saint Basil, and reached Philippopolis.

There they learned that the lord Hugh the Great, brother of the king of the Franks, a prince who had preceded the others with many noble men, had been captured through treachery by the emperor of Constantinople and was being held in chains. With all speed they sent messengers and earnestly entreated the emperor to permit those nobles, whom he held in chains without fault, to depart.

When this was flatly denied them by the aforesaid emperor, they were deservedly indignant and by the common counsel of all exposed that whole region to plunder by their armies. Hearing this, the emperor feared that such and so strong an army might penetrate into the interior of the empire, and permitted the aforesaid noble men to depart freely to their own people.

Therefore, as they approached Constantinople, Duke Godfrey, who commanded the army of pilgrims, was often summoned by the emperor but refused to go to him, because he deservedly held the emperor's treachery in suspicion. The emperor, conceiving very great indignation on this account, prohibited the market in provisions to the people who had arrived with the duke.

When the princes saw the people's want, by common counsel they again ranged far and wide through the suburbs and brought every kind of abundance of food into the camp. Therefore the emperor again commanded that commerce be restored.

After these things, because the emperor regarded the Latins' assurances as suspect, he caused a multitude to be assembled in his empire, although our men took no precautions for themselves. Suddenly sending in the armies of his legions, he attacked our men. At first some were wounded and some were also killed. At length the pilgrims ran to arms, killed many of them, delivered others into bonds, and compelled the rest to flee within the city.

When war had now broken out and attacks were made from both sides every day, while the Greeks were always routed and fled in confusion as unwarlike men, the emperor was deservedly afraid. This was especially so because the number of pilgrims multiplied from day to day and the arrival of certain princes was reported to be near.

He therefore sent trustworthy and solemn messengers to them and caused them to be asked about peace. Although the faithful people of the pilgrims had no doubt that they had taken up arms against the Greeks with just zeal, nevertheless, holding the fear of God before their eyes and considering their purpose, they feared to turn against a Christian people the arms which they had borne against the infidels. Therefore, obeying the proposals of peace, they returned to full concord with the emperor.

When this had been done, the emperor opened his treasuries and conferred immense gifts in gold, gems, and other precious jewels upon both the lord duke and the other princes, so that, laden with gifts to the highest degree, they marveled at the emperor's munificence.

But in truth, what he conferred upon the princes as though liberally proceeded neither from liberality nor from grace, but from fear and fraudulent cunning. Because our men walked in simplicity of spirit and sincere faith, they could scarcely be persuaded of the malice of the Greeks and the wicked fraud of their prince, especially since he overflowed toward them with such great liberality and feigned favor.

When the duke heard of the arrival of the other princes, at the emperor's urging he crossed the Hellespont with his army in prepared ships, passed over into Bithynia, and encamped in the district of Chalcedon. That place was very near Constantinople, separated from it only by the interposition of the Hellespont, which we call the Arm of Saint George. Consequently, those drawn by urgent business could go to the royal city and return to the camp by ship three or four times in a day without difficulty.

The fact that the emperor had compelled the army of pilgrims by persuasion to cross the strait did not proceed from sincerity of faith. Rather, using his customary fraud, he circumvented the duke so that, when the other princes arrived, their forces could not be joined to his. He also compelled the others who followed afterward to cross separately by the same device, so that the armies of pilgrims were never together before the city of Constantinople.

Section II

Therefore, after the whole army of the pilgrims had crossed the Hellespont and come together in Bithynia, it was made one army of the living God. When the number of the legions was counted there, they were found to have six hundred thousand foot soldiers and one hundred thousand armored cavalry.

All these, with one mind, besieged and captured Nicaea, a most populous city. The lord of that city, or rather of the region and at the same time of the adjoining provinces, was a certain most powerful satrap of the Turks named Solimann, a man mighty and vigorous in arms. He possessed all the provinces from Tarsus in Cilicia as far as the Hellespont.

When he heard of the arrival of our men, he gathered great forces of Turks from the whole eastern region, hoping that, relying upon their aid, he might rescue the aforesaid city and the entire region from the impending dangers. But before the capture of the city of Nicaea he was defeated in battles by the pilgrims and put to flight.

The city of Nicaea was captured in the year from the Lord's Incarnation 1097, in the month of June, on the twentieth day. At the command of the princes they continued their journey and proceeded toward Antioch.

On this journey the lord Bohemond, Robert, count of the Normans, Stephen of Blois, the lord Tancred, and the count of Saint-Pol preceded the other forces. They had scarcely gone two miles away from the greater camp when, behold, Solimann suddenly rushed upon them. Mindful of the injuries by which he had lost an eminent city, his wife, and his children, who had been captured in its conquest, he yearned with all his strength to repay them in kind. He had already killed many and almost turned the rest to flight when, behold, the lord Godfrey came flying like lightning with the rest of the army, having hastened after being informed by messengers of his companions' danger. Rushing with his men upon the enemies of the faith, he turned them in flight, not without slaughter among them.

It is said that on that day as many as three thousand powerful and distinguished men fell from the enemy's number. Of our common people and the lowest populace, of both sexes mingled together, four thousand fell. This battle took place on the day of the Kalends of November [read: the Kalends of July].

Departing from there and continuing the journey they had begun, they traversed all Bithynia and entered Pisidia. When they descended into a certain region of it, they suffered a great scarcity of water, to such a degree that many failed because of the distress of thirst. At length, with the Lord assisting, they were rescued from these dangers and descended into a plentiful and fertile region near Antioch the Lesser, which is the metropolis of Pisidia.

Here certain of the princes first deliberately separated from the army, drawing their troops apart. The first of these was the lord Baldwin, brother of Duke Godfrey, with seven thousand armored men. The second was the lord Tancred, with five thousand cavalry and not many foot soldiers.

Tancred descended into Cilicia and besieged Tarsus, the metropolis of that province. Tarsis, the second of the sons of Javan, son of Japheth, son of Noah, is said to have founded this city, although Solinus thinks otherwise concerning the foundation of this city, asserting that it was built by Perses.

When they had already compelled the citizens to surrender, the lord Baldwin arrived with larger forces, expelled the lord Tancred, and claimed the city for himself, after expelling from it the Turks who ruled there. The citizens who inhabited it were faithful, but, having abandoned the use of arms, devoted their labor only to agriculture and commerce, while paying tribute to the Turks.

Tancred, however, withdrawing from Tarsus, captured Anustria, a noble city of the same province, after expelling the Turks from it, and subjected the whole adjoining region to his dominion.

Moreover, after the lord Baldwin had reduced Tarsus to his power, he attacked the cities and fortresses of that region, with a certain Armenian commander named Pangratius as his guide, putting the Turks to flight and killing them. When his name had now become renowned, he was called by the citizens of Edessa and was made their lord and governor.

Edessa is a noble city of Mesopotamia which by another name is called Rages of the Medes. For this city, filled with faithful citizens, had preserved until that time the faith which they had received from the time of the apostles. But until then they suffered daily beneath the yoke of the infidels. When Baldwin had obtained lordship of the city, he attacked and put to flight the infidels all around and subjected the entire region to his lordship.

Meanwhile, while the lord Baldwin labored around the region of Edessa, the greater army reached Antioch after capturing all the cities on its road and putting the Turks to flight.

Antioch is a glorious and noble city, having obtained the third or second degree of dignity after Rome, and is the chief and ruler of all the provinces contained within the eastern region. In ancient times it was called Reblata. Zedekiah, king of Judah, was led there before Nebuchadnezzar's sight, and at his command Zedekiah's sons were cruelly killed in his presence.

After the death of Alexander the Great of Macedon, Antiochus, who obtained part of his kingdom after his death, as was said above, surrounded it with towers and a very strong wall, commanded that it be called Antioch after his own name, and established it as the capital of his kingdom.

In this city the prince of the apostles, blessed Peter, held the priestly chair. In this city the first assembly of the faithful was held, in which the name of Christians was also established. For previously those who followed Christ's teaching were called Nazarenes or disciples. Afterward, however, from the name derived from Christ, by the authority of that synod all the faithful were called Christians. The patriarch of that city is said to have twenty provinces within his jurisdiction.

Antioch is situated in the province called Coele-Syria and has a most convenient and delightful position. For it is almost entirely watered by springs and streams. Two mountains of marvelous height are also enclosed within the circuit of the city. On the summit of one of them, which appears higher, is situated a most strongly fortified stronghold. These two mountains are separated by a very deep but narrow valley, through which a torrent sent down from above flows through the middle of the city. Some assert the length of the city to be two miles and others three. It is ten or twelve miles distant from the sea.

The lord of this eminent city was a certain man named Anexianus [i.e., Yaghi-Siyan], a Turk by nation, who had belonged to the household of the great and most powerful prince, the sultan of the Persians. As we said above, the sultan had violently subjected all those provinces to his empire. Wishing, however, to return to his own lands, he distributed all the regions which he had claimed for himself among his nephews and household servants.

In this distribution, the city of Nicaea with its provinces was conferred upon his nephew Solimann. To a certain nephew of his named Ducat he conferred the city of Damascus. To a certain servant of his named Assunghur he conferred the most famous city of Aleppo. To this Anexianus, of whom the discussion concerns, he also granted the city of Antioch with modest territories, for the Egyptian caliph possessed the regions of Syria as far as Laodicea.

Thus our men, arriving before this most strongly fortified city, besieged it for eight continuous months. But because the city extended in a great circuit, they were unable to surround it on every side, although the number of those among them who could draw the sword was said to be three hundred thousand.

It would take long to enclose within the pen each individual event that occurred on almost every day during that siege prolonged for so great a time. For our army was almost endangered by famine. Moreover, the citizens, making frequent sallies, inflicted many losses upon our men.

Nevertheless, while all with one mind persisted with all their strength in attacking the city, a report resounded that a certain most powerful prince of the Persians, at the entreaty of the people of Antioch, was sending innumerable forces from his entire empire to their aid, and it was now held for certain that they were stationed nearby.

Our princes therefore assembled and began to deliberate with one another about what ought to be done in so great a necessity. Some advised that, abandoning the city, they should go out to meet the approaching multitude and experience the fortune of battle. Others thought that the greater part should go out to meet them while the remainder continued the siege.

Bohemond, prince of the men of Taranto, a vigorous man and very experienced in such matters, rejected both courses, setting forth his reasons and saying: "Whether we all go out, as some wish, or some part remains in the camp, we appear to have spent our labor, zeal, and expenses uselessly over so long a time. For if everyone goes out, the siege will be dissolved, and the citizens within the walls will join the enemy according to their pleasure or admit those arriving within the walls. But if part of the army remains in the camp, how will one part be able to restrain the citizens within the city when all of us together can scarcely restrain them?

“Therefore, fathers, it appears to me that all our intention ought to hasten toward this: that before the arrival of so great an army the city should first descend into our dominion. If you ask the means, it is ready at hand. I have a faithful friend in the city. He has in his power a most strongly fortified tower, which he is prepared to surrender to me under certain conditions. For this transaction I have promised to give him much money.

“If it seems good to your greatness that the city, captured by our solicitude and zeal, should pass into our power to be possessed by hereditary right, I am prepared to fulfill the agreement with my aforesaid friend. Otherwise, let any one of you labor, and by whatever endeavor he can obtain the city, so far as I am concerned I concede it to him.”

Hearing these things, the princes rejoiced with great joy and assented to his request with a grateful mind, except for the count of Toulouse. They granted the city with its appurtenances to Bohemond, to be possessed perpetually by hereditary right.

At that time there were among the other faithful in the same city two brothers born of the same mother. The elder of them, Emirferyus, was a man of very great power and very familiar with the lord of the city. When he heard that the lord Bohemond was a magnificent prince, he immediately gained his favor through faithful messengers while the city was under siege, so that almost every day he informed him more fully concerning the condition of the city.

Therefore, when the council had been dissolved, Bohemond, being a solicitous man, approached this friend through messengers so that what they had agreed with one another might be fulfilled. When he heard this, Emirferyus rejoiced. Because he had only one brother and could not bring so great a transaction to the desired end without him, although he had concealed that transaction from him until that day, he wished to test whether his brother would cooperate with him in the transaction.

When he began from afar and by certain light words first to reveal the mystery to him, he found him greatly abhorrent from this pious purpose, indeed execrating the work of our men. Thus he who had previously doubted whether he should communicate the plan to his brother now, shunning him as though a pestilence, execrated him in his conscience. Lest the service of Christ be impeded through him, he began to plan his death, preferring the public salvation of the faithful to brotherly charity.

That night, when the city had given itself to sleep, the aforesaid man, seeing that an opportune hour for accomplishing the affair had presented itself, signified through a messenger to the lord Bohemond that he should come swiftly with chosen men. Hearing this, the lord Bohemond secretly summoned the other princes, and with his household company they suddenly stood before the tower.

Meanwhile the aforesaid man entered that tower and killed in his bed his brother, whose mind he knew to be opposed to his purpose, while he slept. When this had been done, a rope was let down, and the princes began to ascend in the name of God. The first was the lord Bohemond; after him came the count of Flanders and Tancred; after them the others ascended.

Clothed with strength from on high and led by the aforesaid man who had introduced them, they occupied ten towers without challenge, killing their guards. When this had been done, they descended to the gate, broke it open by force, and admitted those who were waiting outside.

Recognizing that dawn had now arrived, they gave a signal with a trumpet and admitted into the city the others who had remained in the camps. Running through the city and breaking into houses, they carried out no small slaughter.

The citizens, hearing the tumult, rose from their beds. Seeing the slaughter of their people which was taking place everywhere through the streets, they understood the affair as it was and attempted to flee, abandoning their houses. But, falling among the ranks of armed men, they were cut down. Many nevertheless departed through the gates or, being lowered over the wall, ascended into the mountains and preserved their lives. Among them Anixianus [i.e., the same Yaghi-Siyan], the lord of the city, left the city and was found and killed by certain Armenians while he fled.

Our men, having obtained the city, found absolutely no food within it. This was no wonder, since the city had now been enclosed by siege for almost nine months. Yet so many and such great riches in gold, silver, and precious stones were found that the man who had previously begged while starving, now made wealthier, abounded beyond all others.

Antioch was therefore captured in the year from the Lord’s Incarnation 1098, on the third day of the month of June.

On the third day after the capture of the city, the aforesaid most powerful prince arrived with forces said to be even greater and enclosed the city on every side with his men. Thus the Christian people, who a few days before had besieged the same city and violently claimed it for themselves, now—with the roles reversed, as affairs are wont to change—sustained a most grievous siege and were afflicted beyond measure by starvation.

Section IV

Therefore, when the city was thus surrounded on every side by the unbelieving people and the faithful people were no longer permitted to leave or enter, the condition of our men became far worse. For since no food was brought in, a famine more violent than usual arose in the city, so that through lack of provisions and the bitterness of hunger the populace descended to shameful things.

There was no difference among foods even among the delicate, nor was there any legal distinction of clean things from unclean. It was therefore pitiable to behold the stronger men, upon whose strength they especially relied, running about the squares and streets begging, leaning upon staffs with downcast faces because of excessive weakness. Scarcely anyone among so great a people had enough for himself.

Why say more? Camels, asses, oxen, horses, mules, and any unclean things—whenever it was granted to have any of these—were regarded as the greatest delicacies. To relate what happened to each person and in how great a need the pious people labored for Christ would depart far from the brevity of a history and would require individual treatises. But, in summary, scarcely any history records that elsewhere so many princes and so great an army bore such great hardships without failing and with such patience.

Meanwhile William of Grantamesitil, a noble man, and others who had fled with him at the beginning of the siege reached Alexandria the Lesser, boarded ships, and came to Smyrna. The emperor of Constantinople was in that place with his forces and was hastening to the aid of our princes.

Apart from the armies which he had gathered from all nations, about forty thousand Latins were joined to him. Because of certain urgent causes, they had been left in the emperor's lands by the armies which had gone before.

When William and his companions arrived, the emperor asked them about the condition of our princes and armies. To conceal their flight and perpetual infamy, they falsely contrived many things, asserting: "Antioch has been captured, but so great a famine has worn away the army of the faithful that very few survive from so great an army. Moreover, Corbonach, the most powerful prince of the Persians, has surrounded the same city in siege with infinite eastern forces. But our people within have been so diminished by hunger, cold, and slaughter that they scarcely appear sufficient for the defense of the city.

"Therefore, seeing that the affairs of our brothers could not proceed as desired, we often approached them so that they might consult for themselves and cease wishing to undertake an impossible thing. Since we could not recall them from their purpose, we took care to provide for our own safety, lest we be enveloped in equal calamities. Now, if it pleases you, cease to advance, lest your legions be enveloped in equal dangers."

Hearing these things, the emperor took common counsel with his men and decided to return. Thus it came about through the work of the aforesaid wicked men that the army, although greatly needing it, did not receive the aid which the Christian emperor had prepared according to his agreement.

Nevertheless, when the matter is considered more inwardly and diligently examined, this redounded to the glory of our Latin princes. For it was fitting that those who had borne the burden of the day and heat should carry back the glory for their labors. But if the emperor had been present with his forces, because of his preeminent authority the palm of victory would deservedly have belonged to him. Therefore it is believed to have been procured by the Lord that those who had labored faithfully and devoutly amid innumerable dangers should carry back the fruit of their labor and the title of victory.

Section V

Corbonach, however, who not undeservedly feared the emperor's arrival, heard of his withdrawal and, as though now secure of victory, pressed our men within the city at his pleasure. Hence our men fell into so great an abyss of desperation that no hope of safety now appeared to remain.

For this reason it is said that even the princes, despairing of safety, held a private council among themselves and secretly decreed that, abandoning the people, they themselves should flee secretly by night to the sea. When this became known to Duke Godfrey and to the venerable lord bishop of Le Puy, they summoned them to themselves and assailed them with just rebukes.

While the people of God were thus afflicted, the Lord looked upon them, sending to them consolation from His majesty. For blessed Andrew appeared to a certain cleric from the province of Provence, who was exceedingly devoted to him, admonishing him to announce to the princes that they should seek the lance with which the side of our Lord Jesus Christ had been pierced, deposited in the church of blessed Peter. He designated its place to him by certain signs.

When the cleric had done this and they had been led at his suggestion to that same place, they dug the earth somewhat deeply and found the lance just as it had been foretold to them by the cleric. When the people heard this, as though from consolation sent to them from heaven, they began in some measure to be relieved from their distresses.

Renewing their vow, they bound themselves by oaths bodily sworn that they would not depart from one another until, with the Lord as author, they restored the holy city to its former liberty.

When they had labored for twenty-six continuous days under so miserable an affliction, the people began again to return to heart, to gird their loins with courage, and to join battle with the enemy. Therefore, on the night preceding the appointed day of battle, while they prepared their arms and made ready the horses, no place was given to sleep.

When morning came, around the twilight of day, the priests and ministers of the Lord celebrated the divine rites throughout the churches. Before the people went out to battle, they first confessed their sins with humility and fortified themselves with the body and blood of the Lord. When this had been done, so great a grace was divinely poured into them that those who yesterday and the day before yesterday could scarcely lift themselves over the thresholds, as though sluggish and cast down, now came forth in public and promised one another the palm of victory. The bishops and the other priests likewise, clothed in sacred vestments, blessed the people for battle.

Assembling at the earliest dawn on the fourth day before the Kalends of July and invoking aid from above, they drew up twelve battle lines. The last, which was more densely filled than the others, was commanded by the illustrious prince, the lord Bohemond.

In the departure of our men from the city there occurred something very worthy of memory. A certain most sweet dew, sent from above, slight but most welcome, descended upon the army of our men. It was so gentle that the Lord seemed, as it were, to have poured His blessing and grace into it.

For whoever was sprinkled by that shower received such complete gladness of mind and body that there appeared to be no labor and no hardship in that entire expedition. Not only to the men, but also to the horses, their former vigor was restored to such a degree that, although for many preceding days they had had nothing but leaves and the bark of trees for fodder, throughout that whole day they surpassed in moderation and endurance of labor the horses of the enemy, which had been fed on barley and straw.

Meanwhile, when the prince of the enemy understood that our men had gone out from the city, he too drew up his battle lines. But our men, advancing toward them step by step, first sent three battle lines rushing manfully upon them; and the other lines that followed attacked the enemy with no lesser force. Thus the battle was fought most fiercely on both sides. When they had now fought for a long time on equal terms, the last battle line arrived, over which the lord Bohemond presided. He rushed upon the enemy with so great a force that, when their compact formations had been broken apart, they were turned to flight. But Corbonach, seeing his battle lines broken apart, himself took refuge in flight and consulted his own safety.

Our men pursued the yielding enemy for a long time. Nevertheless, fearing the failure of their horses, they did not presume to pursue them farther, with the exception of the lord Tancred, who with certain others pursued the enemy, striking them down, until sunset. When the battle had been completed, our men returned to the enemy's camp, where they found so great an abundance of necessary things and so great a store of eastern riches that there was neither number nor measure of the gold, silver, gems, and precious garments. So great an abundance of horses and herds, and also of grain and provisions, was found that even those who had previously labored under the utmost want no longer knew what they should choose. Our princes obtained this victory in the year of the Lord's Incarnation 1098, on the twenty-eighth day of the month of June.

When affairs in the city had therefore been put in order, the Christian people remained in the city for some time. There, from hidden causes, a great destruction arose among the people, so that scarcely any day passed on which thirty or forty funerals were not presented. Nearly the entire female sex also perished there, so that within a few days fifty thousand died. The venerable man the lord Adhemar, bishop of Le Puy, also died.

During this intervening time, therefore, our princes dispersed and moved their forces separately. They occupied many cities around Antioch, while they made others tributary to themselves. But on the Kalends of September, as had been agreed among them, they came together into one body and undertook the journey toward Jerusalem. After passing through many regions and storming many cities, they came to the city of Tripoli, for it was a great and populous city. Its inhabitants, hearing of the arrival of our men, went out to meet them in battle, but by divine action they were defeated and put to flight.

When our men had besieged the city for some time, the people began to murmur and to cry out that, abandoning that siege, they should undertake the journey toward Jerusalem. The princes, wishing to satisfy the people, therefore raised the siege and undertook the journey, following the seacoast. On the third day they came down before the city of the people of Beirut. Then, passing Sidon and Tyre, they came to the plain that is not far from Acre. Proceeding from there, leaving Galilee on their left and passing Caesarea, after the third day they encamped in a plain not far from Joppa.

Having learned that the noble city of Ramla was nearby, they sent the lord count of Flanders ahead to it with five hundred horsemen. Finding the city empty, they entered it without anyone opposing them. For during the preceding night the citizens, having learned beforehand of the arrival of our men, had abandoned the city with their whole households and fled to the mountains. But our men, coming to the city, passed three days there amid every abundance of wine, oil, and grain.

Meanwhile, the Jerusalemites, made more certain of the arrival of the Christians and knowing for certain that the entire multitude said to be coming had as its special and principal purpose the obtaining of that city, fortified the city with as much care as they could, gathering the necessities of sustenance and kinds of weapons. Moreover, the Egyptian prince, who in that year with great labor had recovered the aforesaid city after expelling the garrison of the Turks, on learning that our army had departed from Antioch, had ordered the walls of the city to be repaired with as much diligence as he could.

Furthermore, they all assembled together and decreed that, after killing all the faithful who dwelt in Jerusalem, they would demolish completely the Church of the Lord's Resurrection and tear the tombs out of it by the roots, lest on their account, or for the sake of prayer, the people of the faithful should thereafter propose to approach and frequent the city. But at length, recognizing that by this action they would inflame still greater hatred against themselves among our peoples, they changed their counsel and desisted. Nevertheless, after despoiling the faithful who dwelt in the city, they expelled them all from the city together with the lord patriarch. Hiding themselves in suburban bonds [read: villages] until the arrival of our men, they awaited death from day to day.

After our men had completed three days at Ramla, they undertook the journey and began to approach the city. Knowing that the venerable places for which they had endured so many labors were now nearby, when they had proceeded only a little they beheld the holy city from close at hand. Pouring forth tears because of spiritual joy, they glorified God, who had deigned graciously to hear the vows of His people, so that according to their desires they had merited to arrive at the places for which they had longed. The prophecy that had been foretold through the prophet appeared to have been fulfilled: "Lift up your eyes round about, Jerusalem, and see the power of the king. Behold, your Savior comes to release you from the bond."

Section VII

It is certain that the holy city Jerusalem, beloved by God, is situated upon lofty mountains; the authority of the ancients hands down that it was placed in the tribe of Benjamin. On the west it has the tribe of Simeon, the region of the Philistines, and the Mediterranean Sea. On the east it has the streams of the Jordan and the wilderness adjoining it. On the south it has the lot of Judah, in which is Bethlehem, the familiar resting place of the Lord and the happy site of the cradle of the Lord's nativity. On the north it has the city of Gibeon of Joshua the son of Nun, distinguished by victory and renowned for the miracle of the sun made stationary, having the tribe of Ephraim.

Jerusalem is the metropolis of Judea, situated in a place altogether lacking streams, woods, springs, and pastures. According to the histories of the ancients, it was first called Salem and afterward Jebus; from the Jebusite it was called Jebusalem. Afterward, however, when his son Solomon reigned as king, it was called Jerusalem, as though "the Jebusalem of Solomon." The city is both smaller than the greatest cities and larger than those of middling size. It is oblong in form and quadrangular, with one side longer than the other.

It is situated upon two mountains, the summits of which are for the most part contained within the circuit of the wall, separated by a small valley that also divides the city through the middle. Of these, the mountain on the west is called Mount Zion. The other, on the east, is called Mount Moriah, where Abraham wished to sacrifice Isaac and on which, according to what sacred history contains, Solomon built a temple to the Lord.

In the year of the Lord's Incarnation 1099, on the seventh day of the month of June, the army of the Christians encamped before the city. The number of those arriving is said to have been about forty thousand of our men, of whom scarcely twenty thousand were serviceable foot soldiers. There were, however, one thousand five hundred horsemen. Within the city there were said to be forty thousand strong and very well-armed men.

On the fifth day after our army came to the city, they prepared with one mind to attack it. When the whole army had now labored at this for four weeks, on the eleventh day of the month of July they attacked the city with one mind. Until the seventh hour of the day the contest remained quite uncertain and doubtful, without a sure victory. When our men, already wearied by great labor, began to press on more weakly, the people gradually fell back while the enemy taunted them.

But suddenly divine power came to their aid and brought consolation to the affairs of the faithful, which were already desperate. For from the Mount of Olives a certain knight, girded with shining arms, who afterward did not appear, gave a sign to our legions that they should return and repeat the assault anew. When this sign had been seen, our army was gladdened and returned with greater courage to attack the city. So great was the ardor of their spirits that those who, weary or wounded, had withdrawn their labor now recovered their courage, offered themselves voluntarily, and pressed on with greater spirit.

So great was the joy in the camps of our men that, as though already certain of victory, within the space of one hour they leveled the ditch, broke through a certain outer wall, and applied to the wall a tower that they had constructed from timbers. The citizens, however, had suspended trees of very great height and immense solidity from the wall so that they might break the blows of the machines. Our men who were in the aforesaid tower cut the ropes by which two of those trees were bound and cast them down to the ground. When Duke Godfrey, who was attacking the city in that part, learned this, he ordered the said beams to be carried up into the tower. Placed with one end upon the machine and the other upon the wall, they served in place of a bridge.

When the bridge had thus been arranged, the illustrious man Duke Godfrey, with his brother Eustace, was the first of all to enter the city. After them many others followed. When the enemies upon the walls saw our men, they abandoned the towers and ramparts. But our men who had already entered the city, approaching at the duke's command the northern gate, which is called Saint Stephen's, opened it and admitted the people who were waiting. Running through the streets of the city with drawn swords, sparing neither age nor sex, they struck down everything by the edge of the sword. Moreover, a very great multitude of the pagans fled into the court of the Temple. Coming to them, the lord Tancred beheaded all whom he found there, who numbered nearly ten thousand.

Section VIII

When the city had been completely subdued, the people of the faithful laid down their arms and, in a spirit of humility, with groaning and tears, began with every devotion to go about the venerable places that our Savior, the Son of God, had willed to sanctify by His own presence. For it was most delightful to behold and full of spiritual gladness with how great a devotion the faithful people approached the holy places. Everywhere there were tears, everywhere sighs.

On the day of the city's capture, the lord Adhemar, the venerable man and bishop of Le Puy, the lord pope's legate, who, as we said before, had departed from life at Antioch, was seen by many in the holy city. Thus many venerable and trustworthy men asserted that they had seen him with their bodily eyes ascend the wall of the city first of all and encourage the others to enter the city. Many others who had fallen by various misfortunes in the service of God upon the said journey appeared in that city, visiting the venerable places with the others. By this it was manifestly given to be understood that, although they had departed from bodily life, nevertheless, being called to eternal beatitude, they were not deprived of their desire, but with complete affection obtained that which they had sought with pious zeal.

The aforesaid city was captured in the year of the Lord's Incarnation 1099, on the fifteenth day of the month of July, on the sixth day of the week, at the ninth hour. It was the third year from the time when the Christian people had assumed the burden of so great a pilgrimage, while the lord Urban II presided over the Roman Church, the lord Henry IV was emperor of the Romans, and the lord Philip reigned in France.

When the holy city had therefore been restored to its former liberty by the Christian people, on the eighth day the princes assembled in order to choose someone from their company who would rule the region and expend royal care upon the acquired province. Invoking the grace of the Holy Spirit and agreeing with one another, they unanimously elected the lord Godfrey, duke of Lotharingia, as king.

This Godfrey was from the kingdom of the Franks, from the province of Reims and the city of Boulogne. His father was the lord Eustace the Elder, count of that region. His mother was named Ida, the sister of Godfrey, duke of Lotharingia, who was surnamed Struma. Later, when the latter was without children, he adopted this nephew of his, Godfrey, as his son; hence, when he died, Godfrey succeeded him in the duchy of Lotharingia.

Godfrey had three full brothers, namely, the lord Baldwin, count of Edessa; Eustace, count of Boulogne, who obtained the county of Boulogne after his father; and the third was William, who remained at home with his father when his two brothers set out for Jerusalem.

This duke was most illustrious, a religious, merciful, pious, and just man, slow and steadfast in speech. He despised the vanities of the world, which is rare at that age, especially in the military profession. Moreover, he was constant in prayers and assiduous in works of piety; he was also distinguished in affability and pleasing in liberality. He was handsome and tall in body, robust, with a comely face and blond hair and beard. In the use of arms and military exercise he was, in the judgment of all, almost singular; his deeds were always magnificent and worthy of admiration, and are recounted in celebrated history even to the present day.

Therefore, after the prince devoted to God obtained the kingdom, being a religious man, he immediately began to offer the firstfruits of his reign to the Lord. For at once he established regular canons in the Church of the Lord's Sepulcher and the Temple of the Lord, and assigned ample benefices to them. The man beloved by God had brought with him disciplined monks from cloisters, who throughout the entire journey ministered the divine offices for him at both the daytime and nighttime hours.

In those days, in a part of the Church of the Holy Resurrection, one portion of the Lord's Cross was found apart, which the faithful had hidden for fear of the gentiles. This circumstance brought great consolation to the faithful.

A most pious deed of this prince ought not to be passed over in silence. For, when raised to the kingship, he would not be adorned with a golden crown after the custom of kings in the holy city, in which the Restorer of the human race had borne a crown of thorns for our salvation even to the gibbet of the cross. Hence some do not even number him in the catalogue of the Latin kings of Jerusalem. To me, however, he appears not only a king but the best of kings, the light and mirror of others. For he must not be believed to have despised the gift of consecration, but humbly to have declined the pomp of the world and its perishable crown so that he might obtain elsewhere one that does not wither.

Section IX

Thus under the hand of the illustrious man Godfrey the kingdom began to gain strength. Since at that same time the most Christian princes had not yet dispersed from one another, the Egyptian prince who is called the caliph, the most powerful among the eastern peoples, had collected boundless armies. Summoning the commander of his army to himself, he commanded him to descend into Syria with all the forces of his kingdom and erase from the earth that barbarous people which had come from many regions of the west.

Obeying his lord's command, he descended into Syria with innumerable forces. When this was heard, our princes assembled together and, after completing their customary prayers before the Lord's Sepulcher, gathered their forces and advanced against the enemy. They had in all one thousand two hundred horsemen and nine thousand foot soldiers. Therefore, having drawn up the battle lines, commending the outcome of the affair to the Lord, and invoking aid from above, they manfully met the approaching enemy. Unable to withstand their first assault, the enemy were turned to flight. Our men pursued them and killed a great number of them. Returning to their camps, which were filled with many kinds of riches, they were sated even to nausea.

After these things had thus been accomplished, the princes beloved by God, the counts of the Normans and of the Flemings, returned to their own lands. But the count of the Normans, upon returning, found that his brother, the king of England who was surnamed Rufus, had died without children. Although the right of succession belonged to him as the elder, his younger brother Henry persuaded the princes of the kingdom that his brother had been established as king at Jerusalem and had no intention of returning. By this fraud he obtained the kingdom.

The brother therefore returned and began to claim the kingdom, but when Henry denied it to him altogether, he prepared a fleet and entered England by force. With mediators of peace intervening, peace was restored between them on these terms: namely, that the king would give his firstborn brother a fixed sum of money each year under the name of tribute. Afterward, however, notwithstanding the agreements, the king sailed with an army into Normandy, defeated his brother in battle, captured him, and consigned him to perpetual imprisonment. When he died there, the king succeeded him in all things.

When these princes had departed, the lord King Godfrey retained with himself the lord Tancred and Count Garnerius of Grees; with them and certain other nobles he governed the kingdom prudently and vigorously. In those days, the lord Bohemond, prince of Antioch, and the lord Baldwin, count of Edessa, hearing that our men had claimed the holy city for themselves, undertook the journey toward Jerusalem with twenty-five thousand armed men. After defeating the Turks who had prepared ambushes for them on the road, they arrived at Jerusalem safe and unharmed.

Indeed, since the church of Jerusalem had remained vacant until those days, by the common will of all they placed in the patriarchal seat the lord Daibert, a venerable man and archbishop of Pisa, who after the capture of the city had sailed to the Holy Land with many men from Italy. When this had been done, these two princes returned, the one to Antioch and the other to Edessa.

But after Bohemond returned, when he had rather hastily approached a certain city for the purpose of capturing it, he was captured by the Turks after many of his men had been lost. In that same year, which was the eleven-hundredth from the Lord's Incarnation, King Godfrey became ill. Perceiving that death threatened him, he received the viaticum of our salvation and, as a true confessor of Christ, entered upon the way of all flesh. In that year William, king of the English, a man most wicked of all, also died, in the thirteenth year of his reign and the forty-fourth year of his life, on the Nones of August.

Finally, when the lord Godfrey had been taken from this light, the lord Baldwin, his brother, count of Edessa, succeeded him in the kingdom. He was indeed a vigorous man, suitably imbued with the liberal disciplines. Moreover, he was ready for arms, tireless, and solicitous whenever the affairs of the kingdom called him. It appears superfluous to commend in him magnificence, courage, experience in military discipline, and the other gifts of his spirit. He had an aquiline nose, was grave in gait and slow in speech, and always bore a cloak hanging from his shoulders, so that to those who did not know him he appeared more a bishop than a secular prince. He afflicted the Turks and the other unbelieving nations in many battles and stormed many of their cities.

Section X

At the same time, when the western princes heard the great marvels that the Lord had wrought through His servants against the unbelievers in the east, and how He had overthrown nations before their face, they firmly conceived the purpose of renewing another expedition and setting out for the east. The greatest among them was the illustrious lord William, count of Poitou and likewise duke of Aquitaine; Hugh the Great, brother of the king of the Franks, who had also been in the first expedition but had been compelled by want of household means to return to his own lands; the lord Stephen, count of Chartres and Blois, who, after Antioch had been captured, feared the future battle and received perpetual infamy through shameful flight; and the lord Stephen, count of Burgundy, together with many other nobles. Seeking to redeem his former disgrace, the count of Chartres undertook the same journey.

All these undertook the journey and came to Constantinople. From there, crossing the Hellespont with their legions, they came to Nicaea. But Alexius, the emperor of Constantinople, after the ancient custom of the Greeks, envied the successes of the Latins and secretly incited the enemies of the faith through messengers to destroy them. Whether deliberately or by chance, they were divided from one another and given into the hands of the enemy, so that in one day more than fifty thousand of both sexes indiscriminately fell. Those, however, who were divinely permitted to escape the enemy reached Tarsus in Cilicia after losing almost everything. Hugh the Great died in that place.

Afterward, drawn by devotion to see the holy places, they undertook the journey toward Jerusalem. They besieged Tortosa, a maritime city, broke into it by force, and reduced it to their power. In a certain shrine of that same city a vessel of the greenest color was found, fashioned in the form of a dish. The Genoese, judging it to be an emerald, received it for a great sum of money as their share of the booty promised to them by the king. Returning home, they offered it to their church as a great ornament. That vessel is shown even today in the said city of Genoa as a miracle, for the aforesaid Genoese say that it is truly an emerald and is that vessel or dish in which Jesus Christ, the Son of God, ate at supper with His disciples.

When the cities that the king had wrested from the hand of the unbelievers had been put in order, as he returned to the kingdom a report resounded that the Egyptian caliph was again directing boundless forces into Syria against the faithful. In their army there were said to be fifteen thousand horsemen and twenty thousand foot soldiers. When the king had learned their arrival for certain, he manfully met them with two hundred seventy horsemen and thirteen thousand foot soldiers, invoking aid from above. When battle was joined, by the cooperation of God’s grace he put them to flight. Our men pursued them and made a marvelous slaughter among them, their prince being killed.

In the same year, which was the year of the Lord’s Incarnation 1103, while King Baldwin was at Joppa, the unbelievers of Ascalon gathered a boundless multitude of their men and attacked the borders of the kingdom. When the king heard this, he took his forces and went out against them very impetuously; not fearing their multitude, he joined battle. But when our men had fought manfully for some time, at length, overwhelmed by the multitude, they were turned to flight after a great slaughter of the enemy. It is not read that so great a slaughter of noble men had occurred in the kingdom of Jerusalem down to that day. Among them fell the lord Stephen of Burgundy, count of Chartres.

The king nevertheless escaped and fled to the mountains. Although he was believed to be dead, he returned to Joppa. At length he attacked the enemy while they were running about here and there because of the victory, defeated them, killed and captured many, and turned the rest to flight.

In the fourth year of his reign, that same king, with a fleet of Genoese that in the same spring had put into the port of Joppa, captured the maritime city of Acre after it had been besieged for twenty continuous months [read: days], expelling the unbelievers from it. From this time safe tranquillity by sea was first opened to those visiting the Holy Land.

In the same year the lord Bohemond, prince of Antioch, together with the lord Tancred and the lord Baldwin of Bourcq, who had succeeded the lord king in the county of Edessa, came together. With a great company of nobles and of other persons, both horsemen and foot soldiers, they besieged the city of Harran near the city of Edessa. When with great persistence in fighting they had compelled the unbelieving citizens to surrender, a contention, poured forth among the princes at the instigation of envy, arose over whose banner should first be brought into the city.

While they contended, there suddenly arrived a boundless multitude of Turks who had hastened from the whole east to break the siege. They attacked our men, who were deprived of divine aid, and turned them to flight. When a great part of them had been killed, the lord count of Edessa and the lord Joncellinus, his kinsman, were captured. But the lord Bohemond and the lord Tancred fled to Edessa. Moreover, neither before nor afterward, anywhere in the whole east during the time of the Latins, is so perilous a battle and so great a slaughter of the strong men of our nation read to have occurred.

In the following year the lord Tancred, to whom Bohemond, voyaging in the west, had entrusted the principality of Antioch, defeated in battle and put to flight Rodoaham, a most powerful Turk, who had entered the borders of Antioch in hostility with a great company of his men, many of the latter being killed. The lord King Baldwin also laid low with a great slaughter the Egyptians who were again rushing into the kingdom, four thousand of them being killed. Moreover, their fleet, while returning to Egypt, encountered a most savage tempest and nearly all of it perished.

Section XI

In the year of the Lord 1101, after many great victories had been obtained against the Saracens, the illustrious Godfrey, the first king after Jerusalem was captured, died. His aforesaid brother Baldwin succeeded him in that kingdom and reigned there for eighteen years. During them he three times overcame the Egyptians in battle and killed their caliph and king.

After the death of Baldwin I, Baldwin II, one of our people, reigned at Jerusalem for thirteen years. He killed Gazis, king of the Persians, after defeating him in battle, and laid low the kings of Damascus and Ascalon. He began to reign in the year of the Lord 1119. Because the Christians who crossed diligently from Europe were failing, Baldwin also summoned many of Christ's faithful from beyond the Jordan and caused them to dwell in Jerusalem together with his own people. In the year 1124 the Christians captured Tyre, the most flourishing city of the Phoenicians. Four years afterward, an earthquake overthrew Tyre itself, the greatest of cities, with a slaughter of the people.

The fourth king to reign in Jerusalem after the death of the aforesaid Baldwin was named Fulk, whose son-in-law he was. He began to reign in the year of the Lord 1131 and reigned for eleven years. During that time the Egyptians under various commanders harassed the Christians who held Jerusalem and in several places broke into their cities. On account of this the war was renewed, in which our men captured certain cities and made some tributary to themselves. In the year of the Lord 1139, Ascalon, a maritime city of Judea, was captured by the Christians. Finally, while the aforesaid Fulk, king of Jerusalem, was pursuing a hare, he fell by the mishap of his horse and died.

He was succeeded as fifth king by Baldwin III of that name, the son of the said Fulk. He began to reign in the year of the Lord 1142 and reigned for twenty-four years. Two years after he began to reign, the peoples of Mesopotamia were converted to the faith of Christ in a greater number of their men. In the year of the Lord 1147, Louis, king of France, moved Emperor Conrad, and with a vast multitude they at last crossed over to conquer the most sacred land in aid of the Christians who were continually failing there. But while they ran about rashly through Syria, they were oppressed by famine and returned empty in that same year. The Venetians also sent an auxiliary fleet in favor of the Christians.

In the year of the Lord 1151, the aforesaid Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, overcame the Egyptians and Babylonians, more than five thousand of them being killed. After these things Ferdinand, king of Spain, died in Arabia while fighting for the name of Christ.

In the year 1166, when Baldwin had died, a king named Amalric, the sixth, the brother of the aforesaid Baldwin, began to reign in Jerusalem. He reigned for twelve years. In the first year of his reign he divinely overcame Dragon, commander of the Egyptians, in battle. Around those times Saladin killed the Egyptian caliph, his lord, and took possession of his kingdom.

The seventh king of Jerusalem was Baldwin IV, the son of Amalric. He reigned for six years and began to reign in the year of the Lord 1178. He overcame Saladin, king of the Egyptians, not far from Ascalon and turned him to flight. Afterward, infected with leprosy, he did not take a wife. But seeing that death threatened him, he commanded that Baldwin, the still youthful son of his sister Sibylla, should reign under the guardianship of the count of Tripoli.

When both the elder and the younger Baldwin had died, Sibylla, the mother of the younger, passed to a second marriage and procured that Guy, her husband, should reign. When Guy had therefore obtained the kingdom, a destructive dissension arose between him and the count of Tripoli. In it the count, adhering to Saladin, prepared the greatest loss for our men. Finally, in the year of the Lord 1187, Saladin, having gained strength because of the discord of our men, at length recovered the city of Jerusalem after a very great slaughter of the Christians. After Godfrey, the Christian kings had nobly possessed that glorious city for eighty-eight years.

Title XVI, Chapter XIV

Around the year of the Lord 1090, as Vincent reports in Book XXVI of the Mirror of History, in the city of Nantes there were two clerics who were not yet of an age to be priests, but were amply instructed in letters. Being very great friends with one another, they entered into this agreement between themselves: whichever of them died first would appear to the other, whether awake or asleep, within thirty days. A bodily pledge was given and received. Not long afterward one of them died.

On the thirtieth day the dead man, with a bloodless and pale countenance, stood before the other while he was awake and was engaged in some work. The former addressed the living man first, saying, “Do you recognize me?”

“I recognize you,” the other replied, “and I marvel that you have appeared so late.”

The former first excused the delay. “At length I have come,” he said, “and my coming, if you are willing, will be profitable to you, but wholly fruitless to me, for I have been consigned to everlasting punishments.”

The other said, “I will aid you with many prayers, fasts, and alms.”

But he replied: “The judgments of God in hell are without repentance.

> While the pole turns the stars, while the sea strikes the shores,
> I shall be punished for my crimes.

“Even if the whole world sought remedies for me, nevertheless I shall suffer eternal and innumerable kinds of punishments. And so that you may know one of my rational punishments, behold one.” He extended a hand dripping with a festering ulcer. “Does it seem light to you?” he said.

When the other reported that it seemed light to him, the dead man himself, with his fingers curved into the palm, cast three drops of the flowing corruption upon him. Two touched his temples and the third his forehead, penetrating the skin like a fiery missile and making holes capable of holding a nut. When the living man declared with a cry that the pain was great, the dead man said: “This will be for you as long as you live both a grave proof of my punishments and, if you do not neglect it, a singular warning for your salvation. Go, therefore, while it is permitted. Change both your habit and your mind, and be a monk at Saint Melanius of Rennes.”

When the living man would not respond to this, the dead man struck him with the force of his gaze. “If, miserable man, you hesitate to be converted,” he said, “read these letters.” Saying this, he extended a hand inscribed with dreadful characters. In them Satan and the attendants of all the inhabitants of hell sent thanks from Tartarus to the ecclesiastical assembly, because, while its members lacked nothing for their own pleasures, through their neglect of preaching they allowed so great a number of subject souls to descend into hell as past ages had never seen.

When these things had been said, the appearance of the speaker vanished. The one who heard sold all things, gave them to the poor, went to Saint Melanius, and, having been made a monk there, conducted himself excellently.

Section I

In the year of the Lord 1094, while Helinand was pontiff in the city of Laon, a certain woman dwelling nearby had a son-in-law adorned with youthful beauty. She cared for him with great diligence because of her love for her daughter. Hence an ugly suspicion concerning the woman and her son-in-law arose among her neighbors, and this greatly disturbed her. Impatiently enduring that her reputation was being stained with such disgrace, she turned the cause of her injury back upon him and, by a hidden contrivance, procured that he should be killed by two servants.

Afterward, however, being converted to penance for the homicide she had committed, she revealed her sin to a certain priest through confession. But after a period of time had passed, the priest, while quarreling with her, reproached her to her face with the evil she had done. When the parents of the slain man heard this, they hastened and reported it to the vidame of Laon. At that lord’s command the woman was summoned and came, and she did not conceal how she had caused the man to be killed.

It was therefore judged that she should be burned with fire. But first she was led to the church of blessed Mary and recounted her sin in order before God and men. Thus she faithfully commended herself to the merits and prayers of the most blessed Mother of God. Then, when she was placed in the fire, she felt the burning in no way. When the fire had been consumed, through the protection of divine grace she herself remained unharmed by that providence.

The relatives of the slain man did not ascribe this deed to divine power but believed instead that the material of the wood was fragile. They again kindled a fire around her with stronger pieces of wood, yet they accomplished nothing. By the repeated miracle God preserved her unharmed from the burning of the fire, to the praise of His name and to the glory and honor of the Mother of God. Thus she came out of the fire unharmed not only in flesh but also in garment and hair, and she was led to the church of Saint Mary. After praises had been rendered to God, when a few days had passed, by God's will she passed from this world.

At the same time, as the same Sigebert testifies, a famine long since begun grew most grievously, and the year became calamitous, with many laboring from hunger and the poor gravely tormenting the richer through thefts and fires. There was also a violent whirlwind. An earthquake also occurred at midnight on the fourth day before the Ides of September.

Throughout a great part of the lands, on the day before the Nones of April, around dawn, many stars were seen to have fallen from heaven to earth. I believe, however, that these were fiery vapors. Among them there was one exceedingly great one. When a certain man in France gazed in wonder as it fell to earth elsewhere and marked the place where it appeared to fall, he poured water there and marveled still more that smoke issued from it with the sound of seething heat. In the county of Namur we saw bread baked beneath the ashes as though stained with blood. In this year many were kindled by the sacred fire, their limbs growing black like coals.

Concerning this fire Vincent reports as follows in Book XXVIII of the Mirror of History, near the beginning. In the year of the Lord 1128, many from the district of Soissons, kindled by the sacred fire, came to the church of blessed Mary situated in the city of Soissons. There, during a few days, earnestly entreating the mercy of God and the assistance of blessed Mary, they obtained salvation through her merits and prayers, so that within fifteen days one hundred three persons by name were restrained from this fire, and three deformed girls were restored to health.

For it had been granted to the adversarial power to strike many persons of diverse age and sex with an invisible blow, so that their bodies, once kindled, burned with intolerable torment. This is indeed a wasting disease beneath taut, livid skin, separating and consuming the flesh from the bones. Taking on increases of pain and burning with the passage of time, it compels the wretched to die at every single moment; but death does not come to those who desire it until that swift and pestiferous fire, having consumed their limbs, invades the vital members.

And what is exceedingly marvelous, this fire, without heat yet powerful to consume, drenches the wretched with so great and, as it were, glacial a cold that they cannot be warmed by any remedies. Likewise, what is no less marvelous, after it has been restrained by divine grace and the mortal cold has been put to flight, so great a heat pervades the sick persons in those same parts that the disease of cancer is very often joined to that same burning unless it is countered with medicines.

For six days in the month of September persons sick in this manner were in the church of the most blessed Virgin Mary. At the prayers of the people running together, the blessed Virgin Mary also came to their aid, drawing with her strong hosts of holy spirits, at whose presence hell is afraid and the gates of death tremble. So great a trembling, the forerunner of her coming, filled the church that all fled, thinking that an earthquake had occurred or that the church had been shaken from its foundations. But when they perceived that no danger was present, they returned and found that all the burning of the sick had been extinguished and all their pain lulled, a most swift sweetness having been bestowed.

Moreover, some of the sick say that on the day before this benefit was given from heaven, abundant brightnesses were seen to descend from heaven through the glass windows of the church, as though certain heralds of the largesse that was to follow. For, as was said above, within fifteen days one hundred three persons were restrained from that fire.

Section II

A certain boy eleven years of age, a keeper of livestock, burning in his feet, was brought by his mother. Having received a remedy for his pain within a few days, he returned home restored. He was from the valleys. But when that same boy, not unmindful of so great a benefit, burned by divine impulse with a desire to see the house of the blessed Virgin, and on this account daily troubled and pressed his mother to go there, she would by no means consent.

"Let the sickness return into me," he said, "so that I must be carried back there." And this was done. Thus he was carried back by his mother. At the entrance of the procession into the mother church, he was shaken from repose and in thanksgiving burst through the heavens with his cries. He related to everyone that he had been caught up before God and had seen the Mother of God supplicating for the people, that God might deign to turn this disease away from the people and overturn it, and take away this spark that had fallen upon them. He said that she had received this response from her Son: "Mother, you are My Star of the Sea. Let all your will be done."

When the same Virgin again complained concerning her house, which was mean and abject in comparison with the others, she heard from her Son that He would cause money to be brought from across the sea and from beyond the Rhine, from which her house would be built and would shine with great brightness and glory in the eyes of all beholders. He also foretold that evils from God would come upon the people of Soissons because they did not repair the church of His Mother. Indeed, the fire attacked many from that same city. What things and of what kind remain we do not know.

The same boy foretold shortly afterward that he would die, and so it happened, for he did not survive a month. What was exceedingly marvelous about this boy was that, recounting the whole history from the beginning of the world, he arranged the whole course of his narration rhythmically. He recited in order the text of the Gospel and all the deeds of the Lord as though he read them in a book and pronounced things dictated by others. Among other things he also said concerning Joseph, the husband of the blessed Virgin:

> He who holds the scepter of the flowering rod > was the guardian of the glorious maiden.

He narrated these things with closed eyes, as though hating transitory light. He scarcely deigned to speak a word to lay and unlettered persons, as though weary of their ignorance. So great a grace suffused his body after death that the whiteness and brightness of his countenance signified something angelic and divine.

At a village called Calla in the territory of Soissons, which is a possession of the mother church of the blessed martyrs Gervasius and Protasius, a woman laboring because of the difficulty of childbirth was in danger for three continuous weeks. Persuaded by neighboring women, she vowed that she would go barefoot to Saint Mary of Soissons, and she was delivered, but in a marvelous order. For first she discharged three stones from her womb: the first the size of a goose egg, the second the size of a hen’s egg, and the third not smaller than a certain nut. When these stones had been discharged, the birth of an infant immediately followed. The infant both received the grace of baptism and survived for a few days.

Title XVII

This seventeenth title contains the deeds of the supreme pontiffs and emperors through one hundred years or thereabout, namely from Urban II exclusively, who died in the year of the Lord 1110 or thereabout, down to Innocent III.

These were the supreme pontiffs: Paschal II; Gelasius II; Calixtus II; Honorius II; Innocent II, and then a schism; Celestine II; Lucius II; Eugenius III; Anastasius; Adrian; Alexander III, and then a schism; Lucius III; Urban III; Gregory VIII; Clement III; and Celestine III.

These, however, were the emperors: Henry V; Lothair II; Conrad III; Frederick I; and Henry VI, son of Frederick I.

There are also contained the deeds or legends of certain saints: Malachy, archbishop in Ireland; Saint Thomas the Martyr, archbishop of Canterbury; the history of Tundale, nevertheless greatly abbreviated; and the life of blessed Bernard. These legends of the saints are placed before the deeds of the aforesaid emperors. Among the deeds of the emperors there is also the history of the wars waged in the Holy Land after Jerusalem was captured by the worshipers of Christ, possessed for eighty-eight years by seven kings, and at length lost.

Title XVII, Chapter I

When Urban II had been summoned by the Lord's calling, Paschal II was canonically elected, not intruding or procuring himself ambitiously, but resisting and being assumed as though unwilling. He was a Tuscan by nation, from the city of Bleda, a monk by profession, a prudent and magnanimous man. He was created pope in the year of the Lord 1100, but in the year 5064 from the beginning of the world. According to the more common opinion, however, one thousand two hundred fifty-seven years are added to the said number. He sat for eighteen years and five months.

After he had been solemnly crowned, he judged that it would be shameful for Guibert, the heresiarch or antipope made by Emperor Henry, to remain in the city and suburbs. Aided by the Romans, he expelled him from the city of Alba. Fleeing from the face of the true pontiff and running here and there, that unhappy man found the end he deserved. For, dying a sudden death, he put an end to so many evils. When he had died, the Roman Church began to breathe again.

Nevertheless, those of the clergy who had adhered to that antipope in the schism elected two others, one after the other, when he was dead. The first of them, in the fourth month of his election, was captured by the faithful and confined to perpetual imprisonment at Saint Lawrence; he was called Albert. The second also, who was called Theodore, ended his life by a similar fate.

Persisting in malice, those schismatics elected as pope another man named Maginulfus. Devoting himself to necromantic arts, he attached many persons to himself, especially from among those who were held by consciousness of crimes or by hope of future prosperous success. But at last, abandoned by all, an exile laboring under grievous want, he ended a miserable life.

