§ 1. Some call parish priests paroeci, ἀπὸ δὲ παροικεῖν [from dwelling beside]; for παροικία is a neighborhood, a habitation, and an assembly of men. But I prefer to follow usage rather than Budé, who affirms in his commentary on the Greek language that it ought to be said in that way. I prefer, therefore, that they were so called from providing, ἀπὸ δὲ παρέχειν, because they provide sacred things for the peoples, just as among the Romans we call by the Greek word parochi those who provided for legates and magistrates

> Wood and salt.

The same men are called curiones, though more rarely, because in former times those who presided over sacred things were chosen from the Roman curiae. Especially in the Christian state they are called the cure of souls, curiones, curators, and possessors of benefices with cure. The laws also call them rectors and parish priests. Certain men were called perpetual rectors, or perpetual vicars, who were instituted by the Bishop in the place of the rector, so that the principal rector would not be held to continual residence. This practice, introduced from a slight beginning, has now transferred the right to many parishes to wealthy men and substituted vicars who are insufficiently suitable, while the revenues are diverted elsewhere.

§ 2. In the German Churches, provision has been made less suitably for parishes, especially those of towns and villages. There is a deficiency in the support of the parish priest. For although a parish priest must be learned, industrious, and of good life, and although his labors and dangers are great in singing, preaching, exhorting, and visiting the sick, even those infected by contagion, nevertheless his revenue is less than that of canons, and even his dignity is held to be less. This, therefore, is a grave wound of the Church, and it must be healed by a spirited and resolute visitor. This mistake has been made: a canon dies, and immediately twenty men fly to the collator; sometimes they purchase the benefice for a price. To obtain suitable parish priests, it is necessary to establish seminaries. Everything is done in the hope of canonries; most men flee the burdens of parish priests.

§ 3. There is one easy method of establishing parish priests well: that parishes be constituted rightly. That is, let the parishes be of such a kind that they are sought with as great a desire as canonries. Let the fruits not be altogether unequal to the labor. This remedy is more powerful than all others that can be employed. Parish priests are, as it were, little Bishops who truly exercise the office of presbyters among their own peoples; therefore they must be assisted liberally. For they preside in word and deed.

§ 4. That care has been entrusted to the Bishop in such a way that he himself can by no means attain salvation unless he appoints diligent, good, learned, and industrious parish priests; for parish priests are those who instruct the people and go before them by example. All chapters, and the individual capitulars according to their office, Abbots, and monasteries which possess the right of conferring parishes are in the same case. For formerly they administered the parishes; now they substitute others, and yet the care belongs to them, and they are bound to render an account. Therefore, since it is a mortal sin to appoint an unworthy parish priest, or not to punish or remove one, it follows that not only Bishops, but also capitulars who appoint such a man by their vote, or protect him, or fail to act for his removal when they are able, sin mortally. For since in nearly all those places they receive the tithes, they are bound under mortal sin to provide those places with a suitable parish priest, either by delegating someone from their own body or by allowing the parish priest so much of the revenues that they can have a suitable man. And it is to be feared that many capitulars perish through this negligence. But if people also perish through the negligence of the parish priest, they perish through the fault of those whose duty it is to be vigilant that parish priests perform their office. For truly, just as an Emperor ought to seek brave soldiers who preserve their ranks and industrious commanders, so also the Bishop and the chapters ought to seek out eager and zealous parish priests, and to rouse, visit, and exhort them. It was piously decreed in the First Council of Milan:

[Printed page 497]

> That sentence of the Lord has the greatest force and necessity: "I have given you as a watchman to the house of Israel"; and likewise in another place: "Know diligently the countenance of your flock, and consider your herds," so that Bishops may observe the flock entrusted to them with the greatest diligence they can, and never cast their eyes away from it, taking notice of what it needs, so that, according to the Prophet's sentence, they may bind up its broken parts, strengthen the weak, heal the sick, bring back the castaway, and seek and recover the lost.

Next it appoints perpetual eyes for him--the vicars forane:

> So that the Bishop may more easily behold and care for, as though present, even the flock outside the city, let him choose several approved priests, assign to each a definite region of his diocese, and impose upon him the name of vicar forane. He shall assign that office principally to Archpriests, Archdeacons, and Provosts who are in the diocese, or to others endowed with ecclesiastical dignity whom he judges suitable; otherwise, to other authorities who are fit for an office of this kind.

§ 5. How, then, will parishes be furnished so that they have suitable pastors? Those which possess good revenues are readily accepted--indeed, they are sought of their own accord. Poor ones in cities are easily aided if a rich canonry, a vicariate, or some other simple benefice is incorporated into them. Nowhere are benefices disposed of more religiously; this has been practiced at Cologne and elsewhere, and from this the most select pastors are found in those cities. The prelates, the Pontiff, and the whole world desire this above all: since there are many excellent men in cathedral and collegiate Churches, let parishes not be left destitute. For they deny the parish priest only the distributions for attendance; they grant him everything else. The Fourth Council of Milan says:

> But a parish priest who legitimately holds a canonry or dignity, and at the same time a parish church, and performs the duty of parochial residence, as was sanctioned by the letters of Pius V, Supreme Pontiff, shall receive the fruits or revenues either of that dignity or of the canonical prebend. But he shall not participate in its third part, which, by the authority of that same Tridentine sanction, having been converted into distributions, neither can nor ought to fall to him while absent, but shall accrue to others who are present and discharge the offices of the choir, or shall, at the Bishop's discretion, be assigned to the fabric of the Church or to pious places, according to the prescription of that same Council of Trent.

The Council of Cologne in the year 1536 established the following concerning these matters, in Part 8:

> Since the divine law commands that the mouth of the ox treading out grain must not be muzzled--which Christ in the Gospel explains was certainly said not for the sake of oxen, but for our sake, when He says, "The laborer is worthy of his wages"--and Paul confirms it throughout chapter 9 of the First Epistle to the Corinthians: "For who ever serves as a soldier at his own expense? Who plants a vineyard and does not eat of its fruit? Who feeds a flock and does not eat of the milk of the flock?" Nor is it a great thing if those who sow spiritual things also reap carnal things. Therefore consideration must be given to providing parish priests, the preachers of the Gospel, with a definite and sufficient supply of food and clothing, and in such a manner that they are not burdensome to their parishioners by exacting something in administering the Sacraments, or compelled to beg food by running from house to house, than which nothing is more shameful or sordid.
>
> First, therefore, those who have received from us the power of governing parish churches through vicars or vice-curates shall assign to those vicars such a portion of the Church's revenues as will enable them to support life fittingly. During visitation we shall command this to be done according to the circumstances of the places and parishes.
>
> Cathedral and collegiate Churches, and likewise monks or religious, who either have parish churches annexed to their Churches or monasteries, or commit them to others to be governed, or procure their commitment by > presentation, sometimes drain away the whole revenue to such an extent that the remaining revenues allowed to the rectors of the churches are exceedingly poor and meager. Therefore it will be our care that such a portion be assigned to those rectors that from it they may pay episcopal dues and possess suitable support.

>
> But where the revenues of the churches are insufficient, we think the counsel of the law must be followed: namely, that two be united; or, if this should seem burdensome, that at least one, or even several, vicariates founded at altars in churches of that sort be incorporated into the parish church, as they say, yet in such a way that, so far as can be done, the parish priest does not at all neglect the office for which those vicariates were founded. Furthermore, there is no doubt that tithes are owed principally to parish priests and ministers of the Church. Now, since in many places laymen usurp a great part of them and they cannot readily be torn from their hands, it must be seen whether by diligent exhortation, or by another way consonant with law, something can be begged from this source for a parish priest whose church revenues are insufficient for his sustenance.

Nor is it unjust that entire prebends should be incorporated even into remote parishes in the diocese: first, by reason of the tithes, because by natural law those who give tithes should experience assistance in spiritual matters; next, because the ministers of the Church ought to have their offices so constituted that the greatest possible provision is made for the people. Therefore whoever truly assumes the care of the flock will turn his mind to enriching parishes, and will wholly abolish the enormous abuse by which wealthy parishes are held either by nobles or by wealthy clerics as whirlpools of benefices, while the vice-curate is sprinkled with a meager little portion. For parishes were made wealthy so that they might support men outstanding in learning and life. But if benefices which can be incorporated into poor parishes are lacking, assistance should be given to the poverty of parish priests from many other revenues.

§ 6. Parishes are not to be conferred upon boys, nor upon anyone unless he has attained his twenty-fifth year, as the Decretals and Councils establish.

Indeed, they are to be conferred only upon learned men and graduates. Thus the Lateran Council, Session 11:

> We also establish that parish churches situated in cities or walled towns shall be conferred only upon persons qualified in the manner stated above, or at least upon those who have studied for three years in Theology or in one of the two laws, or upon Masters of Arts who, while studying in some privileged university, have attained the degree of Master. We admonish the aforesaid universities, under penalty of deprivation of each and every privilege obtained from us and the Apostolic See, not to nominate anyone to ecclesiastical collators or patrons except those who have studied for the aforesaid periods and have been advanced to their degrees according to the statutes of those universities, and not by a leap. But if they do otherwise, besides the penalty of nullity, which we declare in the letters of the aforesaid nominations, we suspend the universities themselves from the privilege of nominating for a time according to the quality of the fault. If, moreover, any graduate, or one nominated in the months assigned, has petitioned ordinary collators or ecclesiastical persons for a vacant benefice by virtue of his degree or nomination, and has brought the ordinary collator into proceedings by virtue of the aforesaid degree or nomination, and has molested him otherwise, we decree that, beyond condemnation for expenses, damages, and interest, he is to be deprived of the fruits of his degree and nomination. By the same bond we constrain ordinary collators and ecclesiastical patrons to whom graduates and nominees duly qualified, as above, have presented their degrees and letters of nomination, so that, while the aforesaid duly qualified graduates or nominees are standing and prosecuting their claims, they shall confer benefices pertaining to their collation or presentation, and vacant in the months of ordinary graduates and nominees, upon no others than graduates or nominees, under penalty of suspension of the power of conferring benefices during the eight months in that year which pertain to their collation and free presentation. We likewise establish and ordain that each Roman Pontiff may, only once during the time of his pontificate, grant letters in the form of a mandate according to the form noted below, and no more, in this manner: namely, he may burden a single collator who has the collation of ten benefices in one benefice, but one who has the collation of fifty benefices or more in only two benefices, yet in such a way that he does not burden one collator for the time being with two prebends in the same cathedral or collegiate Church. And so that lawsuits which might arise on occasion of letters of mandates of this kind may be forestalled, we will that mandates of this sort be given > under the form noted below, which we command to be published in the Apostolic Chancery and registered in its quinternion for a perpetual memory of the matter; declaring that those prosecuting mandates of this kind are to be preferred, as regards the benefices comprehended under them, to ordinary collators and to ordinary graduates and nominees, and that we and our successors may freely confer by right of prevention dignities, personates, administrations and offices, and other ecclesiastical benefices, secular and regular of whatsoever orders, howsoever qualified, which become vacant both in months assigned to nominees and to the aforesaid ordinary collators and which are also comprehended under the said mandates.

But now most parishes are so poor that grammarians and petty rhetoricians neglect them. Let there be Maecenases, and there will be no lack of Maros.

Therefore, if the constitution of the Council of Trent, Session 25, chapter 15, is observed, there will be no complaint:

> The holy Synod establishes that secular ecclesiastical benefices, by whatsoever name they are called, which retain the cure of souls from their original institution or in any other manner whatsoever, shall not henceforth be converted into a simple benefice, even when a suitable portion has been assigned to a perpetual vicar, etc.

Conversely, let simple benefices be changed into benefices with cure and be added to them; and not only those, but so many personates, so many altars, which are held by idle and secular men. Indeed, let the goods of abandoned monasteries, and of those converted to various uses and various tables, be applied to increasing parishes. By this it will come about that not only will many young men gird themselves for studies, but canons and vicars, after resigning their prebends, will pass over to parishes. It is advantageous to the Christian cause that parish priests should occupy that place and possess that authority, learning, and means which the prelates of collegiate Churches now possess; for thus they will perform their office usefully. Now they are frequently despised by their prelates and parishioners.

Here the opponents of parish priests suggest: “The wealth of pastors will make them wanton; poverty is an occasion of virtue.” First, I judge this to be false: more men have fallen through want and domestic difficulties. For there are more poor men than rich among those who live in such squalor. Secondly, the objection is unworthy of an ecclesiastical man. If virtue must be beaten out of parish priests by poverty, if in a more liberal stipend and a studious and laborious life there is a danger of ruin, why do those who take such scrupulous counsel for parish priests not first flee it themselves? Why do they possess several canonries and covet more, while assigning poverty to parish priests for the sake of integrity? But here I stop. From a bad parish priest arises hatred of the whole clergy; hence heresy, fraud in tithes, plunder of ecclesiastical goods, and the overthrow of canons.

Appoint suitable parish priests who are worthy of double honor, who labor in word and deed. Give them liberal stipends like your own, and greater than your own if they labor more than you, and you will see that everything turns out better. Thus much for parish priests; now their office must be discussed.

§ 7. Concerning the life of parish priests I have nothing other than what I said generally concerning the life of Clerics, except that these men must guard still more against scandal, lest they alienate from themselves the men whose souls they ought to capture. For among countrymen also, who are unskilled and weak, people are offended more quickly and reconciled with greater labor; they live their lives deprived of intercourse with others.

§ 8. These are their duties.

1. To reside. The Council of Siena, chapter 11:

> The rectors of Churches, whose singular industry was chosen, shall be compelled by our suffragans, so far as can be done, to personal residence; nor shall a dispensation for nonresidence be granted to them unless a probable cause intervenes. And in parish Churches on every Sunday, the parish priests with cure shall, by themselves or their vicars, announce in a clear and intelligible voice and in the vernacular the ten precepts of the Decalogue and the articles of faith. And if there are priests who lack learning or the grace of preaching, on the aforesaid Sunday they shall read and explain one chapter of John Gerson in his Tripartite Work.

2. To admonish everyone of his duty. The Council of Siena, chapter 12:

> Let those with cure frequently admonish their parishioners to attend the parochial Mass on Sundays and on feasts occurring during the week, and diligently to attend to all those things commanded in the bidding prayers on every Sunday. But if, in the absence of a legitimate impediment and without the permission of their curate, they have neglected for three Sundays to attend the parochial Mass, let them immediately be reported to the promoters, so that they may be punished according to the measure of their contempt or offense.

3. To teach, and to bar the incorrigible from communion. The Synod of Augsburg in the year 1548, chapter 8:

> Parish priests shall teach and instruct the people entrusted to them concerning our faith and religion, administer the Sacraments, explain their mystical grace, canonically rebuke those entangled in public sins, but rebuke hidden offenses privately, and lead them to penance. They shall report the incorrigible to us or to our vicar in spiritual matters, so that they may either be cured through public satisfaction or barred from Catholic communion. At fixed times they shall also teach the little children and all the unlearned of their parish the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, etc., or shall pronounce them clearly from the pulpit on Sundays, so that they may in truth be held worthy of double honor.

4. To teach by one's life. Pelargus in the Council of Trier in the year 1548:

> I, myself also a presbyter, beseech you presbyters: feed the flock of Christ which is among us, exercising care for it not under compulsion, but willingly; not for the sake of base gain, but with a ready mind; and not as exercising lordship against the clergy, but so that you may be examples of the flock. And when the Prince of Pastors appears, you will receive the unfading crown of eternal glory.

Certainly, even from this it becomes clear that it is not sufficient for a suitable pastor to address the people from the pulpit unless he also strives by his life or conduct to impress a definite form of morals upon the minds of others, and does this not from necessity or a scruple of office, nor for the sake of gain, but from a paternal and sincere affection.

But I prefer to present these and other matters in the words of the Archbishop and the Fourth Synod of Milan. It contains the following among its admonitions:

> All of you who among the canons possess the name or rank of Provost, Archpriest, or another dignity: just as you excel in honor and dignity, so shine before others by examples of virtues and by vigilant solicitude in discharging the parts of your office or cure.
>
> Parish priests, moreover, and all you others--even Provosts, Archpriests, or others--who bear the cure of souls: besides those matters of which we admonished you all in common with the remainder of the clergy, discharge with every solicitude those also which have been decreed particularly concerning you.
>
> First, the sheep entrusted to you must be known and called by name, and likewise fed and guarded.
>
> Therefore reduce the number of souls to a register according to the written form.
>
> Record the names of those who are baptized, of those who are likewise confirmed, and also of the sponsors who are employed.
>
> Enter marriages in a book.
>
> Investigate the life and morals of the inhabitants of your parish.
>
> Inquire with every diligence whether any are contaminated with or suspected of heresy, or whether there are any who possess, sell, buy, import, or read books of heretics, and report them immediately.
>
> Admonish the people also to perform this same duty according to the prescription of our edict, which you shall promulgate in the customary manner at stated times.

Inquire into the words and deeds of those who come from the territories of heretics.

Examine whether any from the bounds of your parish travel to places where that which is alien to the Catholic faith is preached with impunity; and also whether those who have obtained permission for the journey act according to the prescription of the decree promulgated in the Third Provincial Council. Investigate, moreover, those who teach in your parish, and observe their morals, life, and faith; perform concerning them also the remaining things prescribed or commanded in the Provincial Councils.

See and take care that superstitions, magical incantations, and diabolical superstitions of this sort do not exist among your people.

Identify public sinners, corrupters of others, concubinarians, adulterers, usurers, and blasphemers, and report them.

Identify also the other corrupters of peoples who on feast days serve not God but dice, games, dances, and the devil, and who violate in any manner the observance of feast days, whoever they may be, and observe neither pontifical nor provincial constitutions concerning the observance of feast days, nor episcopal edicts.

Strive by every duty of piety to recall and deter these men from that corruption of evil conduct; then report them also to the Bishop as need shall require, so that a salutary remedy may be applied in fulfillment of the office of episcopal care.

Again, identify also the poor, widows, orphans, and others in need of another's aid. Assist them both with salutary counsel and consolation and with material means; or, if you are less able, kindle others by exhortation to relieve them.

And if their more grievous poverty demands it, arrange even on feast days that something be collected in the Church from the pious liberality of the faithful, as the Bishop shall prescribe, to be bestowed upon them as alms.

Meet separately also with the wealthy inhabitants of the parish. Set before them the wants of the poor, and show them that riches have been bestowed by God also for this purpose, that they should succor the needy.

But if any have been oppressed in some cause by the resources of powerful men, commend them uniquely and intimately to the protection of those who either ought to provide it by the office they have undertaken, or to whom the Bishop has given this care.

Feed above all the people entrusted to you by the preaching of the word of God, by salutary admonitions, by the administration of the Sacraments, and likewise by example and prayer.

In expounding the word of God, observe fully what has been prescribed in the provincial constitution both to other preachers and to you.

Instruct children on feast days and Sundays in the rudiments of Christian doctrine.

Invite persons of more advanced age to understand the same things.

Admonish fathers and mothers of households that they themselves conduct their sons, daughters, and the others whom they have in the household to the stated schools of Christian doctrine.

Employ for this purpose the labor of the confraternity members enrolled in those schools, and take care that mutual charity and moral discipline are preserved among them.

Render and rouse others also more eager to embrace so pious a work, both by your continual exhortations and by promulgating the spiritual treasury of indulgences granted to those who enroll in those schools and labor in them.

Do not omit on feast days, amid the solemnities of the Masses, to explain to the faithful something from the lessons read in the Mass, to unfold some mystery of that most holy sacrifice, and sometimes to explain the more sacred reasons and meanings of its sacred ceremonies and rites, so that, instructed more diligently from day to day, they may attend that most holy sacrifice more religiously.

Teach likewise how, when the signal for the celebration of Mass has been given, the faithful should prepare themselves with contrite heart to hear it devoutly.

By your continual offices of admonition take care and bring it about that at Mass men are present with head uncovered, women with head covered, and both sexes with knee bent throughout every part of it except at the Gospel.

Instruct them also how religiously they must conduct themselves, not only in the sacred rite of the Mass but also in the other divine offices:

When one must stand, when bend the knees, when rise;

How greatly, while those things are done or celebrated, conversations, talk, walking about, noises, cries--indeed, vain thoughts by which the mind is distracted from pious meditation, contemplation of the mysteries which are being enacted, and religious prayer--must be avoided; and finally, how diligently all other things alien to the sanctity and worship of those offices must be avoided;

Again, how devoutly, religiously, and with how downcast and humble a bearing one must conduct oneself in processions, litanies, and stations;

With what reverence and zeal of piety one must remain in Churches or sacred places, and what things must be kept far from them, according to pontifical sanctions, conciliar constitutions, and, furthermore, episcopal edicts;

[Printed page 500]

And with what inward preparation of a religious mind, and also with what external modesty of worship and dress, with humble genuflection and arms laid aside, one must approach the most holy Communion and also certain Sacraments.

Then teach and admonish how feast days are to be observed and sanctified.

Show that it is most unworthy on those sacred days not only to fail to abstain from wicked works and unlawful business, but also to fail to perform works of religion and piety with all diligence.

And furthermore, that it is impious for sacred days--instituted for honoring the greatest benefits of God, rendering the highest praises to Him, and giving due honor to the Saints--to be diverted to things abhorrent from that worship, such as dances, games, choreographed dances, and spectacles, by whose shameful allurements the devil, the enemy of human salvation, is delighted.

Announce likewise the stated fasts of sacred seasons; teach how one must fast, and what gravity of sin lies in violating sacred fasts;

What duties of Christian piety are to be performed on the vigils of Saints;

How devoutly the Lenten fast is to be observed.

At the stated solemnities of Advent, Septuagesima, or the celebrations of other seasons, forewarn the faithful and instruct them diligently--even by the prescribed reading and explanation of pastoral letters--to celebrate religiously the sacred mysteries of those seasons with holy duties of piety.

And so that they may be instructed in all these matters according to the seasons and solemnities, admonish them frequently to assemble at the parish Church on Sundays and other feast days, as the holy Synod of Trent desires.

In this matter frequently read to the people the general pastoral admonition concerning frequent attendance.

Frequently and diligently teach them how continually one must pray;

How prayer is to be offered both by the silent meditation of a suppliant mind and by stated pious prayers;

How diligently and religiously the institution of common evening prayer is to be undertaken, and how diligently, once undertaken, it is to be piously retained.

Therefore, as you shall often explain at other times in the year the principal points of that manner of prayer with the indulgences granted to it, so especially on the days established by the Third Provincial Council pronounce and publish them from the written text amid the greatest attendance of the people.

On Sundays instruct the people and admonish them for whom they are to pray, as was decreed in that same Provincial Council;

And, moreover, what principal prayers, Christian meditations, and exercises in prayer they may have proposed and ready for themselves on each weekday.

But as often as possible set before the people in your sermons the subjects of perpetual Christian meditation: death, judgment, hell, glory, and the reward of Paradise.

Moreover, diligently and very frequently admonish fathers and mothers of households religiously to instruct their children and household in the discipline of piety and Christian virtues.

Induce fathers of households, moreover, to have in their homes approved books concerning the manner of spiritual life and pious exercises, in the reading of which they may occupy themselves and instruct themselves and their household to act holily.

In the parochial assembly read the constitution concerning the office of fathers of households and the instruction of the household, published in the Third Provincial Council, and explain each of its parts.

Teach, in addition, whatever other things you shall deem opportune, by which they may conform themselves and their household to the institutions and exercises of the Christian life.

Observe also in workshops and shops the rule of discipline and Christian life. If you notice anything being committed by artisans, instructors, or workmen that belongs to dissolute discipline, gravely admonish the masters of the workshops or shops, and show them the parts of their duty in this matter.

You are poor men and partners in the labors and care of the Bishop, and you are laborers in the harvest entrusted to the Bishop. Labor together with him and strive that, with the help of divine mercy, the people whose care is being borne may be gathered as pure wheat into the heavenly barns.

“Guard what has been entrusted to you,” says the blessed Apostle Paul. Consider this to have been said to each one of you, so that you may place every thought, solicitude, care, and zeal in diligently guarding the flock entrusted to your faith and care as a deposit, and preserving it from every stain of sin.

Therefore, each of you must carefully guard the neighborhood of the parish entrusted to him from all other vices, and also take care that there be in it no hatreds, rivalries, enmities, factions, evil customs of rash swearing, cursing, and imprecation, nor even detractions.

But above all rebuke and assail the vices and sins to which you have observed the people to be more inclined.

Do not conceal sins, but announce to the people their crimes; rebuke those who sin publicly before everyone, so that others may have fear.

Do this in the spirit of the Lord’s strength, and as His strenuous soldiers fight the good fight, trembling at nothing whatsoever.

Saint Gregory admonishes you that if you remain silent from rebuke because you fear the hatreds that may rise against you, you are now seeking not the gains of God, but your own.

Do not abandon that office of rebuking or of reproving openly on account of curses, persecutions, calumnies, or insults of any kind, provided that you serve the glory of Christ and the salvation of souls.

Again, do not desist from doing it out of zeal for hunting after men's favor. "I would not be a servant of God if I pleased men," says the Apostle.

Woe to you who are silent or dissemble if the flock entrusted to your care perishes: the just and almighty God will require its blood from your hands.

Therefore, if sin is committed, let your words in rebukes not be flattering, but, as was written by the Holy Spirit, let them be goads and, as it were, nails driven deep.

Press on in season and out of season, even with private admonitions, counsels, corrections, and reproofs, so that, with divine grace assisting, you may recall sinners to the way of salvation.

Restore fraternal correction to holy use in such a manner that you not only correct one another in mutual Christian charity, but also rightly teach the rest--especially the inhabitants of the parish--that duty of charity and correction.

To fulfill the parts of sermons, admonitions, and corrections, procure for yourselves passages, especially from the doctrine of the Roman Catechism, in which you can occupy yourselves diligently with great salutary advantage to your peoples.

Nor for this manifold kind of your ecclesiastical conduct neglect the aids which you can usefully obtain from elsewhere.

Accurately perform and execute the other offices prescribed to you by Provincial and Diocesan Councils in the administration of the Sacraments, in constant exhortation to their frequent use, in the care of the fields, and in the other functions of the parochial office; and conform yourselves wholly to the norm of those conciliar constitutions or decrees with every zeal of observance and obedience.

But those parts of the Provincial or Diocesan decrees which pertain to laymen and their Christian discipline--so that they may be observed more diligently, the more frequently they are published and inculcated--frequently set them before your peoples, announce, explain, and introduce them into custom, as occasion shall arise, expressed summarily in the vernacular.

Finally, whatever decrees pertain either to you or to the laymen entrusted to your care, introduce them into complete execution and the practice of discipline with the greatest zeal you can. See and consider above all what and how religious are the parts of your office; and take care that in the duties and functions of your cure you not only commit no wrong, but do not even omit anything, since in priestly life, in proportion to the office which you sustain, faults of omission can be both graver and far more numerous than in other men.

• Clear transcriptional word divisions and letter confusions in the long synodal quotation have been regularized in translation; no registered Greek lacuna occurs in this chunk.

CHAPTER XLVI

That the Various Institutes of Monks Are Useful to the State; Their Measure and Method

§ 1. If the life of all Christians were such as flourished in the holy city at the beginning, there would be no need for that variety of religious orders which we now see. For then there was an assembly of saints; now very many Christians live in such a way that they are of the world and appear worldly. Indeed, vices have advanced so far that even Churches and prebends are called secular. I do not complain of the profaneness of the terms, provided that religion is maintained in morals. All Christians have renounced the world, the devil, and his pomps, which is necessary for salvation; many have bound themselves by the stricter laws of chastity, poverty, and perpetual obedience. Some of them profess the contemplative life, others the active, and most a life mixed from both, because neither can Mary make use of the necessities of life without Martha, nor Martha sit at the Lord's feet without Mary.

It is not for me to expound either the praise or defense of religious life, or the diversities of the orders. These matters demand whole treatises and have been excellently treated by many. The state alone must be instructed how it may rightly make use of so many examples of holy men.

§ 2. Those who complain of the multitude and variety of religious act unjustly, since nearly all live temperately and most live in the greatest poverty. Do the sacred companies of those who sing to God, who are chaste, poor, and fasting, of whom the world is not worthy, offend you, while so many companies of bankrupt mountebanks, tavern-keepers, and drunkards do not? Do you believe that the grain supply is scourged by the dry diet and fasting of monks, but not by the Apician banquets of prodigals? Away with those artifices of the devil which render the servants of God odious. In one year in Europe, so much wine and beer, together with nature's torture, is consumed in drunkenness to the destruction of body and soul as would suffice for ten years for the sobriety of all the monks in the whole world. Look at the frequency and intemperance of banquets, and you will find that I have said too little. This is what not only causes poverty by emptying the storehouses, but provokes the divine wrath to mow down the hope of the crop in the blade by hail, frost, blight, and drought. I spoke of this matter above; now let us treat those things which are general and must be considered by all in the state.

§ 3. Those orders which procure their living by the labor of their hands are useful to the state, nor can even the rude populace blame them. For after psalmody many labor together at their tasks; during the assigned tasks sacred reading is held, spiritual hymns are sung, and conversation concerning pious matters is instituted. These men are burdensome to no one; they live from their labor, and from it they also do good to others. In former times a great part of the hermits lived in this manner. Augustine treats of them in the book On the Work of Monks. Abba Lucius in the Lives of the Fathers taught that this was to pray without intermission. For when certain brethren had come to him, the old man questioned them, saying: "What work are you accustomed to perform with your hands?" But they said: "We perform no work with our hands, but, according to what the Apostle says, we pray without ceasing." The old man said to them: "Do you not eat?" They answered: "Yes." And he said to them: "When, therefore, you eat, who prays for you?" But they were silent. Again he questioned them, saying: "Do you not sleep?" And when they said that they slept, he said to them: "When, therefore, you sleep, who prays for you?" They found nothing to answer him. Then he said to them: "Forgive me, therefore, because you do not do as you say. But I pray. For I sit from morning until the appointed hour, soak a few palm leaves, and make cords from them; meanwhile I pray, saying: 'Have mercy on me, O God, according to Your great mercy, and according to the multitude of Your mercies blot out my iniquity.' And when I have completed the works of my hands, and made some vessels or a few cords, and have received ten coins for them, from those coins I give two to the poor and eat from the rest. Therefore, when I eat or sleep, they without ceasing fulfill my prayer for my sins." Thus in the Lives of the Fathers, book 3, page 53, number 212.

Both the Pontiff will readily approve orders of this kind and states will receive them. For he will prescribe a time for prayer and psalmody--namely, that which secular men allot to banquets, games, and walking--and they will bring great utility. For food, clothing, and habitation will require little expense; they will sell their works for a lower price than others, because they live at lower expense. But works of more than one kind are to be performed. Formerly they wove baskets, which was a very common occupation among the rushes and sedges of Egypt; and since they ate very few vegetables and bread, they supported their expenses with no great labor. The cultivation of gardens is also suitable. Therefore I would prefer monasteries of this kind in suburban villages rather than in cities, so that they might cultivate a garden, which is a secondary reserve of sustenance, and yet might sell their goods in the cities. The writing, binding, and ornamentation of books also belong to them; I add printing. No less suitable are painting, drawing, and weaving sacred images and the ornaments of churches--finally, whatever is accustomed to be done by ornamental work or by a joiner.

§ 4. Those who do not live by the works of their hands either possess their revenues in common and live from them, or support themselves from alms. The monasteries of the Order of Saint Benedict, and of other orders which practice hospitality, are endowed with revenues. Although these suffer envy among the greedy, they are nevertheless welcome to the poor; for the prelate of one monastery often gives more alms than whole cities. Their institute is most holy: to sing divine praises for several hours every day, to pray, and to maintain a strict discipline of silence, fasting, and other observances. At times they preach and perform other duties of priests; they pass the principal part of the night in prayers and sacred song. No one has ever suspected that these men are useless to the state. For besides sacred occupations they devote their labor to other offices also; the whole North received the Christian faith principally through that order. Emperors have made use of the most faithful and useful labor of very many Abbots. Their religious virtue and modesty, and their proven prudence, brought it about that a considerable number, even men of humble station, attained the right and dignity of Princes in the Roman Empire; and Dukes and Counts do not consider it unworthy of their rank that the authority of the superiors of religious should be equal to their own. For they know that, amid the small number and scarcity of prudent and faithful counselors, religious men were summoned--not by ambition or money--from the recesses of monasteries for the salvation of the Christian state and the people of God, so that they might state their opinion with authority and the power of voting. For no reason counsels that one should fail to employ for the common welfare the work and counsels of men of faith, piety, learning, and prudence, who have stripped themselves of affections for human affairs. I pass over in silence the fact that so many distinguished prelates have proceeded from this order that it might appear to have been instituted by God for this reason, lest the Church lack government and the state assistance. I therefore say nothing more of these men. Emperors, Kings, Princes, and Christian states themselves, having regard not to birth or favor but solely to virtue and the public good, have in many places equated them with Princes, Dukes, and Counts, and have even given Counts and nobles into their clientship.

§ 5. I come to the poor religious, whose immense labor in teaching and celebrating divine offices, and whose austerity and want in clothing, habitation, and food, deservedly move all men to compassion. The Dominican and Franciscan Fathers formerly preserved the Church and the state, and now also devote unwearied labor to religion and the public good. If utility is asked about, one Dominic, one Vincent, converted as many souls as Moses led out of Egypt. Those who say that they enter the order for the sake of idleness speak calumniously; no one can persuade himself that this occurs. It is therefore calumny and an assault upon acknowledged truth. So many wealthy and noble men, having abandoned honorable, rich, and delightful ease, hasten with joyful minds to that most humble abasement of themselves, the want of all things, the austerity of food, hair-shirts, and scourges; and they joyfully sustain the cross, looking to the LORD JESUS CHRIST, the Rewarder, who will refashion their body of humility, conformed to the body of His glory. A King, Prince, Bishop, and state will therefore cherish these men with great affection. For teachers of the virtues and faith--which hearts so devoted to GOD profess by their deeds--will not be lacking. Indeed, the state can promise itself every prosperity when so many prayers of the saints ascend for its kingdom like the fragrance of spices to the throne of the Lamb.

§ 6. The institute of religious is not by its nature that of Clerics, although those among them who are Clerics also enjoy the privilege of Clerics. Thus Cause 16, question 1, canon 6:

> The case of monks is one thing, that of clerics another. Clerics feed the sheep; I am fed. They live from the altar; for me, as for an unfruitful tree, the axe is laid to the root if I abandon service at the altar. It is not lawful for me to sit before a presbyter. If I sin, it is lawful for him to hand me over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, so that the spirit may be saved on the day of the Lord Jesus.

And canon 4:

> A monk has the office not of one who teaches, but of one who mourns, who should lament either himself or the world and fearfully await the coming of the Lord.

The other part is Cause 16, question 1, canon 21:

> We commend that learned and upright monks consecrated with the honor of the priesthood ought to baptize, preach, grant penance, release the debts of the afflicted, and enjoy a just portion of the tithes, first-fruits, and offerings of the living and the dead under a regulated dispensation, so that, living according to the Apostle from the altar which they serve, through ministry to the Lord's people they may transform bread and wine by an immaculate blessing into the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ.

And canon 23:

> By the governance of Apostolic authority we decree that, if monks have been consecrated with the honor of the priesthood, together with the power of binding and loosing, they may laudably claim for themselves, no less than other priests, a portion according to the canon of the tithes, first-fruits, offerings, and donations made for the living and the dead, for their own utility and that of their neighbors by merit of more perfect justice.

§ 7. The care enjoined upon Bishops of visiting monasteries frequently should have as its principal aim that the original institution of the orders be preserved. They will not readily permit the rigor to be diminished without necessity--nor even to be increased. For if austerity of life is excessive, it excludes many who otherwise would be suitable; it generates many exceptions and privileges, and dispensations which the necessity of some demands but the weakness and tepidity of others extorts.

§ 8. Since the religious state is an order of humility and penance, and yet cannot exist without magistracy, that arrangement must be judged best in which the superiors' authority remains entire, and yet there is the least cause for seeking the prelacy. This will occur when it is instituted so as to be an office rather than a dignity. For if those who preside immediately enjoy bodily comforts and honors above the rest, through the weakness of human nature the presidency which is fled in the world is sought in religion. Therefore let all superiors of monasteries so order their table and other things that they are a form and example for their subjects. Let them have nothing peculiar to themselves except what the necessity of their office demands. Let them use it in such a manner that the rest may see that it is done not from love of delights but for benevolence and hospitality; and therefore let the superior diligently compensate by other penances and austerity for what he conceded to charity. For there cannot be a true desire for self-denial, mortification, and humility if prelates and seniors in the same house pursue repose and delights. Certainly it has rightly been established that he cannot become an Abbot who became a monk in order to become an Abbot; nor can he become an Abbot who conducted himself as a monk in order to become an Abbot.

§ 9. In wealthy monasteries the first care should be to remove luxury. Let necessary things be present for those who labor, but let the severity of the rule be observed--not only among subjects, but much more among those who ought to be examples. Let the wealth, moreover, be expended upon the poor, upon increasing the number of laborers, upon studies, and upon the fabric and ornaments of the church.

§ 10. In the monasteries of the poor, Princes, Bishops, Prelates, wealthier Clerics, and citizens should bring it about that there be the least possible need for going about and begging at the doors of others. For although the religious themselves are accustomed to undergo that embarrassment, nevertheless rare departure into public is more humane and altogether more useful for their repose and advancement in divine service. A religious outside the monastery is like a fish outside the water. "A monk without a cell lacks life," Cause 16, question 1, Placuit. No slight cause why fervor and piety grew cold among religious within the memory of our fathers was, in wealthy monasteries, the abuse of riches, and in poor ones, wanderings for sustenance through the districts, as they call them. For when a great multitude had grown but had withdrawn a little from the old zeal and ardor of piety, alms had to be sought by entreaties and sometimes by social courtesy. From this arose more unrestricted departure and association, and what follows a man pursuing external comforts: hatred of the cell and, finally, the overthrow of discipline.

From this they also readily come into contempt, while secular men think they travel for the sake of their belly. I add that not all of them, as men living a poor life at home, know the odious ceremonies of social refinement; being weary, hungry, thirsty, and unaccustomed to draw out delays at table, they frequently appear more desirous of drink or food. This is altogether an injustice: delicate men sit down at table to rouse by the artifice of seasoning a nauseated stomach, while these are judged gluttonous when they quiet a roaring belly.

It is therefore to be desired that there be such liberality--or kindness in the liberality--of the wealthy that laborious excursions through villages and towns, which distract the mind and shake discipline, may be abolished. These are for the most part the task of younger men and lay brothers. For when learned and grave men among them are summoned to give counsel and assist parish priests and parishioners, this does not pertain to that solicitude for sustenance. Nor will their labor be fruitless, since in former times they almost alone sustained the faith.

§ 11. For this reason their monasteries are to be placed either in great cities or near them. And if we inspect the matter, it will appear that in the past century the monasteries of great cities maintained discipline, while in towns it was greatly relaxed. For provisions had to be sought from farther away, few could be supported, and among a few who travel frequently rigor cannot long be preserved. But the farther one withdraws from the original institute, the farther the divine blessing retreats, and the care of sustaining life increases and grows burdensome; and it comes about that harsh necessity drives out those whom it is especially expedient to remain recollected at home, and first impels them into the dangers of acedia and weariness with sacred things, and then into grave sins.

§ 12. Principal care must be employed in receiving novices. In a rigorous order, let them not be admitted quickly and on the strength of sudden fervor; for where impulse rather than mature deliberation moves the mind, perseverance in the purpose fails. Those whom impulse carries proceed with the greatest violence; when we traverse the road with a natural gait, we reach the goal more slowly but more certainly. In wealthy monasteries, in which a more comfortable life, promotion to honorable offices, and liberty can be hoped for, great investigation is necessary lest perhaps not the love of God but the love of the world makes the candidates religious--lest desperation make a monk. For such men are restless, and because they do not attain what they had proposed for themselves, or attain it slowly and mixed with much humiliation, they readily abandon the institute with scandal and their own ruin.

No one does more harm than a Superior who seeks increase through easy and rash admission. Antonius of Siena relates in the Chronicle of the Dominican Fathers that the dissolution of the orders took its beginning from that imprudence. For when in the year 1348 and the following year the immense scourge of pestilence--which Robert of Avignon had foretold thirty years before--pervaded the world, most monasteries were emptied, for it is reckoned that half of mankind was consumed. The evil, however, fell more severely upon religious because they were accustomed to be present with the dying, instruct them, animate them for their departure, and fortify them with the Sacraments. When, therefore, those who then survived saw the houses nearly empty, with a plan more specious than prudent they admitted many without great discrimination. They thought that these men, even though living more licentiously, should be tolerated, hoping that their morals too would mature with age. But the contrary occurred. For when they were now adults and more numerous, and the seniors were dying, they retained the vices of young men while assuming the authority of old men, and introduced dissolution. Zealous men in the orders themselves, Pontiffs, Kings, and Bishops afterward fought against these things, which nevertheless could not be wholly conquered until heresy wrought its slaughter. But now all the orders are reforming themselves with greater fervor and constancy than has been done for three hundred years, being incited by one another's example. Therefore candidates must be admitted with great caution, for the wicked more readily seduce the good than they themselves are converted.

• Obvious transcriptional corruptions in titles, word divisions, and common Latin forms have been corrected from context in the translation; no registered Greek lacuna occurs in this chunk.

§ 13. In religious orders one must labor not only so that vices are severely corrected and scandals removed, but so that the aroused fervor of minds, zeal for souls, and love of maintaining discipline are fostered. If the life of a religious is languid, if he does not advance in virtue, if he undertakes the exercises of his profession unwillingly and sadly, if he aspires to liberty, he is near to ruin. If there are several men of this kind, they retard the alacrity of others. If they have also elected a Superior who assents to their inclinations, all is over unless the Bishop immediately deposes him, which he can do, as is found in the law, Cause 18, question 2, Si quis. Nor is only a criminal man harmful, but also one who is negligent and indulgent toward vices. For just as no labor is necessary for a ship to be carried down by a favorable current, but it is enough not to row and not to spread the sails in the opposite direction, so also, unless we are drawn toward good things by daily care, we glide of our own accord into evils. Each man ought to labor at this in himself, and a Superior in everyone.

Finally, let all who enter religious life strip themselves altogether of human affairs and live in such a way that they are not the cause of even the least violation of the rule of their institute. Let them know that their office is what Jordan replied was the office of the Dominicans: namely, "To live uprightly, to learn, to teach." For in truth one must not only live uprightly, but also learn, and, when there is opportunity, teach. Thus Antony and Aphraates came forth from solitude into public and expounded the word of God. See the distinguished reply of Aphraates to the Emperor Valens in book 8 of the Tripartite History, chapter 4. Saint Basil judged that the life of monks is perfected by reading and prayer, writing to Gregory:

> Εὐχαὶ πάλιν τὰς ἀναγνώσεις διαδεχόμεναι, νεαράν τε τὴν ψυχὴν, καὶ ἀκμαιοτέραν πρὸς Θεὸν πόθῳ κεκτημένην παραλαμβάνει.

[Printed page 504]

Prayers in turn, when they succeed readings, receive the soul fresher and more vigorous, moved by desire toward GOD. For this reason we see religious today devoting themselves to studies in all universities; others use a private master at home. Since they cannot employ his services with equal advantage in philosophy and Theology--for these studies demand public exercises--they are sent to Academies, and indeed most usefully. The Council of Vienne prudently established that in every monastery in which there are sufficient goods for this purpose there should be a master or doctor of a literary school. The Council of Trent also urges the exposition of Scripture, as does the Council of Aquileia celebrated in the year 1596, in the section On Maintaining the Faith:

> In the monasteries of monks also, even of Carthusians, where it can conveniently be done, let a lecture on sacred Scripture likewise be held. If the Abbots are negligent in this matter, let the Bishops of the places, acting in this as delegates of the Apostolic See, compel them to it by suitable remedies, as is providently established by the Decree of the Council. But in the convents of other Regulars in which studies can conveniently flourish, a lecture on sacred Scripture ought similarly to be held according to the prescription of the Council of Trent. This lecture shall be assigned by the general or provincial Chapters to the worthier ministers. In public schools also, if a lecture on sacred Scripture has not hitherto been instituted, it must be instituted as soon as possible for the conservation, championship, and defense of the Catholic faith; and if it had been instituted and were neglected, it must altogether be restored by the decree of the Council of Trent. Thus, if the principles and precepts of the arts and sciences are everywhere diligently handed down so that nothing is lacking for perfect knowledge, the studies of sacred > Scripture, the nourishment of the Gospel Word, the majesty of the divine utterances, and the greatness of the heavenly promises--which is the sole support of the present life and proof of the age to come--may not lie neglected.

But what I have said elsewhere concerning the studies of the state and of Clerics pertains especially to religious, who ought either to have studied or to be studying--or, to speak more rightly, both to have studied and to study.

This is so especially at the present time, when they are assailed by the common reproach of the sectaries, who say that nothing is more unlearned than a monk. Very many most learned men in monasteries show this to be utterly false. Yet the sloth and will alien to studies of certain men provide an occasion for it to be said. To the great evil of their subjects and disgrace of their order--indeed, to the insult of the Catholic Church--they both neglect learning themselves and impede others from advancing. Nor is the swelling knowledge of learned men to be feared, since no one weighs the rule of religious obedience and discipline more than one who is solidly learned.

I shall conclude these matters with the encomium of Saint Chrysostom in his fourteenth homily on chapter 5 of the First Epistle to Timothy, in which the holy man describes with a learned pen the office and all the actions of monks:

> Just as though one were going from earth to Heaven, so one goes from one's own home to the monastery of any holy man. There you do not behold the things that are at home. That place is clean; there is profound quiet and silence. "Mine" and "yours" have been driven entirely from there. Even if you remain there only one or two days, you will then be flooded with a greater perception of delight.
>
> It grows light--or rather, before the light the cock utters his voice. It is not as in the houses of secular men, where the household snores, the doors are shut, all are prostrated in deep sleep and are like the dead, and the muleteer shakes his bells. Nothing of this sort is there. Rather, all rise with reverence after shaking off sleep, roused by their superior, and immediately stand in the sacredly appointed choir; forthwith, with hands extended, they sing holy hymns together. For they do not, as we do, require several hours to shake off sleep. We, as soon as we rise, are occupied for a longer time: we go to the necessities of nature, then wash our hands and face, afterward put on shoes and garments, and spend much time on these things. There you would see nothing of this sort. No one there calls a servant, for each is sufficient for himself; he does not need many garments, nor does he have any need to shake off sleep. For as soon as he opens his eyes, he appears to have been awake for a long time. This happens to him by reason of sobriety. For unless the heart, made heavy by foods, is sunk downward, it is easily awakened from a light and healthful sleep; and immediately he resumes his turn of prayers. Pure hands are extended because an upright and moderate sleep preceded. No one here hears men snoring or yawning with sleep; no one sees anyone toss about in slumber or become uncovered. Rather, composed in order, they sleep more becomingly than men who are awake. All this proceeds from the discipline and uprightness of the mind. These truly are saints and Angels among men. For the highest fear of God does not permit them to be submerged in this deep sleep and the mind to be relaxed from its vigor, but it remains almost upon the surface, and sleep only refreshes them. Their dreams also are of this kind: they do not present fantasies or monstrous images.
>
> But, as I said, immediately at the cock's crow the superior stands beside them, gently strikes the reclining man with his foot, and thus immediately awakens all together; for it is not lawful to sleep naked there. Then, when they have risen, they devote themselves to the divine praises and sing the prophetic hymns in a great and sweet concord and with measured songs. Neither pipe, nor lyre, nor any other musical instrument produces notes so sweet as those holy men singing psalms in the greatest solitude and quiet. Their songs themselves are also most fitting and breathe love of God and zeal for divine things: "In the nights," he says, "lift up your hands to God." And again: "From the night my spirit keeps watch for You in the morning, O God, because Your commandments are a light upon the earth."
>
> The Davidic songs likewise move fountains of tears. For when he sings, saying, "I have labored in my groaning; every night I will wash my bed, I will water my couch with my tears"; and again, "Because I ate ashes as bread"; likewise, "What is man that You are mindful of him?"; and, "Man has become like vanity"; and this, "Our days pass like a shadow"; and, "Do not fear when a man has become rich, and when the glory of his house has been multiplied";

And again, "Who makes men of one manner dwell in a house"; and, "Seven times in the day I have spoken praise to You for the judgments of Your justice"; and again, "At midnight I arose to confess to You for the judgments of Your justice"; and, "O God, deliver my soul from the hand of hell"; and, "If I walk in the midst of the shadow of death I will fear no evils, because You are with me"; and likewise, "I will not fear the terror of the night, the arrow flying by day, the business walking about in darkness, the assault, or the noonday demon"; and, "We have been accounted as sheep for the slaughter." When they sing with Angels--for the Angels also sing at that time--"Praise the Lord from the heavens," while we are yawning, scratching, and snoring, or even lying supine and devising innumerable deceits, what is it like for them to consume the whole space of the night in the praise of God?

But when the light of day is now near, they pause for a very little while; and when we undertake our works, they claim a time of repose for themselves. But when it has grown light, each of us calls another and weaves a conversation concerning impediments. Then one bursts into the forum, stands before the magistrate, trembles, and fears punishments. Another goes to the theater; another proceeds to his work. They, on the contrary, when the morning prayers and hymns have been completed, turn themselves to the study of the sacred Scriptures. There are also those who have learned to copy books. Each one, however, having an allotted dwelling, studies in perpetual silence. Thus, with no one weaving trifles or speaking anything else, they complete the synaxis of the third, sixth, ninth, and evening hours; dividing the day into four parts, they honor God at the completion of each part with psalmodies and praises. While all the rest dine, laugh, play, and are distended with immoderate food, these devote themselves to praises. They have the least care for setting a table and, in general, for things subjected to the senses. After supper they again serve the divine praises, and thus take sleep soberly. Secular men, indeed, sleep even by day; these persevere in vigils even at night, as true sons of light. And the former, after indulging in more sleep, come forth burdened; the latter, on the contrary, are always sober, persisting without food and devoting themselves to hymns.

[Printed page 505]

Again, as the day declines toward evening, the former hasten to baths and repose. The latter, relaxing the labor of spiritual exercise for themselves, take food without rousing a flock of servants, without running through the house and stirring up crowds and tumults, and without setting out costly dishes elaborated by the cook's art. Rather, some take only bread and salt, others also oil, while most of the weaker take vegetables and legumes as food. Then, after they have sat for a little while and concluded the whole time with hymns, each reposes upon beds made only for rest, not for delights.

There is no terror of Princes there, no arrogance of masters, no fear of servants, no crowd of women, no restless cry of little children, no multitude of chests, no superfluous clothing, no gold, no silver, no guards, no treasury, and no other such thing. Rather, everything burns with prayers, everything resounds with hymns, everything is fragrant with a spiritual fragrance. Nothing carnal is there. No incursion of robbers is feared there, for they have nothing that can be carried away from them; they lack money and possess only body and soul. Those who take these things from them have not only harmed them in nothing, but have benefited them greatly. "For to me," he says, "to live is Christ, and to die is gain." They have been released from the bonds of the body. For truly, "The voice of rejoicing and salvation is in the tabernacles of the just."

No wailing and groaning are heard there. Those happy dwellings are free of all these things, free of these sorrows and cries. Men do indeed die even within them, for they are not immortal in body; but they neither call nor consider death to be death. They accompany those departing with hymns and call the event not the bearing-out of a corpse, but a procession and a sending-ahead. Finally, when anyone is announced to have died, great exultation and immense delight arise among them all. Indeed, no one even presumes to call him dead, but consummated. Then thanksgiving, glory, and immense joy follow, as each one prays to be given this end: thus to depart from the contest, to rest from labors and sweats, and to see Christ.

But if anyone has fallen ill, no lamentations and no tears, but perpetual prayers are poured forth. There the hands of physicians do not work, but faith by hope alone heals the sick man. Yet even if there should be need of physicians, great philosophy and immense endurance are displayed here also. No wife stands by with loosened hair, bewailing the evils of a little orphan's misfortune which have not yet occurred; no household strikes the expiring man with importunate entreaties that he should safely commend it to someone. Rather, the mind, stripped of all these impediments, considers one thing alone: how it may pour forth its final breath to God with greater grace.

And if illness occurs, it has not proceeded from the vice of gluttony or from drunkenness. Rather, the causes of illnesses themselves are full of praises and liable to no accusations. For weakness arises either from continual vigils, or from sustained fasting, or from some such things; therefore they are also easily freed from it. For it is sufficient for them to relax even moderately from their former rigor in order to escape the discomforts of illness.

CHAPTER XLVII

Communities of Sacred Virgins, Their Laws and Government

§ 1. Virgins have always possessed great majesty in the state, and an honored place even among the Gentiles. For at Rome the Vestals possessed an almost senatorial dignity, and among the Greeks also virginity was held in esteem--yet it was rare, and therefore virginity was precious. But those flowers, scarcely one of which entire kingdoms of the Gentiles beheld, occupied whole fields of the Church, especially the newly broken lands recently irrigated by the Lord's blood. For after Paul, as though sowing seed, scattered these words in 1 Corinthians 7: "But I say to the unmarried and to widows: it is good for them if they remain so, as I also do. But if they do not contain themselves, let them marry; for it is better to marry than to burn. But to those who are joined in marriage I command--not I, but the Lord--that the wife not depart from her husband; but if she has departed, let her remain unmarried or be reconciled to her husband."

What effect this produced is shown by Corinth, the famous cultivator of immodesty. For they soon began to veil virgins, and Tertullian says in On the Veiling of Virgins, chapter 2: "And the Corinthians today veil their virgins." At the same time there was at Philippi a college of virgins which Ignatius salutes, Ignatius, epistle 8. And in the Epistle to the Smyrnaeans: "I salute also those who pass their lives in perpetual virginity, and the widows." And in epistle 12 he admonishes Hero to care for the virgins as precious jewels of Christ. Clement, Jerome, Ambrose, and Augustine treat of them. Justin Martyr glories magnificently concerning them before Antoninus: "Very many indeed of both sexes, sixty and seventy years old, who from childhood have followed the discipline of Christ, continue incorrupt and celibate; and I glory that I can display such persons among every class of our people." Saint Cyprian, in On the Dress of Virgins, testifies that their number was immense in the Church while it lived beneath the swords of persecutors. "Now the world is filled; the earth is filled with those who can receive continence, living after the manner of eunuchs, castrated for the kingdom of God." The poet Naumachius also sang the praises of virginity:

Καλὸν μὲν δέμας ἁγνὸν ἔχειν, ἀδμῆτά τε μίμνειν

Παρθενικήν· καθαροῖσί τ' ἀεὶ μελεδήμασι χαίρειν,

Μήτε βαρυτλήτων λαγόνων περὶ φόρτον ἄγουσαν,

Μήτε πόνον τρομέουσαν ἀγάστονον Εἰλειθυίης·

Ἀλλ' ἦσθαι βασίλειαν ἀφαυρῶν θηλυτεράων,

Ψυχῆς ὄμμα φαεινὸν ὑπὲρ βιότοιο χέουσαν·

Ἔνθα γάμοι κεδνοὶ καὶ ἀληθέες, ἔνθα μιγεῖσα

Θεσπεσίοις ἐπέεσσι νοήματα φάεα τίκτει.

It is assuredly splendid to have a chaste body and to remain inviolate, a virgin; to rejoice always in pure hymns; not to carry a heavy burden about the loins; not to tremble at the labor and groaning of Lucina; but to sit as queen over weaker women, pouring the bright eye of the soul forth upon life. There are splendid and true nuptials; there, mingled with divine utterances, she begets luminous understandings.

But it is easy to praise virtue; it is difficult to implant, fence about, increase, and defend it--especially the virtue of women, who are fragile and changeable, and above all the virtue of chastity, which has an internal and powerful enemy, strong in flatteries. Therefore the monasteries and life of virgins must be discussed.

§ 2. There are some monasteries of virgins who have vowed chastity, but others are free communities, which I do not know whether they can be found outside Germany; in the free communities, however, the Abbess is bound by vows. I am not ignorant that those communities of virgins are disapproved by many, but they censure the morals of some, not the institute. For it appears plainly useful to me that there be a place in which virgins may be brought up uprightly and safely for piety and for labors necessary and suitable to their sex, and then, after becoming acquainted with the exercises of religious life, either embrace it or be given in marriage. Let it be, as it were, a seminary of virgins and matrons, provided that those things required by the uprightness of common life are present, corruptions are avoided, and whatever can obstruct a good reputation is shunned.

§ 3. We shall now treat the monasteries of professed virgins, or those bound by a vow. These are of two kinds: some virgins live by the labor of their hands alone; others have their own revenues. I approve most of all those whose annual revenue is moderate, so that there is sufficient time for sacred prayers and readings, and so that a part of their support is acquired from the revenue, but the rest by the labor of their hands.

Their labors can be various: everything that pertains to the making of clothing which they use; then weaving, embroidering with the needle, spinning, and cultivating a garden. For since studies and manifold readings are by no means suitable for women, and perpetual prayer or psalmody cannot be employed, these things must be interspersed not with idleness but with labor, of such a kind that it arouses the spirit and exercises the body healthfully without oppressing it. Let the Bishop inquire carefully into this matter when he visits.

But whatever can be established concerning the integrity, discipline, and preservation of monasteries in which virgins dwell was established, through the agency of Charles Borromeo, the most holy and prudent Archbishop of Milan, by the First and Fourth Councils of Milan. I have resolved to take their provisions from there, both so that among Bishops, Prelates, and the communities of virgins themselves they may possess the authority of so great a prelate and of the synods, and so that adversaries may see what the life of sacred virgins and the care of their salvation are, and cease to defame a most holy life which they are unwilling to imitate. I affirm at the same time that these constitutions contain a compendium of Apostolic doctrine, the sacred canons, and those things which the Fathers handed down concerning the care of virgins.

In the First Synod, therefore, the following things are established:

> So that in monasteries of Regular women who have dedicated themselves to GOD in religion the ancient discipline may both be preserved entire and, if perhaps it has anywhere been corrupted, be restored; and so that they themselves, conforming themselves to it, may rest more freely in the contemplation of divine things: we command that these formulas for living piously and rightly--partly handed down in the decrees of the Council of Trent, partly established for the advantage of our province according to the circumstances of these times--be altogether observed by all nuns in this province, even those committed to the care of Regulars or, for any other reason whatsoever, not subject to the jurisdiction of Bishops, by the faculty given to us by the Supreme Pontiff Pius IV.

CONCERNING THE NUMBER OF NUNS

> At the command of the Council of Trent, let the Superior establish for each monastery that number of nuns which can be suitably supported according to the measure and resources of the place and the customary alms, and let him strive to do this within a year. Nor shall it in any manner be lawful for that number to be increased unless an annual accession of revenues sufficient for it has been made to the monastery.
>
> Let the Bishop diligently endeavor to transfer and unite with other monasteries of the same or another order those monasteries in which there are not twelve professed women who use the veil, and which cannot support that number from their own revenues or customary alms, having summoned for this purpose the Regular Superiors, provided that the matter concerns a monastery whose care pertains to them.

But if a union of this kind should appear in no way expedient, let him permit that number of nuns to die away in the course of time and be reduced to nothing, the faculty of receiving novices being altogether taken away from those nuns.

And let the monasteries of those nuns and the revenues of the monasteries even now be assigned to other monasteries or places to which they shall appear to be owed under the laws of that order.

CONCERNING THE SUPERIORS AND OTHER MINISTERS OF THE NUNS

Within two months after these constitutions have been published, let the Bishops admonish the Abbesses or any Superiors who profess that their office of Superior is perpetual--even by edict, if they judge it proper, with the penalty of deprivation proposed, which they shall incur by the fact itself--that within a further month they exhibit to the Bishops or their vicars, and at the same time to their Superiors if they are committed to the care of Regulars, those legal instruments granted to them by the Apostolic See. Thus it can be ascertained whether those instruments are in proper form and, if there is need, a report can be made concerning them to the Supreme Pontiff. But if they have not exhibited them within that prescribed time, let the Bishop declare them deprived of that rank of dignity, and let their Superior arrange for others to be duly substituted in their place.

No nun shall canvass for, or in any manner whatsoever seek for herself, whether directly or indirectly, by herself or through another, the honors or offices of her monastery of whatsoever kind. The established penalty is that both she herself and those who have favored her in that matter shall, for three Fridays in Chapter, kiss the ground at the feet of each nun and accuse her ambition; and she herself, moreover, if she has obtained that office, shall be deprived of it and of other duties at the discretion of the Superior.

Having laid aside their own will, prepared to obey, and setting before themselves there only the glory of God and the common utility of the monastery, they shall elect to honors and offices those whom, after every human affection has been removed, they judge by the impulse of the Holy Spirit to be more suitable for that duty.

According to the decree of the Council of Trent, let no Superior, by whatsoever name she is called, be elected who is less than forty years of age or who has lived uprightly for fewer than eight years after she was professed. But if a woman of this kind is not found in the same monastery, one may be chosen from another monastery of the same order. If, however, this also should appear inconvenient to the Superior who presides over the election, then, with the consent of the Bishop or another Superior, let one be elected from those in the same monastery who are more than thirty years old and who have lived uprightly for at least five years after profession. In the remaining matters, let the constitutions of the individual orders of monasteries be observed.

A Superior of this kind and her Vicaress, and also the Discreets--who by another name are called Mothers of Council--where they are accustomed to be elected by the Chapter, shall be elected by secret ballots in the presence of the Superior or his minister, who shall stand outside the monastery at the grating or grille, according to the decree of the Council of Trent.

They cannot, however, be elected to these offices unless the Superior has carried two of three parts of the ballots, whether by the votes or by accession. But the Vicaress and Discreets shall be created by votes of more than half.

In monasteries in which there are several sisters by blood, if one of them is placed over the monastery, the remaining sisters cannot become Vicaresses, Discreets, or doorkeepers, nor can they perform the office of scribe or cellarer.

[Printed page 507]

The decrees of the Fourth Synod are these:

We establish that the provisions prescribed below are to be added to the other decrees which we established concerning nuns in the preceding Councils.

A monastery shall have two doors by which access is opened into its enclosure, and no others besides them. Of these two doors, one shall serve for leading beasts of burden, carts, and vehicles, and the other for other necessary uses and conveniences. But in a monastery in which one alone shall appear sufficient for every action and use, let there be that one only.

Each door shall consist of double planking, and that strong, and shall likewise be without any opening, even the smallest crack. It shall have a threshold of marble or solid stone which closely adjoins the gate itself.

To the door for carts or beasts of burden there shall be joined, within the monastery itself, another made of strong planks in the form of a grille, which shall stand a little distance from the first door and shall have the form demonstrated in the instructions for ecclesiastical construction.

At the other door, accommodated to other uses, to which shall be attached the revolving box which they call a turn, two nuns shall always be present who shall be appointed doorkeepers.

Each of these two doors shall be locked with two keys, fashioned by the smith so as to differ from one another. Even during the day, the Superior of the monastery shall perpetually keep one key in her possession and the nun senior in profession the other.

All revolving boxes shall be removed and obstructed, and henceforth shall be perpetually forbidden, except the one attached to the common door; another constructed in the place called the parlor; a third which is in the cell of confessions; and a fourth in the Church, fitted for passing out of the monastery the sacred vestments and ornaments necessary for the sacred rite of the Mass.

Food for every lodging of the monastery, even that of the confessor, shall be passed out through the common revolving box.

On the inner side of the monastery a hook shall be firmly fixed in each revolving box so that they cannot be turned at pleasure from outside.

But if there are several places called parlors, there shall be a revolving box in only one, or at most in a second, at the judgment of the Superiors.

The revolving box which faces the Church shall be fitted with two wooden shutters: inner shutters, whose key shall be held by the Superior; and outer shutters, whose key shall be held by the chaplain or by another who shall appear suitable to the Superior.

The height of the revolving boxes shall not be greater than one cubit and eight inches, and their width shall be one cubit.

The revolving box for confessions shall be smaller on every side by half the prescribed measurement.

No window, except those expressly prescribed in the First Provincial Council, shall face from the monastery into the Church or the exterior sacristy; and in it there shall not even be a crack, much less any opening, through which sight or conversation may be possible.

The window through which the elevation of the most holy Eucharist is viewed shall not be open to a height of more than two cubits and twelve inches, but in width it shall be equal to the width of the altar.

Two iron grilles, at a distance of one palm from one another, shall be firmly fastened into that window.

The individual iron bars of which the grilles are constructed shall be distant from one another by no more than three inches.

They shall be inserted into one another in such a way that they cannot be moved from their place.

The windows shall be closed on the inner side with strong shutters, with a lock and key which shall be kept by the Superior.

But wherever that window is at the side of the altar or Church, or in another place, even an upper one, from which the nuns can behold those who are in the exterior Church, let the Bishop bring it about as soon as possible that a window be constructed above the altar from which the nuns view the sacrifice of the Mass, according to the prescribed instruction; and let that lateral or other window, whatsoever it may be, be completely obstructed.

The small window facing toward the Church through which the nuns receive the sacred Eucharist shall be constructed at such a height and in such a suitable manner that the priest may stand conveniently, not bend his knees, while ministering it. On the outside of this small window, in addition to those which now exist, little wooden shutters shall be fitted flush with the wall, and their key shall remain perpetually with the confessor.

The most holy Sacrament shall be reserved nowhere except upon the high altar; a lamp shall always shine before it in the interior Church, and in the exterior Church when its doors are open.

Sacred relics shall be stored in a small aperture which, built into the wall of the interior Church according to the prescription of our instructions, can be opened only from the side facing the exterior Church. This aperture shall be closed with three keys made with different workmanship, one of which shall be with the Bishop, another with the confessor, and the third with the Superior of the monastery.

The small window for confessions shall open to a height of sixteen inches and a width of twelve, and no more. It shall be enclosed by strong iron grilles according to the prescribed form, and also by a thoroughly solid iron plate most firmly fastened to the wall and filled with holes as small as chickpeas, covered with black linen cloth. That cloth shall be fastened with little wooden boards in such a manner that it cannot readily be removed.

The interior places for conversation, commonly called parlors, which shall be constructed hereafter, shall be contained within one and the same circumscription of space with no intervening wall, and, where this can be done without great inconvenience, shall be accommodated to the pattern according to which very many have already been built, so that all conversations can be overheard by the same listeners.

The window of the iron plate shall never be opened, as was provided in the First Provincial Council, except very rarely and for a reason which the Bishop has judged urgent.

In the places constructed for lodging, which are called guesthouses, where food is sometimes taken or sleep obtained because of urgent necessity, there shall be no windows, not even small ones, which face into the monastery.

Care shall altogether be taken that the roofs of the guesthouse and of houses of every other kind be completely separate and very far removed from the roofs of the monastery.

In those monasteries in which provision cannot be made for removing the overlooking view of neighbors, especially religious, as was commanded in the First Provincial Council, the windows shall be obstructed if light can be received from elsewhere. If not, let them be protected from that visual exposure by the form of construction demonstrated in our instructions, which shall likewise be employed in protecting from the same exposure the galleries which they call loggias.

Gardens which extend too widely in monasteries of nuns and require the daily labor and cultivation of men shall, where it can be done, be confined within narrower bounds.

In no monastery of nuns of any order, even one subject to the law or care of Regulars, shall any window, door, or other opening of that kind, from which there is a view outside the enclosure of the monastery, be uncovered or opened without the permission of the Bishop, to whom the enclosure of all monasteries is entrusted. Nor shall he permit or grant this unless he has diligently inspected the place and judged it necessary to be done. And then, to impede or obstruct that view--

[The sentence continues in source chunk B6-079.]

• The final sentence is deliberately left open because the fixed source chunk ends in mid-sentence at the printed-page boundary; it continues without omission in B6-079.

§ 3, continued.

[Printed page 508]

--that very precaution prescribed immediately above shall be employed.

Only those nuns whom the Superior has selected shall give orders to servants who, for a necessary cause, are sometimes given the faculty of entering the enclosure of the nuns; no others besides them shall either command anything of the servants or speak to them.

When the nuns attend a discourse or sermon in a place where they can be seen by others who are outside--even by the preacher or by a Superior--let all have their faces covered and concealed by a veil drawn down to the mouth.

Let those who come forward to meet, receive, or conduct anyone entering the enclosure of the monastery--even a physician or Superior--do the same.

Let several physicians be approved by the Bishop who, with the permission also of the Superiors of the monastery, may lawfully be employed within its enclosure whenever the gravity of an illness requires others besides the ordinary physician.

In every monastery let the Bishops introduce the use of ovens in which bread may be baked, so that entrance into the monastery may be altogether forbidden to bakers and their servants.

Nor shall any man be brought in to clean or light the oven, or to perform anything else that can be done or carried out by the nuns.

We decree that what was sanctioned in the First Provincial Council concerning written permission to approach monasteries of nuns shall be inviolably observed both by men and by women, however distinguished they may be in rank, dignity, or birth, even if they are the father, mother, brothers, or sisters of the nun whom they come to visit. Let the Bishop take care that this is altogether performed everywhere.

Let the necessary causes on account of which it is lawful to enter within the enclosure of a monastery--either explained in this Provincial Synod from the decree of the First Council or rejected as in no way necessary--be published in the final part of this Council, printed, proclaimed, and announced in each monastery of nuns, even those subject to the care of Regulars. It shall not be lawful to depart from them in any manner, for any reason, or under any pretext.

Vessels of fruit or flowers shall in no way be kept in monasteries for the purpose of selling either the fruit or the flowers.

It shall not be lawful for a nun or monastery to make little confections and other things of this kind, not only for the purpose of giving them away, as was forbidden in the First Council, but also for selling them.

Let a nun abstain from giving gifts.

It is altogether forbidden to give alms through the turn or gate of a monastery, since it is most certainly known that no slight dangers--or rather, injuries--arise from this. But those monasteries which, according to their means, shall have been permitted by the Bishop or another Superior to give alms shall give money, grain, or another such thing to certain pious men, especially to the administrators of pious places, who shall distribute it to the poor somewhere other than at the monasteries.

Medicines which the Bishop or another Superior has permitted to be sold or given outside shall be given only by the senior apothecary and by no other. They shall be sold or given not in a private capacity, but in the name of the monastery.

A nun shall not be permitted to prepare or furnish medicines for those outside the cloister, to apply her hand for the purpose of healing, to prescribe remedies, or to practice anything else pertaining to medicine.

If a fireplace has been constructed in private cells, it shall be permanently obstructed in such a way that a fire can by no means be kindled in it.

When a window, door, or fireplace is obstructed, its hinges shall be torn out in such a way that the work has been done not temporarily, but permanently.

The same shall be observed in windows, doors, and fireplaces already obstructed.

That common place for the care of the sick which they call the infirmary, wherever it has not yet been built or constructed, shall be established, constructed, or built as quickly as possible. A sick nun shall not lie outside the bounds of that place; but, when health has been recovered, she shall not remain there any longer for the sake of comforts.

Where it can conveniently be done, the ancient and approved use of common sleeping places shall be restored and recalled to its former custom.

Within the enclosure of the monastery a place of burial shall be given or established for no one except the nuns.

Nor shall the bodies of nuns be carried outside the enclosure for burial.

No person of any status or condition, neither lay nor ecclesiastical, shall be permitted in any monastery of nuns to be received in those lodgings which they call guesthouses, or to lodge in them, whether in the city or in the diocese, except the priest-confessor, to whom this is sometimes conceded because of urgent necessity.

In the diocese, however, this may also be conceded to the visitor of the monastery and to its administrators or procurators where the Bishop has judged that it must sometimes necessarily be granted.

We decree that what was sanctioned by us in the First Provincial Council concerning figured chant, every musical instrument, and musicians not to be employed on the feast day of a nuns' Church in the exterior Church is forbidden to them also on every other day and at every other time.

Nor shall anything besides the Mass be sung by others in their exterior Church, since the offices of Vespers and the remaining canonical hours can be sung by the nuns themselves.

In every monastery where there is neither a common place for clothing nor another place in which the nuns occupy themselves in completing works, both shall be established or constructed as soon as possible.

No nun, except the doorkeepers, shall embroider with a needle or perform any other manual work anywhere except in the place established for completing works.

The Mistress of Labors or Works shall possess a definite book in which she shall record so distinctly whatever profit or advantage is received from those labors that it can readily be seen whether anything is lacking in that matter.

No nun except the Mistress of Labors shall interpose herself in receiving or returning works. When necessary, she may sometimes employ with herself another nun more experienced in the practice of completing a particular work.

Furthermore, so far as this can be done, care must be taken that there are not manifold and diverse kinds of manual works or workshops in the monastery.

In this common place of labors, not only shall a reading concerning the spiritual life be employed according to the prescription of the First Council, but every idle word shall also be avoided.

Garments of every kind and all clothing shall be preserved in the wardrobe. Nothing shall be stored or kept privately in cells or another place which is not necessary at that very time.

A nun shall not keep even a small amount of money in her possession under any title, not even with the consent of the Superior, unless the nature of the office she holds demands otherwise.

Otherwise she shall be punished as guilty of property ownership. The Superior who has permitted it in any manner or under any pretext shall undergo the same penalty, as shall also a nun who has discovered it and has not reported it to the Superior within two days, or, if the Superior is at fault, to the higher Superior as soon as she could.

Care shall altogether be taken that that exact and religious manner and practice of common life be diligently introduced into the monastery, and that the nuns diligently pursue the discipline and studies of the spiritual life and holy instruction.

[Printed page 509]

Every year, as was commanded in the First Council, accounts of the expenditures made for food and other uses of the monastery shall be required from the Superior by those whose concern it is. The Bishop himself shall prescribe accurately how much wheat, wine, provisions, and other things he judges sufficient for each monastery's support for the year. If the Superior has shown herself negligent in that prescribed distribution or administration, she shall be suspended from the duty of her office.

A debt exceeding the sum of fifty gold coins shall not be contracted in any monastery without the permission or consent of its administrators, who shall consult the Bishop in matters of great importance.

Let the nuns not involve themselves in secular business. And so that many frauds and losses may at the same time be prevented, let the Bishop diligently take care that their estates are leased, and that this is done under the spear at public auction, unless at some time he judges that another course is expedient.

For maintaining enclosure this precaution also shall be employed: neither wheat, nor other crops, nor provisions shall be stored in any monastery except for the use and necessity of the monastery.

Definite rules shall be prescribed by the Bishop to the administrators, procurators, patrons, and defenders of each monastery, from which they may know every part of their office. Such administrators and ministers of this kind shall be appointed by the Bishop for each monastery subject to his care which does not possess them, yet in such a way that each and every one can always be removed from the charge of that duty at the discretion of the same Bishop.

Within six months an inventory, drawn up in an approved form, of all goods and rights pertaining to any monastery--even one subject to Regulars--shall be carried to the episcopal archive by those whose concern it is, lest fraud be committed in any manner, once the number of nuns has been fixed by the Bishop.

Therefore, if any alienations of those goods and rights should afterward occur, the Bishop shall be informed of them.

When a girl asks to enter a monastery in order to inspect the place where she is considering making profession, it shall first be diligently and carefully ascertained whether this is truly her purpose or whether she is attempting it from curiosity; nor shall she for that reason be permitted to wander through several monasteries.

Girls shall be received both for other purposes and for profession by the secret ballots of the nuns. According to the decree of the First Provincial Council--which, by the authority of the letters of Pius V, has force even in monasteries subject to the law of those Regulars--this same rule shall be fully observed even in monasteries subject to the law and care of Regulars.

Where in these times that religious and ancient custom of solemnly veiling nuns has become obsolete, it shall be recalled to its former use according to the ancient institute and rite, provided that it is done within the monastery.

It shall not be lawful for a nun of any order to put on albs, vestments, or other garments dedicated to the use of the sacrifice of the Mass.

Confessors and chaplains, likewise the priests and other ministers of the nuns whom the Bishop has placed over their care, whoever they may be, shall not take or accept any gift, not even the smallest, nor any food or drink from them under any title, either publicly or privately, under a penalty to be imposed at the discretion of the same Bishop.

Nor, moreover, shall they take anything given as a gift under the appearance or pretext that things of this kind serve ecclesiastical use, such as corporals, purificators, clerical garments, sacred images, and other things of that kind.

Nor shall they accept from them anything else elaborated by manual work or skillfully fashioned, nor even the labor or work bestowed upon cleaning, mending, or repairing garments.

Let the priests who serve the chapel likewise take care not to receive from any nun privately, but only from the Superior of the monastery or from the nun placed over the sacristy, a commission to celebrate Masses. They shall converse only with that Superior or sacristan, and not with other nuns, and then only about matters which pertain solely to their office.

The same shall be observed by the nuns concerning this whole class of matters, a penalty being proposed both for them and for the chaplains at the Bishop's discretion.

But wherever it shall appear proper, with the Bishop's permission, to give some annual stipend to confessors, chaplains, or priests for the support of life, it shall altogether be given as a definite sum of money, unless the Bishop should sometimes concede otherwise--namely, that wheat, wine, or something of this kind be given in place of money.

Let the Bishop choose several pious and likewise diligent men who, especially on feast days, shall approach monasteries of nuns, even those subject to the law or care of Regulars, and inspect them everywhere from outside, to see whether anything is done or carried on contrary to what has been prescribed concerning them, and whether anyone converses with them without having obtained permission.

Whenever a new monastery of nuns is constructed, particular care shall be taken that no window or lookout faces anywhere except inward upon the enclosure of the monastery.

That enclosure shall be closed not by a simple wall, but by the cloisters and porticoes themselves.

In the middle of its enclosure, however, a garden may be established over a great part of it.

Let it be the Bishop's care that monasteries already built be accommodated or refashioned according to the pattern of this form, so far as it can be done.

The lesser offices--such as those placed over the door, the turn, conversations, or the instruction of novices; those placed over the sacristy; those who preside over the nuns who occupy themselves by the industry of their hands; and those who perform the office of scribe or accountant and who minister to the sick--shall be bestowed, by the person who presides over the election together with the confessor, Superior, Vicaress, and Discreets, upon those whom in the judgment of their consciences they deem suitable. By this decree no derogation shall be made from those monasteries in which nuns are customarily elected to offices of this kind by the votes of the Chapter.

The offices of those who have been elected shall be for two years, or, in monasteries where that is the custom, for three at most. When they have completed them, let them remain free from offices for at least an equal length of time. Nor can they be confirmed in the same offices by the nuns unless a grave cause exists, approved by the judgment of the Superior, who can also remove them from office before the appointed time if they administer it badly.

Those who have been elected shall undertake their offices as their obedience demands and shall humbly execute their duties without refusal. Those who act otherwise without a just cause approved by the Superior shall, at his discretion, be deprived of the right of voting, so that they can neither elect others nor be elected by others.

The Superior of the monastery, as the common mother of all the nuns, shall most diligently take counsel for the welfare of both their bodies and their souls. She shall diligently admonish them to be pure of heart, preserve integrity of life, and strive toward the perfection of all virtues. For those who have undertaken religious life, unless they endeavor according to their strength to attain that highest degree, assuredly accomplish less than they ought according to the institute of their life and order--

[The sentence continues in source chunk B6-080.]

§ 3, continued.

[Printed page 510]

--which they profess. Let her remember, however, that she must render to the most just Judge an account of all the faults which the nuns have committed through her negligence or fault.

Above all, let her take care that the peace and concord of the sisters be preserved, with all causes of dissension and discord removed so far as she can accomplish it, so that, as they ought, they may be bound together as one body and one spirit in their Spouse Jesus Christ by the perfect bond of charity.

Let her also strive that each rightly perform her own duty and that no one occupy the office of another except for the sake of assistance and at her own command; that everything be performed in order; and especially that silence be observed at the prescribed hours and places. But if anyone's importunity, in deed or word, has disturbed the sisters' peace and violated charity, let her be most sharply punished by the Superior herself and, if need arises, by the higher Superior of the nuns also, and let the pride of her spirit be subdued.

All the nuns shall render complete obedience and observance to this Superior or to her Vicaress, who in her absence possesses her authority and place, as their vow demands.

But any nun who has neglected her commands and has been unwilling to undergo the penance imposed upon her, or has answered proudly and injuriously without regard for her dignity, or by contumacious defense or excuse has impeded her from rebuking or chastising those who have committed some offense, shall be accused before the higher Superior by those whom we called Discreets, so that she may pay grave penalties for her contumacy and insolence. If the Discreets do not do this, they shall be compelled on one occasion to apply scourges to themselves under the name of discipline and to take their food upon the ground.

Every week the Superior shall also hold an assembly or Chapter of the nuns, for the purpose of correcting the nuns for the faults which they have committed publicly or in the duty of their offices. They shall spontaneously and humbly seek pardon for them before everyone; the Superior shall impose penance upon them and employ the other measures handed down in their institutes for keeping the pious in humility and contempt of self and for making them diligently pursue all virtues.

Let the nuns take care not stubbornly to refuse a penance imposed by the Superior, nor with a malicious spirit to reproach one another with offenses from an earlier time.

The penalty for one who has committed this shall be that she immediately kiss the ground at the feet of each nun and apply scourges to herself as a discipline.

In matters of somewhat greater gravity, the Superiors shall decide nothing unless the greater part of the Discreets, or Mothers of Council, know and consent.

But in matters which require greater deliberation, the Superiors shall summon the whole Chapter of nuns, and what has pleased the greater part of the nuns shall be ratified by them.

In all secret ballots, however, let the nuns take care not to hand the voting balls or counters into one another's hands. The penalty for those who commit this shall be that, deprived of participation in Chapter, they can neither elect nor be elected by vote, at the discretion of the Superior.

None shall be admitted to cast votes concerning any matter referred to them except those who have dwelt in the monastery for three years after making profession.

The Discreets shall excel the other nuns in uprightness and prudence.

They shall not be fewer than four where the nuns are no more than forty; but if there are more, at least six shall be created.

Nuns of mature age and proven uprightness shall be placed over the hearing of the conversations of the others. They shall perform their office diligently and faithfully, and shall stand by the other nuns who are speaking in such a manner that they themselves hear and diligently notice whatever has been said or done, both inside and outside. They shall not permit anything to be uttered so secretly that it escapes their notice, nor anything unworthy of the handmaids of God to be said or done. If anything contrary to this is committed through their fault or negligence, they shall be punished with the gravest penalty at the discretion of their Superior.

The appointed Mistress of Novices alone, and no one else, shall have the care of the novices in a place separated from the other nuns.

She shall instruct the novices in the fear and worship of God and in the observance of religious life. By the example of a life offering no occasion for rebuke and by continual admonitions, she shall endeavor so to instruct them in the manner of a spiritual and holy life that, advancing with God's assistance, they may become His perfect handmaids.

But any nun who has rashly assumed the task of instructing one of the novices shall be deprived of the right of voting, so that she can neither elect nor be elected for as long as shall please the Superior.

During the day the doors of the monastery enclosure shall be locked with at least one key, which shall be kept by the senior doorkeeper so that they can be opened when necessary. They shall by no means be opened unless both doorkeepers are present. At night they shall be locked with two different keys, one of which shall be kept by the Superior and the other by the same senior doorkeeper.

When the doors are opened for some necessary cause, the nuns shall not dare to approach them in order to look at anything outside or to converse with anyone at all, whether man or woman. A nun who dares to do this shall be confined in a cell and remain there as long as shall seem good to the Superior. The woman placed over the door shall be punished by the same penalty if she either permitted it or did not immediately report petulance of this kind to the Superior.

At the time when offices are changed, one or two mature and prudent nuns shall be placed over the labors of the nuns.

At the turn they shall receive the things to be worked upon and distribute them to those fit to perform that work. When the works have been completed, they shall return them through the same turn to their owners after receiving the payment, always in the presence of the nun placed over the turn.

No other nun shall accept anything to be worked upon, not even from kindred or relations by marriage. A nun who acts contrary to this shall on every occasion apply scourges to herself under the name of discipline in the place where the nuns occupy themselves in completing works.

If any nun, not impeded by illness or another just cause, has abstained from labors of this kind through laziness, idleness, or a certain stubbornness, she shall be deprived of side dishes for the whole time during which she has not applied herself to labor.

In the place where the nuns occupy themselves in labors, a reading shall likewise be employed every day. When it has been completed, they shall discuss among themselves what they have heard and, vying to cast out vices, exhort one another to attain the virtues.

Let the Mistress of Labors take care that secular conversation or songs, or anything abhorrent from the condition and institute of nuns, are not introduced.

The Superiors, even if their office is perpetual, the scribes, and all the others who administer the goods of the monastery in any manner shall keep the prescribed account of them faithfully and accurately.

Every three months they shall present to the Chapter a summary account of receipts and expenditures, so that all may be able to understand the state of the monastery's affairs. But every year they shall render separately an account of all the things which they have administered to the higher Superior or his Vicar and, if there are any, to the appointed administrators of the monastery. Those who have claimed the monastery's goods for themselves or wrongfully lost them shall be punished most sharply at the discretion of the Superior.

[Printed page 511]

So that no occasion of fraud may remain, in each monastery a chest shall be established for this use, that the common money be placed in it. It shall be locked with two keys different from one another, one of which shall be kept by the Superior of the monastery and the other by the senior Discreet. The chest shall not be opened, money placed in it, or money taken from it unless the Superior, the senior Discreet, and the nun-scribe who enters its account are present.

The doors of the granary and of the place where flour is kept shall likewise be locked with two different keys, each of which shall be kept by one of the Mothers placed over that duty. She shall always be present when wheat or flour is brought in or carried out.

The Superior and nuns shall in no way be able to alienate, exchange, lease, or contract concerning the goods of the monastery unless the higher Superior of the property or his Vicar knows, consents, and is present, and the other requirements of law are likewise observed. Otherwise the contract shall be invalid and null.

Likewise, they shall not build unless the higher Superior and the citizens who are administrators of the monastery consent. These shall take care that it be done conveniently and becomingly at the least possible expense.

Those placed over the care of the sick shall show themselves pious and merciful toward them, with the greatest patience and diligence they can, and shall show themselves toward them as they would wish others to be if they themselves were sick.

Food and suitable medicines shall be provided to the sick by the Superior and the ministers elected for this purpose, as the resources of the monastery permit.

The Superior, however, shall visit them every day for the sake of charity, both to be a consolation to them and to learn better from them and provide what they need.

But if one dies, the confessor, together with a companion whom the higher Superior has approved, shall enter the enclosure of the monastery when her body is to be given burial, and shall piously and swiftly perform the office which must be discharged at that time.

CONCERNING GIRLS TO BE ADMITTED TO RELIGIOUS LIFE

As soon as girls are offered to receive the sacred habit, the Superior of the nuns shall admonish their parents, or those to whose care they are entrusted, of the excommunication proposed by the holy Council of Trent for those who compel their own or another's girls against their will to receive or profess religious life. The same shall be done by their higher Superior when his consent is required.

In monasteries in which there are fewer than fifty nuns, only two sisters by blood, or three who are of one stock and family, may be received.

But where there are more than fifty nuns, only three sisters, or four women of the same family, may be received, if it shall so appear to the Chapter of nuns.

The Superior and nuns shall not dare to promise anything concerning a girl to be admitted to religious life by their votes, or to convene the Chapter, before the girl has been secretly examined and approved in a free place by the Bishop or by the person to whom he has delegated this duty, has obtained in writing the faculty of receiving religious life in that monastery, and the higher Superior of that monastery has also consented.

All of them shall first inquire diligently concerning the girl's morals, life, age--which must be more than twelve years--and free and pious will.

At least one year before she is examined and proposed to the Chapter of nuns for admission, she shall have disclosed to the Bishop, the nuns, and their higher Superior her purpose of receiving religious life in that monastery, so that an inquiry of this kind can meanwhile be made maturely.

During that same time she shall confess her sins once each month to the confessor of that monastery, or to the person to whom the Bishop has committed the duty of hearing these girls; she shall receive the most holy Eucharist and speak very frequently with the nuns in the places for conversation, so that she may both be examined more accurately by them and be better admonished concerning everything that she will have to do and endure for the sake of religious life within the monastery enclosure, lest at any time she be able to complain and plead ignorance as an excuse.

Secret ballots shall be cast concerning a girl to be admitted to religious life, and afterward likewise concerning a novice to be admitted to profession, so that the individual nuns, impeded by no affection, may freely satisfy their consciences.

A girl of this kind shall not be received into religious life, nor a novice to profession, unless she has obtained two-thirds of the votes.

The admission of a girl to religious life made otherwise than prescribed shall be invalid and null.

The Superior through whose fault or negligence it was done shall be understood to be removed from the administration of her office or even deprived of it for six months by the fact itself.

The Superior shall immediately inform the higher Superior of the outcome of the votes, so that the name of the woman received may be entered by him in the book instituted for this use.

As soon as any girl has been received by the votes of the Chapter, she shall immediately put aside all luxury in dress and empty ornament. She shall be clothed in black, dark-brown, or white clothing, but not silk, with such modesty and submissiveness that all may understand that she has renounced the world in order to serve God religiously. She shall always use this clothing until she enters the monastery and shall meanwhile abstain from dances and empty spectacles.

A girl received in the manner stated shall not be clothed with the garments of the nuns in the monastery until six months after she has been received, and this with the permission of the Bishop and the higher Superior of the nuns. They shall be free either to lengthen or shorten that period of six months as shall appear expedient to them.

To avoid tumult, she shall be conducted to the monastery in the morning by her closest female relatives, with no pomp and no invitation of others, and shall be introduced alone into the interior Church of the monastery. After hearing Mass, receiving Communion, and employing the other solemn ceremonies, she shall be clothed before the other nuns by the higher Superior or the confessor of the monastery, who shall accompany so grave and sacred an action with an appropriate discourse. The same shall also be observed at profession.

The higher Superior or confessor shall employ this precaution: he shall not impose upon the novice girl the name of Gentile women, but that of holy women celebrated by the Church.

After a girl has received the clothing of the nuns, she shall no longer be able to depart from the enclosure of the monastery, unless perhaps before profession she repents of having entered the monastery. But if she has once departed, no faculty of returning shall thereafter be granted to her.

On account of a novice, before profession, nothing shall be given to the monastery according to the decree of the Council of Trent except what is necessary for her food and clothing during the time she is in the novitiate. We will that the whole of this be paid before the girl enters the monastery.

§ 3, continued.

[Printed page 512]

CONCERNING NOVICES TO BE RECEIVED TO PROFESSION

Since, by the decree of the Council of Trent, a profession made before the completion of the sixteenth year and before the completion of the period of probation after receiving the habit is null and produces no obligation, let the Bishops take care that no novice be admitted to profession before that age and time.

Thirty days beforehand the Superior shall inform the Bishop of the time at which a novice is to make profession, so that either he himself or, if he is absent or impeded, another to whom he has given that task may ascertain the novice's will; may examine whether she is of the condition which the rule of that monastery and order requires, and whether the monastery itself is suitable; and, finally, may demonstrate how grave that matter is and how many things the three vows of religion require, so that before she is received to profession she may understand the force of the bond by which she wishes to bind herself.

If the Superior neglects to do this, she shall by the decree of the same Council of Trent be removed from her office for as long as shall seem good to the Bishop.

The novice shall not be examined within the monastery enclosure, but outside it in the public Church of that monastery, so that she may freely and confidently explain her will.

That which, after profession has been made, is given to the monastery as alms for the support of the professed woman shall, at the time when the girl receives the religious habit, be deposited with a man approved by the nuns and their higher Superior, so that it may be available to the nuns at that time without any impediment.

No renunciation of property shall be made by a novice except, as was commanded by the Council of Trent, with permission granted by the Bishop or his Vicar, within the two months immediately preceding profession.

And since nuns who, after making profession, have received the veil ought to recite the divine office of their religious order every day, no one shall be admitted to profession who does not know how to read competently and learn the office. The person whose duty it is to examine them must test this, and shall order her to read in his presence.

The profession, and the day and year on which it was made, shall be preserved in memory in a book made for that use by the hand of the nun who performs the office of scribe, with the signature of the woman professed, provided that she knows how to write, and of the higher Superior who admitted her.

On the day when a girl makes profession or puts on the monastic habit, banquets shall not be held nor sweetmeats given by her relatives and friends in the guesthouses or buildings of the nuns.

CONCERNING THE DIVINE OFFICES, PRAYERS, AND READING OF THE NUNS

Since it especially pertains to consecrated women continually to praise God, the Creator, Preserver, and Redeemer of the world; to give thanks to Him; and to beseech Him to impart His mercy to all men for salvation, all the nuns shall therefore frequent the choir by day and night and be present at the sacred offices celebrated by themselves distinctly and attentively, both with the voice and with a pious affection of the mind. Only those whose excuse of a just impediment the Superior has accepted are excepted.

Each shall be present at the beginning of the divine offices, clothed in the suitable dress of her order and in her own proper place, and shall remain until the end, not departing before the Superior, or another in her place, has given the signal for departure, unless necessity demands otherwise and the same Superior permits it.

Sounds and songs which are not upright and spiritual, conversations, laughter, and whatever else is unworthy of the house of God and of His divine Majesty, with whom we converse in prayer, shall be altogether removed.

Any nun who acts contrary to these commands shall be sharply punished at the Superior's discretion according to the measure of the fault.

And because the prayer of the mind excels that which is expressed only by the mouth by as much as the soul is more excellent than the body; brings incredible consolation and fruit to the pious; and daily heaps new gifts upon them, converting them in a certain manner to God: therefore, in addition to the canonical hours and the other prayers which they are bound by office to have, all the nuns, affiliated women, and converse sisters shall assemble in choir every day, unless necessarily impeded, and employ mental prayer for at least one hour--namely, half an hour after Matins and likewise after None or Compline. With their minds lifted to God, they shall contemplate pious and salutary matters, and especially meditate diligently upon the life and doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ and His holy mysteries: namely, His Passion, death, Resurrection, Ascension into Heaven, final coming for judgment, the glory of the blessed, the punishments of the damned, and other matters of this kind which pertain to the glory of God and their own salvation and that of their neighbors.

But since the holy Synod of Trent forbids the most holy Body of Christ to be preserved in the choir or the monastery enclosure, rather than in the public Church, let the Superiors bring it about that this decree is obeyed everywhere.

On feast days, so that idleness, from which all evils arise, may be avoided, the nuns shall consume the time remaining to them after the divine offices and customary prayers in sacred and other reading which leads them to a knowledge of God and of themselves and shows the way of perfection and eternal life. They shall do this either separately or together, since reading of this kind is a sweet and fruitful delight of souls, restrains vices, and inflames toward virtues; but, on the contrary, the reading of empty books corrupts minds.

Lest this occur, the higher Superior or confessor shall inspect and review all the books of the monastery, compelling each nun by virtue of obedience to produce her own.

CONCERNING THE PRACTICE OF COMMON LIFE AND THE ABOLITION OF PROPERTY

In all monasteries, as regards food, drink, sleep, and other things, let all live in common, as was decreed by the holy Council of Trent. Let nothing differ among them; let no one be preferred or postponed to another, as the vow of poverty demands, so that "yours" and "mine," and every private possession of things, may be entirely removed in deed and word, as also every superfluous and empty use of things.

Let there be no one who possesses or employs anything as her own, even if it has been granted for a necessity.

Therefore, all the revenues of the monastery, of whatsoever kind they may be, including alms and gains from labors, books also, legacies, and movable and immovable goods which they have received by testament, donation, or any other cause, shall be contributed by the individual nuns for the common utility of the monastery. The Superior, according to her prudence and humanity, shall from these goods make provision especially for the need of the very nun to whom they would have pertained had the vow of poverty not stood in the way.

[Printed page 513]

And so that every occasion of private ownership may be removed from monasteries, confessors and Superiors, for the sake of observing the vow of poverty more exactly, shall endeavor to persuade the nuns to arrange that all linen, woolen, fur, or other garments of any kind be kept in a common place; and that, at the time offices are changed, two of the nuns be placed over shaking out, cleaning, and mending them. These women shall distribute them to the sisters each week according to the season and as use demands, and no one shall keep any garments in her possession except those necessary for daily use. The garments of sick women suspected of contagion shall be kept separately or left with the sick women themselves.

Gifts sent to individual nuns shall be brought to the Superior, and no one shall be able to receive or use one unless the Superior knows and consents. She ought to devote herself entirely to rooting out from the monastery the vice of property ownership as a cause of many evils, nor shall she permit anyone to keep money in her possession.

Three times each year, the Superior, together with the Discreets, shall diligently examine and search the cells and furnishings of the individual nuns, lest anyone possess anything as her own or more than has been granted for her use.

If anyone has been discovered or convicted of retaining private property, she shall for two years be deprived of active and passive voting rights, according to the decree of the Council of Trent, and shall also be punished according to the constitutions of her rule and order; much more shall one be punished who has secretly claimed for herself something from the common property or from that which was assigned for another's use.

If, moreover, a mirror, little dog, ointments, perfumes, or anything of this kind of empty things is found in anyone's possession, the higher Superior shall immediately take care that it is removed from the monastery and that the woman with whom it was found is sharply punished.

No nun, whether a veiled nun or a lay sister, can give as alms, bestow, or sell food, clothes, or goods of any kind, even if they have been assigned for her use, nor can she bequeath them at all. One who acts otherwise shall have her veil taken away for a month and shall be compelled three times to afflict herself with blows as a discipline.

In this matter, however, the Superior shall retain the full power to grant permission to anyone to whom she judges it ought to be granted to bestow something for devotion and religion, or some other small thing, upon relatives and those who have deserved well.

At the sound of the smaller bell, all shall assemble for the blessing of the table, which shall be given by the Superior or Vicaress, or, in their absence, by the senior Discreet.

Then, reclining in their place and order, they shall not depart before thanks have been given to God. One who has not obeyed shall be deprived of side dishes for one day and compelled to sit in the last place at table.

Morning and evening, at the first and second table, some spiritual book which kindles religious devotion shall be read every day, while all who recline listen with silence and attention, so that the soul may be refreshed together with the body.

All the nuns shall, if possible, sleep in one place, very securely locked by the Superior or the Vicaress, whose keys shall be kept by the Superior herself.

Each shall sleep altogether in a separate bed, and also in a separate cell if there is such an abundance of cells that they can contain everyone. But the cells shall be open by day and night so that the Superior may inspect them at every hour. When the signal for going to bed has been given and the sleeping place has been locked, the Superior, her Vicaress, or one of the Discreets shall visit all the cells to observe whether all are sleeping in their own places.

CONCERNING ENCLOSURE AND MATTERS WHICH IN ANY WAY PERTAIN TO MAINTAINING IT

No diligence ought to appear excessive to nuns for guarding that treasure on whose account, renouncing kindred, family property, and all earthly things and cares, they have enclosed themselves within the monastery enclosure.

Therefore, so that their holy purpose may be fortified on that side which lies most open to the devil's snares, let the Bishops take care that two iron grilles or gratings are established at every small window where conversation is held, at least one palm apart from one another.

Between the iron bars of which each grille is constructed there shall be altogether no more than one inch. The bars shall be so solid that they can neither readily be broken nor bent.

To the innermost grille, which the nuns approach for conversation, there shall be affixed an iron plate which cannot be moved and is perforated with small holes for the convenience of hearing only. A black linen cloth, affixed to wooden tablets in the manner of a window which can be opened when conversation is to be held, shall be placed upon it.

In that plate a square little window of only nine inches may be made. Its key shall be kept by the Superior, and it shall not be lawful to open that little window except when conversation is to be held with the Bishop or the Superiors of the order, with the parents or siblings of the nuns, with others joined by a close degree of kinship, when some legal instrument must be drawn up, or when a sacred discourse must be heard.

As regards the concession of this small window, those monasteries are excepted whose nuns, by law or custom, are never accustomed to be seen by persons outside.

The doors of the places assigned solely to conversation, both inside and outside, shall always be locked. Their keys shall be with the most senior of the nuns placed over hearing conversations, and they shall be opened only when there is need of a longer conversation. Otherwise, through the little grilled window of the door, while the door remains closed, the doorkeeper shall answer those who knock; the sister at the turn shall answer from the turn.

But the places assigned to conversation inside and outside shall always lie open while persons are speaking there, so that it can be seen who they are.

Within one month, the doors through which access lies from the monastery enclosure into the exterior Church shall be obstructed by a wall. If anything contrary to this is committed through the fault or negligence of the Superior, she shall be deprived of both her office and her veil at the discretion of the higher Superior.

All windows and gratings, and every place through which the nuns can look into the exterior Church, shall be walled up, except the window in which the turn is placed, the little window established solely for the reception of the most holy Eucharist, and the window through which they may behold the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ elevated by the celebrating priest.

That window shall be perpetually covered with a linen cloth, which shall be removed only when the most holy Eucharist is elevated. The arrangement of the window shall be such that the priest cannot behold the nuns from the altar.

Let the Bishops and other Superiors take care that monasteries cannot be looked into from the neighboring buildings, whoever their occupants may be, and especially if the buildings of brothers of any order or of presbyters overlook them. In that case they shall command that the walls be raised higher and new ones built at the expense of those whose Bishops--

[The sentence continues in source chunk B6-082.]

§ 3, continued.

[Printed page 514]

--and those who are the administrators of the monasteries shall judge to be concerned, every appeal being removed.

For this reason they shall also implore the assistance of secular Princes, so that the nuns, free from the sight and hearing of persons outside, may securely walk through the monastery.

Henceforth Regular men shall not migrate to those places, nor buy plots adjoining monasteries of nuns for the purpose of building, from which a view of the nuns may be obtained. We forbid the nuns hereafter to build monasteries neighboring the buildings of Regular men or places from which they themselves can be seen by them.

Buildings next to monasteries of consecrated women shall not be leased to women of ill repute.

Nor shall spectacles, songs, dances, games, and profane and empty things of this kind be practiced there, which could call them away from sacred duty or furnish them with a cause of offense.

As was sanctioned by the holy Council of Trent, it shall under no circumstances be lawful for a professed nun to depart from the monastery enclosure except for a legitimate cause approved by the Bishop.

But permission to depart of this kind shall by no means be granted unless a most grave matter and supreme necessity demand it; nor shall it be granted to those nuns for whom departure is unlawful except by concession of the Supreme Pontiff. Apostates, fugitives, and those expelled from monasteries on account of an offense, who wander with or without the sacred dress, not without scandal to religious life, shall be compelled by the Bishops and their other Superiors, with the aid also of secular Princes being sought, to return to their monasteries, so that there they may pay fitting penalties for their crimes. But if it appears to the Superiors that they ought by no means to be restored to the monasteries, let them be enrolled, together with the goods which they brought to the monastery, among those women whom they call converse. When those women have died, the goods shall be restored to the former monastery. If any nun has introduced into the monastery enclosure a male or female of any age or condition, even her mother or sisters, she shall be confined in prison for three months; on every Friday while she fasts, nothing but bread and water shall be furnished to her for food and drink; and her veil shall be taken away for a year. Those placed over the turn and the door shall undergo the same penalty, as shall also the Superiors and any others by whose consent it was committed.

But whatever cleric, whether secular or Regular of any order, or layman of whatsoever status, dignity, rank, or condition, has dared to enter the enclosure of the nuns by day or night shall, besides the penalty of excommunication which he incurs by the law itself under the decree of the Council of Trent, also be punished with other most grave penalties, account being taken of the person and crime. If he is an ecclesiastic or possesses benefices, he shall at the will of the Ordinary also be prohibited from the ministry of his orders and deprived of all his benefices. From this decree we except those to whom the Superior, on account of labor and skill necessary to the monastery, has granted in writing a faculty of entering the enclosure, to be renewed every year. But he shall remember that the Council of Trent has taken away from him the right of granting faculties of this kind except in necessary cases. He shall therefore take care that persons outside are not introduced into monastery enclosures to perform duties which the nuns within can discharge. And so that one and the same rule for discerning this necessity may be observed everywhere, and that ready practice of granting permission may be restrained, the Bishop, having called into counsel all the Superiors of monasteries, even Regulars, shall establish and prescribe what works require the necessary entrance of persons outside into monasteries. Whatever rule he prescribes in this matter shall be inviolably observed by all, even Regulars.

Within the enclosure of a monastery, males and females of every kind, even if they serve the nuns themselves or are advanced in age, shall for no reason pass the night. The penalty of excommunication latae sententiae is proposed, which both the person who passes the night and the Superior who permits it shall undergo; other penalties shall be added at the discretion of the higher Superior. Nor shall they keep within the same enclosure oxen, horses, or beasts of burden of any kind.

If the contrary is done, the Superior shall be removed from the duty of her office for three months.

The nuns shall converse with no person outside at all unless that person brings permission written and sealed by the Superior of the monastery or by the person whom he has substituted in his name, and copied without charge in the episcopal chancery. A nun who acts contrary to this shall for three months be deprived of the faculty of speaking with any person outside of either sex, even relatives, and shall be compelled on each Friday during that time publicly to apply scourges to herself under the name of discipline and to pray with the Psalm “Have mercy on me, O God.”

Written permissions shall be received by those placed over the turn and carried to the Superior before the nuns named in the writing are summoned. When the Superior has read the writing and recognized the hand and seal of the person whose office it is to grant permission for conversation, after giving her blessing she shall permit those named in the writing to speak only with the persons expressly described, and this at the common little window for conversation, not at the door, in the Church, or elsewhere, with the nuns appointed to that duty always present as witnesses. Those who approach for conversation shall bring their speaking to an end briefly and shall take care not to consume in empty or useless conversation time, than which nothing is more precious.

It must not be tolerated that nuns, especially on sacred days, wander from prayer and other pious exercises and consume time in conversations which are by no means necessary.

Therefore, on days when the most holy Eucharist is received, whenever feast days of obligation are celebrated by the Church, during Advent and Lent, on vigils of obligation, and finally whenever divine offices are being performed, the nuns shall converse with no person outside at all, unless necessity so demands.

Neither the nuns placed over hearing conversations nor those who will speak shall communicate to anyone at all what they have received from persons outside, lest the monastery be filled with absurd and empty rumors, except to the Superior if it appears expedient to them that some things be reported to her.

Let the Superior and those placed over hearing conversations be vigilant that no one approach to converse with the nuns under the feigned name of the person named in the written permission. If anyone has committed this, he shall be punished by the Bishop; the nun who conversed with him, and those who knowingly permitted it, shall be punished by their Superior with a grave penalty at their discretion according to the prescription of these constitutions.

Whatever cleric, whether secular or Regular of any order, or layman of whatsoever status, dignity, rank, and condition, has approached a monastery of nuns and held a conversation with one of them without obtaining the faculty of speaking as prescribed shall be gravely punished.

By this edict, however, we do not will fathers or brothers to be bound. Without obtaining that faculty of speaking, but with the other rules enacted concerning this very matter observed, they shall be permitted to speak only with their daughters and sisters, but never to enter the enclosure.

[Printed page 515]

No one at all, sacred or profane, male or female, shall be permitted to approach monasteries of nuns for the purpose of teaching the chant which they call figured.

In those monasteries, however, in which the organ is played not by secular persons in the exterior Church but by the nuns inside, the Superior may permit a man approved by the Bishop in morals and age to teach only the nun-organist the art of playing outside at the nuns' little window for conversation, if it is necessary for her to make greater progress in that kind of study.

While learning, she shall remain inside at the small window itself; two of those placed over hearing conversations shall always stand beside her.

Anyone who acts contrary to this, whether the Superior or another, shall be deprived of the veil and afflicted with other penalties at the discretion of the higher Superior.

Henceforth an organ shall not be installed unless the place in which it may fittingly be placed has first been approved by the judgment of the Superior.

The nuns themselves are also forbidden, whether inside or through others outside, to play musical instruments apart from the organ and the harpsichord by which the art of playing the organ is learned.

It shall not be lawful for nuns, for the sake of deposit or safekeeping, to hold in the monastery the money, jewels, garments, or any things of that kind belonging to any person, not even vessels of flowers or plants.

But if they have any at present, they shall return them within three months to those to whom they belong, so that every cause of inconvenience may be removed.

For the contumacious or negligent the penalty shall be deprivation of office for the Superiors and deprivation of the veil for the others.

The nuns shall not use secular male or female clothing even for the sake of relaxing the mind, since it is unbecoming for the handmaids of God to put on garments alien to their profession. But, with decorum always observed and with the Superior's permission, it shall be lawful to relax the mind in a manner upright for every time and action and becoming to virgins consecrated to God.

We also forbid the nuns to make little confections or other things of this kind for the purpose of giving them away, because of the loss of time and the expense bestowed upon them. One who commits or permits anything contrary to the decree shall be punished at the discretion of the higher Superior; but action shall be taken especially against the Superior.

No nun shall be permitted secretly to write letters to anyone except the higher Superior and Bishop, if he must be admonished concerning some grave matter.

Nor shall she open and read letters sent to her unless the Superior has first read them in the presence of the Vicaress or has ordered them to be read in her own presence.

A nun who, contrary to this law, has written or received letters shall not set foot out of her cell for two months, and shall be compelled on every Friday to fast in such a manner that she eats only bread and water. And if those letters contain some suspicion of a crime, the person to whom they were written shall, besides the aforesaid penalty, for six months be deprived both of the faculty of speaking at the nuns' little window for conversation and of her veil.

But so that the Superior cannot be deceived by fabricated letters shown to her which differ from those received and those through which a reply was made, those placed over the turn shall receive all letters which reach the monastery and shall immediately bring them to the Superior. From her they shall also receive letters written by the nuns, closed and sealed in her presence, and afterward hand them to messengers outside.

CONCERNING THE CONVERSE SISTERS

Converse sisters at least forty years of age and approved by the higher Superior shall have the faculty of departing from the monastery enclosure for business necessary to the monastery, yet with the Superior's permission whenever they must depart.

The Superior shall also be free, if it shall so appear, always to retain them within the enclosure; we vehemently exhort her to do this, provided that she can.

They shall not go forth to funerals except those who belong to mendicant orders.

When going out, they shall go forth in pairs, and shall not depart farther from one another than permits them mutually to see and hear each other.

If it should happen that they leave the city, they shall always sleep in the same bed. They shall take care not to enter the house of any person of ill repute, even if that person has deserved well of the monastery.

Nor shall they pass the night in dwellings where no other upright women reside, nor secretly carry letters or instructions.

Nor shall they report to the nuns anything empty which they have seen or heard outside.

For those who offend, the penalty shall be prison, or even a graver penalty, at the discretion of the higher Superior.

CONCERNING SECULAR GIRLS WHO ARE EDUCATED IN MONASTERIES

Secular girls of every birth, condition, and age who now reside within the monastery enclosure for education or another cause shall be compelled to leave the monastery after one year, unless, endowed with all the qualifications required for receiving religious life by the institutes of the monastery and the decrees of the Council of Trent and of these constitutions, they wish to assume monastic clothing. The Bishops are nevertheless permitted the faculty, for a probable cause, of extending the time at their discretion, with the consent of the Regular Superior in those monasteries subject to him.

Hereafter girls shall not be received into monasteries for education without permission granted in writing by the Bishop and by the Regular Superior if the monastery is subject to him, to which the written consent of the Metropolitan shall also first have been added.

This permission shall not be granted to girls who have persons by whom they can suitably be governed and educated, or to those who have not completed their tenth year, or who are older than fifteen years.

Those who once depart from a monastery shall no longer be admitted either into it or into any other, unless they wish to become nuns. Girls of this kind shall use only black, dark-brown, or elsewhere other-colored clothing, not silk. They shall use no added kind of ornament; they shall not be adorned, nor possess earrings, necklaces, or luxuries of that kind.

They shall not converse with relatives or other persons outside unless the same requirements decreed above concerning nuns in this matter are observed.

They shall sleep, take food, and remain in a place separated from the nuns, except for those placed over governing and instructing them; and they shall have no association with any nun except in the Church when Mass or the divine offices are celebrated.

For the food and education of the girls, no less than thirty gold coins shall be paid to the monastery each year, half of which money shall be paid every six months. But if that money has not been paid during those six months, the girl shall be sent back to her family, whom the magistrates shall compel to satisfy the monastery entirely.

Any one of these girls who wishes to become a nun shall be sent to her relatives or those who have care of her, with whom she shall remain for at least one month before she is examined by the Bishop or his ministers, so that her free will can be inquired into and examined more readily and better.

[Printed page 516]

It shall not be lawful for the nuns to teach either letters or any art at all to girls living outside in their own homes, not even at the little windows or other places for conversation. If the Superior of the nuns has permitted this in any manner, she shall be deprived of the office of administration for six months.

CONCERNING PREACHERS, CONFESSORS, VISITORS, AND CHAPLAINS

Those who preside over monasteries shall employ learned, prudent, and pious preachers, who at least twice each month shall preach the word of God at the grilles for the nuns' conversation or the small windows of the Church and instruct them in everything pertaining to the worship of God and the attainment of eternal salvation.

Preachers shall not be permitted to converse separately with the nuns unless permission is granted to them by the Superior of the monastery.

Confessors advanced in age, prudent, and fearing God shall also be placed over the nuns. At least once each month they shall hear the sins of the nuns and administer the most holy Eucharist to them, as the holy Council of Trent judged ought to be done.

No Regular shall be able to hear the sins of the nuns unless he has first been approved by the general Chapter, the General of his order, or, in his absence, by his Vicar General. He shall furnish proof of this to the Bishop of the place where the monastery is situated or to his Vicar. All confessors of nuns, both secular and Regular, shall be changed after two years, or three at most, unless some just or necessary cause shall appear to the Bishop, or to the General of the order if the monastery is subject to Regulars, to demand that their term be extended.

They shall not be able to enter the monastery enclosure unless this has been conceded to them by the Superior for some cause, except in the case of administering the Sacraments to sick nuns when they labor under a grave and dangerous illness.

While they remain within the enclosure, two or three nuns who excel the others in age shall accompany them. The same nuns shall accompany all persons who enter the monastery enclosure, even Superiors and visitors, after the nuns have first been given the signal to withdraw by the sound of the smaller bell. Unless the Superior observes this custom, she shall be removed from office at the discretion of the higher Superior.

Confessors shall not remain for the purpose of taking food in those places of the monasteries called guesthouses except during the time of confessions.

Even then they shall not sleep there at night unless death threatens one of the nuns, so that they can be at hand to administer the Sacraments and perform the remaining offices of piety, or unless they have no dwelling near the monastery, as occurs in many monasteries situated in the diocese.

No secular or Regular confessor shall be permitted to dwell continually in the guesthouses and buildings of the nuns or to live there at their expense. If persons sleep in places adjoining the monastery, there shall be no windows or turn; and if there are, they shall immediately be covered with a wall, so that nothing done or said in that place can be seen or heard by the nuns.

The grille, plate, and linen cloth of the small window of the place where the nuns confess shall adhere together in such a way that they cannot be removed and that from there persons can only be heard and can by no means be seen.

Confessors who offend in these matters shall immediately be deprived of office, and at the discretion of the higher Superior the faculty both of approaching that monastery and of administering divine things to them shall be taken away.

All Regulars and other clerics of every kind shall undergo the same penalty if they take food or sleep in the places for conversation or guesthouses of the nuns, or give gifts to or receive them from any nun who is not joined to them in the second or a closer degree of kinship.

Higher Superiors, however, may at their discretion converse with them and eat and sleep in the guesthouses while they visit the monasteries, provided that houses of the brethren of their order are not there. If there are such houses, they ought to lodge with them and not be burdensome to the nuns.

The same Superiors shall not receive money, gifts, or rewards from the nuns, so that the nuns may understand clearly that in a visitation of this kind they take counsel only for the glory of God and the salvation of the nuns.

But it shall be lawful for those Superiors who are oppressed by want to live at the expense of the nuns when they visit them or approach for another cause which concerns the nuns' utility.

Regulars who are brothers of nuns shall, with the permission of the Superiors as stated above, be permitted once each year to converse with their sisters who are nuns, and with them alone, in the presence of those placed over conversation. But if they bring any persons with them, those persons shall not converse with the nuns at all, under the penalty established above for those who converse without permission.

The companions of Regular confessors shall be advanced in age and approved by their Superior. They shall not be able to converse with any nun except the Superior and the women placed over the turn and guesthouse, if the confessors need anything while they are hearing sins, under danger of the same penalty.

Furthermore, by the decree of the holy Council of Trent, the Superiors shall every year provide a suitable extraordinary confessor for the nuns subject to them, to whom they shall take care that all make confession. Thus those who need a remedy of this kind on account of some hidden malady of the mind, and who themselves would never dare to ask for it or receive it from their customary confessor, may more freely heal their maladies and escape the snares of the devil by confessing their sins to the new confessor together with the others.

Priests who are to perform divine service in the public Churches of the nuns shall be of good repute and good morals, and shall also be approved by the person who presides over the monastery.

Those among them who are hired for payment by the nuns shall be chosen not by them, but by the higher Superior or, at his command, by the confessor of the nuns.

Unless they have been granted permission in writing, they shall not converse with the nuns except with those who preside over the sacristy. With these they shall speak at the Church turn as briefly as possible and only concerning those matters necessary for the sacrifice of the Mass.

When the feast day of the nuns' Church is celebrated, the preparations shall not be magnificent and costly, but pious and modest, and shall exhibit religion rather than some empty show.

Musicians employing figured chant or any musical instrument shall not be admitted to it.

The Superior of the nuns shall admit no one to the service and administration of the monastery whose age and morals have not been approved by their higher Superior.

The same higher Superior shall also approve those who now serve the nuns. In this number shall be understood physicians, barbers, those placed over the oven or bakery, and all others who must enter the nuns' enclosure. Those who administer the monastery's affairs shall every year render an account of their administration to those whom we have mentioned; and within two months they shall provide good sureties to the episcopal chancellors that they will faithfully render an account of their administration. If they neglect to do this, they shall be considered deprived of office.

[Printed page 517]

In parish Churches annexed to monasteries of nuns, perpetual Vicars shall be appointed by the Bishops according to the form prescribed by the Council of Trent.

CONCERNING THE PROPER RULE AND THE CONSTANT READING OF THESE CONSTITUTIONS

Since professed nuns ought to observe not only the precepts of God and Holy Church, but also their own rule and the laws and institutes of their order, it will be worthwhile to renew in their memory as often as possible the duty owed to their vocation and profession.

Therefore, by virtue of holy obedience, we command that in each monastery at least one chapter of the constitutions of the rule or order to which they are bound be read every day by one nun while the other professed nuns listen.

This reading shall begin with the first chapter and proceed thus to the last, and afterward return to the first, so that, with the same order and progression preserved, the practice of this sacred exercise may never be interrupted. We command, moreover, that these constitutions also be read frequently, so that from the frequent recollection of salutary precepts the nuns may become more diligent in discharging their duty. In this matter we admonish the Superior to invite the others to the highest observance of the laws no less by her example than she compels them by her authority.

Finally, all confessors of nuns are commanded once to read and explain all these decrees to all of them. We shall take care that these, translated into the vernacular, are published at the earliest opportunity for the common utility of the province; and the confessors shall vehemently exhort them to observe the decrees altogether as they ought.

It is not our intention that those nuns who live bound by stricter bonds of constitutions and rule should depart from the institutes of life they have undertaken; rather, we command that they observe these decrees also together with them.

I wished to adduce these things from the institution of that most holy and prudent prelate so that Prelates might have a form according to which they may reform monasteries. Since, however, the same things do not suit all places and times, they may omit some and add others according as, with prudent and mature zeal, they judge it fitting for the eternal glory of the divine Majesty, the salvation of souls, and the piety of the people.

CHAPTER XLVIII

Epilogue and Exhortation to the Clergy to Pursue the Perfect Observance of the Gospel's Precepts

§ 1. The calamities of the times now show that my exhortation is indeed superfluous, for they are so grave and frequent that, if anyone has grown hard at their blows, he seems likely to shut out every discourse also. For whom will words move if he remains unmoved by lashes? But if anyone understands that the evils which we suffer occur deservedly, and that disasters are the companions of sins, there is no need of words to make him endeavor to escape them; the destructions themselves have strength enough to strike fear of themselves. Nor is the greatness and dignity of Bishops such that it should be judged unbecoming for them to be admonished by a private man. All who fail in their office must be entreated, admonished, taught, and rebuked, lest they sleep securely amid their evils; those who perform their office must be admonished to continue. No height is beyond a fall; no one is beyond danger. Therefore circumspection must be inculcated in all. From the first See, which is judged by no one, down to the last chaplaincy, which judges no one, there is no security of health; and in all men the assaults of vices display themselves every day like fevers. Indeed, the highest summits of dignities have frequently been besieged by the highest vices; hence come graver falls from on high, made with the crushing of the whole body, and powerful torments for the powerful.

What, then, shall I do? I shall entreat my superiors as fathers and lords, my equals as brothers. Yet all of us are equal when the peril of the soul is at issue, since we all remain ignorant of what evil concerning oneself, and what good concerning others, eternal Wisdom has decreed in the depth of His judgments. Indeed, those who are judged are in less danger, while those who judge are in greater, because they possess more causes of perishing--namely, as many as the souls which can perish through their negligence. Let all, therefore, stand and contemplate their offices and the lives of the martyrs and confessors. They fought and, lest they sin, stood against the force and bitterness of torments. But how shall we be called their sons and successors if admonitions and penalties do not deter us from sin, when neither promises could entice them nor punishments drive them to sin?

Bishops, Priests, Deacons, and others will come to the eternal tribunal of God; we too will come. Their scars and wounds will accuse our wickedness with the greatest power. The Lord will say to them:

> The stronger your confession was in suffering, the more illustrious and greater in honor it is. The battle increased; the glory of the combatants increased. You were not held back from the battle line by fear of torments, but were provoked still more to battle by the torments themselves. Brave and steadfast, you came forth with ready devotion to the combat of the greatest contest. Among you I have already found some crowned, but some near to the crown of victory; and all whom the prison enclosed in a glorious company animated by an equal and similar ardor of virtue for waging the contest, as the soldiers of Christ ought to be in the divine camp, so that flatteries do not deceive, threats do not terrify, and tortures and torments do not overcome the incorrupt firmness of faith, because He who is in us is greater than he who is in this world. Nor can earthly punishment do more to cast down than divine protection can do to raise up.
>
> The matter has been proved by the glorious combat of the brethren, who, having been made leaders for the rest in overcoming torments, furnished an example of virtue and faith, engaging in the battle line until the defeated battle line gave way. With what praises, therefore, shall I proclaim you, most valiant brethren? With what proclamation of the voice shall I adorn the strength of your breast and the perseverance of your faith? You endured the harshest examination until the consummation of glory. You did not yield to the punishments; rather, the punishments yielded to you. The crowns gave an end to pains which the torments did not give. The graver butchery continued for a long time for this purpose: not to cast down the faith which stood, but to send the men of God more swiftly to the Lord.

> The multitude of those present beheld with wonder God's heavenly contest, the spiritual contest, the battle of Christ: His servants stood with a free voice, an incorrupt mind, and divine virtue; naked indeed of secular weapons, but armed with the weapons of believing faith. The tortured stood stronger than the torturers, and their beaten and lacerated limbs conquered the claws which beat and lacerated them. The long-raging and repeated wound could not overcome their unconquerable faith, although, when the frame of their entrails had been ruptured, it was now not limbs but wounds that were tortured in the servants of God. Blood flowed which would extinguish the conflagration of persecution and quench the flames and fires of Gehenna with glorious gore.

[Printed page 518]

What excuse will remain for us if that day which shall behold the requital of all actions sees us defeated and broken by desires, contaminated by vices? Our ancestors will marvel that we are so degenerate, because they will understand that we were prostrated without violence and without an enemy. They will be astonished that the laws enacted by themselves--the divine laws, the laws of the Church sanctioned by their own blood--were burdensome to us. So many thousands of virgins who endured the most exquisite torments lest they violate chastity will regard it as monstrous that chastity and sobriety are burdensome to priests.

The chief point of salvation in the Church is to refer everything to the ancient canons and to imitate the ancients. Saint Charles Borromeo admonishes his Bishops concerning this matter in his discourse to the First Synod of Milan:

> We shall readily restore moral discipline if, in restoring it, we employ the same method and the same deeds by which it was first established and long preserved, following the footsteps of those who, with God as author, acquired for us this greatness of goods by their virtue. I ask, Fathers, that we set before ourselves the sanctity of their lives and their wisdom in the admirable fulfillment of their office. They were upright, chaste, simple, modest, humble, well-mannered, assiduous in prayer and reading, despisers of themselves, and wholly fixed upon the care and thought of another's salvation. They were kind in counsel and work, hospitable, sparing in domestic furnishing and food, beneficent and liberal toward others. They were vigilant over their flocks, cultivating and guarding the Vineyard of the Lord with the greatest diligence and labor.
>
> They continually fed the sheep entrusted to them with the threefold food of salvation--the word, example, and Sacraments. It was also their custom, as imitators of Christ, the Supreme Pastor, who poured out His blood and life for His entire flock, not to hesitate, for the safety of their own sheep, to undertake any labor, encounter every danger, endure every force and injury, and finally, like that good Pastor of the Gospel, to lay down their lives for the sheep. They expected no fruit of this life from it, so that they might obtain the greatest fruits of heavenly recompense.
>
> If, Fathers, we keep these things before our eyes as we ought, we shall readily understand what must be done by us at this time in restoring ecclesiastical discipline. In this matter we must also notice that, just as in forming and establishing the ecclesiastical order Christ the Lord began with the Apostles themselves, whom He willed to be teachers of the Christian life, so we in forming and restoring moral discipline should begin with ourselves, the pastors, who ought to hand down to others examples and precepts of living.
>
> If we perform these duties with the zeal we ought, it will assuredly be a small task to settle the controversies, which the Synod of Trent set before us to be done. For when greed, which is the root and seed of all dissensions, has been removed, we shall readily settle the discords of the present time and leave no place in our province for anyone to dissent hereafter. Therefore, Fathers, let us devote ourselves with our whole breast to this pious and necessary care and diligence of our office. In this acceptable time, on this day of salvation which the Lord has made, let us strive to contribute as much as we can by counsel, labor, and actions, with the Holy Spirit as leader and governor, toward establishing the common safety of the province.

The whole world demands this from priests, for it has not only entrusted souls to them, but has willed them besides to be honored and wealthy. God, the Planter of the Church and Redeemer of souls, demands this, lest through your negligence those for whom Christ died should perish. The heretics demand this, who, offended by the vices of clerics, made a divorce from religion and truth and even now put forward the same cause as a pretext for their perfidy.

ADAM CONTZEN

TEN BOOKS OF POLITICS

BOOK SEVEN

On Civil Magistracy

CONTENTS

Chapter I. The Various Classification of Magistrates 4

Chapter II. The Method of Creating Monarchs 5

Chapter III. The Anointing and Coronation of Monarchs Is Rightly Employed 11

Chapter IV. Great Honors Must Be Shown to Kings 17

Chapter V. Other Honors Customarily Shown to Kings 22

Chapter VI. The Power of Princes Is Great but Various 34

Chapter VII. The Chief Care of the State Must Be to Entrust Dignities and Magistracies to Suitable Men 37

Chapter VIII. The Method of Training Good Men for Government 43

Chapter IX. Magistrates Must Be Inspected 45

Chapter X. Magistrates Should Not Readily Be Changed 49

Chapter XI. Lesser Magistrates Must Be Created Who Can Be Promoted to Greater Dignities, and Inferior Honors Must Not Be Despised by Those Who Have Held Greater Ones 57

Chapter XII. A General Division of Magistrates According to the Practical Mode of the State 60

Chapter XIII. A Suitable Senate Must Be Chosen: Its Laws, and Likewise Concerning Counselors 61

Chapter XIV. The Magistrates Who Are Customarily After the King in a Monarchy 74

Chapter XV. Caesars and Other Magistrates Nearest to Monarchs 80

Chapter XVI. The Constitution of the Royal Court 83

Chapter XVII. A Consideration of Counts 86

Chapter XVIII. A Consideration of the Roman Consulship 91

Chapter XIX. Magistracies Similar to the Consulship 99

Chapter XX. A Consideration of the Dictatorship and Censorship 109

Chapter XXI. The Order and Offices of Provincial Magistrates 118

Chapter XXII. The Established System of Judges in the State 125

Chapter XXIII. The Judgments and Tribunals of Other States 140

Chapter XXIV. The Assistants of Judges 146

Chapter XXV. A Consideration of the Chancellorship 148

Chapter XXVI. The Magistracy and Offices of the Aediles 150

Chapter XXVII. Prefects of the Food Supply Must Be Appointed with Great Care 151

Chapter XXVIII. A Consideration of the Tribunes of the Plebs 153

Chapter XXIX. The Very Great Care Required of Quaestors and Administrators 157

Chapter XXX. Ministers of Magistrates 166

Chapter XXXI. On the Chinese Kingdom 168

Chapter XXXII. A Catalogue of the Magistrates and Offices of the Roman Empire and of Certain Other States 179

Chapter XXXIII. Ambassadors Must Be Chosen from the Most Approved Men 193

Chapter XXXIV. It Belongs to a Prince to Send and Receive Ambassadors 195

Chapter XXXV. An Ambassador Must Not Readily Be Deceived 198

Chapter XXXVI. Security Must Be Furnished to an Ambassador 200

Chapter XXXVII. Instruction Given to Ambassadors 204

CHAPTER I

The Various Classification of Magistrates

§ 1. Magistracy is divided in many ways. First, according to the different kinds of state: thus one kind is monarchical, another aristocratic, another political or democratic; and in each of these a great variety is discerned. Next, according to the very nature of the power: one magistracy is supreme, as a King, a Senate, or the people; another is subordinate, as a Viceroy, a Consul, or a Demarch. Third, according to its proximate end: some are appointed to give counsel and to determine, as are those who are the Counselors of Kings and Princes; others to execute the things which have been decreed, as a Consul, a Praetor, or a Satrap. And this is a distinction taken from the thing itself; for otherwise the power of deliberation and of execution frequently resides in the same person, and it is expedient that it should be so. For prudent men execute counsels more promptly and prudently when they themselves were participants in them or even their authors.

Fourth, the distinction taken from the matter with which, and the persons with whom, the magistracy is concerned is exceedingly varied. Hence one is civil, another military, and each is occupied with a great variety of affairs and business. Hence also there are Urban and Provincial magistrates.

§ 2. Therefore, those who entrust to one man the care of great or many affairs--indeed, sometimes of all affairs--gravely injure the state.

That arrangement has never turned out happily. The Sejani, Plautiani, Rufini, Eutropii, Stilichones, and Ablavii had dreadful ends. Men of the middle age whom excessive responsibility oppressed were likewise overtaken by the indignation of Princes: Belisarius, Narses, and Peter de Vinea of Campania, who under Frederick II was privy to and governor of all his secrets and, after he had been cast down from his dignity and deprived besides of his eyes, was driven into madness and killed himself. Nor did excessive power turn out happily for those at whom our own times have marveled. In nearly one year magnates fell in Germany, France, and Spain.

But if Alfonso prudently detested Princes who were the slaves of their Counselors and conducted everything at another's judgment, how much more shall we detest the man whom the malicious cunning of one person holds in its power? Aristotle speaks excellently in book 4, chapter 15 of the Politics:

> In great states it both can and ought to happen that one magistrate is set over one matter. For it can happen that many men participate in principal offices and commands, because there are many citizens, so that it is permissible to leave some magistracies vacant for a long time and to hold others once. It is then better that the care of each matter and action should fall to a man placed and occupied in one business than to one distracted by many. But in small states it is necessary to unite and concentrate many magistracies in a few men. For because of the small number and scarcity of men, it is not easy for many to be in magistracies.

§ 3. The form and end of the state, and the virtues and vices of those who govern, have already been discussed in the preceding books. The state must now be furnished with magistrates; the offices of the several magistrates must be explained; and certain special precepts must be added. And first, indeed, we shall treat of the supreme magistrate.

It seems to me, not without reason, that the condition of mortals must be lamented: although they alone among animals cannot live without a state and command, they alone nevertheless are malicious and contumacious toward those who command. In all matters we grieve to be overcome, even in those in which it is nobler to be overcome. The desire to excel and command has neither end nor measure, but no one endures subjection to another except through necessity. Man alone can neither govern himself nor endure a governor.

CHAPTER II

The Method of Creating Monarchs

§ 1. The election and inauguration of Monarchs must be conducted with the most celebrated magnificence of preparations and the varied pomp of ceremonies.

For the greatness of the matter demands this, so that, in order that it may be more conspicuous even to all the imprudent, it should be adorned by the addition of outward splendor. Next, the difficulties in a Principate are so great and so continual that no one would undertake it unless he were induced to those enormous labors by these things as though by enticements; for Kings undertake the care of an exceedingly monstrous beast. Plato truly said: if there were a city of good men, περιμάχητον ἂν εἶναι τὸ μὴ ἄρχειν, ὥσπερ νῦν τὸ ἄρχειν; it would come to pass that men would flee from commands as eagerly as they now seek them.

Therefore, biting cares must be made to appear easy, and the most perilous dangers magnificent, lest their weight become apparent.

§ 2. When a Monarch is elected, singular provision must be made for the security and liberty of the electors.

[Printed page 520]

Accurate provision concerning this matter was made in the Roman Empire. For the Golden Bull of Charles IV not only commands that all territories lie open to all who journey to the election, but also binds everyone so that no one may hinder them, and commands that safe conduct be furnished to them:

> We furthermore decree and command all the other Princes holding Fiefs from the Holy Roman Empire, by whatever name they are designated, and likewise all Counts, Barons, Knights, Vassals, Nobles and Commoners, Citizens and communities of all castles, cities, and places of the Holy Empire, that at the same time--namely, when an Election of a King of the Romans to be advanced as Emperor is to be celebrated--they shall, without guile and in the manner aforesaid, escort through their territories, and elsewhere as far as they can, every Prince Elector who asks safe conduct of them or any of them, or his messengers whom he has directed to that Election, as stated above.
>
> But if any presume to act contrary to this our constitution, they shall by that very fact incur the penalties written below. All Princes, Counts, Barons, Knights, Vassals, and all others acting to the contrary shall incur the guilt of perjury and deprivation of all Fiefs which they hold from the Holy Roman Empire and from any others whatsoever, and also of all their possessions held from whomsoever.
>
> All citizens and communities who presume to act against the foregoing shall likewise be perjured and, moreover, shall be entirely deprived of all their rights, liberties, privileges, and favors obtained from the Holy Empire; and they, together with their persons and all their goods, shall fall under the Imperial Ban and proscription. By that very fact we deprive them of right from now as from then; and henceforth it shall be permissible for any person, by his own authority and without judgment or invocation of any magistrate, to attack them with impunity. The person who attacks them shall have to fear no penalty on this account from the Empire or from anyone else, especially since such rash contemners of so great a matter are proved to act faithlessly and perversely as rebels, disobedient men, and perjurers against the state and the status and dignity of the Holy Empire, and also against their own honor and safety.
>
> We furthermore decree and command that the citizens and communities of all cities shall sell, or cause to be sold, provisions at the common price and rate to the aforesaid Princes Electors and to each of them who requests this, and to their messengers, for their necessities or those of their aforesaid messengers and men, both when they approach the aforesaid city for the purpose of celebrating the aforesaid Election and when they depart from it, employing no fraud whatsoever in the foregoing. Otherwise, we will that those acting to the contrary shall by that very fact incur those penalties which we declared above to be promulgated against citizens and communities.

Furthermore, if anyone among the Princes, Counts, Barons, Knights, Vassals, Nobles or Commoners, citizens, or communities of cities presumes to set hostile watches or prepare ambushes for a Prince Elector going to celebrate the Election of the King of the Romans or returning again from it, or to attack or disturb them or any one of them in their own persons, in the persons of their men, or in their property, or their aforesaid messengers or any of them--whether they requested safe conduct or did not judge it necessary to require it--we decree that he, together with all the accomplices of his malice, has by that very fact incurred the aforesaid penalties, so that every person shall incur the penalty or penalties which, according to the foregoing, we judged should be inflicted according to the condition of the persons.

But if any Prince Elector were carrying on enmities with any fellow Elector, and any contention, controversy, or dissension were proceeding between them, notwithstanding these things each shall be bound to escort the other, or the other's messengers to be dispatched to an Election of this kind, in the manner previously provided, under the penalty of perjury and the loss, on that occasion only, of his vote in the Election, as was expressed above.

But if any other Princes, Counts, Barons, Knights, Vassals, Nobles and Commoners, citizens, or communities of cities harbored an adverse disposition toward any Prince Elector or several of them, or any discord, war, or dissension were proceeding among them, nevertheless, with all contradiction and guile ceasing, they shall be obliged to furnish to the Prince Elector or Princes, or to his or their messengers going to an Election of this kind and returning from it, such safe conduct as each will desire to furnish in order to avoid the aforesaid penalties laid by us upon them; and we decree that those who act otherwise have incurred these penalties by that very fact.

And this is the chief point in the election of the Supreme Emperor: that with true liberty the Princes may choose from among many the man who is to preside over all. For it must not be considered an election where fear extorts votes from the unwilling.

§ 3. The Emperor furnishes no less security within the very city appointed for the election:

We enjoin and command the citizens of Frankfurt faithfully and diligently, by virtue of the oath which we decree that they shall swear upon the sacred things concerning this matter, to protect and defend all the Princes Electors collectively, and each of them, from an attack by another if any adversity should arise among them, and also from every person, together with all their men whom they and each of them have brought to the aforesaid city within the aforesaid number of two hundred horses. Otherwise they shall incur the guilt of perjury and, moreover, shall entirely lose all their rights, liberties, privileges, favors, and concessions which they are known to have obtained from the Holy Empire.

They shall also by that very fact fall under the Imperial Ban, together with their persons and all their goods. From then on it shall be permissible for every person, by his own authority and without judgment, to attack with impunity those citizens whom in that event, from now as from then, we deprive of every right, as traitors, faithless men, and rebels against the Empire, so that those who attack them in this way need fear no penalty whatsoever from the Holy Empire or from anyone else.

Furthermore, during all the time in which the often-mentioned Election is discussed and conducted, the aforesaid citizens of Frankfurt shall admit no one into the aforesaid city, nor permit anyone to enter it in any way, whatever dignity, condition, or status he possesses, excepting only the Princes Electors or their aforesaid messengers or Procurators, each of whom must be admitted with two hundred horses, as stated above.

But if, after the entrance of the Princes Electors or in their presence, anyone happens to be found in the aforesaid city, those citizens shall arrange his departure at once, without delay and with effect, under all the penalties promulgated above against them and also by virtue of the oath which the citizens of Frankfurt themselves, by virtue of the present Constitution, shall be obliged to swear upon the sacred things concerning this matter, as was expressed above.

Nearly the same precaution is employed for Cardinals journeying to the assembly for electing a Pontiff and enclosed at Rome in the conclave.

§ 4. The end is that, after setting aside their affections, they may elect a man useful not to themselves but to the state. Thus the electors in the Empire are accustomed to swear, as is set forth in title 2 of the Golden Bull:

> When a Mass of this kind has been completed, all those Ecclesiastical Electors shall reverently place their hands upon their breasts before the Gospel of blessed John--"In the beginning was the Word"--which shall have to be > placed there before them. But the secular Princes Electors shall physically touch that Gospel with their hands. At that time all shall be obliged to stand there unarmed with their whole household. The Archbishop of Mainz shall give them the form of the oath, and he together with them, and they themselves, or the Messengers of those absent together with him, shall swear the oath in the common tongue in this form:
>
> [Printed page 521]
>
>
> I, N., Archbishop of Mainz, Archchancellor of the Holy Empire throughout Germany and Prince Elector, swear upon the holy Gospels of God here physically placed before me that, by the fidelity by which I am bound to God and the Holy Roman Empire, according to all my discretion and understanding, with God's aid, I will elect a temporal head for the Christian people--that is, a King of the Romans to be advanced as Caesar--who shall be suitable for this, insofar as my discretion and judgment direct me and according to the aforesaid fidelity; and I shall give my voice and vote, or the aforesaid Election, without any compact, payment, price, promise, or anything by whatever name such things may be called. So may God and all the Saints help me.

§ 5. Nevertheless, that pomp of ceremonies has not always been observed either in the Roman Empire or in other kingdoms. At times ambition, at times dangers, compelled everything to be conducted suddenly and hastily. Samuel solemnly designated Saul; he anointed David secretly, and after Saul's death David held part of the kingdom. Judah called Rehoboam King, and Israel Jeroboam, with the rites passed over. Jehu was suddenly raised to be King; the soldiers dragged forth the trembling Claudius.

Tiberius immediately usurped the power and falsely refused the name. The soldiers themselves created innumerable Emperors after the authority of the Senate had collapsed. The beginning was made with Claudius; thereafter so many human monsters infested the world.

But care must be taken in the state that the judgment of establishing so great a power should not rest in the votes of the very lowest men, and by no means in the hands of the soldiery; for in truth they seek the man under whom there will be the greatest license and the least justice.

Hence it was also long observed that those elected did not fully reign without the authority of the Senate. Indeed, this was customary even in the time of the Kings: for royal birth did not secure the command for Lucius Tarquinius, the son of Priscus; rather, the guile of his rival overturned it. But as vices increased, nothing remained for the Senate except the servile compliance of adoring and flattering those selected.

Nevertheless, the better each Emperor was, the more highly he valued the authority of the Senate, as did Vespasian, Titus, Trajan, Tacitus, Pertinax, and others. Hence it happened that Emperors chosen by the Senate were frequently hateful to the soldiers.

There is a rare example in Tacitus, concerning whom Vopiscus writes. The army, which had been accustomed hastily to create an Emperor, sent a letter to the Senate asking it to choose a Prince from its own order. But the Senate, knowing that Princes chosen by itself did not please the soldiers, referred the matter to the soldiers. And while this was done repeatedly, the sixth month was completed.

Finally the whole Senate acclaimed: "Tacitus Augustus, may the Gods preserve you! We love you! We make you Prince!" But this was not merely rare; it was altogether unique.

Now that power has been transferred to the leading men, the seven Electors, and the ancient struggles have subsided.

§ 6. Soldiers used to raise Emperors upon a shield or a litter. This was done in the time of Maurice, as Draco relates in book seventeen concerning Germanus. Thus, in the case of Phocas, the soldiers προεστήσαντο, ἐπὶ ἀσπίδος τε εἰς ὕψος ἐξάραντες εὐφήμουν ἐκτόπως τὴν ἀναγόρευσιν. They made him Prince, raising him upon a shield, and proclaimed him after accompanying him with auspicious acclamations. Because Jehu was chosen by God in a council, he was raised upon the cloaks of the Princes.

§ 7. Roman Emperors were conducted into the Palace, according to Capitolinus in his Pertinax. But they had already been elected. Among the Israelites they were placed upon the royal mule and upon the throne, 3 Kings 1:34. Soldiers generally made a raised platform for a throne out of turf, according to Suetonius in his Vitellius. But it was customary for the ruler to be placed upon a shield; the Canninefates also imitated this, according to Tacitus, book 4. Claudian is a witness:

> But when presently the soldier had raised you with the accustomed acclamation, etc.

This, however, was not done when they were elected in the city of Rome or Constantinople. At Rome, rather, thanks were immediately given to the Senate and the army; at Constantinople they were carried into the circus, so that they might greet the people and hear their auspicious prayers.

But now the procession, or solemn court, is instituted by the law of Charles IV, title 24:

> On the day on which a solemn Imperial or Royal Court is to be celebrated, let the Princes Electors, Ecclesiastical and Secular, come at about the first hour to the dwelling place of the Emperor or King; and there the Emperor or King himself shall be clothed with all the Imperial insignia. Having mounted their horses, let all proceed with the Emperor or King to the place prepared for the session, and there let each of them proceed in the order and manner more fully defined above in the law concerning the order of procession of the Princes Electors themselves.
>
> For the Archchancellor in whose Archchancellorship these things are done shall carry upon a silver staff all the Imperial or Royal Seals and Dies. The Secular Princes Electors shall carry the scepter, orb, and sword, according to what is expressed above.
>
> Immediately before the Archbishop of Trier, as he proceeds in his place, there shall also be carried, first, the crown of Aachen, and second, that of Milan; and this only before the Emperor, because he is now adorned with the Imperial insignia. Certain inferior Princes appointed for this purpose by the Emperor at his pleasure shall carry them. The Empress also, or Queen of the Romans, clothed in her august insignia, after the King or Emperor of the Romans, and also after the King of Bohemia, who immediately follows the Emperor, shall proceed at a suitable interval to the place of the session, accompanied by her nobles and attended by her maidens.

Indeed, in title 25 he also pursued the arrangement of the table:

> We establish that whenever the Emperor or King of the Romans celebrates his solemn Courts, in which the Princes Electors ought to serve or exercise their offices, the order written below shall be observed in them.
>
> First, while the Emperor or King himself is seated upon the Royal Seat or Imperial Throne, the Duke of Saxony shall perform his office in this manner. Before the building of the Imperial or Royal session there shall be placed a heap of oats of such a height that it reaches as far as the breast or breast-strap of the horse upon which the Duke himself shall sit. He shall have in his hand a silver staff and a silver measure which together shall make twelve marks of silver in weight; and, sitting upon the horse, he shall first take that same measure full of oats and give it to the first servant who comes. When this > has been done, he shall thrust the staff into the oats and withdraw; and his Deputy Marshal, namely, the man of Pappenheim, shall approach--or, in his absence, the Marshal of the Court--and shall distribute those oats.
>
> [Printed page 522]
>

But when the Emperor or King has entered for the meal, the Ecclesiastical Princes Electors--that is, the Archbishops--standing before the table with the other Prelates, shall bless him according to the order prescribed for them above concerning these matters. When the blessing has been completed, those same Archbishops, all of them if they are present, otherwise two or one, shall receive the Imperial or Royal Seals and Dies from the Chancellor of the Court. The one in whose Archchancellorship that Court happens to be celebrated shall proceed in the middle, with the other two joined to him on either side.

All of them, touching with their hands the staff upon which the Seals and Dies have been hung, shall carry them and reverently place them upon the table before the Emperor or King. But the Emperor or King shall immediately restore them to them; and the one in whose Archchancellorship this occurs, as stated above, shall wear the great seal hung from his neck until the end of the meal, and thereafter until, riding away from the Imperial or Royal Court, he reaches his lodging. The staff mentioned above shall have to be of silver, containing twelve marks of silver in weight; and each one of those Archbishops shall pay one third both of the silver and of its price. The staff itself, together with the Seals and Dies, must immediately be assigned to the Chancellor of the Imperial Court, to be converted to whatever uses he pleases. But after the one whose turn it was to carry the great seal has returned from the Imperial Court to his lodging, as stated above, he shall immediately send that seal back by one of his household to the aforesaid Chancellor of the Imperial Court upon a horse which, according to the propriety of his own dignity and the affection which he bears toward the Chancellor of the Court, he shall be obliged to present to the Chancellor.

Next, the Margrave of Brandenburg, the Archchamberlain, shall approach upon horseback, having in his hands silver basins containing water, of twelve marks of silver in weight, and a handsome towel; and, dismounting from his horse, he shall give water to the Emperor or King of the Romans for the washing of his hands.

The Count Palatine of the Rhine shall likewise enter upon horseback, having in his hands four silver dishes filled with food, each of which shall weigh three marks on the scale; and, dismounting from his horse, he shall carry them and place them upon the table before the Emperor or King.

After these things, the King of Bohemia, the Archcupbearer, shall likewise come upon horseback, carrying in his hands a covered silver cup or goblet weighing twelve marks and filled with wine and water mixed together; and, dismounting from his horse, he shall offer that goblet to the Emperor or King of the Romans to drink.

Moreover, just as we have learned that it has been observed hitherto, so we establish that, when the aforesaid Secular Princes Electors have performed their aforesaid offices, the man of Falkenstein, the Deputy Chamberlain, shall receive for himself the horse and basins of the Margrave of Brandenburg; the Master of the Kitchen of Nordenberg, the horse and dishes of the Count Palatine; the Deputy Cupbearer of Limburg, the horse and goblet of the King of Bohemia; and the Deputy Marshal of Pappenheim, the horse, staff, and aforesaid measure of the Duke of Saxony--provided that they are present at such an Imperial or Royal Court and each of them serves in his office. But if they or any of them determine to absent themselves from the aforesaid Court, then the daily ministers of the Imperial or Royal Court shall act in place of the absent men--that is, each in the place of that absent man with whom he shares a title or office--and, just as he performs the office, so shall he receive the profit in the foregoing matters.

Furthermore, the Imperial or Royal table ought to be prepared in such a way that it is raised in height six feet above the other boards or tables of the hall. On the day of the solemn Court, no one at all shall be seated at it except the Emperor or King of the Romans alone.

But the seat and table of the Empress or Queen shall be prepared at the side in the hall, in such a way that her table is three feet lower than the Imperial or Royal table and the same number of feet higher than the seats of the Princes Electors, who shall have among themselves seats and tables at one and the same height.

Below the Imperial session, tables shall be prepared for the seven Ecclesiastical or Secular Princes Electors: three, namely, on the right; another three on the left; and the seventh directly facing the Emperor or King, as was more clearly defined above in the chapter concerning the Seats and Order of the Princes Electors.

No other person, of whatever dignity or status he may be, shall sit among them or at their tables.

But none of the aforesaid Secular Princes Electors shall be permitted, after he has performed the duty of his office, to take his place at the table prepared for him while any of his fellow Princes Electors still has his office to perform. Rather, when any one or several of them have completed their service, they shall go to the tables prepared for them and wait while standing beside them until the others have completed their aforesaid services; and only then shall all and each together take their places at the tables set for them.

CHAPTER III

The Anointing and Coronation of Monarchs Is Rightly Employed

§ 1. Peter the Pseudo-Martyr, at chapter 19 of book 3 of Kings, is indignant that Christian Kings are anointed:

> But since we are now speaking of anointings of this kind, to which the word of God was peculiarly added, I cannot sufficiently wonder why they were transferred to the Kings and Emperors of the Christians. I know that some say that the matter is political and can therefore be retained. But those who answer this way are deceived and deceive others. For it is held to be a religious ceremony; and for that reason it is performed in a temple, and is performed in a temple by none other than Bishops and Cardinals. It pleases me, indeed, that both Kings and Emperors should be publicly inaugurated by the votes and acclamations of the people, and especially with pious prayers interposed. But I do not think anointing should be recalled from the Jewish ceremonies. Much less do I approve that by which sacrificing priests and Bishops are anointed.

Yet he did not persuade even his own adherents that anointing should be neglected; for the Kings of Britain and others, lest they not be anointed--that is, Christs of the Lord--are anointed with oil when they are inaugurated into their kingdoms.

The error of this shadow-boxing Martyr arises from his supposing the anointing of Kings to be a Jewish ceremony and therefore not to be recalled, lest, of course, we should seem to be Jews. Consideration of Scripture could have freed him from this error. For in Judges 9 we read: מלך עליהם למשח העצים הלכו הלוך (Haloch halechu haghazim. Lemischach ghalehem melech): "Going, the trees went to anoint a King over themselves." Jotham, the son of Gideon, speaks from the common manner of consecrating kings. For why does he say "to anoint," if no Kings were anointed? Why τὸ χρῖσαι, and not τὸ ποιῆσαι, καταστῆσαι--"to make" or "to establish"?

[Printed page 523]

Accordingly, in the time of the Judges, when there was not yet a King in Israel, the Kings of other nations were anointed. Indeed, in verse 9 the olive tree itself answers: "Can I abandon my fatness, ואנשים אלהים יכבדו בי"--by which both gods and men make use of me--or, as some have it, ἣν ἐν ἐμοὶ ἐδόξασεν ὁ θεὸς, καὶ οἱ ἄνθρωποι; "by which in me they honor Gods and men"? Junius and Tremellius interpret this as referring to the fact that oil is employed for sacrifices and for anointing Kings, Priests, and Prophets. Yet they did not correctly translate verse 8, for they rendered it, "They went to create a King over themselves"; by that translation they obscured the antiquity of a most beautiful rite.

It is therefore not a Jewish rite, but a rite of the Eastern Kings, although certain barbarous nations, such as the Persians and Medes, seem to have used other ceremonies. For the Kings of the Persians put on the robe of Cyrus, ate a cake of figs, tasted the terebinth, and drank a cup of sour milk, according to Plutarch in his Artaxerxes. Yet Cyrus is called the Christ of the Lord, and so I think that he was peculiarly anointed, and that this was done by the counsel of Daniel and the Israelites.

Second, he complains that Christian Kings are anointed without a word of God. If he had observed that this was a custom of the nations which the Hebrews imitated, he would no more accuse our Kings than the Eastern ones. For just as the Hebrews borrowed from the nations diadems, thrones, scepters, and other insignia, so too did they borrow the rite of anointing; and Christian Kings borrowed it from both. No sane man can judge that no ceremonies or rites are to be admitted into the state unless there is a special command expressed by God in the sacred writings. Next, the signification of anointing suits not only the kings of the Hebrews and Eastern nations, but also our own, who themselves are and are called Christs of the Lord.

My teacher Nicholas Serarius wrote most learnedly on this matter at chapter 10 of book 1 of Kings:

> Concerning anointing, note first that it is not established whether among other peoples, and before this time, there was any anointing of Kings--unless in Judges 9:8 there seems to be an allusion to anointing which was already customary in those times, though not among the Jews, since they had never yet had a King, but among other nations; as at 3 Kings 19 and St. Jerome on Isaiah 45. Just as among us the diadem and purple are given only to Emperors, so among the Hebrews those about to reign were bathed in ointment. Hence Saul is also called Christ, and Cyrus at Isaiah 45.
>
> Note second: the anointing was performed, first, with oil. Since there were two kinds of oil, sacred oil or ointment and common oil, and only Pontiffs and priests were anointed with the former, Exodus 29, Kings nevertheless could be anointed with either: with the sacred at 3 Kings 1, and with the common at 3 Kings 9. Some, such as Vatablus, think that Saul was anointed with sacred oil, because Samuel had caused it to be brought to himself from the tabernacle, or because he himself, as Pontiff and Prophet, had now consecrated it. Yet the Hebrews cited by him teach that only Kings from Judah and the house of David were anointed with the oil of anointing, but Saul with common oil because he was to be rejected; and Abulensis approves this opinion more strongly in question 1.
>
> That oil was contained in the small vessel which the interpreter here and in book 4, chapter 9, translates as a "lentil," not from anointing, as Abulensis wishes, but from its lentil-like shape, concerning which Pliny speaks in book 37, chapter 12. This is clear from the Greek name here, which is very similar to the Hebrew. It is sometimes called a horn, as below at chapter 16, and a lecythus at book 3, chapter 17. That ointment was poured upon the head of the King, as also upon that of the Pontiff, whereas the lesser priests were only sprinkled with it, Exodus 29. He was anointed sometimes by Prophets, when a King of this kind was still concealed and unknown; ordinarily, however, by the Pontiff, 3 Kings 1 and 2 Paralipomenon 23. It seems that it could sometimes also have been done by inferior priests, if the Pontiff was absent through death or illness, since the latter was also accustomed to be anointed by those inferiors. God was said to anoint through his ministers, as here at verse 1, or the people, as at 2 Kings 2.
>
> No ceremonies, indeed, had been prescribed by divine law, but these were observed by certain human laws and customs. First, the future King was placed upon a seat. Second, he was adorned with a diadem, 2 Paralipomenon 23 and 4 Kings 11. Third, he was anointed. Fourth, the book of the law--that is, Deuteronomy--was put into his hands. Fifth, he swore to observe it. Sixth, sacrifices of every kind were made, 3 Kings 1 and here below at chapter 11, just as in Herodian, book 2. Seventh, various signs of joy and approval were displayed, 3 Kings 1, here at verses 25 and 27. I have spoken of the antiquity of the anointing of Kings at chapter 9 on Judges, question 10. But the Kings of the Persians put on the robe of Cyrus; and, after eating a cake of figs, they also tasted the terebinth and drank a cup of sour milk, according to Plutarch in Artaxerxes.

But there was a twofold reason why Kings were anointed in this way. The first was that, just as there was the highest excellence and dignity of the Pontiff among sacred ministers, so the highest excellence of the King among political princes might be signified, as Abulensis says in question 1. The second was to signify that grace and strength were given to them by God for the defense of religion and the Church, the people, and the inheritance of God, as Augustinus Triumphus explains in On Ecclesiastical Power, question 38, article 2. Chrysostom says in homily 4 on Acts:

> Elisha received grace through a sheepskin cloak; another again through oil, as David did; but Moses is called through the fire of the bush.

The same author says in oration 3 against the Jews:

> Whenever anyone was to be anointed, the spirit of grace flew down and sprang into the ointment.

And in homily 4 on Philippians: "Mercy is καὶ τῆς φιλανθρωπίας σύμβολον, also a symbol of benevolence"; and therefore Priests, Kings, and Prophets were anointed. St. Augustine, as cited by Father Gretser in Anti- page 525, says that Saul, although wicked, possessed the holiness of the sacrament and of anointing, but not that of innocence.

There could also have been a third cause: that they might signify the true King of the whole world, namely, the Messiah or Christ, concerning whose kingdom see St. Thomas, Bellarmine, Suárez, and others. "That stone," says Augustine in chapter 6 of book 2 of On the Trinity, "which Jacob placed at his head, Genesis 28, also received anointing to signify the Lord, who is called the Rock." How much more, then, did those Kings receive it? And if priests signified him by their anointing, why not Kings also? For he is Priest, King, and Prophet. By this anointing Kings were also made sacrosanct and were called Christs or Messiahs, below at chapters 24 and 26; book 2, chapter 1; 1 Paralipomenon 16; Psalm 104.

Note third. Hence the rite of anointing also began to be employed long ago among Christian Emperors and Kings, as is clear from chapter Venerabilem, Extra, title On Election; chapter Cum venisset, Extra, title On Sacred Anointing; Augustinus Triumphus; Aimoin, book 1, chapter 15, and book 5, chapter 49; Hincmar; and Forcatulus, book 6, On the Empire of the Gauls. And God approved the rite of this anointing by, as it were, a twofold miracle. First, by the heavenly gift and preservation of the ampulla which is kept at Reims, as Faye, Senator and President of Paris, writes in his Energumenicus that he himself had inspected it most diligently. Second, by the power which anointed Kings in Gaul possess to cure scrofula, as the same man writes in the same place, and as the Granatensis writes in book 2 of his Catechism, chapter 27; and, among the heretics, Caspar Peucer admits it in On Incantations, folio 156. Those who were present and saw it in the year 1607 affirm it.

[Printed page 524]

Consult Polydore Vergil's English History, book 8, on King Edward, and Peter of Blois, epistle 150, where he calls them scrofulas, because swine are liable to that disease; Pliny, book 11, chapter 17; Celsus, book 5, chapter 38.

On Emperors, see Bellarmine, book 1 of On the Transfer of the Empire, chapter 4, and book 2, chapter 2; Thomas Bozius, book 17, sign 76. "Formerly," says Krantz in book 1 of his Metropolis, "Emperors did not permit Pontiffs to live; now he is not held to be Emperor whom the Roman Pontiff has not confirmed and consecrated. The earth is the Lord's; he transfers kingdoms, and most worthily delegated this sacred mystery to his vicar on earth." See also Castaldus, treatise On the Emperor, question 21 and following; Irenicus, book 2 of Germany, chapter 30. On the coronation of Charlemagne, see Constantine Manasses and Baronius, volume 9, from Thegan. Many things pertaining to this matter are found in the same Baronius, volume 8. Add Onuphrius, On the Assemblies and Insignia of the Ancient Emperors. "At Constantinople," he says, "either under Justinian or after his death, this was added to the election of the Emperor: as soon as he had been declared Emperor, he was anointed with oil by the Patriarch of Constantinople in the great basilica of Byzantium and was crowned with a golden diadem. They called this rite coronation, taking the example from the ancient kings of the Hebrews." And again on anointing, folios 395, 396, and following. See Stevanus, chapter 7, folio 36 verso.

There is therefore no reason why we should reject an ancient and approved rite or render it suspect.

§ 2. There is, I say, no reason why we should begrudge our Kings the symbol when we grant them the reality beyond it. Martyr himself concedes that it is a symbol:

> The anointing of Kings was an external symbol by which was signified the spiritual faculty which, through his favor and kindness, was conferred by God upon a new King. It was a symbol of the power and grace by which he was to exercise his power, and of that which was chiefly sought in a King: victory and peace.

Thus at 2 Kings 1:21: "Because there the shield of the mighty was cast away, the shield of Saul, as though it had not been anointed with oil." It is as if he were saying that he ought not to have been conquered and killed, since he had been anointed with oil. Anointing, therefore, was a symbol that Kings, as men consecrated to God and judging in the place of God, were sacrosanct and inviolable.

Hence David ordered the Amalekite to be killed, 2 Kings 1:14: "Why were you not afraid to put forth your hand to kill the CHRIST OF THE LORD?" And at verse 16: "Your blood be upon your own head; for your mouth has spoken against you, saying: I killed the CHRIST OF THE LORD."