Thus, when these impious men had failed, Paschal, the true shepherd, grew strong. Strengthened by the Lord, through his diligence he restored to the right of blessed Peter all things - namely, cities, castles, towns, and other municipalities - that had been occupied by tyrants during the time of Henry IV, restoring peace in the city. In the fifth year of this Pope Paschal, a general council was celebrated under him at Florence, with three hundred forty bishops present there.

Emperor Henry V, however, entered Italy from Germany with a very great army to settle the scandals that existed between the empire and the priesthood, and hastened to Rome. This discord had begun under Gregory VII, of whom treatment was given in the preceding title, and had been pressed by his successors Victor and Urban, and much more by Paschal. On account of it there was scandal throughout the whole world of the faithful.

For the emperor, wishing to employ the custom and authority of his predecessors, insisted upon and petitioned that those things should be conceded or preserved to him which had been conceded by great privileges to Charlemagne three hundred years and more before, and had been observed under the supreme pontiffs of that time. By these privileges bishoprics and abbacies were lawfully conferred through investiture by ring and staff. He alleged that this was his right.

But contrary to this authority of the ancestors, the aforesaid supreme pontiffs determined by synodal judgment that a bishopric, any ecclesiastical dignity, or an investiture neither could nor ought to be given by rod or ring by any lay person whatsoever. For this cause especially, the emperor was proceeding to Rome.

As he approached the city, all the notability and people of Rome came to meet him. Entering the city with them, he proceeded to the church of blessed Peter and was honorably received on the steps of that church by the supreme pontiff Paschal himself, who waited there with the cardinals and bishops. Nevertheless, the emperor would not enter the church until, with the pope's consent, he had reduced all the fortifications, towers, and high houses into his power. Lest the pope imagine anything sinister concerning his wicked will, he gave his nephew and certain other barons as hostages. When this had been done, he entered the church of blessed Peter.

While the lord pope solemnly celebrated Mass, the emperor approached the altar to receive Holy Communion from his hand. The supreme pontiff said to him: "Lord Emperor, today we give to you, in confirmation of true peace between me and you, the body of the Lord born of the Virgin Mary and suffered for us upon the cross, just as the holy Church holds."

They had agreed that the emperor would relinquish to him the investitures of bishops and prelates, while the pope, in return, would surrender to the emperor all the royal rights of the bishops. They confirmed this agreement by an oath and hostages. But because the bishops resisted and contradicted, the supreme pontiff was unable to fulfill what he had promised. Therefore, by the counsel of certain criminals, the emperor made the pope and cardinals captives. Moreover, he despoiled the clergy of all their goods in the city. The archbishop of Mainz is said to have been the principal author of this crime. Thus, from the second day before the Ides of February until the fifth day before the Kalends of May, the pope was detained in prison and afflicted with many injuries.

At last, for the liberation of the Church and of the many captives who were held captive with him, he was compelled to make a peace for a time with the aforesaid appraiser [read: emperor]: namely, to concede to the emperor the investitures of bishops by ring and staff. When this had been done, he was freed from prison. The emperor, however, took care to reconcile through gifts the pope himself and the Roman citizens, whom he had greatly exasperated by this deed. Hence, as certain chroniclers write, he received from him the gift of coronation. These things were done in the year of the Lord 1111.

When the emperor had departed from Italy, the pope summoned the bishops and prelates and annulled and canceled the privilege made between himself and the emperor. On this account he suffered many persecutions from the emperor's supporters, especially from the prefect of the city and from a certain other noble named Thalamon. Hence the pontiff, yielding to their fury, withdrew into Apulia.

When he had departed, those sons of Belial occupied the greater part of the castles and towns that belonged by right to blessed Peter. Then, fearing the lord pope's return to the city, they sent messengers to the emperor and persuaded him to return to Rome again. Obeying their words, that enemy of the Church returned to Italy, hostile to all good men but more kindly toward the seditious and evil. As soon as he entered Latium, he made war upon the faithful of the Church and occupied many castles, cities, and towns that, still preserving their fidelity to the Church, had resisted the schismatics.

For this reason the Roman people decreed a triumph for him, as though he had triumphed over the Parthians and barbarians. Thus Henry entered Rome and, wearing a crown, proceeded through the arched city together with the wife whom he had brought with him. But there was great apparatus and little glory, for none of the fathers, none of the bishops, and no Catholic priest came to meet him.

At length, as will be said below in the following chapter, Henry, given over to a reprobate sense, was unable to circumvent with words the faithful who were within the city and whom he had provoked beyond measure. He therefore summoned Mauritius, bishop of Braga, who had left his own church and followed him, and caused himself to be crowned in the church of blessed Peter before the altar of blessed Gregory. Thus he departed from the city.

But he had not yet passed the city of Sutri when, behold, messengers came swiftly to him, signifying that Roger, duke of Apulia, was coming against him with a very great army in support of the Church. When the emperor learned this, after assembling the counsel of his men he decreed that the entire strength of his army should be sent there at once, for he readily believed that in this way he could circumvent the unwary duke.

But, God so willing, a certain matron who dwelt in the castle of Plumbinarium made the duke of Apulia more certain of the arrival of the Teutons through a messenger. Thus, while she took care for one, she provided for both, lest two most powerful armies join battle with one another. Therefore Roger, duke of Apulia, hearing that Emperor Henry had abandoned the city and departed into Lombardy, returned to his own lands. But when the emperor's army, which had believed that it would circumvent that unwary duke, learned that he had returned to his own lands, it returned to the emperor.

Amid these things, after the emperor's withdrawal from the city, the supreme pontiff Paschal believed that he could now return safely to the city. After celebrating a council in Apulia, he came first to Campania and then to Rome. His unexpected arrival so terrified the rebels against the Church that they thought of nothing but flight. But the most blessed man, a confessor of Christ, became ill from the labor of the journey and after a few days migrated to the Lord. The Apostolic See was vacant for three days.

Among other things, this Paschal decreed as follows, as is contained in Cause XVI, Question I: "The authority of divine law has sanctioned that tithes are to be rendered by the people to the priests and Levites. Moreover, no reason permits soldiers, bishops, or any persons to extort tithes from monks or clerics living in common, from their labors, increase, or their own possessions." Concerning this matter, see fully in the second part.

The same man, writing to Guido, legate of the Apostolic See, says as follows in Cause XIV, Question II: "We marvel exceedingly at your prudence because, in the affair of the church of blessed Stephen, you were unwilling to accept the testimony of those clerics themselves. For the kinds of causes are diverse, and crimes are not at issue in all causes. Indeed, in criminal cases, that distinction concerning accusers and witnesses which is contained in the canons must be observed, lest household members be assumed for the proof. But in matters of possessions or affairs of this kind, those are especially to be assumed who conducted those same affairs and concerning whose hearing and sight there ought to be no hesitation. Therefore, if those clerics are suitable for the assertion of that cause, let them in no way be removed."

After the death of Paschal II, the cardinals assembled into one body and, with one consent and one voice, elected John of Gaeta as pope in the year of the Lord's Incarnation 1118. It was the year 5082 from the beginning of the world, but according to the greater computation, the year 6321. He held the See of Peter for one year. They called him Gelasius II.

He was a monk of Monte Cassino, a man from his very youth most skilled in the learning of both secular and divine letters. While he flourished in the said monastery in life, knowledge, and morals, although a young man, he was summoned to Rome by Pope Urban II and, while the German persecution raged, was appointed chancellor of the Church. For he was a most eloquent man and exceedingly suitable and solicitous for conducting the affairs of the Church.

When the emperor's supporters who were in Rome - especially Cincius of the house of Frangipane - heard that this pope had been elected, Cincius assembled those who adhered to him in so small a plan, armed himself contrary to custom [read: armed himself without delay], and ran with armed men to the place where the cardinals had made the election. It was formerly called the Palladium, but today it is called Palla. This place is situated between the Colosseum and Saint Mary the New.

Coming to the place, that tyrant broke down the doors and entered. Setting aside the fear of God, he seized the pope who had now been elected and, like another Diocletian, beat him with his own hands, with fists and kicks. Leading him out from there like a worthless slave, he bound him with fetters and consigned him to prison. The cardinals, bishops, and other prelates of the churches who had assembled for the election were assailed by the officers of the said Cincius: some were despoiled, others beaten, and others bound and thrust into prison with the lord pope.

When a report of this had spread through the city, a multitude of the Roman people and nobles assembled. Among them were especially the Normanni, who are now called the Albertesti, and with them the Honesti and Thebalesti. All these, with one mind, came to the Capitol with a multitude of armed men and, sending messengers to those of the Frangipane, demanded back their elected shepherd. When the latter heard the agreement of the Roman people, they feared for themselves and repented of their deed, albeit too late. They approached the elected pontiff, and, prostrate at his feet, although feignedly, they sought pardon. The pope was therefore released and crowned with the great joy of the whole Roman people.

While he prudently disposed all things and made arrangements for the exaltation of the Church, behold, a messenger said that Emperor Henry, the enemy of the Church, was coming with a great army and was already at the gates. Thus, fearing for himself and for the faithful of the Church, the lord pope thought to flee. But because the route by land was closed on every side, he fled by sea to Gaeta. After he arrived there, bishops and archbishops came to him from every side. In that place he was first made a priest, for at the time of his election he was a deacon. Then with great solemnity he received the gift of consecration.

While the pope was still at Gaeta, that barbarian Henry, who ought not to be called emperor, created Mauritius, bishop of Braga, as though a new idol and antipope, naming him Gregory. When the supreme pontiff heard this, he resolved to go to Rome. The illustrious William, duke of Apulia, who had succeeded Roger in the duchy, came to his aid with a great body of soldiers. When Henry perceived their arrival beforehand, he abandoned Rome and returned to Germany with his antipope.

The pope therefore sent Duke William home with his forces, not believing it necessary, after Henry's departure, to introduce a new army into the city. But events occurred otherwise than he thought. For when he arrived, Henry's supporters raised so many wars and so many seditions with the faithful of the Church against the supreme pontiff that the pontiff, wishing first to provide for the peace of the citizens, abandoned the Roman city and journeyed by ship to Pisa. Then, undertaking a voyage again, he betook himself to the kingdom of the Franks, stayed in the monastery of Cluny, and there ended his last day. When he had died, the episcopate ceased for fifteen days.

Section II

In the year of the Lord 1119, by the common assent of all the electors, Calixtus II, the one hundred sixty-ninth pope, was created. He was previously called Guido, was a Burgundian by nation, the son of a certain great count, and archbishop of Vienne. Coming to Rome after his election, he was received by the senate, clergy, and all the Roman people with marvelous and ineffable joy. He sat for six years.

After he was established in the see, he excommunicated Emperor Henry as a rebel and persecutor of the Holy Roman Church. The angered emperor therefore came to Rome a third time and, after the death of that wicked bishop of Braga, the antipope, intruded into the See of blessed Peter a certain man named Burdinus, a Spaniard by nation. When this had been done, he returned to Germany, while Calixtus was then dwelling in Apulia.

Calixtus returned to Rome and, to establish the peace of the Church, sent three cardinals into Germany to the emperor. Going to him, by God's action they obtained from the emperor all things as it pleased them. For the emperor considered for the better that the princes of the empire were gradually deserting him. Turning over in his mind his father's most miserable death, and because he perceived that he himself was excommunicated, in the presence of the prelates and princes whom he had summoned generally to his court he therefore resigned into the hands of the cardinals, the legates of the Roman Church, the investiture of bishops that he had extorted from Paschal by violence. Thus he was absolved from the bond of excommunication by which he had been bound for a long time. The lord legates therefore returned from Germany and, bringing back peace according to their desire, gladdened all the people.

But Burdinus the pseudo-pope, hearing that the emperor had made peace with Calixtus and fearing the fury of the Roman people, departed from the city and betook himself to the city of Sutri with certain Romans who adhered to him. Remaining in that place, he began to persecute the Roman Church and despoil pilgrims to Rome.

Pope Calixtus, however, returned to Rome from Apulia when he saw that he was now secure on every side. He sent John of Cremona, cardinal of Saint Chrysogonus, to Sutri against Burdinus, and himself followed him immediately. Thus, by God's action, the party of Burdinus was defeated and Burdinus himself was captured. After he was captured, he was placed upon a camel and led to Rome with his face turned toward the camel's tail. Finally, he was thrust into a monastery, having been tonsured as a monk.

At that time, when through the zeal of the illustrious man Calixtus peace flourished everywhere, he was called from the world to the Father of Lights. His body was buried with great weeping by all in the Lateran church.

This man beloved by God established several decrees. Hence he says as follows concerning the fasts of the Four Times, in Distinction LXXVI: "The usefulness of this observance, most beloved brothers, is established especially in the ecclesiastical fasts. By the teaching of the Holy Spirit they have been distributed through the course of the whole year in such a way that the law of abstinence is assigned to all seasons. Indeed, we celebrate the spring fast in Lent, the summer fast at Pentecost, the autumn fast in the seventh month, that is, September, and the winter fast in this month, which is the tenth. We understand that nothing is empty in the divine precepts and that, at the word of God, all the elements serve for our instruction, while through the very hinges of the world, as though through four Gospels, we learn by an unceasing trumpet that which we both preach and do."

The same Calixtus, writing to all bishops in Distinction XII, says as follows: "It is not fitting for the members to depart from the head, but according to the testimony of Scripture all the members should follow the head. No one doubts that the Apostolic Church is the mother of all the churches, from whose rules it is by no means fitting for you to deviate. And just as the Son of God came to do the will of the Father, so also fulfill the will of your mother, which is the Church, whose head is the Roman Church."

The same man says as follows concerning the transfer of bishops, in Cause VII, Question I: "Just as it is not permitted for another man's wife to be adulterated by anyone, or to be judged or disposed of by anyone except her own husband while he is living, so it is understood without doubt that the wife of a bishop, which is his church or parish, may not, while he is living, be adjudged or disposed to another without his counsel and will, nor be permitted to enjoy his intercourse, that is, ordination. Hence the Apostle says: 'A wife is bound by the law of her husband for as long as her husband lives; but when he has died, she is released from the law of her husband.' Similarly, the spouse of a bishop, which is called his church, is bound to him while he lives; when he has died, she is released. Let her marry whom she wishes, but only in the Lord, that is, regularly. For if she marries another while he is living, she shall be judged an adulteress. Similarly, if he takes another spouse of his own accord, he shall be judged an adulterer and deprived of communion.

"But if he has been persecuted in his own church, he must flee to another church and be associated with it, the Lord saying, 'If they persecute you in one city, flee into another.' But if he must be transferred for the sake of utility, let him not do this by himself, but let him do it when his brothers invite him, by the authority of this Holy See, not being seized by ambition, but because of utility or necessity, as has been said."

The same man says in Cause IX, Question II: "Let no one usurp the boundaries of another, nor presume to judge, ordain, or excommunicate within another's parish, because such a judgment, ordination, excommunication, or condemnation will neither be valid nor have any force, since no one shall be bound or condemned by the sentence of any judge except his own."

The same man says in Cause XXIV, Question III: "If anyone should attempt to seize those journeying to Rome and pilgrims - that is, those visiting the thresholds of the apostles and the oratories of other saints - or to despoil them of the goods they carry, or to trouble merchants with new exactions of tolls and passage-dues, let him lack Christian communion until he has made satisfaction." Today such persons are excommunicated by the law itself, and absolution is reserved to the pope, as you have in the third part.

This Calixtus II wrote a little book concerning the miracles of blessed James, and compiled into one volume what he had read here and there or heard from the faithful. Hence he himself says, as Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, Book XXVII: "When I was a scholar," he says, "and had loved blessed James the Apostle from infancy, over a period of fourteen years I traveled through lands and barbarous provinces, so that whatever writings concerning him I found I might comprehend in one volume. O marvelous fortune! I fell among three robbers, and when all my spoils had been taken, only the book remained to me. I was thrust into prisons, and when all my property had been lost, only the book remained to me. I often fell into the depth of many waters, very near to death, and the book escaped wholly unspoiled. The house in which I was staying was burned, and when my possessions had been consumed, the book remained with me and escaped unburned.

"And when in my zeal I was considering whether this book, for which I had suffered innumerable anxieties and which I was striving to complete with my own hands, would be acceptable to God, one night, carried away in ecstasy, I saw in a certain splendid royal hall a most beautiful young man, radiant and royally crowned with laurel. Sitting upon a throne, he said to me as I sat at his feet, 'Offer the gloves which you hold in your hand.' When I had gladly offered them, and he had entered the bedchamber, one of his companions said to me: 'He is the Son of the supreme King. Just as he received the gloves from your hands, so he will graciously receive the apostolic book after you have completed it.'

“Again, on a venerable day, while I was pondering an account of the apostle’s translation and holding its writing in my hands, he himself appeared together with blessed James, saying: ‘Write what you have begun. Correct the crimes of wicked hosts who dwell along the road of my apostle.’ Therefore let no one despise this book, for whatever is written in it is authentic and expressed with great authority.”

From that book Vincent, in the Historical Mirror where cited above, reports many and great miracles of the most blessed Apostle James, especially among those visiting his tomb, including even dead persons restored to life. But I shall narrate only this, which he reports from Bede.

“In the time of blessed Theodomirus, bishop of Compostela, a certain man had committed a grave sin which he had scarcely dared to confess to his priest and bishop. When the bishop heard it, he was astonished and did not dare to give him a penance because of its enormity, judging scarcely any penance suitable. He sent that man to Saint James with a little document upon which that sin had been written. When the man had come there on the saint’s feast day, he placed the document upon the altar, weeping and asking Saint James to blot out that sin by his merits. Meanwhile the bishop approached to celebrate Mass. Seeing that document and asking why and by whom it had been placed there, the man immediately came forward and narrated the course of the affair while all listened. When the bishop opened that writing and found nothing written there, he understood, as all declared, that the sin had been forgiven him.”

Let another miracle also be added. In the year of the Lord 1108, in a region of Gaul, a certain man who had no son by his barren wife approached Saint James for this reason, asking that by his merits and prayers he might obtain a son from the Lord. He was heard. For upon returning, he had a son by his wife, to whom he also gave the name James. When the boy had now reached his fifteenth year, his father and mother arranged to go with him to the saint’s shrine to offer him there. But after they had undertaken the journey, the boy became sick on the road even unto death, so that no breath remained in him.

His parents, grieving exceedingly at his death, filled the whole woodland with their cries as though bereft of reason. The mother addressed Saint James in such a way that, if he did not restore her son to her, she would cause herself to be buried alive with him. Meanwhile, as the boy was being carried to the tomb, he revived as though awakened from sleep, and narrated to all standing nearby how Saint James had held him in his bosom and commanded him to follow his parents on their journey.

This Calixtus also, as Vincent reports in the same place from the words of Helinand, was the first to plant the Cistercian Order in the territory of Vienne, in the monastery of Bonneval. The first abbot of this monastery was John of Lyon, afterward bishop of Valence. A most joyful presage of his future dignity was a certain most beautiful vision, which John himself saw before his conversion. Geoffrey describes it in this manner in his work upon the Apocalypse.

When the first foundations of our Cistercian Order were being laid, there was in the church of Lyon a certain upright and honorable cleric named John. Moved by the celebrated report of our Order, he silently resolved within himself that he would be joined to the fellowship of that Order. A few days later, when another thought arose, he changed this resolution and, as a certain compensation for such a resolution, undertook a pilgrimage to Saint James. When he had devoutly completed it, he returned, was joyfully received by his household, and, wearied from the journey, withdrew to his chamber.

As he rested, the Lord Jesus Christ immediately appeared to him in a vision with the two apostles Peter and James. Peter held a book in his hand, which the Lord commanded to be opened. It was written in golden letters and contained the names of the predestined. The apostle, therefore, being commanded, began to read. When he read there the name of that John, the Lord said: “Take it away, take it away; erase him, erase him, because he had promised that he would become mine, and he withdrew from his resolution.”

Blessed James then approached nearer and entreated for him, saying: “Lord, he is my pilgrim. I beseech you, do not erase his name.” The Lord answered him: “He ought to have been my citizen, not my pilgrim. Is it not a greater thing to be my citizen than your pilgrim?” But the apostle persisted in supplication: “Do not erase his name, most merciful God; do not erase him, I beseech you. I stand surety to you for him. He will do what he had resolved.” The Lord said to him, “When will he do it?” The apostle answered, “Within fifteen days.”

Awakened at these words, John prostrated himself upon the ground and, with a most abundant outpouring of tears, gave thanks to the one who had stood surety for him, saying: “I shall indeed do it, holy apostle; I shall do what you have so mercifully promised on my behalf.” Not long after his great weeping, he fell asleep again. Again the Lord appeared with the aforesaid two apostles and commanded the book to be opened again. In it the same John heard blessed Peter reading: “We shall make for you little chains of gold, variegated with silver.” John soon arose and, before the appointed day, fulfilled his vow.

He was the first abbot of the monastery of Bonneval, and afterward prelate of the church of Valence. His life and death were illustrious through many miracles and merits. Plainly, Israel is rightly reproached because its people returned to Egypt in their heart, since this John, because he had drawn back from Cîteaux, was commanded to be erased from the book of life. At the same time, we must consider with how great devotion the intercessions of the saints are to be implored by us, since they intercede for us so affectionately and so efficaciously.

Section III

In the year of the Lord 1124, when Calixtus had been gathered to the fathers, Honorius II undertook the government of the Roman Church. He was previously called Lambert, bishop of Ostia. He was the one hundred seventieth in the order of pontiffs, and sat for six years and two months. He deposed the patriarchs of Grado and Aquileia.

Norbert, the first founder of the Premonstratensian Order, journeyed to this pope. He was honorably received by him and worthily obtained what he requested. He learned by divine revelation that he would become bishop of Parthenopolis. Returning, when on Easter Day at Herbipolis he was celebrating Mass amid a great gathering of the people, a blind woman recovered her sight when, after he had received the mysteries, he breathed upon her eyes.

Thereafter, returning to Prémontré, in the church of blessed Martin situated in the suburb of Laon, he caused a certain man of his company, Lord Walter, to be consecrated there as the first abbot, that is, to be blessed. By his industry, with God cooperating, the same church was so greatly multiplied in a short time, both in temporal and in spiritual things, that it extended the fame of its good reputation and the shoots of its holy planting into other and distant regions, namely into Hainaut, Flanders, England, Gascony, Gothia, Spain, and Burgundy.

When the archbishop of the city of Parthenopolis had died, the aforesaid Norbert was elected and, royal assent following, was advanced to the episcopate of the aforesaid city. In the Premonstratensian church, however, he caused Hugh, who from the beginning had been his companion in poverty, to be ordained abbot as his successor.

Finally this Archbishop Norbert, a man powerful in deed and speech, founder of many monasteries of the said Order and an exceptional propagator of holy religion, a most equitable supporter of the Catholic Pope Innocent, concerning whom it will be related below, and a most just condemner of Peter the schismatic, returned with Emperor Linther from the Italian expedition. Stricken by illness, after four months he fell asleep in the Lord. When there was a dispute concerning the burial of his body between the clerics of his greater, or cathedral, church and the brothers of Saint Mary of his own religious order, the case was brought to the emperor. At his command Norbert was buried in the church of Saint Mary with his sons and brothers, whom he had begotten and reared for Christ.

In the Premonstratensian church, during Matins, a demon stood beside a certain brother who was pondering too deeply upon the Trinity, which is God, and appeared to him bearing three heads. It declared itself to be the Trinity and affirmed that, because of the merit of his faith, the brother was worthy of a vision of the Trinity. But the brother recognized the enemy’s deceit and, reviling it, caused it to depart from him.

Likewise, while Norbert was preaching the word of God at Nigella and exorcising before him a demoniac girl who had been brought there, the demon, mocking him, uttered through the girl’s mouth the Song of Songs from beginning to end and rendered it word for word in the Romance vernacular, and then interpreted it in the Teutonic tongue. But when God’s servant pressed it more closely, at last it went out.

When the aforesaid Norbert came to Cologne to seek relics of the saints and his men, having been enjoined to fast, persisted in prayer, one of the number of the eleven thousand virgins specifically designated her own name and the place where she lay. On the next day she was solemnly raised and translated to Prémontré with other relics of saints. The place where the body of Saint Gereon the martyr lay was also revealed to him, although it was unknown. When it had been found there, it was raised with honor, and a portion of it was bestowed upon him.

In the year 1123 began the order of the military Templars, or of Saint John of Jerusalem, concerning which see above.

Not long before the time of Pope Calixtus, certain horrible and marvelous things occurred. For when God had been provoked by the sins of men, on Mount Castrilocus the church of Saint Waltrude burned with nearly the whole town. The church of Saint Michael in Peril of the Sea, struck by lightning from heaven, burned with the buildings attached to it. Waldric, bishop of Laon, attempted to recall the citizens of that city from the oath by which they had wrongly sworn a commune. When the seditious men ran together to arms, he was stabbed with a sword and perished - a thing wicked even to relate.

On Thursday in Easter week, the seventh day before the Kalends of May, during the Greater Litany, the bishop’s house was set on fire amid a tumult and the attack of a disorderly multitude. Hence both the mother church of blessed Mary herself and the church of blessed John the Baptist in the nuns’ abbey, together with all the other churches attached nearby, were burned. King Louis of the Franks punished the authors of this sedition so severely that the example could deter both future and present persons from a similar crime.

Thus, when Waldric, bishop of Laon, had been wickedly slain by the citizens of his city, Hugh, dean of the church of Orléans, was put in his place. When Hugh died after seven months, the illustrious man Bartholomew was advanced to the episcopate of the city of Laon. By his industry the episcopal church, which had been burned, was repaired in a short time and consecrated again; the desolation of the city and province was relieved; and in many places in which previously there had never been fervor of religion or worship of God, it was founded and propagated even into many distant regions beyond the sea.

Helinand describes the manner of this relief and devotion in Book XL, as Vincent reports in the place cited above. Seven canons of the church of Laon and six burgesses were chosen to carry the shrine of Saint Mary and other reliquaries through diverse provinces to seek the alms of the faithful for the restoration of the churches. These relics were made illustrious by many miracles, and the canons of the church of Laon wrote down those miracles, which were performed in many places in the cities of France and England through which that shrine of relics was carried with great devotion and reverence.

Among the said relics there was preeminent in form and dignity a single phylactery, that is, a vessel upon which the following was written: “The sponge, the cross of the Lord, with the shroud and the face-cloth, and your hairs, Mother and Virgin, consecrate me.” That is, there was in it some small portion of each of these things.

At Ysoldunum two contracted persons were healed whose heels adhered to their buttocks. At the castle of Buscentum one deaf and mute from birth was healed. In the city of Tours a woman who for eight years had not been able to rise from her bed or to go anywhere unless carried caused herself to be borne to the place of the said shrine, as had been revealed to her by a vision, and was delivered. Likewise, another young man, deaf and mute, was healed when the said shrine was carried to Saint Lawrence of Scala on the feast of that martyr.

A monk dwelling there, fearing that he would lose the customary offerings on that feast, did not permit it to be placed upon the altar of blessed Lawrence or elsewhere in the said church. But toward evening that same monk was grievously seized by epilepsy and fell to the ground. Humbled by this, he did penance. And the greater bell fell from the tower and was broken.

From there, when the shrine was brought to Chartres, the venerable Yvo came to meet it with the whole procession of canons, and it was placed in the greater church upon the altar of Saint Mary. There two contracted women were cured, and a certain man bound in prison was freed. Thereafter, when a great quantity of money had been collected throughout France, but not enough for so great a repair, they also carried the said shrine of Saint Mary with the relics into England, where at that time there was an abundance of riches.

While voyaging by sea with the said shrine in order to enter England, they miraculously escaped the danger of capture by pirates whom they encountered. In that kingdom also, in many cities, many persons obtained health from diverse illnesses by approaching the said shrine devoutly and commending themselves to the Virgin.

Then, when they approached a certain large town, the dean with his clerics was unwilling to receive the shrine into his church lest they lose the offerings, although no slight rain was then descending upon the earth. But a certain man, urged to this by his wife out of compassion and devotion, offered shelter in one of his houses to the shrine and to those carrying it.

On the next day a certain fire-breathing dragon came out of the sea and flew into that town. First it set fire to the church and then to certain houses with the flame which it emitted from its nostrils. That church was so burned that not only its wood, but also its walls, very large stones, and the altars themselves were reduced to ash, so that it did not appear in any way that a church had been there.

That dean, seeing the church and his house set on fire, caused his clothes and household goods to be carried from there to a ship which was on the shore nearby. But that dragon, seeking the ship, burned it and everything in it. The house of the man who had received the shrine, however, escaped unharmed with everything belonging to him. Seeing this, the dean sought pardon. Many sick persons were also healed there. Thus from the alms offered, the burned church of Laon was repaired. These miracles were performed in the years of the Lord 1114 and 1115.

Section IV

In the papacy Innocent II succeeded Honorius II, in the year of the Lord 1130. He was the one hundred seventy-first in the number of pontiffs. From the beginning of the world it was the year 6334, but according to the other, lesser computation, the year 5095. He sat for nearly fourteen years. This Innocent, by the reputation of his life and learning, was held worthy of the supreme priesthood.

Against him Peter Leonis was ordained through contention. To allay the plague of this schism, blessed Bernard was summoned from Clairvaux; he labored greatly and accomplished much. This antipope Peter Leonis, aspiring to this summit of honor, was named Anacletus by his supporters, whom he had corrupted with money. He had indeed amassed innumerable riches, both from exactions of the curia and from the business of legations, which he had reserved for the long-awaited fair. In addition, an ample accumulation of his paternal wealth, sealed until then, when distributed among the people, had armed a rabble for sale for right and wrong.

When these things had been expended, he tore from the altars themselves the gifts of kings among the ornaments of the church. And when even those profane Christians either blushed or feared to break the chalices and divide golden crucifixes limb by limb, Jews were sought who boldly broke the sacred vessels and images dedicated to God.

Meanwhile, after a council had been convoked at Étampes, Saint Bernard persuaded it to receive Innocent. But because Peter Leonis remained at Saint Peter's through the strength of his kindred, Innocent departed from Rome and journeyed into Gaul. When the Gallican Church adhered to him, a council was celebrated, and he was declared and confirmed as pope. Peter was anathematized by all the bishops of Gaul and Germany.

Thus Innocent was honorably received at Orléans by Louis, king of the Franks. From there he was conducted to Chartres by Geoffrey, a man of great virtues, where Henry, king of the English, also came to meet him.

Then, as Helinand says, a great synod was celebrated by Pope Innocent at Reims. In it, after many things had been disposed for the honor of God, he crowned King Louis as king while his father was still living because his brother Philip had been cast from his horse by a pig and had died. For when the said Philip, already anointed as king while still a boy, was riding a horse in the city of Paris, by chance a certain pig, placing itself beneath the horse's feet, caused the horse to fall headlong over it. Hence the whole city mourned his sudden and miserable death.

When the aforesaid Innocent was dedicating the monastery of Saint Médard of Soissons, which is situated beyond the river, there was present among the others a certain woman from the region of Laon. She proceeded with others to enter the monastery of the blessed Virgin Mary, but by an invisible power she was driven back from the entrance. Then she began to be tormented by excessive fear and to tremble throughout her whole body. But after she had confessed and been absolved, she merited entrance.

Saint Hugh, bishop of Grenoble, a man of complete holiness and great renown, although he had been very familiar with Peter Leonis and his father and had received many services from them, nevertheless, when he heard that Peter had raised his head against Innocent, was neither swayed by friendship with him nor terrified by his power. Rather, led by zeal for the truth, although old and infirm, he went to the council and, with the bishops and others, excommunicated Peter the schismatic and adhered to Innocent.

Finally, as is held from the chronicles, Emperor Lothair, who is also called Lintherius, prepared an expedition into Italy and, bringing Pope Innocent to Rome with bishops and archbishops, against Peter Leonis, who had fortified the monastery of Saint Peter, powerfully installed that bishop in the pontifical seat in the Lateran church. Innocent himself consecrated Lothair emperor.

At that time, Helinand says, as Vincent reports, the entire church or province of Bordeaux labored under the oppression of the schismatics, and there was no one in Aquitaine who could resist the prince whose mind God had hardened so that he favored the antipope Peter Leonis. Persuaded by Girard, bishop of Angoulême, who instilled seeds of dissension into his heart, he had become a defender and author of the schism.

Girard therefore sent to Peter Leonis so that Peter would grant him a legation, and he himself would obey him with fidelity sworn; moreover, he would incline both the prince of the land and whomever else he could to Peter's rule. The man of perdition rejoiced to have found a place in which he might enlarge his malice, and quickly and willingly assented. He sent to Girard Gilo, cardinal-bishop of Tusculum, who alone among the Romans, together with Peter of Porto, had adhered to him. Thus Girard, having resumed his horns, proceeded publicly wearing a miter, which he had not done before.

By these two men William, bishop of Poitiers, an upright and Catholic man, was violently expelled from his see, and in his place another man, noble by birth but degenerate in faith, was intruded. Similarly, in the church of Limoges they intruded a certain Ranulf of Dorat. Not long afterward he fell backward from his horse on a level road. His head was driven upon the one avenging stone that had been left there for this, and, his brain being shattered, he expired.

Hearing these and similar things, the venerable Geoffrey, bishop of Chartres, to whom Pope Innocent had entrusted the legation of Aquitaine, took Saint Bernard with him. When they came to Nantes, a woman who had already been oppressed for six years by an incubus demon was healed there through the holy man Bernard; how this happened is declared elsewhere.

The dean of the church of Poitiers dared to break the altar upon which Saint Bernard had celebrated Mass. A short time afterward, struck by God, when he was now breathing out his soul, he saw his house filled with demons and himself being strangled by a demon. Shouting, he asked those standing around him for a knife which he might thrust into his own throat to draw out the demon. Amid these words he expired.

The archpriest who announced a synod of Peter, the invader of the church of Poitiers, before those whom he invited to a gathering of perfidy, was seized by the devil. But the hand of God also exercised manifest vengeance upon many others who had been more fervent in that schism.

At last, when the prince had been reconciled and the bishops who had been expelled had been restored to their own sees, Girard alone persevered in evil. He was suddenly found dead in his bed, without confession and viaticum, and enormously swollen. He was buried by his nephews in a certain basilica, but Geoffrey, bishop of Chartres, caused him to be extracted from there and his body to be cast elsewhere. His nephews also were expelled from the Church, and all his progeny and planting, torn up from the root, wandered in exile through other kingdoms, carrying everywhere complaints concerning so great a judgment.

Roger, king of Sicily, alone among the princes not obeying Innocent, sent to Peter Leonis so that he would delegate Peter of Pisa to him from his side, trusting in Peter of Pisa's eloquence. But the holy abbot Bernard reconciled Peter of Pisa himself to Pope Innocent. After three days Peter Leonis died impenitent, and his corpse was buried in hiding; even to this day that pit is unknown to Catholics.

When the schism had therefore been removed, Innocent founded at Aquae Salviae the monastery of Saint Anastasius the martyr, monastic dwellings having been constructed there. He asked that a community and an abbot be sent from the monastery of Clairvaux. Thus Bernard, formerly vice-lord of the church of Pisa and then a Cistercian monk, was sent there with a community. After some years he was created pope, as will be evident below.

This Innocent II pronounced the sentence of excommunication against those who laid violent hands upon ecclesiastical persons, decreeing as follows in Cause XVII, Question IV: "If anyone, at the devil's persuasion, should incur the vice or crime of this sacrilege, because he has laid violent hands upon a cleric or monk, let him be subjected to anathema. Let none of the bishops presume to absolve him, unless the danger of death is urgent, until he presents himself before the apostolic presence and receives its command." This decree has a very lengthy explanation, which you have in the third part under the title concerning excommunications.

Innocent himself, when consulted concerning these matters, also determines that if anyone takes a widow as wife even before baptism, he cannot be promoted, because he is a bigamist, in Distinction XXXIV, "If Anyone Takes a Widow." Likewise, if anyone had one wife before baptism and another after baptism, even if she were a virgin, he is truly a bigamist and cannot be promoted, as in Distinction XXVI, "Thereafter." Likewise, those knowingly baptized or ordained by heretics are not admitted to the clergy, in Cause I, Question I, "It Has Come," unless they were baptized by them in a case of necessity.

The same man says in Cause XXIII, Question IV: "It has been asked concerning those who after baptism administered justice in a case of blood, or exercised tortures, or even rendered a capital sentence, whether such persons sin. We answer: we read nothing defined by our forefathers concerning these persons to the effect that they sin. For they remembered that these powers had been granted by God, that the sword had been permitted for the vengeance of the guilty, and that it had been given by God's ministry to judges of this sort. How, therefore, could they reprehend a deed which appears to have been granted by God as author?" The Gloss says there: "In truth, such persons do not sin if they do this from love of justice and possess authority for such things."

Likewise Innocent says in Cause XXXV, Question IX: "We do not deny that a sentence of the Roman See can be changed for the better when something has been obtained by surreption, or when the See itself, in consideration of ages and times or of grave necessities, has decreed that certain things be ordered by dispensation. For we read that even the excellent Apostle Paul did certain things by way of dispensation which he is afterward read to have reproved. Nevertheless, this must be observed when that Roman Church, by most discerning consideration, chooses that this be done, not when she wishes to reconsider what has been well defined."

The same man says in the same Question: "It ought not to appear burdensome to your most devout minds to reconsider anyone's judgment, because truth, more frequently examined, shines forth more brightly into the light, and destructive error, recalled to judgment, is condemned gravely and without pardon. For it is a divine fruit that justice should be reviewed more frequently."

Section V

When Innocent II had entered the way of all flesh, Celestine II, a Roman of the Castellani, who had previously been called Guido, was raised to the rank of the supreme pontificate in the year of the Lord 1144. From the beginning of the world it was the year 5109, but according to the other computation, the year 6348. He sat for five months. Hence, because of the brevity of his pontificate, nothing concerning him is found recorded, and he was the one hundred seventy-second in the number of pontiffs.

About that time, or a little before, in the presence of Louis, king of France, there was held at Sens a gathering of bishops and religious abbots against Peter Abelard, who was scandalizing the Church by a certain profane novelty of words or meanings. When he was challenged by them and was about to answer concerning justice, fearing a hearing he appealed to the Apostolic See. Escaping in this way, not long afterward he died at Saint-Marcel in Chalon.

This Peter Abelard, as Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, Book XXVIII, was a celebrated teacher, most renowned in the reputation of learning, but one who dogmatized perversely concerning the faith. Innocent II condemned his writings to the fire and the writer to silence. Concerning this Peter, Bernard writes as follows to Pope Innocent II:

"We have in France a new theologian from an old master, who from his early age played in the dialectical art and now raves in the Sacred Scriptures; who always seeks new things and invents what he does not find. At the threshold of his first book of theology - or rather, of foolish discourse - he defines faith as an estimation, so that we are to suppose that something in our faith hangs upon doubtful estimation, as he thinks, rather than that all which is in it rests upon sure and solid truth, divinely commended, established, and consecrated by oracles and miracles, by the Virgin's childbearing, by the blood of the Redeemer, and by the glory of the one rising again. 'These testimonies have been made exceedingly credible.'

"The Apostle cries, 'I know whom I have believed, and I am certain,' and you whisper to me, 'Faith is an estimation.' You chatter to me as uncertain that than which nothing is more certain. Augustine also speaks otherwise: 'Faith,' he says, 'is not held in the heart of the one whose faith it is by conjecturing or opining, but by certain knowledge, conscience acclaiming.' Moreover, the Apostle says, 'Faith is the substance of things to be hoped for,' not an empty fantasy of conjectures. These estimations belong to the Academics, whose part it is to doubt everything but to know nothing." Thus Bernard.

Blessed Bernard noted the reprehensible chapters in Abelard's books in the letter which he wrote concerning him to Pope Innocent II. Nevertheless, his books are curiously preserved by many, for whom stolen waters are sweeter and hidden bread more pleasant. I found many reprehensible things in them.

Geoffrey of Auxerre, who for a long time had been the secretary of blessed Bernard, had at one time been a disciple of this Peter. Among other things he says the following concerning that same Peter:

"I remember that he was once my master. While he himself consumed, or offered to his disciples, nothing more of the Paschal lamb than its feet and entrails, he defrauded both himself and his own of no small part of it. Indeed, emptying the price of redemption, he commended to us nothing in the sacrifice of the Lord's Passion except an example of virtue and an incitement of love. For he said that what the Scriptures declare - that the human race was redeemed from the power of the devil by that precious blood - consisted only in this: that an example was exhibited to us of contending for truth and justice even unto death, and that an incitement of love was supplied, since by the love expended an occasion was given for loving in return; as though these two things had not also been exhibited to us in the deaths of the prophets slain for truth and justice. These things indeed are great and true, but they are not the only things.

"Blessed be God, who at the same time and in the same manner gave to you and to me a teacher, afterward a better one, through whom he reproved the first teacher's ignorance and confuted his insolence. For he, as a true Hebrew, eagerly consumed entirely, and carefully commended to us for consumption, the head of the lamb with its feet and entrails: thus preaching that the suffering Lord is to be imitated, and that the loving Lord is to be loved in return, while he professed and adored as the principal cause of this sacrifice, as the head of the lamb, the redemption of mankind in him.

"For Christ exhibited three special things to us in his Passion: an example of virtue, an incitement of love, and the sacrament of redemption. If a heretic empties out the third, the other things can profit him nothing. For without cause he contended for virtue even unto death, providing us an example of patience; and without cause he exhibited and commended an affection of such immense love, if the captivity long ago already mentioned does not receive the effect of abundant redemption." Geoffrey thus writes forcefully and in a Catholic manner against Peter, formerly his own master.

At that time Henry, the brother of Louis, king of France, became a monk at Clairvaux. Not long afterward he was raised to the episcopate of Beauvais.

And John of the Times died, who had lived for 361 years from the time of Charlemagne, whose armor-bearer he had been.

Section VI

In the year of the Lord 1144, when Celestine had been taken from this light, Lucius of Bologna, who previously was called Gerard and was chancellor, undertook the government of the Roman Church as the one hundred seventy-third pontiff. Because he died within the year, his deeds are not found indicated by writers, except what John of Columna reports: namely, that when the Romans, who were governed according to the judgment of the supreme pontiff, had determined to exalt the senate, which had fallen from use for long ages and had nearly been given over to oblivion, Innocent II wished to prevent this, but, forestalled by death, was unable to do so.

But this Lucius of Bologna, following Innocent's will, resolved to abolish the senate against the Roman people. Hence, after a great body of soldiers had been gathered, he attacked the Capitol in order to expel the senators from it. But the Roman people, running to arms, expelled the pope with his men from the Capitol. There the pope, as is reported, was so battered with stones that afterward he could not exercise the pastoral office. Not long afterward, namely after eleven months of his papacy, he ended his final day.

In the same year a great famine grew strong in France. Saint Bernard performed many miracles in Germany, where at the city of Speyer there was so great a concourse that King or Emperor Conrad, lest the people crush him, laid aside his cloak, received him into his own arms, and carried him from the basilica.

During the same time in the regions of Germany there was a certain marvelous virgin of advanced age, upon whom divine power had bestowed so great a grace that, although she was a laywoman and unlettered, nevertheless, being marvelously carried away, she frequently learned in dreams not only what she poured forth in words, but also what she dictated in Latin for writing, so that by this dictation she composed books of Catholic doctrine. Vincent says in the Historical Mirror that this was, as I think, Saint Hildegard, who is said to have predicted many things concerning the future, and to whom blessed Bernard is also said to have written. Writing to the people of Cologne concerning the future tribulation of clerics, she says that clerics desire to have glory without merit and merit without work.

About this time the boy William was crucified by Jews in England on the Day of Preparation for Easter in the city of Norwich. Concerning him the following vision is read, as Vincent reports from the chronicles in the Historical Mirror, Book XXVIII.

A certain boy named William, fifteen years old, saw while sleeping a radiant man who said to him, “Follow me.” He soon began to see a dreadful shadow on his left, but he was comforted by the gentle sight of his guide. Then he saw a dark valley having fire on one side and very cold water on the other, where souls were always passing from one to the other.

Afterward that radiant elder led the boy to other torments, where he saw innumerable fiery seats and an innumerable people filling the same seats. Demons brought out flaming money from little bags and threw it into the mouths of individuals. They cast it out through their jaws and throat, but the demons cast it back into their mouths again.

Afterward he saw flesh which appeared to have the form of a mature human being cast by demons into cauldrons, and in a moment they appeared like newly born infants. Raised from the cauldrons by fiery hooks, they seemed immediately to be transformed into their former age. Thus they were twisted in the cauldrons repeatedly.

Led from there to another fire, he saw innumerable persons cast into it and dissolved at each joint, and again, when they had been taken from the flame, their joints returned to their places. Afterward he saw many men fastened upon turning wheels by their virile members and women by their genital members, and they all cried, “Woe, woe!”

Likewise he saw many persons upon fiery seats, suspended like thieves in a field with their heads downward. Others, dying from cold, saw garments placed beneath them but could not touch them. Others, tormented by hunger, could not touch the pleasant foods placed beneath them. And those who had not aided others placed in any necessity received no consolation in that same necessity.

Afterward he saw Tartarus open, which appeared in its descent to be deeper than the length of the road from Canterbury to London. There the ancient enemy sat in the midst of the flame, stretched into six parts. When the boy stood trembling near the rim of the pit, the foul spirit which had always adhered to his left side from the time he left his house began to accuse him, saying, “I always suggested every evil thing to this boy.” But those things which the boy had confessed before Easter - for all this happened after Easter - it concealed completely. Nevertheless, it alleged against him so many and such great crimes that they seemed sufficient for eternal damnation.

Then, at the guide’s admonition, when the boy fortified himself with the sign of the cross, the pit disappeared. When the guide withdrew, the boy stood trembling for a long time in the darkness. But the guide returned, led the boy to a luminous radiance, and immediately there appeared a wall of infinite length and breadth in which no entrance was open. Coming to it, in a moment they found themselves carried beyond it.

In that desirable country there appeared a round house which had twelve gates, as is written in the Apocalypse: “From the east, three gates,” and so forth. Entering it, they saw it to be so spacious that all those who are in the world could not fill a tenth part of it. There he saw many persons in great glory, but some more glorious than others. Then he saw ten companies of the blessed.

Coming to the eastern gate, about the middle of the entrance he saw a certain altar, around which radiant men sat, all serving one who was as though the most excellent among them. That man had upon his head a crown distinguished by twelve golden crosses. The guide addressed the boy, who was rejoicing in this vision, saying: “This will be your place if you live well; and know that this is the boy William whom the Jews crucified at Norwich.”

When the guide withdrew, the spirit, although resisting, soon returned to the body. On Monday at about the ninth hour he began to sleep. On Tuesday at about the third hour, raising himself upon his face, he signed himself, when, namely, he saw Tartarus opened. On Thursday at about midday he revived.

Section VII

Eugenius III succeeded Lucius in the See of Peter in the year of the Lord 1145. He was the one hundred seventy-fourth in the number of Roman pontiffs. He was a monk of Clairvaux, a Pisan by nation, and a disciple of blessed Bernard. He had been sent to the city from Clairvaux to be appointed abbot in the monastery of Saint Anastasia outside Rome, which monastery had been constructed by Innocent II. While he was abbot there, he was elected pope.

Thus, unexpectedly elected by the cardinals, he immediately transferred himself to the monastery of Farfa for fear of the senators who had been elected by the Roman people against his predecessor's will. There, after the cardinals and prelates had been summoned, he received the gift of consecration. Although he had previously been a simple man, God suffused him with marvelous grace and refinement. He governed the Church for eight years, seven months, and twenty days.

But the Romans, raising up against him Jordan the patrician and senator, drove him from the city. Seeing that sedition had arisen among the people, he shook the dust from his feet against the disputants and, leaving them, came into France. In his company blessed Bernard performed many signs. The same holy man wrote to this pope the book On Consideration, a book indeed of much subtlety, usefulness, and eloquence.

Under this Eugenius III the book of John Damascene the priest was translated from Greek into Latin by Burgundio, a judge and citizen of Pisa. In it is contained the tradition of the orthodox faith, divided into four books and distinguished into one hundred chapters. Nevertheless, concerning the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son, John did not hold faithfully with the Greeks. Yet he could be excused from the vice of heresy, because in his time that matter had not yet been determined by the Church, as Thomas says in the Summa.

In the year of the Lord 1148 a council was celebrated at Reims under Eugenius. In this council blessed Bernard publicly confuted Master Gilbert, surnamed Porretanus, disputing individually with him as the singular champion of his age. This Gilbert was bishop of Poitiers, greatly practiced in the sacred writings. But, having searched into things too sublime for him, he fell into folly. Indeed, neither thinking simply concerning the unity of the Holy Trinity and the simplicity of the divinity nor writing faithfully, he set before his disciples hidden breads and stolen waters.

He did not easily confess to authoritative persons what he understood, or rather how greatly he lacked understanding. For he feared what they report had been said to Peter Abelard at Sens: "Your own affair is now at stake when the nearest wall burns." Finally, when the scandal of the faithful now grew strong concerning this and their murmuring also increased, he was called into their midst and commanded to deliver the book in which he had vomited forth blasphemies that were indeed grave but enclosed by a certain wrapping of words.

Saint Bernard first elicited by subtle questions everything which Gilbert appeared to conceal by verbal cavils, and then refuted it in a two-day disputation both by his own reasonings and by testimonies of the saints. Perceiving that some of those who presided, although now recognizing the blasphemy in the teaching, nevertheless still turned injury away from the person, he was kindled with zeal and separately summoned the Gallican Church, which was as his own household.

Thereafter, by common counsel, with the man of God dictating, a new formula of faith was opposed to the new dogmas by the fathers of ten provinces and by very many other bishops and abbots. The names of each were also subscribed to it, so that, just as the reprehensible zeal of all those men, so also their irreprehensible zeal, might become known to others. At last that error was condemned by apostolic judgment and the authority of the universal Church.

Bishop Gilbert was asked whether he consented to the same condemnation. Consenting and publicly refuting what he previously had written and asserted, he himself obtained indulgence, especially because from the beginning he had been constrained to enter that disputation under this condition: that he promised, without any obstinacy, freely to correct his opinion according to the judgment of Holy Church. Certain disciples of these two masters, namely Peter Abelard and Gilbert Porretanus, zealously defending them beyond measure, afterward began to disparage blessed Bernard and the whole Cistercian Order.

The same Eugenius issued certain decrees. Hence in Distinction XXXVII it is said from the synod of Pope Eugenius: "It is reported to us that in certain places neither masters nor care for the study of letters are found. Therefore, let care and diligence be exercised entirely by all bishops among the peoples subject to them and in other places in which necessity occurs, so that masters and teachers may be appointed who continually teach the studies of letters and the teachings of the liberal arts, because in these the divine commandments are especially manifested and declared."

The same man says concerning monks in Cause XVI, Question I: "It has pleased our common council that none of the monks, for earthly profit, presume with a most wicked daring to go out from the monastery, or to give penance, or to receive a son from baptism, or to baptize, or to visit a sick person, or to bury the dead, or to transfer to a secular church, or to involve himself in any business whatsoever. Let him be content with his cloister, because just as a fish without water lacks life, so does a monk without a monastery. Therefore let him sit alone and be silent, because he is dead to the world but lives to God. Let him recognize his name: for monos in Greek is ‘one’ in Latin, and archus in Greek is ‘sad’ in Latin. Therefore let him sit sad and attend to his office.”

The same man says in Cause XXVII, Question II, from the synod of Eugenius: “If a husband and wife should agree between themselves to separate solely for the sake of religion, let this in no way be done without the bishop’s knowledge, so that they may be established by him separately in a suitable place. For if the wife is unwilling, or either one of them is unwilling, the marriage is not dissolved even for such a reason.”

At length, having returned to Rome, Eugenius was received by the people with the greatest honor, and afterward migrated to the Lord.

Section VIII

When Eugenius died, Anastasius, a Roman by nation, the one hundred seventy-fifth pontiff, was placed in the Roman See in the year of the Lord 1152. Before a year had been completed, he was gathered to his fathers. I have found nothing recorded concerning him.

In the thirty-eighth year of his episcopate Bartholomew, bishop of Laon, despising the magnificence of the world, was clothed in the monastic habit in a certain monastery. Once, while he was sitting with other monks at the conference, he observed a certain monk coming later and more slowly than the others, with a little black boy walking beside him and holding him by the cowl. When Bartholomew had reported this to the abbot, he learned from him that this monk was exceedingly negligent. Thus Vincent in the Historical Mirror.

About that time there flourished a certain holy man named Peter, bishop of Tarentaise, distinguished for holiness and the grace of miracles. He frequently extinguished implacable enmities and inveterate hatreds and restrained very grave wars. With the Lord cooperating and confirming his word by signs that followed, he also effected reconciliations that had been despaired of, even among the greatest princes.

As Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, Book XXVIII, Chapter CXXV, on the journey by which he approached the king of England to arrange a certain peace, he performed a stupendous miracle at Saint-Symphorien, which is a castle of the church of Lyon. There was there a certain faithful man, Peter of Fraxinetum, known and honored, who had once drawn him to his lodging almost by force.

This man had a young daughter laboring under a miserable affliction. For a certain female sorcerer, induced by the wickedness of an envious mother-in-law, had brought it about that she languished with an affliction deemed incurable and could in no way endure the presence or sight of her husband. Her mother, persuaded by womanly affection to have Satan cast out Satan, summoned a certain famous sorcerer. He came and examined her. Declaring that the young woman had been filled with iron, he rubbed the bark of trees and gave her cups infected by words and herbs to drink. He also bit the wretched woman’s arm with his own teeth in two places near the front of the arm, so that each bite, the upper and the lower, was about one palm distant from the front of the arm.

A new thing, a marvelous thing: she recovered from that illness, but not fully. For at intervals she was grievously tormented when she felt as though a needle were proceeding from her heart, until a hidden power brought the needle out through the upper bite of her arm, which no scar had covered, just as none had covered the lower bite. By now, in this manner and at intervals of time, about thirty needles had come out: some, as is said commonly, without eyes, while others bore holes suitable for receiving threads.

The daughter was therefore presented by her father to the holy man, to whom he explained her lamentable tragedy. And behold, immediately that same young woman, feeling a needle, lamented it with groaning. One of the lay brothers serving the man of God approached her and extracted it bloody; it was preserved for many years as testimony. Saint Peter prayed and, touching the place of the wound, promised by the power of God that no iron or steel would come out any longer.

So it happened; but the material changed, for the malice had not yet been entirely extinguished. Through the other, lower bite on the arm, which the holy man had not yet touched because nothing had yet emerged from it, there began to come forth, in place of iron needles, little wooden stakes which are commonly called broaches, of oak or ash wood, thicker than thorns and somewhat longer. Yet they were not all of one length or thickness, just as the needles had not been. Sixteen pieces of wood had already come out from the woman within a year and a few months.