For this reason David is afraid to kill the King who is his enemy, because he is the Christ of the Lord, 1 Kings 24:7 and 11, and 26:9: "For who shall put forth his hand against the Christ of the Lord and be innocent?" and verse 23. Indeed, David even grieved that he had inflicted the least injury upon the Christ of the Lord, 1 Kings 24:5:

> David therefore arose and silently cut off the edge of Saul's cloak. After these things David's heart struck him because he had cut off the edge of Saul's cloak. And he said to his men: May the Lord be gracious to me, lest I do this thing to my lord, the Christ of the Lord, that I should put forth my hand against him, because he is the Christ of the Lord.

Hence arose the custom that suppliants should carry olive branches before them; for to a branch of leafy olive they joined fillets and the words of petitioners, so that they might show that they sought peace and were inviolable. Nations were rarely so barbarous that they violated ambassadors of peace. And if they were unwilling to pardon the suppliants, they nevertheless by no means killed those who carried olive branches, but sent them back into the city with their object unaccomplished, there to undergo the same fortune as their fellow citizens.

For this reason Kings should now be anointed especially, after new heresies have brought forth so many plotters against Kings.

§ 3. The use of anointing was also ancient in the Christian state. Clovis was anointed in Gaul, and from this the King of France possesses preeminence among Christian kingdoms. Charlemagne was anointed by Leo, as the Deacon writes in book 24, and indeed from his head all the way to his feet. Manasses also describes it:

ἔνθεν ἀμειβόμενος δὲ τὸν Κάρολον ὁ Λέων ἀναγορεύει κράτορα τῆς πάλαι πρεσβυτέρας Ῥώμης, ὃς δὲ τὸν στέφει περιτίθησιν νόμοις Ῥωμαίων, οὐ μὴν ἀλλὰ χρησάμενος καὶ νόμοις Ἰουδαίων, ἐκ κεφαλῆς μέχρι ποδῶν ἐλαίῳ τοῦτον χρίει, οὐκ οἶδα τίσι λογισμοῖς, ἢ ποίαις ἐπινοίαις, οὕτω δ' ἡ τῶν δυοῖν σεβασμίων πόλεων ἐρράγη.

Then Leo, repaying the favor, declares Charles Emperor of ancient Rome and surrounds him with a diadem in accordance with Roman laws. Indeed, employing even the laws of the Jews, he anoints him with oil from his head all the way to his feet. For what reasons or according to what thoughts I do not know. Thus for the first time the bond between the cities--namely, Constantinople and Rome--was broken. So says the Greek scoffer.

They are customarily anointed by Bishops, just as the ancient Kings were by Priests or Prophets. Gregoras writes in book 2 that Justinian established that that city should live by its own laws, but on condition that it should not anoint the Kings of the Romans, for this was granted by the laws to another.

Theodore Angelus assumed for himself the name of Emperor, and Gregoras adds: χρίεται βασιλικῶς παρὰ τοῦ τηνικαῦτα τὴν τῆς Βουλγαρίας ἐπισκοπὴν διιθύνοντος. And he is anointed in royal fashion by the man who at that time administered the Bishopric of Bulgaria.

Royal anointing is a distinction of great honor. For that reason, in title 4 of the Golden Bull, the King of Bohemia has the first place of sitting among the Secular Electors after the Emperor, since he is a crowned and anointed Prince. So the Latin text reads; but the German text has: Wann er ein gesalbter vnd gekrönter König ist--"if he is an anointed and crowned King."

Indeed, at Constantinople a man was not regarded as Emperor until after anointing, and he was consecrated in the church. Nicetas says in book 1: Ταινίᾳ αὐτὸν ἐν νεῷ χρίει τῷ αὐτοκρατορικῷ στεφώματι πατριάρχης, ὃς καὶ χρίει ἱερὰ εἰσερχόμενον μέλαθρα. The Patriarch crowns him--Manuel--with the imperial diadem and also anoints him as he enters the sacred edifice.

Inauguration is the public and solemn transmission of a kingdom. See Alexander, Days of Various Knowledge, book 1, chapter 28; Olaus Magnus, History of the Northern Peoples, book 14, chapter 5.

§ 4. The diadem has been customary for all Kings, so much so that even now kingdoms and empires are called crowns. Crowns have been various; but the most ancient were ribbons or white bands. "Accursed band," a Queen said after she had made a noose from it and it broke when she attempted to hang herself, "not even now are you of any use."

Hence Favonius stirred up ill will against Pompey, according to Varro, book 6, chapter 2. For when Pompey had a leg bound with a white bandage, Favonius said that it made no difference on what part of the body he wore the diadem. Lucian calls Alexander διαδεδεμένον ταινίᾳ λευκῇ τὴν κεφαλήν, having his head bound with a white band. Silius calls it a fillet in book 16.

Later purple was added. Curtius in book 6 attributes to Alexander a purple diadem distinguished with white. Among the Constantinopolitans in later centuries it was made of purple alone; Nicetas in his Alexius calls it πορφυρᾶν.

[Printed page 525]

Later gems and gold were added. Hence Cedrenus calls it ταινίαν χρυσοπόρφυρον, a purple-and-gold band. Suger, in the life of Louis the Fat, calls it Phrygian ornament.

Afterward the diadem itself was made of gold, as Claudius did according to Dio, and as Cedrenus relates concerning Theodosius. Constantine added brighter gems. Cedrenus says: Πρῶτος ταινίῳ διαδήματι ἐχρήσατο, καὶ μαργάροις, καὶ λίθοις περιεργότερον--he was the first to use a diadem and adorned it more elaborately with pearls and gems. Now the crowns of all kingdoms are heavy with gold and gems and often contain the revenue of provinces.

§ 5. Sometimes Kings wore only the diadem or band; sometimes a diadem bound around a cap. And this is what Philo writes in his Life of Moses: Eastern Kings use the cidaris as a diadem. The cidaris is a cap, straight, high, and as it were turreted; it had cheek-pieces in front and fillets behind; around its middle ran a white band bright with little stars.

They therefore did not wear the cidaris in place of a diadem, but wore the diadem upon the cidaris. Xenophon states it plainly in book 8 of the Cyropaedia: ὁ Κῦρος εἶχε διάδημα περὶ τῇ τιάρᾳ. Cyrus had a diadem around his tiara. Zonaras, in his Basil, relates that it was commonly called a tupha. Ambition afterward added rays. Statius says in book 7 of the Thebaid:

> May he himself impress high upon your hair the radiant arc.

And Virgil:

> Twice six golden rays encircle his gleaming temples.

Such were those which were called καμηλαύκια. Such was the Macedonian causia bound with a crown.

§ 6. Just as the name of King was hateful to the Romans, so also the diadem was assumed late. Julius, to be sure, refused it; but in ancient times a great part of dignity lay in it.

The King of the Ammonites had a diadem weighing a talent of gold and bearing very precious gems, and it was placed upon the head of David, 2 Kings 12:30. That diadem could not be borne by the King, but had to be placed upon his head in such a way that it was supported by attendants.

§ 7. Let these things have been said concerning a band that is noble rather than happy. Meanwhile pious Kings perceive what one man said--whether it was Seleucus, as Plutarch says in his book On the Delays of Divine Vengeance, or Antigonus, as Stobaeus says in discourse 47, or perhaps both agreed in so manifest a truth.

Seleucus, contemplating the diadem, said: "O band, noble rather than happy! If anyone knew thoroughly how full of cares it is, he would not lift it from the ground even if it lay there silently." And Antigonus said to an old woman who admired royal felicity: "O mother, if you knew in how many evils that little band is wrapped, you would not even take it from a dungheap." The matter of the robe and purple is too well known for it to need treatment; let us therefore gird ourselves for other matters.

CHAPTER IV

Great Honors Must Be Shown to Kings

§ 1. Flattery diminishes honors by increasing them; for it makes moderate honors contemptible and the greatest honors commonplace. It proceeds so far that ingenuity fails it, and it finds nothing new except what is empty and ridiculous. Honors were bestowed upon Kings either by titles alone, or by ceremonies, or by statues and temples.

§ 2. Some titles of Kings and Emperors were lawful, others unlawful. Among shameful and impious titles I reckon the appellations "Divine" and "Divinity" in their ancient sense. For they actually decreed divine honors to men, and Kings wished to be believed Gods. "Should I doubt that I am a God, when I make Gods?" For those whom the Latins called Divi, the Greeks call Gods. Thus Justin Martyr says: καὶ τῶν παρ' ὑμῖν ἀποιχομένων αὐτοκρατόρων εἰκόνας ἐν τούτῳ τῷ σχήματι ἀνατίθετε, καὶ θεοὺς διὰ γραμμάτων ἐπονομάζετε. And you set up images of deceased Emperors in this guise and call them Gods in writing.

Tertullian says in the Apology, chapter 13:

> But it is fitting that you ascribe the honor of divinity to deceased Emperors, since you also assign it to them while living. Your Gods will accept it as credited to them; indeed, they will congratulate themselves that their masters are made their equals. But when you adore Larentina, a public prostitute--I wish it were at least a Lais or Phryne--among the Junos, Cereses, and Dianas; when you inaugurate Simon Magus with a statue and the inscription "Holy God"; when you make into a God some pathic from among the court pages whose identity I do not know: although the ancient Gods were not more noble, they will nevertheless reckon it an insult from you that this was permitted to that man and to others, a thing which antiquity conferred upon them.

They established altars, flamens, and temples so that they might plainly appear to be Gods. Oaths were sworn by them, and at times the common people believed it. Wise men laughed at those fictions; powerful men commanded them in earnest. Seneca mocks them in his Apocolocyntosis:

> Yet if it should be necessary to produce an authority, inquire of the man who saw Drusilla going to heaven. He will likewise say that he saw Claudius making the journey with unequal steps. Whether he wishes it or not, it is necessary for him to see everything that is done in heaven. He is the curator of the Appian Way, by which, as you know, both the Divine Augustus and Tiberius Caesar went to the Gods. If you question him, he will tell it only when alone; before many he will never say a word. For since, after he swore in the Senate that he had seen Drusilla ascending to heaven, no one believed him in return for so good a report concerning what he had seen, he affirmed in a set form of words that he would not disclose it even if he had seen a man killed in the middle of the Forum. Whatever I heard from this man, I report as certainly clear--so may I have him safe and prosperous.

The Arians impiously usurped those titles. Eusebius says in book 4 of the Life of Constantine, chapter 46:

> When all these matters had now been completed and accomplished, and the fame of the greatest Emperor's virtue was flying through every mouth, one of the Priests dared to call him blessed to his face, since in this life he was worthy to possess supreme power over all things, and in the life to come to reign together with the Son of God. But when the Emperor signified that he heard these things with displeasure, he also exhorted the man never again to dare to employ a word of that kind, but rather to strive with God in prayer that in this life and in the future he might be deemed worthy of God's service.

That man was an Arian, and he proclaimed Constantine worthy to reign with the Son of God as though equal to him. Thus the Arian presbyter Colluthus wrote:

> At the petition of Ischyras the presbyter, supplication having been made to the piety of my lords the Augusti and Caesars that a Church might be built for him in the place of peace called Secontaururus, their Divinity decreed that this should be done as soon as possible. Take care, therefore, after the copies of this divine diploma which was placed first, and the records of our holiness, have been read and briefly examined, that the business proceed and that those things divinely established may be brought to effect.

Behold: those who denied divinity to the Son of God, who is God from God, asserted it of Emperors.

§ 3. The expression "our divinity" is frequent in the laws of Justinian, as are "divine enactments," "the oracle of the divine voice," and others; for almost everything pertaining to the Emperors was called divine. Indeed, it was also customary for them to write, "Our eternity has decreed," an expression which Marcellinus mocks in Constantine and which nevertheless the others, and even Justinian, imitated, in the final law of the Code, title On Bishops and Clerics, and in other places.

[Printed page 526]

I consider it very probable that Justinian--a man otherwise well deserving of the state in peace and war and of the Church--could have been deceived by Tribonian into falling into such great errors. For Justinian was wholly illiterate, and for this reason he was even called ἀναλφάβητος, as Suidas relates; Suidas also mentions his error of supposing himself immortal. Hesychius of Miletus likewise attests this when writing on the Philosophers: "Tribonian, flattering the Emperor Justinian, persuaded him that he would not die, but would be received together with his body and migrate into heaven." I am not unaware that he is accused by many. Indeed, I wish him to be excusable; but I fear that eloquence cannot defend the man whom deeds cast down, and whom heresy and persecution disgrace at the end of his life.

§ 4. I think that these titles--"Divine Emperor," "our divinity," "our eternity"--can be given and admitted in such a way that they are not impious as they were among the Gentiles; nevertheless, I do not think them fitting for Christian Monarchs, both because they can easily become impious and because they offend the weak. Nor is it becoming to borrow titles from idolaters. Finally, modesty must be maintained at so great an elevation.

Moreover, care must be taken that we do not attribute Divinity to Emperors and Kings in the Gentile fashion, so that consecration, temples, and sacrifices follow from it. We see that formerly all things were full of Divinities and empty of truth. Many temples were built for Pompey; yet he himself lies on Mount Casius covered by no tomb, so that, by the great judgment of true Divinity, those fictitious divinities might be mocked from heaven. The following saying about Pompey is witty: τῷ ναοῖς βρίθοντι, πόση σπάνις ἔπλετο τύμβου; "For one abounding in temples, how great is the want of dust?"

Christian Kings, therefore, can be called Divi in the manner in which they can be called Gods, because they are the Vicars of God and judge in God's place. The divinity of Kings is participation in divine power, by which, established under true Divinity, they govern the world. Hence laws and the oracles of their voice are divine, because they are pronounced by divine authority; and those who resist them resist the ordinance of God. For what are Kings? What are Aaron and Moses? The eternity of Kings is nothing except the will of uncreated eternity that men obey them. It is an eternal law that magistrates must be obeyed, and by that law the firmness of all laws is made solid.

Although these things are most true, nevertheless, because their beginning comes from a corrupt custom--τῶν ἡρώων, τῶν ἀποθεωθέντων, ἱερωμένων, ἡγεμονευμάτων--I should wish them to be entirely removed, together with the Indigetes, the couches of the Divi, and their temples; nor would I wish modes of speech or flattery to be restored which the Fathers and the wise men of the nations mocked. For perjuries can arise from flattery. Livia purchased perjury from Numerius Atticus, a man of praetorian rank, at the price of one million sesterces, so that he would say that he had seen Augustus ascending into heaven.

No less imprudently mendacious was Pliny in his Panegyric to Trajan when he said:

> Nerva, whom you first honored with tears and soon afterward with temples, you did not imitate those who did the same thing but with another intention. Tiberius dedicated Augustus to heaven, but in order to introduce the crime of injured majesty; Nero dedicated Claudius, but in order to mock him; Titus and Domitian dedicated Vespasian, the former that he might appear the son of a God, the latter that he might appear the brother of one; you, because you so believe.

Yet neither Trajan, as he listened to Pliny, nor Pliny himself believed it, either for himself or for others; and nevertheless those things were said. If Emperors had come from the house of the Caesars for one or two hundred years, the Romans would have believed as much in the divinity of Augustus as in that of Jupiter. They would have believed it, I say; for as it was, they acted as though they believed it. Prudentius says:

> Posterity worshiped Augustus with table, shrine, flamen, and altars; appeased him with calf and lamb; and pleased him by prostration at his couch.

Let truly Great Kings imitate Constantine the Great. He did not admit those divine titles, as Eusebius and Juvencus attest:

> Constantine, indulgent ruler of the open earth, is present; worthy thanks are due to him who deserves them, who alone of Kings shudders that the weight of the sacred name should be placed upon him, so that, worthier through righteous deeds, he may receive eternal life for divine ages.

I conclude with the opinion of Prosper: "An eternity which is temporal is assuredly a name of blasphemy, since mortal men, although Kings, are in it called Divi, and their suppliants say to them: 'To your divine power, to your altars, to your perpetuity.'"

What then? Shall not only Poets but also serious Writers, historians, and even Theologians be condemned who suppose that by such titles they honor their Kings--and very often Princes inferior to Kings--or seek the reward of flattery? Among writers of every kind I find these titles, even among those who scruple to call the Virgin Mary Diva; yet they are not afraid repeatedly to call a royal maiden or a bride Diva. I think that their meaning is true and right, for those who speak thus do not make Gods. But I judge that the words are to be blamed.

Next, I judge it to be the duty of Kings to repress flatteries so foreign to a Christian Prince. If you call a King Divus, you offend many. If you use the word in the ancient manner, you are an idolater; if in the Christian sense, you would speak more correctly by saying God and the Vicar of God, for this is customary. "Divinity," "eternity," and "immortality" are understood in another sense; let Kings take care that they do not prejudice themselves. The man who admitted flatteries, so that he rejoiced for his words to be called those of a God and not of a man, was struck by an Angel and died. I do not believe that he thought himself to be an immortal God; nevertheless, delighted by a false good, he fell into a true evil, an evil to be expiated by death.

§ 5. A similar abuse was discerned in adoration, oaths, and vows.

The adoration of Kings was always exceedingly customary in the East. At 3 Kings 1:24 Nathan the Prophet adores, prostrate upon the ground, and Bathsheba does the same at verse 31. There in the Hebrew we read, אפים בת־שבע ותקד למלך ותשתחו ארץ, "and she bowed herself to the King with her face toward the ground." The Septuagint has καὶ προσεκύνησεν τῷ βασιλεῖ ἐπὶ πρόσωπον ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν. And in the same chapter Adonijah adored Solomon. This adoration was lawful; for neither Nathan the Prophet nor Bathsheba offered divine honors to David, nor would he have accepted them. Nor was the adoration of others in the East of another kind, although it later degenerated into idolatry.

Since external symbols--such as inclination

[Printed page 527]

of the head, moderate bending and lowering of the knees toward the ground, prostration of the face upon the ground, offering of gifts, and a kiss--are signs both of civil and of divine honor, none of these honors can be condemned as excessive unless the mind and intention of the person who honors are known. At present, Princes other than Kings do not admit prolonged genuflection. But the προσκύνησις shown to Kings is nothing other than a civil ἀσπασμός--salutation and submission. Julius, while servitude was still raw, did not admit προσκύνησιν; indeed, it was among the causes of the conspiracy that he had not risen before the Senate.

Caligula, Nero, Domitian, Heliogabalus, and Diocletian exacted adoration as though they were Gods. It afterward came into common use, but with a different intention; for although Constantine and others were adored, they claimed nothing beyond the distinctions of civil honor. In the life of Chrysostom even the Clergy adores the Emperor: Ἰωάννης, καὶ πᾶς ὁ κλῆρος σὺν αὐτῷ προσεκύνησαν τῷ βασιλεῖ, καὶ ὁ βασιλεὺς ὑπέκλινε τὸν αὐχένα τῷ Ἰωάννῃ. John and all the clergy adored the King, and the King inclined his neck to John.

Thereafter this matter was established by law. For Belisarius, when he proceeded to adore Justinian, warned the captive Gelimer to do the same: ὅτι οὕτω νενομίσται προσκυνεῖσθαι τοὺς Ῥωμαίων βασιλεῖς. For it has been established by law that the Kings of the Romans are to be adored in this way. St. Gregory Nazianzen comes nearer to the present manner when he says, τὴν δεξιὰν προσκυνεῖν, "to adore the right hand," which is now in use; and they say τὴν δεξιὰν προσφιλεῖν, "to kiss the right hand."

§ 6. They were also accustomed to swear by the names of the Emperors:

> We set up altars upon which men must swear by your name.

Thus there was also a twofold oath by the name of the Emperor. The first was idolatrous, when the Emperor was employed as a witness of the truth as though he were God or all-knowing. The second was to swear by the Emperor as a creature, while nevertheless testimony was sought from God. For it is lawful to swear by creatures insofar as the divine majesty and truth shine forth in them. Thus even the Jews swore by the temple, Matthew 23:16. So Christians swore by the safety of the Emperors. Tertullian says in the Apology, chapter 33:

> But we also swear, just as we do not swear by the guardian spirits of the Caesars, so we swear by their safety, which is more august than all guardian spirits. Do you not know that guardian spirits are called demons, and from that, by a diminutive word, little demons? In the Emperors we revere the judgment of God, who placed them over the nations. We know that to be in them which God willed. Therefore we also will that what God willed should be safe, and we hold this to be a great oath. But demons--that is, guardian spirits--we are accustomed to adjure, in order to drive them out of men, not to swear by them, so that we should confer upon them the honor of divinity.

This was nevertheless prohibited by the Kings of the Franks, according to the authority of Pammelius, who affirms that the laws of Clovis, Childebert, and Chlothar, which he possesses in manuscript, read thus in chapter 6: "Let no one presume to swear by the life of the King and of his sons."

§ 7. Vows were made to Princes and for Princes. To make vows to Kings as to Divinities was idolatrous. "You too will condemn us by your vows," says the ingenious flatterer. To make vows to God for Princes is Christian. Tertullian says in the Apology, chapter 31:

> We have now flattered the Emperor and lied about the vows which we said we made, namely, in order to escape violence. Plainly this deceit is profitable. For you permit us to prove whatever we defend. You, therefore, who think that we care nothing for the safety of the Caesars, inspect the words of God, our writings, which we ourselves do not suppress and which many chances transfer into the hands of strangers. Know from them that we are commanded, unto a superabundance of kindness, to pray to God even for our enemies and to ask good things for our persecutors. Who are more the enemies and persecutors of Christians than those against whose majesty we are charged with crime? But it is also said expressly and by name: Pray, he says, for Kings and for Princes and powers, that all things may be tranquil. For the Empire is shaken together with you, and when its other members too have been shaken, certainly we also--although we are thought strangers to the disturbances--are found in some place of the fall.

The public making of vows was an act of great honor, for they were made for Princes and for others who had deserved well. When Pompey was ill, all Italy made vows. Tiberius denied that they ought to be made for the safety of his grandsons. By this he indicated that their health was not so much provided for by that public making of vows as their honors were increased.

In another manner vows are undertaken for Christian Princes, when their safety is commended to the Divine Majesty. This beginning, from the precept of Paul, was thereafter handed down by Constantine in a set form of words. Eusebius says in the Life of Constantine:

> He--Constantine--was the instructor of all the soldiers in the prayer that was to be made, commanding them all to say thus in the Roman tongue: You alone we know as God; you we acknowledge as King; you we invoke as helper. Through you we have conquered; through you we have been superior to our enemies. To you we give thanks for the good things which we enjoy; from you we expect the good things to come. We are all your suppliants. We ask you to preserve our Emperor Constantine and his sons, who love God, safe and victorious for many years.

And hence every day in the Church the Princes are mentioned by name in the public prayer.

Excellent Princes, proposed for imitation to all later ages, are surely very far from that flattery. Following the example of Constantine the Great, they published little books of most holy prayers for their own use and that of their people, and understood that all their security in the Principate and happiness in domestic life depended upon God, not upon the force of wealth and the strength of soldiers. And indeed the divine power willed their prosperous successes and most honorable longevity to be a proof to all that those are happy, not who emulate divine honors, but who worship the Divine Majesty from the heart. Let no one at all hear unwillingly--both because Princes and the children of Princes are known for their piety, and lest anyone disparage another’s piety--that which God willingly and gladly adorns with a great reward.

CHAPTER V

Other Honors Customarily Shown to Kings

§ 1. Among the ancients there was moderation in titles, until the appellations of greater men, attributed to lesser men, compelled them to decree new flatteries to those more worthy of honor. Emperors were especially delighted by these titles: that they should be called Pious, Clement, Mild, Tranquil, Best, Serene, Fortunate, Lofty, Greatest, Lords, Triumphant, Augusti, Antonini, Flavii; or that they should be named from conquered nations--Germanicus, Dalmaticus, Parthicus--and this either separately or with the crowning addition of flattery: Germanicus Maximus, and so forth.

[Printed page 528]

Now we address no Prince except in superlatives: Most Clement, Most Invincible, Most Illustrious, Most Serene. This also is not without the example of the ancients. St. Leo writes to the Emperor Leo in these words: Τῷ ὑπερενδόξῳ, καὶ γαληνοτάτῳ υἱῷ Λέοντι αὐγούστῳ. εὐσεβέστατε βασιλεῦ, ὑπερενδοξότατε καὶ ἡμερώτατε. ἡ σὴ ἡμερότης, καὶ εὐλάβεια. "To the most glorious and most serene son Leo Augustus. Most sacred, most glorious, most mild; your mildness and prudence."

They were among the first to claim the title of piety, so that they were called εὐσεβεῖς. Antoninus was the first to be called by the cognomen Pius, although others had been so called before Antoninus. Yet the ancients and the Christians were called Pious for different reasons: the former from superstition or affection toward country and parents, as "pious Aeneas"; our men from zeal for true religion. Later we read in nearly all inscriptions: "Pious, Fortunate, εὐσεβής, εὐτυχής."

All men, even though they were cruel, loved the title of clemency and mildness, provided that they were not wholly barbarous. Mildness and tranquility pertain to the same thing; the latter was peculiar to the Kings of the Goths. Cassiodorus says in book 6: "They are called Most Tranquil because, themselves unmoved, they rule and compose with the countenance of law the greatest tempests of affairs." Marcus the Philosopher and Alexander Severus were especially called the Best.

Serenity, or Humanity, which the Greeks call γαληνότης, belongs to the ornament of mildness and clemency. For the countenance of a Prince ought to be like the sun, so that the spirits of his subjects may be gladdened and may hope. The title ὁ ὄγκος, καὶ ὑψηλότης, or Highness, was somewhat more unusual. But it is now exceedingly customary among Christian Princes, and it was taken from the Apostle, Romans 13:1, where they are called ἐξουσίαι ὑπερέχουσαι, supereminent powers. For this is indicated by the word "Highness."

The proud name "Greatest" has now almost ceased, as has that of "Triumphant"; "Augustus" and "Lord" have endured continually. Titles derived from conquered nations were at first based upon truth, but later upon flattery. Theudebert, King of Francia, judged it intolerable that Justinian the King should call himself in his royal edicts "Francicus, Alemannicus, Gepidicus, Longobardicus," as though he had reduced those nations to servitude, according to Agathias, book 1. Now, in addition to ordinary and common titles, the King of Gaul is called Most Christian, the King of Spain Catholic, and the King of Britain Defender of the Faith.

Most pleasing of all was that they should be called Fathers of the Fatherland--if they were so called by a free fatherland, not an oppressed one. Rome indeed once so named Cicero, but later forcibly brought monsters of Princes to the same degree of honor. It began with Cicero; but Julius, an oppressor of the fatherland, seized so honored a title while Cicero was still alive. Augustus, who betrayed Cicero, the father of the fatherland, to his enemies, appropriated the same name, book 1 of Deeds. But flattery--servitude--did not remain within moderation:

> Long ago, says Naso, you were the father of the world.

Hence in Horace he is "Father of cities," book 3, Ode 4; and Statius says in book 4 of the Silvae: "Hail, great parent of the world."

The ancients also appear to have rejoiced in a not dissimilar honor; hence the Kings of Palestine were called "My Father, the King." For this reason some think that Pharaoh bestowed this title upon Joseph, Genesis 41:42: "And he caused him to ascend upon his second chariot, while the herald proclaimed that all should bend the knee before him." For many interpret אברך in this way, as if "tender father" were said. The Chaldean has דמלכא אבא רבא, "that father of the King," for they say that רך in Arabic signifies a King. But more learned men agree with our interpreter that כרע is placed there and that the bending of the knees is indicated.

Otherwise, that Joseph was called Pharaoh's father is sufficiently indicated by chapter 45, verse 8: "Who made me as a father to Pharaoh." And that appellation was frequent in the East. Thus the servants of Naaman the Syrian say in 4 Kings 5:13: "Father, if the thing were great," and so forth. For it is pleasing to peoples and to a household to exchange the name of Prince and Lord for the appellation of father.

§ 2. An eminent form of worship shown to Kings and Princes lay in the honor of statues. In this matter, indeed, honor afterward attributed to a creature was due to God alone. For although love and civil veneration gave rise to statues, it nevertheless declined into idolatry. Wisdom 14:15 says:

> For a father, grieving with bitter sorrow, made for himself an image of his son who had quickly been taken from him; and him who had then died as a man, he now began to worship as a God, and he established sacred rites and sacrifices among his servants. Then, as time intervened and the wicked custom became established, this error was kept as a law, and images were worshiped at the command of tyrants.

Nor was there another reason why the King placed the statue in the plain of Dura--or, as Josephus says, ἐν τῷ μεγάλῳ τῆς Βαβυλῶνος πεδίῳ, in the great plain of Babylon--than that he himself might be worshiped in his own image. So Jerome says on Daniel 3:1. For this reason so solemn a dedication of the statue is instituted, and for this reason the furnace is kindled: that all might be compelled to adore the new Divinity.

Nebuchadnezzar followed the earlier King of the same name, concerning whom Judith 3:13 says: "For King Nebuchadnezzar had commanded him to destroy all the Gods of the earth, so that he alone might be called God by those nations which could be subjected by the power of Holofernes." Tyrants had learned these things from the more ancient Belus and others whom power raised to an opinion of divinity.

That divine honors were sought in the statue was taught by the constancy of Daniel's companions, who said, "We do not adore the golden statue which you have erected," and by the miracle through which they were protected in the furnace.

Next, because it was a Colossus, it was sixty cubits in height and six cubits in width, by which he wished to show that he was greater than the human condition. For if the cubits were common ones, this statue contained the height of fifteen men. If they were Babylonian cubits, which exceeded the common cubit by three digits, its length was 67½ cubits, and it had the height of nearly seventeen men.

For no other reason did the statues of the Gods exceed human height by almost three times, while those of Heroes were twice as great as ordinary statues. Therefore the vast statue of the King of the Chaldeans raised him above the Gods. Nero placed his own countenance upon the Colossus of Chares, which was 107 feet high; Vespasian removed it and placed the head of the Sun upon it.

Indeed, the adoration of images of Emperors in cities seems to have passed down from the Chaldeans. Philostratus relates in book 1 of the Life of Apollonius that an image of the Emperor was customarily displayed at the gate of Babylon and adored by those entering.

[Printed page 529]

For because the Romans could not travel throughout the Empire, they used to send images to the cities. Thus the images of Constantine the Great were received at Rome; thus at Aquileia were those of Maximus, Balbinus, and Gordian, according to Herodian, book 8.

Yet this honor and superstition existed especially in the camps. For the images of the Caesars were adored among the eagles and standards, according to Suetonius, Caligula, chapter 14.

Soldiers and provincials alike honored the images of Princes with crowns, flowers, and acclamations; according to Tacitus, book 14, they received them with wax candles and incense. They were called λαυράτα, or laurata, and were also affixed to military standards. See Suetonius, Tiberius, chapter 48; Vegetius, book 2, chapter 6; Tacitus, book 4. They also worshiped them at home. Martial says in book 10:

> This portrait of mine, which is worshiped with violets and roses.

There was recourse to them as to an asylum; the overturning, befouling, and insulting of them were referred to the crime of injured majesty.

All these things can be tolerated, and many of them praised, if the adoration of latria is absent; if men do not sacrifice to them with incense and unmixed wine, as Pliny reports was customarily done in his letter to Trajan; if a rayed head is not represented as a symbol of divinity; and if a golden seat is not placed among the Gods.

Amid these things I am pleased to behold and deplore the vanity of human pride, when I ponder within myself at what expense and with what labor so many thousands of statues were erected to Princes, although scarcely any now appear, and those with doubtful countenances. The envy of successors or the most free indignation of peoples has worn most of them away.

§ 3. Now the statues of Princes and magnates in part remain, and in part have been changed into hereditary insignia. Such is now the religious regard given to the statues of Princes that every cult of divinity is absent. For they are placed either in public, profane places or in churches, and in no place do they receive any veneration other than civil.

Following the example of Constantine the Great, statues are set up in this manner. Eusebius says in book 4 that Constantine was depicted standing in the palace at the gates, in images placed in the upper vestibule, with eyes raised to heaven and hands spread in the posture of one praying.

The same Constantine ordered his images to be placed in churches, as Paul the Deacon attests in book 1--namely, in the posture of one praying, which most now imitate, and with laudable piety. For in this way they attest their faith. If Julian endeavored to prove his apostasy by his image, why should orthodox Princes not attest their constancy and true religion in this way? Julian arranged for Jupiter to be depicted in his images as though appearing from heaven and delivering the crown and the purple, the insignia of Empire. In the same panel were Mars and Mercury, looking on and by their gaze approving the Emperor as one preeminent in war and eloquence.

And these things are done publicly. In private, however, images of Princes are customarily given and carried very widely, with coins struck for this purpose--not coins which serve for commerce and contracts, but monuments of a Prince’s friendship.

§ 4. In the place of images there have generally succeeded what they call insignia, or in German arms. For these are impressed upon coinage, are added to all images, and are inscribed as an indication of jurisdiction. Citadels, bridges, tollhouses, and the boundaries of regions are marked with them; and just as formerly, when images were admitted or cast down, it was a sign of men accepting or rejecting governments, so now the same obtains with these insignia.

They derive their first origin from Egyptian hieroglyphics; I prefer to derive them from the Prophets of the Hebrews, among whom their use was frequent. Reuben is water poured out; Judah a lion’s whelp; Issachar a strong ass; Dan a serpent in the way, a horned serpent in the path; Naphtali a hart let loose; God the stone of Israel, Genesis 49. Joseph is like the beauty of a firstborn bull; his horns are the horns of a rhinoceros. Gad rests like a lion; Dan is a lion's whelp, Deuteronomy 33. Later Daniel likens four monarchies to the same number of metals, chapter 3; then the Holy Spirit expresses four kingdoms by four beasts, chapter 7.

Hence, therefore, the Romans had Eagles and Dragons; hence the standards of the legions and the insignia of shields. For Virgil sufficiently shows that shields and bucklers were sculpted when he describes the shield of Aeneas, which Aeneas, ignorant of the events but rejoicing in the image, raised upon his shoulders, and upon it the fame and deeds of his descendants. And in Christian times:

> Christ marked the labarum; he had painted Christ as the insignia of the shields.

And hence came the ambitious insignia of nobility. The power to paint upon shields either the image of the Emperor, or one's own image, or some hieroglyphic by which men displayed their spirit, virtue, or deeds excellently performed in war, was granted by Commanders; otherwise a man served among the common soldiers, > inglorious, with a white shield.

These insignia were also customary among the Carthaginians. Hasdrubal's silver shield with his own image was found, according to Livy, book 25.

They also sealed letters with these insignia, although this was once a matter of choice. For Augustus varied his seal:

> The Divine Augustus, at the beginning, sealed with a Sphinx. He had found two among his mother's rings, alike in a similarity that could not be distinguished. During the civil wars, while he was absent, his friends sealed letters and edicts--which the circumstances of the times required to be issued in his name--with the other, not without the recipients' witty jest that the Sphinx brought riddles. Indeed, even the frog of Maecenas was greatly feared because of the levying of money. Augustus afterward, in order to avoid reproaches about the Sphinx, sealed with an image of Alexander the Great.

Later Princes sealed with an image of Augustus, which he had engraved upon a gem. Thus the manner of sealing changed, as Pliny relates in book 37, chapter 1 of the Natural History. In that matter this also is remarkable: the man of Intercatia, whose father Scipio Aemilianus had killed after a challenge, used as his seal an image of that combat. This gave rise to the well-known jest of Stilo Praeconinus: "What, then, would he have done if Scipio had been killed by his father?" But you, reader, what do you think those men did who earned praise through some conspicuous deed, when we see all their stones filled with the insignia of a centurionate, decurionate, or tribunate; of the reception of a naval or mural crown; of a citizen saved; and of other boasts of military affairs--stones which afterward passed to their heirs together with the gems and rings?

And let these things suffice concerning the insignia of Princes, which formerly were not customary in the manner in which they are now. Yet it is established that the Gods had definite insignia: Jupiter his thunderbolt, Pallas her aegis, Hercules his club, Mercury his caduceus, and others theirs.

[Printed page 530]

And Pliny, our faithful authority on antiquity--even when he relates things scarcely credible--prudently intimates this in book 37, chapter 1:

> After this ring, there is a royal fame belonging to the gem of that Pyrrhus who waged war against the Romans. For it is related that he possessed an agate upon which the nine Muses and Apollo holding a lyre could be seen--not by art, but because the markings of nature spontaneously ran in such a way that their respective insignia were rendered even to each one of the Muses.

The man who believes this may, with my permission, also believe that Apollo was heard singing with the Muses from the same gem, and that by that harmony Augustus was conducted into heaven by the Appian Way. I note only this: each Muse had her own insignia.

Triumphal arches, trophies, pyramids, and honored inscriptions can be joined to these things; many of them are also now in use. Laevinus Torrentius, a Prelate as learned as he was prudent, indeed records that most monuments of wicked Emperors were formerly erased and altered, and that many marbles can be seen at Rome from which the name of Domitian has been erased. Suetonius attests that this was done, chapter 23.

§ 5. Even in ancient times it had been customary for fire to be carried before Kings. That was a Persian rite, which nevertheless I think was taken from the fire of the Hebrews.

When the camp was moved, they carried before it an image of the sun enclosed in crystal and the sacred fire which they called eternal, and this upon silver altars. Nor was such a man lacking to the Greeks in battle: Pollux and Suidas call him the πυρφόρος, the fire-bearer, who carried laurel and crowns. Indeed, before trumpets were invented, λαμπαδοφόροι, torch-bearers, scattered fire and kindled torches, so that in this way they might at the same time kindle the battle.

Why the Persians carried fire before them is not easy to conjecture. Perhaps it was because fire is ἁγνιστικόν, purificatory, and renders all things pure. But it is more probable either that fire was worshiped by the Persians, as it was by the Chaldeans--this is gathered from the deed of Darius, who, as he went round the battle line, prayed to the Sun, Mars, and the sacred and eternal fire--or that the most likely beginning was this: fire might always be at hand for those wishing to sacrifice. That they did not use any fire whatsoever is sufficiently established from their history. Yet that custom flowed from the laws of the Hebrews. At Leviticus 10:1 and 16:1 it was not lawful to offer strange fire; and in 2 Maccabees 1, from verse 18, we read:

> Since we are therefore about to celebrate the purification of the temple on the twenty-fifth day of the month Caslev, we judged it necessary to signify this to you, so that you too may keep the day of the feast of tabernacles and the day of the fire which was given when Nehemiah, after the temple and altar had been built, offered sacrifices.
>
> For when our fathers were being led into Persia, the Priests who were then worshipers of God secretly took fire from the altar and hid it in a valley where there was a deep and dry well; and there they made it secure, so that the place was unknown to all.
>
> But when many years had passed and it pleased God that Nehemiah should be sent by the King of Persia, he sent the descendants of those Priests who had hidden it to seek the fire. As they related to us, they did not find fire but thick water. He ordered them to draw it and bring it to him; and Nehemiah the Priest ordered the sacrifices which had been laid upon the altar, and the wood and the things placed upon it, to be sprinkled with that water. When this had been done and the time arrived at which the sun, which before had been in a cloud, shone forth, a great fire was kindled, so that all marveled.
>
> All the Priests were making prayer while the sacrifice was consumed, Jonathan beginning and the others responding. Nehemiah's prayer had this form: Lord God, creator of all, terrible and strong, just and merciful, who alone are the good King, alone excellent, alone just and omnipotent and eternal; who free Israel from every evil; who chose the fathers and sanctified them: receive the sacrifice for all your people Israel, and guard your portion and sanctify it. Gather our dispersion; free those of us who serve the nations; look upon those who are despised and abominated, that the nations may know that you are our God. Afflict those who oppress us and act against us with pride. Establish your people in your holy place, as Moses said.
>
> The Priests sang hymns until the sacrifice had been consumed. But when the sacrifice had been consumed, Nehemiah ordered the larger stones to be drenched with the remaining water. When this had been done, a flame was kindled from them, but it was consumed by the light which shone forth from the altar. When the matter was made manifest, it was reported to the King of the Persians that water had appeared in the place where the Priests > who had been carried away had hidden the fire, and that with it Nehemiah and those who were with him had purified the sacrifices.

>
> The King, considering the matter and examining it diligently, made a temple for it, so that he might prove what had happened; and when he had proved it, he gave many good things and various gifts to the Priests, taking them with his own hand and distributing them to them. Nehemiah called that place Nephtar, which is interpreted "purification."

This history, known to the Kings of the Persians, could therefore have been a reason why they wished to preserve, carry about, and in some manner honor fire. Our Serarius, most learned in divine and human matters, weighed the matter accurately in his Harmony of the Maccabees, on chapters 1 and 2 of book 2, minor question 14.

First, the King of the Persians diligently examined the matter. Then "he made a temple," says Lyranus--either he made a temple properly so called, as Darius did at Ezra 6, or improperly, namely, he adorned one already made, as Artaxerxes did. But Genebrardus says in his notes that some sacred building, such as the sheep-pool at John 5 and in Bede on 2 Ezra, was then erected.

In the same sense the Greek ἱερόν could be taken adjectivally: he made that place sacred, so that what had previously been a profane well might now contain some veneration and worship of God, as the commentator on the new translation also says. It contributes not a little to this exposition that the King is said to have enclosed and consecrated that place--Greek περιφράξας. Hence in the Latin at verse 34 there appears to have been, not "considering," but "consecrating," "enclosing," or certainly "shutting up."

For otherwise this act of enclosure would be omitted in that text, and the Greek δοκιμάσας would be translated by more words than is fair when "examining the matter diligently" is added. Furthermore, places of this kind, being religious--such as groves, asylums, and the like--admit even the name of temples, which our interpreter uses. Thus Virgil too said in book 8 of the Aeneid: "The craggy rocks, temples of Bacchus."

Third, he treated the Priests well and gave them with his own hand many diverse things which he received from his treasures. But τὰ διάφορα could also be taken as though it were τὰ διαφέροντα, that is, excellent and distinguished things, or better and more excellent things, as at Romans 2 and Hebrews 1:4: "By how much he inherited a name more excellent than theirs."

[Printed page 531]

But did the King do these things because of Persian opinions concerning fire? So great is the goodness of God that, as St. Augustine says, he elicits good even from evils.

Since fire had descended from heaven, as has already been noted above and is recorded in the Scriptures, the Gentiles fabricated stories that fire had sometimes fallen or been kindled among them also by divine power: in Pliny, book 2, chapter 110; Servius on book 12 of the Aeneid; and most of all among the Persians in Ammianus, book 23. They too possessed a sacred and perpetual fire, and many fire-temples and τὰ πυρεῖα, as Cedrenus calls them in his life of Chosroes. God now converted this opinion--or rather this superstition--of the Persian King to good, and caused his true work and benefaction to be praised and honored even by a barbarian.

This custom therefore appears to have flowed from the Hebrews, although we read that others also had a regard for fire; see Rhodiginus, book 15, chapter 15. We likewise read among the Greeks that barbaric honors were rendered to this element by the Medes and Assyrians--not, surely, through religion, but rather through fear of a most destructive thing which consumes everything. Porphyry writes--as I think I have related elsewhere--that fire can suitably be consecrated to the Gods who are within heaven, whether they wander in a certain course or do not wander, whose leader must be regarded as first the Sun and then the Moon, because it is, as it were, a kindred thing. But, to insert something concerning our religion into these labors of ours: throughout all the Churches of the East, when the Gospel is to be read, they light lamps even while the sun is shining--not, certainly, to drive away darkness, but to demonstrate a sign of joy.

Dino, in Clement, says that the Persians possessed no image of their Gods, because they considered fire and water alone to be images of the Gods.

That honor was transferred to the Roman Emperors. Τοῦ λαμπαδαρίου, that of the lamp-bearer, was an ordinary office of the court of Constantinople; for not a brazier, but a lamp or lantern, was carried before them. Codinus says: τοῦ δὲ λαμπαδαρίου κατέχοντος τοῦ μεγάλου δομεστίκου τὸ ἀξίωμα, τὸ θεῖον μύρον μεθ᾽ ἡμμένης λαμπάδος φέροντος--the lamp-bearer bearing the divine ampulla together with a lighted lamp. The Imperial lamp was encircled by two little crowns, and that of the Augusta and Patriarch by one. I think that the earlier Emperors had braziers, and that what Herodian says concerning Pertinax in book 1 is to be understood in this way: "He did not permit fire to be carried before him or any other insignia of Empire to be raised." Commodus granted this to his sister; to his concubine Marcia he gave all the privileges of an Augusta except the fire, according to Herodian, book 1. Now that ceremony has entirely ceased, except that they are sometimes received with torches. That this was customary formerly is clear from Judith 3:10, for they received Holofernes with crowns and lamps. Festive thunderings of cannon have succeeded to their place. But the insignia of Empire are carried before the ruler as prescribed in title 22 of the Golden Bull:

> To declare the order of the Princes Electors in procession in the presence of the Emperor or King of the Romans while he walks--a matter of which we made mention above--we decree that whenever, in the celebration of an Imperial court, the Princes Electors happen to walk in procession with the Emperor or King of the Romans in any acts or solemnities whatsoever, and the Imperial or Royal insignia must be carried, the Duke of Saxony, bearing the Imperial or Royal sword, shall immediately precede the Emperor or King and shall be placed between him and the Archbishop of Trier. The Count Palatine, bearing the Imperial orb on the right side, and the Margrave of Brandenburg, bearing the scepter on the left side of the Duke of Saxony, shall proceed in a straight line. But the King of Bohemia shall immediately follow the Emperor or King himself, with no one intervening.

§ 6. It was also rendered to the honor of Princes that no one should approach or receive them without a gift. But that belonged to the Persians; in the Roman state, and now in the Christian state, the custom has become obsolete. In the same way New Year's gifts were given to Emperors. Gifts were sent to Augustus even in his absence at the Capitol, according to Suetonius, chapter 57; they were brought to Caligula at his seat, according to Dio, book 56. He both issued an edict and stood to receive them, Suetonius, chapter 42. Tiberius acted better: he was accustomed to repay them fourfold, a custom which Princes now commonly imitate.

§ 7. The birthdays of Princes are also publicly celebrated, a custom which has now so ceased that their birthdays are scarcely known. Martial prefers Domitian's birthday to that of Jupiter in his cradle:

> Kindly day of Caesar, more sacred than that light
>
> Which Ida, knowing what she bore, brought forth Dictaean Jove.

There is something similar in Plato's Alcibiades. But after the firstborn who succeeds to the kingdom is born, at first all who are under the kingdom celebrate that day; and thereafter all Asia annually observes the King's birthday with sacred rites and festivities. But when someone is born among us, not even his neighbors, as the comic poet says, perceive it.

Yet formerly that honor was severely commanded. When the consuls forgot to issue an edict concerning Caligula's birthday, he abolished their magistracy, and the state was without supreme power for three days. Thus, in 2 Maccabees 6, the Jews were led by bitter necessity to sacrifices on the King's birthday. Not only the birthday, but also the day on which the Principate began was celebrated. Pliny says to Trajan:

> Lord, we celebrated with the great joy which you deserve the day on which you preserved the Empire by undertaking it, and prayed to the Gods that they would preserve you safe and flourishing for the human race, whose > guardianship and security were entrusted to your safety. We led the way, while our fellow soldiers rendered the oath in solemn form and the provincials strove to show the same devotion by swearing.

And Suetonius says in Vespasian, chapter 6: "Tiberius Alexander, Prefect of Egypt, was the first to bind the legions to the oath in Vespasian's words, on the Kalends of July; this was afterward observed as the day of his Principate."

Or a day was celebrated on which he had affected the peoples with some great benefit. Thus Augustus, in Dio, book 54: "Because of his return and because of those things which he had accomplished while absent, many and various honors were decreed to him. Of these he accepted nothing except that he permitted an altar to be consecrated to Fortuna Redux, and the day of his return to be enrolled among the festivals and called the Augustalia."

Indeed, peoples devised new birthdays in favor of Princes. Suetonius says in Augustus, chapter 59: "Certain cities of Italy made the day on which he first came to them the beginning of the year." These were indications either of true love or of feigned flattery. That affection of the peoples toward Augustus was already present when he was an old man:

> Whether the people wish you safe more, or you the people,
>
> May Jupiter, who watches over both you and the city, preserve in doubt.

You may recognize the praises of Augustus.

Christians marked their prelates with the same ceremony, for they held as a festival the day on which they had been elected to the episcopate. Thus on the fifteenth day before the Kalends of February the Roman Chair is celebrated, and on the eighth day before the Kalends of March the Antiochene Chair.

[Printed page 532]

Concerning this custom the most learned Baronius writes in the Martyrology at the fifteenth day before the Kalends of February:

> As regards the present solemnity, there flourished in the Church a praiseworthy ancient usage: the anniversary was kept on which someone had been appointed Bishop over a particular see. Almost innumerable examples teach that this was observed both in the Western Church and also in the Eastern. St. Paulinus writes about the custom of the Roman Church in epistle 16 to Severus; and sermons of St. Leo the Pope delivered on that day remain. For Bishops from all parts of Italy were then accustomed to assemble at Rome to celebrate the birthday of the Roman Pontiff, as the epistle of Pope Hilary to Ascanius and the other Bishops of the province of Tarragona beautifully demonstrates, when these words are read in it: "When your letters were therefore read in the assembly of the brethren whom the festival of my birthday had gathered," and so forth. The synodical records recited above indicate who these men were and from which cities of Italy they had assembled at Rome. Receive also examples concerning the usage of other Churches, such as what St. Ambrose writes concerning Felix, Bishop of Como, in book 8, epistle 60 of the Roman edition; likewise what St. Augustine has concerning the birthday of Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage, in sermon 32 On the Words of the Lord, at the end, and concerning the anniversary day of his own ordination in homilies 24 and 25. The menologies of the Greeks sufficiently admonish us concerning the custom of the Eastern Church, for in them the birthday of the see of St. Basil, St. John Chrysostom, and others is observed. By the same usage and reasoning the Roman Church was accustomed solemnly to observe the day on which the Roman Chair was born, because, I say, by divine counsel St. Peter first began to sit at Rome when the see which he had held at Antioch for seven years was transferred there. Moreover, this solemnity is so much more celebrated than that on which he sat at Antioch, because the latter was movable, or established only for a time and as though in passing; but at Rome God established and confirmed that same see to remain forever for Peter's successors. As Irenaeus relates in book 3, chapter 3, the same Apostle, together with Paul, consecrated it even by his blood, after it had been fortified by doctrine, enriched with traditions, illustrated by merits, and increased by gifts.

§ 8. It was customary to receive Princes with joyful acclamations and applause. This has now almost ceased, except when at a coronation men acclaim, "May the King live!" Formerly that applause was especially sought; but after it was rendered more lavishly to every most wicked tyrant, it fell into contempt and disuse.

First, they recounted their praises. They acclaimed Pertinax: "To the pious father, the father of the Senate, the father of all good men! Under the Emperor Pertinax we feared no one; we lived secure!" They repeated this until their voices failed, according to the Deacon, book 8. There were also these words: "O happy you! O happy we!" Pliny to Trajan. Second, they prayed and made vows: "May Jupiter add years to you from our years," in Tertullian; "May you conquer, Justin," they sing in Corippus. Third, this applause was performed by modulation of the voice, clapping of the hands, their casting about, and the movement of garments. The voice was modulated either simply or with instruments added. The common people resounded in fixed modes and with composed applause, according to Tacitus, book 16. Cassiodorus says in book 1 of the Variae: "Voices sweeter than an organ; not shouts, but tones." Pliny calls it harmony. Nero, delighted by the praises of the Alexandrians, caused young equestrians and five thousand men from the common people to be trained to learn that method of applauding. They called the forms bombs, roof tiles, and potsherds, from a certain resemblance of sound. Aurelian gave oraria to the people for acclamation.

But what were oraria? Lipsius wishes them to have been resonant coverings by which modulated acclamations were produced; Casaubon, straps and bands which were tossed about in applause. Nor can the matter be sufficiently gathered from Eustathius, who says on book 4 of the Iliad: μίτραι, he says, οἱ ἐκ φασκίων καὶ ὡραρίων στέφανοι--"mitres are crowns made from oraria and bands." If, therefore, it is established what the parts of mitres are, it will also be established what oraria are. But a mitre or cidaris was various in form; and therefore whatever was in the mitre besides the bands is called an orarium by Eustathius--namely, those parts which were bound together by the bands. Accordingly, since the cidaris was tower-shaped and was also called a τιάρα, according to Pollux, book 8, chapter 13, a tiara also was of this sort. Suger says concerning Louis the Fat: "Surrounding his head, they place upon it the Phrygian Imperial ornament, shaped like a helmet and fashioned with a golden circlet." But Isidore calls the Phrygian ornament a mitre. An orarium, therefore, was some such thing that a mitre might be made out of several oraria, if we believe Eustathius; and thus it served to strengthen the sound and booming, not merely for tossing, since it was small and would not be very conspicuous when tossed. Therefore they produced a smacking sound with an orarium, just as they now do with sheets or other things. Vopiscus wished to say this concerning Aurelian. But if Aurelian's orarium was not unlike the ecclesiastical orarium, and either that profane one was named from the sacred or the sacred one from the profane, it must be said that there was some analogy between them.

The ecclesiastical orarium is treated in canon 28 of the Fourth Council of Toledo, celebrated in the time of Pope Honorius I:

> If a Bishop, Priest, or Deacon who has been unjustly cast down from his rank is found innocent in a second Synod, he cannot be what he was unless he receives back before the altar, from the hand of the Bishop, the things belonging to the rank which he lost: if a Bishop, the orarium, ring, and staff; if a Priest, the orarium and chasuble; if a Deacon, the orarium and alb; if a Subdeacon, the paten and chalice. In this way the other ranks also receive that restoration of themselves which they received when they were ordained.

This orarium was a kind of garment, for in book 6 of Burchard it is called an "orarial stole," chapter Presbyter. This is because canon 40 of the Fourth Council of Toledo says:

> It is not lawful even for a Bishop or Priest to use two oraria, much less for a Deacon, who is their minister. A Levite must therefore wear one orarium upon the left shoulder because he prays, that is, preaches; but he must have the right side free, so that he may move about unimpeded in the priestly ministry. Therefore henceforth let the Levite take care not to use a double orarium, but only one, and one that is pure and adorned with no colors or gold.

It was therefore a garment which impeded the minister, and it appears to have been granted to Bishops that they might adorn it with gold or colors. Third, the manner of wearing it is handed down in chapter 9 of the Council of Braga: "Let the Subdeacon and Deacon have an orarium; but let the Deacon have the orarium concealed beneath his tunic, while the Subdeacon shall use the orarium laid over his shoulder." Bede, in his collection, chapter On the Seven Orders, says: "An orarium properly belongs to prayers, a garment suited to its office." Therefore, just as those applauding an earthly King were furnished with oraria for acclamation and applause, so those who proclaimed the praises of the eternal Emperor and the law of the King of Kings used oraria.

They also applauded with their hands, or gave a κρότον. And now, as the state perished through its own vices, they moved their hands in circuses and theaters rather than in fields and vineyards, as Varro complained. They also applauded artfully, as Aristaenetus says in book 1, epistle 10: ἡ δεξιὰ τοῖς δακτύλοις ὑπεσταλμένοις ὑποκειμένην τὴν ἀριστερὰν ἔπληττεν εἰς τὸ κοῖλον, ἵν᾽ ὥσπερ αἱ χεῖρες εὔφωνοι συμβάλλοιεν τρόπον κυμβάλων. With the fingers contracted, they struck the left hand placed beneath with the right in its hollow, so that the hands, when struck together, might sound well after the manner of cymbals. They also demonstrated their favor by tossing their hands and garments:

[Printed page 533]

> And everywhere to give signs with tossed togas.

Public records teach that they were accustomed to value greatly that applause, or the breezes of popular favor; for they sent the Emperor not only the acclamations themselves, but also their number and their words. Nor was that testimony of the public will to be neglected, since there is a firm bond of friendship between people and Prince: namely, that the Prince should benefit the people, while the people should pour themselves forth in praises of the Prince.

Hence, according to the manner and custom of those times, the people applauded Bishops in the Church with great fervor, showing their agreement in sacred doctrine and their desire for a purer life. A splendid example is found in the proceedings by which Augustine designated Eradius as his successor, epistle 110. I shall append the whole passage so that the ancient custom may be understood:

> Therefore, says Augustine, lest anyone complain about me, I present to the knowledge of all of you my will, which I believe to be the will of God: I desire the Priest Eradius to be my successor.
>
> The people acclaimed: "Thanks be to God; praises to Christ!" This was said twenty-three times. "Hear us, O Christ; life to Augustine!" This was said sixteen times. "You our father; you our Bishop!" This was said eight times.
>
> When silence had been restored, Bishop Augustine said: There is no need for me to say anything in his praise; I favor his wisdom and spare his modesty. It is enough that you know him. I say that I desire what I know you desire; and if I had not known it before, I would have proved it today. This, therefore, I desire; this I now ask from the Lord our God with fervent prayers even in my cold old age. I exhort, admonish, and ask you to pray for this with me: that God may confirm what he has wrought in us, when all minds have been joined and fused together in the peace of Christ. May he who sent him to me preserve him--preserve him unharmed, preserve him without blame--so that he who causes joy while I live may fill my place when I die. As you see, what we say and what you say are received by the notaries of the Church; both my speech and your acclamations do not fall to the ground. To speak more openly, we are now making ecclesiastical records. I wish this matter, insofar as it pertains to men, to be confirmed in this way.
>
> The people acclaimed thirty-six times: "Thanks be to God; praises to Christ!" "Hear us, O Christ; life to Augustine!" was said thirteen times. "You our father; you our Bishop!" was said eight times. "He is worthy and just!" was said twenty times. "Well-deserving, well-worthy!" was said five times.
>
> When silence had been restored, Bishop Augustine said: I wish, as I was saying, my will and your will, insofar as it pertains to men, to be confirmed in the ecclesiastical records. But as regards the hidden will of the Omnipotent, let us all pray, as I said, that God may confirm what he has wrought in us.

The people acclaimed: “We give thanks for your judgment!” This was said sixteen times. “Let it be; let it be!” was said twelve times. “You our father; Eradius our Bishop!” was said six times.

When silence had been restored, Bishop Augustine said: I know that you too know, but I do not wish what was done concerning me to be done concerning him. Many of you know what was done; only those do not know who had not yet been born at that time or were not yet of an age to know. While my father and Bishop Valerius of blessed memory, now an old man, was still present in the body, I was ordained Bishop and sat with him. I did not know that this had been prohibited by the Council of Nicaea; nor did he know it. Therefore, what was censured in me I do not wish to be censured in my son.

The people acclaimed: “Thanks be to God; praises to Christ!” This was said thirteen times.

When silence had been restored, Bishop Augustine said: He shall be a Priest as he is; when God wills, he shall become Bishop. But now, with the mercy of Christ assisting, I am plainly going to do what I have not yet done. You know what I wished to do some years ago and did not permit. It pleased me and you, on account of the care of the Scriptures which my brothers and fathers, my fellow Bishops, at the two Councils of Numidia and Carthage deigned to impose upon me, that for five days no one should trouble me. The proceedings were drawn up; it pleased you; you acclaimed it. Your decree and acclamation are being recited. For a short time it was observed toward me; afterward it was violently broken through, and I am not permitted to be free for what I desire. Before noon and after noon I am held by the occupations of men. I beseech and bind you through Christ to permit me to pour the burdens of my occupations upon this young man, this Priest Eradius, whom today in the name of Christ I designate as Bishop and my successor.

The people acclaimed: “We give thanks for your judgment!” This was said twenty-six times.

When silence had been restored, Bishop Augustine said: I give thanks to your charity and goodwill before the Lord our God--indeed, I give thanks to God for it. Therefore, brothers, whatever used to be brought to me shall be brought to him. Wherever he needs counsel, I shall not deny my assistance. Far be it from me to withdraw myself. Nevertheless, whatever used to be brought to me shall be brought to him. But let him consult me if perhaps he does not find what he ought to do, or let him seek as helper the man whom he knows as father, so that nothing may be lacking to you and I at last, if God grants me however little space of this life, may not give over my life, however little remains, to idleness or donate it to inactivity, but may exercise it in the Holy Scriptures so far as he permits and grants. This will benefit both him and, through him, you also. Therefore let no one begrudge my leisure, because my leisure contains great business. I see that concerning this matter, for which I invited you, I have done with you everything that I ought. I ask this finally: let those of you who can deign to subscribe these proceedings. Here I need your response; let me retain your response. Acclaim something concerning this assent.

The people acclaimed: “Let it be; let it be!” This was said twenty-five times. “It is worthy; it is just!” was said twenty-eight times. “Let it be; let it be!” was said fourteen times. “Long since worthy, long since deserving!” was said twenty-five times. “We give thanks for your judgment!” was said thirteen times. “Hear us, O Christ; preserve Eradius!” was said eighteen times.

When silence had been restored, Bishop Augustine said: It is well. Let us now be able to perform the things of God concerning his sacrifice. At the hour of our supplication I especially commend to your charity that you set aside all your causes and business and pour forth prayer to the Lord for this Church, for me, and for the Priest Eradius.

Indeed, even preachers are attended with applause, for eagerness is necessary to a speaker. Hence arose the madness of Paul of Samosata, concerning which the Bishops write in Eusebius, book 7 of the History, chapter 24. There is no need to relate in speech the tricks which he employed in ecclesiastical councils, cleverly devising them by pursuing shadows of false glory, hunting after various forms of folly, and thereby leading the minds of the more ignorant into admiration of himself; nor in what manner he prepared a lofty seat and throne for himself, kept it private and separate--not as befits a disciple of Christ, but as Princes of the world are accustomed to do--and called it by his own name; nor how, while sitting upon it, he struck his thigh with his hand and sometimes beat upon it with his heels; nor how he gravely rebuked and received with insulting words those who, when they heard him preaching, did not extol him with praises, did not turn themselves about in circles with agitations to applaud him, as is customary in theaters, and did not acclaim him discordantly and rejoice as though at the beat of an oar, after the manner of the gladiators and little women whom he kept about himself, but listened modestly and moderately, as is proper in the house of God; nor how, when openly preaching amid a crowd of men, he raged wantonly and immoderately against the interpreters of the word of God who had departed this life; nor how, not as a Bishop but as a sophist and impostor, he vaunted magnificent words concerning himself.

[Printed page 534]

From these things theatrical gestures and manners may also be noted.

§ 9. Imperial majesty, and before it royal majesty, was especially recognized on journeys. Various honors were exhibited. Sacrifices were offered; the roads were filled with fragrances; candles were lit; flowers, crowns, gates, private houses, and temples were adorned; public banquets were celebrated; cloaks were spread out; all men came to meet them, escorted them, carried them, praised them, and sang with instruments arranged along the road--so that Princes then at last recognized themselves to be Princes when they traversed their kingdoms. Examples are found in Curtius, book 5; Dio on Severus; Livy, book 32; Pliny's Panegyric to Trajan; Appian, book 8 of the Gallic War; Suetonius, Nero, chapter 30; Theodoret, book 5, chapter 34; Socrates, book 6, final chapter; Claudian, On the Sixth Consulship of Honorius, and book 3; Sozomen, book 8; Paul, book 30; and Herodian, books 4 and 8.

I think that this was done by the ancestors with the highest prudence--indeed, plainly by divine counsel. For since it is of the greatest importance to the state that a Prince should not reside in one place, but should exhibit the benefits of his presence to all the peoples by whom he is supported and honored, they endeavored by every enticement to incite him to journeys.

Another honor consists in titles taken from kingdoms which they do not possess. For magnates retain titles, not to soothe their minds with empty delight, but to await an opportunity to obtain those kingdoms.

CHAPTER VI

The Power of Princes Is Great but Various

§ 1. It is established that the power of Princes over their subjects has been various. I have approved as best the power tempered from monarchy, democracy, and aristocracy. This must especially be provided for: when the form of the state is changed, the power of customary magistrates should be changed slowly and in parts, but their names most slowly of all, until, when the matter itself has declined, they vanish of their own accord.

This was done with the greatest deliberation in the Roman Empire. At first tyranny raged under the name of Dictator when Sulla was savage; afterward the dictatorship was given to Caesar, but perpetually. Third, under the name of the Triumvirate for settling the state, proscription removed the foremost of the leading men. And although the Emperors could do everything, they secured their power by the titles of lesser magistrates. Hence they were declared Chief Pontiffs and Consuls; and, what rendered them safest of all, they renewed annually the title of tribunician power. For by that power they were held sacrosanct and retained the favor of the people, since that magistracy had been established for the sake of the people against the injuries of the more powerful citizens.

§ 2. The power of all Christian Kings is constituted not after the manner of Gentile Kings but of Hebrew Kings. For just as the authority of the High Priest and of the supreme council, the Sanhedrin, was inviolable and was not oppressed by royal power, so too a Christian King must command in such a way that he nevertheless hears and venerates the prelates of religion. Then let him weigh within himself how great a thing it is to reign fortified by the friendship and favor of the supreme presiding authority in religion. For when this bond of concord is neglected, everything is violently disturbed. Histories teach us how great a cause of evil was the importunity of the Emperors who claimed everything for themselves in the conflicts between the Henrys and the Pontiffs, and afterward the Fredericks and other Pontiffs. For since the Empire was transferred by pontifical authority from the Greeks to the Franks and then from the Franks to the Germans, it follows that the Pontiffs have some part in its government. To speak of the present condition, Nicholas Bellus, in discourse 1 On the Pontiffs, relates that the Electors were established not only by Imperial but also by pontifical authority.

From this assertion of pontifical authority over Kings, it follows that the Pontiff can much more involve himself in affairs of the Empire, since they belong to pontifical law and are immediately subject to the Apostolic See. This is proved because Gregory V established the number of Electors to whom he granted the power of electing Caesars. Although authentic copies of the Golden Bull which he issued for this purpose cannot be produced, nevertheless, after I undertook great labor to ascertain the clear truth of this matter, many letters patent together with copies of them came into my hands. In these many ancient Electors expressly acknowledged that they attributed their authority to the Supreme Pontiffs, as may be seen in the treasury in Castel Sant'Angelo and in the three books entitled Privileges of the Emperors, and likewise in the Vatican Library, where there are copies taken from those preserved in Castel Sant'Angelo. From these it is clearly evident that the authority and institution of the Electors depend upon the Holy Roman Church.

To prove this more fully, I bring forward the fact that on different occasions Electors were deprived by different Pontiffs of the privilege of electing, as John XXII formerly did. Leo X likewise deprived the Duke of Saxony; but Clement VII maintained and asserted that the election of Charles V was valid even without the vote of that Duke, as may be seen in a certain book bound in red leather entitled Capitulations of Princes, which is preserved in the pontifical repository. In the registers of Leo X and Clement VII in the Archive of the Apostolic Camera, this authority appears more clearly: as soon as a King of the Romans or Emperor is elected, the Electors seek confirmation from the Pontiff; and quite often, when the Pope did not grant his consent, they proceeded to a new election, as may be observed if careful attention is given to the said books.

I would not wish conflicts to arise between the Christian kingdom and the royal priesthood, conflicts which have often been quieted by the disasters of peoples. I give this political and prudent warning: for the sake both of piety and of the state, an Emperor ought courteously to observe the authority of the Pontiff. Let the remaining evidence be seen and the histories consulted. The same writer says that Charles V, when challenged to single combat by Francis, King of the Gauls, answered that he was a son and defender of the Holy Apostolic See, that he was bound to it by an oath, and that he could determine nothing concerning himself.

Charles spoke truly and rightly. The destinies of so many peoples ought not to have been weighed upon one sword, and the death of either King would have given rise to greater evils. But that most wise Prince showed how close the bond between Emperor and Priest is. If the safety of the supreme Prince is so closely joined with the advantage of the Church, so too will be that of other

[Printed page 535]

Kings and states. For the several kingdoms--Britain, Denmark, Poland, Aragon, Hungary, and Naples--have their own treaties. Nor can even the most powerful Kings despise the common father to whom assistance is brought by many sons.

§ 3. In the more cultivated kingdoms, the power of rulers depends in great part upon the council of the fatherland, or the estates of the fatherland. It has great utility against more unjust Princes, but also many disadvantages, since it brings delay to useful or necessary matters. By its authority it moderates the disposition of the Prince and ensures that, if anything happens to him, the fatherland is not without government.

The greatest disadvantages arise if the estates are not in agreement. All of us in Germany complain about this matter, and yet we always act in such a way that there is occasion for complaints. In Germany there are three orders which assemble at the great council or public diet: first the Electors; then the other Princes and Counts; third the free cities. Hence everything is completed slowly, and now, after much time, almost nothing is accomplished. The causes are delay in assembling, the absence of some, the restricted power of the delegates, debate concerning the matter to be proposed, and manifold disagreements. The chief disagreements now concern religion, but many cover their desires with a pretext of piety. In reality there are rivalries among the Princes, and between the Princes and the rest of the nobility, which is oppressed by some, although otherwise they wish to be subject to the Emperor alone as companions and ministers of his court. Greater is the rivalry between the free cities and neighboring Princes. The aims and endeavors of the cities tend toward preserving their liberty; some Princes strive to render them subject to themselves.

The happiness of these cities is situated in peace; when war arises, they are in great danger, because most defend their liberty not by force but by laws, and when laws fall silent amid civil arms, liberty stands beneath the blow. This appeared in the civil war waged against Charles V, in which the cities made the greatest expenditures, obtained an inglorious partnership in the war, and, once defeated, were most grievously fined. They would have been in a worse condition if they had conquered; for during the war they had offended the Princes by obeying less promptly, and even if there had been no offense, the rewards of victory would nevertheless have fallen to the Princes alone as the more powerful. Once this had occurred, the cities would have lacked the protection of the Empire and their neighbors would have pressed upon them more severely. Thus, even as victors, they would have retained their liberty only through the favor of the Princes. These, therefore, are the causes why the Empire moves so slowly: in the same body the same things are never advantageous when it has departed from harmony and a legitimate tempering of the humors.

§ 4. Gaul also has its estates: the Ecclesiastics, the nobles, and the common people. There are two councils, a secret one and a public one. Formerly the public Council was convoked from the three estates. In that Council there was supreme authority and so high a reputation for integrity that many foreigners also referred their controversies to it. The gravest matters--or, as they call them, affairs of state--were treated there: whether a King was to be created or abdicated; whether war was to be waged, peace made, laws enacted, principal prefectures conferred, crimes of Princes examined, or a dowry assigned to royal children. Indeed, the accounting of expenditures and taxes was also treated in that council; and this is what they call the General Court or Parliament.

At that time, therefore, the power of the Kings of France was very greatly curtailed. But their successors diminished the authority of the council--they attribute this to Hugh Capet--by erecting a college of peers who would judge concerning the fortunes of Princes and other matters. Parliaments were later added, but now for a long time they have referred the affairs of the kingdom to the Privy Council. Hence deliberations are more expeditious. Estates of this kind also exist in Gaul, Spain, England, Scotland, and other kingdoms; any Prince can easily regulate his power according to their constitution.

§ 5. The Senate formerly represented the estate of the fatherland--not as one ruling in a free state, but as one sharing in councils and public honors under moderate Emperors. Probus had it in this condition, according to Vopiscus, for he granted appeal from all men to the Senate and other things which had already fallen into disuse. It was done again under Honorius. Claudian says concerning Stilicho:

> When the Senate judged wars in the ancient order,
>
> Stilicho restored the custom neglected now for so many ages:
>
> the Fathers would entrust battles to commanders,
>
> and by decree of the toga the fortunate watchword
>
> would go forth to the legions.

Stilicho did this, but not to honor the Conscript Fathers; rather, he wished to diminish the authority of the Emperor and by this popularity to prepare a path to tyranny for himself and his son Eucherius. Tiberius, when with the greatest dissimulation he had most eagerly accepted the imperial office, long refused its name; sought protection from the Senate; said that the soldiers belonged to the state, not to him; wished to be called Prince of the Senate; and desired colleagues. But these were cruel mockeries by which he explored the sentiments of the nobles. He held magistrates in honor, just as if the state were still standing, and rose before the Consuls; and whenever he gave them a dinner, he went to the doors to meet them as they entered and accompanied them as they departed.

CHAPTER VII

The Chief Care of the State Must Be to Entrust Dignities and Magistracies to Suitable Men

§ 1. I speak of the lesser magistrates, who are appointed either by the King, by the Senate in an aristocracy, or by the people in a polity. For wherever suitable and good men are placed in command, the safety of the state stands firm. Let this remain a certain, fixed, and noble maxim of rulers: a state in which the Prince is bad is better than one in which the friends of the Prince and the magistrates who administer the state in part are bad. For one good man does not easily restrain many bad men; but if a bad Prince has good administrators, he lacks instruments of wickedness. This alone is difficult: that under a bad Prince the administrators should be good and long-lasting.

§ 2. It is a natural and supreme obligation of a Prince to place good Governors over the province, to protect the Prefects, and to keep them in their duty; and, to say it in one phrase, to see that his administrators and magistrates remain in their duty. The Emperors themselves recognized this, and some of them exercised particular care in selection. The Emperor Alexander never granted provincial governorships as a benefice, but by judgment. That obligation arises from the right of the state and of every private person. For just as, if the Prince establishes a physician and surgeon at the expense of the city, he is bound by the laws of justice not to send among the citizens--like living and effective plagues--men such as Demostratus, Marcus, Simon, Menophanes, Capito, Phaedo, Socles, Agelaus, Alexes, Agidas, Zopyrus, Charinus, Gennadius, Rhodon, and Callignotus, who boast like the man in Agathias, Epigrams, book 2, εἰς ἰατρόν:

[Printed page 536]

> Καὶ γὰρ ἐγὼ πολλὰς ψυχὰς Ἄϊδι προϊάπτω.
>
> For I too send many souls down to Hades.

Rather, he must send skilled, industrious, and faithful men--not men whom the textually uncertain οἱ σοφοτηγοί > βάλλουσι μίτραις, ἄνθεσι, καὶ στεφάνοις--

>
> sprinkle with mitres, flowers, and crowns.

Thus by no right can Princes set plunderers and unjust men over peoples. For unless they themselves take precautions, they are compelled to answer for the fault of their Governors.

§ 3. At Rome, even amid the highest ambition and a venal electoral field, some account was nevertheless taken of candidates. Before the assemblies it was necessary to declare their names before a magistrate; if their names were not accepted by him, they could not be elected by the people. For by public judgment those to whom the government of the state was to be entrusted had been judged unworthy. But avarice and ambition broke through all these things. When Cato perceived the conspiracies of the leading men, he cried out that it was an unworthy thing for command to be consigned to the procuring of marriages and for men, through women, mutually to advance one another to provinces, commands, and armies.

§ 4. The greatest virtue of a Prince, therefore, is to know his own men--and not merely to know but also to govern them, which cannot be done without knowledge. It was prudently established in the Roman Empire that a summary of the Empire should be ready at hand, containing all taxes, expenditures, provinces, fleets, armies, magistrates, and their salaries.

The ancients called it the Register of the Empire; Augustus was accustomed to display it publicly. They also called it the laterculus. Cedrenus says: ἦν δὲ πάνδημος πίναξ, καὶ τὰ τῶν στρατιωτῶν ὀνόματα ἀπεγράφοντο. It was a public register in which the names of Senators and of the army were written. Tacitus, book 1 of the Annals, says that Augustus composed a booklet in which the public resources were contained: how many citizens and allies were under arms, how many kingdoms, fleets, provinces, taxes and revenues, needs and largesses--all of which Augustus had written out with his own hand. In later times these matters were handled much more diligently, as is clear from title 17, book 1 of the Code, To the Praetorian Prefect of Africa:

> We believe that this too must be ordained by the present sanction: that judges should not appear to sustain great expenses for the completion of charters or warrants, whether in our register or in the archives of the Praetorian Prefect throughout Africa. For if they themselves are not injured by expenses, they will have no necessity to burden the taxpayers of our Africa. We therefore order that the civil as well as military judges of the African diocese shall pay no more than six solidi in our register for the customary fees of the warrants and charters of their promotion; but in the archive of the Prefects they shall be compelled to pay no more than twelve solidi. If anyone exceeds this measure, the judge himself shall be liable to the expense of thirty pounds of gold, while his staff shall sustain not only a like expense but also the danger of capital punishment. For if anyone from any quarter dares to exceed our commands and does not hasten to observe them with the fear of God, he shall sustain not only danger to dignity or property, but shall also be subject to the ultimate punishment.

The Princes of all, therefore, had a description of their Prefects. Then those records were deposited in the sacred archive. On the Notitia, see also book 5, On Various Advocates.

Since the ancient records have perished, but Justinian's African laterculus survives in the place cited, anyone may read it there.

§ 5. In great Empires, just as nothing is more pleasant or fruitful than common peace and security--for they do not fear more powerful neighbors--so the license of inferior magistrates is most grievous, because in so great a mass of business injuries easily lie concealed. This arises either because access is not given to the accuser or because remote matters are neglected. Therefore the state will take this especially to heart: just as on the frontier of the Empire and near the enemy it stations the bravest and most faithful commanders, so in the most distant places it must station the most equitable Governors and Judges. For distance itself, just as it takes from subjects the hope of assistance, gives rulers confidence of impunity. Who at Rome dared to do what the Romans did in Gaul and Asia? Indeed, it occurred very often that Governors were so intent upon ruin that they compelled the wretched to rebel, and in this way had no need to stand trial, since they had already judged them enemies upon whom their injuries had imposed the necessity of rebellion.

Cyrus restored liberty to the nation of the Jews and issued an edict in this form, 1 Ezra 1:2:

> The Lord God of heaven has given me all the kingdoms of the earth, and he has commanded me to build him a house in Jerusalem, which is in Judah. Who among you is from all his people? May his God be with him. Let him go up to Jerusalem, which is in Judah, and build the house of the Lord God of Israel; he is the God who is in Jerusalem. And let all the rest, in every place wherever they dwell, assist him from their own place with silver and gold, substance and cattle, besides what they voluntarily offer to the temple of God which is in Jerusalem.

If this had had to be done at Babylon, a magnificent temple would have stood within a year. But now, what could the command of an absent King do against the hatreds of neighbors? First Ezra 3:3 says: "They placed the altar of God upon its bases, while the peoples of the surrounding lands terrified them; and they offered upon it a holocaust to the Lord morning and evening."

They had been ordered to assist in building the temple, but they terrified them so that they could not even erect an altar. Nor do they merely obstruct; under the pretense of assistance they also endeavor to profane it. First Ezra 4:1 says: "Let us build with you, because we seek your God just as you do. Behold, we have sacrificed victims from the days of Esarhaddon, King of Assyria, who brought us here."

When they could accomplish nothing by force, they acted by calumnies. In the same chapter, verse 4: “They hired counselors against them, that they might destroy their counsel throughout all the days of Cyrus, King of the Persians.”

They acted much more perfidiously against Nehemiah, not fearing the fact that he was dear to the King, had been sent with power by the King and Queen, and that commanders of the army and horsemen had been sent with him, 2 Ezra 9 and 10. What, then, did the King’s Governors do? First, “They were grieved with a great affliction.” Second, “Sanballat was exceedingly angry,” chapter 4:1. Third, greatly disturbed, he mocked the Jews. And at verse 8: “Sanballat, Tobiah, the Arabs, the Ammonites, and the Ashdodites all gathered together to come and fight against Jerusalem and devise ambushes.” And at verse 11: “Our enemies said:

[Printed page 537]

> Let them neither know nor understand until we come into their midst, kill them, and cause the work to cease.”

Behold, against the express command of the King, the King’s subjects devise such things against his subjects and against a legate sent from the King’s table who was soon to return to the King. Therefore the most diligent provision must be made for distant regions.

Nor did the Governors of the Indies furnish few examples for the Spains. To say nothing of the wars of the Portuguese and Castilians: without the cruelty, avarice, ambition, and mutual slaughters of the Governors, the Castilian Crown would hold all the West Indies. Examples need not be sought farther away. Many men, and not without reason, judge that no Empire in Europe is more rightly constituted than the French; yet when the French held the kingdom in Sicily, petty tyrants, by their injuries, compelled that nation to revolt, because their Governors had withdrawn as far from equity as from their fatherland.

A further proof of this matter is what Nicholas Bellus relates in his discourse on the Kingdom of Naples. First, he testifies that military affairs were administered negligently and perfidiously, and that the triremes were old and useless:

> For, he says, it is enough for the royal ministers to display some outward appearance which may be magnified in the Royal Court. By ostentatiously displaying diligence in this way, they satisfy the King to some degree and hold the whole world in extraordinary expectation of great achievements. This contributes wonderfully to the swift acquisition of riches, with which they soon purchase some jurisdiction in the kingdom, accumulate revenues, and amass costly furniture.

He recounts that these things were done in the year 1579. And a little afterward:

> For the most part the Neapolitan triremes remain at the harbor mole without pay, without soldiers, and often without half their complement of rowers. These rowers are very frequently hired out by the captains to merchants, nobles, and others to unload ships and perform other domestic work. Thus in a time of necessity--as in the preceding year, when eight pirate triremes captured two Sicilian vessels near the island of Capri--five triremes were equipped throughout an entire day to pursue the Turks, since both oars were lacking and soldiers were wanted. It must therefore be doubted whether from so great an expense, which the King bears for these triremes, even the smallest advantage is gathered; all the more because those same triremes are badly furnished with engines of war and lack experienced sailors. The rowers, moreover, are either Turkish slaves or condemned men: the former row under compulsion and with danger to those who employ them, while the latter are inexperienced and insufficiently suited to endure the hardships of the sea.

What the boldness produced by the King’s absence accomplishes is found in the same discourse:

> When an ordinary gift had recently been made to the Royal Majesty, and the nobles and the whole kingdom wished to send it through certain men of their own, the Viceroy wished to send it through his own man. He did this lest, if others were sent, the Viceroy’s misdeeds should be reported to the King and his court; and therefore he compelled them to hand the gift over to him.

This is surely an injury greater than the injuries and insults themselves: violently to wrest from the nobles of the whole kingdom, when sending gifts to the King, the power of sending their own legates. What must private men suffer if such crimes are committed publicly--so openly that the accounts fly throughout the whole world, while the Kings alone, whose danger is involved, remain ignorant? But such was the practice at that time; and that age too had its own Verres.

§ 6. In appointing magistrates, therefore, the lot is altogether to be condemned. For if, when about to sail the sea, you do not choose a ship and a shipmaster by lot, but seek an experienced master and a strong ship, how can it belong to a well-constituted state to cast the safety of all citizens into the hazard of lots? The Athenians, a bold and impetuous people, chose τὴν γερουσίαν τῶν πεντακοσίων, the Senate of Five Hundred, by lot; and through this they possessed a state constituted in the worst manner. Xenophon, in Περὶ Ἀθηναίων πολιτείας, On the Polity of the Athenians, rightly judged:

> Περὶ δὲ τῆς Ἀθηναίων πολιτείας, ὅτι μὲν εἵλοντο τοῦτον τὸν τρόπον τῆς πολιτείας, οὐκ ἐπαινῶ διὰ τόδε, ὅτι ταῦθ᾽ ἑλόμενοι, εἵλοντο τοῖς πονηροῖς ἄμεινον πράττειν ἢ τοῖς χρηστοῖς· διὰ μὲν οὖν τοῦτο οὐκ ἐπαινῶ.
>
> As regards the state of the Athenians, I do not praise the fact that they followed that form of government, because by following it they brought it about that the wicked were in a better condition than the upright. In this respect, therefore, I do not praise it.

They act altogether badly, but popularly, for they consider bad men useful to themselves. Hence they both choose by lot and, when designating a magistrate by votes, are more favorable toward the worst and unjust toward the good. All the decrees and deeds of that people were barbarous. Thus Xenophon judges:

> Διὰ ταῦτα οὖν τοὺς μὲν χρηστοὺς ἀτιμοῦσι, καὶ χρήματα ἀφαιροῦνται, καὶ ἐξελαύνουσι, καὶ ἀποκτείνουσι, τοὺς δὲ πονηροὺς αὔξουσι.
>
> Therefore they dishonor the good, punish them by loss of money, exile, and death, but increase the bad.

Hence they exercised their Empire for a short time and turbulently.

§ 7. Nevertheless, a matter can be entrusted to the lot if some greater power divinely directs it. Thus, after Saul had already been chosen and anointed King by Samuel, they selected him by lot, 1 Kings 10:20. For God did not wish Samuel to be suspected, as though he had designated Saul by his own judgment or affection. Then the people sought a King from Samuel as a Prophet. Although they sinned by demanding a King, they nevertheless acted rightly in this respect: they established a King not through tumult and the ambition of the tribes, but sought him from a Prophet, that is, from God himself. Thus they speak at 1 Kings 8:5: “Establish a King for us, that he may judge us.” The use of the lot, therefore, was not lawful unless it was established that it would be directed by God. There were hidden disputes among the twelve tribes, and that assembly would not have been concluded without strife unless God had determined the matter by his judgment. Among barbarians there was great use of lots, which were corrupted either by rashness or superstition.

§ 8. When there are several candidates who are judged equal and all suitable, they may be elected by lot, yet with the assistance of God invoked so that he may designate the man who is best. Thus the Apostles placed Joseph and Matthias in the midst; the lot fell upon Matthias, and he was numbered with the twelve Apostles. Hence the turns of the Priests in the temple were distributed by lot. “It happened,” says Luke, “when he exercised the priesthood before God in the order of his turn, according to the custom of the priesthood, that he went forth by lot to place incense after entering the temple of the Lord.” For since several Priests were present, all of whom had equal right to place the incense although it had to be placed by the work of one man, one was selected by lot lest contention arise from rivalry. Otherwise, under the Old Law the supreme priesthood was never subjected to the lot. In the Jewish War, according to Josephus, book 4, chapter 5, the Zealots, after Pontiff Ananias had been reduced to the ranks, chose by lot as High Priest a rustic named Phannias, who was an object of mockery to all.

In persecution St. Augustine commands Honoratus to apportion dangers by lot: those more useful to the common people should be retained; but if all are equal and prepared for death, the matter is to be entrusted to lots.

[Printed page 538]

§ 9. Yet even in these cases recourse is not always or rashly to be had to lots. Their use must be applied only from necessity or by a certain decree of God, when reason and counsel admit no other course. For lots have various disadvantages.

First, they are corrupted with little difficulty. When Smerdis had been killed, the nobles of the Persians determined by oath to choose as their new King by lot the man whose horse first uttered a neigh. They were about to regard the voice of a warlike animal as an oracle; but although they supposed that they would act by lot, they entrusted the whole state to the ingenuity of Oebares the groom. For, after bringing Darius's stallion to a mare on the preceding night, he caused it to fill the air with neighing through remembrance of the place and pleasure. What Darius's colleagues believed had occurred by divine power had been accomplished by the fraud of a little slave.

Cresphontes even more cunningly drew the territory of the Messenians to himself, as Pausanias relates in his Messenian Affairs. When the matter was to be settled by lot, the Priest Temenus by evil fraud gave the victory to Cresphontes. The procedure of the lot was that dry, hard clay should be placed in water; he whose clay dissolved more slowly would possess the Messenian territory. Corrupted by promises and gifts, Temenus hardened the clay of Cresphontes at the fire and that of the others in the sun. Since the hardness produced by more violent baking dissolved more slowly, the Messenians fell to Cresphontes.

Second, although men appear equal, nevertheless there is often great inequality which easily appears to those who consider it. In the Roman state, the lot was customary in assigning Governors to provinces and selecting Judges. For the Consuls either agreed upon the provinces between themselves or drew lots for them, while Judges were either nominated or chosen by lot. Each practice was established with much caution and yet not without difficulties.

In the allotment of provinces there appeared to be no difficulty. Since each Consul had exercised the supreme magistracy at Rome, why should he not also be equal to the lesser dignity in a province? Thus it appeared to make no difference who was placed over which province. But this matter often deceived the Roman people. For if there were peace in Greece and war in Gaul, and the Consuls were Caesar and Metellus, I certainly would not wish Caesar to be sent to Greece and Metellus to Gaul. Provinces are therefore to be entrusted by judgment, not chance. For it is contrary to reason to send a veteran commander into a peaceful province and to expose a timid and inactive man to the fiercest enemies. For this reason Augustus prudently corrected that system: he entrusted the peaceful provinces to the Senate and people, while he retained for himself those that were turbulent and where war was necessary. He not only exempted Egypt from the lot, but did not even permit a Senator to enter it without his command. Elsewhere it must be said how great evils the allotment of Judges produced.

§ 10. Although Aristotle, book 2, chapter 6, does not approve that men who have been elected should be called to another election, usage has nevertheless obtained this in many places. Aristotle's reason is that those few men can easily agree and choose the magistrate at their own pleasure. But this will easily be prevented if, first, many Electors are chosen generally, and then a few are selected from them; and if a lot is also added, ambition is entirely excluded. Let the people therefore appoint fifty Electors; let each of these choose another man; and finally let a lot be held among those who are to choose the magistrate.

§ 11. After the King or Senate has deliberated concerning the appointment of Governors, let it never suppose that sufficient provision has been made for the state unless it has clearly understood the judgment of the people concerning the man. For the people is rarely deceived; and if the people approves its ruler, although he lacks many things, the administration is tranquil.

Princes therefore sin most greatly in this respect when, on the recommendation of others, they hold certain men in esteem and place them over cities, although their avarice, frauds, and lusts are publicly known. In this matter they entangle themselves in the greatest danger to their reputation and kingdom. For the people and prudent men speak thus within themselves: the King either knows or does not know the crimes and wickedness of the bad Governor. If he knows them, what may we hope from that King, among whom criminals possess such patronage and who raises the most wicked on high? If he does not know them, we have a statue, not a King. It is not lawful that we perish on account of his ignorance. How greatly such men are hated, moreover, their downfall alone demonstrates.

The ministers of Princes are their eyes, hands, feet, and, as it were, the living organs of the supreme majesty. Therefore their good deeds and offenses are imputed to those who reign, and upon them the reputation of the Prince for the most part depends. Hence the greatest part of the Imperial duty consists in appointing magistrates, as Zonaras teaches excellently. No one assumes or retains a magistracy without the command of the Prince. Thus the Valerian law in Livy, and Dionysius, book 15, speak concerning the people as Prince and bestower of dignities; but that right was transferred to the Prince by the royal law, Digest, book 1, title 4, law 1, §1, On the Constitution of the Prince.

CHAPTER VIII

The Method of Training Good Men for Government

§ 1. Although some are born with better talent, character, and greater prudence than others, no one is born a craftsman. They must therefore be trained by teaching and practice for the art of arts, the art which is mistress of all, that is, politics. I have indeed said enough concerning teaching in the book on education; now practice must be discussed.

§ 2. Since in a state there are civil and military magistrates, together with those who administer taxes and those who administer judgments, the young ought to be exercised in these in due order. I shall speak in its own place concerning military training. In order that they may become skilled in civil affairs, let them learn early to know the state, which they will attain by the following methods.

§ 3. Let noble young men, after they have passed their twentieth year, be permitted by a decree of the Senate or edict of the Prince to attend the Senate, sit in the council of the Prince, and state an opinion, provided they have served their campaigns with praise or proved their learning at universities. Yet their judgment must possess the force of consultation, not decision. For in this way they will understand what matters are treated in the public council; they will observe the speeches and wisdom of the disputants; and they will meditate upon the things proposed. Nor is there less advantage in hearing the petitions of suppliants and the artful discourses of legates, all of which are examined in the Council.

At Rome in ancient times, the witty story about polygamy attests that the sons of Senators attended the deliberation; now the practice is not much in use. The Venetian state preserves it to its great advantage. For all Patricians possess the right of entering the Senate, provided they are twenty-five years old; by a special motion the council is open to some even before that age, provided they are twenty. They are in what they themselves call the Great Council, which they say contains two thousand Senators, although because of those engaged in embassies and the government of cities and provinces, only sixteen hundred ordinarily assemble.

[Printed page 539]

§ 4. It is also a great exercise if either the Senate or the Prince commands these young men to explain briefly and clearly in writing their opinion concerning proposed matters, especially when an answer must be given to embassies or grave matters are proposed. Sometimes, after hearing and maturely considering the various opinions, let them set forth the advantages and disadvantages of them all and produce their own judgment. For just as no man should be considered a veteran soldier who does not possess knowledge of the orders to be preserved and restored in every place and time, and of striking and avoiding the enemy, so no one will ever be a Senator or Counselor who has not long and much been engaged in the affairs of his own and other states.

Hence comes that great number of men who pass over to the opinion of others--not because they approve or understand it, but because they have no wisdom outside the judgments of others and have never learned to judge or speak by their own power.

I observe that the course of those who are employed in the state is twofold. Some, after devoting themselves to jurisprudence with a complete circle of the sciences, and after learning it thoroughly so that they can now be or appear Doctors, immediately enter the training and household of some practiced Advocate, Syndic, or Assessor, so that by experience they may learn forms, forensic practice, and precedents. If these men possess strength of talent or judgment, they become perfect pleaders, but not suitable Judges of lawsuits.

Yet they are not mature enough to give counsel either in the Senate of the Conscript Fathers or in the Consistory of the Prince. For that matter demands varied knowledge and is not confined within the narrow limits of forensic controversies. Others, after philosophizing moderately and tasting a little of the forms of the Institutes, return to their fatherland in foreign dress and undertake the state. From their ignorance the greatest disadvantages arise, for they possess the authority of Counselors and magistrates, but the ignorance of uneducated men.

§ 5. The principal apprenticeship in politics is for those Companions who will one day govern some part of the state to be joined to legates sent anywhere. Nowhere is the nature of affairs and men more easily perceived; nowhere are the words and gestures of others observed with greater care and attention, or one's own governed more carefully.

Therefore, if there is any matter in the whole world by which prudence is learned, it is found in embassies. Formerly the constitution of the world was different. The Greeks went to the King of the Persians while preserving the dignity of liberty even in meeting and speech. Roman Legates were protected by the majesty of their Empire. Now perpetual embassies travel among kinsmen, friends, rivals, and distrustful men; sometimes they do not know the mind either of the other Princes or of their own. Let three or four men, therefore, be joined to the Legate as Companions and Counselors--not to direct him, but to learn to avoid the rocks, which are very many and very hidden.

This benefits the younger men because they are instructed; it benefits the state because it receives more prudent citizens; and a Legate surrounded by such a retinue cannot betray his trust. Nor is there any other reason why the Romans abounded in so great a number of men skilled in politics than their perpetual journeys with Legates and magistrates.

For friends and tent-companions--that is, noble young men who accompanied them in order to learn military and political affairs--were joined to all magistrates except Legates, Tribunes, and others, whether commanders or ministers of an army. This cohort of friends was a nursery of magistrates; and the more illustrious the Proconsul or Propraetor who went to a province, the greater the company of nobility with which he was surrounded. Nor has that usage now been wholly abolished, for Governors and Viceroys draw a multitude with them; but these men are less employed in public deliberations and in learning affairs.

§ 6. It is a matter of no little importance that younger men should attend to the command and administration of others, either to imitate things rightly done or to accuse errors. This is a most wholesome practice when the rage for calumniating is removed. Let us say nothing of ancient examples. In our own age, in Germany, Gaul, and Spain, we have seen certain men amass riches for many years amid the infamy of Kings and Princes and with danger of rebellion, and inflict injuries upon provinces; although their crimes were in every mouth, only the Princes remained ignorant of them.

If there had been a lawful method of accusation here--if either the oppressed had been permitted to speak or well-disposed men to give counsel--wickedness would not have exulted with impunity for long. Those men do indeed suffer punishment, but late and after the disasters of many.

CHAPTER IX

Magistrates Must Be Inspected

§ 1. If the ancient system and custom of judicial proceedings remained, there would be no need to send Legates to inquire into the deeds of magistrates. The Romans ordinarily had annual provincial magistrates. During the time in which a man remained in office, it was lawful for no one to lodge an accusation against him; but as soon as they had departed from the province, they were prosecuted as defendants for many misdeeds. Many were accused, many condemned, and also many acquitted. Later, when judgments had been corrupted, the provinces were plundered. It would altogether be best to restore this method, if frequent change did not greatly obstruct it. But since it is now not so expedient for this to be done, this course must be taken: an annual rendering of accounts should be introduced into custom, the complaints of peoples should be heard, injuries avenged, and the oppressed relieved.

An account of these matters must be required. First, did they do anything against the state? Did a man free enemy commanders with money; did he permit them to escape when he could have detained them; did he attempt to overthrow the highest interest of the state; did allies take up arms through his work and counsel, as is treated in the Varia law? The Sullan law concerning this was most severe and exceeded moderation, being a rival of proscription.

Furthermore, inquiry is ordered into the man who removed an intercession or hindered a Magistrate from exercising his office; who led an army out within a province; who waged war of his own accord; who solicited an army; who pardoned captured enemy commanders or freed them for money; who pardoned captured leaders of robbers; or who did not defend his power in administering. Here the testimony of a woman is accepted; no penalty is established against calumniators; and no dignity is exempted from bloody interrogations.

[Printed page 540]

To this belongs the case in which hostages were killed by his command, a Magistrate was slain, enemy soldiers were assisted, a province was not handed over to his successor or was betrayed to enemies, or money was accepted during embassies.

Yet it rarely happens that provincial Governors are guilty of treason. For they are generally more honored among their own Princes than they could be among enemies under the name of traitor. Formerly it was frequent, when a new Emperor had been elected, immediately to change allegiance and conspire against the Prince. Two other crimes are so customary that they have already passed into accepted practice: embezzling public money and plundering allies. The Romans punished the crime of peculation most severely; at first they vigorously punished injuries to allies, afterward more languidly, and finally neglected them. How frequent peculation--that is, theft of public money--formerly was is proved by the fact that a standing court for peculation and a court for extortion were each entrusted to its own Praetor. Yet more men were accused of peculation because the treasury has many avengers; the cause of allies is easily abandoned.

Money is then extorted from allies in many ways: by hope, fear, malicious fraud, acceptance of gifts, sale of judgments, exactions by attendants, and the usury of publicans. Hence the Senate gave the allies recuperatores. Lucius Calpurnius Piso proposed that a definite Praetor be established for this matter, to whom the allies might flee. There are the Caecilian, Junian, and Servilian laws concerning these matters; under the latter law the Praetor selected four hundred and fifty men. Lest lawsuits be drawn out and the Legates of the allies remain at Rome to their great disadvantage, the Acilian law provided that cases could not be adjourned for further inquiry or deferred to the next day. The Cornelian law added that inquiry should be made in the same manner whether a man had treated provincials or allies lustfully, proudly, or cruelly. It extended this also to those to whom the money had come. The penalty was that, once the defendant had been condemned, damages should be assessed and he should be interdicted from water and fire. And do not marvel: Julius Caesar, the greatest of thieves, enacted a precise law concerning this matter, containing those very heads under which he himself was guilty above all men.

Besides the things said above, it contains these provisions: if anyone accepted money to do more or less of anything from his office; if anyone not possessing the right to testify accepted money to declare or not declare testimony; if anyone accepted it for sending or not sending a soldier, for stating an opinion in the Senate, for granting or not granting a Judge or arbiter; if he entered a public work as accepted before it was completed; if he exceeded the prescribed measure in exacting grain; if he did not leave his accounts in two cities of the province and report the same to the treasury in identical words; or if the Judge's attendant accepted money.

§ 2. If, amid so many laws and judgments, there were not lacking men who plundered or raged at their own peril, knowing that penalties must be paid upon conviction, what will happen where the administration is longer and there is no fear of the laws? What Scauri, Galbae, Hortensii, Pleminii, Verreses, Felices, and Flori may we suppose that the hope of impunity will produce? So many and so pious laws were established by the Kings of the Spains for the benefit of the Indians; but nothing was as effective as the Legates and Bishops sent into those regions to restrain the injuries of the Governors. This, therefore, must be established: a province will never be rightly governed except by a very few men, unless the Propraetor or Viceroy fears the King as much as the subjects fear the Viceroy. This practice therefore formerly belonged to all kingdoms, and must also be employed now.

§ 3. Empires are either middling, great, or very extensive; I speak of the expanses of lands and seas. In all of them a different system can and ought to be instituted. The Athenians possessed a middling Empire. Because access was easy from a moderate distance, they drew all the greater judicial proceedings and causes into their city. Thus Xenophon in Περὶ Ἀθηναίων πολιτείας, On the Polity of the Athenians:

> The Athenian people appear to act imprudently in this too, because they compel the allies to sail to Athens to seek justice. But they themselves set forth the advantages which arise from this for the Athenian people. First, they receive pay from the Prytaneis throughout the whole year. Next, while sitting at home, without a sea voyage, they administer the allied cities; they preserve the popular party and oppress their adversaries in judgments. But if each city had jurisdiction at home, since the Athenians are hated, they would overthrow from among themselves those who were greatest friends of the Athenian people.
>
> To these things it is added that the Athenian people make these gains while the allies seek justice at Athens. First, the hundredth tax is greater for the city at Piraeus. Next, if anyone owns an upper room or a slave for hire, he gains from it. Furthermore, heralds conduct their business better because of the journeys of the allies.
>
> In addition, if the allies did not come to court, they would honor only those Athenians who sailed to them--Generals, Captains of triremes, and Legates. But now each of the allies is compelled to court the Athenian people, understanding that he must go to Athens to undergo trial and plead his cause before no others than the people, who assuredly are the law at Athens. Therefore he is compelled to supplicate in the courts and, whenever anyone enters, to grasp his hand. For this reason the allies become more the servants of the Athenian people.
>
> Add that, because of their possessions and principal offices distant from their own borders, they incidentally learn to row, both they themselves and their companions. For a man who sails often must grasp an oar, as must his servant, and must learn the names of nautical equipment. They become good pilots both through experience of vessels and through practice. Some practice by steering a vessel, others by steering a merchant ship; some pass from this to triremes, while many, as soon as they enter ships, row, since they can do so because they have practiced throughout their whole life.

The Athenians acted with a bad end, indeed, but under a specious title. Accordingly, although most matters were badly established, their Governors who commanded the cities were nevertheless restrained by great fear from inflicting injuries upon the allies. For since men from all the cities traveled to Athens for the sake of their causes, while the Athenian people judged, the crimes of powerful men could not remain hidden. Since the more powerful were also hated in a popular form of the city, they could not hope for pardon from the people. For this reason the Athenians were more pleasing than the Lacedaemonians, whose rule over the cities of Greece was harsher.

If the Empire is great, such as the Spanish Empire is now and the Roman Empire was under the ancient Emperors, the Emperor or King can travel around the provinces, as Hadrian formerly did according to Spartianus, and punish Procurators and Governors for their deeds. Herodotus relates that in ancient times the Kings of the Persians were accustomed to traverse their kingdom to see whether there was anything which needed royal assistance. Plato says the same about Minos, but his dominion was enclosed within narrower bounds. In great Empires this is more difficult.

For very extensive Empires, such as that of the King of the Spains, can never everywhere enjoy the presence of their Prince. Nor is it expedient: if he were to make a journey to America or the East at his own peril, he would place all his kingdoms in danger. Therefore, in inspecting and governing them, he needs the best and most steadfast men.

§ 4. But no man's virtue must be trusted in such a way that the Prince does not know the account of his administration, both because magistracy reveals the man and because honors easily change virtue. Nicholas Bellus relates this praiseworthy practice in the Kingdom of Sweden:

> Above the Viscounts, he says, is a superior or Prefect who is called in Latin the Lawgiver, an office which approaches nearest to the Royal Majesty. He is very like the Seneschals of France, and such men are called Lamem by the Swedes, as though Supreme Justiciars. An appeal lies from the Viscounts to the Prefects and Lawgivers; from them to the Royal Council; and from this to the King himself. The Royal Majesty moreover affirms that in those kingdoms there are eleven Prefects or Lawgivers, to whom more than three hundred Viscountcies are subject. The Lawgivers travel around and inspect a part of their territory every year, until, after inspecting it on every side and completing a kind of circuit, they return again to inspect the earlier part. Just as this contributes wonderfully to knowing in detail the condition of the state and applying opportune remedies to public diseases, so it relieves and revives the peoples, since they exact the tax by turns from the territories and parishes which they inspect, and all are not burdened at once.

The knee is regarded as closer to everyone than the calf, as Theocritus used to say. Each man cares for his private interests. In their sacrifices the Persians prayed for the King and kingdom, not for themselves; yet each man plundered for himself. The same is done now also unless a daily examination strikes fear.

In this manner administration now proceeds more rightly in the New World. For at first the inhabitants were treated with the greatest severity, both on account of their innate barbarity and savagery and because the avarice and cruelty of the soldiers was harsher toward cannibals. It exasperated everyone that, neglecting treaties and oaths, the victors slaughtered all without regard. But when Theologians perceived that the wretched were oppressed, they vigorously pleaded their cause. Francis of Zumárraga, of the Seraphic Order and endowed with true zeal, reported the whole matter to Charles V; Rodrigo Minaya, having journeyed to Paul III for this cause, obtained assistance for the liberty of the Indians. Bartolomé de las Casas also vigorously opposed the oppressors. The jurist La Gasca reformed the jurisdiction. Now the matter is most excellently constituted.

For the Viceroys have their Counselors; they have other independent Governors in the kingdom; they have Bishops whose care it is that all things be administered justly. There are nine supreme Consistories or judicial Parliaments in New Spain and five in Peru, from which there is no appeal. Reports concerning matters to be done are made almost every month. This is done more expeditiously because those matters are judged not suddenly and rashly but deliberately. For other established councils govern all these matters, and the King decrees after hearing the opinion of the Counselors. These councils are the Privy Council, the Council of War, and those of Italy, Aragon, Navarre, Belgium, and the Indies. The account of all matters is referred to them; they respond; and the command for execution is written by the King. Thus the deeds and errors of all are reported and judged not only in Spain but even in the most distant provinces, and are requited by reward or punishment.

Bellus says:

> Cities are governed by one of their own citizens, upon whom the King bestows the name and authority of Governor, and by Counselors whom the citizens themselves elect. When the Governor has completed his magistracy, inquiry is almost always made into his acts by a careful proceeding. After this proceeding has been examined, the Royal Council reports the things badly done to the King's Majesty, who chastises the Governor if he understands that he was unjust and criminal; but if he perceives that the man fulfilled the due parts of justice and diligence, he exalts him to greater and nobler offices. Finally, there is no man who conducts himself honestly and according to virtue for the King and state who is not most generously rewarded, just as, conversely, those who fail in their office through dejection of spirit, negligence, or injustice are punished and chastised. This assuredly is the principal cause and reason by which this most sacred Crown is preserved and is exalted more from day to day.

It has sometimes come into my mind to marvel how, contrary to the custom of all kingdoms, so great a Monarchy has stood for so long a time without sedition, rebellion, or revolt. Besides divine providence, I find no other cause than that the deeds of all men are in the sight of the Royal Councils and of the King. For a hundred years the Spains have held the Indies and various dominions in such remote and inaccessible provinces, with so great an occasion for treaties with barbarians and so great a license for sinning; yet scarcely any revolts or tumults have been heard of, and only the Pizarros waged civil wars in America.

But if we examine the mature Roman Empire, no decade will be found in which there were not more seditions, conspiracies, plunderings of allies, peculations, and crimes of extortion than that so widely extended Monarchy saw in a whole century. This is a sign that the kingdom abounds in excellent laws and men.

§ 5. This, therefore, is the support of a kingdom which is not only most powerful but is also spread in different directions toward the East and West: everything is so filled with inspectors and with men writing to the King and the Royal Councils that the beginnings of plots and injuries can easily be suppressed and their authors discovered.

CHAPTER X

Magistrates Should Not Readily Be Changed

§ 1. The Romans had annual Magistrates in the provinces. There was a twofold reason for this: both lest, through long familiarity with provincials and soldiers, they should acquire a power formidable to the fatherland, and so that access to wealth and honors might lie open to more men. Accordingly, that perpetual changing was instituted not for the good of the state but through the cupidity of powerful men. But if another means of security had been devised, there would have been no need to change Governors every year. Statius says, "A short reign does not spare peoples." Charles V did not readily change magistrates.

§ 2. The Roman custom of renewing provincial Magistrates annually conduced neither to the security of the state nor to the advantage of the provinces. The cause which did not produce security was the wickedness of those men who, if they had not been able to seize the state by continuing Magistracies, would have ruined it by some other crime. Machiavelli, book 3 of the Discourses on the Republic, chapter 24, contends that Rome was brought to destruction by the prolongation of magistracies; but he attends, not rightly to the cause of the evils, but to that which immediately preceded the evil. The words of Machiavelli's discourse are as follows:

[Printed page 542]

> If anyone carefully examines the form of the Roman state, he will discover that the primary cause of its destruction arose from Agrarian disputes and from the prolongation of magistracies. If provision had been made against these diseases in time, public liberty could have been longer-lasting and more peaceful. For although no seditions appear to have arisen at Rome because commands were prolonged, it is nevertheless established that those whose Magistracies were prolonged attained such authority and power as was pernicious to public liberty. Indeed, if all those whose Magistracies were ever continued had been like Lucius Quinctius, no danger to public liberty could have been created from that matter. For when there were disputes between the plebs and the fathers, and the plebs had again created the same Tribunes for the following year--because they considered them fit to resist the fathers--and the fathers for the same reason wished to prolong Quinctius's consulship, he resisted vehemently and did not permit the fathers to imitate the plebs in a matter that was of evil example; and by great exertion he obtained the election of new Consuls. If the other Roman citizens had imitated him, they would by no means, through a most evil example, have dissolved the ancient decree of the Senate concerning the continuation of Magistracies; nor would the continuation of Magistracies have led to the prolongation of command, a thing which brought destruction upon the state.
>
> The first man whose command was prolonged at Rome was Publius Philo. For when he was besieging Palaepolis and, near the end of his consulship, seemed to have victory in his hand, they sent him no successor, but prolonged his command and declared him Proconsul. Although this had been decreed by the Senate for the public good, in the course of time it passed into a most evil precedent and introduced tyranny into the state. For the farther from the City a war had to be waged, the more necessary that prolongation of command appeared. Hence it came about that fewer Roman citizens could excel in military affairs, since fewer became Commanders, and all the glory of war returned to a certain few whose commands were prolonged. Furthermore, a commander who had long commanded an excellent army could easily bind it to himself, so that, having in some fashion forgotten the Senate and People of Rome, it acknowledged only the commander's fasces. For these reasons it came about that both Marius and Sulla could lead an army against the state and seize it. These evils would never have befallen the Senate and People of Rome if that prolongation of Magistracies and Commands had not been in use.
>
> If you object that such great affairs could not have been conducted by the Roman people in places so remote from the City unless the Magistracies of the Commanders had been continued, I reply that perhaps so great a height of > empire could have been attained more slowly, but that empire would afterward have been more enduring, and a Monarchy could not have been introduced so quickly after public liberty had been abolished.

He is too hostile to long commands, although without prolonged or perpetual commands no empire has long endured. I seem to hear Gaius thundering in a most shameful cause: "Well done, Petronius! You have not learned to listen to a commander; you are swollen by Magistracies continued until now." It is established that the examples of all states, and especially of the Roman state, may be set against Machiavelli.

But let us examine examples. The Kings of the Persians had Satraps in long and almost perpetual commands; before them, so did the Chaldeans and Assyrians. Nebuchadnezzar set Daniel and his companions over affairs, chapter 3; Darius did the same in chapter 7. But if we consider the states of Greece, what was accomplished by them except through distinguished men whose commands they prolonged? The Athenian Commanders Pericles, Nicias, Demosthenes, Cleon, Tolmides, and Myronides are illustrious in Thucydides, distinguished by great victories, whether naval or terrestrial, at Cythera, Megara, Corinth, Pylos, the Peloponnesus, and in Boeotia. Nor did those who were worse than these command for only a year: Alcibiades, Thrasybulus, Theramenes, and Archippus. For Miltiades, Cimon, Themistocles, and Chabrias held longer commands. No people was ever more unjust toward its Commanders and Princes than the Athenian people, through envy and perpetual suspicion lest they either excel or exercise tyranny; nevertheless, it could not defend itself without the commands of brave men, and indeed prolonged ones.

Nor did the Lacedaemonians act otherwise once they had become powerful, as the same Xenophon says in Ἐν Λακεδαιμονίων πολιτείᾳ:

> Οἶδα γὰρ πρότερον μὲν Λακεδαιμονίους αἱρουμένους οἴκοι τὰ μέτρια ἔχοντας ἀλλήλοις συνεῖναι μᾶλλον ἢ ἁρμόζοντας ἐν ταῖς πόλεσι καὶ κολακευομένους διαφθείρεσθαι. Καὶ πρόσθεν μὲν οἶδα αὐτοὺς φοβουμένους χρυσίον ἔχοντας φαίνεσθαι, νῦν δὲ εἰσί τινες καὶ καλλωπιζόμενοι ἐπὶ τῷ κεκτῆσθαι. Ἐπίσταμαι δὲ καὶ πρότερον τούτου ἕνεκα ξενηλασίας γιγνομένας καὶ ἀποδημεῖν οὐκ ἐξόν, ὅπως μὴ ῥᾳδιουργίας οἱ πολῖται ἀπὸ τῶν ξένων ἐμπίμπλαιντο. Νῦν δ᾽ ἐπίσταμαι τοὺς δοκοῦντας πρώτους εἶναι τοῦ διακατέχειν ὡς μηδέποτε παύωνται ἁρμόζοντες ἐπὶ ξένης.

For I know that formerly the Lacedaemonians much preferred to live together at home while possessing moderate means rather than to be magistrates in cities and be corrupted by flatterers. And formerly, indeed, they feared lest they should appear to possess any gold; but now I know some who glory in it. Nor am I ignorant that, for this reason, foreigners were formerly customarily expelled and travel abroad was not permitted, lest citizens draw cunning and deceit from foreigners. But at the present time I know that those who appear to be foremost apply themselves especially to this: that they may never lay down a magistracy abroad. And formerly, certainly, they labored to be worthy of command; but now they labor to command rather than to be worthy of command. If, therefore, they sought not merely prolongations but perpetuities of command, it readily appears that those commands were not merely annual; for otherwise they would seek duration in vain.

But let us inspect the Roman state. Tiberius, whom Lipsius calls skillful in commanding, drew annual commands out to great length. Tacitus says in book 1:

> It was also a custom of Tiberius to continue commands and to keep most men to the end of their lives in the same armies or jurisdictions. Various causes are reported. Some say that, through weariness of new care, he preserved decisions once made as perpetual; some, through envy lest more men should enjoy them. There are those who think that, as his disposition was crafty, so his judgment was anxious; for he did not seek eminent virtues and, on the other hand, he hated vices: from the best men he feared danger to himself, and from the worst public disgrace. By this hesitation he was at last carried so far that he entrusted provinces to some men whom he was not going to permit to depart from the City.

Fescenninus Niger also argued many things to this effect in Spartianus. "He was of such authority," he says, "that he wrote first to Marcus and then to Commodus, when he saw that the provinces were being overturned by the easy changing of administrations. First, that no successor should be appointed to any provincial Governor, Legate, or Proconsul before five years, because they laid down their power before they knew how to administer. Then he urged that no new men should approach the governing of the state except through military administrations, and that Assessors should administer in those provinces in which they had sat as Assessors. Severus and then many afterward maintained this, as the Prefectures of Paulus and Ulpian prove: they had been on Papinian's council, and afterward, when the one had served at the bureau of records and the other at the bureau of petitions, they were immediately made Prefects. It was also his rule that no one should sit as Assessor in his own province, and no one should administer at Rome unless he were a Roman, that is, sprung from the City."

[Printed page 543]

Augustus also permitted Governors to hold long administrations. First, he made the Prefecture of the City, which was a great dignity, almost perpetual. He transferred Varus from Syria into Germany. In his testament he gave Tiberius the command that he should entrust the state to those who were strongest in practical knowledge and experience. But he could not have given it to experienced men if they were changed every year.

Yet Julius became more powerful than his fatherland from a prolonged province; so too did Sulla and Marius. Thence came Roman servitude.

I reply that the power of citizens is necessarily increased by continued or repeated Magistracies, just as it is by one Magistracy held once. But that which supplies a cause of greater power is not always to be avoided. For in truth a great part of the Roman citizens considered prolongation salutary. Moreover, unless indomitable Gaul, always formidable to Rome--unless the Batavians, Germans, and Helvetians--had faced a sufficiently vigorous and prudent Commander while the state was struggling with the Asian, Mithridatic, and Pirate Wars, the highest interests would have been placed in peril.

But the custom of continuously continuing or repeating Magistracies existed from the very beginning of the state. Brutus, Postumius, Quinctius, Camillus, Manlius, the Fabii, the Papirii, the Curii, the Fabricii, Africanus, Paulus, Metellus, and even Sulla and Marius held continued commands. The consular fasti themselves exhibit several consulships and triumphs; for whenever the state was in danger--and it is always in some danger--it looked to great and experienced men.

But let us weigh Machiavelli's arguments. When the plebs had created the same Tribunes because they were fit to resist the fathers, the Fathers also wished to prolong Quinctius's consulship; he himself resisted this because it was of evil example.

I am accustomed to marvel when I see history employed so childishly. Quinctius the Consul did not refuse prolongation because he considered it an evil precedent and an occasion for tyranny, whatever he pretended, but for other reasons. First, because the Senate had thus decreed: "Neither shall the Tribunes carry a law in that year, nor shall the Consuls lead the army out of the City. For the rest, the Senate judges that Magistracies should not be continued and that the same Tribunes should not be reelected, as being contrary to the state." Second, the Consul himself adduces this and other reasons:

> I should marvel, Conscript Fathers, if your authority with the plebs is so empty that you yourselves diminish it. For because the plebs dissolved a decree of the Senate concerning the continuation of Magistracies, you yourselves also wish it dissolved, lest you yield to the rashness of the multitude--as though to possess more license and levity were to possess more power in the state. For it is assuredly more frivolous and empty to abolish one's own decrees and resolutions than those of others. Imitate, Conscript Fathers, the unreflecting crowd, you who ought to be an example to others; sin by the example of others rather than have others act rightly by yours, provided that I do not imitate the Tribunes and do not permit myself to be declared Consul contrary to the decree of the Senate. But you, Gaius Claudius, I exhort both to restrain the Roman people from this license and to persuade yourself of this > concerning me: I shall receive it as though, not my honor had been impeded by you, but the glory of despising honor had been increased, and the envy which threatened from its continuation had been lightened.

Thus spoke Quinctius, who not only could not seize a tyranny but despaired that the Fathers could defend themselves from the tyranny of the plebs. Here there is no reasoning concerning the danger of tyranny. But what he says is greatly to be noted: that the envy which threatens from a continued honor is lightened by the creation of a new Consul. For the plebs greatly feared Lucius Quinctius, since it would have him as an angry Consul, supported by the favor of the Senate, his own virtue, and three sons. Already before this the fiercer of his sons, Caeso, had been driven into exile, and Quinctius himself was compelled to pay the money for which his son had given bail. Livy says: “The money was exacted cruelly from the father, so that, after all his goods had been sold, he lived for some time across the Tiber, as though banished, in a hut.” Deservedly, therefore, he refused continuation through fear of envy, although, if we consider the matter, the authority of the Senate prolonging the consulship could be preferred to the fear of Quinctius refusing it.

Finally, other things which occurred in this contest are proof to us that the consulship was not refused because the Romans disapproved its continuation and repetition. For in place of Quinctius and his colleague there were created as Consuls Quintus Fabius Vibulanus, for the third time, and Lucius Cornelius Maluginensis. Why did they not fear tyranny in Fabius? There is no less danger in repeated Magistracies than in continued ones.

Machiavelli nevertheless objects, on the contrary, that from the prolongation of command it came about that fewer Roman citizens could excel in military affairs, since fewer became Commanders, and that all the glory of war returned to a certain few whose commands were prolonged.

But this did not cast down the spirits of brave men. For when they observe that some among the many who have waged wars are held in great glory, when they see their command prolonged, see them reelected, and see them summoned again to great works, they are equipped by emulation. Virtue has sharper spurs if its activity is not concluded by the course of only one year. If it is pressed by a successor and the possibility of returning is cut off, it easily grows obsolete. But his judgment that men cannot excel in military affairs because fewer become Commanders is contrary to experience. David had the bravest soldiers and most excellent Commanders, yet David was King and Joab Commander of the army. Who hoped for command while Alexander lived? Who was Commander in Macedonia while Philip reigned, supported by several sons? And yet in his court there was a great abundance of the greatest Commanders; had they not dashed against one another, they could easily have obtained the whole world. Assuredly, more than thirty Commanders were equal to any King, although more had perished partly in war and partly through Alexander’s cruelty. The Macedonians therefore became great Commanders, Generals, and Kings, not by commanding in turns, but by serving under Philip, the most cautious of Kings. Familiarity with a great King, consultations, and exercises made them great. Such were those who led ranks under Pompey and Julius; such are those who flourished under the Prince of Parma and Spinola. Supreme honor indeed excites men to the hard rudiments of war; but without it military skill can and commonly does subsist. No prudent man chooses a Commander so that he may learn to wage war; the experiment is too insolent when the entire state is in danger.

But the army obeyed its commander rather than the Senate; this was caused by the prolongation of command. Hence Marius, Sulla, and Julius.

Hence laws and plebiscites were compelled.

It seems to me that the fault lay not so much in prolonging command as in-- creating such Magistrates in the beginning--or, to speak more correctly, in prolonging command for such men. I am speaking finally of liberty destroyed under Julius; for Marius and Sulla deserved very well of the fatherland, although through the contest of parties they ruined everything. Nor here was the fault of Marius and Sulla greater than that of others. Florus has excuses for the Commanders rather than for the soldiers, book 3, chapter 21:

§ 2 (continued).

[Printed page 544]

> I would somehow bear it with a more equitable mind if plebeian commanders, or at least evil nobles, had furnished leadership for the crime. But when--O crime!--such men, such Commanders, the glories and ornaments of their age, Marius and Sulla, furnished even their own dignity for the worst crime, the state was agitated, so to speak, by three constellations. In the first, light and moderate, cruelty arose in a tumult greater than the war itself against the commanders of the armies. Soon, in a second and bloodier one, victory raged through the vitals of the whole Senate. The last surpassed not only civic but also hostile madness, when the fury of arms rested upon the strength of all Italy and hatreds raged so far that there were none left to be killed. The beginning and cause of the war was Marius's insatiable hunger for honors, when through the Sulpician law he disturbed the province allotted to Sulla. But Sulla, impatient of the injury, immediately wheeled his legions about and, Mithridates being postponed, poured a double battle line into the City through the Esquiline and Colline Gates.

Caesar and Pompey became powerful through prolonged commands, but the envy of other citizens caused them to abuse their power. "The cause of so great a calamity," says Florus in book 4, chapter 2, "was the same as that of all others: excessive prosperity. For when Quintus Metellus and Lucius Afranius were Consuls, when Roman majesty was powerful throughout the whole world and Rome was singing recent victories and the Pontic and Armenian triumphs in Pompey's theaters, Pompey's excessive power stirred envy among idle citizens, as commonly happens. Metellus, because his Cretan triumph had been diminished, and Cato, always hostile to powerful men, began to disparage Pompey and oppose his acts. This resentment drove him astray and impelled him to seek supports for his dignity. By chance Crassus then flourished in lineage, wealth, and dignity, yet wished for greater resources. Gaius Caesar was elevated by eloquence, spirit, and now also the consulship; nevertheless, Pompey towered over them both. Thus, since Caesar desired to acquire dignity, Crassus to increase it, and Pompey to retain it, and all alike were desirous of power, they easily agreed upon invading the state. Therefore, when each strove by their mutual strength for his own distinction, Caesar invaded Gaul, Crassus Asia, and Pompey Spain. Three very great armies were held, so that now the command of the world was occupied by the partnership of three Princes. That domination lasted ten years, since they were held together by mutual fear. After the death of Crassus among the Parthians and the death of Julia, Caesar's daughter, who, married to Pompey, maintained the harmony of father-in-law and son-in-law by the bond of marriage, rivalry immediately broke forth. Caesar's resources were now suspect to Pompey, and Pompey's dignity burdensome to Caesar; neither the one endured an equal nor the other a superior."

Nor is it so marvelous that powerful men were offended when, in return for their deserts, for enlarging the Empire, for bringing safety to the fatherland, and for innumerable dangers, they saw insult and new dangers. Such men ought not to have been trusted from the beginning. There were so many forewarnings concerning Caesar that the Romans' being deceived was not a matter of error but of will. When friends resisted Sulla as he deliberated about killing him, Sulla said that they had no understanding if they did not see many Mariuses in that boy. They knew that, when twenty talents were demanded of him, he had given the Pirates fifty and had killed them without a Magistrate's knowledge.

Since he gave so many indications of tyranny, Caesar did not steal upon men unaware. Plutarch relates it thus in his life:

> By dinners, his table, and, in sum, the splendor of the rest of his life, he gradually gathered power in the state. His envious rivals, supposing that this would shortly vanish when his expenditures failed, safely permitted him to become illustrious in the state. But late, when his resources had now become immense and overpowering, and they perceived them openly breaking out into a change of affairs, they observed that the beginning of no matter should be judged small, since continuation does not fail immediately to render it great, and since by being despised it obtains the advantage of not being impeded. Therefore Cicero, who seems first to have regarded Caesar with suspicion and to have feared his serenity in governing the state, as one fears serenity at sea, and who considered the sharpness hidden beneath his humanity and flattery, said that in all his other undertakings and actions he discerned > a tyrannical disposition. “But when,” he said, “I see his hair arranged so carefully and see him scratching his head with one finger, on the other hand this man does not seem to me likely to conceive so great an evil in his mind as to overthrow the Roman state.”

They knew that before he had held any Magistracy he possessed a debt of thirty-one million two hundred thousand sesterces, as is found in the same author, and that he had contracted this through great expenditures and splendor. He had placed images of Marius on the Capitol; all men cried that he was contriving a kingdom; fear of his audacity seized all. Lutatius Catulus, accusing him in the Senate, said: “Caesar no longer attacks the state by tunnels, but now by siege-engines.” Since he was suspected in the conspiracy of Catiline, how could they doubt what he would do, when he publicly protested in the Senate that he would pass over to the people? Why did the Senate itself not decree the Agrarian laws and colonies? What of the claim that, while Aedile, he conspired with Crassus to slaughter the Senators? What of the fact that he terrified his enemies with a numerous household? The Senate knew all these things. Therefore it brought it about by largesse that not Lucceius but Bibulus should be designated Consul with him, as Tranquillus teaches. The Senate also contrived that provinces involving the least business--that is, woods and hills--should be decreed to the Consuls. For what would he not do in a province, when at home he compelled his colleague Bibulus and the Senate to confine themselves through fear? So much so that the tyranny was mocked in verses:

> Nothing has lately been done under Bibulus, but under Caesar;
>
> For I remember nothing done when Bibulus was Consul.

Thus, by way of jest, men dated documents “in the consulship of Julius and Caesar.” Finally, through conspiracies he obtained the decree of Gaul to himself for five years. Tranquillus, chapter 22:

> Therefore, with his father-in-law and son-in-law supporting him, from the entire abundance of provinces he chose the Gauls above all, whose advantage and opportunity offered suitable material for triumphs. At first, indeed, by the Vatinian law he received Cisalpine Gaul with Illyricum added; presently he received Gallia Comata also through the Senate, because the Fathers feared that, if they themselves refused it, the people would give him this province too. Elated by this joy, he did not restrain himself from boasting a few days afterward in a crowded Senate that he had obtained what he desired against the will and amid the groans of his adversaries, and that henceforth he would leap upon the heads of them all. And when someone said insultingly that this would not be easy for any woman, he replied, as though alluding to it, that Semiramis too had reigned in Assyria and that the Amazons had once held a great part of Asia.

Then he bound the annual Magistrates to himself. Tranquillus, chapter 23:

> Therefore, to secure the time to come, he regarded it as a matter of great importance always to bind the annual Magistrates to himself and to assist no others among the candidates, or permit them to attain honor, except those who had covenanted to defend him in his absence. From some he did not hesitate to exact an oath and even a written bond concerning this agreement.

Caesar therefore was already ruling before this. For the Senate, which he alone wished extinguished, after Caesar had received Cisalpine Gaul and Illyricum from the people, voluntarily added Gallia Comata, lest the people give him this also. Caesar’s power lay in the favor of the people, then in conspiracy and the purchase of powerful men. Meanwhile he nevertheless added much to the Empire, when all things would have been in danger unless the Gauls had been defended by a vigorous Commander. Therefore it was not long command, but--as commonly happens--the favor of the people and fear among the aristocracy that imposed that tyrant upon the City and the world. He was already a tyrant when he ordered his command to be continued.

[Printed page 545]

Accordingly, I do not approve annual Magistracies: both for the reasons set forth above and because transitions of government offer an opportunity for great and evil undertakings. It is also easier to endure one evil man than many. It is difficult for provincials to accommodate themselves to the variety of characters in different men, who are not merely contrary to one another but burden those who pleased their predecessors. Elsewhere I have said how greatly departing and returning Governors burdened the provinces with gifts and coronation gold. But what is most foul is this: those who think that they have obtained the single, almost unique, opportunity in their entire life to become rich use it most shamefully and avariciously; and since they fear trials and punishments, they attempt every abomination.

§ 3. Therefore, unless many other errors concur, the prolongation of commands is not sufficient for the destruction of a state. Nor did Julius first overthrow liberty when, after two five-year periods spent subduing Gaul, he waged many wars whose outcome was not easy; rather, he did so when by force and fear of death he compelled his colleague the Consul and the Senate to abstain from the Senate-house, and by the same fear drove them, though most hostile and unwilling, to decree to him an extraordinary five-year command in both Gauls and Illyricum; and when, after forming a conspiracy with Pompey and Crassus, he extorted a second five-year period. Thus, before the prolongation, he was already more powerful and had oppressed liberty.

Others attempted the state with greater danger, although success failed them. Spurius Cassius endeavored through Agrarian laws to bind the plebs to himself; his father killed him. Maelius had planned to purchase it more effectively by largesse and would have accomplished it had Servilius Ahala not stabbed him in the middle of the Forum. They cast Manlius down from the Capitol when he was suspected of tyranny. These are the arts of all who wish to reign in a popular state. The Tribunes themselves advanced by this art. Florus, book 3, chapter 13.

§ 4. The Tribunician Power stirred up the causes of all seditions. In appearance, indeed, it sought the favor and support of the people through Agrarian, grain, and judicial laws, for the protection of the plebs, for whose aid it had been instituted; but in reality it was acquiring domination. In all these things there was an appearance of equity. For what is so just as for the plebs to recover its right from the fathers, lest the people, victor over nations and possessor of the world, live as an exile from altars and hearths? What is so equitable as for the needy people to live from its own treasury? What is more effective for the right of equalizing liberty than that, while the Senate governs the provinces, the authority of the equestrian order should at least rest upon the dominion of the courts? But these very things returned to destruction. The wretched state was the merchandise sold for its own ruin: judicial power transferred from the Senate to the equestrians suppressed the revenues, that is, the patrimony of the Empire; and the purchase of grain exhausted the treasury, the very sinews of the state. How could the plebs be brought back to the fields without overthrowing their possessors, who were themselves part of the people and who, through long time, possessed the seats left to them by their ancestors as though by hereditary right?

For what else did Gnaeus and Gaius Gracchus ever do? The one carried Agrarian laws and his brother defended them; both were quickly killed by the faction of the nobility. Caesar, proceeding by the same road, was brought after a longer crisis to twenty-three wounds. Apuleius pressed the Gracchan laws more sharply; but after he had now dominated for three years and had killed Gaius Memmius, a candidate for the consulship, the people covered him with stones and clubs after a siege, and he was torn to pieces even in death. Drusus, after bestowing everything and obtaining what he intended, died. All these men acted in the same way as Julius; the only thing lacking was that they did not depart into provinces from which they could purchase the favor of Magistrates.

§ 5. Furthermore, I do not approve commands of Governors which are at once very long and great. By them Governors are rendered powerful, and even more savage and less obedient to command. Provinces must therefore be divided, as was prudently done by the Romans of old. The consular provinces were Nearer Spain, Farther Spain, Gaul on this side of the Alps, Gaul beyond the Alps, Illyricum, Dalmatia, Cilicia, and Syria. The Praetorian provinces, however, were: 1. Sicily; 2. Sardinia and Corsica; 3. Africa and Numidia; 4. Macedonia, Achaea, and Greece; 5. Asia, Lydia, and Caria, with Mysia and Ionia; 6. Pontus and Bithynia; 7. Crete; 8. Cyprus. If this distribution had been preserved, scarcely anyone could have become more powerful than the state. For beyond these provinces stood Rome and the strength of Italy. Next, all had neighboring Governors as rivals. Third, if any possessed an army, they were harassed by neighboring barbarians. This law was violated in Caesar's case when three provinces were combined into one.

Augustus also produced security for himself by a prudent division. Dio, book 53, page 341:

> Ἔθνη τε μὲν ἀσθενέστερα ὡς καὶ εἰρηναῖα καὶ ἀπόλεμα τῷ δήμῳ ἀπέδωκε, τὰ δ᾽ ἰσχυρότερα ὡς καὶ σφαλερὰ καὶ ἐπικίνδυνα, ἢ ὅτι πολεμίους τινὰς παροίκους ἔχοντα, ἢ αὐτὰ καθ᾽ ἑαυτὰ μέγα τι νεωτερίζειν δυνάμενα, κατέσχε.

He gave the weaker provinces to the people, as peaceful and secure from war, but retained the strong ones, as doubtful and nearer to danger, or those which had neighboring enemies, or which by themselves could contrive some great revolution.

Those belonging to the People and Senate were Africa, Numidia, Asia, Greece, Macedonia, Dalmatia, Cyrenaica, Sicily, Crete, Sardinia, and Baetica, all the more peaceful provinces. The rest belonged to Caesar. The following Emperors most prudently divided them further so that they might diminish the power of each Governor. Accordingly, there were ten provinces in Egypt; eleven in Asia and as many in Pontus; six in Thrace and as many in Macedonia or Greece; five in Dacia. In Africa there were three consular provinces--Carthaginian, Byzacena, and Tripolitan--and not only these but others also. Justinian divided Africa into seven provinces which obeyed Governors. The Notitia Imperii records seventeen in Italy, of which eight were consular; there were also seventeen in Gaul and seven in Spain. Experience taught this multiplication, lest Governors could easily gather strength for rebellion. The King of the Spains now uses no other method: he assigns the West Indies to different Viceroys, one of whom resides at Lima and the other at Mexico; he divided the East Indies among three Governors. For if the individual men are moderately powerful, none will ever equal the other Governors, much less the King himself.

[Printed page 546]

CHAPTER XI

Lesser Magistrates Must Be Created Who Can Be Promoted to Greater Dignities, and Inferior Honors Must Not Be Despised by Those Who Have Held Greater Ones

§ 1. There are two altogether most salutary laws, the neglect of which has often afflicted the state.

The first is: Let no one be employed in any office, however slight, in which there is honor and dignity, unless there is hope that he will be fit for greater dignities; above all, let him not be admitted to the court and society of the Prince. For in truth those who, induced by favor or a price, admit wicked, imprudent, or pusillanimous men to the beginnings of governing the state expose themselves, others, and those very men to great evils. For they either proceed to adorn and advance them with injury to the state, or leave them in their own place. The former is opposed to the common good; the latter renders them enemies. For when they perceive younger men, and therefore their subordinates, preferred to themselves, forgetting all benefits, they think of revenge, for which they have some opportunity as sharers in power and conscious of secrets. Next, the hope of rising makes men diligent and faithful in office; this hope does not exist in those who cannot rise. Third, an unprofitable crowd--especially in the courts of Kings--cannot better be avoided. For if no one is admitted to private services except one to whom some part of the state can be entrusted for government, the constitution of the kingdom will be most excellent, for there will be an abundance of the best Governors. Such was the assembly of aged Counselors in David's time; such were the Tribunes and Centurions of Philip of Macedon, from whom so many Kings arose.

Furthermore, it is a most ancient practice for the familiars of Princes to be sent from the palace to govern provinces. Daniel's companions were appointed over the works of Babylon, Daniel 3. But they had been educated to stand before the King, Daniel 1. In this matter it is proper to marvel at such skillful care in the King of Babylon for educating the youth who were to be brought to the helm. Behold, that King who devastated the world, at Daniel 1:3, seeks men among the sons of his enemies:

> And the King said to Ashpenaz, chief of the eunuchs, that he should bring in some of the sons of Israel and of the royal seed and of the rulers: boys in whom there was no blemish, comely in form, instructed in all wisdom, cautious in knowledge and taught in learning, and who could stand in the King's palace, that he might teach them the letters and language of the Chaldeans.

They were chosen for the dignity of manly form and talent; for the Hebrew calls them משכילים, understanding and intelligent; next, cautious in knowledge, דעת ידעי, knowing knowledge, γινώσκοντες γνῶσιν. Third, διανοούμενοι φρόνιμοι, endowed with prudence; and φρόνησις τῶν πρακτῶν is dexterity and knowledge concerning things that must be done.

For these men the King appointed at verse 5 a daily allowance from his own foods and from the wine which he himself drank, so that, after being nourished for three years, they might afterward stand in the presence of the King.

A barbarian King orders talents gathered from the whole kingdom to be cultivated, so that none but prudent and learned men may stand in his presence; meanwhile, the courts of certain Christian Princes are corrupters both of affairs and of morals. That custom was retained among the Persians, 1 Ezra 4:14: "But we, mindful of the salt which we eat in the Palace." The Princes beyond the Euphrates, therefore, had come from the Royal court, and for that reason considered themselves more deeply obligated. The Romans acted much more prudently, if we consider their first institutions--for afterward the dissolute people itself sinned. They wished no one to command in the provinces unless he had held a Magistracy at home, amid so many Magistrates and before the eyes of his own citizens. That this custom also existed among the Emperors is taught both by many other things and by the name of Counts. For because they accompanied the Emperor, they were called Counts, and indeed while the state yet stood. "And among those whom the state itself has given to you as Counts and assistants, you shall be responsible within these limits which I prescribed above; but as for those whom you wished to be with you from domestic connections or from necessary attendants, who are commonly called members of the Praetor's cohort, you must answer not only for their deeds but also for their words."

Those who had been sent from the court were afterward also named Counts when they administered provinces. Hence arose the dignity of Counts, which was also bestowed upon men who had never been in the retinue of Emperors--indeed, who had never seen the Emperor. Hence the Counts of Italy, Africa, Illyricum, the Spains, and the East.

The custom remains even today that the greatest Princes after Caesar possess and perform Palatine offices as though they were domestics of the Emperor. The Archbishop of Mainz is Archchancellor through Germany; the Archbishop of Cologne through Italy; the Archbishop of Trier through Gaul and the Kingdom of Arles. The King of Bohemia is Archcupbearer; the Count Palatine, Archseneschal; the Saxon, Archmarshal; the Margrave of Brandenburg, Chamberlain. They sometimes publicly perform their offices. Just as these Princes are not placed in so lofty a rank in order to mix wines, offer dishes, or distribute oats--because some of them never and most only once display their office to the Emperor--but so that they may sustain the highest affairs of the Empire with the Emperor, in precisely the same way it is fitting for all Kings and Princes to have as ministers of domestic affairs those who can govern others and undertake the state. Indeed, Joshua son of Nun was the minister of Moses, whom God appointed leader of the people; Samuel was minister of Eli the High Priest; Elisha poured water upon the hand of Elijah. Through sharing in power, these men were afterward honored more greatly even by God.

§ 2. SECOND LAW. Let those who have held greater Magistracies not disdain afterward to undertake lesser ones. Scipio Africanus furnished a distinguished example in the state when he accompanied, by a voluntary legateship, his brother the Consul, to whom the Syrian War against Antiochus had been entrusted. Pompey's camp was called a Senate; Cicero says in Philippic 13 that ten former Consuls were in it.

The laws of the Venetians provide that a man who has previously served with greater dignity may refuse a duty in the army. This law was wisely established concerning war; for it is not advantageous to the state for great men who live with authority to be engaged in wars when offended and unwilling. But in civil affairs it is fitting that one who has held the consulship should be Praetor and Aedile and perform other duties. Let him who has governed the Indies, Naples, and Belgium govern a lesser province; let him preside over councils. For if Governors--powerful men--must be changed, although they rightly administer the part of the state entrusted to them, it is better that they remain in command than lead an entirely private life.

[Printed page 547]

But in this class of matters it was wisely established in the Empire of Constantinople that honors and titles should be conferred upon those who had been in dignity and had waged wars, by which they might be more honored than the Governors themselves. Certain Kings and Caesars indeed dignified some eminent men with the name of Fathers. Mithridates had adopted Theodorus of Scepsis as Father, as Plutarch is authority in Lucullus. But Leo, who was called the Philosopher, made it an established dignity and called it βασιλεοπάτορα, Father of the King, according to Zonaras: Ἐτίμησε βασιλεοπάτορα, αὐτὸς τὸ ὄνομα ἐφευρών--he honored him as Father of the King, having himself invented this name. Cedrenus must be understood in this way when he says that, through love of Zoe, daughter of Tzautzes, he so adorned his father-in-law: Τὸ ἀξίωμα καινουργήσας μὴ πρότερον ὄν--innovating a dignity which had not existed before.

Very well indeed. Previously it had been a name of honor and affection, as when Tiberius called Sejanus father, Gaius called Julianus father, Nero called Corbulo father, and Gordian called Misitheus father, just as a Praetor was regarded as virtually a father to his Quaestor; and as Honorius addressed Stilicho and Arcadius Eutropius in this way. But Leo wished it to be a peculiar dignity. In exactly this way, being a Count of the Emperor was formerly a title and an honor, while now it is also a peculiar rank in the kingdoms of Europe. Formerly all Patricians were called fathers of the Emperor; for they are said ἐν τοῖς βασιλέως πατράσι τελεῖν, or ἄγειν--to act among the fathers of Emperors. That it was a great dignity is established from Novel 81:

> Always thinking upon whatever regards the advantage and adornment of the state entrusted to us by God, we hasten to bring it to effect. Therefore, some time ago we also wrote a law concerning our most glorious Patricians, which shows that the conferral of this dignity frees them from paternal power. For we did not consider it fitting that those whom we advance into the office of our fathers should themselves be under another's power. For if the act of emancipation, formerly performed through what are called actions at law, with insults and slaps, freed men from bonds of this kind, how could the most honorable patents of all, given by him who presides over the universal Empire, be unable to free them from paternal power?
>
> But now, thinking more mercifully and even more honorably in the state, we decree the same concerning the most glorious Consuls, who furnish their own name to the age after the Empire and are honored by consular patents alone, and concerning the girdles which can free men from the Curia--that is, the Prefecture and the office of Master of the Soldiers, provided that these are acknowledged in their own seats and works--namely, that every such dignity, or a girdle of this kind acquired by any whom we have approved, which has the power to free them from the Curia, shall also free them from the power of fathers and grandfathers. For if we decreed that, if a slave with his master's knowledge merits military service or obtains any dignity, he is immediately freed by the Empire and carried off into freedom itself, how is it not just that one who merits so great patents should also be made free from paternal power?

But nowhere is there so great an abundance of honored Commanders and of men who are great without a Magistracy as in Spain. Besides commanderies and other supports of dignities, there are Knights of the Golden Fleece, there are those whom they call Los grandes, and there are others whose dignity is no less than that of men who are engaged in affairs and commands. Indeed, they too are most advantageously engaged in council and in the government of regions.

CHAPTER XII

A General Division of Magistrates According to the Practical Mode of the State

§ 1. A twofold order is established among Magistrates who are placed beneath another and who, in kingdoms and states, possess the necessity of obeying joined with the right of commanding. For some are engaged in governing men, others in administering public resources. Among those engaged in governing men are those who direct them toward the end of the state, so that they may live according to virtue and become happy. Their duties are various, because some actions are honorable and are commanded for the public good, while others are depraved and are prohibited. But because controversies and lawsuits frequently arise and it is not established what is equitable or good, in every well-constituted state investigators and Judges have been established to determine doubtful matters. These in truth possess public and great power. Those, therefore, who arrange the other matters and take counsel for the fatherland are simply called Magistrates, such as the Consuls at Rome. Those who decide controversies have as their subjects only those who come to grips by law, and only in that cause which has been entrusted to them as Judges. We call them Juridical Magistrates and Judges; the Praetors at Rome were of this sort.

The second class of Magistrates is occupied in acquiring, increasing, and preserving the resources of the fatherland; this generally pertains to Quaestors, because they expend care upon the gain of the state. They are therefore curators of the public patrimony--that is, of all revenues and income, public buildings, and ports. Every kingdom and every state, therefore, is completed by Consular, Praetorian, and Quaestorian Magistracy, and all offices and dignities are referred to these classes. By these, therefore, the polity is constituted according to the ancient custom; and this care falls upon the Monarch, the aristocracy, or the people: that the designated Magistrates govern rightly and justly, pronounce law accurately, and handle the resources honestly and purely. I shall therefore speak concerning these matters from ancient and modern customs and laws.

But because, amid so great a variety of affairs, there is need of stable and wise counsel--which in an Aristocracy and Polity we call a Senate, in a Monarchy by the common name a Council, elsewhere a Consistory, and elsewhere a Parliament--there is no other distinction among them if all things are lawfully administered, except that the councils of Monarchs depend upon them, in an Aristocracy they are free, and in a Polity they are confirmed by the suffrages of the people. If all these things, I say, are lawfully administered, the state is well governed. For many dangers arise from the vices of those who deliberate and give opinions. The peculiar evil of a free Senate is the oppression of the people and the elevation of the nobility; nor is there less danger of popularity in a popular Senate, by which first Athens and then Rome perished. Until now fear and flattery have been injurious in the council of Monarchs. Let us furnish the state first with counsel, then with its Magistrates, and these with their laws.

CHAPTER XIII

A Suitable Senate Must Be Chosen: Its Laws, and Likewise Concerning Counselors

§ 1. Let the Senate, both in a free state and in a Monarchy, be the chief dignity and power. Its dignity indeed derives from birth and census, but more from the selection of prudence and virtue. God gave Moses a Senate. For although God himself taught him, although he instructed him for two periods of forty days and nights on the mountain, and although he spoke to him face to face as to a friend, he nevertheless joined to him seventy Elders, to whom he gave of his own spirit, so that he might show that by a singular divine power and kindness he favors those who are lawfully summoned to public counsel. This is so true that we see the excellent decrees and most holy opinions and laws of even the most wicked men, and daily make use of the state which they instituted.

[Printed page 548]

But because the highest authority is needed in public counsel, it came about from ancient times that those nearest in dignity were Counselors to Kings. Thus there were seven Princes of the Persians, concerning whom Artaxerxes says in 1 Ezra 7:14: “For you have been sent from the presence of the King and his seven Counselors to visit Judea and Jerusalem.” And at verse 15 the King and his Counselors offer gifts. Therefore Ezra says that God inclined his mercy before the King, his Counselors, and all the powerful Princes of the kingdom. God numbers Counselors among the highest blessings, Isaiah 1:25: “And I shall turn my hand toward you, smelt your dross to purity, and take away all your tin.”

And Proverbs 15:22: “Thoughts are dissipated where there is no counsel; but where there are many Counselors, they are confirmed.” Aristotle also says most truly that counsel is the most divine of the things that exist among men. Although the Roman Senate was drawn from Romulus’s dregs, nevertheless to Cineas it seemed an assembly of Kings. It was called the counsel of the whole world, the most ample order, and the glory of the Empire. But if those commendations possessed any appearance of truth in that Senate, they are most true in the present Empire.

For who denies that the Senate of the German Empire is a royal assembly, in which preside the Emperor of the Romans and seven Electors, one of whom displays the power and insignia of a King, while the others possess an almost royal power and three possess the majesty of the Priesthood? To these are added so many Princes, Counts, and Legates of numerous and powerful cities, chosen from their Senates, that I could in no way believe that even the Senate of Rome at its most flourishing equaled them. For that ancient Senate under the Kings, drawn from a gathered people and an asylum, ought not to be compared with the Senate-house of any city today. Formerly that band of one hundred was often a Senate in meadows, when the rustic Senate-house had Fathers with hide-clad hearts.

At first one hundred, then two hundred, and under Priscus three hundred were appointed; in Caesar’s time they exceeded a thousand, when criminal and sordid men from every nation had been thrust into it. The Senate of the Empire therefore represents the dignity of the Empire excellently. Add that, for the advantage of that time and by a good moderation of concord, Senators were chosen from the plebs and through the suffrages of the plebs. Formerly the dignity of Princes and Senators in other kingdoms was not dissimilar, but it endures almost only in Germany.

§ 2. In order that the Senate may retain its majesty, care must be taken that unworthy men are not elected; therefore those who are one day to enter that order must be trained early. Cicero in book 3 of On the Laws wishes the Senate to be composed of Magistrates. This is a most excellent plan, for the man most fit to give counsel concerning the state is one who has governed the state or some part of it. Yet a man must not be admitted if he has administered a Magistracy badly. Thus, if he has been charged with treason, extortion, or electoral corruption, let him not sit in the most ample order unless acquitted by judgment. Next, since it is more dangerous for an inexperienced man to command than to be a Senator, it appears no more fitting that one who has held a Magistracy should be in the Senate than that one who is to command should be taken from the Senate. Hence above I especially approved those who early employ in deliberations the men who are being educated in the hope of governing the state. The great Emperor Augustus agrees with me. Although he kept an unprofitable crowd from the Senate-house, he nevertheless permitted the children of Senators, so that they might more quickly become accustomed to the state, immediately to assume the broad stripe upon taking the toga of manhood and to attend the Senate-house. Thus Augustus acted. Yet I scarcely think those younger men gave opinions; I judge that they were instructed by hearing others.

Formerly the names of unworthy men were erased from the roll; when they were passed over by the Censor, they were said to be removed from the Senate. Yet they did not perpetually lack the Senate-house, but were sometimes chosen by a subsequent Censor; indeed, some were afterward created Censors, as I shall later say of Salinator. We learn that in ancient times there was great virtue among Senators because they were readily removed. Marcus Valerius Maximus and Gaius Junius Bubulcus Brutus removed Lucius Antonius from the Senate because he had repudiated the wife whom he had married as a virgin without summoning any of his friends into counsel. Valerius, book 2, chapter 9.

Thus Marcus Porcius Cato removed Lucius Flamininus from the number of Senators because in his province he had beheaded a certain condemned man with an axe, choosing the time of execution according to the whim and for the spectacle of a little woman by whose love he was held. Regard for the consulship which he had held, and the authority of his brother, the Consular Titus Flamininus, could have restrained him. But both a Censor and a Cato--twofold examples of severity--he resolved to mark him all the more because he had polluted the majesty of the most ample honor by so foul a crime and had not cared that the eyes of a prostitute, delighted by human blood, and the suppliant hands of King Philip were recorded among the same ancestral images.

Why should I speak of the censorship of Fabricius Luscinus? His age has related and posterity will relate that he did not retain Cornelius Rufinus in the Senatorial order, though he had most splendidly held two consulships and a dictatorship, because he had acquired ten pounds of silver vessels, as though luxurious by evil example. By my faith, the very letters of our age appear to me to stand amazed when they are compelled to accommodate their service to such severity and to fear lest they be thought to commemorate deeds not of our City. For it is scarcely credible that within the same sacred boundary ten pounds of silver were both an invidious census and poverty was regarded as most contemptible.

Marcus Antonius and Lucius Flaccus, as Censors, removed Duronius from the Senate because, while Tribune of the plebs, he had repealed a law carried to restrain the expenses of banquets--a marvelous cause of the mark.

For how imprudently Duronius ascended the Rostra to say these things: “Bridles have been imposed upon you, Quirites, which must in no way be endured; you have been bound and constrained by the bitter bond of servitude. For a law has been carried which orders you to be frugal. Let us therefore repeal that dominion encrusted with the rust of savage antiquity. For what need is there of liberty if it is not lawful for those who wish it to perish through luxury?”

This was a most just reason why he should be removed from the Senate; in the case of Flamininus, an even more just one.

Augustus, as Dio relates in book 52, diminished the number and purified it. For he exhorted each man to be judge of himself according to the consciousness of his birth and life, and so persuaded fifty voluntarily to reduce themselves to their proper order. Augustus did not act rightly in this. For he did not purify the Senate by that method. First, who, once admonished by Augustus, would dare to enter the Senate-house against his will, if not about to pay penalties, certainly about to hear insults? Next, there were a thousand; of these, the more modest departed, and by this very fact were better than those who remained and hardened themselves against the admonitions. Therefore, a little afterward he reformed the Senate-house by another and more effective remedy. The same Dio says in book 54: Τριάκοντα ἄνδρας τοὺς ἀρίστους ἐξελέξατο, καὶ ἐκείνους ἐκέλευσε καθὰ πέντε εἰς πινάκια γράψαντες ἑλέσθαι.

[Printed page 549]

He chose thirty of the best men and ordered them to write names on tablets in groups of five and to choose. I do not understand this as though only five had been written by each man--that is, one hundred fifty--and the best chosen from them; that number is far too small. Rather, since there were more than a thousand Senators, he wished the names of all to be transferred separately from the roll which he had ordered publicly posted onto tablets, five by five, so that the thirty Censors might judge concerning each group of five.

§ 3. The ancients judged it equitable that the power of the Senate should be very great: "Whatever the Senate has decreed, let them do." Yet this was afterward limited, for the provision was changed: "Commands, powers, and legateships--when the Senate has decreed and the people ordered--shall depart from the City." And: "All Magistrates shall possess auspices and judicial power; from these shall the Senate be composed; its decrees shall be valid. But if an equal or greater power has prohibited them, let the written senatorial decrees be preserved. Let that order be free from every vice; let it be an example to the rest."

The power over war, embassies, and treaties belonged to the Senate. The month of February was customarily allotted to hearing embassies. Decrees of the Senate possessed the force of law; afterward the people were asked whether the Quirites willed and ordered it. But when the people's power had been transferred to the Prince, he was accustomed to enact laws, but from the authority of the Senate. Evil Princes, however, were insulting toward the Senate. Julius, while Consul and not yet Dictator, kept it from the Senate-house through fear. Antonius, not yet Triumvir, threatened Cicero in Philippic 11 with workmen to demolish his house if he did not attend. Nero fined a Senator under the title that he was infrequent in attendance. The same Antonius surrounded the Senate with armed men so that opinions could not be given freely. But it is shameful to possess a public council and oppress it. Formerly nothing could be done with the people except by the authority of the Senate; afterward seditious citizens, by disparaging the Fathers to the Princes, won the people to themselves, and, having become more powerful, oppressed the people itself.

§ 4. It is not fitting for too many to be chosen into the Senate, for it cannot happen that many unworthy of that order are not admitted. Accordingly, although the Roman Empire extended most widely under Augustus, a thousand Senators was considered too great a crowd. Next, that number cannot conveniently be assembled or asked for opinions. Yet the Venetians are not therefore to be censured because, although they do not possess a twentieth part of the Roman Empire, they have nevertheless constituted a Senate twice as numerous; for they are said to number two thousand on the roll. But it must be said that this Great Council represents an assembly rather than a Senate, although it is an assembly not of the plebs but of the nobility. For in that great meeting of the nobility Magistrates are created, dignities and duties of offices are conferred, and supplements are given to other councils in which the Elders deliberate. Various councils have been instituted. From them one which they call the Pregadi is constituted, into which men who excel in prudence and experience are chosen from the Great Council; it generally has no more than two hundred twenty Senators. This properly represents a Senate: they transact all matters of peace and war and the greatest affairs, and decree with great power. Yet at last matters return to fewer men, for whatever the ten Sages establish with the agreement of the Six and the Fifteen is held valid.

§ 5. A Senator had the right not merely to say what and for as long as he wished concerning the matter proposed, but even to speak concerning the state although the Magistrates had not referred that matter. They adorned their tunic with the broad stripe; afterward they used silvered carriages, as is found in Aurelian's concession in Vopiscus. Formerly they could be accused before the people by Tribunes and others; afterward the Prefect of the City alone was their Judge. Alexander Severus wished Senators to be punished only by the Senate. Spartianus in Severus.

Emperors and Kings were also accustomed to grant many privileges to Senators, and not undeservedly, for to give counsel is more than to give money: Βουλῆς γὰρ ὀρθῆς οὐδὲν ἀσφαλέστερον--nothing is safer than good counsel. For force without counsel collapses under its own mass, the more swiftly the greater its weight. One who does not wish to err needs counsel, not impulse.

§ 6. I admonish the Prince to employ no less care in choosing his highest Counselors than in entrusting lesser Magistracies. Indeed, if many unsuitable men are chosen, the state is moved more gravely from the very first beginning. Vopiscus says rightly in Aurelian:

> First of all, excessive license; then an abundance of affairs; moreover, wicked friends, detestable attendants, most avaricious Eunuchs, courtiers either foolish or detestable, and--what cannot be denied--ignorance of public affairs. But I heard my father say that Diocletian the Prince, when already a private man, said that nothing was more difficult than to command well. Four or five men assemble and form one plan for deceiving the Emperor; they say what must be approved. The Emperor, who is enclosed at home, does not know the truth; he is compelled to know only what they say. He appoints Judges who ought not to be appointed; he removes from the state those whom he ought to retain. Why say more? As Diocletian himself said, a good, cautious, excellent Emperor is sold. These are Diocletian's words, which I inserted so that your prudence might know that nothing is more difficult than a good Prince.

Consider, reader, the deeds of our age, and you will grieve that the same things happen in almost every court. In every state and every Empire it has always been possible to find more men ready with the hand and illustrious in war than good in counsel. The lot of Princes is pitiable: they possess armies prepared to undergo dangers for the majesty of the Empire, yet discover few who advise rightly and prudently and whom they may safely trust--so much so that many have possessed three or four, and some not even one, who were both prudent and faithful. Therefore the most prudent Consul in book 1 of On Duties prefers Counselors to warriors. And Euripides says well: "The counsel of one man surpasses the hands of many."

§ 7. The marks and endowments of a good Senator and Counselor are as follows.

First, in a Senator and Counselor I require a settled age, or rather old age, exercised in affairs.

> The Senate has its mild name from old men.

I wish young men to be employed in counsels, but for hearing and disputing, not for deciding. The greatest states have been shaken by young men, sustained and restored by old men. For when rash and audacious young men approach the helm, the greatest and most wretched shipwrecks occur. What Paulus Aemilius said concerning an Emperor--that, if not in age, he ought at least to be an old man in character--also befits the Emperor's council. For there is a most prudent saying of Alfonso the Great: Counselors of Kings ought either to be Kings or to possess the minds of Kings. For if they govern a King, they ought to be endowed with the mind of one who governs. If so great a virtue falls into a youthful mind, it does not readily persevere; the mind is soft, unstable through age, and exposed to deceits. The body of old men is weak with years, but their mind strong with wisdom. In young men there is, to say it in a word, νέα φροντίς, youthful care. Yet even if the disposition is good, that saying remains:

[Printed page 550]

> Αἱ ἄρισται φύσεις μεγίστης παιδείας δέονται.

The best disposition needs the greatest discipline.

The second virtue is silence, the safeguard of secrets. For we ought not to doubt that a Prince and a state whose counsels are divulged are betrayed by their own Counselors; by this most of those counsels are rendered ineffectual and do harm. Silence is rare in a multitude. Therefore many use few Counselors. The remedy is that many should judge what must be done, few should know what you are about to do, and sometimes no one besides the Prince. For this reason states sometimes entrust secret matters to very few men. "Be silent" is a golden precept. Taciturnity is the best and safest bond for administering an affair.

For this reason I think that the Prince's council in which deliberation occurred was called the silentium. Paulus Diaconus says in book 22 of the Miscellaneous History that Copronymus held one every day against images. The same author in book 21 says that Leo celebrated a silentium in the hall of nineteen couches against the holy images; and in book 23 that Irene, after holding a silentium in Justinian's Triclinium, remitted taxes. That place was called the silentiarium, Diaconus, book 16; the silentiarii kept watch there, and Senators were chosen from them. Accordingly, the council and the place were called silentium and silentiarium so that all might be reminded of secrecy. Cedrenus says concerning Phocas that Phocas contradicted Maurice in the silentium. Among the Persians no one is conscious of the counsels except taciturn and faithful nobles, among whom even a divinity of Silence is worshiped. Ammianus, book 21.

The third virtue is that he should not cling to his own opinion but willingly exchange it for a better judgment. Far from the Senate-house and court be those Laconians--as Tacitus calls them--who are enemies of any counsel, however excellent, which they themselves did not bring, and obstinate against experienced men. They err because they judge liberty to be placed in obstinacy, not in moderation. Spartianus relates that Severus was asked by a Greek what he bore most grievously at Rome. He replied: "When ministers obstinately contradict my opinion, and this upon no foundation whatever."

Fourth, let them take care not to deal privately with the legates of other Princes; rivals easily purchase them for themselves at a small price. I said above that among the Romans it was held a crime of treason to receive privately the legates or Commanders of enemies. Nothing brought so much envy upon Scipio Asiaticus as certain services rendered to Antiochus. Even now, what was charged against Barnevelt besides a certain familiarity with the Spaniards, which he nevertheless excuses?