Thereafter the reverend prelate Peter, for whom the fullness of so great a miracle was divinely reserved, came again. The woman was presented to him as he celebrated the solemnities of the Mass, as he had instructed on the preceding evening. At that same hour an eighteenth piece of wood came out from the woman’s flesh, which the chaplain extracted before the eyes of all. The prelate therefore absolved the woman after she confessed and, giving her the sacred Eucharist, commanded her thereafter to be secure from the emergence of anything of any kind. Thus, freed from all illusions, she adhered to her husband, begot children, and proclaimed to many the power of the holy man which she had experienced in herself.

Section IX

In the year of the Lord 1153, from the beginning of the world the year 6328 according to the greater computation, Adrian, an Englishman by nation who previously was called Nicholas, was called to the summit of the supreme pontificate. He sat for four years, nine months, and eight days. He had previously been a monk and abbot in the monastery of Saint Rufus near Avignon. John of Salisbury, who was very familiar with him, says the following concerning him:

“I heard Pope Adrian saying that no one was more miserable than the Roman pontiff and no condition more miserable than his. He confessed that he had found so many miseries in that see that, when present things were compared with them, all the past bitterness of his life seemed joy and happiness to him. He said that the chair of the Roman pontiff was thorny, that the mantle was everywhere crowded with the sharpest points, and that it was of so great a weight that it pressed down, wore away, and crushed even the strongest shoulders. He said that the crown and the phrygium rightly appeared bright, since they were fiery.

“He declared that he would rather never have left his native English soil, or would rather have remained perpetually hidden in the cloister of Saint Rufus near Valence, than have entered such great straits, except that he did not dare resist the divine dispensation. He also very frequently added this to me: that although he had ascended from rank to rank, from a cloistered cleric through all offices to the supreme pontificate, nothing of happiness or tranquil repose of life was ever added to him by an advancement.

“To use his own words: ‘With anvil and hammer,’ he said, ‘the Lord has always enlarged me. But now, if it pleases him, let him place his right hand beneath the burden which he has imposed upon my infirmity, because it is unbearable to me. Is not one who struggles for so great a misery worthy of mercy?’ Thus the richest man who has been elected is poor on the following day and is held bound to almost innumerable creditors.

“Therefore, to aspire to the supreme pontificate, and even to ascend to it not without a brother’s blood, is to succeed Romulus in parricides, not Peter in feeding the sheep. It is therefore rightly said that, not only in name but also in substance, the supreme pontiff is the servant of servants. For it is necessary that he serve the servants of avarice, that is, the Romans, to such a degree that if he does not serve them, he becomes either an ex-pontiff or an ex-Roman.” Helinand reports these things.

In the year of the Lord 1156, the sign of the cross appeared upon the moon. Alberic, a knight of Beauvais, suffered martyrdom for the faith of Christ. In the following year three moons were seen, and in the middle one the sign of the cross. In the following year, on the Nones of September, three suns were seen in the western part. The sun of the day, which was in the middle, remained until sunset when the other two failed. Thus Vincent in the Historical Mirror. Those two are vapors, occurring sometimes miraculously and sometimes naturally.

Adrian excommunicated William, king of Sicily. Filled with anger on this account, the said king sent an army to besiege Benevento, a city of the Church in Apulia. For this reason Adrian summoned the emperor of the Greeks against him and incited against him several princes who had been exiled by the king. Ranging through Apulia, they captured several cities. The lord pope, favoring them in all things, had withdrawn into Benevento.

Hearing this, King William crossed into Apulia as quickly as possible with the military forces gathered from all Sicily, where they then were. Immediately upon his first arrival he routed the forces of the Greeks and bound their captured leaders in chains. Thus, having obtained the victory, he brought the entire region which had defected from him back into his power. When this had been done, he directed his forces toward Benevento and surrounded the city on every side with a siege. There he afflicted both the lord pope, the cardinals, and all the citizens with such hardships that he made them very anxious for their own safety.

But through the intervention of certain persons peace was restored between them, all those who, at the pope’s persuasion, had immersed themselves in such dangers being excluded from the treaty. Thus, seeing that events had occurred contrary to their hope, the aforesaid noblemen began anxiously to seek by what means they might leave the kingdom without danger. Count Robert of Basvilla, with certain others, betook himself to Emperor Frederick in Germany. But the prince of Capua, who had also risen against the king of Sicily, was more unfortunate than the others. While he was preparing to travel by ship along the Garigliano, he was captured by King William’s supporters and presented to that king. William immediately deprived him of his eyes and placed him in prison, and after a short time he miserably ended his life.

After Pope Adrian composed peace with William, king of Sicily, he returned to Rome. It happened that one of the cardinals was wounded at Rome by certain most wicked men. For this reason the pope placed the entire city under ecclesiastical interdict until worthy satisfaction was made.

At that time there also flourished Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, raised from the monastery of Bec, a man altogether praiseworthy and magnificent and most experienced in both secular and ecclesiastical affairs. Thomas, archdeacon of Canterbury, who afterward was archbishop after him, was made chancellor of King Henry through the industry of this Theobald.

Section X

When Adrian had been taken from this light, the cardinals, disagreeing among themselves, elected two men as pontiffs: namely Roland the chancellor, who was called Alexander III and was of the nation of Siena, and Octavian, whom they called Victor. From this circumstance the Catholic Church labored long under schism. For this reason the secular princes wavered, some adhering to one and some to the other. Emperor Frederick, with his bishops, adhered to Octavian. But Louis, king of the Franks, and Henry, king of the English, with their men, received Alexander as father and lord.

But by God's will Octavian, who was called Victor by his men, died after a short time, being taken from their midst. Those who had adhered to Octavian, immediately persevering in obstinacy and contumacy, elected as pope a certain Guido, who was called Paschal. By the just judgment of God, he too died while Alexander was still living. When he had been given burial, John, who called himself Calixtus, was ordained by the same men. When John died, a certain man named Lando, to whom the name Innocent was imposed, was made pope by those schismatics. These three were cardinal-priests, and, excommunicated by Pope Alexander, they perished by an evil death.

At length, when the schism had been removed, Alexander alone remained, declared by all to be the true supreme pontiff. He sat in the chair of Peter for twenty-two years and was the one hundred seventy-seventh in the number of pontiffs. Immediately after his creation, when Emperor Frederick, who favored those antipopes, persecuted him, he fled to the Franks. He was honorably received by them as the true pope by the king of the Franks and English [read: by the kings of the Franks and English]. His party was defended by war, and his adversaries were confounded and destroyed.

He celebrated a general council at Tours in Gaul and enrolled blessed Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux, in the catalogue of the saints. Concerning this he wrote a letter in commendation of Bernard's life and teaching to Louis, king of France, and also to all the bishops throughout the world and the other prelates, commanding that his feast be celebrated on the day of his death.

In the year of the Lord 1163 Pope Alexander III came into Gaul. A little afterward Saint Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, fleeing as an exile from England, came into France and first lived in exile at Pontigny. As Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, Book XXX, and John of Columna, the said blessed Thomas came from Pontigny to Sens to Pope Alexander, bringing with him in writing the customs of the king of England because of which he was an exile, for he was unwilling to observe them since they were iniquitous.

Holding them in his hands, he placed the unfolded and extended charter before the pope's feet, saying: "Behold, holy father, the sacred - or rather, sacrilegious - customs of the king of England, contrary to the canons and decrees and even to the laws of secular princes themselves. We are compelled to endure exile because of them. We have come here so that we might show them to your holy fatherhood and have counsel concerning them. Therefore, if it pleases your holiness, command them to be read and heard. For whoever hears these things, it is marvelous if both his ears do not ring, since he will hear that Christians are acting against the law of Christianity and that, when the venerable statutes of the holy fathers have been condemned, new and unheard-of abuses presumed by ancient tyrants are being introduced into the Church."

When he had said this on bended knees, at the pope's command he rose and stood in the midst, with the company of his clerics surrounding him. When those customs had been read at the command of the lord pope, and when the reader had pronounced the first chapter, the venerable prelate began marvelously to discourse against the proposed chapter and more fully to elucidate and reveal the king's intention in this matter. From decrees and laws he showed and proved in which things and in how many respects what had been pronounced opposed the canons of the holy fathers, and how great a danger threatened the Church of God if the king obtained what he intended. He did the same for each chapter, while the lord pope willingly heard him and diligently noted his assertions concerning each.

Nevertheless, the cardinals who, having received money from the king, favored his party, offered the blessed man much vexation in his cause, especially William of Pavia, who was a closer friend and intimate of the king. Striving by every means to impede the blessed man, he rose up at each point and opposed himself to him, proposing many things and asking many things. The venerable man, without difficulty or hesitation, either unraveled or refuted them as though they were spiders' threads.

For William thought that the archbishop was using another person's speech and not his own, and that if he could deflect him from the path of his discourse, he would immediately be held up to ridicule and confusion. But the holy man, understanding that William directly opposed him, sometimes so entangled and ensnared him in his own objections by a reciprocal course of speech that it became manifest to all that not only was he using his own powers and eloquence, but also that he possessed an unsurpassable genius and eloquence.

When a great part of the day had been consumed both in the exposition of his cause and in contention with his adversaries - for there were sixteen chapters of those customs to which he had replied while standing - the lord pope, at last marveling at his wisdom, called him to himself, commanded him to sit beside him, and said: “Welcome, dearest brother.” Repeatedly rejoicing with him that he had come safely, he began to thank him because he had undertaken so great a burden and so arduous a business and had dared to defend the Church of God against the assaults of tyrants in such dangerous times.

The venerable prelate also returned thanks to the lord pope with due honor and reverence because he had deigned to honor him with so great an honor. Then the lord pope condemned those customs in perpetuity and subjected their observers and exactors to eternal anathema.

Thus, after the man of the Lord had remained at the curia for some time, at length, with the lord pope’s permission and counsel, he betook himself to the Cistercian monastery of Pontigny. He remained there for almost two years and, among his other pursuits of emulation, also desired and received the monastic habit. Sending a confidential messenger to the lord pope, then dwelling at Sens, he sought and obtained that the religious habit be blessed for him by the pope and sent to him, the lord pope writing back to him as follows: “We have sent to you, beloved brother, a habit not such as we wished, but such as we had.”

When Henry, king of the English, learned in how great an honor the venerable pontiff had been received by the lord pope and that he had chosen Pontigny as the place of his dwelling, he raged against his own people with an unheard-of kind of cruelty. He commanded that wherever any man or woman of Thomas’s kindred could be found, each should be disinherited, despoiled of his own goods, and driven from the kingdom, after an oath had first been exacted from that person that he would journey to Pontigny for the purpose of grieving the archbishop and present himself to him. Then old and young belonging to his kindred were expelled, as were women with nursing children and even certain pregnant women.

At length this glorious pontiff Thomas returned to Canterbury, to his own church, and was received with great honor. A few days afterward he fell by the swords of the impious, as will be said below. By this same Alexander III he was enrolled in the catalogue of the saints, shining with many miracles.

In the year 1165 Alexander returned to Rome and was received with honor. But when Emperor Frederick came toward the city, Alexander, fearing his power, fled to Venice to escape his hand. Indignant at this, the emperor armed a fleet against the Venetians. He placed his son Otto in command of it and sent him to demand Pope Alexander. But Otto, the emperor’s son, was defeated in the first encounter in a naval battle by the Venetian fleet, which aided the party of Holy Church and Alexander, and was captured and conducted to Venice.

In the following year, through the agency of the emperor’s son Otto, who had been captured, the dissension between pope and emperor was removed and peace was made. From this great honor and glory followed for the Venetians, to whom the supreme pontiff gave certain insignia to be borne in perpetuity in memory of the affair. I marvel, however, that neither Vincent in the Historical Mirror nor John of Columna makes mention of this.

This magnanimous pontiff issued many constitutions in the first council which he celebrated at Tours in Gaul and in the second Lateran Council celebrated at Rome. He also made many decretals which are found under diverse titles in the Decretals.

Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, Book XXX, that the schism which Frederick fostered endured for sixteen years. At length the emperor himself abjured that schism and, making public satisfaction, composed peace with the pope.

Alexandria, which is in Upper Lombardy between the roots of the Alps and the city of Pavia, upon the river Tanaro, was then built against the people of Pavia who favored the emperor, and was named Alexandria after this pontiff Alexander. In his time Peter Lombard, bishop of Paris, who composed the Book of Sentences, flourished, according to Vincent in the Historical Mirror. He will be discussed below.

Section XI

When Alexander migrated to the Lord, Lucius III was created pope. He had previously been called Ubald, bishop of Ostia. This was in the year of the Lord 1182. From the beginning of the world it was the year 6366 according to the greater computation, but the year 5148 according to the lesser computation. He was the one hundred seventy-eighth in the number of pontiffs and sat for four years.

Lucius himself, however, was driven from the city by the Romans. Many of his men were afflicted by various injuries: some were blinded, and others, wearing miters, were placed backward upon asses. The pope himself went to Verona.

About that time, as Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, in the city of Orléans on a Sunday about the feast of blessed Lawrence, a priest celebrating Mass had prepared two hosts because of the viaticum and had proceeded as far as the Lord’s Prayer. He saw the one which he held in his hands suffused with a red color and blood flowing from it between his fingers. He transferred it to three places upon the altar, and in each place as much of the surface as the host covered was stained purple with blood. The people ran together and marveled. The priest consumed the host which he had prepared to reserve.

Philip, king of France, who was not far away, ran there and saw the host in the form of livid flesh, and upon the corporal drops or marks of blood, circled in the manner of a host when the sacred host was transferred. Afterward, at the castle of Charola, the same host represented partly the appearance of flesh and partly that of bread. On the feast of All Saints, while the prior was celebrating and wished to divide it into three, it could not be broken; rather, remaining whole, it was folded through the middle. Immediately one part assumed the form of flesh, while the remaining part remained in its former form.

Something similar also happened at the town of Sorona; another similar thing in the territory of Vendecinum; and a similar thing also happened at Arras. These works of God's mercy were believed to have been performed at that time because of the heresy springing up in Gascony.

A little before this the reputation of Saint Alpaïs of Cudot became illustrious, nor is it marvelous if it was celebrated, since an eminent and most splendid miracle shone in her. For it was divinely granted to her to live for many years in the body and not to need the assistance of bodily food.

She was indeed of the lowest birth and by occupation a cowherd. Previously she was worn down by a very grave and prolonged scourge, so much so that, because pus flowed from her whole body, she became an object of horror even to her own people. But he who chose the contemptible and lowest things of the world, after long proofs of her patience, regarded the humility of his handmaid. The more he refined her in the furnace of tribulation, the more worthy he made her, restoring her body and sustaining her with spiritual nourishment.

She became so powerless in herself that she could not be moved except by another person, lying continually upon her back, while all her other members except her head and right hand lacked the vigor of their function. Although she could not easily swallow any food, she nevertheless had a natural passage freely prepared for swallowing the viaticum.

Her body became exceedingly thin and withered, since her intestines had been emptied within by prolonged fasting; yet she was seen to be so beautiful and indeed full in the face as if she enjoyed an abundance of delicacies. She was frequently carried away into the heights. Relying upon an angel as guide, she traversed now the places of punishments and now the joys of the blessed.

Upon returning to herself, she cautiously released what and to whom she should disclose [read: she carefully weighed what she should disclose and to whom], the Spirit teaching her inwardly what and in what manner she ought to keep silent, and what she ought to disclose. On the solemnities of the Lord or of his glorious Mother, however, it was granted to her to be carried aloft very frequently and, by the free gaze of the mind, to contemplate the world and all things that are in the world.

When after one or several days she returned from that most exalted repose, she appeared to herself to pass as though from a certain most spacious region of light into darkness, and, as we heard her herself relate, to have a certain millstone placed upon the eyes of her mind. She related that, while in that rapture, she beheld the whole unclean world circumscribed in the form of a circular ball, the sun larger than the earth, and the earth hanging like an egg in the middle and surrounded on every side by waters.

She declared that things and the reasons and causes of things were so infinite and so hidden that each person grasps the less, the more curiously he investigates. In the spirit she saw many absent things and frequently foresaw future things. But this was all the more particularly marvelous because it was rarer: namely, that a woman born and reared in the countryside and accustomed to rural labor was distinguished by so great a gift of wisdom, so prudent in counsels and so circumspect in words. For she spoke so prudently, counseled so discreetly, and exhorted so salutarily that it was clearer than light that he who teaches man knowledge had chosen his seat in her and had made his dwelling in her.

In these times Anselm, bishop of Beauvais, flourished. Lamps were divinely kindled at his tomb as testimony of his holiness, except for one of those lamps, to which a certain usurer supplied the nourishment of oil; that lamp could not be kindled.

In the year of the Lord 1172 Robert, provost of Area, governed two bishoprics, namely Arras and Tournai. The son of a certain rustic smith of Chartres, he is said to have used a familiar demon, through whom he had come to such honors. At length he was killed by ribalds, a certain illustrious knight having procured his death.

In the year of the Lord 1173 fiery battle lines appeared in the sky at night on the third day before the Ides of February. In the following year blessed Thomas of Canterbury was crowned with martyrdom.

In the year of the Lord 1177 an eclipse of the sun occurred at the sixth hour on the Ides of September.

Section XII

Urban III succeeded Lucius III in the papacy in the year of the Lord 1185. He was the one hundred seventy-ninth in the number of pontiffs and sat for three years. When he heard that Jerusalem had been captured by the Saracens and that the Christians had been expelled from those parts of the East with the destruction of many, he grieved so greatly that he became ill from sorrow, and from that illness migrated to the Lord.

About that time, as Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, eastern and western astrologers - namely Jews, Saracens, and also Christians - sent letters through diverse parts of the world, predicting and asserting without doubt that in September there would be a tempest of violent winds, an earthquake, and a mortality of men. They also threatened seditions, dissensions, changes of kingdoms, and many other things in this manner. But the subsequent outcome of events manifestly proved that things would be otherwise than they had predicted by divination.

The judgments of such persons are not to be adhered to greatly: both because it is difficult to determine precisely the influences of the heavenly bodies upon these lower bodies, and the mathematical art which is regarded as heretical intrudes itself into this matter; and because the first cause, which is God, exerts more influence upon the effect of the second cause than does the second cause itself.

At that time Abbot Joachim came from the regions of Calabria to this Pope Urban, who was then dwelling at Verona. It is reported of Joachim that, although he previously had learned little from a human teacher, he divinely received the gift of understanding, so that he eloquently and discerningly unraveled any difficulties or obscurities of the Scriptures.

He therefore said that certain mysteries of the Apocalypse had lain hidden until that time but were now becoming clear in the spirit of prophecy, as is evident to those who read the little work which he wrote. For he says that, just as the Scriptures of the Old Testament contain the histories of the five ages of the world that ran from Adam, namely, to Christ, so the Book of the Apocalypse expounds the course of the sixth age beginning from Christ. He divides this sixth age itself into six little ages, each of them designated quite suitably by individual periods of this book.

He also says that these things were revealed at the end of the fifth little age and that the sixth would immediately follow. In it, he declares, various tribulations and manifold persecutions will arise, as is manifestly shown in the opening of the seal and in the sixth period of the book, where the fall of Babylon is treated. But this above other things in his little book is regarded as notable and suspect: that he fixes the end of the world within two generations, which, according to him, make sixty years, and judges that it will be fulfilled within them.

He is said to have written many things and to have offered his books to the lord pope to be corrected. For he is also said to have erred in certain things, as will be evident in the following title. Nevertheless, many future things are reported to have been revealed to him. Hence, afterward, when the two kings of France and England were wintering at Messina, a city of Sicily, on their overseas journey, this abbot was summoned and said that the time for the liberation of Jerusalem had not yet arrived.

But concerning those things which he wrote about future times, it is fitting that we leave the presaging of uncertain things to the judgment of posterity. Thus Vincent. But add what Thomas says in Book IV: that all who have spoken of the end of the world by determining a definite time have been found false speakers in this matter, and those who determine it hereafter will also be found so. Hence Augustine, in The City of God, upon that passage of Acts I in which Christ said to the apostles, “It is not yours to know the times or moments which the Father has placed in his own power,” says: “Here he unbends the fingers of all who calculate concerning this matter and commands them to rest.”

The same Joachim, in his exposition upon Jeremiah, as Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, Book XXXII, Chapter CVII, speaks as follows:

“From the year of the Lord 1200 onward the times are suspect to me, and the moment in which, when a new order of Samuel has arisen, Hophni and Phinehas, the priests and pontiffs of God, will be taken captive by the prince of the Roman commonwealth. Let the ark of the Church be captured, and let Eli, that is, the supreme pontiff, fall and remain in danger under Haman the Agagite like another Mordecai.

“It is necessary that such persons preach and lament this very fall of the Church, persons to whom voluntary poverty is pleasing and whose spiritual doctrine and purity of life ‘eron withstand’ the goads of future tribulation [read: will not withstand the goads of future tribulation]. Such teachers and such prophets, therefore, are to be sent who will scorch, and not flatter, not only inferior men but even pontiffs and prelates themselves.

“Faithful teachers and preachers are indeed to be revealed shortly, who will strike earthly and carnal hearts with every plague and impose silence by their studies upon proud and swollen masters. Although that future order is to arise for obedience, nevertheless it was foretold by the prophets, and in apostolic men of the third period of the ecclesiastical course it was known and chosen by God, to be sanctified in the womb of the spiritual Church and of perfect doctrine, as another Benjamin, a son not so much of sorrow in punishment as of the right hand, that is, of exultation in glory.

“The universal Church, now growing old, will soon bear such persons. Rachel will lament such sons, as though they were to be slain by a king of shameless countenance, as by another Herod. They are therefore called sons of sorrow, because, when they were crushed, spiritual religion could not be consoled because of the anguish of the time. Yet they are also called sons of the right hand, because, from the same source from which Mother Church is oppressed in them and for their sake, the eternal homeland rejoices concerning them and with them.

“These are faithful in doctrine, spiritual in life, and obedient under oppression. This order, therefore, has been formed in the likeness of Jeremiah in the universal Church and sanctified in regular observance, lest anyone reprehend it concerning the merit of its life. I also think that, just as formerly God chose the Fathers, who were old, and secondly the Apostles, who were younger, so now for a third time he will choose children according to the letter to preach the Gospel of the kingdom, because of those for whom old things have become worthless while the prelates adulterate the word of God.

“And just as formerly through Moses and Joshua the Lord subjected the Canaanites to the Israelites, and through Paul and Barnabas laid low the idolaters, so now through two future orders prefigured in them he will subdue and convert unbelieving nations.” Thus Joachim.

Section XIII

After the death of Urban III, Gregory VIII ascended the chair of Peter. He was the one hundred eightieth in the number of pontiffs, a man illustrious for learning in letters and eloquence, but more illustrious for purity of life and integrity of mind, and a vehement chastiser of himself.

First of all, therefore, he was inflamed with every desire to assist Jerusalem. To rouse the princes and peoples throughout the provinces of the West, he sent both legates and letters to set forth the eastern disaster and to promise absolution of penances to those journeying to Jerusalem. But, alas, immediately at its arising the flower of his splendor withered. After two months he departed from the chair and left this world; he was buried at Pisa.

At that time there flourished a certain man called Peter the One-Eyed, abbot of Clairvaux. As Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, Book XXX, he concealed the nobility of his birth by as much dissimulation as he could. He became a novice in the monastery of Igny. In food he never took anything besides the common fare, and frequently withheld much even of that common portion from himself. He possessed only a cowl and a tunic. He attended vigils both continually and persistently. He wished to appear lowly, not to be proclaimed humble.

He neither possessed nor sought singular graces, nor polished speech, personal beauty, skill in secular business, or popular generosity. He possessed inward goods and rejoiced to be obscure in outward things. Yet to those who judged rightly he appeared greatly venerable and marvelous.

One night this Peter saw in a nocturnal vision that he entered a most beautiful hall in which a throne had been placed, and upon the throne sat a certain lady with a very venerable countenance. As he entered the hall, black and horrible dogs ran to meet him. Charging upon him, they wished to tear him apart. But that great and venerable lady magnificently drove them away by her authority, called Peter to herself, soothed him with gentle words and sweet speech, and commanded him to be secure.

This venerable man was always in the same state. When a certain abbot familiar with him asked how he could always remain the same, he answered: “When I was a novice, a certain spirit seemed visibly to enter into me. From then until now that spirit, that force or affection, in a certain manner rules me, governs me, and leads me like the sheep of Joseph. It gathers inward what has been scattered through outward things and compels me, even when I wish to attend to other things, to apply myself to prayer. Sometimes it causes me not to perceive the things that are thrust upon my eyes or ears and make a din.”

At midnight on Sunday, while the brothers were chanting psalms in choir and he was then with them, a pain of the head attacked him so violently that he considered leaving the choir. When he moved for this purpose, he heard a voice saying to him: “Praising, I shall invoke the Lord, and I shall be saved from my enemies.” Strengthened by this voice, he remained. After a short time, when the pain grew strong again, he again prepared to leave, and the aforesaid voice sounded again. Throughout that whole night and the following Sunday until the end of the conventual Mass, that contest between the pain and the consoling voice did not cease.

When, in his order, he approached the horn of the altar to receive communion, at the very act of inclining it seemed to him that a stone of great weight fell from his head. Immediately rising and receiving the Holy Eucharist, he was healed from all that pain.

A certain religious man very familiar with him, being at times tempted concerning the reason of our faith, asked him in confession whether he had ever had such a temptation. Peter said: “I do not deny that I have often been assailed by such a temptation, but manifold experience of the faith drove away every such weakness of mine.” The man asked what that experience was. Peter said: “I have sensed much concerning God, and sometimes something such that, when I ceased to sense it, I bore it more grievously than if I had been cast into a burning furnace.”

He became prior of Igny, afterward abbot of Val-Roi, and finally abbot of Clairvaux, God revealing it through his saints. For while Peter himself was praying, Saint Malachy and Saint Bernard, concerning whom it will be said below, stood beside him. One of them said to him, “You will be abbot of Clairvaux.” When this had been said, they disappeared. He remained utterly terrified, for he never would have wished this to happen.

Not long afterward Abbot Gerard, who was abbot of Clairvaux, came to Igny. Finding there a certain man named Hugh of Basochiis, who had transgressed gravely within his Order, the aforesaid Gerard avenged the offense with regular severity. Hugh lay sick in body and mind among the infirm brothers. When Hugh had resolved to kill Abbot Gerard because of the punishment imposed upon him, a certain one of the brothers named Haymo, while sitting in the vestibule of the infirmary, saw two horrible persons enter the dormitory.

The aforesaid Abbot Gerard attended vigils that night. When he went to the dormitory because of necessity, Hugh, placed in ambush with an iron weapon prepared for the crime, wounded him mortally. Gerard died of that wound on the following day, saying at the hour of his departure, “Direct me, Lord, in your truth.”

When Henry, a man powerful in deed and speech, had been made abbot of Clairvaux - for a short time afterward this Henry was made a cardinal-bishop - Peter the One-Eyed, concerning whom this account is given, was summoned to the election and fled, but was elected in his absence.

Gerard himself appeared to Peter, who was grieving over his death, and said: “Do not be saddened by my death, because I am with the Lord Jesus Christ. But when you come to Clairvaux, you will perform my office and bury me.” When Gerard’s body had been brought to Clairvaux, Peter, having been asked by the abbots to celebrate Mass for the deceased, agreed. In the canon of the Mass Saint Bernard appeared to him on one side of the altar and Saint Malachy on the other, saying to him: “Do not doubt that Abbot Gerard is a companion of the angels in eternal glory.”

The Roman pope, having heard his reputation, caused him to be summoned. The pope confessed his sins to him, received the Holy Eucharist from his hands, and gave him the necessary expenses for constructing an abbey.

When through an infirmity of the head he had lost one of his eyes, he afterward used to say cheerfully that one of his enemies had escaped, and that he feared the remaining eye more than the one that had been lost.

On one occasion he saw three notable women enter the cloister. When he asked why they presumed to enter there, the one more venerable than the others replied: “I am the mother of the Lord Jesus, and my companions are Mary Magdalene and Mary of Egypt. It is fitting for me to come to my sons.” When he wished to kiss her feet, they vanished. At length, adorned with every holiness, he rested in peace.

Section XIV

After Gregory VIII, having been perfected in a short time, had fulfilled long years, Clement III was advanced to the summit of the supreme pontificate. He was the one hundred eighty-first in the number of pontiffs. This was in the year of the Lord 1186, from the beginning of the world the year 5145 according to one number and the year 6073 according to another. He lived in the pontificate for three years and five months.

During his pontificate there was a universal eclipse of the moon at the fourth hour of the night, and it endured for three hours. Likewise, on the fourth day before the Ides of February, a little before dawn on a most serene night, the moon was seen as though to descend to the earth in a moment and, after a short delay, as though having recovered its strength, gradually to ascend again to the place from which it had descended. Thus Vincent in the Historical Mirror.

About those times Hugh, the venerable abbot of Bonneval of the Cistercian Order, was illustrious by the grace of great holiness. When he had left the world, he began to live religiously in that place. But he was greatly tempted to depart from religious life. Thinking these things, he entered the church and, praying devoutly with tears, saw above the altar the Mother of Mercy clothed with light as with a garment.

It seemed to him that he saw Jesus her Son beside her: how he had been announced by the angel, born of the Virgin, proclaimed to the shepherds, circumcised, afterward captured by the Jews, scourged, mocked, and crucified. Thereafter he beheld him rising and ascending into heaven. While Hugh looked upon these things, our Lady said to him: “Act manfully, and let your heart be strengthened in the Lord; be certain that from now on you will not be assailed by such temptations.”

After this he began to afflict himself with excessive abstinences, so that he appeared almost to lose sense and memory. Meanwhile Saint Bernard, who was still among the living, came to him by God’s providence and commanded that he be sent to the infirmary and that vigils be sung for him every night before they were sung for the other infirm, so that afterward he might be able to sleep sufficiently. Bernard also commanded that he have general permission to speak wherever he wished. Thus by God’s mercy he recovered in a short time. Then religious fervor began to burn greatly within him, and not long afterward he was made abbot of Bonneval.

Under this abbot a certain religious young man was at first exceedingly fervent, but afterward, being greatly tempted, he considered returning to the world. When the abbot, who had heard his temptation in confession, urged him much to remain and accomplished nothing, the abbot said: “My son, have mercy upon your soul and please God. Do not lose the glory prepared for you. For I promise you, and I appoint myself your surety in this: that if you remain, you will be an eternal companion of the holy angels." Strengthened by these words, he remained and lived in the best manner.

For two years before his death this young man labored under a most grave illness. Saint Job, with a great radiance which filled the whole infirmary, was sent to console him. "I am Job," he said, "whom the Father of Mercies and God of all consolation has sent to console you, just as I was patient in such an infirmity; so also must you be. Therefore you will flourish with me in glory, and tomorrow you will be with me and reap what you have sown." This also came to pass. Not long afterward he appeared to the abbot in glory, giving thanks because by the abbot's admonition he had remained in the Order.

On the Annunciation of blessed Mary, when the same abbot was rousing the brothers in choir for the vigils, he saw the devil standing in the middle of the choir in so horrible a form that the abbot himself fell from fear. Raised by the brothers, he signed himself and returned to his seat. On the next day the abbot narrated in chapter what he had seen and said that one of the brothers was in some criminal sin, on account of which the devil had come. Hearing this, all were afraid, but the guilty man concealed his own conscience.

On the following day the abbot again said that the devil was still among them. Then all the brothers confessed and each received disciplines, entreating the Lord that he would reveal the guilty man's conscience to the abbot. This was done. Hence the abbot drew the guilty man aside and disclosed his sin, which the man confessed and did not deny, seeking pardon and penance at the abbot's feet. When this had been done, the devil appeared no more.

A certain servant of the cellarer of Bonneval confessed his sins to the monk who was confessor of the poor. The servant mentioned a certain sin which that monk feared to receive, and the monk enjoined the sick man to confess it to the abbot. He agreed to do so if he lived. But the abbot was not then present, being on a journey, and meanwhile the servant died.

When the abbot returned from his journey after Compline and sat upon his bed, wishing to take off his shoes, he saw that dead man ascending the steps of the dormitory. Coming before him, the dead man fell at his feet, seeking pardon and humbly asking that the abbot hear his confession. He said that he had been sent to him for this purpose, and he confessed with so great an abundance of tears that the abbot also was moved to tears, and both wept greatly.

After absolution the dead man humbly asked the abbot to pray for him, because he was in great torments. When the abbot wished to test by touch whether he was in the body or in the spirit, the dead man vanished. On the next day the abbot asked the confessor of the poor whether that dead man had confessed such a crime. He replied, "Yes." The abbot asked, "And how do you know it?" He answered, "I heard it from his mouth."

A certain lay brother from another house was sent to Bonneval because of his fault, where he became sick unto death. Visiting him, the abbot asked him to confess securely the sin of which he was accused, which he had never been willing to confess even to his own abbot. But the man denied everything and asked that the body of the Lord be given to him. Abbot Hugh urged him not to presume to receive the body of the Lord unless he had first confessed well. But the man, saying that he had confessed well, insisted that the body of the Lord be brought to him.

When the priest brought it and placed it in his mouth, the man immediately began to cry: "What shall I do, wretched man? What shall I do?" Then the priest removed from his mouth the body of the Lord which he held upon his tongue, and the man immediately expired.

When this same abbot was once sick, he entered the dormitory and saw upon the shoulder of the infirmarian monk a dove whiter than snow. When that monk wished to seize it, it flew to the abbot and entered his bosom. Afterward it went out through the opening of the abbot's tunic, fixed its beak in that abbot's ear, and said to him in human words: "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Prepare yourself, prepare yourself. Saint Bernard commands you to go and make peace between the pope and the emperor of Germany." Having received the saint's admonition, he afterward made peace between them.

When Clement III migrated from this light, in the year of the Lord 1190 Celestine III, the one hundred eighty-second pope, undertook the government of the Roman Church. He governed the Church for six years and nine months, and died. At the beginning of his pontificate he crowned Emperor Henry at Rome. In that year there was an eclipse of the sun. In the year of the Lord 1195, when a storm of great violence arose, stones fell from heaven with the rain.

When Celestine died, Innocent III, praiseworthy in all things, succeeded him. He will be discussed at the beginning of the title after the following one.

Title XVII, Chapter II

In the time of Pope Innocent II and blessed Bernard, about the year of the Lord 1140, the glorious pontiff Saint Malachy migrated to God in the monastery of Clairvaux. Blessed Bernard himself described his life, full of virtues, as Vincent reports in the Historical Mirror, Book XXVIII. Hence the things which follow are excerpted from it.

Bernard says: “It has indeed always been a worthwhile labor to describe the illustrious lives of saints, so that they may serve as a mirror and an example and as a certain seasoning, as it were, for the life of men upon earth. For by this means they live among us in a certain manner after death, and provoke and recall to true life many of those who, while living, are dead.

“But now the rarity of holiness especially requires this; clearly, our age is poor in men. For whom might you show me, even from the number of those who were given as a light to the nations, not smoking from on high rather than flaming? ‘If the light that is in you is darkness,’ he says, ‘how great is the darkness?’ - unless perhaps you say, which I do not believe, that those men shine who regard gain as godliness, who in the Lord’s inheritance seek not the things of the Lord but rather their own things.

“Why do I say ‘their own things’? Let even one who seeks his own and retains his own be perfect and holy, if he restrains his heart and his hands from the goods of others. Nevertheless, let the man who perhaps appears to have advanced this far remember that the same degree of holiness is demanded even from a gentile. For John the Baptist said to the gentiles, ‘Be content with your wages,’ so that they might be saved.

“Yet a law has been prescribed by the apostles for the successors of the apostles: ‘Having food and clothing,’ they say, ‘with these we are content.’ Where do we find this pattern? We find it in books, but not in men. But you have it concerning the just man that the law of God is in his heart, not in a codex. He is perfect who is prepared to lack even necessary things. But let that pass. Would that a limit were set upon superfluous things; would that we did not desire without end. Today the best man is one who is not exceedingly evil.

“Hence, because the holy man has failed from the earth, it seems to me not superfluous to recall into the midst, from those who were redeemed from the earth, the holy man Malachy the bishop, a truly holy man and one of singular wisdom in our times. He indeed was a burning and shining lamp, which nevertheless has not been extinguished but removed.”

This Saint Malachy, Bernard says, arose in Ireland from a barbarous people. There he was reared; there he was educated in letters. Yet he drew nothing from his native barbarity. His parents were great in birth and power, but his mother was more noble both in mind and in blood. From the very beginning she endeavored to make the little child know the ways of life. Thus, a boy in years, he acted as an old man in morals and was free from childish wantonness.

In the city of Armagh, in which Malachy was reared, there was a holy man of exceedingly austere life who had a cell within the church and served God, applying himself to fasts and supplications day and night. Malachy betook himself to this man to receive from him a pattern of life. He too sat in solitude, but within a few days he had not a few imitators, provoked by his example.

At length he was ordained priest in the twenty-fifth year of his age. The bishop also entrusted his own authority to him: to sow holy seed among an unholy people and to give the law of life and discipline to a rude people living without law. He received the command with all eagerness, as one fervent in spirit.

Finally, since he possessed the greatest concern and zeal for the divine worship and the veneration of the sacraments, lest perhaps he teach or establish something concerning these otherwise than the rite of the universal Church held, it entered his mind to approach Bishop Malchus, who would instruct him more fully concerning all things. Malchus was old and full of days, wisdom, and virtues. From the monastic habit in the monastery of Nicomensis [read: Winchester] he had been taken up as bishop in the city of Lesinor [read: Lismore]. There so great a grace was bestowed upon him by God that he was illustrious not only in life and teaching but also in signs.

For by conferring the sacrament of confirmation he healed a boy who was mentally afflicted or lunatic, and he restored hearing to a certain deaf man. Because of the fame of these signs, the Scots and Irish resorted to him as to a father and greatly venerated him. Malachy therefore approached him, was kindly received by him, and remained with him for some years.

After his sister had died, he saw concerning her a vision that must not be passed over. The holy man had abhorred her carnal life, and with so great a zeal that he had vowed that he would not see her while she lived in the flesh. But when she was released from the flesh, he was released from his vow, and he began to see in spirit the woman whom he had been unwilling to see in the flesh.

One night in a dream he heard a voice saying to him that his sister had stood outside in the courtyard and had tasted nothing for thirty whole days. Awakening, he quickly understood through lack of what food she was wasting away. After carefully examining the number of days which he had heard, he found that it was precisely the time since he had not offered bread and wine for her. Then he, who had hated not his sister's soul but her sin, resumed the beneficence which he had discontinued.

Nor was it fruitless. For not long afterward she was seen by him to have reached the threshold of the church, although she was not yet able to enter; she also appeared in a dark garment. Since he persevered, taking care that she should not be deprived on any day of the customary offering, he saw her a second time in a whitish garment, indeed within the church at Mass, but not permitted to touch the altar. At last, the third time, she was seen to be joined to the company of those clothed in white, herself in a white garment. You see, therefore, how greatly the continual prayer of a just man avails, and that the kingdom of heaven suffers violence. For Malachy's prayer opened the kingdom of heaven to this sister.

A rich and powerful man who held the place of Bangor and its possessions, inspired by God, immediately gave all his things into Malachy's hands, and himself also; this man was his maternal uncle. The prince handed over the place of Bangor itself to him so that he might build a monastery there, or rather rebuild it.

For it had once been a most noble monastery under its first father, Congallus, producing many thousands of monks and serving as the head of many monasteries. Those swarms of saints poured themselves out, as though in an inundation, not only into the aforesaid regions but also into foreign nations. From among them Saint Columbanus, ascending to these Gallican regions of ours, constructed the monastery of Luxeuil and became there a great nation. For they say it was so great that, with choirs succeeding one another in turn, the solemnities of divine worship continued in such a way that not even a moment of day or night was vacant from praises. These things have been said concerning the ancient glory of the monastery of Bangor.

It had once been destroyed by pirates. Because of the mark of its ancient dignity, Malachy embraced it as though he were about to replant a certain paradise, and because many bodies of saints slept there. For, to say nothing of those who were buried in peace, they report that nine hundred were killed by pirates in one day.

The place indeed had a great possession, but Malachy, content with the holy place alone, ceded all the possessions and lands to another. Taking about ten brothers with him, he came and began to build the place. One day, while one of the workmen was cutting wood with an axe, as he swung it into the air Malachy incautiously occupied the place toward which the blow was directed. It fell upon his spine with as great an impetus and sound as the force with which the man was able to drive it. The man ran, and all ran together, thinking Malachy either struck unto death or dead. But he was found uninjured, as is believed, through the merits of the holy man.

At the same time a certain man was ill. A devil standing beside him and speaking openly suggested that he should never believe Malachy's words, but that if Malachy entered to him, he should attempt to kill him with a knife. When this became known, those who ministered to the sick man, the sick man himself betraying the word, brought it to Malachy and forewarned him. But Malachy, taking up the customary arms of prayer, fearlessly attacked the enemy and drove away both the illness and the demon. In the same place he healed a cleric grievously ill with dysentery, and cured the same man when a second time he languished most gravely in body and mind.

Concerning his acts in the episcopate. When the episcopal see was vacant in one of the cities which had long been without a shepherd, Malachy was unwilling to assent to those who had elected him. Yet, when they persisted, he at last yielded, since the command of his master and also of the metropolitan was added to this. Therefore, in the thirtieth year of his age, he was consecrated and introduced as bishop of Connor.

When he began to act according to his office, the man of God then understood that he had been sent not to men but to beasts. He had never yet experienced such persons in any degree of barbarity; nowhere had he found persons so arrogant in morals, so beastly in rites, so impious toward the faith, so barbarous toward laws, so stiff-necked toward discipline, so filthy in life - Christians in name, pagans in fact. They did not give tithes or first fruits, did not enter legitimate marriages, did not make confessions or penances, nor was anyone found who sought penance or who gave it. In the churches neither the voice of a preacher nor of one singing was heard.

What, therefore, was the athlete of the Lord to do? He must either yield shamefully or contend dangerously. But he who recognized himself as a shepherd, not a hireling, chose to stand rather than flee, prepared, if necessary, to give his soul for his sheep, although all were wolves and there were no sheep. The intrepid shepherd therefore stood in the midst of the wolves, resourceful in every manner by which he might make sheep from wolves.

He admonished publicly, rebuked privately, wept for individuals, and addressed them now harshly and now gently, according as he perceived to be expedient for each. How often he spent whole nights awake for them, extending his hands in prayer. When they were unwilling to come to the church, he met them throughout the villages and streets; going about the city, he sought someone whom he might gain for Christ. He frequently traversed also the countryside and towns outside, with that holy company of his disciples who were never absent from his side. He did not ride a horse but went on foot, proving himself in this to be an apostolic man.

How much he endured from the very persons to whom and for whom he spoke good things. When blasphemed, he entreated; when injured, he opposed the shield of patience. At last hardness yielded and barbarity grew quiet. Ecclesiastical customs were received everywhere, while contrary customs were cast down. Basilicas were rebuilt; clergy were ordained in them; the solemnities of the sacraments were celebrated according to rite; confessions were made; the peoples assembled at church; and the solemnity of marriages gave honor to what had been concubinage.

Finally, all things were so changed for the better that today there applies to that nation what the Lord says through the prophet: “Those who formerly were not my people are now my people.”

Section II

Concerning his assumption to the archbishopric. It happened that the archbishop named Celsus became ill; he had ordained Malachy as deacon, priest, and bishop. Knowing that he would die, Celsus made as it were a testament that Malachy ought to succeed him, because no one appeared more worthy of the primatial see.

But a most evil custom had grown up through the diabolical ambition of certain powerful men: the holy see had been held in hereditary succession. They did not permit anyone to be made bishop unless he belonged to their tribe and family. The execrable succession had advanced no small distance, nearly fifteen generations having already passed in this wickedness, and it had established for itself so firmly a wicked right - rather, an injury deserving punishment by every death - that although clerics of that bloodline sometimes failed, bishops never did. Indeed, before Celsus there had already been eight married men without holy orders, although learned men.

From this came throughout all Ireland that dissolution of ecclesiastical discipline, weakening of censure, and emptying of religion which we discussed above. Grieving deeply over these things, Celsus took care in every way to have Malachy as his successor, because he trusted that through him the badly rooted succession could be torn out, since he was dear to all, all emulated him, and the Lord was with him. Nor was Celsus frustrated in his hope.

For when he died, Malachy was substituted - yet not immediately, nor easily. Behold, from the wicked seed there came one named Maurice to occupy the place. For five years, relying upon secular power, he lay upon the Church, not as a bishop but as a tyrant. For the wishes of the devout had converged rather upon Malachy.

At length they urged him to undertake the burden according to Celsus’s ordinance. But he, who declined everything exalted, seemed to himself to have obtained a good occasion for excuse, because during that time his entrance could not be peaceful. He therefore said that it was not his part for human blood to be shed on his account, and finally that he was joined to another bride whom he was not permitted to dismiss.

But when they insisted to the contrary and cried that the word had gone forth from the Lord, and when with all authority they commanded him to undertake the burden and threatened anathema, he said: “You lead me to death, but I obey in hope of martyrdom, yet upon this condition: that when the Church has peace, it may be permitted me to return to my former church when another has been found.” When they assented to this condition, the holy man yielded to their will, or rather to God’s, by whom it had already been shown to him.

For while Celsus was ill, a woman appeared to Malachy as he prayed, saying that she was the wife of Celsus, that is, his church. Handing him a pastoral staff, she disappeared. And as Celsus died, he sent his staff to Malachy as to the one who would succeed him.

Nevertheless, on undertaking the burden of that dignity, Malachy did not enter the city for as long as that occupier lived, lest anyone should happen to die on this account. But outside the city he vigorously exercised the episcopal work throughout the whole province. When the intruded Maurice had in a short time been taken from their midst, a certain Nigellus - black in name, or rather blackest in truth - again seized the see. Dying, Maurice had left him as heir of this dignity for the accumulation of his own damnation, for Nigellus was his kinsman.

But the king, the bishops, and the faithful of the land assembled so that Malachy might be introduced. Behold, a council of malignant men stood against them. A certain one of the sons of Belial, ready for malice and powerful in wickedness, knowing the place where they ought to assemble and the road by which they would come to the place, set armed retainers in ambush to kill the innocent people as they came, together with the king and the bishop himself.

When this became known to Malachy, he entered the church and poured out prayer concerning it. Behold, cloud, mist, and dark water turned day into night; lightning, thunder, the spirit of storms, and all the neighboring elements threatened death. The man who had been the chief author of the evil perished by a thunderbolt, with three other accomplices struck down. That just tempest assailed only those who sought the soul of the just man.

Section III

Thus, in the thirty-eighth year of his age, the poor man Malachy, after the occupier had been driven out, entered Armagh as pontiff and metropolitan of all Ireland. When the king and the others who had introduced him returned to their own affairs, he remained in the hand of God, and there remained for him fights without and fears within. For behold, the viperous offspring, gnashing and crying out that it was being disinherited, aroused itself wholly, within and without, against him and his company.

Nigellus, seeing flight threaten him, took with him certain insignia of that see: namely the Book of the Gospels which had belonged to blessed Patrick, and a staff covered with gold and adorned with most precious gems, which they call the Staff of Jesus because, as opinion reports, the Lord Jesus himself held and fashioned it with his own hands. These things are of the highest dignity and veneration among that nation.

That wandering man, another Satan, went about the earth carrying the sacred insignia. Displaying them everywhere, he was everywhere received on their account. But it was resolved to pursue the schismatic, because he seduced many by the insignia which he carried, persuading all that he ought to be bishop. Thus he stirred up the peoples against Malachy and the unity of the Church.

But through God's grace, and through the favor which he possessed among all, Malachy blocked all his ways so easily and in so short a time that the malignant man was compelled to surrender, restore the insignia, and remain thereafter in complete subjection.

God reproved not only Malachy's evildoers but also his detractors. A certain man, for example, possessed the favor of princes and powerful men, even of the king himself, because he was a flatterer, garrulous, and powerful in speech. He favored Malachy's adversaries in all things and insolently defended their party. He even resisted the saint to his face and irreverently disparaged him in his absence, confronting him everywhere, especially where he knew that Malachy would be present at more crowded assemblies.

But he was quickly presented with the worthy reward of his insolent tongue. The cursing tongue swelled and rotted, worms teeming from it and flowing throughout the blasphemous mouth. Vomiting them without cease for nearly seven days, he at last ended his wretched life with them.

While Malachy was once speaking to the people, a certain unhappy woman dared to interrupt his sermon with wicked cries. She belonged to the impious stock of the intruders and vomited insults and blasphemies against the saint, calling him a hypocrite and invader of another's inheritance and reproaching him for his baldness. He answered her nothing, as he was modest and mild. But the Lord answered for him. She was turned to insanity and cried repeatedly that she was being suffocated by Malachy. At last by a horrible death she paid the penalty of blasphemy.

Mindful of his purpose, Malachy appointed in his own place Gelasius, a good man worthy of such an honor, the clergy and people consenting, or rather enduring it because of the compact, for otherwise it seemed altogether hard to them. When Gelasius had been consecrated and earnestly commended to kings and princes, Malachy himself, illustrious through miracles and triumphs, returned to his own parish.

Once, departing from Scotland, the holy man turned aside to Clairvaux. After seeing the brothers he was moved to compunction, and they were greatly edified by his presence and speech. Embracing the place and us in his deepest heart, he bade us farewell and departed.

When he had crossed the Alps and came to Ivrea, a city of Italy, he immediately healed his host's little son, who was so ill that he was about to die. At that time Pope Innocent II of happy memory occupied the Apostolic See. He received Malachy kindly and humanely when he approached him. With many tears Malachy implored the pope's permission that it might be lawful for him to live and die at Clairvaux, but he did not obtain it.

Returning by Clairvaux, he bestowed upon us a second blessing. Drawing deep sighs because he was not permitted to remain according to his desire, he said: "Meanwhile retain these men in my place, so that they may learn from you what they may afterward teach us." He left four of his companions and departed. Found approved and worthy, they became monks.

Departing from us, he came prosperously to Scotland and found King David, who remains alive even today, in a certain castle of his. The king's son was sick unto death. Malachy entered to him and was honorably received by the king, who humbly entreated him to heal his son. Malachy sprinkled the living one [read: young man] with water which he had blessed and, looking upon him, said: "Take confidence, son; you will not die this time." On the following day health followed, and the exultation of the whole household followed his health. He restored speech to a mute girl. Another woman, whose limbs were disabled and who had been carried to him in a cart, returned upon her own feet.

Section IV: Concerning His Conduct

Whoever might enumerate all the miracles wrought through him, nevertheless I confess that I would more gladly linger over those things which are to be imitated than over those which are to be admired. And in my judgment the first and greatest miracle which he exhibited was he himself, that is, his life.

Who, even if he watched curiously, ever detected in him an idle thing - I do not say an idle word, but even a gesture? Who saw him move a hand or a foot in vain? Indeed, who saw anything in his gait, gaze, dress, or countenance which did not edify? Finally, neither sorrow clouded the cheerfulness of his countenance nor laughter made it frivolous. Everything in him was disciplined; everything was distinguished, a model of virtue and perfection. In all things he was serious, but not austere; relaxed at times, but never dissolute; neglectful of nothing, although according to the occasion he dissembled many things; often quiet, but never idle.

From the first day of his conversion until the end of his life he lived without property of his own. He possessed neither male servants nor female servants, neither estates nor villages, nor, finally, anything from secular or ecclesiastical revenues. Even in the episcopate there was absolutely nothing established or assigned for the episcopal table from which the bishop might live. Indeed, he did not even possess a house of his own.

Rather, he went about almost without ceasing through all the parishes, serving the Gospel and living from the Gospel, just as the Lord appointed for him. But if at times it was fitting for him to rest, he did this in the holy places which he himself had scattered throughout all Ireland. With those among whom he chose to make a stay, he conformed himself to their customs and observances. And when he went out to preach, he himself went on foot with those who were on foot - a bishop, to be sure, and a legate.

This is the apostolic form, and it is the more wonderful in Malachy inasmuch as it is exceedingly rare in others. They exercise dominion among the clergy; he, although free from all, made himself the servant of all. They eat without evangelizing; Malachy eats in order that he may evangelize. They gather into barns and fill wine vessels, from which they may load their tables; Malachy gathers into deserts and solitary places, from which he may fill the heavens. They exact from the poor what they may give to the rich; he solicits the rich so that the poor may be sustained. They raise lofty palaces and lift towers and walls to the heavens; Malachy does not have a place where he may lay his head. He does the work of an evangelist. They do not even know their peoples; he instructs them. They honor powerful men and tyrants; he punishes them.

O apostolic man, whom so many and such great signs of his apostleship ennoble! What wonder, then, if he wrought wonders, since he himself was also wonderful? Or rather, it was not he, but God in him. “You are the God,” he says, “who works wonders.”

In a region of Ireland a sick man lay in a house, afflicted indeed by the sorcery of demons. For on a certain night he heard them saying to one another: “Take care lest this wretched man—that hypocrite’s brother [read: omit ‘brother’]—touch that hypocrite’s bed or bedding, and so escape our hands.” The man understood that they were speaking of Malachy, whom he remembered had passed the night in that same house not long before, and whose bedding still remained in the place.

Having taken confidence, he began to crawl as well as he could, weak in body but strong in faith. And behold, there was shouting and an outcry in the air: “Stop him, stop him! Hold him, hold him! For we are losing our prey.” But he, supporting himself upon his knees and hands and reaching the bed, climbed upon it and rolled himself in the bedding. He heard the howling of those who lamented: “Alas, alas! We ourselves have betrayed him. We have been deceived. He has escaped.” When this had been said, all the terror and horror of the demons from which he was suffering, and likewise every illness, withdrew from him more swiftly. In another place Malachy also freed a demoniac infant who had been brought to him.

Section V: Again Concerning His Miracles

The saint was sitting with the count of Ulidia in a field, discussing certain matters, and a numerous multitude was around them. A pregnant woman came, truly heavy. For she declared that, contrary to all the laws of nature, she had retained the child for fifteen months and twenty days as now established with certainty. Malachy, moved by compassion, prayed, and the woman gave birth.

A city of Ireland named Cork was without a bishop. While they were treating of the election, the parties divided, each group wishing, as is customary, to appoint its own bishop and not God’s. Malachy came there and, having heard of the dissension, summoned the clergy and people and took care to unite the wishes and hearts of those who were divided. He persuaded them that the entire affair ought to be committed to the one upon whom chiefly rested the care of the churches of Ireland.

Immediately he named for them a holy and learned man. He was sought, and when found was reported to be lying sick and unable to leave his bed. Malachy said: “Let him rise in the name of the Lord. I command it. Obedience will make him well.” Therefore, while the will to obey struggled against a twofold enemy - namely, the weight of his illness and fear of the burden - obedience itself conquered. For, having recovered his strength, he came by himself to Malachy, who placed him in the episcopal chair while the clergy and people praised the choice together.