The fifth and most necessary virtue is liberty of mind, so that they may not be beholden to neighboring, hostile, or rival Princes. This will chiefly be judged from whether they are bound to them by feudal right, whether they possess properties in their territories, whether they are increased with gifts and honors by the opposing party, and whether they court foreign friendships. For it is a sign that they by no means trust their own Prince and therefore--because trust binds trust--that they are not faithful. But if a Counselor is compelled by fear to suppress the best counsels, it is just as if a soldier ready in spirit and robust in body were forbidden by the Commander to free his sword from its sheath when the enemy makes an attack. Princes who order good counsels to be concealed in the Senate-house sin with no less loss than those who order weapons to be concealed in the battle line.

The sixth virtue is that they themselves should know their own condition. They themselves will certainly bear the outcome of bad counsel; for until now no one has been found to whom evil counsels have not given an evil outcome, although for a time they drew some interest from prosperity. Claudian in book 1 glories that evil counsels thus returned upon Eutropius:

> How well it has been arranged upon earth
>
> That the fruit of a counsel presses upon its first authors!
>
> Thus the seer who, while the river had been dry for many years,
>
> Advised that the Thunderer be appeased by a murdered guest,
>
> First stained the altars invented by Busiris;
>
> And he fell as the victim of the savage rite which he had prescribed.
>
> Thus the craftsman of the bull and inventor of torments,
>
> Who had fashioned deadly bronze for a novel suffering,
>
> First felt the untried work when the Sicilian tyrant compelled him,

And taught his own bull to bellow.

Nero's companions, envying Burrus and Seneca, destroyed the Prince. "Do you endure these things? Do you fear those men? Do you not know that you are Caesar, and that you possess power over them, not they over you?" They said these things before Nero, and afterward were the first to experience the insults and savagery of the bloodthirsty beast.

Let this therefore be fixed: whoever has given counsel for another's destruction should be rejected as guilty. Nero's mother, the cause of so many crimes, at last herself suffered her son's savagery. This has never failed, not even in our own time.

The seventh virtue is that counsels should be timely. Those counsels whose time has passed are generally accustomed to appear best. To give after a disaster the counsel by which it could have been avoided is to reproach the Prince with folly. Perseus in flight stabbed a Counselor who gave counsels too late. Selim acted barbarously and with Ottoman cruelty when he killed the author of a counsel whose outcome had been evil. It is the Counselor's duty to determine concerning a matter to be done, to foretell what evils will arise and by what means they can be guarded against. Anyone can be Prometheus after the deeds.

The eighth virtue is diligent study of political affairs and knowledge of history and examples with great judgment. For it belongs to the highest arrogance or negligence to neglect the judgments of good men. There is an oracle in Tacitus, book 1 of the Histories: to advise a Prince what he ought to do is a task of great labor. Therefore remedies for the evils of the state are not found among cups; speech, study, and exercise are needed. Fortune also follows all things done with the highest reason and counsel. Livy, book 5. But if fortune deserts the doer, the fruit of good counsel is nevertheless most salutary in itself.

The ninth virtue is that they should avoid precipitation and employ speed only when there is danger in delay. Whatever is done by impulse rarely grows strong. Therefore they say that Tiberius never deliberated twice about the same matter, because the first counsel was mature and complete. It is not royal to act rashly. Nicetas says: Μὴ βασιλικὸν τὸ αὐτόματον, καὶ ἀνακριβὲς ἐν ταῖς πράξεσι· τὸ δὲ περιεσκεμμένον καὶ χρόνιον.

[Printed page 551]

It is not royal to act without counsel and inaccurately, but considerately and slowly.

The tenth virtue is to put aside all passions early, for after the mind has changed it is not lawful to recall what has already been advised. Avarice must especially be put aside. Wherever gain shines forth, public safety is sold without regard. Regard for private affairs has always hindered and will hinder public counsels. Livy, book 2. Hope belongs here:

Few honor Kings, not kingdoms;

The splendor of the court summons more.

The second passion is favor or hatred. All men oppose their enemies with greater zeal than they assist their friends, for the spur of anger is sharper, and the desire for vengeance is hostile to counsels. The third is the evil of envy, by which spite commands some men to oppose the advancement of others--an immense evil and, what you may marvel at, sometimes more powerful than their own advantages.

The eleventh virtue is sincerity, which requires him to bring forward that which he judges true and salutary. For the best counsels are not those which are most pleasant but those which are true and salutary, as Solon wisely said. Frederick wished two things to be absent in giving counsel: simulation and dissimulation. Therefore one who so moderates his words that, whatever happens, he may appear to have spoken rightly must not be held in the place of a Counselor. It belongs to a wicked man to conceal the truth at the beginning, speak with the Prince's fortune rather than counsel the Prince, and at last twist his opinion in the direction toward which the affair inclines. Sincerity must therefore be regarded; a man is not always to be heard because he once advised well. Indeed, he is not to be held of better faith merely because he advised more prudently. Great, though frequently voluntary, is the unhappiness of Princes: although they do everything so that they may possess sincere Counselors and friends, they are nevertheless very often deceived. The cause is that they do not test them sufficiently.

The twelfth virtue is that his reputation should be honorable. For the first judgment concerning a Prince is formed from this: if he chooses good Counselors, a good judgment; if evil ones, an evil judgment. Therefore let him choose good Counselors, men who fear God and love truth, and finally prudent men; for not every friend can be a Counselor. A Counselor of evil reputation stains the best counsel with his own disgrace. Therefore, when a wicked man had given an excellent counsel, the Lacedaemonians ordered the same counsel to be proposed by another man and used the counsel after changing its author. The reputation of the Prince, and much more that of the Senate, consists in the estimation of the individual members. That saying remains perpetually in men's minds:

Τοιοῦτός ἐστιν ἕκαστος, οἷσπερ ἥδεται ξυνών.

Each man is such as are those whose company delights him. Few continually observe the Prince's life, but all observe those of his Counselors, and from them speak about the Prince most willingly and most dangerously.

The thirteenth virtue is fortitude. It is easy to speak bravely among equals in the Senate-house; but if the countenance of Tiberius or the savagery of Gaius threatens the speaker, you will now scarcely find one who advises what is right. Xerxes thanked Demaratus because he alone had spoken the truth; but this was Xerxes' fault, for until then he had preferred to hear pleasant things rather than true ones. Let Princes remove fear if they desire to hear good counsels. Theopompus, when asked what method there was for preserving a kingdom, replied: if the Prince permits his friends a just liberty of speaking and vindicates, so far as can be done, the injuries of his subjects. If Counselors are brave, they will neither shape their opinions according to the royal countenance nor, when harassed by the reproaches of many, depart from what is right. Meanwhile, the King to whom it is dangerous to give good counsel has perished.

Let the Counselor therefore be brave and endure private disadvantages for the public good.

The fourteenth virtue is that, after hearing others, if he judges their counsels better, he should willingly and gladly change his own, and should regard this as the conduct of a wise man. For to change an evil thing into a good or better one is not levity. If, while you were walking on the right road, another informed you of an easier shortcut, you would immediately follow it. Would you not do this for the safety of the state? Above I admonished him not to be an enemy of another's counsel. Here I inculcate again and again that you should not consider a change of counsel unbecoming to a grave, knowledgeable, and experienced man, even in extreme old age. It belongs to the highest felicity to have seen and chosen the best things at first sight; but that man is superior who declares that he has seen less than another. No one can be more faithful in giving counsel than one who, after renouncing his own, approves another's. He wishes provision to be made for the Prince's safety rather than for his own reputation. This is a rare and arduous virtue. You would sooner find one who counsels rightly than one who bears with an equitable mind the rejection of his own counsel. Ahithophel, whose counsel was as the counsel of God, could advise nothing for himself except hanging. Not even Seneca, of the Stoic sect, approves that proud promise in book 4 of On Benefits, chapter 24: that a wise man never repents of his deed, never amends what he has done, and never changes his counsel. And in chapter 28: "It is not levity to depart from a recognized and condemned error; and it must be frankly confessed: I thought otherwise; I was deceived. But this is the perseverance of proud folly: What I have once said, of whatever kind it is, shall be fixed and ratified."

The fifteenth virtue is that he should be frequent in attendance and should not seek evasions in odious causes. They took pledges. Cicero lays down the law in book 3 of On the Laws: "Let either cause or fault attach to the Senator who is not present." Indeed, if he is faithful, let him thrust himself forward voluntarily, admonish and press, and be troublesome for the safety of the state. Thus acted Cato, concerning whom Plutarch writes in Caesar. But to Cato, who frequently foretold impending things, this remained: at first to obtain the name of an importunate and meddlesome Counselor, afterward that of a prudent but unhappy one.

More unhappy than Cato was Harpagus, who paid the penalties of right counsel. Seneca, book 3 of On Anger, chapter 15. He therefore entered the number of those who showed by great disasters how dearly good counsels cost the friends of Kings. I do not doubt that Harpagus too advised his King and the Persians of something of this kind, by which the King was offended and set his children before him to be eaten; then he asked whether the seasoning pleased him. Afterward, when he saw him sufficiently filled with his own evils, he ordered their heads to be brought and asked how he had been received. Words did not fail the wretched man, nor did his mouth close: "At a King's table," he said, "every dinner is pleasant." What did he gain by this flattery? That he was not invited to the leftovers.

The sixteenth virtue is that he should not dispute about the state outside the Senate, in circles or at banquets. Cicero says rightly: "Let a Senator speak in the proper place and manner." That is, in a lawful Senate, lawfully convened, in his own order, setting forth his opinion clearly and briefly and refuting others with modesty, if there is need. The place of the Senate was the Senate-house, sometimes a temple, outside or within the City. Afterward the place in which the Counselors of Princes debated grave affairs of the Empire was called the Consistory; indeed, the Consistory was the very Senate of Princes. Lampridius calls the fifty most learned Jurists under Alexander the "Consistory of the Prince"; with their assistance he made senatorial decrees and edicts. They also call that Senate θεῖον συνέδριον and βασιλικὸν συνέδριον, as Hesychius does. Their dignity was great; the chief notaries who were of the Consistory are mentioned in book 2 of the Theodosian Code. Hence there is frequent mention of Consistorians, Novel 13; hence Counts of the Sacred Consistory and Counts of the Daily Consistory. Afterward it was also called the Sanctuary. In these places, therefore, and in this manner, let a Senator give his opinion. To hawk his opinion everywhere belongs to foolish vanity.

[Printed page 552]

It pertains to place and manner that the one who possesses power should consult the Senate. Formerly this right belonged to the King, Interrex, Dictator, Consuls, Praetors, Tribunes, and Prefect of the City. Cicero says: "The Consul, Praetor, Master of the People and Horse, and the man whom the Fathers appoint for the purpose of directing the election of Consuls shall possess the right of conducting business with the people and Fathers; and the Tribunes whom the plebs shall choose for themselves shall possess the right of conducting business with the Fathers. Let them carry to the plebs whatever will be the Senate's judgment. Let the business conducted with the people and with the Fathers be moderate." Here he also names the Master of the Horse. To deliberate about the state without the Prince's command is deservedly numbered among crimes of treason, because it belongs to the supreme power, or to him to whom that power has entrusted it, to convoke the supreme council. Next, when men deliberate about the highest interests against the Prince's will, by this very fact they in some measure depose the Prince, for they assume for themselves the right of deciding, whether it pleases the Prince or altogether displeases him.

The eighteenth virtue is that he should be well skilled in law and the state. There is a golden law in Cicero: "Let him understand the causes of the people." Augustus joined to himself fifteen experienced men illustrious for prudence, as Xiphilinus relates, and with them settled affairs arising daily. Tiberius chose twenty Senators by lot for six months. Not rightly by lot, which often falls upon the worst men; nor ought it to have been for six months, for many lawsuits and many affairs come to different men and need new instruction. It is necessary to hear those who preceded them. Those deliberate best who take examples for future affairs from the past. Dio, book 10. Stobaeus 94 praises a saying of Bias: Μία ἐστὶν ἀρχὴ τὸ καλῶς βουλεύεσθαι, γνῶναι περὶ οὗ ὁ λόγος. There is one beginning of advising well: that you know the matter about which the discourse is--not only the matter itself, but also its circumstances.

The nineteenth virtue is that he should be intermediate between the highest and lowest rank. Thus he should neither be a rank-and-file Senator, because he neither benefits the state and is despised, nor undertake all things, because he draws the dangers of all upon himself. Those who presided over the Prince's council were called Proedri. Phocas instituted that dignity. The supreme man was called πρωτοπρόεδρος; he sometimes governed all things while the appearance of power remained with the Prince. But perpetual experience has taught that this is most difficult. The highest favor and estimation do not endure long; therefore let him especially maintain the middle. It is permitted him to proceed between abrupt obstinacy and shameful obedience along a path free from ambition and dangers. Let Counselors follow courageous and faithful physicians whose sole purpose is to protect or recover the Prince's health and who are exempt from, and unconcerned with, other matters. A different man whose object is set upon those other things will advance through disasters of the fatherland to wealth and honors.

The twentieth virtue of a Counselor is that he should not offer himself to the Prince. For a man who, through intercessions and prayers, contrives to be able to give counsel to the Prince is convicted of loving the splendor and resources of the court more than the state. The Prince must therefore hold as suspect those who sell counsels for a price, for at the same price they will drag the Prince over precipices. If Princes therefore seek true counsels, let them seek Jehoiadas, Isaiahs, Ambroses--holy men. Those who are prodigal of counsels and speeches, who thrust themselves forward without being asked and instead ask of their own accord, mix in their own advantage. It is indeed marvelous that, although giving counsel is a task of the greatest labor, many possess audacity in giving it but few patience in receiving it. Amid the crowds of men selling counsels, I see few buyers.

The twenty-first virtue is experience and, from it, knowledge. I prefer to hear Hannibal concerning an army rather than a hundred Philosophers. For authority belongs to experience. Knowledge and use possess great power for persuasion. In truth, for the highest governors of Empire those who advise pious and honorable things are the instruments of a good age, as Symmachus says in epistle 16. Such men are the highest resources of a Prince. Σύμβουλος ἀγαθὸς χρησιμώτατον καὶ βασιλικώτατον ἁπάντων κτημάτων ἐστίν--a good Counselor is the most useful and most royal of all possessions.

The twenty-second virtue is piety, by which all human affairs are rightly governed. For those who assemble without God and take counsel against the Lord and his Christ meditate vain things.

Hence I admonish the Prince not readily to hear those who know affairs neither by experience, reading, nor hearing, for they pronounce most confidently lest they appear ignorant. No method is more effective for beating them back than to demand the reason for what they say; for the reasoning of an imprudent opinion is commonly much more imprudent.

The twenty-third virtue is to be content with the present condition and hostile to change unless it most manifestly tends toward the better. Change reveals many disadvantages which previously lay hidden. The poor, indebted, ambitious, envious, and imprudent are eager for change. Doubts must sometimes be proposed to test them so that they may open their minds; meanwhile, they must be seriously restrained and, if they are restless, sent away.

The twenty-fourth virtue is not to be a flatterer. If a physician has once mixed poison, you always turn away from him. If a Counselor has ever sinned by praising your vices or extolling your virtues beyond the truth, do not admit him to a second consultation; much less should you hear flatterers alone. The society of men who nourish the Prince's vices by flattery must be avoided; much less, therefore, must their counsels be heard. Although at the beginning they lie hidden, nevertheless what they conceal in the root is disclosed in the branches, and what lies hidden in the leaves shines forth in the fruit. They consider pleasing the Prince their sole fruit.

The twenty-fifth virtue is that he should not be excessively audacious. For audacious counsels are fitter for changing affairs than preserving them. The authors of audacious counsels will be beaten back if they are compelled to pursue with their hand what they advise with their mouth. I therefore prefer a Counselor who is too cautious to one who is too audacious, for the Prince will employ him more safely. Indeed, those who are more cautious and appear timid are braver than audacious men when the matter has been reached. The reason is that they come prepared for outcomes and difficulties; rashness, because it is struck by an unforeseen missile, casts down the spirit more quickly than it assumed it. Boasters are the most timid. Just as inflated wineskins swell more splendidly than full ones but become flaccid at a slight puncture, so men ferocious in words expire at the first blow of danger: in peace they are lions; in battle, deer.

The twenty-sixth virtue, and the truest criterion of a Counselor, is whether, when he can, he assists the Prince not only by counsel but also by deed.

[Printed page 553]

Πᾶς λόγος ἐστὶ μάταιος, ὁ μὴ τετελεσμένος ἔργῳ.

Καὶ πᾶσα πρᾶξις τὸν λόγον ἔχει.

Every counsel which is not completed by deed is vain; and every deed possesses its rationale.

For example, a Prince of Germany advises the Emperor to wage war against the Turks. If he assists with provisions, soldiers, and money, he is a true friend, who assists by deed in a doubtful affair when there is need of deed. To assist citizens by counsel and aid is most praiseworthy. But if the advocate of war is a veteran military Commander and demands an immense stipend for his own labor, who doubts that he is advancing his own interest, not the public one?

And so much concerning the endowments and office of Counselors. Let us now consider what must be done by the Prince in this matter.

§ 8. The highest prudence of a Prince is that he should persuade himself with certainty that he needs counsel, and that this is a great part of prudence: not to trust in one's own prudence. For true prudence seeks safeguards for itself from elsewhere. God, because he knows and foresees all things of all affairs, does not need counsel; the wisest of men ought to employ another's prudence. This is so necessary that the ancients, ignorant of the divine majesty yet suspecting something concerning divinity, invented the story that Jupiter convened a council of the gods; much more did they judge counsel necessary for Kings. For if, when doubts arise in private affairs, each man consults his friends, how much more is this necessary in the state itself, where the affairs are both greater and more intricate? Nor should the Prince think that he possesses sufficient wisdom in himself. He is a man--that is, ignorant of many things, not rightly instructed concerning many, and, even if he moderates his passions, he has not yet put them off. Many private men surpass the Prince in prudence. Therefore, just as he uses the labor of others and creates lesser magistrates--Viceroys, Governors, Legates, Praetors, and Consuls--so also in directing all these let him join another's prudence to his own. It belongs to supreme majesty not so much to be surrounded by an army and to glory in the splendor of a bodyguard and dwelling, as to make the prudence of the most illustrious and wisest men its own. No Princes have perished except those who neglected the counsels of prudent men. Aristotle spoke truly, but because he wrote to a foolish young man, he admonished in vain:

Εἰ δὲ τὸ βουλεύεσθαι τῶν περὶ τὸν ἄνθρωπον θειότατόν ἐστιν, ὥστε οὐκ εἰς τὰ πάρεργα καὶ μηδενὸς ἄξια τὴν σπουδὴν ἐστὶ σοὶ καταναλίσκειν, ἀλλὰ τῷ μέγιστον αὐτὸς καλῶς βουλεύεσθαι μαθεῖν βέλτιον· τίς γὰρ δὴ ποτ' ἂν ἀμφισβητήσειε τῶν νοῦν ἐχόντων, ὅτι τὸ μὲν πράττειν μὴ βεβουλευμένον σημεῖόν ἐστιν ἀνοίας, τὸ δὲ μετὰ τὴν ἀρίστην εὐβουλίαν τῆς διανοίας; Ἔξεστι δὲ καὶ ταῦτα τοὺς ἄριστα τῶν Ἑλλήνων πολιτευομένους λόγῳ πρότερον, ἢ τοῖς ἔργοις συγγινομένους πρὸς δὲ τούτοις, ἢ τοῖς μέγιστον ἀξίωμα τῶν βαρβάρων ἔχοντας, τοῦτο πρότερον περιμαθήσαντας ἔχειν αὐτὸς, ὡς ἀκρόπολίς ἐστι σωτηρίας, ἡ διὰ τοῦ λόγου γινομένη τοῦ συμφέροντος θεωρία.

Moreover, among human affairs it is most august to make use of deliberation. Therefore your zeal must not be expended upon superfluous and commonplace matters; rather, you must labor to the extent of your strength both to learn thoroughly and to possess the art itself of deliberating well. For who of sound mind would doubt that, if someone has done something without counsel, this is a sign of madness, but if with reason as his guide, of wisdom? One may also observe that all those who enjoy the best constitution among the Greeks first meet in speech before they meet in deeds. Likewise among those Barbarians who excel in dignity, speech precedes deeds, since they well know that the perception and knowledge of advantage which arises through reason and discourse is a kind of citadel of safety.

Accordingly, that opinion of Antoninus Pius was worthy of the majesty of a ruler: "It is more equitable that I should follow the counsels of so many and such great friends than that so many and such great friends should follow me alone." None of the most prudent Princes arranged so great a mass of affairs without great assistants. I have discovered this: all kingdoms, cities, and nations possessed prosperous government so long as true counsels prevailed among them. Wherever favor, fear, and pleasure corrupted them, soon afterward their resources were diminished; then their government was taken away; finally slavery was imposed upon their kingdoms, and death or exile took away the King.

Guevara says in book 1, chapter 43, of The Dial of Princes: "I do not know why Princes and magnates, although they are so solicitous in seeking the best physicians for the care of the body, are so negligent in seeking wise men for the government of kingdoms and dominions, since in infinitely many ways the harm of bad government in a state is surely graver than the illness of the Prince himself or of the governor. Until now, indeed, we have neither read nor seen that either a King or his kingdom perished through a scarcity of physicians; but through a scarcity of wise Counselors we have seen innumerable Kings and very many kingdoms desolated, collapse, and be overthrown. Through a scarcity of physicians one man can be endangered; but through a scarcity of a wise man great discord can be introduced among the people. For when some tumult grows among the citizens, one timely counsel is more beneficial than a hundred purgations with rhubarb."

And a little afterward: "These things are said to this end: that Princes, Prelates, and magnates, persuaded by these reasons, may transfer some part of the very great diligence which they employ in seeking physicians, and of the very large sums which they expend upon their salaries and largesses, to seeking out wise men whom they themselves may consult and may join to the court Senate. For if men understood how greatly it matters to have a wise governor of a household, or even one wise man, they would purchase him with all their resources. Princes and magnates appear greatly worthy of compassion who lose many days in a month and many hours in a day, conversing about wars, buildings, arms, banquets, beasts, hunts, medicine, and other things, yet neglect the counsels of prudent men themselves."

Rash is the soldier who advances unarmed into the battle line, and no less imprudent the Prince who undertakes the state without counsel.

§ 9. It is fitting that the Prince should know and act upon this: all services are surpassed by that of the man who assists by good counsel. Guevara, Dial, book 3, chapter 55, introduces Aurelius speaking thus: "I charge my son Commodus to pay you a reward for your services. But I ask the immortal gods to return thanks to you for your counsels. Nor is it in vain that I say that I charge my son with the former and ask the latter of the gods. For one man can pay the reward of many services; but all the gods are needed to reward one good counsel. The greatest and most excellent benefit with which a friend can affect a friend is this: if he is fortunate in giving him good counsel in a difficult affair. And not without cause do I wish him to be fortunate, not merely to give counsel. For it commonly happens that those who wished to heal us by their counsels cast us into even greater dangers."

But if the Prince wishes to ascribe all things to himself, he nevertheless ought to remember that counsel is often wanting even to the wisest man:

Καὶ κυβερνήτῃ ἀγαθῷ ἐνίοτε ναυαγεῖν.

An experienced pilot sometimes suffers shipwreck. Matters so hidden often occur that no way out can be found.

Πολλὰ καὶ παράδοξα αἱ καθ' ἀνθρώπους τύχαι κατεργάζονται.

The things that happen to men produce many and unexpected results. Why should the Prince not waver in such matters? Rather, why should he not employ the highest wisdom, which consists in judging others wiser than himself?

[Printed page 554]

If he thinks himself wise, let him not believe that experienced and elderly men are foolish. Let him at least persuade himself of this: no one is so wise that greater wisdom is not necessary for him.

Οὐδεὶς ἄνθρωπος αὐτὸς ἅπαντα σοφός.

No one by himself is wise in all things. Therefore, making use of Bias's answer--when asked about what matter all ought most to be solicitous, he replied that they should seek good counsels and good advisers--let the Prince himself also fortify himself with an assembly of wise Counselors.

§ 10. Finally, so that all things may proceed more rightly, let the Prince consult with many when the matter does not require secrecy. There are many advantages in this. For when some adduce advantages, others disadvantages; some dangers, others arguments for justice, others for the dignity of the Prince; when some are timid, some bold, and they also have rivalries among themselves, truth cannot remain hidden amid so great an agitation. Indeed, the Prince himself will recognize the passions of all. Then all together will strain every sinew to give such counsels that they cannot be censured by others in so great an assembly. But if the counsels turn out badly, the fault will belong to all. A few can conspire to advise advantageously and ambitiously for themselves, not as friends of the state; among many and diverse men, for whom diverse things are advantageous, the same calculation does not exist. For this reason many are more readily trusted than individuals, as Pliny admonished in the Panegyric. The counsels of good men are strengthened when they perceive that prudent and faithful advisers hold the same view. Cicero, epistle 13 to Caelius.

§ 11. Let Kings beware lest they seem to convene a council merely for appearance, as Bellus reports in discourse 23 is done in England. "But because certain public matters sometimes arise which concern the good or even the injury of the kingdom and subjects--for example, to establish a new law, to examine or reject other laws, to levy money for a war already resolved upon, or to make provision for similar matters pertaining to the state--then, and in similar cases, Kings have been accustomed, for modesty's sake, to preserve the ancient custom: namely, to convene Parliaments, in which the estates and orders of the kingdom are assembled, that is, the clergy, nobles, and commons, so that, after the business in question has been examined by them, their decrees may then be confirmed or rejected by the Kings. And although in antiquity these Parliaments enjoyed authority and liberty, so that the Kings were political and civil heads rather than Lords and Monarchs, nevertheless from Edward III down to the present times the authority of the Kings has been so fortified that Parliaments are rather certain masks of royal desires. By them, in framing doubtful measures, the Kings evade labor and inconvenience, and in dangerous matters, loss, rather than wishing to moderate their power by them. For in them whatever is advised or decreed is valid only if royal confirmation is added. Indeed, they not only cannot decree anything or perform any act; they cannot even assemble except at the royal nod. Kings are accustomed to admit to them whomsoever they please and remove the same men from them. They have, in fact, become so formidable to all that no one in Parliaments or outside them dares to oppose the royal will even by the slightest word, unless he wishes to procure loss and ruin for himself. Thus, just as those who sit in Parliaments are slaves and subjects, so the actions and counsels proceeding from them must necessarily be servile."

Thus he; yet I fear that he speaks hyperbolically, for it is certain that the nobles of Britain possess their liberty. But however the matter stands, nobles must not be convened merely for custom's sake. For if these men possess dignity and greatness of spirit, they perceive with indignation that they are being mocked and that it is a cruel jest when they must either say all things to gratify the King or undergo danger. The King's familiars also hold them in contempt and derision, and frequently boast that it has already been determined among themselves what ought to be decreed.

§ 12. In great kingdoms, where various nations and peoples coalesce into one body, various councils and colleges must necessarily be instituted. Use has arranged this in various states, but it is now best observed in the most extensive kingdoms of Spain. I have noted these things, which escaped Roman industry.

The first is this. The causes of all men of all nations were brought before the Roman Senate and tossed about among experts and the inexperienced alike; in Spain the councils of the individual peoples are separate. Hence that diversity: there is a Council of Italian Affairs, by which Neapolitan, Sicilian, and Milanese affairs are directed; a Council of Belgian Affairs, of Indian Affairs, and of War; the individual kingdoms of Spain have their own distinct councils. There is the Council of State, which is the most honored; the Council of Religion, which is the most powerful; and the Council of Commanderies and Taxes. It was therefore the highest prudence to assign one people to one college; for in this way men easily become knowledgeable in its affairs and are not disturbed by variety. A man who commanded troops in India or governed cities there will readily give counsel about governing barbarous nations; yet the same man will not be held expert in Belgian or Neapolitan affairs, because of the diversity of laws and dispositions.

The second is what I regard as the soul of councils: namely, that in the Council of State, where the highest affairs of the kingdom are conducted, the King should have great Princes, or men equal to Princes, whose interest it most greatly is that the authority of the King should remain safe and sound. In that council, however, there are not only Princes but also Archbishops and Prelates, as in Spain the Commander of Alcántara and of the other orders, such as Santiago and Calatrava, who also possess the right of attending the Council of War.

The third is that in these councils affairs are for the most part conducted in the most orderly fashion, though not with the greatest speed. For the King has with him most experienced Counselors, who present the case to the King in person, orally or in writing, generally both orally and in writing. The King then privately rereads and weighs those writings and sends the matter to some college for discussion; he afterward hears the opinion of the Counselors, or they decide it with the King face to face, or send their view to him in writing. For this reason justice is administered with the greatest constancy, and I think that until now there has been no monarchy in which fewer errors have been made in government.

§ 13. But if one must say generally what the Prince ought chiefly to require in councils, I shall speak briefly. It will be of the greatest importance that they be ordered to write their counsels and reasons, to read briefly from the writing, and, if after hearing the opinions of all they wish to remove, add, or change something, that this should be permitted, provided they offer their amended counsel to the Prince in a certain form and manner, so that all can easily be bound together in one booklet. At present, dictated opinions are faultily taken down by notaries, with a loss of time; they do not always grasp the sense rightly; and Counselors form their counsel in the consistory--that is, in the arena itself. If they are ordered to write, they will do it at home and after meditation; they will set forth their opinion quickly; then, when they know that their opinions are to be preserved in the archive and in the mind and hand of the Prince, they will take great care to hold an opinion which they understand themselves to be leaving to posterity as a monument of fidelity and prudence. For the written letter remains and exposes an error after many years. Opinions of this kind by Cicero and others survive, from which one may gather with what zeal they delivered their opinions. Nor do I want an effeminate Counselor to whom the labor of writing is burdensome. For if he writes familiar letters in a private matter, why should he not set forth his opinion accurately and diligently with his pen for the public safety?

[Printed page 555]

Augustus did this, and for this reason alone was worthy of government. Suetonius relates it thus in chapter 84: “He practiced eloquence and liberal studies eagerly and with the greatest labor from his earliest age. During the war at Mutina, amid so great a mass of affairs, he is said to have read, written, and declaimed every day. For afterward he never spoke either in the Senate, before the people, or before the soldiers except from a speech meditated and composed, although he did not lack the extemporaneous faculty for unforeseen matters. And lest he expose his memory to danger or consume time in memorizing, he established the practice of reading everything aloud. More serious conversations with individuals, and even with his own Livia, he held only in writing and from a notebook, lest he say more or less extemporaneously. He delivered speeches with a sweet and distinctive tone of voice and continually devoted himself to a voice trainer; but sometimes, when his throat was weakened, he addressed the people through the voice of a herald.”

Will a faithful Counselor not be able to do what so great an Emperor did? And so much concerning the Senate and Counselors.

CHAPTER XIV

The Magistrates Who Are Customarily After the King in a Monarchy

§ 1. Since ancient profane histories, if compared with sacred history, are judged to possess no antiquity, I have determined at the outset to dispute concerning magistrates from Scripture, so that we may examine the form and magistrates of the first Monarchy, which is that of the Chaldaeans. They are described in Daniel 3:2: "Therefore King Nebuchadnezzar sent to assemble the Satraps, Magistrates, Judges, Tyrants, and Prefects, and all the Princes of the regions, so that they might come to the dedication of the statue which King Nebuchadnezzar had erected. Then the Satraps, Magistrates, Judges, Commanders, Tyrants, and nobles who had been placed in authority, and all the Princes of the regions, were assembled, so that they might come to the dedication of the statue which King Nebuchadnezzar had erected; and they stood in the sight of the statue which Nebuchadnezzar had set up."

From these words the constitution of the most ancient Monarchy is in some manner understood; for the Greek writers vary and deceive. Daniel himself teaches us that this arrangement was approved: although he says that wisdom was in him beyond that in all men, and although he was Prince of the wise men and magistrates, he wished to approve that administration. Darius also resolved to institute this arrangement in chapter 6, verse 1. Let us therefore behold this first Monarchy furnished with magistrates: that great tree, the golden head of the mystical statue.

§ 2. In this Empire one man after the King possessed the highest authority, and three others beneath the King and beneath that man, although they had diverse provinces subject to them. This is explained in chapter 2, verse 48: "Then the King raised Daniel on high and gave him many and great gifts; and he appointed him Prince over all the provinces of Babylon and Prefect of the Magistrates over all the wise men of Babylon. But Daniel petitioned the King, and he appointed Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego over the works of the province of Babylon; Daniel himself, however, was in the gates of the King."

Although he is said to have been appointed over the provinces of Babylon and over the wise men of Babylon, and this could be restricted to the province of Babylon alone, I nevertheless understand it of all the Magistrates of the whole kingdom, however widely it extended. That the Monarchy was very great we understand from the fact that the Persian was smaller. Daniel 11:37 calls that man King of Kings, and in 4 Kings 25:27 he commands many kingdoms. Wherever Daniel says, מלכא אנת, "you, O King," and מלכיא מלך, "King of Kings," he places the Hebrew between two Chaldaic words, to show that he was an eminent King even of the people of God. That many Kings were with him in Babylon is evident from the same words, for he placed the throne of Jehoiachin above the throne of the Kings who were at Babylon. From Jeremiah 37 we are taught that there were Kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, Sidon, and Egypt, many nations and great Kings. I affirm that Daniel presided over all these. For he presided over the Magistrates and wise men of Babylon, and they were the head of the whole Monarchy, just as, if someone presided over all the Roman Magistrates, he would be judged also to command Proconsuls and provincial Magistrates. Pompey was such when the care of the grain supply and the Piratical War were entrusted to him; for, as Cicero testifies, by the people's bill he possessed more power over all the provinces than those who held them with imperium. If therefore he was Prince of those who governed all things, there is no doubt that he was also Prince of all.

Then the Chaldaic words indicate this: רברבין רב, "Prince of great Princes." For רב signifies a great Prince, a word which the Hebrews also employed after receiving it from the Chaldaeans. Rabbi David interprets it "great Prince"; on Isaiah 42:25 the same David interprets it "Kings of the nations," and on Jeremiah 20:1 Rabbi Saadiah, "Princes of the army." Finally, the Perso-Median Empire arose from the Chaldaean or Babylonian, and it possessed Daniel as its wisest lawgiver, as is evident from chapter 6, verse 1: "It pleased Darius, and he appointed over the kingdom one hundred and twenty Satraps, that they might be throughout his whole kingdom; and over them three Princes, of whom Daniel was one, so that the Satraps might render account to them and the King might not sustain trouble."

The counsel of Daniel, a most wise man, under Darius was such as it had been under Nebuchadnezzar: namely, that three should be appointed over all the affairs, and one of these should be Prince. Their power extended through all parts of the kingdom. No one doubts that the Persians borrowed very many things from the Babylonians. And God brought it about that, although the Persians and Medes were the most ferocious of nations, they had Daniel as governor, lest by the cruelty of ruling they should altogether violate human society. By this it came about that the Persian Empire was constituted at its beginning by the best laws.

Josephus therefore deservedly calls Daniel:

> ἁπάσης ἐπίτροπον βασιλείας curator of the whole kingdom. The Persian custom of appointing a Surena confirms this opinion; he takes his name from Sar, שר, which signifies a Prince. Plutarch describes his dignity in the Crassus:

> Οὐδὲ γὰρ ἦν τῶν τυχόντων ὁ Σουρήνας, ἀλλὰ πλούτῳ μὲν καὶ γένει καὶ δόξῃ μετὰ βασιλέα δεύτερος, ἀνδρείᾳ δὲ καὶ δεινότητι τῶν καθ' αὑτὸν ἐν Πάρθοις πρῶτος· ἔτι δὲ ἐξήλαυνε καθ' ἑαυτὸν ἀεὶ χιλίας σκευοφορούμενος καμήλους, ᾧ διακοσίας ἁπήγετο παλλακίδων, ἱππεῖς δὲ κατάφρακτοι χίλιοι, πλείονες δὲ τῶν κούφων παρέπεμπον· εἶχε δὲ τοὺς σύμπαντας ἱππεῖς ὁμοῦ πελάτας τε καὶ δούλους, μυρίων οὐκ ἀποδέοντας.

[Printed page 556]

Nor was Surena one of the common people; rather, in riches, family, and glory he was second to the King, and in courage and keenness first among those about him among the Parthians. A thousand camels carried his baggage; two hundred wagons conveyed his concubines; there were a thousand cuirassed horsemen, and more lightly armed horsemen; his cavalry, clients, and servants together were not fewer than ten thousand.

Darius therefore intended to make Daniel Surena and adorn him with that power which he had formerly possessed under Nebuchadnezzar, whose memory was then celebrated. Those words of verse 49 also show it: "But Daniel was in the gates of the King," מלכא בתרע, "in the gate"; the Seventy have ἐν τῇ αὐλῇ, "in the court." He was not the supreme officer of admission such as existed later among the Emperors of Constantinople, nor like the Persian φύλακες, "guards," or ἀγγελιοφόροι, "messengers"; rather, he was Prince of those who judged and gave counsels to the King. He was therefore the head of both the domestic and the external Princes, not a bodyguard or keeper of the royal person. For it was an ancient custom that the greatest Princes should be about the King, both for dignity and for counsel and safety. In Xenophon, books 1 and 2, they are called παῖδες. The Princes of the Persians, whom they call ὁμοτίμους, "peers in honor," were always in the court of the palace; and in book 8:

> Ἐπίτιμος ἀεὶ παραγένοιτο ἐπὶ θύραις καὶ παρέχειν ἑαυτὸν εὐθὺς χρὴ εἰ βούλεται ὁ Κῦρος, ἱππεύειν σὺν ἵπποις καὶ ὅπλοις.

Men honored in rank were always to be present at the door and make themselves available for what Cyrus wished, if he desired it, and indeed with horses and arms.

In the same manner Haman was second to King Ahasuerus, Esther 3:1: "After these things King Ahasuerus exalted Haman, son of Hammedatha, who was of the stock of Agag, and placed his throne above theirs. And all the servants of the King who were present in the gates of the palace bent their knees and adored Haman, for so the Emperor had commanded; Mordecai alone did not bend his knee or adore him." And his successor, chapter 10: "But King Ahasuerus made all the land and all the islands of the sea tributary; and his fortitude and Empire, and the dignity and sublimity with which he exalted Mordecai, are written in the books of the Medes and Persians; and how Mordecai, a man of the Jewish nation, was second to King Ahasuerus and great among the Jews and acceptable to the people of his brethren, seeking good things for his people and speaking those things which pertained to the peace of his seed."

§ 3. Whether it is expedient for a Monarch to furnish one man with so great a power is debated not without cause. I have often taught that all things must not be conceded to one man and that the counsel and labor of one man alone must not be used. Here, however, the question concerns some Magistrate of the dignity next after the King, who can exist even though he does not possess great power by which he can rebel. I judge thus.

Nebuchadnezzar and Darius, with most prudent counsel, placed over the entire kingdom Daniel, whom they had known to be full of the Spirit of God and of wisdom, since they feared no rebellion from him and were certain that Daniel would order all things most wisely. I think the same concerning Mordecai.

Next, good Persian Kings followed this mode by their example; for the advantage in this matter is evident, both because an account of the sum of all affairs can be demanded from one man and reported to the King, and because greater care in discharging office is instilled into all when they know that an account must be rendered to many. For the King cannot attend even to all great matters; therefore another whom the King greatly trusts more readily performs his functions.

Nor will it be difficult to provide against the possibility that this man rise against the King or seize a tyranny. If the King himself is vigorous, prudent, and active; if he himself hears the provincial Governors and visits the armies and cities, the general Prefect will not easily be able to contrive anything. But if, after the example given by Ninyas, son of Ninus and Semiramis, among the Assyrian Kings, he is rarely seen by his subjects, grows old among his household servants, and gives replies through intermediaries, not only the Prefect second to the King but even a τῶν εἰσαγγελιῶν χιλίαρχος, such as appears in Aelian, book 1, chapter 21, will without difficulty crush the King. Thus the Kings of the Franks perished through indolence, when the Mayor of the Palace, after usurping power, seized even the title of the kingdom. Haman assuredly would never have thought of transferring the kingdom to the Macedonians unless he had judged Ahasuerus a savage, hated, luxurious, and foolish King. Besides, what came into Ahasuerus's mind, that he raised a Macedonian, a man of a hostile nation, to such power?

I therefore judge that the least danger threatens from the man himself; for even if he enjoys the highest dignity, he will not easily transfer the kingdom to another when he cannot obtain a greater honor. For why should he transfer the government, with disgrace and the mark of betrayal, to another, when he himself receives the second share of its fruit? A prudent Emperor can readily prevent him from arrogating power to himself: if he furnishes him neither with an army nor with excessive riches; if he decides nothing in greater affairs except by the consent and command of the King; if the court itself is exempt from his command; finally, if he chooses a modest, elderly, and learned man. In Spain some Archbishop is generally President of the supreme council or in the highest power. When Charles departed, he placed Adrian, afterward Pope, over Spain. In ecclesiastics the administration is generally uncorrupted, and there is no fear of danger.

In the Roman Empire there was scarcely any use of this dignity. Men were called Caesars when the Empire was already declining, but they were those who were being trained in hope of the kingdom or had received the nearest hope of succession. Aelius Verus, adopted into Hadrian's family, was the first to be called Caesar in this manner. Diocletian called Maximian and Constantius Caesars. But they were rather partners in the Empire; nevertheless, when the Senate named Titus and Domitian Caesars, it did not grant them partnership in the kingdom. Constantine created his three sons Caesars; Constantius created Gallus and Julian Caesars. Not without reason was that honor instituted by prudent men: both that they might cut off the wicked hopes of aspirants, and that by the enticement of honor they might attract to the safety of the state men of great spirit and those who relied upon some right.

§ 4. It is therefore fitting that there should be one supreme man; next to him among the Chaldaeans were three, as is evident from Daniel 3:49: "But Daniel petitioned the King, and he appointed Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego over the works of the province of Babylon." I understand "works" as every office and labor, and at the same time understand them to have been placed over the province of Babylon in such a way that their power extended throughout the whole Monarchy. For as a consolation of the Jews exiled throughout the entire kingdom, God granted this: that so great a government should be ordered by captives. Darius afterward appointed three, to whom he permitted power in the whole kingdom, chapter 6. Afterward there were seven. Hence it is that those first Monarchies were better constituted at the beginning than the Roman Monarchy.

§ 5. The words of Daniel show that the Monarchy of the Chaldaeans was most orderly, for they are not placed idly. Let us therefore examine in them the Chaldaean Magistrates.

[Printed page 557]

In the first place are set אחשדרפניא, which, if one wishes to explain Achaschdarphenaio separately, will be literally "a great man dwelling before the face," because they dwell before the face of the King. In one word, it signifies a great companion of the King, or a familiar of the King. The Seventy translate it ὕπατοι, "Consuls," "powerful men," whose honor and power will be great; for among the Greeks Consuls were so called from their power. Our translator renders it "Satraps"; others "magnates," others "Princes." This alone appears to stand in the way: that Satraps did not dwell before the face of the King in the provinces over which they were placed. But those who reason thus are mistaken. For the Satraps possessed great dignity and were generally sent from the face of the King in the manner in which I spoke concerning Counts; then they possessed the right of approaching the King and dining with him, as I indicated concerning the ὁμοτίμοις, "peers in honor." For those ancient Satraps must not be compared with our own, but with Viceroys and Princes, or with the Turkish Bashas and the Consuls and Proconsuls of the ancient Romans; hence the Seventy deservedly translated them ὕπατοι.

Rabshakeh proclaims their power in 4 Kings 18:24, saying that the Jews could not resist one Satrap among the least servants of his Lord. Although in that place the Hebrew calls him פחת, the Chaldaic שלטנים, and the Seventy τοπάρχας, men who were lesser than the Achaschdarphenaio, they were nevertheless so powerful that Rabshakeh preferred them to Hezekiah, King of Judah.

Herodotus, book 7, Ctesias in the Persian History, and Xenophon, book 1 of the Ἀναβάσεως, demonstrate their power also from this: that Satrapies were conferred upon the sons of Kings. And Justin, book 5, says that Cyrus was appointed by his father Darius as Satrap of Ionia and Lydia. Diodorus Siculus, book 11, says that Hystaspes, son of Artaxerxes, was Satrap in Bactria. Indeed, Cyrus, when dying, speaks thus in Xenophon, book 8 of the Education of Cyrus:

> Σὺ μὲν ὦ Καμβύση τὴν βασιλείαν ἔχε, σοὶ δὲ ὦ Ταναοξάρη σατραπεύειν δίδωμι Μήδων τε καὶ Ἀρμενίων καὶ Καδουσίων.

"You, O Cambyses, possess the kingdom; but you, O Tanaoxares, I appoint Satrap of the Medes, Armenians, and Cadusians." Thus Alexander, according to Plutarch, made Porus Satrap of his own kingdom. Aemilius Probus, in the Datames: one man is Satrap of Lydia and Ionia. Oroetes likewise is Satrap of these regions and of Phrygia, Herodotus, book 3. But Phrathrophernes in the same Herodotus is Παρθυαίων καὶ Ὑρκανίων, "of the Parthians and Hyrcanians," that is, of two great kingdoms. Josephus, book 11, chapter 8, relates that there was one Satrap of Syria, Phoenicia, and Samaria. There were therefore in this Monarchy ἔπαρχοι, "governors," with great power; for Plutarch also calls them this in his Sayings. Nor did they command merely over a broad region; rather, provinces were committed to their trust and power. For this was their first and highest law: to administer the state as they judged proper according to the common interest, fidelity, and religion.

Great majesty was also added to them. Oroetes in Herodotus, book 3, has a bodyguard of a thousand men; others had far greater ones. Every year an inspector was sent to them, whom they called the King's brother or the King's eye; the Satraps themselves frequently assembled at court. It is evident that the inspectors were ἐξάρχους, or former Satraps, who had been in the King's council. From what has been said, it is evident that all these things were most wisely constituted.

§ 6. I said above that so great a power of the Satraps, when they are placed over several kingdoms, is dangerous unless restrained in another manner, yet salutary against an external enemy. And certainly it was not according to Daniel's institution. For with him as Counselor Darius divided the Monarchy into one hundred and twenty provinces and placed the same number of Satraps over his kingdom, chapter 6, verse 1, where both the Greek and the Latin translate "Satraps," and this is the word Achascharphenaio. The Persian kingdom, however, was not so extensive that it could have one hundred and twenty Satraps ruling over such broad territories, since it comprised not all Asia, together with Egypt and certain regions of Europe. This is nevertheless evident: if we consider the fertility and population of Asia, and if the provinces are divided among one hundred and twenty, the individual Satraps would be equal to Kings of moderate power. For Asia at one time indeed possessed as many powerful Kings, each of whom led two or three hundred thousand men into battle.

In the second place are those who in Hebrew, chapter 2, verse 48, are called סגניא; our translator renders them "Magistrates" and "Prefects," and others in the same manner. The Seventy have στρατηγοὺς, "Commanders of war." Among the Persians, as also among the Romans, it was a most honorable thing to possess an army; therefore military provinces were sought by brave and ambitious men. The text itself teaches us that these were military Magistrates: משכנא signifies tents, and נסא, a standard. It therefore indicates great Commanders of war, who defended all things in their provinces. They were not appointed by the Satraps or subject to them; indeed, they were suitable for restraining them. At Memphis one hundred and twenty thousand men were in garrison in the White Wall in the time of the Persians. To some it has appeared peculiar to the Persians, as also to this Monarchy, that the Satraps and military Commanders were distinct. Yet although this was preserved in part in the Persian Monarchy, that custom is not evident to have existed in Chaldaea from the words of Rabshakeh, who indicates that the Satraps engaged in war; and the Satraps of the Persians also administered war. Then it cannot happen that one military Magistrate and another civil one of equal power administer an affair harmoniously and advantageously in the same province. This was therefore peculiar to the τοῖς φρουράρχοις, namely, to those who guarded the fortifications; for the Satraps possessed no power over them.

Next follow the פחותא, phathavata, τοπάρχαι, "regional rulers"; others translate them "Governors," others "Commanders," and some "Praetors." These men were not under the Satraps; indeed, they were Princes, but lesser ones. The word is common to Syrians, Chaldaeans, and Persians. Haggai 1:1 calls Zerubbabel יהודה פחת, Phachath Iehuda, "Commander of Judah." And Nehemiah 5:14 calls Nehemiah a Commander and summons the former Commanders. When Nehemiah asks for letters to the Commanders beyond the river in chapter 2, verse 7, it is evident that there were several through whose dominion he was about to travel. Likewise Ezra 8:36, Esther 8:9, and 9:3 join them with the Achaschdarphenim, for letters are given to them by the King. I judge that they should be compared with Roman Governors and with our Counts--our Counts, I say, for formerly the dignity of Counts was greater than that of Dukes.

With these are joined אדרגזריא, Adargazraio. This office properly pertains to Judges; for they are so called as though confirmers of an opinion, decree, or statute, or men strong and magnificent in opinion or decree, whose decrees were ratified. They were therefore Presidents of the courts who administered justice, and tribunals were established in the individual provinces, as we now also see throughout Europe. The Greeks call them here ἡγεμόνας, "governors"; others νομοφύλακας, "guardians of the laws." Our translator renders them "Commanders," whose office was employed not only in war but also in peace.

Our translator renders "Tyrants," whom the Chaldaic calls גדרבריא, gedabraia; the Seventy interpreters agree. גדד, gadad, is to make an incursion, plunder, cut, and divide; גדוד, a troop or band of raiders.

[Printed page 558]

They are therefore Prefects of taxes to be collected from tithes, pasturage, and forests; for this reason they went about the fields and cities with a military force. Hence they are also named וגדברין, gedabrin, who requisitioned τὸ בר, bar, grain, and dispensed other things. Above all, however, they requisitioned grain for the army. Their office was especially hateful.

The Magistracy of those who are called דתבריא, detabraia, μεγάλοι ἐπ' ἐξουσιῶν by the Seventy, was not very different. There is no doubt that they were γαζοφύλακας, "guardians of the treasury," and Quaestors and curators of the treasury. I prefer to follow the interpretation of the Seventy rather than that of the Rabbis, because Rabbi Saadiah derives the meaning from דת, dath, "law," and בריא, berhia, "purity." I therefore think they were named from grain--that is, every tax on produce--because they exacted the canon or fixed assessment. But our translator understood it of the nobles in general and joins דפתיא דתבריא, detabraia diphthaia, "and the nobles who were placed in authority"; he then adds the Princes of the regions, שלטנים, Schultenim, who governed cities and their territories. Thus the whole state, furnished with its Magistrates, is briefly described in this passage; and in this manner, if anyone weighs these Persian affairs, he will easily find everything arranged.

CHAPTER XV

Caesars and Other Magistrates Nearest to Monarchs

§ 1. The men of Constantinople changed the name of Caesars while retaining the dignity. For either the sons of Emperors or those upon whom they had conferred that title were called Caesars. Tacitus, book 1, calls Drusus Caesar. Titus and Domitian were called Caesars by the Senate; Galba called Piso Caesar; Nerva, Trajan; Hadrian, Aelius Verus; Diocletian and Maximian, Constantius and Maximinian and Dalmatius; Antoninus Pius, Marcus Antoninus; Severus, Bassianus; Carus, his sons; Philip, his son; Copronymus, his two sons; and others called other men Caesars.

Afterward they called those who were nearest the Emperor Despots: his sons, especially his firstborn, the heir of the kingdom, and likewise his sons-in-law; thus Ducas, according to Gregoras, book 2. Michael Palaeologus elevated his son above the Despots. What the noblest man called Caesar by the Emperor is, that is the Dauphin in France, except that there were several Caesars but there is one Dauphin. Humbert gave the Dauphiné, a province of the Allobroges, to the King of France in the year of salvation 1349 on this condition: that the King's firstborn and successor should take his title from it. Formerly even the sons of Kings were themselves called Kings, and they divided France into kingdoms. Louis III wisely wished to change this, lest he exhaust the strength of the individual men; he gave a kingdom to Lothair and returned Lorraine to Charles.

In Cedrenus, Monomachus appoints Stephen Commander of the forces, σεβαστοφόρος, as though he bore the Emperor, while by prudence and fortitude he guarded the Empire. As the Empire increased and ambition grew, a Σεβαστοκράτωρ also was appointed, as though "possessing the power of Augustus." This dignity was less than that of a Despot. In Gregoras, book 3, the brother of Michael Comnenus is appointed ὁ σεβαστοκράτωρ; likewise in Nicetas. Isaac, book 1, was encircled with a crown and possessed the name of the dignity without government. Alexius invented Σεβαστοκράτωρ, πρωτοσέβαστος, σεβαστός; and, lest anything remain beyond the titles, πανυπερσέβαστος, which means "as though altogether above Augustus" or "altogether venerable." These were bare names, not governments. Yet all these were below Caesar.

The name ὁ μέγας ἄρχων, καὶ ὁ τὰς τάξεις was also great, but, Codinus says, οὐδὲν ὑπούργημα κέκτηται: he has no ministry. The rationale of the patriciate was nearly the same. It was not the name of nobility, but of dignity and benefice. They were so called as though fathers of the Emperors; their power also matched the name. Belisarius acquired eighteen thousand soldiers together with the dignity of the patriciate. Aemoinus, book 2, chapter 6. Charlemagne was made Roman Patrician before he was Emperor. This was useful for preserving the nobility, just as, where it is oppressed, slaves are assumed into offices. I see that this pleased the ancient Franks, and that the Turk now approves it: that Kings should employ bondmen at court. Marileif, the chief physician, was a bondman of the Church of Tours; Proculus, the King's tutor, was sent away to rustic labor; Septiminia, to the mill; thus Gregory of Tours. But I censured this above. Meanwhile, the later Greeks were excessive in the names of honors.

§ 2. The Curopalates was at first the Architect; his office concerned the repair and maintenance of the palace and its foundations. Cassiodorus, book 7: "We judge that Your Sublimity ought to undertake the care of our palace, so that you may both preserve ancient works in their former splendor and bring forth new works in similar antiquity, if you frequently read the geometer Euclid, if his figures described with marvelous variety, and so forth. Let Archimedes also, together with Metrobius, always assist you. But if we rebuild a city or wish to found a new fortress, or if the charm of a praetorium to be constructed pleases us, what is discovered by us in thought is brought before the eyes under your direction. Whatever the builder of walls, sculptor of marbles, caster of bronze, turner of vaults, worker in plaster, or mosaicist does not know, he prudently asks you."

From this the estimation and rank of the Curopalates increased. For Aetius began to exercise care of the palace after being Count of the Domestics. Indeed, the office was conferred upon fathers-in-law and kinsmen of the Emperors, and they were placed over provinces. For Adranaser governed Iberia. In Liutprand the Emperor's brother is Curopalates; in Photius's Library no one's glory is greater than that of the Curopalates. So too in Corippus, book 1:

> Your uncle confirmed you as lord of the sacred court,
>
> And Baduarius, appointed organizer of the new sacred court,
>
> Successor of his father-in-law, was soon made Care of the Palace.
>
> Who had not foretold that you would be lord of the sacred court,
>
> When you governed the divine palaces of your great father?
>
> Standing equal in cares, unequal only in the diadem,
>
> Called Care of the Palace according to the order of affairs.

The man of spectable rank called Castrensis, under whom were all the ministries of the palace--pedagogues, record keepers, servants of the table, and domestics--was also called Curopalates. For because the Prince's retinue was called στρατόπεδον, "camp," all the ministers were therefore called Castrensians, although they had never seen any camp. At length this office appears to have been altogether changed, and among the Greeks those were called Curopalates who among the Franks were called Mayors of the Palace; for the same men were also called Prefects of the Palace. They were therefore nearest the Emperors.

It is evident that the Seneschal afterward occupied the same place. William of Tyre, book 4, chapter 5, is a witness that the Seneschal is the same as the man called Great Domestic among the Greeks. And since he says that the Great Domestic is second to the Emperor, he appears to assign this dignity also to the Seneschal. Among the Franks, certainly, the office of the Seneschal, or Seneschalcus, increased in the same manner. For he was placed over the table by Pepin. Since the King himself was skilled in waging wars, this was advantageous for the protection and authority of the new kingdom.

[Printed page 559]

They exercised care of the whole house, its ornaments, and even the horses. He was therefore the Steward and is so called by Robert, Abbot of Rheims; he carried the scepter, the mark of jurisdiction. He is called the Vicar of the King and second to the King. He signed the edicts and constitutions of Kings and whatever matters were of greater importance. His authority therefore increased so that it was little removed from the power of the Mayor of the Palace. Theulpus, in the Chronicle of the Monastery of Marigny, makes him the same as the Mayor of the Palace and assigns him also the office of administering war; therefore he also led a horse to the King. Later Kings, however, diminished that power.

§ 3. The Master of Offices stands at almost the same height, for from small beginnings he arrived at the highest power. The Master of Offices presided over the Schools of Shield-bearers, the agentes in rebus, and others; the discipline of the palace was entrusted to him.

His function concerned ordering the Schools and promoting the Scholastics, chapter 1, On the Office of the Master of Offices, title 31: "The privileges long since granted to your School being reserved entire, let no one arrive at the ducenariate, centenariate, or biarchate through canvassing, but each through labor; but let him obtain the principate as the register runs its course, so that those whom the order of military service and of its labors summons may go forth to conduct the services and the cursus. Moreover, in order that the condition of the School and the safety of the Master may be established more securely, let a suitable man, furnished with uprightness of character and good arts, be offered to our notice through the Master, so that he may be appointed according to our judgment."

He also took care that ambition did not anticipate military service. Thus Valentinian and Theodosius Augustuses to Patricius, Master of Offices: "Let no one of the agentes in rebus anticipate the order of military service and stipends, even if through deception he has produced an indulgence of our Divinity; and if anyone is shown to have offered a warrant of an admission of this kind, let him return to the place from which he indecorously emerged, so that the man whom better stipends or longer labor has caused to advance may precede the others in rank."

Theodosius and Valentinian Augustuses assign to Pleitius, Master of Offices, the right of scourging Senators and Ducenarii: "The devotion of our Scholastics, approved by our parents, has shone forth in affection toward Our Greatest Serenity. Hence we have immediately believed that whatever is requested for fostering and preserving their privileges must be granted. Therefore, approving the recommendation of Your Eminence, we deny to the men of spectable rank, the Counts of the Schools, license to scourge or degrade Senators and Ducenarii. For we have willed that those things which are worthy of such punishment should be referred to the notice of Your Sublimity."

The same men extended his command to the camps: "We believe that it must be enjoined upon the care of Your Perpetual Eminence that each year you take care to signify to us by your own report how the number of soldiers stands upon every frontier established under your jurisdiction, and how the care of the camps and barriers proceeds. Given on 2 September at Constantinople, Maximus for the second time and Paterius being Consuls, 443." This was done because he was a participant in all councils, as Priscus admonishes in the Gothic History. At length it began to be reckoned among the highest dignities. Longinus, brother of Zeno, was made Master of Offices. Evagrius, book 3, chapter 9. From this it is evident how great the dignity of this office was.

The Goths imitated these things also. Cassiodorus, book 6, formula 6: "To the Master of Offices pertains the discipline of the palace. He auspiciously restrains the tempestuous manners of insolent Schools within the bounds of his moderation. So many orders are arranged without any confusion, and he alone sustains the burden of all which the multitude possesses in division. Through him a Senator who comes is presented to our gaze; he composes the speaker and is even accustomed to insert words, so that we may fittingly hear all things. The sight of the King is not ineffectual; he is the glorious promiser of our conversation, the giver of the court Consistory. Moreover, we deposit the greatest weight of causes within the bounds of his hearing with the best security. He guards the suitable speed of the post-horses, so that he may dispatch by the benefit of speed the concerns which he assists by counsel. Through him the coming of ambassadors, however much they hasten, is announced to us; through him a warrant in our name is given. No Judge assumes the fasces throughout the provinces unless he himself also decrees it. He does not possess the troubles of exacting money; by means of assessors he appoints the suppliers of provisions in the royal city according to his own will. The officials who have discharged the service of his corps are called Princes and hold primacy among the Praetorian cohorts and the soldiers of the urban Prefecture. An Assistant of the Master is presented to our gaze, so that in the vicarious allotment of a benefice we may choose the protection of the man who offers us faithful consolation."

Hence it happened that, with so many affairs heaped together into one office, an assistant, or βοηθός, was appointed to him by the Prince; he judged in place of the Master of Offices.

Those nearest the first throne were therefore formerly Caesars, afterward called Δεσπόται, "Despots"; as those who would succeed their parents, in Spain they are called Princes, in France Monsieur properly and strictly, and finally Dauphins after the Dauphiné was given to the Crown. Paulus Aemilius, book 9. The Allobroges also called their Princes Dauphins.

CHAPTER XVI

The Constitution of the Royal Court

§ 1. How greatly it concerns the Prince--indeed, the whole state--to have brave, faithful, and prudent men about him and to remove slanderers, avaricious men, and the ambitious far away, the course of many centuries and the destruction of the best-known Kings have taught.

In the court there are two kinds of companions of Princes: either they assist the industry of rulers in counsel and government, or they attend upon the Prince's person and affairs. For this is a distinction of offices, not of men, since many offices are frequently conferred upon one and the same man.

The chief officer in the imperial court was indeed the Prefect of the Praetorium, concerning whom it has been spoken elsewhere.

Equal to the Prefect of the Praetorium in France was the Mayor of the Palace, or Mayor of the Household. His offices were small at the beginning: to administer justice at home among the courtiers and attend to Palatine discipline. From this he acquired authority among his peers; and because they were elected by common suffrage, and possessed esteem with the King, with whom they were continually present, they were gradually brought into the state until, through the sloth of the Kings, they drew the whole power of the kingdom to themselves. Hence Pepin possessed the kingdom and appointed not a Mayor of the Palace, but a Count to adjudicate the controversies of the household. Cedrenus wrote various things concerning these men in his account of Leo the Iconoclast, which may be consulted.

Justinian gave recovered Africa a Prefect of the Praetorium and assigned 396 ministers to his office. Code of Justinian, On the Office of the Prefect of the Praetorium of Africa, title 25, law 2 G: "And by him, with God assisting, let seven provinces be ordered with their Judges: of these, Tingitana, which was previously called Proconsular, Carthage, Byzantium, and Tripolis shall have Governors of consular rank; but the rest--that is, Numidia, Mauritania, and Sardinia--shall be governed by Governors with God's assistance. And in the office of Your Magnitude, and of the magnificent man who is for the time being Prefect of the Praetorium of Africa, we decree that three hundred and ninety-six men shall serve in the various bureaux and offices. But in the offices of the Consular Governors and Governors we ordain that there shall be fifty men in each office.

[Printed page 560]

"The schedule annexed below declares what emoluments either Your Magnificence, or the Consular Governors and Governors, and each person from their office, ought to obtain from the public treasury.

"We desire, therefore, that all our Judges should strive to govern their administrations according to the will and fear of God and according to our election and ordinance, so that none of them is either devoted to avarice, or himself inflicts any violence, or permits it to be inflicted by their Judges or offices, or by any other tax collectors. For although, with God assisting, we hasten throughout all our provinces to keep the taxpayers unharmed, we nevertheless take especial counsel for the tributaries of the African diocese, who after the captivity of so many ages have deserved, with God assisting, to behold the light of liberty through us. We therefore command all violence and all avarice to cease, and justice and truth to be preserved toward all our tributaries. For thus God will be propitiated, and they can more quickly, like the other contributors of our state, be relieved and flourish."

§ 2. The court of the Emperor has great Princes as ministers. The first office is that of Cupbearer, ὁ ἐπὶ τοῦ κρατῆρος, a great and favored dignity among Kings. For great fidelity is necessary in those in whose hand is the life of the Prince. Nehemiah discharged this office under Artaxerxes. Among the men of Constantinople the Cupbearer was greater than the Curopalates; and now the King of Bohemia, who excels among the seven Electors, is Cupbearer of the Emperor.

§ 3. There were various Domestics, such as the Domestic of the Table, of the Schools, of the Walls, and so forth. The man placed over the table was of no lesser dignity.

In the Roman Empire the Margrave of Brandenburg is Archchamberlain, concerning whom the Golden Bull, title 25, On the Offices of the Princes at the Solemn Courts of the Emperors, speaks thus: "Then the Margrave of Brandenburg, Archchamberlain, shall approach on horseback, having in his hands silver basins with water, weighing twelve marks of silver, and a beautiful towel; and, descending from his horse, he shall give water to the Emperor, or King of the Romans, for washing his hands." The Chamberlain in France, whom they are accustomed to call Camlerlan and Camerling, was held in such honor that even the relatives by marriage and kinsmen of Kings occupied that dignity. Under Louis the Pious, Bernard, brother of the Queen, administered this function.

In the same Empire the Palatine is Archsteward. The Elector of Saxony carries the sword, which formerly the ἀρχισπαθάριος performed, who, bareheaded and next to the Emperor's kinsmen, carried the sword. Thus it appears that the ancestors wished those who were themselves Princes to be about the Prince.

§ 4. There are very many other Magistrates of the palace or court, all of whom are called by the single name Palatines. The lesser men were so called: the memorial secretaries, agentes in rebus, and attendants; obsequium was the name of the entire body of attendants, which served equally for protection and honor. But because at court there is frequent mention of a School and Scholastics, I judge that something must be said concerning them.

Scholastics are indeed commonly said to be those who devote themselves to learning and philosophy. Jerome testifies that Serapion was called a Scholastic because of the elegance of his intellect; Salvian joins Scholastics with discerning men. Augustine, On Dialectic, says that properly and originally those who are still in Schools are called Scholastics, yet that all who live among letters employ this name.

But Schools and Scholastics had an altogether different meaning in the state. Scholastics were present in council with the Prefects of the Praetorium and the Governors of Provinces.

Schools were orders of soldiers. They were so called by antiphrasis because they were by no means at leisure, as many think; but I think that in truth they were so called because of leisure, for training in arms was not so great that they could appear not to be at leisure. A soldier spends a large part of his life at leisure. In Vegetius, book 2, chapter 21, a School is a century.

The laws themselves sufficiently indicate that the labors of the military Schools were not excessive. For service in the eleven Schools was easier than that of men who endured service under the exalted Masters of the Soldiers. Indeed, two Schools served without arms: those of the Silentiaries and the agentes in rebus. The others were armed and were as though in Praetorian military service--that is, affluent, soft, and idle, which is seen more in pomp than in dangers. Hence there were two Schools of Candidates, Seniors and Juniors, whom a later age called Ostensionales, because they stood beside the rulers for the display of Majesty, commended by height and form. Yet the number of Schools varied at different times.

To these belong the Ducenarii and Centenarii, which are dignities of the legions but were transferred to Palatine offices. They presided over one hundred and two hundred members of the cohorts. Ducena and Centena were the names of the dignity itself. Paul of Samosata wished to be called Ducenarius rather than Bishop. They were in the School of the agentes in rebus. Augustus first instituted Ducenary Procurators, Dio, book 53, who collected taxes; they were so called because they possessed two hundred thousand sesterces in the census. The man who governed the order was called Primicerius: the Primicerius of the court εὐτακτεῖ τοὺς ἐν αὐλῇ πάντας, "sets all those in the court in good order."

§ 5. These too were chief offices in the royal court. The Protovestiarius presided over the inner wardrobe and kept precious treasures; but the Protovestiarites was President of the treasury, and his dignity was great and not unequal to the Count of the Largesses. Under him was the Vestiarius and the man who was called Avestiarius in the imperial trireme.

The Great Shield-bearer is the King's groom. He offered the belt and sword to the King as he mounted or dismounted his horse, and formerly also the shield.

The Protallogator, who presided over the horses destined for the public post, is subject to the Great Primicerius.

The Λογαριαστής exercised care of all the courtiers, lest anyone lack his stipend.

The Sacellarius presided over alms. Zonaras, volume 3, page 76. Nevertheless he also exacted payments and decreed punishments. They were generally eunuchs and powerful.

The Great Master of the Hospice has under him eight arrangers of the table and tasters.

The Provost of the Hospice punishes those who offend in courtly service or wherever the King acts.

Other nobles were present in the palace and were created by letters patent; they enjoyed honor and titles without labor or emolument. Cassiodorus, book 6 of the Variae.

Among the French a Magistrate whom they called the King of the Ribalds presides over cleansing the courts. Ribalds are strong men, σακκοφόροι, "burden bearers," such as the ancient

[Printed page 561]

Egyptians. Accordingly, they called wanderers and vagrants, worthless men, and rogues by this name. That King therefore drove this whole kind of dregs from the court, lest, like flies, they cling to the royal banquets and befoul the palace.

§ 6. An ordinary fault of ancient courts was an excessive multitude of men. The Proconsul of Africa and his Legates had four hundred attendants. Arcadius and Honorius, Code, book 12, title 56: "We judge that four hundred must be assigned to your staff and that of your Legates, from those only whom the members of the state do not complain have been taken from them."

The Count of the East had six hundred, under Theodosius and Arcadius: "In the office of the Count of the East let there be no more than six hundred attendants, whom we know to be abundantly sufficient for public necessities."

§ 7. The Franks were much more moderate: one hundred nobles, to whom one hundred gold pieces were given monthly; one hundred others were added to them.

The privilege of all Palatines, given by Constantine, is that they should possess what they have acquired as though it were military peculium. "We command," he says in chapter 12, title 31, "that all Palatines upon whom certain privileges of our edict have long since been poured should possess as military peculium any property which, while they remain in our palace, they have acquired by their own economy or obtained by our gifts. For what is so truly from the camp as that which is acquired with our knowledge and almost beneath our eyes? Nor are those men strangers to the dust and labor of camps who accompany our standards, who are always ready for duties, whom the length of journeys and the difficulty of expeditions exercise, intent upon and instructed in their studies. Therefore let our Palatines, who have been able to use the privileges of the edict, retain as their own their peculia which, while appointed in our palace, they have acquired either by their own labor, as has been said, or by our donation. Posted ten days before the Kalends of June, Constantine Augustus for the sixth time and Constantius Caesar being Consuls."

Finally, there was also the Tribune of Shining Things, who possessed this function: that the palace and all public things should be cared for and kept shining.

CHAPTER XVII

A Consideration of Counts

§ 1. Zasius, Rulandus, and Cluverius have without cause invented the claim that Counts had their beginning among the Germans; for they were companions first of Proconsuls, and then of Emperors, and this before the manners and institutions of the Germans were known.

The dignity of Counts has now increased beyond measure. Formerly they were so called because they accompanied the Prince. The Prince's court itself was called the Comitatus, nor did "to be sent to the Prince" signify anything other than "to be sent to the Comitatus." Socrates, Ecclesiastical History, book 2, chapter 23. Ammianus, book 28, calls it the Sacred Comitatus; Symmachus, book 2, chapter 8, and book 9, chapter 8. The Comitatensian Legions or Vexillations took their name from it. Law Nemo, Code, On Military Affairs. The man who ordered the Comitatus was also called Count.

§ 2. The dignity of Counts now exists partly in the greatest Princes, partly in the vilest men, and partly in men of moderate station. The Count Palatine of the Rhine, an Elector, the Count of Flanders, and the Count of Tyrol are great Princes. Certain worthless men, who, endowed by the letters patent of Caesars with the honor of the Comitatus or Palatinate, wander about and boast in the title of honor; nevertheless, many honorable and military men are distinguished by that dignity. They were indeed at one time true companions of the Emperor; but now, when they bear it as a dignity, they ought not to be called Counts from custom alone.

Yet the beginning and origin of the name is from that custom. For Hadrian transferred the Senate into the court and enrolled the most select of the nobles into a company of friends, which was called the Comitatus of Caesar. Spartianus, Hadrian. Afterward the title of honor was given to others also, such as professors who had lectured publicly for twenty years. But now, since there are in Germany Counts Palatine, Landgraves, Margraves, and Burgraves--that is, Counts of the Palace, Borders, and Burgs, that is, of fortresses or towns--those wandering pretenders employ only the name "Counts Palatine."

The Count Palatine is so called from the Palace, not from the Capellatian region, which takes its name from Palas and over which the Count Palatine presides, called in the ancestral language Pfaltzia, as the most learned Peter Gregory of Toulouse thinks, book 6 of the Syntagma, chapter 8. For the Count Palatine is truly named from the Palace of Caesar and from the dignity which he possesses in it. First, he is Archsteward, which is a Palatine office; second, when the Empire is vacant he is Vicar of one portion; third, he is Judge in causes in which the Emperor is accused, which is an eminent dignity.

Thus it stands in the Golden Bull, title 5, On the Right of the Count Palatine of the Rhine and the Duke of Saxony: "Whenever, moreover, as is premised, the Sacred Empire happens to be vacant, the illustrious Count Palatine of the Rhine, Archsteward of the Sacred Empire at the hands of the future King of the Romans, in the regions of the Rhine and Swabia and where Frankish law obtains, by reason of the privilege of his Principality or County Palatine, ought to be Provider of the Empire, with power to exercise judgments; to present to ecclesiastical benefices; to collect revenues and proceeds; to invest with fiefs; and, in the place and name of the Sacred Empire, to receive oaths of fidelity. Nevertheless, all these things must in due time be renewed by the King of the Romans afterward elected, and the same oaths must be offered anew to him, excepting only the fiefs of Princes and those which are commonly called Fahnlehen, the investiture and collation of which we reserve specially to the Emperor alone, or the King of the Romans. Let the Count Palatine himself, however, know that every kind of alienation or obligation of imperial property is expressly forbidden to him during the time of this provision.

"And we will that the illustrious Duke of Saxony, Archmarshal of the Sacred Empire, enjoy the same right of provision in those places where Saxon laws are observed, under all the modes and conditions expressed above. And although the Emperor or King of the Romans, in causes in which he has been accused, must answer, as is said to have been introduced by custom, before the Count Palatine of the Rhine, Archsteward of the Sacred Empire and Prince Elector, nevertheless the Count Palatine himself may exercise that judgment nowhere except in the Imperial Court where the Emperor or King of the Romans is present."

When the Empire of the French and Germans flourished, Counts presided over cities; they were Judges and, as it were, Praetors. Beatus Rhenanus, book 2 of German Affairs. But when, either through merits or the outcomes of wars, administrations of counties were sometimes made perpetual and hereditary, from this arose Counts and Marquesses, of whom there is now in the Empire a great multitude, dignity, and power.

§ 3. Arcadius and Honorius made Counts equal to Proconsuls: "We decree generally that those who have deserved to be called Counts of the Consistory of Our Tranquillity should be made equal to Proconsuls of spectable rank. Given seven days before the Kalends of October at Constantinople, Theodorus, a man of clarissimate rank, being Consul." Code, book 12, title 10. This concerns Consistorians.

Concerning Counts of Military Affairs, title 12, Honorius and Theodosius confirmed the power of adoring the Prince:

[Printed page 562]

"The Provosts and Tribunes of the Schools who are admitted to the banquets of our leisure and from antiquity have deserved the faculty of adoring the Prince--among whom the Counts of the Sacred Stable and the Care of the Palace are also numbered--if they have deserved a Countship of the first order together with the Provostship, and by chance have not arrived at higher honors, when their oath has been laid aside we command that they be held among those who have been Counts of Egypt or of the Pontic Diocese, whose dignity is equal. Others who, with the honor of a Countship, have obtained a government, when released from military service we order to be numbered among those who have been Dukes of Provinces. Given seven days before the Kalends of April at Constantinople, Lucius, a man of clarissimate rank, being Consul."

After faithfully completing their service, the Decurions of the Palace could be enrolled among the Counts. Code, book 12, On Silentiaries and Decurions: "After faithfully completing their service and after laying aside the oaths of military service, let the Decurions of our Palace possess the choice either to prefer to obtain a dignity from Our Majesty from the Master of Offices, like the agentes in rebus, or to be enrolled among men of illustrious rank as Counts of the Domestics, namely among the agentes, so that honor may be reserved to them in every respect, both in adoring Our Serenity and in saluting Administrators, and in the other privileges of the aforesaid honor, and also in our Consistory. Given the day before the Kalends of November at Constantinople, Honorius for the tenth time and Theodosius for the sixth time, Augustuses, being Consuls."

The chief physicians of the Palace were also endowed with this dignity. Thus Honorius and Theodosius: "If the rank of a Countship of the first order has ennobled the chief physicians serving within the Palace, we command that they be enrolled among the Vicars, whether they laid aside military service long ago or shall lay it aside afterward; so that between the Vicars and Dukes who have administered office, and those who have deserved a Countship of the first order, there shall be no distinction except the time when each administered office or obtained the insignia of a Countship. Given twelve days before the Kalends of April at Constantinople, Lucius, a man of clarissimate rank, being Consul."

§ 4. It is evident that the Count of the Stable possessed great authority, for Valentinian adorned his brother Valens with that dignity. In Germany it is an ordinary dignity among men of moderate station; in France it is among the highest, indeed the most dangerous. By a corrupted word they call him Constable or Conestable. Formerly, when there was war, the cavalry was committed to him; afterward the whole army. He possessed jurisdiction over all soldiers and commanded even the King's brothers and kinsmen. His authority then increased when the office was made perpetual. His dignity is therefore the greatest, and the other Marshals are subject to him; for this reason he even possesses the King in his power. The Marshals serve in place of the Count of the Stable and Master of the Horse. Formerly there were four; afterward their number was increased, in order to divide the power, so that there were eight. The Master of Foot is properly the Vicar of the Constable.

§ 5. The authority of Dukes and Counts under Charlemagne was not singular; they were like Roman Governors, whom Emperors at their judgment either removed or restored to the place of dignity, just as the friends of Kings are now worth a talent, now a denarius, according to the place the King assigns them.

After the time of Diocletian Dukes possessed some rank of dignity, and their first mention is in Ammianus. In France they were nearest the Kings. Walafrid Strabo, book On Ecclesiastical Affairs, chapter 13. But they presided over Prefectures rather than hereditary lordship.

The kinsmen and brothers of Kings were called Peers; afterward twelve were so called, though elsewhere even parents are thus named.

Bullinger relates that he read in an ancient codex that a King ought to have two Patricians; a Patrician, four Dukes; a Duke, four Counts; a Count, four Barons; a Baron, four Castellans; and a Castellan, four Vassals. In another codex: a Count should preside over ten Marquesses, and a Marquess over ten Barons. I believe that this was written; I think it was never observed. I do not doubt that Marquesses take their name from borders. In German Marc is not a noble horse, but Maer is a mare, and perhaps a horse; but Marck or March is a border.

§ 6. The Count of Private Affairs was at first the procurator of Caesar and afterward the Count of the Lord's Estate. There was another Count under him, the Count of Private Largesses. Afterward he judged concerning escheated goods, incest, and violators of tombs. The Count of the Sacred Patrimony was also distinct from him, although they appear to have been under him.

Afterward the same office which had belonged to the Count of the Sacred Largesses was given to the Protovestiarius, who guarded all precious things and even the treasury itself; for this also was afterward added.

§ 7. Some think that Barons are Varones, that is, servants of soldiers and camp followers, who are the most foolish of men. The Germans say that they called wise men "Barons," that is, men. Now the Germans call them Freyherrn, not because they acknowledge no superior, but because they are under only the supreme Magistrate. I think the word is German, but the institution taken from the Romans. The Romans called Senators "Fathers"; it was a name of dignity, whence also came "Patricians." But among the ancient Germans, and now also, father is called Vaar, by contraction from Vader, for Vatter is more recent. Barons, therefore, or Varones, were so called as though fathers.

I am not ignorant that there are other opinions of others concerning Barons. Some think that they are called from βαρεῖν, or rather βαρύνειν, because they excel in gravity and dignity. Others who derive them from fortresses, which later Greeks called βάρεις from the Hebrew, or from ברא, that is, "creating," depart farther from the right course. For what would bring it into the mind of Germans and Frenchmen to distinguish a new dignity by a Hebrew name, and indeed one so general? Yet if a name must be sought all the way from Heber, we shall more rightly say that Barons are called Barionim, בריונים, as though from ברר, "chosen, serene, pure," for the Hebrews employ it more commonly in this meaning. But since that dignity exists among Germans and Frenchmen, I prefer to seek its meaning from their own ancient language rather than from foreign ones.

In certain cities, as in golden Mainz, some Masters of artisans whose care it is to provide for and direct foreign workmen who arrive are called Fathers. Yet it is useful to hear others also. Some think Vassals and Barons the same, but Peter Gregory of Toulouse shows that they are different, book 6 of the Syntagma, chapter 10. Hector Boethius testifies that among the Germans and Scots Barons are called the same as Royal Vassals. Blondus wished them to be included under that name. And some think that the captains and magnates of the kingdom were so called by that name:

all Dukes, Counts, and Marquesses. Otto of Freising also numbers William, Marquis of Montferrat, among the Barons of Italy. Among the ancients in France also it sometimes pleased them that Counts should be called Barons, as Renatus Chopinus teaches at greater length. Baldus, however, notes that the Lombards call this man a great Castellan; and Boerius says the same in France and that he is the man who, by concession of the Prince, has obtained in a certain fortress the right of lower, middle, and highest coercion. Others suspect that the man called a Baron is the one who is called a great Valvassor and Captain of the King in fiefs, whom the Prince has invested with some commonalty or portion. But it pleased others that anyone below a Count who possesses some dignity should be called a Baron. For they wished a County to be more worthy than a Barony. Nor is the opinion of those who confuse these dignities commonly approved, because both are often named together in law as distinct.

[Printed page 563]

Some attribute to the Baron even the supreme power after the royal power in matters pertaining to feudal rights, and assert that these men are called Barons from the Greek word βαρεῖν, because they ought to precede the other Beneficiary Lords in gravity and dignity. As testimony for this they cite Cicero to Atticus: "I have placed you in the highest favor with the Patron and the other Barons," and so forth. Others, however, read "Varones" there.

Others derive Barons from the form of a feudal building, because houses enclosed on every side and raised upon towers are called Bareis by the people of Palestine, according to Rhodiginus. But if it is permitted to interpret our word from other languages, the derivation from the Hebrew speech appears truer to me: that a Baron should be called, as it were, a new creature and creation which is neither a Duke, Marquess, nor Count, but some new thing. For thus the Hebrews say ברא, "he created," and בריאה, a formation, a new creature; or from ברר, "he chose," so that a Baron is called "chosen." And among the Rabbis also Barion is a bodyguard, who is commonly called spatharinus, "swordsman."

And in chapter 11 he shows that greater Princes are called Vassals, Valvassores, and Valvasini. His words are: "They think Valvassores are so called because they stood at their Lords' doors, as was also done among the Kings of the Hebrews. Lesser Valvassores they also called Valvasini. And in turn those who received a fief from the lesser Valvassores were called the least Valvassores. Thus there were three ranks of Valvassores: greater, lesser, and least. By common law the lesser were free to take away from the least a fief, after restoring the price, if they had sold it to them; this was nevertheless not permitted by the custom of Milan, because the least possess the same right as the greater. In relation to all these, Dukes, Counts, and Marquesses, who received a fief from the King and gave it to others, are called Seniors, as though first Feudatories before the greater Valvassores. From this word Seniores is derived the word Seigneur. Valvassores are also called soldiers of the Seniors."

For so Conrad I often employs the word in a law added to the Frankish and Lombard laws, in the title On Benefices and Tributary Lands. Pepin also employed it in the law concerning property under dispute, which he enacted in this manner: "Let no one purchase a horse, ox, pack animal, or any other thing unless he knows the man who sold it, or from what district he is, or where he dwells, and who his Senior is." The Franks spoke of Vassals and Vassi, as appears in the title On the Lord's Vassi. Aemoinus says that Charlemagne appointed throughout all Aquitaine Counts and Abbots, and very many others, "whom," he says, "they commonly call Vassi, from the nation of the Franks." And elsewhere he relates that Tassilo, Duke of the Bavarians, came with the chief men of his nation and, after the Frankish custom, commended himself with his own hands into the King's hands in vassalage; and promised by oath upon the body of Saint Dionysius fidelity both to King Pepin himself and to his sons Charles and Carloman; and so forth. In like manner also all the chief men and elders of the Bavarians.

Some say that Vassals were named from vas vadis, because in the form of fidelity they swore an obligation to their Lord. Others say from the Frankish word Vassi, which signifies "brave," namely because Lords granted fiefs to chosen brave soldiers. In the Turkish language Bassalar means eminent men--if one may speak thus, "heads"--who always accompany the Prince for counsel. Thus Satraps and men of greater dignity are also called Bashas among the Turks, some of whom are greater than others. Thus Bashas are honored by other Bashas according to dignity. And perhaps βάσσαι also were so called, as though Vassi.

Others say that Barons and Baros mean men, namely brave men, so that it is a name of virtue. Thus certain glosses. The Picards thus call husbands. Among Spaniards Varon means an eminent man. Indeed, the German word Bar has the notion of liberty; for this reason some think that children, that is, sons, were also so called. Matthew Paris, in the English History, calls the council or assembly of France the Baronagium.

CHAPTER XVIII

A Consideration of the Roman Consulship

§ 1. After the Kings had been expelled, the Consulship was the principal office in the Roman state. In the creation and adornment of this Magistracy I find many things instituted most wisely and some less prudently--not because they lacked wisdom, but because through fear, rivalry, and desire they overstepped the bounds of what was right.

§ 2. In the beginning the creation of Consuls was conducted with the greatest integrity. In the two hundred and forty-fourth year from the foundation of the city, two were created by the Prefect of the City from the registers of Servius Tullius: Lucius Junius Brutus and Lucius Tarquinius Collatinus; and this was done in the Centuriate Assembly.

Servius preferred the Centuriate Assembly, lest the elections be in the hands of the lowest men. For although the poor were the greater part, the Magistracies were nevertheless in the power of the wealthiest. There were six classes: the first was of the wealthiest, the second of the rich. There were one hundred and ninety-three centuries; in the first class were ninety-eight centuries, in the second twenty. Those two classes, therefore, when they agreed, designated the Magistrates. Lesser Magistrates were created in the Tribal Assembly, in which the people had greater power; accordingly Quintus Fabius and Publius Decius cast the rabble of the Forum, which had been mingled through all the tribes, into the four urban tribes. Thus the elections were always in the power of the principal men. This must be attended to with the greatest care in a free state, lest wicked and needy men designate as Consul one to whose advantage it is that the state be afflicted and overthrown.

§ 3. The consular age was forty-two years, and an ordinary return to the office was not permitted except after an interval of ten years. This also was observed: access to the highest dignity was made through the grades and through other Magistracies well administered. Yet all these things were sometimes changed either through ambition or through the necessity of the state. Afterward the rule of age was neglected, and Honorius as a boy was raised to the Consulship. Claudian:

> A Consul amid your cradle-clothes,
>
> You advance, marking the fasti merely by your name,
>
> And the year which brought you forth is given to you.
>
> Your mother herself clothed you, still small, in the Quirinal robe
>
> And taught you to crawl toward your first curule chairs.

§ 4. The honor of the Consuls was great. First, his chair was ivory, altogether royal. Hence it is called the most ample dignity, is preferred to all dignities, and was an honor sought even by Emperors. Statius, book 4 of the Silvae:

> Every honor takes its light from the Consul.

Next came the bordered toga. In the later age it was customarily given by Emperors. Vopiscus, in Probus: “The palm-embroidered Capitolian robe awaits you.” Valerian wrote to Aurelian: “Receive, therefore, for your achievements four mural crowns,” and so forth, “a bordered toga, a palm-embroidered tunic, a painted toga, a deep under-tunic, and an ivory chair; for today I designate you Consul, and I shall write to the Senate that it assign you a scepter and also assign you the fasces.”

[Printed page 564]

In this matter they were liberal, while observing the precept of Maecenas: “Preserve honor for the Consuls; take away their strength.”

Third, the year was inscribed with the name of the Consuls. For this reason the names of wicked men were sometimes erased from the fasti, and Claudian deservedly complains:

> Through the cities an old woman in the consular robe
>
> Is displayed and effeminates the title of the year.

Libanius describes that dignity, which long afterward remained without power: “What could be more venerable than to encompass the whole world, after the manner of the sun, by the appellation of one’s name, and for the name given by one’s parents to be in the mouth of all men--a name whose remembrance attends many necessities: judgments, marriages, the forum, harbors, debts, sales, those contracting, those making agreements, litigants, those establishing credit by letters, those entering into association, those separating, and the birthdays of wealthy sons?”

§ 5. The power of the Consuls was altogether royal. Livy speaks truly in book 2: “You may reckon the origin of liberty from this rather--that the consular government was made annual--than from the fact that anything was diminished from royal power. The first Consuls retained all the rights and all the insignia. This alone was guarded against: lest, if both possessed the fasces, terror should appear doubled. Brutus first possessed the fasces with his colleague’s consent; and he had not been a more vigorous vindicator of liberty than he was afterward its guardian. First of all he compelled the people, greedy for their new liberty, by an oath that they would permit no one to reign at Rome, lest afterward they could be bent by the entreaties or gifts of Kings.”

The summit of their power was nevertheless bestowed chiefly for the conduct of wars, after the example of the Lacedaemonians, among whom there was a King and two annual Commanders. Hence came the fasces and Lictors, all after the royal manner. Later, in the time of the Emperors, scarcely any wars were entrusted to Consuls. It was extraordinary that Belisarius, after being made Consul, conducted the war in Sicily and laid down the Magistracy in the province, although by then it was not a Magistracy but the empty mask of an honor.

§ 6. First, their power was diminished by the addition of a colleague with equal power, so that, if one were wicked or seditious, he might be restrained by his colleague, since they held the fasces by turns.

Next, the government was annual, so that they might rule more moderately over men who were sometime to possess the Magistracy over them. This is still the custom in many cities, though in another and happier manner than among the Romans.

But since not even in this way was the imperious pride of certain men sufficiently restrained, it was afterward established that they should judge and act according to the Senate’s opinion. Indeed, an appeal from the Consuls to the people was granted. At length they reached such a pitch of contention that they broke the Consuls’ fasces and refused to answer to their name. Livy, book 2, under the Consuls Aulus Verginius and Titus Veturius.

At length the Tribunes were opposed to them. Hence came all those conflicts of a divided state. Hence in book 2 they threaten Claudius with bonds; in book 5 they command that the military Tribunes be under the Senate’s power; in book 7 they compel Manlius to resign the Dictatorship; and in book 4 they stir up the people against the Consuls. Amid these struggles between the Fathers and the plebs the state passed a great part of its life, because it possessed governments contending with one another.

§ 7. They possessed an army only by a decree of the Senate or a plebiscite. Julius Caesar was proclaimed Consul and Dictator for ten years; when the first opportunity came, those who had been compelled to do this reclaimed their authority. Augustus also, just as he began to possess tribunician power, likewise possessed Proconsular command. Dio says:

> ἀνθύπατον ἐστὶ καθάπαξ, ὥστε μήτε ἐν τῇ εἰσόδῳ τῇ ἔσω πωμηρίῳ καταλῦσαι τὴν ἀρχήν.

He was created Proconsul--that is, he possessed consular power always and perpetually--so that not even by entering the Pomerium did he lay down his power. Otherwise, upon entering the city, he lost Proconsular command. The plebs conferred a perpetual Consulship upon the elder Africanus because of his immense services to the state, but with greater moderation he refused it. Domitian numbered seventeen Consulships, not without ridicule.

§ 8. The management of public money was in the hands of the Consul. Hence Caesar, when Consul, stole golden ingots and substituted gilded bronze ones in their place. This indeed was a great power, but afterward that charge was entrusted to others. On his first entrance Caesar opened the treasury and threatened the Tribune who forbade him with death. He brought forth twenty-six thousand golden ingots and three hundred thousand in coined money; the sum was twenty-six million.

§ 9. The Consul possessed the ordinary right of consulting the Senate. This was observed so strictly that the Emperor did not possess the power of convening the Senate except by a special privilege. Accordingly, we read that it was granted to Vespasian by decree of the Senate: "That he be permitted to hold the Senate, make a motion, remit a matter, and make a decree of the Senate by motion and division," and so forth. "That whenever the Senate is held according to his will or authority, by his command or mandate, or in his presence, the law of all matters should be regarded and observed in the same way as if the Senate had been summoned and were held according to law."

This right was therefore customarily given to Princes. The Consul who possessed the fasces in that month made the motion. This was the ordinary rule; nevertheless, Senators were sometimes accustomed to ask that they might refer a matter to the Senate and themselves speak at length about urgent affairs. It is evident from the beginning of the eighth Philippic and elsewhere that the Consul nevertheless possessed great weight.

§ 10. Military Tribunes with consular power were created in the 309th year of the city; after the year 396 they ceased to exist. During that time they did not enter the Magistracy continuously, but almost alternately with the Consuls. The reason for creating military Tribunes with consular power was that the Fathers refused to make plebeians Consuls, while the Tribunes demanded it. They therefore preferred Tribunes who might be taken from both plebs and Fathers. At first three were elected from the Fathers, and the plebs was content because account had been taken of its members; afterward four, and finally six, were made, partly patricians and partly plebeians. At length there were eight. Livy, at the beginning of book 5. I marvel that some regard that passage as corrupt and think that there were never eight, since Livy refutes this: "Peace had been obtained elsewhere; the Romans and Veientes were in arms, with such anger and hatred that it appeared the end awaited the vanquished. The elections of the two peoples were held by very different methods. The Romans increased the number of military Tribunes with consular power. Eight, as had never been created before, were elected: Marcus Aemilius Mamercus for the second time, Lucius Valerius Potitus for the third, Appius Claudius Crassus, Marcus Quinctilius Varus, Marcus Julius Tullus, Marcus Postumius, Marcus Furius Camillus, and Marcus Postumius Albinus."

Yet the moderation of the plebs in this matter was great, because for forty-four years no man from the plebs was created military Tribune in the camps, although they contended that plebeians should be Consuls. Thus it appears that the pride of the nobility, not the ill will of the plebs, was the reason why Magistracies were shared with the lowest men.

§ 11. In the creation and administration of this supreme Magistracy there are many things which I find wanting. In truth, poor provision was made for the ancient state.

[Printed page 565]

The source of the evil was that annual power, by always instilling new hopes into men eager for change, possessed too little authority and too little strength to restrain the people. The Romans themselves concede this to me. Livy, book 2: "From this point I shall relate the deeds of the Roman people, now free, in peace and war; their annual Magistrates; and the commands of laws more powerful than those of men. The pride of the last King had caused this liberty to be more welcome. For the earlier Kings reigned in such a manner that they are not undeservedly all numbered thereafter among the founders of the parts of the city, because they added new settlements for the multitude which they themselves had increased. Nor is it doubted that the same Brutus, who earned so much glory by expelling the proud King, would have acted to the greatest public harm if, through desire for an immature liberty, he had wrested the kingdom from any of the former Kings. For what would have happened if that rabble of shepherds and immigrants, fugitives from their own peoples, having obtained liberty--or at least impunity--under the protection of an inviolate sanctuary, had, when royal fear was removed, begun to be agitated by tribunician storms and to sow conflicts with the Fathers in an alien city before the pledges of wives and children and love of the very soil, to which men become accustomed over a long time, had united their spirits? The still immature state would have been scattered by discord. The tranquil moderation of government fostered it and brought it, by nourishing it, to the point that, with its strength now mature, it could bear the good fruit of liberty."

He plainly admits that a free people could not have grown under those conditions. Indeed, while Tarquin, so savage and so proud a King, was still alive, they wished there to be a Dictator because of fear of the Latin war. Livy explained this excellently in book 2: "After a Dictator--Lartius--was created for the first time at Rome, when they saw axes carried before him, great fear seized the plebs, so that they were more intent upon obeying his command. For there was not, as under the Consuls who possessed equal power, the aid of the other; nor was there appeal; nor was there any help anywhere except in careful obedience." A little afterward Postumius the Dictator fought with Tarquin. Then, when the Kings had been removed, tyranny was doubled and a sedition of the plebs soon arose. Livy, book 2: it began when Appius Claudius and Publius Servilius were Consuls. "It was already near the point at which not even the majesty of the Consuls could restrain the passions of men." And a little afterward: "From that point one Consul and the Fathers raged; but the courage of the plebs had increased, and they proceeded by a very different path from that which they had first begun. For, despairing of aid from the Consuls and Senate, when they saw a debtor being led to court, they rushed together from every side. The Consul's decree could not be heard because of the din and shouting; and when he had decreed, no one obeyed. The matter was conducted by force, and all fear and danger to liberty, when individuals were assaulted by many in the Consul's sight, had turned from the debtors upon the creditors." At length a secession was made, and, lest they be bound by the military oath, they resolved to kill the Consuls.

§ 12. The reasons why the Consulship is not a suitable Magistracy are manifold: it belongs to canvassers; it is annual; it belongs to the inexperienced and to rivals; and it is exercised over men whom the Consul fears and whom for many reasons he cannot offend.

The first source of weakness in that Magistracy is that, although the Consulship was sometimes given as a reward for virtue, constancy, and integrity, it more often yielded to flatteries and ambition. First, it was very frequently given to eloquent men. Cicero, On Canvassing for the Consulship: "The man who is regarded as a worthy advocate of Consulars cannot be thought unworthy of the Consulship." Accordingly, supports were procured even through the greatest injustice, and favor privately. The same Cicero: "Then let both the multitude and the kinds of your friends appear. For you possess those things which new men have not possessed: all the publicans, almost the entire equestrian order, many municipalities besides, many men of every order defended by you, several colleges, and in addition very many young men conciliated by devotion to speaking, and the daily attendance and frequency of friends. Take care to retain these by commending, asking, and contriving by every means that they understand both what they owe you, as an occasion for returning favor, and that those who wish to oblige you will have no other time." He then advises him to commend himself to the Optimates and nobles.

Hence we see that no man was so wicked that through his crimes he lost the hope of attaining the Consulship. The things which Cicero writes concerning Antony and Catiline, Galba and Cassius are astonishing; nevertheless they were competitors for the Consulship. They induced the tribes to support them by promise, hope, and gift. Hence came greeters, escorts, attendants, and friends who referred everything to the candidate's ambition and nothing to the safety of the state. Hence, in popular solicitation and handshaking, came those enticements and deceits: knowledge of names, flatteries, assiduity, liberality, rumor, and hope. Hence came that rule of candidates: they were not to permit anyone to be able to say that he had not been asked, or had not been asked earnestly and diligently. Honorable and lavish promises and most profuse largesses often brought it about that they made Consul a man whom no good man would wish to have as a son. Hence came those plagues of the state: intermediaries, agents, and distributors.

Since very many therefore came to dignity by money and crimes, they could not administer with dignity or for the public good the state which they had been unable to obtain by virtue. Blinded by money, they rejected distinguished men. Quintus Aelius Tubero, because he had spread Punic couches with kidskins and had set out Samian ware instead of silver vessels, was rejected from the Praetorship. Paulus Aemilius, after being rejected, wearied the Campus and could not by the splendor of his nobility or the goods of his spirit prevent the Quirites from being adverse to him. The same envy drove the sorrowful Metellus from the Campus. But the greatest disgrace of the Roman people was that Vatinius was preferred to Cato in the Praetorship.

A greater evil arose from this: those Magistracies were very often conferred upon needy men who had poured out all their resources upon largesses. How, therefore, could authority, vigor, or esteem exist in men who, unless by injustice, sold opinions, corrupted judgments, and plunder of the provincials they amassed enough booty for themselves and their judges, would be dragged into bondage as soon as they laid down the Magistracy?

§ 13. Even if the Consuls were good, brave, equitable, and experienced in affairs, the brevity of their term nevertheless frustrated all the force of consular command. For this very fact--that the Magistracy lasted only a year--blunted the courage and confidence of the ruler; and those who obeyed unwillingly or were offended counted each day precisely. A Consul-designate also was often hostile; or, even if benevolent, a successor nevertheless loomed over him. But nothing hindered equally with the inexperience of those who were created. For every year they chose a new Ruler. This is just as if some Prince or city should every year choose for itself a new physician who had never healed anyone and should hazard his art at the risk of its life. The madness would be judged still greater if, captured by favor or gifts, they entrusted their health to an inexperienced man.

For this reason most free cities in Germany, although they change the Consulship, nevertheless permit it to remain among experienced men. The laws of Cologne have made excellent provision that a continuous Consulship remain among six men, in such a way that it returns to each one every third year.

[Printed page 566]

From this they obtain the advantage that neither does excessive power belong to one man nor are affairs governed by the inexperienced. In place of a deceased Consul the Senate by decree substitutes a Senator of proven fidelity, virtue, and prudence. In his year that man enters the Magistracy with a colleague who has served before; thus they are governed by experienced men. No one aspires to the Consulship through ambition, because there is one access alone: if he has proved to the Senate his prudence, vigilance, constancy, justice, and dexterity in ruling.

§ 14. But what was the origin of all disasters was that in the Roman Consulship there was no force by which the injuries of powerful men could be restrained. For, first of all, Consuls were agitated by great personal hostilities, so that they sometimes betrayed their fatherland and army. Thus it happened at Veii, as Livy testifies in book 5. Sergius and Verginius were military Tribunes with consular power, each hated and was hostile to the other. “When it was reported to Verginius that most of the forts had been attacked, the defenses overcome, and the enemy was entering from both sides, he kept his soldiers under arms, repeatedly saying that, if there were need of aid, his colleague would send to him. The obstinacy of the other equaled this man’s arrogance: lest he appear to have sought any help from an enemy, he preferred to be conquered by the enemy rather than conquer through a fellow citizen. For a long time soldiers were slaughtered between them; at last, after abandoning the defenses, a very few made for the greater camp, but the largest part, and Sergius himself, for Rome. There, when he shifted all blame upon his colleague, it was resolved that Verginius be summoned from the camp and that the Legates command in the meantime. The matter was then debated in the Senate, and the colleagues contended with insults. Few supported the state; men supported one or the other according as private zeal or favor had seized each."

Many examples teach that no Senator could be restrained by a Consul if only he possessed the spirit to resist. For the faction of the Patricians allowed nothing to be done for the advantages of the plebs, and the object was that the Consul should strengthen the domination of the nobility. But if anyone sought the favor of the plebs, he assuredly possessed an easy refuge against all patrician commands. Other things were then present by which justice could not be defended or injuries restrained: the conspiracy of the nobility, relationships by blood and marriage, the succession of others to the same dignity, and reciprocal hopes of concealment. No noble Consul was ever found who administered the Magistracy in such a way as to arouse against himself the hatred of his peers by impartial justice and the defense of the plebs. Nor were there lacking those who secretly and openly plotted snares and death. I therefore praise more highly the Veientes, who, weary of annual ambition, the cause of discord, created a King.

§ 15. Excessive expenses were also made in the Consulship, so that the purple of a single year reduced many to poverty. Lest anyone think that the lords of the earth are undeservedly censured, let him hear the most prudent judge Lipsius, book 2, chapter 11 of The Greatness of Rome: "I shall state the chief heads of expenditure. Lactantius speaks thus concerning them generally: 'What is to be said of those who, led by popular fickleness, expend upon the presentation of shows resources sufficient even for great cities?' Likewise Ambrose: 'A Magistrate bestows and squanders his entire patrimony upon theaters, mimes, athletes, gladiators, and other kinds of men of this sort, so that he may acquire the favor of the crowd for a single hour.' The Fathers deservedly condemn this ruinous madness, which strips private men of their goods through play and diminishes and saps Princes themselves. You may learn this both from the frequency of the shows and from their apparatus. Augustus alone says that he gave games twenty-four times in his own name and twenty-three times for other Magistrates who were absent or lacked the means. I scarcely think any of those princely games cost less than five hundred thousand or even a million sesterces, as their equipment and pomp will readily persuade us. For behold, how great were often the expenses in adorning the theater itself, the amphitheater, or the circus, since some charm and enticement of novelty was always sought in the very form. Nero, for example, overlaid and covered the entire theater--not merely its stage--with gold. Whatever was brought in, and every instrument and item of stage equipment, was likewise golden; and the awnings stretched above against the sun were wholly purple and interwoven with golden stars. Hence even that day was called Golden. Dio Cassius relates this concerning Nero. Pliny likewise signifies the same thing: 'Nero covered Pompey's theater with gold for one day, on which he displayed it to Tiridates, King of Armenia.'

"What of Julius Caesar before Nero, when he was not yet Prince? As Aedile, in the funeral show for his father, he was the first to use silver for all the equipment of the arena; and beasts being assailed with silver spears were then seen for the first time. Soon afterward, in something which even municipalities emulate, Gaius Antonius gave games with a silver stage." Afterward the Consulship was a mere name; yet those shadows of Consuls did more to irritate spirits than to pacify them, since in this manner dignity was not added to citizens, but the memory of lost dignity was renewed, not without reproach. Pandulf Petrucci, the tyrant of Siena, imitated the same thing in the creation of Six Men.

And afterward: "But you will say that these things belonged only to principal men. You are mistaken. Cicero long ago said of Milo that he poured out three patrimonies upon these things; Vopiscus speaks of a certain Messala when he relates these things with indignation: 'Let Junius Messala read this passage, whom I dare freely to blame. For he gave his patrimony to stage-players and denied it to his heirs; he gave his mother's tunic to a female mime and his father's cloak to a mime--and rightly so, if a tragic actor were to use his grandmother's gold-and-purple mantle and trailing robe! Why should I speak now of linens sought from Egypt, or of those from Tyre and Sidon, translucent in their fineness, gleaming with purple, most celebrated for the difficulty of their embroidery? Cloaks sought from Arras were given; cloaks from Canusium were given; African riches never before seen appeared upon the stage. I committed these things to writing so that shame might touch future producers, lest, after disinheriting lawful heirs, they assign patrimonies to mimes and babblers.'"

The expense of all was immense, for the consular and triumphal banquet had passed into custom. Pliny, book 14, chapter 15: "Did not Caesar the Dictator also distribute amphorae of Falernian and Chian wine at the banquet of his triumph? At his Spanish triumph he likewise gave Chian and Falernian wine; but at the banquet in his third Consulship, Falernian, Chian, Lesbian, and Mamertine. It is established that this was the first time four kinds of wine were set out. Afterward, therefore, all other wines came into distinction, around the seven-hundredth year of the city."

Let this, however, be granted to the congratulations of friends. Consuls gave games at the greatest loss to themselves and the public. But this surpasses all madness: even when the Consulship was only an honor and not also a power, many nevertheless purchased the mask of a dead Magistracy by the loss of their patrimony. Whoever does not know the expenses of the games is ignorant of Roman antiquity. Consuls exhibited a hunt. Claudian, book 3, On the Praise of Stilicho:

> Beasts to be held with death delayed by nets and enclosures,
>
> And beasts to be led forth--restrain your eager arrows;
>
> Spare the monsters destined to fall for the Consul's applause.

[Printed page 567]

It was a matter of great expense and not suitable for a man who was about to return to private life. Thus, while they competed in expenditures at home, the spoils of the provinces were purchased in the Assembly much more ardently than monstrous beasts:

> Then he gathers green leopards and the other prodigies
>
> Of the south, and together with them Latona's monstrous tusks.

Nor do I censure the madness of expenditure without cause, for popular Emperors alleviated it. Aurelian gave the Consulship at public expense; he would not have given a benefit if he had not himself supplied an expense ruinous to a private man. Other, more prudent Emperors afterward reduced the expense, as Alexander Severus did. Yet ambition most wretched in its desire was not lacking: many judged it more tolerable to be ruined by expenses than to lack the Consulship.

The laws themselves agree with me. Valentinian and Marcian forbade it, Code, book 12, title 3: "We have recalled the order of the Consulship to the ancient ordinance, so that the throngs of the people may follow the chair of our honor for its merit, not through eagerness to seize gifts, and, laying aside desire for gain, may behold the venerable attire of our fathers and the ornaments of most fortunate antiquity. We therefore wish the Consuls to precede all others by this example also, and do not permit them to expend without effect. Thus, when this advantage of scattering gifts has ceased, let the most ample Consuls henceforth abstain from the error of ruining themselves as they proceed; and by the best counsel let that which was to be incompetently thrown away benefit a necessary work. Therefore let one hundred pounds of gold be furnished under each Consulship for the restoration of the aqueducts of this most ample city, so that the Consul may know that he has given to his fatherland and that it may be known that what is given will remain perpetually. Given when Sporacius and Herculanus were Consuls."

Not even antiquity could endure that, after the power of making war and peace had been taken away--as the Emperor speaks in Novel 105--Consuls should exhaust themselves by largesse alone. Marcian altogether forbade the scattering of coins; Justinian permitted them to scatter silver but forbade gold. Yet it is useful to hear the laws: "What the Consul ought to scatter among the people in these seven processions we have determined better than the constitution of Marcian of divine memory declares. That law indeed altogether denied munificence; but we correct that provision, arranging it according to the will of the man who possesses the honor of the Consulship. For if he wishes to scatter nothing, we do not compel him; but if he again wishes to come to this and honor the people with gifts of silver, we do not forbid this either. Nevertheless, we do not permit him to scatter gold of any stamp or weight whatsoever, whether smaller, larger, or intermediate--but silver, as we have said."

Let these things have been said concerning the office, honor, and power of the Consuls. When that power failed, the Romans supported it by the Dictatorship, concerning which I shall speak in its place.

CHAPTER XIX

Magistracies Similar to the Consulship

§ 1. The military Tribunes were altogether equal to the Consuls and were therefore called military Tribunes with consular power. The Decemvirs for writing the laws employed the same absolute power, although a greater power was given to them by which they might compose and enact laws. But their power was abolished in a tumult because, although they promulgated the most equitable laws, they treated the citizens most injuriously and judged most unjustly.

§ 2. The Prefect of the City was nearly equal to, and afterward superior to, the Consuls. It was an ancient Roman Magistracy and instituted by the Kings themselves, for when the Kings departed for war they appointed a Prefect for the city. This afterward continued, except that under the Emperors their power was greater and they discharged their office even when Augustus was present. Tacitus, Annals, book 6: "At the same time Lucius Piso the Pontiff--something rare amid such distinction--died by fate. He was voluntarily the author of no servile opinion and, whenever necessity pressed, wisely moderate. I have related that his father was a Censor; his age advanced to his eightieth year. He had earned triumphal distinction in Thrace. But his chief glory came from this: that, as the recently appointed Prefect of the City, he wonderfully moderated a continuous power, made more burdensome by the insolence of obedience. For formerly, when the Kings, and soon afterward the Magistrates, departed from home, lest the city be without government, a man was chosen for a time to administer justice and govern the subjects. They say that Denter Romulius was appointed by Romulus, then Numa Marcius by Tullus Hostilius, and Spurius Lucretius by Tarquin the Proud. Afterward the Consuls gave the commission; and its image remains whenever, because of the Latin Festival, a man is appointed to assume the consular function.

"But during the civil wars Augustus placed Cilnius Maecenas, of the equestrian order, over all at Rome and throughout Italy. Soon, having gained possession of affairs, because of the size of the people and the slow assistance of the laws, he selected from the Consulars a man to restrain the slaves and that element among the citizens which was turbulent in its audacity unless it feared force. Messalla Corvinus was the first to receive that power and relinquished it within a few days, as though ignorant how to exercise it. Then Taurus Statilius, although of advanced age, bore it excellently. Next Piso, equally approved through twenty years, was celebrated by a public funeral by decree of the Senate."

§ 3. Under the free state the office of Prefect of the City was not of long duration. For after Praetors were created, command, when the Consuls were absent, was transferred to them. It nevertheless remained when the Consuls had departed from the city because of the Latin Festival. Dionysius, book 4, speaks thus concerning the Latin Festival: "So that this treaty might remain perpetual, Tarquin proposed to assign a common sanctuary of the Romans, Latins, Hernici, and Volsci--of those, that is, who had been received into alliance--at which they might assemble for a market each year, feast together, and enjoy common sacred rites. This pleased all. A place for the gathering was appointed almost in the midst of these nations, a high mountain overlooking Alba; there each year the festival was to be celebrated, and during that interval, because of the sanctity of the place and the law enacted concerning it, all were to abstain from every conflict, sacrifice together to Jupiter Latiaris, and devote themselves to feasts, after it had first been determined how much each people ought to furnish for those rites and how great a portion it ought to receive. Forty-seven peoples participated in that festival and sacrifice; the Romans celebrate it in our own age also and call it the Latin Festival. The peoples participating in the rites contribute to it: some lambs, some cheeses, some a fixed measure of milk, and some milk-cakes. The victim is one bull common to all; of its entrails each people receives its portion. The sacrifice is made on behalf of all, and the Romans preside over it."

So great was that superstition--or rather renewal of the treaty--that it was regarded as impious and ominous for Consuls to go to their provinces unless they had first proclaimed the Latin Festival on the Alban Mount. Livy frequently notes this. Livy speaks of the repetition of the Latin Festival in books 32, 37, and 41. The officer created because of the Latin Festival was therefore called Prefect of the City; at first he possessed consular power and, before the Consuls, viceregal power.

[Printed page 568]

After the Praetorship was instituted, a Prefect of the City was appointed only for the sake of religion; Tacitus calls this an "image." Hence arises what Aulus Gellius records in book 15, chapter 8: whether the Prefect of the City for the sake of the Latin Festival possesses the right of transacting with the Fathers or the people. Formerly he possessed it; but when he was the image of a Magistrate, he did not. Indeed, he was an image of a Magistrate precisely because the right of convening the Senate and summoning the people of the Quirites was denied him.

At first the Magistracy lasted a few days, for one day had been instituted by Tarquin; afterward there were more. Dionysius, book 6: "The Senate decreed supplications because the plebs had returned to favor, and added a third day to the Latin Festival, although previously there had been only two: the first consecrated by King Tarquin at the time when he conquered Etruria; the other added by the people when, after the Kings were expelled, it obtained liberty; but the third was then added after the plebs had been reconciled with the Fathers."

Afterward, when disputes about admitting the plebs to the Consulship had been settled, a fourth day was added. Thus, if you consider the departure and return of the Consuls, you will assign six days to that imaginary Prefect. All rightly censure this care for superstition. But I add this also: although the Consuls were absent for a lawful reason--the renewal of friendship and confirmation of the treaty through the cheerfulness of banquets--a sudden and brief Magistracy was nevertheless not expedient. First, because he was named not by any votes but by the voice of the Consuls; then, because authority could not become established in so brief a government. This reason therefore moved the Romans to entrust the care of governing the city to the Praetors, for theirs was an annual Magistracy and next to the Consul.

Yet an error was made in this: that afterward they bestowed the name of Magistracy upon the Prefect for the sake of the Latin Festival. To number dead images among dignities by the name of Magistracies and fit insignia to them is not only ridiculous but insulting even to true powers. For as soon as the force of some government begins to be diminished, or a spirit unequal to the government begins to arise, men soon possess something with which to compare it and ridicule a dignity necessary to the state in its image. A Dictator for the purpose of instituting the Latin Festival--Quintus Ogulnius with Marcus Laetorius Plancianus as Master of Horse--is no less ridiculous than a Prefect of the City for the same festival.

§ 4. The Prefect of the City was instituted by Augustus on the advice of Maecenas; for it had seemed best to leave honor to the Consuls and take away their power, although it was not proper to leave the city ἄναρχον, "without a ruler." That new and then ordinary Magistracy was therefore created. The first was either Maecenas, the author of the advice, or Agrippa; then Messalla, Taurus, and Piso. He judged cases to which appeal applied and capital causes; heard the complaints of Patrons, Freedmen, Slaves, and Masters; took cognizance of offenses by tutors and curators; judged monetary and banking affairs; cared for the meat supply; provided for quiet among the people; restrained unlawful associations; and supervised the discipline of spectacles. He possessed the right of excluding a man from Italy and the city and of deporting him to an island.

His dignity was equal to the honor of the Praetorian Prefect and the Masters of Horse and Foot. Code, book 12, title 4: "We regard the Prefect of the City, the Praetorian Prefect, and the Masters of Horse and Foot as possessing undistinguished dignity--to such a degree that, when they have withdrawn to private life, we will that the place of the man who preceded the others at the time of promotion and receipt of his letters patent be superior."

The Digest, however, book 1, title 12, describes his duties for us. “The Prefecture of the City claimed altogether all crimes for itself: not only those committed within the city, but also those committed outside the city within Italy, as is declared by the epistle of the Divine Severus sent to Fabius Cilo, Prefect of the City.

“He shall hear slaves who have fled to statues, or who, having been purchased with their own money so that they might be manumitted, complain of their Masters.

“He shall also hear needy Patrons complaining of their Freedmen, especially if they say that they are sick and desire to be supported by their Freedmen.

“He has license to relegate and deport a man to the island which the Emperor has assigned.

“At the beginning of the same epistle it is written thus: ‘Since we have entrusted our city to your fidelity, whatever is committed within the city therefore appears to pertain to the Prefect of the City.’

“But if anything is committed within the hundredth milestone, it pertains to the Prefect of the City.

“If it is beyond that milestone, it has passed outside the cognizance of the Prefect of the City.

“If anyone says that his slave committed adultery with his wife, he must be heard before the Prefect of the City.

“He may also hear cases under the interdicts What Is Done by Force or Secretly and Whence by Force.

“Tutors or curators who have conducted themselves badly in a tutelage or curatorship are customarily remitted to the Prefecture of the City when they need a graver punishment than the infamy of being suspected: those who can be proved to have obtained the tutelage by money given, or, after receiving a reward, to have labored so that an unsuitable tutor should be given to someone; or deliberately to have diminished the amount in rendering the account of a patrimony; or by evident fraud to have alienated the ward’s goods.

“What has been said, however--that the Prefect should hear slaves complaining of their Masters--we shall understand thus: not that they accuse their Masters, for this is by no means to be permitted to a slave except for accepted causes; but that they respectfully remonstrate. If they complain of savagery, harshness, hunger by which they are oppressed, or obscenity into which they have been or are being compelled, let them set it forth before the Prefect of the City. This office also was given to the Prefect of the City by the Divine Severus: that he protect slaves from being prostituted.

“Furthermore, the Prefect of the City will have to take care that money-changers conduct themselves uprightly in all their business and refrain from those things which are forbidden.

“When a Patron says that he is held in contempt by a Freedman, or complains that his Freedman is insulting to him, or that he himself, his children, or his wife has suffered abuse from him, or alleges something similar, the Prefect of the City is customarily approached; and according to the measure of the complaint he is accustomed to correct him, threaten him, chastise him with clubs, or proceed farther in his punishment.

“For Freedmen generally must be punished. Certainly, if the Patron proves that he was informed against by a Freedman or that the Freedman conspired against him with enemies, even the punishment of the mines must be imposed upon him.

“The care that all meat be furnished at a just price pertains to the Prefecture, and therefore the swine market is under his care. The other livestock or herds which relate to a supply of this kind likewise pertain to his care.

“The quiet of the populace and the discipline of spectacles also appear to pertain to the care of the Prefect of the City. He ought indeed to have stationarii soldiers disposed for guarding the quiet of the people and reporting to him what is done in the city.

“The Prefect of the City can prohibit a person from the city and from the other customary regions, from trade, profession, advocacy, the forum, and spectacles, both for a time and perpetually; and if he relegates anyone from Italy, he may remove him from his own province also.

"The Divine Severus declared by rescript that those accused of assembling an unlawful association must also be prosecuted before the Prefect of the City."

The Prefecture, therefore, was an Urban Magistracy which also took cognizance as far as the hundredth milestone outside the city. Dio, book 52, where the most learned Lipsius, in his commentary on Tacitus, correctly reads πεντήκοντα καὶ ἑπτακοσίων σταδίων in place of πεντήκοντα καὶ ἑξακοσίων σταδίων--seven hundred and fifty stadia.

It appears that, at the beginning and while the servitude of the nobles was still raw, the Emperors took care to choose men who were faithful and by no means ready for revolution: thus Agrippa and Maecenas; Supinus; and Messalla the Tranquil, whom Eusebius in the Chronicle wishes to have been the first and to have resigned on the sixth day, complaining that that Magistracy was uncivil. I think that for this reason others omit him. Tiberius appointed Piso because he seemed to him to have deserved it by drinking continuously. Pliny, book 14, says: "I believe that Lucius Piso was chosen by him for the care of the city of Rome upon this recommendation: that in the Prince's company he had continued drinking without interruption for two days and two nights." Suetonius says the same in chapter 42. Piso was Prefect of the City for twenty years--or ten, as Lipsius corrects it. His successor also was almost always drunk. Seneca, epistle 84: "Lucius Piso, guardian of the city, was drunk from the moment he was once made such. He spent the greater part of the night at a banquet and generally slept until the sixth hour; that was his morning. Yet he administered most diligently his office, in which the protection of the city was contained. Both the Divine Augustus gave him secret instructions when he placed him over Thrace, which he subdued, and Tiberius when departing for Campania, although he left behind in the city many matters both suspicious and hated." I think that, because Piso's drunkenness had turned out well for him, he afterward made Cossus Prefect of the City--a grave and moderate man, but submerged and soaked in wine.

The power of the Prefect of the City was therefore under the Prince, as that of the Consul was under the Senate and people; it was not annual but at the Prince's pleasure, and almost always longer than a year. Yet the honor of the Consulship was regarded as greater, although without strength. That it was not unlike it, though differing in some things, is evident from the fact that Sidonius calls him Prefect of the Senate; for he consulted the Fathers, judged concerning them, and protected them. Cassiodorus, book 6. Sidonius administered the Prefecture:

> Receiving the honor
>
> Which once alone governed together
>
> The rights of Fathers and plebs.

And Rutilius:

> If it did not displease that I governed the rights of Quirinus,
>
> If I cultivated the sacred men and consulted the Fathers.

The Prefect of the City was regarded as next to the Emperor. Statius:

> The neck nearest stands beneath
>
> The burden's immense weight.

And Ausonius:

> Whether the peoples of Italy or the north-born Britons,
>
> They held beneath the second title of Prefectures;

Whoever ruled the head of affairs, Rome, its people and Fathers,

Almost under the first name.

Cassiodorus, book 6, formula 4: "Not only Rome is entrusted to your dominion, although all things are contained in it, but ancient laws willed that you extend your power to the hundredth milestone. You also take cognizance of appeals from the provinces designated by law. Above all Consulars you deliver your opinion first, and in that hall of liberty you are beheld with reverence, in which you are approved to hold the principal men entrusted to you." Hence he possessed the chair, fasces, and other ornaments.

§ 5. The power of the Interreges was the same as that of the Kings and Consuls, except that, outside the ordinary order, they discharged the office while an ordinary Magistrate was being created. It began at the death of Romulus. Dionysius, book 2: "In the following year no one reigned at Rome, the administration of the state having been transferred to the new Magistracy of Interreges in this manner: the two hundred Conscript Fathers, from whom the Senate had been constituted by King Romulus, were distributed into decuries and entrusted the government of the city by lot to Decemvirs. These men possessed the Lictors and the other royal insignia not simultaneously, but one after another for five days each; these were handed on, as it were, from hand to hand, from the first continually to the last. Then that five-day Magistracy passed to the next decury, and in turn to another."

Interregna were also frequent in the time of the Consuls when elections were obstructed or Consuls had been irregularly created. If anyone asks what I think of the Prefect of the City, I answer that his government was better and more moderate than that of the Consuls, although altogether less and more subject to another Magistrate. With greater prudence the Lacedaemonians, by the institution of Lycurgus, chose a King, but one with consular and prefectorial power. Xenophon says concerning them:

Καὶ ἔφορας δὲ πάντες ὑπανίστανται βασιλεῖ πλὴν οὐκ ἔφοροι ἀπὸ τῶν ἐφορικῶν δίφρων. Καὶ ὅρκους δ᾽ ἀλλήλοις κατὰ μῆνα ποιοῦνται ἔφοροι μὲν ὑπὲρ τῆς πόλεως, βασιλεὺς δ᾽ ὑπὲρ ἑαυτοῦ· ὁ δὲ ὅρκος ἐστὶ τῷ μὲν βασιλεῖ, κατὰ τοὺς τῆς πόλεως κειμένους νόμους βασιλεύσειν, τῇ δὲ πόλει ἐμπεδοῦντι ἐκεῖνον ἀνυπεύθυνον τὴν βασιλείαν παρέξειν. Αὗται μὲν οὖν αἱ τιμαὶ οἴκοι ζῶντι βασιλεῖ δέδονται, οὐδὲν ὑπολὺ ὑπερφέρουσαι τῶν ἰδιωτικῶν. Οὐ γὰρ ἐβουλήθη οὔτε τοῖς βασιλεῦσι τυραννικὸν φρόνημα παραστῆσαι, οὔτε τοῖς πολίταις φθόνον ἐμποιῆσαι τῆς δυνάμεως.

All rise from their seats before a King, except that the Ephors do not rise from their official seats. Each month the Ephors and King exchange oaths: the Ephors on behalf of the city and the King on his own behalf. The King swears to reign according to the established laws of the city; the city, if he abides by his oath, swears to preserve his kingship unshaken. These honors are paid to a living King at home and exceed those paid to private men by very little; for Lycurgus wished neither to implant a tyrannical spirit in the Kings nor to engender envy of their power in the citizens.

The government of the Athenians, however, was always turbulent because every Magistracy was beneath the power of the Roman Consuls and was therefore unequal to the vices of the people.

§ 6. The highest Magistrate of the Carthaginians was the Sufes. Livy, book 30. They therefore called the Suffetes the Senate, because among them it possessed, as it were, consular government. They administer justice, book 34. In other cities of the Phoenicians also, with a change of Magistracy, they called the highest Magistrates Suffetes. Livy, book 28, attributes Suffetes to the people of Gades. When Mago had returned to Gades, was shut out from it, and had sailed with his fleet to Cimbis--a place not far from Gades--he sent Legates to complain that the gates had been closed to him, an ally and friend. When they excused the act as caused by a gathering of the multitude, hostile because certain property had been carried off by soldiers embarking on the ships, he enticed their Suffetes, the highest Magistrate among the Phoenicians, together with the Quaestor, to a conference, mangled them with scourges, and ordered them to be affixed to crosses.

I think they were so called as though from סופא, which in Isaiah 43 and Joshua 22 signifies an end, extremity, or corner; for it is the highest summit of Magistracy. I do not doubt that the Sophim of the Persians were so called in the same manner; nor badly from סף, which signifies an edge, order, or threshold, whence Sophiat of the Persians, as many pronounce it. Yet if one prefers to derive it from the Hebrew יסף, which also means to add or abound, I shall not contend against it.

§ 7. The Πρυτανεία was an Athenian Magistracy; and although the πρυτάνεις, "Prytanes," were more numerous than the Consuls, their power was nevertheless almost the same--that is, supreme, but dependent upon the people. In Demosthenes πρυτανεύειν means to rule or govern. Nazianzen calls God τῆς ἀληθείας πρύτανιν, "the governor of truth." They wish Πρυτανεῖον to have been said as though τοῦ πυρὸς ταμεῖον, "the treasury of fire." Whether this is so or is a dream of grammarians, it is established that the Prytanes were accustomed to feast in the Prytaneum and that it was the highest honor if food in the Prytaneum was decreed to anyone. Cimon, because of his magnificence and hospitality, is said to have maintained, as it were, a πρυτανεῖον, a Prytaneum, at home. Plutarch, in his life.

Plutarch likewise confirms that the house of Lucullus was ὅλως ἑστίαν, καὶ πρυτανεῖον ἑλληνικόν, altogether a hearth and Greek Prytaneum. But let us return to the Prytanes. After the Thirty Tyrants had been expelled, ten were appointed by Thrasybulus; when they had been rejected, fifty others were afterward placed over the city. Harpocration:

> πρυτάνεις πεντήκοντα ἄνδρες ἀπὸ μιᾶς φυλῆς, οἱ διοικοῦντες πάντα τὰ ὑπὸ τῆς βουλῆς ταττόμενα

Prytanes are fifty men from one tribe who administer all things decreed by the Senate. The Magistrate of the Rhodians also is called πρύτανις by Livy, book 42; Hegesilus then bore that office. The same author in book 41 testifies that the Cyzicenes also possessed a Prytaneum and calls it the inner sanctuary of the city. Yet its use was the same as at Athens, for those to whom that honor had been given feasted in it. Perseus placed upon it the golden vessels of one table.

That Athenian method of governing the state was altogether useless, as Xenophon shows in their Constitution and Aristotle in book 2, chapter 12 of the Politics. "Some indeed think that Solon was a good lawgiver. For they say that he abolished the domination of the few, which was unmixed and immoderate; liberated the enslaved people; and constituted the ancestral and hereditary liberty and power of the people by suitably arranging and mingling in order the various kinds of administering the state. For the Areopagite Senate pertained to the rule of the few or Oligarchy; Magistrates being created by election, to the government of the best or Aristocracy; and the courts being popular. Yet Solon appears not to have abolished the things that existed before--the Senate and election of Magistrates--but to have established the liberty of the people afresh by granting to all citizens, if selected by lot, the power of judging affairs.

"For this reason some also censure him, saying that he dissolved and enervated the other part of the state by transferring all authority and power to a judgment entrusted to lot. For after this acquired force, men who granted and indulged all things to the people for the sake of favor, as to a tyrant, reduced the condition of the state to the present power of the people. Ephialtes and Pericles mutilated and curtailed the Areopagite Senate; Pericles made the courts salaried. In this way each of the flattering leaders of the people, by augmenting the majesty of the people, advanced and promoted it to the present state of popular power.

"Yet this appears not to have arisen from Solon's counsel but rather to have happened by chance. For because the people was the cause of dominion and naval victory in the Persian War, it assumed greater spirit than usual and accepted wicked and turbulent flattering Orators as leaders and teachers in place of good and moderate administrators. Solon, indeed, appears to have granted the people a most necessary power: that of choosing Magistrates and demanding accounts from them. For if the people does not possess even this power, besides being enslaved it will also be hostile. Yet he created all Magistrates from distinguished and wealthy citizens: namely, from those who received five hundred medimni each year from their fields; from those who were bound to a yoke, called Zeugitae; and from the equestrian order, which belongs to the third assessment and third class. The citizens of the fourth class are wage laborers and workmen, participants in no Magistracy. Zaleucus, moreover, was lawgiver to the Locrians dwelling toward the west, whom the Greeks call Epizephyrians; and Charondas of Catana to his fellow citizens and the other Chalcidian cities throughout Italy and Sicily."

The multitude is therefore deservedly censured in these matters, for it is hostile to the accomplishment of affairs and the preservation of concord. Then men selected by lot judged concerning all these things, which was to subject the Magistracy to the judgment of every most worthless man. Their object therefore had to be not that they should administer well, but that they should not displease the people.

If, therefore, we consider the matter, we shall find the Magistracy of the Carthaginians constituted much better than that of the Athenians. For it possesses more supports for defending itself against enemies and seditions. I do not know whether any state equaled its duration together with liberty and power. Aristotle describes that state in book 2, chapter 11 of the Politics in this manner: "The Carthaginians also appear to employ a right and excellent method of administering the state, exceptional and outstanding in many things when compared with others, yet in some respects very similar and almost twin to that of the Lacedaemonians. For these three forms of administering a state are in some manner similar to one another and far excel the others: the Cretan, the Laconian, and, third, the Carthaginian. Many things constituted among the Carthaginians are excellent. An argument that this state has been well designed is that, although it possesses a people having power over affairs, it remains within the design and ordering of the state, and no sedition worthy of mention has ever arisen in it, nor has any tyrant existed.

"It has the following things similar to the Laconian state: first, the banquets of the associations correspond to the Phiditia; next, the government of the Hundred and Four to the power of the Ephors, except that the government of the Hundred and Four is better than that power. For the Ephors consist of men presented by chance and fortune; these men are chosen for this government according as each excels in virtue and dignity. Finally, it has Kings and a Senate corresponding by a certain comparison and proportion to the Kings and Senate of the Lacedaemonians. It is indeed better that Kings be taken neither perpetually from the same family nor from any family presented by mere chance, but from some distinguished family; and that they be chosen not because they excel in age, but in virtue. For when men who are despised, abject, and of no worth are made lords and possessors of great affairs, they inflict great injuries, and have already inflicted them upon the city of the Lacedaemonians.

"Most of those things which have been censured because of deviations from the right state were common to this state and to the other forms of administration which we have mentioned. Of the features which have the rule of the best and constitutional government as their proposed end, some incline more toward the power of the people and others toward the domination of the few. For the Kings together with the Senators possess power to refer one matter to the people and not another; and if all are of one opinion in deciding some matter, it is ratified, but if not, judgment and power rest with the people. The matters which they bring before the people they do not merely announce, so that the people may hear what the Princes of the city have decreed; rather, anyone of the people is also permitted to speak against the proposals, which is not so in other forms of administering states.

[Printed page 571]

"But the fact that the Five Men, who possess and judge many great affairs, choose themselves and elect the Magistracy of the Hundred, which is the most ample, and that these men administer their Magistracy longer than the others--for they govern the state both after discharging a Magistracy and before entering it--pertains to the power of the few. But the fact that they are appointed without payment and without lot must be judged to pertain to the rule of the best, as must anything else of this kind. The fact that all disputes and controversies are judged by the men who hold a Magistracy, not different cases by different men as at Lacedaemon, likewise touches the rule of the best.

"The constitution of the Carthaginian state departs most from the rule of the best toward the power of the few because of a certain thought and opinion of the multitude. For they think that Magistrates ought to be chosen not only from virtue but also from wealth. They suppose that a man who lacks the resources of a household cannot rightly discharge a Magistracy and enjoy leisure. If, therefore, choosing Magistrates from wealth and assessment pertains to the power of the few, but choosing them from virtue to the rule of the best, this will be the third method and design by which the Carthaginians administer their state. For in choosing Magistrates, and especially the greatest--Kings and Commanders--they look to these two things."

Kings are not otherwise mentioned; but Aristotle thus calls their Suffetes because they possessed a government as though royal, just as the Consuls at Rome were said to possess royal government.

§ 8. It is admitted that the state of the Lacedaemonians possessed Kings in addition to a Senate and Ephorate. But the King possessed consular power. Both histories teach that the Kings of the Spartans possessed a meager and curtailed power, and Aristotle gives the reason:

> Καὶ διὰ τὸ τὴν ἀρχὴν εἶναι λίαν μεγάλην, καὶ ἰσοτύραννον, δημαγωγεῖν αὐτοὺς ἠναγκάζοντο καὶ οἱ βασιλεῖς.

Because this Magistracy of the Ephors was great and not unequal to the kingdom, even the Kings had to flatter them. For the Ephors, thinking that the accounts of all affairs pertained to themselves, demanded them from all men. There were five Ephors; besides them there was a Senate; the King was, as it were, Commander in war. Accordingly, if they had chosen Ephors distinguished by prudence and probity, they would have constituted the state well. But this could not be done by the corrupted votes of the people. Aristotle, book 2, chapter 9 of the Politics: "Furthermore, those things which pertain to the Ephorate also are not well arranged. For since the government of the Ephors itself possesses power over the greatest affairs, all the Ephors are created from the plebs. Thus very poor and needy men are often unexpectedly advanced to this power, and because of their need they were venal and purchasable. They have often shown this before, and most recently in the banquets of the men which they call Andria. For certain Ephors, corrupted by money, destroyed the whole city so far as lay in them."

From this it is evident that, according to its first institution, the state of the Lacedaemonians was ordered more prudently than that of the Romans. For they possessed a Senate after the Roman manner; then Ephors furnished in some fashion with the power of Consuls, Censors, Judges, and Quaestors; finally, a Commander in war, or King, who administered all external affairs. Thus there was not so great a change as at Rome; they were not agitated by seditions or in danger of tyranny. Aristotle shows this beautifully:

> Δεῖ γὰρ τὴν πολιτείαν τὴν μέλλουσαν σῴζεσθαι, πάσας βούλεσθαι τὰ μέρη τῆς πόλεως, εἶναι καὶ διαμένειν ταὐτά. Οἱ μὲν οὖν βασιλεῖς διὰ τὴν αὐτῶν τιμὴν οὕτως ἔχουσιν· οἱ δὲ καλοὶ κἀγαθοὶ διὰ τὴν γερουσίαν, ἆθλον γὰρ ἡ ἀρχὴ αὕτη τῆς ἀρετῆς ἐστίν· ὁ δὲ δῆμος διὰ τὴν ἐφορείαν.

For that form of administering the state which is to remain safe must be one which all parts of the city wish both to exist and to remain the same. The Kings are so disposed because of the honor with which they have been adorned; honorable and good men because of senatorial dignity, for this Magistracy is the reward of virtue; and the people because of the Ephorate.

§ 9. Yet nothing is more similar to the Roman Magistracy than the Cretan. They possessed a Senate, which they called βουλήν. Next there were ten men with supreme power called κόσμοι, "Cosmi," who ordered affairs; they were so called just as the Carthaginians had Suffetes and the Romans Consuls or military Tribunes with consular power. They next possessed a King who conducted wars; but, when royal power had been abolished, like the Romans they employed the κόσμοις, the Cosmi, as Commanders in war. The Senate is most usefully ruled by those who have discharged the office of κόσμου, a Cosmus.

Finally, the Cretans struggled with the same disadvantages as the Romans. "But what is useful to the condition of the state there," Aristotle says in book 2, chapter 10, "is not so here. For there, because the election is made from all, the people, being a participant in the highest government, desires that the state remain. Here, however, the Cosmi are not chosen from all but from certain families, and the Senators from those who have discharged the office of Cosmus. One could say the same things concerning them as concerning those created at Lacedaemon. For not to be held to the judgment of rendering accounts and to administer a Magistracy throughout life is a greater honor than accords with their dignity; and for a man to govern not according to a prescription of written law but at his own judgment is dangerous.

“The fact that the people remains quiet even though it does not participate in this Magistracy is no argument that the state is well ordered. For no opportunity of profiting from the Magistracy is given to the Cosmi, as it is to the Ephors, since on an island they are far removed from those who would corrupt them. But the remedy which they apply to correct and preserve this error is both absurd and not even constitutional, but consonant with the power of one or a few--that is, with a dynasty or oligarchy. For certain men, either colleagues or private persons, frequently form a conspiracy and expel them. A man is also permitted to resign the Magistracy before his term. It is better that all these things be done by law than by the will of men, for this is not a safe rule.

“The worst of all remedies is the vacancy of this most ample Magistracy and the disturbance of the whole condition of the state, which powerful men frequently introduce when they do not wish to undergo judgment or pay penalties. From this one may understand that in this design for administering the state there is something of a constitutional state--that is, a polity--but that it is nevertheless not a constitutional administration of the state, but rather a power of a few, that is, an oligarchy, or the power of one, that is, a dynasty. For they are accustomed, after distributing and disposing the people and their friends, to subject the whole state to the government of one, excite sedition, and fight and contend with one another.”

§ 10. In free states also there are Magistrates who represent the Consul, but in different ways. Venice has a Duke, but one who possesses neither a distinguished court nor power. For he cannot leave the city, open letters, or decree that anything be increased; all things depend upon the Senate, which consists of forty Senators, among whom the principal men are the nine who are called Procurators of Saint Mark. They also possess perpetual government and therefore are in the highest authority, for a government which quickly ends is deserted even while it exists. Other Magistrates are joined to them, and the Great Council generally appoints them. They prudently deprive their Duke of power because in this manner he cannot invade a tyranny.

[Printed page 572]

The perpetuity of the six Procurators also prevents error from inexperience in affairs. This is dangerous: that they wage wars through hired Commanders who, because they fight for money and not for their fatherland, conduct all things slowly. The Prince therefore occupies the place of the Consuls, although with less power; the others sit and judge as though they were the Senate.

§ 11. The state of the Genoese has made provision still more carefully than all others. It chooses a Duke, neither annual nor perpetual, but for a government of two years. For the same period eight Governors joined to him possess control of affairs. The office of the Duke is very similar to the consular function: he convenes the Senate and refers matters to it; all things are transacted through him; and in the government of the city he possesses much greater authority than the Venetian. For the Venetians took authority from their Duke because they added to his term; the Genoese permit theirs much because, on account of the brevity of his government, he cannot seize a tyranny.

Two Governors, however, dwell with the Duke in the palace by turns, so that pairs are absent from home for three months and all perform their turns in the course of a year. Their method of election contains great caution. On the third day of January the Greater and Lesser Councils assemble. The man who was Duke in the preceding years does not attend; for when his two-year term has elapsed, on the Kalends of January he withdraws to his home and, as a private man, is called only a Procurator for the rest of his life. From each of these councils twenty-eight nobles--one, that is, from each family--are chosen. Those chosen are enclosed in a certain place of the palace and, together with those Senators who are ineligible for the ducal dignity either because of age or the disgrace of their family, choose eighteen from their own number, but not more than one from one family. Those eighteen in turn choose another twenty-eight, who, together with the aforesaid Senators, select the men whom they wish to propose to the Greater Council for elevation to the ducal dignity.

But here it must be noted that no more than four may be proposed to the Greater Council, and in the election those twenty-eight men together with the aforesaid Senators must agree by a two-thirds vote. When this act is finished, before they leave the conclave, the same men choose another twenty-eight, one from each family. These vote together concerning those four and may remove two-thirds from their selection and substitute in place of those rejected one or more men who are nevertheless Senators. When these things have been completed, the Council or Senate is convened and the four are proposed; the man who receives the most votes is created Prince or Duke.

Yet the government is not altogether changed. For Procurators are made from the Governors and even from the Dukes, but in such a manner that those who are Procurators from among the Governors are numbered in the College of Procurators for two years, while those from among the Dukes are numbered in it for life. Thus the state always abounds in a great number of experienced men, since first they are in the Greater Council, then in the Lesser, afterward are designated Governors and Dukes, and finally discharge for two years or perpetually the authority of Procurators, by which all affairs are transacted.

§ 12. The communities of the Helvetians and Rhaetians who dwell in the Alps are most similar to the Athenian state. Their ancestors, harassed by the nobility, introduced popular government. Their histories speak thus: “The mountain Helvetians are so democratic--the Uri, I say, the Schwyzers, Unterwaldeners, Zugers, Glarusers, and Appenzellers--that not only is the highest power of the state in the hands of all men, provided they are of age, but all Magistracies and all the greatest governments are also assigned to artisans and craftsmen; and the cities are not even fortified with walls, villages, or strongholds. The others are less democratic. For although the people of Bern and Zurich constitute their Senate chiefly from craftsmen, they nevertheless are accustomed to create the highest Magistrates in the state from patricians or at least from those who are more distinguished by the antiquity of their family. Thus these men are more stable and less exposed to seditions than the former. But the assemblies of the Rhaetians, being excessively democratic, are governed with the greatest difficulty and, once disturbed, scarcely pacified.

“For this is the summit of popular liberty: that all men can be made equal to all and are unwilling to obey except on condition that they in turn may command those whom they obeyed. Not even so can they be retained in duty unless they are soothed by very necessary and just commands, by largesses, or by the enticements of words. But since many cannot excel many others in virtue, resources, and nobility, it generally happens that the multitude persecutes the noble, wealthy, and virtuous with a certain envy and with a spirit suffused by ill will. Then, if anyone of generous and excellent spirit dares to place restraints upon the passion of a plebs intemperately abusing liberty, they do not hesitate to condemn him to a fine, exile, proscription, and finally death--especially if he is wealthy, so that he may appear to aspire to government. This tendency flows from the utterly corrupt Athenian state.”

Satraps or Amptmanni therefore occupy the place of Consuls. They are chosen in the assemblies, not after the Roman manner--that is, by centuries--but by the Athenian χειροτονίᾳ, “show of hands,” so that it lies in the judgment of every most worthless man to give a Magistrate to his fatherland. Hence the same history relates that, when a Consul is readily enticed by money and other means, the whole nation is led away. Hence, since their magnates are not very wealthy, neighboring Kings who desire to obtain something contend by gifts.

So much concerning Consuls and Magistrates constituted by consular laws or not greatly unlike the Consulship. I am not ignorant that excellent provisions have been established elsewhere, but these suffice for knowledge of politics.

CHAPTER XX

A Consideration of the Dictatorship and Censorship

§ 1. The Dictator possessed greater government than the Consul; the Censor possessed honorary government and also some power over the Consul. The Dictator was also called Master of the People. The cause for naming a Dictator was a great necessity of the state. Cicero, book 3 of On the Laws: "But when a more serious war or discord among citizens arises, let one man possess for no more than six months, unless the Senate shall decree otherwise, the same law which the Consuls possess; and, the auspices being favorable, let him be named Master of the People. Whoever commands the cavalry shall possess equal law with the man who will be the administrator of justice." Livy, book 2; Dionysius, book 5.

When the state was oppressed by the Latin War and domestic sedition, it seemed best that all Magistrates lay down their command. One man, chosen by the Senate and approved by the votes of the people, possessed for six months a power over all affairs greater than that of the Consuls. Livy also, book 4: "When these things were reported at Rome with a tumult greater even than the affair warranted, the Senate immediately ordered a Dictator to be named, which was the final counsel in perilous circumstances." The Dictator afterward began to be hated by the Tribunes of the plebs and the people. The Tribunes complained that the thunderbolt of the Dictatorship was directed against them. For when the Tribunes harassed the Senate by intercessions and did not permit a levy to be held, and employed that weapon most fiercely against the nobles, the thunderbolt of the Dictatorship was opposed to them.

These things belonged to the Dictator: twenty-four axes were carried before him.

[Printed page 573]

Sulla was the first to do this, as appears in the Livian Epitome, book 89. When the Decemvirs at first possessed the fasces one at a time, on the first day of the second year after entering the Magistracy, each came forth with twelve bundles, and one hundred and twenty Lictors filled the Forum. Livy, book 3.

The Dictator possessed command without appeal. For from the other Magistrates there was appeal to the Senate, Tribunes, and people. Once this had been established, confusion similar to that of Athens arose, which the Fathers always deservedly feared. Under that law no noble or good man would have been permitted to remain at Rome. The Dictator was named by a Consul; sometimes a particular man of proven virtue was demanded by name by the Senate.

He named the Master of Horse, who employed the right formerly possessed by the Tribune of the Celeres and afterward by the Praetorian Prefect. Cicero makes him equal to the man who administers justice--that is, the Praetor. Nevertheless, when a Master of Horse was first created from the plebs, the Dictator excused himself on the ground that that Magistracy was not greater than the consular Tribunate.

This was novel and neither of good example nor outcome: Minucius, Master of Horse, was made equal to Fabius the Dictator. If Fabius--a Commander who loved his fatherland and endured insults--had not administered the Dictatorship, the state might have received an incurable wound. For Minucius led the army into danger; Fabius liberated it.

It is established that the Dictatorship was excellently instituted, for a hundred times the state would have perished by sedition or war if it had lacked a Dictator. The government of the Consuls, as I have shown, was not sufficient for conducting affairs and restraining seditions. The Dictators down to Sulla were also most moderate. Lartius laid down the Dictatorship after the Consuls had been designated, with no citizen killed by him, driven into exile, or punished more severely. Thus Dionysius, book 5.

This is indeed astonishing: although so many raised tumults and sought tyranny through Consulships and tribunician power, no Dictator ever behaved uncivilly or cruelly, although the power of all had been gathered into one man; none even gave a beginning to tyranny. Sulla indeed exercised it tyrannically, but he was nevertheless more cruel before the Dictatorship. Before the Dictatorship he performed the deeds contained in the Livian Epitome, book 88: "After defeating Carbo's army at Clusium, Faventia, and Fidentia, Sulla expelled him from Italy. He fought beside the city of Rome before the Colline Gate with the Samnites, who alone among the Italian peoples had not yet laid down their arms. Having recovered the state, he stained the most glorious victory with a cruelty such as never existed in any man. He slaughtered eight thousand men who had surrendered in the public villa; posted a list of proscription; filled the city and all Italy with slaughter; among these killings ordered all the unarmed Praenestines to be cut down; and killed Marius, a man of senatorial rank, after breaking his legs and arms, cutting off his ears, and gouging out his eyes. Gaius Marius, besieged at Praeneste by Lucretius Ofella, a man of Sulla's party, when he sought to escape through a tunnel, was surrounded by the army and took his own life in the tunnel. When he perceived that he could not escape, he ran with drawn sword against Pontius Telesinus, his companion in flight; after killing him, he himself, wounded, obtained from a slave that the slave kill him."

"But after being made Dictator," says the epitome of book 89, "which no one had ever done, Sulla came forth with twenty-four bundles. He confirmed the condition of the state with new measures, diminished the power of the Tribunes of the plebs, and took away their entire right of proposing laws. He enlarged the colleges of Pontiffs and Augurs so that there were fifteen; replenished the Senate from the equestrian order; deprived the children of the proscribed of the right to seek honors; and sold their goods, from which he plundered very much. Three thousand five hundred million sesterces were collected."

Even Caesar's perpetual Dictatorship was not so merciless that it was not better for it to remain than for Rome to experience greater cruelty afterward. If Sulla's conduct certainly has no cause or excuse, it had at least a pretext--to omit everything else. Livian Epitome 87: "Lucius Damasippus the Praetor, by the will of Gaius Marius the Consul, after convening the Senate, slaughtered all the nobility present in the city. From their number Quintus Mucius Scaevola the Pontifex Maximus was killed while fleeing in the vestibule of the temple of Vesta."

What wonder is it that Sulla blazed against the authors of these deeds? Yet he laid down the Dictatorship, which Julius did not do; nor was it safe to submit to the laws after so many crimes had been committed.

§ 2. Julius therefore acted prudently: when he saw that he could no longer depart from the Magistracy without destruction, he retained the Dictatorship. Augustus rejected the name of Dictator but retained all its force. Suetonius, Augustus, chapter 52: "When the people offered him the Dictatorship with great force, he knelt, cast the toga from his shoulders, bared his breast, and begged to be excused."

He rejected not only the Dictatorship but at first tribunician power also, although the power of the Tribunes was otherwise not removed by a Dictator. A perpetual Dictatorship together with tribunician power is, however, enough for a perfect Monarchy. A Dictator is δυσύπατος, furnished with the power of two Consuls, μονάρχης προσωρινός, ἀνεύθυνος, a temporary Monarch--but afterward a perpetual one--who can be corrected by no one and is bound to render an account to no one.

§ 3. A Dictator was frequently named for the sake of elections. Livy, books 8 and 25, and elsewhere. This was necessary lest through interregna the state should be deprived of the care of Magistrates. It must never be permitted that certain men possess so great a power that they can impede the creation of ordinary Magistrates. The Venetians therefore prudently enacted a law that no man should depart from a provincial Magistracy before his successor had been given. For when the Senate called the Great Council, whose function it is to assign Magistracies, suffered from discord, cities were without Rulers and justice was suspended to the detriment of the state.

§ 4. It has often been asked why the Dictatorship was salutary to the Roman people but the Decemvirate ruinous. For the power in both was equal and without appeal, but it was more concentrated, and therefore more efficacious, in the Dictator. Some think the reason to be that the power of the Decemvirs was greater, for there were no Consuls or Tribunes under the Decemvirs; but once a Dictator was instituted, the majesty and name of the Magistrates remained, even though they were compelled to obey the Dictator.

Yet if we consider that time, the matter, and the circumstances, it was not the Decemvirate but the character of Claudius that invaded tyranny. For at first, as Livy says in book 3, "The government of the whole Magistracy was in Appius's hands through the favor of the plebs, and he had put on a character so new that he suddenly became a protector of the plebs and a hunter after every popular breeze, in place of a savage and cruel persecutor of the plebs. Every tenth day each administered justice to the people. On that day the man presiding over the law possessed twelve fasces; to the other nine colleagues appeared one orderly each. The singular concord among them, which among private men might sometimes be harmful, was the highest equity toward others. It will suffice to note as an argument of their moderation the example of one affair. Although they had been created without appeal, when the body of a murdered man was found buried in the house of Publius Sextius, a man of patrician family, and brought forth into the assembly, the matter being manifest and atrocious, Gaius Julius the Decemvir appointed a day for Sextius and appeared as his accuser before the people, although he was the lawful Judge of the affair. He withdrew from his own right so that what was taken from the force of the Magistracy might be added to the liberty of the people. While that ready law, as though from an incorrupt oracle, was administered equally by them to the highest and lowest, attention was given to composing laws.

[Printed page 574]

"With the ten tables displayed amid the great expectation of men, they summoned the people to an assembly and ordered them to go and read the proposed laws, which they prayed might be good, favorable, and fortunate for the state, themselves, and their children. They said that, so far as could be provided by the abilities of ten men, they had made the laws equal for all, highest and lowest; but that the abilities and counsels of many possessed greater force. Let the people turn over each matter in their minds, then discuss it in conversation, and bring into the open whatever was excessive or deficient in each matter. The Roman people would possess laws which the consensus of all appeared not so much to have commanded after they were proposed as itself to have proposed. When the laws appeared sufficiently corrected according to men's reports concerning each head, the laws of the Ten Tables were enacted in the Centuriate Assembly. Even now, amid this immense heap of laws piled one upon another, they are the source of all public and private law. A report was then spread that two tables were lacking, by the addition of which the whole body of Roman law could be completed. As the day of elections approached, this expectation created a desire to elect Decemvirs a second time. By now the plebs, besides hating the name of Consuls no less than that of Kings, did not even seek tribunician aid, since the Decemvirs yielded by appeal to one another."

Behold the Decemvirs already popular; behold Demagogues tending toward tyranny by the customary path. Appius courted the popular breeze as though he studied the advantages of the plebs, with such artifice that he persuaded them without becoming suspect to the Fathers. For they thought that these measures tended to remove the protections of the plebs--that is, the Tribunes of the plebs. Next they administered justice every tenth day with the highest agreement and equity. One man possessed the fasces; the others, with a single orderly, displayed the Magistracy rather than administered it. They yielded to the people and flattered it more than the Tribunes did. They proposed the Ten Tables for the people's judgment. All these things were thought to pertain to the safety of the fatherland; Claudius alone meditated something else: that, after being reelected Decemvir, he might possess more power than all.

Accordingly he now returned to his own character. Livy says: "After the elections for creating Decemvirs were proclaimed for the third market day, so great an ambition blazed forth that even the principal men of the city--through fear, I believe, lest possession of so great a government, if the place were left empty by them, should lie open to men not sufficiently worthy--went about soliciting men and humbly sought from the plebs, with which they had contended, the honor which they had opposed with all their strength. The hazard to dignity at that age and after those honors had been discharged goaded Appius Claudius. You would not know whether to number him among the Decemvirs or the candidates. He was sometimes nearer to seeking than to administering the Magistracy: he accused the Optimates, extolled each most insignificant and lowborn candidate, flew about the Forum in the midst of the former Tribunes Duellius and Icilius, and through them offered himself for sale to the plebs. At last even his colleagues, who until that time had been singularly devoted to him, fixed their eyes upon him, wondering what he intended. It appeared that nothing was sincere; certainly such affability amid so great a pride would not be gratuitous. To force himself excessively into the common order and associate familiarly with private men belonged not so much to one hastening to depart from the Magistracy as to one seeking a path to continue it."

These were the actions of Claudius, who labored to possess colleagues who were attendants and subject to him. In this alone he erred: although he attempted so great a thing, he did not court the Fathers sufficiently instead of the plebs. To one considering these matters it is clear that not the Decemvirate but popularity, just as with Marius, Caesar, Saturninus, and the Gracchi, was the cause of his power: namely, so that he might be reelected, reject illustrious men, and choose unequal men. Appius did this as Decemvir; he could have done far more as Dictator or Consul. As Dictator he could without danger have added to himself as Master of Horse the fiercest and bravest of the Tribunes of the plebs, and arranged that the Dictatorship be continued until equality of liberty had been established by laws. Nor could a Consul have attempted less, since he possessed the highest power of transacting with the people and Fathers. In the Decemvirate the multitude of colleagues could resist; in a Dictatorship all things were in the hands of one man.

For since the name of Consuls was hated no less than that of Kings, and the oppressed plebs detested the assembly of Senators no otherwise than the offspring of the Tarquins, nothing was easier for a Consul or Dictator than to acquire the highest power and oppress the Senate. Since the government of the nobility over the citizens was proud, harsh, and avaricious, the hatred of the plebs was therefore immense, so that they declared that they would not remain in a city in which they participated in no good. All were continually in danger: whichever Consul or Dictator presented himself to the plebs as leader against the Fathers could obtain possession of affairs. The Senate could resist that power in no other way than either by killing the man or by deserving well of the people, so that it might venerate and love the Senate rather than one man as author of its advantages. Caesar as a young man possessed more power than the whole Senate, and afterward more than the people.

Machiavelli is therefore mistaken when, in book 1 of The Republic, he thinks that the magnitude of the power, its annual term, and the cessation of the other Magistracies were the causes of decemviral insolence. For the Dictator's power was equal and greater because more united. Its term was sometimes annual: Camillus, Papirius, and Fabius Maximus possessed Dictatorships longer than six months; and Cicero wishes the law to provide: "Let one man possess it for no more than six months, unless the Senate shall decree otherwise." The cause of the power was therefore favor toward Appius, by which he chose colleagues according to his judgment. For if even one had judged the affair otherwise or dissented, at the beginning of the Magistracy what finally happened after bitter conflicts would have occurred.

§ 5. The state has need of a Censor if this office cannot be discharged by Consuls or princes. Livy describes the beginning of the censorship at Rome in book 4: "This same year"--namely, 310--"was the beginning of the censorship, a thing which arose from a small origin but afterwards grew by so great an increase that the governance of Roman morals and discipline, the distinction of honor and dishonor among the Senate and the centuries of knights, the right over public and private places, and the revenues of the Roman people were under the sway of that Magistracy and subject to its nod and judgment. The origin and beginning of the thing was that the census could neither be deferred among a people not assessed for many years, nor did the Consuls, when the wars of so many peoples were threatening, have leisure to conduct that business. The Senate introduced the proposal that this laborious and by no means consular matter should be conducted by its own proper Magistracy, to which the service of scribes, the keeping and care of the records, and the determination of the formula for making the assessment should be subjected."

The primary work of the Censors was the assessment, for they assessed the number and resources of the citizens. So that the labor of the Censors may appear, I shall give several census totals. Livy, in book 3 and thereafter, reports: 124,214; 132,319; 262,000; 273,000; 278,222; 221,224; 317,227;

[Printed page 575]

251,222; the diminution caused by wars and the establishment of colonies, 270,020; 137,108; after many had been killed in the Second Punic War, 265,029; 143,704; at the end of the Second Punic War, 268,308; 269,015; 327,022; 324,000; 428,342; 323,000; 823,000.

From this it followed that, since the classes were established from the census, they divided the whole state into its members and parts. No one who has treated antiquity has failed to write about the six classes established by Tullius. That division was afterwards neglected. Tertullian, chapter 4 of On the Pallium: "Indeed, now, with the brow of censorial sternness dispersed, whatever passive labeling offers is doubtful: freedmen among the equestrian classes, persons browned by the sun among the liberal, surrendered enemies among the freeborn, rustics among city-dwellers, buffoons among men of the Forum, countrymen among soldiers. The corpse-bearer, the pimp, and the gladiatorial trainer are clothed along with you."

He uses epischynium for the brow; he shows that he was clothed in the same garment. Afterwards Syrians and Phoenicians came into the Senate, nor could this appear unworthy when Felixes and Narcissuses were adored even by Consuls.

But because uprightness of morals was also required in the state, without it the orders could not be established by a census. An examination of morals was therefore conducted, and there survive many distinguished examples of a censorship which is sometimes lacking today among Christians. Livy, book 24: "The Censors, free from the care of contracting for public works because of the poverty of the treasury, turned their attention to the morals of human beings and to chastising the vices which, having arisen from the war, were generating themselves just as bodies sick with long-lasting diseases do. First they summoned those who were said to have wished to desert the state and depart from Italy after the battle of Cannae; foremost among them was Lucius Caecilius Metellus, who happened then to be Quaestor. Then, after these men and the others accused of the same offense had been ordered to plead their cause and had been unable to clear themselves, the Censors pronounced that they had spoken words and delivered a speech against the state so that a conspiracy might be formed for abandoning Italy. After them were summoned the excessively subtle interpreters of how to discharge an oath: having returned from the captives' journey, they secretly went back into Hannibal's camp, supposing that the oath by which they had sworn to return had been discharged. From these and the former men the horses were taken away if they possessed a public horse; all were removed from their tribe and made aerarii. Nor did the Censors' care confine itself merely to regulating the Senate or equestrian order."

It therefore pertained to the censorship to choose the Senate on the basis of property and morals. Once the census was completed, the names of the Senators were read out. Those who had been passed over were judged unworthy of that order, yet were not infamous; for sometimes they were marked on reputation alone and were afterwards promoted not only to a Magistracy but to the Consulship and even to the censorship. This practice doubtless introduced a great stain into the city, for a censorial mark which could be cast against the best men was no disgrace to the wicked.

They therefore removed unworthy persons from the Senate. Dio says that the censorship had very great power: ἐκβαλεῖν δὲ ἔξεστι συγκλητικὸν ἀπρεπῶς ζῶντα, ἐγγράψαι δὲ τὸν ἄριστον. "To remove from the Senate one living disgracefully, and to enroll the best man." This remained in the age of the Emperors. Trebellius in Valerian: "You will judge who ought to remain in the Senate," and so forth. He nevertheless excepts the Prefect of the City, ordinary Consuls, the King of the Sacred Rites, and the chief of the Vestal Virgins, provided that she has remained incorrupt. They took away a horse if the horse was lean, if it was insufficiently sleek, or if the knight was not of good morals. Ovid concerning Augustus:

But I remember that you approved my life and morals,

When I passed before you with the horse you had given;

and:

And I had published poems when, as you marked offenses,

I passed before you so often, an unquiet knight.

They removed men from their tribe. This was a great ignominy, by which they were deprived of the right of voting. This too was done because of morals: if men were bad, the Censors removed them not only from the Senate but also from their tribe; indeed, they sometimes marked entire tribes.

They made men aerarii. Aulus Gellius, book 4, chapter 12: "They make him an aerarius who has permitted his field to become foul, or has kept his vineyard in neglect." To make a man an aerarius was more severe than to enter him on the tablets of the Caerites. For to make him an aerarius was to leave him no right in the city or tribe except that he should contribute bronze for his own person: he was deprived not only of the vote but also of military pay. The Caerites possessed citizenship and all its rights except the casting of a vote.

They added tribes. At first there were three--the Ramnes, Tities, and Luceres. Tullius wished there to be four. Others were then added before the Censors, and in years 366, 395, and 421 of the city. Great was that power by which they held in their hand even the offices and elections of other Magistrates, since by their censorship they could not only choose the Senate but also mark the Consuls and other Magistrates.

To be transferred from a rural tribe to an urban one was ignominious.

They cared for temples, roads, harbors, aqueducts, and all public buildings. These things were omitted during the Second Punic War because of the poverty of the treasury, but were accomplished by the magnificence and liberality of the orders, since before the end of the war they declared that they would accept no money.

They farmed out the revenues. The speech to Valerian also contains these words: "You will set a measure for assessments, establish the revenues, divide the condition of persons, and review the states."

They framed laws. Trebellius: "Authority to frame laws will be given to you." Laws had to be proposed by Magistrates--not, however, by all but by the greater Magistrates, such as the Consul, Praetor, Dictator, Censor, Interrex, Decemvirs, Military Tribunes with consular power, and Tribunes of the plebs.

They completed the lustrum. This was begun by Servius, of whom Livy writes in book 1: "When the census, which he had hastened by a law passed concerning those not assessed, had been completed, he proclaimed under threat of chains and death that all Roman citizens, knights and infantrymen, should be present at first light in the Campus Martius, each in his own century. There he purified the whole army, drawn up in formation, with the sacrifice of a pig, sheep, and bull. This was called the completed lustrum, because an end had been made in the assessment."

Sometimes the census was conducted, yet the lustrum was not completed. Livy, book 3. The Censors also possessed the right of dealing with the people and Fathers, which was common to all the greater Magistrates.

They also made inquiry into the morals of married couples. For the Censor exacted a solemn oath from husbands. Varro, book 5 of On the Latin Language: "Do you, according to the judgment of your mind, have a wife?" If he had answered that he did not, the Censor had cognizance of his morals. Nor could an agreement be made that no inquiry into morals should occur. If husband and wife mutually accused one another, neither was heard. They also made inquiry concerning contempt for marriage. They dealt with usury. Thus the Censor possessed the greatest authority over private persons.

§ 6. The Censors possessed excessive authority in the free state. Marcus Livius and Gaius Claudius demonstrated this in Livy, book 29: "The lustrum was completed later because the Censors sent men through the provinces to report how great the number of Roman citizens in the armies was everywhere. Gaius Claudius Nero completed the lustrum after 265,000 men had been assessed with them. Then they received the census returns of twelve colonies--something which had never previously been done--when the Censors delivered them, so that records of how strong they were in number of soldiers and in money might survive in the public tablets. Then the assessment of the knights began, and both Censors happened to possess a public horse. When they came to the Pollian tribe, in which the name of Marcus Livius was listed, and the herald hesitated to summon the Censor himself, Nero said, 'Summon Marcus Livius'; and, whether from a remaining and ancient quarrel or puffed up by an untimely display of severity, he ordered Marcus Livius to sell his horse because he had been condemned by the judgment of the people. Likewise, when Marcus Livius came to the Narnian tribe and the name of his colleague, he ordered Gaius Claudius to sell his horse for two reasons: first, because he had given false testimony against him; second, because he had not returned into favor with him in sincere good faith. Thus there occurred a foul contest to stain the other's reputation at the cost of one's own reputation. At the end of the censorship, after Gaius Claudius had sworn to the laws and ascended to the treasury, among the names of those whom he was leaving as aerarii he entered that of his colleague. Marcus Livius then entered the treasury and, excepting the Maecian tribe, which had neither condemned him nor made him Consul or Censor after his condemnation, he left the whole Roman people--the thirty-four tribes--as aerarii, because they had both condemned him when innocent and made him Consul and Censor after his condemnation. They could not deny that they had offended once by a judgment and twice in elections; among the thirty-four tribes, Gaius Claudius too would be an aerarius. He said that, if there were a precedent for leaving the same man twice as an aerarius, he would have expressly left Gaius Claudius among the aerarii. This petty contest of censorial marks between the Censors, and this chastisement of the people's inconstancy by censorial gravity, was worthy of those times. Since the Censors were objects of hatred, Gaius Baebius, Tribune of the plebs, supposing that from this he had an opportunity to increase his standing, appointed a day before the people for both. The matter was dismissed by agreement of the Fathers, lest henceforth the censorship be subject to the popular breeze."

[Printed page 576]

First, indeed, there was the foul persecution of colleagues and mutual defamation. Next came the marking of the people because of an unjust judgment, as though a man were a suitable judge in his own case. Finally came the reproach that they had conferred an honor. All these things were full of severe folly; to make the whole people aerarii, with one tribe excepted, was entirely insane, for it was a consolation to the wicked and infamous to lie hidden among all.

The Roman people itself judged this when it limited the censorship to a year and six months: the Dictator Aemilius Mamercus diminished it. Livy, book 4: "Then the Dictator, lest he should have been created to no purpose--since the opportunity to seek glory in war had been taken away--desired to accomplish in peace some work that would be a memorial of his Dictatorship, and prepared to curtail the censorship, whether because he judged its power excessive or was offended not so much by the greatness of the honor as by its duration. Accordingly, after summoning an assembly, he said that the immortal gods had undertaken that the state should be managed abroad and that all things should be made secure; he would take counsel for the liberty of the Roman people concerning what must be done within the walls. But the greatest safeguard of that liberty was that great commands should not be long-lasting, and that a limit of time should be imposed upon those upon whom no limit of law could be imposed. The other Magistracies were annual; a censorship of five years was burdensome, for men lived subject to the same persons during a great part of their lives. He would therefore propose a law that a censorship should be no longer than a year and six months."

Therefore, since so many persons were unjustly degraded and so many entered among the aerarii, the law of Clodius was not so unjust in forbidding anyone to be removed from the Senate or affected with ignominy unless, after his case had been pleaded, he had been accused before the Tribunes. Then the supreme power ceased, but the Consul Metellus restored it, and it existed in the time of Dio. Τιμητείαν, ait, ἀρχὴν ταύτην εἶναι ἱερωτάτην, καὶ δυναμένην μέγα. "The censorship," he says, "is a most sacred and very powerful government"; but its holders were to judge morals, not rage according to their own judgment.

Deservedly, therefore, Cicero says in Against Piso: "For nearly a hundred years we had retained the Aelian and Fufian laws, and for four hundred years the censorial judgment and cognizance. No wicked man failed to dare against those laws, yet no one was ever able to overthrow them; no one was so extravagantly wanton as to attempt to diminish that power so that judgment concerning our morals should not be made every fifth year."

§ 7. Most of the Emperors also bore the censorial dignity. Dio says that Augustus was elected ἐπιμελητὴν καὶ τιμητὴν εἰς πενταετίαν χειροτονεῖσθαι, curator of morals and Censor for a five-year period. The same Dio says this of Claudius in book 5; Suetonius relates that Domitian was Censor. Trajan undertook the censorship late--not from avoidance of the honor, or, as Pliny flatters him, because he preferred to test characters by benefactions rather than remedies, but from consciousness of his own life. For although others were worse than Trajan and accepted the censorship, Trajan nevertheless showed greater modesty.

Most states therefore retain this principle of censorship: judgment concerning morals rests with a Magistrate. This is also customary in the Church, for the Bishops and prelates of the Church themselves are masters of morals. Since the end of a prince is the blessed life of his subjects, and that life cannot exist without virtue, he must himself exercise the greatest care for it. What would so great and severe a power not accomplish? Valerius, book 2, chapter 9, makes it equal to martial praises: "The firmest bond of camp discipline and the diligent observance of military order admonish me to pass to the censorship, mistress and guardian of peace. For just as the resources of the Roman people advanced to so great an amplitude through the virtues of commanders, so uprightness and continence were examined by the censorial brow, an achievement equal to martial praises. For what profit is there in being vigorous abroad if life is evil at home? Though cities be stormed, nations chastised, and hands laid upon kingdoms, unless duty and modesty maintain their place in the Forum and Curia, the heap of acquired things, though made equal to heaven, will have no stable seat. It therefore pertains to the matter to know, and indeed to remember, the acts of censorial power."

If the vigor of the censorship had endured, great Emperors would never have seized their fatherland from fear of poverty. The posterity of the Romans marveled at the severity of the ancients. "What," says Valerius, "shall I say of the censorship of Fabricius Luscinus? Every age has related and will continue to relate that Cornelius Rufinus, who had discharged two Consulships and a Dictatorship most splendidly, was not retained in the senatorial order because he had acquired ten pounds of silver plate, as though luxurious through an evil example. By the god of faith, the very letters of our age seem to me to be astonished when they are compelled to accommodate their service to recording so venerable a severity, and to fear lest they be thought to commemorate the deeds not of our city. For it is scarcely credible that within the same pomerium the possession of ten pounds of silver was once an object of odium, while poverty is now held in the greatest contempt."

Lest we suppose that only a few were marked, the same Valerius shows that there were very many: "A large and good part of the equestrian order--four hundred young men--also endured the censorial mark with a patient spirit. Valerius and Publius Sempronius, because they had been ordered to go to Sicily to perform work on fortifications and had neglected to do it, deprived them of their public horses and entered them in the number of the aerarii."

[Printed page 577]

And thereafter: "The Censors also exacted the penalty for shameful fear with the greatest severity. For Marcus Atilius Regulus and Publius Furius Philus swore that Lucius Metellus the Quaestor and several Roman knights--who after the ill-fated battle at Cannae had sworn that they would depart from Italy with him--must be deprived of their public horses and entered among the aerarii. They also affected with a grave mark those who, after they had come into Hannibal's power and had been sent by him as envoys to the Senate concerning the exchange of captives, remained in the city when they did not obtain what they sought. For it was fitting both to keep faith with Roman blood, and for Marcus Atilius Regulus the Censor to mark perfidy, since his father had judged it preferable to expire amid the utmost torments rather than deceive the Carthaginians. How this censorship passed from the Forum into the camp, for it wished neither to fear nor to deceive the enemy!"

There are two eminent censorial memorials of the ancient state in this affair. They marked very many together with Metellus, concerning whom Livy writes in book 22. Then those who had returned from the camp were marked and affected with grave ignominy, concerning whom the same Livy writes: "Moreover, they had been so utterly broken by every mark and ignominy under the next Censors that some of them immediately brought death upon themselves; the others were deprived not only of the Forum throughout all their remaining life, but almost of light and public society."

In this matter the power of the Censors was greater than that of the Consuls. Indeed, they could mark the Consuls themselves.

§ 8. The censorship, especially of nobles, flourishes and formerly flourished among the Venetians; it is established that that state has been preserved by it more than by war. Among the Lucchese a severe, mature, and better censorship than that formerly exercised at Rome is practiced. In the week immediately before Easter, which is called Holy, those who belong to this council assemble in a certain place. Each of them places in a chest prepared for this purpose a ballot on which is written the name of the man whom he regards as wicked and unworthy of the city. Once this has been done, the ballots are taken out. If by chance someone's name is read repeatedly, the matter is referred to the Greater Council, where the votes are cast again. If he is condemned by them, such a man is judged wicked and unworthy of the city and is immediately ordered by the public voice of the herald to go into exile that very evening. The manner of proscription is that for three years he must remain fifty miles from the city. If he contravenes this, he incurs capital punishment. When the three years have ended, if upon returning he has not amended his life, he is again driven into exile in the same manner.

To this also pertains the fact that the Eight Men there, who observe inns and guests, correct deceitful and lying persons. For the corruptions of many cities arise from the negligence of innkeepers, since the dregs of cities flow together into those places, and vices first grow strong in those places where they are a source of profit to their abettors. Among the Genoese the office of the Censors is given partly to those whom they call Censors and partly to the Magistracy of St. George.

§ 9. I shall add as a conclusion that the Censors were formerly anointed. Varro, book 3 of On the Latin Language: "Now first concerning the censorial tablets. When the censorship takes its auspices by night in the temple and a report from the sky has been made, the herald is commanded thus to summon the men: 'May it be good, fortunate, happy, and salutary to the Roman people, the Quirites, and to the state of the Quirites, and to me and my colleague, and to our fidelity and Magistracy. Summon all Quirites, infantrymen, armed men, and private curators of all the tribes; if anyone wishes a curatorship to be assigned for himself or another, summon the assembly here before me.' The herald summons them first in the temple; afterwards he likewise summons them according to custom. When it grows light, the Censor, scribes, and Magistrates are anointed with myrrh and unguents."

The Censors correct those things on account of which the Praetor grants no action. Bodin, book 6 of the Politics; Lipsius, book 4; Alexander ab Alexandro, book 3, chapter 13, of the Genial Days. But above all, the life of the best and most modest Prince is a censorship. Pacatus says concerning Theodosius: "The man who corrects vices to which the prince is himself subject, even if you do not punish the prince himself, nevertheless brands him."

CHAPTER XXI

The Order and Offices of Provincial Magistrates

§ 1. We must treat the greater Magistrates who command outside the ruling city, such as Proconsuls and Propraetors, or outside the kingdom in which the king has established his seat, such as Viceroys and Great Praetors. Because in this matter not only different states but even the same states--and indeed the Roman state--frequently varied, it must be taught seriously; the practice of the ancient wise men must be brought forward, and the errors and outcomes weighed.

§ 2. Those were called Proconsuls, or men "in place of a Consul," whose Magistracy was continued after the completion of the year for the sake of the state, and who were sent into the provinces either from a Magistracy or from private life. Propraetors were appointed on the same principle: they were sent from the Praetorship or into praetorian provinces. A Magistracy was first prorogued for Publilius Philo, in Livy, book 8: "A triumph was decreed to Publilius because it was sufficiently believed that the enemies, subdued by the siege, had come into allegiance. These two singular things happened first to that man: the prorogation of command, which had not previously occurred in anyone, and a triumph after he had discharged his office."

This happened in year 428 from the foundation of the city, during the siege of Palaepolis. Scipio was made Proconsul from private life; Livy, book 26. Ordinary Consuls, after discharging the Magistracy, went to a province in the following year; but if this occurred in subsequent years, they were said to go as private persons. Yet however they were sent, there was need of good and courageous Magistrates. Most excellently the preface to Novel 24 says: "We certainly never believed that the ancient Romans could have established so ample a state from small and even the very smallest beginnings, and thereafter could have joined to themselves and pressed and protected by command almost the whole world--we might say--unless, after sending the greater Magistrates into the provinces, they had acquired greater dignity for themselves by that means, had given those men power both of arms and of laws, and had possessed men fitted and suitable for both. They called these men Praetors, a name imposed upon them because they went before and were placed over all the others, the administration both of military affairs and of the prescription of laws having been permitted to them. Hence they also called praetoria those places in which Magistrates were accustomed publicly either to administer justice or to reside, and established that most laws in the state should be introduced by the living voice of the Praetors. Many Praetors partly added to the command, or governed, Sicily, partly the island of Sardinia, partly Spain, and others some other region by land and sea."

§ 3. Sicily and Sardinia were the beginning of the provinces; afterwards the two Spains and others followed. The first governors of these were appointed in the Centuriate Assembly and called Praetors; afterwards provinces were also entrusted to Consuls for the purpose of conducting war. Praetors who remained in a province with their command prorogued were called Propraetors. But afterwards it seemed more correct that those who had discharged the Praetorship in the city should depart for the provinces toward the end of the year. Their power was no less than that of the Proconsuls, but they nevertheless employed only six Lictors, not twelve. In order gradually to draw all things to himself, Augustus sent into provinces men who had discharged neither the Consulship nor the Praetorship in the city, and called them Propraetors.

§ 4. They were sent by a Curiate Law, because without it they had no right to conduct war; hence that law was not necessary for men going to a pacified province. The command of the people was, however, necessary for the expenses and equipment required by a province. For by aid of a law it was obtained that traveling expenses should be decreed for the legates, cohort, and retinue. Capitolinus testifies in Alexander that money was given from public funds to governors.

[Printed page 578]

These were the laws for departing. First: "A Proconsul must take care not to burden a province in providing lodgings, as our Emperor together with his father rescripted to Aufidius Severianus. No Proconsul may possess his own grooms, but in place of them soldiers discharge the services in the provinces." Second: "It is indeed better for a Proconsul to depart without his wife, but he can also do so with his wife, provided he knows that the Senate, when Cotta and Messala were Consuls, decreed that, if the wives of those departing to their offices committed any offense, an account and punishment would be exacted from the husbands themselves." Third: "Before the Proconsul has entered the boundaries of the province decreed to him, he must send an edict concerning his arrival, containing some commendation of himself--if there is any familiarity or connection with the provincials--and especially excusing them from coming to meet him either publicly or privately, for it is fitting that each person should receive him in his own native country." See book 1, π., On the Office of the Proconsul.

§ 5. Proconsuls therefore possessed power and command: power was the capacity of making inquiry and judging; command concerned military affairs. They commonly administered justice in winter and in the assize districts, and conducted war in summer. Proconsuls were sent for the sake of war: first into Africa, then into Asia and Achaea. It was first established in year 605 from the foundation of the city that those who had discharged the Consulship in the city should go with consular power into the provinces. Before his arrival a Proconsul could not delegate authority to his Legate unless perhaps he underwent a necessary delay on the journey. Ulpian, book 4, On the Office of the Proconsul: "After he has entered the province he must delegate jurisdiction to his Legate; nor may he do this before entering the province. For it is exceedingly absurd that, before he himself obtains jurisdiction--for it does not belong to him before he comes into that province--he should delegate to another what he does not possess. But if he has done it beforehand, the Legate must be believed to possess jurisdiction, not from the time when it was delegated, but from the time when the Proconsul entered the province."

Papinian limits this in book 1 of the Questions: "Sometimes a Proconsul can delegate jurisdiction even if he has not yet reached the province. For what if he undergoes a necessary delay on the journey, while the Legate will arrive in the province very speedily?"

The care of revenues, the grain supply, and ships rested no less upon them. Thus they commanded a quantity of grain and sold or stored it; they sometimes imposed revenues and possessed their own praetorium. All these things are not now customarily conceded to governors, for they greatly abused their power to exhaust the provinces. But the laws themselves explain these rights most clearly in the passages cited above: "They are also accustomed to delegate inquiry concerning persons in custody to their Legates, in such a way that they remit the persons already heard to themselves, so that the Proconsul himself may liberate the innocent. But this kind of delegation is extraordinary; for no one can transfer to another the power of the sword given to him, or the power of any other coercion, and therefore not the right of liberating accused persons either, since they cannot be accused before him. But just as it rests in the Proconsul's judgment to delegate or not to delegate jurisdiction, so the Proconsul may indeed take away delegated jurisdiction, but ought not to do this without consulting the prince."

§ 6. Plainly royal honor was paid to him: to good men temples, statues, feast-days, and honorable embassies to the Senate; the same things were paid even more lavishly to bad men so that they would not inflict as much harm as they were able.

The honor of a Proconsul extended more widely than his power. Thus π., On the Office of the Proconsul: "A Proconsul possesses proconsular insignia everywhere from the moment he has departed the city; but he exercises power only in that province which has been decreed to him."

He nevertheless employed some power even outside his own province, although honorary rather than commanding power. Thus law 1, π., title 16: "All Proconsuls, as soon as they have departed the city, possess jurisdiction, but not contentious jurisdiction--voluntary jurisdiction. Thus both free persons and slaves can be manumitted before them, and adoptions can be made. But no one can be manumitted before a Proconsul's Legate because he does not possess jurisdiction of that kind."

Voluntary jurisdiction is exercised without a tribunal; contentious jurisdiction from a tribunal, as Cujas and others explain.

But what they principally sought was an opportunity to gather immense treasures. For they harassed the allies by plunder and extortions and granted and sold immunities. Strabo, book 12, concerning Paphlagonia: ὕστερον δὲ οἱ τῶν Ῥωμαίων ἡγεμόνες ἄλλως καὶ ἄλλως ἐποίησαν μερισμούς, βασιλέας τε καὶ δυνάστας καθιστάντες καὶ πόλεις τὰς μὲν ἐλευθεροῦντες, τὰς δὲ ἐγχωρίζοντες τοῖς δυνάσταις, τὰς δὲ ὑπὸ αὐτοῖς τοῖς Ῥωμαίοις ἔχοντες. "Afterwards Roman commanders established different divisions, appointing kings and dynasts, making some cities free, subjecting some to dynasts, and leaving some under the power of the Roman people." From this came great wealth: some from gifts of cities so that they would not pay what was owed or receive a soldier into winter quarters, and other things treated elsewhere.

§ 7. I have mentioned above several errors in this class. No prudent person can approve the fact that the governors were selected by lot; Augustus himself, after he had selected the Proconsuls for the people's provinces by lot, afterwards changed the practice. Next, the command was excessively brief. "What have we to do," says Apuleius, "with those vicissitudes of Proconsuls? What with brief years and hastening months? While they go and return, the year is consumed." For this reason Magistracies are entrusted very differently in the present age, as Augustus himself also did, so that his Prefects remained and were changed at his judgment. This is also observed now in Gaul and other kingdoms.

But the fact that the provincials, deprived of the aid of laws, were condemned under the appearance of right and laws after they had been afflicted and exhausted by every injury brought the greatest ruin. If they prevailed in their case, they nevertheless recovered the smallest part of their property, while those great defendants drank it away:

> But you, victorious province, weep.

Nor did any better hope dawn upon the victorious province: the relatives, friends, associates, children, and grandchildren of the condemned were to command again. Avengers therefore threatened, and advocates were of no benefit, since, having plundered in another quarter, they themselves needed protection, or were joined by affinity of marriages or fellowship in rapine.

§ 8. The method of correction consisted of the laws of treason, peculation, and extortion. But these laws had so passed into abuse that the provincials were afflicted by the very laws enacted for their safety. The law of treason and peculation was indeed enforced severely; proceedings concerning extortion were slow except in atrocious cases and against a weak enemy. That law was therefore given for the sake of the allies, and sometimes had an effect. Peter Gregory may be consulted concerning it in the Syntagma, book 36, chapter 28, §15 and following. Julius Caesar removed from their order men convicted of extortion. When Marius Priscus was accused under the Julian law of extortion by the Africans over whom he had presided as Proconsul, it pleased the Senate that the seven hundred thousand which Marius had accepted should be paid into the treasury. Marius was interdicted from the city and Italy. Concerning Hostilius Firminus, the Legate of Marius, it likewise pleased the Senate that, because he had lent his service to the most shameful ministries,

[Printed page 579]

no account of him should be taken in the allotment of a province. Cornelius Gallus, when Octavian held Roman affairs, was Procurator of Egypt; according to Ammianus Marcellinus, he exhausted the city after intercepting very many things. Upon his return, when he was arraigned for his thefts and the nobility, sharply indignant at the despoiled province, had been given the business for examination by the Emperor, he fell upon a drawn sword, certainly from fear of the capital penalty which he supposed that he would undergo on that account. Gaius Servilius Glaucia proposed a law at Rome by which Latins had the right of obtaining citizenship in place of a man whom they had brought to condemnation by accusing him of extortion. The Julian law of extortion also wills that the man is guilty who has accepted something so as to do more or less by virtue of his office. Demosthenes the Orator was condemned by the Athenian people to fifty talents because, after declaring that Harpalus, who had fled from Alexander out of Asia, was an enemy, he was afterwards appeased by a cup and twenty talents from Harpalus and desisted from his undertaking, as Dinarchus says against Demosthenes, as do Plutarch, Justin, and Athenaeus.

For the same reason, those who accept something in order to accuse or not accuse are held by the law of extortion, as are those who enter into an agreement to accuse innocent persons; those who accept money for giving or withholding a denunciation or testimony, or for selecting or sending a soldier; and those who accept it for delivering an opinion in the Senate or a public council. Ulpian notes another head of the Julian law of extortion: if a Proconsul dismisses his Legate from the province before himself. Another head forbids Senators to possess a seagoing ship. A governor is prohibited from building or possessing a ship in the province which he administers, or from purchasing anything else there. We read that men were condemned under the law of extortion among the Greeks also. According to Xenophon, in rendering their account for the preceding period the commanders Philesius and Xanthicles were condemned because they had embezzled twenty minas from the Gaulitic money which they had received for disbursement, and judgment ordered them to repay the same amount.

§ 9. Sometimes they were first sent into provinces in the fifth year after entering the Consulship. From this it happened that many never obtained provinces by lot. This occurred under Tiberius and frequently thereafter, so that the name of the Consuls gradually grew worthless when they perceived others to hold a higher position.

§ 10. At first they were called Praetors, afterwards Propraetors, of whom I have spoken above. But since the arrangement had been varied in many ways, Justinian attempted to recall it to the ancient laws. He did this in other cases and in the case of the Praetor of Pisidia, Thrace, Lycaonia, and especially Paphlagonia, Novel 29, chapters 1 and 2: “Indeed, the man who holds command over the whole province--while the whole province is called Paphlagonia, as before--will also go about and inspect the cities. No formula, perhaps formerly framed as sacred to prohibit such conduct, prevents this; nor will he send vicars here and there through the cities in his place. For we entirely prohibit this very thing, since it is shameful that, while he himself administers justice in the province, he should meanwhile entrust his functions to another contrary to law. He himself will administer everything and bring the public tributes to completion with the greatest readiness of spirit, exacting neither more nor less. Retaining, moreover, an equality consonant with justice, he will at the same time employ foresight so that, if the fisc has suffered any loss, he may correct it, and at the same time preserve the cities unharmed both publicly and privately. He shall receive the allowance which each of the two Magistrates possessed, amounting to seven hundred and twenty-five aurei; he shall also possess an assessor, who shall receive seventy-two aurei, and one cohort composed from both, proceeding to the number of one hundred men and receiving four hundred and forty-seven aurei and a third from the public treasury. And since he receives his office without payment, let him likewise discharge it without payment. For in this part also we shall redeem our subjects, and we ourselves shall give to those who customarily receive something under occasion of suffragium, as they call it, paying this to them through your throne from the public tributes of that province; nor shall we allow our subjects to be driven into servitude under the appearance and covering of an auction.”

§ 11. The name “Governor” is general, for a Proconsul too was a Governor. Thus book 1, π., title 18: “The name ‘Governor’ is general; and therefore Proconsuls, Caesar’s Legates, and all who govern provinces, even if they are Senators, are called Governors. The designation ‘Proconsul’ is special.”

These are his rights and power. First, adoption before him, emancipation of a son, and manumission of a slave. Ulpian, law 6 and π., On the Office of the Governor. Second, he possesses power over the inhabitants of his province. Paul, law 3. Outside his province he is a private person. Third, he possesses greater command than all persons after the prince, like a Proconsul. Ulpian, law 36, On the Edict. Fourth, cognizance belongs to the correctors and provincial Governors concerning all the causes which at Rome are heard by the Prefect of the City or the Praetorian Prefect, and likewise by the Consuls, Praetors, and others. Hermogenianus, book 2 of the Epitomes of Law. Marcian therefore rightly says in book 3 of the Institutes: "All provincial petitions which have various Judges at Rome pertain to the office of the Governors." The management of all business therefore pertains to the Governor. This must be noted against those who have judged the power of Governors to be less than that of Proconsuls.

More of his offices are described in law 1, π., title 18. There several golden laws must be noted, especially law 12: "Although the man who presides over a province ought to discharge the function and office of all the Magistrates at Rome, nevertheless one must regard not what is done at Rome but what ought to be done." And law 13: "It befits a good and grave Governor to take care that the province which he governs is peaceful and quiet. He will obtain this without difficulty if he acts solicitously so that the province is free from evil men, and searches them out. For he must seek sacrilegious persons, robbers, kidnappers, and thieves; punish each according to his offense; and coerce those who harbor them, without whom a robber cannot remain concealed for long." And law 18: "It is contained in a plebiscite that no Governor should accept a service or gift unless it is food or drink to be consumed within the next few days."

§ 12. Among the Turks the office of the Agha corresponds partly to the office of the Praetorian Prefect and partly to that of Proconsuls. For he is the head and Judge of the Janissary soldiers and possesses the first place in war. Otherwise the Pashas, Beylerbeys, and Sanjakbeys exercise various functions in war and peace. But because that command is tyrannical, it generally sends robbers and thieves into the regions, whom the Turk is afterwards accustomed to slaughter and plunder when they have become rich. The difficult thing is that those through whom the empire is administered must act as lions abroad and foxes at home. For the authority of the Pashas among the Turks is very great: in ancient times, while their affairs were still slight, they were employed in councils; now they also govern the councils and preside over the most powerful kingdoms. This is the more dangerous because Emperors accustomed to pleasures do not ordinarily pay much attention to the state unless the dangers of wars, or the frequent sedition of the Janissaries, shakes off their torpor.

§ 13. A Dioecetes is one who administers definite dioceses, but the division of dioceses varied. In ancient times the parts of a province were called dioceses. Cicero, book 3 of the Letters, says that three Asian dioceses were attributed to the province of Cilicia. But in the later times of the empire provinces were parts of dioceses. There were five dioceses of the East. The one called the diocese of the East properly so called embraced fifteen provinces; the Asian diocese ten, the Pontic six, the Egyptian six, and that of Dacia five. There were also six dioceses of the West: the Italian, Illyrian, African, Gallic, Spanish, and British. From this it came into the usage of the Church that the jurisdictions of Bishops are called dioceses.

[Printed page 580]

§ 14. Viceroys are now furnished with the same power. Spain possesses many of them; the dignity is not so customary in other kingdoms because they do not administer kingdoms so remote or so numerous through vicars. The dignity and power of Vice-kings and Viceroys is not the same as that which belonged to the Vicars, for the Vicars possessed civil jurisdiction, while the Vice-kings possessed both civil and military jurisdiction. Vicars are compared with Counts in law 1 of the Code, title 38: "In civil causes it is fitting that Vicars be preferred to Counts of the soldiers; in military business Counts are preferred to Vicars. Whenever association in judging occurs, the Vicar shall be placed first and the Count shall follow as his associate. For the merit of the Prefecture stands before the other dignities, and the vicarial dignity judges that by its very name it draws to itself a portion of it, possesses the power of sacred cognizance, and is accustomed to represent the reverence of our judgment."

Nevertheless, Augustal Vicars who were created by the Prince possessed the chlamys and carriage and administered the tributes. Cassiodorus, book 9 of the Variae.

§ 15. The Prince of Dalmatia presides over tribunals and hears causes, but is not the Governor of provinces with proconsular or any other power. He also judged the Count of the provinces himself. “Power over the provinces has indeed been given to the Count, but the Judge himself has been entrusted to you,” says Cassiodorus in book 7.

§ 16. The Vicar of the Pontic tract is also called the Count of the Pontic Diocese; he performed the functions of the Praetorian Prefect. “It seemed good to us,” says Justinian, “to impose a Vicar upon all the provinces of the Pontic Diocese, so that he may fill not only the place of the Praetorian Prefect but also that of the most glorious Master of Offices, the most glorious Dukes, and the most magnificent Magistrates who preside over the divine patrimony, treasury, and household Protectors.” They were Proprefects and governed a diocese in the place of the Prefect. Nevertheless, they possessed command from the Prince. The Vicar of the Praetorian Prefect administered justice in seven provinces of Italy. There were, however, not only Vicars of the Praetorium but also Vicars of the Master of the Soldiers. In Eutropius, book 7, chapter 6, the Consular Governors of Venetia, Aemilia, Flaminia, and Liguria are under the Vicar of Italy, as are the Governor of the Cottian Alps and those of both Rhaetias.

Tetrarchs performed almost the functions of Satraps and Vicars, although they are more similar to our Counts and Barons. The name originated among the Thessalians, for their region was divided into four parts, each of which was called a τετραρχία; their names were Thessaliotis, Phthiotis, Pelasgiotis, and Hestiaeotis. Hence it came about that men who commanded some part were called τετράρχαι. Thus Antipas and Philip were appointed Tetrarchs by Augustus. Josephus, book 17, chapter 18. It is established from Hirtius, On the Alexandrian War, that there were several Tetrarchs of Gallograecia.

§ 17. This above all was wisely established: after Consuls and Praetors had been designated, and before they entered their Magistracy, provinces were to be decreed to them, which the designees either arranged among themselves or obtained by lot. In this way, before entering their Magistracy, they knew over whom they were to command abroad, and from their Consulship or Praetorship the provincials also judged the morals of their future Governor. In the time of the Emperors, when Governors were sent at the judgment of one man, this could not be observed.

But enough has been said concerning these matters. I repeat this one thing, and repeat it again: provincial Magistrates must be visited frequently and their actions examined; otherwise they will become worse through the power itself.

§ 18. In the time of Augustus men were also called Proconsuls in another manner. For those whom he sent with command into the pacified provinces, the care of which he had committed to the Senate, he also called Proconsuls. Dio says: “Augustus ordered the Prefectures to be annual unless someone possessed a privilege by reason of a multitude of children or of marriage; he ordered that they be sent by the common counsel of the Senate, neither girded with a sword nor employing military dress. He wished them to be called Proconsuls--not only those two Consulars but also the remaining Praetorians, or men who held the place of Praetorians--and that both should be attended by as many Lictors as the laws permitted them to possess in the city; that they should assume the insignia of command as soon as they came outside the pomerium, and retain them until their return to the city.”

And afterwards: “The Senate granted Africa and Asia separately to Consulars and assigned the remaining provinces to Praetorians. It equally forbade both to obtain provinces by lot before the fifth year after discharging a Magistracy in the city. Thus it happened that, although their number was greater than that of the provinces, command nevertheless eventually reached all. But after the time of Caesar Octavian, when some of them had administered their Magistracy badly, these provinces too were annexed to the Emperor, and so in some fashion he assigned even these provinces to them. Moreover, they also selected certain Legates or Assessors for themselves, whose counsel they employed in the administration of the province. A Praetorian took one from men of his own or an inferior order; a Consular took three from men of the same dignity, all approved by the Emperor himself. This too was established generally concerning the power over all provinces: they were to conduct no levy of soldiers; exact no money beyond that which had been established without command of the Senate or Emperor; and, when a Successor had been sent, depart from the province immediately, spending no time on the return journey but returning to Rome within three months.”

§ 19. The retinue was large and costly and exceedingly burdensome to the state. There were the Quaestor, Legates, Tribunes, Centurions, and, in addition to the military officers, attendants, Lictors, and the whole cohort of friends. Alexander Severus and others established a limit; for the Senate decreed such great expenses for Magistrates for no other reason than that public resources might in this manner be poured out upon patricians. A limit was therefore deservedly established.

§ 20. Augustus sent Proconsuls into the provinces without the military belt and military jurisdiction. This was gradually abandoned, for it produced several disadvantages, and much more so when in the same province there were two Magistrates, one wearing the toga and the other the military cloak, and there was no sufficiently exact method of keeping them in their office. Justinian therefore joined both powers. Novel 21, chapter 1: “These things moved us to make this Magistracy also united, as we did among the Pisidians, and to impose upon it the designation ‘Praetor’ together with our name. For we will that this man too be called the Justinianic Praetor of Lycaonia, just as the Praetor of Pisidia and of others. Next we also draw both cohorts together into one--the one over which the civil Magistrate presided and the one over which the military Magistrate presided--and call it Praetorian. It is to be constituted from approved men proceeding in the customary manner from the sacred bureau of petitions, from which the Duciani formerly also drew them; we extend its measure to the number of one hundred men, and assign to it the allowances of both Magistrates, but to the Assessor and the others--”

[Printed page 581]

Accordingly he placed over Pisidia a governor whom he called both Governor and Praetor, with proconsular command. Then, with the same intention, he gave Lycaonia a Praetor, Novel 25, drawing two Magistrates into one and tempering the two together, as he himself says. In Novel 26 he declares that he did this in many places, and did so because of dissension. Kings must weigh very carefully the words which moved Justinian. He says: “We all know that two men with the name of Vicars sit at the Long Wall. One of them governs the military cohorts, for there is a great force of soldiers in that place; the other is Prefect over civil business. But although both discharge the functions of others there--the one of the most glorious Prefects, the other of the high-minded Masters of the Soldiers--they nevertheless never agree with one another. Although the fisc furnishes each separately with his allowances and provides other salaries, they nonetheless perpetually and without interruption take up this one business for themselves: that they exercise immortal contentions with one another. It therefore seemed right and orderly to us to do here also what we did among other nations, although they were not so savage and did not need such military protection: not to have the one preside over civil business while the other commands among the soldiers alone, but to draw both offices into one and place over that locality some grave Magistrate worthy of reverence, who should equally care for civil business there and be solicitous for the handsome and becoming order of the soldiers. For the man who governs the province moves about in other places and is scarcely sufficient for them.”

The same law was pronounced concerning the Praetor of Sicily, Novel 104: “Let Sicily possess a Praetor who shall both conduct civil affairs and bear the care of military expenditure; public tributes, however, do not pertain to his solicitude.”

CHAPTER XXII

The Established System of Judges in the State

§ 1. Justinian says in Novel 82 that some Judges possess a Magistracy and others do not: "Many Judges indeed were selected who did not possess command."

The equity of judgments chiefly preserves the state; if it is neglected, not even war can be rightly administered. Just as a city cannot stand without justice, so justice cannot stand without a Judge. A Judge is animate law: ὁ δικαστὴς εἶναι βούλεται οἷον δίκαιον ἔμψυχον. He is a μεσίτης, a mediator who joins the parties by equality. He is a διχαστής, one who cuts disputes apart, as Aristotle says in book 5, chapter 7, of the Ethics. Some define a judgment as the explanation, through lawful paths, of another person's obscure right; others, as the administration of justice in a cause heard by a Judge. The true definition is that a judgment is the lawful determination of a Judge possessing power of adjudication, so that the dispute receives an end through his sentence.

Jurisdiction extends very widely. π., title 1, law Ius: "The person who orders another to judge must be a Magistrate." In appointing a Judge, however, the same thing must be observed as in taking a rule and standard for buildings: just as it must be as straight and entirely inflexible as possible, so the Judge ought to govern who is not easily impelled either to anger or desire; otherwise it would be just as if someone bent the rule to fit the wall.

§ 2. The practice of states teaches us that many Judges must be selected for various disputes. Aristotle judges thus in book 4, chapter 16, of the Politics: "The difference among courts is contained under three headings: from whom, concerning what, and how. 'From whom' means whether Judges are taken from all persons or from certain persons; 'concerning what,' how many kinds of courts there are; 'how,' whether Judges are made by lot or by vote. First, then, let us explain how many kinds of courts there are, so that the division of courts may be made clear. There are eight kinds of courts. One pertains to demanding accounts from Magistrates; another to public offenses and those unjustly committed against public persons; a third to offenses against the condition of the state; a fourth concerns disputes of both Magistrates and private persons when they dispute concerning the imposition of fines; a fifth concerns private contracts involving great things, and in addition killings, crimes among assassins, and the affairs of foreigners.

"Of offenses pertaining to killings, whether the matter is conducted before the same Judges or before others, some are committed willingly and deliberately, others without deliberation and unwillingly; some are acknowledged and the fact is agreed among the litigants, but the law is disputed. A fourth offense is that charged against persons who had gone into exile for an involuntary killing after they had been recalled from exile to plead a capital cause; at Athens, the court exercised at Phreatto is said to be of this kind. But throughout all time such cases happen rarely, and only in great cities. Of the courts which pertain to the affairs of foreigners, one kind is that in which a foreigner litigates with a foreigner, another that in which a foreigner litigates with a citizen. Besides all these there are also courts concerning small contracts, from one drachma to five and a little more. For these too must be judged, yet they do not fall to a multitude of Judges."

§ 3. I intend, therefore, to follow the order of the Judges. At Rome the Praetors discharged this one office. For although Varro in book 4 of On the Latin Language thinks they were named from going before, and Justinian confirms this because they went before others both in war and in the prescription of laws, their function at Rome was nevertheless confined within the bounds of administering justice. The Consuls were frequently called away and could not attend those requesting justice; and therefore, for the purpose of administering justice, Spurius Furius Camillus, son of Marcus, was made Praetor in year 386 from the foundation of the city--the same year in which Lucius Sextius was the first Consul from the plebs. Yet, if we consider the internal struggles, that Magistracy seems to owe its origin not so much to justice as to ambition.

For the nobility conceded to the plebs that there should be a plebeian Consul, and the plebs conceded to the nobility that one Praetor, who would administer justice in the city, should be created from the Fathers. These are Livy's words in book 6; in book 7 he adds: "This year was distinguished by the Consulship of a new man and distinguished by two new Magistracies, the Praetorship and Curule Aedileship. The patricians sought these honors for themselves in return for the other Consulship conceded to the plebs. The plebs gave the Consulship to Lucius Sextius, by whose law it had been acquired. By favor in the Field the Fathers gave the Praetorship to Spurius Furius Camillus, son of Marcus, and the Aedileship to Gnaeus Quinctius Capitolinus and Publius Cornelius Scipio, men of their own clans. Lucius Aemilius Mamercus was given to Lucius Sextius as a colleague from the Fathers."

And a little afterwards: "Since all things were deliberately deferred so that nothing should be conducted through the plebeian Consul, there was silence in all affairs and a leisure similar to a cessation of justice. The Tribunes, however, did not suffer in silence the fact that, in return for one plebeian Consul, the nobility had taken for itself three patrician Magistrates seated on Curule chairs as though they were Consuls--the Praetor indeed administering justice, created as a colleague of the Consuls and with the same auspices. From this the Senate felt shame at ordering that the Curule Aediles be created from the Fathers."

[Printed page 582]

At first it was agreed that they should be created from the plebs in alternate years; afterwards the office was open indiscriminately. Then another Praetor was added to administer justice among foreigners; he was called the Peregrine and Lesser Praetor, while the former was called the Urban and Greater Praetor. Chosen in the Centuriate Assembly, they allotted the jurisdictions between them. Afterwards, as not only the city but fraud and crimes increased, four Praetors were created. Livy, book 20. Thereafter six were created, as Livy has in book 37. Finally Sulla added four so that there were ten. The first two exercised private judgments; the others, public judgments. And lest you marvel at the morals of the ancients, two administered justice among assassins, one concerning extortion, and others concerning other investigations.

§ 4. Although they were created to administer justice, they were nevertheless afterwards sent to wars. Thus in Livy, book 23, two are sent to Sicily and Sardinia. Afterwards usage established that Praetors no less than Consuls should obtain provinces by lot. Thus the Praetors were led from tribunals to camps.

§ 5. The contrary occurred in the case of the Praetorian Prefect. At first they were established to be ἔπαρχοι αὐλῆς, Prefects of the Court, according to Herodian; they are also called ὕπαρχοι ("subordinate prefects") and ἔπαρχοι τῶν δορυφόρων τῆς στρατιᾶς, τῆς στρατιώτιδος ("prefects of the bodyguards of the army and of the soldiery"). Eusebius calls one τὸν καθ' ὅλου ὕπαρχον ("the general prefect"). Augustus appointed two to preside over the Praetorian cohorts. But afterwards their power in judgments was great; indeed, Constantine the Great recalled them from war to tribunals and the care of revenues. Moreover, the authority of a judging Prefect was so great that appeal from him was not permitted. Thus π., title 11:

"It is necessary to recount briefly whence the origin of appointing the office of Praetorian Prefects flowed. Some writers have related that in ancient times Praetorian Prefects were established in place of Masters of Horse. For since among the ancients supreme power was entrusted to Dictators for a time, and they chose Masters of Horse for themselves, who, as associates sharing their care in military affairs, exercised the second power after them, when governance of the state was transferred to perpetual Emperors, Praetorian Prefects were chosen by the Princes in the likeness of Masters of Horse and given a fuller license for the correction of public discipline. The authority of the Prefects, begun from these cradles, deserved to be increased so far that appeal cannot be made from the Praetorian Prefects. For when it had formerly been asked whether it was permissible to appeal from the Praetorian Prefects, appeal was both lawful by right and supported by surviving examples of persons who had appealed. Afterwards, when an imperial sentence was read publicly, the faculty of appeal was forbidden. For the Prince believed that men employed in the greatness of that office because of singular diligence, after their fidelity and gravity had been tested, would judge no otherwise, in accordance with the wisdom and splendor of their dignity, than he himself would have judged. The Praetorian Prefects are also supported by another privilege: minors in age can be restored against their sentences by no other Magistrates, but only by the Prefects themselves."

That dignity had grown excessively, so that one Prefect directed everything. Claudian says concerning Manlius:

> Empire took you not in a part of itself, but throughout its whole body,
>
> And gave you governors to rule throughout the entire earth.
>
> The Spanish and German Tethys obeyed you,
>
> And Britain, severed from our world;
>
> Through different currents your utterances were honored
>
> By the slow Saône, swift Rhône, and wealthy Ebro.
>
> O how often the Rhine, where the barbarian went,
>
> Grieved that it did not enjoy you as Judge upon both banks.
>
> To the care of one man belonged whatever reddens
>
> At sunset, whatever the descending day encircles.
>
> So swiftly he again completed continuous honors.
>
> One lifetime came between the intervals of powers,
>
> And brought so many steps of fate into youthful years.

The great men of the palace in Francia taught how dangerous this was: the Sejani, Rufini, Stilichos, and others. But let us continue to speak of Judges. After the Praetor and Consul, a Legate administered justice in the provinces; in the city the Aediles and others also did so, of whom we shall speak in order. Here this must be admonished: the most ruinous system of all judgments was that in which a Magistrate referred public crimes to the people, concerning which every most wicked person was accustomed to deliver an opinion. Nowhere were judgments more shameful. The Roman people, despite the Senate's resistance, converted to its own use land disputed between the Aricini and Ardeates. Thus in Livy, book 4, pity for his children acquitted Galba, who had killed many persons in Lusitania contrary to the faith he had pledged. Gabinius was acquitted because his son, lying upon the ground, was despised by the accuser. Rain liberated Claudius, who had lost a fleet. It more justly preserved Quintus Flavius the Augur. For when he had already been condemned by fourteen tribes, he exclaimed that he was perishing though innocent; the accuser violently replied that it made no difference to him whether Flavius perished guilty or innocent, provided that he perished. Offended by this atrocity, the people favored the defendant. Thus Aemilius Scaurus was acquitted when he could not name 120 persons in the province from whom he had taken nothing. Scipio Asiaticus was condemned through envy. But, to pass over others, we see Coriolanus, Camillus, and finally Cicero afflicted by the rashness of the people.

§ 6. Of all states, the Roman state was least able to provide for the citizenry in its judgments. It therefore changed the systems of judging very frequently. The Senate possessed the judgments down to year 630 of the city. Gracchus transferred them to the knights alone. In year 647, by the Servilian Law, the power of judging was again shared with the Senators, but in such a way that the number of knights was greater. Afterwards, when Caesar was Consul in year 662, Marcus Livius Drusus made the number of knights and Senators equal, so that there were three hundred of each order; those laws were abrogated in the same year because the unjust judgments of the knights oppressed the provinces and held the fortunes of Governors in their power. When Gaius Pompeius Strabo and Lucius Porcius Cato were Consuls, at the proposal of Silvanus 450 Judges were appointed who decided disputes in that year; they were taken from every order, including the plebeian, in year 683. Sulla restored the judgments entirely to the Senate. In year 673, Cotta again distributed the judgments among Senators, knights, and Tribunes of the Treasury. Julius Caesar as Consul abolished the Tribunes of the Treasury. In his second Consulship Pompey proposed and carried a law that Judges should be selected by property assessment from the Senate, equestrian order, and Tribunes of the Treasury. Antony was not content with these three decuries, but in place of Tribunes of the Treasury substituted Centurions, standard-bearers, Larks, and common soldiers. Augustus added a fourth decury from the ducenarii, to judge lighter matters. This great and sudden change of Judges is a sign that none were not only pleasing but even defensible. Appian reports that in the time of Lucius Drusus corruption by gifts ceased to be held among crimes; thus men plainly rubbed all shame from their brow.

§ 7. A Judge, arbiter, or recuperator was given by the Praetor.

[Printed page 583]

For after the selected Judges had previously been chosen, the Praetor drew by lot from the selected men the number prescribed by the law. Both defendant and accuser could reject those whom they wished; in their place the Praetor or Judge of the investigation selected others by lot. Under the Servilian Law the plaintiff presented one hundred from 450 Judges; the defendant, 150. If the Judges did not excuse themselves, they swore to the laws and their names were recorded, lest substitutes be intruded. There was excessive freedom in that selection by lot. For who doubts that a man favoring an unjust cause would reject not only hostile men but all whom he judged to have integrity at heart? Therefore, in chapter 3, On Judgments, and other laws, that license of rejecting was restrained.

"It is of the most manifest law that litigants may reject delegated Judges before the suit is begun, since even by the general forms of your most sublime See it has been established that, when a Judge is rejected, a necessity is imposed upon the parties to come to the selection of arbiters and propose their rights at a hearing before them. For although the Judge has been delegated by imperial divinity, nevertheless, because it is our concern that all disputes proceed without suspicion, let the man who judges the Judge suspect be permitted to reject him before the suit is begun, after a petition of rejection has been presented to him, so that recourse may be had to another. Since we have already established that after joinder of issue neither may appeal be made before a definitive sentence nor may rejection occur, lest disputes be extended to infinity, the same executor shall impose upon the parties through the ordinary Judge and every civil aid the necessity both of selecting arbiters and coming before them, and of thus pursuing the suit as though the arbiters had been delegated by the imperial summit. But if the Judge was not delegated by the imperial Majesty, we decree that this be obtained from another summit." Given on the fifth day before the Kalends of May at Constantinople, Lampadius and Orestes, most illustrious men, being Consuls. [9.]

For that reason a man is ordered to select an arbiter within three days. Today this is observed: after joinder of issue it is not lawful to reject the Judge. Indeed, even the cause why he is suspect must be judged. Thus all those things were afterwards changed for the better in law and reduced to a fixed order, so that to reject a Judge is not to reject at one's pleasure but to adduce lawful causes why he is deservedly suspect. All these things must be done without calumny or defamation. I admit that slight causes are often admitted for rejecting a Judge, not only because several Judges are easily available but also because by the very fact that a Judge has been rejected he is judged an enemy.

If, therefore, he is a relative of the opposing party within the seventh degree, he can be rejected, because succession extends that far and the Judge can be believed more inclined toward a man whose heir he can become. This cause will also be valid in a more remote degree if he can be heir. If he is related by marriage, he will deservedly be rejected according to the degree of affinity. If he is a member of the opposing party's household or his intimate, the other party will not entrust himself to him. The laws do not extend this to the Procurators or Advocates of the other party: although they may be very intimate with the Judge, it is nevertheless not permissible to reject him for that reason. Likewise, the lord or patron of the opposing party can be challenged. Other causes are added: if they are Canons in the same College; if they are from the same fatherland; if the Judge is the opposing party's subject or vassal; if the Judge has a similar cause; if he was the opposing party's Advocate or counselor; if he thrust himself into the cause; if he was surety for the opposing party; or if hostilities preceded. Indeed, an entire Consistory can be rejected if the presiding man can command the others and is suspect. Otherwise, only the suspect members are removed from a whole college, not the others also.

The removal of a deservedly suspect Judge belongs to natural law. But, as I admonished at the beginning, a penalty is imposed upon a man who makes a rash challenge. George of Toulouse writes excellently in book 49, chapter 4, of the Syntagma of Law: "These causes of rejection must moreover be presented in writing and comprehended in a petition, so that they may be proposed thoughtfully, not rashly, since a penalty also from the royal Constitutions threatens a person who proposes rashly: ten Tours pounds in the lower courts for each rash cause, and twenty pounds in the supreme courts. Thus they compel men either to pay the penalty or prove the proposed causes. Therefore, for the purpose of deciding the challenges, the litigants must select Judges or arbiters within a fixed period prescribed by the rejected Judge. If they do not agree concerning them, the Judge gives them ex officio, and before them proof of the causes is made, if those causes are not manifest and altogether notorious and the Judge denies them."

For a defendant to wish no Judge at all to be selected, or selected in substitution, is the height of distrust; in an accuser it is an indication of calumny. Certainly it is altogether grave to challenge a Judge rashly. The fact that they rejected as Judge in their cause Cato, the man afterwards called Uticensis, contributed greatly to the condemnation of many. For they could not appear innocent--indeed, they sufficiently confessed concerning themselves--when they rejected the judgment of so upright and religious a Judge and so excellent and incorrupt a man. Nor today is Bartolus's gloss, or the opinion of others on the law Apertissimi, Code, On Judgments, received; they establish that by civil law a Judge declared suspect may be rejected without cause. We instead follow pontifical law: the Judge does not cease to be Judge before the causes of suspicion have been proved.

§ 8. The Centumviral Court seems to have been established most excellently in the state. From thirty-five tribes 105 men were selected, who by a round number were called the Hundred Men; three were appointed from each tribe. Their number and jurisdiction were afterwards increased; Pliny, book 6, epistle 33, testifies that there were 180. There were four councils of them. They judged civil causes. Cicero, book 1 of On the Orator. The Urban Praetor presided over them; two spears were set up; four councils heard one and the same cause. Pliny, epistle 21 of book 5, and chapter 2.

§ 9. The Capital Triumvirs were selected in the Tribal Assembly. It belonged to them to judge persons of base and abject condition and wicked, criminal slaves. They were created when Curius Dentatus was Consul, in year 465 of the city. Among other things they also possessed the care of prisons and quarries. When the conspiracy of the Bacchanalia was discovered, the Capital Triumvirs were commanded to arrange watches through the city, to take care that no nocturnal assemblies occurred, and to guard against fires. Livy, book 39. The same men are accused by the Senate because they did not resist the superstitions of foreigners and the people. Livy, book 25: "The Aediles and Capital Triumvirs were gravely accused by the Senate because they did not prevent them. When they attempted to remove that multitude from the Forum and disperse the apparatus of the rites, they were not far from being assaulted. When it appeared that this evil was already more powerful than could be quieted by the lesser Magistrates, the Senate gave Marcus Aemilius, the Urban Praetor, the business of liberating the people from those religions. In an assembly he both read the decree of the Senate and declared that whoever possessed books of prophecies or prayers, or a written art of sacrificing, should deliver all those books and writings to him before the Kalends of April, and that no one should sacrifice by a new or foreign rite in a public or sacred place." They seem to have presided over the execution of capital matters. Thus Sallust in Catiline and Plautus in the Amphitryon.

§ 10. The Duumvirs of Treason, created by Tullus, afterwards frequently judged treason outside the ordinary order. Labienus, Tribune of the plebs, restored the Magistracy after it had fallen into disuse. Cicero, in his speech for Rabirius, uses Labienus's own act to excite hatred against the accuser: "The Porcian Law," he says, "wrested the liberty of citizens from the Lictor; Labienus, a popular man, delivered it to the executioner. Gaius Gracchus carried a law that judgment concerning the life of a Roman citizen should not occur without your command; this popular man, through the Duumvirs and without your command, compelled a Roman citizen not to be judged, but to be condemned to death without his cause being stated. Do you even make mention to me of the Porcian Law, of Gaius Gracchus, of these men's liberty, or finally of any popular man--you who attempted not only by unaccustomed punishments but also by the unheard-of cruelty of your words to violate the liberty of this people, test its gentleness, and diminish its discipline?"

It is established from the trial of Rabirius that men of great dignity presided over these judgments, for the Duumvirs at that time were Julius and Lucius Caesar. Rabirius, condemned by them, appealed to the people.

§ 11. Quaestors of Capital Matters were appointed by the people and were called Quaestors, or Inquisitors, of parricide; for whoever killed a human being was called a parricide. These are the words of Numa's law: "If anyone knowingly and by deceit gives a free human being over to death, let him be a parricide."

The Five Men judged concerning exile, as Pliny testifies; they were selected from the best Senators. Afterwards it was established that they should be chosen by lot. Thus Honorius and Theodosius. This was nevertheless subsequently changed by other laws, since lot ought not readily to be admitted in so great a business.

§ 12. The Praetor who at Constantinople was called πραίτωρ τῶν δήμων, whom Simocatta calls τὸ θεματικὸν δικαστήν, "Judge of the Theme," possessed only the functions of judging, as did the Juridicus of Alexandria. Judgments at Constantinople were customarily held at the sacred well of the church of St. Sophia, where a veil was extended. Nicetas, in Alexius, is authority that there were several βήλου ("of the Velum") Judges. Others think that they were called Judges of the Velum because they judged at the Emperor's Chamber. The Velarii, however, were those who stood by and guarded the places of the tribunals.

§ 13. The Decemvirs for Judging Lawsuits belonged to the Centumviral Court and convened the centumviral spear. Donatus thinks that they were not from the Hundred Men. Dio, book 54, calls them τοὺς δέκα, τοὺς ἐπὶ τῶν δικαστηρίων, τῶν εἰς τοὺς ἑκατὸν ἄνδρας κληρουμένων--"the ten men placed over the courts, from among those allotted to the Hundred Men." Suetonius in Octavian says that, among other things, Augustus established "that the Decemvirs should convene the centumviral spear, which men who had discharged the Quaestorship had been accustomed to convene." The Decemviral and Centumviral Court were therefore altogether the same. Thus Laevinus Torrentius on that passage of Suetonius.

Pomponius, in book 11, On the Origin of Law, relates that the Decemvirs for Judging Lawsuits, who presided over the Centumviral spear, were established at nearly the same time as the Peregrine Praetor was first created, as also were the Monetary and Capital Triumvirs, about year 512 from the foundation of the city. Did Augustus therefore create other men? I certainly do not think so. For they were the same men and, unless I am mistaken, were from the body of the Hundred Men, although they possessed the right to summon the others. The authority of Pomponius proves not only that they existed before Augustus, but so does the very manner of writing the name, since ancient marbles survive even today on which is written "X MEN FOR JUDGING STLITIBUS"; for the ancients said stlocum, stlatum, and stritavum. In the meantime it had happened that men who had discharged the Quaestorship were placed over their office. Augustus abolished this.

Dio, book 54: "For this reason it had previously been decreed, while Augustus was absent, that the Twenty Men should be created from the knights. Hence none of them was enrolled in the Senate without having discharged a Magistracy which furnished entrance into the Senate. Those Twenty Men were drawn from the Twenty-six Men: namely, three Capital Triumvirs, three Monetary Triumvirs, four Curators of the roads in the city, and the Decemvirs for Judging Lawsuits which are to be judged by lot by the Hundred Men. For the two Curators of roads outside the city and the four sent to the Prefectures in Campania had been abolished."

I judged that these things should be transcribed because I see that nearly the same system of courts has pleased most states. Decemvirs were created every year. Twenty-six Men were created annually and afterwards distributed their offices so that there were Capital Triumvirs, Monetary Triumvirs, Four Men who were Curators of roads, Decemvirs for Judging Lawsuits, Duumvirs of roads outside the city, and Four Men to be sent to the Prefectures of Campania. They were taken from the Senate, and this was the beginning of honors. Augustus created the Twenty Men, omitting the six latter men, and took them from the knights, as Dio says in book 54. Nevertheless, it is established that the office also returned to the sons of Senators. For in Tacitus, Annals 3, Tiberius asks the Fathers that Nero, son of Germanicus, be released from the duty of undertaking the Twenty-man office. That function therefore belonged even to the sons of Princes.

§ 14. This too was provided most wisely: that Judges should render an account in the province. "Let Judges remain fifty days in the province," chapter 1, title 49: "Let no Governor of Provinces from among the most illustrious men, whether Consular or Corrector, nor those who have merited the insignia of a higher administration--that is, the respectable men, Proconsuls, the Augustal Prefect, the Count of the East, the Vicar of any tract, any Duke or Count of any soldiers, or the Count of the Divine Houses--after a successor has been appointed for him, dare to depart from the places which he is known to have governed before the established number of fifty days is completed. But during that time let Governors, Consulars, and Correctors remain in the metropolis; let respectable Judges, both civil and military, remain publicly in the more illustrious cities of the diocese they administered--not hiding at home, within sacred precincts or regions, or in the houses of powerful persons, but moving in the most frequented places before the faces of all whom they lately governed--so that the free faculty of raising a complaint concerning thefts or crimes may lie open to all.

"Thus, defended from every injury by the provision of the succeeding administrator and by the peril of his office, and no less by that of the Curials and Defender of the City, once he has been summoned into complaint, and entrusted only to an oath-bound security, let him answer those wishing to accuse him according to the law, as has been said. Let no copy of an imperial utterance, codicils offered for another administration, command of your most ample See that he discharge the functions of the governor of another province, command of the aforesaid or of any other civil or military power that he conduct any public solicitude, or that he be produced or led away, grant him any excuse for departing from the province before the appointed time. Finally, let the craftiness of any art and devised cunning of any occasion be excluded, so that what we sanction for the safety of all provinces may by every means obtain its effect. But if anyone, with temerity worthy of punishment, believes that this most salutary law should be circumvented or violated, although he may deservedly be judged guilty even of treason, he shall nevertheless be compelled to pay a fine of fifty pounds of gold into the public accounts. The man who, after undertaking the administration after him, failed to take care that he was honorably detained or immediately to report his flight shall be punished by a similar penalty."

§ 15. The mute, deaf, and underage are prohibited from judging. I would not prohibit a deaf and mute Prince from the power of judging, since he can sufficiently understand the cause through writings and judge a sentence in writing, except when certain things must be explained by voice. Our forefathers wished the Judge to be without infamy; hence they prohibited a man removed from the Senate from judging unless he had either been restored or the period of his condemnation had elapsed. Book Cum praetor, penultimate section, On Judgments. This golden passage is from Cicero: "For men condemned forever by a disgraceful judgment, there is neither any approach to an honor nor entrance into the Curia."

[Printed page 585]

If, therefore, anyone has accepted money and given testimony, made an accusation, rendered judgment, or refrained from judgment, bound or did not bind someone, the gates of dignity are closed to him. First: if anyone comes to honors by payment, not by the commendation of his life. A man charged with a crime cannot obtain honors in that year unless he has cleared himself; nevertheless, he does not lose those which he possesses, because he ought not to be condemned unheard. Merchants, especially those dealing in base wares, were formerly prohibited. I have shown elsewhere that this is to be approved in part but not universally, for wealthy and honorable merchants govern many great cities with praise.

§ 16. Gregory of Toulouse, book 47, chapter 10, of the Syntagma, teaches that this is nevertheless greatly to be lamented: men who have gathered money through interest, frauds, and circumventions purchase the offices of states and dignities, from which, again accustomed to profit, they conduct business to the wretched loss of their subjects. If the ancient Romans had admitted this, they would not marvel so greatly that Varro ascended from his father's butcher-shop to the Consulship and obtained the twelve fasces and the Dictatorship by the most sordid bribery; that Titius Aufidius, formerly a publican of a small part of Asia, afterwards obtained the proconsular dignity of Asia with command; and that Publius Rutilius, who had formerly given service to the publicans in Sicily, when made Consul gave laws to all the Sicilians.

The chief condition of a Judge is that he be skilled in the causes which he judges; I have spoken of this knowledge in book 4. Another condition has been disputed in various laws: that no one should hold a Magistracy or judge in the province in which he was born. The Roman laws concerning this are not consonant with their own state, since at Rome only Romans judged. At one time the same thing seemed good to the French, so that Philip the Fair and Charles V carried a law concerning foreign Judges. It is also said to be customary in the kingdom of Castile; concerning the cities of Italy I have spoken above. Nevertheless, I think good men should be preferred; otherwise Kings and Princes would adopt foreigners for the same reasons--something which God condemned in his own state when he forbade the appointment of a King who was not a brother.

§ 17. The most learned Jurisconsult of Toulouse described the system of Judges in France in book 47, chapter 33, in the following manner. In France, because the idiom of speech is different and the manner of governing the state is different, we do not employ Governors of provinces altogether after the example of the Romans, although in part we agree with the Romans. In it jurisdictions and powers are distinguished according to the nod and will of the Prince. Especially in time of war there are Governors of provinces, whom we call Gouverneurs du pays: such is our Governor of the Tectosages, another of Aquitaine, of Picardy, and the like, who exist in place of Proconsuls. Certain men also, with delegated royal power, are Vicars of the King, whom they also call Viceroys, whose power can be compared with that of Praetorian Prefects. Yet I do not deny that Governors or Rulers also act in the King's stead in military causes and in the provinces committed to them. Their authority was once great: for they granted pardon and abolition of crimes; ennobled fairs and markets; legitimated persons, or restored them to the rights of birth; and called causes away from ordinary Judges to themselves. All these powers were afterwards taken away and restored to royal power alone by an edict of Louis XII. Today the Governor of Dauphiné grants all offices and can do many things, excepting offices of the Supreme Court of Parlement and indulgences or pardons for crimes.

Those who think that the King's Lieutenant-General, whom we call Lieutenant general pour sa Majesté, is so called because he is like the Proconsuls are mistaken. For this man, who acts in the King's stead throughout all the provinces of France, would better be called Master of the Soldiers, such as existed under a Dictator; or Praetorian Prefect under the Emperors; or, in the time of the ancient Kings of the Franks, Meier or Mayor of the Palace: by his authority the whole military operation would be governed; in that power he would be second after the King and greater than the Proconsuls and Governors or Presidents of provinces. Certainly this office too is scarcely granted, nor ought it to be granted, to anyone other than the Prince's brother or son, or to him who has been designated successor to the government. For there is danger lest the man invested with this dignity, enticed by the sweetness of ruling and seeing himself now armed with every military force, should seize the sovereignty of him whose vicariate he administers. At least so it happened formerly, when the Meieri and Mayors of the Palace of France usurped the government.

This Lieutenant-General of the King is therefore the greater man; he also has under him other Polemarchs of France, whom they call Maréchaux, the first syllables of Polemarch having been cut away. The Governors of provinces are also subject to him, and they have others under themselves, such as Toparchs, that is, Governors of definite places. These were sometimes added contrary to custom before the Senarchies and Bailiwicks, and sometimes Governors are added to a Seneschal and to a Seneschalry, and govern according to the Prince's will. But the Senarchs are lawful Toparchs and are older there than the particular, supplementary Governors. For the Senarchs are, as it were, the proper and natural Governors of places, to be counted not only among Governors in military cloak but also among Governors in the toga. Thus even Philip VI, surnamed Valois, called them Governors of provinces in a constitution of the year 1344, when he said that, during the hearing of appeals on the ordinary days of their Seneschalry, they ought to be present in the Parlement--"so that," he says, "their conduct, life, and morals may be manifest, and how worthily the provinces delivered under their governance are governed by them," and so forth.

For they govern those committed to them by military operation and jurisdiction. In time of war they are the commanders of the nobles of their Toparchy, and the ban and arrière-ban fight under them alone as commanders, according to the Constitution of Henry II of 9 February 1547, article 3--provided that the Toparchs themselves are fit to govern and lead the soldiery. For when they are unfit, one man is selected from the nobles of the Toparchy by decree of the Governor of the province, if there is a Governor; if there is not, he is selected through a man delegated for that cause by the Prince in place of the Seneschal, to lead the ranks in time of military service for the Toparchy. For that reason I once saw at Cahors an assuredly vigorous Toparch or Senescharch complain because a particular Prefect had been made Governor by the Prince in his own Toparchy, as though he thought this a dishonor to himself. The grounds of that controversy even divided the citizens into various opinions and hostilities, so that I fear something more serious later arose from it.

Senarchia or Senescharchia, which by the common name we call a Seneschalry and Bailiwick--and hence Seneschal and Bailli, for Toparch and Prefect--derive their inflection from a single meaning. For Senarchia seems to be named from a compound of the Latin and Greek words senum and ἀρχία, "rule of the elders"; and the Senarchus or Senesarchus is the man placed over this council of elders. Or, if we prefer the whole compound to consist of Greek words, we shall say Cenarchia from the Greek κοινὸν καὶ ἀρχία, that is, "common rule," as Perionius observed, and the Cenarchus will be called the prince of that administration. Seneschalcia can be said to come from the German idiom, from the words Seken and Schalk: the investigation and inquiry into, or censure of, a most wicked and crafty man, because in that seat judicial proceedings chiefly concern unjust men. Some also say that the old word Sen means justice and scalcus a prefect, and say that senescalci, prefects of justice, come from this; but Lupinus says that this is conjecture. It is also called a Bailliva, as if βουλή, that is, "council."

[Printed page 586]

For the Prince did not wish to entrust distinguished cities altogether to Toparchs alone without a council of prudent men to sit beside them, just as Severus, according to Spartian in his life, added an order of Decurions to the Juridicus of Alexandria. These Juridici certainly cannot be called Presidents of a province, because they are neither placed over one province nor is there only one Seneschal in the same province: in Aquitaine there are several among the Tectosages and several elsewhere likewise. Nor does the power of a President belong to them, for an appeal is made from them but by no means from Presidents. There also survives a constitution of Charles VI, surnamed the Pious, of the year of the Lord 1138, by which names other than the common ones and that of Provost are prohibited. For thus it provides: "We have willed that the governance of no Seneschalry, Bailiwick, or other judicature be administered under any name other than Seneschal, Bailli, or Provost, just as it was granted in ancient times." Thus in France provinces have also been divided into these prefectures of places, so that both civil and military matters might be governed more easily, just as Pliny, book 5, chapter 9, relates that the Thebaid in Asia was divided into prefectures of towns which they called nomes.

Proof is supplied by the fact that the original institution of the Senarchs required them to execute their office in person and not employ vicars or Subprefects except because of a grave and necessary absence, according to the Constitution of Charles VII, article 86, in the Constitution of Philip the Fair of 1302. They are also commanded by the Constitution of Charles VI of the year 1388 and by several other Constitutions to be continually present--or, as they say, resident--in the prefecture, just as the necessity of continual presence and residence during juridical days has been imposed on the other established superior and inferior courts dependent upon the Prince, and even upon Senators and Presidents of the Senate. There survives the Constitution of Francis I, Sur la residence des officiers, conseilliers, Presidens, Baillifs, and so forth; also the Constitution of the year 1539, article 129; that of Charles VIII, articles 3 and 77; of Charles VII, article 2; and of Louis XII, articles 23 and 25. Indeed, they cannot even be of the Prince's council so as to be absent while holding the prefecture, according to the Constitution of Charles VI of 1388.

The Senarchies sometimes have greater and lesser Judges, or Subprefects, if the tract of jurisdiction is somewhat wider and the place populous; they call them Lieutenans et sieges de Seneschaux. But the Subprefects are instituted and appointed by the Prince, not by the Senescharch, and are made not delegated but ordinary Judges, although under the dominion and power of the same Senescharch. Therefore their judgments are pronounced in the Senescharch's name, and business is transacted in the same name, although he does not judge in person. For the Judges added to him perform the work in this respect, while he by the royal name and power confirms and protects the judgments and orders them to be carried into execution. Therefore Louis XII, in article 48 of his constitution, determined that no one should be placed over the governance of the Prefecture or Subprefecture of the judgments of a Senarchry unless he had obtained the degree of Prolyta or licentiate, or a doctorate, in some famous university.

It was at one time prohibited by Philip the Fair and by Charles V that anyone should become Juridicus in his own native country, as formerly among the Romans in the final law of the Code, On the Office of the Governor of a Province. There are also Constitutions of the Kings which establish the qualification of persons to be appointed and their examination, as well as that of other officials, such as the constitution of Henry II in the years 1547 and 1548. I also omit--perhaps because it has passed out of use--the constitution which forbids the trafficking in or purchase of offices of any greater or lesser court, that of King Charles VIII, article 68, published in the year 1463, with which another of Louis XII, article 40, agrees.

Concerning these courts, Senarchs, and their courts, I think it is sufficiently clear from the common constitutions of the Kings that their competence embraces the affairs of the King's domain; lawsuits of nobles; the appointment of tutors or curators; the preservation or care of sacred buildings, that they be kept sound and whole; and the examination of privileged crimes, if the matter concerns injured or diminished majesty, public faith violated, armed force, investiture of fiefs to be delivered by vassals to the King, and the execution of obligations made under the binding force of a particular seal according to custom. They also make proclamations of arms, except in the lands of Barons and of others possessing this jurisdiction. They determine concerning the repair of bridges, roads, and walls if the proper Magistrates are negligent; concerning complaints over ecclesiastical benefices; and concerning matters of lordship, which formerly were handled in the Parlements at the first action or first instance, as Imbertus says in book 1 of the Forensic Institutes, section porro, and which they still handle now. They also take cognizance of other matters whose jurisdiction has been granted to them, concerning which the practice and the constitutions of the aforesaid Kings sufficiently admonish us, together with that of Francis V of 16 April 1537, articles 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and so forth.

Before Senescharchs obtain possession of the prefecture, they are compelled in the Supreme Court of Parlement--from their judgments appeal lies to it--to swear in the prescribed words of this oath established concerning their administration: that they will preserve the right of the King and of the Domain; render to each his own without distinction of persons; accept neither gifts nor presents, nor even hospitality or food, from those committed to them; not permit their wives, servants, or companions to accept them; not burden their subjects; and take care that their own Judges do the same. Therefore, while on fixed days of the year the causes of ordinary appeal from each Senarchry are argued in the Parlement to which appeal lies from them, each Toparch must be present in the courtroom in the causes of his own Bailiwick, ready to render an account of his acts if there is need; to admonish and instruct the royal officers there about the rights of the King and of the Domain of his Senarchry and about abuses of royal officials; to take care that the records of business transacted and of matters pursued by appeal from his Toparchy be brought forward; and to perform other similar things prescribed by Charles VI in the year 1388 and Charles VII in 1453.

The Senarchries did not at one time possess a perpetual office or perpetual administration, nor were their Juridici always permanent, just as the other officials in France were not. Therefore, while holding the administration or office, it was not lawful for them--as is clear from the constitutions of the aforesaid recent Kings and others--to buy, contract, marry a wife, or obtain an ecclesiastical benefice without the Prince's permission; to have or procure anything for themselves or their people, following the example of those who administered Roman provinces or provincial offices; or to borrow more than twenty pounds. Their juridical assemblies were not fixed as now, but were proclaimed throughout the Toparchy in the more distinguished places; they called them Assises, that is, Sessions, whence Sieges. Thus, following the example of Roman Magistrates, by the Constitution of Charles VI, after laying down the administration of a Senarchry and judicature, they were bound to remain in the Senarchry for fifty days, so that they might stand trial and answer before their successors to bills, petitions, and complaints lodged against them, which were to be judged summarily and without formal pleading.

Moreover, just as the cognizances of the Senarchs are subjected on appeal to examination by the Supreme Court, so there are also certain ordinary Judges from whom an appeal is brought to the Senarchry. For this reason each Senarchry knows its own boundaries. Along with these, in certain cities, there are Vicars whom at Toulouse and elsewhere we call Viguerios, whose jurisdiction, having once been suppressed, revived. In certain places the Viguerius holds concurrent jurisdiction with the Decurions and the Seneschal; he is nevertheless an ordinary Judge of the smallest causes and the smallest crimes. How ridiculously they have erred who think that Viguerii are so called as if they were Vergobreti! For the Vergobretus, according to Julius Caesar, was greater and possessed almost royal authority among the Aedui, from which the Viguerius is very far removed. However greatly the Viguerii enlarge their phylacteries, I think they are so called either from the compound expression Vices gerens, just as in the common idiom we say Vichancelier, Viroy, and Vigerand for Vice-Chancellor, Vicar of the King, and one acting in another's stead; and that Viguerius should be taken for Vicar of the Seneschal. Thus I am admonished by the constitution of Philip IV, called the Fair, of the year 1302, when it says: "We further will and ordain that no Seneschal, Bailli, or Judge whatsoever shall have a Provost, Viguerius, or Judge bound to him by a bond of consanguinity, affinity, or nature, lest the aforesaid persons judge less faithfully in causes which ought to come to them by appeals."

[Printed page 587]

In some places those Viguerii say that they are adorned with the custody of citadels, whence those in the places of citadels are called Guardians, Castellans, and sometimes Keepers of the Seal and Provosts, Prevosts. Therefore their jurisdiction must be distinguished according to the nature defined by the Kings and Seneschals. For the most part they take cognizance of the tutorships of those who are not nobles; of suspect tutors and curators; of the dissipation of the food supply; of abuses by innkeepers, hosts, bakers, butchers, apothecaries, retailers, and merchants within the city or their jurisdiction; of agreements and obligations transacted under the binding force of a particular seal; and of other crimes of injuries and invasions, unless a contrary jurisdiction or custom prohibits it. I have elsewhere admonished that custom must be considered in forensic power, lest they transgress the boundaries which their fathers and forebears established and observed.

In most recent times Subprefects in military cloak have also been added to the Senarchs; in some places they call them Lieutenans de Seneschaux de robbe courte. They conduct the apprehension and trials of marauding brigands. Such were the Provosts of the Marshals or Subprefects, but they were called by the name Vice-Seneschals, Viceseneschaux, properly Brigand-catchers. Thus, as times changed, the King's nod and judgment, according to the need of provincials, changed the names of things and increased or diminished the jurisdictions of Prefects. And so in place of the Governors of provinces permanent Senarchs were made; their Judges in the toga were increased; and permanent βῆλαι, or Councils, were established, as were fixed offices of Judges, conferred with a title by the Prince upon men who would judge in place of the Senarchs themselves and receive fees, armed force having been granted to the Senarchs. Prerogatives were also added to those councils: jurisdictions over all civil matters except the Prince's domain affairs concerning his waters and forests; deciding finally, without appeal, matters of two hundred and fifty Tours pounds and of five hundred, whose execution they could pursue notwithstanding an appeal, yet without prejudice to it, as is contained in the Constitution of Henry II of March 1551, where their origin is treated.

At one time--τῶν stands here in the print--the highest extent of their jurisdiction was enlarged, when first a new Magistrate was created, called the Presiding President: namely, the first Magistrate in that Toparchical council, who was to preside over the Presidents or Judges introduced there--not, indeed, over the province, for that is utterly false, and under this false pretext certain men rashly arrogate to themselves the name and purple of President of a Province. Nor does the King call them Presidents of a Province, but Presidents and Presidial Judges. For the Presidial Judges, that is, Judges and Councillors, are and were formerly so called who presided over the other seats of the Seneschalry. Nearly every Seneschalry has two or more benches of the same Senarch in different places, but one seat was selected before and above the others to preside over the others by deciding their appeals. Hence those constituted in that seat, which is chief among the others, were called Presidial Judges insofar as they judge the appeals from inferior seats. The same men are also called ordinary Judges insofar as, in the first action and outside the cause of the edict by which appeal is prohibited, they judge those subject to themselves and to their jurisdiction. Therefore the same Judges are called both ordinary in causes outside the edict and Presidial and Superior in causes permitted to this jurisdiction by the edict.

Consequently the Presiding President is appointed there, not to preside over a province--for neither the Presidial Judges themselves nor the Seneschals possess a province, but a part of a province or a diocese--but rather to preside over the Presidial Judges and, in the Seneschal's absence, to oversee the court committed to him, so that all things are duly done by the Judges according to law. The Senarch, as his Vicar, precedes him in honor. But the President of a province among the Romans had no superior in his province and was first after the Prince. That this man ought to preside over and judge the greater Judge is sufficiently indicated by the name and office. Although I have seen controversies concerning this matter, this is the more just opinion, free from partiality. Nor is it equitable that he who is constituted head of the council should follow a member subject to him, although the wretched ambition of certain Magistrates of this age resists it.

Thus, when the court was augmented by the new Magistrate and the Senarch was in a certain manner consulted, the Presidial jurisdiction grew in the matters which Rebuffus reports in the first volume of the Royal Constitutions, title 12, article 11. Nevertheless, because it afterwards seemed greatly diminished, the authority of the Senates then returned to its origin through the edict of Charles IX held at Moulins in 1566, article 15, and at Paris in March 1568. There were men who thought this office and this excessive jurisdiction superfluous, where so many--namely seven--Supreme Courts of Parlement exist; for the multiplication of Magistrates seems, as they say, to furnish an occasion for litigation. Men who in ordinary proceedings and first actions are compelled to grow old amid pettifoggers and baser business can scarcely become accustomed to Senatorial gravity.

I shall not linger over these matters, however. For at the assemblies at Orléans and Blois and elsewhere the Prince heard his subjects' petitions on this matter; he will determine, I think, what appears conducive to the state and to the safety of the people committed to him by God, and will spare the treasury, which is nearly exhausted by so many salaries of duplicated offices. For he knows that the state is better governed by a few good men than by many bad men, of whom perhaps the greater part studies its own gain rather than the safety of the state. He understands that the forum ought to be treated so sacredly, as the seat of justice and of God, that plunder should not be sought from the place where plunderers and brigands are to receive the punishment due to their crimes. But thus far these things have been said concerning the provincial Magistrates of France. I omit many things concerning Dukes, Marquises, Counts, Barons, Castellans, and other Juridical Lords of places, because we have already spoken of them in the treatment of fiefs in book 6 of this Syntagma, chapters 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11.

§ 18. There are judgments and men who preside over them which, though variously different, are not dissimilar to the Roman ones. Hence there are Baillis, Castellans, Provosts, auditors of the Châtelet, Presidial Courts, Judges and Consuls of merchants, Inquisitors, Mayors, Schöffen, Secretaries of mandates, and Secretaries of the House of France or of the Chancery. Golden is the constitution of the Novel concerning Judges to be created without payment for influence, which instructs all states in such a way that, if any follows it, it will have made the best provision for itself concerning justice. Many have desired this; few have accomplished it. But let us hear the Novel, Novel 8, Collection 2, title 2, in the preface:

"The thought has therefore occurred to us that by a single common act we should move all those who administer all things in our provinces toward better things. For we believe that this will altogether come to pass if we take care that Governors of peoples--whoever hold the civil administrations of provinces--use clean hands and abstain from every taking, content for these things with those payments alone which are given them by the treasury. This will not happen otherwise unless they themselves also receive their belts without payment, giving absolutely nothing, either on the occasion of payments for influence, or to those who possess the belts, or to anyone else whatsoever.

[Printed page 588]

"For we have considered that, although an excessive source of gain is diminished for the government, nevertheless our subjects will receive the greatest increase if they are preserved unharmed by the Judges; and the government and treasury, enjoying wealthy subjects, will abound. With this one order introduced, there will be a manifold and innumerable abundance of things. Or is it not assuredly manifest to all that the man who gives gold and thus buys an administration does not give only the amount contrived on the occasion of payments for influence, but adds more besides on the occasion of the advantage of the administration, either to those giving it or to those promising it? And so, after one unlawful payment has been given, it is necessary for many hands to surround the man who makes the gift; and perhaps he furnishes this not from his own property but from borrowed money, and, so that he may be able to borrow, suffers loss. He calculates with himself that it is fitting for him to receive from the province so much as will free him from the principal owed, the interest, and the losses incurred for the loan itself. He will also calculate among these things the more lavish expenses suitable both to a Judge and to those about him; and he will also store up for himself a certain profit for the time following, in which perhaps he will not administer.

"Wherefore what is exacted from our subjects will be three times what was given by him--or rather, if the truth must be stated, ten times. From this the treasury too is diminished. For the man who holds the administration, converting to his own advantage the things which ought to have been brought into the treasury by an administration using clean hands, and making the contributor poor for us, charges to us the poverty which is effected through him. And how many impious things of this kind are done because of the opportunity afforded by these thefts! Those holding provincial administrations, looking to this taking, release many guilty men by selling their offense to them; but they condemn many innocent men in order to favor the guilty. This is done not only in pecuniary causes but also in criminal ones, where a life is endangered. Flights therefore occur from the provinces, and all men stream hither groaning--priests, Curials, officials, possessors, peoples, and farmers--justly accusing the thefts and injustices of the Judges. Nor are only these things done: seditions of cities and public disturbances very frequently arise from the cause of money and are quieted by money. Altogether, this one thing is a certain cause of all evils: to accept a payment for influence from Judges is the beginning and end of every wickedness.

"There is also that admirable and true saying of the sacred utterances, that avarice is the mother of all evils, especially when it inheres not in the souls of private men but of Judges. For who will not steal without danger? Who will not commit robbery without liability, while looking to the administration? For seeing that man selling all things for gold and presuming that whatever unlawful thing he does he will redeem by giving money, men think that murder, adultery, invasions, wounds, the rape of virgins, the confusion of commerce, and contempt for the laws and Judges--all these things--have been offered for sale like some cheap slaves. Nor are we sufficient to consider and expound how many terrible evils arise from the theft of provincial Judges, since no one presumes to convict them with confidence, when they openly declare that they have bought their belts," and so forth.

"Considering all these things among ourselves, taking here also as a partner in counsel our most reverend consort, given to us by God, and communicating the cause to your Highness, and also receiving certain things from your counsel, we have come to this sacred law. By it we ordain that neither any proconsular administration, nor the vicariate hitherto vacant, nor the Countship of the East, nor any other administration whatsoever--neither proconsular nor presidential, which they call consular and corrective--of which the schedule annexed to this our sacred law expressly makes mention, and which alone we determine to place under this law, shall give any payment for influence or any gift for an administration to any Judge, to any of those about the administration, or to another on the occasion of patronage; but that they shall indeed receive administrations gratis, while furnishing only a little on the occasion of those things which are given for the belts and papers. For we have also annexed to this our sacred law a schedule declaring what it belongs to each of our administrations to furnish in our sacred register or in the forum of your Highness on the occasion of codicils or commands, whereby that amount also has been reduced, lest it inflict the greatest loss upon him."

§ 19. Justinian said that lawsuits must be decided within three years (chapter 3, title 1, On Judgments): "It has seemed good to us, lest lawsuits become almost immortal and exceed the measure of human lives--since our law has already concluded criminal causes within two years, while pecuniary causes are more frequent and they themselves are often known to furnish material for crimes--to establish the present law concerning these matters throughout the whole world, to be confined by no narrowness of places or times. We therefore decree that all lawsuits brought concerning money, of whatever quantity--whether concerning conditions, the right of cities or private persons, possession or ownership, mortgage, servitudes, or certain other causes for which men must litigate with one another, excepting only causes which belong to fiscal law or concern public functions--shall not be drawn beyond the bounds of three years after joinder of issue.

"Rather, all Judges, whether in this nurturing city or in the provinces they administer a greater or lesser administration, whether placed in Magistracies, given from our court, or delegated by our nobles, are not to be permitted to extend lawsuits beyond the space of three years. No one is ignorant that this is especially within judicial power. For if Judges themselves are unwilling, no one is found so audacious as to be able to prolong a lawsuit against the Judge's will.

"If the plaintiff's party has been inactive so that the defendant may be wearied by repeated delay, and the bounds of three years after joinder of issue are already approaching their end, so that only six months remain to him, the Judge shall have license to seek the plaintiff through the officers of the matter, with the one party fleeing, the other party charging the plaintiff with absence, and the Judges by every means opening their ears to questions of this kind. If this has followed three times, a period of ten days having been appointed for each appearance, and thus the plaintiff's party has not been found and has arrived neither in person nor through an instructed procurator, then we decree that the Judge inspect the acts of the case completed before him. If nothing sufficient has been transacted from which a conjecture concerning the determination of a certain cause can be made, we will not only that the fleeing party be released from observance of the trial, but also that the plaintiff be condemned in all expenses customarily expended upon lawsuits, their true quantity to be manifested by the oath of the fleeing party, and that every security which he furnished in writing be returned; and if it remains, it shall be deprived of force.

"But if, from the records which he has before him, although the plaintiff's party has by no means been found, the Judge can discover a way by which it becomes manifest to him what must be determined, and if he has perceived that the plaintiff possesses the better cause, let him not delay to pronounce sentence for him even though he is absent, and to condemn the defendant who is present in favor of the plaintiff who is absent. Only the expenses of the suit which the defendant shall swear that he lawfully expended are to be excepted from the condemnation, because we impose this penalty upon the plaintiff, even one possessing the better cause, because of the contumacy of his absence alone, preserving absolutely no return for him to the same lawsuit. But let a contumacious plaintiff fall altogether from the lawsuit if the defendant is acquitted.

[Printed page 589]

"But if a condemnation is pronounced against the defendant for the absent plaintiff which the fugitive plaintiff perhaps thinks insufficient for himself, we in no way permit him to revive the same lawsuit, and let this penalty be imposed upon the plaintiff. But if the defendant has been absent and a similar search for him has proceeded, just as we said concerning the person of the plaintiff, even in his absence let judgment by default be undertaken. Let the Judge, according to what was provided by the ancient laws, investigate the cause from the one party with all exactness; and if the defendant is found liable, let him not cease to pronounce condemnation even against the absent man. Let it be carried into effect, and let satisfaction be made to the victor from the property and resources of the fugitive, whether the Judge himself can do this by his jurisdiction or the matter is referred by a report to a higher Judge, and from him a lawful route is opened against the property of the contumacious man. No license to contradict is to be granted to him or to another who puts forward only his person, when the plaintiff is sent into possession of this kind on account of the cause. Nor, if he himself returns and wishes to give sureties and recover possession, is he to be heard; for in cases of this kind we exclude every contradiction from him."

But now everywhere among the nations lawsuits live much longer. Accordingly, by common consent so many Judges must be appointed that all old lawsuits may be concluded once for all and new ones quickly decided; for now many litigate because they hope that they will leave their lawsuit surviving them.

§ 20. It is of the highest importance that an examination of matters adjudged be instituted; it was customary formerly. They were called Examiners. Those men possessed an almost excessive power and the greatest license for sinning. They were sent into the provinces so that, under whatever title, they might exact and administer matters pertaining to the treasury and make up accounts. The law indeed says, "As often as," chapter 10, title 30: "If in a dispute it is established that a false examination was completed, and the Examiner shall not be able to prove the truth of the act, let him himself immediately be compelled to pay under the same title and in the same manner in which he wrongly made another a debtor. Given on the day before the Ides of March, Valentinian, Most Noble Boy, and Victor being Consuls."

Yet by law 4 under the same title he can give security to all: "Let no one be made an Examiner otherwise than by a command of the Prince which makes special mention of an Examiner--not by command of the Prefects, not by instruction of any other Judge; not of civil works or of monies assigned for purchasing grain; not of harbors or of those monies expended upon the construction of aqueducts and walls, the paving of roads, or the building of bridges and embankments; nor of monies assigned to baths or pertaining in any other manner to the civil account. But if the Prince has either sent monies from the treasury for construction of walls or another work, or has found monies left to cities by another, let him once or even more often, when it pleases him, send an Examiner who shall measure the work, calculate the accounts exactly, and report back to him, so that if the expenditures have certainly been made, a sacred security may be drawn up for those who made them, by whose protection neither they nor their heirs or possessors of their goods may afterwards suffer any inquiry. Let a security issued by the Examiner after examination of the accounts be valid and stand in need neither of a sacred receipt nor of any other security whatsoever." Thus full faith is placed in the Examiner, wherefore he can be delegated by no Governor, but by the Emperor alone.

§ 21. The insignia of Judges--or, as they were called in the Greek Empire, τῶν δικαιοδοτῶν--was the δικανίκιον, a silver-gilt rod, or also ξύλον λεῖον, smooth and polished wood. It was an ancient custom that not only σκηπτοῦχοι, scepter-bearers, were βασιλεῖς, kings, but that δικασπόλοι, ministers of justice, were also Judges; and thus even the Centumvirs conducted judgments after the spear had been set up.

CHAPTER XXIII

The Judgments and Tribunals of Other States

§ 1. Not only the location of the Roman Empire but also very many of its laws have been changed, for the most part for the better; for different times of the ancients require different laws, as was said above concerning laws. In the year of Christ 1495 the Imperial Chamber Court, which was to judge in the Emperor's sacred stead, was established at Worms. Thus the constitution provides. First, the Chamber Court is constituted with a Supreme Judge, who is to be an Ecclesiastical or Secular Prince, or a Count or Baron. Sixteen Judges are to be joined to him; they are afterwards also called Assessors. They are to be chosen from the German nation, from the Empire itself; half of them is to be learned and adorned with academic honors, and half from the Nobility, all furnished with upright and honorable morals and with knowledge. All causes are committed to their judgment; if the votes are equal, the opinion of the Supreme Judge possesses the prerogative. If it happens that the Judge is absent, he will establish in his place a Count or Baron from among the Judges, with the consent of the others.

New men are chosen in place of Assessors in an assembly of the Princes. In place of the Judge, a successor is given by the Emperor; and until the next Diet, if the Emperor is farther away, the Judges themselves appoint someone from among themselves to perform his functions until someone is appointed in the public assembly.

But for some time that tribunal ceased. For in the year 1500 it was restored again, and it was decreed that it should be held at Nuremberg. This too was decreed: that another Count or Baron should be joined to Count Bernard of Eberstein, so that there might be someone able to preside in causes of Princes when the Judge was absent or ill. At the same time it was provided that the opinion of eight Assessors and of the Judge should be valid. Indeed, this too was prudently added to avoid suspicions: that the Assessors should have no procurator, orator, or solicitor in their own home and that no Assessor should be in the company of such men.

So that there could be no complaint in the election, in the year 1507 the Emperor appointed two Assessors, each of the six Electors one, and the six Circles eight: so it was decreed at the Diet of Constance, at which new Assessors were also elected.

At Worms in the year 1521 Charles V added two to these, so that there were now eighteen Assessors. At the same time he also established a visitation every year. Other things were added in 1523. Then in 1527 abuses were removed. In 1532 the Reformation was confirmed and amended, and the order of visitation established. At the same time it was instituted that pronounced sentences should be examined and the Judges judged. The visitation of the year 1533 was especially famous; in it many abuses were corrected and many things excellently established. In the following years several difficulties then arose because of disagreements among the religions. The matter was treated in the year 1544, but, because the Estates disagreed, it again occupied the year 1546. In 1551 ten Extraordinary Assessors had by law been added for concluding old lawsuits; they were to judge for two years, or even three if the multitude of lawsuits required it. Their appointment was confirmed for another two years. In the year 1557 sixteen Extraordinary Assessors were again appointed.

[Printed page 590]

In 1566 many grievances were removed; but because of the multitude of causes, in the same year another eighteen Ordinary Assessors were joined to the twenty-four Ordinary Assessors, so that there were forty-two in all. In the year 1570 another six new Assessors were added, and this for six years; the Emperor also decreed that another Count or Baron should be added, so that there were then forty-eight Assessors, not counting the Count.

No less a change in matters and in the manner of proceeding was made in that tribunal. For by individual Diets and visitations, through long experience and practice, the matter has now come to such a point that it seems nothing can be added, except that a multitude of the most ancient lawsuits remains undecided and the execution of judgments is impeded by the power of the parties. Against these difficulties many excellent provisions were made in the year 1600. And thus much concerning the Judicial Magistracy which is in Germany; in its judgments it uses edicts in the Emperor's name and with his seal. If anyone also considers the offices, order, and laws of the Advocates, Procurators, and others, he will necessarily confess that in no kingdom was there ever so perfect a system of judgments. But, as I said, execution of judgments is suspended when powerful men are concerned.

§ 2. Yet this form of the Imperial Court and of its Assessors is not without an ancient precedent; indeed, not even the Greeks lacked it. Aristotle in book 2 of the Politics: λαμβάνουσι δὲ καὶ παρέδρους ὅ τε ἄρχων, καὶ πολέμαρχος δύο ἑκάτερος οὓς ἂν βούλωνται. "Both the Archon and the Polemarch also take Assessors, two each, whomever they wish." The nation of the Getae, a very remote people of Barbarians, joined to its King a Counsellor and Assessor in judging, whom on account of his dignity they were accustomed to call θεόν, "god," as Strabo testifies. Dio, in Augustus, calls them συνέδρους, fellow-sitters: Τὰ μὲν ἄλλα αὐτὸς μετὰ τῶν συνέδρων διεσκέψατο, καὶ ἐδίκαζεν ἐν τῷ παλατίῳ ἐπὶ βήματος προκαθήμενος. "Other matters he himself considered with the Assessors, and he judged in the Palace while seated in front upon a tribunal." Tiberius was accustomed to join himself as a Counsellor to those judging; he sat beside the principal Judge, either indiscriminately among the others or opposite him. Hence, in celebrity of name and honor among posterity, Assessors surpassed even the Emperors themselves. Ulpian, Alexander's Assessor, as Eutropius says in book 8, still holds the primacy in law. Marcus Scaevola gave law to nations by intellect and prudence, as Capitolinus relates. Commodus most prudently established on the advice of Pescennius Niger that those who had served as Assessors in provinces should administer in those same provinces. For formerly, although there were Assessors of Proconsuls and Legates, they did not readily succeed them.

Formerly πάρεδροι τοῖς νεωτέροις, "Assessors for the younger men," were indeed given; but it was most excellently established that they should afterwards be given to all. They were selected from the most experienced and most approved Advocates. Cassiodorus gives the reason in epistle 12 of book 8: "It is fitting that those to whom power is entrusted should have most learned advisers. The field of Advocacy exercised you; the summit of our judgment chose you. Since you see yourself joined to the counsel of him who treats the secret of our Empire, hence we adorn you with the illustrious honor of Count of the Domestics."

Yet it must not be denied that many things in the ancient Assessors were different from those now in use. For they received salaries from the Magistrates beside whom they sat. Code, book 1, title 51: "The labor of studies deserves that those who, established in public administrations, desire that sharers of their counsels be associated with them should summon by the hope of rewards and honor--and with knowledge itself as license--those whose prudence they think necessary to themselves, not by fearsome compulsion, a necessity unsuitable for liberty."

Alexander, however, established salaries for them from public funds, frequently employing that golden saying: "Those men are to be promoted to the state who can administer the state by themselves, not through Assessors." So Spartianus in Alexander Severus. Assessors could not subscribe petitions. For Constantine punishes with exile an Assessor who subscribes, chapter 1 of the title On Assessors. If they were able to unite anything by lawful and honorable gains, they can claim it even after the death of their father as though it were a military peculium.

The highest Jurisprudence was required in an Assessor. For this reason lack of prudence is imputed to the Assessor, not to the Magistrate beside whom he sits: law 2 of What Each Man.

§ 3. Among the Turks the system of judgments is swift and expeditious rather than consistently just. Their Supreme Priest, the Caldelescher, judges causes; they generally have as this man one grave in age and, according to the measure of Barbarism, knowledgeable in law. From him an appeal is granted to the Mufti, who also seeks the opinion of the Cadi in doubtful matters. But since they possess few laws, in most controversies they judge according to their own judgment and inclination. For in so enormous an Empire they rarely judge rightly. Nowhere is victory ready without gifts. At Thebes, indeed, they placed statues of Judges without hands, so that it might be shown that they ought to be strangers to receiving gifts; but Turkish Judges have hands in the purses of the litigants of every party, unless greater fear recalls them from crime. How much holier are the Roman laws, which have not only poor Judges and Magistrates but a wealthy state, as Salvian says in book 1 of On the Government of God. Cato would not permit even his servants to accept gifts from King Deiotarus. See also Commines, book 6, chapter 2, concerning those who receive largesses.

Hence there arises for a Prince the calamitous oppression of the poor--indeed, of the entire state. For those who afflict the poor possess such power, especially if they conspire, that they cannot be punished without a convulsion of the state. But if they escape for a time, deferred penalties are nevertheless portents of greater punishments, as Tzetzes rightly says upon Hesiod.

§ 4. Bellus, in Discourse 23, thinks that the public system of judgment in Britain is less rightly constituted: "It is not to be wondered at," he says, "that they regard only the advantage of the Prince, while the good of the subjects seems abandoned, and that they are full of chicaneries and ambiguities and are contrary to themselves. For they were devised and sanctioned by the Normans, than whom no nation more litigious and more deceitful in devising and prolonging controversies can be found. These laws are inviolably and rigidly observed in those courts and are publicly lectured upon in the schools of London in the Norman language. In that language, until a few years ago, lawsuits were argued and all judicial acts and public instruments were written; and, what will seem strange, the degree of Doctor is conferred in that Faculty, just as in Italy and other states it is customary to confer the degree in Civil and Canon Law.

"If narrowness of time permitted, I could relate certain diversities and truly notable abuses which are frequent in the form of judgments, especially in those judgments which are called Inquests, in which great inconveniences follow in civil as well as criminal matters. This judgment consists of twelve men who are assembled by the Judge so that he may seek their opinion concerning the matter in controversy, and it is necessary that all agree; otherwise the Judge cannot proceed to sentence. But lest I occasion weariness, I pass over this entire argument, adding only that throughout the whole kingdom and in all consultations the royal will alone is regarded, since the Kings are absolute lords and Monarchs.

[Printed page 591]

"Accordingly, lest they seem to be alone in governing--or because of idleness and greater convenience, or because of pride and pomp, after the fashion of the Turkish Empire--they have introduced a council of the chief officers and ministers. These men are assembled after the fashion of Pashas and follow the Prince everywhere; for this purpose they have both a table and their own lodging at court, a splendid household, and great dignity. They diminish the King's labors, since most subjects and public ministers, and also the Ambassadors of Princes, have recourse to them. Thus they can be called the Prince's ears and person, since throughout the whole kingdom they exercise power and command over the ministers, whom they treat with great authority, while the ministers in turn furnish obedience. In short, like the King, they themselves can command and decree whatever they please.

"Into a council of this kind, which is called the Royal Council, there are for the most part admitted three or four chief offices of the kingdom: that is, the Chancellor, Treasurer, the man whom they call the Brovizellus--Keeper of the Privy Seal--and the Admiral, besides the more eminent officers of the Court and Royal Household, such as the Steward, who is very like the Grand Master in France and the Mayor of the Palace at the Imperial court; all are for the most part Lords and noble and eminent men."

§ 5. Amid so great a diversity of judgments and so slippery a condition of causes, the cities of Italy prefer to entrust their fortunes to foreign inquisitors rather than be tossed about among the partialities of Judges who are relations and kinsmen. Thus a court which they call the Rota is established among them. It consists of three Jurisconsults of great learning and a great reputation for integrity and justice, whose native country is fifty miles distant from the city in which they are placed over the administration of law. The first is called the Podestà; it is his office to deliver to the Council his written opinion concerning a citizen. The Council possesses the final decision and either approval or correction of the opinion. Concerning foreigners, however, that Jurisconsult alone decides. The second Jurisconsult investigates and judges crimes, just as formerly the Praetor who conducted the inquiry concerning assassins. The third is the examiner of civil causes. Yet each does not possess his function perpetually, but at an interval of six months they exchange duties among themselves.

Every other year the Genoese also hire Jurisconsults for civil causes who are foreigners and who pronounce law from the written laws in the Palace; they dwell with the Doge himself. But although foreign Judges are without the partialities of kinship, it is nevertheless hard for a state to distrust its own citizens and to be unable to maintain justice without external assistance. Nor would I approve this: to commit the causes of foreigners to a Judge to whom you are unwilling to entrust the lawsuits of citizens. Why can the Podestà not determine concerning a citizen except with the Council's intervention and approval, while a foreigner, as a cheap life, has his life and fortunes liable to the judgment of one man? Yet law must be pronounced more swiftly and carefully for a foreigner, since his innocence has fewer aids of defense, while his offenses obtain neither intercessors nor ready pardon. Divine Mercy, by a special law, commends the care of strangers to all men.

§ 6. That it is most difficult to constitute and preserve tribunals rightly is taught even by this fact: not even among the Chinese, where the highest system of civil government is maintained according to the capacity of barbarians, could defects of judgments be avoided. "They lack many laws," says the writer concerning China; "in pronouncing law they follow the opinion of their own mind. In their own Provinces they carry new laws as they please, and these for the most part are alien to the laws of others." For one can conjecture even from this that this kingdom is not administered in the best manner: not everyone who has learned to write elegantly thereby possesses the prudence of a lawgiver. I pass over the fact that they often turn lawsuits to their own advantage, violate law, and seize what they can. Nothing is more frequent than gifts, nor is the sale of any man's property so open as the sale of favor. Although the crime of one is not unknown to another, they nevertheless conceal it among themselves, since they are participants in the same offenses. But when they strive most to be hidden, they most betray themselves.

There is a great multitude of Mandarins in all cities, but an almost immeasurable one in the royal city of Peking. For, to pass over the Mandarins placed over war, who are not of high station, the number of the others here is greater than anywhere else. Besides those who continually frequent these cities on account of business, the permanent Mandarins of this city are more than two thousand five hundred. All these men daily give attention to counsellors and litigants. But how great the concourse of causes is, or what each man's jurisdiction is, has not yet been sufficiently discovered by us.

Six of the chief Mandarins of the whole Kingdom dwell in this city; six, an equal number, preside over councils. The Supreme Mandarin is the man who either raises the Mandarins of the whole kingdom to higher Magistracies when they deserve it, or reduces them to the ranks and chastises them when they fail in their duty. On account of the amplitude of his power, the Chinese call him the Heavenly Mandarin. He reports to the King all the cases of men to be promoted to dignities or removed from them. The King so determines concerning each that even the least Mandarin of the whole Kingdom acknowledges his honor as received from the King. The second Mandarin has care of all rites, both human--such as those employed in all the King's affairs, in the public address of a new King and designation of a Prince, and in the marriage of each--and divine, such as those employed in funerals and in the sacrifices which Kings customarily make to heaven and earth.

§ 7. Therefore the Prince will apply himself to this care all the more earnestly, the more difficult it is to preserve the integrity of Tribunals sound, whole, and inviolate. Yet when this is neglected, it brings about changes of kingdoms. For a kingdom is transferred from nation to nation because of injustice.

I also admonish Judges, not in my own words but in those of a Bishop--if not Augustine, nevertheless an ancient and wise man. Thus he says in sermon 35 To the Brothers in the Wilderness:

"Having been asked by you, O Judges, though wearied by a long disputation with Fortunatus, presbyter of the Manichaeans, we have not delayed, conquered by your affection, to deliver a sermon with God's help. For behold, you are now assembled in the house of a Bishop; you have all come together as one, not to hear sophisms, not to understand the curiosities of Poets, not that I may proclaim you blessed, but only that you may hear what is necessary for your salvation and, hearing it, fulfill it in works. For you have been accounted by men leaders of the people, Judges of the earth, fathers of orphans, husbands of widows, zealots of justice, and lovers of the state. Beware, therefore, lest you be corrupted by hatred, love, payment, prayers, or fear.

"It is therefore fitting that Judges not only fulfill the things we have said, but with God's aid tread down pride, abominate luxury, abhor falsehood, and despise avarice, which is said to be the stepmother and greatest enemy of justice. For she it is who knows no father, ignores her mother, loses her friends, and abandons herself. It is therefore fitting that Judges pursue not avarice but liberality, love little children, and show a serene countenance to the lowly and to orphans, not only in word but in deed. For they ought not avert their face from the poor, nor should a superior disdain to preserve the faithful, nor ought they lift their neck in despising certain persons, knowing that the learned and the unlearned die alike.

"It is fitting, therefore, that Judges preserve with a solicitous mind the grace which they have divinely received, display fidelity, and preserve zeal for rectitude. It is also fitting that Judges be cultivators of clemency, detesters of cruelty, kind to all, slow to anger, swift to mercy, steadfast in adversity, humble and cautious in prosperity; and, to whatever dignities they have been raised, that they recognize themselves and take care lest they despise their inferiors. It is also fitting that Judges be wise and most learned in the law, lest, as men ignorant of the holy law, they be able to call good evil and evil good. It is also fitting that Judges fear God more than other men, care more for the salvation of souls than of the body, and love the honor of God more than full purses.

"But woe to you, O Judges, woe to you for eternity and beyond, because there is in you no truth, no mercy, no piety, no justice, nor can knowledge of God be found in you. For what reigns among you? Avarice, falsehood, clamor, outward show, perversion of the sacred law, calling evil good and good evil. Behold the acceptance of persons. For truth is not in you; truths have been diminished by you. O fathers of the poor--O truly not fathers, but plunderers! Why are you not fathers? Because everywhere the poor are oppressed through you, and there is no one to have mercy upon God's little ones. But if a rich man has spoken, immediately you have fallen silent; you have carried his causes even to the clouds.

"O Judges, lovers of the knowledge and justice of the world, attend to what you do. For you are full of the knowledge of the world, and in that knowledge you will die. What is the knowledge of the world except to gather treasure, acquire earthly profit, deceive one's neighbor, lie, swear, carefully pervert justice, and do similar things in all affairs? For this is the wisdom of this world. In these things nearly the whole of your life, as it were, consists. Therefore attend, you who judge the earth, because the wisdom of this world is foolishness before God.

"But you say: 'O Bishop, we do not approve this opinion. We do not commit theft; we do not deceive or offend our neighbor.' Why? 'Because we receive nothing except as much as he was willing to give us.' But I say to you that you have done as much as you were able to do. No more was given to you; therefore you received no more. You have done as much as you could. You have made small causes great. For although you did not seize by force and did not rob your neighbor on the road, you can nevertheless be robbers. For a robber fears evil; where he cannot act, he does not, and nevertheless he is a robber. For God questions the heart, not the hand.

"A wolf often comes to the sheepfold and seeks to seize the sheep, seeks to tear them, seeks to devour them. The Shepherds nevertheless keep watch, the dogs bark, and thus the wolf flees in fear. Do we therefore say that he is not a wolf? Far from it. Thus you too do as much as you can; if you could do more, you would do more.

"Come then, O Judges: attend, lest you be confounded with the false Judges of Susanna. For the Lord will awaken the spirit of Daniel and place the spirit and wisdom of his boy Daniel in the mind of some young man; and, just as he did in the case of Susanna's Judges, he will confound all false witnesses together with the Judges. Then they will know how their knowledge profited them.

“Consider, therefore, O Judges of the earth, what God speaks through Hosea his servant. For he says: ‘I shall visit my people and the Judges, and I shall repay to them their ways and their thoughts.’ O how dreadful it is to fall into the hands of the Lord! O how great the vengeance! O how great the misery there will be for the wicked on the last day! For wicked merchants and false Judges will be expelled from the house of the Lord; they will be banished from the house of God, expelled from paradise, and will go into the place where there will always be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

“Therefore attend to my counsel; open the doors of your heart. Arise, you who have slept; read Isaiah the Prophet and follow him--not tomorrow, but today; not only today, but even now. For the Prophet says: ‘Let the impious man forsake his way, and the unjust man his thoughts, and let him return to the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him, because he is merciful.’ Run, Judges, to the Father of mercy, lest you be judged. Seek pardon; restore what you have received unlawfully. Seek pardon, because he is near to all who call upon him in truth. He it is who heals the contrite of heart and the humble in spirit, and will save those troubled in heart.

“Walk while you have the light, while it is day. Behold, O Judges, the night will come soon, because death now comes, in which it will not be lawful to walk. Consider what you are and where you are going. For your dead parents preach; the grave cries out; hell howls; demons await; Priests preach: ‘Why are earth and ashes proud?’ O Judge who has not acknowledged God, when you pass beside the tombs of your fathers, know that the dead cry out: ‘You are earth, and into earth you shall go.’ They were men just as we are, possessing riches. Where they are now, so shall we be. Where is their pride? Where their knowledge? Where their magisterial chair? Where the honor of disciples? Where the garments adorned with silk and fur? O ash and dust! O Judge, consider what you are and what you will be.

“Do not, therefore, delay to be converted to God, and do not defer from day to day. For suddenly his anger comes, because the day of perdition is near; it is necessary that it come, and the times hasten. Yet let none of you despair; let no one distrust God’s mercy. But attend, because no fault is so great that it has no pardon. And lest anyone despair, take as an example Mary that sinner, mistress of luxury, mother of vainglory, sister of Martha and Lazarus, who afterwards merited to be called the Apostle of the Apostles. May that same God and man who deigned to be born and to die for us assist us. Amen.”

If Judges revolved these and things consonant with them in a mindful mind by night and by day, there would be fewer lawsuits, fewer complaints among those above, and fewer torments among those below.

CHAPTER XXIV

The Assistants of Judges

§ 1. The origin and subsequent office of Advocates were not the same. For in the beginning, when men went to join hands at law, they were accustomed to call upon friends who would aid them by authority and counsel. Afterwards, when this was little protection amid subtleties, they called upon men experienced in law and statutes, whose duty it was to give answers concerning law. They did not themselves judge, but, when consulted, gave answers concerning law, pleaded causes, and assisted Magistrates. The Count of the East had forty in his forum. Their dignities began when they departed from office. Sidonius, book 1, epistle 2: "After the fashion of Advocates, whose dignities begin when their pleadings end." For from them Consistorial Counts were created, Code, On the Advocates of Various Courts. Others attained the most ample dignities. Certainly at Rome they obtained a Magistracy through defending defendants and conducting causes as readily as through the dangers of wars. Scipio's Scribe was preferred to Scipio's son.

And would that now too there were a most rigorous selection of Advocates and the promotion of the selected men to the highest places. Would that pettifoggers, brawlers, vultures of the forum, abysses, plagues of cities, purple-fish of the benches, barkers, and architects of fraud--who beset all things, weave lawsuits, and oppress justice--might at last be restrained, and great honor be accorded to true Advocates.

§ 2. Many things were formerly granted to them which adorn the study of law. The things acquired by Advocates have the character of a military peculium; this was granted in honor of studies so that sons under paternal power may claim ownership for themselves: chapter 2, title 7, On the Advocates of Various Courts.

No solicitude of a province can be imposed upon them, according to Theodosius and Valentinian; and this was granted although there were many of them, for the Praetorian Advocacy was limited to 150 men in the toga.

[Printed page 593]

Indeed, they formerly underwent an Examination, as they still do now, just as the law says: "To no one," chapter 2, title 7.

Two years are granted to them, whereas before they served for one year, under the same title 8. The privileges of Advocates and Patrons of the Treasury are many. What is more remarkable, Agents in Affairs were also honored with the distinctions of Princes, Code 12, title 22, Agents.

§ 3. Next to Advocates were Notaries and Procurators. In the German Empire it was provided that no Notary should be admitted to the Chamber Court unless he either had testimony from his own state or was examined by the Chamber Court: Augsburg, year 1500. At the same Diet all are ordered to be reformed and examined. Procurators are prohibited from being Advocates, and conversely, at the Diet of Augsburg in the year 1500. In the same place it was established that Procurators and Advocates should be content with the fee fixed by the Assessors of the Chamber; if they received more, they were to restore it to the parties, and affirm by oath that they would do so. No Procurator is accepted unless he has been thoroughly examined. Procurators of the treasury are prohibited from undertaking causes of private persons, and conversely.

The oath of Advocates proposed at Speyer in the year 1535 is of the greatest importance for justice. The Advocates will enter all opinions, together with the names of those judging, in a book designated for this purpose by the Protonotaries of the Chamber.

It is assuredly very remarkable that amid so many oaths of the parties, Advocates, and Procurators there is still room for lawsuits. A Procurator takes the oath against calumny: that he believes his cause to be just, that he will not seek an unnecessary delay, and that he will not seek a dangerous one. The oath of the Advocate is more severe, so that I marvel greatly how men so learned can sin through ignorance.

§ 4. Many contests have made Scribes costly among us. Their esteem is no less among foreign peoples. In 2 Esdras 4:8, Sampsai the Scribe is placed second. Among Alexander's men Eumenes was held in honor. At Rome Scribes were base. Valerius, book 4, chapter 5, relates as an unworthy thing that Cicero, a scribe of Africanus, was preferred to Africanus's son in seeking the Praetorship. But in the rest of Italy their estimation was greater. Mucius Scaevola killed a purple-clad Scribe seated with King Porsena; so great was his likeness to the King that Scaevola himself thought him the King. At Rome those who took part in councils possessed greater dignity, as Chancellors and Secretaries now do; the others were ordinary.

§ 5. Cato beat down the insolence of Scribes. Thus Plutarch: ὅθεν εὐθὺς εἰς τὴν ἀρχὴν καταστὰς μεγάλην ἐποίησε μεταβολὴν τῶν περὶ τὸ ταμεῖον ὑπηρετῶν καὶ γραμματέων, οἳ διὰ χειρὸς ἀεὶ τὰ δημόσια γράμματα καὶ τοὺς νόμους ἔχοντες, εἶτα νέοις ἄρχουσι παραλαμβάνοντες δι' ἀπειρίαν κἀγνοιαν ἀτεχνῶς διδασκάλων ἑτέρων ἢ παιδαγωγῶν δεομένοις οὐκ εἴωντο ἐξουσίᾳ χρῆναι, ἀλλ' ἦσαν ἄρχοντες αὐτοί. "Cato," he says, "because it belonged to the office of Quaestor, learned it diligently; and as soon as he entered upon the Quaestorship he recast and reformed the Quaestorian assistants and Scribes. Since they always had the public records and laws ready to hand, if they encountered new Magistrates whose inexperience and ignorance stood in need of teachers, they did not permit them to exercise their Magistracy, but were themselves the Magistrates."

This must be considered and imitated very carefully by a Prince, for nothing is more arrogant or avaricious than those formulary-writers when they have the Prince's inexperience in their power.

The Commentarienses were a class of Scribes who recorded in their own hand the acts before the Treasury and had charge of registered prisoners. Indeed, they also guarded men in bonds. The assistant of the Commentarienses was the Optio, a name also extended to other offices; the same men were likewise called Proximi, assistants, and sub-assistants.

The Actuaries wrote not the proceedings of litigants before a Judge but the acts of contracting parties; they also entered the names of soldiers upon the roll.

Different from these were the Formulary-writers, who recited to the people the forms of actions. Spartianus in Geta records an Advocate of the Treasury selected from among the Formulary-writers. And now they earn salaries almost beneath the Chancellor.

CHAPTER XXV

A Consideration of the Chancellorship

§ 1. The office of Chancellors is now honorable; formerly it was among the lesser services. Κιγκλίδες among the Greeks are θύραι δικτυωταί, διαφανεῖς, latticed and transparent doors. Thus Polybius calls them in book 15. The Etymologicon calls them τὰ κάγκελα, and the Gloss says, κάσσες οἱ Ῥωμαῖοι τὰ δίκτυα λέγουσι, καὶ ὑποκορ. εἰς κάγκελον. The Romans call nets casses, and by the diminutive, cancellum. And the Scholiast upon Aristophanes' Wasps says: κιγκλὶς ἡ θύρα ἡ δικαστηρίου, ἣν καὶ καγκελάτην καλοῦσι. "Cinglis is the door of the praetorium, which they also call latticed." Codinus names it καγκελόθυριον.

Accordingly the tribunal was surrounded by lattices, lest the Judge and Assessors be pressed by the surrounding crowd; and, since some were continually departing and others arriving, the doors were latticed so that they could easily be opened and closed, and so that those who wished to be admitted could be seen and questioned. Those who stood within those doors and had care of them were called Chancellors. Ἔνθεν, says the Gloss, Καγκελλάριοι οἱ ἐν αὐτῷ ἑστηκότες, δύο δὲ οὗτοι μόνοι: "Hence the Chancellors who stood within them; these were only two."

That it was a base ministry is established from Vopiscus, who says that Numerian made one of the Chancellors Prefect of the City, than which nothing more disgraceful could be imagined or said. Indeed, even under the Christian Emperors it was not yet a great dignity. Thus Honorius and Theodosius decree concerning them: "Let no Judge dare to take with him to the province committed to him anyone upon whom he imposes the name of Domestic or Chancellor, nor receive one departing to him from any place whatsoever, lest he be punished by the mark of infamy together with confiscation of his goods. For at the peril of the chiefs of the office, we command that Chancellors selected under attestation of the records from that same office be attached to the Judges, so that after laying down the administration they do not depart from service and present themselves to the provincials, whereby those who wish may have the faculty of accusing them. For if a suitable cause requires it, they must be subjected to examination under torture in order to uncover the Judge's crimes. Given on the day before the Kalends of July, Asclepiodorus and Marinianus being Consuls, 423."

Accordingly Chancellors, as assistants, could be tortured against Judges and were therefore of plebeian condition. Their office and dignity afterwards increased, so that they guarded the acts and secrets themselves. Cassiodorus, book 11: "The Praetorian Prefect attributes to you the domestic service, the honor of the lattices, so that you may guard the secrets of our consistory with faithful integrity." And the same author in book 11, epistle 6: "Consider by what name you are called. What you have done within the lattices cannot lie hidden. For you hold luminous doors, open enclosures, windowed entrances."

§ 2. But not only the condition of the times but necessity itself produced esteem for Chancellors, so that now the honor of a Chancellor is either the highest or next to the highest. Thus in Poland the Grand Chancellor is next to the King, and in Germany three Prince Electors are Chancellors, who possess a special dignity for that reason. The first is the Elector of Mainz, who is Archchancellor throughout Germany; the second is the Elector of Cologne, who is Archchancellor throughout Italy; the third is the Elector of Trier, who is Archchancellor throughout Gaul and the Kingdom of Arles. There is nevertheless another Vice-Chancellor in the name of the Elector of Mainz, and another Chancellor of the Imperial court, upon whom, as also among other Kings, the chief affairs rest.

Nor in ancient times was the dignity of the Chancellor great in France; but because the very mass of business required great and faithful men, it came about that it was committed to men capable of bearing it. In the time of Charlemagne that function was in the hands of Bishops. These words are read in a Carolingian edict: "I, Gauzelinus the Notary, in the place of Roger the Archbishop and Supreme Chancellor, have authenticated this, in the eighth indiction, in the twenty-eighth year of the reign of Charles the glorious King." Afterwards laymen were raised to that dignity. Two or three of the most select men from the Court of Paris were proposed, one of whom was created Chancellor by the Senate's authority and votes. Then, as the power of Kings grew, the right of appointing the Chancellor remained with the Kings themselves. This was held in less esteem when they used him as their personal amanuensis; for he delivered letters to be signed to the Constable, Master of the Horse, and to the Chamberlain. But afterwards he held the primacy of law: he keeps the royal seal, writes edicts in the royal name, examines the charters themselves, and takes care that nothing contrary to the public good and the Prince's dignity is published.

Budaeus, upon the title On the Office of the Proconsul: "The Chancellorship is today the highest summit of honors, beyond which it is lawful for a man of the toga to hope for nothing, and as it were a certain solstice of the mind that aspires to all the highest things. By his eloquent mouth our Kings are accustomed to speak; with his eyes all things are surveyed; with his ears they are said to give a full and just hearing to petitioners."

An office similar to that of the Chancellor was held by the λογοθέτης τῶν σεκρέτων, Logothete of the Secrets; the same man also performed the office of Secretary. Yet he was different from the man called the First of the Secrets, whom Procopius in book 2 of the Persian Wars calls τῶν ἀπορρήτων γραμματέα, Secretary of Secret Matters.

There are Vice-Chancellors in all the Parlements of France, who execute all things pertaining to law.

Those called Mystici were secret Counsellors and other men privy to secrets.

The Master of Petitions received supplicatory petitions.

Referendaries presented the petitions of suppliants to the Emperor. Justinian decreed that, whereas they were ten, they should be reduced to the number eight.

Outside the court, the office of Scribes possessed various degrees of dignity. Among the Hebrews it was held in the greatest veneration. A Scribe is named among the first Princes of David, 2 Kings 8:16: "But Joab the son of Zeruiah was over the army."

And in 4 Kings 12:10 he has care of the sacred treasury with the High Priest: "And when they saw that there was very much money in the treasury, the King's Scribe and the High Priest went up, and they poured it out and counted it," and so forth. A Scribe is also sent to Rabshakeh with Eliakim son of Hilkiah, who was over the house, 4 Kings 18: "And they called the King; but Eliakim son of Hilkiah, who was over the house, and Shebna the Scribe, and Joah son of Asaph, the Recorder, went out to them."

And chapter 19:2: "And he sent Eliakim, who was over the house, and Shebna the Scribe, and the elders of the Priests, covered with sackcloth, to Isaiah the Prophet, son of Amos." Indeed, Ezra, a chief man, is called both Priest and Scribe. 2 Esdras 8:4: "But Ezra the Scribe stood upon the wooden step which he had made for speaking"; and verse 2: "Therefore Ezra the Priest brought the law before the multitude of men and women, and before all who were able to understand, on the first day of the seventh month."

Nevertheless, the power of Scribes always grew, for they were also adorned with military dignity. Jeremiah 52:25: "And seven men of those who saw the King's face, who were found in the city; and the Scribe who was chief of the soldiers, who tested recruits; and sixty men of the people of the land who were found in the midst of the city." And these men are the assistants and ministers of Chancellors.

CHAPTER XXVI

The Magistracy and Offices of the Aediles

§ 1. Kings were formerly Aediles, wealthy Curators of public works. The ostentation of Barbarians displayed itself in the masses of pyramids, the wonders of hanging gardens, and cities rapidly constructed. But among those cultivated toward humanity and civil government, the Aedileship was occupied with more useful and necessary construction. They gradually built, enlarged, and fortified cities; undertook the construction of citadels, bridges, roads, aqueducts, and sewers; and, whether from superstition or piety, of temples and lordly houses for themselves. Hence those immense subterranean works at Rome, strong against so many inundations of waters, fires, and collapses.

§ 2. The Aediles of the Plebs were assistants of the Tribunes. Among their other offices, however, they had care of sacred and civil buildings, which was also common to the Curule Aediles, so that they preserved temples, theaters, stadia, porticoes, forums, the walls themselves, and Basilicas. They produced games. At times they undertook care of private buildings. Livy, book 6: "And Rome at the same time began both to increase in population and to rise everywhere in buildings, the state assisting the expenditures and the Aediles exacting the work as a public service," and so forth.

§ 3. This was pernicious in the Roman Aedileship: abandoning useful things, they incurred excessive expenditure upon games. For by this means they won the poor commons to themselves, and very many examples of prodigality are found everywhere. Accordingly, under the Emperors, as all things gradually depended upon the Prince, that madness ceased.

§ 4. In place of the Aediles there was afterwards instituted the Curator of Public Works. There were very many public works at Rome: the Circus, walls, Castrensian Amphitheater, Viminal Field, Campus Martius, Harbor, Baths, Aqueducts, warehouses, stables, public post, bridges, roads, Basilicas, obelisks, Libraries, Groves, stadia, Nymphaea, pictures and statues, Arches, mills, forums, meeting-halls, columns, temples, and shrines. In the provinces a third part of the revenues was expended upon the walls and baths of the cities. There was another Curator of Cities, for he handled money, and his office belonged to quaestorian dignity.

§ 5. To the Aediles belonged the care of those who were Curators of the Channel of the Tiber and of the Sewers. Under them were the Four Men for the Care of Roads and the Curators of roads outside the city. There was also the man afterwards called Count of the Channels, whose office was to care for the aqueducts, which they called formae.

§ 6. Formerly all took care that public works should be magnificent and beyond a private scale. All were bound to contribute toward them, although Senators were sometimes excepted, book 5 in the Theodosian Code.

[Printed page 595]

A Curator bound not only himself but also his heir; indeed, so that the works would be solid, he was liable for a defect within fifteen years. It was forbidden that anyone inscribe his name unless he constructed the work at his own expense. It was not permitted for a private person to dwell in public buildings. A new work ought not be begun unless the old one is completed. Accordingly, the Aedile can apply money bequeathed for a new work to restoring an old one, provided that it is one of the public works.

CHAPTER XXVII

Prefects of the Food Supply Must Be Appointed with Great Care

§ 1. Lucius Minucius was selected as the first Prefect of the Food Supply; he reported to the Senate that Spurius Maelius was devising plans for kingship. Thus Livy, book 4. Pompey's prefecture was the most powerful of all, for he possessed greater command in the provinces than the men who administered them by lot.

Augustus himself discharged the prefecture; when already an old man he substituted Turranius for himself, and thereafter it was an ordinary Magistracy. Cassiodorus describes its office in book 6 of the Variae, 18: "It belongs to your diligence that the food supply be prepared for the most sacred city and an abundance of bread overflow everywhere. You make the rounds of the bakers' workshops and foods; you exact the prescribed weight and cleanliness of bread. You mount the carriage of the Prefect of the City with just glory. At spectacles you are found most closely joined to him. If a complaint over bread, as is customary, is aroused, you, the promiser of abundance, dissolve civic seditions by instantaneous satisfaction. Not undeservedly is Pompey said, through the quantity of provisions furnished, to have arrived at the highest pinnacle of affairs. The privileges of the bakers have been made subject to your dignity; these extended through the various parts of the world with the widest possession. Assassins who are discovered also seem to be assigned to your examination. The Praetorian Prefecture procures the supplies of wheat; the Prefect of the Food Supply dispenses them and examines the bread by weight."

He was furnished with Apparitors and through those whom they called Compulsors of the office exacted the established contribution. How greatly care for the grain supply aided the people is shown by the city in the war waged with Porsena. Livy, book 2: "Never before had so great a terror assailed the Senate, so powerful then was the Clusian state and so great Porsena's name. They feared not only the enemies but even their own citizens, lest the Roman plebs, struck by fear, should receive the Kings into the city and accept peace even with servitude. Therefore many conciliatory favors were then granted to the plebs by the Senate. Care was taken first of all for the food supply, and men were sent to procure grain, some to the Volsci and others to Cumae. The power of selling salt, because it was sold at an excessive price, was taken from private persons into public hands at the whole expense. The plebs was also freed from tolls and tribute, so that the rich, who could bear the burden, should contribute; the poor paid tax enough if they reared children. Accordingly, amid the harsh conditions which followed during siege and famine, this indulgence of the Fathers held the state in such concord that the lowest no less than the highest abhorred the name of King; nor was any single man afterwards so popular by wicked arts as the whole Senate then was by good government."

Complaints, murmurs, and even seditions arise from nothing more frequently than from scarcity of grain: Suetonius in Octavian; Symmachus, book 2, epistle 6; Marcellinus, book 21. At first, when Rome maintained its multitude and idleness from the harvests of others, Sicily was its granary; Sardinia was added, then Africa, and finally Egypt. Greece and Macedonia sometimes bore a part when the Libyan harvests failed.

Victor enumerates the warehouses and mills in this manner. In the first region at the Porta Capena: 13 warehouses, 20 mills. In the second region at the Caelimontium: 23 warehouses, 12 mills. In the third region: 18 warehouses, 12 mills. In the fourth region: 8 warehouses, 12 mills. In the fifth: 23 warehouses, 12 mills. In the sixth: 18 warehouses, 20 mills. In the ninth: 22 warehouses, 20 mills. In the tenth: 48 warehouses, 20 mills. In the eleventh: 16 warehouses, 12 mills. In the twelfth: 26 warehouses, 20 mills. In the thirteenth: 26 warehouses, 20 mills. In the fourteenth: 22 warehouses, 22 mills. I do not doubt that there were more at one time, and the Register of the Roman Empire indicates it. This is the total of the warehouses.

§ 2. There was a twofold construction of warehouses. Some were subterranean, as Vitruvius says in book 5, chapter 9: "Built sewers are dug and hollowed out as deeply as possible; those places, furnished with boards, are filled with charcoal; then above it those walks are strewn with gravel and leveled so that they are dry." In these are the treasures of the city. For salt is easily brought there, and grain is more expeditiously gathered both publicly and privately.

In Philo, grain is heaped up not in such caverns but in upper rooms. Their walls, and the floor itself, were smeared with the dregs of olive oil; they had several windows toward the North, with nets stretched before them.

Warehouses had not only Curators but also Superintendents and Counts, and they were held in great honor; for to preserve the city's food supply is a dignity no less than to preserve the treasury.

§ 3. The Prefecture of the Food Supply had its origin from the Greeks. The Athenians call its officers σιτονόμους and σιτῶνας; Suidas calls them σιτοφύλακας, and says that there were fifteen in the city and five in Piraeus. The Aetoli called them ἀγορανόμους, as is found in Plautus.

Now Princes who look to stable rule apply themselves with great spirit to preventing a failure of the food supply; for subjects draw all the things they suffer into the disrepute of the Magistrate. By caring for the food supply the Venetian Senate purchases the love of the plebs, for one will not easily find greater care of the food supply. On the contrary, although the Emperor of the Turks possesses the widest and most fertile regions, which formerly fed even foreign kingdoms, he chastises his subject people with perpetual famine. For because, through the harshness of his rule and the rapacity of his ministers, he reduces the land to a wilderness, it is cultivated only listlessly. They sow only as much as is necessary for themselves; the Collector of the established tax and the Attendant take away the surplus, or the things which are customarily laid away for use.

§ 4. To have care of a part of the food supply was formerly considered honorable. He was called the Grand Bread-Master, or Superintendent of Bread, who was accustomed to correct the bakers, examine the weights, and set the price of wheat.

CHAPTER XXVIII

A Consideration of the Tribunes of the Plebs

§ 1. The Magistracy of the Tribunes of the Plebs was sacrosanct. They possessed the right to convene the Senate and to impede whatever they judged opposed to the interests of the plebs; for their principal power consisted in opposing: they interposed their veto and prohibited. Then, in the course of time, the strength of the Tribunes increased so greatly through continual contentions that they ordered Consuls to be led to prison and often cast the fatherland into the utmost danger. For this reason Augustus and the other Emperors retained the tribunician power continuously, so that they numbered the years of their rule from each renewal of the tribunician power. Although great disadvantages and continual dissensions arose from this contest between the Tribunes and the nobility, the persistent devotion of the people nevertheless always retained and defended them. Indeed, the imperial laws also established Defenders in the cities; and even now they are found in most free cities, except where the power of the patricians has subjected everything to itself. The office of the Defenders lasted five years, as did that of the Censors among the Romans.

[Printed page 596]

§ 2. Their power was various. First, they judged matters of lesser importance and cases among persons of slender means, up to fifty solidi. Thus the Emperors Valentinian and Valens to Seneca the Defender: “If anyone among those of slender means believes that he ought to bring a complaint concerning rather small matters, in lesser cases--that is, up to the sum of fifty solidi--he shall prepare judicial acts; namely, so that if at any time anyone has claimed either a just debt, or a slave who had escaped by flight, or that which he had paid beyond his assessment, or anything else of this kind, you shall restore it by your adjudication. But you shall bring the other matters, which appear worthy of the magnitude of the forum, to the notice of the ordinary Governor.”

§ 3. They were chosen not from the order of Decurions but from the citizens. The same Emperors to Probus: “The Defenders of the cities shall be appointed to this office not from the body of Decurions or Cohortales, but from other suitable persons.” Rightly indeed; for the Decurions in the cities were like the Patricians at Rome, against whom the remaining plebeian citizens sought defense. Therefore Defenders ought not to be supplied from the body of their adversaries, but from those whose interest it was that the interests of the plebs be preserved and defended. Illustrious and Spectable men who had discharged great dignities could nevertheless undertake the honor, provided that they were not Decurions.

§ 4. No one could evade that honor, neither Illustrious men nor soldiers. Novel 15: “Meanwhile this must first be known: that no man is to have license to decline appointment as Defender, but all the nobler inhabitants of the cities shall in turn fulfill this ministry for them. For we have learned both that this prevailed in earlier times and that it was practiced in the state. We permit no one to decline this, not even if he is honored with the dignity of the Most Magnificent Illustrious men, nor if he possesses an honorable military office, nor if he produces his privilege from divine rescripts, nor if pragmatic sanctions have been conferred; rather, the inhabitants of the city who possess some means shall fulfill it in rotation, and when the rotation is completed, they shall return again to the charge and minister the aforesaid care to the city--so that in each city the Defender may appear to be a Judge rather than a Defender. He is to be appointed by a decree made under oath by all the landowners residing in that city, but not those living in this City; and he is to take an oath that he will conduct all things according to law and right and for the common good of all. He is to be confirmed, as now, by a precept of our Most Glorious Prefects; he is to administer alone for a biennium; and the Most Distinguished Judge of the province is not to have license to remove him from his charge. But if they appear to do anything improperly, he shall report it to the Most Glorious Prefects, so that deprivation of the charge may come to him from the same source from which it is also given. Neither the Governor nor the Defenders themselves shall have any license to create deputies of the Defenders; rather, we forbid this also to all of them in every manner. Nor shall the Most Distinguished Judges dispatch their own deputies through the cities, but only the Defenders themselves, whom we wish to fulfill the office of Judges in the cities; and they themselves shall employ diligence in all the cities in which they are."

§ 5. The laws judged the defense of persons of slender means to be of such importance. Thus Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian, Emperors, to the Senate: "It has been provided by a useful measure that innocent and peaceable country people should enjoy special patronage through the benefit of a local Defender, and should have the ability to litigate monetary cases before him." They stood in the place of parents to the plebs. Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, Emperors: "Among the Defenders of all the provinces this shall be the form of administration, and its time shall be measured by the span of five years: namely, that above all you show yourself as a parent to the plebs; that you do not permit country people and city dwellers to be afflicted by tax assessments; that you meet the insolence of officials and the forwardness of Judges--while preserving the reverence due to modesty--having free ability to approach the Judge whenever you wish; that you exclude the losses occasioned by demands for excessive payment, or the spoils taken from those whom you ought to protect in the place of children; and that you do not permit anything beyond the customary assessment to be exacted from those whom it is certain cannot be restored without such a remedy." Thus this single remedy was established for the poor against so many Quaestors, Exactors, and Agents in Affairs. They possessed the right of arrest. Novel 5, chapter 6: "For this is necessary to defense, for which reason the Tribunes of the Plebs also obtained it." Indeed, they had charge of discipline, as Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius, Emperors, state: "Throughout all regions in which the savage frenzy of brigands, conscious of its own danger, is raging, let all the most approved and most rigorous Defenders of discipline be present and preside over daily proceedings. Let them not permit crimes to grow strong with impunity; let them remove patronages which, by imparting favor to the accused and assistance to criminals, have caused crimes to ripen." They send persons apprehended to the Judge. Arcadius, Honorius, and Theodosius, Emperors: "The Defenders of cities shall immediately send under suitable guard to the Judge persons accused who have been offered to them after being apprehended in the very act of brigandage or a violent encounter, or after the commission of homicide, rape, abduction, or adultery, and who have been delivered to them by public acts, with the crime expressly stated and together with those by whom they were accused."

§ 6. Yet, lest they rage beyond their office in the manner of the Tribunes, provision was made: "Let the Defenders, insolently claiming nothing for themselves and claiming nothing undue, discharge only the office signified by their name. Let them impose no fines and conduct no more severe examinations. Let them protect the plebs or the Decurions from all insolence and rashness of wicked men, so that they do not cease to be only that which they are called." They applied themselves especially against the frauds of tax-receivers and the plunder of officials. Honorius and Theodosius: "We command that Defenders be appointed in such a manner that, initiated into the sacred mysteries of the orthodox religion, they are established by a decree of the Most Reverend Bishops, as well as of the clergy, Honored men, landowners, and Curials. Their appointment is to be reported to the Most Illustrious Praetorian authority, so that their authority may be made firm by letters from that Magnificent See. But if the Defenders learn that anything is being done by any person contrary to public discipline and to the injury of landowners, they shall have power to report it to the Illustrious and Magnificent men, the Praetorian Prefects; to the Illustrious men, the Masters of Horse and Foot; to the Master of Offices; and to the Counts both of the Sacred Largesses and of the Private Estates."

§ 7. But because it sometimes happened that they acted treacherously and became enemies instead of Defenders, whether through avarice, fear of the more powerful, or affinity with them, suitable men were sought with great care--to such a degree that they were appointed even by the votes of the Bishops. Thus the same Emperors decreed: "We command that through the care and diligence of the Defenders landowners are by no means to be burdened by tax-receivers with larger measures and weights; rather, those detected shall be sent to trial together with the proof of the fraud committed.

[Printed page 597]

"We also permit the following to be done: if our provincials wish to attest their injuries or losses and the Defenders deny them the preparation of acts, they shall be granted license to post, in the less-frequented places of the cities and at the time when the attestation ought to have been made, a written petition of their own complaint; to summon the scribes, record-keepers, and the other public offices which must be given notice through that petition; and to thrust it, despite the unwillingness of the persons named above, among the preparation of the acts. Their testimony may be investigated by examination, and when it has been proved, judicial rigor shall be exercised against those who are established to have denied the requested preparation of the proceedings."

§ 8. Finally, lest they disturb the state in the manner of the Tribunes, their offices were so harassed that at length the power ceased, and, after the poor had been afflicted, the state perished. Defenders of ecclesiastical affairs were also established, whom they called ἐκδίκους and Syndics, and their authority today is great in both State and Church. Their office is ἐκ πάσης τῆς ἀδικίας τὰ πράγματα ἐκδικήσαι ἐλεύθερα, to vindicate affairs and causes as free from every injustice. Now the office of Syndic is perpetual; formerly it was a περιοδικὸν πολίτευμα, a Magistracy returning in rotation.

§ 9. The destruction of all states has been more fateful from no other thing than from this Magistracy of Defenders. In the beginning peoples created Kings lest the weaker be oppressed by the stronger, and equipped them with great power and honor. After the Kings turned their benefits to the people's destruction, the people sought safeguards from the Optimates against the Kings. When the Optimates too appeared to be no more gentle than the Kings, the people created Tribunes from their own body, so that, because the danger was common to them, their care in defending might be more exact. But there is a twofold error in them: for either they are ruled by the multitude rather than rule it, or, to win the favor of the powerful, they permit the liberty of the plebs to be oppressed. Thus fidelity is safe nowhere except where morals are good. The Aediles of the Plebs were joined to the Tribunes of the Plebs; with the Tribunes' permission they pass judgment, appoint a day for those who possess more than is permitted by law, establish laws against the luxury of women, restrain usurers, and also have charge of grain.

§ 10. Municipalities and other cities had their own Magistrates. They consisted of Curials and Principals, although those who had discharged a Magistracy were customarily called Principals in the proper sense. Under the final period of the Empire they possessed their own Consuls. In the ancient centuries they called them Duumvirs; in place of these others preferred Five-Men. In Greek they called them Demarchs and ἄρχοντας, I believe; some Italians called them Dictators or Aediles. Unless Governors, and indeed the Emperor himself, took notice, the state was most grievously afflicted by these men; for they were generally created from the nobility and were hostile to the needy. Hence it came about that, just as Tribunes were chosen at Rome, so Defenders were chosen in the cities to protect the poor plebs. But in order that the reader may perceive how greatly it matters to have a multitude of Defenders and to have the weak defended sincerely, and what the condition of the Defenders was under Justinian's Empire, Novel 15 must be read:

> Unless we speedily restore the care of Defenders through a competent office, we shall no longer possess even the truth of the ancient names. For some names have different significations from antiquity according to the part they play in affairs; but this name "Defenders" demonstrates purely that antiquity placed certain men over affairs so that they might vindicate them as free from every injustice. Indeed, for this reason we call them Defenders in our ancestral tongue, so that they may rescue those who suffer injustice from evils. But now this name of Defenders has been greatly trampled upon in many parts of our state and so despised that it lies in disgrace rather than in any honor. For obscure men are appointed, and decrees concerning them are tainted by pity rather than by election. Those who have no sufficient means of food and life beg for appointment as Defenders and approach this charge; and judgment is subjected to arbitrary wills as though to some game of dice. Finally, they remove them whenever they wish, although they commit either no fault or the very smallest one, and they advance others to their office, making them, as it were, temporary occupants of the Defender's post. They do this frequently in a single year with many men, so that officials, Judges of the cities, and their inhabitants ultimately hold the Defenders in contempt. The acts performed by them are regarded as though not performed. For if the provincial Judges obtain their wish, the Defenders--serving them in every respect and attending only to their nods--by no means presume to prepare certain proceedings and records before themselves. But if some are prepared, they first sell even these; then, because they have no archive in which to deposit the proceedings conducted before them, that which is prepared perishes. You will by no means find any record at all from many years deposited with them; rather, those who have an interest in these records seek the proceedings from their heirs or other successors. Of these, those which are found are worthy of no confidence, while others truly perish and fall into such a condition that they are regarded as not performed. We, therefore, since we have ordered matters well concerning the Judges and have made their powers greater among the nations, while the inspection of the cities is far removed from them, believe that it is necessary also to establish provisions concerning the Defenders. For there will thus be a useful harmony if the Defenders of cities assume the office of Judges; and the Governor of the province will appear to be a Judge of Judges rather than a Judge, and more honorable in this respect than those who preceded him. For the more anyone presides over better men, the greater and more honorable he himself is.

§ 11. For this reason the Kings of Spain most prudently established Defenders and Patrons of the Indians in both Indies, to protect them from the rapacity and cruelty of soldiers, Prefects, and Governors. The Bishops and Prelates applied themselves vigorously and earnestly to this cause.

CHAPTER XXIX

The Very Great Care Required of Quaestors and Administrators

§ 1. Among the ancients there were two kinds of Quaestors, Urban and Provincial. The Urban were called either Quaestors of the Treasury, or Quaestors of Parricide, that is, Capital Quaestors. In this place we treat not of investigators of crimes but of Magistrates of the Treasury, who manage the patrimony of the state. In no matter is there greater danger; nowhere is a fall easier even for steadfast men. The Wise Man spoke most wisely: "Blessed is the man who has been found without blemish, and who has not gone after gold, nor placed his hope in treasures of money. Who is he, and we shall praise him? For he has done marvelous things in his life." To receive and expend a great sum of money, amid great opportunity for gain and over a long time, without suspicion of fault is arduous; not to employ one of the thousand arts of plundering which lie ready to hand belongs to a most upright spirit. When I consider the things which I either read have been done or hear are being done, I perceive that in no class of offices are more frauds admitted, or greater or more frequent punishments inflicted.

§ 2. The Quaestorship was granted in the twenty-seventh year, after ten campaigns. Some refer its beginnings to Romulus, others to Tullus Hostilius. But its beginnings must have been slight, as in a poor kingdom. For those two shepherds could be Quaestors for themselves, when

[Printed page 598]

> One hearth was the brothers' greatest kingdom.

When Valerius had established the treasury, he created two Quaestors in the Curiate Assembly. Sigonius, book 2, On the Ancient Law of Roman Citizens. See π., book 1, title 13, On the Office of the Quaestor.

§ 3. All the duties of the Quaestors were, as it were, private; for they possessed no command, did not use a curule chair, fasces, or lictors, and were permitted neither to summon anyone to plead a cause nor to arrest anyone. They could be summoned into court by any private person. They had only this in common with Magistrates: that they could convene an assembly. Dionysius, book 8.

The treasury and revenues of the Roman people were entrusted to the care of the Quaestors. They disbursed both public and private money, deposited it in the treasury, and entered receipts and expenditures in the accounts.

They received Ambassadors, provided lodging and lautia, furnished gifts and provisions--even clothing--and took care that neither the Ambassadors nor their companions lacked anything. They also undertook the care of the sick, and if they died, conducted the funeral at public expense. They also preserved the decrees of the Senate, but this duty was transferred to them at a late date.

Two honors were granted to the Quaestors. First, they brought forth from the treasury the military standards for a Consul setting out to war. Second, those who were going to seek a triumph had to affirm under oath before the Quaestors that the number of enemies and citizens killed had been reported truthfully to the Senate.

§ 4. Quaestors were at first created from the Patricians; afterward the power was shared with the plebs. Livy, book 4, records a remarkable example of the people's despising its own Tribunes and choosing nobles: "All the Tribunes, inflamed by this insult, were indignant--Pompilius and Antistius before all the rest. 'What,' they said, 'was the meaning of this? Neither by their own benefactions, nor by the wrongs of the fathers, nor finally by the desire to exercise a right--although what had not previously been lawful was now lawful--had they prevailed so that, if not a Military Tribune, not even any Quaestor should be made from the plebs. The entreaties of a father for a son, of a brother for a brother, and of the Tribunes of the Plebs, whose sacrosanct power had been created for the aid of liberty, had not prevailed.'"

Afterward Quaestors were created to accompany the Consuls to war and to furnish the things necessary for the army. The place assigned to them was called the quaestorium. In Livy, book 10: "An attack was made upon the rear of the camp, at the Decuman Gate; and so the quaestorium was taken, and the Quaestor Lucius Opimius Pansa was killed there."

§ 5. Proconsuls and Propraetors possessed their own Quaestors in the provinces. These too obtained provinces by lot, just as the Consuls themselves did. They used Lictors to represent the majesty of their command. They also wore the bordered toga, administered justice, and appointed recuperatores; Praetors sometimes entrusted command to them. Otherwise their proper duty was to give, from money received from the treasury, pay to the armies and the Praetorian cohort and traveling-money to Ambassadors; to exact the revenue money; and to carry it back into the treasury. They did not always enter the provinces at the same time as the Proconsuls and Propraetors. From this it is apparent how great the abstinence and integrity required in Quaestors, especially Provincial Quaestors, who with such great power hung over the fortunes of the allies.

§ 6. The Emperors later changed the name of the Quaestors, for the Counts of the Sacred Largesses held the office and power of the Quaestor. To this Count was entrusted the care of the imperial treasuries; this fund was available to the Prince for exercising liberality. For from the treasuries all expect the Prince's liberality, and it befits a Prince to hold wealth for liberality, not for avarice. Arcadius and Honorius write to Limenius, Count of the Sacred Largesses, Code, book 1, title 32: "Let them know that four-month accounts are also to be sent to the Palatine office, and that the gold exacted is to be sent to the Sacred Largesses without any delay." He had several Counts stationed throughout the provinces, who presided over the collection of money. For the Counts of Mines, Commerce, and Wardrobes, as also the Accountants of the General Funds, the Superintendents of Treasuries, the Procurators of Mints, the Procurators of the Gynaecea--for so they called the sacred weaving-establishments--and likewise the Procurators of the Dye-Works, and whatever was serviceable for making money, belonged to the Count of the Largesses.

He presided over the striking of coin; for he acted so that the countenance of the Prince was impressed upon the metals in common use. Cassiodorus, book 6, formula 7:

> To him are entrusted the sacred wealth and the tributes
>
> Of the possessed world, whatever gold is rolled down by rivers,
>
> Whatever, far from daylight, the hidden industry of the pallid Bessian,
>
> Searching out the following veins, digs forth.

§ 7. The custom of other nations was not dissimilar. Among the Athenians there were Magistrates called Ταμίαι, ten in number. Harpocration describes their office: Παραλαμβάνουσι δ' οὗτοι τό τε ἄγαλμα τῆς Ἀθηνᾶς, καὶ τὰς νίκας, καὶ τὸν ἄλλον κόσμον καὶ τὰ χρήματα ἐναντίον τῆς βουλῆς, εἰσὶ δὲ τινες καὶ τῶν τριήρων ταμίαι. "These Quaestors receive the statue of Minerva, the Victories, the rest of the adornment, and the money in the presence of the Senate. There are also certain Quaestors of the triremes." Hence came those Roman laws. Hence among other nations there were γαζοφύλακες, ἐπιμεληταὶ τῶν θησαυρῶν, καὶ δημοσίων χρημάτων, θησαυρῶν προεστῶτες, ἐπιτροπεύοντες τοὺς θησαυρούς, ἔπαρχοι καταλόγων: keepers of the treasury, overseers of treasures and public moneys, men set over treasuries, men administering the treasuries, and prefects of the registers. Such a man is found in 2 Maccabees, chapter 3. Heliodorus was ὁ ἐπὶ τῶν χρημάτων βασιλείας--one who was set over the King's treasury. The name of Quaestor did not afterward become obsolete, although the office was transferred to others. Codinus says that in his own time the Quaestor had no office, although formerly he had possessed one. In Menander, On Embassies, Gaianus is sent to the Persians, being one of the royal Fathers, καὶ τὴν λεγομένην κοιαίστωρ ὀφέτζαν ἀρχὴν ἐν αὐτοῖς τελέσας, "and exercising the authority of Quaestor." Was it perhaps restored at that time? Or was the ἀρχὴ without a function and merely the name of a dignity? It is assuredly established that the Count of the Largesses and the Quaestor existed at the same time, as in law 12, Code, title 6: “Those who have flourished through the honor of the Quaestorship, through official mastery, or through the dazzling splendor of the Countship of either of our treasuries shall be received with the customary acclamation and shall not be passed over as unknown.” Given on the eighth day before the Kalends of July at Thessalonica, in the fifth consulship of Gratian and the first of Theodosius, Emperors. Thus was it decreed by the Emperors Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius.

§ 8. The Quaestorians were those who handled some part of the Quaestorship. The λογοθέτης στρατιωτικός, who in Latin is named the Accountant of the Military Treasury, was one of them. Zonaras, volume 3. Afterward they were called Treasurers, who kept money safe in the individual provinces until they sent it at the established time to the Count of the Sacred Largesses. Special provision was made for their fidelity, because they had to give security.

Third, it was the one principal duty of all Governors of provinces that they should attend to the tributes and see that they were sent safely to the Count of the Largesses, as in Novel 134. Indeed, not even places of asylum could protect anyone, as Justinian decreed in Novel 17: “You shall see that the exactions of public tributes are made in a seemly manner even within the temples, since the fiscal account is useful and necessary to soldiers, private persons, the temples themselves, and the entire state. The Defenders and Stewards of the Churches, beloved of God, will also assist you, neither snatching from exaction any of those who exact fiscal tributes, nor permitting those who bring the exaction to suffer any violence or sedition; for they know that if they do anything of this kind, they will be compelled to satisfy the fisc from their own property.”

[Printed page 599]

Fourth, because Financial Administrators were assigned to the Governors for collecting tributes, they were called διοικηταὶ, but the Great Financial Administrator was the one to whom the collected revenues were delivered. The Great Financial Administrator who resided at Constantinople appears to have been the General Quaestor, and perhaps at some time held the office of the Count of the Largesses or acted in his place.

Fifth, because there was never an end of frauds and the fisc possessed many champions, other men too were appointed, called λογοθέται, whom they called Auditors; they were examiners of the public accounts, relieved those unjustly burdened, and sometimes defined the measure of the revenues. A Theodosian law concerning them survives in law 2 of the Code, On the Jews.

For the same reason there were Exactors, or Executors. All who were sent under any right whatever had to disclose everything to the Governor. Thus the Emperors Arcadius and Honorius established, Code, book 12, title 61: “Lest a Palatine Exactor approach through divided parts of the provinces, or an Apparitor of Illustrious men wander about, or military terror bring fear, we ordain by this law that all the persons mentioned shall attend to the Governor of the province and act with him. With him pressing, directing, and taking cognizance, they shall transact the matter at his peril and fulfill everything.” Given on the seventeenth day before the Kalends of July at Milan, in the consulship of Olybrius and Probinus.

Indeed, he must also prove his case to the Judge. Thus the same Emperors established: “Whether anyone has been dispatched from the Praetorian office, from the Illustrious Countship of the Sacred Largesses, from the service of our Private Estate, or from any body of Apparitors, for the accomplishment of any necessity, let him know that within the bounds of one year he must, after gathering his accounts, return to his own Judge and show him his effectiveness: what was exacted through his urgency, what remains among the debts and with whom it remained, or through whose fault or for what reason it was left in the same province. But if, after the space of a year has been completed, he is detected lingering in the bowels of that region, lying in wait as a plunderer, then, stripped of his military belt, he shall be cast out. A fine of ten pounds of gold is imposed upon the chiefs of that service if he evades returning; and, bound with iron chains by the successive offices, under the care of the provincial office, he shall be sent to the examination which is due. Nor shall he be free to defend himself by this privilege or pretext: that he alleges another business or another necessity was imposed upon him afterward, since we take from the same persons license to continue an exaction in the same province." Given on the tenth day before the Kalends of October, in the eighth consulship of Our Lord Theodosius Augustus and the consulship of Pallas.

Sixth, those called Dispatchers and Canonical Collectors were subject to the same laws. Cashiers too were appointed not only to guard but also to exact the tributes.

Seventh, the variety of business compelled the establishment of another Master in this class. He was the Master of the Census; before him declarations, wills, and gifts were published, and the Census-Officers obeyed him. It belonged to them to be present at public acts and preserve them; those who exhibited public games deposited money and prizes with them. But the matter in which the Census-Officers were chiefly occupied is established from Novel 17: "You shall compel the public Exactors to make everything evident in their receipts concerning those matters for which they gave them: namely, the quantity of zygocephala, or yokes, or yoked lands, or by whatever name they are called throughout the regions; the estates for which these and any other things are exacted; and the quantity given, whether in kind or in gold. You shall threaten them both with a great penalty and with amputation of the hand if henceforth they do not in every manner observe that which is always commanded but until now has not been observed. But if, as is customary, they discover some evasion, saying that the quantity of the yokes cannot be entered, we indeed believe that they are acting maliciously above all; yet neither the fisc nor the contributors shall be injured thereby. For the fisc shall receive everything belonging to it without prejudice, and those who have paid these things shall receive receipts completed in due form, with nothing more to be exacted. The cause shall be harmed in no respect, and according to custom the tributes shall be paid by them and brought into the fisc. But it shall be reported to our Most Glorious Prefects concerning these Census-Officers, who must first be compelled to give minutely the aforesaid statements, so that from this an adjudication of the matter may be made. And thus, meanwhile, the fiscal payments being made according to custom and brought in without fault, whatever our Most Glorious Prefects shall judge concerning those matters which are in doubt shall prevail in the matters which are disputed. After the truth concerning these questions has been learned, the Exactors shall be under the necessity henceforth to describe in those receipts also the quantity of the zygocephala and of all other things, in accordance with what has thus been ordained by us."

§ 9. Not all the duties of the Curials were different from these. For although they were the most honored men of the cities, and the Senates and sinews of the cities, they were nevertheless compelled to sustain the burden of exacting the tributes; indeed, frequently, while the interest of the fisc was being hastened, they were compelled to pay for persons of slender means. They were also called Decurions. The government applied itself to collecting money to such a degree that almost all men in a Magistracy were Quaestors or their assistants. For this reason the Decurions followed and tracked every method of plundering, so that they might not suffer loss. Salvian rightly says in book 4: "The Roman state, either already dead or at least drawing its last breath, is dying in that part in which it still appears to live, strangled by the bonds of tributes as though by the hands of robbers." The Emperor Anastasius appointed Vindices to restrain the unjust exactions of the Decurions and to make the exactions themselves; but, enticed by the sweetness of plunder, they advanced more oppressively, so that Justinian rightly removed them. It was an honor of the Decurions that they could not be subjected to the tortures of plebeians. If they embezzled public money, they were beaten with leaded whips. At their own peril the Decurions nominated a Tax-Receiver to collect the tributes; those who had nominated or consented to him were compelled to give security for him. He deposited in the warehouses not only money, but a fiftieth of the wheat, a fortieth of the barley, and a twentieth of the wine and lard. But the arrangement concerning the Decurions and the Vindices is explained in Novel 38:

> Those who formerly ordered the state for us thought that it was necessary, after the model of the Royal City, to unite the noble men in each city and to give each Senate a Curia, through which public affairs ought to be conducted and all things done according to order. Thus, therefore, the condition flourished; thus it was illustrious, > because the households of the Curials were great and populous and there existed a multitude of Curials. What appeared to be the burden of public functions was utterly intolerable to no one. For that which is divided among a multitude renders the burden almost imperceptible to those who sustain it. But when they began, one by one, to remove themselves > from the roll of the Curia and to discover occasions through which they might be made free from these obligations, the Curiae were thus gradually diminished by the invention of innumerable occasions through which private affairs might fare well while common and public affairs were diminished. Therefore the public functions, reduced to a few men, disturbed their resources also, and the cities were so diminished that, when the Curia had been reduced beneath those ruinous Contractors whom they call Vindices, it came about that the state was made full of deficiencies and full of every injustice. We, often examining these things, judged that it was necessary to apply a remedy to the condition. Yet, to the same extent that we labored in this, the Curials discovered every art against those things which were rightly and justly ordained and against the fisc. For when they saw themselves compelled by every means to preserve a fourth part for the Curia--and this had scarcely been imposed by our laws--they began to tear apart their own resources so that they might die with less property and leave to the Curia not a fourth portion but immediately all their poverty. Finally, because they wished to defraud the Curia even of their own bodies, they discovered the most impious expedient of all: we learn that they abstained from marriages, so that they chose rather to die without children than to die subject to the law or to appear useless to their own family or to the Curia.

>
> [Printed page 600]
>

The condition of the Decurions was altogether harsh, so much so that many preferred to follow armed military service, as is established from the Code, book 12, title 34. Sometimes they remained obstinately in hiding, and then their goods were granted to those who belonged to the duties of the Duumvirate. Since, therefore, they were compelled to the Decurionate in so many ways, it is established that its administration was extremely difficult.