When the wife of a certain nobleman was sick unto death, Malachy was asked to come down before the sick woman died in order to anoint her with oil. He came down and entered where she was. On seeing him she rejoiced, animated by the hope of salvation. When he was preparing to anoint her, however, it seemed to everyone better that it be deferred until morning, for it was evening. The saint therefore yielded to them. When he had withdrawn, a sudden cry and lamentation arose because she had died.

Hearing the tumult, Malachy hurried back and was struck down in spirit, imputing to himself alone that the woman had died deprived of the grace of the sacrament. Raising his hands to heaven and confessing his fault, he declared in the hearing of all that he would receive no consolation unless he were permitted to restore the grace which he had taken away. Standing over her throughout the entire night, he labored in his groaning. He also commanded his companions to keep vigil and pray. Thus they passed the sleepless night, some in psalms and he in tears.

When morning came, the Lord heard his saint. For the woman who had died opened her eyes, raised herself, and greeted him; and mourning was turned into joy.

There was a certain woman over whom the spirit of anger and fury so exercised dominion that not only her neighbors and relatives fled her company, but even her own sons could scarcely live with her. She was brought to Malachy and, after she had made confession as he had commanded, he prayed for her and converted her to the highest gentleness, so that she could not be provoked by any losses or insults. I judge this miracle to be preferred to the preceding miracle in which the dead woman was raised, because there the outward person revived, but here the inward person.

When Malachy was offering the sacraments and a deacon approached him in order to perform something belonging to his office, the priest looked upon him and groaned, because he perceived that something unfitting lay concealed within him. When the sacrifice had been completed, Malachy carefully questioned him in private concerning his conscience. He confessed and did not deny that he had been deluded by a dream that night. Imposing penance upon him, Malachy said: “You ought not to have ministered today, but modestly to have withdrawn yourself from sacred things and to have shown reverence toward such great and divine mysteries, so that, purified by this humility, you might thereafter have become worthier.”

On another occasion, while Malachy was celebrating, a deacon saw a dove enter through the window with great brightness, in order to manifest his purity. These few things have been related from among many, from which it appears sufficiently how great my Malachy was in merit, since he was distinguished by so many wonders even amid so great a scarcity of holiness.

Section VI: Concerning His Death and Place of Burial

When he was once asked in what place, if the choice were given him, he would prefer to spend his final day, he said: “If I depart from here, nowhere would I do so more gladly than where I may rise together with our apostle.” He was speaking of Saint Patrick. “But if it is necessary to die abroad, and God permits it, I have chosen Clairvaux.” When he was asked about the time, he answered: “The solemn day of all the departed.” As we heard, so we saw concerning the place and the day.

He bore it very grievously that Ireland had until then lacked the pallium, for he was a zealous guardian of the sacraments. Remembering that this had been promised to him by Pope Innocent II, and having obtained the opportunity that Pope Eugenius was presiding and had then drawn near to France, he presumed that with such a man he would encounter no difficulty in obtaining it. He therefore undertook the journey. The brothers who had assembled accompanied him as far as the shore, but not very far because he himself, of course, forbade it.

One of them, named Catholicus, said to him in a tearful voice: “Alas, you are departing and leaving me to daily affliction by so great a suffering. You are not ignorant of it, yet you do not bring help, having compassion upon me.” Moved in the depths of his mercy by these words, Malachy embraced him, impressed the sign of the cross upon his breast, and said: “Be certain that you will suffer nothing of this kind until I return.” For he was epileptic and frequently fell, and had now suffered this for six years. But at this word of Malachy he recovered perfectly.

When they had boarded a ship and had now completed half the voyage over the sea, a contrary wind suddenly drove the ship and brought it back to land. But when calm had arisen, they continued the journey and came with a prosperous course to Scotland; from there he crossed into England.

It was necessary for him to pass through Clairvaux so that he might follow the supreme pontiff. He was received by us as a true Dayspring, coming from the west and visiting us from on high. On the solemn day of blessed Luke the Evangelist, after Mass had been devoutly celebrated in the community, Malachy was seized by fever and lay down upon a bed.

You would have seen the brothers running about, eager to give or to receive. All were solicitous in frequent service: to seek medicines, to apply warm compresses, and often to urge him to taste something. He said to them: “These things are without purpose, but out of regard for your charity I do whatever you enjoin. Malachy must depart from the body this year.”

Finally, he was anointed and, after receiving the viaticum and commending himself to the prayers of the brothers, he returned to his bed. He lay in an upper chamber, and he did not permit the community to ascend to him; rather, he himself descended to them. And yet he said that death was at the doors. Who would have believed that this man was about to die? His countenance did not appear paler or more emaciated. His forehead was not wrinkled, his eyes were not sunken, his nostrils were not narrowed, his lips were not contracted, his teeth were not parched, his neck was not wasted and thin, his shoulders were not bent, nor was the flesh in the rest of his body emptied away. This was his body, and this the glory of his countenance.

Indeed, the eyes of all were fixed upon him, and yet no one could have turned them away when he departed, because in death the same liveliness of countenance and the same serenity remained as in life. He was not changed; rather, he changed everyone. A wonder indeed: the weeping and groaning of all suddenly ceased; sorrow was changed into joy; song shut out lamentation; faith conquered; affection triumphed.

And in truth, what reason is there to mourn Malachy without measure, as though his death were not precious, as though it were not sleep rather than death, as though it were not rather the gate of life? Malachy our friend sleeps, and shall I mourn? If the Lord gave sleep to his beloved, and such a sleep in which the inheritance of the Lord is sons, the reward the fruit of the womb, which of these things seems to summon weeping? Shall I not refrain from weeping for the one who has escaped weeping? He exults, he triumphs, he has been brought into the joy of his Lord, and shall I mourn him?

When all things had now been duly performed, a boy applied his withered arm to the hand of the bishop lying upon the bier and was healed. Malachy was buried in the oratory of blessed Mary in the year of the Lord 1148, on the fourth day before the Nones of November.

Title XVII, Chapter III: Saint Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury

Saint Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, was in his youth very pleasing to everyone. But when he saw many things done in the court of the king of England which were contrary to piety and chastity, he left the court and committed himself to Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury. Faithfully contending in many matters against the barons of the English who opposed the Church, he went to Rome many times and always dispatched every affair faithfully and successfully. Therefore the archbishop of Canterbury made him archdeacon.

When that same archbishop perceived that a sufficiently harmful king of England had died and that Henry, still exceedingly young, had succeeded to the kingdom, he feared that through the impulse of his youth and the counsels of wicked men he would oppress the Church more grievously. He therefore made blessed Thomas the king's chancellor, so that by his integrity and prudence he might temper the savagery of malignant men. Thomas so pleased the king that, after the archbishop's death, the king took care to have him appointed over that same church.

But Thomas, considering the conduct of the king and the nobles and the effective malice of detractors, refused as much as he could that see, which was filled more with burden than with honor. At last, however, when the king pressed him and a certain cardinal of Rome also urged it, he consented to this.

Immediately after he was consecrated, he changed himself wonderfully. For, always intent upon reading and prayer, and afflicting his flesh beyond endurance with a hairshirt and fasts, he so subtly concealed his holiness that under the respectability of his clothing, the preparation of his utensils, and the cheerfulness of his countenance he conformed to the people in all things. But in a more secret little chamber, bending his knees, he washed the feet of thirteen poor men every day. After giving each a full meal, he distributed four silver coins to each. If at any time he could not do this himself, he caused it to be done most diligently through a deputy.

But the devil, seeing that the holy man would greatly benefit the Church, envied him. He stirred up another archbishop and many other bishops, who were bound to defend the Church, for his destruction. For when the king and his counselors endeavored by promises and flatteries to bend Saint Thomas to their will, to the detriment of the Church, he resisted altogether. Therefore, through the rigor of justice, he provoked the anger of the king and his princes against himself.

After innumerable persecutions and injuries, when the barons and bishops had assembled at a certain place, the king insistently demanded that the customs which the kings of England had been accustomed to possess within the Church should be most firmly observed, so that they might dispose of ecclesiastical and spiritual dignities. Saint Thomas and the bishops, considering this and seeing danger on both sides - namely, either a crisis for faith and salvation, which was then pressing, or an intolerable war against the Church - would gladly have deferred that affair if they had been able. But, under the pressure of necessity and deceived by the counsels of great men, blessed Thomas consented verbally that the petition be granted. Thus he and the bishops, although with injury to the cause, escaped the danger of death.

But blessed Thomas, in this deliverance of bodies fearing the death of souls, afflicted himself more grievously in penance and suspended himself from service at the altar, until, having confessed and repented, he merited release by the pope. Yet not even thus did the king's anger rest. Rather, with threats and terrors he demanded that the customs which he was striving to introduce against the Church should be confirmed by the letters of the archbishops and bishops.

But blessed Thomas, opposing himself fearlessly, was pressed with many losses, injuries, and insults. He appealed to the Apostolic See against the bishops, lest they condemn him unjustly so that even in this way they might flatter the king. But when the nobles did not acquiesce even then, the holy man raised aloft the cross which he held in his hand and departed from the court, while the impious shouted after him: "Seize the thief! Hang the traitor!"

When he had withdrawn to his lodging, two great and faithful nobles came to him by night, weeping and declaring under oath that many nobles had conspired to bring about his death. Therefore, fearing more for the Church than for himself, he fled by night. Hiding by day and walking by night, on the seventeenth day he came to a port; in a little vessel he was carried across to Flanders by two priests. Pope Alexander, who was then residing at Sens, received him honorably and committed him to the monastery of Pontigny.

But the king of England sent bishops and nobles to Rome so that legates might come who would decide the king's affair against the archbishop. He was refused. Therefore the king, angered, ordered the church and all the goods of the archbishop and of his adherents to be confiscated, and all without exception who belonged to him to be condemned to exile.

Thomas, however, remaining at Pontigny and afflicting himself with fasts and prayers, continually prayed for the Church, for the king, and for the kingdom of the English. But through the abbots of the Cistercian Order he was compelled by the king to leave the monastery. Therefore he betook himself to Louis, king of France, who received him reverently and kindly supplied his necessities until peace should be made.

At last the archbishop of Sens, taking pity upon the desolation of the English Church, went to Rome and obtained a decree that the king should be excommunicated together with his whole kingdom unless peace were restored to the church of Canterbury. Peace was therefore restored, and Saint Thomas returned in the seventh year of his exile and was received honorably.

When the lord pope heard the complaint of Saint Thomas against a certain bishop and against others who favored the king, he suspended all the bishops from their offices or benefices. Therefore the king, exceedingly angered, so oppressed Saint Thomas with losses and injuries that he forbade him, as though he were a traitor, to go outside the enclosure of his church.

At last, when the holy man could be bent neither by force nor by flatteries from always defending the rights of his church, behold, armed knights of the king arrived. Shouting, they asked where the archbishop was among the clerics and monks who were with him in the church. Saint Thomas immediately answered them from the steps of the chancel: “Behold, I am here. What do you wish?”

One of the knights answered: “We wish you to die, because you can live no longer.”

He said: “I am prepared to die for God, for the defense of justice, and for the deliverance or liberty of the Church. But if you seek my head, on behalf of almighty God and under anathema I forbid you to harm anyone except me. I shall indeed die gladly, provided that through my death the Church obtains peace and liberty. Therefore I commend myself and the cause of the Church to God, to blessed Mary, to the patron saints of this church, and to Saint Dionysius.”

When these things had been said, the swords of the executioners were drawn, and he was attacked by the impious. With his head inclined, he was beheaded. And, what is horrible to relate, after the crown of his head had been removed, his brain was scattered over the pavement with his blood and bones.

When, according to custom, he was being clothed in pontifical vestments for burial, they found his body wrapped in a hairshirt filled with lice and worms, and the garments upon his thighs as far as the backs of his knees were likewise of haircloth.

But the fury of the impious did not rest with these things. They said that the body of the traitor ought not to be buried among the holy pontiffs, but should be thrown into a marsh or hung upon a gibbet. Holy men, fearing the savagery of the malignant men who were attempting to seize or cast away the saint’s body, buried it before the altar of Saint John the Baptist in a marble tomb, in the year of the Lord 1174 [read: 1170].

Shortly before he returned from exile to his church, however, it had been revealed to him by the Lord that he would return with honor to that church, but after a few days would migrate to the Lord through the palm of martyrdom.

Meanwhile, when a certain young man was sick, his soul departed from his body and afterward returned to it. He said that, having been carried up into heaven, he had seen a certain exceedingly ornate, empty seat situated among the apostles. When that soul asked for whom this magnificent seat was prepared, an angel answered: “It is reserved for a certain great priest of the English.” This was understood concerning blessed Thomas.

Section II: Concerning His Miracles

When the clerics began to sing the Mass of the dead, namely, “Eternal rest,” suddenly, as is reported and as Jacob of Voragine writes, the voices of angels were heard singing together: “The just man will rejoice in the Lord,” and the clerics continued with that text.

The wrath of God raged so greatly against his killers that some tore their fingers to pieces with their teeth; others perished while pus flowed from them; others, undone by paralysis, and others, having been made mad, furnished clear indications of the unjust death inflicted upon the saint.

The Lord also deigned to work many miracles through him by the merits of his saint. For sight was restored to the blind, hearing to the deaf, walking to the lame, and life to the dead.

A certain simple but very devout priest celebrated Mass concerning the Virgin every day, namely, “Hail, holy Mother.” When he was accused before Archbishop Thomas, who was then still among the living, he was summoned by him and, as though an uneducated and ignorant man, was removed from his office.

When blessed Thomas needed to sew his hairshirt and had hidden it under his bed so that he might find a suitable hour for sewing, blessed Mary appeared to that priest and said: “Go to the archbishop and tell him that she for love of whom you used to say those Masses has sewn his hairshirt, which is in such a place, and I have left there the red thread with which I sewed it. She therefore sends word to you that you ought to relax the interdict which you made for me.” Hearing this, he was astonished and relaxed it for him. But he commanded him to keep this very thing hidden during his lifetime.

A certain woman from England desired to have eyes of differing colors on account of wantonness and beauty. Making a vow concerning this, she visited the tomb of blessed Thomas with bare feet. When she had lain prostrate in prayer, she rose and found herself completely blind. Immediately repenting, she began to ask blessed Thomas to restore to her, no longer eyes of differing colors, but at least her own. At last, with much difficulty, she was scarcely able to obtain this.

A certain bird which had learned some speech, like a magpie, was being pursued by a hawk. As it had learned, it began to cry: “Saint Thomas, help me! Saint Thomas, help me!” Immediately the hawk fell dead, and the other bird escaped.

A certain man whom Saint Thomas had greatly loved during his life became sick and went to the saint’s tomb, asking to recover his health, which he immediately received in full. But when he had returned home, he thought within himself that perhaps that illness had been given to him for his salvation and would be more useful to his soul than health. Returning to the saint’s tomb, he asked that Saint Thomas obtain for him from the Lord whichever was more expedient for his salvation, whether illness or health. It came to pass that the illness returned to him.

The Lord wrought many other signs through him. Therefore he was also inscribed by Alexander III in the catalogue of the saints.

Title XVII, Chapter IV: The Vision of Tundal

Vincent narrates in the Historical Mirror, Book Twenty-eight, Chapter Seventy-eight and the following chapter, that in the year in which Saint Malachy died - namely, as has been seen, in the year of the Lord 1148 - the vision of Tundal occurred in Ireland.

This Tundal, who originated from Ireland, was noble in birth but degenerate in conduct. He was cruel, distinguished in bodily form, robust in strength, and in no way solicitous concerning the salvation of his soul. He bore it grievously if anyone spoke to him about the salvation of his soul. He neglected the Church and did not even wish to see the poor of Christ.

God, wishing to lead him back to the way of truth, suddenly drew his soul out of his body while he was eating with a companion, so that he might see the condition of the other life, the immense punishments of the wicked, and the glory of the blessed who live well here; and so that, when that soul at last returned to the body, he might change his conduct because of the things which he had seen and heard and, by relating them to others, provoke them to a better life.

From the tenth hour on the fourth day of the week until the same hour on the Sabbath, his body lay without a soul. Because a little warmth remained in the left part of his breast, which was perceived by those who touched him, they kept him unburied. But when he revived on the Sabbath, he began to say: “O God, your mercy is greater than my iniquity, although it is exceedingly great. How many great and evil tribulations you have shown me; and, turning, you have given me life, and from the abysses of the earth you have brought me back again.” He narrated all the things which he had seen and suffered.

“When my soul put off the body, conscious of its guilt, it began to fear and did not know what it should do. Therefore, weeping, lamenting, and trembling, it trusted in nothing except the mercy of God. At last it saw so great a multitude of unclean spirits coming toward it that they filled not only the entire house and the courtyard of the house, but also the streets and squares of the city.

“Surrounding the wretched soul, they said: ‘Let us sing for this wretched soul the song of death which is its due, because it is a daughter of death, food for inextinguishable fire, a friend of darkness, and an enemy of light.’ Turning toward it, they gnashed their teeth against it and, in their excessive fury, tore their most foul cheeks with their own claws, saying: ‘Behold, wretched one, the people whom you chose, with whom you will enter hell to burn: nurse of scandal, lover of discord. Why are you not proud now? Why do you not commit adultery? Where is your vanity and your gladness? Where is your immoderate laughter? Where is your strength? Why do you not devise evil with a wicked heart, as you were accustomed to do?’

“While they were saying these things, it saw from afar something coming like a most brilliant star. Fixing its unwearied gaze upon it, the soul hoped that it would obtain some consolation. It was its angel. When he had drawn near, he greeted Tundal by his own name, saying: ‘Hail, Tundal. What are you doing?’

“Seeing that exceedingly beautiful young man and hearing himself greeted by his own name, Tundal said with fear and joy together: ‘Alas, lord and father! The groanings of death have surrounded me; the pains of hell have surrounded me.’

“The angel said to him: ‘Now you call me father and lord, though you always had me with you and never judged me worthy of such a name.’

“Tundal said to him: ‘Lord, where did I ever see you? Or where did I ever hear your most sweet voice?’

“The angel said to him: ‘I always followed you from your birth wherever you went, and you were never willing to acquiesce in my counsels.’ Extending his hand toward one of the unclean spirits who insulted him above the other accursed spirits, the angel said: ‘Behold the one whose will and counsels you obeyed. But the mercy of God, which nevertheless you did not merit, will be present to you. Follow me, and retain in your mind whatever you learn from the things which I show you, because you will return again to the body.’

“Then the soul of Tundal, terrified beyond measure, left its body, above which it had been standing, and approached nearer. The demons, seeing this and seeing that they could not inflict upon it the evils which they threatened and which it had merited, blasphemed God, saying that he was unjust because he did not render to each according to his works. After this they rose against one another and struck one another with whatever blows they could; and, leaving behind an excessive stench, they withdrew with immense sorrow and indignation.”

The angel, going before, said to Tundal: “Follow me.” The angel therefore led Tundal’s soul to diverse places of punishment and to a dark and terrible valley covered by the gloom of death. It was deep and filled with burning coals. Its stench surpassed all the tribulations which he had suffered in the world. There was an iron plate there upon which a multitude of souls descended. They were burned there until they melted like fat in a frying pan, and thus they were strained as wax is customarily strained through cloth.

The angel said to Tundal: “This is the punishment of those who kill fathers, those who kill brothers, and murderers.”

From there the angel led him to another place, where there was a great and tempestuous lake whose waves rose exceedingly high. There was a multitude of terrible beasts roaring so that they might devour souls. Over the lake was a very narrow bridge. Its length was two miles, but its width one palm. The plank of that bridge across which the passage ran was filled with exceedingly sharp iron nails driven into it, which pierced the feet of all who crossed.

Those horrible beasts were as tall as towers. Dwelling in the lake, they devoured the souls which could not cross the bridge, and fire came forth from their mouths. He saw there a certain soul upon the bridge, weeping greatly and accusing itself of many crimes. It was burdened by the great weight of sheaves of grain and was compelled to cross that bridge. Although it grieved exceedingly over the soles of its feet pierced by the nails, nevertheless it feared still more to fall into the lake and enter the open mouths of the beasts.

When Tundal asked what this was, the angel answered: “This punishment is especially fitting for you and for those like you who commit theft, whether great or small, although the one who commits a small theft does not suffer as grievously as the one who commits a great one. But those who transgress under the habit of religion are especially guilty. Therefore you must cross this bridge, lead an untamed cow with you, and deliver it to me unharmed beyond the bridge, because you once stole your godfather’s cow.”

Tundal said to him: “Lord, did I not restore it?”

He said: “You restored it, but only when you could not hide it, and therefore you will not suffer the full punishment, because it is a lesser evil to will evil than to accomplish it.”

When these things had been said, the angel showed him an untamed cow. Tundal therefore took hold of the cow and, provoking it with whatever threats he could, tried to lead it to the bridge. But the beasts came roaring and took their food from the bridge, namely, from those who fell from it.

Tundal therefore began to make his journey across the bridge, but the cow resisted following him. When Tundal stood, the cow fell; and when the cow stood, Tundal fell. Thus in turn, now standing and now falling, with the greatest difficulty he came to the middle of the bridge.

When they had come there, they saw a certain man coming toward them across that bridge. He carried sheaves of wheat which he had stolen during his life. The man asked Tundal, who was leading the cow, not to occupy the way before him. Tundal, in turn, asked him to permit him to finish his own journey, half of which he had already completed. Neither of them could return or even look back. Thus, standing and weeping, they made the bridge bloody with the blood from the soles of their feet.

When they had now stood for a long time, without knowing how, each saw that he had passed the other. Tundal then saw before him the angel whom he had left behind. The angel said to him: “Welcome. Be concerned no longer about the cow.” When Tundal showed his wounded feet, saying that he could go no farther, the angel answered: “You ought to remember how swift your feet were to shed blood, and therefore destruction and unhappiness are in their ways.” Touching him, the angel healed him.

The angel led Tundal to various places of diverse torments, where souls were tortured in many ways by demons because of diverse vices: pride, gluttony, and lust. From the shameful parts of men and women, both lay and religious, worms sprang forth, and beasts entered through them.

Among other things, he saw Lucifer, the prince of darkness, in the depth of hell. If anyone had a hundred heads and in every head a hundred tongues, he would in no way suffice to narrate what kinds and how great the torments Lucifer suffered. In the magnitude of his body he surpassed all other beasts. So great a multitude of demons and souls surrounded him that it could not be believed that the world from its beginning could have contained so many souls.

He was bound at every joint of his limbs with red-hot iron chains, stretched out over living coals. Holding souls in his hands, he tortured them in diverse ways, and especially wicked prelates and princes, according to the saying: “The powerful will powerfully endure torments.”

Section I: After Many Places of Punishment Had Been Seen

At last the angel led Tundal’s soul to places of glory. He saw a city having very high, splendid, shining, and beautiful walls of silver. Although no gate appeared there, he saw himself admitted within, without knowing the manner.

Looking around, he saw choirs of exultant saints saying: “Glory to you, God the Father; glory to you, God the Son of God; glory to you, Holy Spirit, God.” There were men and women clothed in white and most precious garments without spot or wrinkle, joyful, cheerful, always rejoicing and praising the Holy Trinity. Their harmonious voices produced sounds like a musical melody.

Brightness, pleasantness, joy, beauty, honor, health, eternity, unanimity: one charity belonged to all. Its fragrance surpassed all spices and fragrant substances. The angel showed Tundal the diverse conditions of the blessed in various degrees of heavenly glory: married people who had lived virtuously here were in great glory and joy; the continent were in a greater triumph; virgins and perfect religious were in the greatest.

At last Tundal's soul returned to the body. Rising from the dead, he looked upon the clerics and others standing around him. He devoutly asked for and received the viaticum. Having made confession, he distributed all his possessions to the poor. By narrating every individual thing which he had seen and preaching to the peoples, he converted many to God. He himself undertook a perfect manner of life and rested with a blessed end.

Section II: A Caution Concerning the Vision

Nevertheless, it should be noted that Vincent, in the Historical Mirror at the place cited above, after the narration of these things, which we have greatly abridged, says that this vision is not approved by our doctors, because they posit no intermediate condition of souls between purgatory and paradise.

For if a soul departs from here not fully purified, yet dies in grace, it proceeds to purgatory and remains there in torments until perfect and complete purification. It is not free from torments for any hour or moment until, fully purified, it ascends to glory. But a soul which departs from here fully purified immediately flies to glory. If it dies in mortal sin, it immediately descends to the place of the damned, to be tortured perpetually without any interruption or refreshment.

But in the course of the history of this vision it is said that Tundal saw some who were not perfect in malice or goodness, but were moderately good or moderately evil, and that they were partly in some rest and consolation and partly in some affliction. Concerning a certain King Cormartho [read: Cormachus], who had been his lord in the world, he narrates that he saw him partly in the punishment of fire and that for three hours each day he suffered in fire, but for the remainder of the time, namely twenty-one hours, he had rest.

Therefore these two things are not maintained: namely, that those who are in purgatory are partly in punishment and partly at rest, or that for one hour they are free from punishments and at another time are in punishment. This is much less to be maintained concerning those who are in hell.

What is said in the aforesaid vision, however, that certain souls amid punishments melted in the fire and were strained like wax, is not to be understood literally, because souls lack death and cannot be changed, diminished, or consumed in their substance. Rather, this was said to show the magnitude of that punishment, just as Christ, to show the magnitude of his suffering in the Passion, says through the Psalm: "My heart has become like melting wax."

Likewise, concerning what was said there about the diverse bodily members in which souls or demons suffer, it is not to be believed that either souls or demons have bodily members as mortal human beings do, since they are spirits and without bodily matter. But just as by a similitude we say concerning God that he has a head, eyes, hands, and feet, in order to denote his works, although God is spirit, so also are things said by similitude concerning souls and demons.

For it is necessary through similitudes of material things, which are known to our senses, to treat and speak of spiritual things, so that we may be able to understand something about them. Other visions of souls of this kind are to be understood similarly. And the things which are said about the city of glory - about walls, gold, silver, precious stones, garments, foods, and temporal things of this kind - are to be understood spiritually of spiritual delights which surpass all the delights of this life.

Title XVII, Chapter V: Blessed Bernard, Abbot of Clairvaux

Blessed Bernard of the Cistercian Order, an abbot and extender of the Order, passed from this world to the heavenly Father in the year of the Lord 1153, in the sixty-third year of his age. In the twenty-second year of his age he entered the Cistercian Order, which had been founded or begun fifteen years earlier by Stephen, a most religious man. During his life Bernard founded one hundred sixty monasteries of his Order.

He illuminated the Church by holiness of life, sweetness of teaching, and the glory of miracles, so that he deservedly obtained that name. For ber is said to be a well, and nard is a small herb, warm in nature and fragrant. Thus Bernard was a well or fountain by the profundity of divine wisdom, a little nard by humility, warm by charity, and a fragrance breathing forth by purity of life.

His companion William, abbot of Saint Theodore [read: Saint-Thierry], described his life. This saint, therefore, originated from Burgundy, from the town of Fontaines, and from noble parents. His father, named Tescelin, was in the world a vigorous knight and no less devoted to God. His mother was called Aleth. By him she bore six males, all of whom would become monks, and one female, who became a nun after having been married.

That mother was so religious and dedicated to God that she immediately offered with her own hands to God the child whom she had borne. She avoided having them nourished at other breasts, as though with their mother's milk she were in some manner pouring a good nature into them. When they had grown, for as long as they were under her hand she fed them coarser and common foods, as though they were soon to be sent to a monastery.

When she had now conceived her third son, namely Bernard, and still carried him in her womb, she saw a dream foretelling future things. It seemed to her that she carried in her womb a little dog which was entirely white, reddish over its entire back, and barking. When she had explained this to a certain holy man, he answered with a prophetic voice: "You will be the mother of an excellent little dog, who, as the future guardian of God's house, will give great barks against the enemies of the Church. For he will be an outstanding preacher and by the grace of his medicinal tongue will heal many."

When Bernard was still a boy and was oppressed by a grave pain in his head, a little woman came to him so that she might lessen the pain by incanted charms. Crying out with great indignation, he expelled her. The mercy of God did not fail the boy, who was moved by good zeal; for, rising immediately, he perceived that he had been freed.

On the most sacred night of the Lord's Nativity, while Bernard, still a boy, had risen for the morning office and was waiting in the church, he desired to know at what hour Christ had been born. The infant Jesus appeared to him before his eyes as though then being born from the womb of the Virgin Mother. Therefore, for as long as he lived, he believed this to have been the hour of the Lord's Nativity.

From that hour a more profound understanding and more abundant speech were given to him in those things which pertain to that mystery. Therefore, afterward, among the very beginnings of his treatises, he published a distinguished little work in praise of the Mother and the Son, in which he sweetly explained the Gospel reading, "The Angel Was Sent."

But the ancient enemy, seeing the young man's purpose to be so salutary, envied his chastity and placed many snares of temptation before him. For when at one time he had kept his eyes fixed for some time upon a certain woman, immediately, blushing at himself, he arose as a most severe avenger against himself. Leaping into a pool of icy water, he remained there so long that, having been made almost bloodless, by the grace of God he was completely cooled from the heat of carnal desire.

Again, when he was lodging in the house of a certain matron, she considered the young man, who was handsome in appearance, and burned vehemently with desire for him. When he had caused a bed to be prepared separately for himself, she shamelessly and silently arose and approached his bed. Perceiving her, he immediately cried out: "Thieves! Thieves!" At this cry the woman fled; the household, having been roused, arose; a lamp was lit; the thief was sought but by no means found.

All returned to bed. The others rested, but that wretched woman by no means rested. Rising again, she approached Bernard's bed. He again cried: "Thieves! Thieves!" Everyone arose; the thief was sought, but was by no means disclosed by the one who alone knew her. A third time the wicked woman thrust herself upon him. Repelled in this manner, she scarcely ceased even when overcome by fear or despair.

When on the following day he was making his journey with his companions, they reproached him because he had dreamed of thieves so many times during the night. When they asked the cause, he answered: "Truly, this night I suffered the ambushes of a thief, because my hostess attempted to take from me the irrecoverable treasure of chastity."

Considering, therefore, that it was not safe to dwell together with serpents, he began to meditate upon flight and determined to enter the Cistercian Order. When his brothers learned this and tried in every way to prevent him from this purpose, and when his companions likewise advised him to remain in the world, the Lord bestowed such great grace upon him that not only was he himself not prevented from conversion, but he gained for the Lord all his brothers and companions, disposing them toward religious life.

Guido, the firstborn, although married, now had the purpose of entering religious life, but he could not induce his wife, since she was a young woman, to do the same. The Lord sent a grave illness upon her. In it she perceived the vanity of the world and the brevity of life and, moved by compunction, resolved that if she escaped the illness she would become a nun. This also followed. For, having soon recovered health, she left the world together with her husband: she entered a monastery of nuns, and Guido entered the Cistercian Order.

Gerard, Bernard's brother and a vigorous knight, judged vain the words by which his brother Bernard exhorted him to religious life and entirely rejected his admonitions. Then Bernard, now fiery in faith and wonderfully provoked by zeal for fraternal charity, said: "I know, my brother, I know that affliction alone will give understanding to hearing." Placing his finger upon Gerard's side, he said: "The day will come, and it will come soon, when a lance will pierce this side and will make a way to your heart for the counsel which you reject."

After a few days Gerard was captured by enemies and wounded by a lance in the place where his brother had put his finger. Captured, he was bound in custody. Bernard came to visit him, but when he was not permitted to speak with him, he cried out to him: "Know, Brother Gerard, that very soon we are going to depart and enter a monastery." That same night the fetters fell from Gerard's feet and, when the door opened by itself, he joyfully escaped. He informed his brother that he had changed his purpose and wished to become a monk.

Section II

In the year 1112 from the Incarnation of the Lord, the fifteenth year from the establishment of the Cistercian house, Bernard, the servant of God, being about twenty-two years old, entered the Cistercian Order with more than thirty companions.

When Bernard was departing from his paternal home with his brothers, Guido the firstborn saw Minard, his youngest brother [i.e., Nivard], still a boy, playing in the street with other boys. He said: "Ah, Brother Minard, the whole land of our possession now looks to you alone." The boy answered in a manner not childish: "You therefore have heaven and leave only the earth to me. This division has not been made equitably." He therefore remained with his father for a short time, but afterward followed his brothers.

Having entered the Order, Bernard, the servant of God, was so wholly absorbed in spirit and so given over to God that he no longer used any bodily senses. For he had now spent a year in the novices' cell and still did not know whether the building had a vaulted ceiling. For a long time, entering and leaving the church, he thought that there was only one window at its head, where there were three windows.

The abbot of Citeaux sent brothers to build the house of Clairvaux and appointed Bernard abbot over them. For a long time they lived there in extreme poverty. They often made cooked dishes from beech leaves and ate bread of barley, millet, and vetches.

The servant of God kept vigil beyond human possibility. For he was accustomed to complain that he lost no time more than when he slept. He judged the comparison of death and sleep sufficiently fitting: just as those sleeping appeared dead among human beings, so before God those sleeping in sins were dead. Therefore, if he happened to hear anyone snoring too loudly or saw him lying in a less composed manner, he could scarcely bear it patiently and declared that the man was sleeping carnally or secularly.

Appetite was scarcely drawn to eating by any pleasure. Rather, solely from fear of collapse he approached the taking of food as though to a torment. After eating, he was accustomed to consider how much he had eaten. If he ever found that he had exceeded his customary measure even a little, he did not permit it to pass unpunished.

He had so subdued the allurements of gluttony that to a great extent he lost the very discernment of flavors. For he drank oil which had once been served to him by mistake and remained completely unaware of it. He did not learn what it was until someone wondered why his lips were greasy. He is known to have eaten raw lard, that is, pig fat, which was offered to him by mistake in place of butter, for many days. He said that water alone had flavor for him, because when he drank it, it cooled his jaws and throat.

Whatever he had learned in the Scriptures, he confessed that he had received chiefly by meditating and praying in forests and fields. Among friends he was accustomed to say that he had never had any teachers except oaks and beeches.

He was accustomed to say to novices who wished to enter the Order: “If you hasten toward the things which are within, leave here outside the bodies which you brought from the world. Let spirits alone enter, for the flesh profits nothing.”

His father, who alone had remained at home, went to the monastery and died there after some time in a good old age.

His sister, however, was married in the world. While she was endangered amid the riches and delights of the world, she came on a certain occasion to visit her brothers at the monastery. When she arrived with a proud retinue and display, Bernard shuddered at her as though she were a net of the devil for capturing souls, and he would in no way consent to go out to see her.

When she saw that none of her brothers came to meet her, but that one of them, who was then the porter, called her “dung wrapped up,” she dissolved entirely into tears. She said: “Even if I am a sinner, Christ died for such persons. Indeed, because I perceive that I am a sinner, I therefore seek the counsel and conversation of the good. If my brother despises my flesh, let the servant of God not despise my soul. Let him come and command me, and I shall fulfill whatever he commands.”

Holding her to this promise, Bernard went out to her with his brothers. Because he could not separate her from her husband, he first forbade her every glory of the world and, pointing out to her the model of their mother which she should imitate, dismissed her. Returning, she was so suddenly changed that she led an eremitical life in the midst of the world and made herself altogether a stranger to the entire world. At last, with many prayers, she prevailed over her husband and, released by him, entered a monastery.

Once, when the man of God became sick and seemed now to be drawing his final breath, in an ecstasy of his mind he was ordered to be presented before the tribunal of God. Satan was also present on the opposing side, assailing him with wicked accusations. When Satan had pursued everything and the man of God was about to speak for his own part, Bernard, neither frightened nor troubled, said: “I confess that I am not worthy, nor can I obtain the kingdom of heaven by my own merits. But my Lord possesses it by a twofold right: namely, by the inheritance of the Father and by the merit of the Passion. Content with one, he gives the other to me. Claiming it for myself by right from his gift, I am not confounded.” At this word the enemy was confounded, that assembly was dissolved, and the man of God returned to himself.

He wore away his body by so great abstinence, labor, and vigils that, languishing under a most grave and almost continual illness, he could scarcely follow the community. Once, while he was most gravely ill and the brothers were praying insistently for him, he perceived that he had recovered a little. When the brothers had assembled, he said: “Why do you hold back a wretched man? You are stronger and have prevailed. Spare me, I beg you, spare me, and permit me to depart.”

Section III

On a certain occasion he visited the Carthusian brothers. Although in all things they were greatly edified by him, there was one thing which moved the prior of that place somewhat: the saddle upon which Bernard had sat while riding was insufficiently neglected and displayed poverty too little. When the prior said this to one of the brothers and that brother reported it to the man of God, Bernard, no less astonished, asked what the saddle was like. For he had come from Clairvaux as far as the Charterhouse and yet was entirely ignorant of what the saddle was like.

Likewise, while traveling for an entire day beside Lake Lausanne, he did not see it at all. When, after evening had come, his companions spoke about that lake, he asked them where the lake was. Hearing this, they marveled greatly.

Certainly in him humility of heart overcame sublimity of name. The whole world could not raise him so high as he alone cast himself down. He was considered highest by all, while he considered himself lowest; although everyone preferred him to themselves, he preferred himself to no one.

Finally, as he himself often confessed, amid the highest honors and favors of the peoples, he seemed to himself to have borrowed another man. He judged himself rather to be absent and regarded the whole thing as a certain dream. But when he was among the simpler brothers and was always permitted to enjoy friendly humility, there he said that he had found himself and returned to his own person.

He was always found either praying, writing, meditating, or edifying the brothers by his word.

Once, while he was preaching to the people and all were receiving his words attentively and devoutly, a temptation of this kind crept into his mind: “Truly, now you preach exceedingly well, and you are willingly heard by everyone and considered wise by everyone.” He paused briefly and began to consider whether he should proceed or make an end. Immediately strengthened by divine aid, he silently answered the temptation: “I did not begin through you, nor shall I cease through you.” Thus secure, he continued to the end.

A certain monk who in the world had been a ribald and a gambler, being incited by a malignant spirit, wished to return to the world. When blessed Bernard could not retain him, he asked him whence he would live. The man answered: “I know how to play at dice, and I shall be able to live from that.”

Bernard said: “If I entrust capital to you, are you willing to return to me every year and divide the profit with me?” Hearing this, the man rejoiced and gladly promised that he would do so. Bernard therefore ordered twenty-five solidi to be given to him, and he departed with them. The holy man did this so that he might be able to call him back again, as afterward came to pass.

The monk went away, lost everything, and returned in confusion to the gate of the monastery. Hearing this, the man of God joyfully went out to him and extended his lap so that they might divide the profit together. The monk said to him: “I have gained nothing, Father, but I have also been stripped of your capital. If you wish, receive me in place of your capital.” Bernard kindly answered him: “If it is so, it is better that I receive you than that I lose both together.”

Once, while blessed Bernard was traveling somewhere seated upon a beast of burden, an occasion presenting itself, he complained to a certain countryman concerning the instability of the heart. Hearing this, the man immediately despised him and said that in his prayers he possessed a firm and stable heart.

Wishing to convince him and restrain him from his rashness, Bernard said: “Withdraw from us for a little while and begin the Lord’s Prayer with all the attention you can. If you can finish it without any wandering of the heart, the beast upon which I am sitting will without doubt be yours. But pledge to me on your faith that, if you think of anything else during it, you will not deny it to me.”

The countryman rejoiced and thought that he had already gained the beast. He withdrew confidently and, recollecting himself, began to say the Lord’s Prayer. He had scarcely completed half the prayer when, behold, an importunate thought concerning the saddle thrust itself upon his heart: whether he ought to possess it together with the beast. Perceiving this, he quickly returned to Bernard and disclosed what he had anxiously thought during the prayer. He no longer presumed concerning himself as he had before, that is, concerning firmness of mind in prayer.

Brother Robert, a cleric, his monk and his kinsman according to the flesh, was deceived in his youth by the persuasion of certain persons and, leaving the Cistercian Order, betook himself to the Cluniac Order. After the venerable father had dissembled for a long time, he determined to recall him by a letter. While he dictated it beneath the open sky and another monk wrote from his mouth, a rainstorm suddenly and unexpectedly broke out. The monk who was writing wished to fold the sheet. Bernard said to him: “It is the work of God to write. Do not fear.” Therefore he wrote the letter in the midst of the rain without rain.

When Bernard had constructed a certain monastery, an incredible multitude of flies occupied it, so that they caused grave distress to everyone. On learning this, he said: “I excommunicate them.” When morning came, they were all found dead.

When the blessed man was at Pavia, a certain man brought to him his wife, who was possessed by a demon. Immediately the devil burst forth through the mouth of the wretched woman in insult against him, saying: “This eater of leeks or devourer of cabbages will not drive me out of my little old woman.” But the man of God sent her to the church of blessed Syrus. Blessed Syrus wished to defer to his guest and bestowed no cure upon her. Therefore she was brought again to blessed Bernard.

Then the devil began to chatter through her mouth and say: “This little Syrus will not cast me out from here, nor will Bernard expel me.” Bernard answered him: “Neither Syrus nor Bernard will cast you out, but the Lord Jesus Christ.” As soon as he poured forth prayer, the devil said: “How gladly I would leave this little old woman, being grievously distressed within her. How gladly I would depart, but I cannot, because the great Lord does not will it.”

Bernard said to him: “Who is the great Lord?”

The devil answered: “The Lord Jesus Christ of Nazareth.”

Bernard said: “Have you ever seen him?”

The devil answered: “Certainly.”

Bernard added: “Where did you see him?”

The devil said: “I saw him in glory.”

Bernard said: “And were you in glory?”

The devil answered: “Certainly.”

Bernard said: “How did you depart from it?”

The devil answered: “Many of us fell with Lucifer.”

He spoke all these things with a mournful voice through the woman’s mouth while everyone listened. Bernard said to him: “Would you wish to return to that glory?” The devil, laughing in a strange manner, said: “It is too late.” At last, while the holy man prayed, the devil departed from her.

But when the man of God had gone away, the devil again invaded her. Therefore her husband ran and reported it to Bernard. Then the man of God commanded that a little sheet containing these words be fastened around her neck: “In the name of Jesus Christ, I command you, demon, not to presume any longer to touch this woman.” When this had been done, the devil did not dare to approach her any longer.

While the man of God was staying in Aquitaine in France, having been sent as a legate by the pope so that he might reconcile to the Church the duke of Aquitaine, who fostered the schism by adhering to Peter Leonis the antipope, that duke refused this in every way. The man of God entered to celebrate Mass while the duke, whom he had excommunicated, waited outside.

When Bernard had said, “The peace of the Lord,” he placed the body of Christ upon the paten and, carrying it, went outside to the duke with a fiery face and flaming eyes. He assailed him with terrifying words, saying: “We entreated you, and you despised us. Behold, the Son of the Virgin, the Lord of the Church whom you persecute, has come forth to you. Your judge is present, in whose name every knee is bent. Your judge is present, into whose hands your soul will come. Will you despise him as you have his servants? Resist him, if you can.”

Immediately the duke became entirely rigid and, all his limbs having been loosened, at once fell at Bernard’s feet. The saint of God struck him with his foot and ordered him to rise and hear the sentence of God. Trembling, he arose, fulfilled whatever the holy man commanded, renounced the schism, and adhered to Innocent.

When Saint Malachy, bishop of Ireland, of whom it was related above, had happily migrated to Christ in the monastery of Clairvaux, and blessed Bernard was solemnly chanting the Mass at his obsequies, he knew Malachy’s glory through the Lord’s revelation. Therefore, after Communion, under God’s inspiration he changed the form of the prayer and said with a joyful voice: “Lord, who have equaled blessed Malachy to the merits of your saints,” and so forth. When the cantor indicated to him that he was making an error, Bernard answered: “I do not err, but I know what I am saying.” After Mass he kissed Malachy’s feet.

Section IV

When blessed Bernard had been made abbot of Clairvaux while still quite young, he approached the bishop of Chalons to receive his blessing. He entered the bishop’s house a young man of wasted and almost dying body, with a contemptible appearance, followed by an older monk elegant in bodily size and strength. Some laughed, while others approached them interpreting the matter as it truly was. When it was asked which of them was the abbot, the bishop, having first fixed his eyes upon Bernard, recognized the servant of God.

As in private conversation the young man’s prudence disclosed itself more and more together with his modesty in speaking, there was made between him and that bishop one heart and one soul in the Lord.

After a short time had passed, Bernard’s illness grew so much worse that nothing was now to be hoped for except either his death or a life more grievous than any death. The bishop himself visited him. On seeing him, the bishop said that he had hope not only for Bernard’s life but also for his health if, acquiescing in his counsel, Bernard would permit some care to be expended upon his body according to the measure of his illness.

But because Bernard could not easily be bent away from the rigor of his accustomed practice, the bishop went to the Cistercian chapter. There, before the few abbots who had assembled, by pontifical authority and priestly charity he prostrated his whole body upon the ground and asked and obtained that Bernard be handed over to him in obedience for one entire year. He obtained this.

Returning to Clairvaux, the bishop commanded that a little house be made for Bernard outside the cloister and boundaries of the monastery. He ordained and commanded that no discretion of the Order concerning food, drink, or anything of this kind should be observed toward him there; that no solicitude concerning the entire care of the house should be referred to him; and that he should live there according to the manner established by the bishop.

At that same time I also began to visit Clairvaux. When I visited with another abbot, I found Abbot Bernard, by command of the bishop, at leisure from every care of the house, free for God and himself and exulting as though amid the delights of paradise. When I entered that hut, the house itself impressed upon me so great a reverence for it that it was as though I entered the altar of God.

When Bernard had received us joyfully and we asked what he was doing and how he lived there, smiling upon us in that noble manner of his, he said: “Excellently. I, whom until now rational human beings obeyed, have by God’s just judgment been given over to obey a certain irrational beast.” He was speaking of a certain rustic and vain man who knew absolutely nothing but boasted that he would cure Bernard of the illness from which he labored. The bishop, the abbots, and his brothers had handed Bernard over to obey this man.

Eating there with him, we supposed that so sick a man, entrusted to so much care, was to be cared for as was fitting. But when we saw foods offered to him at the direction of that physician of his which a healthy person would scarcely touch under the distress of hunger, we looked on and wasted away, scarcely restraining ourselves by the silence of the Rule from rising against that man with anger and insults as though against a sacrilegious man and murderer.

But Bernard, against whom these things were done, took everything indifferently and approved all things equally, like one who, his very sense of taste corrupted and almost dead, scarcely distinguished anything by flavor. For he is known to have eaten raw lard by mistake in place of butter for many days, and to have drunk oil in place of water.

At last, Father Bernard returned to the monastery of Clairvaux. With so great a fervor of spirit he nourished his sons by his sweet admonitions and magnificent examples that although they lived in simple dwellings, ate bread not so much branny as earthy, were occupied by hard labors, and their other foods scarcely possessed any flavor, they judged these things to be excessive delights.

They judged every pleasure of the flesh to be an enemy of the soul. Whatever seemed to nourish the flesh with some delight they considered something to be fled like poison. Because of the sweetness of divine love, bitter things seemed sweet to them, and it seemed to them that they lived more delightfully in the desert than they had formerly lived in the world.

Moved by a scruple concerning this, they asked the aforesaid venerable bishop of Chalons, who visited them out of great devotion and affection, and sought his counsel. As a prudent and God-fearing man, he consoled them, removing from their hearts the sting of conscience concerning so great a sweetness which they perceived in their foods, foods which provoked in them nausea rather than pleasure. He brought forward the example of the prophet Elisha, who, after a little flour had been placed in the cooked food set before the sons of the prophets, that is, religious, changed the death which was in the pot and the highest bitterness into sweetness. He explained that this flour was the fervor of charity, which caused harsh things to taste sweet to them; therefore they should entertain no scruple concerning this.

Section V

After Bernard had been freed from the bond of that year of obedience and made subject to his own authority, he returned to his former rigor like a bow released from constraint. One might see a weak and languid man striving after and undertaking whatever he wished, considering less what he was able to do: solicitous for everyone, negligent concerning himself; most obedient to everyone in all things, yet concerning himself scarcely obedient to anyone, whether to charity or to necessity. Counting his former deeds as nothing, he attempted greater ones, adding strength from spiritual pursuits in order not to spare his body. His body, already weakened in itself by various infirmities, he wore down further without interruption by fasts and vigils. He prayed standing by day and by night, until his knees, weakened by fasting, and his feet, swollen from labor, were unable to support his body.

His food was milk with bread, or the water in which legumes had been cooked, or porridges of the kind customarily made for infants. The rest either his infirmity did not accept or he himself refused through zeal for abstinence. If he ever used wine, he did so rarely and in an exceedingly small quantity, since he declared that water agreed better both with his infirmity and with his appetite.

Yet, so affected and exhausted, he scarcely ever allowed himself to be excused from the common labor of the brothers, whether by day or by night, or from the occupations and labors of his office. And when that frequent eruption of undigested matter from the corruption of his stomach through his mouth began to be more troublesome to others, especially in the choir of those chanting the psalms, he nevertheless did not immediately cease attending the brothers' assemblies. Instead, after arranging for a receptacle to be dug in the earth beside the place where he stood, he endured that painful necessity in this way for some time, insofar as he could. But when the intolerable nature of the matter no longer permitted even this, then at last he was compelled to abandon the assemblies and to live separately by himself, except insofar as it was sometimes necessary for him to be present at the brothers' convent for conversation, consolation, or the discipline of the cloister. For who in our age, however robust in body and sound in health, has ever accomplished so much as this man, dying and languishing, both accomplished and accomplishes for the honor of God and the usefulness of the Church?

Section VI

He also shone abundantly with the power of miracles. The first of them was this. When he had already completed some years at Clairvaux, it happened that a noble man named Josbert, who was also Bernard's kinsman according to the flesh, fell gravely ill at La Ferté, a town near the monastery. Suddenly overcome, he lost both understanding and speech. Consequently, his son and all his friends were afflicted with still greater grief because so magnificent and highly honored a man was to die without confession and Viaticum.

A messenger ran very quickly to Abbot Bernard, but at that time he was not in the monastery. At last Bernard came and found Josbert already lying in that condition for three days. Having compassion upon the man, and moved by the tears of his son and the others who were likewise mourning, Bernard trusted in the mercy of God and delivered an imposing address, saying to them: “It is known to you that in many matters this man has burdened churches, oppressed the poor, and offended God. If you believe me, so that what has been taken may be restored to the churches and the customs usurped to the injury of the poor may be relinquished, he will yet speak, make confession of his offenses, and devoutly receive the divine sacraments.”

Everyone marveled; the son rejoiced; the entire household exulted. Whatever the man of God commanded was promised to him and fulfilled. But Bernard’s brother Gerard and his uncle Galdric, not a little frightened and disturbed, met with him more privately concerning so great a promise, reproved him more harshly, and assailed him more sharply. Answering them briefly and simply, he said, “God can easily do what you believe to be difficult.”

Therefore, after secret prayer, he approached the offering of the immortal sacrifice. While he was offering it, a messenger arrived to announce that the aforesaid Josbert was already speaking and earnestly asking that the man of God hasten to him. When Bernard came to him after the sacrifice had been offered, Josbert confessed his sins with tears and groaning and received the divine sacraments. Living and speaking for two or three days after this, he determined that those things in particular which the holy man had commanded should be observed without any retraction. He also put his household in order and gave alms, and thus at last breathed forth his spirit in Christian fashion and in good hope.

When, by praying out of mercy, Bernard restored health to many sick persons, his brothers and spiritual sons marveled at the things they saw and at the things said about him. Yet they were not raised up to human glory in the manner of carnal men, but with spiritual solicitude they feared for his still youthful age. In this zeal his uncle Galdric and Guido, the firstborn of the brothers, certainly went before the others, so that it might appear that those two had been given to him by God as twin goads of the flesh, lest the greatness of his virtues should in some way exalt him. For they did not spare his tender modesty, but harassed it with harsher words, found fault even with things well done, reduced all his signs to nothing, and frequently afflicted that most gentle man, who contradicted nothing, even to tears by reproaches and insults.

The venerable Godfrey, bishop of Langres and a kinsman of the holy man, used to relate that it happened that he was present, together with Bernard’s aforesaid brother Guido, at a certain miracle which he saw performed through Bernard’s hand. For when the holy man Bernard was passing through the castle of Nanton in the territory of Sens, a certain young man whose feet had been seized by a fistula implored with much supplication to receive the touch of the aforesaid father in blessing. After being signed, he immediately recovered. Hence, when the blessed father returned after a few days and passed through the aforesaid castle, he found that young man unharmed. But his aforesaid brother Guido could not be restrained even by the miracle itself from reproving Bernard still further and accusing him of presumption because he had consented to touch a man and had shown such great charitable solicitude for him.

About the same time it happened that his uncle Galdric, who likewise, out of zeal, overwhelmed his nephew’s gentleness with harsh rebukes, labored under very severe fevers. At last, when the illness grew worse, overcome by the very greatness of his pain, he entreated Abbot Bernard with humble supplication to have mercy upon him and bring him the aid that he was accustomed to bring to others. Bernard, whose spirit was sweeter than honey, first gently and briefly recalled Galdric’s frequent rebukes concerning this very matter and charged him not perhaps to be saying this in order to test him. But when Galdric persisted, Bernard placed his hand upon him and commanded the fever to depart. Without delay, at his command, the fever left Galdric, who now experienced in himself what he had reproved in others.

A certain brother whom Bernard had suspended from communion at the sacred altar because of a secret fault feared being marked out and could not endure the shame. He therefore approached Bernard’s hand with the others in excessive presumption. Bernard looked upon him and, because the cause was hidden, did not wish to repel him; but in the depth of his heart he prayed to God that he would ordain something better concerning so great a presumption. Accordingly, when the brother received the Eucharist, he could not pass it into his interior. Although he strove for a long time and with great effort, since he was able to accomplish nothing, he anxiously and tremblingly kept it enclosed in his mouth. Therefore, when the hour of the office of Sext had been completed, he drew the holy father aside. Prostrate at his knees, with many tears he disclosed what he was suffering; and, opening his mouth, he also showed him the Host itself. Bernard rebuked the man, absolved him when he confessed, and without difficulty the man received the Lord’s sacrament.

An adulterous wife tormented by sorceries a poor man who lived not far from the monastery. For, just as she had threatened him in anger and fury, by malignant incantations she had caused the wretched man, his flesh being consumed, neither to be able to die nor to be permitted to live. Very often he lost both the use of his voice and every bodily sense. Again he returned—not to life, but cruelly recalled to a more protracted death. He was brought by his people to the man of God with many tears. Bernard, vehemently indignant that the malice of the malignant enemy had usurped so much power over a Christian, caused the man to be carried before the altar. After placing upon his head a vessel containing the Eucharist, by the power of the sacrament he commanded the demon to be restrained from injuring the Christian. The man was restored to perfect health.

The miracles which the Lord performed through him are innumerable. For he expelled demons from many possessed persons. Thus at Milan, while solemnly celebrating Mass before all the people, he gave a little girl water poured over the paten to drink and immediately freed her from a demon. He likewise freed another matron, whom the devil had now so tormented for many years that he had deprived her of sight, hearing, and speech; held her tongue extended after the manner of an elephant's trunk; made her countenance terrible; and made her breath fetid.