§ 10. Today these matters have been more advantageously provided for, especially where the handling of money is divided among many; for among them some are always found who do not wish to deceive, and because of them the others either cannot or dare not do so. In the Kingdom of France there is a Council which they call the Council of Finances, in which there are Quaestors and Superintendents. There is also the Court of Aids, or Contributions. Charles VI, King of France, imposed a revenue upon wine and other merchandise; so that the peoples might bear it more lightly, he called it an aid. Over it he placed two Clerics and two Laymen of known integrity and fidelity. Then, when controversies arose, a Bishop as President and three Councillors, together with a Procurator and an Advocate-General, were added. Afterward these judgments were transferred to others, and the number of Councillors and Presidents was increased by Charles VII, Louis XII, and Henry II. Meanwhile the Masters of Accounts and Receivers of moneys are bound to render an account in the Chamber, whose Procurator takes cognizance of crimes committed by Accountants and Treasurers.

It has also been rightly established that four Treasurers-General of the Domain travel throughout the provinces entrusted to them and take cognizance of the lesser Treasurers.

Nothing is more pernicious than to have Treasurers of Casual Revenues who receive money paid for offices and dignities. Louis XIII has now abolished this with a fortunate beginning.

Nor ought it to be passed over that the President of the Treasury, and as it were the Supreme Quaestor or Count of the Largesses, is called among the French the Treasurer of Savings, so that they may indicate that the Royal Treasury increases through nothing more than through the economy and frugality of the Prince. His duty is to command the Treasurers of War to pay the soldiers' stipends. They do this through Commissioners and Paymasters, to whom Counter-Scribes are joined.

§ 11. The origin of the ἀντιγραφέων, or Counter-Scribes, as they are now called, is very ancient. Aristotle advises that public money be delivered in the presence of the citizens and that duplicate records be written, so that it cannot be embezzled.

These men continually adhere to Receivers, Treasurers, Tax-Receivers, and Equalizers, so as to impede frauds. France has therefore departed little from the ancient state; and where it has changed, it has established matters more rightly. First, it possesses a Treasurer. Next, it is not a Governor or Quaestor who judges concerning the tributes, but a Council, whose judgment is always more sincere in this cause. Then it has four Receivers-General of the assessed contributions; in each Election there are two Receivers, who carry the money of their Province to the Receivers-General. They too are assisted by Equalizers, who, in accordance with equity and fairness and according to the resources of each person, apportion and collect tributes throughout the parishes. If all these things are administered by men of upright life and haters of injustice, an immense sum of money can be collected without molestation of the subjects.

Nor is the Belgian Quaestorship dissimilar. For the Council of Finances handles monetary affairs, and in it the Treasurer and Receiver possess principal authority. That Council directs all public expenditures. It has annexed to it the Chamber of Accounts, in which all others to whom money has been entrusted are compelled to render an account to seven Masters of Accounts.

§ 12. Among the Spanish there are different Quaestorships in the various Kingdoms. In the Palace itself is the Council which they call the Hazienda. Three Quaestors, whom they call Cantadores and who from their dignity are called Majors, meet in it several times each week; an equal number of Minor Quaestors are joined to them, together with a Secretary, a Reporter, and Councillors of the Chamber. The matter of their deliberations consists of all revenues, debts and their payments, mortgages, alienations, and recoveries.

Controversies concerning money are decided by the same Quaestors, with four other Auditors and one Secretary joined to them. That Council is called the Cantadoria.

The same Officials have others, when they meet in Council, whom they call Cantadores de Cuentas; for in it the revenues of all the Provinces and Kingdoms are recorded, and accounts are given of receipts and expenditures.

§ 13. The Quaestors of the Genoese preserve and increase the state. I find their arrangement described in this manner. Bell., volume 3: “But in order that the citizens might be rendered more eager to disburse money to the state, security was given to creditors by assigning certain pledges and revenues from duties on grain, wine, or other things, and so forth. And this contract, as it were, between the state and private persons was called a Compera. It was added that those who had given one hundred pounds as a loan should hold one new place in this Society, as it were; those who had given two hundred should hold two places; and so on. Thus Comperae, or Societies of this kind, were greatly multiplied; some of them were called those of the Chapter, others of Saint Paul, others of salt, and so forth. Each of these was administered by certain citizens, whose task it was to take care that the creditors were duly satisfied and that the accounts between them and the state were justly preserved.

“But when, as is customary, confusion had arisen from the great multitude, it was decreed that all should be reduced into one body, upon which the name of the Compera, or Chamber, of Saint George was bestowed; and its care was likewise entrusted to certain Citizens. Since they administered the duty entrusted to them with singular industry and prudence, while public necessities required great expenditures, the number of Holders of Places--for we said above that those admitted into this Society were so named--grew greatly. Thus, after a great part of the public revenues had been pledged, the responsibilities and business under the care of this Office increased in a remarkable manner, and towns and territories also came under its jurisdiction.

[Printed page 601]

"Hence it came about that this Society obtained many privileges, first from the state itself, then from Pontiffs, Emperors, and other lords of the city. Thus, although this office depends upon the state itself and those who govern the palace, it is nevertheless not subject to the Urban Magistracy. Rather, all who undertake any part of the state are compelled to promise and swear that they will preserve its privileges inviolate. But just as in nearly all matters beginnings are very slender and despised, yet in the course of time gradually strive toward perfection, so it has also happened in this Office or Magistracy, whose form today is much better and more perfect than it was formerly. For as regards the calculation of the advantage or profit to be received by a Holder of a Place, something certain is no longer prescribed or determined, as formerly, but all things are directed according to the proportion of revenues and expenses, as also toward the preservation of those matters whose care has been entrusted to this Office, and according as the revenues have been more or less productive. Indeed, the present manner of receiving the revenues is much stricter and more accommodated to conscience. Moreover, as we have said, in this manner certain dominions and territories have been acquired for it, for whose easier administration it was necessary to establish new rules and new laws.

"With respect to this Office or Magistracy, the city of the Genoese can be divided, as it were, into two communities. The first is the Greater; it is governed by those who administer justice in the palace and comprises nearly the entire city. The other is small; the Magistracy of Saint George presides over it, and it pertains to the Holders of Places, or participants in the revenues. The former is subject to many changes and has sometimes experienced tyrannical government; but the latter has always been free and restricted to certain citizens, and has therefore been stable."

§ 14. Formerly persons of lower condition sometimes handled the money, nor could they increase their wealth in this manner. They were called Accountants, and the Agents were frequently slaves or Freedmen of Caesar who handled the accounts of the patrimony; they too were called λογισταὶ καὶ λογοθέται. They were also called Agents of the Lord. Tertullian, in On the Soldier's Crown, calls them Ministers of the Camp. They served for two years and thereafter could not return to the same office. Title On Camp and Ministerial Officers, chapter 12: "In the office of Your Spectability, according to the tenor of the divine responses, when the prescribed time--that is, the biennium--has been completed, let those who follow succeed to the position according to the merit of their labors and service when their predecessors depart; and let no license be granted to those who have laid down their office after completing it to return again to the same service or charge."

Frequent mention is made of Primicerii not only in profane but also in sacred affairs. They were so called because, being the first men in their own order, they were entered first upon the wax tablet, or upon the first wax tablet. Suidas defines the first as τῆς τάξεως τυγχώνης, the first man of each order. The dignity of Primicerius makes one a Senator, Cassiodorus, book 6, chapter 7. It is equated with men Selected from the Consuls in law 19 of the Theodosian Code, On the Palatines of the Sacred Largesses. The Prince of the Thebans was called the Great Primicerius. There were therefore Primicerii of the Chamberlains, of the Private Estates, of the Bureaus, of the Notaries, of the Deputies, of the Augustales, and of the Singulares, that is, of those who wrote with signs.

§ 15. Twenty-six assistants, or Boethi, of the Quaestor are established in Novel 35: "Let the twenty-six assistants of the Quaestor, whom they call the Quaestor's Boethi, be permitted to substitute others in their own place, yet suitable men whom the Quaestor for the time being shall choose with the Holy Gospels set before him. But those who are appointed in the place of those who have fallen from their position shall be appointed upon payment of one hundred solidi. Yet the men of these three grades--that is, of the Bureau of Memory and the two who are to be next--although they are not from the twenty-six assistants, shall nevertheless have license to substitute another in their own place. They shall therefore have the right to sell their military office, and for not more than one hundred solidi, provided that he who is substituted is appointed by the choice of the Quaestor. The constitution, however, gives privileges to Theodosius and Epictetus, and to Quirillus, Sabbatius, and Perigenes, with this condition plainly observed: if any of the twenty-six Assistants has died, one hundred solidi shall be given to his heirs, and they shall serve by the choice of the Quaestor. But if they are the children of the deceased, they shall possess the same right, although they have not become heirs to their Parent." Given at Constantinople, in the consulship of Belisarius.

They called “Assessments” that which was owed in each Province or city in grain, gold, and other things. An Assessment-Letter was an Epistle by which those things were granted, and sometimes a right to enter estates was conferred. Concerning Tax-Receivers see title 70 of book 10 of the Code: “We decree that public Tax-Receivers shall receive gold without any delay, lest anyone be compelled to incur expense through this occasion. For if a man wishing to pay is spurned by the Receiver, he must, after summoning witnesses, set forth an attestation; so that, when this has been proved, he himself, freed from the bond of the liability incurred, may receive the security due together with the profits, while the man who neglected to receive it is compelled by the force of the Governor’s office to bring into the accounts of the fisc twice the weight that was owed. But whatever a Tax-Receiver has wrongfully violated while the Judge whose concern it is remains negligent shall be repaired from the resources of that Judge himself.” Given on the fourteenth day before the Kalends of August, in the consulship of Paulinus and Julianus.

Thus the fisc is secured in many ways; but Quaestors know more arts of securing themselves. They rarely depart poor from office and often depart rich from plunder. Would that there were as great a care for the poor as there is for public wealth. Ancient examples are by no means lacking. For it is worthy not only of remembrance but most especially of imitation that even great Princes wished to be ὀρφανοτρόφοι, keepers of orphans. Zonaras reports that the brother of Michael the Paphlagonian was an ὀρφανοτρόφον, a keeper of orphans. Cedrenus reports the same.

§ 16. Many laws forbid the frauds of Exactors; few restrain them. Meanwhile, useful are those which prohibit them from doing anything without the knowledge of the Governor of the Province, Code, book 12, title 61; which require them to render an account within a year; and, finally, which prohibit them from doing anything that has not been entrusted to them. Thus Arcadius and Honorius, Code, book 12, title 61: “Whoever from our palace, under any title, has traveled to the Provinces--whether a Compulsor, Exactor, Summoner, or Bearer of a Precept, an Agent in Affairs, a Palatine, or an Apparitor of the Illustrious authorities--shall seize only so much power as is specially approved by the mandate of his own bureau. Let no one presume by right of his corporation upon that which was enjoined upon another; and while they do not divide this among themselves by the license of reciprocal duty, let all perform that which was entrusted to each one.” Given on the day before the Kalends of July at Milan, in the consulship of Olybrius and Probinus.

“Whether anyone has been dispatched from the Praetorian Office, from the Illustrious Countship of the Sacred Largesses, from the service of our Private Estate, or from any body of Apparitors, for the accomplishment of any necessity, let him know that within the bounds of one year he must, after gathering his accounts, return to his own Judge and show him his effectiveness: what was exacted through his urgency, what remains among the debts and with whom it remained, or through whose fault or for what reason it was left in the same

[Printed page 602]

Province. But if, after the space of a year has been completed, he is detected lingering in the bowels of that region, lying in wait as a plunderer, then, stripped of his military belt, he shall be cast out. A fine of ten pounds of gold is imposed upon the chiefs of that service if they evade his return; and, bound with iron chains by the successive offices, under the care of the provincial office, he shall be sent to the examination which is due. Nor shall he be free to defend himself by this privilege or pretext: that he alleges another business or another necessity was imposed upon him afterward, since we take from the same persons license to continue an exaction in the same province.” Given on the tenth day before the Kalends of October, in the eighth consulship of Our Lord Theodosius Augustus and the consulship of Palladius.

The laws of title 26, book 12, should be restored to use: “If anyone knows that he has been injured by the Ducenarii, Centenarii, or Advocates of the Fisc, let him not delay to approach the courts and prove the injury, so that vengeance may be taken upon the man who is convicted with fitting severity.” Given on the Kalends of November at Trier, in the fourth consulship of Constantine Augustus and the fifth of Licinius.

"Beyond the customary and canonical payments, many things are most unworthily demanded from provincials by Scholastic Officials not only in the individual cities but also at the stopping-places, while sustenance is supplied without price to them and to their animals. Therefore let all the Judges protect the provincials and not permit injuries to pass unavenged." Given on the third day before the Kalends of July, in the consulship of Leontius and Sallustius.

"Whenever a Compulsor is accused of plundering and convicted, let him undergo, even without consulting Our Clemency, the punishment fitting under the laws." Given on the day before the Kalends of January, in the consulship of Stilicho and Aurelianus.

"We wish assistance to be given to Curials, Shipmasters, and all corporate bodies in such a way that no Apparitor of any Judge is permitted anything which pertains to the plunder of provincials."

§ 17. I conclude this treatment of Magistrates and add that they will act rightly if every day they repeat their oath with a true resolve to keep it and weigh that which is set forth in Novel 8, title 3:

> I swear by Almighty God, and by His only-begotten Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, and by the Holy Spirit, and by the holy, glorious Mother of God and ever-Virgin Mary, and by the four Gospels which I hold in my hands, and by the holy Archangels Michael and Gabriel, that, on account of the administration entrusted to me by their Piety, I shall preserve a pure conscience and genuine service toward our Most Sacred Lords Justinian and Theodora his consort; and I undertake every labor and toil with favor, without fraud and without any artifice, in the administration entrusted to me by them concerning their Empire and state. I am in communion with the Most Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church of God, and in no manner or at any time shall I oppose it; nor, to the extent that I have the power, shall I permit anyone else whatever to do so.
>
> I also swear the same oath that I have given and shall give absolutely nothing to anyone on account of the belt given to me, nor on account of patronage or promise; nor have I undertaken, nor shall I undertake, to send anything from the province, whether on account of the Lord's recommendation, to the Most Renowned Prefects who hold the administration, to those who are about them, or to any other man. But just as I received the belt without recommendation, so too shall I exhibit myself purely toward the subjects of our Most Pious Lords, content with those provisions which have been established for me from the fisc.
>
> And first I shall exercise every care to watch over fiscal matters vigilantly. I shall exact from the disloyal and from those who are in arrears through constraint with every vehemence, by no means being inclined beneath anyone, nor considering gain itself at all on this account, nor exacting from anyone less than is fitting through favor or hatred, nor granting remission to anyone. But I shall treat the loyal in a paternal manner, and, to the extent that I have the power, shall preserve the subjects of our Most Pious Lords unharmed on every side.
>
> I shall act equitably toward each party in causes and in public discipline, and shall furnish nothing to either party beyond what is just. Rather, I shall pursue all offenses and preserve all equity according to what shall appear just to me. Those who are innocent I shall preserve innocent and unharmed on every side; but upon the guilty I shall impose punishment according to law. And, as has already been said, I shall preserve every justice and right in public and private contracts.
>
> If I discover that the fisc is suffering injustice, I shall not merely act concerning this myself, but shall also endeavor always to take as my Assessor such a man, and likewise all those about me, so that I am not pure while those about me steal and offend. But if any such person is found about me, I shall remedy what has proceeded from him and expel him.
>
> But if I do not thus observe all these things, may I receive my punishment here and in the age to come in the terrible judgment of the great Lord God and our Savior Jesus Christ; may I have my portion with Judas, the leprosy of Gehazi, and the trembling of Cain; and, in addition, I shall be subject to the punishments which are contained in the law of their Piety.

CHAPTER XXX

Ministers of Magistrates

§ 1. Among the ministries of Magistrates the best known is the Accensus, so called from summoning. He imposed silence, which was called the Illicium, and proclaimed that it was the third hour, midday, and the ninth hour. This duty was commonly entrusted to Freedmen. He was more honorable than the Herald. The latter pronounced in an Assembly or in the Comitium anything that had to be recited; the Accensus summoned private persons before the Magistrate. All these were called Apparitors, just as they were Official Ministers. There were several decuries of Heralds. It was the duty of the Summoners to arrest and bind, as it was also that of the Lictors. Some derive the name of the latter from binding; Tiro derives it from the linen or thread with which they were girded crosswise. The same men were called Statores, and they do not appear to have been different from Apparitors. This entire class in the Provinces was called Brutiani. They were commanded to perform not military service but servile works because they had been the first of all to desert to Hannibal.

The Romans also possessed Interpreters, not only when they administered Provinces in which a different language was used, but even in Italy itself, and, although they knew Greek, in Sicily and Greece. They judged it fitting to the majesty of the Empire that they should display not only the fasces but also their language, so that the entire world might appear to belong not only to Roman law but also to the Roman idiom.

The Cornicularii were not Horn-Blowers, but Secretaries who presided over the wings and guarded the Praetorium. They were selected from veteran soldiers for this service, as it were, of repose, inquiry, and honor. Symmachus, book 10, epistle 56. A Greek gloss interprets the term as ῥαβδίτην καὶ πρίμαχον; they were adorned with the insignia of Spectability.

§ 2. There were Minor Court Offices, which were nevertheless also employed in the houses of private persons in the cities. An ancient inscription is reported to bear: “Diophantus, Adorner and Glabrarius of Tiberius Caesar.” The same men were also called Glabratores and Pumicatores, from the foul custom of removing bodily hair. Brambaricarii and Silversmiths also adorned things; they overlaid objects with gold, silver, and bronze, and engraved in gold, silver, and bronze. There was no class of artisans that was not subject to the Emperor. Their guilds were called corporate bodies and the men themselves Corporates; and they possessed their own Prefects and Magistrates. Indeed, even the very lowest offices had Prefects: the superintendence of lime was a dignity. Cassiodorus, book 7, epistle 7: “Burnt lime is of the same color as snow and lighter than sponges. Our authority sets you over the burning and distribution of lime.”

[Printed page 603]

Nomenclators, or Name-Callers, were produced by the multitude of men and by ambition, since they stuffed the names of individual citizens into the ears of candidates; from this they were also called Fartores, Stuffers. Afterward a law was written that no Nomenclator should attend a candidate.

Couriers must be appointed so that certain knowledge of every region may be possessed. There were Day-Runners, who traversed an immense distance in one day. They were later also called Mandate-Bearers, because they carried mandates to the Governors.

The entire arrangement of transports and freight-carriages, and likewise of navigation, was formerly established very differently in the very great Empire. Now things are generally transported more easily, more quickly, and at less expense through exchange and merchants.

Stationarii and Curiosi were established throughout the Provinces and reported to the Magistrate all offenses both of Judges and of the military. This was also the office of those who are called Agents in Affairs. Formerly the same men were Couriers with post-horses and Grain-Officers, for they were called πυροφόροι. But the name Grain-Officers was also employed for scouts. The Athenians called them ἀλήρους, because they investigated who was grinding grain at home. Accordingly they were ἐρευνηταὶ, that is, investigators of all matters, which they reported to the Prince. They were also soldiers and were named Saiones. Their use is especially necessary; but they must be trusted cautiously, and in cases of great offenses by Governors they must be employed secretly, lest the Governors rebel through fear of punishment. But the Agents in Affairs had various duties. After completing their labors, they were numbered among men of Consular rank. Their Chief summoned litigants before the Prefect. He exacted tributes.

Other Stationarii are forbidden to possess a prison. Constantine, Code, book 12, title 58: "Let no Stationarii dare to go beyond the exaction or possess a prison; nor let any man keep a person in custody before himself, even for a manifest crime, knowing that if anything of this kind has been committed, he is to be punished capitally." Posted on the Ides of May at Carthage, in the fourth consulship of Constantine Augustus and the fourth of Licinius.

The prudence of the Princes judged that Account-Clerks and Record-Keepers must be disciplined severely by laws. Constantine, Code, book 12, title 50: "The rapacious and fraudulent purpose of the Account-Clerks, who render various services to Governors, must be restrained in such a manner that, as we previously ordained and now likewise ordain, they be subjected to tortures and lie beneath the rack and lacerations." Given on the fourteenth day before the Kalends of June, in the consulship of Optatus and Paulinus.

A law of Honorius, Code, book 12, title 50, also kept the same men from association with Registry-Clerks: "Lest Registry-Clerks, aided by associations with Account-Clerks, continue longer to the ruin of all, let Your Illustrious Authority command all the Account-Clerks to abstain from the Registry-Clerks and withdraw from association with them. But if, after being admonished, they neglect to observe this, let them not doubt that they are subject to the same penalties as the Registry-Clerks." Given on the fourth day before the Kalends of June at Nicaea, in the fourth consulship of Honorius Augustus and that of Eutychianus.

Apparitors thereafter held a very honorable place. Valentinian and Valens made them exempt, Code, book 12, title 55: "Those who shall have shown that they serve in the offices of the Masters of Horse and Foot shall be excused from every injurious nomination." Given on the thirteenth day before the Kalends of October at Aquileia; accepted on the fifteenth day before the Kalends of November at Salerno, in the consulship of the Divine Jovian and Varronianus.

They were also of the military order: "Those who have obtained service in the office of the Masters of Horse and Foot shall be of the military order."

Finally, the law joins them to Military Tribunes: "We command that the Account-Clerks of the Illustrious men, the Masters of Soldiers both in the Presence and in the East, who have been adorned with rank and years of military service, shall upon departure be joined to Praetorian Tribunes, receiving the benefit from their labors in the military part, in such a manner, plainly, that after their military service has been completed, they shall always be held exempt from all appointments by both military and civil Judges. But we wish those who have discharged the office of Chief to be aggregated to the Twenty Military Tribunes."

CHAPTER XXXI

On the Chinese Kingdom

§ 1 (part 1 of 3). In place of a conclusion, it seemed good to add what Father Nicolas Trigault, the instructor of the Chinese, writes from the commentaries and experience of Father Matteo Ricci concerning their state, laws, and Magistrates; for there are many things which may be of use to Princes. They are found in book 1, chapter 6, of On the Christian Expedition to China.

I shall touch upon no more concerning this subject than I shall judge altogether necessary for the purpose of this Commentary. For if I intended to pursue it according to its dignity, the entire matter could be contained only in very many chapters, or even books. First, therefore, throughout the whole course of time only that government has been approved in this kingdom for administering the state which sustains monarchic majesty in the rule of one man. Among the Chinese even the name of Aristocracy, Democracy, or any other Polycracy whatever is unheard. Formerly, indeed, under one Monarch there were no fewer titles of inferiors than there are among us of Dukes, Marquises, Counts, and the other men of this kind. But for nearly one thousand eight hundred years these titles and the power of particular Lords have been altogether abolished.

Yet although civil tumults and wars have by no means been absent in any period--whether before this system was changed or after it was changed--and although this Empire also was divided into various lesser Kingdoms, as we have heard is now the case in the Japanese Islands, nevertheless it is never read to have been entirely subdued by foreign peoples before the year of our Salvation 1206. At that time some Duke or other from Tartary, a conqueror of Kingdoms, cast himself into this Kingdom with a victorious army.

Some of our countrymen judge, and in my opinion by no slight conjectures, that this Duke was Tamerlane or one of his successors. For the Chinese call him Tiemor and write that, after first subduing Persia and Tartary, he directed his mind toward adding China to his possessions. Whoever he was, I shall call him a Tartar. Having sent in an army, he shortly subjected all China to himself, and his descendants extended the Tyranny received over so great a Kingdom down to the year 1368. At that time, when the strength of the Tartar Empire had already begun to fail and the Chinese no longer endured a foreign government and a Barbarian disposition, they cast off the yoke in various Provinces under different Dukes.

The man who, through affairs splendidly conducted either by courage or by cunning, surpassed the other Dukes was one of the family Ciu, whom the Chinese afterward called Ham Vu--that is, the Distinguished Duke, or rather the Deluge of Arms.

[Printed page 604]

Having enticed to himself the auxiliary forces of certain other vigorous Dukes, he shortly grew in strength from a common soldier to such a degree that he not only drove out the Tartars, their King, and their Dukes, stripped of their rule, but with no less good fortune also overcame the remaining rebels throughout the entire kingdom and alone occupied the Chinese Empire. His descendants too have most prosperously extended it even to this day. Hence they bestowed upon their Monarchy the name Tamin, of Great Splendor, as I said above.

The Chinese Empire descends from a parent to his sons or to royal kinsmen according to our custom. Only two or three of the most ancient Kings, when about to die, entrusted the kingdom not to sons whom they judged unfit to rule but to others, although they possessed no bond of blood with them. It has also happened more than once that a man who ruled too violently was stripped of the fasces by a people impatient of the yoke, and that in his place they substituted the man who excelled in strength, courage, and the favor of the people, and thereafter revered him as lawful King. But this deserves to be placed among the praises of the Chinese: that very many prefer to choose an honorable death rather than swear allegiance to an intruding Prince. Indeed, there is a celebrated saying among the Chinese Philosophers: "A chaste matron knows not two Husbands, nor a faithful client two Lords."

In this Empire there are no ancient laws, such as the laws of the Twelve Tables and of Caesarean law among us, by which the state is perpetually governed. Rather, the first man of any family who takes the Kingdom establishes new laws according to his judgment. His descendants of the same family are compelled to observe them and are not readily permitted to change them. Therefore the laws observed today by the Chinese are no older than Ham Vu. He either accepted all of them from the ancients or confirmed them, setting before himself this principal goal: by what method he might preserve peace for the kingdom and extend rule for himself and his descendants as long as possible.

Because the boundaries of this Kingdom extend so far and wide, and because of their ignorance of the world beyond the seas, the Chinese judge that their King rules the entire world. Therefore they call him by the splendid name Thichcu, Son of Heaven, and they name him thus today, as they always did formerly. Because they worship Heaven as the supreme divinity, to name him Son of Heaven is the same as to name him Son of God. Yet he is commonly called not by this name but Hoam, that is, Supreme Emperor or Monarch. Other Kings, however, are called Guam by the Chinese, with a far inferior title.

That Ham Vu whom I mentioned is reported to have been remarkable not only for military courage but also for intelligence and practical wisdom. This is demonstrated by the many statutes and laws through which he stabilized the Chinese state. I shall select certain of the more notable among them, always mindful of my proposed brevity. The sequence of their annals establishes that all royal families lost the Empire through the factions of royal kinsmen or of the chief men of the kingdom, because they governed a great part of the reins of the kingdom. He therefore established that henceforth no one of royal blood should touch a public office, whether it were civil or military. To those Dukes by whose aid he had liberated the kingdom from the Tyranny of the Tartars, and to their descendants, he assigned military Prefectures by hereditary right. But lest the royal race, rejected from every public office, should conduct itself too violently, he distinguished the sons of Kings by the title Guam, that is, by the appellation of Petty Kings, and assigned them very ample annual incomes. Yet he placed these not in estates and lands, lest they acquire clients, but in an annual stipend which was paid by the Magistrates from the royal treasury. He also wished all the Magistrates to revere them as Petty Kings, but no one to be subject to them. Thereafter he honored the sons and grandsons of the Petty Kings with various titles in such a manner that these titles gradually diminished, together with the annual income, according as they descended farther from the Royal Stock through the degrees of generations. But when they reached certain generations, no more was furnished to them from the public treasury than was sufficient for maintaining life conveniently without any handicraft or trade. He also provided that girls of royal blood be married according to their dignity and proximity to the Royal Stock, and that they be endowed in the same manner with more or less splendid titles and with an excellent income.

To the allied Dukes and liberators of the kingdom he most liberally imparted annual incomes and most splendid titles of honors; he also granted military Prefectures and other immunities. But they are subject to the Civil Magistrates in almost the same manner as the rest. Among these immunities there is one for their firstborn which is unheard of among our people. Upon an iron tablet in the likeness of a dish are seen engraved those illustrious deeds which the head of the family accomplished under King Ham Vu for the liberation of the kingdom. In consideration of these deeds, he will obtain impunity even a third time for any offense, including one punishable by death, if he offers that tablet to the King. When he has seen it, each time the King grants pardon he orders a certain mark to be engraved upon it, from which it may be understood how many times that tablet has obtained pardon. This must, however, be understood with treason excepted; for those convicted of it, both they themselves and their entire posterity, are immediately and perpetually stripped of every dignity. The royal sons-in-law and fathers-in-law possess honors and incomes of this kind, with the diminution over time of which I have spoken, as do certain others who are found to have deserved well of the Chinese state, region, or condition through some remarkable deed.

For governing the state and the helm of the entire kingdom, only Doctors and Licentiates proclaimed in the examinations are admitted. For this purpose they require the favor neither of the Magistrates nor even of the King himself; for all offices of the state depend upon each man's proven knowledge, virtue, prudence, and practical wisdom, whether they are now beginning to administer for the first time or have already administered other Magistracies. This is what the laws of Ham Vu prescribe, and for the most part they are observed, except insofar as human wickedness among Heathens who are by no means religious sins daily against rights and laws.

All Magistrates, whether they belong to the philosophical or the military Senate, are called Quonfu in the Chinese language--one might say Governors. But by way of honor rather than of office they are called Lauye or Lausie. This signifies Lord and Parent. The Portuguese call those Magistrates Mandarins, perhaps from "commanding"; by this name Chinese Magistrates are now understood even among Europeans.

Although I said at the beginning that the manner of administering this Kingdom is Monarchic, nevertheless it is easily established from what has been said, and will be established from what is to be said, that no small measure of the Aristocratic is mixed with it. For although everything established by the Magistrates must be confirmed by the King through petitions given to him, he nevertheless decrees nothing in any matter before he is first solicited or prompted by the Magistrates. But if a private person offers a petition to the King--which few do, because all petitions must first be examined and approved by a particular Magistrate before they are transmitted to the King--if the King presents himself as willing at the first granting, he generally subscribes thus: "Let the tribunal whose concern it is examine this petition and advise me what appears ought to be done." This must be held altogether beyond doubt, as I have diligently investigated it: the King himself is absolutely not permitted to bestow upon anyone a gift of money, to confer a Magistracy, or to increase one, unless he has been asked by one of the Magistrates. Yet this is not to be understood as though the King by private authority could not bestow gifts upon those who dwell within the boundaries of the Palace. For he does this frequently from ancient custom and, as it were, by a law by which each man is permitted to honor his friends from his domestic expenditure; but this is by no means reckoned among public benefactions. Indeed, these gifts of the King are made not from public but from private income.

[Printed page 605]

The revenues from duties and tributes--which without doubt exceed one hundred and fifty millions, as the common people call them, each year--are not brought into the treasury of the Palace, nor is the King permitted to expend them according to his own judgment. Rather, all things, whether silver, the coinage of the nation, or rice, its provision, are amassed throughout the whole Kingdom in public treasuries and granaries. From these are furnished the expenses of the King, his consorts and children, as well as of the Royal Kinsmen, Eunuchs, and the entire Royal household, always with Royal splendor and abundance, yet nothing more or less than is prescribed by the laws. From them are paid the stipends of Magistrates and Soldiers and of the other curial ministers throughout the whole Kingdom. This sum is greater than our people can persuade themselves. From them also are restored public buildings, the Palace of the King and those of the Royal Kinsmen, the walls of Cities, the defenses of citadels, and, finally, every apparatus of war; in so great an extent of the Kingdom there is never a lack of something to erect or restore. And, what appears more incredible, in some years it is customary to happen that not even so immense a sum of revenues equals the expenditure, but it becomes necessary to impose new tributes also.

But let us descend individually to the orders of Magistrates, of which I find that there are two kinds in all. The one consists of those who not only hold Court Magistracies in the Royal City but from it, as from a watchtower, direct the whole Kingdom. The other consists of Provincial Magistrates, who govern individual Provinces or cities. Five or six volumes of suitable size concerning each order are available for sale throughout the whole Kingdom, and in the Royal City of Peking they are reprinted twice in each month, something very easy because of their method of printing. Nothing else is read in these volumes except the names, native country, and rank of those who at that time hold Magistracies throughout the Kingdom. It is altogether necessary that they be reprinted so often; for in so great a multitude there are daily changes. Some die, some are deprived of office, some are demoted to lower offices, and finally the parents of others meet their appointed day. From this last event it comes about that, after immediately resigning any Magistracy whatever, they necessarily return home for three years of mourning, concerning which below in its own place. To fill the places of those who are absent, very many men are always awaiting fortune in the Royal City of Peking. From this great multitude I shall touch only upon those Magistracies which I judge necessary for understanding the books that follow. I shall, moreover, envelop the entire Military Senate in silence, lest I exceed the prescribed limits of my proposed brevity.

I shall speak first about Court Offices, then about Provincial Offices. Six primary tribunals are numbered among the Court Offices. They call the first Li Pu, for Pu among the Chinese is the same as a tribunal. Li Pu is the Tribunal of Magistrates. It rises above the other tribunals because it belongs to it to nominate absolutely all the Magistrates of the Philosophical order throughout the whole Kingdom, who are held to be the more eminent. This first nomination is determined by excellence in writing, judgment concerning which belongs to this tribunal. Beginning from the humbler offices, every one of them gradually ascends through the grades of honors prescribed by the laws, provided that they have given evidence of virtue and justice in the lower offices. If they have acted contrary to these, they are either cast down to humbler Magistracies or deprived altogether. For it is certain that the man who has obtained a literary degree aspires, in a continual ascent even to old age, to all the highest offices; nor is he ever rejected from governing the state except through his own fault. But if it happens that he is altogether rejected through fault, together with the Magistracy he also lays aside the hope of returning to govern the state.

They call the second tribunal Ho Pu, which among us is named the Treasury or Quaestorship. It belongs to this tribunal to exact the royal revenues, pay the stipends, make public expenditures, and conduct other things of this kind.

They call the third Ly Pu; we may call it the Tribunal of Rites. It has charge that public sacrifices, temples and their priests, Royal marriages, literary games, and examinations be conducted duly and in order; it has charge of public feast-days, common congratulations to be exhibited to the King at fixed times and events, titles to be conferred upon those who have deserved well, Physicians, Colleges of Mathematicians, Embassies to be received and dismissed, their rites, gifts, and letters. For the King judges it unworthy of his majesty to write a letter to anyone by himself, whether within or beyond the boundaries of the Kingdom.

They call the fourth tribunal Pim Pu, that is, the Military Tribunal. All military Prefectures are subject to it; for they are both taken away from the slothful and conferred upon the vigorous, and an increase of dignity is given by it according to the greatness of deeds. It also belongs to this tribunal to oversee examinations in military affairs and confer grades.

They call the fifth Cum Pu; we may call it the Tribunal of Public Buildings. Its duty is to draw plans for structures of this kind: namely, the Palaces of the King, the Royal Kinsmen, or the Magistrates. It also sees that ships are constructed which are necessary for public uses or fleets; it likewise makes and repairs bridges and the walls of Cities; and, finally, has charge of every other apparatus.

The sixth, which from the exacting of punishments for crimes they call Him Pu, investigates and judges crimes. The public Prisons throughout the entire Kingdom are also subject to this tribunal.

All the business of the entire kingdom depends upon these tribunals. Therefore they possess Magistrates and Notaries subject to them in every Province and City, by whom they are informed of individual matters with great fidelity. Thus they are burdened not a little by so great a mass of business; but the multitude and the order of those Colleges render this burden lighter. For first there is one President of the whole tribunal-- whom they call Ciam Ciu. He has two Assessors, one on the right and the other on the left; these are called Cilam. The dignity of these three is numbered among the highest in the Royal City and throughout the entire kingdom. Beneath them each tribunal is divided into its various offices, over each of which several Colleagues preside. To these are added Notaries, Curials, Apparitors, and many other servants.

§ 1 (continued, part 2 of 3).

[Printed page 606]

Besides these tribunals, there is another which is the greatest in the entire kingdom and Court; they call its members the Colaos. There are generally three or four of them, sometimes six. They have nothing in particular entrusted to them, but watch over the entire state and in every business are the King's Privy Councillors. They are admitted daily into the Royal Palace. Since the King today is not present for the public determination of the affairs of the kingdom--which formerly he himself determined together with these Colaos--they remain in the Palace throughout the whole day and answer according to their judgment the petitions sent daily to the King in great number. With this answer they return to the King, by whom the answers are approved, annulled, or changed according to his pleasure. The King writes this final answer upon the petitions with his own hand, so that thereafter what he has commanded may be put into execution.

Besides these orders of Magistrates which I have mentioned, and many others which it is not permitted to touch upon because they scarcely differ from those of our people, there are two other orders almost unheard of among us.

The former is called Choli, the latter Zauli. In each order more than sixty are numbered, all selected Philosophers--men of courage and prudence--who have previously proved their fidelity splendidly to the King and kingdom. These two orders are employed out of the ordinary by the King, among both Court and Provincial officials, upon matters of great importance, always with great and Royal power, which wins reverence and authority for them. But before all others their peculiar duty is such as that of the Syndics among us.

It consists in this: that by petitions, whenever they wish, they admonish the King if anywhere in the whole Kingdom an offense is committed against the laws. In this matter not only do they by no means spare Magistrates, even if these are the highest, but they do not dissemble even with the King himself or the royal house. This office would appear to me not to differ much from that of the Lacedaemonian Ephors if these Monitors could do anything more than speak, or rather write, and if they were not compelled to depend upon the decision of the admonished King. Yet they discharge this duty of theirs so exactly that they can be a wonder and example to foreign nations. For at no time do they spare any Magistrates whatever--indeed, not even the King himself, so great is their liberty and integrity. And although it happens not rarely that the King is offended and even rages fiercely against them--for generally they fasten the sting of their petitions where the sense of pain is sharper, censuring the vices of the highest Magistrates and of the King without distinction--they nevertheless never cease admonishing and censuring so long as no suitable remedy is applied to the common evil.

The same is also permitted by the laws to the remaining Magistrates, and not only to the Magistrates but even to any private person among them. Yet the petitions of those whom I mentioned above are valued more highly because they perform this as their special office. Copies of the petitions transmitted to the King and of the Royal answers are printed by many persons. Hence it comes about that the affairs of the Court travel very swiftly through every corner of the kingdom. Nor are there lacking men who then bind these petitions into books; and if anything worthy of the memory of posterity is furnished, they write it in the annals of the kingdom.

A few years ago, when the King who now rules wished to inaugurate as Prince the son second by birth but most beloved by himself and the Queen, to the exclusion of the firstborn and contrary to the laws, so great a number of petitions was written in which the King's action was censured that the King, incited to fury, either deprived more than one hundred men of their offices or consigned them to humbler ones. Yet, not terrified by this fear, they did not restrain themselves. On a certain day all the Magistrates who were then present, conspiring as one, betook themselves to the Royal Palace. Laying down the insignia of their offices, they sent a man to admonish the King that, if he persisted in this matter against the laws, they would henceforth resign every Magistracy and return home as private persons; the King himself might entrust his kingdom to whomsoever he wished. Upon hearing this, the King abstained from the matter, although unwillingly.

Recently also, when the greatest of the Colaos was discharging his office less lawfully, he was accused within two months in nearly one hundred petitions by these Royal Monitors, although they were not ignorant that he was one of the few especially favored by the King. Not long afterward he died, indeed, as report has it, from the magnitude of his grief.

Besides these Magistrates at Court, there are also in the same place not a few Colleges established for various ends; but the noblest of all is that which is called Han Lin Yuen. None except selected Doctors is admitted to it after the examinations described above.

Those who dwell in that Royal College touch absolutely no public duty, yet surpass in dignity those who govern the state. Hence men aspire to that College with great zeal. Their duty is to compose royal writings, arrange the annals of the kingdom, and write laws and statutes. From these men are chosen the Teachers of Kings and Princes.

They apply themselves wholly to their studies and possess within the College itself their own grades of honors, which they attain by writing. From there they are admitted to the gravest dignities, yet not outside the Court. No one is chosen to the most weighty office of Colao unless he comes from this College. They also make great profit from writings composed in favor of friends; of this kind are epitaphs, inscriptions, and similar things, which all eagerly strive to obtain from them and which are held to be most elegant merely for this reason: because they proceed from them.

Finally, they are Presidents and Judges in the examinations of Licentiates and Doctors, by whom they are held as Masters and presented with gifts.

All these Magistrates of the Peking Court, with the exception of the Colaos, are also found at Nanking, but they are altogether inferior because of the King's absence. They write that the following was the cause of this circumstance. Ham Vu had established the seat of the Kingdom at Nanking. When he died, one of his grandsons, called Yunlo, who in the Northern Provinces guarded the boundaries of the Kingdom against the Tartars who had recently been driven out, with an army and with the dignity of a Petty King--this man, I say, when he perceived that Ham Vu's firstborn, the heir of the kingdom, possessed little industry and vigor, determined to wrest the Kingdom from him and acquire it for himself. Therefore, when he had easily joined the Northern Provinces to himself, he came to Nanking with an army and partly by force, partly by cunning and largesses, joined the remaining Provinces to himself; and he drove his uncle from Nanking. Having done this, he subjected the entire Kingdom to himself without anyone resisting. Because he possessed greater strength and fidelity in the Northern Provinces, and because it was credible that the Tartars would burst forth from there to recover their tyranny over the Kingdom, he determined to settle in those parts, and indeed in that City in which the Tartar Kings had dwelt when they ruled the Chinese. He himself named that city Peking, that is, the Northern Court, in imitation of the Southern Court, which is called Nanking. So that the people of Nanking might bear that change more moderately, he left them the same Magistrates and immunities which they had formerly enjoyed.

[Printed page 607]

I come now to public administration in the Provinces. The Cities which have been attributed to the Court Provinces of Peking and Nanking are governed in the same order as the other Cities of the remaining Provinces; yet appeals are directed to each one's own Court. But the government of the thirteen Provinces depends upon one Magistracy which they call Pucinsu, and upon another which they call Naganzasu. The former judges civil causes, the latter crimes. Their seat is in the Metropolis of the Province, with the greatest apparatus. In each tribunal there are various Colleagues and themselves also chief Magistrates, who are called Tauli. It frequently happens that these men dwell outside the Metropolis, because they preside over several cities and it befits them not to be far distant from the duty entrusted to them.

All the Provinces, as I said above, are distributed into various Regions, which they call Fu. Each Region has its own Governor, whom they call Cifu.

The Regions are again subdivided into Ceu and Hien, as though one were to say more noble and ordinary towns; nor are these smaller than the cities of our people which are not among the largest. Each has its own Prefect: the former they call Ciceu, the latter Cihien; for Ci among the Chinese signifies to govern. These Prefects of all the cities and regions have their own Colleagues and, as it were, Assessors, four in number, who, as Auditors and Judges, assist them in taking cognizance of the causes of their jurisdiction.

But here I judge that an error which has crept into certain writers must be briefly noted and refuted. For because the Governor and his court receive their name from the name of the city in which they reside--for example, in the city Nanciam, the entire Region, its Governor, and court are called by the same name, Nanciam Fu--some have therefore judged that among the Chinese only these are Cities which are called Fu, while the remaining Ceu and Hien are held to be towns or villages. That this is altogether most false is gathered not only from the size and populousness of the places but even from the very manner of public administration. For that very city in which the Prefect of the whole region resides also receives the name Hien and possesses its own Governor, whom they call Cihien, and likewise its own Colleagues and Assessors, after the likeness of the others. The Prefect of the Region himself possesses no more authority in this, his own seat, than in the other places attributed to his jurisdiction. His right consists in the first appeal to him, when causes judged by the Ciceu and Cihien are referred to him as superior in the first appeal. The second appeal--and that only in more serious causes--is referred, according to the nature of the cause, to the highest Magistrates of the Metropolis, the Pucimsu and Naganzasu, and their Colleagues. Indeed, the Metropolises themselves also possess their own Cifu and Cihien, no less than the Regions subordinated to them. Among all the Magistrates, however, there is an incredible symmetry of a well-ordered state.

Because all administration of the state in the Provinces must be reported to the Royal City of Peking, in every Province, besides these Magistrates, there are two others superior to those mentioned, sent from the Royal City. One of them establishes his seat in the Province and is called Tutam. The other is sent every year from the Royal City and is named Cia Yuen. The authority of the former, because it is great over all the Magistrates and subjects, because he presides over military affairs, and because he touches the primary offices of the state, appears able to be compared with our Viceroys. The dignity of the latter is, as it were, that of Commissioner and Visitor. Yet because, by the King's command, he reviews the causes of the entire Province, visits the Cities and Citadels, investigates all the Magistrates, even punishes certain men who are not among the greatest and reduces them to order, and advises the King concerning the manner in which each man discharges his office; and because he alone among all Magistrates in the Provinces executes capital punishments, all therefore rightly revere and fear him.

Besides these Magistrates, there are also many others who exercise various duties in cities and even in villages and towns. Besides these, many Prefects and Dukes of soldiers stand watch throughout the whole Kingdom, but especially everywhere in maritime and neighboring places, before walls, gates, bridges, and citadels, as though all things were ablaze with war, although the deepest peace exists everywhere. For they also possess their own levies, inspections of soldiers, and exercises conducted almost daily.

Absolutely all the Magistrates of the entire Kingdom are reduced to nine orders, whether one looks to the Philosophical or to the Military Senate. According to the arrangement of these orders, a stipend either of money or of rice is paid each month to each from the public treasury. In truth it is small amid so great a majesty of Magistrates; for the stipend of no one, even if he is of the highest order, grows to one thousand gold pieces in any year. In this stipend all who are reckoned in the same order are plainly equal, whether they are Philosophical or Military; for in military affairs the highest order receives a stipend equal to that of the highest literary order. I wish this to be understood of the income established by the laws for each order; for that which is acquired beyond the ordinary by gains is far greater than that which is paid as stipend. I say nothing of the other things which each man's own industry, cupidity, fortune, and largesse produce for him in accordance with his dignity, for by these means they commonly attain great wealth.

All Magistrates also, whether Philosophical or Military, the lowest equally with the highest, are distinguished by the same cap. It is made of black gauze and has on either side two forms like wings, approximately above the ears, of oval shape. These adhere to the cap in such a way that they nevertheless fall off easily. They say that in this manner they are compelled to walk modestly and uprightly and are prevented from bending the head even slightly; for if they do so, they violate the majesty of Magistrates. The clothing is also the same for all; so are the boots, which possess a peculiar shape and material, being made of elegant black leather. An insignia of all Magistrates is also a certain belt encircling the body itself and approximately four fingers wide; it is adorned with remarkable workmanship, partly with circular figures, partly with squares. Upon the breast and the back they also sew two square pieces of cloth elegantly woven with embroidered work. But in these squares or belts there is great variety, and according to the variety, majesty.

For from these an expert immediately understands from which--

§ 1 (continued, part 3 of 3).

[Printed page 608]

Senate they belong, whether Philosophical or Military, and what dignity each holds in it. For upon those cloths are seen figures of quadrupeds, birds, and even flowers fashioned in tapestry work. Those Senatorial belts indicate majesty by the dignity of their material: some are made from a turned wooden stock, others from horn, some from unicorn horn or from Calamba, a particularly fragrant wood, and some from silver or gold. But the noblest of all are made from a certain translucent stone to which we have given the name Jasper, although it is certainly not Jasper and is perhaps more similar to Sapphire-like marble. They themselves call it Yuce. It is imported by Saracen merchants from the west, from the Kingdom of Cascar, and is held in especially high value by the Chinese. But there will be some place below for speaking about it.

Magistrates are also distinguished among the Chinese by umbrellas spread out to ward off the Sun, beneath which they customarily go forth in public. Some possess blue ones, others yellow; for some two are carried in procession, for others three, while others are permitted to use only one. They are also distinguished by the apparatus with which they go forth in public. For all the lowest ride on horseback; the greatest are borne upon the shoulders of bearers in a carrying-chair. But majesty is also found in the number of bearers: some are permitted to use only four, while others may employ eight.

There are also very many other ornaments of dignity and insignia of Magistrates: standards, chains, censers, and a numerous escort, by whose shouts the crowd is driven from the streets. So great is the reverence for them that no one appears even in the most crowded streets, but all withdraw at these cries; and this is practiced to a greater or lesser degree according to the dignity of the Magistrates.

Before I close this chapter on the administration of the Chinese state, I shall appear to perform a useful task if I recount individually certain matters in which the Chinese differ from Europeans. First, the following may appear remarkable. Although this Kingdom abounds in the extent of its borders, the multitude of its people, the abundance of provisions, and every material from which ships and all other instruments of war are fashioned--by means of which resources they might easily add at least the neighboring kingdoms to themselves--nevertheless neither the King nor the subjects labor for this, nor does it come into their mind. Content with their own possessions, they do not even covet those of others. In this matter they appear to me to differ as widely as possible from the European nations, which we often see driven from their own kingdoms while aspiring to those of others, which devour everything through an insatiable lust for ruling and do not know how to preserve the things received from their ancestors, as the Chinese have been able to do for many thousands of years.

Hence I myself judge to be very like a fiction that which not a few of our Writers recount concerning the Chinese: that at the beginning of their Empire they subjected to themselves not only the neighboring Kingdoms but even advanced as far as India. For although I have most diligently unrolled the annals of the Chinese from four thousand years ago down to the present time, I find not even a trace of so great a matter, nor do I ever hear them boasting of this extent of empire. Indeed, when I have often inquired about this very matter from certain learned men, they all agree that it never happened and could not have happened.

This error of the writers--to preserve their authority--could have crept in from the fact that certain traces of the Chinese nation are found in foreign places, to which it is credible that they sailed by their own will, not by the authority of the King, as may be seen today in the Philippine Islands.

Another matter also most worthy of notice is that the entire Kingdom, as I said above, is administered by its Philosophers, and that both unmixed and mixed command are found in them. All the soldiers and Commanders venerate these men with great humility of spirit and a singular rite, and are subject to them. It happens not rarely that soldiers are beaten by them no differently than boys among us are beaten by a Schoolmaster. These Philosophers also govern all matters which pertain to war, in which they take part and over which they preside; and their counsels and judgments possess more authority with the King than those of the other Prefects of military affairs, only a few of whom it is customary to admit, and then rarely, to deliberations about war. Hence it comes about that no one among those who nourish lofty spirits applies his mind to military affairs, and that he aspires rather to the lowest dignities of the Philosophical Senate than to the greatest Magistracies in military affairs. For they see that the Philosophers precede by a long interval in profit, in men's estimation, and in reverence. But what will appear more remarkable to foreigners in this matter is that those Philosophers undoubtedly bear away the palm from those who profess military affairs by their own institution in nobility of spirit, fidelity toward the King and state, and contempt of dangers and death in the cause of the fatherland. This perhaps takes its origin from the fact that the human spirit is ennobled by literary studies, or because from the very beginnings of this kingdom the gentler letters have always been valued more highly than the military profession among a nation by no means desirous of extending its empire.

No less remarkable is the symmetry among superior and inferior Magistrates, whether between Provincial and Court Magistrates or between the latter and the King himself. They profess this not only by their exact zeal in obeying but also by external observance. For they never omit the visits introduced by custom at fixed times or the duties of presenting gifts. Inferiors also scarcely speak to superiors, whether before the tribunal or elsewhere, except with bent knee, and address them with honorific words. Subjects of the cities render the same service to Prefects and Governors, although it is established that, before attaining the rank of literary office and entering Magistracies, they were born from the lowest plebs.

No one holds any dignity beyond three years unless he is confirmed anew by the King; but he is generally raised to a greater one, though not in the same place. This is done lest anyone readily contract friendships and be turned away from the rigor of justice, or gain the affections of some Province too greatly--especially if he has held the highest dignities--and, relying upon its favor, attempt revolution, something they recount to have happened in preceding centuries. The principal heads of the Provinces, Regions, and Cities whom I named above--the Pucinsu, Naganzasu, Cifu, Ciceu, Cihien, and similar Magistrates--must also, every third year, all present themselves together in the Royal City of Peking and render to the King the customary duties of clientship. At that very time an inquiry is made concerning the Magistrates dispersed throughout the Kingdom among the Provinces, whether they are those compelled to be present or the others; and this is conducted with the utmost rigor. From this examination it is then determined who are to be retained in the state, who removed, who raised, who cast down, and who even punished, without any regard paid to persons. I too have observed that not even the King himself dares to change anything among those matters which have been established in this public investigation by the appointed Judges. Those who are punished, moreover, are neither the lowest nor few. Indeed, in the year of our Salvation 1607, in which an investigation of this kind occurred, we read that four thousand Magistrates were condemned. For the series of them is collected into one volume which, when printed, is published throughout the whole Kingdom.

Those condemned are divided into five classes. The first contains the covetous, who sold justice for gifts and appropriated to themselves anything from public income or the fortunes of private persons. These are excluded from offices and are stripped perpetually of all insignia and immunities of Magistrates. Into the second class are cast those who exacted punishments too cruelly from the accused. These too, stripped of their dignities and of their insignia or privileges, are sent home as private persons. The third class numbers older and infirm men, as well as those too remiss in exacting punishments or performing their office. These, although private persons, are permitted the use of insignia and immunities throughout their entire life. In the fourth class are reckoned those who are precipitous and insufficiently considered in rendering judgments, and those who lacked reason and counsel in the administration of public offices. These are assigned to humbler duties or sent to those places where the administration of the state is judged easier. The final class comprises those who govern themselves, their dependents, and their entire household with too little caution and lead a manner of life unworthy of a Magistrate. These are deprived perpetually both of offices and of immunities.

The same inquiry is also instituted concerning Court Magistrates, but only every fifth year. This system is observed with the Prefects of military affairs at the same time and in the same order, and with no dissimilar severity.

No one in the entire Kingdom holds a Magistracy in the Province in which he was born, unless it is a military Prefecture. This is done so that the former, who administer justice, do not yield to blood and friendship, but so that the latter, incited by love of their fatherland, guard it more bravely. While a Lord holds a Magistracy, none of his sons or domestic servants goes out of the house, lest he procure gifts; rather, every external service is furnished by servants publicly assigned to the Magistrate. When the Magistrate himself goes out of the house, he secures with a seal the doors, whether private doors or public ones in which judgments are exercised, lest a way out be open to any of his household without his knowledge.

They also permit no foreigner to live within the boundaries of the Kingdom who contemplates a return to his fatherland or who is understood to possess any intercourse with foreign kingdoms. Indeed, they permit absolutely no foreigner to enter the interior of the Kingdom. Although I have seen no law by which this is forbidden, I nevertheless perceive that this custom crept in over many centuries through a certain fear or horror of foreign nations. I wish this to be understood not only of those foreigners whom long distances of land or sea have rendered unknown to the Chinese, or of those with whom they exercise hostilities, but even of friends and tributaries of their Kingdom, such as the neighboring Koreans, who generally employ the laws of the Chinese. Until now I have seen no such person in the Kingdom except certain slaves whom some Commander or other had led from there with him after he had resided for several years in that kingdom. Moreover, if a foreigner has secretly penetrated the Chinese Kingdom, they punish him neither with servitude nor death; but they forbid him to return to his fatherland, lest perchance among his own people he attempt revolutions to the destruction of the Chinese Kingdom. Hence they punish with the severest penalties those who have any intercourse with foreigners without the will of the King. And if necessity demands that someone be sent with mandates beyond the boundaries of the Kingdom, there is scarcely anyone who can be induced to go. His entire household laments a man setting out as though he were being dragged to death; but when he returns, the Magistrate rewards him with some office of dignity.

No one bears arms in the cities--not even the soldiers, Commanders, or Prefects of military affairs, nor even the learned--except when they go forth to their levies, exercises, or battles. Some of the nobler Magistrates are nevertheless accompanied by armed men. Nor does anyone possess arms in his own house, except perhaps some rusty dagger which they sometimes use on journeys against brigandage. To such a degree do they dread and flee armed men. Consequently there are no factions or quarrels among them except those settled by the impression of fingernails or the tearing of hair. There is no desire to avenge injuries by blows or death; rather, the man who flees another and abstains from inflicting injury is commended for prudence and fortitude.

When the King has died--lest factions arise--no other son or kinsman of the King except the heir of the Kingdom is permitted to remain in the Royal City. Indeed, once they have been divided among various cities, it is a capital crime for them to set foot outside. Disputes arising among them are settled by one of the noblest among them, by whom they are also governed. But if any business arises between them and another who is not a kinsman of the King, they are subjected, like anyone from the plebs, to the tribunals and punishments of the public Magistrates.

CHAPTER XXXII

A Catalogue of the Magistrates and Offices of the Roman Empire and of Certain Other States

§ 1.

• Accensi.

• Chamber Attendant.

• Purse Attendant.

• Two Attendants of Constantinople.

• Military Registry-Clerks.

• Registry-Clerks.

• Registry-Clerk.

• Actus quadratus.

• Assistant to the Master of Offices.

• All Domestic Assistants.

• Officers of Admission.

• Masters of Admissions.

• Great Adnumiastes.

• Adscensio.

• Adscriptitii.

• Adscriptivi.

• Asscriptivi Soldiers.

• Asscriptitii and Selected Men, opposed to Honoraries.

• Assessors and Councillors.

• Advocate of the Fisc.

• Aediles.

• Alithri.

• Allogator.

• Allitarchae.

• Angelraphorus.

• Prefect of the Food Supply.

• Distributor of the Food Supply.

• Antisagittator, Commander of the Archers.

• Various Apparitors.

• Apparitor.

• Apparitors and Praetorian Soldiers.

• Apparitors in the Exaction of Revenues.

[Printed page 610]

• Aphoplistae.

• Apocrisiarii.

• Cashiers.

• Count of the Chief Physicians.

• Archdeacon.

• Architects appointed for overthrowing statues.

• Great Archon.

• Archons.

• Arithmeticians.

• Armor-Bearers.

• Avertarius.

• Auestiarius.

• Augusta, Queen.

• Augustus.

• Courtiers.

• Court Scholars and Caesars.

• Hearers.

• Baiulus, believed to be the Great Pedagogue.

• Procurators of the Dye-Works.

• Baracurius, King of the Iberians.

• Superintendents of the Freight-Carriers.

• Beneficiaries.

• Bicolytae.

• Great Drungary of the Watch.

• Prefect of Blachernae.

• Abbreviators.

• Horseman.

• Caesar.

• Caesarean Courtiers.

• Caligula, the first called Lord.

• Camillus, the first Praetor.

• Drill-Master.

• Chancellor.

• Candidates of the Prince.

• Canonical Collectors.

• Capitularies.

• Officers of the Camp.

• Cellarers.

• Assessors of the Census.

• Assessor of the Census.

• Census-Officers.

• Master of the Census.

• Hundred-Men.

• Centurions.

• Great Chartulary.

• Chartulary of the Sacred Chamber.

• Spectable Chartularies.

• Most Distinguished Governors.

• Most Distinguished Men.

• Collectors of Tributes.

• Sacred Cognitor.

• Cohortales.

• Collectors.

• Count of Africa.

• Count of Britain.

• Count of Italy.

• Count of Illyricum.

• Count of the Spains.

• Count of Strasbourg.

• Count of the Domestics.

• Count of the Domestic Horse and Foot.

• Count of the Private Estates.

• Count of the Sacred Patrimony.

• Count of the Sacred Largesses.

• Count of Mines throughout Illyricum.

• Count of the Houses of the Prince under the Chamberlain.

• Count of the Domestics and Excubitors.

• Count and Master of Horse in the Presence.

• Count of the Sacred Stable.

• Consistorial Counts.

• Two Counts in the East.

• Counts of the Schools.

• Counts of the Port of Rome and Ravenna.

• Counts of the Warehouses.

• Illustrious Counts.

• Counts and Governors.

• Counts of the Treasury, Illustrious Men.

• Counts of the Sacred Vesture.

• Counts of the First, Second, and Third Order.

• Four Counts of Commerce.

• Commissioners.

• Great Constable.

• Councillors.

• Emperor of Constantinople.

• Consul of the Philosophers.

• Men of Consular Rank.

• Correctors.

• Most Distinguished Correctors.

• Cortelini.

• Curtain-Keepers.

• Cornicularius.

• Curator of Various Affairs.

• Curator of Public Works.

• Curators of Cities.

• Curators of the Tiber and Sewers.

• Curators of Warehouses.

• Curators of Roads and Districts.

• Curials.

• Curopalates.

• Curopalatissa.

• Guards from Illyricum.

• Princes of the Dalmatians.

• Commanders of Ten.

• Deans.

• Decurions.

• Defenders of Cities.

• Orthodox Defender.

• Demosthenes, Superintendent of the Royal Table.

• Despots.

• Diathretarii.

• Distributors of Ballots.

• Auditors.

• Distributor of Provisions.

• Director of the Banquet.

• Di Zabulus, the Chagan magnificent in receiving the Ambassadors of the Romans.

• Domestic Attendants.

• Most Noble Count of the Domestics.

• Domestic of the Table.

• Domestic Horsemen.

• Domestic of the Schools.

• Domestic of the Church.

• Dorixenus, Ambassador.

• Dromitutor.

• Dromonarii.

• Drungaries.

• Drungary.

• Naval Duumvirs.

• Ducenarian Exactors of Tributes.

• Ducenarian Procurators.

• Perpetual Commanders.

• Commanders who are Prefects of Soldiers.

• Twelve Commanders of Military Affairs.

• Duumvirs, Municipal Magistrates.

• Defender of the Churches.

• Eparch next after the Papias.

• Bishops.

[Printed page 611]

• Standard-Bearing Horsemen.

• Great Hetaeriarch.

• Eunuch Counts of the Sacred Vesture.

• Eunuchs of the Emperors.

• Eunuch Chamberlains.

• Exactors.

• Exactors of Revenues.

• Exarch, Tribune of the Excubitors.

• Recorders.

• Excubitors.

• Sons of Emperors.

• Count of the Fisc, called the Former Advocate.

• Prefects of the Markets.

• Grain-Officers.

• Prefect of the Gauls.

• German Guards of the Romans.

• German Praetor.

• Elagabalus.

• Heliogabalus.

• Crowned Hierarch.

• Honoraries.

• Honorius, who rebuilt the Roman walls.

• Hypatius, Emperor.

• Hyprostrategus.

• Crowned Janus.

• Illarches, First of the Centurions.

• Illustrious Men.

• Most Illustrious Illustrious Men.

• Image-Makers and Image-Bearers.

• Emperor of Constantinople.

• Commanders of Captives.

• Commanders called Germanic.

• Consecrated Emperors.

• Emperors called Maximi and likewise Optimi.

• Tutors of Emperors.

• Sons of Emperors.

• Empress called Lady, likewise Augusta.

• Renowned Men.

• Dyers.

• Royal Tutors.

• Great Interpreter.

• Inviters.

• Judges of Capital Matters.

• Judges of Revenues and Tributes.

• Judge of the Camp.

• Julian Augustus.

• Julius Caesar, the first Perpetual Prefect.

• Juridical Governor.

• Juridical Governor of Alexandria.

• Justinian the Triumpher.

• Justin the Thracian.

• Praetor of the Youth.

• Prince of the Youth.

• Lamp-Bearers.

• Prefect of the Latin Schools.

• Ambassadors.

• Municipal Ambassadors.

• Leo, son of Constantine.

• Superintendent of Petitions.

• Copyists.

• Procurators of Linen-Works.

• Great Logoriastes.

• Great Logothete.

• Logothete of the Secrets.

• Logothete of the Military Treasury.

• Master of the Census.

• Master of Epistles.

• Master of Offices.

• Master of Foot.

• Master of the Bureaus of Memory, Epistles, Petitions, and so forth.

• Master of Horse of the Gauls.

• Magisteriani.

• Ordinary Lesser Magistrates.

• Extraordinary Lesser Magistrates.

• Municipal Magistrates.

• Ordinary Greater Magistrates.

• Extraordinary Greater Magistrates.

• Provincial Magistrates.

• Masters of the Census.

• Masters of Linen Vesture.

• Masters of Municipalities in place of Duumvirs.

• Masters of Offices.

• Masters of the Private Vesture.

• Contractors of the Public Post.

• Mandate-Bearer.

• Megaloalogitae.

• Superintendent of the Table.

• Procurators of Mines.

• Silk-Worker.

• Display Soldiers.

• Enrolled Soldiers.

• Ordinary Soldiers.

• Soldiers creating an Emperor.

• Stationary Soldiers.

• Ministers of the Sacred Vesture, subject to the Masters of Offices.

• Ministers of the Dagger.

• Ministers of Magistrates.

• Ministers girded with linen at Banquets.

• Ministers at the Feet.

• Dispatchers.

• Monocaballi.

• Officers of Small Gifts.

• Mosaic-Workers.

• Nomarchs.

• Notaries.

• Commanders of a Military Unit.

• Account-Clerks, Calculators, Arithmeticians.

• Distributor of Provisions.

• Officials of the Most Distinguished Men.

• Chief of Offices.

• Optimates, Ministers of the Authorities.

• Pedagogian Boys.

• Prince of a District.

• Palatines.

• Distributor of Bread.

• Panypersebastus.

• Paphlagonians.

• Pareverhedi, Parafredi, and Parrippi.

• Patricians.

• Cattle-Officers.

• Cup-Bearer.

• Swine-Officers.

• Bearers.

• Heralds and Orators.

• Prefects of the Treasury.

• Praetorian Prefects.

• Prefects of the Frontier.

• Prefect of the Food Supply.

• Prefect of the Camp.

• Prefect of the Distribution of Grain.

• Prefect of the Canicleum.

• Praetorian Prefect.

• Superintendent of the Camp under the Prefect of the Camp.

[Printed page 612]

• Superintendent of the Roman Warehouse.

• Superintendents of Public Works.

• Superintendent of Lime.

• Superintendent of the Royal Table.

• Superintendent of the Sacred Chamber.

• Master of Horse in the Presence.

• Praetor of the People.

• Primates of the Regions of the City.

• Primicerius of the Court.

• Primicerius of the Private Estates.

• Primicerius of the Notaries.

• Primicerius of the Chamber.

• Primicerius of the Domestics.

• Primicerius of the Protectors, a Tribune.

• Four Primicerii in the Body of Deans.

• Primicerius of the Sacred Chamber.

• Primicerius of the Singulares.

• Primivirgius, Key-Bearer.

• Prior of the Palace.

• Chief Men.

• Chamber Watchman.

• Procurator of the Goods of Condemned Persons.

• Procurators of Dye-Works and Linen-Works.

• Procurators of Caesar.

• Procurators of the Gynaecea.

• Procurators of the Private Estate.

• Deputy Heralds.

• Propraetors.

• Pursuers.

• Protallagator.

• Protectors and Domestics.

• Deputy Ambassadors.

• First Count.

• First Huntsman.

• First Hierarch of the Treasury.

• First Master.

• First Notaries.

• First Pope.

• First Sword-Bearer.

• Protosebastus.

• First Stator and Marshal.

• First Syncellus.

• First Vestiary and Protovestiarites.

• Boys who are Mimic Actors.

• Informers for a Fourth Part.

• Quaestors.

• Quaestors of Parricide.

• Inquisitors.

• Quincunx.

• Magistrates of a Five-Year Term.

• Rod-Bearers, the Judge’s Closest Confidential Attendants.

• Accountants.

• Accountant of the General Funds.

• Accountant of the Private Estate.

• Accountant of Wines.

• Accountant.

• Governors of Provinces and Dioceses.

• Referendaries.

• Referendaries in place of Chartularies of the Church.

• Regerendarius and Subscription-Clerk.

• Purple-Clad Kings.

• Responsales.

• Questioners.

• Sacellarii.

• Sack-Carriers.

• Satraps.

• Scholars.

• Members of the Schools.

• Scholastic.

• Scribes of the Acts.

• Scrutinizers of Emperors.

• Secretaries.

• Axe-Bearers.

• Distinguished and Most Distinguished Senators.

• Roman Senate.

• Military Six-Men.

• Silentiaries.

• Sword-Bearer.

• Sword-Bearing Chamberlain.

• Sword-Bearing Chamberlains.

• Spectable Magistrates.

• Scout Soldiers.

• Statores, or Apparitors.

• Attendants.

• General.

• Commander of the Camp.

• Commander of the Camp of the Monocaballi.

• Commander of the Camp of the Murtati, Tzacones, and Tzangratores.

• Grooms of the Emperors.

• Subscription-Clerk.

• Sultan.

• Super-Illustrious Men.

• Suppliants.

• Tax-Receiver.

• Notary, Recorder, and Public Scribe.

• Notaries.

• Toll-Collectors.

• Watchword-Officers.

• Purple-Clad Witness.

• Tetrarchs.

• Consular Governors of the Thraces.

• Broad-Stripe Tribunes.

• Tribunes of Soldiers.

• Tribune-Notaries.

• Tribunes of the Plebs.

• Tribune of the First Cohort.

• Tricaballi.

• Prefect of the Golden Dining-Room.

• Triumphers.

• Three-Man Boards for the Levy, others for Banking, others for Transporting Horsemen.

• Squadron-Commanders.

• Turranius, the first Prefect of the Food Supply among the Romans.

• Tzangratores, a kind of Archers.

• Farmers of Revenues.

• Judges of Revenues.

• Carriers.

• Prefect of the Wardrobe.

• Curators of Roads.

• Summoners of the Tribunes.

• Vicars called Augustales.

• Vicars of a Prefect.

• Vicars of the Prefecture of the Gauls.

• Vicars of Prefects.

• Vicars.

• Vicar of the Spains.

• Vicar of Rome.

• Vicars of a Tribune.

• Curators of Districts.

• Steward of the City.

• Vindices.

• Tax-Receivers of Wine.

• Epistolary Men.

• Spectable Officer of the Camp.

• Perfumers in the Offices of the Emperors.

• Urbaniciani.

• Usurers, or Moneylenders.

[Printed page 613]

CHAPTER XXXIII

Ambassadors Must Be Chosen from the Most Approved Men

§ 1. Although I frequently made mention of Ambassadors in the first edition, I nevertheless did not treat them by design, both because I saw that subject occupied by many writers and because the things which I discussed concerning the virtues and vices of Princes, Optimates, the Senate, and Councillors appeared able sufficiently to instruct an Ambassador. For whatever is praiseworthy in all of them ought to shine forth collectively in an Ambassador. He sustains the person of his own state; he is placed between fire and sacrifice, between hammer and anvil. Concerning him the Prince who sent him and rivals in that Prince's council pass judgment; enemies and friends judge and scrutinize him. To serve and satisfy one Prince for a long time is arduous. An Ambassador must serve his own Prince, accommodate himself to a foreign one, and also please the Ambassadors of other Princes. No Province is more burdensome, none more dangerous. He must be dear to his Lord without being hated by an enemy or rival. Indeed, it is necessary to be wary even of Secretaries and Domestics. Here there is need of the highest protection afforded by all the virtues--yet not new virtues, but those which I have expounded. For this reason I had passed over this subject. But now, induced by the requests and arguments of certain men, I have resolved to institute a discourse on this matter also and to imitate other writers of no mean reputation: Plato, Demetrius of Phalerum, Diotimus, Crates, Julius Ferretius, Brunus, Octavianus, Bodin, and Carolus Scribanius.

§ 2. They refer the antiquity of Ambassadors to Belus and Ninus. But, to omit the times before the Flood and disputes over chronology, it must be established as certain that in the same year in which the human race was scattered into various parts of the world through the confusion of languages, Ambassadors were sent for the sake of business and treaties. For neighbor had to speak with neighbor if it seemed good to establish something for the advantage of both or to settle a disputed right. Such is the relation among nations that a state necessarily holds communication with its neighbor. Necessity is the mother of embassies, as it is of clothing; adornment and splendor were added afterward. Letters are indeed mute Ambassadors, which speak only to the eyes and exhibit the mind of their lord as though in a mirror; but there are many things which cannot be accomplished through them. For letters cannot immediately answer the things proposed by the other party. Moreover, an Ambassador must conceal or disclose many things in accordance with the disposition of the Prince to whom he is sent or with the condition of the times and affairs. An Ambassador assuredly sometimes finds many things otherwise arranged than the man by whom he was sent had thought.

§ 3. An embassy requires immense prudence together with dexterity. For an Ambassador is publicly sent to conduct public business; he is a messenger, or Apostle. Therefore he sustains not only the person of his own Prince but that of the entire state and indeed of the Senate itself. The Greeks always chose the highest men, and therefore called them πρεσβευτὰς and πρέσβεις, because they were selected from the γερουσία. For that name belongs not more to age than to dignity. Thus the Venetian Ambassadors excused their age before the Emperor, and Scipio professed that he possessed enough years if the Roman people should make him Consul.

They are also called Orators and commonly Ambassadors. Some derive the latter name from the German Ambacht, which among the ancients signifies work, as though they were Workers; others derive it from the Greek ἀναβάζειν, to speak, to advance to make a speech, as is established from a witty saying of the Athenians. When an unwelcome Orator began his speech from the word Ἀναβαίνειν, "for those ascending," the People answered Καταβαίνειν, "let them descend." That ἀμβάζειν is said for ἀναβαίνειν is known even to boys. But I omit these matters.

I give this warning: Military Legates are excluded from this discussion. They were Legates who were Councillors and assistants of the next dignity, attached to Commanders and frequently greater than those Commanders in the glory of their deeds. Caesar, book 2 of The Civil War, acknowledges that the Commander employs their service in trust. See Vegetius, book 2, chapter 9; Lipsius's commentary on book 2 of the Annals of Tacitus. Departing Proconsuls sometimes entrusted to them part of the army, sometimes the whole army, and indeed a Province. Much less does the Free Embassy belong here. It is the mask of an embassy, often unjust and always burdensome to the allies. For, so that men of Senatorial rank might be more honored and secure in the Provinces and might conduct private business more easily, a Free Embassy was decreed to them, which they could employ when, where, and as long as they wished, although it was generally annual. Lipsius on Tacitus; Alexander ab Alexandro; Cujacius, book 9 of Observations, 29; and law 14, π., On an Embassy.

CHAPTER XXXIV

It Belongs to a Prince to Send and Receive Ambassadors

§ 1. Not only can a supreme and absolute Prince send Ambassadors to and receive them from another supreme Prince; inferiors can also conduct embassies with a supreme Prince and indeed among themselves. The matter is disputed among Jurisconsults and political writers. Certainly, by ancient law private persons are forbidden to receive enemy Ambassadors as guests and to confer with them. On the other hand, the Princes of Germany and the Hanseatic cities send and receive embassies, as the Historians, Crantzius, and daily customs demonstrate. It appears to me that the matter can altogether be settled by an easy distinction.

No Prince can send to foreign Princes an embassy which treats a public cause of the entire Empire, especially to rivals or enemies. That care belongs to the majesty of the Emperor alone. It belongs to the head, not to one part, to govern a body so vast and composed of so many members; it does not belong to one part to conduct the cause of all the parts and of the entire Empire without consulting its colleagues. Such an embassy, whether sent or received, will deservedly be suspect. Therefore I remember that, when foreign embassies arrived bearing mandates concerning affairs of the Empire, the Electoral Princes customarily referred them to the Emperor or to the Diet. What is said concerning a public cause must also be understood of negotiations concerning the private affairs of individual Provinces when they carry prejudice to the public interest--for a private cause is then to the detriment of the state. But when the private affair of some Prince is conducted in such a way that it does not concern the Empire, although in comparison with the whole the embassy is private, nevertheless with respect to the Prince it is public. Thus, when men congratulate someone upon a victory, negotiate concerning marriages, or seek privileges for the commerce of subjects, the right of Ambassadors is altogether free. Bodin denies this in book 1 of The State, chapter 10, and accuses writers who think otherwise; but the Emperor and Imperial Diet concede these things, provided that no prescription is laid upon public safety and supreme majesty. In this action not merely the things themselves but even suspicions must be avoided.

[Printed page 614]

§ 2. Ambassadors are publicly sent, though not always openly. For there are certain embassies known either to the Prince alone or to very few; matters of the greatest importance and secrecy are sometimes transacted through merchants and Religious. They are nevertheless sent publicly because they are sent by princely authority. Thus even a matter which pertains only to the Prince is judged public, as when a marriage is under discussion. Hence it is clear that a twofold kind of Ambassadors is recognized. The first, with greater noise and pomp, not only conducts business but also represents the dignity of its lord by civil splendor. The other merely unfolds its mandate and is the naked interpreter of a will, entirely free from concern for other matters. It nevertheless comes with equal authority, but avoids expense to the sender and recipient, especially so that occasions for action are not delayed or lost through the empty superstition of ceremonies, of which there is neither measure nor end. Whether they call these men Agents, Appointed men, Deputies, or Commissioners, if they possess a public mandate, they are Ambassadors. The office, privileges, and security of Ambassadors are due to them, while immunity from ceremonies is granted them. Those who are afraid to name them Ambassadors have not yet learned to distinguish the different kinds of Ambassadors. A mandate publicly given and the power to act concerning the state make Ambassadors; seats, precedence, a crowd of companions, and similar trifles lie outside the essence of an embassy. And when business is conducted seriously, those empty things are despised. Moreover, subjects are compelled in necessity to undertake an embassy, as they are military service; yet it is not prudent to compel unwilling men to a difficult matter. The Venetians indeed command embassies to whomsoever they judge good, but rarely to the unwilling. If anyone does not set out voluntarily, he nevertheless grants this to the honor of the state: that he conceals his mind and presents eagerness.

Accordingly, an Ambassador will avoid ambitious splendor in his retinue, expense, clothing, and other things; indeed, so will the Prince himself. For among foreigners and the ill-disposed it is generally attributed to pride and is the mother of animosities and hatreds. I remember Ambassadors who, because they possessed certain faults or more conspicuous dress, were continually marked by the reproach of nicknames. Mockery advanced so far that many believed those things which had been invented as reproaches were their proper names. Nor does this happen to few; few escape taunts cast behind their backs.

§ 3. Ambassadors, even those of enemies, must be received honorably and lovingly. For they are angels and mediators of peace and endeavor to reconcile the human race without bloodshed. Even if they come to declare war, they must nevertheless be heard, for perhaps they will bring something toward impeding or diminishing the war. For when the anger of enemies is met with moderation and virtue and conferences are intermingled, much progress has been made. The Romans proudly rejected the Ambassadors of the Numantines; they ought to have heard men who had conducted themselves kindly as victors. Hannibal, according to his custom, kept away the Ambassadors of the Romans by warning them of danger on the journey and alleging that he had no leisure to hear Ambassadors. Pericles persuaded the Athenians to dismiss the Ambassador of the Spartans unheard and without honor. He did this with evil intent, so that he might inflame anger and war more greatly.

§ 4. Ambassadors must not be received into a city if they can corrupt the spirits of the citizens by gifts, promises, or threats, and there is fear that they will attempt it. For this reason the Ambassadors of King Tarquin ought to have been excluded, and the example of Hezekiah excluding Rabshakeh is remarkable. Much less must they be admitted into an Assembly if they are able to stir up commotions. The same reasoning applies if they come with the intention of spying. For the Ambassadors of enemy and rival Princes are very often spies, and at Court they possess men who report the most secret matters to them. The Kings supply many examples of this in our own years and render the same service in return. Yet when it is judged that they will be dangerous in camps or cities, when resources are slender, they are not admitted. At Rome they frequently gave enemy Ambassadors a meeting of the Senate outside the City. The Kings sometimes forbade them to come to Rome. They ordered Hannibal's Ambassadors to depart from Roman territory before night. They refused to possess spectators of their anxiety and calamity. Yet there is less danger in an Ambassador when secret spies are innumerable and guards can readily be assigned to an Ambassador under the appearance of duty and honor, while the cunning of secret spies is unavoidable.

§ 5. Ambassadors are not customarily heard when they either deny a title which is due or arrogate to their lords one which is not due. The King of Hungary ordered the Ambassadors of a Voivode who named their lord King of Pannonia to depart. Aemilius spurned the letter of the defeated Perseus, who nevertheless called himself King of Macedonia, and did not even deem it worthy of reading. Accordingly, it is not prudent to send Ambassadors to those with whom there is controversy over a title. For spirits on both sides are embittered, and impediments to peace are offered by the very negotiation of peace.

On the other hand, Ambassadors must be heard honorably and not treated with contempt. Curius invited them indecorously and sordidly to turnips, and by an ostentatious display of poverty exposed Roman majesty to ridicule. In private life economy and modesty are praised; magnificence must be exhibited publicly. Artaxerxes' fashioning of knife-handles while hearing Ambassadors was also a rustic display. A petty King of the Indians combed his hair while the Ambassadors completed their speeches. These are the actions of men who are foolishly proud and gather great hatreds without profit.

§ 6. Ambassadors are sometimes affected with the highest honor. By sitting, giving an opinion, and subscribing they sometimes hold the place of their lords; at other times they are compelled to yield. Both other Ambassadors and even those of the Emperor yield to the King of the Romans, for he is judged the supreme Legate, successor, and son of the Emperor. Thus in the year 1541 Ferdinand took precedence over the Ambassadors of Charles V. In Synods the Legates of the Pontiff preside. In assemblies of the Empire, Electors who are present are customarily placed before the Ambassadors of those absent--deservedly and by right. For the image of an absent dignity yields to present reality.

This was also devised so that they would not readily excuse their absence if they were compelled to yield to the servants of their colleagues. Yet elsewhere and among others the arrangement is different.

CHAPTER XXXV

An Ambassador Must Not Readily Be Deceived

§ 1. Guicciardini, Political Memoranda, 1, warns that a Prince wishing to circumvent another must first deceive the Ambassador. Cassander contemplates war against Demetrius; he wishes Demetrius to suspect it as little as possible, so that he may overwhelm him unprepared. Accordingly, he sends an Ambassador concerning peace, a treaty, and affinity, and makes a display of an immense desire for friendship. Here they do not wish the Ambassador to be conscious of his lord's innermost intention. Indeed, they do not wish him to inquire whether his mandates are given truly or feignedly. They say that he must speak what his lord has ordered him to speak, but that it appears better for him not to know what his lord wishes to do, so that he may thus express the pretense more earnestly. In this manner most Political writers commend that cunning as wisdom.

[Printed page 615]

Let me be permitted to weigh the matter by its proper considerations. There is one reason for deceiving the Ambassador: lest he deceive with insufficient earnestness. Yet a man will be found without difficulty who, complying with the character of his Prince with great zeal, will perform that piece of acting more intensely and will delight in the cunning. For pretense performs more and greater things than truth. Indeed, he will handle the deceits with more practiced cunning. Moreover, what if he completes the matter itself and, while pretending, concludes a true marriage? Has an Ambassador ignorant of pretense truly been sent since the foundation of the world?

Accordingly, although I judge it honorable for neither the Prince nor the Ambassador to deceive, but approve truth and candor, nevertheless, if it has been resolved to deceive, the Prince will employ as Ambassador a man not ignorant of fraud and pretense. For many things occur everywhere in the course of business which a man conscious of everything will accomplish according to the mind of his lord more easily than one who is ignorant--especially so that he may draw out the time, not advance farther than is necessary, and not cast the honor of his lord into danger. A man ignorant of fraud does not regulate fraud well.

Indeed, it is also arduous to deceive an Ambassador. For if he shares in secret counsels, he himself will doubt the good faith of his embassy from other acts and deliberations and from the letters of familiars; and he will resent that this was concealed from him to his own insult. If he does not belong to the secret counsels, conjectures will nevertheless not be lacking, and silence at Court is rare. Certainly, whenever he learns that he has been deceived, he will act more slowly, cease to trust his lord, and condemn the embassy himself, if he nevertheless remains faithful. For deception impairs fidelity and impels the man whom you have deceived toward perfidy. Do not believe that a man will be faithful to you who knows that he is not trusted.

It is added that through that pretense the Prince renders himself suspect not only to foreigners but also to his own people, for they rightly judge that a deceitful man is not to be trusted. Nevertheless, they sometimes employ in this fashion blind Ambassadors, or those who are insufficiently cautious, or even Priests and Religious. These conduct the business with great effort and confidence, but, being ignorant of Courtly arts, first perceive that their simplicity has been mocked when they are ridiculed by each party. They endure this, and it is necessary for them to endure it; but other men of great spirit store away deeply in their minds that they were not trusted and were held in mockery. When Louis Trabantius had pledged to the King of France that his lord, the Duke of Brabant, was a friend, but the latter allied himself with the Englishman against the Frenchman, Trabantius, detesting the deceit, refused to return home and wasted away from grief in France.

Accordingly, when Princes resolve in this matter to deceive their own men and their enemies, they sin twice. For they both employ fraud--which, although shameful in all men, is most shameful in Princes--and they handle their deceits improperly by showing that they distrust their own people. Far be it that what Isocrates said against his own people in the oration On Peace should have to be said concerning a Christian Court: “Princes have now been corrupted and depraved for a long time by Courtiers whose whole art is consumed in deceiving.”

CHAPTER XXXVI

Security Must Be Furnished to an Ambassador

§ 1. Concerning the security of Ambassadors, our Carolus Scribanius has written better than all others. Their security is sacred by the public law of nations. Everywhere among nations, even among Barbarians, they are inviolable. At Rome, if anyone had struck them, he was judged guilty of treason and was surrendered for punishment to those who had sent them, so that they might punish him according to their judgment. If he was spared through the humanity of those injured, they nevertheless did not receive him into citizenship. Varro, On the Latin Language; Cujacius, book 11 of Observations, chapter 5. Necessity is the procurer of so great a privilege, lest the society of the human race perish. Security itself includes the power to come, remain, and depart--indeed, also to conduct business. They therefore act wickedly who restrict the liberty of Ambassadors by fear or corrupt them with gifts. The ministers of Arcadius Caesar were injurious in all these ways toward the Ambassadors of the Roman Pontiff; Zeno and others sinned in the same manner, something abominable among Christians. The harshness of the Swiss War was remarkable, when beggars and girls were employed as Ambassadors because men were insufficiently safe.

§ 2. When enemy Ambassadors and those of others are warned not to come, or that they will be held as enemies and spies, or are ordered to depart by a prescribed time, the law of nations is not violated if the reason for so harsh a decree is just or appears prudent. If those barbarous decrees are made from arrogance, hatred of peace or enemies, or an immense hope of victory, this is contrary to the law of nations: to cut off every hope of peace or pardon and to refuse even to enter into conference. For even a state which has injured another so greatly that it is attacked in a just war possesses the right to send Ambassadors, to entreat, to make a compact, and to intercede for its innocent people, who constitute the greatest part. It is not bound to surrender its people to servitude or slaughter; humanity and the law of nations command that satisfaction be accepted without destruction. Coriolanus acted contrary to the law of nations when he declared that, if they sent Ambassadors, he would hold them as enemies. The King of Syria during the siege of Samaria and others acted with the same injustice and cruelty. The Athenians can be excused when they rejected the Ambassadors of Kings. Basilides, Duke of Muscovy, killed some Ambassadors after driving a great nail through their heads, and sent others home cut limb from limb and salted. Formerly the people of Fidenae furnished examples of equal barbarity and paid for them with their own destruction.

But if Ambassadors possess no evil in their intention or mandates and come altogether innocently for the sake of sincere peace, yet the condition of affairs and men is nevertheless such that, if they wish, they could contrive sedition and treachery, they are rightly forbidden to come; and if they do not obey, they can be killed, for they cast themselves headlong by their own rashness. The state ought not to trust them but to act so that it is safe through its own counsel and caution, not through the innocence of enemies. The Senate does not dispute whether the enemy wishes or does not wish to cause harm, but resolves to provide matters in such a way that, even when he most wishes it, he cannot cause harm. Accordingly, Ambassadors who come in opposition to that security of the state violate the law of nations.

[Printed page 616]

§ 3. Those who deny that Ambassadors are secure unless they first send a Herald and obtain permission to come understand the law of nations insufficiently. A Herald or Trumpeter is safe by the law of nations, under no other right than an Ambassador. The right of each is equal; indeed, the sanctity of the Ambassador is greater. Otherwise the Herald too would require a forerunner. Those who procure security for an Ambassador from a pledge sought and given through a Herald abolish the entire law of nations. For in that manner any man whatever is secure, since a pledge cannot be violated without crime. An Ambassador is inviolable by his own sanctity and the consent of the entire world. He is venerable amid the weapons of enemies, not by the promise of one Prince or King, and he does not bargain for protection; rather, he carries with himself rights and laws whose violator is not to be tolerated even by any barbarism.

They allege the custom of Ambassadors, who are accustomed to send ahead men to announce their arrival and ask that they be permitted to approach with favorable leave. Yet that very practice asserts the right of Ambassadors. For if the Ambassador's messenger or forerunner is safe by the law of nations because he is the Ambassador's servant or courier, how much more is the Ambassador himself? The reason for giving notice of the arrival is both that it may be established that he is an Ambassador and that civility and courtesy may be observed, lest a new guest arrive unexpectedly before the Prince and so that provision may be made concerning lodging and other matters.

§ 4. Moreover, the things which are said concerning the security of Ambassadors pertain only to those to whom they are sent, not to others. For if we detect enemy Ambassadors proceeding either to other enemies or even to our friends, it will be lawful to intercept, detain, or kill them. For they are enemies. Thus the Romans detained Ambassadors of the Samnites who were journeying to the Etruscans; the same Romans intercepted those of the Carthaginians, the Athenians those of the Persians, and Charles V those of Francis I who were proceeding to the Turk. This is the perpetual practice of nations: that they intercept not only enemy Ambassadors but even their letters.

§ 5. Through an offense an Ambassador loses his right and immunity. Yet not every sin of this kind is such that he forfeits his right. For the private disgraces of an Ambassador--drunkenness, fornication, blasphemy--merely render the Ambassador infamous and are turned into a reproach against the Prince by whom he is sent; by those to whom he is sent, they are customarily dissembled. But concerning crimes which bring injury upon others--such as adulteries, murders, and thefts, whether committed by the Ambassador himself or by his household--although all concede that they ought not to be unpunished, they nevertheless dispute concerning the punishment. Many judge that the cause must be referred to the Prince by whom he was sent. For another Prince is not Judge of an Ambassador, since the Ambassador is free from his scepter; moreover, it is burdensome to undergo judgment among foreigners, rivals, and enemies.

To me, certainly, the law of nations does not appear to permit an Ambassador license for crimes or to take defense away from those who have suffered injury. Is the Prince of the injured party not the Judge of the Ambassador? But the Ambassador's Prince is not the Prince of the injured party. There is nevertheless a reason why my Prince should punish the Ambassador; there is no reason why he should dispatch me to accuse him before a foreign Prince. The Ambassador is judged in the place of his offense. I ought not, through no fault of my own, to be compelled to foreign tribunals. It belongs to natural law that a brigand, thief, or incendiary be punished by that Prince whose subjects he has harmed. Brigandage, theft, and adultery have punishments established by the law of nations, for no nation is so barbarous that it has not imposed vengeance for those crimes by law. The Ambassador therefore deserves punishment by the law of nations. But the man whose house he has plundered or whose wife he has violated can be compelled by no right to accuse the malefactor at Byzantium or elsewhere. Neither the length of the journey, the measure of the expenses, nor the system of the courts permits it. By law and desert, therefore, the Ambassador is judged in the place where he is known to have sinned. But if he has contrived sedition, tumult, or treachery, he himself has already violated the law of nations first and is punished by right. For it would be foolish to send him back to his own Prince, from whom he possessed not only license for the crimes but even mandates, and who will instead give him rewards. The law of nations protects only an innocent embassy.

§ 6. Although these things can be done by strict law, I would nevertheless counsel moderation and a certain surrender of his own right to the injured Prince. If an Ambassador kills a private person and confesses it, let the Prince conclude the affair by a settlement, admonish the Ambassador's Prince, seek his judgment, or refer the cause to neighboring Princes or Academies. If the matter is obscure and requires examination, let him ask the sending Prince for Commissioners to take part in the inquiry, or let him delegate the cognizance to others. In this manner the Prince will obtain praise for justice and moderation even among enemies, and therefore love, reverence, and authority. No occasion will be furnished for violating the law of nations; then an opportunity for complaints will be cut off. For never, or rarely, will the Ambassador of a foreign Prince recognize equity in his judgment; and, to clear himself, he will endeavor to render the Judges suspect.

But if he is said to have conspired against the Prince or state or to have attempted something else, because the matter is secret I should generally prefer him to be dismissed rather than entrust the affair to an inquiry. If the matter is notorious, it pertains to the security of nations that the violator of that law not be without punishment.

§ 7. If an enemy has killed our Ambassador, crime must not be weighed out for crime. I am not ignorant that many Jurisconsults, in the law If It Has Been Agreed, π., For Partnership, judge this lawful and employ the saying: "Let fidelity be broken toward the same man who breaks fidelity." For the law, they say, is not violated but returned. More prudent men, however, rightly pronounce this too unjust. For an Ambassador is secure, sacred, and inviolable absolutely by the law of nations and in his own person, and does not lose his right through another man's crime. Nor ought another Prince to be an imitator of a foreign crime; rather, he ought to protect and favor the innocent man. For who would undertake an embassy if he saw that his own safety depended upon another? What if the Prince is offended with his own Ambassador or despises his life? Toward a Prince who breaks fidelity, promised fidelity is rightly broken; but it ought not to be broken toward an Ambassador, to whom it is owed by the law of nations.

Indeed, that principle has no place even with captives. For if Hannibal slaughters four thousand captives contrary to the pledge given, the Senate at Rome will not therefore kill the Carthaginians to whom a pledge has been given. For the pledge was given to the captives themselves so that they would not fight to the point of extermination and, through despair of their own life, draw others into destruction. Indeed, not even hostages can be killed unless, willing and knowing, they themselves stipulated that law for themselves.

§ 8. If an enemy detains our Ambassador, most writers concede that his Ambassador can also be detained so that ours may be freed. Yet not even this must be conceded without caution. For the law of nations always protects an innocent Ambassador, whatever his state, against his will, may sin. He does not cease to be sacrosanct, because of the necessary society of the human race, against which it is not lawful to offend by another man's example. Scipio assuredly presented himself as such toward the Carthaginians. For when they had killed the Romans, he did not touch even those who feigned an embassy, being the more worthy of victory, the more he loved law and equity. On the other hand, detestable was the fraud of the Italian cities which contemplated revolt. For, after feigning a disagreement among certain cities, they asked for Ambassadors from Rome to settle the affairs. Men of the highest rank were sent; they detained them until they recovered their own hostages. But a little afterward they paid great penalties for the twofold deceit.

[Printed page 617]

What, therefore, must be done to an Ambassador? First, he must be afflicted by no insult or punishment, neither beating nor prison. Next, he may be detained honorably for a time--for he does not cease to be an Ambassador--if perhaps our Ambassador too will be released. But if the enemy possesses such harshness that he is not moved by danger to his own Ambassador, the latter must not long be detained to the peril of his health and household affairs. He ought not to refuse a brief and honorable detention whose end is the liberation of our Ambassador; by the law of nations he ought to be exempt from a long captivity.

Certainly, if an Ambassador has been sent from friend to friend and, during the embassy, a savage war has broken forth with plunderings, fires, killings even of chief men, and the overthrow of cities; if every bond of friendship has been broken and even a just cause has been given for repaying destruction, nevertheless the Ambassador pays no penalties, but departs unharmed amid the weapons and fires of enemies, and even honored. Thus it was done by Charles V and Francis I: each dismissed the other's Ambassador and offered gifts while all things blazed with war. Although the Frenchman did not accept Caesar's gifts, Caesar's Ambassador received and returned them. Accordingly, I would counsel a Prince to overcome an enemy by virtue, whose victory is the noblest, and to send the enemy's Ambassador away honored and presented with gifts.

§ 9. A more difficult question is whether the security of rebel Ambassadors is valid by the law of nations. Most deny it. The civil laws also appear to oppose it. For do seditious men merit the law of nations by rebellion and perjury? I do not dispute the right; rather, I give this counsel: if they send Ambassadors, let them be heard and dismissed unharmed through the Prince's kindness. For in sedition, although no right is acquired by the wicked, it is nevertheless better for tranquility to be restored by words than by the sword, lest despair--equally dangerous to each party--destroy the one. Next, if the rebels repent of their deeds and send suppliant Ambassadors, even if the Ambassadors themselves are guilty, I judge them to be immune by the law of nations. For although the offenses of the suppliants can be so great and so savage that pardon ought not to be given, their embassy must be heard and sent back without harm. Thus it has been established and practiced by the law of nations. For just as it is humane to pardon sins, whose atrocity must nevertheless sometimes be punished without pardon, so it belongs to Princes to hear suppliants even when pardon must be denied, lest they appear to be punished by cruelty, not justice. This always has place in a multitude, in which there are always many who are either innocent or at least pardonably guilty.

In these circumstances they nevertheless customarily employ others as intercessors; sometimes they send either women or an innocent person. The Romans too did this when Coriolanus had forbidden Ambassadors to come.

When Ambassadors are discharging their duty, they cannot be summoned into court at home. Law 2, § Ambassadors, law 7. The Memmian Law extended this privilege to all who were absent on account of the state, for their names were not to be received.

But if anything was done against them, when they return they are restored to their former condition. They are nevertheless compelled to appear in a lawsuit begun before the embassy and to continue it, lest justice be delayed to the great detriment of others. Indeed, an absent man can be summoned into court if he has given a new cause for a lawsuit--for example, if he has ordered a neighbor's field to be occupied or through his people has given cause for complaint. Otherwise embassies, which often continue for many years, would be dangerous to citizens and neighbors; for injuries would have to be endured and tolerated without remedy until the Ambassador's return. This is without doubt burdensome and harmful to the state.

CHAPTER XXXVII

Instruction Given to Ambassadors

§ 1. The mandates which are customarily delivered to Ambassadors in writing are called Instructions. I do not speak about those instructions; rather, I shall set forth in a brief method a general doctrine for Ambassadors, which can be taken from the civil doctrine that I have pursued thus far. For the sake of order, however, I shall explain the points individually.

Aphorism 1. For embassies in great affairs, the greatest men in the state must be sent. The greatest, I say, in prudence, integrity, and authority. The reason is manifest. For they represent their state and Prince, and it contributes greatly to his reputation that he possess the most excellent ministers possible. Princes, Ambassadors, and Councillors also revere these men, look up to them, and yield to their authority. For even rivals commend virtue--if not by loving it, certainly either by praising it openly or envying it secretly. Indeed, those to whom an embassy has been sent judge themselves honored by the arrival of a great man; they also begin to love the Prince whose minister they revere.

Aphorism 2. All the virtues are required in him, especially those which pertain to civil life. It is necessary for an Ambassador to possess them in a heroic degree. The pretense of virtue and cunning are hateful to all. Accordingly, those who are suspected and ill-reputed on that account must not be sent. For a man who sends a Cretan or a Cilician appears to wish to deceive, and thus a minister who is suspect obstructs the beginnings of actions. Moreover, those who are assailed by such an Ambassador possess two safeguards: one invincible, namely, to believe nothing; the other equal to his arts, namely, to oppose intricacies to intricacies and deceits to deceits.

Aphorism 3. The exceptional gifts and dignity of Ambassadors contribute little to the affair if they are hated by the Prince to whom they are sent. In this matter men often offend most gravely, when chief men through some affection confer an embassy upon one who is unsuitable for that person. For the man who receives the embassy rightly judges himself provoked when he sees a man thrust upon him and required to be treated honorably although he judges himself rightly offended with him and holds him suspect. Princes judge that this honor must be granted them: that they are not compelled to act and negotiate with an enemy. Indeed, it is repugnant even to the prudence of private persons to conciliate friendship and conduct affairs through the intervention of enemies.

[Printed page 618]

They act just as though they attempted to solder metals together with earthenware. Hence arise impediments and delay in business; hence difficult access and other things which especially harm the Prince.

Aphorism 4. I require the highest prudence in an Ambassador; badly concealed craftiness customarily causes harm, as I have said. Very many at Courts are crafty, cunning, secretive, scrutinizers of the thoughts of others, investigators of all affairs, dissemblers, and obscure. One thing is upon their tongue, another in their mind; they say one thing with Titius and another with Gaius. Men judge them the most suitable for embassies because they know how to lie, deceive, and conceal by art; I judge them useless. For these vices are poisons of peace and friendship and can never be concealed for long. The King himself, the chief men, and spies from among the lesser men speak with an Ambassador. A disguise, worn away for a long time among many men by so many devices, cannot preserve the same color; a long fiction cannot prevent its lie from speaking through some part of itself. Thus the Ambassador loses trust, which is the foundation of an embassy, and incurs hatred or contempt, by which every benefit is shaken away. All his actions are rendered suspect; his faults are exaggerated. All prepare themselves against his cunning and deceits so as to elude them. Certainly, against deceitful men the invincible safeguard is not to believe them.

This class of men, therefore, neither preserves the mutual friendship of Princes nor deceives rivals. Fraud loses all its force where it is not believed. A Prince too loses authority through an embassy of this kind. A wolf, concerning the conclusion of a treaty with oxen, sent a little fox as Ambassador. When she had spoken at length concerning her sincerity, this answer was given: “Because it is manifest that you lie, we cannot trust your Prince.” Whatever an Ambassador does or says is judged to be done by the command or with the approval of the Prince. For it is known that all these things are written in full to the Prince either by the Ambassador or by his companions as things likely to please him.

Aphorism 5. Accordingly, I wish truth to be commended to an Ambassador, paying no heed to those who wittily define an Ambassador in these words: “a good man skilled in lying and prepared to lie for his state.” Truth is the foundation of the state, and an Ambassador sent to lie will readily lie even to his own Prince. Now so many Ambassadors are sent and reside everywhere, and at so great an expense, as existed in no age; nevertheless the benefit is slight, there are many offenses among Princes, and very many Ambassadors offend on each side and destroy themselves. For who discharges an embassy without being accused of παραπρεσβείας, misconduct in an embassy? Men are known who have only recently departed from prison. The reason is that they were sent to deceive. But God, detesting public frauds, turns punishments upon their ministers.

Certainly, since there is no lie which must not be covered by the veil of other lies lest it be revealed, it cannot happen that an Ambassador should either always lie consistently or regulate his deceits according to the mind of an absent lord. Thus it is necessary that, while lying, he disagree with his lord, whether that lord is truthful or deceitful. And because it is necessary to write everything home, it is arduous to lie so neatly that everything agrees with the intentions of the Prince and his Councillors.

Aphorism 6. The primary good in an Ambassador is fidelity, which elsewhere the Roman calls even the most sacred good of the human breast. Antiquity placed it in the Capitol near Jupiter. Certainly, the fidelity of few is firm if the hope of reward is absent or, on the other side, a greater reward is offered.

Παῦροι τοι πολλῶν πιστὸν ἔχουσι νόον.

Few among many possess a faithful spirit. In an Ambassador fidelity ought to be altogether unconquered. For it is often shaken by conference with Kings, by gifts, and even while it believes itself safe. I add threats and the fear of calumny. Amid so many methods, the danger that it may be enticed or shaken is very great, especially since the fortune of the Prince is often placed in the Ambassador’s hand.

For this reason the greatest Emperors frequently sent holy men, Bishops, and Priests as Ambassadors. Ambrose, Chrysostom, and Bernard discharged embassies.

Aphorism 7. Livy sometimes requires nobility of birth in an Ambassador, book 30. At times even Kings have been offended by the low condition of Ambassadors. But generous virtue and learning can supply its place. The Romans are certainly less to be approved when they sent back Ambassadors in whom little dignity appeared, for the person of the Ambassador must be estimated according to the dignity of those who send him. When Augustus learned that certain Ambassadors of Freedman stock had been sent, he refused them a place in the orchestra. Suetonius, chapter 44. But those Ambassadors belonged to cities and subject Provinces, which Augustus could admonish in this manner not to send unworthy men. Louis XI, King of France, sent Olivier the barber to Burgundy to seek a wife for his son. The matter was received as an insult, and it was not far from violence. But those were the arts of chief men who favored neither their King nor the Burgundian. Surgeons, shopkeepers, and artisans can certainly be sent if fortune has raised them to a more dignified station. Augustus himself, born of a father who was a money-changer, and other Caesars sprung from an ignoble nation and stock ought not to have labored fastidiously and rigidly in estimating another man’s nobility.

Justinian sent a Physician to Chosroes, King of the Persians, but one who had formerly treated the King and was therefore dear to him. The tutors of Crassus and Alexander were sent to them; they made peace and preserved cities.

Aphorism 8. Let him pursue courtesy in such a way that he flees flattery. Flattery is pleasing when it is not noticed; but if a wise Prince notices it, it is most hateful, for the man who praises him to his face reproaches him with vanity and folly. This appears especially in the Ambassador of a rival Prince, who generally praises for this reason: that he may deceive. I speak of flattering praise; for some praise is owed to a Prince and cannot be omitted without the reproach of incivility.

There is a remarkable example in the life of Charles V. A French Orator praised him intensely according to the custom of his nation, although a year before he had censured him most bitterly in England. The magnanimous Emperor answered him: "If a year ago you had censured me less in England, and now had praised me less, each would have been pleasing to me." Thus the Orator lost trust and favor, and could accomplish nothing more useful for his King than to request a successor. Indeed, Ambassadors frequently offend their own Princes by being too profuse in the praises of foreigners. Before their own Princes they customarily excuse themselves in no other way than by censuring and ridiculing the men whom they praised, namely, by saying that they accommodated their speech to the inclinations of an empty Prince who had to be captured by those enticements. Princes are not ignorant that these things are done, and through secret friends they can learn what the Ambassadors have written.

I have treated flatterers elsewhere. I warn only that flattery is fitting to no one less than to an Ambassador, both because he sustains the person of a Prince, whom it is impious to cast down and reduce to the rank of parasites, and because he cannot deceive, since he is judged to say nothing from his true mind. For unless flattery deceives, it harms its author. Whatever he has said in praise of the Prince is celebrated throughout the entire Court, not without addition, and is therefore carried out into public and brought to the Prince who sent him. Timagoras was accused because, contrary to the institutions of his fatherland, he had adored the King of the Persians. Demacles was fined ten talents because he had worshiped Alexander as a god.

[Printed page 619]

Aphorism 9. Let him regulate ceremonies in such a way that he is not ridiculed for being excessive in them and therefore becomes wearisome. For that excessive elegance of gestures belongs to a dissembler and hypocrite. Now the observance of ceremonies in going, sitting, addressing, and visiting is reckoned almost among the principal cares of Ambassadors. Nor is it remarkable that no less danger arises from those empty things than from an embassy badly conducted. Even if he has conducted the affair for which he was sent most wisely, most faithfully, and indeed most successfully, if he has slipped in some ceremony, he will learn at his own peril how arduous it is to be an Ambassador. This is an ancient evil. Arsaces killed Orobazus because in a conference he had yielded the more honorable place to Sulla. But I omit these things. I ask all Princes not to be avengers of such errors: let them care for serious things and pass over empty ones.

Aphorism 10. The prudence of an Ambassador consists in this: that he not be captured by the immense allurement of ceremonies, honors, banquets, processions, and words, and that he not judge things which belong to deceit and mockery to be signs of love and reverence. Remember: pretense is more laborious than truth. It is arduous for an Ambassador to distinguish honor from mockery and kindness from fraud. Here the magnitude of the things which are offered must not be estimated, nor their prices; true courtesy, secure in its own sincerity, requires few things. A genuine thole-pin is made by easy art; a painted one is completed by much labor and varied color. But what are the signs of true honor, and what the indications of mockery? The matter will disclose itself to a prudent man. If the honor is excessive, it is false. If the Prince does not love the Ambassador, no one among the ministers speaks well of him in his absence; no one honors him except feignedly. He will discover this through his own ministers and the servants of other chief men. He himself will also consider with no lack of care the causes of the honor which is due.

Aphorism 11. Above all, he will avoid pride, a vice hateful in all men; but when it is seen in an Ambassador, it impedes the conduct of affairs and then brings infamy upon the Prince. For what sort of Prince can endure so swollen a minister? Why did they send so insane a man to us? Are these the customs of that whole nation? Is it not better to wage war with such men than to tolerate their arrogance? Indeed, let him also consider that all pride is akin to folly. Its origin teaches that it is no small portion of folly, for pride is contained in three very great faults: ignorance of oneself, of others, and of human affairs. It obscures reason, so that it not only judges nothing well but disturbs judgment in the most perverse manner. Concerning his own affairs let him relate nothing, and concerning the affairs of his Prince let him relate everything, with moderation--but very rarely. Let him never dare to censure the vices of the nation among which he dwells. Each is hateful: the former through a display of power, the latter through reproaching vices. It was truly said:

Ἀλαζονείας οὔτις ἐκφεύγει δίκην.

No one escapes the punishment of boastfulness. The first punishment is that a braggart is not believed; the second, that he is hated.

Aphorism 12. In presenting the demands of his Prince, let him be industrious and announce his arrival promptly. No answer was given to the Ambassadors of the Illyrians because they had not announced themselves to the Senate. In exacting an answer, let him be neither inflexible, as Popilius was when he drew a circle around Antiochus, nor disdainful, like Callicratides. Sent by the Spartans to Cyrus to request money as a loan, Callicratides preferred to depart without accomplishing the affair rather than request a conference three times. Princes are necessarily offended by so unyielding a manner of proceeding. For what sort of disposition was that of Xenocrates, who declared that he would take no food before an answer was given? The servant of Abraham had done this previously; but matters had then advanced so that they recognized all things as divinely ordained.

Aphorism 13. It has been asked whether an Ambassador may receive gifts. Some employ a distinction: gifts offered for the sake of kindness, not for corruption, can be accepted. But this is not the state of the controversy. For it is fixed and settled that it is lawful for no good man to accept gifts for the sake of corrupting either fidelity or justice; and therefore it is not necessary to admonish an Ambassador concerning this. The question, accordingly, concerns gifts which are given for the sake of honor and friendship alone. Some permit them, others deny them. Truth lies in the middle way. Sometimes they must be refused; at other times they must be accepted.

Aphorism 14. Although gifts are offered under the appearance of kindness and honor, nevertheless, if there is a suspicion that something else also lies concealed--namely, that they are being brought up like battering-rams, by a secret device, to shake fidelity loose--they must altogether be rejected. For in this matter not only sin but even ruinous suspicions are dangerous. It is foreign to the duty of a good and prudent man to nourish such wicked hopes; certainly, those who hope that he can be corrupted condemn him as a wicked man. Accordingly, an Ambassador will never squander his reputation here by placing it after money. In this class there is always also the danger that he may be punished by his own state--even if not as unfaithful, nevertheless as one whom it rightly holds suspect. Those suspicions extend very widely: they belong first to the Ambassador himself, then to the state, his companions, hosts, rivals, and those who may at some time become enemies and therefore slanderers, against all of whom the gifts will sometimes have to be defended. Demosthenes most excellently refused Philip’s gifts; Aeschines most wickedly accepted them. Pelopidas laudably despised the royal gifts of the Persians; Timagoras paid for those he accepted with death.

Aphorism 15. When gifts are forbidden by the law of the fatherland, they must never be accepted. At Athens and Corinth it was provided by severe laws that an Ambassador should not accept gifts. The Most Serene State of the Venetians imitates these laws even today. The Romans gave gifts to Ambassadors coming to them and did not forbid their own Ambassadors to be honored with gifts, except when they were suspect, as when they were offered by Pyrrhus, Antiochus, or Jugurtha.

Nevertheless, it is very rare that the fidelity of Ambassadors is attacked openly and, as it were, by manifest bargaining. Men employ a more concealed art: they allege benevolence and their estimation of the virtue shining in the Ambassador. From four classes of arguments he will readily conjecture which are true gifts, which suspect, and which ἄδωρα, no gifts in truth: from the person of each Prince, from his own person, and from the kind of gifts.

Suspicion arises from the person of the giver if a rival who is parsimonious or needy makes great largesses; if he does so beyond custom, law, or usage; if he has not given to others or has given less; if he did not formerly love the Ambassador and the embassy carries with it no occasion for new love; if he extends singular favor to him; if he asks for services in general; if the Ambassador can bring him an advantage; or if the Ambassador is confident that he can assign no cause for the unusual liberality except that a return service must be rendered.

[Printed page 620]

Next, he will consider the person of the Prince by whom he was sent. Is that Prince accustomed to be generous toward Ambassadors? Does he do this gratuitously and from benevolence, or in truth so that he may capture Councillors? For what he himself does, he will suspect is done by others. Is he accustomed to rejoice if he receives his own men enriched by gifts? Is he suspicious by nature? To this also pertains the mind and judgment of the Councillors, who very often envy their colleagues. No matter is nearer to slander than when the ministers of Princes are beholden to other Princes, especially rivals. Indeed, things which are approved at present are rendered criminal by a change of times. An apology of the aged Barnevelt has been published, in which he complains sorrowfully that gifts received by him from the Spanish after the truce was made are cast against him, while others who had received no smaller gifts are not even named. But calamity made this man guilty; fortune raised the others. And so those glittering with Spanish gold condemned the wretched man for the gold he had taken. For when a man is falling, even accidental things--and indeed clothes and arms, which customarily afford protection--drive him down more violently.

From his own person he will gather the mind of another. He should be suspicious if the favor is neither pleasing nor proportionate to the gifts; if otherwise he labors under suspicion of δωροδοκίας, bribery, or of avarice; if he sees men more worthy than himself neglected; if he perceives that he possesses very great influence with the Prince, or that others judge it so. For if a corrupted man is thought to possess little influence, they do not judge the crime worth the trouble. I saw a certain Councillor ruined for this reason: when his Prince had turned aside to a wealthy city, all the others were indeed received honorably, but he alone was cultivated by private banquets and gifts, though not openly, and was chosen, as it were, as guardian of the city. When this was made known at Court, it brought indignation, suspicion, investigation, and finally destruction.

As regards gifts, two kinds are suspect: immense and perpetual. Immense gifts are enticements or wages of perfidy--for example, if one hundred thousand gold pieces are given to a man who could have been sent back content with a golden cup, or if a perpetual pension of ten thousand is established for one to whom a capital of ten thousand appears to be a great income. These are earnest-payments for perfidy and covenants of servitude. Princes are not customarily so profuse as to pay out one hundred thousand if they can discharge the obligation with ten thousand, especially since liberality toward one man is drawn into a precedent by comparison both among subjects and among foreigners. The most suspect of all are secret gifts. But they can be concealed by Ambassadors only with the greatest difficulty. For although none of their friends learns of them, they are certainly known to the Councillors of the man who gave them. I remember that, when a great man, though not impregnable to gold, had received from a Prince an immense silver vessel and delivered it to his wife for safekeeping, not without praise of the giver, she imprudently disclosed the matter. For, setting the cup upon the ground, she placed her eight-year-old son beside it to test whether his stature equaled it. Without delay, the boy boasted among his companions concerning so great a cup and so great a friend of his father. The matter was learned by rivals; the cup was brought forth, and the man was cast down from his dignity.

Aphorism 16. If those causes are absent, gifts can and sometimes ought to be accepted, lest either the gifts themselves or the Princes appear to be despised. Gifts are customarily given even to enemy Ambassadors, and this appears, as it were, an ornament attached to the law of nations: although they come from an enemy and return to an enemy, they are not only safe but also honored. For they are mediators of peace, and although peace is not concluded, the will for peace is nevertheless worthy of reward. Indeed, even if they come to declare war, for that declaration too belongs to common justice, and the man who comes to declare war first proposes conditions of peace.

I shall add one thing. I have seen immense royal gifts which made an Ambassador an enemy. For when the man heard himself ill-spoken of among his own people because of the gold he had accepted, to remove that suspicion he everywhere opposed the interests of the King and endeavored to prove his alienation to his own Prince by casting forth reproaches and insults. So slippery a matter it is to tempt the fidelity of another man's minister with gifts.

Aphorism 17. It is the duty of an Ambassador to reread and meditate most diligently upon his mandate or instruction. If any question arises, let him ask. If it contains a perplexed judgment and conceals the mind of the Prince, let him refuse the embassy in whatever manner he can, lest he be held in mockery. If he possesses free mandates, the greatest care is needed so that he may know the mind of the Prince. If they are certain and defined, he ought not to pass beyond their bounds--not only lest he offend the Prince, but much more lest he appear to have corrected the Councillors. For although the Prince, appeased by the fortunate outcome of affairs, will hold as ratified and pleasing that which was performed better abroad than it had been deliberated at home, nevertheless some of the Councillors will grieve more at the correction of their own judgments than at the public loss which was feared from them. For from this they foretell disgrace for themselves and advancement for another. To most men the public good is of less value than private good. Those who wish to slander will not lack an occasion. Aelian relates in book 6 that Ambassadors of the Athenians who had successfully completed an affair in Arcadia were killed for this reason alone: that they returned by a road different from the one they had been ordered to take. Accordingly, it will rarely be lawful to depart from a mandate, for one man will not without danger change that which was deliberated long and much in a common council.

Aphorism 18. Nevertheless, circumstances sometimes occur such that the mind of the Prince must be preserved and no account taken of the mandate. First, new mandates suited to the affairs to be conducted must be awaited. If the matter requires speed, the will of the Prince must be obeyed rather than his word. This is what the Athenians customarily added as a final clause: if the Ambassadors could accomplish any other good thing, they should do it. Some extend this to whatever can render the affair of the one giving the mandate better; but it is hazardous. For Princes often serve reputation and other things more than their own advantage.

ADAM CONTZEN

TEN BOOKS OF POLITICS

BOOK EIGHT

On the Power of the State

CONTENTS

Chapter I. The Definition of Human Power; Its Weakness 4

Chapter II. The Prince Ought to Study the Acquisition and Increase of Power 8

Chapter III. Power Is Twofold: Domestic and External 13

Chapter IV. In What Power Consists, and Concerning Its Head, Which Is Authority 14

Chapter V. That Riches Must Be Sought for the Prince 17

Chapter VI. Various Methods of Acquiring Riches 22

Chapter VII. That Tributes Are Lawfully Paid, and Their Measure 24

Chapter VIII. Personal Services Are No Less Useful Than Tribute 37

Chapter IX. Good Household Management Is an Honorable Road to Wealth and Troublesome to No One 41

Chapter X. Commerce Must Be Increased 45

Chapter XI. Agriculture Must Above All Be Cared For and Honored 58

Chapter XII. That the prince must seek out the valuable products of things dug from the earth 67

Chapter XIII. Thrift Is the Greatest Revenue 71

Chapter XIV. Power Is Marvelously Increased by Sumptuary Laws 74

Chapter XV. Other Honorable Means, Useful to Subjects, by Which the Resources of the State Are Strengthened 87

Chapter XVI. Methods of Collecting Money Recounted by Aristotle in Book Two of the Economics, and Other Similar Methods 93

Chapter XVII. Unjust Methods of Amassing Money 107

Chapter XVIII. Those Who Need a Loan Should Be Assisted in Another Manner 124

Chapter XIX. Other Methods of Collecting Money, as Customary as They Are Condemned 127

Chapter XX. The Defense of the Nobility Makes a Prince Powerful 132

Chapter XXI. Power Is Stable When Provisions Have Been Collected for Use 147

Chapter XXII. The Principal Power Lies in Strong and Populous Cities 152

Chapter XXIII. Fortresses Are Useful and Necessary for Preserving Power 155

Chapter XXIV. Treaties Contribute Very Greatly to Power 165

CHAPTER I

The Definition of Human Power; Its Weakness

§ 1. Power is the faculty, furnished with suitable means, for preserving one's own things and obtaining another's; thus the Roman orator describes power for us. That thing is constituted by many things: resources, arms, men, provisions, cities, citadels, and prudence rightly using all these.

§ 2. All human power is spoken of comparatively. For whoever is powerful by comparison with inferiors will perceive himself to be weak if he wishes to assail one greater than himself. Rams rush together and contend for mastery of the flock; yet before the wolf victor and vanquished alike become prey. He too, when he has filled his maw with the tender flock, will perish by the tooth of a lion or bear. Adonibezek saw seventy mutilated kings crawling beneath his table; but he suffered from one more powerful what he himself had inflicted as an evil upon the weaker. The stronger Carthaginians oppress Messana and the Sicilians, but they provoke the more powerful Roman enemy, until, after the seas and islands had been taken away, they paid tribute, and then lost their city also and their liberty. Philip the Macedonian--not the ancient one, but he whom the Romans conquered--harasses Athens with tyrannical domination, having abused his power against that noble city; but Roman power, already the conqueror of Carthage, shattered it, so that Macedonia became a modest possession of so great an empire.

Nor, for the most part, could those who seemed more powerful than their neighbors recognize their own strength until some greater monarch restrained them as they raged fiercely. For nearly all those have been the fates of nations: while they devote themselves to increasing power, they lose liberty. In the time of our grandfathers also, while all the cities of Italy attacked one another in war, contended about power, and led forth their proud carrocci, they passed into the power of a few.

§ 3. Great power can exist only in a great state. Yet the greatest kingdoms are frequently weak, and moderate ones more powerful. For just as those bodies whose mass is taller are not the strongest, but those which possess symmetry and vigor, so also those vast bodies of lands must be estimated by their character, position, and other circumstances, not by their extent. In great kingdoms this very greatly breaks their power: when one part is weakened or rebels. Just as the pain of one limb not only torments the sick man with its own evil but also casts down the mind, the ruler of the body, and corrupts the functions of the other limbs, so also, in this vast mass, the estrangement or tumult of one province disturbs even faithful cities. We have heard that this occurred formerly, and in our own time we experience that by the rebellion of one province, which is scarcely the hundredth part of a kingdom, the peace of all parts is disturbed and all expenditure is devoted to one.

§ 4. But what is powerful? What is not powerful? Who is worthy of so great a name that he is not only powerful but even most powerful? "Because I have not known letters, I shall enter into the powers of the Lord." ספרות ידעתי כי־לא, "I have not known γραμματείαν," as the Seventy render it, or, as others, "σοφισματείαν"--human and crafty wisdom, which seems to itself to govern empires--"I shall enter into the powers of the Lord," which have made every power. "I shall declare his wonders, the power and justice of God even unto the highest places." For this is true power; the power of men is wretched, since it depends upon the slightest moments.

If it is confined within narrow borders, it is wholly concentrated in itself, and when war arises in the neighborhood, it fights concerning its entire safety and its head. If it has peoples subject to it under a broad dominion, it lies open to a wound in many parts and is entangled in perpetual labor and innumerable dangers; for what region is added which does not bring new dangers with it? Do you command many? Yet you displease many; many hate you, and many are permitted many things against you and yours, without whom you cannot be safe. Demosthenes is reported to have said that, if two roads lay open, one to the lower regions and the other to the throne, he would choose that which leads to the lower regions. I believe that he did not speak sincerely; nevertheless, he showed that the ambition of those men is most wretched who through labors, dangers, and wounds climb a slippery, tottering summit, buffeted by thunderbolts and winds, where they can neither stand nor depart thence without a most conspicuous ruin, over which Fortune delights to exercise her command. For how many, not only kings but even peoples, have stood upon a lofty summit so that they seem to have obtained no other advantage than that the sound of their regal collapse might be heard farther?

For although power may be great, it is not certainly lasting. While Epaminondas lived, the Thebans' quasi-dominion over the Lacedaemonians was brief. When they boasted of it, Cotys used to say that the power of the Thebans was like a torrent which quickly dries up, while that of the Spartans endures after the fashion of a perennial river. This was said truly of the Thebans; of the Spartans, more by comparison than according to the truth. For although that torrent endured longer than the Boeotian, it nevertheless did not flow for long. The Eurotas saw Sparta rising, endangered, ruling, enslaved, finally destroyed, and now sees tamarisks where Sparta was.

[Printed page 622]

The names of the ancient kingdoms have long since ceased; and where they are retained, the peoples are different. No power is fixed; great empires migrate. Monarchy began in the East and reached its summit in Nebuchadnezzar: the head of gold ends in the breast and arms of silver; these are followed by the belly and thighs of bronze, which end in legs of iron and clay. Daniel 2. Meanwhile not Fortune, but God, turns this wheel; whoever holds the higher places upon it necessarily now descends: there is no rest, or only a brief one. But while entire kingdoms change more slowly, how many kings perish in the meantime? How few fulfill their own fate? And is he powerful whom fever burns, quinsy strangles, dropsy suffocates, and--to speak briefly--as many hundreds of diseases as there are members kill? Zoroaster seemed powerful, but is killed while his power looks on; Ninus, after conquering him, was pierced by an arrow; Cyrus drank blood from Tomyris's skin-bag. Artabanus killed Xerxes, his friends Darius, domestic enemies Alexander, and his fellow banqueters Antiochus. Indeed, in our own time Henry IV, a king great in wisdom, in war, and--what is chief--in clemency, after he had assembled a great army and filled all Europe with fear or hope, was slaughtered by a fanatic among his bodyguards.

§ 5. Since, therefore, every power is brief and weak, it must be used sparingly--not so that it may be lasting, as Cato advised, but lest it be most brief. Golden is the saying of Pertinax: "It is holier, Conscript Fathers, to govern a needy state than to arrive at a heap of riches through dangers and the footprints of disgrace." The first good of power, therefore, is its moderate use. The second is that you not attempt things greater than your strength and hope for Fortune as helper--something which, although it sometimes does not turn out badly, is nevertheless never undertaken without the fault of rashness. Finally, do not consume power without cause upon those things which do not increase it, as Cyrus did when he divided the Gyndes into 365 streams and consumed the season for waging war in digging channels; as Caesar did when, neglecting the main issue, he wore down his army at Massilia:

> Although we hasten toward the western axis of the world,
>
> there is leisure to destroy Massilia.

Yet surely there would not have been leisure if Pompey the Great had been able to use that opportunity. I give this warning because it has always happened: great things rush against themselves. Consider Roman power: after it ceased to have an equal, it was divided against itself. That Rome-- > than which the aether embraces nothing higher upon earth, > whose extent no sight, whose beauty no hearts,

>
>
> whose praise no voice contains; which, with the gleam of metal, > joins roofs rivaling the neighboring stars;
>
>
> parent of arms and laws, which pours dominion upon all and first gave the cradle of law.

She it is who, sprung from narrow bounds, stretched toward the twin poles, and, setting forth from a small seat, spread her hands together with the Sun. Meeting the fates, while she waged innumerable wars at one time, laid low the Gaul on land and the Carthaginian on the sea,

she never succumbed to losses; terrified by no wound, after Cannae and the Trebia she raged greater.

Nevertheless, she consumed all her strength, not upon the winds--which is foolish--but upon her own entrails--which is most monstrous--until she went to serve barbarians, Heruli, Alans, Goths, Vandals, and Lombards.

§ 6. There is no surer sign of how weak the pillars are upon which human power rests, and how worn its strength is, than that the greatest empires have always fallen, not by a violent hand, but through slight circumstances and a trivial occasion. But what depends upon a changeable occasion is weak. Curio transferred the Roman Empire from the Senate to the Caesars, and he had no other cause for war than the magnitude of his debt. Thence it passed to Augustus because Cicero, they said, had repeatedly said that the boy must be praised and raised up. Offended by that expression, Octavian estranged himself from the Senate, because he declared that he would not permit himself to be removed. Claudius was then made Emperor when a few soldiers dragged him from hiding. And thus the bloody tragedy continued throughout the Roman world, with the greatest battles inclining to one side at a single word or gesture. There scarcely seems, therefore, to be any place for power which upon so many occasions ceases to be power.

§ 7. As I consider all these things, it comes to my mind that nothing in human affairs is more wonderful than the providence of God governing occasions; for the power of human affairs, even when greatest, is overthrown by a small occasion. Hannibal came into Italy. His army, coming from the sun and the south after breaking through the Alps, could easily have been conquered by the Romans, but every opportunity was let pass. Through no one’s care was he prevented from crossing the river, entering Italy, and refreshing his army. Hannibal seizes every opportunity: he chooses a cold day; he conceals his cavalry with fog and brushwood; finally at Cannae he even fought with dust, wind, and sun. Behold, power and army would have availed nothing unless he had conquered by the occasion of thorn-thickets, fogs, rains, cold, wind, and dust. Rome was now in the greatest alarm, and it would have been her last day if Hannibal had wished to use his victory; but he neglected the opportunity, and Rome was saved not by her own strength but by the enemy’s imprudence.

The empire of the Turk seems formidable to many, but in truth it grew strong by opportunity alone, and even now protects itself by our discord. Heraclius gave an opportunity to Muhammad when, in place of pay, he inflicted insults upon the Saracen soldier whose faithful service he had used. The Saracens then grew, and the Turcomans subdued them. At last the family of the Ottomans occupied Asia while two Andronici, grandfather and grandson, contended with one another; it was easy to conquer the divided. Then the dissensions of those same Greeks, and of Cantacuzenus and Palaeologus, made Orchan powerful. Palaeologus all but delivered Greece into the hand of Amurath. The rebellious Greeks hated their Emperor; in order to restrain them, he called in Amurath, who came as avenger of the sedition and obtained the empire of Greece--a robber in place of a helper. Tamerlane subdued Bayezid. When Calepinus had recovered himself from flight, the nobles of the Greeks aided the desperate affairs of the Ottomans, although that empire could have been destroyed in one battle; and so Muhammad soon turned the strength of the Greeks against themselves. But while Amurath II was reigning, those Greeks first equipped his uncle and then his young brother as an adversary. Such was the madness and softness of the Constantinopolitans that they preferred to equip barbarians with arms, money, and men rather than arm themselves. Thereafter, although they abounded in resources, they were conquered because they were unwilling to expend them upon enlisting soldiers.

That enemy is now feared by us because we provide him opportunity through seditions, civil wars, and heresies.

[Printed page 623]

We also provide him opportunity through distrust. Nor does he lack spirit, but he is wearied by the Persians. Nothing is readier than that he be called in as an ally by one of those at discord. The Greeks did this; the Hungarians did this; and they paid the penalty of destruction. Earlier Alfonso II and Ludovico Sforza called in Bayezid against the French and Venetians. Indeed, in the time of Francis I, King of France, and Henry II, they summoned his fleet--and its plunder--to the Ligurian Sea through our discord. There survives a speech of the British ambassador before the Turk in which he exhorts him, together with his queen, to turn his arms against the Spaniard. Therefore, a kingdom exposed to so many occasions of adversity cannot be called powerful.

§ 8. But neither is the Turkish kingdom powerful. If the Hungarian war had been continued, the Turk could easily have been driven from his kingdom with moderate preparation. The Hajduks defend themselves against him in Pannonia; the Cossacks in Poland voluntarily bring arms against him; the Arabs keep everything hostile. At present nothing sustains him in Europe except our sloth, because we do not use the opportunity.

CHAPTER II

The Prince Ought to Study the Acquisition and Increase of Power

§ 1. In matters so uncertain and fluid, counsel and reason must be employed. For although states never perish except when their counsels are corrupt, even good counsels can nevertheless be ineffectual and lack success. But, as I have said, no state has perished except through corrupted counsels; for I have not yet found an example to the contrary. Hence it belongs to the prince and senate always to think about stabilizing, strengthening, and increasing power, and to contrive that there be no day upon which something is not added to the strength of the state. For although most things depend upon occasions, the weak are nevertheless struck most severely; the less powerful you are, the more is exacted from you. The blow which casts down the languid rouses the strong, and that which extorts prayers from the sluggish awakens the strength of the angry. Nothing among mortal things is so fluid as power, but it must be held in many ways lest it flow from one's hands. Health too is a fluid thing, which cannot subsist without the proper tempering and integrity of so many limbs and humors, and, besides these, the wholesomeness of air and food; yet it is not therefore neglected, but is preserved with great care and expense.

§ 2. A just method of acquiring power must be entered upon. For those who inflict injury upon inferiors and then, increased by their strength, subjugate others to their dominion, act altogether unjustly. And they build power upon a fragile foundation--that is, upon injustice. For unbridled power commits many evils, and therefore easily collapses.

§ 3. The reason why power must be acquired is evident: because without it we cannot protect our fatherland. For since the number of the covetous and wicked is very great, the state cannot break injustice without power. Subjects, therefore, will be prey, exposed to the insolence, rapacity, violence, and cruelty of all; nor will the princes themselves be safe, but they will be objects of contempt and will reign on sufferance. For the right of rule without power is like a body without a soul: it is a statue, not a living thing. Therefore, since government has been instituted to defend all and each from injury and, if they have been harmed, to avenge and restore them to their former condition, and to preserve the society of citizens, a nerveless and powerless prince can by no means attain this end. Those men, therefore, do not act prudently who so establish a state that it cannot be safe from neighboring princes, pirates, and robbers except by the power of another. Justice surely requires a strong patron and an unconquered champion.

Let that king according to the heart of God, King and Prophet David, be for us an example of acquiring power. His power in a kingdom not very great seems to me almost greater than the forces of all kings. For in addition to the people he maintained a great number of soldiers. Thus it is described in 1 Chronicles, chapter 27: "Now the sons of Israel according to their number, the princes of families, tribunes and centurions, and officers who ministered to the king according to their companies, entering and departing month by month throughout the year, were each set over twenty-four thousand. Over the first company in the first month was Jesboam, the son of Zabdiel, and under him were twenty-four thousand. Of the sons of Perez, he was chief of all the captains in the army in the first month. The second month had the company of Dudia the Ahohite, and after him another named Macelloth, who governed a part of the army of twenty-four thousand. The captain also of the third company in the third month was Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada the priest, and in his division were twenty-four thousand. This is that Benaiah who was the mightiest among the thirty and over the thirty; and over his own company was Amizabad his son. The fourth, in the fourth month, was Asahel the brother of Joab, and Zebadiah his son after him; and in his company were twenty-four thousand. The fifth, in the fifth month, was the captain Shamhuth the Izrahite; and in his company were twenty-four thousand. The sixth, in the sixth month, was Ira the son of Ikkesh the Tekoite; and in his company were twenty-four thousand. The seventh, in the seventh month, was Helez the Pelonite, of the sons of Ephraim; and in his company were twenty-four thousand. The eighth, in the eighth month, was Sibbecai the Hushathite, of the stock of Zerah; and in his company were twenty-four thousand. The ninth, in the ninth month, was Abiezer the Anathothite, of the sons of Jemini; and in his company were twenty-four thousand. The tenth, in the tenth month, was Maharai, also a Netophathite, of the stock of Zerah; and in his company were twenty-four thousand. The eleventh, in the eleventh month, was Benaiah the Pirathonite, of the sons of Ephraim; and in his company were twenty-four thousand. The twelfth, in the twelfth month, was Heldai the Netophathite, of the stock of Othniel; and in his company were twenty-four thousand."

Behold, a guard for the royal court--twenty-four thousand, in addition to the ordinary attendants, ministers, and throng. To what end was this multitude? First, to uphold royal dignity; for who would rebel when he saw so many garrisons in the cities and an army in the palace? Second, that he might be feared by his neighbors, for they were very brave men; for whatever brave and industrious man he saw, he associated that man with himself. Third, by this means he made the royal city illustrious. Fourth, he conciliated for himself the love of the tribes. Fifth, he fostered the study of arms, for in that splendor of the kingdom, in the sight of the brave, they exercised themselves in that battle line of the praetorian soldiery. And zeal for military affairs was kindled in a wonderful manner when the tribes contended concerning the adornment of arms and skill. Sixth, by this occasion also, in the royal city, where there was an abundance of priests and learned men, they were most easily instructed in religion. Nor did David sin against the divine precept; for he had gathered resources and a bodyguard for the protection of his subjects and the restraint of peoples whom he had subjugated by war, without injury to the Israelites.

But why do I speak of David? Behold Jehoshaphat, king of two tribes, Judah and Benjamin. His power is described in this manner in 2 Chronicles 17:14: "There were also warriors and strong men in Jerusalem, whose number by the houses and families of each was this. In Judah, the captains of the army: Adnah the captain, and with him three hundred thousand very strong men. After him Jehohanan the captain, and with him two hundred and eighty thousand. After him also Amasiah the son of Zichri, consecrated to the Lord, and with him two hundred thousand brave men. He was followed by Eliada, strong for battles, and with him two hundred thousand bearing bow and shield. After him also Jehozabad, and with him one hundred and eighty thousand soldiers equipped for war. All these were at the king's hand, besides others whom he had placed in walled cities throughout all Judah."

[Printed page 624]

Who would not marvel at 1,160,000 men in that kingdom? Nor was that soldiery in garrisons, but at the king's hand; for by turns it attended the court and was sent upon sudden business. The text expressly excepts the garrison soldiers--those in the cities and throughout all Judah.

In the same chapter, verse 2, there are other garrison soldiers in the captured cities: "And he stationed numbers of soldiers in all the cities of Judah which were fortified with walls."

When I consider these things, they would seem to me almost incredible if Scripture did not say them; and then what is said about Roman greatness seems small. For the king maintained these soldiers without tyranny and did not exhaust his subjects with tribute, but filled them with an abundance of all things. "Moreover, he built in Judah houses after the fashion of towers and walled cities." God bestowed so great a power upon a single kingdom which afterward was an appendage of a single province of Syria--how small a part of the Roman Empire? But he who is truly powerful displayed such great power in so small a kingdom. For so far was he from emptying the treasury with so great an army, contracting debt, attacking towns, and selling rights and immunity that he accumulated treasures besides. For verse 13 says: "And he prepared many works in the cities of Judah." The Hebrew has, "and he had much work"; καὶ τὰ ἔργα πολλὰ ἐγένετο αὐτῷ. It calls the buildings בירניות, for they are palaces, temples, edifices. Thus in Ezra 8:2, ἐν τῇ βάρει τῶν Μήδων, and Daniel 8:2, "I was in Susa, in the palace," ἐν βάρει. בירה also frequently signifies a city, 1 Chronicles 29. "For the palace is not for man." Therefore it is just as though he said that he built palatial buildings, lofty and towered. They think that בירניות is said from אבר, because they are strong. Then "walled cities," ὀχυρὰς; the Hebrew has מסכנות, "of treasures," because treasures were stored in fortified places. Then those soldiers were not barbarians or unwarlike, but חיל גבורי, "of robust strength," verses 14 and 16; and in verse 17, two hundred thousand armed with bow and shield. Verse 18 has צבא חלוצי, “girded or equipped for war,” words by which brave, trained, and well-armed soldiers are designated.

What, therefore, if he had been obliged to fight against Alexander the Great or the most powerful Romans? Surely he would have been equal or superior; for he was more powerful than all of them in this respect: although fortified by so great a soldiery, he was nevertheless rich. Verse 5: “And riches and glory were made infinite for him.” Indeed, he gave his sons many gifts of silver, gold, and precious things, with fortified cities--מצורות, ערי מבצר--“with cities of fortifications.” He was therefore continually able, in addition to the garrisons of the cities, to maintain 1,160,000 brave men; and he did this in time of peace, while he gathered resources. What, then, in time of war? Yet, when he heard that neighboring nations were rising up, he was afraid, proclaimed a fast, and conquered by prayer. 2 Chronicles, chapter 20. This is what I warn: so powerful a king set, not his treasury as his power, but his face to seek God, who fought for him and left to him only the labor of gathering the spoils for three days. He feared that, if the Lord were not with him, all that force would collapse upon itself, just as happened in the enemy camps. Thus Scripture, 2 Chronicles, chapter 20, verse 22.

§ 4. Concerning power, this must especially be warned: that its timely use not be delayed until it is diminished; that if an enemy attacks, he be repelled with the whole effort; if wicked citizens rebel, they be restrained at the very onset, while their counsels still waver in uncertainty. The Romans formerly erred gravely in estimating their strength during the Second Punic War, but at last, with great spirit, they corrected the error for which they paid with much blood. Florus weighs the matter well in book 2, chapter 6:

> Meanwhile the Roman began to breathe again and, as it were, to rise from the dead. There were no arms: they were stripped from the temples. Youth was lacking: slaves were freed into the military oath. The treasury was in need: the Senate willingly brought its wealth into the common stock, and, beyond what was in their amulets, belts, and rings, they left themselves nothing of gold. The equestrian order followed the example, and the tribes imitated the knights; finally, the tablets and the hands of the scribes scarcely sufficed, when, in the consulship of Laevinus and Marcellus, private wealth was conveyed into the public treasury.
>
> And in electing magistrates, what wisdom of the centuries there was, when the younger sought counsel from the older concerning the creation of consuls! For against an enemy so often victorious and so crafty it was necessary to fight not only with courage but also with his own counsels. Fabius was the first hope of a returning and, so to speak, reviving empire: he devised a new victory over Hannibal--not to fight. Hence came that new surname, salutary to the state, “the Delayer”; hence that saying from the people, that he should be called the shield of the empire. Thus throughout all Samnium, through the Falernian and Gauran passes, he so wore down Hannibal that the man who could not be broken by courage was diminished by delay. Thereafter, under the leadership of Claudius Marcellus, Rome even dared to engage him: it came to close quarters, drove him from its Campania, and struck him away from the siege of the city of Nola. Then, under the leadership of Sempronius Gracchus, it dared to follow him through Lucania and press upon the rear of the retreating man, although at that time--O shame!--it fought with a servile hand.
>
> O dreadful confidence amid so many adversities! O singular spirit and courage of the Roman people! When its affairs were so constrained and afflicted that it was doubtful about its own Italy, nevertheless it dared to look in different directions; and while enemies flew at its throat through Campania and Apulia, and were already making Africa out of the middle of Italy, at the same time it both sustained this enemy and sent arms in diverse directions through the world--to Sicily, Sardinia, and Spain. Sicily was entrusted to Marcellus and did not resist for long. For the whole island was conquered in one city. That great head, Syracuse, undefeated before that time, although defended by the genius of Archimedes, at length yielded. Its triple wall, its equal number of citadels, its marble harbor, and the celebrated fountain of Arethusa--what did they avail except this much, that the beauty of the conquered city was spared?

Gracchus seized Sardinia. The fierceness of its people and the savagery of its “insane” mountains--for so they are called--availed it nothing. Violence was inflicted upon the cities and upon Cagliari, the city of cities, so that a stubborn people, holding death cheap, might at least be subdued by longing for its native soil. Gnaeus and Publius Scipio, sent into Spain, had taken almost all of it from the Carthaginians; but, crushed by the ambushes of Punic fraud, they lost it again. They indeed had cut down Punic resources in great battles, but Punic ambushes overwhelmed the one with the sword while he was laying out his camp, and the other, after he had escaped into a tower, by surrounding him with firebrands. Therefore Scipio, sent with an army to avenge his father and uncle--he for whom the fates had decreed so great a surname from Africa--recovered all that warlike Spain, renowned for men and arms, that nursery of the enemy army, that instructor of Hannibal, from the Pyrenees to the Pillars of Hercules and the Ocean--an incredible thing to say. You would not know whether he did it more quickly or more easily. Four years attest how quickly; even one city proves how easily: for on the same day on which it was besieged it was captured, and the fact that Spanish Carthage was conquered so easily was an omen of the African victory.

[Printed page 625]

Yet it is certain that the singular chastity of the commander contributed especially to subduing the province; for he restored to the barbarians captive boys and girls of surpassing beauty, and did not even permit them to be brought into his sight, lest he should seem to have touched the integrity of their virginity even with his eyes.

Amid these operations in diverse lands stood the Roman people; yet for this reason it could not dislodge Hannibal, who clung to the entrails of Italy. Most cities had defected to the enemy, and that very fierce commander used Italian strength too against the Romans. Yet by now we had struck him out of most towns and regions. Tarentum had now returned to us; Capua too--the seat, home, and second fatherland of Hannibal--was held. Its loss caused the Carthaginian commander such grief that thence he turned all his strength against Rome. O people worthy of command over the world, worthy of the favor and admiration of all men and gods! Driven to the extremity of fear, it did not desist from its undertaking; anxious about its own city, it nevertheless did not abandon Capua, but, leaving part of the army under the consul Appius and sending part with Flaccus to the city, it fought at once absent and present.

Why, then, do we marvel? When Hannibal moved his camp from the third milestone, the gods themselves--for a second time, the gods, I say, nor shall it shame me to confess it--gave testimony. For at each of his movements so great a force of rain was poured down, so great a violence of winds arose, that the enemy seemed to be driven off by divine agency, not from heaven but from the very walls of the city and from the Capitol. And so he fled, yielded, and withdrew into the farthest gulf of Italy, leaving the city all but assaulted. A small matter to tell, but sufficiently effective to prove the greatness of spirit of the Roman people: during those very days in which it was besieged, the field which Hannibal occupied with his camp was offered for sale at Rome and, placed under the spear, found a buyer. Hannibal wished in turn to imitate their confidence; he offered the bankers’ shops of the city for sale, but no buyer was found, so that you may know that even the omens were sufficient.

Nothing had been accomplished by such courage and such favor even of the gods. For Hasdrubal, Hannibal’s brother, was coming from Spain with a new army, new strength, and a new weight of war. It was undoubtedly all over if that man had joined himself to his brother; but Claudius Nero, together with Livius Salinator, conquered this man too as he was pitching camp. Nero had driven Hannibal into the farthest corners of Italy. Livius had turned the standards toward an entirely opposite region and the very jaws of nascent Italy. With so great--that is, with the entire length of Italy--an expanse of soil lying between, it is difficult to say by what plan and speed the consuls joined their camps and, after bringing their standards together, crushed an unsuspecting enemy. Certainly, when Hannibal learned the matter and saw his brother’s severed head thrown before his camp, he said, “I recognize the misfortune of Carthage.” This was that man’s first confession, not without a certain foreboding of impending fate. But nothing was more wonderful than that, while Hannibal still clung to Italy, Scipio was sent into Africa.

These things Florus says, fully and truly, in praise of his Romans. But if at the beginning they had expended even half the care and expense, it would have been easy for them to rout Hannibal--indeed, to occupy Africa. Saguntum was captured; armies were lost at the Ticinus, Trebia, Trasimene, and Cannae; cities of Italy were alienated, captured, and turned against the Romans; fields were devastated and villas burned. Only then did they fight in earnest and send armies into Africa. Ought this not to have been done at the beginning? Upon hearing that Saguntum was being besieged, they ought to have prepared a strong army for Spain, a stronger one to meet Hannibal, and the strongest to attack Africa. This was easy while their affairs were intact; after they had been cut down it was arduous, but nevertheless it was done.

Greater was the error of the Constantinopolitan emperors throughout the time when Turkish power was growing. They never resisted it in earnest, though the error could still have been corrected around the time of the siege of Byzantium. For if Palaeologus had been willing to spend even the tenth part of his gold, he could have made from the Christian kingdoms an army equal to the Turkish one. But they brooded over buried gold, of which they were afterward not only stripped, but many were also cut to pieces by tortures so that they might reveal it. Nor was the error of the Christian kings smaller. There were six thousand Greek soldiers and three thousand Venetians and Genoese; in the harbor were seven Genoese ships, three Cretan, and some from Chios. The Venetian fleet looked on, as did all the Christian princes, who afterward paid great penalties for their negligence by the loss of so many kingdoms. But then, if each king had sent three ships, each prince one ship, and each city two soldiers as aid, we would still hold Greece, Macedonia, the islands, and Hungary. Yet we continue in the same error: we do not give a part of our resources in time to ward off the enemy, soon to give all. How slowly, how meagerly, and not without harsh conditions were subsidies decreed for the Hungarian war some years ago? I do not speak of those who secretly conspired with the Turk. And yet no one now doubts that, if Pannonia is occupied and the Hajduks and other Hungarians are let loose into Germany, we shall fight for all our fortunes and our liberty.

For if the power now necessary for the frontier princes is not assembled, after their provinces have been occupied they will oppress us by means of the resources seized and the nations conquered. Nor will those nations be gentler toward us, but will exact penalties for the aid denied them; and those who were first the shield of the German Empire will begin to be thorns in our sides. Let these observations suffice in general concerning the necessity of power and its just and timely use.

CHAPTER III

Power Is Twofold: Domestic and External

§ 1. Political writers distinguish a twofold power: domestic and external. Domestic power is directed against seditions, conspiracies, and rebellions of citizens which are against the state, the prince, the senate, or one part against another part. External power is directed against neighboring states or kings, either to repel or to inflict force.

§ 2. There cannot be firm power against an external enemy unless there is also power against an internal one. For every kingdom divided against itself will be made desolate, and house will fall upon house. For only a united city has strength against an enemy. For this reason the Romans, who were always unwarlike at home, if danger threatened, created a dictator and reduced everyone to order. But I have dealt with this subject when I treated monarchy and concord.

§ 3. Domestic power is acquired and preserved with greater difficulty than external power, because you will much more easily find one who conquers an enemy than one who governs a citizen. An enemy can be overcome by strength, stratagem, anger, vigilance, or fraud; a citizen is governed only by prudence and virtue.

§ 4. Hence there is no domestic power unless you are feared and loved. It is necessary to be feared, because no one will perform his duty from love if he loves himself more; but each person is more attached to himself than to another. Therefore, when the matter so falls out that your prosperity must be sought at his own danger, expense, and labor, each will begin his affection from himself and put the prince second. Yet it is necessary to be loved. For if the prince, the senate, or the state is in danger, no one will be afraid; for we do not fear those who themselves are afraid and are placed amid great difficulties. Therefore, when fear has been removed through contempt, if love is absent they will wholly desert the man whom they neither love nor fear; and if by chance they hate him, they will pursue him.

[Printed page 626]

§ 5. If I must speak the truth freely, the thought of all those who court power seems most foolish. For if they desire to be powerful solely for the public safety or the divine glory, so that they may protect the good and restrain the wicked, I praise their royal spirit, because it devotes its life to justice. For every dominion is of brief life. Ecclesiasticus, chapter 10, verse 11. Few non-Christian princes were safe from their own people; most were killed. There has been absolutely no one, among those who have merely tasted command, who did not endure many plots and conspiracies. Since I have demonstrated this by many examples, let us now treat of acquiring and increasing power.

CHAPTER IV

In What Power Consists, and Concerning Its Head, Which Is Authority

§ 1. The strength of the state consists in piety and the virtues; next, in those things which follow the virtues in government. The first of these is authority, or reputation and majesty; next, the love of the citizens; third, resources, arms, men, citadels, and cities--for the most prudent kings established these things as defenses of their subjects. Let us now treat of authority.

§ 2. When auctoritas is taken in its strict sense among the Romans, it is a judgment of the Senate made when, either because of the small number of senators, or because of tribunician intercession, or for some other cause, a senatus-consult could not be made. They deny that it has a Greek name, for αὐθεντία is something greater, and αὐθέντης is more than an author. For both in civil law and in common speech those things are called αὐθεντικὰ which possess no half-complete authority, or which have been confirmed and ratified by the supreme magistrate. For in truth αὐθεντία in law, unless it is ἐκ τῆς αὐτεξουσίας, from plenary power, is empty. Written authority, if I may so speak, has no authority today.

Majesty is akin to authority. For we are not treating strictly of majesty, which embraces five heads: the right of enacting and repealing laws, of war and peace, of tributes, of coinage, and of conferring magistracies. Rather, we take the authority and majesty of a prince for the esteem in which he is held, his reputation, and, as they now say, his good repute. This indeed is opposed to contempt, but nevertheless embraces many things: love, reputation, praise, fear, reverence, and the goods by which these are produced. That prince is most powerful who holds his subjects devoted to him by paternal power, and foreigners by reputation and esteem.

§ 3. Even a private man who neglects his reputation is cruel; but a prince is the guardian alike of his reputation and of his safety. It was truly said to this effect: “The resources of a ruler then become richer when he remits and acquires treasures of reputation, neglecting the utility of money.” And Augustine says, “He who, trusting in his conscience, neglects his reputation is cruel.” For in truth to attack a person’s reputation is a kind of homicide; but he who corrupts the reputation of the state is held guilty of a crime against majesty. You must therefore be solicitous for reputation if you delight to act as prince. “Praise is not to be blamed, but acting for its sake,” says the Bishop of Hippo. But I shall remove this scruple for you, O prince. A prince ought to act even for the sake of praise--not so that he may stop at an empty thing, for why would so great a man grasp at a shadow?--but so that he may use good reputation for the salvation of the people. For if we can gather money and kill men for the public good, why should the prince not seek reputation for that use? A field does not become better by being praised, and a shadow, the companion of the body, does not make it safer; but reputation alone nevertheless often makes a prince safe and the state secure.

More things are accomplished by opinion than by reality. What if there is so great an opinion of you that you disperse present battles, that an enemy does not dare provoke you, and that by terror alone you bring wars to an end? When Curios and popular agitators undermine and overthrow the state by disparaging the lives of kings and nobles, why will you not preserve it by your praise? Nor is it secret that the reputation of princes is burned by the flames of hatred and obscured by the cloud of envy. For there are always some whom a prince necessarily offends, and those men are not accustomed to speak well of one against whom they think themselves rightly angry. A prince must therefore labor so that public reputation overwhelms the little voices of private men. It is most quickly acquired; once lost, it is not rekindled; once firmly established, it endures even against vices. Solomon, already degenerate, nevertheless retained his kingdom through his reputation for wisdom; and if Rehoboam had wished to learn the first precepts of ruling, he would have handed it intact to his son also. Reputation is the companion of virtue, a benefit of God, with regard to which kingdoms are generally given and taken away. For the care of majesty belongs as much to virtue as does political order, which cannot exist without majesty.

§ 4. Therefore let the prince protect and increase his own greatness and loftiness, which the Greeks are accustomed to call σεμνότητα, so that in very fact he may be σεβάσιος, venerable. For this dignity of the state is not removed without loss to its safety. Unless a veneration of majesty, and an opinion that the prince is worthy of it, has been implanted in the minds of those who obey, the city has already received a wound greater than opinion; for soon those voices will resound: "Can this man save us?" Thus they neither desire him to be safe, since they hope their own affairs will be better through his death, nor undergo dangers for him, since they prefer themselves to him. By every means let him be so approachable that he nevertheless preserves dignity, provided that swelling does not pass under the name of dignity. Such swelling is in those who stride toward empty glory through their own and others' disasters--men of whom I have spoken elsewhere--who do not shudder to destroy entire nations for a few laurel leaves.

§ 5. You will acquire the reputation for power--which is almost as necessary as power itself--by the method which I shall transmit in this book: namely, that the things which you acquire for the public be known. Conscience will make you tranquil; virtue, good; reputation, known as excellent and venerable. The first thing, therefore, is that your life be such as the reputation you desire; for it is difficult in a prince, who stands in the sight of many, to wish to appear one thing and to be another. Although he may perhaps deceive some at some time, he will never deceive all. Hence no wicked man has long possessed a good reputation. Reputation is a great bridle upon those about to act badly when laws are neglected.

[Printed page 627]

Alexander valued reputation more highly than his deeds, yet he obtained a reputation as bad as it was great. What did Augustus not do for reputation? He fostered the talents of his age in every way, though he was offended if anything was composed about him except seriously and by the most excellent writers, as Tranquillus relates. Yet what was accomplished? Those encomia of Augustus by the most excellent writers have perished; more survives concerning his vices and disgraces. Therefore, even this part of reputation belongs to the prince: to cultivate virtue and not court reputation except insofar as it is salutary to the fatherland. For it is as dishonorable for virtue to be the slave of glory as of pleasures, unless through glory it serves the fatherland or God.

Nor do I approve Themistocles, whom the trophy of Miltiades roused. I would prefer that the love of his citizens had done it; but because he was far from a vain heart, he was incited to dangers by a tree trunk when he could not be incited by Athens, the nurse of virtues. This very substance of glory also must be avoided, as a mark of a petty spirit. By it Trajan, an emperor otherwise not numbered among the bad, made himself contemptible; for he inscribed his own name upon the buildings of the ancients whenever they had been restored, so that, not without reason, by the judgment of a great emperor he was called wall-pellitory. This, therefore, is the foundation of reputation, as it is of command: to follow virtue without the reward of reputation, and to pursue reputation only as an instrument of the public safety.

§ 6. Divine providence conciliates this esteem among subjects and foreigners. For it is a gift of God, like every kind of power; so too is this part which consists in another's opinion. With it God fortified his servant Abraham amid the fiercest and strongest nations, for the people of Heth said to him, "You are a prince of God among us." Thus he protected Israel after the slaughter of the Shechemites, Genesis 35: "And when they had departed, the terror of God invaded all the cities round about, and they did not dare pursue those who were departing." Thus Joshua also grew strong, chapter 5:1: "Therefore, after all the kings of the Amorites who dwelt beyond the Jordan toward the western region, and all the kings of Canaan who possessed the places bordering the great sea, heard that the Lord had dried the streams of the Jordan before the sons of Israel until they crossed, their heart was dissolved and no spirit remained in them because they feared the entry of the sons of Israel." Thus Jehoshaphat too was safe, 2 Chronicles 20:29: "And the dread of the Lord rushed upon all the kingdoms of the lands when they heard that the Lord had fought against the enemies of Israel. And the kingdom of Jehoshaphat was quiet, and God gave him peace round about."

On the contrary, the greatest kingdoms, when deprived of God's protection, and their kings lived in perpetual fear. Consider the Roman Empire: plots at home, wars abroad; the most wretched peoples--the Triballi, Thracians, and others--plucked at it. Now the Turkish Empire is ravaged by Hajduks, Cossacks, Arabs, Cilicians, and pirates. The Persian Empire, and indeed its national capital, Babylon, the wonder of the world, was attacked by the Persians, a people hitherto servile and rustic. The Macedonians, a foul nation known only through contempt except insofar as it had grown under King Philip by brigandage and fraud, cast down the Persians after they had been placed at the summit.

§ 7. In order that the prince may also protect his own esteem, it will greatly contribute that he judge and enact laws in such a manner that he retracts nothing. In this matter Justinian, however much he benefited others, greatly harmed himself, since his jurists set up and took down laws. Next, in public let him always act gravely and in accordance with his dignity. For it contributes greatly to authority when magnates, whom the people admire and regard with awe, serve the prince so humbly. Third, whether in public, in the senate, or even in private council, let him rarely speak unless after reflection, but in such a way that he does not incur a reputation for pride or stupidity. Let them not imitate Pallas, who from the basest slave became the proudest master and did not deign to speak to any of his household. At home he never signified anything except by a nod or his hand, or, if more things had to be indicated, in writing, lest he associate his voice with theirs. Fourth, if his countenance is not venerable, let him nevertheless contrive always to be serious and never readily moved to laughter. Fifth, let his voice be grave, his jest nonexistent unless sharp, and his clothing without fastidiousness, costly beneath the measure of his dignity. Let his gait be grave and slow; his riding attended by austere dignity, so that even among his ministers the manner of doing all things may be deliberate, without disorderly running about.

Sixth, let him have few intimate familiars, joke with some, and reveal secrets--and this cautiously; for most such men either disclose them to others and boast of their familiarity with the prince, thus procuring envy for themselves and a reputation for imprudence for the prince, especially if they are not good men. Rare is the good fortune by which princes have many good men around them. King Attalus said that images must be viewed from a distance; and surely rarity produces admiration, while satiety with familiarity makes men less revered. Seventh, let him take the greatest care--something few even good princes have taken care to do--not to seem to be governed by one or two men. For people venerate such a man as prince and hold the prince for a statue. Hence came the hatred of all kings against those kings--Sejanus, Plautianus, and those whom in our own age we see to have paid the penalties of power. For whatever is administered, even rightly, is hateful to the nobles because the author of the counsel is hated. Eighth, in receiving embassies too, let there be splendid modesty, so that he may seem to shun luxury and love dignity. It belongs to petty women to shine with the whole treasury. Augustus was content with his customary clothing and dwelling. Alexander Severus sold his gems because he said that command was situated in virtue, not adornment. Let him in no way display his treasures to visiting ambassadors, for they interpret it as pride and conceive envy if it is immense; if moderate, they despise it. And they judge the prince a fool who values small things greatly.

CHAPTER V

That Riches Must Be Sought for the Prince

§ 1. I have already detested an avaricious prince above, when I was treating liberality, and I detest him now also. Nevertheless, I require a provident and well-funded prince; indeed, I affirm that industry in accumulating riches is one of the principal virtues of princes. Nor do those men offend slightly who establish such a government that the treasury is always empty. This, therefore, must now be demonstrated by me: that this is pious and holy, and the duty of the prince and of the state, so that in the discussions which follow I may treat the method of gathering resources.

§ 2. At the outset I establish this as fixed and ratified: rich men who are devastated by desires, scattered by cupidities, tormented by fears, and consumed by sorrow are not to be approved. For these are vices of men, alike in the poor, the man of moderate means, and the rich. But I assert that riches are necessary to the prince and the state. They are a gift of God, as Augustine teaches: welcome when given to private persons, necessary when given to a prince. And so the prince will desire them "for the supplements of necessity," as Augustine speaks on Psalm 66.

[Printed page 628]

The slothful man is sent to the ant and warned of timely labor, lest he hunger in winter; where is the state to be sent, lest it abandon itself? Those who have money do not sin, but those who love it excessively. Indeed, riches are possessed more safely and better in proportion as they are loved less. Nor let them set before me the apostolic threat: "They who desire to become rich fall into temptation." Augustine answers for me in book 1, chapter 10 of The City of God: "Surely he censures cupidity in riches, not the means themselves." For although private persons with difficulty hold resources without loving them, the state can more easily employ them as instruments of virtue and defenses of protection. "I do not know," says Augustine, "how it is that, when superfluous and earthly things are loved, they bind more tightly once obtained than when desired." But this arises from the fact that money is sought by private persons to fulfill their own desires, by the prince for the safety of the state.