When she had been brought with great violence to the holy man of God before the altar of the church of Saint Ambrose, he celebrated Mass before an innumerable people. When the consecration had been performed and the Lord's Prayer said, he took the Eucharist and held it over the head of the possessed woman. Bernard adjured the demon on behalf of Jesus Christ present in the sacrament—Christ who was born of the Virgin, was crucified and died for the salvation of the world so as to cast the demon out of humankind, rose from the dead, ascended into heaven, and sits at the right hand of the Father—and commanded the demon to depart from her. She was freed, and, the demon having been cast out, she recovered hearing, sight, and speech, while all those standing by marveled and praised God in his saint.

So great a devotion toward Bernard grew among the people from his honey-flowing teaching confirmed by miracles that, abandoning the schism to which they had adhered by following their archbishop Anselm, who supported the party of the antipope Peter Leonis, they rendered complete obedience to Innocent II, the true vicar of Christ. At Pavia he also cured a demoniac who barked like a dog. He restored very many persons suffering from fevers to their former health. He restored to natural strength those disabled by paralysis. He gave light to the blind. He healed those who had withered members, whether hands or other members. Sick persons were also healed by eating from loaves blessed by him. Through the spirit of prophecy he also knew many things hidden from human beings and many future things, all of which are set forth explicitly in his legend.

Section VII

When in his time a schism had arisen, Innocent II having been canonically elected, while Peter Leonis, a Roman, had been intruded by certain men into the papacy through the friendship of powerful men and money and called himself Anacletus, the saint of God labored greatly, running through cities and kingdoms to remove the said schism. Innocent had indeed been enthroned according to the customary manner. But in a short time so great was the multitude both of nobles of Peter's own family, of those joined to him by affinity, and of those corrupted by money, that almost the entire city followed the antipope. On this account, after mature counsel had been taken with the servants of God, Innocent, the true pontiff, decreed that he should yield to the fury. Having secretly procured ships, he departed thence by the Tiber and arrived at the port of Pisa.

After sending messengers ahead into Gaul to make known the truth of the affair, lest they should be forestalled by falsehoods from the other party, a council was assembled at Étampes. Saint Abbot Bernard was summoned by the king of the Franks himself and by all the principal bishops. For he was already held in renown for miracles and teaching. He approached in no slight fear, not being ignorant of the danger and weight of the affair. But on the journey God consoled him, revealing in a nocturnal vision that peace was to come to the Church.

Therefore, after a fast had first been celebrated and prayers poured forth to God, when the king and bishops with the princes had sat down to treat of the affair, there was one counsel and one opinion of all: that so great an affair should be imposed upon the servant of God and the entire case should depend upon his mouth. Fearing and trembling, but acquiescing in the admonitions of faithful men, he undertook it. After diligently following the order of the election, the merits of the electors, and the life and reputation of the one first elected, he opened his mouth, and the spirit of wisdom filled it. Therefore, speaking with the mouth of all, he declared Innocent to be the supreme pontiff who must be received by everyone. All alike acclaimed that the matter was ratified and must be so held; and, after praises had been sung to God, all subscribed to Innocent's election.

Thereafter Pope Innocent was carried by ship into Provence and afterward into Burgundy. At Orléans, where the bishops met him, he was honorably received by Louis, king of the Franks. When the pope had also been conducted to Chartres, Henry, king of the English, came to meet him with a very great company of bishops and nobles. The venerable Abbot Bernard had been sent ahead to this king. Addressing him, Bernard scarcely persuaded him to receive Innocent, because the king himself had been dissuaded from doing so by the bishops of England. For when the king, speaking with the man of God, kicked against the goad and drew back lest he offend God, the saint of God said: "Why do you fear to incur sin if you obey Innocent? Consider how you are to answer God for your other sins. Leave this one to me; let this sin rest upon me." Persuaded by this word, the king acquiesced and received Innocent with honor.

After a council had been celebrated at Reims, the lord pope did not permit Abbot Bernard to be separated from him. Bernard sat with the cardinals in public affairs, and privately all who had business consulted the man of God more secretly. At last at Liège the lord pope met the king of the Romans and was indeed honorably received. But that serenity was quickly clouded. For the same king insistently demanded, judging the time opportune, that episcopal investitures be restored to him. The Roman Church, through the greatest labors and many dangers, had claimed them for itself from his predecessor Henry. At this demand the Romans and those who were with the pope grew pale, and counsel failed them, until the holy abbot placed himself before them as a wall. Boldly resisting the king, he reproved the malignant demand with marvelous freedom and restrained it with marvelous authority.

Returning from Liège, the lord pope wished to visit Clairvaux in person. There he was received most affectionately by Christ's poor, who were not adorned with purple and fine linen and did not carry gilded Gospel books, but came in ragged ranks bearing a rugged cross, not with clamorous jubilation but with subdued melody. The bishops wept, and the supreme pontiff himself also wept. They marveled at the gravity of that congregation: amid so solemn a joy the eyes of all the men remained cast down and were nowhere carried about by wandering curiosity; rather, with eyelids closed, they themselves saw no one and were seen by everyone.

The Roman saw nothing in the church that he might covet. In the oratory they saw nothing except bare walls. There whole-grain bread was set in place of fine flour, boiled-down grape must in place of sweet wine, vegetables in place of red things [read: turbots], and legumes in place of any delicacies whatever. If by chance a fish was found, it was set before the lord pope, and it benefited the community by being seen, not by being used.

The devil envied the glory of God's servants, whom the presence of so great a guest had ennobled, and he was unable to bear it. While they were chanting psalms eagerly and devoutly in choir, with some of the cardinals also present, one man, more seized than the others, spoke certain blasphemous words, saying, "Tell them: I am Christ." The others, frightened and trembling, fled to the steps of the blessed father. Turning to the others, Bernard said, "Pray." Then, in silence, he led out and restrained those who appeared disturbed, so that that most wicked spirit might reveal itself and discover its efforts to be feeble. Everything was calmed with such speed that what had happened remained hidden from those standing nearby.

Innocent could not make a long stay in Gaul. Just as he had agreed with Lothair, king of the Romans, he met him at Rome, and by the strength of the army Innocent was conducted into the Lateran palace. Many of the Roman nobles faithful to the Church received him honorably. Nevertheless, Peter Leonis, the antipope or antichrist, surrounded by the malice of his confederates, remained in the higher places and towers, awaiting a time to rage.

Leaving Innocent at Rome, Emperor Lothair withdrew elsewhere. After his departure, Peter made frequent incursions through the city and thirsted for the slaughter of the faithful. Innocent, understanding that a stay at Rome was fruitless for him at that time, returned to Pisa lest his presence enrage the fury of that beast. There the bishops of almost the entire West and other religious men were assembled. The holy abbot assisted them throughout in all counsels, judgments, and definitions. The sum of the proceedings of that assembly consisted in the excommunication of Peter Leonis and the deposition of his supporters.

When that council had been dissolved, the lord Innocent sent Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux, to reconcile the Milanese, who had sought him with many supplications. From his own side he also directed Guido of Pisa and Matthew, bishop of Albano, to wash away the schism made by Anselm in that same city and recall the straying to the unity of the Church.

Therefore, when Saint Abbot Bernard together with his aforesaid colleagues was approaching the city of Milan, the entire people, of whatever condition and status, came to meet him seven miles from the city and received the man of God with incredible reverence. They delighted in the sight of him and judged themselves happy if they could enjoy hearing him. All kissed his feet; and although he received this with distress, no reasoning could restrain the devout. They even claimed whatever hairs they could from his clothing, and for remedies against diseases they tore something from the hems of his garments. At last everything was pacified, the churches were reconciled, and those who had been disobedient to Innocent subjected themselves to him.

Section VIII

After this the holy man returned to Clairvaux and began to expound the Song of Songs to those monks. But since many still followed the schismatic Peter and favored his party, attempting and contriving to turn away from the truth cities and princes who adhered to Innocent, the lord pope dispatched special messengers for the blessed man, that he should come to the city and confront those who were causing scandal. Coming to Rome as quickly as possible, he was honorably received by the supreme pontiff and the entire curia.

Meanwhile Roger, king of Apulia, who favored Peter Leonis, sent to Innocent that he ought to dispatch to him his chancellor Aimeric and Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux. He wrote similarly to Peter Leonis that he should send to him Peter of Pisa as his defender, so that, by hearing them debate before him, he might understand the cause of this dissension and schism. For he sent deceitfully. He had heard that Peter of Pisa was most eloquent and second to no one in knowledge of the laws and canons. He thought that, if a hearing were granted to Peter's rhetorical declamations in a public consistory, the abbot's simplicity could be overwhelmed, and silence in the weight of words and arguments could be imposed upon him.

At last both parties came to Salerno, where the king held his court. In the meantime that King Roger had gathered an innumerable army against Duke Ranulf, who with his peoples stood on the side of the Church and Innocent. Although the saint of God had persuaded him not to enter such a conflict because, if defeated, he would lie open to disgrace, he did not acquiesce, trusting in his multitude. But what had been foretold to him occurred: he was defeated and put to flight in battle by Ranulf, although Ranulf's army was much smaller.

But the king, feigning cheerfulness and exalting himself in royal apparel, with his court surrounded by soldiers, commanded both parties to be summoned. Peter of Pisa, first instructed and inflamed by the inducements of many promises, was ordered to speak concerning the arguments for his cause. Accordingly, Peter first strove to prove that the election of his lord, Peter Leonis, was canonical, and fortified his words with many assertions from laws and canons.

But the man of God, considering that the kingdom of God consisted not in speech but in power, said: "I know, Peter, that you are a learned and wise man. And would that the sounder party and more honorable business had occupied you; would that a happier cause had obtained you as its advocate! And without doubt no eloquence could impede— [read: no eloquence could impede you when presenting reasonable arguments]. And we rustic men, accustomed more to hoes than to declamations, would keep the silence imposed upon us if the cause of the faith did not press us. But now charity compels us to speak, because Peter Leonis, with this lord as his supporter, has lacerated and rent the Lord's tunic, which at the time of the Passion no one, not even a Jew, presumed to tear.

"There is one faith, one Lord, one baptism. We know neither two Lords, nor a double faith, nor two baptisms. To begin with ancient things: there was one ark at the time of the flood. In it eight souls escaped while the others perished; and as many as were found outside the ark perished. No one doubts that this ark bore the figure of the Church. Another ark has recently been built. Since there are two, one must necessarily be adulterous and be submerged in the deep.

"If the ark which Peter Leonis rules is from God, the ark which Innocent rules must necessarily be overwhelmed. Therefore the Eastern Church perishes. The entire West perishes. France will perish. Germany will perish. The Irish, the English, and the barbarian kingdoms will be submerged in the depth of the sea. The Camaldolese, Carthusian, Cluniac, Grandmontine, and Cistercian religious orders, and innumerable other congregations of God's servants and handmaids, must fall beneath one whirlwind into the abyss. The sea will engulf and receive bishops, abbots, and the other princes of the Church as they are cast headlong into it with an ass-driven millstone bound to their necks. Alone among the princes of the world, this Roger has entered Peter's ark; and, when all the others have been put to death, he alone will be saved. Far be it that the religion of the whole world should perish and that Peter's ambition—whose manner of life is openly known—should obtain the kingdom of heaven."

At these words those who were present could no longer restrain themselves, but abominated Peter's life and cause. The holy abbot, taking Peter of Pisa by the hand, raised him up and likewise rose himself. "If you believe me," he said, "we shall enter the safer ark." And, as he had already conceived in his mind some time before, he approached Peter with salutary admonitions and, with the grace of God cooperating, immediately persuaded him to return to the city and be reconciled to Pope Innocent.

When the assembly had been dissolved, the king was not yet willing to obey, because he had greedily occupied the very extensive patrimony of Saint Peter in the provinces of Cassino and Benevento. He thought that by means of these suspended negotiations he could extort from the Romans certain privileges through which that patrimony might be established for him as though by his own right.

At that time it happened that a certain nobleman, very well known in Salerno, fell ill and was despaired of by the physicians, whose art and study especially flourished there at that time. By drinking water from the washing of the holy man's hands, as had been revealed to him in dreams, he was suddenly restored to perfect health. When this became known, it drew everyone to an extraordinary devotion toward the saint and to belief in his words, the king alone persisting in his malice.

The holy abbot returned to Rome, reconciled Peter of Pisa and certain others to the Church, and joined them to Pope Innocent. At last, a little afterward, Peter Leonis died in despair in his malice. But his party established another pope in place of the other. As quickly as possible this ridiculous pontiff came to Abbot Bernard, laid aside through him the papal insignia he had usurped, and was reconciled to Innocent, seeking and obtaining pardon.

After this the holy man, who for seven years had labored to mend the aforesaid schism, departed from the city—to the great grief of the peoples' minds because of their excessive affection for his holiness—and returned to Clairvaux. He continued the exposition of the Song of Songs which he had begun. Nevertheless, he did not complete it, but scarcely completed the second chapter.

As the brothers entering that Order multiplied, attracted by his honey-flowing teaching in his sermons and inflamed by examples of holiness, he founded one hundred sixty monasteries of his Order in diverse parts of the world. He left such disciples that many of his brothers were elected bishops and archbishops in great cities, and some were even made cardinals. Bernard, too [i.e., Pope Eugene III], who had been sent to Saint Anastasius near Rome, a monastery of the said Order constructed by Innocent, was created pope after Lucius and Celestine, the aforesaid successors of Innocent II. To him Saint Bernard, while still living, wrote the most beautiful and useful book On Consideration.

All those prelates assumed from the Cistercian Order displayed a great light to the Church. Bernard himself, though elected many times as bishop or archbishop by the Genoese, the Milanese, and many churches beyond the mountains, neither acquiesced nor refused with an obstinate mind, but asserted that he was not subject to his own authority. The brothers of the Cistercian Order had arranged and procured with the supreme pontiff, at Bernard's instigation, that this treasury of wisdom could not be taken away from them by any church.

Section IX

In Aquitaine there was a certain wretched woman who was tormented by a wanton incubus demon. For six years it had abused her and tormented her with incredible lust. When the man of God came there, the demon vehemently threatened the woman not to approach him, because Bernard would be able to profit her nothing; and when Bernard departed, the demon, who had been her lover, would become her most cruel persecutor.

But she confidently approached the man of God and related with much groaning what she was suffering. He said to her, "Take this staff of mine and place it in your little bed, and let him do whatever he can." When she had done this and lay down in her bed, the demon was immediately present, but did not presume to approach either its accustomed work or the bed itself. Rather, it threatened her most sharply and declared that, when Bernard departed, it would take atrocious vengeance upon her.

When she had privately related this to Bernard, he called the people together and commanded everyone to hold lighted candles in their hands. Together with the entire assembly present, he excommunicated the demon and forbade it thenceforth to have access to that woman or to any other. Thus she was wholly freed from such an illusion.

When the servant of God entered the kingdom of Germany to settle a certain great discord, an archbishop sent a certain venerable cleric to meet him. When the cleric said that his own lord had sent him to meet Bernard, the man of God answered, "Another Lord sent you." Astonished, the man affirmed that he had been sent by none other than his lord the archbishop. In reply the servant of Christ said, "You are mistaken, son, you are mistaken. A greater Lord sent you: Christ."

Understanding this, the cleric said, "Do you think I wish to become a monk? Far be that from me. I have not thought of this, nor has it arisen upon my heart." Why say more? On that same journey he bade farewell to the world and received the habit from the man of God.

Bernard had received into the Order a certain very noble knight. When this man followed the man of God at a certain time, he began to be assailed by a most grievous temptation. When a certain brother saw him so sad, he asked the cause of such great sadness. The man answered, "I know, I know that I shall never again be joyful." When the said brother reported this statement to the servant of God, Bernard prayed more attentively for him. Immediately that brother, who had been so tempted and sad, appeared as much more joyful and cheerful than the others as he had previously been sadder than the others. When the said brother amicably reproached him with the sorrowful statement he had made, the man answered, "Although I said, 'I shall never again be joyful,' I now say, 'I shall never again be sad.'"

When Lent was approaching and Bernard had been visited by many young men, he asked them to abstain from their vanities and wantonness at least during those sacred days. When they acquiesced in no way, he commanded wine to be served to them, saying, "Drink the cup of souls." Having drunk it, they departed suddenly changed; and those who had refused to give a short time gave to God the entire time of their life.

At last the blessed father Bernard, happily approaching death, said to his brothers: "I leave you three things to observe which I remember having observed according to my strength in the course of this present life in which I have run. I wished to give scandal to no one; and if scandal ever arose, I quieted it insofar as I could. I always trusted my own judgment less than another's. When injured, I never sought vengeance upon the one who injured me. Behold, I leave you charity, humility, and patience."

Finally, after he had performed many miracles and compiled many books and treatises, when the days of his life had been completed at about sixty-three years, in the year of the Lord 1153 he fell asleep in the Lord amid the hands of his sons.

After his death he manifested his glory to many. For he appeared to a certain abbot in a certain monastery and admonished him to follow him. When the abbot followed, the holy man said, "Behold, we have come to Mount Lebanon. You will remain here, but I shall ascend there."

When the abbot asked why he wished to ascend, Bernard said, "I wish to learn." Astonished, the abbot said, "What do you wish to learn, Father, when we believe that today no one is second to you in knowledge?" Bernard answered, "Here there is no knowledge, no cognition of the truth. Above is the fullness of knowledge; above is the true knowledge of truth." At this word he disappeared. The abbot noted the day and found that at that time the man of God Bernard had migrated from the body. The Lord also performed many other and almost innumerable miracles through his servant.

Title XVII, Chapter VI

Now treatment must be given to the emperors who existed from Henry IV through Henry VI, inclusively.

After Henry IV, therefore, his son Henry V, of the same name, received the Roman Empire in the year 1107 from the Incarnation of the Lord, but in the five thousand seventieth year from the beginning of the world. According to the other, more common opinion, it was the six thousand three hundred seventeenth year. He reigned for twenty years.

Nevertheless, during the two years before his father's death, when he had already been declared the future emperor, forgetful of the benefit received from him, Henry moved rebellion against his father and rose against him under the pretext of improving the commonwealth and restoring the Church. He took as his occasion the fact that his father had been excommunicated by the Roman Church. Hence he easily joined to his will the princes of the Saxons, who had always been hostile to his father. Moreover, many princes of the empire abandoned the father and adhered to the son. At last, when everyone deserted him, the father was captured by his son and committed to confinement in prison.

There, while he sought a hearing, the son together with the princes surrounded him deceitfully and forced him to resign the imperial insignia to his son. When this had been done, he was released and, deprived of everyone's support, ran through Germany wandering and in flight, and came to Cologne. Its citizens had compassion upon his calamity, and he was solemnly received by them not as an exile but as an emperor.

Thence he came to Liège, with many accompanying him. There, when a court of the princes had been summoned and certain men had gathered to him, he asserted that he had been compelled by his son to resign the imperial insignia. When the son heard that he was at Liège, he prepared to besiege him. He sent soldiers ahead to occupy the bridge situated over the river Meuse. Through the father's action they were repelled, and many were killed and captured. Count Bruno was among those killed. Thus the son, advancing against his father, returned without glory.

Not long afterward this Henry IV died at Liège and was buried by the citizens in the same church according to the custom of princes. But afterward, by command of the supreme pontiff, as one excommunicated he was cast out of the sacred cemetery, and all Christian burial was denied him.

When he was dead, his son Henry V gathered a marvelous army of his men and entered Italy. Thirty thousand armed men were found among the Teutons alone, apart from those from Italy who were joined to him. Thence, moving the army and passing into Tuscany, he long besieged and assaulted the castle of Pontremoli, which was most strongly fortified with walls and towers and had denied him passage, and compelled it to surrender. Having captured it, he razed it from the foundations and leveled it.

Thence, moving camp, he entered Tuscany and was honorably received by almost all the cities. Only the city of the people of Arezzo resisted for some time. Afflicting it with many calamities, he at last compelled it to carry out his commands. When he had arranged affairs within Tuscany as he wished, he proceeded to Rome to settle the scandals between the kingdom and the priesthood. How he conducted himself toward Pope Paschal—namely, that he imprisoned him but afterward released him and attempted to reconcile him with the people whom he had offended—has been related above in the preceding chapter, in the section concerning Paschal II.

Thereafter, when the emperor had left the city and Italy, he returned to Germany. Since he had no wife, he immediately accepted as his bride Matilda, daughter of the king of England, and celebrated magnificent nuptials at Mainz. There Lothair, duke of Saxony, who had been rebellious against him from the time when he obtained the empire, came to the emperor's feet seeking pardon, dressed in a woolen tunic, barefoot, and ungirded. For so great a terror of Henry had seized him that no one dared resist him. But afterward, when Henry was exceedingly harsh and rigid, many of the princes rebelled against him.

Meanwhile the pope annulled before many prelates the privilege or compact made between Pope Paschal and the emperor—namely, concerning investiture—as was related above. On this account the Church suffered many persecutions from the emperor's supporters. At their persuasion the emperor returned to Italy, where he made war upon the faithful, captured cities, and was received by the Romans with great honor. Nevertheless, none of the Catholics came to meet him.

When he was about to go to the basilica of Peter, he crossed by boat, not by the bridge. Coming to that church, he requested to be crowned. He was told that he ought to be crowned by the pope or the pope's commissioner. Henry, knowing that the mind of the Catholics was alienated from him and being not a little confounded within himself, thought of departing from the city. But before he withdrew thence, he commanded the entire people to be summoned. He is reported to have addressed them thus:

"If it were divinely granted, Romans, that the condition of commonwealths should be governed with worthy moderation and their rulers should anticipate one another with worthy reverence, there would be peace. The pontiff would not be absent from the imperial assemblies of the city, nor the emperor from pontifical assemblies. The glory of one would support the other; the glory of one would be the glory and strength of both. The strength of both would be the fear of all, and the city would turn itself in love between the two.

“Fathers, consuls, leading men, and all the good men of the city and the world would look to us. Goths, Gauls, Spaniards, Africans, Greeks, and Latins—the Arab, the Parthian, and the Indian—would either fear or love us. But now, while matters are conducted otherwise, it happens otherwise. For while we are divided from one another, we are trampled by everyone, despised, cursed, and attacked.

“Turn, therefore, and receive both my desire and my correction, although I am a sinner, lest, while justice grows stern against me through you, it should have no means, without me, of growing stern against others when their crimes have multiplied. Behold, I have come from the father of the Roman Church, the lord pope, out of Gaul into the city to be crowned. I ascribe his absence to my misfortunes. But now I ask this of you: let there be peace between us. Indeed, there will be peace if you Romans yourselves wish it; and assuredly, when the winds have been calmed, the seas will be at rest.”

To these words of Henry, the Church of the Catholics which was in the city answered thus:

“We consider it sufficiently dishonorable and unworthy that you should approach us at any time with sweet words, when you strive daily to circumvent us with deceitful deeds. Do you suppose, O king, that we believe you have come to this city to repent and make satisfaction, when through you we see continual and hostile invasions and sacrilegious ordinations being made? As soon as you entered Latium, O king, you made war upon the faithful of blessed Peter.

“Come now: who are those on whose behalf the abbot of Farfa and Ptolemy act, both excommunicated for their crimes? With those men as your leaders, you entered the church of the apostles. With what fathers? With what bishops? With what clerics? Add to this: who are those who now keep watch before its doors? Are they not seditious men? Who are those who guard its treasury? Are they not sacrilegious men? Who are those who minister at its altar? Are they not heretics?

“Alas, alas! All the Catholics having been expelled, through you schismatics occupy the venerable church of blessed Peter. Is this that road by which you merit pardon? Is this the satisfaction by which you are reconciled to the Church? Is this the peace by which wars are quieted? The matter must be conducted otherwise, O king.”

Nevertheless Henry, given over to a reprobate sense, was unable to circumvent with words the faithful who were within the city and whom he had provoked beyond measure. He summoned Mauritius, bishop of Braga, and caused himself to be crowned. Thus he departed from the city and proceeded into Lombardy.

In those times, in the diocese of Liège, a sow gave birth to a piglet having the face of a human being. A chicken was also born four-footed, as Sigebert attests. Many were consumed by the sacred fire, their members growing black like coals. In the month of July a comet appeared, directing its rays toward the south. Many conjectured that this sign portended the future expedition of King Henry toward Italy.

About that time at Laon a twin boy was born, double from the buttocks upward: he had two heads and, as far as the loins, two bodies with their own arms. Having been baptized, he survived for three days. In the month of June grain-crops and trees, burned by the sacred fire, belied the hope of their fruit; certain forests also dried up. There followed a grave and prolonged sickness of human beings, both from a flux of the belly and from mortality. Lord Sigebert, the venerable monk of the monastery of Gembloux, ingenious in every branch of literary knowledge and a chronicler of the times, died.

While the aforesaid Henry V was reigning in the Roman Empire, our western princes, as Jacob de col. relates, fought with varying fortune against the enemies of the faith in the East. For Bohemond, the illustrious prince of the Antiochenes, returned from the regions beyond the mountains into Apulia and crossed into Epirus, having five thousand cavalrymen and forty thousand infantrymen. Pursuing the causes of the Latins and remembering the injuries which the emperor of the Greeks had inflicted upon him and upon the other Latin princes, he broke the maritime cities, gave them over to plunder, and devastated the whole of Epirus.

When the emperor of the Greeks heard this, he likewise gathered his armies and, advancing to meet Bohemond, established camp nearby. There, with mutual friends intervening, the emperor entered into a treaty with Lord Bohemond under interposed oaths: henceforth he would in good faith provide counsel and assistance to Christ’s faithful who wished to pass into the East. When this had been completed, Bohemond dismissed the multitude of pilgrims and returned to Apulia.

In the following summer, after he had gathered a fleet so that he might prepare himself for the journey into the East, he was seized by a violent illness and died, leaving one only son as heir to his principality and his name, whom he had begotten from Constance, daughter of the king of the Franks. In that year Philip, king of the Franks and his father-in-law, also migrated to the Lord. His firstborn son Louis succeeded him in the kingdom.

In the same year, which was the second of Henry V, Bertrand, son of the count of Toulouse, who had succeeded Raymond, landed in Syria with a fleet of the Genoese. When he had arrived at the city of Tripoli with a fine company of cavalrymen and infantrymen—a city which his father had besieged and assaulted for a long time before—he again enclosed it with a siege by land and sea. Lord King Baldwin also came to that siege with the strength of his armies. As the struggle was renewed, the citizens, worn down by prolonged labors, surrendered the city to the Christian army with their persons and possessions preserved. Bertrand was made count there and became the liegeman of the lord king of Jerusalem. That city was captured in the year of the Lord 1109.

About that time the aforesaid worshiper of God, the king, assembled a multitude of cavalrymen and infantrymen from the entire kingdom, surrounded the city of the people of Beirut with a siege, violently broke into it, and captured it, the greater part of the unbelievers having been killed. Beirut is a maritime city situated between Byblos and Sidon, one of the cities of Phoenicia. It was captured in the month of April in the year of the Lord 1111.

In the same year, the brother of the king of Norway arrived in the port of Joppa with a great force of armed men. He had come to this kingdom beloved of God for this purpose alone: that for some time he and his men might devote themselves to the service of Christ. The king, rejoicing not a little at the assembled multitude of the army, surrounded the city of Sidon by land and sea with those who had arrived.

When they had assaulted the city with continual attacks for some days, the citizens, despairing of their escape, surrendered the city to the lord king upon these conditions: that departure should be granted to the nobles, while the common people should be permitted, as before, to devote their labor to agriculture under favorable conditions. Sidon is a maritime city situated between Beirut and the city of Tyre in the province of Phoenicia, possessing a most advantageous location. Sacred Scripture makes mention of it in many places. It was captured in the month of December in the year of the Lord 1111.

In the following year Tancred, prince of Antioch, of illustrious memory and pious remembrance, died. By his final judgment, his kinsman Roger, son of Richard, succeeded him in his principality upon this condition: whenever Lord Bohemond the Younger should demand back the said principality, Roger was to resign it to him without dispute.

In the year of the Lord 1113, under a certain Turkish prince, an infinite multitude of Turks coming from Persia poured itself into the kingdom of Jerusalem. The king did not wait for the prince of Antioch and the count of Tripoli, who were hastening to his aid with great forces, but met the Turks with those troops which he himself had with him. Overwhelmed by the multitude, he lost a great part of his men. On that day thirty Christian cavalrymen and one thousand two hundred infantrymen fell. Having obtained this victory and inflicted great losses upon the kingdom, the Turks returned to their own lands.

In the year of the Lord 1115, Bursoquinus, a most powerful man of the Turks, gathered an infinite multitude of his people and invaded the region of Antioch in hostility, devastating everything with fire and sword. When this became known to the prince of Antioch, he took with him Lord Baldwin, count of Edessa, and proceeded to meet him. When the two armies were already near one another, the army of the Christians placed its hope in the Lord. As though certain of victory, as soon as they saw the enemies and despised their multitude, they rushed upon them with greater spirit, broke apart their formations, and turned them to flight. Pursuing them for two miles, they produced a horrible slaughter. After this they approached the enemies' camp and returned to their own lands with infinite spoils and rich treasures.

At the same time Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, saw that the holy city of Jerusalem was empty of inhabitants, to such a degree that there was not a population in the city sufficient even to protect its entrance. Anxiously he considered how he could fill it with faithful peoples. At last he learned that across the Jordan and in Arabia many faithful persons lived in villages, serving the unbelievers under oppressive conditions and living under tribute to the enemies of the faith. The lord king summoned them and received them into Jerusalem under better conditions, with their wives, children, and entire households.

In the year of the Lord 1118, so that the lord king might repay the Egyptians for the things they had repeatedly committed in the kingdom, he descended into Egypt with immense forces, violently assaulted and captured a most ancient city named Faramia after besieging it, and divided the plunder among the soldiers. This city is situated on the shore of the sea, not far from the mouth of the river Nile, which in ancient times was called Tanis.

While the king was staying in that city, preparing to penetrate into the interior of Egypt, he became gravely ill. Therefore, when a return had been proclaimed to his legions, he was carried in a litter. There, overcome by the illness, he migrated to the Lord. Thence he was carried to Jerusalem and was buried on Palm Sunday beside his brother Godfrey, below the place of Calvary, with royal magnificence.

Section II

For some years before this, so great an earthquake shook all Syria that it entirely overthrew cities, castles, and towns. An infinite slaughter of human beings resulted from the ruin of the buildings, so that people fled human habitation and lived in the fields in order to find rest.

About those times, according to the chronicle, so great a snow fell on the ninth day before the Kalends of May in the district of Brabant near Tournai that it even broke the forests. At Ravenna and Parma, cities of Italy, blood rained in the fields and within the walls in the month of June. On the Ides of November, in the suburb of Antioch, the earth opened at night and swallowed many towers and many adjacent houses with their inhabitants.

In the year of the Lord 1118, on the third day before the Nones of January, an earthquake occurred in certain places, though not everywhere, gentler in some places and more violent in others, to such a degree that parts of certain cities are said to have fallen together with their churches. The river Meuse beside the abbey called Sustula also appeared, as though hanging in the air, to have abandoned its bed.

In the same year the city of Liège was afflicted by many plagues. For on the fifth day before the Nones of May, while Vespers was being celebrated in the greater church, thunder together with an earthquake suddenly cast everyone to the ground. Lightning entered at the left side of the church and cast sizeable fragments here and there. Then, entering the tower, it split many portions of the beams. An intolerable stench followed, to such an extent that it could scarcely be expelled by the fragrance of many aromatic substances.

In the following month of June, on the seventh day before the Ides of that month, at about the ninth hour, a rain-cloud suddenly burst from the mountain called Robert and utterly overwhelmed and ruined the part of the city lying beneath it. It demolished many houses and destroyed an immense quantity of grain. It killed a mother embracing two sons in her arms and crushed eight other persons in diverse places.

While the bells were sounding Vespers on a Saturday, as a certain woman washed a boy's head, her hands grew red with flowing blood. Around the Kalends of July, at about the sixth hour, an exceedingly violent and dark whirlwind covered the city. A cloud suddenly split open and cast down the entire roof of the greater church, so that it lay open to the rains and the whole pavement was flooded. Immediately lightning entered from the northern side and killed three clerics: one praying, another reading, and another coming out of the writing room at the entrance to the church. It also killed one layman before its doors.

On the third day before the Nones of August, at the first silence of the night, thunder was heard as though throughout the circle of the earth and lightning repeatedly flashed. In the city of Liège this whirlwind raged more greatly, so that people leapt from their beds, filled the churches in a sorrowful assembly, and devoted themselves to supplications throughout the whole night.

At the first light of dawn, fire with an immense flame circled from the eastern side, so great that everyone feared they were to be burned by divine action. After this a great whirlwind, bursting from the west, appeared somewhat to obscure that fire. But the fire, as though victorious, grew hot again with its flame; and when the whirlwind returned, it lay hidden for a little. A third time the fire also grew hot again, and a third time, nevertheless, it fell defeated by the whirlwind. From early morning until the third hour this spectacle vehemently terrified the people.

A certain monster was born at Namur, the like of which has rarely or never been seen: namely, a two-headed infant. It was double with respect to sex, but simple in the remaining structure of its body.

On the third day before the Ides of December, at midnight, while the stars were shining in a clear sky, the moon, thirteen days old, suffered an eclipse. Its orb contracted and was suffused with many colors, but especially a blood-red one, for almost an entire hour.

On the fourth day before the Kalends of January, at the first hour of the night, fiery battle-lines were seen in the sky from the north toward the east. Then, spread through the whole sky for a great part of the night, they were a marvel and astonishment to those who saw them.

Section III

When Lord Baldwin, the second king of Jerusalem, died, Baldwin of Bourg, his kinsman and count of Edessa, succeeded him in the kingdom. This Baldwin was a Frank by nation, from the province of Reims, and the son of Lord Hugh, count of Rethel.

Nevertheless, his elevation displeased many princes of the kingdom. Therefore, through faithful messengers they invited Lord Eustace, count of Boulogne and brother of the deceased Lord King Baldwin, to come to the kingdom which was owed to him by hereditary right. They drew him, as though unwilling and resisting, as far as Apulia. There the aforesaid venerable man heard that in the meantime Baldwin, count of Edessa, had been ordained king at Jerusalem, and determined to return to his own lands.

The messengers nevertheless pressed him to proceed, asserting that what had been done against sacred right could stand in no way. The man full of God is reported to have answered: "Far be this from me, that through me scandal should enter the kingdom of the Lord, through whose blood the world received peace, and for whose tranquility my brothers, men of virtue and immortal memory, carried their distinguished souls to heaven." Therefore, having arranged his baggage, he returned to his own lands.

This Baldwin was conspicuous in form, tall in body, handsome in face, with sparse blond hair mixed with gray. He had a sparse beard let down as far as his chest. He was fit for the use of arms and had much experience in military affairs. He was moreover merciful, religious, and God-fearing, and so constant in prayer that he had calluses on his hands and knees from genuflections and the frequency of his bodily afflictions.

Having therefore obtained the kingdom, he gave the county of Edessa, which he had left without a ruler, to Lord Jocelin, his kinsman, a prudent and vigorous man who knew that region more fully.

At the same time Alexius, the emperor of Constantinople and a great persecutor of the Latins, was removed from human affairs. His son John succeeded him in the empire, much more humane than his father and much more acceptable to our Latin people.

At the same time certain nobles of the equestrian order, devoted to God, delivered themselves into the service of Christ in the hands of the patriarch of Jerusalem and professed that they wished to live perpetually in chastity and obedience, without property. The first and principal among them were Hugh of Payns and Godfrey of Saint-Omer. The king granted them a dwelling in his palace beside the Temple.

First, for the remission of their sins, the lord patriarch enjoined upon them that they should guard the roads and routes for the safety of pilgrims against the ambushes of the unbelievers. For nine years after their institution they wore secular clothing. At last, in the ninth year, at a council celebrated in France at Troyes, a rule was established for them and a white habit assigned by command of Pope Honorius. The bishop of Albano, the pope's legate, presided over that council, and from that time their number began to increase.

Afterward, in the time of Eugenius, they began to affix red crosses to their mantles. Because they had their dwelling beside the Temple of the Lord, they were called the brothers of the knighthood of the Temple. But just as their beginning was holy and full of virtues, so afterward they degenerated from their fathers after they had grown fat and spread throughout the world.

In the year of the Lord 1117, a certain prince of the unbelievers named Gazo, together with the king of the Damascenes, entered the territory of Antioch with a great multitude of his men. When their arrival became known, Lord Roger the prince took with him the counts of Edessa and Tripoli and proceeded to meet them. Impatient of delay according to his custom, he joined battle with them without waiting for the king, who was hastening to his aid with all the forces of the kingdom.

But, our sins demanding it, almost all were killed and the adverse party became superior. Prince Roger, as a man vigorous in arms, fought manfully in the midst of the enemies and perished, pierced by their swords. It is marvelous to say: of the seven hundred cavalrymen and three thousand infantrymen who followed the prince in that battle, scarcely one escaped to announce these things, while few or none of the enemies were killed.

Not many days afterward the lord king of Jerusalem arrived with his legions. On the way he defeated a part of the army which the aforesaid Gazo had sent to meet him, killing and capturing many. Then he came to Antioch and, after restoring his forces, met the said prince of the unbelievers in battle on an open field with standards brought together and conquered him, four thousand being killed, apart from the captives and wounded. This victory obtained by Baldwin II occurred in the year of the Lord 1119.

Section IV

But after two years, King Baldwin heard that a certain prince of the Turks named Balaach was gravely harassing the region of Antioch. Having assembled a military force, he went into the land of the count of Edessa, who a little before had been captured together with his kinsman Geleran and committed to chains.

One day the king went out with his household retinue from a town called Turbessel. While he journeyed incautiously with his column dispersed, the aforesaid Balaach followed him, laid ambushes, captured the king, and led him away captive. He bound him in chains and committed him to custody in a certain castle beyond the Euphrates. In that place Lord Jocelin and Geleran were held captive.

When they had been detained there for some time, fifty Armenians from the land of the count of Edessa, bound together by oaths, resolved to set aside every fear and free those magnificent men. Armed beneath monastic clothing, they entered the said town, drew their swords, and killed those who met them. Having gained the castle, they released the king and his companions from their chains.

When the Turks who lived in the suburban towns learned this, they seized their arms and besieged the castle before the king and his men could depart. But Count Jocelin, at the king's command, took two companions and secretly left the castle. With the aid of two inflated skins he crossed the river Euphrates, reached Antioch, and disclosed everything that had happened. Accordingly, troops assembled both from the kingdom and from the principality and set out to aid the king.

When they had now reached Antioch and were preparing to advance farther, Lord Balaach had violently captured the said castle and, after imposing many conditions, had reduced the king together with his company into his power. Having obtained the castle, the aforesaid Balaach granted life to the lord king, to one of his nephews, and to Lord Geleran, and sent them as captives to the city of Caira. But he killed the aforesaid valiant Armenians by various tortures. Those who were hastening to the king's aid returned to their own lands after hearing of the unfortunate event which had befallen him.

Section V

Meanwhile the Egyptian prince, having heard of the captivity of the king of Jerusalem, came by sea to Ascalon with an infinite multitude of his men. When the princes of the kingdom learned this, they assembled the military force of the entire kingdom together with Lord Eustace Grenier, to whom they had entrusted the kingdom after the king's capture. Armed with faith, with the Lord's cross going before them, they proceeded against the enemies.

Finding them near the place called Ibelin, they despised their multitude and rushed upon them with greater spirit. After invoking the Lord's aid, they pressed them with their swords and turned them to flight. Our men pursued and laid them low in a great and horrible slaughter, so that seven thousand of them are reported to have fallen that day, apart from the captives, who were infinite in number.

Not long after this victory, the said Lord Eustace Grenier departed from life. In his place, while the lord king was still held captive, Lord William of Bures, lord of the city of Tiberias, was appointed.

Section VI

At the same time Lord Domenico Michiel, duke of the Venetians, came into Syria with a fleet of seventy galleys. When he heard that the fleet of the Egyptians, after learning of the slaughter of their men, was returning to its own lands, he pursued and overtook it not far from the port of Ascalon.

Battle was joined and was prolonged for a long time with varying fortune. At last, by the Lord's authorship, after a great slaughter of the enemies, the Venetians became superior and turned the enemies to flight. So great a slaughter occurred in that battle that it seems to exceed belief. For the adjoining sea is said to have taken on the color of blood for two miles around from the bodies cast headlong into it.

When the Venetians, having obtained victory, sailed farther through that sea toward Egypt, they encountered and captured ten ships laden with eastern riches. Dividing all these things among themselves, they returned to the port of Acre.

The duke of the Venetians, leaving the fleet, came to Jerusalem to see the holy places. He was received with much honor by the lord patriarch and the other princes and celebrated the Lord's Nativity there. Then, after deliberation among them, it was determined that the princes of the kingdom should besiege the city of Tyre on every side by land, while the fleet of the Venetians should do so by sea. Thus, on the fifteenth day before the Kalends of March, they enclosed the aforesaid city with a double siege.

Tyre is a most ancient city, to which Severus, emperor of the Romans, gave Italian right because of its distinguished fidelity to the Roman commonwealth. The Roman princes granted this right only to very few and to those who had deserved exceedingly well. Not only gentile writers but also the sacred oracles of the prophets bear witness to how great the glory of this city was in most ancient times. For in Ezekiel it is read: "And you, son of man, take up a lamentation over Tyre; and you shall say to Tyre, which dwells in the heart of the sea, the mart of the peoples to many islands: You have said, 'I am perfect in beauty and situated in the heart of the sea.'"

Sichaeus and his wife Dido, who built the marvelous city of Carthage, came from Tyre. Hiram reigned in it and cooperated in the building of Solomon's Temple. After it had been captured and destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, Alexander the Great rebuilt and enlarged it. The body of Origen rests in it, as ecclesiastical history attests.

The army of the Christians therefore surrounded this noble city with a siege on every side and attacked it with frequent and almost continual assaults. The neighboring princes of the unbelievers were summoned to its aid, but because they could not assist its inhabitants, they returned to their own lands. Thus, after the citizens had long resisted our men manfully, at last, when they were already laboring under most dangerous hunger, they began to discuss among themselves how they might impose an end upon such great troubles. Therefore, after sending messengers to our princes, they began to negotiate concerning surrender. With compacts intervening, the city of Tyre was surrendered to the Christian people in the year of the Lord 1124.

In the same year, in the month of September, the same Lord Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, after being held in chains by the unbelievers for almost eighteen months, returned after money had been agreed upon and hostages given. Thence he returned to the kingdom with his household retinue.

In the following year Bursoquinus assembled a multitude of Turks, crossed the Euphrates, and invaded the territory of Antioch in hostility. When this became known to the king, he assembled the troops of the whole kingdom, took with him Pons, count of Tripoli, and, supported by divine aid, proceeded into battle against the enemies with one thousand one hundred cavalrymen and two thousand infantrymen. In the army of Bursoquinus there were fifteen thousand cavalrymen alone. Battle was therefore joined; our party prevailed and, the enemies having been turned to flight, obtained victory most gloriously. About two thousand are said to have fallen in that encounter; but twenty-four of the Christians fell.

In the following year King Baldwin assembled the military force of his kingdom and entered the lands of the Damascenes, devastating everything with iron and fire. When he came to the place where Saul the persecutor heard the voice saying, “Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?” our men saw the camps of the Damascenes set against them and arrayed for battle.

Seeing them, our men seized their arms and attacked the enemies like lions, as though already certain of victory. But the enemies, encouraged by their multitude and by the admonitions of their lord, resisted manfully, so that the battle was prolonged with varying fortune from the third hour of the day until the tenth. At last, with divine clemency assisting, the enemies were turned to flight. Two thousand of them were killed on that day. Of the Christian cavalrymen twenty-four fell, and of the infantrymen eighty.

Finally, concerning Emperor Henry V, some say that he disappeared in such a manner that he was never seen again. Others say that, when he began to be troubled by a congenital disease called dracunculus, after some time he died of that illness. His corpse was disemboweled, sprinkled with salt and aromatic substances, and carried to Speyer for burial.

Others say that he feigned himself dead, secretly withdrew, and became a monk at Cluny. This, however, is fabulous. Rather, a certain man very similar to him pretended that he was Henry. After it was discovered that he was not, as punishment he was compelled to become a monk at Cluny.

Title XVII, Chapter VII

When Henry V had died without children, the legates of the Roman Church, the archbishops and bishops, and the nobles of the empire assembled by agreement at Mainz and deliberated concerning the election of an emperor. At last, after many discussions, Lothair, who was also called Lintherius, duke of Saxony, was elected emperor, although he resisted greatly and cried out that he was unworthy of so great an honor.

He began to reign in the year of the Lord 1127, but in the five thousand ninetieth year from the beginning of the world, or, according to the other computation, the six thousand three hundred thirty-seventh year. He reigned for eleven years.

In the first year of his empire, advancing with a great multitude of Germans against the Bohemians who were rebelling against him, he suffered a great slaughter of his soldiers through the treachery of certain of his princes.

Afterward he entered Italy. Having assembled his army, he conducted Innocent to Rome, honorably placed him in his see, and, having been crowned by him, was consecrated emperor. After this both proceeded into Apulia—namely, Pope Innocent and Emperor Lothair—against Prince Roger, who favored the antipope Peter Leonis. When Roger had been put to flight, the lord pope established there a certain Rayno as duke. Returning to Rome with victory, after some time Lothair took the road into Germany. Coming to Verona, he was seized by illness and ended his life.

This Lothair, at the beginning of his empire, especially after he had been confirmed in the empire, as John of Cologne relates, humbled as much as he could the offspring of Emperor Henry, his predecessor, in favor of the Roman Church. Therefore Frederick and Conrad, brothers and nephews of the aforesaid Henry through his sister, rebelled against him; for this cause they had been excommunicated by Pope Honorius, the predecessor of Innocent II. Nevertheless, the said Conrad was made emperor by certain princes of Germany. And when, having gathered a great army, he had entered Italy, he caused himself to be crowned with the iron crown according to the custom of emperors. And when he wished to advance as far as Rome, his money being exhausted, he returned into Germany.

While these things were being done in the West under the rule of Lothair, our eastern Latin princes fought indefatigably against the enemies of the faith, with varying fortune, for the extension of the Christian faith; and with much sweat they held the kingdom of Jerusalem, beloved of God, which, with divine aid going before them, they had claimed for themselves.

And in the year of the Lord 1127, Bohemond, son of the elder Bohemond and prince of Taranto, came into Syria. After this became known to the lord king, he went out with the magnates of that region to meet him. And when Bohemond had entered Antioch, the king restored to him entire the city and the region which he had governed with the greatest care after the death of Prince Roger. He also gave him as wife one of his daughters, named Alice, the second by birth; and when the wedding had been celebrated according to custom, he returned to the kingdom.

But the lord Bohemond, illustrious prince of Antioch, violently stormed the castle of Carsada, which the enemies had held occupied for several years.

In the year of the Lord 1129, about the beginning of spring, the illustrious man Fulk, count of Anjou, for whom the lord king had sent by the common counsel of all the princes in order that he might give him his firstborn daughter, the lady Melisende, as wife, landed at Acre with an honorable company of nobles. Immediately and without delay the king gave the said daughter to him under the law of marriage.

In the following year, Hugh of Payns, master of the knighthood of the Temple, and certain other religious men who had been sent by the lord king to the western princes in order to stir them to the aid of the Holy Land, returned. With them a very great multitude of nobles landed in the kingdom. Trusting in their strength, the king and his princes deliberated by agreement to besiege the city of Damascus. But the divine power was adverse to them: although their army was exceedingly strong and numerous, because they presumed upon their own strength they accomplished nothing at all; rather, after losing very many of their men, they returned to the kingdom without honor.

In the year 1130, Rodoacham, prince of the Tartars and lord of Aleppo, entered the territories of the Antiochenes in hostile fashion. Bohemond went out against him without awaiting the forces of his men and did not hesitate to join battle with him. But, overwhelmed by the multitude and deserted by his men, he was pierced by the swords of the enemies and died. Struck with consternation by this misfortune, the people of Antioch summoned the king of Jerusalem to their aid. After this was announced to the king, he hastened to Antioch with swift steps. But his daughter Alice, a wicked princess moved by an evil spirit, attempted to prevent her father from entering. Therefore, when he arrived, he was not admitted within the city because his daughter forbade it. Afterward, however, through the efforts of God-fearing men, the king entered the city against his daughter's will and disposed of the condition of the city and region according to the judgment of his own will. The princess had one daughter by Prince Bohemond.

The king, therefore, having returned to Jerusalem, fell into a grave illness. Seeing that the day of death threatened him, he departed from his own palace and, as a suppliant and humble man who had laid aside royal pomp, commanded that he be transferred in the sight of the Lord to the patriarch's palace, because it was nearer to the place of the Lord's Resurrection. There, having summoned his daughter and son-in-law, and with the boy Baldwin, now two years old, and the princes of the kingdom placed before him, he entrusted the care of the kingdom to them. He himself, however, a true confessor of Christ, assumed the habit of religion and, having professed the regular life if he should live, rendered his spirit to him who is the Father of spirits. He was buried beneath Mount Calvary in the thirteenth year of his reign.

Section II

When Baldwin, the third king of Jerusalem, who was called of Bourcq, had been called from this light, Fulk, his son-in-law, succeeded him in the kingdom. He was count of Anjou, Maine, and Tours. When he obtained the kingdom, he was sixty years of age.

During the same time, the elder Jocelin, count of Edessa, weighed down by a long illness, while he lay in bed, heard that the sultan of Iconium had besieged one of his castles with a great multitude of Turks. On hearing this, the magnificent count commanded his son to take military forces with him and meet the enemies manfully. But the son, as though timid, excused himself, asserting that it was dangerous to encounter so great a multitude with so few men. Therefore the father, angered, commanded that a litter be prepared for him. Placed upon it, he proceeded with the forces that he had gathered to meet the enemies and break the siege. When the sultan learned of his approach, he feared his courage, raised the siege, and returned to his own territory. The count, coming to the place at that same hour, ordered the litter in which he was being carried to be set down upon the ground. Raising his eyes to heaven with groaning and sighs, he gave thanks that in his last days the Lord had visited him with such great grace that, although placed in the very vestibules of death, he became fearsome to the enemies of the Christian faith. When he had said these things, he rendered up his spirit, leaving a son of the same name as himself, but one greatly degenerate from his father's glory.

In the first year of Fulk, king of Jerusalem, the foremost men of Antioch summoned him, and he hastened to Antioch. But the princess, a wicked woman aspiring to dominion over the city, opposed the king in all things, to such a degree that by her flatteries and gifts she also stirred up against him as a rival in this affair the lord count of Tripoli, corrupted by her. Thus, when they met one another in war, a great division arose in the kingdom of Christ. But the king, having gained the upper hand in the war, drove him from the field. By the grace of God, with authors of peace interposing themselves, they were reconciled to one another. The king, however, after a long stay at Antioch and after settling their affairs in peace, returned to the kingdom, the care of the principality having been entrusted to the noble man Reynald Masoir.

But not much time afterward, having heard that an infinite multitude of Turks had poured out of Persia into the regions of Antioch, the king hastened thither. While he was on the road, however, he learned that Sanguin, the most powerful of the Turks, was besieging Pons, count of Tripoli, with a great multitude. Postponing the former journey for a little, the king directed his battle lines thither. When Sanguin heard of his approach, he raised the siege and returned to his own territory. The king, continuing his former journey, reached Antioch. Having summoned the military forces there and relying upon divine aid, he went out to meet the enemies of the faith. After camps had been placed not far from them, he remained quiet for some time. But seeing that the enemies attempted nothing and remained quietly in their stations while awaiting still greater reinforcements, the king suddenly rushed upon them and, pressing upon them with his men and with swords, wrought an immense slaughter among them, so that permission to escape death was granted to few.

The lord king, therefore, having gained so distinguished a victory, was now preparing his journey back into the kingdom. But before his departure, the nobles and chief men of the principality of Antioch, by the counsel and assent of the king himself, sent solemn messengers and summoned to themselves the lord Raymond, son of the lord William of Poitiers, in order that they might join to him in marriage the daughter of the younger lord Bohemond. When this had been done, the king returned to the kingdom.

After the king had returned from the regions of Antioch, various conspiracies, and grave ones, arose against him in the kingdom, chiefly from Hugh, count of Joppa. Condemned by the king for his contumacy, Hugh betook himself to Ashkelon, to the enemies of the faith. The king besieged Joppa. But the citizens, considering that their lord had sought the protection of the enemies of the cross, betook themselves to the king under the guidance of better counsel. While the king was occupied about the siege of Joppa, the king of Damascus besieged and stormed the city of Paneas, all the citizens and stipendiaries being captured.

In the following year the lord Raymond, for whom the Antiochenes had sent, came to Antioch and immediately took as wife the said daughter of Bohemond, who was below the lawful years. This Raymond was distinguished by nobility, fashioned with an exceptional tallness of body, commendable in speech and affability, and to be preferred in the use of arms and experience of military affairs to all who had preceded him. He was almost assiduous in the divine offices and sober in food and drink. Nevertheless, among the other defects from which he suffered, he was precipitate in spirit, impetuous in things to be done, knowing no measure in anger, devoid of reason, and little fortunate.

At that time Pons, count of Tripoli, manfully met the Damascenes when they entered his land in hostile fashion and joined battle with them. But, their sins requiring it, after his battle lines had been broken and turned in flight, he was killed, the Syrians who dwelt on Mount Lebanon betraying him. In that battle many nobles and many citizens of Tripoli of middling station were killed. The aforesaid Pons left as his heir a son named Raymond. As soon as Raymond obtained the lordship, he gathered the remaining multitude of his men, suddenly ascended Lebanon, and killed with various torments, in the sight of the people, all those who had betrayed his father.

Meanwhile it was announced that the lord John, emperor of Constantinople, having gathered infinite forces of both cavalry and infantry, was hastening to descend into Syria. He was greatly indignant that the Antiochenes had presumed to give the daughter of the prince in marriage to someone without his knowledge and wholly without consulting him. Coming into Cilicia, he occupied almost all the cities of that province, casting out the faithful princes from them. Thence, coming to Antioch, he surrounded it on every side with a siege and began to press the city more vehemently.

While these things were being done around Antioch, Sanguin, an indefatigable persecutor of the Christian name, entered the county of Tripoli in hostile fashion and laid waste everything with fire and sword. After this became known to the king of Jerusalem, although he had determined to go toward Antioch, nevertheless, changing his purpose, he directed his battle lines against the enemies of the faith. After Sanguin learned this, he left the siege of the city of Raphania and came to meet our men, with his battle lines drawn up, in order to fight. Battle having therefore been joined, by the hidden but just judgment of God, our men were defeated. The king, seeing the slaughter of our men, took counsel for his own safety and secured himself with a few men in a certain neighboring fortress. For in that deadly battle almost all the infantry forces perished, with a few of them captured. Raymond the younger, prince of Tripoli, was also captured there.

Immediately after the victory, Sanguin surrounded on every side with a siege the castle into which the lord king had withdrawn, denying the besieged rest. But when he heard that the prince of Antioch and the count of Edessa were hastening to the aid of the lord king, he sent messengers concerning peace to the king. He said that he would restore all whom he had captured a little before, both the count and the others, and would give free departure both to the lord king and to his men, provided that the king surrendered that fortress to him. The king, not knowing that aid was so near, accepted his word, marveling whence such great humanity proceeded in them. When all things had therefore been completed as they had agreed, they hastened on their journey toward the kingdom. But when the king was at the place called Archis, he then learned of the lord prince's approach. The prince therefore came to Antioch after a short time, and the king returned to Jerusalem.

Amid these things, the emperor of Constantinople, with his armies, vexed the citizens of Antioch with frequent attacks. They, in turn, wore down the emperor's army according to their strength with continual sallies. When each side had suffered very great harm in that affair, peace was at last reformed between them under certain agreements, certain men interposing themselves for that business. It then seemed good to the arbiters that the lord prince should approach the emperor and, with due solemnity, render the due homage and fidelity; and he should swear that he would not deny entry to the emperor when he wished to enter Antioch. And if the lord emperor should restore to the prince the cities of Aleppo, Caesarea of Cappadocia, Hamah, and Emissa, the prince, at last content with these cities, should without difficulty restore Antioch to the lord emperor to be possessed by his own right; but the lord emperor, in recompense for the fidelity rendered, should concede the city of Antioch to the prince.

Thus, the compact having been completed and peace more fully reformed, the emperor betook himself with his armies into Cilicia for the sake of wintering, on account of the severity of the approaching winter, promising that in the immediately following summer, with the Lord as author, after he had stormed the aforesaid cities, he would subject them to the prince's power.

Therefore, when the winter months around Cilicia had passed, the emperor besieged the city of Caesarea and, with engines erected round about it, struck its walls with his armies, not without slaughter of the inhabitants. While the imperial army sweated manfully in the assault upon the city, the prince and the count of Edessa conducted themselves more remissly, delighting themselves with games and dice. Observing this, the emperor was not a little indignant. Taking no small quantity of money from the besieged citizens, he raised the siege and departed, and returned with his armies to Antioch.

When he had rested there for some time, he asked the prince that the city’s citadel be given to him. He sought, moreover, free lordship over the city. This seemed exceedingly hard to the prince and the other Latins dwelling there: that the city acquired at so great a peril to our people and restored to the Christian faith by the blood of so many blessed princes should descend into the hands of the effeminate people of the Greeks. Thus the matter was placed in a narrow pass.

When this new development had been made known among the people, a tumult was suddenly raised to the stars; and the citizens, inflamed by these reports, rose up against the Greeks dispersed through the city, wounded many, and killed some. Vehemently moved by this uproar of the citizens, the emperor summoned the prince and the foremost men of the city and spoke these words to them: “I remember that I held negotiations with you about obtaining the city, from which a scandal is said to have arisen among the people. Therefore, since what I had sought seems so hard and difficult to you, I revoke my decision. Keep the city for yourselves, therefore. It suffices for our empire that you are truly our faithful men. Go out, therefore, and restrain the raging people. But if my delay in the city is in any way suspected, with the Lord as author, we shall depart tomorrow.”

He carried out what had been said on the following day. For, having departed from the city, he commanded the camp to be pitched above the river. At last, having most firmly promised his return, he went back with his legions to his own territory.

While these things were being done around Antioch, the lord Theodoric, count of Flanders and son-in-law of the lord king, landed at Jerusalem with an honorable company. Gladdened by his coming, the Christian people besieged and stormed a certain stronghold situated beyond the Jordan.

Meanwhile Sanguin, immeasurably exalted by favorable successes, determined to occupy for himself the kingdom of the Damascenes. Understanding this, Aynard, procurator of that kingdom and father-in-law of the king of the Damascenes, entered into an alliance with the lord king and the Christian people and summoned him to his aid. After the matter became known to Sanguin, fearing that he could not resist the two very strong armies which had now assembled against him, he left the siege he had already laid against a certain city and returned to his own territory. But the king, with the army of the Damascenes, as had been provided in their agreements, besieged the city of Paneas; aided faithfully by the army of the Damascenes for this work, he compelled the besieged city to surrender after not much time. Having received it, he restored temporal jurisdiction to the lord Raynerius, from whom it had been taken.

In the eighth year of this Emperor Lothair, Henry, king of England, died. Stephen, his nephew through his sister, succeeded him in the kingdom. But he was deprived of a great part of the kingdom. For Matilda, daughter of King Henry, who had first married Emperor Henry V and afterward Geoffrey, count of Anjou, occupied the duchy of Normandy with the aid of Louis, king of the Franks. Moreover, she also stirred up great troubles against Stephen in England and afterward even captured him when he had been defeated in battle. But she released him in exchange for her brother, Count Robert, whom King Stephen held captive. From these dissensions England was worn down by famine and the sword while the princes were in discord with one another.

Title XVII, Chapter VIII

When Emperor Lothair had been removed from human affairs, Conrad, nephew of Henry V, who had aspired to the empire before Lothair, was assumed for the government of the empire by the common vote of the princes. This was in the year of the Lord 1138, but in the five thousand one hundred first year from the beginning of the world according to the shorter reckoning, and in the six thousand three hundred forty-eighth year according to the greater reckoning. He ruled for fifteen years.

Nevertheless, Duke Henry of Saxony and Bavaria, who was surnamed the Proud and with whom the imperial insignia were also stubbornly withheld, did not consent to this election. This Henry was the son-in-law of the deceased emperor; therefore, after the emperor's death, claiming those same insignia for himself, he aspired to the empire.

The emperor appointed a general court for all. Those who came to it, together with the empress, Lothair's widowed wife, were received into the emperor's peace and favor, except Henry, duke of Bavaria, who scorned to come. Persevering in his contumacy, this Henry was abandoned by all. With only four counts as companions, alone and in poverty, he withdrew secretly into Saxony and, after a short interval of time, ended his life.

When the aforesaid Henry had died and Emperor Conrad now had no opponent in the empire, although he had not yet received the imperial blessing, he ruled more fully in Germany.

At that time Roger the Sicilian, whom, with Lothair's aid, the lord Pope Innocent II had expelled, as we said above, because he favored the antipope, again gathered military forces from every side and returned into Apulia. He joined battle with Rayno, whom Innocent had set over Apulia; defeated by him, Roger was again driven from Apulia. But after a short time the said Rayno died. When his death became known to Roger, Roger returned to Apulia once more and received under his dominion without battle the province bereft of a duke. Having exterminated from it the nobles who had opposed him, he began to call himself king of Sicily.

Prince Robert of Capua, with those whom Roger had expelled from Apulia, betook themselves to Emperor Conrad in Germany, exhorting him to cross over into Italy. But because other business pressed upon him, he was unable to cross over at that time.

Pope Innocent, however, a magnanimous man, gathered a great army and set out into Apulia against Roger, Roman nobles also accompanying him to that business. When he had come to a certain place, and the leaders of the army conducted themselves with insufficient caution, he was surrounded and captured by Roger. But because Roger behaved with exceedingly great reverence toward him, Innocent received him into favor. Roger, having sworn fidelity to the lord Pope Innocent and to all his successors, obtained by apostolic authority the royal name both in Sicily and in Apulia.

King Roger, therefore, raised up immeasurably and now having no obstacle except Emperor Conrad, corrupted with his money Welf, duke of Bavaria and brother of Henry the Proud, and stirred him up against Conrad in Germany. Welf, having procured great armies with the money of Roger, king of the Sicilians, brought wars upon Emperor Conrad. At last, defeated by him in battle, he lost many of his men.

Many think that the Welfs were named from this Welf, duke of Bavaria, whose pestiferous name gained strength especially in Italy. I call it pestiferous insofar as it is destructive of unity and peace, so that it could never afterward be eradicated from there. For because this Welf opposed himself to the emperor, those among the Italian peoples who reject imperial dominion in Italy are called Welfs down to the present day. But I have not found it written why those who favor the party of the empire in Italy are called Ghibellines. Others assign another cause from which the supporters of the Church are called Welfs and the supporters of the empire Ghibellines.

Around the same time John, emperor of Constantinople, again led by desire to possess Antioch, gathered great forces anew and descended into Syria. Coming to Antioch, he was in no way admitted because the Latin inhabitants opposed him. Conceiving great indignation from this, he recalled his army into Cilicia, hoping that, when the winter had passed, he might obtain something around Antioch even against the will of the citizens.

While he was there, about the beginning of spring, he went out to hunt. When he had loosed an arrow from his bow against a boar, he gravely wounded himself with the arrow in the hand with which he controlled the bow. That arrow had been smeared with poison. Having thus received the sentence of death from so slight a cause, he returned to the camp. But the deadly plague of poison having been received inwardly, the remedies applied by the physicians accomplished little. Nevertheless, the physicians said that one remedy could be applied: the injured hand should be cut off before the poison infected the remaining parts of the body. Hearing this, the magnanimous man steadfastly rejected it, asserting that it was unworthy for so great and so noble an empire to be ruled with only one hand. This, however, seems to be ascribed more to pride than to magnanimity.

The emperor, therefore, seeing that the danger of death threatened him, declared Manuel, the younger of his sons, heir of the empire. This having been done, he departed the present life. His son, after completing the affairs in that region according to his desire, returned to Constantinople.

In that season there occurred a matter very harmful to all Christendom. While the lord Fulk, king of Jerusalem, was making a stay at the city of Acre and had gone outside the city for the sake of recreation, it happened by chance that a little hare, started by the dogs, fled. A shout raised by all pursued it as it fled. The king, sitting on a horse and hastening without deliberation, ran up. But the horse was driven headlong and, falling to the ground, cast the king headlong, so that the king's head was entirely crushed by the saddle and he discharged brain through both nostrils and ears. Therefore, borne back to the city amid the groaning of all, he prolonged his life for three days, still palpitating without sense. On the fourth day, however, he breathed out his spirit, in the year of the Lord 1142. By the lady queen, his wife, he left two sons: namely, Baldwin, the firstborn, about thirteen years of age, and Amalric, seven years of age. And thus, within one year, two most illustrious princes—the lord John, illustrious emperor of Constantinople, and Fulk, the fourth king of the Latins of Jerusalem—died by an unexpected death.

Section II

When Fulk, the fourth king of Jerusalem, had died, his son named Baldwin succeeded him in the kingdom. He was a youth of excellent natural disposition. After he had become a man, he was tall in body and displayed such great eminence of beauty that, even to those who did not know him, a certain exceptional dignity shining in him gave a sure indication concerning him, that is, concerning his royal majesty. He was affable and very merciful, by no means covetous of another's goods, nor did he, after the manner of a prodigal man, lie in wait for the riches of his subjects. What is usually a rare occurrence at that age, he was also God-fearing in the age of adolescence. He was moderately learned and, whenever time was available to him, he gladly applied himself as a hearer to the reading of histories; he diligently investigated the deeds and customs of ancient kings and ancient princes. He was, moreover, patient in labor and, after the manner of an excellent prince, exceedingly provident amid the doubtful outcomes of wars.

In that same year Sanguin, a wicked man and the most powerful of the Turks, surrounded Edessa, filled with Latin peoples, with a siege. He had taken the occasion for besieging the said city from the absence of Count Jocelin, count of Edessa. Contrary to the custom of his predecessors, Jocelin had abandoned residence in that city and was dwelling near the Euphrates in a castle called Turbessel, giving himself to delights because of the fertility and pleasantness of the place. The aforesaid city had as inhabitants Chaldeans and Armenians, men unwarlike, who, entirely abandoning the use of arms, gave themselves to commerce; and it was rarely frequented by the coming of Latins. Its care had been entrusted only to mercenaries.

Sanguin, therefore, finding it empty, placed his legions round about it and, continually afflicting the citizens with frequent assaults, denied rest to the besieged. Count Jocelin, however, hearing these things, summoned his military forces too late. Moreover, he warned the prince of Antioch, his lord, to prepare himself together with him to break the siege. A messenger was also sent to the king of Jerusalem to announce that the city was besieged by the infidels. While both of them were summoning military forces, Sanguin violently stormed the aforesaid city after it had been breached. Sparing neither sex nor age, he caused all the faithful found there to be cut down with swords by his infidels, except a few who had withdrawn into the city's stronghold. Thus, therefore, a most ancient city, devoted to the Christian name from the time of the apostles and rescued from the superstitions of the infidels, came into the hands of the infidels.

At the same time Baldwin departed with the greater part of the army of his kingdom in hope of obtaining a certain city which one of the emirs of the king of the Damascenes, to the harm of his lord against whom he had rebelled, wished to surrender. But when the Turks met him, he suffered great losses among his men. And when the army of the Christians was pressed on every side by the infidels even to despair, to such a degree that certain of the nobles secretly counseled the lord king to take for himself the wood of the life-giving cross and the horse of a certain noble man, which surpassed all the others in speed, and alone take counsel for his own safety, the said king, although he was below the years of puberty, despised that counsel with royal magnificence. He said that he would entirely spurn his own safety if a people so devoted to God should perish in so lamentable a misfortune.

Section III

When the city of Edessa had thus been captured, a deadly report full of bitterness occupied the whole West. For it had been made known abroad that the impious nation of the Turks was laying waste the cities and fortified towns of the Christians and afflicting the Christian people with frequent invasions. The lord Eugenius III, who was then supreme pontiff, bearing paternal solicitude for the affliction of his children, sent religious men into diverse regions of the West to announce to princes, peoples, and nations the oppressions of the eastern Christians.

Among them, the blessed Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux, a man of immortal memory, was chosen for the execution of the aforesaid office pleasing to God. Although vigorous and indefatigable, he was nevertheless of an infirm body. He went around the kingdoms, everywhere evangelizing the word of God, and diligently revealed the affliction of the Christian people who were in the East. In the city of Speyer there was so great a concourse of people to hear and venerate him that Emperor Conrad, who was standing there, lest the people trample him, carried him from the church with his own hands.

While he was discoursing upon these things, the free favor of both nobles and common people attended his exhortations. They gave their voluntary assent and pledged themselves to the journey toward Jerusalem. Moreover, the illustrious men the lord Conrad, emperor of the Romans, and the lord Louis, king of the Franks, together with many princes of both peoples, with all devotion impressed the saving sign of the cross upon their garments. Having therefore settled the condition of their kingdoms and prepared the things necessary for the journey, they undertook the journey in the month of May.

They determined to advance separately, namely for this reason: lest contentions arise between peoples disagreeing among themselves, and so that they might be able more conveniently to provide for themselves the necessities of life. Having therefore traversed Bavaria and Austria and the territories of the Hungarians, and having crossed both Pannonias, they reached Turkey. At last Emperor Conrad came with his men to the royal city, that is, Constantinople. He was magnificently received by Emmanuel, emperor of the Greeks. Some rest having been given to the armies, Conrad crossed the Hellespont and came with his legions into Syria.

Meanwhile the sultan of Iconium, a man most powerful among the Turks, hearing of the arrival of such great princes, summoned infinite forces of armed men from the remotest boundaries of the East. For he had heard that a multitude unheard of through the ages had arrived. And it was truly so. For, as those who were in the aforesaid expedition steadfastly assert, in the company of the lord emperor alone there were as many as seventy thousand armored horsemen, apart from the infantry forces. A number no smaller than theirs had been in the company of Louis, king of the Franks. If the Lord's grace had been favorable to them, not only the sultan of Iconium, who was most powerful, but all the provinces of the East would easily have been subjected to the Christian name. But, by the hidden judgment of God, God despised their service and did not hold acceptable the gift that perhaps was being offered by unworthy hands.

Meanwhile the lord emperor came into Lycaonia, whose metropolis is Iconium. At the request of the lord Conrad, emperor of the Romans, the lord emperor of Constantinople had given him guides for the road who were knowledgeable about the places. Employing their innate malice and led by their customary hatred of our men, whether by the command of their lord or corrupted by the money of the infidels, they deliberately began to draw the legions of the Teutons through trackless places. And when they had led the emperor's army where they intended, while our men slept from weariness, in the silence of the untimely night they secretly fled, abandoning the lord emperor's camp and leaving the people without a guide.

When daylight had at last returned, those who customarily preceded the columns were not found. When the emperor perceived this, he assembled his princes and consulted them about what needed to be done. Some counseled that they should return, others that they should advance. While, ignorant of the places and anxious because of the lack of provisions, they thus wavered, it was announced that the battle lines of the infidels were stationed not far away in the vicinity. For the army had been placed in a barren wilderness, just as it had deliberately been led in by the aforesaid seducers.

It was also publicly said, and did not differ much from the truth, that these perilous contrivances had been constructed with the knowledge and at the command of the emperor of Constantinople, who envied the successes of the Latins. For the Greeks are said always to have held and still to hold the Latins, and especially the Teutons, in suspicion as rivals of the empire who were growing strong in dominion, because their king names himself emperor of the Romans and Augustus. In this, indeed, they judge that too much is detracted from their own emperor, whom they call monarch, that is, the one who singularly rules over all, as if they call him the one and only emperor of the Romans.

Thus, therefore, while the army of the faithful was suffering from hunger, labor, and ignorance of the places, the battle lines of the Turks suddenly rushed upon the emperor's camp. Although at the beginning our men were struck with amazement and trembled at their sudden arrival, nevertheless, after recovering their spirits, they resisted manfully on both sides as the place and time permitted. At last, worn down by hunger and weariness, they now began to fail. Thus the army of the faithful, surrounded on every side by the infidels, was exceedingly grievously distressed by the discharge of missiles and arrows and was pressed even to death. Nor was an opportunity given to return the attack or the ability to engage with the enemies. For whenever the battle lines of the faithful attempted to make an assault upon the enemies, the latter, breaking up their columns and eluding the efforts of our men, were carried in different directions. Again, when our men withdrew themselves into the camp, the enemies recalled their columns, surrounded our army, and, pressing more fiercely as though upon besieged men, denied them rest.

It therefore came to pass, by the hidden but just judgment of God, that all that power of the princes, which in arms, strength, courage, and number appeared incomparable, was suddenly crushed and fell, so that scarcely any traces of its glory and scarcely any remnant of such great forces survived. But of seventy thousand armed knights and of so great a body of infantry troops, whose number was infinite, scarcely a tenth part escaped, as those who were present assert, the others either killed by the sword or bound in the chains of the enemies.

By God's will the emperor escaped with a few of his princes. Although with exceedingly great difficulty, after some days he betook himself into the regions of Nicaea. But the enemies, having gained the victory, laden with spoils and made rich with manifold treasure, were enriched with horses and arms even to nausea. They eagerly awaited the arrival of the king of the Franks, who was said to have arrived near those same regions. Nevertheless, the sultan of Iconium did not take part in so great an affair. Rather, a certain noble first officer of his army, called Paramuni, by the Lord's permission inflicted this blow contrary to expectation. This happened in the year of the Lord 1146, in the month of November.

But these sons of Belial, who had been given to our men by the emperor of the Greeks as guides of the roads and routes, in order to add sin to sin hastened to the army of the king of the Franks, who was said to be near. They lied that the lord emperor, relying upon their guidance, had conducted all things prosperously and, after violently storming Iconium, had triumphed over the enemies.

Meanwhile Louis, king of France, following almost in the same footsteps, came with his army to Constantinople. Making a short stay there, he crossed the Hellespont and descended into Bithynia, where he inquired more diligently concerning the lord Emperor Conrad, who had preceded him. It was truthfully signified to him that the emperor himself had lost his army in battle and had escaped with a few princes. At first, therefore, the report that arose was doubtful and without a certain authority, but in the course of time it became more certain. For, after a short interval, Frederick, duke of the Swabians and the emperor's nephew through his brother, who had escaped from that slaughter, came hastening to the army of the king of the Franks. From him Louis learned more fully and more certainly what adverse things had occurred.

King Louis therefore moved camp and came to the place where the emperor had encamped. There, employing familiar conversations, they ordained that they should set out together with their columns joined. But when they had come to Ephesus, the metropolis of Asia Minor, the emperor—either because he could not endure the shame that they were so few who had previously had very many with them, or because he could not bear the pride of the Franks—sent his men onward by land and himself returned by ship to Constantinople. There he made a stay with his princes until the beginning of spring.

Meanwhile the king of the Franks, after remaining at Ephesus for some days, undertook the journey again and came to the fords of the Venander [read: Maeander] River. Here the Franks were first granted sight of the enemies according to their desire. Having seen them, the king and his men, crossing the river despite the enemies, rushed manfully upon them. Having killed and captured many, they turned the rest to flight. Pursuing them as far as their camp, they also stormed the camp itself. Having therefore gained this victory and been made more joyful by the spoils and plunder of the enemies, they again continued on their way in the morning and girded themselves for the journey.

When they had now advanced a little, he who customarily went before the others with the royal standard reached a certain mountain where it had been ordained by the king that morning that they should encamp that night. But when it seemed to certain of the chief men who went before that the army had advanced too little that day, the standard began to proceed farther. Those who followed, however, when they saw that they were already not far from that mountain, judged that the camp had been established there, as had been ordained, and began to advance much too slowly. And thus, with some having crossed the mountain while others still delayed around the mountain, the army of the Franks was divided.

The legions of the infidels, who were following the army from the side, saw this and seized the occasion, both from the narrowness of the places and because the more robust portion of the knights had been separated from the army. Suddenly, with their battle lines drawn up, they rushed upon our men; and before they could seize their arms, they broke up the battle lines of the Franks present there. Although the narrowness of the places hindered the Christians, nevertheless for some time they resisted manfully. The battle was fought for a long time in an uncertain art [read: with the battle wavering] and with a doubtful outcome. But at the end, our sins requiring it, the hand of the infidels prevailed, and the army of the Christians was reduced to a small number. Thus on that day very many noble and illustrious men fell, whose names no one should doubt are written in the book of life.

Why then, blessed Lord Jesus, did you suffer this people, so devoted to you and wishing to adore the footprints of your feet and the venerable places which you consecrated by your bodily presence, to perish by the hands of those who hate you? Truly, Lord, your judgments are a great abyss, and there is no one who can resist your will.

But the king of the Franks, by chance delivered by God's will from so great a danger, ascended the summit of the aforesaid mountain. With the greatest danger, in the silence of the untimely night, he betook himself to the place where those who had gone before had encamped. On that day bread and every nourishment of food began to fail in the camp. And, what was worse, without a guide going before them, they wandered here and there as men who had lost their way.

At last, with much difficulty, they came to the city now called Attalia, which city is situated on the seashore and was then under the dominion of the emperor of the Greeks. From that place the king, with the remaining infantry forces and his princes, came by ship to the port of Saint Symeon, which is ten or twelve miles distant from Antioch. He remained there until the rest of his army, which followed him by land, came to him.

Before the king's arrival, Raymond, prince of Antioch, summoned the nobles of the whole region, went out to meet him, and introduced him with his company into Antioch with the greatest magnificence. Long before, upon hearing of his approach, Raymond had conceived the hope that he might enlarge the principality of Antioch through his aid. Therefore, after some days, meeting the king according to what he had conceived in his mind, he sought his aid so that, supported by his forces, he might subject to himself the neighboring cities of Aleppo, Caesarea, Emam, and certain others. But when he saw that he made no progress, since the king had irrevocably determined to go toward Jerusalem, frustrated in his hope, he changed his purpose and began to abominate the king's ways and to arm himself for his injury.

After this became known to the king, he forestalled the prince's contrivances and, on the counsel of his magnates and hastening his journey, departed secretly from the city of Antioch. There were those who imputed it to the excessive malice of the king of the Franks that he did not admit the entreaties of so great a man and a prince who had deserved so well of him, since, if the king had been willing to give his effort to it, he could easily have obtained one or more of the aforesaid cities.

Meanwhile the lord emperor, when the winter had passed, was carried from the royal city in a fleet which the lord emperor of Constantinople had caused to be prepared for him, and with his men reached the port of Acre. Setting out thence toward Jerusalem, he was introduced into the holy city by the lord king and by the whole clergy and people.

In those same days there also landed the lord Alfonso, count of Toulouse and son of the elder lord Raymond. Before he reached Jerusalem, at the maritime city of Caesarea, he ended his life, as is said, after taking poison; the author of so great a crime was uncertain. The people of the entire kingdom were awaiting the coming of this illustrious man with joy, hoping that he would bring many things to the kingdom.

Meanwhile it was announced that the king of the Franks was approaching Jerusalem. Therefore, by the common counsel of all, the king sent the lord patriarch to meet him. Thus, as the whole people came out to meet him, he was conducted into the city and led to the venerable places.

After some days, a general court was proclaimed at the city of Acre so that the fruit of so great a pilgrimage and the end of such great labors, and the desired increase of the kingdom of Jerusalem, might be discussed. Present at the said court were the lord Conrad, emperor of the Romans; Louis, king of the Franks; Baldwin, king of Jerusalem; and many other princes and barons of the said kingdoms. Coming together as one, they began to discuss what seemed best and more expedient to attempt for the glory of the Christian name and the increase of the kingdom.

At last, by the common counsel and will of all, it seemed expedient that the city of the Damascenes, situated near our peoples in the East, should be besieged. Therefore, when counsel about this had been made firm, it was commanded by the voice of a herald that on the appointed day all should be prepared to direct their forces into those regions.

Section V

Thus, on the twenty-fifth day of the month of May, in the year from the Incarnation of the Lord 1147, the aforesaid kings beloved of God assembled. With the saving wood of the Lord's cross going before them, they undertook the journey together with their expeditions. Having traversed the most famous Mount Lebanon, which lies midway between Caesarea Philippi and Damascus, they descended into the field of Damascus at a place whose name is Daria. There, with the battle lines drawn up, they approached the city.

On its northern and western sides, from which the Christians approached, the city of Damascus has orchards that are almost infinite, so that they extend more than four or five miles toward Lebanon. These are enclosed separately on every side by a wall, although an earthen one. These orchards are a supreme fortification for the city. Therefore, on the first day, with the king of Jerusalem and his men going before, they obtained the said orchards, not without difficulty and danger. Having obtained the orchards and crossed, against the enemies' will, the river which flowed between the orchards and the city, they freely encamped beside the city.

The citizens, therefore, struck with amazement by so great a number and strength, began to distrust their own strength. Holding a deliberation among themselves, employing that resourcefulness which is customary in desperate circumstances, and having recourse to their final devices, they covered with great beams all the streets of the city on that side where the Christian people had placed their camp, for this purpose alone: that while the Christians labored to break through the city's walls, they themselves might depart by fleeing through the opposite side.

It appeared quite ready to be accomplished, if the divine power had been favorable to us, that in the near future the Christian people would obtain that most noble city. But it seemed otherwise to him who is terrible in his counsels over the sons of men. For while the city was placed in a narrow pass and its citizens had no hope of resisting, they began to presume upon the covetousness of our men. They promised an infinite quantity of money to certain of the eastern princes if the siege should be raised by their efforts. Seduced by money, these descended into such a crime that they persuaded the kings and pilgrim princes, who trusted in their diligence, to abandon the orchards and transfer their expeditions to the opposite part of the city, asserting that the city wall was weak there.

Both the kings and the other princes believed them. Abandoning the places which they had previously occupied with great slaughter among their men, they transferred their legions to the opposite part of the city. There, seeing themselves placed far from convenient access to water and that provisions were now failing entirely, they complained too late that a deception had intervened and that they had maliciously been transferred from fertile places. Doubtful of what they should do, they deliberated secretly and privately and determined that they must return, detesting the frauds of those who had seduced them.

Thus, therefore, that glorious army, clothed with confusion, was compelled to return to Jerusalem with the business unfinished. And after it was granted to the western princes to return to their own regions, remembering the injuries they had received, they abominated the malice of the eastern princes. It is related, moreover, as a supreme miracle that afterward all that money wickedly received was found to be false and entirely useless.

Having returned to Jerusalem, they again summoned an assembly of the princes. There were some who suggested that a siege should be laid around Ashkelon, which was still held by the infidel people. But after many words, the said plan suffered an abortion.

The illustrious man the lord Emperor Conrad, therefore, seeing that the Lord had withdrawn his grace from them, prepared a ship and returned to the western regions of the empire. But the lord Louis, king of the Franks, after passing the circuit of one year in the kingdom of Jerusalem, returned with his wife, whom he had brought with him, and the other princes into his own kingdom.

From that day, therefore, the condition of the eastern Latins began manifestly to become worse. For the enemies of the faith, to whom their names alone had previously been a terror, had now despised without loss the presence of such great princes. From this they were raised into such great presumption that thereafter they neither held their strength in suspicion nor feared to press more bitterly upon our men.

Section VI

Thus, after the departure of the said princes, Nuradin, son of Sanguin, began insolently to rage around the regions of Antioch with an infinite body of his men. After this became known to Prince Raymond, because he was an impetuous man, and a rash one, without waiting for those whom he had summoned to his aid he hastened with a few men to those regions. After he arrived and saw the multitude of the enemies, he began, although too late, to doubt in distrust. Nevertheless, he drew up his battle lines and, although far unequal both in number and strength, joined battle with the enemies.

But those who were with the prince, unable to endure the strength of the enemies, were turned to flight. The prince, however, because he was a strenuous man, fought manfully in the midst of the slaughter of enemies which he himself had wrought by cutting them down. At last, wearied and pierced by swords, he died. Many nobles also fell with him. Nuradin, having gained the victory and obtained the prince's body, commanded the head together with the right arm to be divided from the rest of the body. As a sign of victory he sent them into the East to the caliph of Baghdad and the other satraps of the Turks. The prince was killed in the year from the Incarnation of the Lord 1148.

The count of Edessa, who had escaped from that battle, was also captured by enemies lying in ambush on the road while he was returning to his own territory. He was conducted to Aleppo and, unable to endure the filth of prison, miserably ended his life after a short time. After his death, his wife, a most prudent woman, strove as much as she could to fortify and defend the strongholds of the region.

Meanwhile the emperor of Constantinople, hearing of the desolation of those regions which had been under his dominion, sent one of his princes with infinite treasures and no small military force to the aforesaid regions. He offered certain annual revenues to the countess and her children if they would concede to his empire the strongholds which had remained in their possession, so that it might preserve that land from the incursions of the Turks and, moreover, restore to his empire those things which had been lost. The lord king of Jerusalem, who was then in those regions, also condescended to this opinion, although he did not greatly presume that the province could be preserved in that condition by the strength of the Greeks.

All things therefore having been completed according to what had been provided in the agreements, and all the towns having been surrendered to the Greeks, the lord king of Jerusalem took with him the lady countess with her children and all the other Latins who wished to depart, and went out to Antioch. But Nuradin, most powerful lord of the Turks, seeing the land destitute of the aid of the Latins and presuming upon the softness of the Greeks, sent in his armies and within one year occupied the entire region. Thus, therefore, a most wealthy province in which five thousand knights had sufficient support came into the hands of the infidels.

In the same year, which was the year of the Lord's Incarnation 1151, Raymond the younger, count of Tripoli, was killed by Assassins in his city of Tripoli.

In the following year, two certain most powerful Turks, namely full brothers, whose inheritance the holy city is said to have been before it was liberated by the Christians, gathered an infinite multitude of Turks and set out toward Jerusalem. Coming not far from the city, they placed their camp on the Mount of Olives itself. When those who were in the city heard this, they invoked aid from above, took up their arms, went out, and attacked them manfully. Rushing upon them, they wrought a very great slaughter and, after they had been turned to flight, our men pursued them, cutting them down as far as the Jordan. Thus clothed with confusion and shame, these two brothers returned to their own territory. It is said that as many as five thousand of them were slain on that day.

While Conrad was emperor, Louis, king of the Franks, captured Vitry, a castle of Count Theobald. There the church was burned by fire, in which one thousand two hundred persons of both sexes were burned. Therefore certain men thought that Louis, led by consciousness of this danger, undertook the pilgrimage across the sea.

In that season also, Audebert, count of La Marche, disturbed by the death of his only son, sold his land to King Henry. For it is read that this man's son was suddenly carried away alive, before many witnesses, by a certain knight whom he had treacherously killed, and nowhere appeared again. Terrified by this, the father took up the cross, set out for Jerusalem, and ended his life there. Geoffrey and Hugh of Lusignan, asserting themselves to be heirs of his land, reclaimed it and at last obtained it.

Moreover, at that time, while Louis, king of the Franks, was returning by ship from Syria into Gaul, he happened upon ships of the Greeks and was captured by them. While he was being conducted to be presented to the emperor, who was besieging Cursolium, Gregory, commander of the king's fleet, returning with the fleet from Constantinople, attacked them. For he had laid waste and dispersed the provinces of the Greeks, had advanced as far as the city of Constantinople itself, and had shot golden arrows into the emperor's palace. And after burning the city's suburbs, he had violently taken away fruits from the emperor's gardens. Therefore, while returning, he encountered the ships of the Greeks. Having brought them under his power, he rescued Louis, king of the Franks, but released the captives at the king's request.

Returning into France, Louis, led by a spirit of jealousy and after consanguinity had been sworn, repudiated his wife. Henry, duke of the Normans, namely the son of Geoffrey, count of Anjou, and the aforesaid Matilda, married her against Louis's will. From this cause the king of the Franks at that time lost the duchy of Aquitaine. She was King Louis's first wife, the daughter of the elder count of Poitiers, who died at Saint James. For it is read that, when King Louis had taken her with him across the sea, he heard that she had received gifts. Therefore, after his return into France, he wished to repudiate her not only because of the aforesaid cause but also because of that woman's incontinence. For the monk Helinand relates that she conducted herself not as a queen but almost as a harlot.

In the same year, which was the year of the Lord's Incarnation 1153, Conrad, king of the Teutons, died. Although he had reigned for fifteen years, he nevertheless did not receive the imperial blessing from the lord pope. In that year Pope Eugenius, who had returned to Rome from Gaul and had been received with supreme honor and joy by the Roman people, also migrated to the Lord. In the same year Anastasius, a Roman by nation, was substituted for him in the papacy. When he had died within a year, Adrian, an Englishman by nation, succeeded him. He sat for four years, nine months, and seven days.

Title XVII, Chapter IX

After the death of Conrad III, emperor, Frederick, duke of the Swabians, the first of this name and nephew of the aforesaid Conrad through his brother, was made emperor. He was called Barbarossa. And when the electors of the empire did not agree, committing their votes to him, he elected himself emperor.

Coming to Rome, he caused the desolated city of Tivoli to be rebuilt, but he destroyed Spoleto. He began to rule in the year of the Lord 1153, in the five thousand one hundred sixteenth year from the beginning of the world, or, according to the other computation, in the six thousand three hundred sixty-third year. He ruled for thirty-six years.

He did many evils to the Church. And when he had reigned as it were for a year in Germany, he descended into Italy with an innumerable army of his men in order to obtain the imperial blessing, and he directed his journey toward Rome. His arrival, however, was very suspect to Pope Adrian, who was then at Rome. Nevertheless, before his arrival there was peace and concord between them. Therefore, received with imperial favor by the Roman clergy and people, he was solemnly crowned by Adrian in the church of Saint Paul on the sixth day before the Kalends of July.

Three days afterward, the pope together with Emperor Frederick celebrated the solemn feast on the day of the apostles Peter and Paul below the city of Tivoli, at a place called the Lucanian Bridge. In that solemnity, the one bore the insignia of the supreme prelacy and the other was adorned with the imperial garb; on the feast of the apostles they proceeded crowned within the city. After the completion of the feast, they separated from one another in good peace, and the lord emperor hastened toward the regions of Ancona.

In those days grave enmities arose for certain causes between the lord pope and William, king of Sicily, to such a degree that the lord pope hurled against him the sentence of excommunication. Therefore King William, full of fury, commanded the city of Benevento to be besieged by his princes. The lord pope bore this matter grievously and, wishing beyond measure to repay him in equal measure, determined to arm his own princes against him. For he persuaded Robert, count of Bassavilla and nephew of the same King William, to rise against him with many other nobles.

Moreover, the same pope recalled into the kingdom the exiles whom William and his father Roger had expelled—illustrious men powerful in arms, namely Robert, prince of Capua, Andrew of Ripa Canina, and many others—promising them on the word of the pontiff that the aid of the Roman Church would not fail them. He promised no less firmly that both the emperor of the Romans and the emperor of the Greeks would hasten to their aid within a short time. In truth, the same pope had solicited both emperors for his aid against King William.

Thus, first, the emperor of Constantinople, under hope of recovering the kingdom of Sicily, sent certain of his princes with a great army and infinite treasure and invaded the region of Apulia. At their first arrival he occupied the city of Otranto when the citizens surrendered it. Count Robert of Bassavilla also violently obtained Taranto and Bari and the whole maritime region as far as the boundaries of the kingdom. But Robert, prince of Capua, and Count Andrew claimed for themselves all Campania, which by common appellation is called the Land of Labor, as far as Saint Germanus.

Frederick, emperor of the Romans, who had already prepared arms against the said William, king of the Sicilians, was prevented. For while he made a stay with his armies in the March of Ancona, he suffered so great a slaughter among the people whom he had led into Italy that scarcely a tenth remained of the more noble and principal men. Therefore he was compelled to return to his own territory with the others who remained to him.

But in the year of the Lord 1156, Emperor Frederick himself descended into Italy with great forces and surrounded the city of Milan with a continuous siege for seven years. At last he captured and destroyed it and divided it into three boroughs. When that most famous city had been destroyed and leveled to the ground, Rainald, archbishop of Cologne, transferred from Milan to Cologne the bodies of the three kings, namely, the Magi who had come under the guidance of the star to adore Christ in the cradle. They had formerly been transferred from Constantinople and carried miraculously to Milan by Saint Eustorgius. They now rest at Cologne.

This Frederick also, in the year of the Lord 1167, when he had been unable to prevail against Pope Alexander, who was aided in France by the king of the Franks, entered Italy. Because the Romans had rebelled against him, adhering to Alexander, he moved war against them near Tusculum and obtained victory, a very great slaughter of the Romans having been made. And because the Colonnese had committed betrayal in aid of the emperor, the Romans therefore expelled them from Rome. When Frederick besieged Rome, the Romans, animated by the Orsini, manfully expelled him.

In the first year of Emperor Frederick, Louis, king of the Franks, entered the territories of Normandy in hostile fashion with a very small army and received the castle of Vernon in surrender. Meanwhile Henry, duke of Normandy, acting forcefully against King Stephen, at last made peace with him under this condition: that while Stephen himself lived, he should possess the kingdom of England peacefully, but when he died, with no other intermediary, the kingdom of the English should devolve upon Henry.

In the following year, Louis, king of the Franks, received the duke of the Normans into peace. When King Stephen had died, the duke, with the aid of the king of the Franks, entered the kingdom of the English and, having obtained the kingdom in its entirety, reformed the ancient peace.

Moreover, in the first year of Frederick, the illustrious King Baldwin, fifth king of Jerusalem, gathered the knighthood of the kingdom and led it to lay waste Ashkelon. When they had burned the orchards adjoining the city, divine clemency attended them so that it might inflame the Christians to greater things, for they proposed to compel the city to surrender.

Ashkelon is one of the five cities of the Philistines, situated on the seashore and having the form of a semicircle, whose chord lies along the shore of the sea, but whose circumference or arc upon the land faces east. Fifty years after the Lord had delivered the land of promise to the Christian people, our men then first dared to besiege this city, which was still resisting, undertaking an arduous and almost impossible matter. Thus, the city having been surrounded everywhere by sea and land, they frequently assailed it on every day.

The citizens resisted manfully for some time. But when our Christian princes had persevered throughout the siege for five continuous months, and the enemies' strength seemed to have been worn down while a greater hope than usual of obtaining the city sustained our men, a fleet of Egyptians landed at the city's port while our men saw it and were unable to prevent it.

At that time, while the Christian people sweated with all their strength in the storming of Ashkelon, Nuradin, a circumspect and prudent man, saw that, after the death of Aynard, procurator of the kingdom of the Damascenes, who had always greatly resisted his efforts, the knighthood of the Christians was occupied around Ashkelon. With a huge military force he invaded the kingdom of the Damascenes. There, with the Damascenes for the greater part assisting him, he deprived their dissolute and useless king of the kingdom and compelled him to flee into the East.

Thus Nuradin, having captured Damascus and subjected the whole region, besieged the city of Paneas, judging that he would remove our army from Ashkelon. But by the provident mercy of the Lord he obtained neither outcome. For he himself accomplished nothing around the besieged city, and our men compelled Ashkelon to surrender. For, sweating over the work begun with much urgency and vigilance, and altogether denying rest to the citizens, they daily wrought no small slaughter among them, although not without loss among our men.

For on one day about forty of the brothers of the Temple violently entered the city through a certain breach made in the wall. By God's permission, every one of them was killed. Struck with consternation by this misfortune, the Christians almost desisted from their purpose. But when they returned to the same undertaking, on a certain day the citizens went out beyond the city to battle and were laid low by our men with so grave a slaughter that there was no family in the city which domestic grief did not oppress. Therefore, the strength of their knighthood having been consumed, all their power of resistance withered. Hence, pressed by so many evils, by the common counsel of all and under conditions that they be permitted to depart from the city with their wives, children, and all their household goods, they surrendered it to the lord king. The said city was captured in the year of the Lord 1154.

At that time also the lord Reynald of Châtillon married the lady Constance, widow of Raymond, prince of Antioch, not without the amazement of many. For many illustrious and noble men sought marriage with her; scorning all of them, she secretly chose for herself as husband one stipendiary knight, namely this Reynald. Seeing that this deed had not greatly pleased the lord patriarch, Reynald, moved by indignation at the devil's instigation, seized the said patriarch and treated him shamefully. For he compelled the old and infirm man, with his head bare and smeared with honey, to stand through a summer day in the most fervent sun. Then he released him, stripped of all his goods. Unable to endure the eyes of his own citizens, the patriarch abandoned Antioch and betook himself into the kingdom of Jerusalem.

Section II

During the same time, after the city of Ashkelon had been captured by the Christians, Raymond, master of the house of the Jerusalem Hospital which is named after Saint John, together with his brothers, began to inflict many vexations concerning patriarchal right both upon the lord patriarch of Jerusalem and upon the other prelates of the churches. For they freely admitted to the celebration of divine offices those who had been excommunicated and separated from the Church, whether by the lord patriarch or by others, on account of their crimes. They did not deny viaticum and extreme unction to the sick, nor burial to the dead, and they did many other things contrary to the immunities of the churches.

When the lord patriarch often complained concerning these acts of temerity, at length, at the devil's instigation, they arrived at such temerity that, taking up arms as though in the house [read: into the house] of some ordinary man, they rushed against the patriarch in the Church of the Sepulcher. But, as the archbishop of Tyre says in his History, the Roman Church, perhaps not knowing it, seems to have furnished the first material for so great an evil. For it exempted the aforesaid place from the jurisdiction of the lord patriarch, to which it had long been subject.

But in order that it may be committed to the present history from what small seed, once sown, the aforesaid place took so great an increase, we have judged that the matter should be carried back a little to an earlier beginning.

Therefore it must be known that, at the time when the infidels held the kingdom of Jerusalem, there were not lacking some from western regions who sometimes visited the holy places either for the sake of devotion or for the sake of commerce. Among these were Amalfitans. Amalfi is a city of Apulia. The inhabitants of this city were the first to carry into the regions of Syria, for the sake of making profit, foreign merchandise which the East had not previously known. Therefore they merited favor with the lords of that region.

But because, when they came to the holy places for the sake of prayer, they did not have a dwelling within the city where they might make a stay, they obtained from the caliph, king of Egypt, permission to build an oratory within Jerusalem at a place which they might choose. Thus, money having been taken from the merchants by way of contribution, they erected a monastery before the door of the Church of the Lord's Resurrection in honor of Saint Mary, Mother of God. And because Latins founded it, for a long time it was called the monastery of Saint Mary of the Latins. When this had been done, they brought both monks and an abbot from their own regions and established the place according to a rule.

When people from western regions flowed together to visit the venerable places at Jerusalem, especially those whose own resources did not suffice to procure provisions for themselves, whatever was available was ministered to them fraternally from the aforesaid monastery. They also erected in the said place an altar of blessed John the Almsgiver. He was patriarch of Alexandria, whose pious endeavors and liberal alms the whole Church of the saints recounted. Therefore he was called by the holy fathers John the Almsgiver, which is interpreted “merciful.”

This venerable place, which extended itself so charitably to all, had neither revenues nor possessions. Rather, the aforesaid Amalfitan citizens collected money among themselves, as if by contribution, and offered it to the abbot who was there at the time through those who sailed to those regions. Thus, through the courses of many years, until it pleased the supreme Maker of things to cleanse the city beloved of God from the worship of the gentiles and restore it to his worshiping people, that place remained in the aforesaid manner.

A monastery for women in honor of Saint Mary Magdalene was also built by God-fearing people not far from the said Church of Saint Mary of the Latins; and sisters under a fixed number were assigned to the service of arriving women. In this monastery, at the time when the city of Jerusalem was captured by the Christian princes, a certain abbess named Agnes, a Roman by nation, was found there. She also lived for some years after the capture of the city.

Thus, therefore, from so small a beginning of the aforesaid house, the brothers first withdrew themselves from the jurisdiction of the abbot. Then, their riches having multiplied, they were delivered by the Roman Church from the power of the lord patriarch. The patriarch proceeded against them to the Roman curia. When he had litigated there with them for a long time, he returned to his own territory clothed with confusion. For from the whole multitude of cardinals scarcely three were found who, following Christ, wished piously to favor his minister in his cause. All the others, going away after gifts, followed the way of Balaam, son of Bosor.

During the same time Reynald of Châtillon, prince of Antioch, governed chiefly by the judgment of perverse men, violently occupied with armies sent in by him the island of Cyprus, which is near the kingdom of Jerusalem and was then held under the dominion of the emperor of the Greeks, and which was filled with faithful peoples. Having occupied the island, he crushed its cities, overthrew its towns, and shamelessly broke into the monasteries both of men and of women. For there was neither number nor end to the gold and silver which he took away from there.

Moreover, in that season, while the lord Baldwin, fifth king of the Latins, was rebuilding a certain city which the Turks had violently occupied apart from the stronghold, and had burned after occupying it, the Saracens suddenly placed ambushes on the road as he was returning thence to Jerusalem and attacked him on every side. All his men being turned to flight, he was himself almost captured. But by the speed of his horse, with God protecting him, he was rescued from the hands of the infidels. A very great multitude of the Christians was captured on that day, but few were slain. Among those captured was also the master of the knighthood of the Temple. This happened in the year from the Incarnation of the Lord 1158, on the thirteenth day before the Kalends of July.

In the following year Nuradin, a most hostile persecutor of the Christian faith, gathered his forces and besieged a certain castle called the Cave. After this became known to King Baldwin, he took the knighthood of the kingdom and hastened together with the lord Theodoric, count of Flanders, to break the siege. When Nuradin learned of his approach, he raised the siege and, having drawn up his battle lines, went out to meet the approaching king in battle. Battle was therefore joined; but, divine mercy going before them, after the combat had been prolonged for a long time, victory over the infidel people was granted to our men. Not without great slaughter among them, they were turned to flight.

In the same year the lord emperor of Constantinople descended into Cilicia with an innumerable army. The cause of his coming was that the lord Thoros, great lord of the Armenians, had expelled for the greater part the emperor's household men who presided over the cities and castles, and had occupied almost all Cilicia.

But the prince of Antioch, agitated by the stings of conscience because of the things that he had committed against the emperor, considered by what kind of satisfaction he could reconcile himself to the emperor after so great an offense. By the counsel of his men, he came to the emperor in Cilicia and was reconciled to him with the greatest ignominy of the Latin people. For, as is said, barefoot, clad in a woolen garment with sleeves cut short as far as the elbow, a rope bound around his neck, and holding in his hand a naked sword whose hilt he presented to the lord emperor, he was presented to the lord emperor before all the legions. There, prostrate on the earth before his feet, he lay so long that it turned to nausea for everyone and the glory of Latinity became an object of reproach and a fable.

But the king of Jerusalem, hearing of the lord emperor's arrival, hastened to him with a most select company of his princes and was received by him with much glory. And lest his stay with the emperor be unfruitful, he reconciled to him the lord prince of the Armenians, whom the lord emperor persecuted with insatiable hatred. At last, laden with many gifts, he returned to the kingdom. The emperor, having accomplished the things for which he had descended into Cilicia, returned after no long interval of time to his own territory, domestic cares recalling him.

In the year from the Incarnation of the Lord 1160, Reynald, prince of Antioch, learned that the land which had belonged to the prince of Edessa was filled with herds and was without military forces, and that it could easily lie open to plunder. Gathering a huge military force, he set out for the place and, with no one resisting, collected infinite plunder from there and was returning to his own territory. When the enemies of the faith who dwelt in those regions heard this, they went out in a great multitude to meet the prince and shake off the plunder. Trusting in their multitude, they joined battle. When they had fought for a long time in an undecided battle, our men at last, struck with consternation in mind, abandoned the plunder and turned their backs. Many were killed, and some were also captured. Among them Reynald himself, the leader of his men, was captured, his sins requiring it, and with the other captives was conducted to Aleppo with the greatest ignominy.

After this so lamentable misfortune, the king of Jerusalem, summoned by the Antiochenes, set out for Antioch. When affairs had been settled, he returned to his own territory, governance having been left to the lord patriarch for the time. But not much time afterward, when certain difficult affairs required it, the lord king came again to Antioch. While he was there, he fell into a grave illness. Sensing that the danger of death threatened him, he caused himself to be carried to Beirut. While there, he caused the prelates and princes of his kingdom alike to be summoned to him.

When they had been placed in his presence, he piously and religiously disclosed his faith article by article, confessed his sins to the pontiffs with much contrition, and, released from the prison of the flesh, carried his soul to heaven. It is said that poison was offered to him in a certain medicine, nor was this very dissimilar from the truth. For the remainder of what had been commanded to be given to the king was poured upon bread and given to a certain little dog, which died within a few days. No history records that so great a sadness had existed in any kingdom over the death of any prince.

It is related, moreover, that the enemies of the faith also grieved at his death, so that when some suggested to Nuradin, king of the Damascenes, that, since the Christian leaders were occupied in many things, he should enter our territories, he is said to have replied: “We must have compassion upon them and humanely grant indulgence to their just grief, because they have lost a prince such as the rest of the world does not have today.” He died in the year of the Lord 1162, on the twenty-first day of the month of February, and was buried among his predecessors in the Church of the Lord's Sepulcher.

Section IV

When the lord Baldwin, fifth king of Jerusalem, had died, as has been said, the lord Amalric, his only son, succeeded him in that same holy city as the sixth king of the Latins, in the year of the Lord 1163. This Amalric was a man furnished with secular experience, exceedingly prudent, and circumspect in matters to be done. He was of little learning, but through liveliness of intellect and the benefit of memory he was quite suitably instructed. He was also, what cannot be denied, covetous of money beyond what befitted royal dignity. But in the necessities of the kingdom he neither spared expense nor was recalled by the weariness of his own body.

Thus, in the first year of his reign, when the Egyptians refused to pay the annual tribute which they had covenanted with his father, he gathered military forces and descended into Egypt. There the procurator of Egypt met him with an innumerable multitude. Defeated in battle, and having lost many of his men, the procurator fled. Fearing, therefore, that the Christian army would penetrate into the interior of the kingdom, the Egyptians broke the embankments which ordinarily restrained the River Nile and led the overflowing water through the region. Because of these barriers the lord King Amalric was unable to advance farther. Hence, having gained the victory, he returned to the kingdom.

Not much time afterward, Nuradin, stirred by the persuasions of a certain powerful man of Egypt and hoping to claim the kingdom of Egypt for himself, determined to send Shiraconus, chief of his knighthood, into Egypt with an infinite multitude of Turks. Hearing this, the sultan of Egypt, distrusting his own strength, sent envoys to the lord King Amalric, entreating him to bring aid against the enemies who were rushing upon him. He promised not only the tribute that had been established with the king's father, but a much greater one at the king's judgment; he was prepared to confirm perpetual subjection and an everlasting compact by giving hostages.

While the aforesaid envoys were treating with the king concerning these things, and their petition had almost been satisfied, the aforesaid Shiraconus entered Egypt with his legions, defeated in battle the sultan who met him, and drove him into flight. The sultan, as he fled, was killed by his own men. After his death a certain Suar was made sultan. After the victory Shiraconus stormed the city of Bilbeis. Sultan Suar, therefore, fearing lest by admitting such a guest he make his own condition worse, renewed the former agreements with Amalric, king of Jerusalem, through envoys.

Hence, in the second year of his reign, the king descended into Egypt with the whole army of his men. Together with the sultan he besieged the said Shiraconus at Bilbeis and compelled him to surrender under this condition: that he should have free departure with all his men. Having obtained this, he abandoned the city and returned to Damascus.

In those days Nuradin was defeated by pilgrim Christians around the regions of Tripoli. For certain nobles of Aquitaine had come for the sake of prayer, namely Hugh the elder of Lusignan and Geoffrey, brother of the count of Angoulême. These men suddenly rushed with their knighthood upon Nuradin's army and destroyed it almost to annihilation.

Nuradin, struck with consternation by the adverse misfortune and wishing to erase the loss, after not many days gathered the forces of his men and besieged a certain castle of the Christians not far from Antioch. After this became known to our princes, the lord Bohemond III, prince of Antioch; the count of Tripoli; Calamannus, governor of Cilicia and kinsman of the lord emperor; and Thoros, prince of the Armenians, set out to break the siege. Thus, when they arrived, battle was joined. When they had fought for a long time with doubtful Mars, at last, our sins requiring it, the Christians were turned to flight, defeated, and innumerable men were cut down. Almost all the princes were also captured: namely, the prince of Antioch, the count of Tripoli, the governor Calamannus, Hugh of Lusignan, and many other noble Christians.

Nuradin, prince of the infidels, having gained this victory, stormed the aforesaid castle. This happened in the year of the Lord 1169, on the Ides of August. In the same year, while the king was still held occupied in Egypt, the same Nuradin besieged and compelled to surrender a city of the Christians which by common appellation is called Bellianas.

Returning from Egypt with his expeditions, King Amalric, although he had heard of the adverse things that had occurred in the kingdom, nevertheless, when summoned by the Antiochenes, did not delay in going thither together with the count of Flanders, who had landed in the kingdom that year. Coming there, he began to treat the affairs of the region with as much diligence as he was accustomed to treat his own. Prudently administering all things, he brought it about that in that same summer, at the intervention of a great price, the prince was restored to liberty and his own honor.

In the following year Nuradin again attempted to occupy the kingdom of Egypt. When the lord King Amalric learned this, he gathered military forces from the whole kingdom, traversed the wilderness, and descended into Egypt. Hearing this, Sultan Suar, marveling at the sincerity of our faith, rejoiced immeasurably. For the prudent man considered that in no way could he either sustain the enemy who had entered his kingdom or expel him from the boundaries of the kingdom except by means of the Christian army. Therefore, with the caliph consenting, it was agreed that four hundred thousand gold pieces should be given to the lord king, under this condition: that the lord king should not attack Egypt [read: should not depart from Egypt] unless Shiraconus were either killed or expelled from all the territories of Egypt.