§ 3. From the foundation of the world we have David, Solomon, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and Josiah as the wisest of all kings. What was gathered for the temple demonstrates the resources of David, 1 Chronicles 22:14: "Behold, in my poverty I have prepared for the expenses of the house of the Lord one hundred thousand talents of gold and one million talents of silver; but of bronze and iron there is no weight, for number is overcome by magnitude; timber and stones I have prepared for all the expenses." Concerning his manifold treasuries, 1 Chronicles 27:25: "Over the king's treasuries was Azmaveth the son of Adiel. But over those treasuries which were in the cities, villages, and towers was Jonathan the son of Uzziah." Behold: first, the king's treasuries; second, in the cities; third, in the villages; fourth, in the towers. Add the fields and livestock. Behold a king possessing so many treasuries and nevertheless not avaricious, but liberal and gentle, who was accustomed to sing before the Lord: "Blessed is he who understands concerning the needy and poor; in the evil day the Lord will deliver him." For the treasure was preserved for the needy, the poor, and the whole people.

It is fruitless to say a few things about Solomon because many are found everywhere. 1 Kings 10:26: "And Solomon gathered chariots and horsemen, and he had one thousand four hundred chariots and twelve thousand horsemen." And in 2 Chronicles 9 he is said to have been richer than all kings and to have furnished in Jerusalem an abundance of silver as great as that of stones.

I have spoken above about the riches of Jehoshaphat and about his army.

Scripture proclaims the riches of Hezekiah, 2 Chronicles 32:27: "But Hezekiah was rich and exceedingly renowned, and he gathered for himself very many treasures of silver and gold, precious stones, spices, arms of every kind, and vessels of great price; storehouses also of grain, wine, and oil, stalls of all beasts of burden and folds of cattle. And he built cities for himself; he also had innumerable flocks of sheep and herds, because the LORD had given him exceedingly great substance."

The piety and zeal of Josiah, indeed, are praised in Scripture more than his resources; nevertheless, the power by which he removed every abomination from the land and even the high places--something no king before had done--shows that he was rich. And he restored such a Passover as had never been, in which from the king's substance he himself gave thirty thousand head of small livestock and three thousand oxen. Nor is it a small sign of power that he met Pharaoh Necho as he proceeded against the Assyrians. For without doubt Necho's army, which he was leading against a most powerful king, was immense; yet Josiah did not think himself unequal to it, and perhaps would have conquered if the Lord had not disapproved the expedition.

It is madness to accuse such men of bad administration, and those greatly err who think it royal to give gold but not to preserve it. It must be given and preserved; both are necessary. But it cannot be given with reason unless it is preserved. Yet if one pleases to accuse these men, what shall we do with Joseph, who furnished Pharaoh's palace with immense revenues? For he received money, livestock, and fields, and finally the fifth part of the annual crops. Why did he furnish the king with so great an abundance of resources if those riches did not belong to the art of ruling? I truly judge that the entire public revenue of the Romans was a small part of Pharaoh's resources, if every kind of crop is considered. For, first, six hundred thousand men dwelt in the land of Goshen, and those men were Israelites. There were as many Egyptians, so that altogether they were 1,200,000. Add as many adult women: they will be 2,400,000. You will double this number by the young boys and girls and by servants, so that in Goshen alone there were 4,800,000. The fifth part of these would be at least 900,000, whom Pharaoh could maintain from the fifth part of the land of Goshen alone. For if the whole land suffices for the whole people, then a fifth part suffices for a fifth. Indeed, very much grain was exported into neighboring and distant kingdoms. If, therefore, so great was the revenue from the land of Goshen alone, how great was it from all Egypt?

§ 4. Nor does reason advise otherwise: "You are worth as much as you have." If resources are lacking, friends will be lacking; no one readily inclines himself toward an unhappy lot. For many avoid meeting needy and indebted princes because they fear that loans of money may be sought from them. Mucianus truly said that money is the sinew of command. Resources are needed; without them nothing will be done which must be done. All things are purchasable with money, and Rome found a buyer, as Jugurtha predicted. If you possess money in the enemy camp and in his councils, you will have friends, if not sincere, at least useful. For what is wiser than that saying?

> Ἀργυρέαις λόγχαις μάχου, καὶ πάντα κρατήσεις.

"Fight with silver spears, and you will conquer all things." Therefore, he who has not gathered money deprives himself of the short way to victory. Nor let the speech of ancient simplicity move you: "Not trafficking in war, but waging war." Rather, redeeming war--for why should I not conquer by the expenditure of money rather than blood? If an ass laden with gold can capture a citadel, I shall preserve the army intact.

But riches are necessary not only in war but also in peace. Of those who attach themselves to a prince, many desire to be honored, most to be gilded. Therefore, a prince ought to give; and because he needs the faithful service of many, to give lavishly. But the fountain of liberality is thrift.

§ 5. Those who say that they rely upon virtue alone and deny that gold should be trusted employ a specious but fallacious speech. It is not a prince's virtue to strip himself of means and the state of defenses. Gold is not to be trusted, but used; and in order that you may use it, it must be possessed. For since the services and fidelity of many are necessary to a prince, and they place virtue after gold, they must be held by gifts. And this belongs to virtue: to draw each man by his own pleasure, as though by bait, to perform his duty.

An old saying of Cyrus and of others who flourished in the praise of prudence is also circulated and pronounced amid the applause of young men: “Friends are treasures.” Thus Alexander too answered Darius that Darius had enclosed his treasures within a citadel, but that he himself possessed no treasures except the hearts of his friends.

[Printed page 629]

Yet the event shows that these words were spoken for appearance, from a display of generous confidence, and more to conciliate the hearts of friends than from the heart. For Alexander gathered gold in that madness: “Thirty thousand mules carry your captive gold,” the noble defendant casts against him. And although he plundered so much, it is wonderful that he gave so little. But let us examine his treasures. Which of his friends did not plot against him? Which prince did not participate in extinguishing his stock? Not to speak, indeed, of those whom the king’s vices had provoked: he did not retain the hearts of his soldiers when the hope of resources had collapsed. Let the turning-back from the journey out of India be read in Curtius. Everyone will understand that without the hope of money he accomplished absolutely nothing, and without money little. What then? Do you think that anyone from Macedonia would have followed without that lure, when we so often read that his soldiers, after squandering their gifts and their own plunder, demanded a return? When the Argyraspids, in order to redeem their baggage, delivered their own commander Eumenes to the enemy?

The same thing which is done among the standards is sought in the forum and senate house. Few defend a needy man. The soldier must bring arms into the field, the prince money. Among so many peoples scarcely one fidelity is found; minds must be retained by coin. In order that this may be done, the treasury must be cared for. If anyone is a friend without hope of money--and surely he is rare--he nevertheless must be enriched: both because it is expedient for the prince that a man of so faithful a spirit should be as powerful as possible, and because poverty ought not to be the penalty for so generous a will. Friends, therefore, are treasures, but they must be fostered and raised up, lest the condition of enemies seem better with the prince. “But when I have enriched my friends, they themselves will succor me when I am needy.” Julian was never desirous of increasing money, which he thought was kept more securely among its owners. But these things can persuade only boys. I seek serious things. I believe neither Marcellinus when he praises Julian nor Constantine when he prosecutes him. I shall not believe that Julian was not desirous of money, since I know that he stuffed his coffers through the persecution of Christians and confiscations. At times he feigned philosophy in words and deeds; at other times he was accustomed to mock Christians when they complained of injury, saying that Christ had commended poverty and that they would be blessed by it.

But if we consider the state as it is ordinarily constituted, a prince in danger will not easily seek protection from the friends to whom he gave riches in prosperity. For even then he made them friends only by giving; and now by asking or plundering he will make them enemies. He will also find many who would prefer that the prince should not exist rather than that they should be poor for his sake. Caligula and Nero squandered all things through largesses and luxury; did they therefore find a friend? If we speak of good and just princes, I seek one example thus far of a prince whom friends mindful of a benefit restored to his former condition, unless either the hope of greater gain enticed liberality or fear of greater loss extorted their money. Hope must therefore be placed in friends with the knowledge that there is more protection in those who hope for new benefits than in those from whom gratitude is requested.

§ 6. The care of gathering resources rests not only upon the prince but also upon him to whom the succession looks, who by some right can come to the principate. For since all things obey money, it is certain that there is nothing which does not obey, except virtue. All things, I say, obey money--even money already received obeys that which is hoped for, the former money the future; all things obey, even the enemy’s arms and even the money of the enemy treasury, if more is hoped for from you. Hence many have attained the principate by money. “Queen Money bestows both birth and kingdom.” Thucydides, book 1, relates that Pelops, by the Asiatic money which he had brought as a foreigner, obtained among poor men first reputation and favor, then a kingdom. Didius Julianus purchased the empire from the soldiers, Herodian, book 2. Manlius formerly attempted the same; and, something at which you will marvel, the sons of Brutus were made Tarquin’s men by hope of rewards. Tarquinius Priscus obtained command, although the sons of Ancus were disregarded, by an honorable use of money. Nor did anything different thereafter occur in the state: canvassing for office, although suppressed by so many laws, trials, and punishments, was absent from no elections.

> The annual contests return venal to the Field.

The reason is that all seek a prince for themselves rather than for the state. They most desire that man to have power from whom they hope for most.

> Virtue, reputation, honor, things divine and human obey > splendid riches. He who has amassed them > will be renowned, brave, just, wise, even a king;
>
>
>
> and whatever he wishes, he will hope that this, as though procured by virtue, > will redound to his great praise.
>

Even prudent men judge thus. For if he enlarged his estate while in a private station, and was kind and generous to friends, what will he do in the principate? Consider that, in proportion as each man's estate is well provided, so his friends are firm; if his estate totters, his friends likewise collapse. An estate finds friends; an estate advances a man to kingship. I do not say these things in order to teach that command must be sought by evil arts and largesses, but to impress upon a prince how great is the force of an estate well arranged at home for obtaining his right. Moreover, command is retained and acquired by the same arts. Resources are an eminent instrument of civil affairs.

Thus Aristotle, Politics 1.8. After saying τὴν κτητικήν, the art of acquisition, to be a part of household management which supplies things necessary for life and useful to the community of the city, he adds:

> καίτοι κἂν οὐδ' ἀληθινῶς πλοῦτος ἐκ τούτων εἴη· ἡ γὰρ τῆς τοιαύτης κτήσεως αὐτάρκεια πρὸς ἀγαθὴν ζωὴν οὐκ ἄπειρός ἐστιν, ὥσπερ Σόλων φησὶ ποιήσας·
>
> Πλούτου δ' οὐδὲν τέρμα πεφασμένον ἀνδράσι κεῖται.
>
> κεῖται γὰρ, ὥσπερ καὶ ταῖς ἄλλαις τέχναις· οὐδὲν γὰρ ὄργανον ἄπειρον οὐδεμιᾶς ἐστὶ τέχνης, οὔτε πλήθει οὔτε μεγέθει· ὁ δὲ πλοῦτος ὀργάνων πλῆθός ἐστιν οἰκονομικῶν καὶ πολιτικῶν.

True riches seem to consist of these things, for the sufficiency from such possession for a blessed life is not infinite, as Solon expressed in verse: "No limit of riches has been established for men." Yet there is a limit, as in the other arts; for no instrument of any art is infinite, either in multitude or magnitude. Riches, however, are a multitude of household and political instruments. But the state has need of very many instruments; therefore, unless it prefers to be prey, they must be acquired in due season.

§ 7. I contend not only that the prince or the state ought to be rich, but also its administrators--not because I judge that unfit rich men should be admitted to the helm, for thence follow those evils which Gregorio Tolosano prudently noted in book 5, chapter 1, §25. Plato, he said, called the constitution of the few that polity in which magistracies are distributed to citizens according to the valuation of their property, and in which the rich rule, while the poor have no participation in the state. Thus, the more money and property qualifications bestow honors, the more base virtue becomes; and men, following one another's example, are more intent upon amassing money than upon good morals, while the good poor are excluded. Hence also follows the corruption of that state, no differently than a ship is not safe from danger of shipwreck when a rich man ignorant of the art is placed over its navigation, while a needy man more skilled in governing is by no means admitted. Soon thereafter one state begins to become two: one of the rich, the other of the poor; and it always happens that men dwelling within the same walls plot against one another. Another evil follows: the rich always gape after the means of the poorer, oppress them by usuries, compel them to sell, and make them altogether beggars, thieves, robbers, plunderers, and finally seditious conspirators who seize the state. But I would have administrators instructed and chosen, for they can aid the state; and because they are participants in honor and government, they also wish to aid it.

[Printed page 630]

CHAPTER VI

Various Methods of Acquiring Riches

§ 1. Since the zeal for acquisition is natural, and many princes are more readily found who fall into avarice and cupidity than those who incline toward liberality--even those who desire to be considered liberal and magnificent, for such men exact more importunately what they do not bestow well--it is nevertheless wonderful that it frequently happens that the greatest empires lack money. Perpetual complaints are read concerning the straits of the Roman treasury. Amid mountains of gold the kings of the Persians lacked money in the war against the Greeks; and in the one thing in which they were superior, in that one thing they were conquered. In our time too we see the same thing happen to the very wealthy kings of the Spains: many opportunities lost, many defeats received, and various mutinies of soldiers because their stipends were delayed or unpaid, while meanwhile the States of Holland generally kept their soldiers at their duty.

In the Roman Empire also we have learned by experience that certain princes, although ruling no great territories, gathered treasures, while others whose dominions were many times broader struggled with perpetual want. Let the deeds of two distinguished German prelates and princes be considered: Julius of Würzburg and Theodore of Paderborn. Each erected citadels, academies, and a church; furnished his treasury with money and storehouses with provisions; recovered mortgaged possessions and added new ones. For the increases of each bishopric are so great that another prince could be maintained from what they added. Meanwhile, others, neither exceeding them in greater splendor of court nor oppressed by war, burdened richer dominions with debt.

It is greatly to be marveled at that around the year of Christ 800, when the Eastern Empire was already considerably diminished and Basil was reigning, nevertheless there were riches so great that they were scarcely found in the whole Roman Empire except when it flourished greatly. Zonaras relates that he filled the whole treasury, and even its approaches and passages, with money heaped densely together. “He had,” he says, “in the treasuries two hundred thousand talents of gold. For the sum of the other money could not be reckoned, so that he buried it in the earth, the treasuries or repositories being everywhere filled. Indeed, he also had small chests full of precious stones and gems, among them those which shine and which we properly call pearls.” What do those two hundred thousand talents of gold amount to? Precisely twelve hundred million. If any king now possessed twelve hundred million, he would easily obtain command of the world if he wished to use it.

Benjamin the Jew saw Constantinople around the year 1200 and relates: “In that city,” he says, “I saw things and resources beyond telling. For tributes are brought annually into the Prince’s palace, with which towers are filled with scarlet and purple clothing and with gold, so that nowhere upon earth can a comparable example of accumulated money be found.” It is even affirmed that the tax of that city alone, collected from markets of merchandise for sale, the harbor, and the dues of merchants, amounted to twenty thousand gold pieces every day. Considering these things, it is my intention to transmit a method of χρηματοποιΐας, the production of wealth--not because the treasurers and counselors of princes know no more methods, but because they know no better ones. For while they hasten to enrich the treasury and themselves, they disarm the state. For since the expenditures are great, and since the state needs very great support, just as a vast body needs abundant nourishment, they seek to accelerate this and, by their voracity and gluttony, produce diseases far more dangerous than those arising from abstinence and thrift. The tenth penny was the occasion of rebellion in Belgium; and now, if you ask the Confederates about the tenth penny, they will answer truly that it is well with them if they retain the tenth penny.

§ 2. A method of increasing the treasury is either honorable or dishonorable. The honorable is likewise threefold: honorable and burdensome to subjects, as tribute; honorable and not burdensome to subjects, as an accurate account of receipts and expenditures; honorable and useful to subjects, as sumptuary laws, agriculture, and lending. A wicked and fraudulent χρηματιστικήν, art of acquiring money, is likewise threefold. One kind is openly unjust and public theft, such as usury and unjust oppressions. Another is not indeed unjust, yet is hateful and unbecoming to a prince: as if you should enact a law that no one should wear a silk garment, and then dissemble until the law begins freely to be violated, meanwhile punishing the transgressors with a fine through informers whom you have assigned. Another kind is neither unjust nor hateful, but sordid and productive of contempt, as when Vespasian collected a tax upon urine. In an honorable tribute and in other measures there can also intervene some things which introduce injustice; indeed, even in measures which are not burdensome and are useful, certain hateful things can occur and appear, as it were, sordid.

Hence general rules must be observed by the prince. First, never is even a three-ounce coin to be exacted from subjects by injustice, for both the prince and the counselors who advised it are bound to restitution. Second, when money is justly exacted, but in a hateful manner and with infamy and some mark of disgrace, that method must be used only from necessity; for more harm is done by hatred than advantage gained by profit. Third, when a gain is sordid, let a moderate necessity make it honorable. For why should you not sell urine so that a subject may be defended and a poor man not die? Fourth, among the honorable kinds of enriching the treasury, that must be embraced first which benefits publicly and privately, so that by the same operation the prince and subjects become rich. Fifth, secondly, that method must be embraced which benefits the state and harms no private person, such as that concerning the auditing of accounts. Sixth, only at the last must one come to this: that even subjects be burdened, lest the state suffer loss, but in such a way that all recognize that the money is expended, not upon the prince's kindred or his pleasures, but upon the advantages of each person. Barnevelt advised the gravest exactions in Holland when he said, "It is better that the fatherland be burdened than lost," as he admits in his Apology, although amid and from those burdens both he and others gathered immense resources. But let us now examine each kind.

CHAPTER VII

That Tributes Are Lawfully Paid, and Their Measure

§ 1. The ancients ingeniously appointed Saturn as guardian of money--sluggish, slow, morose, scarcely opening the coffer once in the great year; but over collection, as over every gain, they appointed Mercury. For he, equally welcome to those above and those below, swifter than the rushing east wind when he puts on his winged sandals, runs over lands, seas, and the lower regions themselves, and sometimes even puts the heavens themselves up for auction; from everywhere he gathers what the never-sated greed of Saturn may store away. So it is: greedy courtiers repeatedly prescribe tributes at every movement and every opportunity, and run about with their Mercury's wand. Let us therefore speak of this defense, not of the spoliation of the state.

[Printed page 631]

§ 2. The power of imposing tributes is granted to the state, that is, to the authority which is supreme. At Rome the Senate exercised the right of striking coin, and therefore there was also the inscription S.C., that is, senatus consulto, "by decree of the Senate." The matter was then entrusted to the monetary triumvirs, who marked the coin by their own authority and indicated it by these letters: III VIRI A.A.A.F.F.--triumviri auro, argento, aere flando feriundo, "the triumvirs for casting and striking gold, silver, and bronze." To this faculty was formerly added this right of majesty: no one except the supreme magistrate could impose tributes or exactions. Law 3, Code, On the Establishment of New Taxes: It Is Not Permitted. This right was formerly by no means communicated to cities. Now almost all princes and free cities use it. But I must treat not the right, which is clear, but the manner.

§ 3. Customary and moderate customs duties, revenues of public land, and tributes are not to be remitted, although they annually yield ten times more than is expended upon roads, bridges, magistrates, and rewards for brave men. For the preparation for a single war will consume more than the peace of many years. Cicero complains to Atticus of the diminution of taxes: the port duties of Italy removed, the division of the Campanian land impending, and even the twentieth part to be taken away. Honorius and Arcadius, Theodosius and Valentinian, provided that taxes not be diminished. Nero attempted it with youthful impulse, but was restrained by prudent men, Tacitus, Annals 13; for they repeatedly said that the strength of the empire would be broken. But the freedmen easily shook that thought from him, since they inflamed him toward plunder.

§ 4. The cause of taxes ought to be just. Thus Novel 149:

> If any of them--that is, of the magistrates--has conducted himself negligently in the exaction of public tributes, or has involved our taxpayers in losses or insulting injuries, he shall at once fall from his goods and be subjected to the supreme punishment. For, with God as our guide, this one concern is ours: that the provinces be governed by good laws, inhabited in safety, enjoy the justice of their governors, and that public tributes be paid without complaint. For otherwise it is impossible that the state be preserved if the sacred tributes are not paid. The military forces, receiving thence the salary assigned them, resist enemies and vindicate the taxpayers from the incursions and savagery of barbarians; finally, by keeping watch they defend fields and cities from the incursions of robbers and others who pursue a disorderly manner of life. From these tributes the remaining cohorts also receive what has been assigned to them; walls and cities are likewise restored; the heating of public baths proceeds thence; finally spectacles and all other things invented for the delight of individuals are cared for from the same source, so that what is contributed by them is expended and laid out partly upon them, partly on their behalf. But it falls to us to possess nothing except the care of these things, yet not without reward, since that great God and our Savior Jesus Christ, from the greatness of his clemency, rewards us with very many goods on this account.

And Novel 16, title On Provincial Governors, chapter 2:

> The thought of securing these things by law came to us because the wealth and well-being of our subjects is of greater value to us than the revenues which are thereby brought into the empire. For together with the largesses of the governors we also reduce the fees paid into the imperial accounts, which produced a great heap of money, in order that this cause and the state may obtain a better outcome and return richer, freed from the payments devised by certain persons some time ago. For this one matter is the concern of our power: that the provinces be governed by good laws and inhabited safely, and also obtain the fruit of the justice of their governors, and that public tributes be paid without complaint. For otherwise it is not possible to preserve the state unless the payments are most dutifully brought into the public treasury; from them military forces are maintained so that enemies may be resisted and watches kept throughout fields and cities; likewise the other orders are furnished with the salaries assigned them, walls and cities are repaired, and finally all the other things arise which preserve the common utility of the subjects.

For since the prince presides over the body like its head, he ought to employ reason and love when receiving sustenance from the other members, and to remember that he is carried by the members and will fall when they languish.

Hadrian certainly remitted debts owed to the treasury. Spartianus.

Cato restrained embezzlement, as Plutarch relates in his life.

Tiberius answered that gold collected with the affliction of subjects and offered to him was adulterated and poisoned.

Masinissa made all Numidia exceedingly abundant from being uncultivated.

Philip, the father of Perseus, increased the revenues of the kingdom by agriculture and the digging of mines.

Through the harshness of contributions the English lost Aquitaine, and Alfonso's heirs Naples.

Hybicas used to say to Antony: "If you want two collections, grant two harvests." Plutarch, Antony.

For subjects are bound to contribute nothing other than what suffices for the honorable maintenance of the prince and the defense of the state. Magistrates receive tribute so that they may be guardians and defenders of justice. Nor is it the will of the people, nor can it prudently be, that they contribute so great resources for no or slight advantage of their own.

John de Salas, most learned in theology and law, rightly warns in On Laws, treatise 14, disputation 15, section 10, that it is most difficult to judge concerning the justice of a tribute:

> It is exceedingly difficult to judge that a tribute imposed upon non-exempt subjects by a legitimate prince is unjust, because all private persons cannot judge the cause which moved the prince to impose the tribute. For it is often hidden and just. Often also it can seem to have ceased because it was temporary, or certainly because it is not put into execution as had been decreed or promised; and nevertheless the tribute is not immediately unjust, either because another cause has arisen or because the prince, beset by other actions or burdens, is compelled to cease from one work so that another more urgent one may be accomplished. Next, it is difficult to condemn a tribute from a defect of distribution alone: both because the manner of distributing can scarcely be established when a tribute is imposed simply upon some kind of thing and it is incidental whether it is sold or bought by these or those persons; and also because, if some greater burden from a tribute falls upon certain persons, it is customarily compensated through other means, such as by increasing the price of other things.
>
> Hence mere uncertainty concerning the cause and the other conditions required for the justice of a tribute is not sufficient for the obligation of paying the tribute to cease, because knowledge of these matters does not > belong to every particular person; and the prince, who possesses universal prudence, can be moved by many just reasons which cannot readily become known to others. Hence I say that a merely negative doubt is not of itself > sufficient to excuse one from payment of tribute. For it is often founded solely upon ignorance of the reasons or conditions of the tribute, which is not sufficient against the action performed; and because in doubt the presumption favors the prince, unless it is otherwise established that he is a tyrant. Otherwise ordinary people could never be bound, because of themselves they would always doubt unless they rested upon the good faith of their superiors.

[Printed page 632]

Therefore Julian not unsuitably took care that tributes not be granted away through indulgences. For if people never contribute anything, war can scarcely be waged.

§ 5. When a new tribute is needed, let it rather be divided into small sums, for thus it is neither burdensome nor does it furnish astute ministers so great an occasion for theft. Cypselus had bound himself by an impious vow that he would sacrifice all the fortunes of the Corinthians; yet he did it by a mild command, for he sacrificed a tenth and thus only in the tenth year discharged his vow. Therefore the tribute paid to Antony by Asia was unjust also from the manner of demanding it, when he said: "Lest you be driven from your cities and fields"--Appian, Civil Wars 5--"money must be given for the use of the soldiers, and not the greatest sum, but one at the hearing of which you may willingly be at rest. In two years you gave our enemies, Cassius and Brutus, the tributes of ten years. Let these suffice for us also, except that they must be given in one year." Gaius Sulla had furnished the example, for in the Mithridatic War he commanded that the taxes of five years be given immediately. Here the proportion of years is not observed, and the poor must necessarily be overturned from all their goods.

Golden is the judgment of Suárez, book 5, chapter 16, §1: "For if a tax is imposed upon immovable property, it ought not to exceed a moderate amount, with its fruits and the labors and expenses made upon it taken into account; for if the tribute becomes too burdensome in this respect, it will plainly be unjust. But if it is imposed upon movable things which are sold and bought or made by craft, care must be taken that such things are not of this sort, or that the tribute is small and not great, lest it redound to a greater burden upon the poor, craftsmen, or merchants than they can conveniently sustain while maintaining life and family."

§ 6. A tax must be exacted in proportion to each person's property and means. Otherwise the poor must necessarily be flayed, not shorn, something not even Tiberius--the cruelest of the avaricious, the most avaricious of the cruel--desired. For such men cut out the roots so that the plants do not grow again. Hence Servius established the census among the Romans, as is found in Livy, Florus, and others. The first class possessed one hundred thousand asses; the second, seventy thousand; the third, fifty thousand; the fourth, twenty-five thousand; the fifth, eleven thousand. A smaller valuation, or the sixth class, contained the remaining multitude. The equestrian valuation was different. The same method existed among the Athenians. Demosthenes, On the Public Services. Cato conducted the census avariciously, Livy 39, though he did certain things rightly, as when he assessed ornaments. For even now that man will act rightly who assesses ornaments and women's clothing rather than the little fields and stones of countrymen; for those things too belong to their means.

Here account must also be taken of the things upon which the tax is imposed. For taxes imposed upon things conveyed for the sake of trade are unjustly extended to things intended for use, which is prohibited in the laws Universi and Omnium, Code, On Taxes. The Turk exacts an apparently small tribute when he plans war against Christians--one ducat from each person--but burdens his own people with another burden.

§ 7. The treasury is the collection of public goods; it is sometimes called the fisc. For the private patrimony of the prince is rarely called the treasury. The public treasury is not properly the prince's patrimony, nor can he use it with full right except for public use. It is great praise for a prince to take from his private fisc and increase the public treasury. Thus Hadrian, according to Spartianus, forbade the goods of condemned persons to be brought into the private fisc, the whole sum being received into the public treasury. King Minyas, as Pliny, book 33, chapter 3, and Pausanias, Boeotia, book 9, attest, is said to have been the first to build a treasury--but among barbarians; treasuries had long before been constructed in Egypt. Thus our Suárez rightly judges in On Laws 5.13 that tributes must be paid even by commutative justice. Indeed, he rightly teaches in §9 of the same place: because the debt of maintaining the king and sustaining public burdens is natural, and tribute imposed by a just law is the means of justice.

Those who doubt whether a treasury is to be possessed and increased are not worthy of the name "political writers." Yet questions have been published concerning this matter.

§ 8. When the immense and uncertain expenditures of war must be sustained, it is better to impose men, horses, and ships; for people tolerate all these things more easily than a contribution of money. They call this kind of tribute angaria, when the labor of persons, horses, and oxen is demanded. Yet care must be taken in this matter that public works not be exacted at the time of plowing, harvest, vintage, or fairs, something ministers frequently do in order to elicit money. Next, they must not be compelled to carry wine, grain, and other things to a distant place. Verres used this practice, and now the mercurial agents of princes are not ignorant of it. For example, one hundred wagonloads of wine are owed to the prince; they are valued at the highest price; the subjects wish to deliver wine, not money, but they are ordered to carry it a long distance at the busiest or a rainy season.

§ 9. Care must be taken that thefts by officials do not intervene; nowhere is wrongdoing more serious. Antony and Dolabella commanded Asia to pay two hundred thousand talents; avarice and the frauds of the tax-farmers added as much again. Today also, when people consent to a contribution, additions for the collectors are appended that are far too large. Our eyes teach how great an error is committed in these matters. For most officials who are put in charge of money, although at first they are thin and juiceless like the driest sponges, and, like the cows Pharaoh saw, misshapen and wasted by leanness, such that he had never seen their like in Egypt, nevertheless soon grow fat, although the prince is reduced to the last extremity.

Lipsius thinks that in the age of the princes there were no tax-farmers in the provinces of the Caesars, for they raged too violently. Julius removed both their injuries and the injurious men themselves, permitted the fruits to be collected from the farmers, and introduced tributes. There are many examples concerning Verres which today are repeated with greater ruin.

§ 10. An even greater error occurs when revenues are pledged or given to nobles. Henry III, king of Castile, corrected this practice. Because the same execution is necessary today, take the history as follows from Mariana, book 3, chapter 7.

Henry, the third king of Castile by that name, a man of lofty spirit, followed this course: when he was older and possessed of prudence, he freed the revenues seized by the nobles, in a memorable example. While still a minor he was staying at Burgos, a city in Old Castile, and was accustomed to amuse himself by hunting quail. It happened once that he returned to court very late in the day, exhausted by the delay and by his labor, and no food had been prepared. When the royal provisioner was summoned about the matter, he reported that not only the king's money but also his credit had been exhausted. The king, concealing his present distress, ordered mutton to be bought after his cloak had been pledged, and a meal to be prepared entirely from it and the quail that had been caught.

[Printed page 633]

During the meal he heard that the nobles were in a better condition: every day they attended the most sumptuous feasts among themselves; free from every other care, they vied in the luxury and splendor of their tables. That night there was to be a dinner at the house of Pedro Tenorio, archbishop of Toledo. The king came with his head wrapped. He saw everything overflowing with festivity and delights. When dinner was finished, each was to report for himself how much revenue he received annually from hereditary towns and how much from royal revenues.

On the following day the king, eager and resolved upon vengeance, pretended that he was confined by a grave illness and wished to give his final commands. At this announcement the nobles, hurried and afraid, came from different directions to the citadel. Their servants were excluded, as had been ordered; the nobles were admitted and remained in the dining hall until late in the day, wondering at the cause of the delay. At last the king entered among the nobles armed with iron and with drawn sword. When he had seated himself among them, all terrified by that sight, he asked the nobles with a stern expression, as though angry, how many kings each had seen in the province. Some answered two, others three or four, according to each man's age. "Indeed," he said, "what you say is true, although at my age I have nevertheless known twenty kings in Castile." Wondering at the reason for the statement, with anxious minds awaiting the issue of the affair, they listened. "You," he said, "all of you--you, I say--are kings. Having occupied the strongholds and resources of the kingdom, you have left me an empty title, squalor, and want. Does that seem an adequate cause for treating us as a mockery? But lest you do it any longer, I shall make a decree upon all your heads." At the same time he ordered the things required for their punishment to be prepared and brought forward. In a loud voice he summoned the lictors and six hundred soldiers whom he had secretly held ready.

While the others were stunned with fear, the archbishop of Toledo, as he was a man of great spirit, fell upon his knees and, with tears streaming over his whole face, begged pardon; following his example, the others did the same. He granted pardon to those filled with fear of death and making supplication. Nevertheless, he decided not to release them from the citadel before one or two months had passed. During that interval they were compelled to deliver the strongholds and revenues to the king. Thus did he bear a spirit beyond his years, and manly care. It is no less shameful for public revenue to be appropriated for the pleasures of the prince than for the luxury of nobles. For it is public patrimony, not the prince's.

§ 11. It is the counsel of many, including the most prudent, that revenues be established for the advantage of the country; this can be done with such moderation that, even if they are great, they nevertheless burden or trouble no one. Let no or very small customs duties be established upon common, necessary, and useful goods, but many and heavy ones upon useless, harmful, and costly things without which this life, whatever it is, is lived well--indeed, upon the craftsmen themselves. Bodin, book 6, On the State, chapter 2, says truly: "The tribute most pleasing to God, most honorable to the king, and most useful to subjects is that which is imposed upon those things that tend to corrupt morals."

I remember seeing, in places where beer is used and wine is scarce, a third part of the wine paid to the state, because they deny that wine is necessary for their citizens. Therefore, it is in the interest of the polity to press with a heavy tribute those who sell sugar, unnecessary spices, and enticing preserves of Indian delicacies. It is likewise just to reduce by exactions confectioners, sellers of delicacies, and innkeepers dealing in foreign wine, since they are exceedingly harmful to morals. Indeed, a state will readily impose a tax, never unjust, upon purple, cotton cloth, silk trimmings, Attalic coverlets, and gilded vessels, since money is better expended in aiding the public welfare than in corrupting morals by luxury.

The Romans certainly imposed immense duties on Arabian wares, pearls, and precious pearls. This was accomplished by the Romans. Cicero, Against Verres, complains that the allies lost sixty thousand sesterces through Verres's exports--according to Lipsius, 1,500 Philippei--and this from the twentieth part at the port of Syracuse alone. Behold a twentieth as a customs duty. In Justin an eighth is given, and those who exact it are called octavarii. In the speech For Quinctius and in Symmachus, a fortieth occurs. Lipsius rightly says that things imported more for delights and display than for use paid a heavier duty. Caesar established a duty upon foreign merchandise; I believe one existed before, but the customs duties were increased by Caesar. Alexander Severus had this intention when he established a tax upon makers of armlets, linen-workers, citron-wood workers, furriers, wagon-makers, bankers, goldsmiths, and other trades--rightly, if they were useless trades. Would that he had done the same to cithara-players and others who corrupt youth.

§ 12. They should also impose greater duties upon all foreign goods that are unnecessary, although not useless. In this way money will remain in the province--for example, duties on English cloth, Sarmatian skins, Gascon wines, and the like. For if we wish to hear and speak the truth, what do foreign regions bring to Germany without which it cannot live, except perhaps Dutch fish and cheeses? Why, therefore, do importers of foreign wares carry so many millions away from here? I seek a spirited prince who will abolish these things, or a frugal one who will grow rich from them.

Pliny, book 11, chapter 1, says that Arabia, India, and the Seres take one thousand million sesterces--two and one-half millions--from the empire; and in book 6, chapter 23, that those wares sell for a hundred times their cost. There are several causes, but the chief is the size of the customs duty. For if they sold for a hundredfold, were not two hundred and fifty millions produced from them? If they spent fifty millions upon the journey and gained one hundred from two and a half, what great thing is it if they contribute one hundred millions to the state? The luxury of those who buy them at a hundredfold for ostentation cannot complain of this, nor can the wicked toil of merchants who supply foreign nourishment to the vices of fools. Luxury has brought them to those prices.

§ 13. Since tributes are frequently increased through the harpies and swallows of the people, since they turn the labors and sweat of the people into their rewards and stir up hatreds and curses against the prince, care must be taken that the prince learn the complaints of his people, demand an account from the procurators, and cause it to be described item by item what has been spent by each. If anyone is found to have exacted more, let him be punished as a traitor to the prince.

I understand this not only of the amount of money and goods, but also of coin, which they demand disdainfully as unworn and exact to the standard, and not at its common price, so that poor people can scarcely find among the coins they possess any fit for those thieves. Yet all kingdoms cry out against them, and still they grow rich. Therefore my counsel is that everything be delivered to certain men of unimpaired fidelity chosen by the people, and that they, in the magistrate's presence, deliver it to the king.

The whole kingdom of France approved this counsel, as Bodin reports. He says that he was present at the estates among the Tectosages when a petition was made to Henry II, king of the French, that he remove fraudulent men and money-scrapers. They promised that they would faithfully present all tributes on the appointed day and would even carry them to whatever part of the kingdom the king designated; this would benefit both king and people. The king approved the counsel, but, drawn away from his judgment by specious arguments, left the treasury and his subjects to be harassed by coercive collectors. For they not only exacted more but also returned less, equally faithless to king and kingdom.

[Printed page 634]

Richard, king of Britain, acted with much greater spirit, inflicting the supreme punishment upon those convicted of guilt. Antoninus Pius prescribed that moderation to his officials. He ordered his procurators to receive tributes moderately and commanded those who exceeded the limit to render an account of their deeds. He never rejoiced in gain by which a provincial had been oppressed, and willingly heard complaints against his own procurators.

Caligula, in keeping with his character, did the contrary. He administered new and unheard-of revenues, first through tax-farmers and then, because the profit was abundant, through centurions and tribunes of the Praetorian Guard, omitting no class of things or persons upon which he did not impose some tribute. A fixed and established charge was exacted upon foods sold throughout the whole city; a fortieth of the amount at issue was exacted for lawsuits and judgments wherever undertaken, with a penalty if anyone were convicted of having settled or relinquished the case; an eighth part of the daily earnings of porters; and from the takings of prostitutes, as much as each earned in one act of intercourse. It was added to the heading of the law that those who had practiced prostitution or procuring were liable to the public revenue, and that marriages were also liable.

A harsh and unjust exaction gave rise to the great war concerning which Tacitus writes in book 4 of the Annals. Drusus had ordered a moderate tribute from them, in view of their straitened circumstances: they were to supply ox hides for military uses. No one took care what strength or dimensions they possessed, until Olennius, formerly a chief centurion and appointed to govern the Frisians, selected the hides of aurochs as the pattern according to which they should be accepted. This was difficult for other nations and still harder to endure among the Germans, who had forests productive of immense beasts but small herds at home. At first they surrendered the oxen themselves, then their fields, and finally the bodies of their wives or children into servitude. Hence came anger and complaint. When no relief came, they sought a remedy in war: the soldiers present for the tribute were seized and fastened to the gallows. Olennius anticipated their hostility by flight and was received into the fortress called Flevum, where a by no means contemptible force of citizens and allies guarded the shores of the Ocean.

Claudius was in no less danger. Suetonius Tranquillus says of Claudius Caesar: "He ordered all orders to contribute a part of their assessed property, and in addition required tenants of private houses and apartment buildings to present a year's rent to the treasury. With great disdain and severity he demanded unworn coin, refined silver, and purified gold, so that many openly refused the entire contribution and, by agreement, demanded that the rewards which the informers had received should rather be recalled from them."

§ 14. I approve the wisdom of the ancient Romans in providing against the difficulties of the times. They had three treasuries. The first, which they also called sacred, was in the temple of Saturn, a most strongly fortified place; they praise Valerius Publicola as its founder. In the same place records, military standards, laws, and decrees of the Senate were preserved. They brought twentieths into this treasury, and it was reserved for the final emergencies of the state. It was opened in the Second Punic War, when Fabius was consul for the fifth time and Flaccus for the fourth; then again during the civil war. It was an enduring treasury appointed only for a Gallic war, Appian, book 2, Civil Wars.

The third was the richest, and into it were brought the tributes and revenues of citizens and allies, spoils, and the census of the people. Caesar plundered it, as Lucan relates:

> Then from the lowest depth of the temple is dug out
>
> The census of the Roman people, untouched for many years,
>
> Which the Punic wars had given, which Perseus,
>
> Which the spoil of Philip had given to you;
>
> What Pyrrhus left to you, Rome, when he fled in terror;
>
> That for which Fabricius did not sell you to the king for gold;
>
> Whatever the customs of frugal ancestors preserved;
>
> The tribute which the rich peoples of Asia sent;
>
> And what Minoan Crete gave to victorious Metellus;
>
> What Cato carried over distant seas from Cyprus.
>
> Then the wealth of the East, and the last treasure of captured kings,
>
> The treasure displayed before Pompey's triumphs,
>
> Is carried out; the temples are despoiled in mournful ruin.

But he did not spare even the more sacred treasury when he needed money and knew that the greatest dangers were imminent; for the Spanish and Pharsalian battle, the African war, and the final battles at Munda remained. States will have acted entirely rightly if, in a fortified place which not even the prince may enter without the consent of the nobles, they store away a treasure for the last emergencies.

It is therefore vainly disputed by newly fledged political writers whether it is expedient for a treasure to be preserved in a state. For just as in a household it is very advantageous, when money is at hand, to purchase everything at the proper time and not miss opportunities, so it is necessary in a state. For this reason we read of David's treasuries not only in the citadel but in cities, villages, and towers; likewise those of Hezekiah and others. The Hebrews built for Pharaoh, who did not know Joseph, cities of tents, or treasuries; for in the same places in which the treasuries were situated were the military garrisons or tents.

The objection that public wealth can be seized by an enemy or sedition, and that the country can be oppressed by its own riches, is refuted. For no one therefore neglects money because his house is exposed to thieves. By that argument they would prove that neither towns, fortresses, nor ports ought to be fortified; indeed, that wealth ought not even to be possessed privately, lest an enemy or evil citizen have the means to harm his country. Vigilance is required; and when dangers threaten, the cities of the treasuries must be fortified, which ought to be strong and trustworthy.

I do not approve the counsel of the Athenians, who had a treasury at Delphi, protected by superstition alone, which an enemy, atheist, or witty man could easily borrow from Apollo. A Brennus, Dionysius, or certainly a Diagoras was needed. For the common treasury of Greece on Delos was meager; the individual cities provided for themselves.

Augustus very prudently established a separate military treasury. Suetonius, chapter 99: whatever soldiers there were anywhere, he bound them to a fixed schedule of pay and rewards, defining according to each man's rank both his period of service and the benefits of discharge, lest through age or want after discharge they could be stirred to revolution. And so that funds for maintaining and rewarding them might always be available without difficulty, he established a military treasury together with new revenues.

This was prudent counsel, for the other expenditures upon magistrates, works, and ordinary gifts were regular and perpetual, whereas war demands great, sudden, and uncertain expenditures; and because the empire extended widely, war was being waged in different regions at the same time. This treasury at first consisted of the collection of twentieths paid from legacies and inheritances, unless the heirs were blood-relations or poor. This was a great tribute in so great an empire, but unjust, because the other revenues sufficed to support the army, but were consumed upon games, the fattening of the people, and the cruelty of the arena.

A twenty-fifth part of slaves sold was added, an altogether great sum amid so many myriads of saleable slaves, their frequent transfer, and their price--matters which Lipsius considers excellently in book 2, On the Greatness of Rome. To these was added a hundredth part of goods sold. The separation of that treasury is to be approved, but the new exactions were not necessary. The kings of the Persians poured molten gold and silver into earthen vessels, Herodotus, book 3, and did not have different treasuries for war and peace. Yet lest accounts be confused and so that what is destined for extreme emergencies remain intact, it is expedient that those things which must be expended extraordinarily be separate.

[Printed page 635]

§ 15. Lipsius teaches that Roman revenues consisted of tithes, pasture, and customs duties. First, they received a tenth part of grain--Appian, book 1, Civil Wars--and this is evident from the speeches against Verres. This was generally imposed upon conquered peoples and lands. From plantations and orchards they took a fifth. For pasture they agreed upon a fixed price, for the tax-farmer leased out the land and drew up the accounts; therefore the land was called scripturarius, and that revenue scriptura. A great profit was also made from goods imported or exported. These were just if imposed upon the lands of enemies conquered in a just war.

Among these, the Spaniards and Africans, and even the Gauls, were in the worst condition: both their lands and their persons were assessed more heavily. They called the latter a poll tax, and it is evident that it was severe. Lampridius says that those who under Heliogabalus had paid ten gold pieces paid a third of one gold piece under Alexander. From that census they knew the number of persons. Josephus says that there were 750 myriads of people in Egypt, and that this was clear from the tribute which individuals paid per head. Augustus arranged and increased all these; Vespasian increased the tributes of all the provinces and doubled them for some, as Suetonius says. These were for the most part exceedingly unjust, since not only were such amounts given, but they were exacted with the utmost harshness.

§ 16. A Christian prince, therefore, must act so as to abolish some tributes, moderate others, and reduce them to the ancient rule. Under Servius's institution the tribute was slight; Tarquin increased it, but it was again reduced to its original form. Thereafter it was long observed that the rich contributed according to their census and the poor by their labor. Now tributes grow in Germany because, amid great mutual distrust, each fortifies himself. But if with united minds they spent against the Turk the money with which they frighten one another, they could all procure territories twice as extensive for themselves. Thus subjects are burdened and yet treasuries are not filled, although the sole end of tributes is that the poor not be burdened in time of war.

§ 17. But when tributes are exacted lawfully, it is unjust to refuse them. Accordingly, the penalty established by Servius was chains and death, as Livy says. Dionysius of Halicarnassus says that it was provided by law that those who evaded their declaration or wished their goods to be valued at less should be flogged, their goods confiscated, and themselves sold. Zonaras says that those who did not report themselves or their goods for assessment were sold--the persons by the consuls and their goods by the censors. Herodotus testifies in book 3 that the Persians acted with the same precaution. For Darius apportioned the tributes and collected 14,560 Euboean talents annually, perhaps not a great sum for maintaining the army. But those who impose tribute upon nations conquered in a just war are readily excused. Thus Jotham commanded the Ammonites to pay one hundred talents of silver and ten thousand cors each of wheat and barley.

§ 18. There are three conditions of a tribute for it to be just: authority, cause, and proportion. If any one of these is absent, the tribute will not bind. Authority resides in the supreme prince; the cause is public necessity; proportion means that the tribute corresponds to people's means. With these conditions posited, I judge with our John de Salas, treatise 14, disputation 15, section 10, that all are bound to pay tributes. Those whom he cites think thus: Gabriel, book 4, distinction 15, question 5, article 2; Antoninus, part 2, title 1, chapter 13; Sylvester, under the word gabella, question 8; Medina, On Restitution, question 13 and those following; Castro, book 1, On Penal Law, chapter 10, toward the end; Córdoba, Summa, question 95; Hostiensis, book 3 of the Summa, title 1, chapter 13, On Assessments, § For What Causes; Panormitanus with others upon the chapter We Renew, On Assessments; Covarruvias, rule Sin, part 2, §5, no. 5. There he therefore binds merchants who sell, buy, and transport goods to declare themselves and make their tender to tax-farmers and exactors.

The foundation is that tribute is not a penalty but a true debt founded upon a true title of justice. But whoever is bound to pay a debt without any compulsion or exaction is bound--even if it is concealed--to disclose it to the creditor or to pay it. Hence Matthew 17: "Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's," namely tributes, as all understand; and Romans 13: "To all their dues: tribute to whom tribute," and so forth. Likewise, tributes are as it were a just stipend given to the king for his service and for the expenses necessary to defend and govern the state. But the hired laborer is worthy of his wages, nor is the mouth of the ox threshing grain to be muzzled. For the same reason tithes are owed even if not sought, because they are a just stipend and the owed maintenance of ministers; but the king is God's minister for the state, Romans 13.

And manifest reason proves it. The prince has the right of commanding; therefore, when the command is legitimate, it must be obeyed. Many contend that payment is required only when it is rigorously exacted, because, since penalties are attached, the laws seem to be merely penal, and because otherwise a great snare would be cast upon consciences. These reasons, I say, accomplish nothing. For even if a penalty is established with the law, the law nevertheless binds conscience. It would indeed be absurd for a legitimate prince to bring just revenues for the necessities of the state to such a condition that he is not obeyed unless he exacts them rigorously, with armed hand and severe threats. This is to be unwilling for princes to be mild and gentle.

No honor sufficiently great can be shown to a good prince, and will you abandon him as he keeps watch for you, and not aid him unless compelled by evil? Next, if you lawfully owe it, rigorous exaction is therefore not to be awaited. For by resisting you cause him to exact it rigorously, and, as though you were a bad debtor, you do not permit the debt to be canceled unless force or law is employed. Finally, delay often carries danger; when aid does not come promptly, others who are ready are offended. Accordingly, authors who think otherwise err dangerously, and perhaps seditiously, if the question concerns right. But I believe rather that they think thus concerning tributes which are everywhere imposed without necessity; the counselors of princes, the swallows of the people, are accustomed to be accused of these, although the princes themselves are truly condemned.

§ 19. Exemption from just tributes must in no way be granted without a just cause. This can happen in two ways. First, the prince may remit the tribute to someone. When he does this without just cause, he sins partly by prodigality and partly by injustice, because he deprives the state of the protection owed to it. This latter kind of offense has its greatest place in revenue that must be expended not upon the prince but upon the state. But if a fixed sum has been commanded from the whole state or city, the prince cannot exempt some and incline the burden upon the rest. For even if individuals feel little loss, all are nevertheless injured; indeed, contrary to right a sum is imposed upon all, and from this arises mortal sin.

[Printed page 636]

For if someone extorts one hundred gold pieces by fear from the inhabitants of a territory, although the multitude is such that individuals pay only one denarius, the injury is nevertheless grave, and he is bound to restore the one hundred gold pieces. Here, so far as the obligation is concerned, the reasoning is the same. For the prince exacts from the others what one man is bound to pay. It is certainly of great importance that exemptions of this kind not be granted. If a prince is pressed by the importunity of certain persons, let him either show them his own obligation or satisfy it from his private patrimony.

I give this warning because of certain men who always incite princes to collect tributes, yet when the matter comes to action most shamelessly demand immunity for their own estates. Although they redeem the infamy of this crime by another wickedness: in collecting tributes they contrive that something always remains over as an honorarium for the prince; it is then given to those very men, who boast that they have paid the revenues from their own possessions.

§ 20. Tributes which are given for the public cause not only require a cause; they also cease when the cause ceases, unless another cause has succeeded it. Those which are given to the prince for expenses and labors remain free. The continuation of a tribute when its cause has ceased is altogether damnable. Our Suárez defines the matter thus, book 5, On Laws, chapter 15, §§5--6:

> Concerning this condition, it must be considered that, if we speak of tributes which are paid to the king himself for his expenses and because of his labors and vigils, the justice of such tributes does not depend upon their use. For whether the king later spends such revenues badly or well, he will not be unjust in receiving the tributes, because he is truly their owner and can freely dispose of them without injustice, provided that he fulfills his office by governing and defending the state as he is bound. Otherwise, if he fails in this, he will unjustly receive and retain these tributes, which are given on account of his office and are like wages for work, which one who does not labor receives unjustly.
>
> But if we speak of tributes imposed for the common works of the state, it is clear that they must be expended upon such works; otherwise fraud and injustice are committed, which lies rather in the reception and retention of that tribute than in its imposition. For the imposition could have been just if a real cause was present, but afterward reception or retention becomes unjust from the lack of the required use. It is therefore necessary that the tribute be expended upon the work for which it was imposed; for the king does not properly become owner of that tribute, but its steward. Hence at most he will sometimes be able, when a true necessity arises, to transfer it to another work which also pertains to the common utility of the kingdom or people; for with respect to this he possesses supreme power and administration.
>
> From this it is further inferred that tribute depends, so to speak, upon its cause both in coming to be and in being preserved. For if the cause is necessary for the justice of the title, the tribute cannot last longer than the cause, because when the cause--which is certainly necessary and adequate in its own kind--ceases, the effect ceases:

> chapter When It Ceases, On Appeals. The Gloss explains it in almost this way, citing various laws in the chapter After the Translation, On Renunciation, at the word ceasing; and the Doctors note it on law When the Father, § Sweetest, Digest, On Legacies, book 2. But in the present matter, the cause is necessary for the justice of the tribute, as has been said. Therefore, when it ceases, the justice ceases, and consequently the tribute ought to cease.
>
> This is confirmed because, if tribute is exacted after the cause has ceased, more is now exacted than is necessary; therefore equity and justice are not observed in it. For, as we have said, the proportion between the amount of tribute and the demand of the cause is necessary for the justice of the tribute. Therefore, if the cause is perpetual, the tribute will be able to be perpetual; but if the cause is temporal, the tribute ought also to be temporal, so that when the cause ceases, it too ceases.

Nevertheless, the cause is just if, by consent, the contributions are useful for increasing the treasury, are brought into it, and are not expended upon other uses. Therefore it is expedient that they be brought in before the eyes of all. Thus Aristotle, Politics 5, chapter 8: "Therefore, lest the treasury be plundered, let public money be delivered in the presence of all the citizens; and let copies of the accounts, diligently compared with the exemplar, be distributed and deposited among the wards, centuries, and tribes. And so that magistracies may be administered without gain, honors ought by an enacted law to be decreed to those whose fidelity and diligence in office have been proven and observed. Now in democracies the wealthy must indeed be protected, not only by not dividing their farms and estates, but also by not dividing their fruits individually and transferring them to others--a thing which occurs in some forms of governing the state, yet is not noticed."

§ 21. The last counsel is to warn all rulers to take the least possible amount in tributes. For through them they burden themselves with hatred, diminish commerce, destroy agriculture, and render the prices of things--especially estates--very low. And although the prince is armed with persuasion and violence, poverty is nevertheless unconquerable. Indeed, it cries freely with the Roman people: "May the devil take the new revenues, and their authors with them."

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, when he saw ancient towns in ruins and their inhabitants few, restored everything by remitting revenues. What prince's quaestor now does not favor the treasury more than justice? How many make the treasury a place of spoliation and a receptacle of bloody plunder? Danger is never greater than when the ignoble crowd riots because of tributes. When Hannibal threatened, the Romans withheld tributes and did not aid the state until the Senate set the example, although necessity stood before their eyes. How much more will they do so if they understand that the arrogance of courtiers is supported at their loss, as the city of Paris objected to Charles VI? The Lydians hanged Achaeus when he had exhausted everything by tributes.

For the benefit of those who suggest to princes new methods of exacting money--that is, of plundering--I shall append from Erasmus a tale, whether history or fable, that is certainly pitiable. In Paris, he says, in the grain market, there is shown a sewer in which a certain man ordered himself to be buried, because he repented too late of an evil counsel. He had seen the king sad and anxious; the cause of his grief was a straitness of money. In order to relieve the king, he advised that one or two small bronze coins be exacted even upon the small goods which countrymen brought into the city, and that this be done for only two years. When they saw that no small quantity of money was collected from this in a very populous city, more exactions were devised according to this example. When the man who had given the counsel saw that he did not possess the same authority in dissuading it that he had possessed in advising it, he fell into the greatest sorrows of mind, so much so that he despaired even of his salvation. In order both to exact punishment from himself for his ill-considered counsel and to warn others not to strike against the same stone, he provided in his will that he be buried in that sewer into which the filth of the whole market flows. The enforcement of the exaction remains there even to this very day.

But these things move little those whom avarice has blinded, who have reached such madness that sometimes they are administrators of the most filthy gains. The Chrysargyron, as Cedrenus says, was a payment of such a kind that every beggar or poor person, every prostitute even if retired, and every slave and freedman paid into the treasury for urine and dung--also the dung of beasts of burden and dogs-- whether they lived in the country or in towns. Men and women each paid a silver coin; a horse, mule, or ox the same amount; an ass and a dog, six folles.

[Printed page 637]

Yet men sought the office of collecting this tribute no differently from a military command or civil magistracy, as Evagrius says. The jurists call the contractors for the same right foricarii. O how those whom wealth commands consider nothing shameful! Those who are blinded by avarice never lack their nightingale's song; those greedy for gold never lack the pretext that security is sought for the kingdom. Princes who were rapacious and greedy of their own accord and had no need of teachers nevertheless always learned more from us against us. But after the prince has done everything, he will correct some things, not all; many, when open dangers of theft arise, will turn their minds to cunning and impostures.

The necessity of revenues is shown in law 1, § In the Cause 20, π., On Examinations: a city cannot be sustained without expense. See Bulenger, On the Revenues of the Roman People. A city without a treasury is fragile.

Egypt paid a fifth part, Genesis 47; Sicily a tenth, Cicero, Against Verres; the Indians a fourth, Strabo, book 11, to their kings. Babylon paid an artaba of silver each day, Herodotus, book 1; see also Herodotus, book 3. Lipsius thinks the Gauls gave Caesar four millions; others, one million. The latter is truer, for they also supplied grain, labor, soldiers, and other things. And at that time one million was worth more than ten are now.

Tacitus, book 13: the Senate prevented Nero when he wished to remit tribute, lest the empire be dissolved.

Nicephorus collected a tax from smoke, as Zonaras says, which he called καπνικόν.

A tax was given upon shade, with Pliny, book 12, as witness.

Michael the Paphlagonian scraped money together from the air; Cedrenus calls it ὑπὲρ ἀερικὸν, and Chrysostom says, ἀὴρ ὠναῖς ὑποβάλλεται. "Air is for sale."

There was also another tax called ἀλληλέγγυον, the obligation of the rich on behalf of the poor. It was called chartiaticum when they paid two folles to officials for documents. The twentieth of Augustus is well known--altogether a tolerable tribute, and one which I would recommend. Those who were neither the nearest agnates nor poor gave a twentieth part of an inheritance or legacy. His invention too was the twenty-fifth part of slaves sold, altogether a great revenue at a time when they had armies of slaves and slave-dealers. All owed a fortieth to tax-farmers, Quintilian, Declamation 359. Caligula exacted a fortieth of lawsuits, Suetonius. A fiftieth of wild beasts was added.

Augustus instituted a hundredth part of goods sold; Tiberius converted it to a two-hundredth, but afterward restored the hundredth; Caligula remitted it for Italy. Appian, in the Syrian Wars, says that the Syrians and Cilicians paid a hundredth of assessed property.

The urine tax of Vespasian was exacted from fullers who used urine; jars stood in alleys. Macrobius, Saturnalia 3.17. Another was the foricarium.

I have spoken of the Chrysargyron; I have no intention of stirring further controversy about it.

A tenth was deducted from legacies made between spouses. Alexander Severus instituted a tax upon craftsmen, but for the most part upon those who were unnecessary. Lampridius.

Caligula also wished marriages to be taxable, although what he exacted is not stated individually; some understand it of those who were procurers of their wives at home. A brothel tax existed in the time of Claudius.

In the Triumvirate an eighth part was exacted from freedmen in Italy, Dio, book 10; from freeborn men, a fourth of annual income. Isaac Comnenus imposed a tribute upon villages; Pertinax received revenue from lakes and rivers. There was also a ground rent, when houses had been built upon public soil. More severe was the tax of thirds, when a third part was paid from fields. A tribute for the dead was as profitable as it was wicked. Cicero, book 2 To Quintus His Brother, admits that the tribute of the aediles was unjust and heavy. The siliquaticum was imposed upon all merchandise. The sextarius paid in Apulia and Calabria seems to belong here. The tribute for the furnishing of recruits was great. Tenants also brought twelve drachmas into the treasury.

Add to these all revenues, tithes, pasture-dues, poll taxes, the income of the meat market, and saltworks, and an immense quantity of money will result. There are so many other names which I have omitted that in a short time the state drew everything to itself.

CHAPTER VIII

Personal Services Are No Less Useful Than Tribute

§ 1. There is another kind of tribute, little used but nevertheless more useful than a monetary contribution, and not very burdensome if applied moderately. For by labor that is not difficult, subjects accomplish what would otherwise have to be done at great expense through hired workers.

The customary works are chiefly these: 1. that for restoring public buildings, fortresses, hospitals, and churches, and for building new ones when necessary, they convey the materials; in this matter care must be taken that the labor is divided among many. 2. That they repair roads, banks, and bridges. 3. That each group repair the walls in its own cities. 4. That they cut down forest. 5. That they plant forests. 6. That they cultivate common land, or the land of the state. 7. It is harsh to employ them in mines, but nothing prevents imposing the easier operations, such as removing the earth that lies upon the surface.

§ 2. Legitimate causes are also required for these impositions when labor is exacted: they must proceed from a legitimate prince, from public necessity, and without great burden upon the subjects. Samuel shows the right of the king chiefly in these matters, 1 Kings 8:11:

> This will be the right of the king who is to rule over you. He will take your sons and place them in his chariots; he will make them horsemen and runners before his four-horse chariots; and he will appoint for himself tribunes and centurions, plowmen of his fields and reapers of his crops, and makers of his weapons and chariots. He will also make your daughters perfumers, cooks, and bakers for himself. He will also take your fields, vineyards, and best olive groves and give them to his servants. He will also take a tenth of your crops and the revenues of your vineyards, to give them to his eunuchs and servants. He will also take away your male and female servants, your best young men, and your asses, and put them to his work. He will likewise take a tenth of your flocks, and you will be his servants.

Many formerly abused this right or power. And it has been shown above that this very right is unjust. Many kings, I say, used this labor tyrannically, and, so far as I know, no one surpassed Pharaoh, except perhaps the Rasuani, who oppressed not only the children of Israel but also the Egyptians; for they too were compelled to build the pyramids. But the work was deliberately contrived so that it might appear like a miracle.

First, from its sheer size: the Pyramid covered eighty iugera, as Herodotus reports. Pliny and Theodorus assert that 360,000 men were assigned to this work and completed it in twenty years. It was made from the hardest stones, intended to remain forever, yet dressed with the greatest art although difficult to handle, and joined together with the utmost firmness. He says that none was less than thirty feet. They were cut from the Arabian mountains, dragged over land for a very long journey as far as the Nile, placed upon boats there, carried to the African mountain, and built there in earth sandy on every side.

[Printed page 638]

Afterward no trace either of the embankment or of the fragments of the cut stones appeared, as though the gods themselves had heaped together so great a mass. The money expended in building it upon parsley, onions, and garlic alone exceeded 1,600 talents, which amount to 9,060,000 crowns. Herodotus relates that this was inscribed upon the mass in Egyptian letters. At the bottom was a mound upon which these great structures were imposed; the Nile was let into it through a trench.

Asychis, the fourth king of Egypt after Cheops, wishing to surpass his predecessors in the glory of achievements, built a pyramid of brick. Herodotus testifies that he inscribed these words upon its side: “Do not compare me with the other pyramids; I surpass them as greatly as Jupiter surpasses the other gods. For men struck the bottom of a lake with a pole; gathering the mud which adhered to the pole, they formed me and brought me to such a size."

The hanging gardens of Babylon and walls of immense size were made by compulsory labor, although an innumerable multitude of laborers was driven to it. For it is said of Nebuchadnezzar that he did not open the prison to those who were bound. But he so enlarged and fortified Babylon that he could be considered its builder. Therefore, formerly the first part of tyranny was to oppress subjects with works and to exact the performance of labors as though from slaves.

In the statue of Nebuchadnezzar, the Babylonian kingdom is gold, the Persian silver, the Greek bronze, the Roman iron. The comparison among the monarchies is not such that the Roman is as much worse than the Babylonian as iron is worse than gold; nor indeed is the distinction between the Persian and Babylonian the same as that between gold and silver. For gold is tenfold, as Pollux teaches from Menander and the letter to Commodus, or twelvefold, as Plato in the Socrates, and as our Villalpandus attempts to prove from 2 Kings 24 and 1 Chronicles 21:24--25. But the Babylonian monarchy could not equal twelve Greek monarchies. The principal point, therefore, was that in its manner of ruling or its power, the Babylonian was greater, more powerful, more glorious, and, as it were, more imperious.

In that barbarism this was sought above all: not so much that they might collect gold as that they might hold nations in servitude. Nor did Nimrod, author of the tower of Babylon, seek money, but the glory of a name from so celebrated a monument. Individual families did not depart to found houses and cities, but remained intent in mind upon that most insane substructure. They therefore thought that this was truly to reign: to possess the labor and bodies of subjects. Hence Sesostris drove his chariot upon the necks of kings, and in no other spirit that Roman rustic emperor said that he preferred to command the rich rather than to be rich. Hence Nebuchadnezzar rendered the lands of the nations desolate and gathered captivity as the sand of the sea.

I indeed think false the things which Berossus, Abydenus, and others report concerning the works, but those very hyperboles indicate that the greatest things were accomplished by them. Berossus relates that Nebuchadnezzar added a new Babylon to the old, placed three περιβόλους within and the same number without, of brick and bitumen, and adds:

> πλὴν ὄντα γε ὑπερβολὴν ὡς μεγάλα, καὶ ὑπερήφανα
>
> "Except that they were exceedingly great and lofty."

He then describes the hanging gardens, in which he had made mountains, forests, and rivers, for the sake of his wife, who, born in Media, desired upon the plain of Shinar a likeness of the hills of her homeland. They say that Babylon was laid out in a square, each side of which was 120 stadia, that is, fifteen German miles. The width of the walls was fifteen royal cubits and their height two hundred; the royal cubit exceeds the common cubit by three digits. Now, considering the size of present empires, all the kings of Europe could not build so great a city, much less in so short a time. For the work required three million craftsmen, besides carriers, diggers, and others, who must have been twice as numerous, where there was so great a height of walls and mountains and the diversion of streams and rivers. Others employed people in mines; the Romans employed them both in other works and in hunting, namely the most dangerous hunting of lions, tigers, and leopards.

But Tarquinius Priscus, vainly numbered among the good kings, surpassed the cruelty of all tyrants. Pliny, book 36, chapter 15, says of him:

> But then the elders marveled at the vast area of the embankment and the insane substructures of the Capitol; besides these, the sewers, the greatest of all works to describe, with mountains tunneled through and, as we related a little above, the city suspended and navigated beneath. When Marcus Agrippa was aedile after his consulship, seven rivers were diverted through channels and, being forced by their headlong course to seize and carry away everything after the manner of torrents, and in addition being stirred up by the mass of rain, they beat their beds and sides. Sometimes they receive the waves of the Tiber poured backward. The opposing currents of the waters fight within, and yet the stubborn strength resists. Internal masses of such size are dragged along, while the fabric of the > work does not yield. Collapses that fall of themselves or are caused by fires strike it; the ground is shaken by earthquakes; nevertheless, for eight hundred years from Tarquinius Priscus they have endured almost impregnable.

>
> A memorable example must not be omitted, especially because it was omitted by the most celebrated founders of histories. When Tarquinius Priscus made the work by the hands of the plebs, and the labor was uncertain whether it was longer or more dangerous, weariness was aroused everywhere, and the Roman citizens escaped it by suicide. The king found a new remedy, never devised before or afterward: he fastened to crosses the bodies of all who had died in this way, to be viewed by the citizens and at the same time mangled by beasts and birds. For this reason the shame proper to the Roman name, which often saved desperate battles, then too brought assistance; but at that time it imposed a constraint, since the living were ashamed when they thought that the dead would feel shame. He is said to have made the size of the passages such that a wagon heavily laden with hay could pass through.

That tyranny was excessively cruel and unjust, and no prince ought to imitate it.

§ 3. A prince will act humanely and piously if, where an exaction of money is just, he converts it into labor, but on this condition: those who are unwilling to perform the labor should pay a fixed amount as its price, which should go to those who labor. That is the mildest form of tribute and is frequently employed in fortifying cities. It is easy for the rich to pay something and for the poor to labor with some profit.

Although Valens and Valentinian decreed that care must be taken lest anyone think this personal service should be assessed at a price, Code, book 10, title 47: “This precaution is fitting: let no one think that this service, which is personal, should be assessed at a price. The pinnacles of the greatest dignities, also the counts of the consistory, our notaries, all chamberlains and former chamberlains, are to be freed from all base services. But a similar privilege is then to cover the rest, who are protected by a palatine or military prerogative within the palace, only if they have shown under the earlier statutes that they belong to an exemption of this sort; so that such benefits may be shown to have been granted not to individuals but commonly to a dignity or body, while the ancient custom concerning rhetoricians and grammarians of both branches of learning remains in force.”

[Printed page 639]

§ 4. Formerly many private persons took care of public works at their own expense, and therefore inscribed their names upon them. The magnificence of Pericles and the Athenian people in this matter is well known. They rightly honor the man who confers honor upon the state itself.

“One who, through generosity and not the necessity of a debt, has granted his own revenues in the interim for completing works is not through envy to be prevented from receiving the fruit of his munificence through the inscription of his name upon any works he has made. The superintendents of works have dealings with the contractors, but the state with those whom it has appointed for accomplishing the work. Therefore how far, who, and to whom one is bound is for the governor of the province to assess. And lest the name of the man through whose generosity the work was built be erased and the names of others inscribed, and for that reason similar generosity by citizens toward their native lands be withdrawn, let the governor of the province interpose his authority.”

What may cause still greater wonder is that sometimes that generosity had to be restrained. Thus in the same place: “A private person may make a new work even without the prince’s authority, unless it pertains to rivalry with another city, supplies material for sedition, or is situated around a theater or amphitheater. But the constitutions declare that a new work may not be made at public expense without the prince’s authority. It is not permitted to inscribe upon a public work the name of anyone other than the prince or the person by whose money that work was made.”

A law in the same place shows that money was also bequeathed for public works, and prefers that it be converted to the maintenance of those already existing: “The deified Pius rescribed that money bequeathed for new works should rather be converted to the maintenance of works which exist than expended upon beginning a new work--namely, if a city has enough works and money cannot readily be found to repair them. If someone, with the consent of the people, has promised to adorn with marble or in another manner a work made by someone else, and to inscribe the title of his own name while the titles of the earlier men who made those works remain, the Senate decreed that this ought to be done. But if private persons add any sum of their own to works made with public money, it is provided by the same commands that they should use the title of inscription in such a way that they write how great a sum they contributed to that work."

If the prince could stimulate this manner of public benefit, so that private persons would contribute for honor's sake toward building and maintaining towers, bridges, fortresses, and other structures, the state would be relieved of great expense. He will attain this if he is sparing in tributes and receives only so much as is given through persuasion. Now great riches are spent upon those works and the labor of very many is exacted.

Much greater vigilance must be used lest he employ the labor of farmers in hunting. For they weary themselves and their beasts of burden; farmers are harshly treated by nobles and curse the prince. But how can a recreation please a prince amid the groans of the wretched and the curses of the angry?

§ 5. Meanwhile, exemption cannot be granted except to one who has deserved well, and rank does not exempt, Code, book 8, title 12: "All must strive through a contribution of labor to restore or construct harbors, aqueducts, and walls; nor may anyone be excused from a share of this kind by privileges of rank." Those who use common goods will rightly all assist in their preservation.

This must be done now, for formerly they were maintained from the estates of the state, as the emperors Arcadius and Honorius decreed, Code, book 8, title 12, Lest the Most Splendid. Yet soldiers are exempted even after the completion of their service by Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius, Code, book 10, title 48, On Exemptions; likewise illustrious persons, but only from base services; likewise students, those older than fifty-five years, Code, book 10, title 49; and, in title 50 of the same book, a blind father and those suffering from disease of the ears or gout.

CHAPTER IX

Good Household Management Is an Honorable Road to Wealth and Troublesome to No One

§ 1. Kings and all princes are rich enough if they are good household managers, and if they employ frugality, but royal frugality. The saying of Chilon in Laertius, book 1, is prudent: "One who does not rightly govern his own house cannot govern the state." For a household is exceedingly like the city that is governed.

But here Megalonymus Parophaeus stands ready as a formidable adversary. He removes all household management from a generous prince. "Why do you make a money-changer out of a king, so that he looks around anxiously like Euclio and offends all his friends? Will you lead him to the granaries, the wine cellar, and the valuation of onions and garlic? Let the prince's mind be free for the loftier heights of affairs. Let him administer wars, peace, treaties, and justice; let him rejoice that there are many things which perish to his loss. From his sublimity let him cast the lower cares upon others. Let there be a distinction between the prince and his procurator."

§ 2. That flattery brings more evil to the state and ruins the prince more than can be imagined. I wish the prince to be great-minded and, as follows from this, liberal. But it belongs to liberality not that he pour out wealth rashly, but that he receive from those from whom he ought, at the place, time, and manner in which he ought; that he preserve, expend, and give according to right reason. I say that no prince can do these things unless he possesses an exact system of household management.

For if he neglects his affairs, these disadvantages arise. 1. When he has himself been reduced to the last extremity, the cleverest thieves lend him money at interest. 2. Then, unknowingly, he enriches enemies and makes them most hostile. Beware of believing that those who, abusing your sloth, have committed various forms of embezzlement ever wish you well; as long as they fear, they wish you dead.

Nor do I occupy the prince with private labors, but show him the necessity of attending to them. Amid so many eyes of petitioners, hands of plunderers, and tongues of liars, you set the prince like a golden sheep and order him not to know by whom he is plundered. Nor do I listen when you say that good men should be placed over the household management. For the prince's sloth will make them evil: great gains and greater impunity recommend nothing moderate.

Third, the prince's household management is easy; neglected, it increases his cares and, what is unworthy of a prince, makes them anxious. For he who has abundantly enough upon which to live and from which to give to others passes his life pleasantly. He whose debt increases daily is compelled to submit his mind to biting anxieties. Indeed, if he knows that very many things are being lost to him, yet neither grieves nor commands them to be spent better, he is scarcely worthy of the name of man. If you do not know what he has received, what he possesses, or what has been given to each, but know only the bread he eats and that which he gives to a parasitic embezzler, he is a prince only in title, a laughingstock to foreigners, a burden to subjects, a source of profit to ministers, the slave of his own slaves and the prey of purple-clad thieves.

[Printed page 640]

§ 3. Since I have seen and known men who, while apparently doing the same things and using the same care, administer their affairs with very different results, I began to consider within myself why this should happen. I learned from Scripture to refer increases in household property to the divine blessing and losses to the curse. Yet because miracles are not ordinary, I discovered that such contrary effects proceed from the means and diligence of men.

Gaius and Titius practice agriculture and animal husbandry: one accumulates wealth, while the other's estate always slips backward. Two men trade: one man's affairs increase, the other's decrease. Two possess instruments for carrying on their affairs: one immediately draws out for use what has been placed in order; the other spends the time for acting in searching. Some build at great expense houses which are useless because the principles of architecture have been neglected; others at lesser expense arrange houses suited to every use, in which no corner is not most suitably adapted.

The reason, therefore, is that some conduct affairs by a certain art, order, and method, while others complete everything rashly, just as it comes to hand. Those who learn to play upon organs scarcely produce a slight harmony with great labor and readily damage the very instruments which they do not know how to tune. In the same way private persons injure their patrimony, and princes their province, with great losses while they are ignorant of or despise household management.

§ 4. Household management is fourfold, as Aristotle distinguishes in book 2 of the Oeconomica:

> Οἰκονομίαι τέσσαρες δὲ εἰσὶν ὡς ἐν τύπῳ διελευστέον· τὰς γὰρ ἄλλας εἰς τοῦτο ἐμπιπτούσας εὑρήσομεν· βασιλική, σατραπική, πολιτική, ἰδιωτική. τούτων δὲ μεγίστη μὲν καὶ ἁπλουστάτη, ἡ βασιλική· ποικιλωτάτη δὲ καὶ ῥᾴστη, ἡ πολιτική· ἐλαχίστη δὲ καὶ ποικιλωτάτη, ἡ ἰδιωτική. ἔστι κοινωνεῖν μὲν τὰ πολλὰ ἀλλήλαις ἀναγκαῖον· ὅσα δὲ μάλιστα δι᾽ αὐτῶν ἑκάστῃ συμβαίνει, ταῦτα ἐπισκεπτέον ἡμῖν ἐστιν.

There are four forms of household administration, so that the matter may be distinguished by a certain outline, for we shall find the others falling within these: royal, satrapic, civic, and private. Of these, the royal is the greatest and simplest. The civic is more varied than the others and the easiest. The private is indeed the smallest, but it too is exceedingly varied. It is necessary that there be many things common among them; but those things which occur by themselves in each must be considered by us.

He divides the royal into coinage, ἐξαγώγιμα καὶ εἰσαγώγιμα, καὶ ἀναλώματα--exports and imports, and expenditures. Those things which are imported and exported were treated in the chapter on tributes; expenditures will now be discussed.

But if it is royal to establish a standard for denarii and gold pieces, to impose tributes upon all things great and small, and if not even the buyer of roasted chickpeas or the poor man selling trifles can defraud him, why should it be contrary to his dignity to guard what has been collected in this way, demand an account, and know where it goes?

They therefore betray themselves as impostors who suggest to kings every pocket and every name for plunder: hundredths, fiftieths, fortieths, twentieths, tenths, fifths, taxes on columns, taxes on doors, the Chrysargyron, and smoke taxes; yet, after these have been collected with so many cares, they forbid the king to attend to them, repeatedly saying that it is unworthy for Jupiter to be present at small matters. As though it were worthy for Jupiter to be present when poor men are scraped together door by door and handful by handful, his granaries stuffed from all their baskets and his treasuries from all their purses, and then, lest those griffins, who are ἁρπακτικώτεροι γαλῶν, “more rapacious than cats,” lack an opportunity for seizing, to close his eyes.

But what of Aristotle? Does he not expressly posit τὰ ἀναλώματα, expenditures and expenses? Unless I am mistaken, these men will lead their prince under the appearance of magnanimity to be mad by calculation. For they consume him in the most foolish labor: that he should strain every sinew to collect, but not preserve what has been collected. This is just as if he poured water into a perforated cask with wicked labor. What the poets feigned to be the punishment of the Danaids in the lower world, these men interpret as dignity, so that no one can doubt that they desire this: that the prince, at his own danger, labor, and odium, should squeeze money from his subjects, which they afterward, without the prince’s knowledge, turn to their own profit.

§ 5. Satrapic management also pertains to the king, that is, as Aristotle warns, those things which arise ἐκ τῆς γῆς, “from the land,” concerning which he should calculate the most exact account. When all matters have been brought together into one, this is the sum of household management: no more should be spent than is received. From exceeding that limit come borrowed money and pledges, and all the ornament of majesty is surrendered to the ostentation of the rich.

But it is too little not to spend more than you receive if you do not diligently set aside something to be taken up for the uncertain emergencies of the times. Since they possess great revenues, they can also heap up great treasures without diminishing princely splendor, provided order is established. Once order has been brought into use, it makes the accounts balance without any labor. Xenophon says many things about order in λόγῳ οἰκονομικῷ, "the discourse on household management"; if order is applied, the numerous phalanx of a palace will be governed as easily as a small house.

§ 6. First, effort must be made to have faithful ministers. This indeed will be attained in few, for amid so many peoples there is scarcely one fidelity. Yet the faithful hearts of a few will be able to resist the rapacity of many. Next, let no one be idle; let his own duties be assigned to each, an account of which most should be bound to render on the same day, and very many in the same week. Third, let the prince purge and contract his court, and free it entirely from a useless crowd of men who neither benefit the prince, defend him, nor increase his splendor.

Great kings and princes did this, preferring to have a great, dignified, royal court rather than a populous one. I judge useless a crowd such as exists at the court of the Turkish emperor. First, there are three hundred court tailors in the palace, a sign of great luxury in clothing; likewise three hundred smiths; five hundred new Janissaries assigned to cleansing the citadel and base services; four hundred who care for dogs and falcons; and thirty wrestlers. He could reduce these and other refuse of men to a moderate number.

Antoninus Pius formerly did this. Julius Capitolinus says: "He withdrew salaries from many whom he saw receiving them in idleness, saying that nothing was more sordid, indeed more cruel, than for those who contributed nothing to the state by their labor to gnaw it away. Hence he also diminished the salary of Mesomedes the lyric poet. He knew particularly well the accounts of all the provincials and revenues. He transferred his private patrimony to his daughter, but gave its fruits to the state. He sold superfluous imperial furnishings and estates, and lived upon his own farms, differently according to the seasons. He undertook no journeys except that he went to his estates in Campania, saying that the retinue even of an exceedingly frugal prince was burdensome to provincials."

Golden words: "The retinue even of an exceedingly frugal prince is burdensome." For a retinue is costly, and that concerning which magnificent cruelty is practiced publicly is tyranny in private. What is poured out splendidly is exacted with the utmost bitterness.

[Printed page 641]

Alexander Severus used to say that it was an evil thing for a prince to feed from the entrails of provincials men who were neither necessary nor useful to the state. Let the prince look around his court, and let him persuade himself that, in proportion to the number of men whom he maintains for idleness and delights, he is maintaining a plague for the state.

§ 7. In every matter let him avoid immoderate expenditures, as upon gems, building, and similar things. Let him despise gems like childish locks of hair. Alexander Severus acted excellently, as Lampridius reports: "Whatever he had in gems, he sold, and brought the gold into the treasury, saying that gems were of no use to men; that royal matrons ought to be content with one hair-net, earrings, a necklace set with pearls, a crown with which they performed sacrifice, a single cloak sprinkled with gold, and a ceremonial robe which did not contain more than six ounces of gold." In his own times he plainly performed a censorship based upon his own morals. Great men imitated him, and most noble matrons imitated his wife.

Caligula, on the contrary, neglected nothing upon which money is customarily squandered. Accordingly, when he had found two hundred and thirty hundred-thousands of gold pieces, he dissipated them before the third year, as Dio says in his Caligula. These amount to sixty-six millions of our gold pieces, for the Roman pieces were twice as large. This was the more marvelous because money at that time was rarer and dearer, and one gold piece accomplished more than ten now do; for they could buy an ox for a gold piece.

Some also deliberately lost everything, like that monster of whom Cornelius speaks: “He himself, from the sole concern of wasting, built stables for charioteers; filled the environs with spectacles of gladiators and beasts; as though amid the greatest abundance of money he made sport of it.” Indeed, Caecina and Valens celebrated the birthday of Vitellius by exhibiting gladiators district by district throughout the whole city, with immense preparation unprecedented before that day.

But this occurred under that fourth beast, that is, the Roman Empire, so that it might break in pieces and trample the remainder underfoot. Therefore there was always public want, both of men and of money. Take an example from Vopiscus in his Probus:

> The kind of spectacle was as follows. Strong trees, torn up by the roots by soldiers, were fastened to beams joined far and wide; earth was then thrown over them, and the whole circus flourished like a forest through the charm of new greenness. Then through all the entrances were let in a thousand ostriches, a thousand stags, a thousand boars, a thousand fallow deer, ibexes, wild sheep, and other grass-eating animals, as many as could be fed or found. Then the common people were admitted, and each seized what he wished.
>
> On another day he added in the amphitheater, in one release, one hundred maned lions whose roars aroused thunder. All of them were killed from the rear gates; they did not afford a great spectacle when they were killed, for they did not possess that onset of beasts which they customarily have when emerging from their cages. Moreover, many beasts which the people were unwilling to seize were killed with arrows. Then one hundred Libyan leopards, one hundred lionesses, and three hundred bears were exhibited together. The spectacle of all these beasts is known to have been greater than it was pleasing.
>
> In addition, three hundred pairs of gladiators were exhibited, most of them Blemmyes of enormous size who had been led in triumph, many Germans and Sarmatians, and some Isaurian robbers.

But I shall speak later of the expenses fabricated for gifts and donations. Now let us look at other things.

CHAPTER X

Commerce Must Be Increased

§ 1. A twofold question is raised concerning trade. Some would prefer commerce to be prohibited altogether in a state, for it imports vices; others prohibit only the state itself from trading. They have their reasons. It is excellent not to seek foreign things, but to be content with one's own. Cicero, Brutus. Next, when things pertaining to luxury have been imported, spirits grow languid and virtue is relaxed. Caesar, book 2, Gallic War. It is agreed that:

> πλούτου κακίας μᾶλλον, ἢ καλοκἀγαθίας ὑπηρέτιν εἶναι.

Wealth is the handmaid of vice rather than of virtue.

Next, commerce makes a city poorer because it makes it more extravagant. A great mass of gold and silver is brought from Spain and Peru, yet nothing else has resulted than that, from the abundance of money, the prices of things have risen. For this reason, after Indian gold reached us, the ancient tables of rents which prescribed the payment of grain and wine were changed.

Next, before cochineal, anil, xylon, sandarac, sugar, cassia fistula, pearls, and quicksilver, we felt no want; now ambition has made it a law that cities must be filled with those delights and poisons. Guevara, book 3, chapter 4 of the Dial of Princes, beautifully introduces a Danubian farmer speaking about this question:

> That you say there is no state in our country, no polity, but that we live like wild beasts, rests upon no greater reason than those statements above. For in our land we scarcely endured lying and turbulent traders, or those who import from foreign places the instruments of vice and luxury. Therefore, since we were honorable in clothing and rejoiced in sobriety in food, we had no need of much commerce.
>
> Although there are in our country no Carthaginian merchants, no oil of Mauritania, merchants of Tyre, Cantabrian steel, Asiatic spices and ointments, Spanish gold, British silver, Sidonian amber, Damascene silk, Sicilian grain, Cretan wine, or Arabian purple, nevertheless we are not beasts in that land, nor are we wholly without a state. For those things, and others of that kind, are incitements to vice rather than spurs to virtue for men.

The same Guevara, book 3, chapter 28, introduces Marcus Aurelius severely reproaching a nobleman because, having abandoned public honors, he had cast himself down to plebeian trade: "I cannot wonder enough, Cincinnatus, why you have ceased to attack enemies in the manner of a Roman knight and have become a merchant, as though made one of the plebs."

He indeed judges it unbecoming, but nevertheless speaks of unjust trade, by which, while foreigners are left unharmed, fellow citizens are injured. For he says thus:

> Hold this as certain, Cincinnatus: commerce and merchants are not condemned by me, nor are the contracts of buyers and sellers censured. For just as war cannot be well conducted without cavalrymen, so a city cannot stand without merchants. But I find no other cause for abandoning military service and undertaking trade than that, sitting at leisure, you may plunder in the market-place because through old age you can no longer rob in the forests.
>
> Therefore, most wretched Cincinnatus, buy cheaply and sell for more; promise many things and perform few; use one measure in receiving and another in giving; keep watch--indeed, be exceedingly watchful--lest anyone deceive you, as is customary for those who practice commerce in matters of this kind. But I affirm upon oath that the measure by which your life will be measured will be more just than the ell of your shop.

§ 2. I judge that legitimate trade, of the kind divine and human laws permit, must be preserved and increased with every effort. In Genesis 37:23 the Ishmaelites trade without censure, carrying resin, stacte, and other spices into Egypt.

Indeed, in Genesis 34:21, the Israelites also do so: “Those men are peaceable and wish to dwell with us. Let them trade in the land and cultivate it, for it is spacious and broad and needs cultivators.” Although this can be understood of cultivation, the Hebrew word nevertheless signifies trade; therefore even the patriarchs were merchants.

Indeed, in 1 Kings 10:16, merchants and sellers of wares bring gold to Solomon. In 2 Chronicles 1:16 they are called the king’s merchants. In 2 Esdras 3:32 craftsmen and merchants build at the Sheep Gate. At Tyre, however, the merchants were princes, and the traders were renowned men of the earth, Isaiah 23:8. Babylon also was a merchant, Isaiah 47:15. In Ezekiel 17:4, a city of merchants in Canaan is mentioned. Yet rich Tyre surpassed all of them. Ezekiel 27:8:

> The inhabitants of Sidon and Arvad were your rowers; your wise men, Tyre, became your pilots. The elders of Gebal and its wise men had sailors for the service of your various equipment; all the ships of the sea and their sailors were among the people of your commerce. Persians, Lydians, and Libyans were warriors in your army; they hung shield and helmet in you for your adornment. The sons of Arvad with your army were upon your walls round about; and the Pygmies who were in your towers hung their quivers upon your walls on every side; they themselves completed your beauty.
>
> The Carthaginians, your merchants, from the multitude of every kind of riches, filled your markets with silver, iron, tin, and lead. Greece, Tubal, and Meshech were your traders; they brought slaves and bronze vessels to your people. From the house of Togarmah they brought horses, horsemen, and mules to your market. The sons of Dedan were your merchants; many islands were the commerce of your hand; they exchanged ivory teeth and ebony for your price.
>
> The Syrian was your merchant because of the multitude of your works; they offered gems, purple, embroidered cloth, fine linen, silk, and chodchod in your market. Judah and the land of Israel were your traders in the finest wheat; they offered balm, honey, oil, and resin in your markets. Damascus was your merchant in the multitude of your works, in the multitude of various riches, in rich wine and wool of the finest color.
>
> Dan, Greece, and Mosel offered wrought iron in your markets; stacte and cane were in your commerce. Dedan were your traders in carpets for sitting. Arabia and all the princes of Kedar were the merchants of your hand; your merchants came to you with lambs, rams, and kids. The sellers of Sheba and Raamah were your merchants; with all the choicest spices, precious stone, and gold they offered their goods in your market.
>
> Haran, Canneh, and Eden were your merchants; Sheba, Asshur, and Chilmad were your sellers. They were your merchants in many kinds of things, with wrappings of violet cloth, embroidered work, and precious treasures which were wrapped and bound with cords; they also had cedars in your commerce. The ships of the sea were your princes in your commerce; and you were exceedingly filled and glorified in the heart of the sea.

Indeed, vast Nineveh made its merchants more numerous than the stars of heaven. Therefore, those who seek renowned cities and kingdoms must increase commerce.

I admit that morals suffer loss through commerce and riches, but these are vices not of things but of men. Otherwise it would be wrong to seek the fertility of the earth, for it too is a fertile mother of vices; nevertheless God gave his people the most excellent land, not unaware that very many would abuse that liberality for wickedness. I report these things as though the reasoning of those men were certain, because they attribute those evils to commerce; nevertheless, in this matter they seem to me to err not slightly.

For no less deceit and fraud--and even more envy and spite--are found in the huts of the poor. The vices of barbarous peoples to whom merchants did not travel were not lighter, nor are they found lighter even today. For above all they departed farthest from humanity, destroyed natural law, sanctioned man-eating and other horrors by laws, and, as now appears among the Brazilians and other peoples of America and histories teach, almost became brutish. Yet there is no less hatred, arrogance, and lust among them than among all the richest people: those beneath rags are inflamed no less than these beneath silk.

§ 3. Acquisition, or χρηματιστική, is twofold. One kind agrees with nature and arises from nature itself. For ἡ κτητική is the faculty, implanted in us by nature, of procuring what is necessary for life, just as in all animals both appetite and the acquisition of food are innate in most diverse ways, and instruments are given by which each may feed itself, as Aristotle demonstrates in Politics 1, chapter 8.

Beasts possess one method of obtaining a necessary thing: they pursue and seize the thing itself, as an ox hay, a dog bones, a lion a stag. But another method has also been given to human beings: when one has a surplus of what another lacks, they exchange with one another. This occurs in two ways. First, when one thing takes the place of another: a shoe is exchanged for a cap. If Spain exchanges wine for Polish grain, that is simple exchange. Second, when one thing is exchanged not for another thing but for money. This was invented from necessity and by the law of nations, because things cannot always be transported; money was therefore created, which by a moral law contains the power of all things.

Next, it rarely happens that one man has, in the same number and value, what another needs; thus money makes all those things liquid. Nor does it differ from other things because the use of other things is twofold: we use wine to extinguish thirst and exchange it for other merchandise, whereas every use of money is perceived in exchange.

> Τὸ νόμισμα γὰρ στοιχεῖον καὶ πέρας ἐστὶ τῆς ἀλλαγῆς.

For money is the element and end of exchange, as Aristotle says in Politics 1, chapter 9.

From this it is evident that artificial commerce is also very close to nature. For just as a Pole sows wheat not only to bake bread but also to exchange it for money and with that money procure other safeguards of life, so also a merchant carries wine bought in Spain into Poland in order to purchase other necessities with the money. Each expends labor; each undergoes danger. There is less labor but more danger in the merchant. Nature, therefore, taught this method of sustaining life.

For my part, I do not at all doubt that Abraham was a merchant. He had sheep and camels, silver and gold. I do not believe that, while wandering continually, he mined the latter, but that he acquired them through the exchange and sale of livestock. Therefore he raised livestock for this purpose: to sell it, purchase a household, and accumulate money.

§ 4. That method is therefore honorable, just as when sustenance is sought from a mechanical art, from labors upon the earth, or from the pasturing of livestock, which is movable and living agriculture. Nor is there disgrace in selling at a higher price a thing bought more cheaply, although it has not been made better. For it is in the interest of the state that this be done, and therefore a thing is ordinarily considered better by reason of place, time, and other circumstances, especially by reason of expenses. If none of these exists, the trade will not be legitimate, as when money is given and received no worse than before, yet its price is nevertheless increased.

It is honorable to sell a thing for a price; all kings also do this when they possess something in abundance. It is no less honorable to sell for a higher price a thing bought and made better, as when you raise foals and sell them dearly. But this is the work of merchants; therefore their art and practice are honorable.

[Printed page 643]

A thing must be considered better even if it has sometimes been made worse. For the price of every thing is found where its use is. Rhine wine in Sweden is better by moral valuation, although, having endured transport and the sea, it is physically worse than in its native soil. For the expense and dangers of carriage are valued at a great price. As in truth he who seeks profit must incur expense, so he who has incurred expense deservedly receives profit. This is true profit because it is just; that iambic poet therefore said prudently:

> Τὸ κέρδος ἡγοῦ κέρδος, ἐὰν δίκαιον ᾖ.

Regard profit as profit if it is just.

But you will say that it is shameful to risk oneself from desire of profit and that this does not befit a great man. Then look at an army for me, and from thirty legions select one cohort of men who do not daily put on the garb of death in hope of profit and plunder. Why do you praise these men and censure merchants?

§ 5. Therefore those who removed merchants from the state did not act prudently. The Thebans did not admit men to the helm of the state unless they had abstained from trade for ten years. This was also received in the customs and laws of the Lacedaemonians, but through the error of both cities. It is not worth the trouble to summon the Thebans to counsel concerning the state:

> You would swear that a Boeotian was born in the thick air.

Through the courage of Epaminondas alone they gained strength in a short time like a torrent, and with him they ceased. The Lacedaemonians, who at first professed military courage and poverty alone, became the most avaricious of robbers. Although that city possessed some good things, it possessed very many evils, so that they could not readily resist a powerful adversary.

I demonstrate that merchants must be admitted to counsel concerning and administration of the state. First, from the nature of the thing: exchange is a part of money-making, τῆς χρηματιστικῆς; ἡ μεταβολικὴ, καὶ τῆς μεταβολικῆς μέγιστον ἡ ἐμπορία. The greatest means of producing wealth is exchange, and the principal part of exchange is commerce. It follows that this is a principal instrument for establishing a household, and thus also a state, which arises from well-established households. If anyone considers these things, he will see that Venice, Florence, Messina, Nuremberg, and other commercial cities both abound exceedingly and possess a very well-established state. Formerly merchants were held in such honor that they were inviolate even in time of war. Indeed, in our own times, when war raged between the Belgians and the Spaniards, commerce was nevertheless not abolished.

Second, the more numerous and powerful merchants are in a city, the more numerous are the resources of the state and the methods of preserving the city. For it is exceedingly useful to possess an abundance of various things against every event. It possesses profit, but profit is an aid to need, as Aristotle warns in Ethics 8: profit, that is, with benefit to the state, without another's loss, or even with his profit.

Third, merchants are also more useful to the state if rich and distinguished merchants preside over it. For thus judged the Tyrians, Carthaginians, and other exceedingly wealthy states. 2. Their diligence brings great benefits, both because they know the characters, resources, and conditions of various nations and because with easy business and at a moderate price they obtain the things pertaining to the defense of the state, including arms, gunpowder, and engines of war. 3. They also excel in dexterity of action and civility; for wherever they go, they introduce these too. Among the reasons why the ancient Belgians were less civilized, Tacitus adduces the fact that merchants rarely migrated among them.

§ 6. Among humane and civilized peoples--that is, those who employ true prudence and moderate sustenance, as all must live, and who retain the true worship of God--commerce is necessary. For what now protects the Christian state and the dignity of kings except the diligence of merchants? Seville alone brings together the wealth of one kingdom; Lisbon alone, the wealth of a great kingdom. Therefore, where there is commerce, there are also great cities, such as Seville, Lisbon, London, Antwerp, Hamburg, Lübeck, and Amsterdam. Hence, when the multitude of people overflows, many can be retained and hired for the defense of the country.

Indeed, if we wish to confess the truth, without merchants kings can neither wage war nor even conveniently maintain a court. Merchants also conciliate foreign nations by importing things pleasing and opportune. Three things acquired the Indies for the king of Portugal: religion, war, and commerce. Religion was the head; God deigned to employ the others as instruments. Meanwhile, the Indies themselves are now held by their tribute. Innocent VIII said that the Spaniards were born to govern, so that they might commit no error in this respect; therefore they now hold so many nations in obedience. But that is public praise; after that saying they perhaps committed private errors, not by public counsel but through the desires of governors.

For my part, I think that they were born to trade. For princes, marquises, and nobles trade through others with such decorum that they preserve their dignity above all nations and increase their estate. Indeed, when I compare everything with the flourishing Roman Empire, I assert that that kingdom stands more through opportunities for commerce than through force of arms. Rome too could not stand without trade; its foremost citizens traded throughout the world, and now the Spaniards pursue the same path.

§ 7. Not only must individual merchants be fostered, but it is also honorable, according to ancient custom, for kings, states, nobles, senators, and distinguished and wealthy citizens acting in their name to trade publicly and privately. Sidon, Tyre, Nineveh before them, Babylon, and afterward Carthage teach that this was customary among the ancients. Yet they do not equal the Romans, a martial people whose rank depended upon the census, while the census of merchants is ordinarily the greatest.

Let us look at the Roman state. The Senate held the first place--the council of the world, judged even by hostile testimony to be an assembly of kings. At first there were one hundred, then three hundred, finally six hundred through the action of Livius Drusus, and at last one thousand in the time of the civil war; Augustus reduced them to six hundred. They were the heads of the empire and lights of the provinces, chosen by the censor. Although they were not free of the reproaches of enormous vices, they nevertheless compensated for these by many virtues, until the vices conquered and abolished liberty.

In the second place stood the equestrian order, certainly noble and in great part drawn from senators. It was itself also a nursery of senators, as Emperor Alexander called it. But a great part of these men traded. Crassus, who possessed a name derived from his riches, had as many as five hundred architects and craftsmen among his slaves; he hired out their labor in a city exposed to collapses and fires.

[Printed page 644]

Livy is the authority that a guild of merchants was established at Rome; it was formed when Appius Claudius and Publius Servilius were consuls. At Rome there was a most powerful association of tax-farmers. They were Roman knights because they possessed influence in a province. Cicero, in letters to Lentulus, Appius, and Quintus his brother: these same men were merchants and traded throughout the province.

What of Caecina, a man of such rank, birth, and ability? Does he not write to Cicero, Letters to Friends 6.7: “As to the journey to Asia, although the greatest necessity pressed, I did as you commanded”? Cicero’s letter indicates that he sought counsel whether he should remain in Sicily or proceed to the remnants of his Asian business. Caecina was therefore an Asiatic merchant. Cicero also commends Cuspius to Valerius, a man who had presided over the greatest affairs of the association in Africa, book 13, letter 6.

But why do we doubt concerning the Romans? Let us venture to hear Cicero For Fonteius:

> They say that, while this man was praetor, Gaul was overwhelmed with debt. By whom do they say the refinancing of such great sums was made? By Gauls? Nothing less. By whom, then? By Roman citizens who trade in Gaul. Why do we not hear their words? Why are none of their account-books produced? I pursue them of my own accord and press the accuser, judges; I pursue him, I say, and demand witnesses. I consume more labor and effort in this case in demanding witnesses than other defenders do in refuting them.
>
> I say this boldly, judges; I do not affirm it rashly. Gaul is filled with merchants; it is full of Roman citizens. No Gaul conducts any business without a Roman citizen; no coin is moved in Gaul without the account-books of Roman citizens. See how far I descend, judges, how far I seem to depart from my custom, caution, and diligence. Let one account-book be produced in which there is any trace signifying that money was given to Fonteius. Let them produce one witness from the whole number of merchants, colonists, tax-farmers, farmers, and stock-raisers.

Here he puts merchants in the first place, and Roman merchants at that. What happened in the other provinces? Were the affairs of the Romans fewer? Mithridates, by a single edict, killed 80,000 Roman citizens in Asia, among whom the foremost were knights; nevertheless, not all were killed, for hiding places protected many and friends many. Plutarch in Sulla numbers 150,000 men killed; Appian is authority that their children too were killed. These men, therefore, traded and turned every gain to their own advantage, and for this reason they were hated by the provincials.

Cicero, seventh speech Against Verres, greatly commends the affection of the Sicilians toward Rome because they did not hate tax-farmers and merchants: "Indeed, they so love our men that among them alone neither a tax-farmer nor a merchant is hated." Why "among them alone"? Therefore they were hated by all others. They were hated because they enjoyed the greatest liberty, because they had magistrates who were citizens and those whom they had favored by their votes, and because they had been commended to them through friends, so that it was difficult to obtain justice against a Roman.

Anyone who considers these things will find that there was more commerce than warfare in the provinces. For what does it mean that no business was conducted without a Roman citizen and that no coin was moved? In these affairs plebeians, knights, and senators engaged; and, what was most serious of all, they practiced usury. The case of Seneca is well known. Verres lent public money at interest. Pompey oppressed the provinces more through interest than through war. Nor could the immense wealth of the Romans have stood in any other manner, for how could the luxury and splendor of so many knights and patricians have endured without commerce?

§ 8. Let us also consider the trade of great princes in our own time. The first is in Portugal, concerning which Botero writes, book 7, discourse 12. Each year immense heaps of pepper are carried from the East Indies. These and all spices were customarily the king's, for he was accustomed to buy them together at a fixed price in Malacca and other islands. Their price is increased in the House of India at Lisbon so greatly that what is bought for three gold pieces is sold for forty.

Ginger, cinnamon, mastic, cloves, and nutmegs, to a sum of 200,000 gold pieces, are brought at every arrival of ships. They are carried to the fulling-house of Eudolius for a sum of about 100,000 gold pieces; and because in Spain they began not long ago to use them in dyeing cloth, they are sold at a dearer price, equal to that of spices. Borax, camphor, sandalwood, aloe, ebony, condiments, and other spices are brought severally for 40,000 ducats. Bales of various kinds of cotton are leased to private persons for a price of 60,000, from which a profit of eighty for every hundred is made. Ambergris and musk are brought for 20,000 gold pieces.

No moderate quantity of pearls, gems, amethysts, and diamonds is brought, but how much is unknown, because private persons hold them secretly so that they may not pay the king the duty of five for each hundred. From China, Malacca, the Moluccas, Bengal, Pegu, Lambaca, and other places in those regions are brought white silks, porcelain wares, and many most delicate trifles, which at Lisbon are called brincos, in great number. Small pearls are also brought from China, and most delightful and minute works which at Lisbon are sometimes valued at one hundred gold pieces each and are worn by the Portuguese like upper garments, as Italian priests are adorned with their rochets and dalmatics.

From China are brought certain couches, tables, chairs, and stools made from a certain wood black and shining like ebony, skillfully worked and gilded, and other most beautiful objects. From this we understand that the Chinese peoples abound in delights and possess the keenest ability. From Persia are brought most elaborate carpets worked from silk, gold, and the finest wool. The ships which come from the Indies carry in place of ballast certain small white shells found upon particular shores; these are afterward sold at Lisbon to certain merchants trading within the kingdom.

How great a profit could be prepared if the king possessed faithful ministers and drew the whole profit publicly to himself? What shall I say of exceedingly wealthy Venice? Do not both the state itself and its citizens and nobles trade? That state certainly owes to commerce the fact that it has often resisted the most powerful monarchs, for it possessed at home the sinew--money. If the power of others did not stand in the way, it would long ago have prepared a great empire; but it is difficult to rise against such powerful men.

The States of Holland protect commerce as the life and blood of their provinces, and defend voyages to the Indies with no less care than their native walls, although with great losses to private persons. For if they cease, the sailors will go elsewhere and die off, so that it will be necessary to cease altogether. The cities of Germany either trade or are partners of those who trade. The fact that some practice usury through Jews is certainly an execrable crime. I do not know whether any cities are governed more rightly than those marts, especially those in which all citizens can be participants in the public council.

§ 9. There is nothing among these things which cannot be done most honorably. If the treasury is exhausted, if debt has also been contracted, will money not be collected more honorably through commerce than through urine and other things? Nor is the question difficult for a wise man: is it more honorable to press subjects with tributes, or through diligence in trading to assist the state and spare the poor? But who will be a faithful trader for the prince? What does this matter? Who is a faithful exactor of tributes?

[Printed page 645]

No one, by Hercules, no one--either two men, or no one. Trading requires less care than collecting everything individually. The rapacity of collectors is constrained by so many laws, yet no force sufficiently opposes their desires. Let the prince employ the tax-farmers whom he now employs.

But what is worse than tax-farmers? Chrysostom asks: “What is worse than a tax-farmer? Tell me. He is the minister and trader of the misfortunes of others. He divides the labors of others and, although he has no part in the sweat, receives profit from another’s labor. For a tax-farmer is nothing other than violence raging under license, a lawful injury, avarice beneath an honorable pretext.”

Now all the chests and bundles of merchants are searched so that part of great riches may be brought into the treasury; by the same labor, complete profits can also be acquired. Τελώνης, says Suidas:

> ἀλλοτρίων πραγμάτων μεριστής, πεπαρρησιασμένη βία, ἀνεπιτίμητος ἁρπαγή, ἀναίσχυντος πλεονεξία, παραγγελίας λόγον μὴ ἔχουσα, ἀναιδὴς ἐμπορία.

A tax-farmer is a participant in and divider of the business of others; free and permitted violence; unpunished plunder; shameless avarice; business lacking reason; commerce without modesty. Let him exchange this for a somewhat more modest trade and carry the prince’s merchandise. Employ him, therefore, in merchandise. He will be capable of less evil in trade than in collection, for there he prevails by cunning alone, but here also by force; there he deals with Cretans, here with Boeotians.

§ 10. The end of commerce is to procure necessary things and sell superfluous things without fraud or deceit. If a prince does this through his agents, I do not see why he does not preserve his dignity. The merchant despises everything beneath the burning sun and sea-monsters, and

> The African wind wrestling with Icarian waves.
>
> The merchant, fearing them, praises the leisure and fields
>
> Of his own town; soon he repairs his shattered ships,
>
> Unable to endure poverty.

It also belongs to kings and princes to undertake dangers for their country; to die is not the part of the timid. To stand in the first battle-line, move among weapons, keep watch, dig a rampart, walk through frosts, and commit life to a fragile ship which enemy beaks will soon assail is judged the highest honor amid such majesty. To feed the soldier from enemy territory and establish colonies belongs to a provident commander. This appears greater, but in truth it is wiser and more right if through diligence he acquires wealth and protects the kingdom, if India and Asia increase the treasury.

Solomon's ships certainly went to Tarshish, and they did not bring back royal merchandise without commerce. "For his fleet went by sea with the fleet of Hiram once every three years to Tarshish, bringing thence gold and silver, elephants' teeth, apes, and peacocks. King Solomon was therefore magnified above all the kings of the earth in riches and wisdom," 1 Kings 10:22.

Without doubt the gold and silver were bought by the commander of the fleet with other merchandise carried there. Next, why would elephants' teeth be enumerated unless they were brought in great number? Nor do I see why the king should convey so great a quantity of ivory. Therefore the ivory was sold through royal traders, just as pepper and Indian spices once were in Portugal. Why too would apes and peacocks be mentioned if they were procured for the royal household alone and not for the whole kingdom, into which they were sold? I will not believe that playful animals were brought without profit, but that those flocks were sold throughout the richest marts of Asia.

But if some think it sordid to increase resources through commerce, they are mistaken. For wherever it is not sordid to receive revenues from merchants, countrymen, gardeners, and poor people, neither is it sordid to make a profit by exchanging things, provided that the public good is sought.

They carry the magnanimity of Theophilus in their mouths. When a cargo ship arrived with his wife's merchandise, Theophilus, although he had commanded that the property of private persons be exempted, burned it with Greek fire, pursuing the empress with insults and curses. Commerce, he said, belonged to private persons; their profits were not to be snatched away by princes but permitted to men of slender fortune. An illustrious speech in appearance, in reality empty.

Let us therefore consider Theophilus, and we shall assess his deed. Curopalates wrote his life, and the others drew from that source. 1. He feigned justice:

> After Michael's death his son Theophilus, who had now reached manhood, received his father's empire in the month of October, in the eighth indiction. In words he sought to be called a vehement lover of justice and a perfect observer of the civil laws; but in truth, guarding himself from outsiders who were hostile to him, lest anyone perhaps venture some crime against him, he feigned these things.
>
> Therefore, immediately at the beginning, he took care that all who had conspired with his father in the murder of Leo be removed from their midst and put to death. He accordingly issued an edict that all who had received any benefit from the emperor, and in addition all who had been made participants in any imperial dignity, should assemble in the Magnaura or the Pentapyrgium. When this had been done and all had assembled as he ordered, as though he had previously hidden his savagery in darkness, he addressed those gathered together in a mild and submissive voice:
>
> "My father, O people," he said, "wished and intended to bestow many benefits and other honors upon those who had assisted him and undertaken the contest for obtaining the empire. But overtaken by fate, and lest he seem ungrateful to those who had deserved well of him, he left me, his successor in the empire, as their debtor. Therefore let each man separate himself from the multitude and show himself openly to us, so that, once our friends are known, we may reward them with worthy prizes."
>
> Deceived by these words and led out of their minds, the wretched men, each of whom had devoted his effort to Leo's murder, identified themselves.

That statement, therefore, belonged to a dissembler, and to an avaricious dissembler who hunted for the reputation of magnificence. For in truth he was an iconoclast and a most bitter and avaricious persecutor. Thus the Acts of Saint Joannicius the Anchorite relate:

> Theophilus held the scepter of the Romans. But he was wholly intent upon heaping up gold and was overcome by it; moreover, unable to bear being a Christian and behaving impiously toward the divine images, surpassing others both in power and in the dogma of the icon-fighters, he concealed such a snare for all Christians. With scribes and exactors he occupied an entire village at once, wishing to do two things which are the worst: both to gratify his avaricious spirit by exactions of tribute and to make manifest to himself every person who followed orthodox doctrine, so that he might seize them by force and cause them, even unwillingly, to be joined to the heresy of the icon-fighters.

Do you not wonder that so rapacious an exactor of the poll tax was so severe toward commerce? But he was angry with his wife Theodora, an excellent woman. Her mother Theoctista also did not consent to iconoclasm, as Curopalates relates. Hence came his anger, and from any cause he sought an opportunity for vengeance. Curopalates tells the story concerning Bender, a new Thersites.

Therefore Theodora must be praised, a heroic empress of great virtue and the wife of that monster, who bore up under servitude to a husband who stripped all temples of images and filled all prisons with bishops, pastors, and monks. Mountains and caves were full of men killed by hunger and thirst. He enclosed Saint

[Printed page 646]

Methodius alive in a tomb; delighted with magic himself, he made John the Magician patriarch of Constantinople. A cruel and avaricious man, raging even at death itself, ought not to have been brought forward as an example of liberality and magnificence. These things had to be warned because many writers judge serious affairs from some single ambitious or even feigned statement.

Greater authority resides in an edict of the emperors Honorius and Theodosius: “We prohibit those more noble by birth, conspicuous in the splendor of honors, and richer in patrimony from practicing merchandise pernicious to cities, so that the intercourse of buying and selling may occur more readily among plebeians and merchants.” Code, book 4, title 63, law 3. They are not excluded because commerce is unlawful, but because it is more difficult for men of slender means to contract with them in the same city; there is now no danger of this.

Commerce, however, seems afterward to have been permitted to nobles, rich men, and those holding magistracy. For Harmenopulus, book 2, title 5, §19, testifies that it is lawful for all to practice commerce. Certainly law 1, title 63, book 4 of the Code, teaches that it was formerly customary among the powerful: “Merchants, if any belong to our household, and the men of powerful persons, are to be admonished to acknowledge the obligation of payments owed, as honor demands, so that among all who take profits from commerce the disposition of acknowledging a tolerable duty may arise.”

In the time of the Henries and afterward, a great part of the German nobility had turned to robbery and plunder, as histories and the castles still lying in ruins teach. The cause of so great an evil was that commerce was either prohibited to nobles or made a reproach to them. Even now many among the nobility prefer to be in need and defraud their creditors rather than trade, although the magnates of Spain and Italy, as also those of Belgium, practice commerce with great zeal and continually. They do this in rivalry with the marts in which they live, for they see that they are despised if only birth is in their possession and property is in the possession of others. Birth and virtue, unless joined with property, are viler than seaweed in the opinion of men--an evil opinion indeed, but one which possesses very great weight in governing a state.

The imperial laws make it manifest that commerce is not condemned in a noble and military man. For it is prohibited to soldiers, who possess a particular military oath, title 35, Code, law 12. But the reason is added in book 15:

> Soldiers, who are armed and maintained by the state, ought to be occupied with public utilities alone, and ought to labor not for the cultivation of fields, the care of animals, or profit from merchandise, but at the duties of their own military service. Let your greatness not allow any soldier hereafter to be free from the aforementioned services, but > order them to be present frequently in their own unit, so that through daily exercise in arms they may prepare themselves for wars.

>
> But if any military judge believes that any soldiers should be assigned to divine, royal, or private households or possessions, or to various other services, contrary to the prohibition of our serenity, let him know that from the one who acted contrary to the prohibition and from the one who dared to receive the soldier, one pound of gold for every soldier is immediately to be exacted.

Behold, it places merchandise and agriculture in an equal position and prohibits both, because soldiers are maintained by the state and must be prepared for wars through daily exercise in arms.

§ 11. Various goods are prohibited. At the present time all things by which the Turks could be aided against us are prohibited from being sold to them, such as every kind of weapon and things pertaining to weapons. Formerly it was also unlawful to export gold. Thus Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, title 63:

> Not only is gold by no means to be furnished to barbarians, but even if any is found among them, let it be taken away by subtle ingenuity. But if gold has moreover been carried to barbarian lands by merchants in exchange for slaves or goods of any kind, they shall be subjected not so much to losses as to punishments. And if a judge does not reclaim what is found, he hastens to conceal it like an accomplice in the crime.

Now in Sicily and Spain the export of military horses is prohibited.

§ 12. Let goods by which those of the country and native goods become cheaper not be permitted to be imported. Thus in Germany princes should not permit Cretan or Spanish wine except with an immense customs duty, nor English cloth, since the Germans themselves weave so great a variety of garments. Since the French possess much silk, they will readily permit domestic silk to be sold but burden foreign silk with customs duties.

§ 13. Finally, that prince seems to me likely to act most prudently who incites every most honorable man to commerce rather than permits him to be idle; who summons those who increase wealth through business to public duties; who furnishes merchants not only with immunities and privileges but also steadfastly provides for their safety; who orders his own people, when they travel to various kingdoms, to learn everything; who administers justice accurately and swiftly to foreigners; who grants them their own consuls and magistrates if they are numerous; and who diligently prevents frauds, monopolies, and other things which obstruct the public good.

§ 14. This too has often been asked: is it lawful for clerics to trade?

First, unlawful trade is forbidden by canon law and divine law not only to clerics but to all Christians. Thus Distinction 88, chapter 11:

> By casting those who sold and bought out of the temple, the Lord signified that a merchant can scarcely or never please God. Therefore no Christian ought to be a merchant; or, if he wishes to be one, let him be cast out of the Church of God, as the Prophet says: “Because I did not know commercial dealings, I shall enter into the powers of the Lord.” For just as one who walks between two enemies, wishing to please both and commend himself to both, cannot avoid much speaking--for it is necessary that these men speak evil of that man, and those men evil of this one--so one who buys and sells cannot avoid falsehood and perjury.

And canon 13:

> What else is trade but to wish to sell more dearly what can be bought more cheaply? Those merchants, therefore, are considered abominable who, paying no regard to the justice of God, are polluted by an immoderate pursuit of money, burdening their merchandise more with perjuries than with prices. The Lord cast such men out of the temple, saying: “Do not make my Father’s house a house of trade.”

Second, dangerous commercial dealings are dissuaded for all, On Penance, distinction 5, canon 2:

> The character of the profit either excuses or accuses the trader, because there is both honorable and shameful gain. Nevertheless, it is more useful for a penitent even to suffer losses than to be bound by the dangers of trade, because it is difficult for sin not to intervene in the intercourse of buyer and seller.

Third, trade is prohibited to clerics just as other secular affairs are. Thus Distinction 88, chapter 2, Consequent; chapter 8, Useless; and chapter 9: "Flee as a kind of plague a clerical merchant who becomes rich from poverty and glorious from obscurity." And chapter 10: "Fornication is never lawful for anyone; trade, however, is lawful at one time and unlawful at another. For before someone becomes an ecclesiastic, it is lawful for him to trade; once he has become one, it is not lawful." And Cause 14, question 4: "Let clerics know that they must abstain from unworthy gains and cease from every design or desire for any kind of commerce; or, if, in whatever rank they have been placed, they are unwilling to cease, let them immediately be compelled to abstain from clerical offices."

[Printed page 647]

Fourth, a cleric can expend some time upon business if he acts not from cupidity but with the intention of aiding the wretched. Thus Distinction 88, chapter The Holy Synod Decreed:

> The holy synod decreed that henceforth no cleric should lease estates or involve himself in secular business, except for the care of wards, orphans, and widows, or if perhaps the bishop of the city commands him to have concern for ecclesiastical affairs.

Here it is plainly evident that some affairs are secular and others ecclesiastical. Was not Moses in the world when he repeatedly entered and left the tabernacle--one who, within, was carried away in contemplation, but outside was pressed by the affairs of the weak? And chapter 7: "Let the bishop conduct the administration of widows, wards, and strangers not by himself but through the archpriest or archdeacon."

Just as in the preceding book we spoke about the secular dominion of clerics and their hearing of cases, so we must reason about commerce. Nor is there danger in this respect. For one who involves himself in business in order to relieve the poor, since the matter is indifferent by nature, makes it holy by a good end; nor will one whom piety rather than avarice has led to commerce readily commit fraud or lie.

Fifth, if commerce is permitted for the cause of wards and the poor, much more is it permitted for a cleric's own cause if he is poor; it is better for him to trade than to burden others by begging. Hence it is evident that Plato, when he thinks cities must be removed farther from harbors lest an unregulated crowd rush in and they be deformed by vices, is ἀεροβατεῖν--walking on air--and constructing separate Ideas, Chimeras, and Utopias. He does not accommodate himself to human pursuits and affections or teach that which can be put into practice.

For if a city is situated at a convenient harbor, so that cargo ships can enter the bridges and be brought into the middle of the city, why should I withdraw it to a mountain, so that ships must be unloaded with great labor and merchandise conveyed at great expense? Aristotle rightly reproaches this in his teacher, for convenience in human affairs is not to be neglected.

For my part, I think that such a city, situated rather far from a harbor, will be more vicious than one which receives into its bay fleets laden with wealth. For that more distant city needs an immense supply of sailors, boatmen, carriers, grooms, beasts of burden, and wagoners, who infect the city with great vices and receive those arriving at their very first approach. This counsel for excluding commerce seems to me like one by which someone should attempt to persuade our inhabitants of the Rheingau, who inhabit the happy hills beside the Rhine, to migrate to the neighboring mountains and carry their wines there, lest their morals be corrupted through the easy arrival of foreigners. But these things belong not to one who wishes to establish a state, but to one contemplating metaphysics.

I approve the action of an emperor who in his time was considered the best. For he had previously governed four consular provinces, lived moderately, and was most skilled in military discipline; men judged him most worthy not only of honor but also of veneration. When he was designated, the barbarians, through fear of his tested courage and confidence in the justice they knew to be in him, voluntarily surrendered themselves to him. In the greatest danger he said or did nothing that was not worthy of an emperor. When he was killed by the injury of the Praetorians, the people and Senate bore it so bitterly that they ran about like madmen and filled everything with tumult and mourning. Herodian and others relate these things concerning him.

This was Pertinax, who as a private man taught grammar, led military units, and was considered rather frugal--a fact which was also a cause of his death. Julius Capitolinus relates of him: "He was so frugal and so desirous of profit that, at the fords of Sabaria, as emperor he practiced commerce through his agents no differently than he had been accustomed to do as a private man."

Capitolinus says this with little sincerity, for he is plainly convicted of falsehood when he says that Pertinax "was nevertheless not greatly loved." How was one not greatly loved at whose elevation as emperor the Senate and people so rejoiced that there had been no altogether so sincere rejoicing over anyone? Whom they mourned as greatly as any mother mourned a son? Capitolinus himself says that the people bore his death with the greatest indignation. The soldiers and courtiers indeed hated him, and the cause of their hatred was most unjust: because he restrained their plunder and lusts. Finally, his successor Severus adopted the name Pertinax so that he might seem likely to emulate the morals of a good prince. He would not have done this unless Pertinax had been dear.

I do not excuse him from avarice. He himself defended himself when he was refusing the empire:

> Besides, all those who have become accustomed to the enormous and immense largesses of tyrants, if you begin to act a little more frugally or temperately because of a lack of money, do not attribute it to moderate administration and prudence, but immediately reproach you with avarice and sordidness. Nor do they consider that no one can distribute great gifts to everyone if he abstains from violence and plunder. But one who administers rightly and according to each person's rank not only unjustly takes nothing from anyone, but also teaches others to be frugal and to spare what has been acquired.

His deeds were performed according to this rule. Herodian says:

> He entirely remitted all the revenues which tyrants had devised for collecting money upon riverbanks, in city harbors, and along roads and journeys, and restored them to their ancient liberty. He seemed likely to do many other things according to the same example. For he had also driven informers from the city and commanded that they be punished wherever they were found, taking care that no one suffer injury or have danger raised against him from empty accusations.

The deed was excellent if rightly weighed. Commodus had squandered everything; Pertinax found ten hundred-thousands of sesterces, that is, scarcely 30,000. Nevertheless, he had to distribute donatives, govern the state, and establish a court. Amid these things he abolished tyrannical revenues and sought lawful methods of acquiring wealth. Among them he included commerce, which he had practiced as a private man; nor was it charged against him as a fault that, after so many wars successfully completed and provinces administered, already a senator of the highest rank and sixty years old, he traded. He was venerable to the people and Senate and dear to emperors and the army--worthy to become an emperor from a merchant.

This history sufficiently shows what I said above: that martial people cultivated Mercury even more zealously than Gradivus, whom they thought the father and founder of their race.

Hence came the wealth of Crassus, with which he could maintain an army. Pliny nevertheless records that freedmen were richer than Crassus. Lucius Domitius promised the soldiers four iugera each, which, according to the number of soldiers, were forty-eight thousand. Pliny, book 18, says that six landowners possessed half of Africa. Therefore the Romans were not only soldiers but also plowmen and merchants, and both amid arms.

Guilds rightly established are bonds and supports of democracy. Therefore Solon established and strengthened them. For they prepare wealth, possess counsel, are bound together by a certain hidden compact, and accomplish everything in order. Therefore they are like certain legions or cohorts, not a crowd, and are most tenacious of their rights and privileges. From them arise practical experience and prudence that are not subject to tribunes and agitators. Nor do they harm monarchy: since they possess privileges from the king, practice requires them always to seek new ones and to have the old confirmed. Let there be among them men who preside in the king's name and report everything. Let there also be a fixed time at which statutes and rights must be reread and approved afresh. A certain jurisdiction and power of correction are customarily granted, final law, Code, On Jurisdiction. See Gaill, book 2, observation 2; Hippolytus, singular law 560, no. 2.

[Printed page 648]

The preservation of guilds and associations therefore pertains greatly to commerce, since an association of several persons who do and profess the same things is established; they also call it one body. See law 4 at the beginning, π., On Guilds. Bodin has much concerning guilds, Politics 3.7. See also book 11 of the Code. It was an institution of Numa; Plutarch, in his life; Dionysius, Book 2. Solon likewise had this care; Plutarch.

CHAPTER XI

Agriculture Must Above All Be Cared For and Honored

§ 1. Agriculture holds first place among all arts, for the first-formed man was placed in Paradise to cultivate the garden, and Noah, a husbandman, began after the Flood to till the earth and planted a vineyard. The reason is that agriculture is the foundation of all arts. Πρῶτον μὲν οὖν, says Aristotle, Politics 7.8, ὑπάρχειν δεῖ τροφὴν, ἔπειτα τέχνας. Food must first be supplied, then arts.

He discusses it more explicitly in book 1, chapter 2 of the Oeconomica: "This, then, is the provision that must be made, and what its character ought to be. The first care concerning possessions is that which follows nature. In the order of nature agriculture is first, and those things which bring forth something from the earth hold the second place, such as the art of mining and any other of that kind. Agriculture is certainly especially just, for it does not depend upon men--either willing men, as do innkeeping and those who hire out their labor, or unwilling men, as does all warfare. Moreover, it is especially natural. For nourishment is naturally supplied to all by their mother, and therefore to men by the earth. In addition, agriculture contributes very greatly to courage."

This part, therefore, must be cared for in every kind of state, whether it possesses fertile land or very little; for even sterile land becomes useful by cultivation and is loved by its own people. Therefore Ulysses, who is represented as prudent, loved rugged and rocky Ithaca. Agriculture must therefore be pursued because it is especially natural and just.

Aristotle, Politics 1.10: "Therefore that method of acquiring money which proceeds from fruits and animals is consonant with nature for all. Since it is twofold, as we have said, one part is commercial while the other pertains to maintaining the household; and since the latter is necessary and praised, while the former, which consists in the exchange of money, is deservedly censured--for it is not consonant with nature, but in it one man hunts profit from another--the method of lending at interest is with the best reason hated by all, because gain is made from money itself and it is not used for the purpose for which it was prepared. For it was created for the sake of exchange, but interest increases and multiplies it. Hence it also found this name among the Greeks--for τόκος derives from giving birth, which they call τίκτειν."

Turkish barbarism has also judged thus. For although the Ottomans render life unlivable for farmers--concerning which error I shall speak later--they nevertheless value agriculture greatly. This is evident from the accepted custom that the emperors live from their garden. Leonicenus relates it thus, Turkish History 1.20:

> In the emperor's palace there is a very large and pleasant garden. Those who care for it are called Bostangieler, that is, gardeners, and there are two hundred of them, young men from their fifteenth through their twentieth year. Their office is to cultivate and irrigate the garden by digging and watering. They receive a daily stipend of three or four aspers and annual clothing. The first who offers to the prefect a fruit when it has ripened, to be presented to the emperor, is given one thousand aspers.
>
> The prefect of the gardeners is called the Bostangi Bascia. His stipend is two hundred aspers each day. He is by no means equal in rank to the other eunuchs but is merely the emperor's slave. The fruits collected from that garden are sold by the prefect of the gardeners; the money is offered to the emperor and is applied to no other use than that food for the emperor's own table be purchased from it.
>
> For the emperor judges profit received from the fruits of the earth honorable and divine, precisely because it is collected not from the burdens of subjects but from the divine blessing. Therefore he forbids food for his table to be purchased from the money acquired through revenues, tithes, and exactions.

§ 2. All who prudently established or governed a state gave first place to agriculture. I shall begin with those whose glory is secure. Joseph enriched Pharaoh through cultivation. David himself took the greatest care of this matter. For after Scripture enumerated his riches and power, it also described his care for rural affairs, 1 Chronicles 27:26:

> Over rural labor and the farmers who tilled the earth was Ezri son of Chelub; over the cultivators of vineyards, Shimei the Ramathite; over the wine-cellars, Zabdi the Shiphmite. Over the olive groves and fig groves in the plains was Baal-hanan the Gederite; over the storehouses of oil, Joash. Over the herds that grazed in Sharon was Shitrai the Sharonite; over the cattle in the valleys, Shaphat son of Adlai; over the camels, Obil the Ishmaelite; over the asses, Jehdeiah the Meronothite; and over the sheep, Jaziz the Hagrite. All these were chiefs of the property of King David.

Josiah seems to have been no less zealous for agriculture. He gave the people for a feast 30,000 head of small livestock and 3,000 oxen from the king's property. The princes of the temple gave 2,600 head of livestock and 300 oxen. Then Conaniah and his other brothers gave the Levites 5,000 head of livestock and 500 oxen.

It is not lawful to doubt concerning Hezekiah, 2 Chronicles 32:28: "He also built for himself storehouses of grain, wine, and oil; stalls for every beast of burden; folds for livestock; and cities, for he possessed innumerable flocks of sheep and herds, because the Lord had given him exceedingly great substance."

Uzziah also devoted himself to agriculture amid the cares of war, 2 Chronicles 26:10: "He also built towers in the wilderness and dug very many cisterns, because he possessed much livestock both in the plains and in the expanse of the desert. He also had vineyards and vine-dressers in the mountains and in Carmel, for he was a man devoted to agriculture."

He was plainly an excellent king, to be compared with the best, had he not fallen through the arrogance familiar to powerful men and lost his kingdom while grasping at the priesthood. The Romans also were farmers from the beginning, for Romulus prescribed to them the laws of cultivation and warfare. Hence consular and triumphal farmers: the Cicerones, Fabii, Marcii, Dentati, Catones, Serani, and even, among emperors, Diocletian and others.

[Printed page 649]

§ 3. God himself commanded that land be divided among his people. He established laws lest possessions be confused, and made sacred the fiftieth year, in which they returned to their original owners, lest a few men seize great estates and the poor be driven out. For it is expedient that a field be divided into small parcels so that it may be cultivated better.

Aristotle, Politics 6.4, reports the praiseworthy custom of the Aphytans: "Now we must direct all these things by the law of the Aphytans. It is useful for what we are saying. For although they are numerous and possess narrow land, all are nevertheless farmers. Whole possessions are not assessed, nor do they report entire estates in the census, but divide them into so many parcels that even the poor can surpass the rich in assessments." After that multitude which consists of farmers, that people is best in which there are shepherds and those who sustain life from livestock.

This was also the rationale of the agrarian laws among the Romans, by which they contended that public lands should be divided individually, both to assist the necessities of citizens and so that the fields might be cultivated more diligently. Lycurgus also divided fields among all, so that each might share in the labors and fruits of the earth; the Athenians followed the same method.

The Romans gave lands to their veterans as a support for life. Many used this occasion for sedition, and Caesar for stirring up the soldiers, when he complained that the lands which our veteran plows were denied, although Pompey the Great had given lands to conquered pirates:

> Will pirates, Magnus, become better colonists?

Hence they also ordered conquered peoples to depart from their lands. There are innumerable examples. Cicero testifies concerning the Gauls in For Fonteius:

> Marcus Fonteius--as I said--presided over this province, which consisted of such a variety of peoples. Those who had been enemies he subdued; those who had been near them he compelled to depart from the lands of which they had been deprived; from the others, who for this reason had often been conquered in great wars, so that they should always obey the Roman people, he demanded large bodies of cavalry for the wars then being waged by the Roman people throughout the whole world, large sums of money for their pay, and a very great quantity of grain for sustaining the Spanish war.

Colonies were established after lands were divided. We know only the Thracians and Thespians as haters of agriculture. Herodotus relates concerning the Thracians that among them it was considered praiseworthy to be idle and that the cultivator of fields was most despised. But it is evident that they were barbarians and robbers and possessed no state, but lived by slaughter and plunder.

§ 4. Beyond the fruit which the earth returns at great interest, the state should promote cultivation of fields and vineyards first by reward and punishment. Among the Romans, if anyone permitted his field to become squalid, he was made a treasury-class citizen. Gellius, book 4, chapter 12. I would certainly advise that fields, gardens, and vineyards be inspected twice each year; that praise and sometimes remission of part of the tribute be given to diligent cultivators; that the idle be censured; and that good but negligently cultivated land be burdened more heavily.

Valentinian and Valens acted prudently when they established thus, Code, book 11, title 58:

> Whoever shall have obtained deserted estates under a fixed immunity shall not be permitted to enter into possession of what has been granted before they have firmly secured by a suitable guarantee--either by giving suitable sureties at the risk of the decurions or by obligating the most productive lands of their own patrimony--that the possession undertaken by them will be relinquished with no public loss.

This latter provision arose from distrust. Formerly it was enough to be a cultivator, when farmers were publicly favored. Thus, to have cultivated a field well was held in great glory; to maintain a great household was royal. Abraham and the other patriarchs, and that rich Job, exemplar of patience, possessed pastoral armies of remarkable strength.

It was therefore a matter of great honor. Eumolpus Petronianus is said to have possessed so great a household scattered through Numidia, according to Roman custom, that it could capture Carthage. Why scattered? Was it not for agriculture and pasturage? The Romans assuredly plowed, grazed livestock, lent at interest, and traded. By these arts they sustained war.

§ 5. New fields, or newly broken lands, should be established by cutting down thorn-brakes, draining marshes, sometimes felling forests, and conducting streams and drainage channels. Formerly this was easy, when spacious land offered a choice of itself to few inhabitants; now, when the best places have been occupied, it is difficult to sweat upon sterile soil. But I exhort the prince to look about for what is neglected and what can be cultivated.

For through the sloth of cultivators and discontinued use, much fertile land lies uncultivated and rough. What was more cultivated than Egypt? Yet Augustus, by cleansing the channels of the Nile which had become silted, made it more fertile, so that he might possess a more certain grain supply at Rome.

Cultivated lands were not always assigned even to veterans. Thus the seditious soldiers in Tiberius's time complained that swampy pools were assigned to them under the name of fields. In this way he should assign deserted fields with immunity, as Constantine did, Code, book 11, title 58, law 1:

> Since the deified Aurelian, our father, ordered the councils of cities to be summoned concerning deserted possessions and, for those estates for which owners could not be found, commanded those who had received them > under a three-year immunity from the same possessions to satisfy the customary obligations, we command that this rule be preserved: if it is established that the councils are insufficient to undertake those possessions, the burdens of those fields are to be divided among the possessions and territories accepted.

§ 6. Above all, let the prince himself do this: following Uzziah's example, let him dig cisterns in the desert, build towers, raise flocks, and cultivate fields. Pertinax is a distinguished example among rare princes. Herodian writes thus concerning him:

> At last, before two months of his rule had been completed, after he had already given an undoubted specimen of his integrity and raised all men to the best hope, evil fortune, which overthrew everything from its foundations, suddenly envied him, so that those excellent undertakings, which would have greatly benefited all, fell as it were in the middle of their course. For first he assigned to occupation and cultivation whatever uncultivated land lay vacant in Italy or among the other nations, even under kings, and granted farmers ten years' immunity and perpetual liberty of ownership.

A golden law is that of Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius, Code, book 11, title 58, law 8:

> One who hastens to cultivate, for private and public advantage alike, fields deserted because their owner has ceased, fields lying far away, or fields situated along the frontiers, shall know that our rescript supports his will, yet on this condition: if a new cultivator has settled upon vacant and abandoned soil and the old owner wishes within two years to recall it to his own right, after first restoring what is established to have been expended, he shall obtain possession of his own place. But if the period of two years has elapsed, the man who kept silent shall lack every right of possession and domicile.

With such care good and prudent emperors insisted upon the cultivation of fields.

§ 7. Our Germany teaches how greatly it matters to be zealous for agriculture. Formerly rough in cultivation, it possessed neither cities nor bread; its people used porridge. Caesar, Tacitus, and Strabo, book 7, may be consulted.

[Printed page 650]

Procopius writes that deserted regions are watered by the Danube. The Suebi regarded it as a source of praise that the regions all around should lie vacant for the greatest distance. Thus, in Caesar's time, six hundred miles lay squalid without a cultivator--Caesar, Gallic War 4. Now, however, Germany is so thoroughly cultivated and possesses so many cities that it yields to no region.

Nor can it be said that all the best places are occupied, for this also seemed to be the case formerly, when Germany was one single forest. What some have said concerning plants can even now be applied to Germany: the best are trodden upon. The best clods are trodden upon, not cultivated. I have seen private men, nobles, prelates, and others who, after clearing hills, planted vines or sowed crops and made luxuriant pastures. How great a wealth could a prince prepare for the state if he either caused such lands to be cultivated at his own expense or assigned them to private men for cultivation in exchange for tithes?

What prince is there who could not collect several thousand iugera in a territory of moderate size? Let him grant liberty to his subjects so that, if they occupy in suitable places land fit for cultivation, they may retain it for themselves and transmit it to their heirs after paying an annual rent to the state.

The ancient Germans did not pursue agriculture. Strabo, book 7: "The nation of the Suebi, as I said above, inhabits partly within and partly beyond the Hercynian forest, adjoining the nation of the Getae. The nation of the Suebi is exceedingly extensive, for it reaches from the Rhine as far as the River Elbe. A portion of them also grazes the places beyond the Elbe, as do the Hermunduri and Langobardi; but now those beyond the river have been driven into flight and destroyed.

"It is common to all who inhabit this region that they migrate readily elsewhere, both because of the scantiness of sustenance, because of their sloth in cultivating fields, and because of their poverty of money. Since they inhabit huts, they possess furnishings only for the day and draw most of their nourishment from livestock. Like nomads, carrying their household implements upon wagons after their manner, they turn with their herds wherever fortune and opinion have carried them. There are also other peoples of Germany suffering still greater want: the Cherusci, Chatti, Gambrivii, Chattuarii, and, reaching to the Ocean, the Sugambri, Chaubi, Bructeri, Cimbri, Chauci, Chaulei, Gampsiani, and very many others."

They also changed fields every year, which supplied a cause of great negligence. Thus Julius, book 6: "The Germans do not pursue agriculture, and the greater part of their sustenance consists in milk, cheese, and meat. Nor does anyone possess a fixed measure of field or his own boundaries; but the magistrates and princes assign each year to peoples and kindreds of men who have assembled together as much land, and in whatever place, as seems good to them, and in the following year compel them to move elsewhere. It is the greatest praise for states to possess around themselves habitations as widely as possible with the borders laid waste. They consider this proper to courage: that neighbors driven from their fields depart and no one dare settle nearby." Cultivated peoples must hold the contrary method, so that fields for cultivation are sought everywhere.

§ 8. We can readily see and enjoy what the diligence of earlier men accomplished. Caesar, book 3, speaks thus concerning our Belgians: "Where the Rhine approaches the Ocean, it flows into several branches and forms many immense islands, a great part of which is inhabited by wild and barbarous nations, among whom there are some who are thought to live upon fish and birds' eggs." But could one now find in the whole world a more cultivated place? Cultivation accomplished this. Formerly the whole territory of Fulda was forest; now it yields to no part of Germany except the regions of the Rhine and Danube.

Sustenance in Belgium and Germany was formerly most wretched, nor was it thought that another kind was possible. Tacitus, Germany:

> In every household they grow up naked and filthy into those limbs and bodies which we admire. Each is nourished at his own mother's breasts and is not delegated to maids and nurses. You could not distinguish master and slave by any delicacy of upbringing. They live among the same livestock, upon the same ground. The covering of all is a cloak fastened with a brooch or, if that is lacking, a thorn; otherwise uncovered, they spend whole days beside the hearth and fire.
>
> I doubt whether I should assign the nations of the Peucini, Veneti, and Fenni to the Germans or Sarmatians. Although the Peucini, whom some call Bastarnae, act like Germans in language, cultivation, settlement, and dwellings, there is squalor and lethargy among all. Through mixed marriages of the nobles they are somewhat deformed into the appearance of the Sarmatians.

And soon afterward: "Among the Fenni there is astonishing savagery and foul poverty: no weapons, no horses, no household gods; grass for sustenance, skins for clothing, the ground for a bed."

There were scarcely any houses, but caves and caverns. Tacitus: "Each surrounds his house with an open space, whether as a remedy against accidents of fire or from ignorance of building. They do not even use rubble or tiles. They use rough material for everything, without appearance or delight. They coat certain places more carefully with earth so pure and shining that it imitates painting and outlines of colors. They are also accustomed to open underground caves and heap much dung over them, as a refuge from winter and a storehouse for crops."

And Seneca: "The Germans wander with no fixed habitations. There are perpetual winters among them, infertile soil, and no houses; they live by hunting. Wherever night overtakes them wearied by labor, they lie beneath branches, or in caves and pits. They do not possess houses, but huts covered with leaves and stalks. The inhabitants are driven about in the manner of dancers upon the frozen sea, living on the flesh of wild beasts, a naked nation clothed only in the skins of beasts, and therefore cheap and despised by all."

These things remained until Christian times, until Charles and Boniface, when cultivation showed that every soil is fertile. I have introduced these things so that we may learn that places for cultivation still remain. For just as those places which are now most cultivated and fertile were formerly thought unproductive, so even now there are remarkable fields which plows have not yet violated; there are marshes which the diligence of many has shown can be drained.

§ 9. Not only weather and war but chiefly civic burdens render fields sterile. In some places herds of deer graze them; in others, a friendly but extortionate soldier; in very many, tributes also, so that cultivation gives no pleasure. Indeed, compelled by the magnitude of tributes, the cultivators themselves feign sterility so that they may avoid exactors. We gather that this occurred from a law of Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, Code, book 11, title 57:

> Whoever has cut down a vine or damaged the growth of fruitful branches in order to evade the good faith of the census and feign the character of cunning poverty shall, as soon as he is discovered, be subjected to suitable indignation. That person, however, shall avoid accusation who is perhaps discovered to have labored for abundance and the restoration of the produce of the fields, and not to have procured sterility or poverty. Given the day before the Nones of January at Constantinople, in the consulship of Eucherius and Syagrius.

For what care will there be for fields if sterility is considered better than the cruelty of thieves who rage under evil but specious law? Hence by law Those Who Are Burdened and law Equalizers, assistance is kindly given to the wretched. In civil wars great care was also taken for farmers, but later times turned everything for the worse.

§ 10. The ancient law concerning the peace of farmers, which Xenophon attributes to Cyrus in book 5, must be recalled:

> When he had considered that those who had defected to him, because they were neighbors of Babylon, would be afflicted by evil unless he himself were always present, he ordered all the enemies whom he released to tell the Assyrian, and he himself sent a herald to say this to him: that he was prepared to permit the farmers to cultivate the earth and afflict them with no injury, if the Assyrian likewise wished to permit the farmers of those who had defected to Cyrus to cultivate their land.
>
> "Although you," he said, "even if you could prohibit it, would prohibit only a few men--for the land of those who have defected to me is small--I shall permit a large region to be cultivated for you. As to gathering the fruit, if there is war, the one who is superior will gather it; but if there is peace, it is evident that you will gather it. If any of my soldiers carries weapons against you, or any of yours against me, we shall each take vengeance upon them to the extent of our strength."
>
> When he had commanded the herald to say these things, he sent him. When the Assyrians heard all of them, they urged the king to concede these things and leave as little of the war remaining as possible. The Assyrian, whether persuaded by his people or because he himself wished it, conceded them; and a treaty was struck so that there should be peace for those cultivating the earth, but war for those bearing arms.

The Belgians, at least by public counsel, also imitated this policy. For many farmers who lived upon the borders possessed the protection of both parties, but by public counsel; for they suffered losses from the soldiers of both. Indeed, kings used this humanity even before Cyrus. Nebuzaradan, prefect of the Babylonian king, left vine-dressers and farmers. Arrian, book 5 On the Deeds of Alexander, and Diodorus Siculus, book 2, chapter 10, are authorities that the Indians also possessed this custom. For the labor of farmers is necessary to victor and vanquished alike.

This class of men is now exposed first of all to plunder. Therefore, at the rumor of war, the dearness of grain increases. Farmers, compelled by necessity, take up war themselves or turn to robbery.

§ 11. It will also be an act of great prudence to preserve farmers immune from the injuries of courtiers, nobles, powerful men, and pettifoggers. Those injuries cause them neither to cultivate their fields diligently nor to consider increasing their property, like that man while

> There was neither hope of liberty nor care for private property.

Therefore, let them not feel several masters in their villages, nor be dragged from the country into the city. Let provision also be made for their simplicity when they bring necessary goods into ungrateful cities. Clement V and Pius V thus established it; the latter forbade revenues to be exacted from farmers importing grain. Hence those excellent rules: that it is not lawful to take an ox used for plowing as a pledge, and that it is not lawful to molest farmers by way of reprisals.

Formerly powerful city-dwellers transferred their burdens to countrymen. Emperor Constantine prohibited this, Code, book 11, title 57: "Since the account-keepers of cities, through collusion with the more powerful, transfer the burden to their inferiors, we command that whoever proves that he has been burdened shall acknowledge only his former possession. Given on the fifteenth day before the Kalends of February at Rome, in the third consulship of Constantine Augustus and the consulship of Licinius."

Farmers are also vindicated from the harassment of soldiers, Code, book 11, title 60:

> It is pernicious or dangerous for the meadows of our provincials, and especially those of our private estate, to be wearied by the harassment of soldiers. Therefore, by a law promulgated to the most ample prefecture, we decree that this practice shall not be employed hereafter. Let your Magnificence not delay to summon all whom the matter concerns, and let it not permit possessors or tenants to be harassed by any importunity on account of their meadows. Given on the Nones of September, in the tenth consulship of Honorius Augustus and the sixth of Theodosius Augustus.

§ 12. It is very expedient that each person cultivate his own property and not another's. Among the Romans the amount of field beyond which no one might possess was so often defined, yet those laws were always violated, even by the legislators themselves. For from this farmers are oppressed, and afterward, when farmers have been driven out, workhouses occupy all possessions; when servitude has been introduced into noble land, sterility follows, such as now exists among the Turks.

For there is so great a sterility and lack of cultivators throughout vast expanses of fertile land that their emperor can in no way sustain a war at home. Because the subjects of the Turks have been persuaded that all their property belongs to the emperor, and because he employs this right, the land is deprived of agriculture and therefore of people, that is, the foundation of strength. First, the Europeans are treated tyrannically and live in the greatest despair. Nothing except an opportunity is lacking to stir them to rebellion against so great a tyranny. This empire, therefore, is uncultivated, waste, solitary, and weak. It is said in a proverb that where the Ottoman horse plants its foot, grass never grows. There are many causes, but the principal one is that either the people are removed from their estates or the estates from them, at the judgment of those who rule.

§ 13. Pasturage is simpler and easier than agriculture; shepherds lead the easiest life. Aristotle, Politics 1.8: "For sustenance comes to them without labor from tame animals, even while they rest. Since it is moreover necessary for livestock to change place because of pastures, they themselves are compelled to follow with them, as though devoting their labor to living agriculture. Others live from hunting, but in different ways. For example, some from robbery, others from fishing--those who dwell near lakes, marshes, rivers, or a sea suitable for fishing--others from fowling or the capture of wild beasts. But most men live from the earth and from cultivated fruits."

This received the greatest care among eastern peoples and is plainly royal. It is now most despised; but the prince will add dignity to it if he desires to become rich easily and without injury.

§ 14. It is suitable for rural peace and pertains to security that people in farms and villages possess their own judges. Many advantages arise from this: they are not compelled to go into cities, are not called away from labor, settle a dispute more easily, and justice is administered by a shorter course. Nor can inexperience be objected. Their lawsuits are not intricate, and they possess few laws from which they pronounce sentence; but if a more difficult matter is agitated, it is sent to neighboring cities for counsel.

It is just that, as merchants' cases are entrusted to merchants, so countrymen's should be entrusted to countrymen and craftsmen's to craftsmen, provided that they are directed by a skilled person so that they do not depart from the common law. For in truth many now shake down the wretched διασείσει, by extortion, and terrify them by the authority and threats of magistrates. Formerly governors, tax-farmers, their staff, and soldiers, when they could not openly plunder peaceful soil, customarily oppressed people through calumny. This was formerly the cause of the Varian disaster, when the Germans accepted Roman rule but could not endure Roman customs. They raged especially against advocates. Holding the tongue cut from one of them in his hand, a German said, "Aha, viper, even now you hiss."

§ 15. The fertility of all fields would indeed be desirable; but because God for a just cause was unwilling to give it, even dry land must be plowed. Every state would choose for itself land such as Aristotle describes in Politics 7.5: "The reasoning is similar concerning the nature of the land. As to what character it ought to possess, certainly all would praise land which is filled and furnished with an abundance of all things and is content with its own goods. Such land must be productive of all things. For to abound in all things and lack nothing is to be content with one's own goods and to be filled and furnished with an abundance of all things. In population and size, however, let it be such that those who inhabit it can live liberally and at the same time temperately while free from every labor."

[Printed page 652]

But land of this kind is rare; not every soil bears everything, and some bear very few things. Therefore the laws which established agriculture commanded that lands be mixed, so that one who disdained infertile land should be deprived of fertile land. Thus the laws concerning public lands, Code, book 11, title 58:

> Whoever is found to be the lessee and possessor of a fertile estate which descends from public or temple ownership shall have a less useful field joined to it. But if he thinks that he must resist this, let another possessor be sought under the same payment. Or, if no voluntary lessee is found, then let the places of the aforesaid ownership, with the useless parcels attached, return to their ancient possessors--that is, the decurions or any others--after suitable sureties have been furnished.

§ 16. Indeed, sagacious antiquity also provided that the borders could be fortified and cultivated lest the fields lie uncultivated. If soldiers wished to cultivate them, the law ordered them to be immune. Thus Theodosius and Valens, Code, book 11, title 59:

> We will that all frontier lands, together with marshes and every right, which frontier soldiers under the ancient arrangement were accustomed to tend and plow for their own advantage, free from every service, shall, if they are cultivated at present, be firmly retained by them without any burden from an extortioner; and, if they are possessed by others--with prescription from any lapse of time ceasing--shall be reclaimed from all possessors and assigned to the same soldiers without any burden whatever of contribution, as was anciently established. Against those who attempt to oppose our commands, the penalty of proscription shall also prevail. For if anyone perhaps possesses the lands of the aforesaid right under a title of purchase--a thing he ought by no means to have dared--his competent action against the seller shall be preserved unimpaired.

Imitate this with spirit, Prince; you will strengthen your wealth and kingdom. Behold, the masters of nations cultivated through soldiers the frontier lands exposed to incursions by enemies. Nor were veterans then ashamed of plowing: they awaited fields as their final reward and knew that the greatest emperors had returned after the trabea to the triumphal plow-handle. In short, act so that everywhere the field and livestock may appear yours.

I marvel at Roman diligence. In the reign of Augustus, when Gaius Asinius Gallus and Gaius Marcius Censorinus were consuls, Gaius Caecilius Claudius Isidorus declared in his will, as Pliny says in book 33, chapter 10, that although he had lost much in the civil war, he nevertheless left 4,116 slaves, 3,600 yoke of oxen, 250,000 head of other livestock, and in ready money six hundred fifteen hundred-thousands of Philippei, according to Lipsius's calculation. These were the possessions of a private man who had suffered war. Why could a prince not attain the same if he sought every opportunity?

I refer to agriculture fishponds, forests, and everything produced by earth and water. If the prince pursues their fruits, there will be no need to impose new revenues and new tributes every day. The earth itself will be fertile enough to maintain dignity and repel an enemy. If the Turk, who possesses so much deserted and fertile land, undertook seriously to cultivate even some thousandth part in Greece, Asia, or Palestine, he could readily raise such flocks as Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and Jonah possessed for the expense of his army. But God was unwilling to add political prudence to so great a savagery, lest through his strength he occupy the whole world.

CHAPTER XII

That the prince must seek out the valuable products of things dug from the earth

§ 1.

Tacitus doubts whether the gods, propitious or angry, denied silver and gold to our Germans. Certainly they now possess a very great quantity of gold, silver, and gems. Many also greatly censure the grievous labor--τὸν μετὰ πόνου, "that accompanied by toil"--of those who search for mines. They say that gold, had it not been discovered, would have been better placed, and they grieve when > Riches, the incitements of evils, are dug out.

Pliny, in Book Thirty, assails the same pursuit that they condemn: "Now mines themselves, and wealth itself, and the values of things, shall be spoken of, while anxious care searches the earth within in many ways. For in one place it is dug for riches, as life seeks gold, silver, electrum, and bronze; in another for luxuries, gems and pigments for walls and fingers; in another for rashness, iron, more welcome even than gold amid wars and slaughter. We pursue all its fibers and live above an excavated earth, marveling that at some time it yawns open or trembles, as though this too could not be expressed as the indignation of our sacred parent. We go into its entrails, and in the abode of the Manes we seek wealth, as though it were insufficiently kind and fertile wherever it is trodden. Amid these things we search for the sake of remedies least of all. For to how many is medicine the cause of digging? And yet it has given these too on its highest surface, being nowhere sparing and readily accessible in all things that are beneficial. The things that crush us, the things that drive us to the lower world, are those which it concealed and submerged, those which do not come into being: so that a mind suddenly soaring into emptiness may reflect what at length will be the end of exhausting it through all the ages, how far avarice will penetrate. How innocent, how blessed, indeed how luxurious life would be, if it desired nothing except what is above the earth and, to speak briefly, nothing except what is with it!

"Gold is dug out, and chrysocolla beside it, so that it may appear more precious by retaining a name from gold. For it was too little to have discovered one plague of life, unless even the corruption of gold were held at a price. Avarice was seeking silver; meanwhile it counted it a good thing to have found minium, and devised a use for red earth. Alas, monstrous talents! In how many ways have we increased the values of things? The art of painting was added, and by engraving gold and silver we made them dearer. Man learned to challenge nature. Incitements of vices also increased art. It pleased men to engrave lusts upon drinking-vessels, and to drink through obscenities. Thereafter these things were cast away and began to be regarded as sordid; and there was too much gold and silver. From the same earth we dig murrhine and crystal vessels, to which fragility itself was to give value. This was judged a proof of riches, this the true glory of luxury: to possess what could immediately perish altogether. Nor was this enough: we drink amid a host of gems and weave our cups with emeralds; for the sake of drunkenness it is pleasing to hold India, and gold is now merely an accessory."

§ 2.

All these things are reproaches against avarice, not against resources, as I said at the beginning. For God gave these things also for the use of the human race, which he wished to abound and to shine. Nor are subterranean riches censured in any way different from those which the earth itself brings forth outside: wine and crops, the delights of animals, and the beauty of forms; for folly abuses all these things. Therefore a wise prince will seek out the wealth of mines, and with it will assist the state. To seek gold through wars is wickedness; through seas, danger; through falsehoods, disgrace; but in its own natural place it is justice, as Cassiodorus admonishes.

There is a threefold method of finding it. “Among us,” says Pliny in Book Thirty, chapter 4, “it is obtained in three ways: from the scrapings of rivers, as in the Tagus of Spain, the Padus of Italy, the Hebrus of Thrace, the Pactolus of Asia, and the Ganges of India; by another method it is dug out through shafts of pits, or by the collapse of mountains. Although that found in rivers is said to be the most excellent and most perfect, polished by the very current and friction, nevertheless it is now no longer found--or rather, it is not sought.”

Since, however, enormous advantages arise from mines, gems, marbles, every kind of mineral, and the exudation of metals, they must not be neglected, but must be employed with thanksgiving as benefits given to the state. But if veins appeared long ago, they must be investigated further; new ones too must be considered diligently. Nor must it be thought that God distributed matters in such a way that the ancients dug everything out. Immense riches lie hidden beneath the masses of mountains, some in deep places, others almost in the open. So great is their variety that they appear to contend with those things which grow. “In the uppermost earth, during Nero’s principate, gold was found in Dalmatia which yielded as much as fifty pounds on individual days, although it was found in the very topmost turf,” says Pliny.

§ 3.

It must be established without qualification that very many veins of metals, which are neglected, lie scattered throughout Europe and Asia. A sign of this is the golden sand of rivers, which indicates that the neighboring banks abound in gold. Nor do I think there is any prince who does not possess those riches, but diligence in searching for them is lacking. I do not affirm that gold is everywhere, but that there is some kind of metallic or fossil substance: gold, silver, electrum, bronze, iron, tin, lead, quicksilver, sandarach, minium, cadmia, alum, sulfur, bitumen, Samian, Eretrian, Elian, Selinusian, Pignitis, Ampelitis, Cimolian, Sardian, and Umbrian earth, and so many kinds of stones. For new things of this sort are found every day, which is a sign that they exist. In ancient times none of these was present in this northern Europe of ours; now very many exist in several places, because the cares of mortals were formerly directed elsewhere, whereas now these things are sought. Tacitus denies that silver exists in Germany, but now both it and gold are found.

There is no part of Germany in which some such things are not dug out. Those endowments are present in the County of Tyrol, Bohemia, Saxony, Pannonia, Transylvania, Poland, Hesse, and the Eifel. Indeed, in Norway itself, beneath the arctic cold, there are veins of silver near Ringarike and an abundance of copper in Sunnhordland. In Sweden also mountains of gold, silver, copper, and lead are counted beneath the sixty-second degree. Britain itself produces tin that is almost the rival of silver. Prussia sends electrum, and the Hercynian Forest gems. The cause why less effort is expended in this class of things is either a change of masters and governors, wars, or certainly the magnitude of the expenses. Hence it is scarcely a work for private persons; formerly public contractors leased them, several together, and wealthy men.

There is now rarely a digger for gold in Spain, because New Spain and Peru are more fertile. We nevertheless cannot deny that there are metallic mountains in Spain, since Scripture and experience have shown it. Near New Carthage no fewer than forty thousand men were continually occupied in the work, as Polybius is the authority. Who would believe that the neighboring mountains contain no gold, or that the Carthaginians exhausted them altogether?

Nevertheless, I think that no prince possesses more mines of metals than the emperor of the Turks. Although he is most thirsty for gold, he does not use that advantage, both because of a scarcity of skilled men and by the providence of God, lest he be furnished with such great resources against the remnants of the Christians.

In Deuteronomy 8:9 God promises “a land whose stones are iron,” ברזל אבניה (abaneha barzel), “and from whose mountains metals are dug,” נחשת תחצב ומהרריה (umehararеha taḥṣob neḥosheth). He indicates a great abundance when he says that its stones are iron, as though its abundance of iron were equal to that of stones; and although this is remarkable, the same reasoning applies to silver, as I said above. He also signifies a multitude of bronze when he says “you shall hew out,” as though bronze were hewn from the mountains in the manner of rocks.

That there was an abundance of gold is shown by Deuteronomy 1:1: “These are the words that Moses spoke to all Israel beyond the Jordan, in the level wilderness, opposite the Red Sea, between Paran and Tophel and Laban and Hazeroth, where there is very much gold.” Here our translator and the Chaldaic translate זהב ודי (wedi zahab) as “an abundance,” or “a sufficiency, of gold”; the Septuagint has καὶ καταχρύσεα, or, as others read, καὶ κατὰ χρύσεα, “toward the gold mines.” Whether one truly understands it as a sufficiency of gold or rather as the name of a place makes little difference against what I have said. For if it is the name of a place, the name was imposed from its abundance of gold; or if Scripture says that gold is very plentiful, we prove that there is a multitude of mines.

In that tract is the city concerning which Genesis 36:39 says זהב מי (me zahab), “waters of gold,” although it can be the name of a woman. And in Deuteronomy 33:25 iron and bronze are called its “footwear,” or ὑπόδημα, which they interpret as mines of bronze and iron--as though it said, “iron and bronze are your treading-place”; that is, mines of iron and bronze are everywhere beneath your feet. Hence Zarephath of the Sidonians is named from צרפת (tsaraph), “to smelt.”

But let us return to the καταχρύσεα, concerning which the Christian Adrichomius writes as follows in his Theater of the Holy Land, under Pharan, number 16: “The gold mines, called Dizahab in Hebrew and catachrysea in Greek, are the place where there is very much gold. They are gold-bearing mountains in the desert, an eleven-day journey from Horeb, near which Moses is said to have written Deuteronomy. But they also think that the mine of bronze which collapsed in our own time, and mountains formerly full of veins of gold, were nearby.” Deuteronomy 1; Jerome on the Hebrew place and in his Letter to Fabiola, Station 42.

It is also agreed that Arabia is exceedingly rich in gold. “It so abounds,” says Adrichomius under Manasseh, number 12, “in veins and lumps of gold and silver that almost all the furnishings of this nation shine, some with gold, others with silver. They also sell gold to their neighbors at three times the price of bronze, and silver at twice the price; and once, as Ezekiel teaches us, they used to offer in the markets of Tyre wares of the most excellent spices, gold, and precious stones, which were carried from there into the whole world. For the soil of this fortunate Arabia is exceedingly fertile in the most precious and select gems, namely sardonyxes, diamonds, pearls, beads, and other stones of different color and shining brightly. Nor does the land alone, but also the sea adjacent to it, abound in stones of this sort. For here oysters or shells are caught in which pearls are born and mature. Because no two of them are found indistinguishable, they are also called uniones. Their nature is so noble that it cannot be equaled by any price. Hence it is read of Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, that she purchased a pearl found here for two hundred and fifty thousand gold pieces.”

Yet now there is neither great concern nor power to procure those riches, for everything is full of brigandage, devastation, and fear of tyranny.

§ 4.

It is appropriate for every kind of mineral substance that it indeed be administered by suitable men, but that the greatest part of the labor be completed by persons condemned to the works. Thus it was done wisely in former times by the Romans and others, and there was no sin except in the unjust sentence of a judge, by which Christian bishops, priests, and faithful laymen were condemned to the mines for their piety. Those who through crimes have deserved such treatment by right and justice are to be subjected to this punishment; and it is often lawful for the penalty of death to be commuted to this one.

As the Egyptians accomplished the barbarous works of the pyramids and the channels of the Nile through condemned persons and captives, so also they assigned the wicked to dig for gold. Diodorus writes in Book One: “All their kings assigned to the digging of gold persons condemned for a crime, likewise those captured from enemies, or, if anyone had offended the king, sometimes both him and his whole kindred; at once exacting the penalty for their crimes and receiving a rich profit from their labor.”