These agreements having therefore been made, the king went out to battle against Shiraconus and encamped not far from him. On the following day, battle was decreed according to the desire of all. But the distribution of those equipped for battle was exceedingly unequal. For Shiraconus had twelve thousand armored horsemen, while there were four thousand horsemen of the Christians, apart from the base and effeminate Egyptians.

Going out to battle, the king manfully attacked the battle line over which Shiraconus presided, overthrew it without any resistance, and pursued it for a long time, cutting it down after it had been turned to flight. But Hugh of Caesarea, who presided over the other battle line, made an assault upon the battle line over which Saladin, nephew of Shiraconus, presided. When they had fought for some time, Hugh was captured when his men deserted him. Some from his battle line were captured and many were killed, although they too left the enemies a bloody victory behind them. On that day one thousand five hundred of the enemies fell, but one hundred of the Christians died.

Shiraconus, fleeing from the battle, occupied Alexandria when the citizens surrendered it. After this became known to the king, he came thither with all speed and surrounded the city with a siege. A fleet was stationed at sea so that neither provisions nor nourishment might be brought into the city in any way.

Alexandria is the metropolis of all Egypt, situated in that part which looks toward Libya, on the border of cultivated soil, so that immediately outside the city walls toward the setting of the sun a vast desert lies adjacent. As ancient histories relate, Alexander the Great founded it. It is situated not far from the mouth of the Nile. It is distant five or six miles from the riverbed. Nevertheless, at a fixed season, by the customary increase of the river, part of it flows into the city; they preserve that inflow of water in very large cisterns for their use throughout the whole year.

It is, moreover, most conveniently situated for conducting commerce, having two separated ports with a certain very narrow tongue of land lying between them. At the head of that tongue is a tower of marvelous height which they call Pharos, and Julius Caesar is said to have built it. From the upper regions of Egypt, by the streams of the Nile, it receives a rich abundance of every kind of food. From the overseas regions also, all wealth is supplied to it by ship.

In addition, from both Indies, Saba, Arabia, both Ethiopias, Persia, and the other adjacent provinces, whatever there is of spices, pearls, gems, eastern treasures, and foreign merchandise which our world needs is brought by way of the Red Sea, through which those nations have a route to us, to the city situated in the upper regions of Egypt which is called Ardeph and which is situated on the shore of that same sea. Thence it descends by the river to Alexandria. Thus, therefore, a meeting of eastern and western peoples takes place there, and that same city is the public marketplace of both worlds.

Section V

With the city besieged, our men pressed on and burdened the besieged by whatever methods they could. Why say more? Daily conflicts, the continual slaughter of their men, and the lack of provisions had worn down the people enclosed within the city. Saladin, therefore, fearing that the citizens might rise against him, signified all things to his uncle Shiraconus, who was besieging a certain city in the upper regions of Egypt. Hearing of his nephew's necessity, Shiraconus raised the siege and came to Babylon.

But hearing that those cities were fortified with a garrison of Christians, through the mediation of Hugh of Caesarea, whom he held captive, he began to treat concerning peace: namely, that the lord king should receive back his men whom Shiraconus held in chains; that the king himself should raise the siege of Alexandria; that the captured Turks should be restored to Shiraconus; and that Shiraconus should depart from the kingdom of Egypt with his legions.

The form of the peace pleased the lord king and the sultan, and it seemed sufficient for glory that the city should pass into the lord king's power by surrender and that Shiraconus should be compelled to depart from all the territories of Egypt. Peace having therefore been granted, those who had been worn down by the long siege departed, marveling at one thing above all: that so small an army had so easily constrained within the city walls so great a multitude of citizens and so great a number of foreigners, and had compelled them to an ignominious surrender according to its pleasure. For there were scarcely five hundred knights of the Christians and four or five thousand infantrymen, while there were more than fifty thousand of the besieged who were able to bear arms.

Thus, when Shiraconus departed from Egypt, the lord king also returned with his army into the kingdom, in the year of the Lord 1167, the fourth year of his reign.

In the following year a solemn embassy was directed to the lord king of Jerusalem by the emperor of Constantinople. The substance of the embassy was this: the lord emperor of Constantinople had perceived that the kingdom of Egypt, hitherto exceedingly powerful and very wealthy, had come into the hands of unwarlike and effeminate men. This had also come to the knowledge of the neighboring peoples. Therefore it did not appear able to continue long in its present condition without its dominion necessarily passing to foreign nations. The lord emperor had therefore conceived within himself that, with the aid of the lord king of Jerusalem, he could easily receive it into his own jurisdiction. Hence he had sent the aforesaid envoys concerning this.

For this purpose the aforementioned envoys approached the king and made firm agreements, namely, that within a fixed time the lord emperor should send forces so that, joined together, they might attack the aforesaid kingdom. As public report resounded, Sultan Suar of Egypt was secretly directing frequent embassies to Nuradin, imploring aid from him and asserting that unwillingly he had been joined in a compact of peace with an enemy people, and that if he were assured of Nuradin's friendship he would withdraw from that people and break the agreements. Therefore the king, moved by just indignation, gathered forces and hastened to descend into Egypt.

There are some, however, who say that all the aforesaid things were fabricated, but that such things were made known among the people so that so notable a deed might have some excuse. Gilbert, master of the house of the Hospital, as some maintain, supplied the incentive for this evil. But the brothers of the knighthood of the Temple withdrew themselves from this same deed, because it seemed to them contrary to conscience to declare war, against the tenor of the agreements, upon a friendly kingdom which presumed upon our faith. They refused to follow the king.

The king therefore descended into Egypt and stormed the city of Pelusium, the greater part of the citizens being killed. But Sultan Suar, struck with consternation in mind when he heard these things, did not know what he should do. Nevertheless, as the narrowness of the time permitted, he deliberated whether he should try to overcome the king with gifts or solicit with prayers and a price the neighboring princes of his superstition for his aid. With mature foresight he resolved, however, to attempt both.

Having therefore sent an embassy to Nuradin, he implored aid and obtained what he sought. For Nuradin summoned Shiraconus and directed him into Egypt with a great military force of his nation. But the king, having overthrown Pelusium, besieged Cairo. The sultan weakened the king's mind, which was covetous of money, with promises, offering him infinite money. For, as some say, he promised two million gold pieces, which the kingdom of Egypt could scarcely pay. But, as afterward became evident, he contrived this not with the intention that he believed himself able to pay what he promised, but so that meanwhile the aid of the Turks which he awaited might arrive.

In the meantime, one hundred thousand gold pieces having been given in the present, the king raised the siege and, withdrawing about a mile, established his camp around the garden of balsam. While he was there, he learned through scouts that Shiraconus was approaching and drawing an innumerable multitude with him. When this was discovered, the king prepared to go out to meet him; but he had not advanced far when he heard that Shiraconus had crossed the Nile. There was now need of a new counsel. For, with the strength of the enemies doubled, it was not safe to make a longer stay in Egypt. Therefore, having ordered his columns, he returned to the kingdom.

Moreover, Shiraconus, seeing that the opportunity of the time agreed with his wishes and that, with the king departing, there was now no one who could place an impediment before his desires, committed to effect what he had previously conceived in his mind. For he commanded the sultan, who suspected nothing concerning the faith of the Turks, to be killed. After his death Shiraconus entered before the caliph, rendered him the reverence owed, and was adorned by him with the office of sultan.

O unspeakable rage of an insatiably covetous mind! Behold from what quiet and tranquil condition, and into what a turbulent one, the disordered ardor of possessing cast down the Christians in the regions of the East. The resources and immensity of the wealth of Egypt served our uses. On that side the kingdom of Jerusalem had secure flanks, nor was there anyone it feared from the south. But now, contrariwise, the finest color has been changed, and our harp has been turned into mourning. For wherever I turn myself, I find the regions suspect, because every neighboring region round about afterward lay open to enemies, and the bordering kingdoms armed themselves for the destruction of the Christians.

But Shiraconus did not rejoice long in so great a success. For scarcely had he possessed the empire of Egypt for one year when he ended his life. When he had died, Saladin succeeded him, a man of keen intellect, strenuous in arms, profound in counsel, and liberal beyond measure, especially toward military men, upon whom he poured out all things. He was, moreover, merciful toward the conquered and very steadfast in his word.

At the first auspices of his principate, Saladin entered before the caliph, his lord, to render him his customary reverence, and killed him with a club which he carried with him. When the caliph had been killed, Saladin pierced all his progeny with the sword so that he himself might be at once sultan and caliph. After the caliph's death, he liberally distributed all his treasure, which was infinite, to his own soldiers.

When the lord King Amalric had returned from Egypt into the kingdom, nothing worthy of memory was done in the kingdom during that winter in those days. But in the following spring, our eastern princes of the Christians, seeing that, with Egypt occupied by the Turks, the condition of the Christians in the East had been made much worse, deliberated that it was necessary for men from among the prelates of the churches of the kingdom to be directed to the princes of the West. They were diligently to disclose the unbearable necessities of the kingdom of Jerusalem, the affliction of the Christians there, and the harsh misfortunes that threatened.

Therefore, by the common counsel of all, the lord Frederick, archbishop of Tyre, and the lord John, bishop of Paneas, were sent for the work of this ministry. They happily reached the western regions but accomplished little or nothing. Therefore, when two years had been completed, the archbishop of Tyre returned, the lord bishop of Paneas having died at Paris.

Section VI

In the year of the Lord's Incarnation 1169, around the beginning of autumn, the aforementioned emperor of Constantinople, mindful of the agreements which he had made firm with the lord king of Jerusalem—namely, that, aided by his forces, he should occupy the kingdom of the Egyptians—sent a fleet into Syria. In the emperor's naval army there were one hundred fifty beaked ships, which are called galleys. There were seventy-two transport ships for carrying horses, arms, and other instruments of war. Moreover, he sent from among his princes Malducas, his kinsman and a count, who presided over the army, and Alexander of Conversano, a noble man from Apulia.

King Amalric, having learned of their coming long beforehand and settled the affairs of the kingdom, gathered the army of both the Greeks and the Latins at Ashkelon. Thence they encamped before Damietta, which from the beginning he had determined to besiege, proceeding both by sea and by land, and surrounded the city with a siege. There, while for three days they postponed the assault, they learned by experience how true is what was said by the poet: “Delay has always harmed those prepared.” For in this intervening space, infinite forces of Turks arriving from the upper regions of Egypt filled the city, which had previously been almost empty, while our men saw them and were unable to prevent them.

Nevertheless, the Christian people, with engines erected, attacked the city on every side. The citizens strove to resist our men with the arguments which they had at hand. But our men, seeing their spirit in resistance, when they ought to have pressed more fiercely, began to administer all things timidly and coldly. During the same time there was added so great an abundance of rains that neither the poorer men in huts nor the richer in tents could by any art keep off the dripping water. Assaults were made upon the city, moreover, but on interrupted days; in these, now our men, now the enemies, carried away the worse reckoning. The enemies rarely provoked the Latins to an encounter unless they had been harassed, but sometimes they made sudden sallies upon the Greeks through a certain postern gate which faced their camp.

Furthermore, the citizens' military forces increased daily, to such a degree that they were now a terror to our men. A murmur therefore crept among the people, and almost all the Christians held one opinion: that, with the divine power angered, they had begun this work uselessly, and that it was safer to return to their own territory than to waste away from hunger in Egypt. For a severe famine had grown strong in the camps, and there was dearness of all provisions, especially in the camps of the Greeks.

Thus, with our men acting as mediators and certain of the satraps of the Turks consenting to the same, a compact was entered into with the Greeks under certain secret conditions, and peace was immediately proclaimed by a herald's voice. The engines having therefore been taken down and burned with fire, the lord King Amalric returned to his kingdom by the land route. But all the Greeks who had come by ship boarded their ships to return to their own territory, under a sinister omen and with ill-omened birds. For a most savage storm suddenly arose; their ships having been broken against the shores, they suffered shipwreck, so that from so great a fleet scarcely a few ships are said to have remained unharmed.

In the month of June of the following year, so great and so violent an earthquake occurred in the eastern regions as is never read to have happened within the memory of the present age. Destroying utterly the cities of the entire eastern tract, it crushed their inhabitants by the fall of buildings, so that it reduced them to a small remnant. Among them, it cast down to the ground even the cities of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia. Among these it utterly laid low Antioch, so that it could scarcely be restored to a middling condition with much expense and labor. Among the inland cities held by the enemies, Aleppo, Caesarea, Hamah, Emissa, and many others collapsed utterly. In Phoenicia, noble and populous Tripoli was shaken to such a degree that the whole city became, as it were, a field of stones and of the tumult of citizens.

Section VII

In the month of December of the same year, Saladin, in order to repay the Christians in turn, prepared himself with all his strength to invade their territories. Gathering military forces from all Egypt, which are said to have been as many as forty thousand horsemen, he entered the kingdom of Jerusalem. When his arrival was heard, the king hastened with all speed to Ashkelon with his entire army, which could scarcely amount to two hundred fifty knights. Then, prepared for battle, he made ready to meet the enemies. But they turned aside to another place, broke through the suburbs, and returned into Egypt with the city's treasure and immense plunder.

In the following year, which was 1171, the aforesaid king, seeing by how many troubles the kingdom was wearied, that the number of the enemies increased incessantly, that the provident princes of that same kingdom had now failed, and that in their place a pernicious offspring was growing, whence it had come into such great weakness that it almost failed, sent solemn messengers into the West by the counsel of the princes. He himself determined to approach the emperor of Constantinople in person with a fleet of ten galleys.

Thus, employing prosperous sailing, he reached Constantinople. When the emperor heard that so famous a prince and so beloved of God a ruler of the kingdom had entered his empire contrary to custom, he first marveled greatly what could be the cause of so great a labor. Then, considering the increase of his own glory, because the king of Jerusalem, defender and advocate of the venerable places of the Lord's Passion and Resurrection, had come to him—something which is not read to have happened to any of his predecessors—he rejoiced exceedingly.

When the king therefore entered before him in the assembly of his nobles, the emperor familiarly told him to rise and received him very joyfully with the kiss of peace. After some days the king disclosed to the emperor the cause of his journey and explained the necessities of the kingdom. He set forth more diligently the immortality of fame which the lord emperor could acquire for himself by subjecting the kingdom of Egypt to himself. He also established the ease of obtaining the proposed end by evident arguments. The emperor accommodated a kindly ear to these persuasions and assertions and promised the full and desired accomplishment of his wishes.

The business therefore having been completed according to his desire, the king began to prepare himself for his return. The work having been happily consummated and a fleet arranged, he entered the sea and, driven by favorable winds, landed at the city of Sidon.

In the same and the following year Saladin made incursions into the kingdom of Jerusalem, but, the divine power being favorable, he was able to harm the Christian faithful little or not at all.

In the year of the Lord 1173, an exceedingly dangerous matter and one very detestable to the kingdom is said to have occurred in the kingdom of Jerusalem. In order that this may become known more fully, the beginning of the narrative must be taken from farther back.

In the province of Tyre, around the bishopric of Antaradus, there is a certain people possessing ten castles with their suburbs. Their number, as we have often heard, is as many as forty thousand men or more. They are accustomed to set over themselves a master not by hereditary possession but by the prerogative of merits. Scorning the names of other dignities, they call him the Old Man. They are accustomed to bind themselves to him by so great a bond of obedience and subjection that there is nothing hard, nothing so difficult or dangerous, which at the master's command they do not undertake with ardent spirit to fulfill.

For, among other things, if they hold certain princes hateful, a dagger or sword having been given to one of their men, the man to whom the command has been given strives thither without considering the outcome of the matter, whether he can escape. Anxious to complete the command, he labors and goes about until he performs the office enjoined, satisfying the command of his preceptor. Both our men and the Saracens call these men Assassins, though we do not know whence the name is derived.

Thus for almost four hundred years they cultivated the laws of the Saracens and their traditions with so great a zeal that, in comparison with them, the other Saracens were judged as transgressors and prevaricators, while they alone seemed to fulfill the law.

It happened in those days that they set over themselves as master a most eloquent man of subtle and keen intellect. Contrary to the customs of his ancestors, he began to keep books of the Gospels and the apostolic book in his possession. Applying himself to their continual study, he had attained with much labor the sequence of Christ's miracles and commandments. Comparing within himself the sweet and honorable doctrine of Christ with the things which that wretched seducer Muhammad had handed down to his accomplices and to those deceived by him, everything that he had drunk with his milk began to become foul to him, and he began to abominate the uncleannesses of the aforesaid seducer.

Instructing his people in the same manner, he caused them to cease from the observance of that superstition, casting down the oratories which they had formerly used, dissolving their fasts, and allowing them wine and the flesh of sheep. At last, wishing to proceed to the inner parts of the law of God, he directed to the lord King Amalric a certain prudent man named Boabdellus, bearing secret words.

The chief article of these words was that if the master and brothers of the knighthood of the Temple, whose castles bordered theirs, were willing to remit the two thousand gold pieces which they exacted from them in each year, they would hasten to the faith of Christ and baptism. The king received their embassy with a joyful spirit. Because he was a most discerning man, he consented fully to their petitions and was prepared to repay to the aforesaid brothers from his own revenues the two thousand gold pieces whose annual remission they sought.

He sent the messenger, whom he had kept with himself for a long time, back to his own master with a guide for the journey given to him. When the messenger had reached Tripoli and entered his territories nearby, the aforesaid brothers suddenly rushed upon him unexpectedly with drawn swords and killed the man, who presumed upon royal guidance and upon the sincerity and faith of our nation and feared nothing of the kind.

When the king heard this, he was inflamed as if into madness at the atrocity of the deed. Summoning the princes of the kingdom and asserting that whatever had occurred redounded to his own injury, he sought to be instructed what ought to be done in such a case. At last, by the common counsel of the princes, they declared that the deed which had occurred must not be neglected.

For in it royal authority seemed to perish, the faith and constancy of the Christian name seemed to contract undeserved infamy, and the eastern Church seemed to lose an increase pleasing to God which had already been arranged.

Therefore, by counsel, noble men were sent to demand from Odo of Saint Amand, master of the aforesaid brothers, that they render satisfaction to the king and the whole kingdom for so great an excess. For it was said that a certain brother, Walter du Mesnil, a wicked and one-eyed man possessing no discretion at all within himself, had nevertheless done this with the knowledge of the brothers. Hence the master, sparing him beyond what was due, signified to the king through his messengers that he had imposed penance upon the brother who had committed this and that, with the imposed penance, he would direct him to the lord pope. He also forbade, on the lord pope's behalf, that anyone dare lay violent hands upon the aforesaid brother.

But the king, who was stationed at Sidon on account of the aforesaid business, caused the aforesaid man guilty of an offense against majesty to be violently dragged from the house and delivered into chains. At last, on account of this deed, almost the entire kingdom incurred irreparable ruin. Nevertheless, the king appeared before the master of the Assassins to be free of blame for the deed through messengers concerning his innocence. Employing a sufficiently temperate moderation with the aforesaid brothers, he left the matter undiscussed until his death.

It is said, however, that if he had recovered from that illness which he incurred immediately after this deed, he had determined to discuss that injury with the kings and Christian princes of the world through most solemn messengers.

At the same time Nuradin, supreme lord of Aleppo and a very great persecutor of the Christian faith, but nevertheless a just and provident prince, died in the twenty-ninth year of his reign. Not much time afterward, the lord King Amalric, after he had lain sick for some months, wearied by fever, died in the year from the Incarnation of the Lord 1175, the twelfth year of his reign and the thirty-third of his age. He was buried among his predecessors, beside his brother in the same line, before the place of Calvary.

Now, however, let us return to the western histories by relating those things which occurred while Emperor Frederick I ruled.

Section VIII

In the year from the Incarnation of the Lord 1172, Robert, a native of Chartres and provost of Aire, governed two bishoprics, namely Arras and Tournai. He was the son of a certain smith and rustic, who, as they say, employed a familiar demon, by whose mediation he attained such great honors. Afterward, deceived by this same patron and familiar of his, he was killed by ribalds through the contrivance of a certain noble knight.

In the year of the Lord 1179, Philip, son of Louis, king of the Franks, was consecrated king at Reims on the feast of All Saints by Archbishop William, his maternal uncle. He was consecrated while Louis, his father, still lived. Louis had now passed the seventieth year of his age, while the boy himself was now fourteen years old.

Although young, Philip had excellent beginnings, for especially beyond what belonged to his age he seemed to fear God. For at the beginning of his reign he abhorred so greatly the enormous oaths which were customarily made by gamblers in taverns and courts that he commanded those who uttered such oaths in his presence, whoever they might be, to be immersed in a lake or river. He commanded that this edict be observed most firmly thereafter.

In the first year of his reign, when grave wars arose against him, although he was a boy in age he began to excel all men not childishly, but manfully and strenuously. For first he moved an army against Hebo of Charenton in the territory of Bourges, who oppressed the churches and their ministers with a heavy yoke.

And he so greatly repressed his tyranny that, compelled, he was forced to come to his feet, and could obtain pardon and indulgence from him in no other way until he promised under oath that, according to his pleasure, he would make full satisfaction to all the churches for all the damages inflicted and would abstain from like acts.

Likewise, in the same year, having gathered an army against the sons of iniquity, Imbert of Beaujeu and the count of Chalon, who presumed to burden the churches of God contrary to the royal immunities, he entered their lands. Breaking their tyranny and pride, he compelled them to restore in full what had been taken from the churches. And because he vigorously waged these first two wars for the defense of the churches and the liberty of the clergy, the Lord was therefore with him against the fraud of those who surrounded him.

In the following year his father Louis died at Paris in the forty-third year of his reign. In the year of the Lord 1182, Pope Alexander died. Lucius, a Tuscan by nation, succeeded him in the papacy. He sat for four years and two months.

In the same year Philip, the great count of Flanders, Odo, duke of Burgundy, and William, archbishop of Reims—his brother—conspired against King Philip. But Henry, king of England, together with his son, brought aid to the king, and through their mediation peace was composed between them. At that time Henry and Richard, brothers and sons of Henry, king of the English, were at discord with one another, their father favoring Richard's side. But not long afterward the younger Henry died, whom his father had long before caused to be crowned king.

At that time, indeed, a very great multitude of Jews, which had flowed together from every part of the world, dwelt at Paris. Having remained there so long, they had become so rich that they claimed almost half the city for themselves. Contrary to the decree of God and holy Church, they kept Christian men and maidservants in their houses. What was still worse, they compelled some of them to Judaize with them. Moreover, retaining as pledges sacred vessels on account of the urgent necessity of churches, they treated them so vilely that they made morsels for their infants in chalices and drank from them. They also committed many other enormities against the faith, indeed in contempt of God.

It was said further that in each year, in reproach of the Christian religion, as if for a sacrifice, on the day of the Lord's Supper, in certain crypts and underground pits, they killed one Christian by fastening him to the gibbet of a cross. Philip had heard that these enormities were committed by the Jews, and, while his father lived, had long carried the matter enclosed within his mind. When his father died, at his command the Jews were seized throughout his entire kingdom. First they were stripped of all their goods, namely, in gold and silver. Then he commanded that all who were unwilling to receive the Christian faith and baptism should depart from his kingdom. Many, therefore, by the grace of God, came to baptism and the faith. To them the most pious king restored all their possessions entire. But as the others departed, the king commanded that their synagogues be dedicated as churches of God. Philip was then seventeen years old.

While these things were therefore being done in the West, a great change was made concerning the imperial power at Constantinople, and a mournful calamity befell all Latinity. For the sorrow which deceitful and faithless Greece had conceived the day before brought forth and bore iniquity. When Manuel, the most fortunate emperor of the Greeks, had died in the Lord, his son Alexius, a boy of thirteen years, succeeded him in the empire. He was placed under the guardianship of his mother, and the imperial affairs were administered by Alexius the protosebastos, the lord emperor's nephew by a brother older than himself.

It therefore seemed both to the nobles and to the people that they could conveniently put into effect what they had maliciously conceived against our Latins. For while the aforesaid emperor Manuel, beloved of God, reigned, the Latin people had found so much favor with him that, neglecting his own petty Greeks as effeminate men, he entrusted great affairs only to Latins. Hence Latins, noble as well as ignoble, hastened to him from the whole world. For this reason all the Greeks, especially the emperor's blood relatives, conceived an insatiable hatred against the Latins. They sought an opportunity whereby, at least after the emperor's death, they might utterly exterminate the hated Latin name or people, both those dwelling in the city of Constantinople and those remaining in the bounds of the empire.

Therefore, not long after the emperor's death, Andronicus, a nephew of the aforesaid emperor, was summoned by them. Coming to Constantinople with innumerable forces of barbarous nations, he first removed the aforesaid Alexius, who exercised the boy's guardianship, from the administration and deprived him of his eyes.

But the Latins who dwelt within the city were greatly struck with consternation in mind, fearing that a sudden irruption of the citizens would be made upon them; and they did not fear this without cause. For Andronicus had already deliberated with himself concerning their extermination. Therefore, forestalling their designs, some took refuge in the forty-four galleys that were in the harbor, and others in ships, and thus escaped the peril of death. But those who were infirm, old, or less fit for flight experienced the rage which the others had escaped. Although they were exceedingly few in number, especially those who were able to bear arms, they resisted for a long time and left their enemies a bloody victory over themselves. Nevertheless, they were cruelly killed by the Greeks with diverse kinds of death, who spared neither sex nor age.

But the few who committed themselves to their faith, and to whom they had given hope of safety, they sold to the Turks and other infidel peoples into perpetual servitude. These are said to have been more than four thousand, of both sexes indiscriminately. Thus, therefore, the faithless people of the Greeks and brood of vipers, after the manner of a serpent in the bosom, rewarded their guests, who had merited nothing of the kind. Yet they did not depart altogether without vengeance; but a crime unheard of for ages had been committed with impunity.

For those who, as we have said before, were in the galleys and ships had a very great multitude with them. After they learned more fully that the Greeks had consumed by sword in part, and by fire in part, their wives, children, and entire households which had remained in the city, moved by just indignation they went around both shores of the Hellespont as far as the mouth of the Mediterranean Sea, which is said to be more than two hundred miles distant from the city. Violently seizing every municipality, they killed all its inhabitants with the sword. Invading the monasteries also, they killed the false monks and their sacrilegious priests with iron and set fire to the monasteries themselves. From those places they are said to have carried away infinite quantities of gold and silver.

Then, entering the Mediterranean Sea and traversing the cities and towns of Thessaly and the other adjoining provinces, and delivering all things to fire and plunder, they wrought an innumerable slaughter. But others who abominated the slaughter and plundering withdrew from the aforesaid army with their wives and children and descended into the kingdom of Jerusalem. This happened in the year of the Lord 1182, in the month of April.

Section X

When Amalric, the sixth king of the Latins at Jerusalem, had died, his son Baldwin, the fourth of that name, succeeded him in the kingdom. He was thirteen years old at the time when his father died. While his father was living, when he was nine years old, he was discovered to have contracted the leprous disease. Since he could not administer the affairs of the kingdom, both because of the illness, which continually increased and grew, and also because of his age, by the common counsel of all the princes the care and administration of the kingdom of Jerusalem was committed to the lord Raymond, count of Tripoli.

In the first year of this Baldwin's reign, Saladin, summoned by the Damascenes while their lord, the son of Nuradin, was still under age and dwelling at Aleppo, occupied the kingdom of the Damascenes. When this had been done, he hastened with a multitude of his men toward Coele-Syria, hoping easily to occupy all those cities which had hitherto belonged to Nuradin. What he had begun, he brought to effect within a short time.

Hearing this, the lord king, by the counsel of his princes, swiftly directed the lord count of Tripoli thither with the whole knighthood of the kingdom, that he might oppose all Saladin's endeavors. For all held Saladin's increase suspect, and deservedly so, lest, his possessions having been doubled, he should rise more fiercely against the Christians. It seemed safer to minister aid to Nuradin's son, not that anything of kindness might appear to be offered to him through favor toward him, but that a more suspect rival might be nourished against the adversary.

But Saladin, hearing of the count's coming against him, asked him through messengers not to oppose his successions [read: successes], but to permit him to try his fortune with Nuradin's son and those who had come to aid him. And lest he should disdain even this without a worthy repayment, he freely offered to restore his own hostages and those of the lord Reynald, formerly prince of Antioch, who were held captive in the city of Emissa, which he had occupied. This proposal pleased the lord count, and, having received the hostages according to the agreement, he returned to his own territory with the army of the Christians. Thus it came about contrary to our purpose that our favor accrued to the very man who ought to have been opposed utterly.

During the same time, while Saladin was more closely occupied about those regions, the lord King Baldwin entered the territories of the Damascenes in hostile fashion with his army. When Servusidolus, Saladin's brother who governed at Damascus, heard this, he gathered the knighthood of his men and met the Christians. But, God willing it, he was defeated and fled after losing many of his men. The Christians, having obtained the victory and laden with much plunder, returned to Jerusalem.

In the third year of this Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, the lord William, marquis of Montferrat, who was surnamed Longsword, having been summoned to the kingdom by the lord King Baldwin and his princes, landed at Sidon. The king immediately gave him his sister as wife, just as had been promised to him. This marquis was most noble in birth, so that he was said very rarely to have an equal. For the mother of Philip, king of the Franks, was his own sister; but the mother of William himself was sister of the lord Emperor Conrad. Yet after three months of the consummated marriage, the aforesaid William died at Ashkelon, leaving his wife pregnant.

In the aforesaid third year of the lord Baldwin, which was the year from the Incarnation of the Lord 1175, Saladin, who had occupied all the land that had belonged to Nuradin, returned into Egypt, gathered an infinite multitude of his men, and entered the kingdom in hostile fashion. When this was heard, the lord king swiftly summoned his men and, having invoked aid from above, went out of the city of Ashkelon with his men to fight. In his army there were scarcely three hundred seventy-five mailed knights, for the king had sent the rest of the knighthood of the kingdom to Antioch.

All these, trusting in divine aid and preceded by the life-giving wood of the Cross, despised the enemies' multitude and invaded them. At first the issue of the battle between them was doubtful, since their forces were very unequal. For it was said that in Saladin's army there were twenty-six thousand armed horsemen alone. But, God willing it, when their legions had been broken, after a great slaughter our men turned them to flight. Our men pursued them with slaughter as far as night for twelve miles, and almost utterly destroyed so great a multitude, to such a degree that Saladin barely escaped by flight with one hundred horsemen, the rest having been killed and others bound in chains. Having obtained this victory, the lord king returned to Jerusalem laden with much plunder.

Section XI

In the year 1178, Saladin again entered the kingdom of Jerusalem in hostile fashion with his forces. After this became known to the lord king, he summoned his men from every side and advanced against the enemies of the faith. He encountered raiders of the Saracens, and, battle having been joined with them, by God's favor our men became the stronger. Very many having been killed, the rest were turned to flight and returned to Saladin's camp.

But Saladin, having learned what had occurred, arranged his battle lines according to military discipline and proceeded to meet our men. He encountered the Christians, who were excessively secure because of their victory. But when our men saw the enemies, whom they now thought defeated, rushing so fiercely upon them, they resisted for a time, fighting with their order confused. At last, unequal in strength, they succumbed, shamefully turned to flight. Many of them were killed by the sword, while the others escaped by taking counsel for their safety in flight. But the lord king escaped unharmed, supported by the aid of his men.

Odo of Saint Amand, master of the knighthood of the Temple, was captured there from among the Christians. Worn down by the squalor of prison, he died in the same year. Elated by this victory, Saladin inflicted infinite injuries upon the kingdom of Jerusalem in that year. At the same time, for certain intervening reasons, the lord king gave his sister, the widow, namely, of the lord marquis, as wife to a noble and illustrious young man, Guy of Lusignan. At that time also truces were made between the Christians and Saladin for two years.

In that season, while the kingdom enjoyed a temporal peace, a certain nation of Syrians, which dwelt in the province of Phoenicia around the ridges of Lebanon near the city of Byblos, underwent a very great change concerning its condition. For almost five hundred years they had followed the error of a certain Matron [read: Maron], a heresiarch, so that from him they were called Maronites. Separated from the Church of the faithful, they performed sacred rites apart. By divine inspiration, returning to their heart, they laid aside the error and approached Aimery, patriarch of Antioch, who was then the third of the Latins to preside over that same church. Abjuring the error by which they had long been held, they returned to the unity of the Catholic faith.

Meanwhile, while these things were being done, Saladin, sultan of Egypt, dissolved the treaty by which he was bound to the Christians under certain conditions. With an infinite multitude of infidel nations he entered the territories of the kingdom of Jerusalem and began to ravage the fields and suburbs. The number of the enemies was twenty thousand, while the horsemen of the Christians were scarcely seven hundred. But, the Lord's mercy going before them, they arranged their columns according to military discipline, rushed manfully upon the enemies' wedges, and, with drawn swords, broke their columns and turned them to flight. A thousand of them fell on that day. They also killed some of their princes. But exceedingly few of the Christians from the equestrian order were lost.

Saladin, therefore, defeated in battle and clothed with confusion, returned to his own territory. But, as he was a most vigilant man, accounting the Christians' strength as almost nothing and aspiring to greater things, he gathered the knighthood of his men and hastened toward the river Euphrates. Having crossed it, within a few days he claimed for himself the most splendid cities of Mesopotamia, Edessa, Harran, and very many others, as well as the whole region which was under the dominion of Nuradin's brother.

But when the king heard that Saladin had transferred himself to distant regions, and considered that the enemies' region was destitute of forces, he entered the lands of the Damascenes with his knighthood. He violently broke open a celebrated and famous place named Zora, filled with many inhabitants and not far from Damascus. When this had been done, they besieged a certain fortress which Saladin had taken from the Christians a little before, and compelled the besieged to surrender. Having recovered it, the king returned to the kingdom with much plunder.

Section XII

Meanwhile Saladin, a tireless man and a prince conducting himself strenuously in all things, after he had subjected all Mesopotamia to his dominion, crossed the Euphrates again, returned to Coele-Syria, and received the noble and powerful city of Aleppo under certain intervening conditions. Here fear first crushed the eastern Christians, for that which they most greatly feared occurred. With Aleppo subjected, all that region round about was, as it were, encircled by a siege through Saladin's power. Therefore the Christians began to fortify the cities and towns which were situated in the enemies' territories.

At that time the lord king was suffering from a most grave fever at Nazareth. The leprous disease, which had begun to grow upon him from his earliest adolescence, was also becoming worse. Despairing, as it were, of himself, he bestowed the universal care and administration of the kingdom upon the lord Guy of Lusignan, his sister's husband, retaining for himself the things to be paid annually.

But Saladin, having arranged affairs in those regions according to his will, returned to Damascus. Then, with the whole army of his men, he entered our territories. When this became known, the Christians, their arms having been prepared, proceeded to the place where he had pitched camp. Here indeed, as the lord William, archbishop of Tyre, says in his Chronicle, if our sins had permitted God to be propitious to us, it seemed that the strength of the enemies could easily have been turned to ruin. For never is so great a knighthood read to have assembled at one time from the eastern Christian kingdom. There were one thousand three hundred horsemen most excellently mailed, and fifteen thousand foot soldiers girded for war.

In that battle there were great and admirable leaders, namely, the lord Bohemond III, prince of Antioch; Raymond, count of Tripoli; Henry, duke of Louvain, from the empire of the Teutons; and Prince Rodulf of Milleone in Aquitaine. But, our sins requiring it, contention was poured out upon the princes. For certain of the princes, through hatred of Guy of Lusignan, to whom the king had committed the care of the kingdom, dissuaded them from fighting.

The knights who were present marveled what was the matter with us, that, when so great an opportunity had been given, no engagement was made with the enemies. Hence it happened that for eighteen days they shamefully allowed the enemies' camp, scarcely distant from our men by the space of one mile—something which is never read to have happened otherwise in the kingdom—to remain there and, moreover, to rage in the region according to their judgment. But Saladin, after inflicting many injuries upon the region, returned to his own territory unharmed.

But when scarcely the space of one month had elapsed, Saladin recalled his forces and surrounded on every side with a siege the city which in antiquity had borne the name Petra of the Desert but is now called Krak. The king, considering that in the aforesaid administration of the war the count of Jaffa had conducted himself less strenuously, recalled the care of the kingdom to himself. By the common counsel of the princes, he caused his nephew Baldwin, whom his sister had borne to William, marquis of Montferrat, to be crowned king.

When this had been done, he hastened with the knighthood of his men to aid those who were besieged by Saladin. When Saladin learned this through scouts, he raised the siege, which he had continued for a month, and returned to his own territory. This was done in the year of the Lord 1183.

Not much time afterward the aforesaid boy Baldwin, whom the elder King Baldwin had caused to be crowned king of Jerusalem, died. After his death the king himself did not live long, but, when his illness grew strong, he migrated from this world. When he had died, the aforesaid Guy of Lusignan, to whom the kingdom of Jerusalem was owed by reason of his wife, obtained the said kingdom. At that time the Saracens took many lands from the Christians.

When King Guy was pressed on every side by the infidels, by the counsel of his princes he sent the lord patriarch of Jerusalem, together with the master of the Temple and the prior of the Hospital, to the princes of the West, that he might announce to them in how great a calamity the Christian people in the East were. They first came to Philip, king of the Franks, to whom they carried the keys of the Sepulcher and of the holy city of Jerusalem, supplicating that he deign to succor the Holy Land, which was about to perish, and to furnish aid.

But the most pious king received them very benignly. Having learned the cause for which they had come, he celebrated a general council at Paris. In it he first commanded all the prelates to admonish the princes by frequent exhortations that they should hasten to the succor of the land of promise. By the counsel of the princes, he himself in the same year sent most strenuous knights with a multitude of foot soldiers, to whom he ministered sufficient expenses from his own revenues.

Section XIII

In the year of the Lord 1184, Philip, king of the Franks, gathered an army near the city of Amiens against Philip, count of Flanders, on account of the county of Vermandois, which he unjustly detained. When the count despaired that he could resist him, he freely restored the said county into the king's hands. He asked, however, that the castle of Saint-Quentin and Péronne be left to him only for his lifetime, and he obtained it.

At that time the king made two notable works in his kingdom. First, he caused the forest which is near Paris and is called Vincennes to be enclosed with a most excellent wall of squared stones. When Henry, king of the English, heard this, he sent to the aforesaid Philip wild beasts—namely, boars, stags, roe-deer, and does—captured in a very great multitude throughout Normandy and Aquitaine and placed upon a certain ship, conveyed along the river Seine by the course of the waters [read: over a long course of water], so that he might cause them to be enclosed in it.

Moreover, in order that he might take away the ancient name from the city of Paris—for it was formerly called Lutetia from mud—he summoned craftsmen and caused all the districts and roads to be paved with hard and strong stones.

In the year of the Lord 1186, Emperor Frederick set his firstborn son Henry over Italy. Much enmity arose between him and the pope.

In those times a frequent crowd of entertainers gathered in the courts of kings and princes. By flattering and jocular words they extorted horses, garments, gold, and silver from princes. This pestilence had grown so strong that those who lacked the company of such parasites were reckoned miserable and avaricious. Philip, king of France, considering this vain and contrary to salvation, promised God that thereafter, for as long as he lived, he would bestow his garments upon the poor for God's sake. If other princes followed this most pious king in this deed, so many parasites would not run hither and thither throughout the world.

In the same year a grave discord arose between this King Philip and Henry, king of England. For Philip sought homage from Richard, Henry's son, for the county of Poitou, which Richard, instructed by his father, delayed rendering. He also sought from the king of England himself Gisors and the other neighboring castles which his father Louis had given to his daughter Margaret by way of dowry when he gave her as wife to Henry's younger son, under this law: that if he did not beget from her a son or offspring, after Henry's death the dowry should return to the king of France.

But when the king of England treated these matters with contempt, Philip invaded the lands which he possessed on this side of the sea. Then Henry, king of England, likewise gathered his men for war and advanced against Philip. But before the battle lines engaged, when they had already proceeded into the field, by the grace of God the legates of the Roman Church interposed themselves. A truce was made between them, and they returned to their own territories.

Section XIV

Meanwhile, while these things were being done, Saladin gathered an infinite multitude of Turks and Saracens from the whole East, entered the lands of the Christians, and besieged Tiberias, a city of Galilee. When this was heard, Guy of Lusignan, king of Jerusalem, gathered the knighthood from his entire kingdom and, together with the count of Tripoli, met him, the divine power being adverse to him.

When Saladin learned of his approach, he raised the siege and proceeded to meet the approaching Christians. Battle was therefore joined between them, in which they fought with equal fortune from midday until night. When night came, each side withdrew to its camp. On the third day the enemies prepared themselves again for battle and suddenly approached our camp.

When their approach became known, our princes deliberated together with the king by what art they should fight with the enemies. A certain man from among the Christians, named John, a man very experienced in war and one who had at one time served as a soldier with the Turks, advised that they should break with all their strength into that wedge above which Saladin's standard stood higher. He asserted that if that battle line could in any way be made to incline, the remaining army would easily be put to flight.

All except the count of Tripoli inclined to this counsel. For that most wicked man asserted that faith ought not to be given to one who, having abandoned the faith of Christ, had sworn faith to the Turks. But he suggested that clean places [read: the high ground] should first be occupied, so that from there the enemies might be attacked with greater force.

Thus, the useful counsel having been rejected, assent was given to the traitor. For they soon rushed upon the enemies, and, when they had fought readily enough for some time, both through the heat and thirst and through the opposed splendor of the sun, our sins requiring it, our battle line began to incline. The enemies rushed upon our men with a force of javelins and arrows.

The count of Tripoli gave a most evident sign of betrayal. For at the very beginning of the contest, together with those who followed his standard, he cast aside his altars [read: arms] and was the first to flee. Before our men withdrew from the battle he took refuge in the castle of Saph. At last, before the flight and in the flight itself, a horrible slaughter of our men was made.

In this crisis the bishop of Acre, who carried the Lord's Cross, was gravely wounded in battle. Perceiving that the danger of death threatened, and being unable to govern himself upon his horse, he handed the Lord's Cross to another, and that man handed it to the king. At last, when the king had fought strenuously with his wedge until the end of the battle, the enemies attacking on every side and his men having for the greater part been killed, he himself, not knowing how to flee, was captured together with the precious wood of the life-giving Cross.

Rarely since the first entrance of the Latins into Syria was so much blood shed in any battle. For then the strength of all Christianity in the East fell. In that most deadly battle all the nobles and stronger men for the greater part fell, except a few who, after the enemies were satiated with the slaughter of our men, were captured.

The valor of the Hospitallers and Templars shone forth especially in that battle. For, not knowing how to flee, almost all who took part in that battle were either killed or captured. Those whom Saladin captured from among them he caused to be killed without any consideration of humanity. Moreover, the lord Reynald of Châtillon, formerly prince of Antioch, a man strenuous in hand and counsel, was captured in that battle and led before him, and Saladin cut off his head with his own hand. For this Reynald had been a most bitter assailant of the Turks and had routed the Saracens in battle in many places.

But Saladin, having obtained a celebrated victory, liberally divided among his men at the bridge of Tiberias the spoils and plunder of the Christians. The king and the master of the Temple were reserved as a sign of victory. At the king's petition, Saladin granted to him the master who had been captured together with him.

Section XV

After the victory Saladin, following his fortune, led his victorious army to storm the cities and castles of the Christians. First of all, he surrounded the city of Acre on every side with a siege. Its citizens, despairing of aid, surrendered it to him after two days. Thence he went to the city of the Beirutians and received it into his dominion without resistance, its citizens delivering it to him. From Acre as far as Ashkelon there was no city that dared resist him, since they were destitute of their defenders. For all the fighting men had either been killed or captured in the aforesaid battle.

In this, however, Saladin's liberality is commended, because he permitted no one to be burdened who had freely surrendered himself to him or wished to remain under his dominion and tribute.

But the Ashkelonites, because they believed their city impregnable, retarded Saladin's force for a little while. They refused to surrender the city to him, asserting that for no reason would they wish to resign the city to him until they knew for certain whether the citizens of Jerusalem would surrender their city to him.

When Saladin heard this, he surrounded the city with a siege and attacked it for nine days with continual assaults. But when he made no progress, because the citizens defended themselves manfully, he abandoned the siege and hastened to Jerusalem in order to besiege it. He believed that they would yield easily, since they saw that all the others had already come into Saladin's surrender.

But the citizens of Jerusalem, and those who had flowed together there from the neighboring places on every side through fear of the enemies, hearing of the slaughter of their men, the loss of the life-giving Cross, and the king's capture, humbled themselves with every kind of supplication. Litanies, confessions, and fasts were solemnly performed by all the Christians dwelling there. Even the very young persisted in these spiritual exercises.

But the wrath of God was manifestly vehement. Nor is it a wonder. For both the clergy and the people had poured themselves out excessively into various luxuries, and that entire land had become filthy with crimes and shameful deeds. Moreover, those who wore the habit of religion had shamefully exceeded the bounds of regular temperance. There were few whom the disease either of avarice or of lust did not infect. Therefore the Lord, provoked to anger, again permitted the land which he had taken from the hands of the impious to be occupied by their dominion.

Thus Saladin came to Jerusalem and surrounded the city on the western side. By continual assaults he strove to burden the besieged. But when the citizens resisted according to their strength, he attacked the city day and night from the northern side. When he had weakened the walls with engines, the citizens feared, since they expected aid from no place, lest the enemies occupy the city by a violent irruption. It pleased them to yield to the pressing and unavoidable danger and to surrender themselves to Saladin under certain conditions, namely, that, once he had received the price of redemption, he should permit those who wished to depart to go away freely.

Thus, on the second day of October, which was the fourteenth day from the beginning of the siege, a Friday, the city was surrendered into the hands of the pagans, in the year of the Lord 1187.

When the Saracens entered the city, in reproach of the Christian name they stabled foul animals in the churches and did vile and abominable things there. But the Syrians redeemed the Church of the Holy Resurrection with much gold, lest it lie open to the gentiles and be subjected to filth. The Turks, however, exhibited marvelous veneration toward the Temple of the Lord. For ancient custom had accustomed them, according to their superstition, to venerate that place in many ways. Saladin also, before he entered it, caused its walls to be washed with rosewater and suffused with many perfumes.

When this had been done, he caused the bells of all the churches to be broken with hammers. I myself saw in the bell tower of the Sepulcher the bells still broken, which the Saracens keep suspended to the present day in reproach of the Christians.

Section XVI

After the holy city had thus, God permitting it, been surrendered into the hands of the Saracens, Patriarch Heraclius, with all the clergy and people of the Latins, departed from the city. But Syrians and men of the other sects—namely, Maronites, Jacobites, Georgians, Armenians, and Nestorians—remained in the city under tribute to the Saracens. When the surrender of Jerusalem was heard, many places which could scarcely have been captured by man surrendered themselves to the Saracens.

The Christians departing from Jerusalem therefore took the road toward Tripoli. But when they had now approached the city and already believed that they had escaped the hands of the Saracens, they fell among sacrilegious men worse than the Saracens themselves. For the count of Tripoli, together with his satellites, sons of iniquity, met them. He who ought now to have shown compassion toward them as toward brothers attacked them as enemies. Whatever of their substance they had carried with them, even that which the Saracens themselves had left to them out of humanity, he violently took from them, inflicting many insults upon them.

A certain marvelous event is read to have happened there. A certain woman who had departed from Jerusalem with the other Latins and carried with her upon her shoulders a little child, her son, was totally despoiled by the impious Christians and stripped of all her goods. Thus the wretched woman, who had once abounded in many riches, seeing that nothing at all remained to her for nourishing her son, driven by a woman's fury, cast her own son into the sea.

In those days the sultan, having received Jerusalem, commanded the count of Tripoli by letter to cause the citizens of Tripoli also to swear the agreements which he had personally sworn to him. Therefore the count summoned a council of the citizens and commanded them to swear. But they declared that they would in no way do this unless they first heard the form of the oath. When the count pressed them, they sought a delay until morning.

But before the term assigned to the citizens the hand of the Lord was laid upon the wicked man. For that morning the count was found dead in his bed. And what could not be concealed was found manifest: the marks of circumcision upon his body, which he had recently received. Hence it was discovered, disclosed by the confession of his attendants, that he had determined to deliver the city to the Saracens and, allied with Saladin, had promised to observe the sect of the Saracens after renouncing the Christian religion.

Thus, Jerusalem having been occupied, Saladin returned again with his whole army to besiege Ashkelon. When he had attacked it for some days, the citizens were prepared to deliver the city to him under this condition: if he would restore to the Christians King Guy and the master of the Temple, whom he had captured in battle. Saladin gladly embraced these terms. Having received the city, as he had promised in the agreement, he permitted the king of Jerusalem to depart freely with the master of the Temple and, moreover, the entire household of both of them.

Having received Ashkelon, he came thence to Tyre and began to attack that city fiercely. But considering that the citizens, together with those who had escaped from the battle, were prepared to defend the city, and despairing that he could violently obtain that city without a great slaughter of his men, he directed his expeditions toward Antioch. He was unwilling to labor much in storming the maritime cities, because the adjured man [read: admiral] of William, king of Sicily, had come into Syria with fifty armed galleys. For that most illustrious king had sent that fleet to the aid of our men when he heard of the calamities of the kingdom of Jerusalem.

Thus Saladin, coming into the regions of Antioch, obtained almost the whole principality of Antioch within the space of three months. He was unwilling to approach to attack the city, knowing that, once the other fortifications had been occupied, the city alone could not long resist him.

Returning therefore into the kingdom, Saladin surrounded by land and sea the city of Tyre, which alone remained among the cities to be occupied. Conrad, count of Montferrat, a prudent man and strenuous in arms, had landed at that city. Coming from Constantinople, he had landed there on the day on which the Christians were defeated by Saladin in that most deadly battle.

When the aforesaid prince arrived, he undertook to defend the city against the Saracens under this condition: if the citizens would grant it to him to possess perpetually. The citizens granted this petition with a grateful spirit. Thus the marquis, having first received the city from the citizens, began to resist the attacking Saracens manfully. For, making a sally with his men on the landward side, he expelled Saladin with his army, and on the seaward side he burned the galleys of the Saracens with fire.

Having suffered these losses, Saladin, struck with consternation in mind, withdrew from the siege. But as he departed he captured the most strongly fortified castles of the Christians after a long siege. They had resisted him manfully as long as they had provisions.

But Pope Urban III, who then presided over the Church, when he heard of the desolation of the land of promise, died from excessive grief. He was buried at Ferrara, where he then was.

Section XVII

Meanwhile sinister reports and lamentable calamities concerning the loss of the kingdom of Jerusalem had shaken all the kingdoms of the West. Hence the kings and princes girded themselves to avenge the blood of the Christians. First, in the kingdom of the Franks, at the exhortation of the archbishop of Tyre, on the thirteenth day of January, Henry, king of England, and Philip, king of the Franks, spoke together. Their discord having been settled for a time, contrary to everyone's opinion, both received the Cross in the presence of the aforesaid archbishop, and many with them.

Among these, from the prelates, were the archbishops of Rouen and Canterbury and the bishops of Beauvais and Chartres; also the counts of Poitou, Flanders, Blois, Soissons, and Champagne. Many other great men, kindled with the same zeal, took up arms for the liberation of the Holy Land.

As a memorial of this deed, the two kings erected a wooden cross in the same place. Founding a church there, they entered into a perpetual covenant with one another. They called that place the Holy Field, because there they had been signed with the sacred crosses. That place is in the territory of Normandy.

In the year 1188, a general council was celebrated at Paris. In it a marvelous and incredible multitude of knights and foot soldiers received the Cross for the aid of the Holy Land. In that council it was ordained by the aforesaid Philip, king of the Franks, that all who had not received the Cross should give at least tithes from all their movable goods and revenues. These were called the Saladin tithes.

In the same year the renowned prince, the lord Frederick, emperor of the Romans, after he had been reconciled with Pope Alexander and the Church, which he had long persecuted, took up the Cross as a sign of penance and in satisfaction. He promised the pope that he would proceed with great forces to the aid of the Holy Land for its recovery. This he did with the company of many of his princes, an infinite multitude of both horsemen and foot soldiers, and Conrad, his second-born son. As a sign of this, as has been said, he fastened the Cross upon his shoulders with much humility and tears.

Therefore, following the example of the king and the emperor, many from diverse nations took the road to liberate the holy city, especially from Italy with ships and galleys. Among them the Pisans, with a fleet equipped as if they were the first, set out with their archbishop and the duke of Sardinia. Moreover, many nobles and barons from the entire world, flowing together toward the sea, hastened to the aid of the Holy Land. So universal was that movement that the whole world seemed to have come together in this purpose.

Fifty ships from Frisia and Datia [i.e., Denmark], allied together, likewise undertook the same pilgrimage. Thirty-seven vessels from Flanders, equipped with every apparatus of war, followed them.

At the same time that renowned and magnificent prince, the king of the Sicilians, died without a male heir. After his death the Sicilians set his nephew Tancred over them as king. But Henry, the emperor's son, asserted that the kingdom was owed to him by reason of his wife, the lady Constance, sister of the aforesaid William. Thus his death brought many evils and injuries upon the kingdom of Sicily.

Meanwhile, while the kings of the Franks and the English prepared themselves magnificently and powerfully for the journey overseas, at the instigation of the devil, who endeavored to hinder them from so holy a journey, a grave and dangerous dissension arose between them from this occasion. Richard, count of Poitou and son of the king of the English, invaded in hostile fashion the land of the count of Toulouse, which he held from the king of France, and stormed many municipalities.

When Count Raymond reported this to Philip, Philip, as he was a man impatient of delay, immediately gathered an army, invaded the lands of the English, and captured many municipalities in Auvergne. The king of the English also invaded the kingdom of the Franks with his armies. When they had inflicted many injuries upon one another, with winter approaching they rested under a truce between them.

Meanwhile Richard, count of Poitou, sought from his father the wife who was owed to him by right, namely, the sister of King Philip. She had been delivered by her father Louis into Henry's custody under this condition: that he should give her as wife to one of his sons, the firstborn, together with whom he would also give the kingdom. Therefore, when Henry, Richard's firstborn brother, had died, Richard himself, remaining as firstborn, sought and claimed that she be given to him by this right.

When King Henry was unwilling to do this, or dissembled, Richard withdrew from his father in anger. Betaking himself to the king of the Franks, he did homage to him and confirmed an alliance or compact with him by oath.

Thus, when winter had passed, the king of the Franks recalled his armies to arms and entered the lands of the king of the English. Having driven the king of the English from the city of Le Mans, he received the city itself into his dominion. Then, coming to the river Loire, he himself was the first to cross the river by fording, something which had not been heard of for an age. After him his entire army crossed. Immediately after crossing the river, it stormed the city of Tours after breaking into it by force.