I am not unaware that very many innocent persons, crushed by great tyranny, underwent every dreadful thing. But I admonish the prince to banish into those dark places persons truly guilty, not truly innocent, either for their whole life as slaves under punishment, or for a fixed time according to the measure of their offenses. For it is remarkable how greatly that exercise assists modest conduct, when complete exhaustion must be exacted from the body. Nor is guarding them difficult, both because they are confined in caverns and because this whole class is held in irons. What then? Let the punishments of those whose crimes harmed the state benefit it.

At present many are kept in prison for many years at public expense; they are mutilated in their ears, publicly scourged, and punished with exile. Meanwhile, since the opportunity to live a civil life is denied them, they again equip themselves for thefts and brigandage; for nowhere can they establish themselves because of their infamy. Other men must nevertheless be placed among them, both supervisors and persons hired for wages, so that there may be no opportunity to flee. Prisons today contain many hundreds of wretched persons who have not committed offenses so atrocious that they are to be punished with death.

§ 5.

To this industry I refer all the other workshops, such as those for crystal, glass, stone, and other things. For it is superfluous to name saltworks and other works, since even the use of acidulous springs has now begun to bring profit and water is drunk for a price. Ancus Marcius first established saltworks at Rome; he also gave six thousand modii to the people in a distribution. Pliny, Book Thirty, chapter 7. Once this was a rare and difficult thing; now it is readily available. Yet nowhere, so far as I remember, is there that abundance which exists in Italy, where the Tarentine lake is dried by the summer suns and is transformed wholly into salt.

CHAPTER XIII

Thrift Is the Greatest Revenue

§ 1. Where I discussed the prince's liberality, I also commended thrift, which is the source and support of liberality. The same matter had to be discussed where household management was treated. Now, however, thrift itself must be treated, which is necessary τῇ χρηματιστικῇ, "for the art of acquiring wealth," and bestows gifts with judgment and moderation. For many princes pour out everything in certain largesses which they have scraped together by care, household management, and agriculture. I should like them to weigh these things with themselves and dispense everything according to right reason.

§ 2. Let them consider the nature of men, greedy to receive and to possess, and let them establish this as certain: gifts will never satisfy avarice. It is an oracle of Aristotle, Politics 2.7:

> Furthermore, the wickedness of men is something insatiable. At first they consider it enough to receive only two obols; but when this has become ancestral and hereditary, they always desire more than it, until they have advanced into immensity. For the nature of desire is infinite and immeasurable, and most men direct every effort, and indeed all the plans of their lives, toward satisfying it.

§ 3. No prince, indeed, seems sufficiently liberal to flatterers; yet no one gives equal offense to the prodigal man, who, as they say, gives with his eyes closed and weighs neither the merits nor the dignity of those receiving. For one who is unworthy of a benefit is also ungrateful, while more worthy persons who have received equal or lesser things think themselves injured.

§ 4. Prodigal men have generally perished badly. Galba promised enormous things to the courtiers and Praetorians and destroyed himself and many others. Plutarch writes wisely:

> And for this reason he promised to the courtiers and to the soldiers whom they call Praetorians seven thousand denarii individually, and to those serving in the provinces 1,250. He could in no way have procured this money unless he had afflicted the whole human race with more crimes than Nero.

That promise first destroyed Nero and soon afterward Galba: they betrayed the former in hope of receiving it, and killed the latter because he did not pay it. Afterward, while seeking a man who would give the same amount, they themselves perished amid defections and betrayals before obtaining their desire.

§ 5. If the prince wishes to give something liberally, let him rather take it away from unjust and unworthy persons--for example, Jews, moneylenders, and similar Christians--and give to those who deserve well the fines exacted from wicked men. For thus there will be not only rewards but also punishments and examples for cultivating virtue. Galba acted splendidly, as Plutarch relates: "He ordered the gifts which Nero had given to actors and athletes to be exacted rigorously, leaving them only a tenth part." If he had done this with most of Nero's largesses, he could have collected money to maintain a great army.

§ 6. I have said that many princes go astray in this matter; nor is it remarkable. Solomon himself, the richest of kings, who made silver like stones in Jerusalem, after he had already been corrupted in old age by women, afflicted the province by this matter alone. He had seven hundred queens and three hundred concubines. What largesses shall we say were necessary to adorn seven hundred queens, furnish their courts with annual revenue, and build temples for them? Hence those complaints were deserved: "Your father placed a very hard yoke upon us," 1 Kings 12:4. For no wealth could have been sufficient for the courts of seven hundred luxuriant queens. Therefore he unjustly exacted what he spent most wickedly; those two things are accustomed to accompany one another: to have been acquired badly and to be spent badly.

§ 7. This also occurred in the Roman state. For however politically its other things may have been established, certainly the wealth of so great an empire was spent most disgracefully. Justus treats this matter in Book Two On Roman Greatness, chapter 10 and the following chapters. He divides expenses into necessary and discretionary. The necessary expenses were for the soldier and the magistrates. To Piso, when he was going into Macedonia, one hundred eighty hundred-thousands were given under the name of traveling allowance. One hundred hundred-thousands of sesterces are 50,000 Philippei. Grain was given to the people first at a lower price, then free under the Clodian law, from which arose a great corruption in the state. Those receiving it were at one time 320,000. From Egypt each year they carried two hundred hundred-thousands of modii of grain, and twice that amount from Africa: therefore six hundred hundred-thousands of modii, or 164,383 each day.

[Printed page 655]

These were such great expenses that the greatest armies could have been maintained by them, yet they were expended for the most part upon the wicked and seditious rabble beneath the rostra; sixteen hundred thousand men could have been maintained by it. Aurelian also distributed pork, as Vopiscus says, and Severus oil.

Next came individual largesses, not merely marvelous but astounding, as Lipsius says. Suetonius relates that Caesar sometimes gave individual slaves and estates to the soldiers, man by man. As to slaves, I do not wonder: eleven hundred thousand. Τέρας, that monster, killed that number and reduced more to servitude. As to estates, it is a great thing; nevertheless he assigned the possessions of idlers to his own men. In this way he was liberal toward the Senate. Suetonius writes:

> With a great part of the Senate bound to him by gifts or loans at light interest, he also followed with a most abundant distribution persons of the remaining orders who came to him either when invited or of their own accord.

With no less zeal he enticed kings and provinces throughout the world: offering some thousands of captives as a gift; sending to others auxiliaries wherever and as often as they wished; and adorning the most powerful cities not only of Italy, the Gauls, and Spain, but also of Asia and Greece, with principal works.

These things came from plunder. For in Gaul he despoiled shrines and temples of the gods filled with gifts and sacked cities, more often for the sake of booty than because of an offense.

Hence fifteen hundred talents were given to Lucius Paulus the consul, that is, nine hundred thousand Philippei. More was given to Curio, as Appian relates: he received six hundred hundred-thousands of sesterces, that is, fifteen hundred thousand Philippei. Beyond their pay, Caesar expended fifteen millions upon soldiers in the civil war, as Lipsius proves. To each member of the grain-receiving populace he gave ten modii of grain, the same number of pounds of oil, three hundred coins, and a further hundred because of the delay. At that time those who were fed from the public store numbered 320,000. In a single donative Augustus, when he had prepared arms against Antony and the issue of supreme power was already at stake, promised one hundred and fifty millions, as Lipsius calculates. There were many largesses of other emperors. Those donations overturned the whole empire and transferred the wealth of entire nations to others.

The Roman Empire was prefigured by that horrible beast which is the fourth in Daniel. It is called “devouring and breaking in pieces and trampling the remainder under its feet.” The last pertains to the games. It consumed and devoured by plundering, collecting revenues, and founding colonies; it trampled with its feet when it wasted wealth through wantonness and luxury. So much money was expended upon stage shows, circuses, and gladiators that the whole empire could have been defended by it.

What apparatus was there upon the stage? In the Agamemnon there were six hundred mules. Nero covered the theater of Pompey with gold for one day. Caesar made the apparatus of the stage silver at his father's funeral, and at that time he was not yet Caesar. Pliny also teaches in Book Thirty-three that there were silver stages everywhere in towns and colonies. Heliogabalus, according to Lampridius, exhibited circus games in canals full of wine; and since ships raced in unmixed wine, I wonder whether one year's wine sufficed for such madness. Add next the awnings floating above the full theater, and Arabians drenched at Rome by showers of their own produce.

Add also the gifts thrown among the people--of every sort of thing on every day: each day a thousand birds, a manifold store of every kind, grain-tokens, clothing, gold, silver, gems, pearls, painted panels, slaves, beasts of burden, and even tame wild animals; finally ships, islands, and fields. Not even the Ocean appears capable of sufficing for donations so blind and so harmful, and every most wicked man received these gifts.

The greatest resources of the empire were also poured out upon gladiators alone. Lipsius thinks there were two hundred or three hundred thousand. I think there were altogether more, if we join to them the beast-fighters and the beasts; and these were properly called munera, “gifts.” Let us now consider the cause of the Roman treasury's repeated exhaustion. First, most gladiators had to be bought; next, fattened; third, trained; fourth, guarded; fifth, nobly armed.

For the hunting, guarding, and feeding of beasts I reckon sustenance sufficient for a hundred million men. Gordian supplied one hundred Libyan beasts and a thousand bears in one day; others supplied other things; Severus supplied four hundred beasts from a collapsible ship. Let us establish that ten thousand beasts were always fed: they consume as much as thirty thousand men. Let us suppose that five thousand were captured each year. How many thousands of men shall we judge to have been occupied in hunting lions, bears, and tigers? I do not ask how many perished, since it is difficult to capture even one lion.

But the work of hunting was more laborious and dangerous because the beasts were not to be killed with arrows and hunting-spears, but captured alive in pits and nets, placed upon ships, and sent to Rome across long distances, with keepers and tame animals on which they might feed added. Thus so great expenses appear to have been made upon the capture and sustenance of beasts that they would have sufficed for an entire army. Hence came the public poverty of the treasury, and very often the wealth of entire nations was exhausted and the nations themselves sold, but the money was poured out in largesses and munera.

Thrift, therefore, does not suffer want. Xenocrates received Alexander's envoys, who brought fifty talents, with a slight supper in the Academy. When they asked the following day to whom he would order the money to be counted out, he said: “What? Did you not understand from yesterday's supper that I do not need money?”

Thrift fills the treasury with the greatest speed. Antoninus Pius drove away useless men; Alexander Severus did the same, as Lampridius and Capitolinus testify. It follows, therefore, that nothing better happened to Heliogabalus than that Alexander Severus was justly his heir.

CHAPTER XIV

Power Is Marvelously Increased by Sumptuary Laws

§ 1. I call those laws sumptuary laws by which moderation in expenditure is prescribed. I reduce them to three heads: for some command modesty in banquets, which Cato called alimentary laws; others regulate the prices of clothing; others regulate building and the household. I judge that not only the most useful part of thrift but also the safety of the state is contained in these laws. For if the prince fixes laws for himself and his own people, and his subjects follow them, abundance and riches must arise publicly from the thrift and frugality of all, and there must be fewer disputes and crimes, very many of which arise from prodigality, while that which is poured away through wantonness is sought through injustice. By these laws, moreover, peace and tranquility, the distinction of orders, and propriety are preserved, and poverty, the counselor of evil, is averted. For in truth most men go beyond their means in expenditure and cast themselves into extreme necessity. There was great foresight in former times, when expenditures were defined.

[Printed page 656]

Numa, otherwise exceedingly superstitious, enacted a law: “Do not sprinkle wine upon a funeral pyre,” lest the gods be worshiped by expense rather than by disposition. For since luxury always increased and found no limit, there was need of the barriers of laws, by which men might be contained within bounds and a fixed course.

§ 2. We should with the best right marvel at the most malicious complaints of the human race, if they were not by now customary. Whatever adversity befalls a man according to his deserts, each accuses the times, the magistrate, sometimes God--in short, everything rather than his own vices. If blight has burned the crop, if the meadows have withered, if frost has struck the vine-shoots, if a soldier has driven away the cattle, if the prince has imposed taxes, everything resounds with querulous, bitter, mournful, and sometimes seditious voices: the times are hard; everything is falling; life is scarcely supportable; no citizen can rise; farmers are oppressed and drained on every side; the nobility is near destruction.

Yet in the lands where such frequent complaints are repeated, who are they that cry that they are oppressed and drained? The very men who themselves bring about the cause of their losses. The fact itself speaks; at this very hour I shall show a hundred examples. The farmer whose grandfather furnished his private table, banquets, and weddings with provisions that were not bought is no longer content with beef, lamb, veal, goose, and chicken: he heaps together foreign fish, exotic wines, Italian and Spanish fruits, preparations and adulterations made from every spice, and he teaches rustic hearts, unaccustomed to delicacies, to consume the plow together with the very clod of earth.

Citizens who seek their livelihood by their hands indulge in banquets; they omit none of the costly things which they have seen upon the tables of the rich and noble; at a wedding banquet they contract a debt upon which their children, when already grown, are compelled to pay the interest. What shall I say about clothing? The sons of villagers and craftsmen, who carry all their goods upon themselves, imitate and surpass the attire of the rich and noble.

They do these things in large part through perverse rivalry, so that they may appear rich. I do not yet dare to accuse that madness as it deserves and ask why, by feigning opulence, they hasten toward want, when by frugality they could acquire an estate. I am not yet treating that point, but I rebuff the impudence of those who disparage their own times when they themselves are a great stain upon the times. The rustic, the citizen, the tailor, and the smith complain that they cannot rise because of the difficulty of the times. Yet the same man is clothed like a nobleman, feasts like a rich man, builds like a prince, maintains a household like a magistrate, and does not perceive that the cause of his poverty has been derived from his habits.

You praise past years, despise the present, indeed curse them, and enumerate the causes of poverty; but, rustic though you are, arrayed in silk and rings, in a painted house, amid pheasants, thrushes, partridges, costly wines, tortoise shell, and courtly music, and perhaps drunk as well, you lay down your complaints. I do not listen unless your habits are changed. No times are so happy that they can make such a man prosperous; not even prosperity itself could preserve you.

My most reverend prince, Johann Schweikhard, Archbishop of the Holy See of Mainz, published sumptuary laws in the year 1615 and stated their causes in the preface: that he had already learned by the experience of several years that his subjects in the upper and lower diocese, in towns and villages, especially at baptismal banquets, feasts of godparents, and wedding banquets, were burdening themselves with great expenses in this matter; that no one wished to hold the last place; that those of slender means emulated the wealthier; and that many were consequently sometimes so oppressed and burdened by debt that they could not rise, nor render the services owed to the magistrate.

It is plainly so: they contend with one another in expense; all are defeated; whoever has surpassed the others is most gravely harmed. Then, when their own affairs have become desperate, they are neither faithful to their country nor obedient to the magistrates. Those vices are ancient, and unless the ruler's severe hand resists, they break loose. Sammonicus Serenus, speaking of the Fannian law, relates nearly the same things:

> The Fannian law came before the people with the great agreement of all the orders; and it was not the praetors or tribunes, as with most other laws, but the consuls themselves who proposed it upon the counsel and opinion of all good men, since the state was suffering greater losses from the luxury of banquets than can be believed. For matters had come to such a pass that very many freeborn boys, enticed by gluttony, sold their chastity and their liberty, and very many of the Roman plebs came to the Assembly soaked in wine and, while drunk, deliberated upon the safety of the state.

Thus Sammonicus. The law of our prince also was enacted to the applause of all. Frugal heads of households rejoiced that they could be sober and frugal without disgrace and the objections of gourmands, and that not only had the danger of profusion been shaken off by law, but the necessity of thrift had also been imposed. Yet there are not lacking those who strive against it: rich only in luxury, poor in assisting the state.

§ 3. The laws of Mainz defining expenditure consist in prescribing the number of guests and dishes, the time, and gifts; certain banquets, however, they abolish altogether.

Concerning these things the edict reads as follows.

I. At the making of a betrothal contract, no banquet shall be held in villages; but those who were present to settle the contract shall be given a slight refreshment of bread and wine. In cities, however, if the bridegroom and bride are wealthier, ten or twelve guests may be invited at the expense of both families, provided that the banquet is not prolonged beyond three hours. The penalty for transgressors is ten pounds of denarii, article four, §3.

II. Fifty wedding guests are permitted to citizens and craftsmen; seventy-four to academics, those who belong to a council or serve in courts, and also wealthy merchants; ninety-four to court counselors and assessors of the court tribunal, article 4, §§4 and 5. A fine of four pounds of denarii is prescribed for each person exceeding the number. In villages, however, only forty are permitted even to the wealthier and thirty to the rest.

III. The power of dispensing anyone from this law is removed from all; it must therefore be sought from the prince alone, or, in his absence, from the one holding his place, §7, article 4.

IV. The measure of dishes at a baptismal banquet is defined in the following manner. First, those who are of the first or middle station may send the woman in childbed, upon the first day of the baptism, a breakfast--that is, one measure of wine and two white loaves, or as much bread of fine flour--where breakfasts are customary. Where it is not customary to take them, it is lawful to send two measures of wine and two white loaves; this, however, is not permitted to craftsmen and hired laborers. A fine of ten pounds of denarii is imposed upon the transgressor, article 3, §7.

V. If anyone after the baptism wishes to invite the midwife or other women who attended the childbirth, he shall set before them nothing except broth with meat, roast meat, and cheese, not cakes or anything else. The fine is six pounds of denarii. Nor shall the women spend more than two Batzen upon the refreshment.

[Printed page 657]

VI. These are the wedding dishes. Citizens and craftsmen shall set out only four dishes: first, broth with boiled meat or a hen; second, vegetables with boiled meat, or ham, or sausages, according to the season; third, fish; fourth, roast meat, to which may be added either gudgeons, or crabs, or curds--one of these, not several. A second roast is permitted to persons of the middle station, such as academics and rich merchants; but two other dishes to court counselors and assessors of the court tribunal. The fine is ten pounds of denarii. But if someone of great dignity is present, somewhat more may be set upon his table alone by way of honor, provided, nevertheless, that molded representations of foods are altogether abolished, article 4, §19.

VII. When the baptism is finished, there is no banquet for men, article 3, §10.

VIII. The time also is defined. In villages they must rise from the table about the second hour; in cities, at the fourth or fifth--not because more license is granted to townsmen, but because they are accustomed to sit down later. All, however, are ordered to return home honorably and decorously.

IX. On the following day they may assemble again, but at the eleventh hour; in villages, however, at the fourth hour after noon, provided that everything is ended at the eighth hour. Meanwhile neither children nor other uninvited members of the household shall be brought, nor shall anything be sent outside.

X. The measure of gifts is as follows. Citizens and craftsmen may give godparents only half a Philippicus; academics and the richer, a whole Philippicus or a gold florin; court counselors, a ducat. Other little gifts shall be omitted altogether, under a penalty of ten pounds of denarii. If anyone gives gilded or silver cups, he shall be fined four hundred pounds of denarii.

They shall offer the midwife two white coins as her honorarium, and the same amount to the sacristan. The rich may give four and one-half.

XI. Presents or New Year's gifts among godparents shall not exceed an eighth of a florin. Cakes and all other sweets are abolished altogether, under a penalty of five pounds of denarii.

XII. At confirmation also, a gift shall not exceed three Batzen. If they prefer to give a prayer book, its price shall not exceed five or six Batzen, and this shall be granted only to persons of the first rank.

XIII. At weddings, shirts shall be given only to parents, and handkerchiefs only to the best man and the nearest agnates. The penalty is five pounds.

XIV. Guests shall not exceed the appointed value, nor shall young men and maidens exceed half a Philippicus.

A pair of spouses of the middle station: an imperial thaler.

Persons of higher rank: a gold florin.

Prelates of the second rank of the clergy, and secular persons in honorable offices: a ducat. Whoever gives more shall be fined ten pounds of denarii.

XV. It is permitted to the very wealthy to give a silver cup as a memorial, but only to parents, brothers, and sisters, and to no one else, under a penalty of fifty pounds of denarii.

XVI. Free weddings, at which nothing is paid, are abolished altogether. If, however, one of the principal counselors wishes to hold one, he shall invite only fifty or sixty guests; he shall furnish the meal not in a public house but in a private one; and he shall receive gifts only from parents, brothers, and nearest agnates. Whoever acts otherwise shall be fined one hundred pounds.

XVII. To the inviter, where there are six tables, two florins shall be given; where there are more tables, three florins. No other little gifts shall be given.

To the musicians, two florins; if they demand more, a fine of ten florins is prescribed. Badges shall not be given to the young men, under a penalty of eight florins. To the cook, where there are six tables, five florins; where ten, seven florins; to the dishwashers, three white coins; to the one turning the spit, two white coins. For one demanding more, a fine of four pounds is established. If an orator, musician, or cook is unwilling to serve at that price, he shall not be employed at weddings for an entire year; if obstinacy appears in them in these matters, they may even be deprived of civic rights and banished from the city. The sacristan shall be given broth with a portion of meat and two measures of wine. The same food, with one measure of wine, shall be given to the trumpeter who keeps watch in the tower. Those who carry the wedding wine into the cellar shall receive nothing beyond their ordinary wages; only one measure may be given to them. To the watchmen also they shall give only two measures of wine and two loaves.

Finally, costly gifts, handkerchiefs, and other things between the bridegroom and bride are prohibited. Accordingly, citizens and craftsmen shall not exceed five florins; persons of the middle station, eight; persons of greater dignity, ten. A fine of forty pounds of denarii is prescribed for offenders.

§ 4. And those are laws concerning weddings, which it would be worthwhile to extend also to other banquets. Our ancestors acted in this way.

For first they prescribed thrift in common foods and condemned costly and exotic ones. “There survive censorial laws,” says Pliny in Book Thirty-six, chapter 1, “forbidding sweetbreads, dormice, and other things too insignificant to mention from being set upon dinners.” And in Book Eight, chapter 57, he says that mice were removed from dinners, which the censorial laws--the princeps Marcus Scaurus being consul--removed from dinners no otherwise than shellfish and birds conveyed from another world.

What then? They forbade as delicacies things which now are despised as rustic food. Pliny, treating of swine in Book Eight, chapter 51, says:

> Nor does any other animal supply more numerous material for the eating-house: nearly fifty flavors, whereas the others have one apiece. Hence the pages of censorial laws and the prohibition from dinners of belly, sweetbreads, testicles, wombs, cheeks, and boar-meat; nevertheless, after Publilius, the poet of mimes, had cast off slavery, no dinner of his is recorded without belly, and even the name “udder” was imposed by him. Late-farrowing sows also found favor. Already the speeches of Cato the Censor reproach people for the calloused flesh of boar. Nevertheless, when it had been divided into three parts, the middle part, called the boar's loin, was set out. Publius Servilius Rullus was the first of the Romans to set out a whole boar at banquets; he was the father of that Rullus who promulgated the agrarian law in Cicero's consulship. So recent is the origin of a thing now daily. And the Annals noted this, evidently for the correction of the morals of those for whom, though the dinner was indeed noted at its beginning, two and three boars together are now commanded.

He relates the same concerning hens in Book Ten, chapter 50:

> The Delians began to fatten hens; thence arose the plague of devouring plump birds and birds made fat with their own bodies. I find this first excepted in ancient prohibitions of dinners, already by the law of the consul Gaius Fannius, eleven years before the Third Punic War: that nothing belonging to birds should be set out except one hen, and one that was not fattened. This provision was afterward transferred and passed through all the laws; and an evasion of them was devised by also feeding cockerels with food soaked in milk, by which they are approved as much more pleasing.

[Printed page 658]

Will you persuade our age that after the Punic War, when Italy, Sicily, Spain, Greece, and a great part of Asia served the Romans, there was such thrift that they enacted by law that nothing belonging to birds should be set out except one hen, and one that was not fattened? O men worthy to be masters of the world, who, though ruling most widely, did not even taste the delicacies of our rustics! The same author shows that the law was observed, because this provision passed through all the laws and because cockerels were substituted in place of their mothers.

As for Pliny's mention of the Fannian law, it was added to the Orchian law, which prescribed the number of guests; for the Fannian law regulates expense. At the Roman and Plebeian Games, the Saturnalia, and certain other days it permitted one hundred asses to be spent on each single day; on ten other days in every month, thirty; but on all other days, ten. Because it permitted one hundred asses, the law, which was received with the enormous favor of all the orders, was called the “hundred-as law” by Lucilius.

But how much did the law permit when it permitted ten or one hundred asses? An as is the smallest thing: “I do not value you at an as” occurs in the proverb of those expressing contempt. Thus the as is the smallest coin when the matter concerns counted money. Epicurus boasted that he was fed for less than an entire as; Metrodorus, who had not yet made so much progress, for an entire one. Seneca, Epistle 18. But he ate, as he himself boasts, only bread, ὕδατι καὶ ἄρτῳ χρώμενος, using water and bread. Seneca indicates that the bread was barley bread; for water and porridge, or a piece of barley bread, is not a pleasant thing. Epicurus calls it μᾶζαν, which Pliny calls polenta. The same Seneca shows that this was great thrift: “The provisions of a prison are more liberal; a man who is going to kill those set apart for capital punishment does not feed them so narrowly.” The provision of a prison was a pound of meal for each day.

It was scanty, however, as Sallust says: it prevented death, but nevertheless strength grew feeble upon it. Seneca says: “You will exult when filled for two asses.” They therefore spent two asses to fill the belly with bread. From this appears the severity of the Fannian law, which upon a feast day permits only one hundred asses to be set out at banquets--a sum that appears incredible, for one hundred asses make an imperial thaler less its fifth part; they make approximately nineteen Batzen.

At this price, for the whole day--two parts upon food and drink, three upon seasoning--not only citizens but the leading men of the Senate were ordered to be content on the greatest festivals. We cannot restrict banquets in that fashion, but it is nevertheless useful to know what was done. I am not ignorant that there was at that time great cheapness of commodities; but by any valuation the thrift is great and the law severe. Let us grant a head of household five guests, so that he is the sixth and his wife the seventh. I reckon fourteen asses for bread, so that each may be filled for two asses; for wine--which was rare at that time, since vine-dressers had been driven away by wars--twenty-eight asses: now you have forty-two asses. Nor can it be less. For those who were most frugally filled with barley bread spent an as, and Seneca requires two asses, that is, a dupondius, at a banquet, where bread matching the festival in whiteness and bright with fine flour was required. Wine also easily exceeded twice the price of bread; nor were the sons of Romulus ignorant of drunkenness, for the Quirites came drunk to the Assembly and cast their votes. From this fact I also conclude that drunkenness at that time was not exceedingly disgraceful, since it was public and thrust itself into the assembly. For the remaining provision there are fifty-eight asses, of which twenty-nine must be spent upon the remainder of the midday meal and as many upon dinner.

But what were ten asses for one day? They are not two of our Batzen. If some similar law were now in use, how many thousands of annual revenue would it bring? Yet I do not approve one so severe and stringent, because it is not easily observed.

Didius enlarged the Fannian law so that all Italians were bound by it; then he enacted that not only those who had made lunches or dinners at greater expense, but also those who had been invited to them, should be subject to the penalties of the law.

Licinius Crassus, who was called Rich, himself also enacted a sumptuary law not very different from the Fannian. It differed from it in this: on the Kalends, Nones, and Roman market days, each man was permitted to consume only thirty asses on each day for the sake of eating; but on other days, which were not excepted, no more was to be set out than three pounds of dried meat and a pound of salted fish. Those things, however, which were born from the earth, vine, or tree it granted without restriction. This was received with the greatest zeal and agreement; but soon it was relaxed by the dictator Sulla, who permitted thirty sesterces for dinner on the Kalends, Ides, Nones, games, and festivals, and on other days no more than three. Antius followed, but the obstinacy of luxury resisted his law.

Augustus attempted somehow to restrain luxury after morals had been corrupted. For two hundred sesterces were permitted on ordinary days, three hundred on festivals such as the Kalends, Nones, and Ides, and one thousand at weddings and the feast on the following day. See Macrobius, Saturnalia 3.17, and Aulus Gellius 2.24 concerning these matters.

After these things luxury grew powerful; poverty and the destruction of all followed, until the scepter was taken away and necessity taught sobriety. The same will happen to us also unless the license of ruining oneself is restrained by laws. For if we consider the things set upon the tables of private persons, they will easily equal the dinner of Metellus the pontiff, which Macrobius treats as sumptuous in Saturnalia 3.13.

§ 5. The second part of sumptuary laws is that luxury of dress be removed. It is now so great that it removes the distinction of all orders and confounds everything. Lest we suppose it a slight madness or a slight injury to the state, I have seen hired laborers and craftsmen diligent for an entire year, defrauding their own bodily comfort, so that they might be clothed like nobles. Now a village dresses at greater expense than a great city formerly did. I said something about this matter in Book Six; but now I require a courageous prince who will provide paternally for his subjects, lest they exceed their means in expense. For many millions are spent upon accessories and the adornment of clothing which can be applied to useful things.

The prince can attain this in two ways. First, if he himself is dressed modestly and shows that the prices, variety of colors, and other such things displease him. For since all courtiers wish to please the prince, and many also flatter him, without any command he will see the court decorous and grave, without extravagance of clothing. Once it is thus ordered, if nobles and others come there for business, at first they will feel shame when they perceive that they are more ornate than everyone else; afterward they will incur the jests and mockery of the courtiers.

[Printed page 659]

For pride in clothing is the vilest pride, because it is womanish and shows a mind occupied with little things. Hence, if you unexpectedly catch a youth or a man arranging himself elaborately and studiously, he blushes, as though he had committed something shameful and had unbecomingly cast aside a manly spirit, no less than if he were found playing with nuts or riding upon a long reed. Satraps and praetors will imitate the prince, and those among the subjects whom they observe to exceed the limit they will punish with contempt. Who, indeed, will not blush to be more ornate than his lord? Who, his fingers burdened with costly gems and rings, will dare to shine at a banquet when he perceives the governor's hands to be bare? No one can be ignorant of how important this is, for so much gold is now worn away upon the fingers of craftsmen, hired laborers, and rustics as is sufficient to maintain great armies. And in this matter rivalry is most destructive, and the evil flies over to everyone with the greatest speed.

The second method is easy and profitable: the prince should prescribe to each order the material and manner of clothing and sanction the law with a heavy penalty. First, those who violate the law should be subject to a monetary penalty. Then, if the right of wearing a ring or a linen garment is granted to anyone, let him purchase that privilege with a definite sum of money.

Both are equitable, for no one will violate the law except a boaster of his riches; for that very reason the adornment will be despised and shunned by prudent men. From this the prince will have one or the other of two advantages: either pride will assist the treasury, or obedience will enrich the city. Let there be, to be sure, a city containing one hundred thousand souls. All are clothed more expensively than accords with their station, and indeed ostentation exults in the cradle and amid infant cries. I reckon ten florins for each person, which they spend beyond what respectability requires; nor does that luxury cost less, although some do not offend, for most lose greater sums and some squander hundreds and thousands. Behold: if that city were governed by laws, it would now be richer by a whole million. Let the prince therefore sanction discipline by sumptuary laws.

§ 6. The Roman emperors displayed great severity in forbidding costly clothing. For first Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian did not wish such garments to be woven for private uses, Code, title 8, chapter 11:

> We prohibit the weaving and making, for private uses, of men's gold-embroidered garments or silken borders interwoven with gold, and we command that they be made only in our imperial weaving establishments.

He specifies only men's garments here, for the Theodosian Code also forbade women's garments, which Justinian permitted. But afterward Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius mitigated this same law--or rather made it harsher--when they granted those garments to the prince's ministers; for the concession invited others. The law reads:

> Let no one have golden borders either upon tunics or upon linen garments except only those to whom this has been conceded because of imperial service. For whoever has not divested himself of a forbidden and undue garment will be punished by no light chastisement.

Theodosius forbade purple, as owed to the prince alone, and all silken garments:

> Let all persons, of whatever sex, dignity, craft, profession, and family, refrain from possession of a material of this kind, which is dedicated to the prince alone and his household; nor let anyone weave or make silken cloaks and tunics at home. Let those garments which have been dyed with the purple shellfish and which have been woven without any admixture of another material be brought forth from houses; and let tunics or cloaks whose texture has been infected throughout with the blood of the shellfish be handed over. Let no threads dyed with the shellfish be woven beneath, nor let fibers of the same dye run down to be compacted by the sounding comb. Whole-purple garments must be returned to the treasury; men's garments must immediately be offered. Nor is there cause for anyone to complain about the forfeited price, because impunity for the violated law is sufficient. But lest anyone now incur the snares of the new constitution by concealing a thing of this sort, otherwise he will sustain danger after the likeness of injured majesty.

Here purple is forbidden to private persons, and there is a grave penalty, namely danger after the likeness of injured majesty. Then it must be returned to the sacred treasuries without receipt of a price. Under the same title the markets in purple also are prohibited, and Theodosius and Valentinian command that the workshops of the Tyrians or Phoenicians be inspected.

It is equitable, however, that the law forbids counterfeiting purple, for purchasers are defrauded at great prices. Theodosius, Arcadius, and Honorius forbade “dipping fleeces painted with a counterfeit color into an imitation of the sacred murex.” If, therefore, to wear clothing similar to the prince's was the crime of majesty, punished by laws and death, why should the prince not prescribe modesty to his subjects, so that he may cut away a cause of debt, poverty, disturbances, and rivalries?

§ 7. Nor is there need of new laws. Laws which ought to have been observed were decreed long ago, provided that soul and vigor against vices be imparted to the laws by the magistrate.

The matter of clothing has been treated in many diets of emperors and princes, already for one hundred and fifty years; but luxury has always increased in opposition to all the edicts. The very senate of the princes is witness. In the year 1500 it was decreed under the emperor Maximilian as follows:

> Since in past diets the superfluous luxury and prices of clothing have been treated in many ways, especially in the assembly at Freiburg, and laws and constitutions have been made but not yet published, we have now again renewed and accepted these through ourselves and the orders of our empire, while we have also more fully explained, enlarged, and corrected them, as the things following indicate.

> We ordain, command, establish, and will, earnestly commanding all and singular princes, electors, dukes, and other magistrates, of whatever dignity, family, and estate they may be, under penalty of our indignation and punishment, that they themselves, and each of them, command their subjects and those belonging to them to observe this constitution of our empire and the law written below concerning the superfluous prices of clothing after mid-Lent, upon the next Sunday Laetare, and to bring it into constant use. But if any of the electors, princes, or magistrates shall be slow and negligent in the business or penalty of this matter, then, after the royal fiscal officer has admonished the electors, princes, and magistrates concerning that cause, he shall have power to summon and punish the violators; nor shall the magistrates to whom the transgressors of the law are subject have a right to interpose or obstruct. We also, as authors of the law, shall be the first to institute this constitution in our court and hereditary provinces, and shall take care that it is firmly observed.

The laws themselves are these:

> First, therefore, we judge, ordain, institute, and will that which was also decreed and sanctioned in the Diet of Freiburg: that the common sort of rustics and laborers, both in towns and elsewhere in villages, shall not put on cloth whose ell exceeds half a florin. Furthermore, we forbid every kind of gold, silver, gems, velvet, silk, and embroidered clothing to all of them, their wives, and their children. By this decree, however, we will that princes, prelates, counts, lords, and nobles, together with their satraps or officials, be exempt; indeed, let it be lawful and right for them to clothe these annually according to custom, as also their other servants.

[Printed page 660]

> Likewise, craftsmen, together with servants and all other hired laborers, shall use for hose or bands cloth whose ell does not exceed three quarters of a florin. For gowns and cloaks they shall be content with native cloth whose ell does not exceed half a florin. Nor shall they wear gold, silver, pearls, silk, velvet, watered, or embroidered clothing. Let the same rule concerning clothing apply to the wives and children of craftsmen.
>
> Likewise, knights shall have neither gold, silver, nor silk, indeed neither a breastpiece nor anything interwoven with gold and silver, nor shall they distinguish their garments with silk.
>
> Likewise, we prohibit to all and singular persons pleated shirts, breastpieces ornamented with gold and silver, and both silver and golden bands, excepting princes, magnates, counts, lords, and nobles, whom we will to be free from this decree. But let each cherish moderation or modesty according to his station, and avoid superfluous luxury. And especially let nobles who have not obtained the name of knight bachelor or doctor not cover their shirt-fronts with pearls or gold. We grant, however, to nobles distinguished by the title of knight bachelor or doctor that they may display upon their caps two ounces of silver and no more.
>
> Likewise, to citizens in towns who are not nobles, knights, or doctors, we prohibit the use of gold, pearls, velvet, purple, and linings of costly furs; we permit, however, silken and velvet doublets or damask cloth as clothing. Similarly, let it be lawful to ornament the clothing of their wives and children with velvet and silk, but not with golden and silver borders. Furthermore, let their unmarried daughters not be forbidden circlets, gems, and various pearls, yet under this law: that they not transgress the laws of modesty and moderation.
>
> Likewise, nobles not yet made knights bachelor or inaugurated with the title of doctor shall wear neither gold nor pearls openly, nor clothing of diverse colors, nor clothing excessively worked with the needle; yet if they have a mind to procure such work, let there be nothing excessive.
>
> Likewise, nobles, knights bachelor, and doctors shall abstain from Attalic cloth; nevertheless, we give even them the opportunity to use doublets of this kind.

In the year 1530, during the reign of Charles V, it was established as follows:

> CONCERNING THE IMMODERATE SPLENDOR OF CLOTHING

Since it is honorable, becoming, and equitable that everyone, of whatever order and family he may be, use clothing and attire suitable to his station, dignity, fortune, and wealth, so that each man's station may be discerned more easily and certainly, it has pleased us to confer, agree, and conclude with the electors, princes, and estates concerning the following ordinance of clothing, which we will to be observed in every respect under the chastisement and penalty annexed.

CONCERNING RUSTICS DWELLING IN THE COUNTRY OR IN VILLAGES

And first we sanction, ordain, and decree that the common sort of rustics, laborers, and hired workers dwelling in villages or the countryside shall employ for clothing not foreign cloth, but cloth woven within Germany and customarily used of this kind--excepting London, Mechlin, and Lierre cloth. Let their tunics not reach the ankles and not be gathered, but extend only as far as the calves and have no more than six pleats. Hose of London, Mechlin, or Lierre cloth shall, however, be suitable; indeed, it shall be lawful to procure a cotton doublet without looser sleeves, provided that slashed and cut garments are always avoided.

Furthermore, we decree that they shall not wear gold, silver, gems, silk, embroidered collars sewn to their undergarments and worked either with gold or silken thread, nor breastpieces, plumes, silken bands, slashed shoes, or doctoral caps, but hats and bands.

Likewise, nothing more or further is granted to their wives and children; and we forbid them all collars, breast-coverings, caps bordered with golden fringes, gold, silver, or linen girdles, corals, all gold, silver, gems, and linen. Only to daughters and unmarried women let a silken hairband be conceded.

Likewise, wives may make and wear an outer garment at most from London cloth and no other, but mantles from linings of lambskin, goatskin, and skins of this sort of a cheaper quality and price, without coverings and fringes.

CONCERNING CITIZENS AND INHABITANTS OF CITIES

Likewise, since in cities and towns there are principally three classes of citizens and inhabitants--namely common citizens and craftsmen; merchants and traders; and others of the senatorial and patrician order, or of more honorable family and descent, living from their own property, revenues, and substance--we establish, ordain, and decree that the common people, craftsmen, and merchants shall not use gold, silver, gems, velvet, silken, eyeleted, slashed, cut, or bordered garments, nor a doctoral cap; nor shall they line their attire with marten or shrew furs, or the costly furs of animals of that kind, but shall be content with the cheaper furs of ferrets, foxes, lambs, and that sort, in moderate and becoming apparel.

The same rule applies to their wives and children. Nevertheless, there is permitted to them a gold ring worth only six florins without a gem; a collar bordered with linen; a cap with a small golden fringe two fingers wide; a damask or silken outer garment; and a girdle worth not more than ten florins, ornamented only with silver bosses, not gilded. It shall be lawful for unmarried women to display a velvet hairband ornamented with silver, not gold.

Likewise, we forbid apprentices of craftsmen and servants already discharged from apprenticeship the use of gold, silver, linen, a plume, a cushion, or a slashed garment; nor shall they carry themselves in any other attire than was most recently stated concerning craftsmen and mechanics in cities.

But if anyone from the tribe and number of craftsmen should be chosen into the senate, it shall be lawful for him to use no other apparel than that of the merchants which will next be described.

CONCERNING MERCHANTS AND TRADERS

Urban merchants and traders shall not put on gowns of velvet, damask, silk, or linen. Let them avoid gold, silver, gems, and golden and silver ornaments for the hair. Watered gowns, silken doublets--not of velvet and not dyed with murex, and not bordered--and likewise gold rings, are permitted.

Let them not use cloth exceeding two florins in price. Let them, together with their wives, abstain from marten, shrew, or other furs of that kind that are more noble and rare.

Likewise, let their wives have equal ornament in clothing, and let them spend no more than two ells of velvet, linen, silk, or damask upon any garment; it is not forbidden to sew fringes upon its upper part.

[Printed page 661]

Likewise, there is forbidden to them a girdle exceeding twenty florins in price.

Likewise, a fringe or fold in a veil or cap more than five fingers wide.

Likewise, a velvet or linen outer garment with a golden clasp or brooch exceeding twenty florins.

URBAN CITIZENS WHO ARE OF THE SENATORIAL OR PATRICIAN ORDER, OR OF A PRINCIPAL FAMILY, AND LIVE FROM THEIR OWN REVENUES AND PROPERTY

Let all these be in precisely that clothing and apparel which was indicated above for merchants and traders, except that they may use watered gowns bordered with three ells of silk, and likewise marten furs--but not the choicer kinds--as well as doublets of velvet and linen, not dyed with murex, and linen hairbands.

We likewise permit them gold rings, but not exceeding thirty or forty florins in price.

Let their wives be in attire not unlike that of merchants' wives, except that it is lawful to spend four ells of velvet or linen not dyed with purple in distinguishing and varying their garments. We likewise grant a gold necklace worth thirty, forty, forty, or fifty florins, and a girdle worth thirty florins.

NOBLES

Furthermore, we forbid nobles velvet or silk dyed with murex; at most damask cloth or linen of this sort is conceded, which they may variegate with no more than six ells. Similarly, it shall be lawful for them to display gold rings, ornaments for parting the hair, and a necklace not greater than two hundred florins in price, but let them wrap or distinguish the latter with a band, according to ancient custom and usage.

One who is prefect of the court, chancellor, marshal, or counselor of some prince, yet not noble, may use attire not different from that of nobles.

Knights bachelor, however, are excepted. Let it be lawful and right for them to wear necklaces publicly without a band, but let no necklace exceed four hundred florins in price.

We do not prohibit them the furs of shrews and of that kind.

Wives of nobles may procure for themselves four linen tunics and use them openly: namely, one of velvet and the other three of damask cloth or linen of that kind, and no more than four apiece. Yet let them be without gems, silver, and gold. But if it pleases them to ornament these with borders and fringes, this indeed shall be lawful with gems or silver upon the upper part, and not beyond the width of a quarter of an ell.

The wife of a knight bachelor may sew this fringe with gold upon the upper part, but with the same width. And if any have a greater number of garments than we have just mentioned, let them keep them with their daughters and children; it shall not be forbidden.

It shall be lawful for them to use golden bands or caps whose circlets and ornaments do not exceed forty florins.

Likewise, a noblewoman may wear necklaces, brooches, clasps, pendants, and female ornaments of that kind, all of which--rings excepted--shall not exceed two hundred florins.

Likewise, golden borders and girdles shall not be greater than forty florins.

CONCERNING DOCTORS

Doctors and their wives may display ornate clothing, gold rings, and other insignia according to their station.

CONCERNING COUNTS AND BARONS

> Counts and barons shall not use Attalic clothing, but only velvet, purple, and other linen and silk, not interwoven with gold, unless they are knights bachelor.
>
> It shall be lawful to wear necklaces worth five hundred florins.

§ 8. The last subject of a sumptuary law is the construction of houses and the household; for to build houses and maintain many persons, εἰς πενίαν ἄτροπος ἐστὶν ὁδός. It is a straight road to poverty. The prince must take great care that citizens do not so contend in the splendor and magnificence of houses that they are reduced to want. For since the expenses of building are uncertain, accounts are never drawn so exactly that greater expenditures than those intended need not be made. And this is the customary error of those who build ostentatiously: that they are compelled to abandon their houses and move away. It is therefore expedient that a fixed rule for public buildings exist, lest, while men dwell spaciously and magnificently, they restrict their patrimonies and their means of subsistence.

§ 9. If laws of health can be prescribed for this error or disease also, the following must be observed.

1. Let the prince and the state restrain themselves. Let the council-house, palace, and all things be beneath their majesty, lest they kindle rivalry among the citizens.

2. Let them omit harmful, temporary, and useless works. Such are theaters, circuses, pyramids, colossi, hanging gardens, triumphal arches, and whatever of that kind barbarous ostentation has devised. In this matter the Romans certainly offended. What benefit was the theater of Scaurus, concerning which Pliny writes in Book Thirty-six, chapter 15?

> We shall not suffer the two Gaiuses or the two Neros to enjoy even this glory of fame; and we shall teach that even their madness was surpassed by the private works of Marcus Scaurus, whose aedileship, I know not whether, most of all overthrew civic morals, and whether Sulla's evil was greater in the power of so mighty a stepson than in the proscription of so many thousands. In his aedileship this man made the greatest work of all that were ever made by human hand, not for a temporary stay but even with a view to permanence. This was a theater. Its stage had three stories in height and 360 columns, in that city which had not endured six Hymettian columns without reproach to a most eminent citizen. The lowest part of the stage was of marble, the middle of glass--a kind of luxury unheard of even afterward--and the highest of gilded panels, as we have said. The lowest columns were thirty-eight feet high. The bronze statues between the columns, as we have indicated, were three thousand in number. The seating area itself held eighty thousand persons, although Pompey's theater, after the city had been multiplied so many times and its population had become so much greater, amply sufficed for forty thousand. But the remaining equipment also, of Attalic fabric, painted panels, and the rest of the theatrical apparatus, was so great that, when those things which remained for the luxury of daily use had been carried back to his villa at Tusculum, the villa was burned by angry slaves and property worth one hundred million sesterces was consumed.

What benefit was Curio's theater, except to make citizens suspended in the air? What benefit was Heliogabalus' bridge? All those things were made for the destruction of resources. If that money had been spent upon fortification, could Rome not have been made invincible?

3. Useful works--such as fortifications, mills, aqueducts, harbors, and navigable channels of rivers--he shall make with judgment and in proportion to expenditure. Such are the works which Quintus Marcius Rex made, which Pliny recounts in the same place:

> Ordered by the Senate to repair the conduits of the Appian, Anio, and Tepula waters, he introduced a new aqueduct, called from his own name, by driving tunnels through mountains within the term of his praetorship. Agrippa, however, in his aedileship, after adding the Aqua Virgo and bringing together and repairing the others, made seven hundred basins; in addition, 105 fountains and one hundred and thirty distribution reservoirs, very many also magnificent in ornament. Upon those works he placed three hundred statues of bronze or marble and four hundred marble columns, all of them within the space of one year. He himself adds in his commemoration of his aedileship that games were held for fifty-nine days and one hundred and seventy baths were supplied free, which have now > increased at Rome to an infinite number. The most recent costly work, begun by Gaius Caesar and completed by Claudius, surpassed the preceding aqueducts. For from the fortieth milestone the Curtian and Caerulean springs flowed in at such an elevation that they might be raised to all the hills of the city. Three hundred million sesterces were expended upon that work. But if anyone should estimate more carefully the abundance of water in public places, baths, pools, houses, canals, gardens, suburban properties, and villas, together with the length of its approach, the arches constructed, mountains pierced, and valleys leveled, he will confess that nothing in the whole world was more marvelous. I should indeed reckon among the most memorable works of the same Claudius--although abandoned through the hatred of his successor--the mountain pierced in order to discharge the Fucine Lake, certainly at an indescribable expense and with a multitude of laborers through so many years: since either the collecting of the waters, while a four-mile mountain was being excavated from its summit by machines, or the cutting of flint, and all things within being done in darkness, are things which can neither be conceived in the mind except by those who saw them nor recounted in human speech. For I pass over the work of the harbor at Ostia; likewise roads cut between mountains; the Tyrrhenian Sea shut off from Lake Lucrinus by breakwaters; and so many bridges made at such expense. And among the many other marvels of Italy, Papirius Fabianus, most experienced in nature, is authority that the very marble grows in the quarries; the contractors also affirm that those wounds of the mountains are filled spontaneously. If these things are true, there is hope that luxury will never be wanting.

[Printed page 662]

4. Let there be a fixed measure for private houses. Augustus restrained ambition in building; for since men raised them too high, so that they constructed the danger of collapse, intercepted the air, and excluded the light, he defined the limit as seventy feet, according to Strabo. Nero also did the same; Trajan permitted sixty.

5. Let him altogether prohibit expenditure upon useless features of buildings, which contribute neither to stability nor convenience. For the madness of building has no end. The house of Marcus Lepidus was the most beautiful; but within thirty-five years it was not among the first hundred. Thus Pliny in Book Thirty-six, chapter 15:

> Let whoever wishes reckon in this valuation the mass of marbles, the works of painters, the royal expenditures, and the hundred houses contending with the most beautiful and most celebrated, and afterward those houses surpassed by innumerable others down to this day. Fires certainly punish luxury; yet it cannot be brought about that morals understand anything to be more mortal than man himself. But two houses surpassed all those.

By this law three things especially are restrained: foreign marbles, sculptures, and paintings.

Pliny's complaint concerning marble in Book Thirty-six, chapter 1, is hardly empty:

> We cut mountains and drag them away for no cause other than delights--mountains which it was also a marvel merely to have crossed. Our ancestors considered it almost a prodigy that the Alps were surmounted by Hannibal and afterward by the Cimbri; now they themselves are cut into a thousand kinds of marble. Promontories are opened to the sea, and the nature of things is reduced to a level. We carry away the things which had been established as boundaries for separating nations; ships are made for the sake of marbles, and across the waves, the most savage part of the nature of things, mountain ridges are carried this way and that, with even greater madness than when a vessel is sought from the clouds for cold drinks and rocks closest to heaven are hollowed out so that one may drink with ice. Let each consider within himself what prices he hears for these things and what masses he sees carried and dragged.

Scaurus brought 360 marble columns together for a theater lasting one month, but from his father's plunder of the provinces and Sulla's proscription lists. Lucullus gave his name to a marble as a memorial of vanity, and some of those columns were thirty-eight feet high. We see the swift triumph of vices. Lucius Crassus the orator was the first to possess columns of foreign marble, but they were Hymettian, only six in number, and no longer than twelve feet--and not without reproach, for Brutus therefore called him the Palatine Venus.

Much greater care must be taken that the workmanship not exceed the material. Sculptures, paintings, incrustations, and gildings must be forbidden. For to what purpose are such expenses and care? Why is clay polished with gold? Or what more can be bestowed upon royal palaces than that they be adorned with marble, bronze, ivory, electrum, silver, and gold? Deservedly will the prince make such great ostentation by private persons liable to servitude, so that they may be compelled to receive ambassadors or foreigners and, just as elsewhere tax is paid from hearth and tiles, so here it may be paid from gold.

The ancients had households that were armies, and retinues reduced many to solitude. Even now provision must be made lest those whose station is middling maintain a useless household at home. Gaius Caecilius Claudius Isidorus had 4,116 slaves, but most of them useful; others had more without cause. At Rome there was so great a passion in this matter that both private persons and the state suffered extreme things from it. The Servile War arose from herds of slaves; Rome was in perpetual danger.

“An opinion was once delivered in the Senate,” says Seneca in On Clemency 1.23, “that slaves should be distinguished from free men by their dress; then it appeared how great the danger would be if our slaves began to count us.” Demetrius, Pompey's freedman, who was not ashamed to be richer than Pompey, had a great household, as Seneca says in On Tranquility of Mind, chapter 9: “The number of his slaves was reported to him daily as that of an army to a commander; yet two deputy slaves and a somewhat more spacious cellar ought long since to have been riches for him.”

Plutarch relates the following about the parade for Demetrius in his Cato the Younger:

> Cato was going to Antioch and saw outside the gate, standing in orderly ranks along both sides of the road, men, youths, and boys, divided according to age, all in festive attire and clothing; in addition there were magistrates in white robes and even priests themselves wearing crowns. Cato was vexed and thought that this had been done for the sake of honoring him; he was angry with those whom he had sent ahead, as though they had given notice. And so, when he drew nearer, he descended from his vehicle and ordered his men to do the same and go on foot, as though he were to be greeted and led in by that procession. But behold, a certain old man, distinguished by a crown and staff--for he was the master of ceremonies--without even offering a greeting, asked where they had left Demetrius and when he would come. This Demetrius was Pompey's freedman and had great influence with him, upon whom all mortals then had their eyes fixed. Therefore Cato's companions were both indignant and dying with laughter; Cato said nothing other than, “O wretched city!” and entered it.

A multitude of slaves, clients, and attendants is the rock of destruction for nobles and princes. Yet foreign nations generally desire that petty glory more eagerly, such as the Turks; for the more barbarous any nation is, the more it delights to command many persons at home. And these things suffice concerning sumptuary laws.

CHAPTER XV

Other Honorable Means, Useful to Subjects, by Which the Resources of the State Are Strengthened

[Printed page 663]

§ 1. I have taught that resources are necessary to the state. They are gathered honorably either with inconvenience to the citizens, or without detriment to them, or, finally, with advantage to them. I treat the last method, and shall present certain other means, each of them indeed not of great consequence by itself, but several together powerful and abundant.

§ 2. The purchase of slaves and their lawful use tempered by humanity contributes greatly to gathering resources. Paul exhorts slaves to obey their masters, “not serving to the eye.” Nor is it contrary to Christian gentleness to use the labor of slaves. Abraham certainly had very many slaves, as did other holy men, for whose slaves that subjection was even more useful than dangerous liberty. Indeed, the laws of Moses concerning servitudes are most equitable, Exodus 21:2 and the following verses, and Leviticus 25:6, 42, and 44. For if they can lawfully be killed, they can therefore also be reduced to servitude.

Next, the civil laws and the perpetual practice of Christians attest this, nor does Paul command Onesimus to be manumitted, but restores him to Philemon. For servitude is nothing other than to be in another's power, to be governed by his counsel and will, to furnish labor to him, and to possess nothing of one's own unless the master concedes it. Servitude, however, ought to arise from a just cause and to be equitable and mild, according to that maxim:

> What you do not wish to be done to yourself, do not do to another.

This is useful in common. For since many persons are by nature, through neglect of instruction, or by the efficacy of seduction wicked and stubborn in vices, it is plainly useful for those who cannot bear liberty to serve in servitude. How many myriads of vagabonds and wanderers burden the state and betray it when there is an opportunity? Would it not have been better for them to serve moderate masters, be exercised by labors, gather a private fund, and await manumission by the praetor's rod? If they are not well-behaved, let them be ruled by δεσποτικῷ command; if they are prudent and moderate, like Abraham's servant, let them acquire liberty. For Christian laws long ago abolished that harsh and cruel servitude of the ancients, who usurped the right of life and death over the wretched, cast the sick or old out of the house, and sold them to the beasts. It is therefore a just and lawful means, and it burdens no one in the state except him who deservedly is a slave; indeed, it also strikes fear into enemies, while they flee wars through fear of servitude.

Furthermore, the advantages which arise from it are several.

1. Great works can be completed publicly and privately with the greatest speed. For what would Clodius not do with his laborers, or Crassus the Rich with five hundred workmen? The cause is that they are subject to power: they can be pressed, compelled, and flogged, although in this matter account must be taken of justice and clemency. Nor were cities and great substructures formerly made in any other way than by servile hands. Thus the children of Israel built Pithom and Rameses for Pharaoh, cities of tabernacles. Those who are free come and go at their pleasure, drink, and neglect their work.

2. They accomplish everything at lesser expense. Hired labors are costly, undertake the work more slowly, and live more lavishly. Therefore one who uses slaves gains half the price. He pays them no wages and feeds them more cheaply than free men.

3. In mines, trenches, aqueducts, laying walls, cutting wood, and cultivating fields, even private persons can conveniently accomplish many things through slaves; and it is expedient for the prince to have public slaves, or for there to be certain rich men who hire out the labor of slaves to private persons.

4. Pharaoh teaches us that very many advantages are attained from this, since after so many plagues he still preferred the useful to the honorable: "Why have we released Israel, so that it should not serve us?" With what great savagery do the Turks press on, so that they may carry off Christian captives? Why do we not in turn use their servitude? I always speak of just and mild servitudes. Why should it not be lawful or advantageous for us, when we see the Italians and Spaniards gather riches from slaves?

5. Past ages have taught how many slaves were talented and suited to great arts, to governing the state, in necessity to military service. Manlius, Antiochus, Taberius, Eros, and others were learned. Others were trained in every kind of craft; indeed, they can also be instructed so that they may be useful to their masters and sold at a higher price.

§ 3. The cultivation of all mechanical arts which are necessary or useful. The state will accomplish this if it renders craftsmen honored and confers privileges, and that in imitation of the ancient laws. For thus Constantine to Maximus, Code 10, title 64:

> We command that craftsmen of the arts comprised in the list appended below, residing throughout the individual cities, be free from all public duties, since leisure must be afforded for learning the arts, so that they may desire all the more both to become more skilled themselves and to instruct their sons.

From the Notitia, however, he enumerates them thus: architects, physicians, painters, makers of statues, marble-workers, makers of couches or chests, locksmiths, chariot-makers or stone-squarers, whom they call by the Greek term πῆκτας; masons, that is, builders; wood-carvers, mosaic-workers, gilders, white-metal workers, whom the Greeks call κοιλάτα; silversmiths, embroiderers, openwork craftsmen, braziers, founders, seal-makers, workers in iron, makers of armlets, makers of beams, and levelers; potters, who in Greek are called κεραμεῖς; goldsmiths, glass-workers, plumbers, mirror-makers, ivory-workers, furriers, fullers, wagon-makers, sculptors, plasterers, coiners, makers of three-horse chariots, makers of light carriages, and beaters of leaf, that is, πεταλουργοί.

Constantius and Constans confirm the same immunities under the same title:

> By our pronouncement we summon mechanics, geometers, and architects, who preserve the divisions and sections of all parts and bind those making works to measures and rules, and those who reveal the conduits of waters and the methods discovered by skillful leveling, to an equal zeal for teaching and learning. Accordingly, let them enjoy immunities and receive persons to be taught, those who are capable of teaching.

Aristotle indeed excludes them from the state, but unjustly, since they possess practice and prudence and have the means necessary for life. For today their condition is such that they do not break their bodies by labors but strengthen them, at least those guilds of craftsmen that are most honorable in cities; and this has been instituted according to the standard of the ancients and of the sacred state. For in the Israelite state God himself honored craftsmen, Exodus 31:

> Behold, I have called by name Bezalel, son of Uri, son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah, and I have filled him with the spirit of God, with wisdom, understanding, and knowledge in every work, to devise whatever can be skillfully made from gold, silver, bronze, marble, gems, and different kinds of wood. And I have given him as companion Oholiab, son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan. And in the heart of every learned man I have placed wisdom, so that they may make all things which I have commanded you: the tabernacle of the covenant and the ark of the testimony, and the mercy seat which is over it, and all the vessels of the tabernacle, the table and its vessels, the most pure lampstand with its vessels, and the altars of incense and holocaust, and all their vessels, the laver with its base, the sacred vestments for the ministry of Aaron the priest and his sons, and so forth.

[Printed page 664]

Once this foundation of the arts had been laid, the dignity of craftsmen was always great, as also were their resources. This very time of calamities shows it, for when the Babylonian carried away the princes, the strong men, and the craftsmen with King Jehoiachin, he left only the poor, 2 Kings 24:14:

> And he carried away all Jerusalem, and all the princes, and all the strong men of the army, ten thousand into captivity, and every craftsman and smith; and nothing was left except the poor of the people of the land. He also carried Jehoiachin away to Babylon; and he led the king's mother and the king's wives, his eunuchs, and the judges of the land into captivity from Jerusalem to Babylon. And all the robust men, seven thousand, and craftsmen and smiths, one thousand, all strong men and warriors; the king of Babylon led them captive to Babylon. And he appointed Mattaniah, his uncle, in his place, and imposed upon him the name Zedekiah.

Smiths and craftsmen, therefore, were among the rich and the princes, to such an extent that he is said to have carried away all Jerusalem because he led the principal men into captivity. The Hebrews call a smith המסגר, and the Septuagint συγκλείοντας; some call him a doorkeeper, others a guardian, others one who fastens swords, and others men skilled in laying out a camp. The same things are found in Jeremiah 24:1 and 29:2. But I prefer that a skillful craftsman be called this, one who makes מסגרות, artful joints of buildings, columns, and instruments. Thus some interpret it as a metalworker. Those, however, who call them great or highly esteemed, as Rabbi David in the Book of Roots, although they seem to derive it from סגור, which is refined, pure gold, or from מרוק, which is melted gold, nevertheless take it in the same way; for such men were held at a great price. Therefore Rabbi David also calls them wise men and counselors in his commentary; nor is this remarkable, for God calls Bezalel such. What we see done here, Isaiah had already foretold: that God would "take away the wise man from among the architects," chapter 3, verse 3. Solomon also esteemed these things, 1 Kings 7:14:

> King Solomon also sent and brought Hiram from Tyre, the son of a widowed woman of the tribe of Naphtali, whose father was a Tyrian, a worker in bronze, full of wisdom, understanding, and learning, to make every work of bronze.

The descendants of Othniel, a most noble and brave man, through his son Seraiah and grandson Joab, were craftsmen. For "he was the father of the Valley of Craftsmen, for craftsmen were there," 1 Chronicles 4:14, where the Hebrew has simply היו חרשים כי, and the Septuagint ὅτι τέκτονες ἦσαν, "because craftsmen were there." Craftsmen also build Jerusalem, Isaiah 2:3, 33. Nor were they less esteemed at Rome, for they were both admitted to magistracy and, after the faction of the patricians had been overcome, obtained the right of citizenship, which was the highest right. Romulus distributed the citizens into curiae or brotherhoods; Numa Pompilius, as Plutarch says, in order to remove the hateful distinction of nations, instituted a division of arts and associations and colleges of craftsmen and architects.

Craftsmen bring the greatest supports to the state, for they attract merchants, flee idleness, import riches, and are useful in war.

If their industry is honored, they will flourish much more. For since there are economical methods of conducting affairs which prevail in the arts, they will assist the state with less care and labor.

§ 4. The first thing, therefore, is that the arts be honored; the second, which follows from this, is that certain arts be regarded as so honorable that even the rich and nobles practice them. Plato says that the arts are deserted for two causes: riches and excessive poverty; for the rich dissolve in idleness and luxury, while the poor lack instruments and material.

Nor will arts be lacking, provided the prince wills it. In the East the pastoral life was considered most honorable and royal; agriculture and the planting of groves and vines were held in great esteem. Now equestrian exercise and hunting almost entirely occupy the nobility. Other pursuits, however, can also be added, especially those which are liberal, such as painting, sculpture, architecture, the polishing of muskets, bows, axes, and swords, and everything pertaining to distillations of medicinal waters and the treatment of herbs. For if so many labors are expended upon alchemy with fruitless endeavor, why should they not rather be expended upon useful things with certain outcome? Finally, whatever pertains to the polishing of gems, gold, and silver befits the wealthy. I spoke above about the liberal arts.

As for the poor and those of middling means who cannot live from their annual revenues, I repeat the law which I stated elsewhere: all must be examined as to the art by which they seek their livelihood; no place must be given to idleness. Boys must immediately be applied to lighter crafts, so that no one is idle; vagabonds must be restrained; those, however, who lack not the ability but the will to labor must be compelled to work. If this is done, the number of the poor will be ten times smaller. Some of them, although weak, will nevertheless be able to perform certain sedentary occupations. The rest, who are truly poor, will be maintained by alms without difficulty. And what was formerly said to the Israelite people will be capable of observance: “There shall be no beggar among you.” Work, however, will never be lacking if the prince cultivates fields and establishes newly broken lands. The things that are done teach what can be done. The Belgians engage in wool-working and weave woolen and linen cloths and tapestries, with which they clothe Germany, Gaul, Spain, Africa, Asia, and both Indies. Why do the princes of Germany not imitate both this and other things? From here they buy up wool, carry it away, and bring it back, and double the expenses of customs and carriage. This, finally, is a great disadvantage in a state: because things made by art are bought from foreigners, everything is sold at a higher price and the city is drained.

Next, an abundance of craftsmen easily devises marvelous things, such as Curio's invention when he made a suspended theater. Pliny, Book Thirty-six, chapter 15:

> He made two very spacious theaters next to one another out of wood, each suspended upon the revolving balance of hinges. In both of them, after a spectacle of games had been exhibited before midday while they were turned away from one another, lest their stages disturb each other, they were suddenly revolved so that they stood opposite; afterward, while the panels were now descending and the corners were coming together, he made an amphitheater and exhibited spectacles of gladiators, carrying around the Roman people itself, bound by a still greater gladiatorial contract. For what should one first marvel at in this affair: the inventor or the invention? The craftsman or the author? That anyone dared to devise this, or to undertake it? To obey, or to command? Above everything will be the madness of the people: that they dared to sit upon so untrustworthy and unstable a seat. Behold, here is that conqueror of lands and master of the whole world, who distributes nations and kingdoms, sends laws to foreign peoples, a certain portion of the immortal gods for the human race, hanging upon a machine and applauding at his own danger. What worthlessness of lives is this! Or what complaint about Cannae! How great a calamity could have occurred!

Lead these men into camps if a town must be defended by machines: what will they not accomplish? Let their talents exert themselves upon useful things.

[Printed page 665]

Contempt for the mechanical arts arose from the pride of the Greek philosophers and orators. And now also they are regarded by many as contemptible and sordid, although they were the first occupations of the human race after agriculture. The industry of the Indians pleases me more. They permitted individuals to practice individual arts, but permitted several to philosophers in honor of wisdom. From this we gather that Indian philosophy was not a follower of idle subtleties, but wisdom taking counsel for common and civil life.

§ 5. The method of collecting money in necessity which Sabellicus, Books Six and Seven, says the Venetians followed was also honorable and useful. For they publicly proclaimed that from those who had assisted the state with money, thirty would be chosen into the number of senators and that this dignity, once ratified, would remain for their descendants; to the rest, when the war was ended, five thousand coins apiece would be distributed each year. The wealthy gave in competition, and the treasury increased through rivalry. This was done prudently by the state, and there is no public rivalry between the old and new families. Why should kings not imitate it? Certainly the king of Spain, a few years ago, while ennobling some of the richest Italians, obtained great subsidies for wars. The honor of nobility, however, must be conferred upon men of resources, ability, and industry, lest, if they fall back into want, they be a reproach to the order. No injury is inflicted here upon the state or upon private persons. But if it is objected that nobility ought to be a matter only of virtue, the reply is easy: those who assist their country with money are not inferior to others who boast of smoke-darkened ancestral images; for account is taken not of money alone but also of virtue. We learn that those men are of great spirit even from this: that they value great sums of money less than a moderate honor. I would recommend this to those princes to whom the nobility is subject and where it also conducts commerce. But if the old nobility becomes cheapened by the multitude of new men, that is a lesser evil, since it can recover dignity through virtue. This was also done in Gaul, and men purchased immunity with a great sum. It was also done formerly, when the right of Roman citizenship was given or sold to entire nations: an immense increase for so great an empire. Acts 22:28: ἐγὼ πολλῷ κεφαλαίῳ ταύτην τὴν πολιτείαν ἐκτησάμην. “I obtained that citizenship with a great sum.” If many thousands were given citizenship, but for a great sum, there is no doubt how much money many thousands of great sums made. Thus the prince will also be able, for some moderate sum of money, to grant the right of citizenship and other things which are honorable, yet do not prejudice the advantages or liberty of others.

Not unlike this is what the Byzantines did in necessity. For since there was a law that no one should enjoy the right of citizenship unless born of two citizen parents, they proclaimed that if anyone contributed thirty pounds to the state, although born of only one citizen parent, he would be regarded as a citizen with the same right as the man who possessed citizenship upon the best terms.

§ 6. Tamerlane's device was one of barbarous cunning. He sent merchants with costly furs into a city which he intended to besiege, and commanded them to sell them at an easy price so that they would be bought; then, when he had occupied the city, he recovered the furs, which could not conveniently be concealed. An honorable method: for thus he maintained his army from the enemy's money and afterward recovered the merchandise to be sold to others. Thus Hayton the Armenian.

§ 7. Edward IV, king of Britain, asked his friends voluntarily to contribute money to him for military expenses, saying that he would measure his goodwill from the deed of each; wherefore the contribution itself was named “benevolence.” Henry VII imitated the same thing. Polydore, Books 26 and 27. If great necessity presses, it is a proper method; but care must be taken that he in turn benefits them. Otherwise nothing is harsher than the prince's private entreaties among friends; for if they refuse or give sparingly, they think ruin has been prepared for them. If anyone either is unwilling or unable to give, he becomes the prince's enemy because the prince judges that he has been gravely offended by him.

§ 8. Antoninus the Philosopher, in order to obtain money, publicly sold all his vessels of gold, silver, murrine, and crystal, his gems--in a word, all his household furnishing--and his wife's ornaments, so that he might raise money. Not unlike this was the act of the Ephesians, who, as Aristotle relates in Economics 2, when they were in need of money, enacted by law that women should not wear gold, and then that they should lend it to the city. Some consider these things sordid; I judge it magnificent, for to despise external adornment is royal. Then the subjects are spared, and the spirits of the nobles and powerful are inflamed to assist the state. For who will drink from a rich jeweled vessel if he sees the prince's earthenware furnishing?

The matter turned out less in accordance with expectation for the Venetians when they wished to extort money from the citizens. For they proclaimed that whatever wrought gold or silver there was should be carried to the two commissioners so that coins might be struck; that those who brought it would receive the profits of a tenth part; and that the goods of those who did not bring it would be sold. But when they delayed, they were compelled by the seizure of pledges and by prisons. This was done in the war against Julius II. Bembo, Books Seven and Ten of the History of Venice. This indeed would have been less harsh if there was good faith, for a great profit was promised, and they could not refuse the state if it could furnish sufficient security. But they, cursing the war and the causes of the war and holding the Senate's good faith suspect, clung to their property. Nevertheless, the prince can use this method and must not be reckoned among the hateful if provision is made concerning the principal and the profit. For it does not befit anyone to be so pleased with himself that, while the prince is in danger, he wishes to drink only from gold, especially when it is lawful to expect profit from the benefit.

CHAPTER XVI

Methods of Collecting Money Recounted by Aristotle in Book Two of the Economics, and Other Similar Methods

§ 1. Aristotle judges it worthwhile to know how the ancients raised money. I have determined to pursue his narrative in the order in which it is presented by him. Some methods must be condemned; some, but few, are worthy of praise; necessity renders several just.

When Cypselus of Corinth had made a vow to Jupiter that, if he gained possession of that city, he would dedicate all the resources of the Corinthians, he ordered a census to be recorded. When they had declared their property, he took away from each a tenth part of his goods, and ordered them to trade and acquire property with the remainder. When the year had turned, he did the same. It therefore happened that in ten years he himself possessed all the goods of the Corinthians and dedicated them, while the Corinthians in the meantime sought and acquired others.

[Printed page 666]

A wicked man's vow ought not to have been fulfilled; yet it was fitting that it should be carried out humanely. Julius acted similarly when, after swearing that he would crucify the pirates, he first killed them.

§ 2. Lygdamis of Naxos, after driving certain men into exile, when no one wished to buy their property except at a very low price, sold it to the exiles themselves. He also sold, both to the exiles and to others, those things which lay in workshops, not entirely finished, so that they might be consecrated as gifts to the gods, permitting the purchaser's name to be inscribed upon each.

The reason why men wished to buy at a low price was that possession assigned by a tyranny appeared uncertain and hateful to the common people. The exiles preferred to redeem it at a moderate price rather than lose everything. If he expelled them justly, he was not unjust in the sale; the sale also brought it about that the exiles were set against one another, while one bought another's goods.

§ 3. The Byzantines, in want of money, sold public groves and sacred places: productive ones for a fixed time, but unproductive ones as perpetual property. Likewise they sold both the things which associations possessed and those which belonged to ancestral rites, including those situated in private fields. For these were bought at a high price by the men who possessed the remainder. They gave the associations other public properties which were around the gymnasium, forum, or harbor, and also market places where something was sold. In addition, they sold the sea saltworks and the trade in salt. Likewise they ordered sleight-of-hand performers, diviners, sellers of drugs, and others of this kind, wherever they made profit, to pay a third part of their profit. They then leased out only one counter for exchanging money. It was not lawful to buy anything from one person or sell anything to another with any other coin. If anyone did so, he was fined that money. Since there was a law among them that one who had not been born of two citizen parents was not to be regarded as a citizen, when they needed money they enacted that one born of only one citizen parent should be regarded as a citizen if he paid twelve thousand coins. During a scarcity of grain, when they suffered from want of money, they brought ships down from the Pontus. When the merchants bore this with resentment, they paid them interest of a tenth. Those who then bought from them exacted that tenth from them beyond the price itself. When certain inhabitants had placed money at interest upon security of goods, and there was no source from which those loans could be repaid, they enacted that whoever contributed a third part of the debt or loan as tribute should retain those goods as his own.

Many things in these χρηματιστείαις of the Byzantines are worthy of note, and some perhaps of imitation in necessity. First, they sold τὰ τεμένη, that is, all places consecrated to the gods, such as groves, open areas, temples, and chapels.

Second, they sold productive places, such as groves and fields, for a fixed time; unproductive ones, such as open areas and chapels, in perpetuity. Otherwise they would not have found a purchaser; for who would buy unproductive properties, only to render them productive and surrender them again? Third, they sold τὰ θιασωτικὰ, that is, places which belonged to sacred assemblies or associations; for those who entered an association for the sake of religion, such as Bacchic and Eleusinian initiates, are called θιασῶται, and θιασωτικά are the things which belong to them, especially houses and banqueting places. The rites were either πατριωτικὰ, ancestral, or, as some read, φρατριωτικά, rites of a brotherhood; and then τὰ ἐν τοῖς ἰδιωτικοῖς, those situated in private fields. Pollux in Book Six calls the houses themselves φωλητήρια, caves and dens in which they drank deeply. There were many things of this kind in private gardens and fields which nevertheless belonged to the associations, not to the men in whose possessions they were found. Therefore the owners bought them at a high price so that they might have their fields free. Fourth, they gave the associations other things which were not productive publicly. Fifth, they sold the saltworks. Sixth, when there was need of exchanging money, they appointed only one man to do so at a fixed price, namely to pay out coin at a high price and receive it at a low price. This was manifestly unjust, especially since they could not use another coin. It was therefore easy to exchange gold pieces for a single denarius. The law concerning interest was no less unjust. All these measures took their beginning from the bad administration of the state.

§ 4. Hippias of Athens sold upper projections of houses extending into the public roads, likewise stair-steps, fortified vestibules, and doors which turned outward when opened. The owners of the properties therefore bought these things, and thus a plentiful sum of money was collected.

These things could have been done lawfully if the projections and steps were contrary to law; for since they occupied public space, and it was contrary to law for private buildings to make roads more obstructed, the state could lawfully have claimed them for itself. The cunning of Hippias was conspicuous in this: that he punished a concealed transgression of law under the supreme pretext of justice; for the owners of the houses were compelled to redeem these things at a high price unless they wished, by alteration and deformation of the whole building, to incur greater expenses. What Aristotle calls καὶ θύρας τὰς ἀνοιγομένας ἔξω--doors which open outward--was also forbidden formerly among the Romans. This was not readily granted to anyone, not even to triumphal houses, except those whose triumph had been attended by exceptional glory. Pliny, Book Thirty-six, chapter 35:

> The thought arises, however, what portion of these were those sites upon which they decreed that houses should be built publicly for unconquered commanders. Their highest honor, as in the case of Lucius Valerius Publicola, who was the first consul with Lucius Brutus after so many merits, and his brother, who twice defeated the Sabines in the same magistracy, was that it was added to the decree that the doors of their houses should open outward and the doorway should be thrown back into public space. This was the most illustrious distinction even among triumphal houses.

Hippias acted dangerously and hatefully, however, for this appeared to belong to a malicious and crafty tyranny. He sold προφράγματα, or, as another reading has it, περιφράγματα--although I prefer προτεράσματα, for these are places before a stage or an enclosure, and in this place defenses of houses and enclosures extending into public space--which, unless they were redeemed, as I said, would have required the houses to be entirely destroyed.

§ 5. He ordered the coin then in use at Athens to be declared invalid, and commanded that all money be brought to him at an established price. When those who wished to mint with another device had assembled, he leased the same silver back to them.

Here there was pure fraud and deception by the tyrant, so that he might gather money by fraud and then approve anew what he had previously rejected. Even now many frauds are practiced in minting and reminting money, but generally under some pretext of justice.

§ 6. Furthermore, from those who were obliged to furnish the expenses of a trireme or a tribe, or the games, or to make expenditure upon another public service of this kind, he ordered that, upon establishment of a moderate sum, whoever wished to pay it should be enrolled among those who had discharged their office.

This was badly established concerning triremes and necessary things, but orderly and rightly concerning games, banquets, and other things. For if a thousand drachmas were to be spent upon games, it was better that six hundred should be given to the public and the games omitted. Here is a great opportunity for imitation, so that our princes may turn all expenditures made upon empty displays toward true and useful things. Nor did the man act foolishly, although avariciously, who, when crowns, statues, and empty honors were being considered, showed his hollow hand and wished them to be placed in it.

[Printed page 667]

§ 7. He also commanded that two sextarii of barley, the same amount of wheat, and one obol--that is, two asses--be brought to the priestess, ἱερεία, of Minerva who was consecrated on the citadel, for each dead person, and the same amount from those who had been increased by offspring.

The translator renders χοίνικας as two sextarii; more correctly, our Villalpandus, in his apparatus on Ezekiel, shows from Fannius that χοίνικα contains four sextarii:

> This measure, taken four times, is called a choenix in Greek.

He judges, however, that five pounds of bread are contained in it.

In a populous city this produces a great contribution, but one that is tyrannical and sordid: to assess the dead and those being born. Yet it is not unlike the Roman poll tax, which brought it about that many did not rejoice that sons were born to them, as certain cities have also done.

§ 8. When the Athenians at Potidaea needed money for war, they ordered everyone to declare the valuation of his property, not all together in his tribe, but so that each possession should be declared in whatever place it was situated, so that the poor might submit an assessment. If anyone possessed absolutely nothing, the valuation of his person was two minae. From this, therefore, the tribute exacted from each was contributed in full. Nothing unjust was done in this matter; precaution was taken against the fraud of those who did not make a true declaration.

§ 9. A citizen of Antissa, when his city was oppressed by want of money and they had a custom of celebrating the Dionysia or Bacchanalia splendidly--upon which they made great expenditures from the provision of the entire year, on other things and on costly victims--and that feast day was then at hand, persuaded them to make a vow that they would render double things to Liber in the following year and to sell all the things which they had prepared together. Thus no small amount of money was collected for their present use. He acted rightly; and what was promised to an idol can also be done in the cause of God, for in a public necessity the ornaments of temples can be torn away and sold; those of idols ought to be. Saint Maternus admonishes the emperors to convert the ornaments of all temples consecrated to demons to the use of the state.

§ 10. When the arrival of many triremes was expected, and six modii of barley-meal sold for four denarii, the Lampsacenes ordered the men trading in the market to sell those six modii for six denarii. To a congius of oil which sold for four denarii, they ordered three obols, or six asses, to be added. They ordered the same to be done with wine and other things. Private persons therefore received the former price; the city, retaining what exceeded it, thus obtained an abundance of money.

This was an immense and inimitable tax, for they received a third part of all things offered for sale. Although they did not bring ruin upon the sellers, they nevertheless increased the losses of the citizens and of those who were in the triremes.

§ 11. When the Heracleots sent forty ships against the tyrants in the Bosporus and did not abound in money, they bought up from the merchants all the grain, oil, wine, and other goods offered for sale. A time was appointed at which the price would be paid; and since it was advantageous for the merchants not to have their wares distributed by the hemina, but to have them sold all together, the Heracleots themselves, since they would pay when opportunity permitted, carried not pay but merchandise in cargo ships, and placed one quaestor in charge of each ship. When they had now arrived in the enemy's land, the soldiers bought everything from them. Money was collected, and the commanders gave the pay. Thus it happened that the same money was given repeatedly until they returned home.

That commerce was just if they paid the merchants at the appointed time. From the trade they maintained the army until they could dissolve it altogether. For the state did what was difficult for the merchants, namely κολλυβίζειν, that is, to sell by retail.

§ 12. When the Samians asked the Lacedaemonians to contribute money to them for the recovery of their country, they decreed that on one day both masters and household, and the beasts of burden, should fast, and that each should contribute to the Samians as much as he would have spent if they had not fasted.

This was a small but just subsidy, by which they showed that the state can easily be defended if each person is prepared to assist. Nor do I doubt that, if a thousandth part of the things which perish through luxury were expended upon the Turkish war, the Pannonias, together with Greece and Thrace, could be recovered in two years.

§ 13. When the number of foreign soldiers among the Carthaginians increased and they had no source from which to pay the wages owed them, a proclamation was made that, if any citizen or inhabitant had a right to seize either the city or any private person, and wished to make a seizure, he should declare it. Since very many made declarations, they thus seized ships sailing into the Pontus, putting forward some plausible cause and appointing a fixed time at which they affirmed that they would plead the cases. When a great abundance of money had then arisen, they dismissed those soldiers and adjudicated concerning the seizure. The city made satisfaction from its revenues to those upon whom injury had been inflicted by the seizure.

It was a Libyan deed and Punic fraud, which can nevertheless be excused by necessity. First, the foreign mercenary soldiers were numerous and, unless they received their pay, would have plundered the city and even the harbor. Second, they seized the ships and ἐσύλων, plundered them, as the Greek has it, not in the manner of brigands, but with witnesses brought in and a written record of how much each man had taken--indeed, with it deposited with the state. Third, judges or recoverers were then appointed; and to those from whom property had been unjustly taken it was restored gradually from the revenues of the treasury, namely by giving a loan for the present.

§ 14. When sedition arose among the Cyzicenes and the plebs was victorious, and the rich had been oppressed and captured, because money was owed to the soldiers they decreed that the captives should not be killed, but that after money had been exacted they should go into exile.

Here also mercy intervened, if the city could justly have killed the rich.

§ 15. Since there was a law among the Chians that debts should be registered publicly, when they needed money they enacted that the debtors themselves should pay their loans to the city, while the city should pay the creditors interest from the revenues until the amount paid equaled the principal. Injury was inflicted upon the debtors because they were compelled to pay at their own loss. The moneylenders were deservedly punished in this way, for it would have been lawful to take away the principal itself.

§ 16. Mausolus, tyrant of Caria, when the king of Persia requested through ambassadors that he pay tribute, summoned the wealthiest men in that land and showed them that the king was requesting tribute, but that he himself by no means abounded in money. Certain men who had been suborned then immediately promised that they would contribute and stated the sum. When this had been done, the wealthier men, partly from shame and partly from fear, both promised and contributed more.

There was nothing unjust here, if tribute was truly being exacted, if the matter was not conducted by armed entreaties, and, finally, if Mausolus was not able to pay.

§ 17. Again needing money, he summoned the Mylassans and showed them in a speech that their city, the chief city of the kingdom and the one from which he himself had arisen, was not enclosed by walls, while the king of Persia was bringing an army against it. He therefore ordered the Mylassans to contribute as much money as each could, affirming strongly that by means of the things which they contributed then, they would preserve the rest of their resources. When great resources had been contributed, he himself retained the money, but declared that the god did not wish the walls to be constructed at that time. Now he openly plays the impostor and brings it about that no one will thereafter believe anything from him, even when he is placed in true dangers.

§ 18. Condalus, the prefect of Mausolus, if anyone brought him a gift of a pig or calf when he was making a journey through his province, ordered that the name of the giver and the day be recorded and that the animal be led to his house and fed until he returned. When a sufficiently long time seemed to have passed, he demanded back what the other man had fed, with an account of its produce also calculated. A slave like his master. Τὴν ἐπικαρπίαν λογιζόμενος: that is, calculating the produce--if a sheep had given birth, if it had been shorn, he exacted all these things. But the man played the impostor and stage-player, as is clear from what follows.

§ 19. Likewise he sold the fruit of trees overhanging or falling into the royal roads. If any soldiers had died, he also sold for a denarius the opportunity to carry the body outside the gate. From this he at once received silver and was not deceived by the commanders' report of the time at which any soldier had died. That man would gather coins from the lower regions themselves and from Pluto.

§ 20. What he judged concerning the Lycians is witty: that they could be milked of their coins by a jest. Aristotle relates the matter thus. Seeing that the Lycians delighted in wearing long hair, he said that royal letters had been brought in which it was commanded that their hair be brought to the locks. He therefore said that he had commands from Mausolus that they be shorn. He promised that, if they wished to contribute a fixed sum per head, he would take care that hair was brought from Greece. They gladly furnished what he demanded, and a plentiful sum of money was collected from a great multitude.

The translator renders τριχοκομίαν or τριχοτροφίαν, “locks,” which has either no meaning or an obscure one. Aristotle says in Greek that they wore Τρίχωμα, that is, that they were long-haired; then that Condalus said that it was necessary ὑποστείλαι εἰς ἀκροκόμια, or προκόμια. What κόμας ὑποστείλαι εἰς τὰ προκόμια means--whether it is to let the hair down to the forelocks, or where it was to be sent--is not very difficult to conjecture, since he says that they ought τὸ κείρασθαι, to be shorn. The cut hair was therefore sent to προκόμια, or perhaps προκομεῖα, places where it was dedicated; for no one is ignorant that there was enormous superstition in this matter. In place of their hair he promises to bring from Greece artificial locks in exchange for the Lycians' hair. Their hair, therefore, was to be sent somewhere; but where would it be sent except to certain places where it was customarily consecrated to the gods?

§ 21. Aristotle of Rhodes also acted wickedly. Aristotle relates the following about him. Aristotle of Rhodes, holding authority at Phocaea, when in want of money and seeing that there were two factions of the Phocaeans, secretly spoke to one of them, indicating that the others were offering him money so that he would incline affairs toward them, but that he preferred to receive it from themselves and to deliver the administration of the city to them. Upon hearing these things, they immediately gave him as much money as he had ordered. But he in turn showed the other faction what he had received from the first. These men gave no less. Having thus received money from both parties, he reconciled favor between them.

Not a few imitate this, and a Roman arbiter also did it formerly.

§ 22. When the same Rhodian observed that there were many controversies among the citizens, and great injuries in them because of the war, he established a court and proclaimed that, if any had not proceeded at law within the prescribed time, judgments concerning their earlier charges would no longer be granted them. Then, drawing to himself the collection and appeals in a great many causes and disputes, after many terms had been proposed, and receiving something from both parties through different persons, he amassed no small amount of money. Another fraud, and one also too customary. For why is the matter conducted with such vehemence that cases are drawn to specified tribunals, unless because advantages also are drawn there?

§ 23. When the Clazomenians lacked money during a scarcity of grain, they decreed that those who possessed oil should lend it to the state at interest. This produce was plentiful in their region. When the oil had thus been lent, they hired ships and arranged that it be carried to places where markets were held, from which grain came to them, the price of the oil having been given as security. That commerce--the exchange of oil for grain--was lawful; but it was unjust that they commanded those who possessed oil to make a loan to the state.

§ 24. Their other device was much more ingenious. When, Aristotle says, they owed the soldiers forty and eighty sesterces in the name of pay and could not discharge it, each year they paid the commanders ninety-six sesterces in interest. But because by this agreement nothing was deducted from the principal and they themselves continued to make expenditure in vain, they struck iron coin to the value of silver, in the amount of 480 sesterces. They then gave this money to the wealthiest men in the city, in the proportion suitable to each, and received the same amount of silver from them. Private persons therefore had what they might spend upon daily uses, and the city was freed from debt. Then from the revenues they both paid them interest and, always dividing it, distributed it to each according to his share, and received the iron coins back. Aristotle says that they owed twenty talents but paid φόρον τέτταρα τάλαντα, four talents as interest. The citizens could trade with the iron money no less than with silver, since it had force by command of the magistrate, while the Senate exchanged the coins themselves for silver until it received all of them within the fifth year.

Many in necessity have followed this method. Enicus Lupides did so, as Tolosanus relates from Nebrissensis, Book Three, chapter 6, number 26. Thus Enicus Lupides, count of Tendilla, a distinguished commander placed in charge of the city of Alhama in the war of Granada, in extreme desperation concerning money, while awaiting money from King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella, made little notes from cardboard with his own hand and marked them with his signature, calling some gold pieces, others silver coins, bronze asses, halves, thirds, and quarters. Purchases and commerce were conducted among them with these, after he had promised that he would give true money for those fictitious pieces after its receipt.

At number 27, Sabellus relates that Domenico Michiel, doge of the Venetians, did the same when he was far from home, besieging Tyre with a fleet in the Asiatic expedition. Since because of a lack of money pay could not be rendered to the rowers and naval allies, he marked leather money with the public stamp; distinguishing it by fixed symbols as gold and silver, he paid it as wages to the naval companies, promising that soon at home gold and silver coins would be presented in equal number to the possessors in exchange for the leather ones. This also was done.

[Printed page 669]

Since this form of money is held valid not by the value of the metal but by valuation alone, which arises from the faith placed in the one establishing it, it must not be used if everything is in doubt; for in that case it introduces despair, much less if no faith is placed in him, for men think themselves mocked. Accordingly, if Mausolus or Condalus should strike coins from leather or lead, no one would accept them. For that money is not properly money but rather a token that true money is to be given, or a promissory note, which we value at nothing if it is given either by an impostor or by a needy man.

§ 25. When the Selymbrians were in want of money, and there was a law that grain should not be exported in time of famine, while old grain remained to them, they decreed that private persons should deliver their grain to the state at an established price, so that each retained sustenance for himself for one year. Afterward they granted to anyone who wished the power of exporting at an established price, which appeared equitable.

There was already famine. Therefore, since it was not lawful to export it, they appeared with a certain right to be able to demand that what remained beyond necessity be sold to the state. The state itself then exported it and sold it at a higher price, which was unjust, for it received the property of private persons, traded with it, and took from them the opportunity of making profit.

§ 26. Because the land of the Abydenes was uncultivated through sedition, and the inhabitants spent nothing further upon it because other debts were still owed, they decreed that whoever lent money to farmers so that they might perform work in the country should receive the fruits produced first, and the others only those which remained.

The zeal for agriculture is praiseworthy, in which those who furnish expenditure to the cultivators are preferred to the owners.

§ 27. When the Ephesians needed money, they enacted a law that women should not be permitted to wear gold, and that whatever gold they had at that time they should entrust to the city. After also establishing a sum of silver which was to be paid, they permitted the name of the man who had paid that silver to be inscribed upon the columns of the temple as though he had consecrated the column.

This was equitable, for they ought to lend to their country rather than, by loving their ornaments excessively, lose both their country and the ornaments themselves. The provision concerning inscription of the name upon the columns was certainly prudent, for by it defense of the country was obtained without injury to anyone--unless perhaps the names of others had already been inscribed.

§ 28. Dionysius possessed various arts of defrauding and gathering money; Aristotle recounts them. Dionysius of Syracuse, wishing to heap up money, summoned an assembly and said that Ceres had appeared to him and commanded that women's ornaments be brought to her shrine, and that he himself had done this with the ornaments of his own women. He therefore demanded that the same be done by others also, lest the goddess be angered. He pronounced that whoever did not do it would be guilty of sacrilege. When all had brought the things they possessed, both out of regard for the goddess and for him, after the sacred rite had been performed he took away the ornaments as though they had been lent by the goddess herself.

This was a foul deception unworthy of a king, abusing the superstition of wretched women for profit.

§ 29. But the device that follows for chastising female φιλοκαλίαν, love of adornment, was not incapable of imitation, provided superstition were absent. “When some time had passed,” says Aristotle, “and the women again wore ornaments, he proclaimed that the woman who wished to wear gold should dedicate in the temple something of equal value.”

§ 30. When he was about to build triremes, he knew that he would need money. He therefore summoned an assembly and said that a certain city was being betrayed and that he needed money for that affair. He demanded that the individual citizens contribute two gold pieces. They contributed this money. After an interval of two or three days, as though the affair had been frustrated, he praised the citizens and returned to each what he had contributed. By doing this he reconciled their goodwill to himself. Afterward, in the same hope that they would receive it back, they contributed again. Dionysius, however, retained what he then received for building the triremes.

Thus they build up trust in small things so that they may deceive in great ones.

§ 31. When he did not abound in silver, he struck a coin from tin and, summoning an assembly, commended that coin in an abundant speech. The Syracusans, although unwilling, approved it by their decree, and each preferred to regard himself as possessing silver, not tin.

Since neither he himself nor others afterward accepted the tin coins, private persons necessarily suffered this loss contrary to right. For it was just as if he had exchanged χρύσεα χαλκείων ἑκατόμβια ἑπταβοείων: gold for bronze, things worth a hundred oxen for things worth seven.

§ 32. This also belonged to a crafty defrauder mocking his citizens. Again, when in want of money, he asked the citizens to contribute to him. When they denied that they possessed any, he brought out his own utensils and offered them for sale, as though he were doing this through want. When the Syracusans bought these things, what each had bought was recorded. But when the price had been paid, he ordered each man to carry back to him the utensil which he had bought.

§ 33. This too was tyrannical. Because of frequent tributes the Syracusans had ceased to raise livestock. Then Dionysius affirmed that enough had been contributed to him for that use, and that those who thereafter acquired livestock would be exempt. But when many had acquired many animals in hope of immunity, he seized the opportunity, ordered an assessment of what each possessed, and imposed a tribute or payment. Then the Syracusans, resentful that they had been deceived, began to slaughter and sell their livestock. When Dionysius had by edict fixed the number of animals to be slaughtered each day, they claimed when slaughtering them that they were sacrificing. Then Dionysius prohibited the killing of a female animal.

§ 34. This, however, was cruel, although it found imitators. Again, when in want of money, he ordered a declaration to be registered with him of the property of every household whose children were bereft of parents. Once this had been done, he himself used the money until each came under his own guardianship.

§ 35. There is also what he did at Rhegium. After occupying Rhegium, he summoned an assembly and said that he could lawfully plunder their city, but that he wished to release them if only he recovered the expenses made upon that war and three minae for each person. Then the Rhegians brought into view whatever they had concealed. Even the needy borrowed money from wealthier persons and foreigners, and thus they paid that sum. But after Dionysius had received it, he nevertheless both sold them all under the auctioneer's spear and took away all the household furnishing which they had brought out from concealment.

Here he was a thief and breaker of treaties. But nothing is sacred to avarice.

§ 36. He had borrowed money from the citizens which he was to repay. When they demanded it back, he ordered each to bring him as much silver as he possessed, under penalty of death if they did not do so. When the silver had been brought, he struck coin in such a way that one denarius was valued at two, and with it paid both what he owed and what they had brought to him.

§ 37. When he had sailed with one hundred ships into Tyrrhenia, he took from the shrine of Leucothea a very great quantity of gold and silver and no small quantity of other ornaments.

[Printed page 670]

But because it did not escape him that the sailors also possessed much, he ordered a proclamation to be made that half of what each had taken should be brought to him, and that the man who had taken it could retain the other half. He proposed the penalty of death for anyone who did not bring it. The sailors, judging that if they brought half they would safely retain the rest, brought it. But when Dionysius had received these things, he ordered them again to bring half of what remained.

Thus did that tyrant use not only power but falsehood and frauds to milk men of money.

§ 38. The Mendaeans used the proceeds rendered by the harbor and other taxes for the administration of the city. But they did not exact what was received from land and buildings, and recorded only the names of the occupiers. Whenever the city needed money, these men paid what was owed. They therefore made profit from the past time, having used that money without interest.

That method was most just, for those who occupied the buildings could use the money and thus become rich. If money was not needed for a period of twenty years, they paid nothing; and even then they paid not as much as they owed, but as much as the city needed. Nor did the state suffer loss from this, for they leased those properties at a price higher by as much as they saw that they could profit from the proceeds not paid. Nevertheless, lest they become bankrupt, everything was recorded each year.

§ 39. When the same people needed money in a war against the Olynthians and abounded in a great number of slaves, they decreed that each should retain only two, a male and a female, and sell all the rest, so that private persons might possess money which they could lend to the city.

Without doubt a great sum of money was collected from the numerous and costly slaves. Yet the cause of the edict was that, while the Mendaeans were occupied with war, the multitude of slaves should not be dangerous and occupy the city after expelling their masters, as they had done elsewhere and attempted elsewhere; and then that resources might remain for sustaining the burdens of war.

§ 40. Callistratus, when the customs duty in Macedonia generally sold for 280 sesterces, brought it about that twice as much was received. For when he observed that the wealthier men always bought it because sureties were required, and that sureties worth a talent had to be appointed for those 280, he proclaimed through a herald that whoever wished was given power to buy it and to appoint sureties for a third part and for whatever sum anyone could show that he possessed.

I judge that a prince should frequently employ this method, so that properties are leased in various ways; for in truth men are often persuaded that a thing is of less advantage although it can bring an immense sum.

§ 41. Timotheus of Athens, waging war against the Olynthians, when in want of money, struck a bronze coin and distributed it to the soldiers. When they bore this with resentment, he showed that all things offered for sale by merchants and in the marketplace would be sold to them for the same coin. He showed the merchants, however, that with the bronze coins they received they must in turn buy things offered for sale in that region and booty that had been taken. If any bronze remained, they were to bring it to him and receive silver for it.

We have seen the same practices of creating money above. Here only the difficulty arising from it is removed. From this it is clear that the method has no force unless the money is accepted and there is hope that it can be redeemed.

§ 42. But when he was waging war at Corcyra, suffering from want, while the soldiers demanded pay, refused his command, and threatened that they would pass over to the enemy, he summoned their assembly and said that storms had prevented silver from being carried to him. For he abounded in such plenty that he wished to give them as a gift three months' pay now, before its time. The soldiers, judging that he would by no means have undertaken so great a loss unless he truly expected the money to reach him, thus acquiesced concerning their pay until Timotheus completed the things which he wished to accomplish.

Aristotle does not explain whether he gave it afterward. Certainly the soldiers believed him, and it was dangerous not to give. A man who refuses just things to one bearing arms gives him everything.

§ 43. His method during the siege of Samos was excellent. When he was besieging Samos, he sold the crops and whatever was in the fields to the Samians themselves, whence an abundance of money was available for paying the soldiers' wages. But afterward, when many persons came and money for necessities began to circulate in the camp, by edict he forbade the sale of grain or flour in a measure smaller than six modii, and of all liquids in a measure smaller than ten congii. The centurions, therefore, and those who led companies, buying all things in quantity, distributed them to their soldiers. Those arriving brought their own sustenance with them, and when departing sold whatever remained, so that the soldiers now abounded in a plentiful supply of food.

The first point worthy of praise is that, since he could not conquer them by famine, he voluntarily sold them crops which they bought dearly from fear of scarcity, since the field lay uncultivated because of the war. This is an example for illustrious commanders: things captured from enemies which cannot be of use to themselves can be sold back even to the enemies so that pay may be obtained for the soldier. Then, since those who came to the camp wished to procure provisions for only one or two days and could not buy small amounts, they brought them with them, and somewhat more than they needed; when departing they gave the remainder away or sold it cheaply in the camp. Yet merchants and retailers were not thereby turned away from the camp, since they sold many things together without κολλυβισμῷ, minute division.

§ 44. The Persian Didales could furnish daily sustenance to the soldiers whom he had from the enemy's land, but he did not possess money to pay them. When the day of payment arrived, he devised the following. Summoning an assembly of the soldiers, he said that he was not destitute of money, but possessed money in a certain place, which he also indicated. Breaking camp, he proceeded there. Then, when he approached that region, he advanced into the place itself and took from the shrines there whatever silver vessels he found. Soon he loaded the mules and made the journey as though they carried nothing but silver, while those vessels that projected could be seen. Observing this, the soldiers, judging that whatever the mules carried was all silver, were of good courage, as though about to receive their pay. But he said that they had to reach Amisus and that the silver had to be coined there. The road to Amisus was several days long and difficult because of the cold. During that entire time, therefore, he made use of the army while furnishing nothing except sustenance. Likewise he kept with him in the camp all craftsmen, innkeepers, and exchangers, nor was anyone else permitted to practice any of these occupations.

A stratagem not unworthy of a great commander, provided that he afterward discharged the debt in good faith from the royal treasury.

§ 45. Chabrias of Athens taught Taos, king of the Egyptians, various methods of raising money. Aristotle recounts them thus. When King Taos of the Egyptians was leading out an army and lacked money, Chabrias advised him to show the priests of both sexes that, because of the expenses of the war, it was necessary for him to reduce their number. Upon hearing this, both those priests and each person wishing the administration of the rites to remain his own gave money individually to the king. When he had received it, Chabrias advised the king to order in addition that the priests should thereafter spend only a tenth part of the expenses which they had hitherto made upon the rites and themselves, and lend him the remainder until the war against the king of the Persians was ended. He also advised him to impose a fixed sum upon each settlement as tribute, and likewise upon individual persons. As to grain brought to market, two asses beyond the price were to be exacted from both buyer and seller for each artaba; and upon ships, workshops, and every other business in which profit was made, a tenth part of that profit. When the king was now about to lead the forces outside the land, he advised him to command that each person bring to him whatever uncoined silver or gold he possessed. When it had been brought, he likewise advised the king to use it and to commend those who had lent it to the naval commanders, who would discharge the debts from the tributes.

[Printed page 671]

§ 46. Iphicrates of Athens gave Cotys better advice: that he should command all subject to his dominion that each should recognize a portion of his own land exempted for the king, sufficient for eighteen modii. When this had been done, a great abundance of grain was collected. When it was exported to those places where markets were held, an abundant sum of money was obtained.

Thus he bore the expenses of war from agriculture. If he had listened to Iphicrates beforehand in peace, he would have prepared heaps of grain and money for the uses of war.

§ 47. The deed of Cotys the Thracian was full of treachery. He sought a loan from the Perinthians to enlist soldiers. The Perinthians were unwilling to give it. He therefore asked them at least to send to him some of their citizens to serve as garrisons in specified places, so that he might use elsewhere the soldiers who were then guarding them. The Perinthians quickly did this, judging that those places would thereby be in their own power. But Cotys detained as captives those who had been sent to him, ordered the money sought as a loan to be sent to him, and thus ordered them to receive their citizens back.

§ 48. Mentor, after capturing Hermias and also occupying the places which he had held, did not remove the administrators appointed by Hermias. Accordingly, when all were now secure and again possessed whatever they had long concealed or deposited with foreigners, he captured them also and took away everything which they possessed.

§ 49. Memnon of Rhodes, after gaining possession of Lampsacus, in want of money prescribed a great sum which the wealthiest were to pay, and showed that they themselves would recover it from the tribute of the other citizens. But when the others also had contributed, he ordered that this sum likewise be lent to him for a time, and fixed the time at which the money would be restored. Needing money again, he ordered them to contribute and to recover from the revenues what they had given. They, hoping that they would recover it quickly, contributed. The time was now at hand for the revenues to be received, but Memnon showed that he still needed money then and that he would afterward return what had been received with interest. From those whom he had in the army he also deducted grain and pay for six days in each year, assuring them that on those days they would undertake neither watches nor marches and would spend nothing, because those duties had of course been removed from them.

§ 50. At an earlier time also, when he measured grain to the soldiers on the second day after the new moon, in the first month he passed over three days, in the next five, and proceeded in this manner until he reached thirty. Those who in our time made a military month of five or seven weeks have imitated this.

§ 51. Charidemus of Oreus, holding certain places in Aeolis, when Artabazus was bringing an army against him, lacked money to be paid to the soldiers. At first they contributed something. Soon they said that they possessed nothing more. But Charidemus ordered the inhabitants of the place which he judged richest to send elsewhere any coins or costly vessels they possessed, saying that he would add escorts. It was manifest that he was doing this very thing.

Accordingly, when they trusted him, once they had been led not far outside the city he searched them for anything they possessed, took as many things as he needed, and led them back to the same place. He also proclaimed through a herald that no one in that city subject to his dominion should possess weapons in his house; whoever possessed them was to pay a stated sum of silver. But immediately he himself neglected the matter and showed no concern for it. The men, judging that the proclamation had been made rashly, retained in its place what each had possessed before. But Charidemus, suddenly searching their houses, exacted the established fine from those with whom he found any weapon.

The first had been plunder, the second fraud. For a law ought not to be enacted so that a fine may be imposed upon transgressors. Our princes could collect plentiful money daily in this way, for their laws are generally neglected. Accordingly, if those who violate sumptuary laws concerning meals or clothing were secretly noted, and penalties were exacted when they thought everything safe, the treasury would be increased with great advantage. But it does not belong to a good prince to place laws like snares and traps for his subjects.

§ 52. A certain Philoxenus, a Macedonian satrap in Caria, when in want of money, showed that he was going to celebrate the Dionysia. He enrolled the wealthiest inhabitants of Caria to furnish the choruses, prescribing the things to be prepared by them. Seeing that they were burdened, he suborned certain men to ask what they would give to obtain exemption from the office. They promised that they would give even more than they appeared likely to spend, so that they would not be interrupted and drawn away from their business. When he had received what they gave, he enrolled others until he received from these also what he wished; thus he received something from each.

This mockery was indeed shameful, but nevertheless profitable and customary in another sphere, when those who desire in every way to avoid military service are summoned to it and therefore buy exemption at any price.

§ 53. Euaeses also added avarice and mockery to cruelty. This Syrian satrap in Egypt, when he perceived that the governors of the provinces wished to revolt from him, summoned them to the palace and hanged them all. He ordered their households and relatives to be told that they were being kept in custody. Each therefore labored for his own man and wished to redeem the captive with money. After bargaining over each and receiving the amount agreed upon, he returned each man dead.

§ 54. Cleomenes, the Alexandrian satrap in Egypt, when there was a great famine in other places but a moderate one in Egypt, prohibited permission to export grain. The governors of the provinces said that they could not pay tribute unless it were lawful to export grain. Then he permitted exportation but imposed a great tax upon the grain. It therefore happened that, although not much grain was exported, a great tax was received and the governors were deprived of the pretext which they had put forward.

[Printed page 672]

When famine pressed Egypt, he rightly prohibited the exportation of grain; but when tribute was refused, he found a method by which there would be no pretext for refusing, and nevertheless little grain would be exported.

§ 55. What he determined concerning crocodiles was ridiculous. When at one time he was passing by ship through the province in which the crocodile was regarded as a god, one of his boys was seized by a crocodile. Then, summoning the priests, he showed that, since he had first been injured, he wished to avenge himself upon the crocodiles responsible for it, and gave orders that they be captured. But the priests, lest their god be despised, gathered as much gold as they could and gave it to him.

§ 56. But what he next did was malicious. King Alexander had given him commands to found a city at Pharos and to transfer there the market for merchandise from Canopus. He himself then approached Canopus by ship and showed the priests and wealthy men in that place that he had come for the purpose of transferring them elsewhere. The priests and citizens gave him money which they had contributed so that he would leave the market among them. After receiving it, he departed at that time. Later, when everything had been prepared for building, he again approached Canopus by ship and demanded a vast quantity of money from them, for the difference between having the market there and elsewhere was now so great. When they affirmed that they could by no means pay so much, he transferred them.

§ 57. He nevertheless ingeniously circumvented an unfaithful trader. After sending a certain man away to make a purchase, when he perceived that the man had found cheap goods and wished to enter as expenditure a greater price, he told the man's associates that he had heard that their friend had bought merchandise at an excessively high price and that he would therefore not approve it. At the same time, with feigned anger, he attacked the man's idleness. Upon hearing this, they said that he ought not to trust those who said something against an absent man until he returned and rendered his account in his presence. When he returned, they related to him what they had learned from Cleomenes. Wishing to demonstrate everything both to his own associates and to Cleomenes, he reported the price which he had expended in trading.

§ 58. The following was similar. When grain sold in that region for ten denarii, he summoned those who made profit by selling grain and asked how much they wished to receive from him. When they said that they would give it to him for less than to other merchants, he ordered grain to be delivered to him at the same price as to others; but he himself fixed the price of grain at thirty-two denarii and sold it for that amount.

§ 59. Summoning the priests, he said that very unequal expenses were made upon sacrifices in that region, and that therefore the number both of shrines and priests ought to be diminished. The priests gave him both their private and public sacred monies, judging that he would truly do what he said, since each wished his own shrine to be safe and himself to remain a priest.

§ 60. Antimenes of Rhodes, after Alexander had entrusted to him the oversight of the roads around Babylon, obtained an abundance of money in the following manner. There was an ancient law in the region of Babylonia that a tenth part of the things imported had to be paid. No one had used it for a long time. But he observed the time when the arrival of all the satraps was expected, and likewise of soldiers and not a few ambassadors, as well as craftsmen summoned and bringing others, and men traveling in a private capacity, at which time many gifts also were customarily brought. He then exacted the tenth according to the law which existed.

§ 61. Again suffering from want, he ordered that the names of the slaves in the camps be registered by those who wished, and that they be valued at whatever amount seemed proper; they were to pay him eight denarii for each for one year. If anyone's slave fled, he promised that the slave's price would be restored. When the names of many slaves had therefore been registered, no small amount of silver was raised. But if any slave fled, he ordered the satrap into whose territory it had come either to arrange its return to the camp or to pay its price to the owner.

§ 62. Ophellas of Corinth, after a procurator of the province of Athridis had been appointed, when the governors of that place's districts approached him and promised that they would pay much more tribute and asked that he remove the appointed procurator, asked whether they could fulfill their promise. When they affirmed that they could, he did not remove the procurator from his place, but ordered the tributes which they had submitted according to their own valuation to be exacted. Thus he seemed neither to detract honor from the man appointed by him nor to impose greater tribute upon the governors than they themselves had established, while manifold money came to him.

§ 63. Pythocles of Athens gave the Athenians counsel that the state should receive Tyrian lead from private persons at the price for which it sold, namely two denarii, and that the city should then sell it at the established price of six denarii.

That fraud belongs to forbidden monopoly; for the state ought not to trade in such a way that private persons are compelled to buy.

§ 64. Chabrias, having compelled a number of men sufficient for 120 ships to assemble, although he needed no more than sixty, ordered the remainder to pay two months' wages to those who were in the sixty ships or themselves to sail. Desiring to remain with their own affairs, they gave what he had commanded. Antimenes ordered the supplies customarily stored for the royal roads to be furnished by the satraps according to the law of that region. Whenever either the army or another multitude suffered want in the king's absence, he sold some of the supplies that had been stored for a little less than half price.

§ 65. Cleomenes defrauded the soldiers of one month. When the new moon approached and pay was to be given to the soldiers, he deliberately arrived by ship. Then, when the month departed, he sailed away after paying the wages. Afterward, in the following month, he deferred payment until the next new moon. Because the soldiers had received their pay a little before, they remained quiet. Thus, by passing over one month in a year, he withheld one month's pay from the soldiers.

§ 66. Stabellius, when he owed the soldiers pay, summoned the commanders and said that he had absolutely no need of them personally; and that whenever he needed soldiers, if he gave each of them silver, they could thus be sent away to hire foreign soldiers. He said that he would more willingly give them the wages which he was compelled to pay to the soldiers. He therefore ordered each to dismiss his men, so that they would depart from that region company by company. The commanders, judging that they would make some profit from the affair, dismissed the soldiers as Stabellius had commanded. After a short interval, when they had assembled, he said that neither a flute-player without a musical company nor a commander without soldiers was of any use, and ordered them to leave that region.

§ 67. Dionysius, going around the shrines, whenever he saw a little golden or silver table set out “of Good Fortune,” ordered wine to be poured into it and commanded that it be carried away. As for statues of such a kind that they held out a bowl in an extended hand, he ordered it to be removed, saying that he accepted it. He also stripped golden cloaks and crowns from the statues, saying that he wished to give them things both lighter and more fragrant; and thus he wrapped them in a linen cloak and crowns of violets.

[Printed page 673]

CHAPTER XVII

Unjust Methods of Amassing Money

§ 1. Everything that has thus far been said about gathering wealth tends to this end: that equitable methods should be approved and inequitable ones rejected; for to grow rich through injustice is the greatest evil. Indeed, nothing is so sacred that wickedness does not violate it. Every industry which is occupied in so slippery a business easily totters and is made unjust from just. For, as I have shown, there are many exceedingly inequitable things among taxes, as in the chrysargyron, in the tax upon lions, and in Caligula's brothels. Nor is it sufficient to have abolished former taxes unless you refrain from imposing new ones. Anastasius indeed abolished the chrysargyron, but introduced the χρυσοτέλειαν, a tribute much heavier than the former one, Nicephorus, book 16, chapters 40 and 41.

And so we shall now recount other methods by which the poor and the rich are oppressed in the state.

§ 2. The first method, in addition to those already stated, consists in diminishing and increasing the public coinage--not by that ancient fraud, which was evident, but by a new and subtler one. For who imitates Hippias, or Leucon, concerning whom Polyaenus relates in book 6 of the Stratagems that he ordered everyone to bring coins to be struck with another design? When they had brought them, he restruck them and ordered the new coinage to be worth twice as much, and thus retained half for himself. But he inflicted loss upon the citizens, because among foreigners the coins were accepted only at their customary value; nor could an ordinance so far removed from the common valuation endure for long.

Necessity compelled the Roman state sometimes to deprive its citizens of almost half, and sometimes of precisely half, Pliny, book 33, chapter 3.

No one now attempts such things, and the attempt would be vain; for among so many minters account is taken not merely of the stamp but also of the weight and fineness. There is therefore need of an artful fraud in mingling metals in various ways.

They also gather pure silver, even through the agency of Jews, and mingle it in such a way that they sometimes make the value greater by half. Hence there are so many adulterated coins and petty coins, which are everywhere prohibited and forced upon people. Yet our Mariana, in chapter 22 of his book On Weights and Measures, says that the kings of Castile imitated the Romans. And indeed I found that want of money in the treasury was the cause of so great a variety; for, in order to replenish it, kings often diminished the weight and fineness of the coin while retaining its old value. This is inequitable and should not be employed except in the harshest times of the state, especially since trade is impeded by adulterated coinage, and there is no lasting respite but only the briefest one from the value of the new money, since its weight or fineness is soon diminished as well. We observe that this has happened in every age and among every nation.

But, to speak about the coinages of our own people, many laws enacted against continual frauds do not so much prevent them as reveal that they are evil. Nor perhaps do they accomplish anything else than that one may very freely censure certain magnates' ἀδόκιμα τέχνα (disapproved devices). Concerning these matters there were laws of the diets at Frankfurt in the year 1442; at Augsburg in 1512; at the same place in 1500; at Cologne in 1512; at Worms in 1511; at Nuremberg in 1521; at Speyer in 1526; at the same place in 1529; at Augsburg in 1530; at Regensburg in 1532; at the same place in 1555, and in 1559 and 1566 and 1582; at Speyer in 1570, and in 1570. The following are approximately the points worthy of notice:

1. In the Golden Bull, the right of striking coinage is granted to the king of Bohemia and the electors.

2. In the year 1442, Frederick III at Frankfurt ordered only gold coin of one weight to be struck. He ordered silver coin to be struck correctly, and imposed penalties upon those who acted otherwise or received such coins.

3. In the year 1500 it was decreed that a fixed and constant system of coinage should be instituted at Nuremberg, and that meanwhile all mints should cease working.

4. In the year 1512 it was decreed that neighboring peoples should strike coinage of the same kind.

5. Since great frauds were committed in striking Batzen, and bad coins were mingled with good, it was decreed at Nuremberg in the year 1524 that no new ones should be struck before a system of coinage had been established.

6. In the year 1551 many things were rightly established at Augsburg, and the values of the coins were defined.

7. Those who possess the right of coinage are not to entrust the mints to others.

8. The adulteration of coinage is prohibited under penalty of being burned alive.

9. After various delays, a system of coinage was at last established by Ferdinand in the year 1559, by which precautions are taken against all frauds. Yet they remain in practice even today, so that there is now need only of penalties to restrain subtle thefts.

§ 3. Allied to this is the fraud and wickedness of usurers. This has been an ancient evil of the state, and is now a very great one; it rages most freely under the name of profit ceasing, loss arising, and the cloak of money-changing.

It must, however, be established that all usury, when

> Coin begets coin through interest, is illicit. Yet the purchase of an annuity is not usury; for the ownership of the money is transferred to another, and the right to an annual return is received. A loan for consumption, however, exists when the right of demanding repayment of the sum remains with the lender; whatever is exacted on account of it is theft. Something may nevertheless be exacted when a loss arises from a benevolent concession made to another--a true loss which cannot be met in another way. Or it may be exacted if a true and legitimate profit, which the person was about to make, ceases. For no one is bound to care for another's advantages to his own detriment; and here there remains that equality and justice which does not wish what is profitable to another to be injurious to me.

§ 4. Usury is altogether forbidden in Exodus 22, Deuteronomy 25, Leviticus 25:3, Psalm 15:5, and Ezekiel 18:17. In canon law, 14, question 3, and question 4, If Any Cleric, usury does not consist in money alone but in every kind of thing, 14, question 3, They Think; even in commerce itself, 14, question 3, Of the Canons. Whether one lends at interest through oneself or through another, let those who practice usury through Jews not think themselves less disgraceful. Finally, it is forbidden to everyone. A clerical usurer is not to be admitted to orders, distinction 33, A Husband, and distinction 46, Seditious Men, and throughout distinction 47. If he possesses orders, he is to be deposed, distinction 47, A Bishop, and what follows. Indeed, to accept a loan at usury is not free from crime except in a time of necessity, distinction 83, He Errs; 24, question 3, Not to Be Inflicted; 26, question 1, He Who. Finally, one who has received usuries does not truly repent unless he restores the usuries. One who denies this is judged a heretic, chapter It Has Determined, chapter Upon.

[Printed page 674]

§ 5. They are also prohibited by the civil laws, concerning which the very learned Gregory Tolosanus should be consulted in his Syntagma of Universal Law, as should others--a matter which I do not think I must debate. For not many now defend usuries, but more practice them.

> Thus, among so many thousands of thieves and embezzlers, you would scarcely find one who approves the deed:
>
> But they approve the better and follow the worse.

I must therefore admonish the prince to abolish them. The first reason is his office; for he ought to prevent brigandage, robbery, theft, calumnies, and the wrongs of tribunals, and therefore also the thefts of usury. The Romans punished a moneylender more severely than a thief, for they condemned the latter to twice the amount, but the former to four times the amount. From this cause, therefore, the prince will justly collect money; for if he condemns Jews and Judaizers to fourfold restitution, money cannot fail him. The vices of the times will make him rich.

From this it is evident that those princes and cities which thus protect Jews or Christian usurers, and permit subjects to be oppressed so that Jews have easy access to them and are managers of their financial affairs, bind themselves by a grave crime. Indeed, they are liable for the losses contracted through their neglect. This obligation of office therefore arises from the nature of princely rule, but much more in Germany. For all magistrates have been commanded not to permit moneylenders. In the year 1500 at the Diet of Augsburg, Maximilian issued the following decree with the consent of all the Estates, in the section Concerning Usurious Contracts:

> Since, moreover, through usurious and other dangerous and unbecoming contracts which, as we have learned, Christians and Jews have hitherto practiced, great losses have been inflicted upon provinces and peoples, we establish, ordain, and will, seriously commanding all Estates of the Empire, that they prohibit contracts of this kind--usurious and dangerous--within their duchies, provinces, dominions, territories, and everywhere else, under an appropriate penalty, and that they also punish violators seriously. By these presents we likewise command ecclesiastical and secular judges, arbiters, and benches of judges that, if usurious, unsuitable, and dangerous contracts of this kind are brought before them, they adjudge and declare them invalid, void, and in no way binding, and permit or assist no execution of them.

Nor can an excuse be advanced: in the year 1530 everything is repeated in the same words, the enormity of the crime is demonstrated, and this is added:

> Since we have learned that manifold usurious contracts, not only immoderate but also contrary to the Christian religion, have been conducted and are still being conducted in the Holy Empire against divine and civil laws--as when eight hundred florins are lent, a sum of one thousand florins is entered in the instruments of annuity, and thus they pay more than five per hundred; while others, for the delay of a short time, receive immoderate interest, increase the sum, and change the contract.

These provisions, then established and renewed in the years 1532 and 1548, did not have sufficient strength to remove so great a wrong; for in the year 1576 the same complaint remains:

> The laws have not been observed; the common people have for a long time, by inequitable contracts and dealings in usury, contrary to divine and imperial laws, and especially in contempt of the political order, been reduced, distressed, and driven in many ways to extreme poverty.

The same things were again inculcated in the year 1577, so that no magistrate can excuse himself.

The second evil is sedition born of poverty and the weakness of princes. For although bodies are firm and full of nourishment, if the feet are weakened by gout or for another reason, we cannot stand. In the same way the state is weak when the people lie oppressed by usuries. When the people withdrew to the Sacred Mount, the state was weak; if it had had even a trifling enemy, its dominion would have been finished. But the cause of the secession was that the people were exhausted by the robberies of usurers and one part of the citizen body oppressed another. Many examples are readily available, nor do we lack examples from our own day. I shall touch upon the matter briefly; let the magistrate weigh it according to its own importance.

In the Roman Empire there are free cities and princes. The free cities are not only afflicted by the wrongs of usurers, but have citizens so disposed that, if they did not fear the emperor, they would either cast out the Jews, the Christian usurers, and those magnates whom they regard as their patrons, or even deprive them of life if there were an instigator. And although the people would do this neither in orderly fashion nor by any right, the magistrate would nevertheless be judged to have given the occasion by not restraining usuries--indeed, by urging their execution against divine and human laws and against so many laws of the imperial diets. Nor are those princes safe whom they know to receive money from Jews in return for protection, and especially those whose treasurers are seen to be intimate with those usurers.

§ 6. When usuries are approved, this occurs by reason of some legitimate contract, but not by reason of a loan for consumption; when they are permitted, this occurs in order to avoid greater evils. Thus Tolosanus, book 22, chapter 3, §20:

> Moreover, throughout all law we find that usuries have sometimes been permitted in certain matters, causes, persons, and methods of doing business. Yet for that reason it is not proper to say that they have been approved, just as God permitted divorce to the Jews because of their stiff neck, but did not approve it. For the wickedness of men is so great that it cannot be so thoroughly amended or purged by the lawgiver that some dross does not perpetually remain; or, if he wishes to remove it altogether, he cannot do so without its degenerating into a worse vice. In this danger the worse evil must be avoided and shunned.

In this way, in the matter of usuries, if they are altogether forbidden, the worst avarice and cruelty, or mercilessness, of the rich causes them to prefer to consign their coins in a chest to rust rather than to aid the needy without charge; or, if they lend without charge, they demand repayment so savagely that they harass their debtors with every kind of unrest. Consequently, a certain manner of lending at interest has been permitted because of the obstinacy of creditors and in order to assist the poverty of debtors. We therefore consider, in the permission of usuries, the things, the persons, and the assessment. The things in which usuries are said to be permitted are comprised in these verses:

> Fiefs, a surety, for a dowry, stipends of the clergy;
>
> The sale of fruits, one whom you would wish to suffer loss by law;
>
> A seller under uncertainty, one paying the price after a time;
>
> A penalty, and not in fraud, a forfeiture clause, one giving without charge;
>
> Partners, pomp: in these ways more than the principal is given.

All these things are explained and proved at length by the gloss and by Henry Bohic, on chapter A Complaint, On Usuries; John Faber; Angelus de Clavasio; Baldus; Fulgosius; Jason; Hostiensis; and Chassanaeus. Nevertheless, these cases do not properly pertain to a loan for consumption, and therefore neither to that illicit usury of money from such a loan, but either to just commerce and the reckoning of that which is of interest, or to a penalty, that is, to punishing the delay of debtors in a way other than by a loan for consumption.

§ 7. Remedies for so great, ancient, common, and pernicious an evil were sought long ago and established by laws; but the power of the usurers, the conflicts of others, the wars and dissensions of princes, and the poverty of certain nobles and leading men prevailed against the laws. Yet laws and penalties must nevertheless be opposed to it. First, usurers must be driven from the fatherland. This is the most efficacious method. Provision was made in the laws of the Twelve Tables that no interest should be paid except the unciaria, that is, the hundredth part, as Tacitus says; afterward the rate returned to the two-hundredth, the half-unciaria.

[Printed page 675]

Afterward it was entirely forbidden, and it was resisted by many decrees of the Senate. The hundredth was regarded as the highest rate, because on each Kalends a hundredth part of the principal sum was given--that is, the whole in one hundred months. But if ἀνατοκισμός occurred, so that unpaid usuries were reckoned into the principal, the principal sum would be recovered much more quickly. But this is a matter which scarcely admits moderation: the evil must be cut out. And so I judge that the Jews must either be expelled or occupied in other matters, and that they must not be permitted to receive even the smallest interest. But I myself think that the Jews must be expelled; nor am I moved by the fact that many princes retain them, because many have most justly expelled them. I therefore do no injury to those who retain them, because those who judge that they should be retained do not offend those who have dismissed them.

The reasons are many and grave.

1. Those whose one and only pursuit is to live from thefts, robberies, frauds, and impostures, and who have no manner of living honestly--or can have none while that condition of the state remains--must be cast and driven out from the entrails of the state as poison and plagues. But the Jews are such persons; therefore they must be removed from the state. The major premise is most true and is denied by no one, except when a greater danger arises from their exile, as if they should be so strong in multitude and power that they could stir up sedition or war. But here that danger is so far from existing that the prince, whoever should expel the Jews, would attain the greatest glory, and the people would carry him in their eyes and hands. Experience teaches the minor premise. For, first, they persecute Christians with so bitter a hatred that, in whatever matter they can, they are detrimental to them. Next, they judge it lawful for themselves to circumvent Christians with every kind of fraud; and although they sometimes benefit them, they nevertheless do this so that they may harm them more grievously, just as condemned spirits also offer certain apparent advantages to most wretched men so that they may cast them headlong into true destruction. Third, the ability to live honestly or to make a profit from lawful work is denied them in Germany. They cultivate neither fields nor vineyards; they practice no crafts; they do not trade. What, then, remains except frauds? Hence they are intent upon every opportunity for defrauding; and, as Johannes Pfefferkorn says, “They examine everything and, like dogs, smell out profit from anything whatsoever.” Johannes Pfefferkorn, who had dealings with them, sets forth their methods and practices; he not only saw them but also practiced them.

2. Those who by their own wickedness are the objects of the greatest hatred among everyone, and who also make their princely protectors hated if they furnish protection to their contracts, must be cast out. The experience of every age has taught that the Jews are such. Nor are the present examples different: the most renowned cities have risen against the Jews. Nor was the magistrate safe except through fear of Caesar. When that fear is removed through civil wars and other occasions, the Jews are in the most immediate danger not only of their fortunes but also of their lives. Indeed, a hard necessity falls upon the magistrate either to abandon them contrary to the agreements made, or to defend them against every hatred. If therefore he is wise, he will promptly drive out public usurers; he will restore to their true owners those of their goods which consist of usuries, and will retain the rest for himself as belonging to the fisc. For theft is punished by restoration and confiscation.

3. Further, the reason why that plague is retained to so great a detriment of the state can be threefold: (1) the advantage of princes and of the treasury, because the Jews are burdened with taxes; (2) the advantage of subjects, because they have need of borrowed money; (3) the advantage of the Jews themselves, so that they may be converted to the true religion.

But princes are deceived in every reason. For, first, if the Jews and moneylenders were absent, the citizens could contribute more assistance; for even that which the Jews contribute now comes from the injury of citizens whom they exhaust by deceit and fraud, and the citizens are compelled in addition to support and enrich the Jews themselves. For what city is there which would not willingly furnish twice the amount that the Jews pay to the fisc, if the magistrate were to expel the Jews? It therefore does not pertain to the public advantage to nourish those cunning thieves so that, when they have contributed ten gold pieces, they may steal a thousand--and in a thousand ways. This, therefore, is an enormous error of government: to connive at the robberies of public moneylenders, that is, at weekly, monthly, and annual returns, and by this method to extort their fortunes from subjects so that they pass into the possession of the moneylenders and the treasury is sprinkled with some portion. Let all things pass away, I say, as formerly at Rome. And what Gregory Tolosanus warns is most true: “Thus the mercilessness of the rich rages, interest is piled upon interest and profit upon profit, so that, if the matter were conducted at the discretion of the moneylenders, it would soon come about that all resources and inheritances, and the persons themselves, would pass into their ownership.” Hence prudent men, not estimating their own advantages but judging truly concerning these men, were severe toward moneylenders. Agis, an Athenian leader, burned their account-books, Alexander ab Alexandro, book 1 of Genial Days. Oh, would that we now had many men like him! Gaul was more severe: it formerly expelled the Jews from the boundaries of the kingdom and cut off the thieving right hands of monstrous moneylenders. Cato expelled all usurers from Sardinia, Livy, book 32. I certainly cannot in any way disapprove the opinion of those jurists who judge that usurers should be punished criminally; thus Molinaeus, On Usuries, number 156, and others. I would not wish their condition to be better than that of a manifest thief. The injury is the same, except that this one assumes the appearance of law. A poisoner is punished more severely than a robber; why, then, are artful thieves retained? Nor is it sufficient that all usurers and their assistants are infamous, for they think that infamy is well compensated by riches. Now

> Very great honor comes from gold.

Through the people and reputation they gather coins, and they applaud themselves when they contemplate them in the chest.

Therefore not even those who receive money at a lower rate of return and then place it with the Jews at a higher rate provide for their treasury. For there are said to be Christians whose brokers and retailers of usuries are Jews. They receive money from Christians under a lawful rate and security, five per hundred each year; then they place the same money with Jews and receive eight or ten, while the Jews also claim their own small profit for themselves, so that fifteen or twenty per hundred are often given. Yet they do not thus escape infamy, for the Jews openly and clearly confess that the monies belong to Christians and that they themselves are only administrators of the usuries. Those men do not provide for their own treasury, because they oppress cities and gather hatreds, although they could make more profit through honorable commerce. Nor is their method dissimilar to that which belonged to the emperor Tiberius. He appointed needy, cunning, avaricious, and rapacious governors, whom he afterward slaughtered when they had grown rich with the spoils of provincials, and he brought the spoils into the fisc. In this affair he long remained concealed at first as a just and severe emperor; but when the fraud had been perceived and people saw that everything returned to Tiberius, they said that he used governors like sponges: he sent them dry into the resources of the provinces and squeezed them when full. In the same way, certain men of our Germany freely permit Laverna's men and rapacious raiders--the Jews--to range about, and afterward squeeze those same men in order to furnish the treasury with unjust wealth.

[Printed page 676]

The second reason, that they provide for the necessities of the poor, is not merely false but plainly contrary to the truth. For the poor are overthrown together with all the goods which remain to them. Nor do I hesitate to affirm that every year in Germany several thousand citizens are exhausted by interest, and that this evil is greater than if some notable city were destroyed each year. For now they are gradually consumed, as if by a fever. Lucullus removed usury from Asia because he saw that a most fertile province was about to be reduced to the possession of a few. How, therefore, is that useful to subjects by which there is introduced

> Poverty prone to crime?

More than one hundred thousand Jews in Germany harass Christians with every kind of fraud. Among them there is scarcely anyone who does not reduce someone to extremity; and though a particular person may not do so, many nevertheless afflict several persons. Therefore one hundred thousand are circumvented by them. How, then, are the poor provided for through the Jews?

How was the payment of interest useful to Otto, when he publicly confessed that he could not stand unless he were prince, and that it made no difference whether he fell in battle under the enemy or in the forum under his creditors?

But the savagery of the ancients did not equal the monstrousness with which the marrow of Christians is sucked out today. Hence those complaints of many: the Jews therefore lend at interest because no one offers gifts to princes so that they may prohibit this crime. Julius Clarus, Received Opinions, book 5, § Usury, number 7. Covarruvias, book 3, chapter 1, number 8, should also be consulted. This too is the opinion of the canons: the resources of Christians are exhausted through the usuries of the Jews.

The third cause was that they might be converted to the faith. But by this method they are rendered most obstinate. There are three causes of this.

The first is hatred, which separates the human race and excites wars and quarrels. This endures perpetually between Christians and Jews because its cause is not removed. The cause of hatred among the Jews is that they hate Christ above all things and curse him each day; next, because they see that they are hated by Christians. But it is natural to hate one's enemies. And every day that fire is kindled by new torches, since they are received and harassed by Christians with scoffs, jeers, and abuse. Nor do the hatreds of Christians cease. For when every day they see before their eyes men exulting, grown sleek from the spoils of the poor, and gaping after their own possessions, they can no more love them than a lamb loves a wolf or a dove a hawk. And so Christians do not speak of their conversion, nor do the Jews endure hearing of it. If they are exercised by other labors, both they themselves will return to a sound mind and Christians will attend them with mercy.

The second cause is that now, by the permission or connivance of princes, they have the crimes of lending at interest, deceiving, and plundering unpunished. Indeed, the greater the hatred and the opinion of wickedness in which they are held among Christians, the more they glory among their own people. Just as that soldier is most pleasing to the emperor and his fellow-soldiers who harms the enemy most, from this comes that most atrocious deed which histories relate concerning the capture of Jerusalem: that Jews bought Christian slaves from the victors, not for use and service, but so that they might delight themselves with the most cruel pleasure in torturing them and killing them by a lingering death. Hence their monstrous cruelty toward Christian boys, when in the year 1236 at Fulda, in 1380 at Hall in Swabia, in 1429 at Ravensburg, in 1475 at Trent, and at other times elsewhere, they cut innocent boys with many small wounds, so that they might show that their hatred was not directed against our vices, which are surpassed by their crimes, but against our race and religion. Although Christian princes do not tolerate these things, other acts are nevertheless not punished when, by lingering hunger and shameful wasting, they kill not only the poor but even noble families. Reputation, disgrace, separation, and excommunication at least recall a Christian from a public crime; all these things incite the Jews to daring, and they even rejoice that the crimes of lending at interest are in public view, because they see that the crimes bring them glory among wicked men.

The third cause is the gravest of all. If it were removed, a great multitude of them would receive the Christian rites: namely, the restitution of ill-gotten goods. Neither baptism nor religion permits the retention of things belonging to others. "If I have defrauded anyone of anything, I restore fourfold," says the converted Zacchaeus. It therefore seems a hard condition to the Jews to surrender the treasures which they have amassed either in great part or altogether through injustice. If they gained everything by lawful works, after receiving the religion they would retain their own possessions, and only unbelief would have to be put off; but now the wealth on account of which many fall away from faith and piety must be cast aside. Here, therefore, is the hindrance which holds back a great part of them. Those who permit this consequently bind them with more chains of unbelief and obstinacy. For the Church cannot concede that they need not restore what was taken away, because this is God's commandment.

Alexander III truly says to the bishop of Palermo, in the appendix to the Third Lateran Council, part 16, § On Usuries, chapter 1:

> Concerning what your discretion has asked of us--whether a dispensation can be made in receiving money at usury, so that the poor who are held in Saracen captivity may be freed by means of that same money--we have judged that you should be answered by the present letter that, since the page of each Testament detests the crime of usuries, we have not seen that any dispensation should be admitted in this matter. For, since Holy Scripture prohibits even lying for the life of another, much more must it be prohibited that anyone should become involved in the crime of usuries in redeeming the life of a captive.

In the same way, the Council of Basel, session 19, nevertheless permits a Jew in favor of conversion to retain goods whose owner is uncertain, when in good faith he does not know to whom they are to be restored:

> If any of them wishes to be converted to the Catholic faith, let whatever movable and immovable goods he possesses remain intact and undisturbed for him. But if goods of this kind were acquired from usury or illicit gain, and the persons to whom restitution ought by law to be made are known--because the sin is not forgiven unless what was taken is restored--they must altogether be restored to those persons. But if those persons do not exist, because such goods would have to be converted to pious uses through the hands of the Church, this holy synod, acting in the place of the universal Church, grants in favor of the baptism received that they ought to remain with those persons as for a pious use. Under penalty of divine anathema, it forbids both ecclesiastical and secular persons to inflict any disturbance upon them in these matters under any pretext sought, or to permit it to be inflicted; rather, let them judge that they have made a great gain when such persons have been gained for Christ. And since it is written, "Whoever has the substance of this world and sees his brother have need, and closes his bowels to him, how does the love of God remain in him?" if at the time of their conversion they are poor or needy, through the bowels of the mercy of our God this holy synod exhorts everyone, both ecclesiastical and secular, to extend helping hands to the converts.
>
> [Printed page 677]
>
> Let the diocesan bishops themselves also not only exhort Christians to assist them, but, as they are able, let them not neglect to support neophytes of this kind both from the revenues of churches and from those things which devolve upon them to be converted to the uses of the poor; and let them defend the converts with paternal affection from disparagements and insults. And since through the grace of baptism they are made fellow citizens of the saints and members of the household of God, and it is far more worthy to be regenerated by the spirit than to be born by the flesh, by this edictal law we establish that they enjoy the privileges, liberties, and immunities of the cities and places in which they are regenerated by sacred baptism which others obtain solely by reason of birth and origin. Furthermore, let the priests who baptize them, and those who receive them from the sacred font, diligently instruct them both before and after baptism in the articles of the faith, the precepts of the new law, and the rites of the Catholic Church.

§ 8. I shall add what the holy canons further establish in this practice, for the sake of magnates and those who serve them as counselors.

1. No one can without crime compel anyone to pay usuries. The reason is natural: because, when no legitimate cause has been given, I am not bound to deliver to another what is mine. The ecclesiastical law is as follows, in the appendix to the Third Lateran Council, part 16, chapter 4. Alexander III says:

> Debtors ought not to be compelled to pay the usuries by which they had bound themselves, unless they are bound by an oath to pay them. But if they have made an oath concerning their payment, they must be compelled to fulfill their oath to the Lord, so that they may be released by their creditors; and when the usuries have been paid, the creditors, if necessary, must be compelled by ecclesiastical severity to restore them.

And chapter 15:

> Since, as you assert, you have ordered manifest usurers--that is, those who died in that sin--to be deprived of communion at the altar and ecclesiastical burial, in accordance with our decree recently promulgated in the Council, until they restore what they wickedly received, some of them say that their own resources are insufficient to pay the usuries received. Others promise that they will restore the portions of the usuries which they have at hand, but declare that they cannot restore other usuries which they extorted, since possessions were acquired from them and delivered to their sons or parents. Others, in order to make excuses for excuses in sins, imprudently affirm that only those usuries which were received after our prohibition must be restored, and that no one should be compelled to pay the usuries which he received before the prohibition. Concerning these matters we answer your discretion that, whether they received usuries before or after our prohibition, they must be compelled, under the > penalty which we established in the Council, to restore them to those from whom they extorted them or to their heirs; or, if these do not survive, to distribute them to the poor, provided that they possess the resources from which they can restore them, since, according to the word of blessed Augustine, the sin is not forgiven unless what was taken away is restored. But those who do not possess resources from which they can restore the usuries ought not to be punished with that penalty, since their known poverty excuses them. Possessions which were acquired from usuries must, however, be sold, and the prices themselves restored to those from whom the usuries were extorted, so that they may thus be freed not only from that penalty but also from the sin which they incurred through the extortion of usuries.

And chapter 6, to the bishop of Winchester:

> Concerning the matter upon which you wished to consult us--whether a cleric should be compelled to pay usuries to a creditor--we answer your prudence in this manner: since it is dangerous for all the faithful of God to receive usuries, no Christian is to be compelled to pay them unless he is bound by oath or pledged faith to pay them; rather, creditors ought to be restrained from exacting usuries by an ecclesiastical sentence.

Finally, more extensively, to the archbishop of Canterbury:

> You should know that it has come to our hearing that, when Peter of Ursiton, during the war which occurred between our dearest son Henry, the illustrious king of the English, and his sons, had lent a fixed sum of money to certain men for the protection of the kingdom of the Franks, he received from them certain possessions and revenues as a pledge. He also bound them to himself by the sanctity of an oath that they would inflict no disturbance or burden upon him concerning those possessions and revenues until they paid him the money lent. Although the aforesaid Peter, as he asserts, has not yet received his principal from those possessions and revenues after expenses have been deducted, nevertheless, brother archbishop, because you bound him with the bond of excommunication on this account, we are consequently compelled to direct our letters to you, especially since he himself, as he asserts, perhaps wishes to be content. Hence it is that, in answer to your consultation, etc., after receiving sufficient security from the aforesaid P. that he ought thereafter to obey your command, you are, by our authority, to absolve him completely from the sentence under which he is held, all contradiction and appeal ceasing. Then, if it is so, you are by ecclesiastical censure to compel the debtors, who are said to have taken the aforesaid possessions and revenues from him contrary to their oath, to restore those possessions and revenues to the said Peter, all appeal ceasing; and they are thereafter to inflict no disturbance upon him contrary to their oath until the money is paid to him. For it is not safe for anyone, but rather dangerous, to violate the sanctity of an oath. But when they have paid the aforesaid P. his money, as they swore, you are to take care diligently to admonish and induce him to restore whatever it is established that, after expenses have been deducted, he received beyond the principal. If, when admonished, he does not do this, you are to return him to the same sentence of excommunication, the obstacle of appeal being removed; for just as it is dangerous for debtors to violate their oath, so it is no less dangerous for creditors to retain what they have received as usuries, since the crime of usuries is most detestable and horrible and condemned by the page of each Testament.

It is most certain that these penalties apply to magistrates and states which compel usuries to be paid. Indeed, the magistrates themselves are bound to restitution. For whoever, contrary to my law, gives what is mine to another, or by his power defends another from being compelled to restore it, is liable to compensate the loss. But princes have been commanded not to permit Christians to be burdened, by the civil laws and by the command of the entire Church. The Lateran Council under Innocent III, chapter 67:

> The more the Christian religion is restrained from the exaction of usuries, the more grievously the perfidy of the Jews grows strong in these matters, so that in a short time they exhaust the resources of Christians. Wishing therefore in this respect to provide for Christians, lest they be monstrously burdened by Jews, we establish by synodal decree that, if henceforth under any pretext Jews extort grave and immoderate usuries from Christians, Christian participation is to be withdrawn from them until they have made suitable satisfaction for the immoderate burden. Christians also, if necessary, are to be compelled by ecclesiastical censure, all appeal set aside, to abstain from commerce with them.

But we enjoin princes not to be hostile to Christians on this account, but rather to endeavor to restrain Jews from so great a burden.

And we decree that by the same penalty Jews are to be compelled to make satisfaction to churches for the tithes and offerings due which the churches were accustomed to receive from Christians from houses and other possessions before they passed to Jews under any title, so that the churches may thus be preserved unharmed.

[Printed page 678]

This command is also repeated in the Council of Vienne under Clement IV:

Adding that, if henceforth under any pretext Jews extort grave or immoderate usuries from Christians, Christian participation is to be withdrawn from them until they have made suitable satisfaction for the immoderate burden. Hence Christians, if necessary, are to be compelled by ecclesiastical censure to abstain from commerce with them. But we enjoin princes not to be hostile to Christians on this account, but rather to endeavor to restrain Jews from so great a burden. If, however, the Sacrament of the altar happens to be carried before their houses, upon hearing the preceding sound the Jews themselves are to withdraw within their houses and close their windows and doors; they are also to be compelled by the prelates of the Church to do this on every day of the Parasceve. They are not to presume to dispute concerning the Catholic faith with simple persons; nor are they to dare to detain against their will the sons and wives of Jews coming to the Christian faith. They are not to entice Christians to Judaism or circumcise them by any rash attempt; nor are they to visit sick Christians or practice the works of medicine upon them. They are not to erect a new synagogue; and if they have erected any, they are to remove or take them down. If necessary, they may repair an old one, but are not to make it larger, more costly, or higher. During Lent, when Christians abstain from meat and fast, they are not openly or publicly to carry meat. We command the bishops to compel the Jews, by withdrawal of the communion of Christians, to observe every article of all these provisions. We also admonish their princes and judges more strictly not to extend the favor of any protection or defense to Jews unwilling to observe our statutes, but faithfully to execute whatever may be enjoined upon them by ecclesiastical prelates; otherwise, let them know that entry into the church and participation in divine offices are forbidden them. We also will and command under penalty of excommunication that the lord-elect of Salzburg and his suffragans, and also the bishop of Prague, possess these our constitutions sealed with our seal; that they cause them to be recited each year in episcopal synods and in the provincial council, and to be observed more diligently; and that they cause those provisions which concern the laity to be published through the parish churches of their dioceses.

But John XXII pursued all these matters even point by point in the Fourth Council of Ravenna, rubric 15:

Wishing to restrain in our province the abyss of usuries, condemned by the page of each Testament, we announce or declare, with the approval of this holy council, that all manifest usurers, until they have made full satisfaction for usuries as their resources permit, or have furnished suitable security for making satisfaction according to the strength of their resources, shall be deprived of communion at the altar and ecclesiastical burial; that their offerings ought not to be received, nor can they themselves be absolved; and that their testaments are not valid but void by the law itself. We also decree or declare that all who deliver communion at the altar and the body of Christ to usurers of this kind, or admit them to ecclesiastical burial before they have made satisfaction according to the judgment of the ordinary of the place, are suspended from the execution of their office. We add that all who absolve such usurers, admit them to communion at the altar, or participate in their testaments or burial are subject to penalties of this kind. Notaries also who knowingly compose or receive instruments concerning loans and usurious contracts, or contracts entered into in fraud of usuries, are by that very fact subject to the penalties imposed upon usurers.

Moreover, in receiving from penitent usurers the aforesaid security concerning the restoration of usuries, we will the following precaution to be employed and observed. First of all, through the confession of the usurer, his book or books of accounts, witnesses, an instrument, or some other method, let the quantity of usuries received be made certain and manifest, if it can be--not only those which were extorted from unknown persons but also those from fixed communities and persons. If this is not possible, let the person who by force of the present constitution is to receive security of this kind assess and moderate the amount of it according to a right conscience, to be informed by report, the testimony of neighbors, or other probable conjectures.

Where, however, it does not appear through entries in the usurer's book that usuries were paid by the person seeking their restoration, if the petitioner possesses original instruments, or copies taken from the originals of the community of the city or of the place in which the debt of a loan received from the usurer was contracted, or of another obligation contracted with him or with another on his behalf, and an instrument of payment, release, or acknowledgment, payment of usuries is to be presumed and adjudged. From the loan itself or obligation, from the day on which the debt or obligation was contracted until the day on which the instrument of payment was drawn up, the usurer is to be adjudged to have extorted from him as usuries for each month as many denarii per pound as the diocesan bishop, his vicar, or penitentiary may wish to declare, if the usurer himself did not declare in the said security and state how many denarii per pound he received each month. But when no instrument or writing of payment appears, the usurer is then to be adjudged to have extorted usuries from him for six months from that loan or obligation, according to the aforesaid reckoning and assessment for each month, provided that it appears through entries in the book or by another lawful method that the loan or obligation was contracted.

When this has been done, let the usurer solemnly promise and swear to the person who, as is permitted, has received this security for the court of the ordinary of the place where the usurer resides, in the name of all whose interest it is or will be, that he himself, personally if he can, or through another or others, and in the presence of the aforesaid ordinary's vicar, his penitentiary, or another person with the court's permission, without any difficulty, will make satisfaction, up to the assessed amount--and even a greater amount if a greater is established--for the usuries received by himself, by his party, and by other persons whose inheritance has passed to him, and for other things wrongly taken and illicitly acquired through usurious wickedness, to those from whom he or they received them, or to their heirs, if they can be found. The remainder, concerning which it is not established to whom it ought to be restored, he will freely assign to the ordinary, the vicar, or the ordinary's penitentiary, to be distributed to the poor according to the ordinary's judgment, without the noise and formality of a trial.

He shall say, allege, or do nothing, personally or through another, by which the proceedings, sentences, or commands of that court may be impeded or in any way delayed concerning the restoration, in the aforesaid manner, of the usuries and things illicitly acquired; binding himself, his heirs, and his goods to the aforesaid provisions by a special compact, and expressly renouncing, specifically and generally, all exceptions, rights, and defenses according to the will and expression of the person receiving security of this kind. But for attending to these matters and making the restitution and assignment, as set forth above, let him bind all his goods, constituting himself as possessing them at sufferance in the name of the said court; granting every license and free power to that court and to the recipient of the aforesaid security on its behalf, by their own authority and notwithstanding anyone's opposition, freely and without penalty to seize, sell, and alienate from his goods whatever, how much, and wherever the court wills, until full restitution and satisfaction of the aforesaid matters.

[Printed page 679]

On their account, let him also renounce usuries, remit those promised to him, and release, return, or at least promise to return the oaths made to him for paying them, or for not recovering or demanding them back. Let him swear that, without deceit or fraud, diminution or removal, he will personally or through others give and consign to the ordinary, his vicar, or a specified messenger the books and registers of his accounts and the usurious instruments which he possesses or can possess for the same matter. Let him also assign the money which he possesses, or make a deposit, if he can, according to the judgment of the ordinary, his vicar, or his penitentiary; and we judge that this provision is to be included in the security itself.

Let him also bind his future heirs, under penalty of forfeiting the inheritance, to do the same things. If those heirs are present, let them promise and swear under penalty and under the sanctity of an oath that they will do the same.

> Furthermore, if he can, let him give pledges, or at least suitable sureties, who in the same manner and under the same penalties and terms shall bind themselves and their goods principally to the aforesaid matters, constituting themselves principal debtors in them, renouncing the epistle of the Divine Hadrian, the benefit of the new constitutions concerning sureties, and every other defense and right, according to the judgment of the recipient of that security, by a special compact, and furnishing a similar oath. We command these things to be done before the parish priest, trustworthy witnesses, and a public notary, by command of the ordinary, his vicar, or his penitentiary. The notary is to receive the aforesaid promise, obligation, renunciation, security, and the other things stated above, and draw up an instrument concerning them.
>
> Finally, throughout the individual dioceses of the ordinaries, where the ordinary or vicar is not present, let the rector of the parish church in which the usurer lived receive the security itself, or, in the absence of a priest, a public notary, who shall be bound to report these matters within a month to the ordinary of the place or his vicar. But in a city let no one at all, without special permission of the ordinary, his vicar, or his penitentiary--except perhaps the parish priest when, upon the sudden occurrence of a case of death, the ordinary's attention cannot be sought for these matters--presume to involve himself in receiving that security; otherwise he shall incur the penalty of ten Ravenna pounds, not to be remitted without due satisfaction. For with respect to the aforesaid matters we declare those persons manifest usurers concerning whom there is a report throughout the parish in which they lived or where they died that they extorted usuries, or for whom this appears through their own confession, suitable proofs, or another lawful means. Let all rectors of parish churches, even if they are collegiate, possess, read, and understand the present constitution, publishing more frequently in their churches the aforesaid penalties of usurers and more cautiously avoiding their own penalties, if they desire to escape divine vengeance and ours.

Many things concerning these matters were also established in Germany. The Council of Salzburg under Bishop Eberhard in the time of Martin V established the same things and renewed the notable statute of Lord Bishop Pilgrim. Usurers, after they have been admonished by name three times by their rectors, incur by that very fact the sentence of excommunication if they do not desist within a month. Rectors and prelates of churches are bound to admonish and induce their subjects who are manifest usurers to desist from wickedness of this kind within a month and to make effective satisfaction for what they received. If they do not do so, the rectors are to announce them as excommunicated, nevertheless informing them that, if they die in this sin, they will lack ecclesiastical burial. If the rectors knowingly bury them, they likewise are by that very fact bound by the sentence of excommunication. Those are called manifest usurers concerning whom there is public voice and report, and certain indications and proofs, that they lend money at usury and receive the usuries, or by agreement or otherwise put into their own purse the fruits of the pledged property and do not reckon them toward the principal of the money lent.

It also relates and condemns a new method of lending at interest:

> We know sufficiently that usurious acts are reproved by divine and human law, and the most recent constitution of the Council of Lyon established carefully devised penalties against those who practice usuries; we do not see that anything must be added to them. But because, under a newly devised appearance of lending at interest, some persons practice usuries under the title of sale, buying a pledge for the quantity sought as a loan and selling it at the same time of redemption for a quantity increased by the amount of the usuries, we have provided that this fraud be met in the following manner. Let the constitution of Pope Gregory X of holy memory, issued against usurers in the Council of Lyon, together with these present constitutions of ours, be published in every cathedral and collegiate church, once each year in Lent, publicly before the people immediately after the Gospel has been read. Then let moneylenders of this kind, and others who practice usuries contrary to the tenor of the said Council of Lyon, and those who retain them in their own houses, be publicly announced by name as excommunicated. If the prelates of churches are negligent or remiss in this publication, which they ought to make personally and through others, and the publication itself is not made at the appointed time, we consign them to the vengeance of the eternal Judge. If a usurer who secretly practiced usuries closes his final day, and it is established by the testimony of three or two trustworthy witnesses that he practiced usuries, let no one receive him for ecclesiastical burial unless satisfaction has been made on his behalf for the usuries received. Otherwise, if the contrary is done, in addition to the penalty > enacted against such persons in the Council of Lyon, we will that the place or church in whose cemetery the bodies of such persons were buried by the will of the prelate or chapter shall by that very fact lie under ecclesiastical interdict for as long as those bodies have not been exhumed by them.

§ 9. These laws also seem to me to aim at this result: that the Jews should be expelled altogether. For, first, those who foster their unbelief are excommunicated by the Fourth Council of Toledo and the Council of Meaux, chapter 58:

> So great is the cupidity of certain men that some, pursuing it, according to what the Apostle says, have even wandered from the faith. For until now many priests and laymen, receiving gifts from the Jews, fostered their unbelief by their protection. These men are known, not without cause, to belong to the body of Antichrist, because they act against Christ. Therefore, henceforth, whatever bishop, cleric, or secular person gives them support by gift or favor against the Christian faith, let him, as profane and sacrilegious, be struck with anathema and made a stranger to the Catholic Church and the kingdom of God; for it is fitting that one who becomes a patron of the enemies of Christ should be separated from the body of Christ.

But one who assists and defends their usuries, takes a portion from them, and compels others to pay, fosters their unbelief--if not another form of it, certainly this one by which they persuade themselves that lending at interest is lawful. For why should they regard as unlawful for themselves what they have observed to be conceded so liberally by the highest authority?

Next, the laws forbid a Christian to serve Jews, as Gregory, book 7, letters 13 and 111, and the Council of Meaux, chapter 56. Pope Gregory to Theuderic and Theudebert, kings of the Franks, and Queen Brunhilda:

> We have wondered that in your kingdom you permit Jews to possess Christian slaves. For what are all Christians except members of Christ?

And a little later:

> In this especially we ask that you show yourselves worshipers of God: that you release his faithful from his enemies.

Likewise the same Gregory to Bishop Fortunatus:

> Christian slaves who are brought in or possessed by Jews are either to be delivered to agents, or certainly sold to Christian purchasers within forty days; and when this number of days has elapsed, let them not remain among the Jews in any manner. But if any of those slaves should perhaps incur such sickness that they cannot be sold within the appointed days, care must be employed so that, when they have been restored to their former health, they are likewise sold by every means, and thus every occasion of fraud is removed, lest Christian slaves be permitted to dwell in the house of a Jew.

[Printed page 680]

Christian slaves bought by Jews are therefore to become free. Thus Constantine Flavius, Emperor Augustus:

> If any Jew buys and circumcises a Christian slave, or one of any other sect, let the slave be removed from the power of that Jew and remain in freedom.

Theodosius and Valentinian, Augusti:

> We deny Jews or pagans permission to litigate or serve in public office, since we do not wish persons of the Christian law to serve them, lest through the occasion of a master they change the sect of the venerable religion. We therefore command that all persons of that unhappy error be excluded, unless timely amendment assists them.

Likewise the same Emperors Augustus:

> By this law, which shall endure for all time, we decree that no Jew may attain honors and dignities, that the administration of civil service shall be open to none, and that none may discharge even the office of defender. For > we do not believe it right that enemies of the supreme Majesty and of Roman laws should dare, under the appearance of any office, to harass Christians or even priests with injuries under any pretext, or presume either to condemn or adjudicate anyone under our law. Nor are they to preside over the custody of prisons, lest Christians who are sometimes shut away, as commonly happens, suffer a second prison through the hatreds of their guards. Let them not dare again to build any synagogue; for if they do, let them know that it will profit the building of the Catholic Church and that the authors of the building are to be fined fifty pounds of gold, permission being granted them only to repair the ruins of their synagogues. Any Jew who turns a slave or free person, against his will or by punishable persuasion, from the worship of the Christian religion to an impious sect or rite shall, after losing his resources, be punished capitally and consigned to the most just penalty of blood, since by perverse doctrine he attacked the faith of another. Whoever of these has crept into honors is to be regarded, as before, as belonging to the lowest condition, lest we seem to have furnished to execrable men the insulting benefit of immunity.

Childebert, king of the Franks:

> From the Lord's Supper until the first Easter, Jews are to be denied permission to walk through the streets or forum as if for the sake of insult.

These provisions too are renewed in the same Council of Meaux. Priscus, bishop of the Church of Lyon; Artemius of Sens; Remigius of Bourges; and Saint Syagrius, bishop of Autun, with many others, renewing ecclesiastical statutes, determined as follows:

> Jews are not to be appointed judges over Christian peoples or permitted to be tax collectors, through which Christians might seem--may God avert it--to be subject to them. From the Lord's Supper until the first Easter, according to the pronouncement of the lord King Childebert of good memory, Jews are to be denied permission to walk through the streets or forum as if for the sake of insult. They are to show reverence to all priests and clerics of the Lord, and they are not to presume to have a seat before priests unless ordered to do so. If they should perhaps presume to do this, let them be constrained by the judges of the places according to the person's condition. No Christian is to presume to participate in the banquets of Jews. If any cleric or secular person should presume to do this--which it is impious even to say--let whoever has been polluted by their impieties know that he is to be restrained from the fellowship of all Christians.
>
> And although it was long ago established, not only by canonical provisions but also by the benefits of the laws, what rule ought to be observed concerning Christians who, either by an incursion of captivity or by any frauds, become entangled in service to Jews, nevertheless, because the complaint of certain men has now arisen that some Jews dwelling throughout cities or towns have broken out into such insolence and wantonness that Christians, even when protesting, cannot be released from their service even at a price, therefore, by the authority of God, we decree in the present Council that henceforth no Christian ought to serve Jews. Upon payment of twelve solidi for any slave, any Christian shall have permission to redeem that slave either into free status or into service. For it is impious that those whom Christ the Lord redeemed by the shedding of his blood should remain entangled in the chains of persecutors. If any Jew is unwilling to acquiesce in what we have established, for as long as he delays accepting the established money, the slave himself shall be permitted to live with Christians wherever he wishes. We also specially decree that, if any Jew is convicted of having persuaded a Christian slave to adopt the Jewish rite, he shall both lose that slave and be punished by legal condemnation.

Third, familiarity and banquets with Jews are forbidden. Thus in the same Council the pronouncements of the ancients are recounted. Saint Alcimus Avitus, bishop of the Church of Vienne; Saint Apollinaris of the Church of Valence; Saint Gregory, bishop of the Church of Langres; and Saint Viventiolus, bishop of the Church of Lyon, assembled in the name of the Lord with twenty other bishops, enacted as follows:

> If a cleric of superior rank participates in the banquet of any heretic, he shall not possess the peace of the Church for the space of a year. If junior clerics presume to do this, they shall be beaten. Our constitution has also prohibited laymen from the banquets of Jews; and whoever has been polluted by a Jewish banquet is not to eat bread with any of our clerics.

The same precaution is taken by the Council of Basel, session 19:

> Further renewing the sacred canons, we command both diocesan bishops and secular powers to prohibit by every means Jews or other unbelievers from possessing Christian men or women as household members or servants, or as nurses of their children; and to prohibit Christians from associating with them at their festivals, weddings, banquets, or baths, or through excessive intercourse. They are not to appoint them as physicians, public matchmakers for marriages, or mediators of other contracts; nor are they to place them over other public offices or admit them to any scholastic degrees. Estates or other ecclesiastical revenues are not to be leased to them. They are also to be prohibited, under penalty of loss of the object, from buying ecclesiastical books, chalices, crosses, and other ornaments of churches, or, under penalty of loss of the money lent, from receiving them as pledges. Under grave penalties they are also to be compelled to wear some manner of dress by which they can be plainly distinguished from Christians. In order that their excessive concentration may be avoided, they are to be compelled in some places in cities and towns to live separately from Christians, and as far as possible at a greater distance from churches. On Sundays and other solemn feast days they are not to presume to keep their shops open or to work in public.

The same provisions are established in the Council of Vienne under Clement IV.