But King Henry was staying at the castle of Chinon. When he saw himself thus oppressed by the king of the Franks and abandoned by his own son, afflicted by excessive grief, he fell ill and died after twelve days. His son Richard, count of Poitou, succeeded him. After obtaining the kingdom, Richard renewed the peace which had been made between his father and his son Henry and the king of the Franks. Hence Philip, for the good of peace, immediately restored to him the cities of Le Mans and Tours which he had previously taken away.

Section XVIII

While these things were being done so variously in the West, Guy, king of Jerusalem, who at the same time was staying at Tripoli, by the counsel of the lord of Lusignan, his brother, a most strenuous man, and of the lord patriarch, the master of the Temple, and the other pilgrims who had already landed by a sea journey, determined to go to Tyre. There, with their forces joined, he would proceed to battle against Saladin.

Beforehand, however, he determined to test the marquis, who had occupied the lordship of the city, whether he would in any way surrender the city to him. But when he had attempted this in vain, he set out with those who followed his camp. After this was heard at Tyre, the army of the king of Sicily went out of the city, and from Germany Count Bertold and Count Albert with a multitude of Teutons.

When the king had dwelt outside the city in tents for several days, a part of Saladin's army, which was then besieging the castle of Belfort, suddenly rushed upon the king's army. But, the Lord's mercy going before them, they were repelled with loss to themselves, many of them having been killed and captured.

The king, seeing that the people who were with him were afflicted by weariness, communicated counsel with the greater men who were in the army and surrounded the city of Acre with a siege. Hearing this, Saladin raised the siege of the castle of Belfort and directed his battle lines to furnish aid to his men who were being besieged in Acre. Coming toward the north, he attacked the camp of the Christians and inflicted great injuries upon our army on that day.

In those days the lord James of Avernis [i.e., James of Avesnes], a man very strenuous in arms, came, and with him the fleet of the Frisians, who had entered into association with him at Messina. In his army were Flemings and Brabanters, and he landed at the port of Acre. Moreover, a multitude of nobles and other men from Champagne, Burgundy, and also Italy arrived.

At their arrival the army of the Christians was replenished with every abundance of provisions and strengthened by strong warriors. Hence the city was surrounded from the southern sea as far as the northern sea. It thus came about that Saladin could in no way aid the besieged. Therefore, having summoned a fleet from Alexandria, he conveyed arms and provisions into the city and also brought in warlike men.

How great were the tribulations, how many the dangers, how many the injuries which the army of the Christians endured there, it would be long to encompass with the pen, especially before the arrival of the kings of the Franks and England. For the Saracens often broke forth in a grave multitude and, after killing and wounding many of our men, set fire beneath the engines erected to attack the city and burned them. Countless men also perished through labor, hunger, and corruption of the air.

At times there was so great a scarcity in the camp that a measure which at one time was sold for half a bezant could scarcely be found for sixty bezants. Hence it happened that certain men who could not provide for themselves from their own resources and were unable to endure the misery of hunger any longer—as many as twenty thousand armed foot soldiers—proceeded to battle against the Saracens contrary to the prohibition of the greater men who presided over the camp.

But the Saracens, foreknowing their coming, abandoned their camp filled with every convenience and placed themselves in ambush. The Christians arrived without perceiving the deceit. When they had eaten to the point of nausea and, stuffed and laden, wished to return to our camp, the Saracens suddenly rushed upon them. Pressing them with swords and bows, they killed almost all, so that very few escaped from so great a multitude.

After those who were in the city learned this, they suddenly broke forth and attacked the Christian camp with such force that, if divine power had not been with us, and the prudence of the renowned man Geoffrey of Lusignan, the camp of the Christians plainly could easily have been crushed. But through his providence and probity the camp was defended, and the Saracens themselves, after losing many of their men, were violently driven back into the city.

While our men were thus occupied about the attack upon the city, Henry, count of Champagne and nephew of the king of the Franks, landed at Tyre with a great multitude of armed men. He immediately betook himself with the company of his men to the camp of the Christians around Acre.

Section XIX

At the same time the renowned Frederick, emperor of the Romans, directed his battle lines or legions toward Constantinople by a land route. Arriving there, and peace having been arranged on each side with the emperor of Constantinople, he crossed the Hellespont and came into Asia. After enduring many hardships among his men in that province, he arrived in the region in which the sultan of Iconium ruled.

Terrified by fear of his arrival, the sultan promised to provide provisions at a just price to the passing army. But the faithless man not only failed in his promise, but, having gathered a multitude of Turks, also harassed the emperor's army everywhere.

Therefore the angered emperor pursued the same sultan and advanced powerfully as far as Iconium, after laying waste the whole region round about.

When he had taken the road toward Cilicia with his legions and had come to certain narrows of the places, he found an unheard-of multitude of Saracens. Trusting in the aid of the terrain, they thought that they could easily hinder his passage. After the emperor learned this through scouts, he drew up his battle lines, approached the place, and rushed manfully upon them with his legions. With divine aid, he easily repelled the infidels from that place. Pursuing them, he led them out into the open fields, where he could easily unfold his battle lines, and wrought an unheard-of slaughter among them.

Having obtained this victory by divine aid, the emperor reached Cilicia with his army unharmed. There he was received with much joy and charity by Leo, lord of the Armenians, and provisions were supplied abundantly for his army. When he had determined to remain there to refresh the army, at the exhortation of the aforesaid lord of the Armenians he devoted himself to hunting in order to refresh his spirit.

On a certain day, when he was burning with the force of the heat and had descended into a certain river for the sake of cooling himself, by the Lord's permission he was drowned in it, to the irreparable injury of all Christianity. For Saladin feared his arrival to such a degree that he contemplated leading himself with his Turks out of Syria into Egypt, despairing that he could hold against him those places through which the emperor was to pass. Hence he then commanded all things to be destroyed. Thus the walls of Laodicea, Gibellum, Tortosa, Byblos, Beirut, and Sidon were broken down.

This renowned prince died in the thirty-eighth year of his empire. He was certainly a magnificent and illustrious man, who so greatly enlarged the empire in his time that after Charlemagne he scarcely had an equal in the magnificence of his deeds. Nevertheless, he sometimes persecuted the Church terribly, in which he cannot and ought not to be praised.

After his lamentable death, his son Conrad signified his father's death to King Guy through solemn messengers. He added that men of prudent judgment should be sent to him, by whose counsel his army might proceed. For before approaching the siege he wished, if the Lord permitted it, to recover those cities which Saladin had taken from the Christians.

He avoided the counsels of the prince of Antioch because of the wickedness of the deceased count of Tripoli, his father, for he had heard of the cruelty which he had exercised against the Christian people fleeing from Jerusalem. Baldwin, who had been castellan of Petra, and a certain knight named Galgan, a Poitevin by nation, were therefore directed from the king's side. These two came to him with an honorable company, and by their counsel they turned aside to Antioch to refresh the legions. There the Germans—men truly very disorderly in regard to food—finding an abundance of provisions and all things, while seeking to refresh their bodies poured themselves out into feasting.

Therefore, within a short time, so great a mortality followed from intemperance in food that scarcely a few thousand remained from so great an army. Hence the aforesaid young man desisted from the purpose of attacking the cities. His plan having been changed, he came by ship to Tyre, where he buried his father's body with imperial magnificence.

Section XX

But Saladin, hearing that the army of the emperor's son was coming to the siege by a land route, sent a certain Todequin, one of his princes, with part of the army to meet him. For this reason, because Saladin's army appeared to be diminished in great part, those who were among the princes of the Christians judged that they should fight with the sultan altogether, since it appeared that his army could easily be crushed. But the sultan, fearing this same thing, moved his camp away from the camp of the Christians and established it in a safer place. Yet the marquis's accomplices, who were unwilling for the Saracens to be attacked in his absence, dissuaded them from battle. Their opinion then prevailed.

Amid these things Conrad, son of the emperor, came into the camp. In his army there were scarcely seven hundred knights girded for war, for, as we said before, his army had been greatly diminished by the mortality. At his arrival the entire army, as had been ordained, girded itself to attack the city. The places were therefore assigned.

First, the maritime places, namely from the bridge as far as the houses of the bishop of Acre, were given to the king, the Pisans, and the Templars. From the same place as far as the Bridge of the Accursed they were given to the duke of Swabia. Thence as far as the house of Raymond they were given to the bishop of Salisbury and the English. The remainder as far as the other sea was given to Count Henry, Count Theobald, the French, the Genoese, the Hospitallers, the Provençals, and the Italians.

The day of assault arrived, but because envy was strong between the accomplices of the marquis and those of the king, while some attacked the city manfully, others rested. Hence on that day they accomplished nothing at all.

In those days two daughters of King Guy died, whom he had received from Sibylla, the firstborn daughter of King Amalric. A little afterward their mother died. The lord Humphrey of Toron, who had the second-born daughter of Amalric himself as wife, namely, the lady Elizabeth, considered that after their death the kingdom appeared to devolve by right upon her. Trusting in the power and favor of Count Henry, he began to aspire to the kingdom.

The aforesaid Humphrey asserted that the kingdom was owed to his wife, both by her father's command and by the testament of the lord Baldwin, the leper king. King Guy asserted, to the contrary, that he had been justly and solemnly anointed at Jerusalem and crowned king, and that he ought never to be deposed from the royal throne, since he had committed nothing in the kingdom worthy of deposition. He promised that, when the king of the Franks arrived, he would stand by his judgment.

Notwithstanding this, at the will of Henry, count of Champagne, whom no one in the army dared contradict, it was done that the port duties and the forfeitures of delinquents should remain with Humphrey, so that King Guy, stripped of all jurisdiction, remained king in name alone. Therefore the king complained deservedly that, contrary to all justice, he was being stripped of the honor of the kingdom.

For this reason, summoning those from the army who had followed him from the beginning, he determined to commit himself to the chances of fortune and resolved to engage the Saracens together with them. The greater men, and those who appeared to be the columns of the army, feared that if the king committed himself to battle as he had resolved and succumbed in it, that whole multitude gathered in the service of Christ could easily perish. It was therefore brought about that King Guy was restored to all things as before.

But the marquis of Montferrat, to whom it appeared that the kingdom had devolved by hereditary right upon the aforesaid lady Elizabeth, daughter of the lord King Amalric, was led by desire for the kingdom. With the consent of her mother Calomaria, wife of the aforesaid Amalric, who was still living, he carried off the aforesaid Elizabeth from her husband, the lord Humphrey, with Elizabeth herself willing, and took her as wife in fact. This enormous and detestable deed displeased all the pilgrims. Nevertheless, they dissembled for this reason: unless he willed it, provisions could not come from Tyre. Moreover, as an astute man, he had inclined certain of the greater men to himself with gifts and presents, that aid might be furnished to him by them in the aforesaid business.

Section XXI

Meanwhile Philip, king of the Franks, desiring to hasten to the aid of the land of promise, entrusted the guardianship of the kingdom to his mother Adela and his maternal uncle William, archbishop of Reims. He forbade all his prelates and men to impose a tallage or any exaction in his kingdom for as long as they were in the service of God.

He commanded, moreover, that all his revenues and proceeds for three terms be brought to Paris. If it should happen that he died on that journey, the queen, the archbishop, the bishop of Paris, and three other men were to divide his treasure into two parts. From one of these they were to distribute, according to their judgment, for repairing churches destroyed by his wars; to divide the residue among those who had been excessively impoverished because of the tallages and exactions which he had exercised upon his men; and to give the remainder of the same part for his soul and the souls of his ancestors. They were to preserve the other half for the use of his son Louis, the only son he had, who was then three years old.

The kingdom having thus been ordered, he received the pilgrim's wallet and staff in the church of Saint Denis and came to Genoa by a land route with his company. At that place he had caused ships and provisions to be prepared. Entering the sea, by a prosperous journey he came to Messina, a city of Sicily, where he was honorably received by Tancred, king of Sicily. There he also bestowed provisions upon him abundantly.

After him the king of England began his journey in the month of August. King Philip therefore undertook the sea journey and, departing from Marseille, happily landed at the port of Acre on the vigil of Easter, where he was received by the Christians as an angel of the Lord. Having pitched his tents and constructed a house from boards, he was unwilling to attack the city. For in the king of England's absence he was unwilling to make an assault. They had agreed that they would assault the city only together. But in the meantime he prepared all things magnificently for storming the city.

The king of England, coming by sea with his men, landed on the island of Cyprus. When he was there and the Christian army which had followed him was treated less well by the lord of that island, he determined to attack him in hostile fashion. For he had heard that the man who then ruled the island had rebelled against the emperor of Constantinople and consequently possessed that island tyrannically. Thus Richard, king of England, landed his army upon the island and within a few days captured the tyrant and his daughter with all his treasure and occupied the whole island.

When this had been done, he left a garrison of his men there and took the road toward Acre. When he had not gone far from the island, his fleet encountered a certain ship of unheard-of size, exceedingly well furnished with men and arms. Saladin was sending it to the aid of those besieged in Acre. Thus the ship was captured and burned, and all who were in it were killed. At last the king of England reached Acre and established his camp before the city walls.

At the arrival of these two most powerful kings the Christian army was exceedingly increased. With continual assaults by day and night, denying rest to the besieged, they harassed them. At that time, while our men strove with all their strength to storm the city, many nobles and some of the princes rested there in the Lord. Among them were Count Theobald, seneschal of France; the count of Perche; the count of Clermont; the duke of Burgundy; and the duke of Swabia, son of Frederick.

In the same year, while the kings were at the siege of Acre, there was an eclipse of the sun in the seventh degree of Cancer, and it lasted for four hours. In that year, namely, the year from the Incarnation of the Lord 1199, [read: 1191] Pope Clement III, who had succeeded Gregory VIII, died. Pope Celestine succeeded Clement.

After the western people who had descended to aid in recovering the Holy Land had labored for a long time in the siege of the city of Acre, they compelled the besieged Saracens to surrender under this condition: that they be permitted to depart with their persons safe. In addition, they promised to restore to the Christians the wood of the Cross which Saladin had captured in battle. Moreover, they promised to pay two hundred thousand gold bezants. Thus the city of Acre was received in the year of the Lord 1194, on the Nones of July [read: in 1191, on the third day before the Ides of July].

After its capture Saladin, struck with consternation in spirit and despairing that he could hold the other fortifications against us, demolished all the walls of the maritime cities, namely, Porphyry, Caesarea, Ashkelon, Gaza, and also Damietta. But after the city had been captured, the kings caused the provisions which they found within the city to be divided among the people with an equal balance. They divided the captives between themselves.

But because Saladin did not observe the agreements which had been promised to the kings, namely, concerning restoring the Lord's Cross and returning the Christian captives who were in Saladin's whole dominion, the angered King Richard on one day commanded five thousand to be beheaded, retaining the richer and more powerful. They were afterward released for their redemption when an exceedingly great sum of money had been given. But the king of the Franks, employing better counsel, preserved his captives alive for an exchange of the Christians who were held captive by the Saracens.

Section XXII

After the Christian people captured the city of Acre, the princes and leaders of the army began to deliberate among themselves what they should do from there. Some said that they should set out for Egypt with all their forces by land and sea and wage war there with the most abominable nation of the Saracens. For it was believed that if, with the divine power favorable, the Christians could occupy that most opulent kingdom, they could easily occupy not only the kingdom of Jerusalem but also Damascus and lightly expel the Turks from all Syria and Asia.

Others judged it better that the kingdom and Jerusalem, the city beloved of God, should first be recovered, and afterward Damascus should be besieged; when it had been occupied, they should then set out for Egypt. The greater part of the lower people assented to this opinion. But the enemy of the human race, who endeavored to hinder so great an exaltation of the faith, hindered both plans through his machinations and cunning.

For he renewed the former discords between the kings of the Franks and the English. Each secretly persecuted the other, and each was suspect to the other. King Philip especially feared the deceit and cunning of the king of the English, chiefly because he saw that, by receiving the greatest gifts from Saladin, Richard had allied himself with him. Hence Philip began to aspire to return. A most grave illness then troubled him. But, as some writers of histories also assert, he hastened to return solely because he was led by desire for the county of Flanders.

Thus Philip, king of the Franks, abominating Richard's madness and detestable purpose, commended his armies to the duke of Burgundy. Contrary to the will of all who had followed his camp, he departed from the Holy Land and the service of God, leaving the army of the living God with great desolation. For it was believed that if these two princes had administered that war with one mind and had persisted to the end as they had promised, they could have occupied the whole East.

Thus the king of France departed and landed in Apulia. Thence, visiting the thresholds of the apostles and receiving the blessing of Pope Celestine, he returned to his own kingdom.

But King Richard, judging that the king of the Franks, whom he held as his rival, had not departed without a hidden cause and returned to his own territory, regarded him with great suspicion, lest Philip invade his lands in his absence. He himself therefore determined to sail westward, although the king of the Franks had confirmed by oath that he would not harm Richard's lands within fifty days after he himself had returned to his own.

Richard therefore departed and, adding affliction upon the desolate, left his army to his nephew, the count of Champagne. Moreover, he left to him for guardianship the land overseas which the Christians held in the kingdom of Jerusalem.

King Richard therefore entered the sea and, God so willing, suffered shipwreck when a most savage storm arose. But escaping with his men, while making passage through Austria very secretly, he was captured through ambushes placed by Sapuldus [i.e.,

Leopold], duke of that region. Stripped of all his goods, he was delivered to Emperor Henry. He was unjustly detained by him for a year and a half and, moreover, burdened with many expenses and exactions. At last, after two hundred thousand marks of silver had been given, he was released. Fearing to pass through the land of the king of the Franks, he returned by ship to England.

The aforesaid Henry, count of Champagne, to whom the king of the English had committed the care of the Christian army, was a pious and prudent man. Considering that after the departure of those two princes the land had remained desolate, he determined to remain there in the service of God. Considering his pious spirit, the masters of the Hospital and the Temple, together with the other pilgrims, elected him king of Jerusalem. They also gave him as wife the daughter of the king of Jerusalem whom the count of Montferrat had previously had. For the marquis had been killed by the Assassins in the preceding year.

Section XXIII

At that time, when the city of Acre was acquired by the Christians, there was found among the captured Saracens one of the sultan's emirs, named Carachux, a man of unheard-of prudence and wisdom among them. Obeying his counsel and cunning, as is contained in a certain chronicle, Saladin had occupied almost the whole East and Syria. As the Saracens who had been captured with him said, Saladin held him so dear that, in order to have him back, he would gladly give one of his sons in his place.

Therefore the man who had been appointed by the king of France over the Saracen captives, hearing of his reputation, summoned him to himself. When he saw that he was deformed in face and small in stature, he marveled how so great a prudence could be found in so contemptible a man. Nevertheless, that overseer honored him greatly. Drawing him to a secret place, he said, “I have heard that you are a most prudent man and most faithful in counsels. I therefore adjure you now to counsel me faithfully concerning the things which I shall ask you.”

The Saracen replied to him, “My lord, there was no need to adjure me, since you have determined to communicate the secret of your counsel with me, for every counselor ought to be faithful.” And he added, “My lord, let it not be burdensome to you to wait for me a little.”

Thus the Saracen withdrew for an hour, washed himself, and prayed humbly. Afterward he returned to that overseer. When they had sat down together, the overseer said, “This is the counsel which I seek from you: that, according to the prudence given to you by God, you disclose to me by what way, by what manner, and by what device the kingdom of Jerusalem can be obtained with less difficulty and, once recovered, preserved and peacefully possessed.”

Hearing these things, the Saracen was vehemently astounded and sought to be absolved from this counsel. But when the overseer pressed him to disclose altogether what he thought concerning that matter, the Saracen said, “By God, today you have destroyed the Saracens. And I, compelled by counsel, shall tell you the truth and shall give you counsel which will benefit your nation both now and in the future, but will work the desolation and destruction of our nation.

“The sum of my counsel is this. If you wish to recover the land which you call holy and, once it has been recovered, to possess it perpetually, it is expedient for you to capture Egypt.”

Then the overseer said, “Tell me by what way the kingdom of Egypt can be occupied.”

The Saracen answered, “It is agreed that the Christians are more powerful upon the sea than all nations. Hence, with their fleet, they can easily harass by continual incursions the sea which adjoins Egypt, so that merchandise does not come into Egypt. But if the fleet is powerful, it will also be able to run along the river Nile and harass it, and to impede the vessels which carry goods from all Egypt to Cairo and Babylon. In this manner they will destroy the Saracens without sword and iron.

“Then let them strive with all their strength to obtain Damietta. When it has been captured, truly, my lord, if the Christians have good governance, it will be easiest for them to subject the whole kingdom of Egypt to their dominion.”

It must be known that at the time when that Saracen said these things, Damietta was a most strongly fortified city. But because the Christians afterward captured it twice, from whose capture the Saracens believed that they would lose all Egypt, for this reason the Saracens, after recovering it, destroyed it utterly and built its walls, and the city itself, far from the sea. Thus it is now a very opulent city.

“But if they are unwilling to besiege Damietta,” he continued, “then they will necessarily have to capture the land at the mouth of Rosetta, which is very broad and suitable for navigation, because, once this has been obtained, it would be easy to capture Alexandria.”

In the year of the Lord 1193, that marvelous sultan Saladin died at Damascus. He was a magnificent man, very experienced in arms, liberal and munificent. By his cunning he expelled the Latin Christians from Syria and subjected almost the whole East to his dominion.

When he had died, two of his sons succeeded to the dominion, namely, Saphadin over Syria and Meralinus over Egypt. But for a long time there was a contest for the empire between Saladin's sons and Saphadin, the brother of the aforesaid Saladin.

This notable account is read in a certain chronicle: when Saladin saw that he was altogether about to die shortly, he summoned one of his men whom he knew to be most faithful and said to him, “You who have been accustomed to carry my standards in battles, now carry the standard of my death, namely, this cheap little cloth in which this cheap and putrid body must be wrapped, through the city of the Damascenes, and cry out, saying: ‘Behold, the lord of the East, dying, carries away with him from all his glory nothing except this cheap cloth which you see.’” Thus Saladin, the scourge of the Latin faithful in the East, ceased by dying.

Section XXIV

Around the end of the empire of Frederick I, as he passed through Florence, where he had been honorably received, although he had been reconciled to the Church, nevertheless, because the Florentines, holding with the Church, had not been favorable to him, he was moved by complaints from the nobles of the city that their castles near Florence had been taken from them because of the Florentines' insolence. Frederick took away the entire county of the Florentines as far as the walls.

He did the same to other cities of Tuscany, restoring those castles to the nobles as being subject to the empire. He did this because those cities had held with the Church, not with him, except Pisa and Pistoia, which had held the party of the empire. But after four years they recovered their county.

Around that time a fire was accidentally kindled in Florence and, assisted by the wind, burned the buildings from the foot of the Old Bridge as far as the Old Market. Again in the same year, another fire burned the houses from the church of Saint Martin as far as the oratory of blessed John the Baptist and as far as the church of Saint Mary of the Ughi. The Old Bridge also collapsed because of an inundation of waters. These things occurred because of the crimes which abounded in the city.

In the same year seditions and quarrels arose among the Florentine citizens. Because the city was governed by consuls under a fixed form, and the nobles were excluded from the offices of this city, and other evils arose because of their pride, many injuries followed from it and several men were killed. This evil lasted for two years.

Likewise, the Florentines moved war against the Aretines because the latter had aided the Counts Guidi. The Aretines fought against the commune of the Florentines and were pacified. Likewise, the Florentines, fighting against the Sienese in defense of the men of Montepulciano, prevailed and expelled them.

Likewise, in the year of the Lord 1188, when a certain bishop of Ravenna of the Cistercian Order preached the Cross at Florence in aid of the Holy Land, very many devoutly took up the Cross and set out with a great company. They aided sufficiently in the capture of the land of Damietta. On account of this Emperor Frederick restored to them their county as far as ten miles.

Around that time the arm of blessed Philip the Apostle was bestowed upon the Florentines by the queen of Jerusalem. It is in the church of Saint John the Baptist.

Section XXV

Returning the pen to the western kingdoms: when Frederick I had died, as has been said, a son of the aforesaid Frederick, who was called, and was, Henry VI, was created emperor of the Romans by the consent of the princes in the year of the Lord 1190. From the beginning of the world, according to the shorter number, it was the five thousand one hundred fifty-fourth year; according to the other opinion, the six thousand three hundred sixty-ninth. He ruled for seven years.

This Henry was strenuous in deeds, fierce against enemies, and munificent in giving. At Rome, after receiving the imperial diadem, he delivered to the Romans the city of Tusculum which had been handed over to him. Mindful of the injuries and slaughter which the Tusculans had inflicted upon them, they utterly destroyed the city. When the people who were in the city had been dispersed, some migrated with their wives and children to Rome, others to Tivoli, and others to Velletri.

But certain men, since it was intolerable for them to abandon their own soil, assembled together and established new settlements in that region, which remain to our own age, namely, the castle of Molaria, Rocca di Papa, Rocca Priora, Borgo, and the castle of San Cesareo.

In the same year Emperor Henry, aspiring to the kingdom of Sicily, entered Apulia while the Apulians resisted him in hostile fashion. Subjecting all things to himself, he reached Naples. When he had besieged that city for three continuous months, so pestilential a disease invaded his army that all there either died or fell sick. Therefore the emperor himself, also languishing, was compelled to abandon with a few men the land which he had occupied.

In the same year Louis, son of Philip, king of the Franks, became ill to the point of despair of life. The whole community of the monks of Saint-Denis, carrying with them the Lord's nail and crown of thorns, together with the clergy and innumerable people, walking with bare feet, visited him. Afterward the venerable man Maurice, bishop of Paris, delivered a sermon to the people. Prayer having been poured forth, the boy, by touching the holy relics, was freed from peril through the grace of God. Moreover, on that same day the serenity and temperateness of the air, long lost, were restored.

In the same year the bishop of Liège, fleeing from the face of Emperor Henry while he stayed with William, archbishop of Reims, was deceived by treachery and killed by the accomplices of the same Henry. There was no other cause except that he had been elected and consecrated bishop contrary to Henry's will.

In the same year the count of Flanders died at the city of Acre. Because he had no other male heir, possession of that county devolved upon Baldwin, his nephew, namely, the son of the count of Hainaut. This Baldwin, as will be said below, was afterward made emperor of Constantinople.

In the year of the Lord 1193, at the devil's instigation, a grave and dangerous war began between the king of France and the king of England. For King Philip entered Normandy with the army of the Franks; he greatly desired to occupy it. He besieged the most strongly fortified castle of Verneuil. But hearing that the Normans had surrounded the city of Évreux with a siege, he raised the siege, put the Normans to flight, and utterly destroyed the city itself. But the king of England captured Bayeux with his army.

Thus these two Christian princes, pursuing one another with implacable hatred, struck one another and mutually inflicted many irreparable injuries to the detriment of the eastern Christians.

In the year of the Lord 1195, when King Philip had led an army against the king of England into the archbishopric of Bourges, and the king of England had met him with a grave multitude and pitched his camp not far from the camp of the Franks, each army prepared itself for battle. But, God disposing it, contrary to everyone's opinion the king of England laid down his arms and, accompanied by a few companions, approached the king of the Franks. There publicly before all he rendered him homage and fealty for the duchy of Normandy and the counties of Poitou and Anjou. Thus a peace not long to endure was made between them.

In the same year Roger, firstborn son of Tancred, king of Sicily, whom his father had caused to be solemnly crowned king even during his own lifetime and to whom he had given as wife the daughter of the emperor of Constantinople, died. Not long afterward his father Tancred also died from grief, leaving three daughters and one male child named William, whom his mother Sibylla immediately caused to be crowned king of Sicily.

But Emperor Henry, who asserted that he pertained to the kingdom of Sicily on account of his wife Constance, aspired to it and gathered a great army. For he was then powerful in the treasure which he had extorted from Richard, king of the English. Entering that kingdom with great power, he obtained it without resistance.

But the aforesaid Sibylla, formerly Tancred's wife, together with her son William and her daughters, seeing that she could not resist the emperor's power, took refuge together with the archbishop of Salerno in a certain most strongly fortified castle of Sicily. Emperor Henry caused negotiations for peace to be held with her. Making a virtue of necessity, she composed terms with the emperor in this manner. The emperor, interposing an oath, granted to her son William and his heirs the county of Lecce, which his father had possessed in Apulia before the kingdom. Moreover, he added to him the principality of Taranto.

When this had been done, and the aforesaid queen had committed herself to his faith, he, forgetful of his faith, sent her captive into Germany with her son William and her daughters, as well as certain other nobles of the kingdom whom he held suspect, and commanded them to be shut up under close custody. Moreover, he imprisoned the archbishop himself, and deprived his brothers and certain others of their eyes.

But Philip, full brother of Emperor Henry, took as wife the widow of the aforesaid Roger, daughter of the emperor of Constantinople. Emperor Henry, after he obtained all Sicily, despoiled that kingdom of gold, silver, and other goods through grave and frequent levies and unbearable exactions, and returned to Teutonia. He brought it about among the princes of Germany that they elected his only son Frederick, whom he had begotten from his wife Constance and who was not yet three years old, king of Germany.

In the same year the king of the Moabites invaded Spain in hostile fashion with an infinite multitude of Saracens. Alfonso, king of Castile, met him with a gathered army of Christians. But, God permitting it, he was defeated in battle. In that battle more than fifty thousand Christians were killed.

In the year of the Lord 1196, war arose again between the king of France and the king of England. Baldwin, count of Flanders, openly withdrawing from the king of the Franks, adhered to the king of the English and began gravely to persecute the king of the Franks, his lord. In this deed Reynald, count of Dammartin, a man most strenuous in arms, adhered to him.

When Emperor Henry had died, Innocent III was then made pope. Two emperors were elected, concerning whom treatment will be made in the following title.

Section XXVI

Around the year of the Lord 1190, when the aforesaid Philip, king of the Franks, was at Saint-Germain-en-Laye, he heard of the shameful death of a certain Christian perpetrated by the Jews. Showing compassion for the Christian religion, without his household knowing where he was going he suddenly took the road and came with the greatest speed to Bray near Paris. Guards having been placed at the gates of the castle, the Jews having been seized, he caused more than eighty to be burned.

For the countess of that castle, corrupted by their gifts, had delivered to them a certain Christian upon whom they falsely laid theft and homicide. Thus, moved by ancient hatred, they led him through the entire town with his hands bound behind his back and crowned with thorns, scourging him, and afterward hung him upon a gibbet.

In the same year, on the day before the Ides of March, at Nogent, in the portico, battle lines of knights descending from the air were seen upon the earth. A marvelous battle having been fought there among them, they suddenly vanished.

A certain William, an English priest, a charitable man flourishing in holiness of life and morals and a most vigilant pursuer of his office, migrated to the Lord in a Rogation procession. At the time of his death many miracles were wrought at his tomb: the blind were given sight and the sick were healed. Hence, from the fame of the miracles, his body began to be visited by very many.

At that time letters were also brought to King Philip from the regions overseas, saying that Arsacids [i.e., Assassins] were being sent to kill him at the suggestion of Richard, king of England. For at that time they had killed the marquis, the king's blood relative, overseas, who had governed the Holy Land with marvelous vigor before the kings came there.

Therefore, when King Philip had remained troubled for many days, at last, after taking counsel, he sent messengers to the Old Man, king of the Arsacids, that through him he might learn the truth of the matter. Meanwhile he then established guards for his body, always carrying bronze clubs in their hands and watching around him alternately throughout the entire night. When the messengers returned, he learned through letters from the Old Man of the Arsacids that the rumors were false, and thus he withdrew from the false suspicion.

Section XXVII

In the year of the Lord 1183, in the third year of the reign of Philip, king of the Franks, seven thousand Cotterels and more were killed in the province of Bourges by the inhabitants of that land, who had allied together as one against the enemies of God. For these men, laying waste the king's land, carried away plunder, dragged captured men with them most vilely, and slept with the wives of the captives while the captives themselves looked on—O abomination. They burned churches.

Moreover, leading away captured priests and religious men, and mockingly calling them their singers amid the very torments, they derided them, saying, “Sing to us, singers, sing,” and immediately gave them blows on the face or beat them with thick rods. Some of them, scourged in this way, rendered their blessed souls to God. Others, half dead through a long confinement in prison, returned to their own territory after money had been given for their redemption.

Finally, the sins of men requiring it, the same Cotterels despoiled churches. Drawing the Lord's body from the gold and silver vessels in which it was reserved for the necessity of the sick, alas, they cast it violently upon the earth and trampled it underfoot. Their concubines, moreover, fashioned veils for their own heads from the corporals. They carried the chalices with them irreverently and, breaking them with hammers or stones, stripped them.

The inhabitants of that province, seeing these things, disclosed them by letters to their lord King Philip. Having received an army from him, they unanimously made an assault upon the enemies. Having killed all of them, from the least to the greatest, they were enriched by their plunder.

In the same year many heretics in Flanders were burned by William, archbishop of Reims, and Philip, the illustrious count of Flanders.

When a great dissension had arisen for a long time between the king of Aragon and Raymond, count of Saint-Gilles, which could be pacified by no means, as Vincent says in the Speculum Historiale at the place cited above, God is said to have appeared to a certain poor man named Durand in the city of Anicium, which is now called Le Puy. He is said to have delivered to him a sheet upon which was the image of the blessed Virgin seated upon a throne, holding in her hands the image of the boy Jesus, and around it this inscription was impressed: “Lamb of God, who takes away the sins of the world, grant us peace.”

Hearing this, the princes assembled with all the peoples at Anicium on the Assumption of the blessed Virgin. Then the bishop of that city, together with the clergy and people, placed that poor carpenter in an elevated place and listened to him most attentively as he boldly reported the Lord's command concerning the restoration of peace among them and showed the sheet with the image of the blessed Virgin to all as a sign. Raising their voice with tears, with a most ready mind they promised under oath that they would preserve peace.

As a sign of the peace to be preserved, they always carried the aforesaid seal of the blessed Virgin impressed in tin and placed upon the breast, with white linen hoods made after the manner of the scapular of white monks. What is marvelous, all who carried a hood of this kind with the sign were so secure that if anyone had by some chance killed another's brother, and the surviving brother saw the fratricide coming to meet him with the sign already mentioned, immediately, consigning his brother's death to oblivion, he received him with tears in the kiss of peace and, leading him into his own house, ministered to him the necessities of sustenance.

Around the same time, on the feast of blessed Denis, a certain little boy suddenly died. He was carried by his parents to the church of the same martyr and placed before the bodies of the saints upon the altar. By their merits he was restored to life before all the people.

Chartres, a populous city in France, was consumed by a sudden conflagration. In that fire the renowned church of the blessed Virgin Mary, together with the entire cloister, was burned and collapsed. There a multitude of relics and men and an immense mass of ornaments perished.

Section XXVIII

Around those times King Philip sent Stephen, bishop of Noyon, to Canute, king of the Danes, that he should send him one of his sisters, whom Philip would receive in marriage, as Vincent reports in the Speculum Historiale at the place cited above. Canute, accepting this gratefully, delivered to him Vigeburg [i.e., Ingeborg of Denmark], a holy maiden adorned with good morals. The king took her as his lawful wife at Arras and caused her to be crowned queen.

But soon afterward, at the devil's instigation, the king himself, hindered, as is said, by certain spells worked by sorceresses, began to hold in hatred the wife whom he had desired for so long. Not long afterward, when the line of consanguinity through Charles, count of Flanders, had been computed by the bishops and barons, he caused the marriage to be separated.

The queen, however, unwilling to return to the Danes, determined to remain in religious houses in France, preferring to preserve conjugal continence perpetually rather than, being joined to another, to violate the bonds of the first marriage. But because that marriage was said to have been dissolved unjustly, Pope Celestine, at the complaint of the Danes, sent two legates into France, namely, Melior, cardinal priest, and Cencius, subdeacon. Having summoned a council at Paris, they treated of restoring the marriage; but, fearing for their own skin and acting rather lukewarmly, they brought nothing to completion.

In the same year there was a universal eclipse of the moon on the fourth day before the Ides of November, and it lasted two hours.

In the month of February King Philip entered Normandy and captured the city of Evreux, Neufbourg, the valley of Rouloir, and several other fortifications. He also besieged Rouen; but, seeing that he was making no progress there, he departed in anger after burning his petraries, mangonels, and other engines.

Afterward he entered Normandy again and besieged Verneuil. When part of the walls had been destroyed, he heard a message that the city of Evreux, which he held fortified, had been captured by the Normans. He withdrew from the siege in anger and, after putting the Normans to flight, utterly overthrew that city and, in a vehement spirit, also destroyed the very churches of God.

In the same year William, count of Leicester, a strong and magnanimous man, was captured by King Philip and placed in prison at Etampes. Meanwhile the king of England captured Loches and, expelling the canons of Saint Martin of Tours, despoiled them of their possessions.

When King Philip heard this, in retaliation he seized all the churches in his territory that belonged to the bishoprics and abbeys of the other's land. At the instigation of certain wicked men, he expelled the monks and clerics who served God there and transferred their revenues to his own uses.

Thus Philip, king of France, and Richard, king of England, did not cease from their former rivalry, but persecuted one another with implacable hatred. Especially along the borders of their realms they frequently made many grave incursions and acts of plunder.

In the same year, in the district of Beauvais between Clermont and Compiegne, such rains accompanied by thunder, lightning, and storms occurred as no antiquity of men records. Stones falling from heaven utterly destroyed trees, fruit-bearing vines, and crops. Villages also were destroyed and burned by lightning in many places. Very many ravens were seen flying through the air from place to place amid a storm of this kind, carrying live coals in their beaks and setting houses on fire. Men of both sexes also perished by strokes of lightning, and many other dreadful things were manifested on that day.

On that same day, in the diocese of Laon, we heard that a certain castle, namely, Mont-Chauve, was also destroyed by lightning. An unusual disturbance of the air occurred. Whirlwinds, storms, and hail destroyed the vineyards and harvests, whence a severe famine followed in the next year.

In the year 1195 the truces were renounced by the king of England, and war began anew. Then King Philip utterly overthrew the valley of Rouloir, which he held fortified. A few days afterward he gave his sister, whom Richard, king of England, had sent back, as wife to the count of Ponthieu.

In the year of the Lord 1196, in March, a sudden and excessive inundation of waters destroyed villages in many places and killed the people dwelling in them. It also broke the bridges over the river Seine.

In the same year King Philip took as wife a woman named Mary, daughter of the duke of Moravia and Bohemia and margrave of Istria.

After a short time King Richard, setting aside his oath, deceitfully captured the castle of Millon, otherwise called Pago, in the territory of Bourges, and utterly overthrew it. On account of this King Philip, having gathered an army, besieged Aumale. While he remained there, the king of England recovered the castle of Neufchatel after money had been given to the knights guarding it.

King Philip attacked the aforesaid castle with erected petraries and other engines for seven weeks and more, until, when the tower and walls had been broken, he compelled the warriors within to surrender. When he had completely destroyed the castle, he besieged Neufchatel, captured it in a short time, and gave it to Count Robert to guard.

Section XXIX

In the same year Maurice, bishop of Paris of venerable memory, father of the poor and of orphans, happily migrated to the Lord, as Vincent testifies in book thirty of the Speculum Historiale. Among the innumerable good works which he performed, he founded four abbeys and endowed them from his own expenses, namely, Herivaux, Hermetias, Hedera, and Gif.

Because many at that time doubted the resurrection of bodies, which he himself believed most firmly, when dying he commanded that a scroll be written containing this text: "I believe that my Redeemer lives," and so forth. Therefore, when he was at the point of death, he asked that this scroll be placed extended upon his breast, so that it could be read by all who came to his burial.

Odo, a native of Sully and brother of Henry, archbishop of Bourges, succeeded him. In morals and life he was far unlike his predecessor.

In the year of the Lord 1197 Baldwin, count of Flanders, who in the preceding year had done homage to King Philip at Compiegne, openly withdrew from his fealty at Compiegne and allied himself with Richard, king of England. He also gravely persecuted the king of the Franks himself and his land. Reynald, son of the count of Dammartin, acted similarly. Out of the greatest affection the king had given him as wife the countess of Boulogne together with her county.

In the same year the queen of Hungary, sister of Philip, king of the Franks, after the death of her husband, set out for the regions overseas with great equipment. When she had already landed at Ptolemais, she died a short time afterward.

In the same city and in those same days Henry, count of Troyes, her nephew, who had been established as king in the Holy Land, leaned upon a certain window in the upper chamber of his palace and, dashed down in a pitiable fall, expired.

His mother, named Mary, was a sister of Philip, king of the Franks, on her father's side and also a sister of Richard, king of England, on her mother's side. She governed the county of Champagne with sufficient vigor and ruled it in manly fashion. When she received the news of the death of her son and of her sister the queen, she grieved exceedingly and died not long afterward. Her son Theobald, a youth of excellent disposition, succeeded to the county.

In the same year Peter the Chanter of Paris, conspicuous in both life and learning, a lover of piety and justice, died. At the monastery of Longpont he migrated to the Lord in great devotion and holy confession.

In the same year, namely, the third year from the beginning of the preaching of a certain priest named Fulk, the Lord began to work many miracles through him. By preaching he also induced many to make restitution of usury. For he restored sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, speech to the mute, and walking to the lame.

In the following year, namely, 1198, the aforesaid Fulk associated with himself in the office of preaching another priest, namely, Peter of Roissy, a learned and good man, who recalled many from the sins of lust and usury. He also called certain public prostitutes to conjugal continence. But some, rejecting marriage and desiring to serve God alone, assumed the religious habit and were placed in the new abbey of Saint Anthony near Paris, which was founded at that time for their sake. Others exposed themselves to various pilgrimages and labors, walking with bare feet.

Besides these, Herluin, a monk learned in the sacred writings, preached in Brittany on this side of the sea. Through him an innumerable multitude of Britons assumed the Lord's cross and, suddenly crossing the sea without waiting for the other pilgrims, reached Acre with the same monk as their leader. But, having no ruler there, they were divided into many parts and accomplished nothing profitable.

At that time many novelties also appeared at Rosetum in Brie. In the sacrifice of the altar the wine was visibly changed into blood and the bread into flesh. In the Vermandois a certain knight who had died returned to life and foretold many future things to many people. Afterward he also lived for a long time without food and drink.

In France, around the feast of John the Baptist, honeyed dew falling from heaven during the night permeated the ears of grain, so that many who placed them in their mouths plainly perceived the odor and taste of honey.

In the month of July a violent storm arose, and stones of such magnitude fell from heaven that from Trebacum as far as the monastery of Cale, and in the surrounding places, they utterly destroyed crops, vineyards, and woods.

Section XXX

In the same year, in the month of July, contrary to every expectation and to the king's own edict, King Philip brought the Jews back to Paris and gravely persecuted the churches of God. Not long afterward, namely, in the month of September, punishment followed.

For Richard, king of England, with one thousand five hundred armed knights, Cotterels, and innumerable foot soldiers, laid waste the Vexin around Gisors. He destroyed Courcelles, burned many country villages, and carried away their plunder.

King Philip desired to cross to Gisors, but no easy passage lay open to him. With only five hundred knights, he furiously rushed through the midst of the enemy battle lines and, fighting manfully against the enemy, escaped unharmed by the grace of God and reached Gisors, although many of his knights were captured and others put to flight.

For there were captured the renowned men Alan of Roucy, Matthew of Marly, William the Younger of Mello, Philip of Nanteuil, and several others. Thus the king of England withdrew in triumph and divided the plunder.

King Philip entered Normandy and laid it waste as far as Neufbourg and as far as Beaumont-le-Roger. He then immediately dismissed his army, less cautiously, as it seemed to certain persons.

When the king of England heard this, he carried away great plunder from the Vexin in the district of Beauvais with his Cotterels, over whom Mercadier had command. Philip, bishop of that city, a man strenuous in arms and a blood relative of King Philip, and William of Mello pursued him fiercely in order to wrest the plunder from him. After laying ambushes, the king captured them and committed them to prison for a long time.

At that time the count of Flanders captured Sanctum Hocimarum [read: Saint-Omer].

Around that time Henry, bishop of Bourges, died. William, abbot of Chaalis, succeeded him in the episcopate. This William, as Vincent reports from his deeds in the Speculum Historiale at the place cited above, was noble in lineage. From boyhood he held a canonry in the churches of Paris and Soissons. When he had matured and grown into manly strength, being unable to bear the troubles of the world, he broke their fetters and flew to the hermitage of the Grandmontines.

There he lived for some time in sincerity of mind and purity of conscience. But when a disturbance arose in the same order, fearing for the tranquility of his mind, he transferred himself to the Cistercian Order in the monastery of Pontigny. Professing there and advancing in virtues, he received the office of prior.

Afterward, from being abbot of Fontaine-Jean, he was transferred to the monastery of Chaalis, where by election he received the office of abbot. Everywhere he treated his subjects with gentleness and propagated examples of the virtues.

At last, although unwilling, he was raised to pontifical honor in the church of Bourges and submitted to the burden, not to the honor. He did not alter the observance of the order he had first received, but retained his former humility and habit. Although he found the delicacies of an archbishop's foods, he did not abandon the practice of his ancient sobriety.

Gladly intent upon meditation and prayer, he was solicitous for the care of souls committed to him. Receiving their confessions with great gentleness, he comforted their spirits. He diligently persisted in preaching, either in person or through another.

The Lord also added to him that grace of merits whereby even while living he shone with miracles. Hence a certain priest named Girard, who had so lost the use of his left hand that he could not celebrate, came to him. When William had stroked his hand and enjoined him to confess and to conduct himself better, after the third day he fully recovered.

A certain boy also, with his brain and eyes disturbed and suffering from a trembling of the head, was brought to him. After William stroked his head, he restored him to health.

This saint was almost always cheerful and joyful, which displeased certain austere men. Although in this manner he showed himself sociable and lovable, he avoided with the greatest intent the vice of detraction, which is accustomed to creep into the course of speech even among men who diligently guard themselves against it.

At last, after assuming the cross and wishing to set out for the territory of the Albigensians against the heretics, he was seized by illness while he prepared the necessities for the journey. He died on the fifth day before the Ides of January. Buried in the church of Bourges, he immediately began to shine with miracles. Pope Honorius III canonized him after an inquiry had been made concerning his life and miracles.

Around that time, when the archbishop of Sens, a man full of God, migrated to God, Peter of Corbeil, formerly the teacher of Pope Innocent, succeeded him. Through Innocent's hand and authority Peter merited to receive first the see of Cambrai and then that of Sens.

Not long afterward, at Dijon, a council of all the bishops, abbots, and priors of the entire kingdom was summoned by the aforesaid Cardinal Peter. But because he was endeavoring to place the kingdom of the Franks under interdict, an appeal to the Apostolic See was made by the king's messengers. Nevertheless, the cardinal, not deferring to the appeal, pronounced the sentence before all. He commanded, however, that it not be published until twenty days after Christmas. From that time the whole land of the king of the Franks lay under interdict.

When King Philip heard this, he was angered because his bishops had consented to imposing the interdict. He disturbed them from their own sees, expelled their canons or clerics from his land, and confiscated their goods. He also expelled the parish priests and plundered all their goods.

To the accumulation of all this evil, he shut up Vigeburg, his holy wife, destitute of all the aid of her people, in his castle at Etampes. He also tormented the knights, who had formerly enjoyed their liberty, and their men, and took from them a third part of all their goods. From his burgesses also he extorted intolerable tallages and exactions.

In the year of the Lord 1200, on the Ascension of the Lord, peace was restored between the two kings, namely, those of the Franks and the English, between Vernon and the Isle of Andely. On the following Monday Louis, the only-begotten son of the king of the Franks, took as wife Blanche, daughter of Alfonso, king of Castile, and niece of the king of England.

For this marriage John, king of England, quitclaimed to the aforesaid Louis and his heirs all the fortifications, cities, castles, and land which the king of the Franks had captured, and granted to him all the land on this side of the sea after his own death, if it should happen that he died without a lawful heir.

Section XXXI

In the year of the Lord 1201 Octavian, bishop of Ostia, and John, bishop of Velletri, came into France as legates. At their admonition the king received Vigeburg, his wife, into some degree of favor and for a time separated from the woman whom he had taken in addition to her.

Then the Council of Soissons was summoned by the legates Octavian and John. Philip, king of France, attended it with his bishops and princes. There for fifteen days treatment was made concerning whether the marriage of Queen Vigeburg should be confirmed or separated.

After many and various disputations of the jurists, the king, affected by the long delay and weariness, departed in the morning with Vigeburg his wife without greeting them. Through a messenger he commanded them to be told that he was taking his wife with him as his own and that at that time he did not wish to be separated from her.

When this was heard, the council was dissolved, while the cardinals and bishops who had assembled to effect a divorce were astonished. John departed with shame, but Octavian remained in France.

In the same year Count Theobald died in the twenty-fifth year of his age. Because he had no male heir, King Philip received his land under tutelage and guardianship. He had only one daughter; but afterward a posthumous son was born to him, because his wife had remained pregnant.

In the same year John, king of England, came into France. King Philip received him very honorably at Paris and gave him many and various precious gifts.

Then also, before Octavian returned to Rome, Mary, whom King Philip had taken in addition to his wife, died. By her the same king had begotten a son named Philip and one daughter. He had kept her for five years contrary to God's decree and law.

After she died, Pope Innocent III, concerning whom below, at the petition of King Philip, commanded that the aforesaid children be lawful heirs, and afterward confirmed it by his letters. This deed displeased many at that time.

In the same year King Philip held a conference with the king of England between Vernon and the Isle of Andely. Summoning him as his liege man, he commanded him to come to Paris fifteen days after Easter for the county of Poitou and Anjou and for the duchy of Aquitaine, to respond concerning the things which he would bring forward against him.

Because on the appointed day he neither came in his own person nor wished to send a sufficient representative, King Philip, after taking counsel, entered Normandy and utterly overthrew the little fortification called Boutavant. Then he captured Argueil and Mortemer, and at last Gournay, and subjected to himself all the land which Hugh of Gournay held.

There he made Arthur a knight, delivering to him the county of Brittany, which belonged to him by hereditary right, and adding to him the counties of Poitou and Anjou, which he was to acquire for himself by right of arms. He also delivered two hundred knights to him as aid and a great sum of money. Thus he received him as his liege man in perpetuity.

When Arthur withdrew from him, the king of England unexpectedly came upon him and captured him together with Hugh le Brun and Geoffrey de Laudunaco [read: Geoffrey of Lusignan], and afterward the count of Limoges.

These three were liege men of the king of England himself. But because he had taken his own wife, namely, the daughter of the count of Angouleme, away from Hugh le Brun, who was viscount of Thouars, they had withdrawn from his fealty and had allied themselves under oath with the king of the Franks, hostages also having been given.

When winter came, each king, without peace or truce, ceased from war with the machines secured [read: with the fortresses secured].

In the year of the Lord 1202 King Philip entered Aquitaine with an army and, when the men of Poitou and the Bretons had joined him as aid, captured many fortifications. Then also the count of Alencon, allied with him, delivered his land to him to guard. Returning into Normandy, the king captured Conches, the Isle of Andely, and the valley of Rouloir.

Meanwhile Pope Innocent III sent the abbot of Hamary to the king of the Franks and the king of the English to restore peace between them. Taking with him the abbot of Trois-Fontaines, they commanded each king by apostolic authority to summon the bishops and princes of the kingdom and make peace while preserving the justice of each, and to restore to their former condition the abbeys and other churches destroyed by their peoples.

When King Philip heard a command of this kind, he recalled the cause to the examination of the supreme pontiff by interposing an appeal. Then, gathering an army, he besieged Pont-de-l'Arche and, after wooden towers had been erected around it, attacked it strongly and captured it.

After this he besieged the most strongly fortified Chateau Gaillard, built by King Richard upon a high rock over the Seine. He remained in that siege for six months and more and at last captured it with a great battle.

In the year already noted, Fulk, priest of Melliacum [read: Neuilly], died. Many who had been signed with the cross through him came to Venice after many labors, but their passage was impeded. Many died, many returned, and the remainder spent what they possessed.

On the thirtieth day of May, three days before the Ascension of the Lord, an earthquake occurred, and a terrible voice was heard. A great part of the city of Acre collapsed together with the king's palace, and many people perished. Tyre was almost entirely overthrown. Arqa, a most strongly fortified town, was destroyed even to the ground. The greatest part of Tripoli collapsed, and very many of the common people were suffocated.

Antarados, however, was preserved unharmed. In it blessed Peter the Apostle is said to have constructed the first basilica of the blessed Mother of God. Thereafter barrenness of the earth and mortality of men followed.

John, king of England, captured Arthur, count of Brittany, the son of his elder brother Geoffrey, at Mirebeau. When the others had been liberated through hostages, he himself, as is reported, secretly killed Arthur. Concerning this he was accused by the barons before the king of France, whose vassal he was. When he refused to appear, after many citations he was disinherited by the judgment of his peers.

In the year of the Lord 1204 Peter, king of Aragon, count of Barcelona, and duke of Montpellier, offered his kingdom to Pope Innocent. For the remedy of his soul and for that of his parents, he established it as tributary to the pope and his successors in perpetuity, so that annually two hundred fifty Nassemuntine [read: Massamutine] coins should be rendered from the chamber of the king himself to the Apostolic See, and that he and his successors should be held specially faithful and obligated to that same see.

Section XXXII

Therefore, in the year from the Incarnation of the Lord 1197, after Emperor Henry VI had caused his son Frederick to be elected king of Germany and fealty and homage to be rendered to him by the princes, he returned again with his son Frederick into the kingdom of Sicily. While he was in the city of Messina in the presence of Constance his wife, he ended his last day.

After his death certain members of his household, departing from the kingdom, betook themselves to the lands of the Church which Henry had tyrannically usurped. Markward went to the March of Ancona, Conrad returned to the duchy of Spoleto, and Philip withdrew to Montefiascone, occupying the whole patrimony.

When this had been done, Philip himself, brother of the aforesaid dead Emperor Henry, aspiring to the empire, returned into Germany. Certain men, however, remained in the kingdom: in Sicily, William Capparone; in Calabria, Frederick; and in Apulia and the Terra di Lavoro, Dipold and his supporters.

After the death of her husband, Empress Constance returned to Palermo and sent for the duchess of Spoleto, who was raising her son in the March. Having had him brought to herself, she caused him to be crowned in the kingdom of Sicily and began to reign in Sicily with him.

When Emperor Henry died, Pope Celestine died almost immediately. Innocent succeeded him, concerning whom treatment will be made in the following title.

In the year of the Lord 1199 Richard, king of England, heard that a certain knight of the diocese of Limoges had found a great treasure in his castle. The king himself, desiring ambitiously to have that treasure, demanded the aforesaid knight from the viscount of Limoges, to whom he had fled for his safety. When the viscount refused, Richard besieged him in the aforesaid castle.

While he attacked that castle strongly by day and night, he was struck by an arrow and died a few days afterward. He was buried at Fontevraud, where he rests. Because he was without children, his brother John, who was called Lackland, succeeded to the kingdom. Some things concerning him have been said above.

Here happily ends the second historical part of the lord Antoninus, archbishop of Florence.