Fourth, a distinctive dress and residence are prescribed for them, so that it may be evident that they do not belong to the state. The Council of Salzburg:

> It is not a matter of doubtful law that the Hebrew nation ought to be separated from the faithful people of the Crucified by some outward mark of distinction. Hence Guido of holy memory, cardinal priest with the title of Saint Lawrence in Lucina and legate of the most holy Apostolic See to this our province, prudently decreed and established that Jews appearing in public ought to wear a horned hat. We command those who do not wear it to be punished with a monetary fine. But we, wishing so far as lies in us to bring the good intention of the aforesaid legate into effect, command and strictly enjoin, under sentence of excommunication, all secular powers, of whatever condition and preeminence they may be and by whatever name they may be called--whether they are communities or individual presidents of a state--that, personally or through their own servants, they immediately punish with a monetary penalty, to be assessed according to their judgment, every Jew who does not wear such a hat in public, notwithstanding any condition, appeal, or frivolous excuse.

[Printed page 681]

This cannot be a matter of doubtful law, because it had already been decreed in the Lateran Council under Innocent III, chapter 68:

> In some provinces a diversity of dress distinguishes Jews or Saracens from Christians, but in certain places such confusion has grown up that they are distinguished by no difference. Hence it sometimes happens that through error Christians have intercourse with the women of Jews or Saracens, and Jews or Saracens with Christian women.

And the Council of Vienne under Clement IV:

> Likewise, since the Jews have grown to so great an insolence that the purity of Catholic holiness is already said to be defiled through them among very many Christians, we strictly command--not so much coining new provisions as renewing the ancient statutes of the Supreme Pontiff--that Jews, who ought to be distinguished in dress from Christians, resume the horned hat which some in these regions were accustomed to wear and which they have presumed to set aside through their own obstinacy, so that they may be plainly distinguished from Christians, as was formerly determined in a general Council.

The Council of Vienne prescribed a horned hat; Ravenna, according to rubric 23, prescribed that men wear a wheel of yellow color upon their outer garments and that women wear the same sign upon the head. Paul IV confined the Jews to one part of the city and forbade them to practice usury. He willed that they wear a hat of yellow color by which they could be distinguished from the rest. Thus in his life.

I can by no means omit setting forth the most salutary statutes concerning Jews of the First Council of Milan under the most holy man Charles Borromeo:

> In order that, as far as we can, we may take from Jews the opportunity to corrupt the morals of Christians and to take their goods from them by fraud, and endeavor to lead the Jews themselves to the way of salvation, we decree, also from the ordinances of the sacred canons:
>
> That Jews, always and wherever they make a journey, shall wear--the men a hat or cap of yellow color; the women a cloth of the same color placed upon the rest of the covering of the head.
>
> That Christians are not to attend the banquets, weddings, feast days, or synagogues of Jews; nor are they to play with them or, what is more detestable, dance with Jews.
>
> That Christians cannot be in the service of Jews.
>
> That if Christians hire their labor to Jews for a day or an hour, they are not to take food among them.
>
> That Christian women cannot under any agreement be nurses of Jews in their houses; nor outside their houses unless necessity, to be approved by the ordinary, demands it.
>
> That Christians are not to summon Jews to themselves for the sake of medical treatment.
>
> That they are not to employ their services in joining marriages among themselves.
>
> That Christian women are not to employ Jews for the sake of cosmetics, pigments, or arranging their appearance.
>
> That fields or ecclesiastical estates may not be leased to Jews, nor vestments, vessels, or other sacred objects or things destined for the use of the Church be sold or given to them as pledges.
>
> That Jews are not to dwell in houses situated near a church; and if any now dwell in them, they are to be compelled to move altogether within a fixed time.
>
> That Christians are not to dare to contract with Jews on feast days, whether in the name of purchase, sale, or anything else.
>
> That during the three days before Easter Jews are not to go out in public or dare to do anything openly or secretly in contempt of the Christian religion.
>
> That Jews are not to possess any dignity or public office which can in any way concern Christians.

Let bishops, princes, and magistrates, each according to the function of his authority and after establishing more severe penalties against Christians and Jews, take care that these and the remaining provisions which are established by the sacred canons concerning the intercourse of Christians with Jews are preserved inviolate.

We also earnestly ask princes to establish in each city a fixed place where Jews may assemble to dwell separately from Christians. If Jews possess any houses of their own in the city, let them order that within six months they be sold to Christians by a true and not a pretended contract.

In addition, princes, in accordance with their piety, will have to establish that Jews, in recording in their books any contracts and transactions which they have with Christians, use the letters and vernacular language of our people, and not Hebrew language or characters. If they act otherwise, let them be severely punished, and let no right of action or defense arise for them from it.

Finally, it will be equitable for them to exert every diligence to repress and restrain the fraudulent and treacherous manner in which Jews contract with Christians, and the avarice which gapes after their resources.

But we admonish bishops to take care that the Christian faith and doctrine be preached to Jews by pious men skilled in the Hebrew language and Jewish rites, or, if such men cannot be found, by other learned and good men.

Let all Jews be ordered to assemble for those sermons; but let the boys and girls hear the preacher separately from their parents and from those who are older. Let him instruct them familiarly and respond kindly to those who ask questions.

Let anyone in whom some sign of conversion is recognized be separated from the others and led into a house of catechumens prepared for this purpose, where he may be taught more diligently everything which a Christian ought to know.

Let catechumens not be baptized unless they have first been diligently instructed and examined, especially if they are older.

After they have been baptized, let them be entrusted for at least a year to the care of some upright man, who may rule and regulate their life by these provisions:

> That on feast days they attend Mass, sermons, and Vespers.
>
> That on other days they employ some craft by which they can seek sustenance.
>
> That they have no association whatever with Jews.
>
> Nor with Christians whose life is disgraceful.

Let the bishop take care that a Jew who converts to the faith possesses all his goods; and, if he is a son under paternal power, that the legitimate and every other part of the goods due to him by law be given to him even while his father lives.

[Printed page 682]

Or, if the convert is a woman, let her dowry be restored to her by her husband or established by her father, from which she can be supported according to the prescription of the constitution of Pope Paul III, especially in those matters which he established concerning resources acquired by usuries.

Fifth, public offices also are forbidden to them. This is a sign that they are altogether foreign to the state. Thus the Lateran Council under Innocent III, chapter 69:

> Since it is exceedingly absurd that a blasphemer of Christ should exercise the force of power over Christians--a matter concerning which the Council of Toledo made prudent provision--we renew it in this chapter because of the boldness of transgressors, prohibiting Jews from being preferred to public offices, since under such a pretext they are exceedingly hostile to Christians.
>
> But if anyone commits such an office to them, after an admonition has first been made, let him be restrained by the provincial council--which we command to be celebrated every year--with the constraint which is fitting. But let communion with Christians, in commerce and other things, be denied to an official of this kind until whatever he acquired from Christians through the occasion of the office thus assumed is converted to the use of poor Christians according to the providence of the diocesan bishop; and let him relinquish with shame the office which he irreverently assumed. We extend this same provision to pagans.

Since, therefore, their clothing, habitation, and all the other things collected here tend to this end, that Christians should have no dealings with Jews; and since all judge that this concerns the state and the Church, this cannot be obtained better than if they are entirely expelled. Poisonous beasts are never in a house without danger, even if they do not always bring forth their poison; for they do not do so either because they fear or because they are torpid. I do not believe that one can be indebted to Jews, associate familiarly with them, banquet with them, or have them move about in the courts of princes, consuls, and senators without great detriment to public safety, honor, justice, and morals.

CHAPTER XVIII

Those Who Need a Loan Should Be Assisted in Another Manner

§ 1. In a great multitude of rich and beneficent men there would be no lack of one who would liberally offer money as a loan to the needy, but negligence and the removal of trust make everyone timid.

> If anyone makes a loan, it is lost as though it were his own;
>
> When you now seek repayment, through your benefit you find a friend an enemy.

Nothing is easier than to make enemies from a benefit.

> For the greatest part of mankind possesses this custom:
>
> While they seek what they desire for themselves, they are good; but when they now possess it,
>
> From good men they become the worst and most fraudulent.

Plautus, Trinummus.

The obstinacy, perfidy, and ingratitude of certain debtors cause all those whom poverty oppresses to suffer punishment. A creditor is sometimes troublesome and burdensome, premature and savage, which is forbidden by law. More often, however, the debtor is fastidious and a defrauder. For those to whom something is owed generally ask for it humanely; but debtors, however gently you address them and whatever delay you grant, are indignant. If they are poor, they proclaim the creditor a tyrant; if they are magnates, they threaten as if by their own right. Especially in this matter, nothing so closes the fountain of doing good as the abuse of benefits. Nor can sufficient precaution be taken, nor is it customarily taken, although there is a mortgage and there are judges. Yet is it not burdensome to recover by force of arms what you gave to a friend? These matters must therefore be established seriously by the magistrate; clear debts must be judged quickly and summarily, and an obstinate debtor must be punished.

§ 2. Let the prince, or each city, make a loan from the treasury to its citizens, after fixing the day upon which it must be repaid and receiving a mortgage. This is exacted without envy and hatred; it does not permit the debtor to be negligent through hope in judicial proceedings, and it binds those who are in need. Many princes have attained great praise from this and fortified themselves with the firmest defense of majesty, that is, love.

§ 3. A perpetual remedy for usuries is the institution which they call a mount of piety. This, therefore, was also a special object of care for Charles, archbishop of Milan, in the First Council:

> Let bishops apply all their care and labor to erecting and instituting, by authority of the Supreme Pontiff, in each city and more notable town, the pious establishments which are called mounts of piety, from which the poor can receive borrowed money. Let them take care that both these and those already established are administered diligently and faithfully. We beseech princes and magistrates to assist the zeal and diligence of the bishops in this matter by every means. In them let nothing beyond the principal be received except for the maintenance of the ministers and other necessary expenses, and this by authority of the Supreme Pontiff.

Leo X ended the controversy which had arisen concerning the mounts. His edict reads as follows:

> Leo, bishop, servant of the servants of God, for perpetual remembrance of the matter, with the holy Council approving. Among the manifold cares of our solicitude, in accordance with our pastoral office we ought especially to undertake this one: that those things which in our time are salutary and praiseworthy, consonant with the Catholic faith and conformable to good morals, should not only be unfolded but also propagated to posterity; and that things which could furnish material for scandal should be completely cut down and torn out by the roots, and not permitted to sprout anywhere. Thus we permit only those things to be cultivated in the field of the Lord and the vineyard of the Lord of Hosts by which the minds of the faithful can be spiritually fed, after the tares have been eradicated and the sterility of the wild olive cut away.

Indeed, since we have learned that formerly a certain controversy arose, not without scandal and murmuring among the peoples, among some beloved sons, masters of sacred theology and doctors of both laws, and that it has recently been renewed in these days concerning the relief of the poor by loans made to them under public authority, which are commonly called mounts of piety; these have been established in many cities of Italy by the magistrates of cities and other faithful of Christ to relieve by such a loan the poverty of the poor, lest they be swallowed by the abyss of usuries, and they have been praised and advocated by holy men who preach the divine word, and have also been approved and confirmed by some Supreme Pontiffs, our predecessors. The question is whether the aforesaid mounts disagree with Christian doctrine or not, with each party thinking and preaching differently.

For some masters and doctors say that those mounts are not lawful in which, after a fixed time has elapsed, something beyond the principal is exacted per pound by the ministers of the mount from the poor themselves to whom the loan is given; and that consequently they do not escape the crime of usuries or injustice, or some certain appearance of evil, since our Lord, as Luke the Evangelist bears witness, has bound us by an open command that from a loan given we ought to hope for nothing beyond the principal. For this is the proper interpretation of usuries: namely, when one endeavors from the use of a thing which does not beget to acquire profit and offspring without any labor, expense, or danger.

[Printed page 683]

The same masters and doctors also added that in these mounts neither commutative nor distributive justice is satisfied, although a contract of this kind ought not to exceed the limits of justice if it is to be approved. They also endeavored to prove this because the expenses owed by many, as they say, for the preservation of mounts of this kind are extorted only from the poor to whom the loan is given; and because sometimes several things beyond the necessary and moderate expenses are furnished to certain other persons, not without an appearance of evil and an incentive to offend, as they seem to imply.

But many other masters and doctors assert the contrary, and in many schools of Italy proclaim by word and writing, in favor of so great a good and one so necessary to the state, that, provided nothing is sought or expected by reason of the loan, nevertheless, for the indemnity of those mounts--that is, for the expenses of their ministers and of all things pertaining to their necessary preservation, without profit to mounts of this kind--something moderate and necessary may lawfully be exacted and received beyond the principal from those who receive an advantage from a loan of this kind; for the rule of law holds that one who receives an advantage ought also to bear the burden, especially if apostolic authority is added. They show that this opinion was approved by the Roman Pontiffs of happy memory Paul II, Sixtus IV, Innocent VIII, Alexander VI, and Julius II, our predecessors, and was also preached by holy and God-fearing preachers of evangelical truth who were held in great esteem because of their reputation for holiness.

Wishing to make suitable provision in this matter, as has been granted to us from on high, and commending the zeal of each party--the former from zeal for justice, lest an abyss of usuries be opened; the latter from love of piety and truth, so that the poor might be assisted--since these things seem to pertain to the peace and tranquility of the whole Christian state, with the holy Council approving we declare and define that the aforesaid mounts of piety, established by states and hitherto approved and confirmed by authority of the Apostolic See, in which, for their expenses and indemnity, something moderate is received beyond the principal solely for the expenses of ministers and of other matters pertaining to their preservation, as stated above, and solely for their indemnity, without profit to those mounts, neither display an appearance of evil nor furnish an incentive to sin; nor are they to be disapproved in any way. Rather, such a loan is meritorious and is to be praised and approved, and is by no means to be regarded as usurious. It is lawful to preach their piety and mercy to the peoples, even with indulgences granted for that reason by the holy Apostolic See; and henceforth other similar mounts may also be erected with the approval of the > Apostolic See.

>
> Nevertheless, it would be much more perfect and much holier if such mounts were established altogether free of charge; that is, if those who erect them assigned certain annual revenues from which, if not all, at least half of the expenses of the ministers of mounts of this kind might be paid, so that through this means the poor would happen to be burdened with a lighter portion of the money to be paid. We decree that the faithful of Christ are to be invited by greater indulgences to erect mounts for them, with the assignment of revenues of this kind for bearing the expenses. But we will that all religious, ecclesiastical, and secular persons who henceforth dare to preach by word or writing contrary to the form of the present declaration and sanction shall incur the penalty of excommunication already pronounced, notwithstanding any privilege whatever, the aforesaid matters, apostolic constitutions and ordinances, and all other things whatsoever to the contrary. Therefore let no one at all be permitted to infringe this page of our declaration, definition, decree, and excommunication, or to oppose it by a rash attempt. If anyone should presume to attempt this, let him know that he will incur the indignation of Almighty God and of his blessed apostles Peter and Paul.

In those mounts, therefore, the following things are necessary:

1. The loan must be given altogether without charge.

2. Something is to be given for the maintenance of the ministers, who do not render their services without charge.

3. A house must also be established and pledges preserved, which cannot be done without some expense.

4. Those expenses must be equalized, so that the poor are not burdened more than the rich.

5. There is nothing usurious in these things. For if a person gives a loan, employs witnesses and a notary, and orders a pledge to be inspected or brought in, it is not equitable that these things be done at the expense of the person who gave the loan.

6. Nevertheless, one must endeavor to establish the mounts altogether free of charge, for thus every cause of suspicion will be removed. This can be done by either of two methods, or by both. First, let an annual revenue be purchased by which the necessary expenses may be borne. Second, let great, trustworthy, and rich men discharge without charge the offices of scribes, tellers, and custodians. Nor, in so pious a matter, is the labor beneath anyone’s dignity. For if in Italy and Spain, and now also in Gaul and Germany, noble and senatorial men go to seek alms for the poor, and it is not contrary to their reputation to be ambassadors of the poor, but adorns their dignity more than any purple; indeed, if it redounds to the great glory of Christ that men clothed in purple and the rich of this age are vicars and procurators of his poor, that they are not high-minded but fear, and that they do not regard poverty, preferred in the life of their Lord to every scepter, as disgraceful--if kings and princes minister to the poor, why should a rich man not also act as a scribe and doorkeeper of the poor? What they do for one of the least of these, they do for Christ. Every office rendered to Christ is above every dignity and is altogether royal, because to serve God is to reign.

CHAPTER XIX

Other Methods of Collecting Money, as Customary as They Are Condemned

§ 1. Suetonius relates the following concerning Nero. But when his hope deceived him, and he was abandoned and now so exhausted and needy that it was necessary even to postpone and defer the soldiers' pay and the veterans' rewards, he turned his attention to calumnies and robberies. Before all else, he established that from the goods of deceased freedmen three quarters, in place of one half, should be exacted for him from those who, without a probable cause, bore the name of any family with which he himself was connected.

This was an immense increase of plunder. For whereas the fisc had previously claimed one half, that is, half the inheritance, Nero received three quarters--that is, nine ounces out of twelve. If the inheritance was twelve thousand, the emperor entered upon nine and the heir three.

§ 2. He established that the testaments of those ungrateful to the prince should pass to the fisc, and that the learned men who had written or dictated them should not go unpunished.

An immense abyss under a robber prince. The prince was named in the testaments of all men, especially the wealthy, which was a great thing. Next, no small portion had to be assigned to him, lest he be placed after private persons. Third, he rescinded as ungrateful the testaments of former chief centurions, even of those who had made their wills under Tiberius; thus Suetonius, chapter 38. The chief centurions whose inheritances he seized were rich. From this it is clear that those of whom he was not himself the heir were called ungrateful.

[Printed page 684]

§ 3. To kill those by whom he had been named heir. This was the invention of Gaius, Suetonius. When fear had thereby been instilled, and he was now openly named heir both by strangers among their friends and by parents among their children, he called them mockers because they persisted in living after naming him, and sent poisoned cakes to many.

§ 4. To take rights away from citizens and compel them to purchase them again. Suetonius. He denied that those whose ancestors had obtained Roman citizenship for themselves and their posterity possessed it by right, unless they were sons, for he said that "posterity" ought not to be understood beyond this degree. When the diplomas of the deified Julius and Augustus were brought forward, he lamented them as old and obsolete.

There was more profit in this than even anyone acquainted with Roman affairs could understand. For in this census there was a part of the Romans which, if not the greatest, was certainly immense and consisted of many myriads who possessed citizenship by gift or purchase, not by birth. It was purchased for a great sum, especially under that robber, and from others by those who already enjoyed it; nor was it safe not to purchase again what they possessed, lest they lose life itself.

§ 5. He also accused those census declarations as falsely made to which any increase whatsoever had afterward accrued for any reason. He rescinded as ungrateful the testaments of chief centurions who from the beginning of Tiberius's principate had left neither Tiberius nor himself heir; likewise, he rescinded as invalid and void those of all others whom anyone said had intended to die with Caesar as heir.

But why did he do this? Because much had accrued to many; and fraud in a submitted census declaration was punished by death, exile, loss of liberty, or certainly confiscation. Consider that among so great a multitude something had accrued to ten thousand men: that monster therefore devoured as many estates through a single calumny--but a most carefully devised calumny.

§ 6. To turn judicial inquiry toward profit. Suetonius. He heard cases of this kind only after first fixing their price; and, impatient of delay, on one occasion condemned more than forty defendants from different charges by a single sentence, and boasted to Caesonia, when she awoke from sleep, how much business he had conducted while she took her midday rest.

For he obtained forty inheritances by one judgment, and apparently splendid ones; for calumnies were contrived against the rich. Next, it is credible that the defendants in whose trials Caligula himself sat were distinguished men.

§ 7. To compel men to buy worthless things at an immense price. Suetonius. After announcing an auction, he offered and sold the remnants of all the spectacles, demanding the prices himself and extending them so far that certain men, compelled to purchase some things for an immense price and stripped of their goods, cut their veins. The affair of Aponius Saturninus is famous. While he was sleeping among the benches, Gaius warned the auctioneer not to overlook a man of praetorian rank who was repeatedly nodding his head to him; nor was an end made of bidding until thirteen gladiators were knocked down to the unaware man for nine million sesterces.

§ 8. To mingle every fraud with a sale. Suetonius. In Gaul also, after he had sold at immense prices the ornaments and household goods, slaves, and even freedmen of his condemned sisters, he was enticed by the profit and demanded from the city whatever belonged to the equipment of the old palace. Even hired vehicles and mill animals were seized for carrying it, so that bread often became scarce at Rome and many litigants, because they were absent and could not appear for their recognizance, lost their cases. In selling this equipment he employed every kind of fraud and allurement: at one time reproaching individuals for avarice and asking why they were not ashamed to be wealthier than he; at another time feigning regret that he was giving private persons the opportunity to possess things belonging to princes.

§ 9. To deduct a portion of sums in litigation. Suetonius. For lawsuits and judgments begun anywhere, he deducted a fortieth part of the sum concerning which the litigation was conducted; nor was anyone without penalty if he was convicted of having settled or given up the business.

How great was that plunder from all the lawsuits in so great an empire? Those times abounded in lawsuits between the greatest and richest men, so that I judge, not without cause, that the sum of all property in litigation was equal to a great kingdom. Indeed, I think it is so even now. By that law, therefore, he seized a fortieth part of some kingdom.

§ 10. To pursue every disgraceful profit. From the daily earnings of porters he took an eighth part; from the takings of prostitutes, as much as each earned from one act of intercourse. It was added to the heading of the law that both those who had practiced prostitution and those who had practiced procuring were held liable to the public treasury, and that marriages also were subject to it.

It is a small matter to relate, but because of the multitude of porters it was a great tax throughout the whole empire. Shame prohibits speaking about the prostitutes' takings. Yet no one ought to doubt that, in blind paganism and amid so great a corruption of morals under Augustus, Tiberius, and Caligula, many legions could have been supported from the lusts of criminals. At Corinth, in the single temple of Venus, four thousand prostitutes earned money. But it is better that this Camarina remain unmoved.

§ 11. To impose these things and not publish them, so that transgression might occur through ignorance of the law. Suetonius. After taxes of this kind had been imposed but not posted, and many offenses were committed through ignorance of the writing, at last, when the Roman people demanded it, he indeed posted the law, but in the smallest letters and in the narrowest place, so that no one could copy it.

These things were imposed but not posted; yet the people's demand shows that enforcement was at hand and that penalties were imposed upon those who violated the law.

§ 12. To establish a domestic brothel. Suetonius. Lest he fail to try any kind of booty, he established a brothel in the palace; and, after a number of chambers had been divided and furnished in accordance with the dignity of the place, matrons and freeborn youths stood in them. He sent nomenclators around the marketplaces and basilicas to invite young and old to lust. Money at interest was furnished to those who came, and men were stationed to record their names openly, as though they were assisting Caesar's revenues.

§ 13. To play at dice and perjure oneself. Not scorning profit even from the game of dice, he gained more by falsehood and even perjury.

§ 14. To confiscate the wealthy. Once, after entrusting his own turn to the player next to him, he went out into the atrium of the house. When he had ordered two wealthy Roman knights who were passing by to be seized and their goods confiscated without delay, he returned exulting and boasted that he had never had a more prosperous throw of the dice.

§ 15. To compel contributions. When his daughter was born, complaining of his poverty and of the burdens not only of an emperor but now also of a father, he received contributions for the maintenance and dowry of the girl. He also proclaimed that he would receive New Year's gifts at the beginning of the year, and stood in the vestibule of the palace on the Kalends of January to catch the contributions which a crowd of every kind poured before him with full hands and folds of their garments.

§ 16. To conduct the harshest levies. Caligula also did this, and it was customary to force onto the rolls those young men who would purchase exemption at a great price. Nor are those who compel countrymen to take up arms now ignorant of these arts.

[Printed page 685]

§ 17. How great were the robberies produced by that law of Nero. Suetonius says that then all deeds and words for which only an informer was not lacking were held liable under the law of treason, chapter 32.

How monstrous and barbarous that law was! For men were deprived of life for every word, not merely for deeds; and the goods which the avaricious and needy tyrant sought fell to the fisc.

§ 18. He also recalled the rewards of crowns which cities had ever conferred upon him in contests.

Thus he demands back, as though it were a debt, what had once been given in friendship. Lipsius treats most learnedly of crowns and crown-gold in book 2 of Roman Greatness, chapter 9. At first it was given to victorious commanders for the sake of honor; afterward it was severely exacted and contributed on various occasions, not for a triumph alone, as is clear from the same Lipsius, for two thousand were contributed for Sulla's funeral. But all the cities had sent Nero crowns of great price for his theatrical contests. He demands these back, or their gold.

§ 19. By calumny to despoil the shops of merchants. Suetonius. When he had prohibited the use of amethyst and Tyrian colors and had secretly sent a man to sell a few ounces on market day, he shut up all the merchants.

How great that spoil was can be considered by one who has estimated the Roman markets.

§ 20. To strip the rich of their goods for a single transgression. Indeed, he is believed, while singing, to have noticed among the spectators a matron dressed in the forbidden purple and pointed her out to his procurators; she was immediately dragged away and stripped not only of her garment but also of her goods.

§ 21. To impel all intermediate magistrates to robberies. Suetonius. He delegated an office to no one without adding, "You know what I need"; and, "Let us see to it that he possesses nothing."

§ 22. Suetonius. At last he took gifts from many temples and melted down images made of gold or silver, among them the images of the household gods, which Galba soon restored.

§ 23. To beg monies from allies; thus Julius in Spain. Suetonius, chapter 54. He displayed self-restraint neither in military commands nor in magistracies. For, as certain men testified in their memorials, when proconsul in Spain he received from the allies monies begged as assistance toward his debt.

§ 24. To plunder towns without cause. Suetonius on Julius. He plundered in hostile fashion certain towns of the Lusitanians, although they neither refused his commands nor closed their gates when he approached. In Gaul he despoiled shrines and temples of the gods filled with gifts; he destroyed cities more often for plunder than for an offense. Hence it came about that he abounded in gold and sold it throughout Italy and the provinces at three thousand sesterces per pound as merchandise.

§ 25. To steal. Suetonius on Julius. In his first consulship he stole three thousand pounds of gold from the Capitol and put back the same weight of gilded bronze.

§ 26. To sell the property of others. Suetonius. He gave alliances and kingdoms for a price, as one who took nearly six thousand talents from Ptolemy alone in his own and Pompey's name.

§ 27. To seize without a pretext. Suetonius. Later, by the most evident robberies and sacrileges, he bore both the burdens of civil wars and the expenses of triumphs and public entertainments.

§ 28. Not to pay creditors. Thus Vitellius, as Dio of Nicaea relates. Then, when a man whom no one had previously been able to see in the forum because of the multitude of his creditors ascended the Capitol with so great a body of soldiers--and when at last everyone worshiped a man whom previously no one had even wished freely to embrace--those who laughed could not restrain themselves. But when those who had lent him a great sum as he was departing for Germany pressed him and scarcely permitted him to depart after sureties had been given, they then not only did not laugh but, moved by pity, even concealed him. Vitellius, however, afterward sought out his creditors, said that he had returned safety in exchange for the money lent, and demanded back the instruments of the contracts.

He frequently came to the theaters in order to attract the affections of the plebs to himself. He dined familiarly together with the leading men so that he might bind them to himself to a greater degree. He often mentioned his old companions and held them in honor. For he did not think it disgraceful or unworthy if he appeared to recognize anyone from among them--a thing which most men do who, raised to the greatest and unexpected honors, hate those by whom they understand that they were known when previously humble and abject.

§ 29. To proscribe the friends of enemies. Thus Severus. For when he had defeated Albinus, he proscribed the friends of Albinus's soldiers and commanders, and left to his sons as much money as no one else.

§ 30. To have the soldier himself as a source of revenue. Tacitus indicates the method. For the common soldier paid as though an annual tribute. Some wandered among the companies; others on furlough or in the camp itself, until they paid the fee to the centurion; and no one gave thought either to the measure of the burden or to the kind of profit. By brigandage and plunder, or by servile services, a soldier purchased freedom from military duty. Then every wealthiest soldier was worn down by labor and savagery until he purchased exemption. When, exhausted by expenses, he had miserably languished in idleness, he returned to the company, poor instead of rich and slothful instead of vigorous. And in turn one after another, corrupted by the same poverty and license, rushed into sedition and dissension and, finally, civil wars.

§ 31. To have a compact and partnership with pirates. The viceroy of Algiers is accustomed to do this.

§ 32. To kill those who have discharged magistracies. The emperor of the Turks possesses this custom. His principal revenues come from confiscations and gifts. Thus the Political Treasury, concerning the empire of the Turks:

> And although the ordinary revenues in the Turkish Empire do not exceed the sum which we have stated, it can nevertheless scarcely be believed how much accrues extraordinarily to the prince's treasury, especially from confiscations and gifts. For pashas and other Turkish ministers suck out the blood and fortunes of the subjects like > swallows, and accumulate inestimable treasures, which in the end generally pass to the prince's fisc. Ibrahim Pasha is said to have carried away from Cairo sixty times one hundred thousand gold pieces, that is, six million. Mehmed the vizier had acquired for himself a much greater sum. Occhiali possessed, in addition to other immense riches, three thousand slaves. The sultana, sister of Selim II, received each day two thousand five hundred sequins or crowns, and began to conduct an aqueduct for the convenience of pilgrims from Cairo all the way to Mecca--certainly an incredible work. It is easy for the sultan to find some cause for taking away from anyone, at his pleasure, life together with fortune.

The gifts also are great and immense. For no ambassador dares to approach him without a gift. No one can obtain any office or dignity unless money intervenes. No one comes into the sight of so great a prince from a province over which he presided, or from an expedition which he conducted, with empty hands. Nor are trifles or farthings given to so great a prince. The voivodes of Moldavia, Wallachia, and Transylvania redeem and preserve their principalities by gifts. The princes of Moldavia and Wallachia are changed very frequently; for those principalities are given to those who offer more. In order to fulfill their promises, these men do not shear but flay their peoples and reduce their provinces to poverty.

Nevertheless, in an earlier period we saw the treasuries of the Turks exhausted by the Persian war and almost all their treasures consumed. In recent years, both at Constantinople and throughout the whole Turkish Empire, the price of gold was increased beyond what can be believed, so that a gold coin was worth twice as much as previously. Moreover, the very substance of the gold and silver was so adulterated that the Janissaries, seizing an occasion from this, set fire to the city of Constantinople and struck immense fear not only into the citizens but also into the sultan himself. At that time, sixty thousand gold pieces had indeed been sought as a loan in the sultan's name from the merchants of Aleppo.

[Printed page 686]

§ 33. To sell honors and judgments. Thus Vespasian, Suetonius, chapter 16. The only thing for which he is deservedly blamed is his desire for money. For, not content with having recalled the taxes omitted under Galba, added new and heavy ones, increased the tributes of the provinces, and even doubled those of some, he openly practiced dealings which would have been shameful even for a private person, buying up certain things only so that he might afterward sell them for more. Nor did he hesitate to sell offices to candidates and acquittals to defendants, the innocent no less than the guilty.

§ 34. To sell the possessions of the rich. Dio on Caligula. There it was a public crime to be rich; and when he himself sold their possessions, he obtained much more money from them because everyone was compelled to buy for more than the things were worth.

CHAPTER XX

The Defense of the Nobility Makes a Prince Powerful

§ 1. A question much debated both formerly and now is whether it is advantageous for a powerful prince to have no powerful prince beneath him, and to leave nobles and commoners undistinguished, so that the sole nobility is to have been honored by the king; or whether account is indeed to be taken of nobility by birth. Nor is the matter debated only in words, but is conducted in deed, as the disagreement of rulers shows. To leave other things unmentioned, in Europe most affairs are conducted through the nobility, and especially in Germany a strict distinction of marriages is observed. On the contrary, however, the emperor of the Turks holds even all the highest pashas as slaves, nor is any nobility acknowledged except being pleasing to the master--which is properly the good fortune of a slave. For since he belongs wholly to his master, both in use and in ownership, he can rely on nothing other than his master's goodwill. This administration, therefore, has pleased many, and it has seemed safe that after the prince all should be slaves or equals, that no one should be accounted noble--a practice which obtains also among the Chinese. If there are no nobles, let none be made; if there are, let them gradually be reduced to the ordinary rank. I shall therefore also set forth my own opinion concerning this matter, so that it may be made clear what is to be followed amid these varieties of ruling.

A prince is not of great spirit if only ignoble and servile men attend him, nor is he of proven judgment if boorishness and stupidity win men a place among his ministers.

§ 2. I am not unaware that no Appian or Lentulan lineage is to be preferred to virtue, and that virtue is the sole and only nobility. We are all born with an equal lot; we are distinguished by virtue alone, as Minucius admonishes: "He who boasts of his lineage praises what belongs to others." What is best is also noblest. Indeed Euripides rightly says:

> πολλοὶ γὰρ ὄντες εὐγενεῖς, εἰσὶν κακοί.

Many nobles are wicked. Hence Nazianzen also says most excellently:

> Κακὸς δ᾽ ἀκούων, αἰσχύνου, μηδὲ δυσγενής,
>
> γένος γὰρ εἰσὶν οἱ πάλαι σεσηπότες.

If you hear yourself called wicked, blush; do not blush if you are called ignoble. For the lineage which is esteemed consists of those who rotted long ago--perhaps men who were thieves, adulterers, and robbers.

> οὐδὲ ἵππον ταχὺν ποιεῖ τὸ ἐκ τῶν ταχυτάτων φῦναι.

Nor does descent from the swiftest make a horse swift.

Agapetus therefore gives a golden precept:

> Ἐπὶ προγόνων εὐγενείᾳ μηδεὶς ἐναβρυνέσθω· πηλὸν γὰρ ἔχουσι πάντες τοῦ γένους προπάτορα· καὶ οἱ ἐν πορφύρᾳ καὶ βύσσῳ τρυφώμενοι, οἱ δὲ ἐν πενίᾳ καὶ νόσῳ τρυχώμενοι, καὶ οἱ διαδήματα περικείμενοι, καὶ οἱ διὰ δώματα προκείμενοι. μὴ τοίνυν εἰς πηλὸν καυχώμεθα, ἀλλ᾽ ἐπὶ χρηστότητι σεμνυνώμεθα τρόπων.

Let no one insolently exalt himself on account of the nobility of his ancestors. For all have clay as the founder of their lineage: both those magnificently and gloriously clothed in purple and fine linen, and those worn down by poverty and diseases; both those upon whom diadems have been imposed, and those who are stationed before houses for the sake of guarding them. Let us therefore not boast of our clay-born lineage, but let us render ourselves venerable and commendable by innocence and uprightness of conduct.

And indeed Charlemagne preferred the nobility of virtue to smoke-blackened ancestral images; from this comes the nearly most ancient nobility of Germany--he preferred the former.

Henry Mutius, book 8 On German Affairs, and Aventinus, book 4 of the Annals of the Bavarians, report that the emperor entered the schools of Paris and, having learned that the poor were making great advances in their studies while the nobles languished in idleness, placed the former on his right, promised them bishoprics and civil dignities, and neglected the nobles--an action truly worthy of a king. For to what purpose is a boorish and idle nobility? There is need of prudence, labor, and vigor.

I therefore do not dispute how highly nobility is to be valued, but rather this point which pertains to the matter: whether it is advantageous for the nobility to be fostered and advanced to dignities while commoners are neglected, or whether the nobility ought instead to be pressed down, commoners raised on high, and all things made equal.

§ 3. In the Turkish state there are only distinctions of offices; all other conditions are servile, so much so that even the emperor's concubines are not accounted free, and the principal strength rests with men of the lowest condition. In the Roman Empire, besides offices, there are hereditary or elective dignities.

The order of nobility is duke, count, baron, noble. I say of nobility, not of dignity or of offices. For the nobility of emperors can rank below that of a duke; furthermore, the dignity of electors and archdukes is not defined by nobility alone. The dignity of counts also varies: some are called counts simply, others margraves, others landgraves. From men noble by birth, and also from others, knights of the golden spur are made when they have conducted themselves bravely in battle; for then they attain that dignity. From these barons are made, in consideration of their virtues and power. One who conducted himself heroically in a first battle is created a noble; in a second, a military tribune; after a third, a baron. Then follow count, margrave, landgrave, duke, and king.

But what they say--that a noble must be wealthy and a knight still wealthier; that a military tribune ought to be able to lead forth at his own expense a troop of fifty nobles; that a baron must possess lower, middle, and basal jurisdiction, together with four castles of nobles; that a count-margrave must possess three baronies; that a landgrave must possess four baronies in one duchy; that a viscount, or princely count, must possess five counties; that a duke must possess four principal counties, and a county or barony annexed to each--this assuredly is not observed. A king is crowned if he has four contiguous duchies, and in each one four cities in which no one else possesses any right; in these cities one archbishop, and under four archbishops forty episcopal provinces. But--

[Printed page 687]

--these things have been received neither by firm law nor by custom. Among these men there is no equality of nobility, for the emperor is the fountain of nobility, chapter De decurionibus, law Imperatores, and the lineage of dukes is greater than that of counts. Nobility is therefore, as it were, recognizability, too narrowly called by the Greeks εὐγένεια, because men are well-born; for a man can be noble who by virtue gave a beginning to his own stock, who has borne offices, or who without administration attained nobility through honorary codicils. Nor is nobility solely in descendants; rather, it is often better in its first root. For descendants sometimes possess nothing from their ancestors except their images, empty of virtues and deeds; their nobility is cheaper than seaweed to the ancient poet.

§ 4. Kings and princes must act so that they have lesser princes, petty rulers, counts, and nobles whose continual service they may employ at home and in war; for this is a firm defense of the state. When between the royal summit and the son of the maidservant who sits at the mill there is no one in the middle, there is a great gap advantageous to the enemy. My reasons, insofar as reasons can be given in these matters, are strong.

The first reason. This was the form of all rightly constituted states: that the nobility possessed its own dignity. For one who is engaged in the state and debates concerning it, this consideration ought to be of great weight. I am not establishing a Platonic or ideal city, but one such as can and customarily does exist.

Certainly, in Numbers 1:16 I read that men newly emerged from servitude were called most noble princes, קריאים, "called men"; and in Deuteronomy 1:15, nobles, וידעים, "known men." Nobility therefore arose at once within the same nation and house. In 1 Samuel 9:6 a man is called ἔνδοξος, נכבד, honorable and weighty. So too Psalm 149:8; Job

14:21; Proverbs 31:23; Isaiah 3:5, 5:13, and 34:12; and Jeremiah 39:6. Indeed, Joseph too is praised as a noble councilor in Mark 15:43:

εὐσχήμων βουλευτής.

But let us not labor over the name. Whenever we hear of the princes of Israel, we ought to understand noblemen and leading men. There were also princes of Egypt of great dignity, and likewise those of the Persians, and before them of the Medes. The matter is clearer concerning the Roman state, which only late gave way to monarchy. Nebuchadnezzar, after living the life of a beast for seven years, was at last restored to his kingdom. "My leading men," he says, "and magistrates sought me," Daniel 4. Those who governed everything for seven years after their king had been lost were not of a servile disposition. The matter is established most clearly concerning the monarchy of the Medes from Daniel 6:12 and 15, and especially verse 7.

The kingdom of the Macedonians had many great princes and nobles. Nor was it generally otherwise in Greece, a region most fond of liberty. At Athens, as Plutarch relates in his Theseus, this distinction existed: for he named the nobles εὐπατρίδας and entrusted to them the care of discharging the magistracies. The nobility of Germany is the emperor's one support; and, if there were concord, he could quickly obtain from it several thousand of the most select cavalrymen. Matters have reached such a point that even princes can accomplish nothing without the nobility. In Gaul they wage wars and administer the state; in Spain the principal roles in so vast an empire are also theirs. The nobility has grown to a remarkable degree, increased by the offices of so many dukes, counts, prefects, and admirals, so that, unless newly ennobled men had come to its aid, the ancient nobility would have been unequal to so many affairs.

The kingdom of Britain also stood through the labor and care of the nobility, but especially Poland, where the nobility is very numerous and possesses great eminence in the state. It is not surprising that the Venetians foster nobility, for they have an aristocracy. No voyage is permitted without a company of nobles. By an ancient law of the Venetians, says Gregory of Toulouse, book 4, chapter 2, §13, it has been observed even from antiquity down to the present that the captain of every galley or trireme, wherever he journeys, should take with him eight sons of poor nobles, with a stipend of seventy gold coins. Necessary provisions of the kind nobles ought to have are to be furnished to them; and at the same time he is to permit each of them to import four thousand pounds of spices without payment of any naval duty and free of charge. Nevertheless, by votes of the senate these nobles are chosen from among many poor petitioners.

This is a great privilege of the nobility; for that reason it seems all the more remarkable to me that there should be poor nobles among them when there is so great an opportunity to become rich.

Since these things are so, the nobility must be defended and increased in every way. Nor are those political writers to be tolerated who suggest otherwise, for it belongs to a good man to preserve the condition of the state which exists and, if it did not exist, to recommend it.

The second reason. If, on the contrary, we examine the customs of disordered or perishing states, we shall observe that nobility is hateful to those who contrive to introduce either the tyranny of one man or the confusion of the multitude. To cut down the ears of grain that rise above the rest is an ancient maxim of tyranny. Nor is any concern greater for the Turk than to extirpate the nobility in conquered regions. At Rome also, those who stirred up seditions under the free state made it their policy to oppress the nobility. But after affairs had fallen under the decision of one man through the royal law, no men were more cruel toward the senate than those who proved to be the most oppressive tyrants--so much so that some began attempts to destroy the entire senate.

There are two reasons, arising from the different purpose of each, why a tyrant hates the nobility while a legitimate prince loves it. A tyrant wishes to be feared and considers it equitable that all others should be slaves, in accordance with the maxim: "Remember that everything is permitted to you, and against everyone." The nobility especially obstructs him in this, and therefore he fears and reveres it. For generous and martial spirits do not suffer themselves to be subjected slavishly; nor can a tyrant be so shameless that he does not blush for his crimes before weighty, prudent magnates. Since he does not wish there to be any whom he either fears or before whom he blushes, he desires the nobility to be removed from his midst.

A prince, however, because he has resolved to be an observer of law and equity, loves noblemen as the most faithful advocates of justice. He places his government before the eyes of men such as Paetus, Thrasea, Corbulo, and Seneca. Moreover, he judges it more honorable for the principate itself that his administration should be confirmed by the testimony and approval of such great men. Hence that magnificent and royal preface to edicts: “By the judgment of the kinsmen of princes, of the nobility, and of our counselors, we establish,” and so forth. Nero killed Seneca lest shame before his teacher burden his disgraceful life. Great is the authority of a good and great man over a ruined spirit. Nero could despise the present and posthumous reputation of the human race; he had learned to suppress his conscience and to hear flatteries of all his vices; before Seneca alone he blushed.

The third reason. Nobility is necessary in war; without it neither fidelity, courage, nor military prudence is furnished. I do not deny that there are some who have obtained nobility for themselves through war, but I deny that this is lasting. A state must be established so that it stands amid the great and moderate vices of the great, the middling, and the lowest, and does not perish through the fall of one man, as happened at Thebes when Epaminondas died.

[Printed page 688]

Above all nations the Romans exhibited fidelity to their fatherland, and this through the defense of tribunes, chief centurions, and knights--that is, nobles. Servile hands do not readily fight for their master through every danger. First, they acquire nothing for themselves except perhaps a more tolerable servitude. Second, they often experience an even harsher master when, exulting in victory, he treats more bitterly and insultingly those by whose wounds he conquered. Third, those raised in servitude esteem neither the good of a name nor that of a lineage; they are therefore easily conquered by fear or price. In this matter, then, the Turks err most of all: everyone encounters dangers through fear; no one does so through hope or love of his lord.

But where the honor of nobility is held in esteem, men rush into death through the desire to receive, preserve, and increase the distinction of their lineage. The daily pugnacity of the nobility supplies proof of this--vicious indeed, but suitable for demonstrating what I have proposed. If you call a nobleman a liar, faithless to his lord, a scoundrel, unwarlike, timid, or a fugitive, he immediately challenges you to a duel; men decide the dispute by the sword and regard it as disgraceful for the challenged man to evade it. Whence comes so great a desire for reputation and honor? From ancestral training and the discipline of military life, in which faithlessness and timidity are the greatest disgrace. Hence they regard it as contrary to their honor not to stand in battle, to desert the ranks, or not to aid the wounded; and their concern for honor and fidelity is greater than their concern for life.

Nobility therefore preserves fidelity and is consequently courageous, for those two qualities always cling together in war. No one preserves fidelity in difficult circumstances, amid flying javelins, unless he is courageous; and no one fights courageously and rises above dangers unless he has resolved not to violate his fidelity and oath even when death is set before him.

Trained by these rudiments, the nobility also cultivates military prudence above others, for this is, as it were, its craft, by which it renders service to the state. Those who in our age are judged to conduct wars most cautiously, the States of Holland, think no differently: for they place nobles, barons, and counts in command during war, although their domestic and civil council consists of commoners.

The fourth reason. Those who suddenly attain dignities without any hope of permanent nobility are readily carried away by insolence and conduct themselves without restraint in all things. They collect wealth most greedily, as though an opportunity had been granted only once. No men were richer than freedmen. Crassus was regarded as rich. “From the same nation,” says Pliny, book 33, chapter 10, “Marcus Crassus declared that no one was wealthy unless he could maintain a legion from his annual income. He possessed two hundred million sesterces in his estates and was the richest Roman citizen after Sulla. Nor was this enough unless he should hunger for all the gold of the Parthians." And although he may have secured for himself the very record of wealth--for it is pleasing to assail this insatiable desire for possession--we afterward knew many men released from slavery who were wealthier, including at the same time three under the principate of Claudius: Pallas, Callistus, and Narcissus. Behold, the richest of the Romans were slaves. Whence did their riches come except from robberies? There were many such men, but it was peculiar that three existed under the one Claudius, and while Claudius behaved as he did. There is no need to say anything about Rufinus, Eutropius, and others.

The present times show us the fortunes of ignoble men increased through administration of the state. In order that the matter may be understood, I shall set forth the words of the most famous political figure of our time, Johan van Oldenbarnevelt, advocate of the States. In his Apology he writes as follows:

> From these five royal embassies and negotiations it happened that the aforesaid kings supplied the States collectively with more than twenty-five million pounds. By payment of these, the confederated provinces--chiefly through my foresight--were freed, and the obligations were restored together with the pledged cities and citadels.

And:

> When I entered my office, with the greatest labors and difficulties the lords States of Holland and West Friesland could scarcely raise annually one million eight hundred thousand florins for the generality, to sustain the burdens of war. But at present they pay approximately four million two hundred thousand pounds. Here, however, it must be noted that the burdens of war during these thirty-two years in which I have held office have been so great and enormous that at present it is necessary for you to provide more for the burdens of Holland and West Friesland alone than could be collected in 1586 both for the burdens of the generality and for Holland and West Friesland in particular: namely, more than two million florins each year. These nevertheless are deducted and paid from the revenues of the fatherland in addition to the aforesaid four million two hundred thousand pounds. And although it is more expedient to burden the fatherland than to lose it, one must nevertheless observe wisely and providently--as the colleges of the Supreme and Provincial Councils and the prefects of accounts taught in writing in 1604--that, while burdens grow beyond revenues, provinces must necessarily fall at last into utter ruin. And if during the last ten years expenses had been made equal to those made during the preceding ten years, at this time the burdens of Holland and West Friesland alone would easily have consumed about four million florins annually. The conclusion of the truce applied a remedy to this evil, after many other dangers and troubles, foreseen as well as unknown, had passed.

In these difficulties of the fatherland and amid so great a public debt, do you suppose the wealth of its rulers to have been diminished? See what he recounts:

1. He had received so much property from his wife that he could easily support himself.

2. At the beginning he received four thousand annually from his practice.

3. By inheritances he received four hundred Holland acres and two thousand florins annually.

4. He made a profit of four hundred acres by draining marshes.

5. He contributed a little more than five hundred thousand to the Indian Company.

6. He purchased estates.

Observe the swift increase of riches while the burdens of the fatherland grow. But in his case these things were tolerable; consider what follows:

> But if it should now please you to inquire into and assess the property of your subjects, I shall readily suffer it. For I have learned that those who in the general assessment of 1599 valued all their goods at no more than fifty or sixty > thousand florins now dare to boast that they are twice as wealthy as I. Yet in that same year those same men, being more hostile, counted me among those upon whom the highest contribution was to be imposed and valued me at two hundred thousand florins.

Behold what ignoble men do in the extreme necessity of their fatherland, and how great the wealth they amass, so that it is not surprising that those for whom war is so fortunate hate peace.

First, Oldenbarnevelt's goods in 1599 were valued at two hundred thousand; those of certain others at fifty or sixty thousand. But those men now possess twice as much as he, namely four hundred thousand. Oldenbarnevelt's goods in 1599 were--

§ 4, continued. --two hundred thousand, valued unjustly, as he himself complains. Meanwhile he acquired many things for himself, so that in 1618 he possessed five hundred thousand besides his lands. But others who in 1599 possessed fifty or sixty thousand made so much profit in the space of seventeen years that they were twice as rich as Oldenbarnevelt. That is, each possessed sixteen hundred acres, a million in gold, and so forth; for Oldenbarnevelt possessed more than lands and Indian gold. Behold: the fatherland bestowed so great wealth not upon one but upon several such men; this is what they obtain by governing it. And this is that splendid liberty of the fatherland which exhausts the citizens and fills those conducting affairs and acting on behalf of affairs. For because the merchants obtained an opportunity from the fatherland, they conducted commerce, afterward intending to live cautiously elsewhere.

The fifth reason. Just as there ought to be a profession for the other arts in a city, so too there ought to be a profession of defending the fatherland from the enemy, governing it at home, and regulating it, and a definite class of men occupied in so distinguished an exercise: namely, nobles educated for wars and for the discipline of ruling. All historical records teach us that this was the perpetual occupation of the nobility.

From this comes the German name by which nobles are called vom Adel, from the eagle, because they follow victorious eagles and the Roman standards; and they take the name Knaben von Schild from the shield. Indeed, in preceding centuries they were called simply soldiers. Military service, moreover, is twofold: armed service, and the more peaceful service of those who possessed immunities and privileges. Lest they discontinue military exercises in time of peace, they produced imitations of war in various games and called them lance-games or tournaments. These were often forbidden because of their dangers; but if they provide exercise without bloodshed, they can be beneficial and arouse manly spirits.

It can neither be said nor believed how greatly that institution assisted the nobility, especially since most honorable laws were laid down for the contestants. For wicked nobles were excluded by a single word:

1. Enemies of the Christian religion, or transgressors and apostates.

2. One who had been guilty of treason.

3. One who had violated a virgin or widow, and adulterers.

4. Perjurers, deniers of written obligations and agreements, traitors, deserters from military service, and authors of flight in battle.

5. Men injurious to subjects, oppressors, and murderers.

6. The sacrilegious.

7. Despoilers of widows and wards.

8. Robbers, pirates, and assassins.

9. Authors of new taxes.

10. Those who had harmed the state.

11. Moneylenders, merchants, and artisans.

12. Those who were not nobles from their great-grandfather onward.

Those marked by any of these vices were not admitted to the mock battles. This was a great restraint upon audacity, ostentation, and desires; and among the nobles they were in some fashion infamous. Hence those marked with disgrace were called Schelmen, and they lost their order. How much it contributes to the defense of the fatherland that there should be many rich and prudent men in whom a great natural capacity for war is advanced toward justice and courage by domestic precepts, exhortations, examples, and the pursuits of their equals becomes apparent only when a soldier is ready at hand against sudden assaults.

The sixth reason. In war there is need of the highest authority. The first cause is that the most difficult things are commanded: to hold the assigned place in battle although certain death presses upon it, to climb the rampart against the enemy's weapons, and to go into death. The second is that great authority is needed in order to command armed men. Noble tribunes and centurions possess greater authority, both because they are of illustrious blood and because their whole family is occupied at home in dignities and command. More is also expected from them as fortunate men. But men who are fellow slaves and who all came forth from the same chamber or workhouse obey their equals--or even those subject to them in peace--more stubbornly. For this reason men generally seek nobles as commanders and centurions.

The incident in the time of Claudius is well known. Narcissus, Claudius's freedman, whom Rome revered and the Senate feared, was sent to mutinous soldiers. As he was already ascending the platform, they shouted: "Io Saturnalia!" So much greater was the liberty in the camp than in the senate-house.

The whole German nobility arose from command, specifically military command, and takes its name from the eagle: der Adel, von Adel, Adelingi. They were formerly soldiers, but noble soldiers, distinguished by the shield. There are two kinds of them: some are subject to the emperor alone; others to the princes in whose territory they dwell. The Swabian, Franconian, and Rhenish nobility possesses the highest liberty; in other places there are very few such men. Swabia came to the empire in 1269 when its heirs died, and thereafter there were no dukes of Swabia; therefore its nobility was not subject to one. In a manner not dissimilar, in eastern Franconia and along the Rhine that liberty was acquired through changes of lords and because many provinces were under the emperors. The Franks once had a secular duke. When the duchy was transferred to the bishopric of Würzburg, they say that the nobility remained subject to the emperor alone--although the immunity of many rests upon the individual grant and privilege of emperors, and prelates possess their own rights.

The seventh reason. When after the prince there is no one of dignity or esteem in the state, the whole state is endangered in one little body; but this is contrary to right reason. The Persian Empire in its old age had a corrupted nobility: all were slaves and all flatterers. Accordingly, when Darius was killed--and indeed by his own men--no one resisted. The Macedonian Empire, however, because it possessed many Alexanders, stood for a long time and had many kings, each of whom was powerful; and unless, having been set against one another, they had worn away their strength, each could have equaled Alexander.

Machiavelli himself, an enemy of nobility, admits that when the emperor of the Turks has been killed, no one remains who must be feared. Experience itself taught this. When Bayezid was captured by Tamerlane, none of the Turks conceived any hope of restoring the empire. For when Çelebi, Bayezid's son, had fled to Adrianople, it was not the Turks but the Greek nobles--hostile in arms to their own emperor Palaeologus--who equipped him with money and troops and, to the destruction and disgrace of their fatherland, gave him the empire when he was despairing. At that time there nevertheless remained some care for nobility; now, since all serve equally, there is none.

But because ancient histories possess great authority, let the political writer weigh the deeds of Philip of Macedon and Alexander the Great. Philip cultivated and adorned the nobility. Hence they accompanied his son into Asia and nevertheless preferred Philip. For when Alexander had rejected his own nobility and attached himself to the Persians and conquered nations, he was tossed amid many dangers; the princes and the whole nobility rejoiced at his death. Nor is there any doubt that, if he had lived longer with those customs, he would have been deserted or killed. Although the stronger authority of the histories relates that he died from Babylonian poison, it is established that his mother, son, and entire family were killed by his princes because he had already provoked them while alive.

[Printed page 690]

The eighth reason. Machiavelli says that a kingdom in which everyone serves is more easily held, but that a kingdom in which there is a multitude of princes is more easily occupied. Yet his discussion must be set forth and examined, for he mingles true things with false and finally deceives altogether. Chapter 4 of The Prince:

> Someone could be led to wonder, after considering the difficulties which seem to attend the retention of a newly acquired empire, whence it arose that Alexander possessed Asia within a few years and died almost as soon as he had occupied it--so that it could deservedly have seemed that the whole empire would fall into revolt--although his successors preserved it for themselves and labored under no difficulty in defending it except that which arose among themselves from their own particular ambition.
>
> I answer that the principalities whose memory still remains are found to be administered in two different ways: either at the decision of one prince, by whose favor and permission all the rest, who are slaves by condition, are employed like ministers in the administration of the kingdom; or by the counsel of a prince and nobles who obtain that rank not by favor but by the antiquity of their blood. Nobles of this kind possess dominions and peoples subject to them, who acknowledge them as lords and are affected toward them by a certain natural love.
>
> In principalities governed by the direction of one prince and the ministry of slaves, the prince presides with greater authority. For there is no one in the entire province who acknowledges any other superior besides him; and if anyone obeys another, he does so as a minister and appointed official, and those men are not affected by any particular love.
>
> Examples of these two kinds of governing a kingdom occur in our own times: the Turk and the king of the French. The whole supreme power of the Turkish Empire is governed at the will of one prince; the rest are slaves. Having divided his kingdom into prefectures, he sends different administrators and removes and substitutes them according to the will of his mind. But the king of the French is placed amid an ancient multitude of lords whom the peoples subject to them acknowledge and embrace with goodwill. They retain their authority, which the king cannot take from them without danger.
>
> Therefore, whoever considers the constitution of each kind will encounter difficulties in occupying the empire of the Turk; but once it has been conquered, there is no difficulty in retaining it. The reasons for the difficulty that prevents the Turkish Empire from being occupied consist in this: one who attempts to occupy it cannot be called there by the princes of that kingdom, nor be led to hope that he can more easily bring his undertaking to effect through the defection of those who surround the ruler. This appears to proceed from the reasons I touched upon above. For since they are all his slaves and bound to him, they can be corrupted with much greater difficulty; and even if they were corrupted, little benefit could nevertheless be hoped from it, since for the reasons given above they cannot draw the peoples with them.
>
> Accordingly, one who is to wage war against the emperor of the Turks must consider that he will find him united and that he must be conquered more by his own strength than by the efforts and seditions of others. But when he has been defeated and his battle-line routed so that he cannot restore his army, there is nothing besides the prince's stock which must afterward be feared. When that has been extinguished, no one remains whom anyone need fear, since the rest lack fidelity and authority among the peoples. And just as before victory the victor could place no hope in winning them over to himself, so after victory there is no reason for him to fear them further.

> The contrary occurs in the administrator of kingdoms constituted like that of France. For access into it will readily lie open to you if you win over one of the king's leading men. Among them there are always some who, offended in spirit, strive to cause revolutions. For the reasons stated above, these can open the way into that kingdom for you and render victory more expeditious. But afterward almost infinite difficulties arise in preserving it, not only with those who assisted you but also with those whom you oppressed. It is not enough for you to have extinguished the prince's blood; those leading men also survive who make themselves authors of new changes of state. Since you can neither satisfy nor extinguish them, you lose the kingdom whenever an opportunity offers itself.
>
> Now, if you consider to which kind of administration the kingdom of Darius belonged, you will find it very similar to that of the Turk. For this reason Alexander had to make an attack upon the whole of it and strip Darius of his camp. After that victory, when Darius was dead, that empire passed securely to Alexander for the reasons collected above. If his successors had been concordant, they could plainly have enjoyed it altogether at leisure; for no disturbance arose within it except what they themselves excited against one another.
>
> But dominions constituted in the likeness of the kingdom of France cannot possibly be possessed so peacefully. Hence came the frequent revolts of Spain, Gaul, and Greece from the Romans, because the dominions of princes were more numerous in them. As long as the memory of those dominions remained vigorous, the Romans were always uncertain of their possession. But when their remembrance had been erased by the power and duration of the empire, the Romans possessed a secure right of possession. Afterward, according as each of the Romans had acquired authority for himself in parts of the provinces, even when waging war among themselves, they could draw a part of those provinces with them; and this was because, after the line of the former prince had been removed, the peoples acknowledged no one except the Romans.

A kingdom, therefore, in which all besides the king are slaves cannot, once oppressed by an enemy, reclaim liberty for itself. Machiavelli admits this. But a state must be established in such a way that fortune possesses a means of return. In saying that such a kingdom is more difficult to occupy, however, he is mistaken.

Experience refuted this long ago. For regions in which there were many princes not only retain the yoke of a foreign empire with greater difficulty but also receive it with greater difficulty. The Romans attacked Gaul for many years and, after taking it piecemeal--now this part, now that--waged wars with the remainder. But when Antiochus was defeated, they very quickly occupied the principal part of his kingdom and ordered him to reign beyond the Taurus. The same thing also occurred in Greece: now the Aetolians, now the Macedonians resisted; at another time Lacedaemon under its Nabis resisted. In Asia, when Antiochus was defeated, his slaves went forth as degenerate slaves, while their master followed behind their backs. They think it matters little whom they serve; indeed, they desire a change of masters and hope for an alleviation of servitude.

The Turkish forces also, although their emperor was often defeated, did not occupy Greece except over a long period, because its princes, although not sufficiently, nevertheless resisted much. Do we not see the same in Hungary? Its greater part was long ago betrayed to and subjugated by the Turks, yet the remaining portion still resists through the courage of its princes and nobles and even preserves its liberty. Remove these men, and the rest, performing no deed of great praise, after bargaining for their little fields and cottages, will become an accession to that great empire.

Although the tyrant has attempted them in every way, he has nevertheless never conquered them.

But it is easy to entice some one prince to one's party, which is not practicable in a monarchy. Machiavelli therefore means that where there are nobles and princes, betrayals and rebellions are easier.

It seems otherwise to me, unless the king is changed into a tyrant--

§ 4, continued. --for reason and examples have taught that a man of servile disposition, avaricious and joined to his prince by no bond, can be driven to those crimes. Who betrayed Pyrrhus for money? Who wounded Darius? Who destroyed so many emperors? Were they not for the most part petty slaves? I pass over those men who, while the servitude of the state was still fresh, were killed by the lowest of the Romans. The betrayers of empires are men such as Eutropius, Rufinus, Stilicho, and Andragathius: all slaves, and sprung from slaves or from the most sordid barbarians.

> Alas! Alas! By what slight causes great things perish!
>
> An empire sought with so much blood, preserved with so much,
>
> Which the labors of a thousand commanders produced,
>
> Which the Roman hand constructed through so many years,
>
> One idle traitor overturns in a brief time.

Priam was betrayed, and Agamemnon was betrayed--but by a vile adulterer; Pompey the Great by a eunuch; Rome by Curio, and the same city earlier by a girl; Ahasuerus by eunuchs. Phrynus and Philocrates the pimps were traitors. Eurybatus betrayed the king of the Persians, for he took money from him and handed it over to Cyrus. To put on the fox's skin belongs to sordid spirits, not to princes; for slaves possess many causes for infidelity, but princes few. If we weigh the examples, we shall understand that princes, cities, and kingdoms have generally been betrayed by sordid and indebted men.

Those who are entirely subject to masters cannot easily rebel and riot where the government is despotic, because they lack strength and possess no authority. On this account alone, therefore, danger can be created for a king who possesses many powerful princes. But if one is pleased to compare dangers with dangers and defenses with defenses, we shall understand that a multitude of princes and nobles is to be preferred. An emperor or king is one man; his safety, security, and power consist in the spirit and strength of others, and he is always in the power of others. If he does not possess princes chosen from distinguished stock, he is in the power of the lowest men, by whose arms he is surrounded. These are easily moved and watch for revolutions, judging that right is wherever the greatest reward is. If he possesses princes, the lowest men dare nothing. Moreover, the plots of princes are more easily guarded against than those of the lowest. Hence we see that, although there have been various disturbances in Gaul, the murderers of the kings were nevertheless vile men and were not suborned by princes. Finally, plots can be guarded against if men are governed moderately and equably and if everything is not entrusted to one man--a matter treated elsewhere.

The ninth reason. Finally, I judge that not every nobility but an energetic, upright, and uncorrupted nobility is to be admitted into partnership in government. I also judge that this is the support of empire and that it is especially effective against the ancient evil of nobility: pride and injuries. For just as trees fail with age, so do certain families over a long period. They retain neither vigor nor purity and possess nothing except their insignia. Frivolous, languid, and stupid men are often born from courageous and great men. Such was the appearance of the Roman nobility when Marius delivered his speech. Sallust, Jugurtha:

> You have ordered me to wage war against Jugurtha, a decision which the nobility has borne most grievously. I ask you to consider in your minds whether it would be better to alter this decision and send on this or some other similar enterprise someone from that crowd of nobles, a man of ancient lineage and many ancestral images but no military service--so that, being ignorant of everything in so great a matter, he may tremble, hurry about, and take some man from the people as the instructor of his duty. Thus it generally happens that the man whom you ordered to command seeks another commander for himself.
>
> But I know, Romans, men who, after they had been made consuls, began to read the deeds of their ancestors and the military precepts of the Greeks--men acting in reverse order. For discharging an office is later in time than being appointed to it, but in reality and practice preparation comes first.
>
> Now compare me, Romans, a new man, with their pride. What they are accustomed to hear and read, I have in part seen and have in part performed myself. What they learned from books, I learned by military service. Now judge whether deeds or words are worth more. They despise my newness; I despise their idleness. My fortune is cast as a reproach against me; their disgraces are cast against them. I indeed judge that nature is one and common to all, but that every most courageous man is also the most nobly born.

And if it could now be asked of the fathers of Albinus or Bestia whether they would rather have had me or those men born from them, what do you believe they would answer except that they wished their children to be the best possible? But if those men rightly despise me, let them do the same to their own ancestors, whose nobility, like mine, began from virtue. They envy my honor; let them therefore envy my labor, innocence, and dangers also, since through these I obtained it.

Yet men corrupted by pride pass their lives as though they despised your honors, while they seek those honors as though they had lived honorably. Truly those men are deceived who expect contrary things at once: the pleasure of idleness and the rewards of virtue. Moreover, when they speak before you or in the senate, most of them extol their ancestors in their speech. By recounting their courageous deeds, they think themselves more illustrious; but the contrary is true. For the more distinguished the life of those ancestors, the more disgraceful is the sloth of these descendants. And assuredly the matter stands thus: the glory of ancestors is a light for their posterity and permits neither their good nor their evil deeds to lie hidden.

I suffer poverty in this respect, Romans. But what is far more distinguished, I am permitted to speak of my own deeds. Now see how unjust they are. What they arrogate to themselves from another's virtue, they do not concede to me from my own--evidently because I possess no ancestral images and because my nobility is new. Assuredly it is better to have produced nobility than to have received and corrupted it.

I am indeed not unaware that, if they now wished to reply to me, they would possess an abundantly eloquent and polished speech. But amid your very great favor, when they lacerate both me and you with reproaches in every place, I resolved not to remain silent, lest anyone interpret modesty as a guilty conscience. Indeed, in accordance with my conviction, no speech can injure me: a true one must necessarily speak well of me; my life and conduct overcome a false one. But because your counsels are accused--you who imposed upon me the highest honor and the greatest undertaking--consider again and again whether you ought to regret it.

To inspire confidence, I cannot display ancestral images, triumphs, or consulships of my forefathers; but, if the matter demands, I can display spears, a standard, horse-trappings, other military gifts, and, besides these, scars on the front of my body. These are my ancestral images; this is my nobility--not left to me by inheritance, as theirs was to them, but what I acquired through very many labors and dangers of my own.

My words are not polished. I make little of that. Virtue sufficiently manifests itself; they have need of artifice in order to cover their disgraceful deeds with speech. Nor did I learn Greek literature. It pleased me little to learn it, since it profited its teachers nothing toward virtue. But I am learned in those things far better for the state: to strike the enemy, to keep watch over defenses, to fear nothing except a disgraceful reputation, to endure winter and summer alike, to rest upon the ground, and to tolerate want and labor at the same time.

By these precepts I shall exhort the soldiers. I shall neither maintain them harshly while maintaining myself lavishly, nor make their labor my glory. This is useful; this is command suitable to citizens. For when you yourself live in softness, to compel the army by punishment is to be a master, not a commander. By doing these and similar things your ancestors brought glory to themselves and to the state. The nobility, relying upon them but itself unlike them in conduct, despises us who emulate them and demands all honors from you, not from merit but as though they were debts. Yet those most arrogant men are far mistaken. Their ancestors left to them everything that it was possible to leave: riches, ancestral images, and a distinguished memory of themselves. They did not leave virtue, nor could they; that alone is neither given nor received as a gift.

[Printed page 692]

They call me sordid and uncultivated in conduct because I adorn a banquet with little skill and possess neither any actor nor a cook of greater price than my farm steward. I am pleased to confess these things, Romans. For I received this teaching from my father and from other virtuous men: that elegance befits women, labor men, and that all good men ought to possess more glory than riches; that arms, not household furnishings, are an ornament.

Why then do they not always do what pleases them and what they esteem dear? Let them love and drink. Let them pass their old age where they passed their youth: at banquets, devoted to their belly and the most disgraceful part of the body. Let them leave sweat, dust, and other such things to us, to whom they are more pleasant than feasts. But it is not so. For when the most disgraceful men have dishonored themselves by crimes, they go to seize the rewards of good men. Thus, most unjustly, luxury and idleness--the worst arts--do no harm to those who cultivated them, but are the ruin of the innocent state.

Now, since I have answered them as far as my conduct, not their crimes, required, I shall speak briefly concerning the state.

§ 5. I do not approve this nobility, for it is wicked; but I judge that the counsel of our Mariana must be followed. "Indeed," he says, book 4, chapter 4:

In my judgment the nobility must be protected by the prince, and something must be granted to descendants because of the distinguished merits of their ancestors--but only if they themselves add conduct not unlike the splendor of their birth, together with industry and virtue. Nothing is more disgraceful than an idle nobility: men who, swollen with the glory of their ancestors, consume the wealth received by inheritance in wickedness and frivolity; and who, trusting in the praise of their forefathers, themselves languish in idleness and sloth, striving to obtain the rewards of virtues by vices and, through the disguise of nobility, to occupy in sloth and inactivity the place of courageous men.

They are therefore to be repelled by the prince on two grounds and are foul with a twofold disgrace: because they both contaminate themselves with baseness and stain the distinction of their lineage with baseness. For the more illustrious their forefathers were, the more deserving of hatred are those who obscure the splendor of nobility by lust and impurity. And most especially, many from their number possess such rashness and madness that, proud of the emptiest names, they so despise in comparison with themselves men born in an obscure station, however industrious, courageous, and energetic, that they do not consider them human beings. Having been honored with many honors, they seek greater ones; and, ambitious and senseless through evil arts, they contend that all rewards owed to virtue are owed also to their nobility.

Moreover, not a few concessions must be made to the rich, since men of wealth constitute a great defense for the prince in every part of the state, and they can set many things in motion unless they are bound by the prince's beneficence. But they are finally to be held in esteem only if they devote themselves to good arts and direct their money and wealth toward the pursuit of honor. If the rich, although empty of every virtue, are increased by rewards and honors, avarice, insolence, and idleness will be sanctioned among the people; and they will believe that only those whose fortune is immense and whose possessions are extensive are blessed. The needy will lie perpetually in squalor without any hope of rising. Having therefore conceived despair, they will be incited to make an assault upon the rich. Quarrels, insults, and robberies will arise. The state, torn into opposing parties, will utterly perish.

Therefore, if the prince desires service to be rendered to his dignity and the public safety, he will not regard immense wealth if it is stripped of virtue, nor will he foster nobility of lineage if it is destitute of the light of honor. Rather, he will embrace virtue and industry wherever they are found; and, retaining liberty to establish what he judges, he will fear the empty murmuring of no man. He will not be moved by anyone's displeasure. No one will be supported by such great wealth or illustrious through such great nobility that he may impose laws upon the ruler and assume so much for himself that he dares to draw the prince away from the pursuit of ordering virtue.

The prince will nevertheless not cast aside illustrious families even when they are idle, but will arouse them to virtue by every means; and, just as he cares for the preservation and increase of ancient cities, so will he care for families.

He will especially employ the method which Plato valued most highly: namely, that he graft warlike men into peaceful families. There is a noble family in towns or citadels, a follower of pleasures but nevertheless rich and peaceful; from it let him seek a wife for a noble admiral, tribune, or courageous and fierce man. He will add spirit to his relations by marriage and draw them with him into labors and the sweet honor of victories. Let him entrust to a military father-in-law a noble youth who hides at home or is occupied with courtly pageants; for thus the virtue of one man will arouse both sons-in-law and grandsons.

Next, let the prince have no nobles around him, and let him indicate that he esteems none, except those who delight in prudence, temperance, and labor. Most importantly, after a careful selection for virtue, prudence, and wealth, every year he will ennoble men who have deserved well and employ them in the state. From this he will obtain two things: first, that he possess nobles; then, that he possess suitable magistrates.

Many of the ancients often ridicule new men, or recently created nobles. Against them Cicero argues in book 3 of his Letters and shows that there can be εὐγένειαν--nobility of character--without hereditary nobility, and hereditary nobility without εὐγενεία. Euripides also expressed this excellently:

> ὁ μὲν γὰρ ἐσθλὸς εὐγενὴς ἐμοί γ᾽ ἀνήρ·
>
> ὁ δ᾽ οὐ δίκαιος, κἂν ἀμείνονος πατρὸς
>
> Ζηνὸς πεφύκῃ, δυσγενὴς εἶναι δοκεῖ.

A good man seems noble to me; but one who is not just, even if he was born from a father nobler than Jupiter himself, I account ignoble.

Let men acknowledge that these nobles are new, since their own ancestors were also new, while the descendants of these men will be called members of an ancient lineage. Seneca speaks prudently in Letter 44:

> If there is anything else good in philosophy, it is this: that it does not inspect a pedigree. All men, if recalled to their first origin, are from the gods. You are a Roman knight, and your industry brought you to this order; but, by Hercules, the fourteen rows are closed to many. The senate-house does not admit all; the camp also disdainfully chooses those whom it receives for labor and danger. A good mind lies open to all; we are all noble for this purpose. Philosophy rejects no one and chooses no one; it shines for all.
>
> Socrates was not a patrician. Cleanthes drew water and hired out his hands to irrigate a little garden. Philosophy did not receive Plato as a nobleman but made him one. Why is there reason for you to despair of being able to become equal to these men? They are all your ancestors if you conduct yourself worthily of them. You will do so if you immediately persuade yourself that no one surpasses you in nobility.
>
> All of us have the same number of generations before us. The origin of every man lies beyond memory. Plato says: “No king is not descended from slaves; no slave is not descended from kings.” A long succession of changes has mixed all these things, and fortune has turned them up and down. Who, then, is nobly born? One well fashioned by nature for virtue. This alone is to be regarded. Otherwise, if you recall matters to antiquity, every man comes from a point before which there is nothing. From the first origin of the world down to the present time, an alternating succession of illustrious and sordid ancestors has brought us forth.
>
> An atrium full of smoke-blackened ancestral images does not make a man noble. No one lived for our glory, nor is what existed before us ours. The spirit makes a man noble; from any condition it is permitted to rise above fortune. Consider yourself, therefore, not a Roman knight but a freedman.
>
> [Printed page 693]
>
> You can attain this: that you alone should be free among freeborn men. “How?” you ask. If you distinguish good and evil without taking the people as your authority.

If we examine the whole nobility, few extend their insignia beyond two hundred years, fewer beyond three hundred, and very few beyond four hundred. For how small a proportion of nobles is found celebrated in records and histories before those years? The little moons of the Arcadians are therefore laughable if they wore them upon their shoes as a boast of antiquity, as though they were older than the moon; they are praiseworthy if worn as a symbol of changes.

The promotion of new men brings a notable advantage to the state. For since the old nobility in part despises them and in part envies their advancement, the new men must necessarily look to two things: that they be beyond contempt and then beyond envy. They will be beyond contempt if in great, honorable, laborious, and costly matters they render faithful and energetic service to the prince and are accepted by him, as were Daniel and his companions in the court of the Chaldeans. These things, however, kindle the torches of envy. So it happened in Darius's court, Daniel 6:1:

> It pleased Darius, and he appointed over the kingdom one hundred and twenty satraps, that they might be throughout his entire kingdom; and over them three princes, of whom Daniel was one, so that the satraps might render an account to them and the king might not sustain trouble. Daniel therefore surpassed all the princes and satraps because a greater spirit was in him. Moreover, the king was considering appointing him over the whole kingdom. Hence the princes and satraps sought an occasion by which they might find fault with Daniel on the king's side; but they could find no cause or suspicion, because he was faithful and no fault or suspicion was found in him.

Envy clings to upright successes, but more strongly when others perceive that they are being obscured by their brilliance. They will escape or diminish envy by living modestly and courteously; accordingly, they will make no display either of pomp or expense. Their virtue will spur on the old nobles, as Miltiades' trophy spurred Themistocles, so that by the same path they may strive through good deeds for the prince's favor. Next, they will arouse others from the same family and from other families to dare likewise to raise themselves from the ground.

Nor will the estimation of nobility be cheaper, for men will be chosen who are an ornament to the state--not men whose nobility consists in cicadas or bordered togas, but men who bring learning, prudence, dexterity in action, and magnanimity to government. For them nobility is not a covering for vices and idleness but a whetstone and spur of industry. Thus a new nobility will grow up as a rival of the old and itself will soon become old. The old nobility will diminish; and, just as the most excellent medicines become the most harmful poisons when they have putrefied, so generosity of stock, when corrupted into degenerate conduct, gravely infects the state.

The prince will correct those vices seriously, especially if nobles inflict injuries, for the vices increase through toleration. Otherwise either the nobility, through fear of judgments, will disturb the state, as happened at Rhodes, or the people will rise up, as happened in Switzerland and a hundred years ago in many places of Germany. The same occurred in Hungary in 1514. In 1505 the Genoese expelled the nobility. King Casimir opportunely corrected the tyranny of the Polish nobles when the people were already disposed toward conspiracy. Cromer, book 6, On the Deeds of the Poles.

§ 6. Furthermore, for someone to be accounted noble means that he is distinguished from the condition of the common people, of which there are many degrees. Every supreme majesty possesses the right to ennoble. For the ordering of the ranks of citizens, the granting of rewards to virtue, and the exempting of worthy men from the common lot are in its power. This power has been given to certain others either by privilege or by usage.

Men of many pedigrees but degenerate and without virtue, prudence, or knowledge are nevertheless accounted nobles, both by opinion and by common law, which does not examine every particular circumstance.

If, however, a prince ennobles a man possessing no virtue, but solely by grace and favor or because of riches, Arumaeus judges that he does not become noble. Yet since experience teaches that many nobles are inferior in virtue and prudence to commoners, and since nobility is a dignity established by civil law, I judge it valid even when conferred upon an unworthy man. The prince indeed abuses his power when he lavishes the rewards of courageous men upon the unworthy; nevertheless, it does not belong to a private person to accuse the prince's judgment or render it void. Accordingly, just as an office, gift, praetorship, and other things conferred by the prince upon unworthy men are not to be revoked, so neither is nobility. For if the people must acknowledge an unworthy governor because the prince appointed him, why should they not also regard as exempt the man whom the prince exempted? If an unworthy man receives a fief and transmits it to his descendants, why not nobility also--and its effects, privileges, honor, and immunity from the various burdens to which the common people are subject?

The reasoning is the same if nobility is granted for a crime: because a man devised new taxes, calumniated the innocent, committed slaughter by the prince's command, or pandered to his pleasures. For although the prince sins most gravely when he rewards vices of which he was appointed the avenger by God, and although all detest Tiberius, who willed the prefecture of the city to be the reward of drunkenness, the benefice of even an imprudent prince nevertheless remains unaltered. For if the merits of the recipients are weighed, perhaps few are worthy, and generally the worthier are passed over, since they flatter less. That man will therefore enjoy his nobility to his own and his lineage's everlasting disgrace. He will be exempt from the common people, but foul, infamous, and a reproach to the prince.

Nor ought this to seem surprising: prostitutes securely retain the payments given them for crimes. Many princes have also ennobled their concubines; noble families remain today whose nobility began from fornication. Nor is it surprising that the royal stock of the Israelites arose from incest.

They say that nobility is lost by practicing vile arts. They deny that bakers, smiths, carpenters, cooks, innkeepers, money-changers, pipers, harpists, and merchants remain noble. The laws indeed forbid servile and theatrical crafts, but most have now fallen out of use. Others do not so much deprive a man who practices them of nobility as demonstrate that they are unbecoming to nobles. If necessity drives someone to them, I do not see why he should cease to be noble, if lineage and virtue remain. I do not wish the man struggling with that difficulty to boast meanwhile of his nobility; if he emerges from it, let him defend and display his right and dignity. David assuredly was noble: at home a keeper of sheep, at court Saul's harpist. I have seen serious men of senatorial rank who were innkeepers and were themselves ennobled; elsewhere I have shown that many nobles engage in commerce. Would that idle, drunken, blasphemous nobles--oppressors of farmers, fornicators, adulterers, and unjust men--lost their nobility! Would that they preserved it by sedentary handicrafts rather than by robberies!

CHAPTER XXI

Power Is Stable When Provisions Have Been Collected for Use

§ 1. Men, arms, and other things must be discussed, but I shall more suitably transfer these matters to the book on war. Let us now treat the remaining matters, among which the foremost is that the prince make provision for granaries and the grain supply. Hunger subdues every power; want has handed many cities and kingdoms over to the enemy. Yet even in peace there is no firmer defense for a prince than provisions, and nothing is more dangerous than hunger if the prince cannot appease it. One who does not prepare grain and other foods in good time is conquered without a sword. Indeed, he is endangered even in peace: a hungry soldier is useful to no one; a hungry citizen is restrained by no reverence for majesty.

§ 2. The state will therefore establish public granaries and storehouses of grain, wine, and oil. It can do this without great expense if it possesses public fields and if, when grain is cheap, it buys wheat, as Joseph did in Egypt. A distribution of grain is powerful for attracting the common people. By this method Maelius was aiming more effectively at kingship, and would have drawn the Roman Empire to himself by the gift of bread, had the leading men not opposed him. A prince who neglects that opportunity takes little thought for himself.

It is incredible to relate how much grain was stored at Rome. Lipsius treats this beautifully and learnedly in Admiranda, book 2, chapter 10. Distribution of grain at Rome was therefore ancient and was practiced even by the senate itself. In times of scarcity and a restricted grain supply, like a kindly father taking pity on the plebs, the senate sometimes divided grain among them--though not at no price, but for a moderate sum. The tribunes immediately followed and claimed this thoroughly popular measure for themselves, passing various grain laws. Last in this matter, Clodius carried an annona law that the grain which had previously been given to the people for half an as and a third of an as for each modius should be given FREE OF CHARGE. Thus Asconius. This was the origin and afterward the continuation of free grain.

The senate had indeed already employed such a distribution immediately after Catiline's conspiracy, at Cato's instigation, but I do not know whether without any price. The matter is related thus in Plutarch, but in words which must be weighed. He says that Gaius Caesar, during his praetorship, had attempted revolution while the people were agitated and unstable because of those Catilinarian disturbances. Cato therefore, in order to forestall him:

> ἔπεισε τὴν βουλὴν ἀναλαβεῖν τὸν ἄπορον καὶ ἀνέμητον ὄχλον εἰς τὸ σιτηρέσιον, ἀναλώματος μὲν ὄντος ἐνιαυτῷ χιλίων καὶ διακοσίων καὶ πεντήκοντα ταλάντων.

He persuaded the senate to admit the needy and landless people to the distribution of grain, although the expense was one thousand two hundred and fifty talents. This is thirty million sesterces according to the Roman reckoning; according to ours, seven hundred and fifty thousand Philippics. You therefore see the expenditure made upon this matter in that age.

The institution remained thereafter under the emperors, except that, when during the civil wars the number of recipients had grown beyond measure, Julius Caesar reduced it. Suetonius says concerning him: "From the three hundred and twenty thousand who received grain from the public supply, he reduced the number to one hundred and fifty thousand"; or, if you listen to Dio, to one hundred and sixty thousand, because he says they were reduced by half. The difference is small. But Augustus afterward increased the number and made it two hundred thousand. Did Tiberius also increase it? Although he was very far from being popular, he nevertheless enumerates in the senate, in Tacitus, from which provinces and in how much greater quantity than Augustus he imported the grain supply. Therefore it was to be distributed to more people also, unless I am mistaken.

I have already condemned this type of distribution above. Here I wished only to show that it was always employed for winning the favor of the people. Nor can anyone safely wage war unless provision has been made concerning the grain supply. Caesar Augustus and Antony, because of the hunger of the people, were endangered although they were so much more powerful than Pompey. Dio relates the matter. Then the Romans--because Sardinia was occupied and the maritime region was being harassed--lacked grain. Therefore, when there was an immense famine and they were grievously afflicted by it, they exhorted Caesar and Antony to make peace with Sextus and raised a great clamor for that reason. But when they understood that they were accomplishing nothing, they hastened quickly to kill them. When Caesar perceived this, although his own men had already been wounded, he nevertheless tore his garment and, as a suppliant, began to entreat their good faith and implore their mercy. Antony resisted by employing greater force. At last they were compelled to send envoys to Sextus concerning peace.

Nor was provision made for the city thereafter. For near the end of Augustus's life there was so great a famine that Caesar himself was compelled to dismiss the crowd of his servants, and a greater one occurred under Claudius, although that Claudian famine was universal.

Therefore defenses against famine must be established in every suitable place, so that, when the fields have been devastated or cultivation impeded, the subjects may live from the stored grain supply. For if a kingdom labors under famine, it will be easily captured. For this reason all fortifications are perishable. Accordingly, if the Spaniard could divert the northern grain from Batavia, he would easily subjugate those dominions--even if he did not cut off all provision, but merely made it difficult for them. For no kingdom is secure in which there is not produced a quantity of crops sufficient to feed its inhabitants.

For this reason Roman strength at home was always weak. For if anyone had made the sea dangerous or brought Africa or Egypt under his dominion and power, the eternal city would have had to perish by hunger. The Roman princes knew that internal evil, and Rome herself acknowledges it in Claudian:

> Rome, already fearing destruction and wearied by crops denied her,
>
> Was making her way to the threshold of swift Olympus,
>
> Not with her accustomed countenance, nor as when she apportions laws to Britons
>
> Or subjects trembling Indians to the fasces.
>
> Her voice was feeble, her steps slow, her eyes downcast;
>
> Her cheeks had sunk inward; hungry wasting consumed her arms;
>
> On sick shoulders she scarcely sustained
>
> Her rusting shield; her loosened helmet revealed
>
> Her gray hair, and she dragged a spear full of rust.
>
> When at last she reached heaven and fell at the knees of the Thunderer,
>
> Sorrowful she began complaints such as these:
>
> "If my walls, Jupiter, deserved to be born in order to remain;
>
> If the Sibyl's prophecies stand unshaken;
>
> If you do not yet despise the Tarpeian citadel,
>
> I come as a suppliant--not that an exultant consul may tread upon Araxes,
>
> Or that the axes of the rostra may press quiver-bearing Susa,

Nor that we may plant eagles in the red sands.

These things, these things you formerly granted us; now I ask only food.

Have mercy, best of fathers, upon Rome, your own nation.

Ward off this final famine. We have satisfied your anger,

If there was any. We have drained what the Getae must lament and the Suebi bewail.

Parthia herself would shudder at my misfortunes.

Why should I recount pestilence and disease, tombs filled

With carnage, and frequent deaths beneath a corrupted sky?

Or the river wandering through roofs and threatening

The highest hills? Submerged, I carried immense ships,

Heard the sound of oars, and experienced the age of Pyrrha.

Alas for me! To what have Latian strength and the city's power

Fallen? Into what a shadow have we gradually flowed?

Once I flourished through armed peoples and the counsels of the Fathers;

[Printed page 695]

By my counsels I subdued lands and bound humankind with laws;

Victorious, I ran to each sun.

After fierce Caesar transferred the common laws to himself,

Conduct slipped away; and, unaccustomed to our ancestral arts,

I withdrew into the servile bosom of peace.

For so many merits they gave me Libya and the Nile,

So that they might feed the ruling plebs and the warrior senate

With summer fleets, and so that winds from opposite shores

Might fill my granaries in turn.

My safety stood assured: if Memphis should perhaps refuse,

I balanced an Egyptian year with Gaetulian harvests.

I saw crop-bearing ships contend, and far and wide

Punic canvas meet Nilotic sails.

When a Rome equal to me arose, and the divided Dawn assumed

Equal robes, the fields of Egypt

Passed to a new share. Libya remained our only hope,

And scarcely and painfully sustained us,

Carried by the south wind alone and never secure for the future;

Always needy, it demanded the fidelity of wind and year.

This also Gildo has now seized at the close of declining

Autumn. We measure the sea with a scant prayer:

Whether any ship may come, whether perhaps either shame has wrung anything

From our powerful master or plunder has left anything.

We are fed at the decision of a Moor. He boasts not that a debt is repaid,

But that he grants what is his own; and he rejoices to furnish daily

Food as to a maidservant. He weighs life and famine

With barbarian arrogance, exults in the tears of the crowd,

And holds suspended the fate of so great a ruin.

He sells Roman harvests and possesses fields

Acquired by my wounds."

Every state, therefore, will estimate its strength from its provisions and grain supply: what it possesses at home, what grows there, what is imported from abroad, and whether it can be impeded. Hence it is especially necessary for the Venetian state to possess a grain supply stored for many years. For the entire seacoast and the islands are so exposed to Turkish arms that, even if they cannot easily be occupied and reduced beneath Turkish dominion, they can at least be devastated, burned, and despoiled. Therefore no grain supply can be obtained from them in time of war. Even if they abounded most greatly, navigation can nevertheless easily be closed or, what is sufficient to produce famine, rendered dangerous; for fear of danger restrains merchants, and the prices of merchandise increase with the dangers.

Their exceedingly populous city cannot be fed from the regions subject to it, but consumes food imported from the fields of its neighbors. The wealth of both the state and its individual citizens consists in commerce. If it is removed or diminished, the multitude must necessarily diminish and the city be deserted; for the associations of artisans are maintained by merchants, and, if the merchants' profits cease, the industry of mechanical works will collapse for lack of a purchaser. Hence, unless provision has been made publicly and privately for the city's grain supply for several years, it cannot be powerful, however much it may excel in money, soldiers, or fleet. It can nevertheless prepare power if, while it possesses wealth, it keeps grain stored in public granaries for two years and orders individual senators to possess enough for their household for three years, and likewise the richer citizens, while artisans keep enough for two years or one.

The Belgian dominions are pressed by the same difficulty. If the Dane and the Spaniard enter one alliance, if the Pole is offended, if the Swede joins marriages with the Spanish nation, whence will they feed so great a multitude of populous cities? The enemy besets the Rhine; the regions beyond the Meuse are hostile; bread comes from the north. Are there not many means by which that apparent power can be crushed unless they have made provision long beforehand? And that seafaring people would be equal to the Roman people, which said:

Now without honor and needy, it displays the pitiable punishment

Of peace; although plainly surrounded by no enemy,

It endures the crisis of the besieged. Death hangs over me

At every moment, and a few days prescribe

A doubtful allowance of food. Alas, prosperous fates!

Why did you give me seven hills and a crowd

Which could not be fed by a little? I would be happier

With straitened resources; I would prefer to endure the Sabines

And Veii. I passed a shorter age more securely.

My very mass harms me. Would that it were permitted to return

To my ancient limits and the walls of poor Ancus.

The cultivated fields of Etruria and Campania would suffice for me,

Together with the harvest of Quinctius and Curius; when the fatherland asked,

A rustic dictator would bring in his own ears of grain.

CHAPTER XXII

The Principal Power Lies in Strong and Populous Cities

§ 1. No state is to be judged powerful unless it possesses the lofty and strong defenses of cities. Today, indeed, there is no one who doubts that cities and towns must be possessed and fortified; dispute concerns only the manner and method. For in former times the boast of the Spartans was ridiculed because they called the valor of their young men their walls: if shield should cling to shield and man stand close-packed against man. It was a great and ruinous error, even in the judgment of the Spartans, who afterward encircled their city with walls and then themselves judged those cities powerful which were surrounded by walls, towers, and ditches. For they stripped Athens, their rival city, of its walls: at Lysander's persuasion the ephors judged that this should be done, and, when it had thus been disarmed, they oppressed it with the Thirty Tyrants. They placed a garrison upon the citadel and the Piraeus. Why did they destroy the walls of that most renowned city, unless in order to enervate its strength?

Sparta, ungenerous and ungrateful, gave a notable monument of this same judgment, but one full of envy and injustice, as Nepos is the authority in his Themistocles, together with Plutarch, Diodorus Siculus in book 11, and Frontinus in book 1, chapter 1. For when Xerxes had been defeated at Salamis--the foremost glory and command in that victory belonging to the Athenians--and they returned to their fatherland and began to rebuild the walls, or rather to restore everything that had been thrown down, the Spartans, through envy of their glory and fear of their future power, sent ambassadors to explain that it would be contrary to the safety of all the Greeks if they constructed walls; for if the Persians returned and occupied the cities, from them the whole Peloponnese and all Greece could easily be harassed. They would have prevailed, had Themistocles not frustrated the attempts of these concealed enemies by counsel and artifice. I wished to say this on account of the young men in whose mouths that ecstatic oracle is always found:

ἀσπὶς ἄρ᾽ ἀσπίδ᾽ ἔρειδε, κόρυς κόρυν, ἀνέρα δ᾽ ἀνήρ.

Shield should support shield, helmet helmet, man man. Just as the ancients ridiculed this, so it is harmful even now; for at the present time a few cannon would scatter that wall. Therefore, one who intends to defend great wealth with a small force and without danger will build for himself fortified cities, equipped to the highest degree with every kind of provision and instrument of war. For he who has no defenses of cities is continually tossed about in danger and takes less thought for his safety than wild beasts in the forests and birds, which choose the safest forests and rocks for the protection of their offspring.

[Printed page 696]

§ 2. The care of building cities is most ancient. Cain built the first and called it Enoch after the name of his son. After the Flood Babel followed--for the times before the Flood are obscure--and very many cities were built thereafter, as is evident from the history of Abraham, who was born not yet three hundred years after the Flood. At that time there were not only cities, but destructions of cities, far-ranging wars of nations, and servitudes imposed by kings, Genesis 13. In the land of Canaan, strong cities walled up even to heaven, which especially terrified the children of Israel, had been founded in the time of Moses. David afterward built and fortified cities; Solomon even built distant ones, such as Palmyra in the desert; and Jehoshaphat, although in his army, apart from the garrisons of the cities, he numbered one million one hundred and sixty thousand most valiant soldiers, nevertheless built walled cities in Judah. If we look to our own times, the Spaniard holds the New World by means of cities that have been constructed. For he plants very many and very large colonies and possesses exceedingly populous cities; yet, if one considers the East Indies, he maintains supremacy in navigation over so vast an extent with very few fortifications.

§ 3. Care for and protection of cities procure for a prince a multitude of people, arts, wealth, and the other things by which power grows and is made secure--and, what is chief, love of the fatherland that is to be defended. In former times there were no towns in Germany and Britain. The Britons call it a town when they have fortified tangled woods with a ditch and rampart. Strabo says in book 4 that, after constructing huts in groves, they stable themselves there with their herds. Therefore at that time the Germans had no power except when they were borne into battle by a single onrush; and if they were repulsed, they remained quiet. When sought at home, they lay hidden among forests and marshes.

For the same reason they suffered every extremity as the Vandals, Goths, and Huns passed through. When the Empire had been transferred to us, then abundance of wealth and power began to flourish. A German author speaks thus about this condition: "I hold it as most certain that in that age--the age of Caesar--there were no cities, and scarcely anything resembling country houses and villages. For when we read through the records of Strasbourg, endowed with even a modest antiquity, we see that in the times of the Ottos that city had scarcely as much space enclosed within it as an undistinguished town. The same account is commonly given of Mainz, Worms, Speyer, and Nuremberg, which nevertheless received their growth in the times of the Henrys. Trajan, as Dio of Prusa, a Greek author, testifies, began two exceedingly populous cities of Dacia which even today adjoin the Danube; and I am easily led to believe that those were the first cities of the Danube. Thereafter, in the times of Constantine and Julian, as trustworthy annals assert, towns were fortified indiscriminately by the dukes of Swabia; these now obey the Empire, and among their number are Ravensburg, Ulm, and others. Thereafter Attila, the destroyer of all Germany, utterly destroyed Basel, Worms, Strasbourg, Regensburg, Nuremberg, Salzburg, Cologne, Jülich, and other towns. These were restored in part by Saint Rupert the bishop under the auspices of Theodo, duke of Bavaria, and by other bishops. Thereafter Pepin and Charlemagne increased cities to such a degree and endowed them with so many bishoprics, just as Dagobert had done before them. Thus the greater part of all Germany, while it was under their Empire, received its beginning and increase from the kings of the Franks and from the line of Charles, as we shall pursue more fully concerning each city separately when mention is made of it. At the time when the Empire was transferred to us, the cities of Germany were also made more populous."

But now Germany abounds in so many fortified and wealthy cities that it yields utterly to no region and altogether surpasses them all--not only Asia and Africa, but also the rest of Europe. For neither Spain nor Italy could contend with us in the number of great and wealthy cities. For although no city of Germany surpasses Lisbon, Venice, or Paris, German cities nevertheless surpass those of other countries in number. For no kingdom has cities which it could set against these in equal size, wealth, and strength. They are Antwerp, Lille, Ghent, Cologne, Dordrecht, Amsterdam, Bremen, Hamburg, Lübeck, Danzig, Nuremberg, Augsburg, Vienna, Basel, and Strasbourg. I know many cities larger than these, such as Leuven, Lüneburg, Brunswick, Brandenburg, Erfurt, and Prague, and many equal to them; but I deny that in any kingdom there can be found as many equal to those fifteen which I named in the first place.

§ 4. In founding and adorning cities, those things which Aristotle advises in book 7 of the Politics must always be kept before one's eyes--in founding and arranging them, I say. Today few are founded, both because there are many already and because suitable places have been occupied, so that the preservation of cities must now be the chief concern. Advantageous fields, rivers, and harbors must be sought.

Therefore, when a prince observes opportunities of this kind, he will attend that city with privileges and benefits, so that in a short time it may become a great city. Thus the celebrated city of Lille grew in our time; thus Dunkirk can grow by means of its harbor, thus Gravelines, thus Goa in India. So Koblenz could grow, wealthy through the confluence of two commercially busy rivers; so could our Mainz, advantageously placed for the commerce of the upper and lower regions, filled also with the riches of Gaul and the lands beyond the Rhine, and abounding in wine and grain. Upon these, I say, labor is usefully expended; for cities which lack the advantages peculiar to their locations spend money in vain. Hanau long ago ceased to grow, separated as it is from the Main; and those who first built it paid for their rashness with their own loss. Frankenthal grew rapidly, but now it comes to a halt, being more widely separated from the Rhine; and when Worms and Speyer have increased their commercial enterprise, Frankenthal, caught between them, will lose the hope of growing.

§ 5. We shall easily judge those cities to have been built in an advantageous site which, after having suffered adversity rather often, have flourished again; for the place seizes men's affections and holds them by its advantages. Above all I require a fertile place, because poverty is the fountainhead of sedition, and God willed to give his people a fertile land. Dinocrates the architect foolishly contemplated an Alexandria on Mount Athos, to whom Alexander rightly said: “From where will it be able to obtain food?” As regards the quarters of the heavens, little consideration has been given to this matter in Germany. Although our Mainz faces east and north, consideration was given to its fields, rivers, springs, and mountains.

§ 6. Those two conditions can be obtained only with difficulty: that an advance into another's territory be easy, but an enemy's approach difficult. In former times many cities were situated on mountains: the descent was easy, the entrance difficult. But because the method of warfare, and also that of provisioning, has changed, cities which are on mountains and afford little convenience for provisions and all other things are not strong. Thus now also we see the castles situated on the hills of the Rhine and Moselle for the most part deserted.

[Printed page 697]

Now as to what some say--that the fortifications of cities are dangerous because enemies, once they have captured them, are secure in them--this has already been refuted above in the treatment of money. For a city ought to be defended by valor and prudence. Who doubts that the single city Tyre resisted Alexander more than the whole kingdom of Darius did? That same city closed its gates to Nebuchadnezzar and detained the conqueror of nations. Thus Ezekiel 29:18: “Son of man, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon made his army serve a great service against Tyre: every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare; yet no recompense was rendered to him or to his army from Tyre for the service which he performed for me against it.”

Therefore he took all Egypt--that is, hundreds of cities--more easily than Tyre, because it is easier to receive a reward than to earn it by laboring. Thus in the memory of our fathers one Vienna, but a faithful Vienna, resisted the Ottomans more than half of Hungary and more than the whole Peloponnese.

§ 7. They say that wealthy cities, once they have easily acquired means, rebel; for satiety and riches are followed by the desire for liberty and honor. But a remedy for this evil will be provided by the just and mild government of the prince, the election of trustworthy men to magistracies, and the binding of those same men to him by honors and benefits. Nor is this to be neglected: that those who might be the instigators of disturbances should possess properties in other places, so that through fear of losing them they may prefer the prince's favor to all things. He will also grant those privileges which, if the city should deserve it, he can immediately withdraw.

Aachen, a renowned city and royal seat, received immunity from tolls from Charlemagne--a vast benefit if one considers the citizens, but in turn a close obligation not to offend the emperor, who could overturn their fortunes with one word, one sheet of paper. Therefore citizens of this kind will listen to no Manliuses, no Clodiuses or Curios, not even Brutuses. Thus Frankfurt, a renowned emporium, is protected by the right to hold fairs, which it possesses by the favor of the emperors. That right is great and alone preserves the city; but the same right nevertheless makes it a city faithful to the Empire, for it can be stripped of it by a single edict. In no city of Europe are there greater riches than in Lisbon, which is the emporium of the whole world, distinguished for its harbor, buildings, and number of people. But there is no danger of defection, because by one edict its merchants' wares, dispersed throughout all the royal cities and ports, can be confiscated. For this reason also they detested Antony's rebellion, because they saw that, if they were impeded by a domestic war, they would easily lose the Indies.

CHAPTER XXIII

Fortresses Are Useful and Necessary for Preserving Power

§ 1. Political writers differ concerning the construction of fortresses; indeed, some demolish those which others have constructed. Machiavelli is uncertain. For this is his counsel in chapter 20 of The Prince:

> A custom had grown strong among princes that, in order to possess their principate more securely, they should erect fortresses which, as though with reins and bridles, would restrain those who contrived something against them, and that against every sudden assault they should have a secure refuge to which they might withdraw. Indeed, I would not wish to condemn this counsel, since it is now very ancient and customary. Nevertheless, in our age we have seen Niccolò Vitelli destroy the two fortresses which were at Città di Castello in order to retain that dominion. Guidobaldo, prince of Urbino, having been restored to the principate from which he had been expelled by Valentino, utterly overthrew all the fortresses of that province. For, when they had thus been overthrown, he judged that the province could be lost again only with greater difficulty. When the Bentivogli returned after Bologna had been recovered, they followed the same counsel. Fortresses, therefore, are or are not useful according to the condition of the times; but in whatever respect some good returns to you from them, in another they harm you exceedingly. This matter can assuredly be examined thus.

§ 2. I judge fortresses useless to free cities, but judge that every expense which would have to be spent separately upon a fortress should be devoted to walls, ditches, and bulwarks. Thus the Romans ought to have leveled the Capitol to the ground, and the Athenians to have demolished the citadel of Minerva; for it is advantageous to wicked citizens and slaves to occupy them and hand them over to the enemy. They must also be guarded in time of peace. When war is raging, it is a miserable consolation for citizens to abandon their houses and flee into the fortress, which nevertheless they cannot defend for long, since their multitude impedes them and there is a lack of provisions and danger of disease among a crowded multitude.

Hence fortresses are demolished as workhouses of slavery and supports of servitude as soon as men aspire to liberty. Simon Maccabaeus destroyed the fortress which the Greeks had occupied for thirty years. Fortresses are therefore hateful to cities as fetters upon liberty. As long as they remain, citizens judge that they have been placed beneath the blow; and although the garrison may do no harm, it is nevertheless an object of fear. A fortress nevertheless saved Rome, but those who preferred to die were men of great spirit. The Messenians also, after being defeated by the Lacedaemonians, defended themselves for twenty years in the fortress of Mount Ithome. Pausanias, Messenian Affairs.

§ 3. Those who have added some province to their empire by war ought to keep its people obedient by means of fortresses. Everyone now employs this method throughout the whole world; and if anyone undertakes to advise the contrary, he will appear to be acting so as to be mad with reason--and, if the truth must be said, he is mad. Therefore, when Machiavelli proclaims fortresses useless and harmful, he acts so as to strip his prince of dominion by means of exotic wisdom. The Spaniards would already have lost the West Indies a thousand times, and the Portuguese the East Indies, if they had been without fortresses. For a few fortresses impose a bridle upon so many peoples.

But the entire matter will be understood if we weigh Machiavelli's wisdom. In book 2, chapter 24, of his Discourses on the Republic, he reasons thus:

> It may perhaps seem remarkable to someone that, although the peoples of Latium, after being conquered and subdued, rebelled so many times, the Roman people did not construct any fortresses either at Privernum or in their other cities in order to restrain them and keep them obedient. For they certainly acted otherwise than our Florentines think one ought to act, since the Florentines judge that their own and other cities must be restrained by fortresses. Indeed, if the Roman people had been like our own men, they would have acted in the same way as ours. But because there was in that people another valor, another power, and another judgment concerning affairs, it > therefore thought that one must act otherwise. While the state was free, it never constructed any fortresses either for restraining cities or for defending provinces; nevertheless, it preserved some of those which it occupied after they had been founded by others. Since these things are so, while the princes of our own time appear to think very differently, I have therefore judged that I would not act amiss if I inquired in this place whether structures of such great mass are useful or useless to their authors.

I reply that those who deny that the Romans possessed fortresses are gravely mistaken, for they held their whole empire by the garrisons of fortresses. I shall easily prove this matter, remarkable though it may be to antiquaries, to be true for political writers. It must be observed that some whom the Romans conquered were received into the city. Florus, book 1, chapter 1: “Thus peace was made and a treaty struck with Tatius. A thing marvelous to relate followed: the enemies abandoned their own seats and migrated into the new city, and joined their ancestral wealth to their sons-in-law as a dowry.”

And in chapter 3: “He incorporated the Albans. And so, after the enemy had been conquered, he tore apart Mettius Fufetius, guilty of breaking the treaty, after he had been bound between two chariots drawn by swift horses. He also destroyed Alba itself, although it was a parent city, because it was nevertheless a rival; but first he transferred all the wealth of the city and the people itself to Rome, so that the kindred city seemed not to have perished but in some sense to have returned again into its own body.”

They utterly destroyed some, sold others, and received others in surrender, so that they might either enervate them in this fashion and prevent them from rebelling or restrain them with garrisons. These garrisons were of two kinds: colonies and fortresses. They treated them according to the cause of the war, the obstinacy, or the obedience of the besieged. The Falisci surrendered voluntarily; the Fidenates were consumed by their own fire; the Veientes were seized and utterly destroyed; among the Sabines, and where the Nar flows around, a great number of men and a great extent of land were captured; the cities of the Samnites were so destroyed that Samnium had to be sought in Samnium. But I must speak of fortresses.

The first kind consisted of colonies, when in suitable places they fortified ancient towns or constructed new ones. Peoples about to rebel attacked these first of all. At the beginning they were like great fortresses; afterward they grew into great cities. Lipsius describes this custom in book 2, chapter 23, of his Constancy: “Let this one example concerning colonies stand for all exactions and robberies. Just as nothing firmer for the strength of empire was discovered, so nothing more grievous to subjects could have been devised. Legions and veteran cohorts were everywhere conducted into fields and towns, and the miserable provincials were in a moment cast down from all their goods and fortunes. They had dared nothing and deserved nothing; their wealth or fertile fields constituted their whole crime. In this there assuredly appears a kind of whirlpool of every calamity. It is miserable to be despoiled of money; what if one is despoiled also of fields and roofs? It is grievous to be driven from those; what if from one's whole fatherland, temples, and altars? Behold, several thousand persons were torn apart: children from parents, masters from their household servants, wives from husbands; and they were scattered into various lands according as each man's lot fell--some ‘to the thirsty Africans,’ as the poet says concerning this very matter, ‘part to Scythia, or to the Britons divided from the whole world.’ Octavian Caesar alone planted twenty-eight colonies in Italy alone; in the provinces he planted as many as he pleased. Nor, so far as I know, was any other thing more destructive to the Gauls, to us, and to the Spaniards.”

Colonies were towns of Roman or Latin citizens who had been conducted there. Sigonius relates these reasons for colonies: first, that the earlier peoples who had previously inhabited the places might be restrained; the second people was therefore military and was introduced as though into a fortification. Second, that neighboring enemies might be repelled. Third, that the urban plebs might be drained away. Fourth, that the Roman stock might nevertheless be increased. Fifth, that seditions might be removed. Sixth, that veterans might receive rewards. According to their original institution, therefore--for matters were afterward conducted in another manner also--the colonists had to deal with conquered peoples and neighboring enemies. Thus the colonists planted among the Ubii kept perpetual watch against the unpacified Gauls and Germans. But we must treat of fortresses properly so called, of which I affirm that there were very many.

These were, namely, camps, from which our fortresses or castles also take their name; for in Italian they are called citadels because they are like small cities, as colonies generally were at the beginning. But I speak of camps, which I affirm were fortresses--temporary fortresses and sometimes permanent ones. I call military fortifications fortresses whether they are made of stone or of turf and timber, for even now fortresses of turf are more highly approved. Nicolas Bellus teaches this concerning his Gauls in volume 1 of Political Matters:

> As regards fortifications, there is no other region in which there is a greater number of them, which results from several causes. One is that, when the kingdom was divided into several dominions and principalities--namely Burgundy, Brittany, the Duchy of Anjou, and Normandy--each ruler fortified his own frontiers. The number of fortifications grew through the wars of the English, who ruled a great part of France. The situation and nature of places suitable for fortification, and no less the diligence and aptitude of the people for these matters, make the fortification of places easier. There is no other nation more industrious in fortifying or one which spares labor and expense less. Nor is France less strong within than on its outermost frontiers. Beauvais, Troyes, Orléans, Angers, the city of Bourges, Limoges, Saint-Flour, Carcassonne, and Soissons yield nothing in strength to Calais, Péronne, Narbonne, and other frontier places. Each part of this kingdom is fitted to serve as a frontier for the rest of the kingdom.

This is also proved in Belgium and Germany. Such were the fortresses of the Romans; for we are not disputing about the material of fortresses but about their purpose and manner. Let us therefore examine Roman fortresses. First, all Roman camps, even for the rest of a single night, were like fortresses. A place most suitable for prospect, watering, and foraging was chosen; it was surrounded with a rampart and ditch; everything was distinguished in the highest order, as Lipsius explains most learnedly. But like these camps were those which were permanent upon the frontiers. Next, there were permanent forces established by Augustus for the protection of the empire. Tacitus, Annals 1: “The legions, provinces, and fleets, all things joined to one another”; for the principal part of the soldiers was stationed on the frontiers.

Third, in the time of Augustus there were three legions in Spain, seven in Gaul along the Rhine, two in Africa, two in Egypt, four in Syria along the Euphrates, two in Moesia along the Danube, and two in Dalmatia. But afterward there were three in Egypt--one at Alexandria, according to Strabo--and likewise nine cohorts: three in the city, three at Syene, and three in other places. There were also two legions at Berytus, because it was the barrier of the sea. It is established that there were also cohorts of allies, auxiliaries, wings, and cavalry. In Raetia, Judaea, and other places there were cohorts alone; at Lyons in Gaul there was the Eighteenth Cohort; at Forum Julii of the Ligurians there was a cohort, the ancient auxiliary force of the place. In Gaul there were 1,200 soldiers, Agrippa says in Josephus. Afterward three legions were stationed in Britain by Claudius, two in Cappadocia by Vespasian, and two in Dacia by Trajan. Indeed, at Rome there were ten thousand--or nine thousand--and afterward more praetorians for the protection of the princes and against sudden emergencies. “These men,” says Lipsius, “had the Praetorian Camp at the Viminal Gate, so that they might be kept under closer restraint and discipline, separated from the citizens and the city.” Besides these there were three Urban and Watch Cohorts; Dio, book 4. Lipsius judges that there were fourteen cohorts.

§ 4. While I weigh all these matters with myself, I at the same time establish what they are accustomed to deny: the fortresses of the Romans. The Praetorian camps were enclosed with a ditch and rampart, and all those along the Rhine in the same manner. They differed in no respect from our castles except that their garrison was larger. Their fortification was of the kind which is now customary in our temporary camps, such as Ambrosius, the greatest of commanders, made along the Rhine. Indeed, those ancient winter camps of the Romans were stronger--stronger, I say, if you consider the times. For since men lacked cannon, it was necessary to climb with their hands, tear apart palisades and embankments, and level the breastwork. Thus at that time they were safer in their camps than men now are in fortresses. For although they were made with little labor, they were nevertheless easily defended.

[Printed page 699]

Sejanus established a camp at Rome and fortified it with a rampart. Tacitus, Annals 4: “He increased the power of the prefecture, previously moderate, by gathering into one camp the cohorts dispersed throughout the city, so that they might receive commands together and, through their number, strength, and the sight of one another, confidence might be given to them and fear to everyone else. He alleged that the soldiers grew wanton while dispersed; that if some sudden event should arise, aid could be brought more powerfully by all together; and that they would act more severely if their rampart were established far from the allurements of the city.”

Although, therefore, the Romans are not thought to have possessed fortresses, there is nevertheless no doubt that the camps themselves were like fortresses. For I define a fortress as a bulwark built for restraining peoples and repelling enemies; fortresses are accordingly named from repelling, and hence many towns have retained the name of camps. But let us hear Machiavelli further:

> Let this be the beginning of the discussion: fortresses are customarily constructed either to repel enemies or to restrain subjects and keep them obedient. I declare, however, that they are not necessary for the former use and that for the latter they are useless and harmful. I judge fortresses harmful for restraining subjects because the danger of rebellion which is feared customarily arises from hatred conceived by subjects against their lords. Subjects hate their princes and lords because of injuries received; princes are accustomed to injure their subjects and treat them badly especially when they hope that they can rule them according to their own decision and tame and restrain them according to their mind's desire. They think and hope this most of all when they possess in the subjects' midst exceedingly well-fortified citadels constructed in a vast mass, because they believe that no one will dare anything against them. Since these things are so, fortresses of this kind are not merely useless for keeping subjects obedient but also harmful, since princes, trusting in them more than is fitting, seize an opportunity for mistreating and punishing their subjects and thereby stir up their hatred against themselves, from which rebellions, slaughters, and infinite evils depend.

Machiavelli's argument can be concluded briefly thus: fortresses cause a prince to command securely; tyranny follows from security, by which subjects are harshly and insultingly treated; from this come hatred and rebellion; fortresses are therefore not to be built. But what prince will listen to this counselor? “Lest you become a tyrant, refuse to be powerful”? Rather, labor so that you may be powerful, so that you can protect the good and overthrow the wicked. Security is sought for a prince from a fortress, from resources, and from an army, all of which can give courage no less than fortresses can. I believe that security arises from fortresses. I therefore judge that they must be built, so that the prince, secure in himself, may administer justice without fear and may deter an enemy and a citizen of hostile disposition from rebellion through despair of victory. Otherwise, if security must be avoided, let the soldier be dismissed; let the prince walk alone without bodyguards; let him invite the wicked to parricide, which they will perpetrate without any danger. A prince without attendants and a province without the garrisons of fortifications equally invite the enemy.

I conclude to the contrary. A prince must act so that he is truly a prince, so that, secure in himself, he compels what he has commanded to be done and cuts off hope from those who contrive revolution. He can maintain this purpose especially by fortifying citadels; therefore citadels must be fortified.

Moreover, it is not rightly advised that a prince should not seek security but should pass his life in fear and anxiety in order that he may act more mildly. For in truth nothing is more cruel than a timid prince: he fears everything, believes everything hostile, and indulges suspicions. Hence the timidity of a prince is calamitous to leading men, and far more princes have been cruel through fear than through security. Augustus was most savage while he was afraid, and if he had died within the first twenty years of his rule, he would have been among the most hateful of princes. But when he had gained possession of affairs and dispelled his dangers, he put on gentleness. Let this remain stored deep in the mind: if he is timid, he is also cruel; if he fears, he rages. Claudius is a great example. Therefore, lest he fear and rage, let him build fortresses for his security. Machiavelli continues.

§ 5.

> But neither, when wars press upon us, do fortresses possess as much force as men customarily attribute to them. For there are only two methods of keeping subjects obedient and restraining them by force. One is that you should have ready at hand an excellent army, as the Roman people had, by which you may settle the waves once they have been stirred. The other is that you should utterly destroy and extirpate rebels, lest they be able to defect again or take up arms against you. For if you plunder their goods, arms remain to the despoiled. If you take away their arms also, fury supplies arms. If, after killing the commanders, you grant the rest the enjoyment of life, other commanders will immediately be reborn like the heads of the Lernaean Hydra. If you possess fortresses, in time of peace they will make you more audacious and unjust toward your subjects; when war comes, they will be attacked both by enemies and by your subjects, and it will not be possible for you to resist both.

I know that nothing is secure for a tyrant whom subjects and foreigners hate, and whom the very ministers of his cruelty detest.

Those two methods belong to the rich, powerful, and cruel. For to have an excellent army always ready at hand belongs only to a most powerful prince. Next, permanent armies must be maintained with great stipends; and when these are wrung from subjects, then at last they take up arms or flee to any nation whatever, and the cultivation of the province is abandoned. Next, a hundred deaths of emperors demonstrate how readily an army mutinies. Third, two thousand men in fortresses have greater power for restraining enemies than ten thousand in the open. Fortresses are therefore savings of expense.

But what he says--that fortresses do not greatly harm enemies--is false. For no one attacks a strong fortress equipped with soldiers and provisions unless he is prepared for the weariness of a long siege. Meanwhile relief forces can be assembled while the enemy fights against stones, turf, and wickerwork and pours out his strength and resources. But let us consider for a little while the fortresses of the most astute commander. In the year in which Caesar disturbed the Britons, there was a scarcity of crops because of drought, and he was compelled to station his legions in different places: one was led among the Morini, another among the Nervii, a third among the Aedui, a fourth among the Remi, three into Belgium, one among the Eburones, together with five cohorts. Caesar himself meanwhile determined to remain in Gaul until he learned that the legions had been stationed and the winter quarters fortified.

But how well fortified were the camps? The tribunes and centurions of the first ranks judge that forces however great, even those of Germans, could be sustained by fortified winter quarters. The matter itself bore witness, because they most courageously sustained the first assault of the enemy, inflicted many wounds in return, and were not pressed by want of grain. We cannot deny here that there were as many castles or fortresses as there were legionary camps. Caesar did not depart from Gaul until he heard that the winter quarters had been fortified. The fortification was such that the centurions and tribunes judged that it could be defended against forces however great; and Cicero defended his camp for many days against many thousands, although the enemies drove forward shelters and towers and in three hours completed a fortification ten miles in extent, and although on the seventh day they set the camp on fire after fire had been cast within the rampart. But the whole hope lay in fortifying and resisting.

[Printed page 700]

Caesar writes thus in book 5:

> On the next day, after the enemies perceived from the nocturnal noise and watches that the Romans were departing, they placed ambushes in two divisions in the forests, in a suitable and concealed place approximately two miles away, and awaited the arrival of the Romans. When the greater part of the column had descended into a great valley, they suddenly showed themselves on each side of that valley and began to press the rearmost men, prevent the foremost from ascending, and join battle in a place most disadvantageous to our men.

Had they not possessed strong camps, all the legions could have been destroyed in one day. Assuredly the Romans would have acted far more prudently at the beginning by doing what they were afterward compelled to do: fortifying permanent camps, winter quarters, and even summer camps in fixed places. Hence Trajan placed castles beyond the Danube and built a bridge so that relief could be brought if they were attacked. Indeed, the conquered Decebalus was ordered to destroy his bulwarks.

Only this can be asked in this place: whether it is more advisable to possess temporary or permanent camps. But no prudent man can doubt that permanent ones are more useful. First, they are stronger, having been fortified by long labor. Second, there is no need to repeat the labor every year. Third, a conquered or routed army possesses a refuge. Hence the legions, concerning whose distribution I spoke above, and the cohorts passed their lives in their own fortifications. The regular legion at Alexandria possessed its own separately fortified camp, as though a fortress; the cohort at Jerusalem also possessed its own camp. What else was this than a fortress for restraining the city?

Herod himself, not contrary to Roman discipline, restrained the populous city hostile to him by three fortresses. Nor did the most courageous kings act otherwise. David fortified Zion and from it securely ruled the people. Besides the Cherethites and Pelethites, divisions of twenty-four thousand of the most select soldiers always served him as a garrison, as Holy Scripture testifies, 1 Chronicles 27. But let us consider our own times, concerning which Machiavelli speaks in this manner:

> If fortresses were ever useless for restraining subjects, assuredly in our age they are not only useless but also ruinous because of the use of engines of war, whose assault neither fortresses nor any confined places can sustain. To withstand them, it is necessary continually to fall back and to compensate inwardly with new ditches and embankments for the ruins of the walls which they produce. Since these things are so, consider further whether a people which was already previously under your dominion, or one which has recently been added to your empire, should be restrained by fortresses of this kind. Certainly, if you possess a principate received from your ancestors, fortresses will not benefit you in keeping subjects obedient, for the reasons already explained: since they make you and your descendants more audacious in inflicting injuries upon the people, and consequently expose you to their hatred, and cannot afterward defend you. For these reasons, and lest either he himself or his heirs have an opportunity to exercise tyranny, but instead endeavor to win the people's goodwill, a wise prince should never construct fortresses.

This argument repeats the preceding one and adds that fortresses are useless at the present time because they cannot long sustain the assault of engines. If this argument possesses force, no fortification whatever ought to be employed; nor should camps be surrounded with a rampart in the Roman manner, for they cannot long resist cannon. But kings and princes, as well as the most courageous commanders of our time--whom I judge in no way inferior to the ancients in strength of spirit and prudence--think altogether differently. For first, many fortresses fortified by the nature of the place and also assisted by art, if they possess an energetic soldiery, are impregnable and render rivers, harbors, and roads secure. Next, those which at some time yield to the enemy nevertheless, by delaying him, furnish time for assembling soldiers, exhaust the adversaries in expense and labor, and diminish their authority, while at times the treasuries of kingdoms are spent upon a single rock or marsh.

But if the enemy finds everything level and without fortifications, if he has gained one victory, uses it, and raises fortifications in various places, he imposes the bridle of perpetual servitude; for he finds an unarmed province. What prevented Albert of Brandenburg, as he raged with sword, pillage, and fires, from entering lower Germany except the fortress set at Koblenz? He neither dared pass it nor judged that attacking it suited his plans. The fortress was not the reason why the descendants of Sforza lost Milan, but their conduct, the hatred of the people, and the power of the French. If Milan had not possessed a fortress, it would have lost its dominion much sooner; and now for many years that fortress and others have been the protection of this duchy. The French fortified their kingdom with citadels better constructed than those of all other nations. Nicolas Bellus therefore speaks truly in volume 1 of Political Matters, concerning France:

> As regards fortifications, there is no other region in which there is a greater number of them. This results from several causes. One is that, when the kingdom was divided into several dominions and principalities--namely > Burgundy, Brittany, the Duchy of Anjou, and Normandy--each ruler fortified his own frontiers. The number of fortifications grew through the wars of the English, who ruled a great part of France. The situation and nature of places suitable for fortification, and no less the diligence and aptitude of the people for these matters, make the fortification of places easier.

§ 6. What Machiavelli adds, however, contributes nothing to the matter. He says:

> To these considerations is added the fact that fortresses are easily lost, either through the fraud of those who command them, the force of enemies, hunger, or a long siege. But if you wish to recover a city which has been lost by the aid of a fortress which alone has remained faithful, you nevertheless need an army just as though you possessed no fortress, and indeed an army so much larger as it is more likely that the citizens will be more hostile to you because of injuries received from the fortress than they would have been if you had lacked one. Experience itself has taught that the fortress of Milan benefited neither the Sforzas nor the French at all in time of war and harmed them greatly in time of peace, because both, trusting in so great a mass of construction, did not consider some more humane method of preserving that principate.

I have already refuted a similar argument above concerning a treasury. For if fear of thieves means that treasure must not be laid aside, neither should a method of household management be recommended to the head of a household. But it is miserable to be despoiled, and most miserable to possess nothing of which you can be despoiled. I say most miserable in a prince and in a state; for I am not instructing solitary men and pupils of voluntary poverty but a state, which needs resources, fortresses, and the other necessities by which it may terrify and restrain the wicked.

Commanders of fortresses can desert and hand the fortresses over, but unfortified camps, towns, and villages can be handed over much more easily. Consequently, neither camps nor fortresses are beneficial without the fidelity of men. Sometimes a stronger enemy wrests a spear from a soldier and kills him after he has been struck down with his own sword; nevertheless, an army is not for that reason to go unarmed. But Guidobaldo, son of Federico, duke of Urbino, a man most skilled in military affairs, after he had been driven from his dominion by Cesare Borgia, son of Alexander VI, and had afterward recovered that same dominion through a certain chance, demolished all its fortresses and bulwarks. For since he possessed well-disposed subjects, he did not need them for restraining those subjects; and he saw that he could not defend them against enemies without an army.

[Printed page 701]

I do not deny that it is sometimes fitting for fortresses to be demolished: namely, if the goodwill of the subjects is so great that they are not necessary for restraining them; if money for maintaining a garrison is lacking; or if they cannot be defended. Nor are we disputing about that matter. We know that great commanders have consumed towns, villages, crops, and all other things which they could not defend with flames, lest they benefit the enemy. Guidobaldo did not hold the principate long thereafter, as experience taught. The favor of the people is changed more swiftly than a breeze. Peoples begin most swiftly to hate those princes whom they embraced most eagerly when, contrary to expectation, they see that tributes, taxes, and services are commanded.

He does not reason rightly concerning the fortress of the Genoese. Although that city could not be held, it does not therefore follow that all fortresses must be demolished. Otherwise cities should not be surrounded with walls, since prodigious walls did not defend Babylon and Nineveh; for there were other causes of their destruction. But let us refute Machiavelli from his own words and from history. He says:

> The event which occurred at Genoa a few years ago is both the most recent and the most evident example for demonstrating that the construction of fortresses is useless and their destruction useful. For we know that after that city defected from Louis, king of France, in the year of salvation 1506, and he came into Italy with a great army to recover it, the king, after recovering the city, founded a fortress of immense mass, such as it is established that no other then existed. For it seemed impregnable both by the nature of its location and by art. It rested upon the promontory of Gondega, projecting over the sea, so that from there the entire harbor and also a great part of the city > could be struck with missiles. Nevertheless, when afterward, in the year of the Lord 1512, all the French were driven out of Italy, Genoa also, fearing the fortress not at all, defected to Ottaviano Fregoso. He surrounded it with a siege and in the space of sixteen months compelled it by hunger to surrender. After Fregoso had occupied it, despising the counsels of all who advised that he preserve it as a kind of refuge, he caused it to be demolished utterly. He judged the goodwill of the people and his own valor to be a better foundation for his dominion, which he still possesses, than any fortresses or bulwarks.

To me, however, the great usefulness of fortresses seems to be proved most firmly by this very example. For when the French, hated by the Italians and afflicted by diseases, hunger, and innumerable calamities, were being driven from all Italy, it was not surprising that the citizens of Genoa also--long free and princes of Italy--agreed upon liberty. The fortress caused them not to be the first to do so. This ought not to be esteemed a small matter, for the French held the fortress and harbor for sixteen months. If meanwhile they had assembled a strong army, they could have lifted the siege. Add that the fortress was compelled by hunger to surrender. Therefore, if adequate provision had been made for its supplies, a siege of two or three years would have been necessary; during that time the French could both have prepared relief forces and worn down the besiegers, and the dispositions of the peoples could have changed.

But Machiavelli proceeds:

> The same reasoning applies also to those fortresses which states are accustomed to found in recently occupied cities in order to keep those citizens obedient. If this is less evident from the example of the Genoese already adduced, it will become better known from the encounter between the Florentines and Pisans. For when the Florentines had seen the Pisans rebel so many times, they judged that by constructing a fortress they could restrain them. They paid too little attention to the fact that a city which had been accustomed to be free and had always been hostile to the Florentine name could be kept obedient by no other method than if, in the Roman manner, they either received it into partnership with themselves or utterly destroyed it. How much the fortresses benefited them toward their intended end became apparent from the arrival of Charles, king of France, to whom they were immediately handed over, without negligence of the commanders and without fear of a greater evil. If the Florentines had not previously founded them and had not attributed so much to them as to suppose that the city was preserved through them, they would assuredly have considered another method by which they could not so easily have been stripped of dominion over the city by the king.

Here too nothing is concluded against fortresses. Pisa and Florence were rival cities for a long time. At last Pisa succumbed; but because it was held neither by a sufficiently strong garrison nor by a fortress, when an opportunity was given it rebelled. They afterward restrained it by a fortress until the arrival of King Charles, to whom everything yielded. Since the fortress was defended by a garrison insufficiently strong, faithless, and feeble, the commanders preferred to surrender themselves to the king's favor rather than run risks without cause. If the Florentines had strengthened the fortress, placed a powerful garrison and provisions within it, and mollified the hostile spirits of the Pisans so that they preferred neighbors and kinsmen to distant masters, they could have sustained and worn down Charles's army for a long time, preventing it from gaining other successes.

The remaining methods were difficult: to transfer Pisa to Florence or to destroy it utterly. For they preferred to rule another city rather than that there should be no city. I do not excuse the Florentines if they sinned through pride of command or avarice. Against great hatreds no power endures, yet fortresses and armies resist for some time. If they had not constructed a fortress at Pisa, the Pisans would already before Charles's arrival have shaken off the yoke and harassed Florence with incursions and depredations.

§ 7. He concedes that cities have been recovered through fortresses but responds in this manner:

> If someone should object to us that either Tarentum in ancient times or Brescia in our own age was recovered by means of a fortress after the inhabitants defected, I reply that the fortress was by no means sufficient for recovering Tarentum, since the consul Quintus Fabius was sent with a very great army to occupy it; with that army he could without doubt have captured it even if they had possessed no fortress there. What, therefore, did the fortress benefit > the Roman people if they nevertheless needed a consular army to recover the city? The Romans possessed no fortress at Capua, yet they recovered that same city by the valor of an army. In the rebellion of the city of Brescia something new and rare occurred. For it rarely happens that, when a city defects, those in the fortress remain faithful unless they possess a neighboring army whose aid they can implore. When the Brescian citizens defected, Foilleus, the commander, was at Bologna with the royal army. Having learned of the matter through swift messengers, he immediately prepared for the journey and, arriving there on the third day, recovered the city with the help of the fortress. Therefore Brescia could not be recovered by the fortress alone but needed the royal army; nor, even if it could have been recovered by that alone, [would this example suffice].

I reply that the fortress was of the greatest benefit. For although the city could not be recovered without an army, it could nevertheless be recovered easily because the fortress furnished the opportunity. The disorders of Belgium have shown how much importance lies in fortresses. Indeed, he admits that Brescia was recovered with the aid of a fortress. The very method of wars teaches this. How much danger and labor is expended by commanders so that, while they besiege a city, they may take one tower, one bulwark from the enemies! And when they have obtained this, they judge that their labor has been worthwhile.

When Jerusalem was besieged--and that was the most renowned siege among all those since the world was created--Titus first took the outer wall, then the second, finally the third, and this at intervals of time and with fresh slaughter of his own men; fourth, he took the fortress Antonia constructed by Herod; fifth, the Temple, which possessed the strength and position of a fortress; finally, Mount Zion, an altogether royal fortification. If the Romans had taken timely thought for themselves and occupied one of those fortresses before they were driven out, they would easily have obtained the city. The kings of the Greeks acted more prudently, therefore, because they held the fortress.

[Printed page 702]

§ 8. Nor do I approve every kind of fortress, but only three kinds. First are those which are separated from cities or possess small cities joined to them but were not constructed for keeping those cities obedient. Their purpose is the protection of rivers, harbors, frontiers, and roads; on this account the advantageous position of their locations renders them useful. Hence the Hermenstein fortress--Ehrenbreitstein--set over the confluence of the Rhine and Moselle, is useful. In the same way there is the fortress which they call Schenkenschanz at the division of the Rhine; for I have already shown above that it is properly called a fortress because it repels the enemy.

Second, fortresses are founded for restraining and defending great cities. There are three modes of these. Some can strike the city and divert provisions, such as the one at Genoa which the king of France constructed. These are to be approved most of all, because they constrain the spirits of the citizens by fear of two things: bombardment and a sortie into the city, and the prevention of provisions. Others prevail through fear of only one of these two disadvantages, such as those of Prague and Luxembourg, which can do harm by battering and invading the cities. Those situated in harbors generally serve to protect or impede imports. Such is the African fortification of Rachia, which the Spaniards brought under their dominion a few years ago by a courageous stratagem and which the Ethiopians besieged for a long time with their utmost strength.

The third kind of fortresses is that which princes and nobles are accustomed to construct, which does not come under the name of a fortification but is a somewhat more honorable dwelling fortified against sudden assaults. There is an innumerable multitude of these in Germany and Gaul. In former times many were very strongly fortified and set upon rocks; now most are deserted.

Machiavelli errs much more gravely concerning fortresses against enemies:

> But those fortresses which are constructed to repel foreign enemies and to defend your people and empire are not necessary either. If you abound in courageous men and energetic soldiers, they are not only unnecessary but altogether useless. For without an army they are of no benefit; an excellent army can defend you without fortresses. All who excelled either in political or military arts--such as the Romans and Spartans--understood this sufficiently > from experience itself. The Romans never constructed any fortresses; the Spartans did not even wish the cities occupied by them to possess walls. They believed that the valor of soldiers alone constituted bulwarks. Hence it happened that when a certain Spartan was asked whether the city of Athens seemed furnished with beautiful walls, he replied, “Entirely so, if it were inhabited by women.” Therefore, for a prince who possesses a good army, only some fortresses situated upon the frontiers of the empire, especially in maritime locations, can be beneficial for sustaining the enemies for several days until the armies are made ready; but not even these are necessary to him. If he lacks a courageous army, fortresses on the frontiers of the empire either benefit him not at all or even harm him. For they are easily lost, and when the enemy occupies them, he will employ them against you. But if you grant that some fortresses are so strong and fortified that they cannot be occupied, the enemy nevertheless proceeds onward after leaving them behind him; for most powerful armies invade and overrun the enemy's frontiers without taking account of either the cities or the strongest fortresses which they leave at their back. It is established that this is so from both ancient and modern examples. Francesco Maria invaded Urbino a few years ago and was not at all concerned that he had left behind him ten cities, all hostile to him. Therefore, every prince who possesses a powerful army can easily lack fortresses; one who lacks it ought not to construct fortresses but to fortify as strongly as he can the city in which he dwells and to equip the citizens with arms, so that he may at least sustain for some time the assault of arriving enemies until he can either make an agreement with him or summon foreigners to his aid. Whatever other fortresses and bulwarks are built burden both princes and subjects with excessive expenditures in time of peace and are of no benefit in time of war. Therefore, just as in other matters the senate of the Roman people administered everything with the highest prudence, so here also it acted wisely, because it judged that the conquered and subdued Latins and Privernates were not to be restrained by any fortresses but kept obedient by another method, more advantageous and more consonant with valor.

I have already refuted these things above, nor do the Lacedaemonians move me, since in the judgment of all nations they acted with ἀφροσύνης--that is, with foolish simplicity--in not even surrounding their city with a wall. Nothing could be more foolish than this. For if a place lies open to every injury, watch must be kept with great forces, great labor, and danger. In every place, even one at peace, the Romans fortified their camp. For what wisdom is there in exhausting a citizen with watches when by interposing a small wall you can save so much labor?

But the walls of the Athenians were as though they were inhabited by women. This, however, was the jeer of a Laconian--and of one who feared walled Athens. We know that the most courageous men founded and defended the strongest walls, and that fortresses in Europe and India have in our own time been defended with remarkable valor. If we praise Roman strength, assuredly we ought to admire our own times; for the strength of soldiers who advance against iron cannon is greater than that of men advancing against arrows.

They object that Poland and England lack fortifications. But perhaps it would be better for those kingdoms to receive examples from many others than to give them. How often is Poland invaded with impunity by Turks, Tatars, Muscovites, and Swedes? How many thousands of people are carried away? If there were fortifications and garrisons at suitable places, if the crossings were occupied, the sudden assaults of the enemies would easily be repelled. England is girded by the sea: to have entered it is to have conquered it.

CHAPTER XXIV

Treaties Contribute Very Greatly to Power

A treaty is an agreement between states concerning mutual friendship and partnership in some matter. No kingdom is without a rival; therefore neither ought it to be without an ally, just as a private person ought not to be without a friend. To strike a treaty belongs to supreme majesty and, by its concession, to princes; without its consent, it is a conspiracy. Public defense pertains to the prince alone. Thus Besold, book 2, chapter 5, §12, on the law of treaties.

Treaties which are entered into among those who possess different ends and seek one thing are brief. If two rivals easily exclude a third after entering into a treaty, when that man has been cast out they turn against one another.

[Printed page 703]

§ 1. By treaties I understand covenants and agreements by which several parties bind themselves by mutual obligation, συμμαχίαν, and enter into partnership, so that they judge the same persons friends and enemies. Nothing is more effective than this for power. For more is accomplished by the treaties of allies than by wars, and the Romans performed no fewer deeds with the forces of allies than under their own auspices.

§ 2. Treaties with foreign princes establish security at home and confer authority. For everyone considers that prince great whom kings and magnates court and to whom splendid embassies frequently come.

§ 3. The covenant of treaties ought to be most sacred. For they are sanctioned publicly and by oath. Many forms of an oath accompanied by a curse are found everywhere among the historians. Next, because fidelity publicly pledged binds more than any private promise. Even if no one preserved fidelity, kings nevertheless ought to preserve it. Nothing, however, can harm a kingdom more than violation of treaties. Hence no one is a friend to the Turks, because they measure treaties by utility alone.

§ 4. When several parties enter into one treaty, it must be useful or necessary to both parties; otherwise it is not lasting. Indeed, the most grievous wars arise from the complaints of allies, as when the Rhodians complain that their military service and partnership with the Romans had been without honor. For almost everyone regards his own utility. This consideration so often prevails even over honor that allies oppose allies. When Xerxes had been routed and the victorious fleet of Greece stood at anchor, a wicked thought, worthy of exile, entered Themistocles' mind: that he should burn the fleet of the allies so that, once stripped of maritime power, they would be in the power of the Athenians. When Aristides declared that this was useful but not honorable, the Athenian people forbade it--and rightly, for it would have burdened itself with so much hatred that no equal power could have been imagined by which it might escape.

A most useful treaty was negotiated between the Venetians and the Spaniard in 1571. Agreement was reached later than was fitting, for Nicosia had been captured. It was altogether in the interest of the Venetians that the treaty be hastened and the auxiliary forces be decreed swiftly; for the Venetian could be defended only by a treaty, and if he were conquered all Italy would have been in danger. But the treaty was afterward rendered void for private reasons, because the Venetians saw that their commerce was being cut off and that they were consequently being reduced to poverty. Therefore one must always be vigilant to make an agreement with a man whom sudden necessity does not compel to make an agreement with the enemy. For after the greatest expenditures had been made, the Venetians, afflicted by losses in commerce, made a disadvantageous peace with the Turk.

§ 5. Treaties between dissimilar parties are not very secure--for example, between states and princes. For their interests are different, and for a long time no king was admitted into the city of Rome. Although the Roman people possessed allied kings, it nevertheless oppressed them especially.

Hence neither do the Venetians possess a secure treaty with any king, nor do they appear greatly to desire one; and in the most recent war they were defended more by the Hollanders than by any other prince. Nor do the Hollanders trust treaties with princes. One who in these days flattered the Belgians perceived this truly, although otherwise he was a most mendacious historian:

> Great hatreds will follow the alliances of kings, to which we owe a great part of our liberty, and aid from Gaul and Britain will cease when concord ceases. The allied cities toward the east, lest they submit to the factious commands of the Belgians, will soon restore themselves to liberty. Since through their own weakness they will be unable to retain it, they will submit themselves to the savage nation toward the north. The princes of Germany will feign a new endurance of Austrian commands. The Turks, Conscript Fathers, apart from mere commerce in the Mediterranean, and the nobles of Venice--who in these wars have squandered the flower of our blood--will open only their treasuries.

The cause of this matter seems to me to be that democratic or aristocratic states do not wish their magistrates to admire or desire royal splendor. For there is the greatest danger that those who seek annual commands with so much canvassing that they even pour out their entire patrimonies should strive with every effort for perpetual dictatorships and royal stability. I judge that there were scarcely three Romans who, if they had been able, would not have done what Caesar, Pompey, and Augustus did.

No less suspect to kings is the familiarity of their princes with the senators of a free state. For those senators obtain liberty while generally possessing less power, whereas princes are bound in many ways; therefore, from the senators' laws and custom princes can adopt plans for their own liberty. But, all things considered, there is more danger in a state. For those who preside over a state, as at Venice, in Holland, among the Alpine Grisons, and in Switzerland, readily accept gifts from kings and are accustomed to sell them their services. For where would you now find men such as Fabricius? And now in Holland and the Alps proceedings περὶ δωροδοκίας--concerning bribery--are conducted openly. For among equal senators of a state ambition is kindled more greatly as they succeed one another, court the popular breezes, and rescind deeds and laws. Hence comes their concern for resources and power. These are furnished by kings when the senators direct their counsels toward the kings' advantages or impede the counsels of others.

Nor can states so easily bind royal ministers to themselves with gold: private men do not do it because it exceeds their means, and the senate itself cannot conveniently do it because accounts must be rendered. Therefore such largesses cannot be secret and are consequently most dangerous.

§ 6. Honorable marriages with the powerful confer by far the greatest power and authority, which is the foundation of power. Therefore powerful fathers-in-law and sons-in-law, or men suitable for conducting affairs, must be sought for a prince. We see this happen: royal hatreds are ended by loves, and a bridesmaid has been the salvation of nations. Assuredly wars are ended more happily by no means than by marriages.

But care must be taken lest wars arise through the occasion of marriages. This is accustomed to happen when the parties are not joined in good faith. Daniel 2:43 describes such a kingdom for us: “But whereas you saw the iron mixed with earthenware of clay, they shall indeed be mingled with human seed, but they shall not adhere to one another, just as iron cannot be mixed with earthenware.” The cause must be sought from the nature of the matter. Metals cannot be mixed with earthenware either by heat or by cold. Earthen vessels are hardened by heat and made firm into stony hardness; by cold they are softened. Metals grow solid by cold; by heat they are dissolved and liquefied. What benefits one, therefore, harms the other. Metals easily coalesce with one another because, when heated, they flow together and, when cooled, are hardened together. This condition of kings must be regarded, so that treaties of marriage may produce the peace of provinces.

Hence a reason must be sought why the minds of kings bound by affinity do not cohere. Daniel speaks thus in Chaldaic: that the kingdom will be טינא בחסף מערב,

"mixed with earthenware of clay." ערב means to make a pledge, give security, conduct business, or mix. Marriages will therefore be mixed in that kingdom in the manner of merchandise, so that treaties are contracted not from conjugal love but for the advantage of ruling. They will also be mingled with human seed, but, as the Chaldaean says:

דנא עם דנא דבקין לֵהון ולא

"But not so as to exist glued one to another."

καὶ οὐκ ἔσονται προσκολλώμενοι οὗτος μετὰ τούτου, as the Septuagint translates it. What, therefore, must be considered especially in these marriages?

§ 7. First, in these marriages it must be regarded that the end of marriage be true: marital union, the begetting and education of offspring, the spouses' mutual assistance, and perpetual love. For those who perversely employ this holy covenant, which God instituted, for deceptions acquire greater evils for themselves from it.

In this manner Saul promised his daughter to David, 1 Samuel 18:15: "Saul therefore saw that he was exceedingly prudent and began to beware of him. But all Israel and Judah loved David, for he went in and out before them. And Saul said to David: 'Behold my elder daughter Merab; I will give her to you as a wife. Only be a valiant man and fight the battles of the Lord.' But Saul was considering, saying: 'Let not my hand be upon him, but let the hand of the Philistines be upon him.'"

They did not adhere to one another; for Saul both persecuted his son-in-law and gave his daughter to another, while his other daughter was more faithful to her husband than to her impious father. Marriage therefore could not reconcile these men, since Saul sought nothing other than David's death; hence a dowry of one hundred foreskins of the Philistines was imposed.

Antiochus employed a similar fraud; concerning him Daniel 11:17 says: "And he shall set his face to come and take possession of his entire kingdom, and he shall make equitable terms with him, and shall give him a daughter of women in order to overthrow it; but she shall not stand, nor shall she be for him." When the guardians of the Egyptian king guarded against the plots of Antiochus, he betrothed Cleopatra to him, feigned peace, and gave her Coele-Syria, Judaea, Samaria, and Phoenicia in the name of a dowry. Yet he did not relinquish those territories altogether, for Josephus says that tribute was paid to each king. He had commanded his daughter to kill her husband by whatever means she could; but she supported the part of her husband more than that of her father. Polybius, to whom perhaps the king's murderous disposition toward his own kin was unknown, supposes another reason for the marriage: namely, that he might bind Ptolemy to himself by affinity, lest Ptolemy oppose him when he was about to fight against the Romans. All these things were the beginnings of immense calamities, while that most criminal man against the whole human race violated a father's right over his daughter, a father-in-law's right, and finally the fellowship of the human race.

§ 8. Marriages cannot establish concord when each party possesses a different purpose, although they do not fight by design. At last matters will reach the point that those treaties are broken. The first sedition of the state concerned marriages; from the mingling of patrician and plebeian blood arose an opportunity for the plebs to seek the magistracies, until all things devolved upon the plebs and, as customarily follows from this, upon one man.

Afterward the same thing was attempted under the triumvirate. Antony married Octavia, the sister of Augustus; Augustus married Claudia, Antony's stepdaughter. But the more powerful desire for ruling shattered all those bonds and set east and west against one another. Afterward Severus wished to stabilize the kingdom for his sons Caracalla and Geta through affinity with Plautianus, but the marriages were ruinous to both parties. The same thing was attempted in Stilicho and others, but with fruitless effort, because he employed marriages with imperial women to transfer the Empire. They could not be glued together because the exceedingly impious and faithless Stilicho sought anything rather than the safety of the Empire. Hence marriages under a dissimilar religious observance cannot long be enduring and useful.

§ 9. Treaties, whether of marriage or of any other kind, entered into with distant parties do not help greatly and offend neighbors. For if, while the state stood, some prince of the Romans had married a daughter of Antiochus or Ptolemy, allied kings, he could neither have been assisted by his father-in-law nor, being utterly hateful to the other citizens, would he have been admitted to any administration. Thus princes must now also beware lest through marriages with the powerful they appear to be contriving some revolution. Treaties with the Frenchman and agreements of betrothal were harmful to Wilhelm, duke of Jülich. The reason is openly known. For when neighboring princes are neglected and the splendor of foreign marriages is sought, hostility and suspicion arise, which always accompany power recently increased. At home, therefore, among his own people he has hatreds, alienation, and distrust ready at hand, but assistance far away.

The other things which contribute to power, since they are military, I shall discuss in their proper place.

ADAM CONTZEN

TEN BOOKS OF POLITICS

BOOK NINE

On the Internal Evils of the State

CONTENTS

Chapter I. That the Losses of States Are Many and Grave, and Which of Them Especially Pertain to the Statesman 5

Chapter II. That Sedition Is a Most Grave Evil 6

Chapter III. That Seditions Are Most Frequent 10

Chapter IV. Seditions and Conspiracies in the Time of the Monarchy 23

Chapter V. That the Empire of Constantinople Was Agitated by Sedition and Rebellion 28

Chapter VI. The Seditions of Other States 33

Chapter VII. The Seditions of the Osmanids 38

Chapter VIII. The Causes of Seditions and Tumults on the Part of Rulers 39

Chapter IX. The Causes of Seditions Arising from Subjects 51

Chapter X. A Fuller Discussion of Seditions Arising from Religion, and the Condition of the State and of Religion in the Year 1617 58

Chapter XI. The Condition of the European Religions, If One Considers Their Doctrine and Doctors 85

Chapter XII. The Unexpected Origin of Seditions, and Their Origin from Small Things 92

Chapter XIII. Chance Events Sometimes Furnish a Cause of Sedition 94

Chapter XIV. The Order and Method of Stirring Up Seditions 97

Chapter XV. Remedies against Seditions and Civil Wars 104

Chapter XVI. Various Methods of Restraining Seditions Employed by Different Men 110

Chapter XVII. Public Peace Has Been Disturbed Not by Catholics, but by the Seditions of Sectarians 114

Chapter XVIII. Civil Peace Can Scarcely Be Obtained in the Roman Empire So Long as the Preachers Disturb Ecclesiastical Peace 121

Chapter XIX. Experience Teaches That Religious Dissensions Disturb the Peace of the State 127

Chapter XX. Concord of Religions Commended to the Prince 129

Chapter XXI. The Sectarians Themselves Feel the Disadvantages of Their Discords 134

Chapter XXII. That Religious Peace Can Be Established in Germany . . . 140

Chapter XXIII. That Peace Cannot Exist in a Mixture of Religion and a Certain Political Moderation . . . 143

Chapter XXIV. That Seditions Arising from Religions Cannot Be Removed by Syncretism Is Taught from Its Nature and End . . . 146

Chapter XXV. That the Primary Aim of Syncretism Is That, Once the Peace of Religion Has Been Violated, Catholics Should Be Slaughtered . . . 153

Chapter XXVI. That the Secondary Aim of Syncretism Is Twofold: the Overthrow of the Lutherans and the Servitude of Calvinist Princes . . . 159

Chapter XXVII. That Syncretism Is Not Proved by the Examples of the Fathers, Catholics, and Lutherans . . . 175

Chapter XXVIII. That the Lutherans Condemn Syncretism and That Catholics Ought to Be Prepared to Endure Evils . . . 178

Chapter XXIX. That the Civil Alliance of Certain Princes Is Not to Be Adduced in Favor of Syncretism in Religion . . . 181

Chapter XXX. That for Peace It Is Necessary to Restrain the Insolence of Intellects . . . 185

Chapter XXXI. That Arbiters Free from Passions Must Be Chosen in a Negotiation for Peace . . . 189

Chapter XXXII. That Meanwhile, While Peace Is Being Negotiated, the Lies and Calumnies of Preachers Must Be Restrained . . . 195

Chapter XXXIII. That Colloquies Rightly Instituted Conduce to Peace . . . 199

Chapter XXXIV. That Writings Undertaken Concerning Controversies, Although Eristic, Are Nevertheless Useful for Peace . . . 202

Chapter XXXV. That a General Council Is the Most Certain and Compendious Way to Peace Is Shown from the Scriptures . . . 204

Chapter XXXVI. That It Is the Custom of the Church to Assemble Councils against Heresies, and That the Holy Fathers Think Thus . . . 208

Chapter XXXVII. That the Sectaries Themselves Think a Council the Most Advantageous Way to Peace . . . 211

Chapter XXXVIII. That the Sectaries of Our Time Cannot Possess a General Council . . . 214

Chapter XXXIX. It Is Shown Further That the Innovators Can Possess Neither a Synod nor Peace . . . 218

Chapter XL. The Form of a Council Assembled to Make Peace Must Be Taken from the Ancient Custom of the Church . . . 227

Chapter XLI. There Are Weighty Reasons Why Catholics, but Not the Adversaries, Approve a Council . . . 229

Chapter XLII. The Council of Trent Must Be Received, So That Peace May Be Restored to Germany . . . 237

Chapter XLIII. The Objections against the Authority of the Council Are Empty 244

Chapter XLIV. The Method of Entering upon Peace 253

Chapter XLV. Severe Punishments Have Been Established for Seditious Persons and Rebellions 261

Chapter XLVI. A Good Citizen Should Sometimes Join One Party, and Sometimes Neither 266

CHAPTER I

That the Losses of States Are Many and Grave, and Which of Them Especially Pertain to the Statesman

§ 1. Just as in the human body there are as many troops of diseases as there are joints and members, so also in the great system of the state and of kingdoms there are innumerable calamities and modes of perishing. Sometimes pestilence depopulates entire nations, as did that one in the time of Gallienus which traversed the whole world. Famine is accustomed to precede or follow pestilence, and it itself sometimes devours the remnants of peoples. The very earth is provoked by the sins of men and is shaken: in the year of Christ 366 almost the whole world was violated by an earthquake. Add to these floods and fires, and whatever evil has befallen anyone which may rightly be feared by all. Some cities have been overthrown by feeble creatures. Pliny, Book VIII, chapter 29: “Nor are there less famous examples of destruction even from contemptible animals. Marcus Varro is an authority that a town in Spain was undermined by rabbits, one in Thessaly by moles; that a city in Gaul was driven out by frogs, one in Africa by locusts; that the inhabitants of Gyaros, an island of the Cyclades, were put to flight by mice; that in Italy Amyclae was destroyed by serpents. On this side of the Dog-Milking Ethiopians a region lies widely deserted, its people removed by scorpions and solifuges; and Theophrastus is an authority that the Thrarienses were driven away by centipedes.” Although a wise prince may moderate and alleviate the gravity of these evils by diligence, humanity, and liberality, they nevertheless do not come under the consideration of politics, since they can be averted and governed by no means except prayers and the amendment of morals.

§ 2. But the losses of the state with which the prudence of the prince is occupied are twofold. For either they arise from the city itself and adhere in its entrails, as fever, dropsy, and pestilence do in a man; or they are brought in from elsewhere, as hail, lightning, and arrows are. The internal evils are hatreds, contempt, factions, treasons, seditions, and rebellions. The external evil is war. Although, however, the causes of discords and seditions can be forestalled and excluded by those things which I have taught, it has nevertheless seemed good to dispute in separate books about sedition and war, lest anything which pertains to the perfect government of the state appear to be lacking.

CHAPTER II

That Sedition Is a Most Grave Evil

§ 1. We call sedition, as it were, a separation or secession, when one part of the state rises against another part or against the prince; the Greeks call it στάσιν. It is a great evil and more calamitous than war. For the members of one body, which cannot be safe unless by agreement, clash among themselves and destroy themselves by their mutual pressure. Indeed, greater crimes are committed in sedition than in war. And so, in the judgment of all wise men, nothing is more detestable than civil war. Its causes are various, but the principal one is that civil hatreds are most bitter; for they seem to be stirred by great causes, and when they have grown strong, they are little removed from madness. Indeed, we openly say that those who rage against their own members are mad. And so kindred battle lines, when brothers and parents are on opposing sides, clash more fiercely. Hence even fables have handed down that the most burning hatreds were fraternal; hence the banquets of Thyestes and the smoke of the Theban funeral pyres tending in opposite directions; hence the deaths of Turkish brothers, now as if by law. With an external enemy the contest is about liberty, glory, and resources; with a citizen, about life.

Let the antiquity of Roman history be consulted. They received conquered enemies into the city, sent them under the yoke, and sold them into slavery; and when they exercised cruelty, they struck them down with axe or sword. But in civil war the conquered man counted it a gain if he were permitted to die without tortures and insults. They very often spared the leaders and kings of enemies; they killed their own commanders after torture and abused their corpses with every kind of mockery. Civil madness has given the world no example, so far as I remember, more horrible than that concerning Andronicus. Nicetas describes the history in Book I:

“And so Andronicus, having been captured, is cast into the fortress of Anemas with two heavy chains fitted with iron clasps placed upon his proud neck, and laden with fetters, as it is customary for captives to be treated. When he is brought in that condition to Isaac, he is assailed with insulting words, slapped, struck upon the nostrils, plucked by the beard, beaten out of his teeth, and torn by the hair. Publicly exposed to the mockery of all, he is even beaten with fists by women, especially by those whose husbands he had either killed or blinded. Then, after his right hand had been cut off, he is taken back into the same fortress without food, without drink, without any service from anyone. After some days, his other eye having been put out, he is set upon a mangy camel and led through the forum in the semblance of a triumph, his smooth bald head like a dry oak and barer than an egg, clothed in a short tunic--a pitiable spectacle which could draw streams of tears from eyes not inhuman.

[Printed page 706]

“But the most foolish and wanton inhabitants of the city--especially tailors, leather-workers, artisans, and the filthy rabble hanging about the marketplace, like flies in springtime flying to milk-pails and rich cups--paid no regard to the fact that only the day before yesterday he had been emperor, adorned with the royal diadem, praised, celebrated, and adored by all, and that they had attested by the most sacred oath their fidelity and goodwill toward him. Rushing upon him with savage minds and without any reason, they omitted no evil by which they might wickedly afflict Andronicus. Some drove keys into his head; others defiled his nostrils with dung; others squeezed upon his face sponges fouled with the excrement of men and beasts; others assailed his parents with obscene words. There were also those who pricked his sides with spits, and certain more shameless men, hurling stones, called him a rabid dog. A certain shameless harlot, having snatched from the kitchen a pot full of boiling water, poured it upon his face. Finally, there was no one who did not harm Andronicus.

“Thus, after he had been led ignominiously into the theater in that ridiculous triumph and taken down from the wretched camel, they suspended him by his feet, tied with a rope, beside two little columns upon which a stone rests above, near a bronze she-wolf and hyena which stand with necks bent as though roused to rush one against the other. Having suffered so many evils and six hundred others which we have passed over, he nevertheless still bore the evils inflicted upon him with a noble spirit; and turning, with his mind unimpaired, toward the crowd pouring in while he lay there, he said nothing other than: 'Lord, have mercy; and why do you break a bruised reed?' But the utterly mad crowd of people did not spare the most afflicted Andronicus even then, after he had been suspended by his feet. Having torn away his bonds, they maltreated his genitals, and a certain wicked man drove a long sword through his throat as far as his intestines. Two men of Latin stock, leaning with both hands upon their swords, drove them into his buttocks in order to try which was sharper, glorying in dexterity of stroke. After so many hardships and disasters he ended his life with difficulty, his right hand brought painfully to his mouth, so that many thought that he was sucking from it the warm blood still dripping from the recent wound."

§ 2. This also shows the cruelty of civil wars in many ways: all the consolations of the victor are removed by his fear and hatred. In external wars the usefulness of slavery blunts the edge of cruelty; for men prefer to have from their enemies slaves, cultivators of fields, and superintendents subject to works rather than to tread upon corpses. And so avarice, by preserving men as slaves, makes those live to whom mercy does not grant life. Civil wars know no slavery. They station Persians and Getae at the wine-cups, make Ethiopians hall-servants, and Alemannic horsemen walk before the carriage; but no service of a captured citizen is valued: death alone renders the victor secure. He is not even sold abroad to enemies, because so long as he lives he is not believed likely to remain quiet. Hence Marius stained with civil blood; hence the Sullan vengeance, which was more ruinous than if the crimes had been left unpunished. Lucan, Book II:

> The remedy exceeded measure and followed too far
>
> those hands which led men to death: the guilty perished;
>
> but when now only the guilty could survive,
>
> then liberty was given to hatreds, and wrath, released > from the reins of the laws, raged.
>

§ 3. Enemies are often accustomed to spare nobility and virtue. The cause is twofold. For either they pity the common lot of human affairs and judge that those whom they understand to have fallen back from the highest fortune to the lowest should be treated more gently. Nebuchadnezzar indeed admitted conquered kings to his table, and advanced Daniel and his companions, the sons of captive nobles, to honors. Alexander ordered the conquered Porus to reign; after consoling the daughters and mother of Darius, he ordered them to hope for a marriage not beneath their dignity. The Romans afterwards found those same nations to be their most faithful allies which they had had as their most hostile enemies.

Seneca, Book II On Anger, chapter 34, exhorts one by this consideration to conquer anger; but it is accustomed to avail in the case of an enemy, not in the case of a citizen: "Whom does the Roman people have as more faithful allies than those whom it had as its most obstinate enemies? What would the empire be today if a salutary providence had not mingled the conquered with the conquerors? Someone will be angry; do you, on the contrary, challenge him with benefits. The quarrel falls away at once when deserted by the other side. Unless there is an equal opponent, there is no fight. If the contest is maintained on both sides, the better man is he who first withdraws his foot; he who conquered is conquered. He struck you: withdraw. For by striking back you will give him both occasion and excuse for striking more often; you will not be able to tear yourself away when you wish. Would anyone wish to strike an enemy so heavily that he left his hand in the wound and could not draw himself back from the blow? Yet anger is such a weapon: it is scarcely drawn back."

The other cause is that many, revering the virtue of enemies, have granted life to those from whom they received the greatest disasters. The madness of civil wars is inflamed by these good qualities. No one is judged more hostile to nobles and the rich than a conquered citizen; proscription is especially aimed at them, and riches are an incitement to the slaughter of citizens. In sedition they persecute virtue as though it were sorcery. Sedition persecutes the Catuli, Ciceros, Antonii, and Catos; the Clodii and Curiones enjoy security. The cause is that, where enmities and hatreds have occupied the mind, where spirits have been embittered by mutual injuries, nothing is easily believed or said except what is effective for increasing enmities. For those citizens whom men think their enemies they also judge to be injurious, and therefore unjust and impious. With this opinion another is joined: namely, that no pest is more effective for doing harm than a familiar enemy. And so whatever good appears in a citizen they suspect to be an instrument for harming themselves.

§ 4. Military discipline is utterly destroyed, since in both battle lines there are acquaintances and blood-relations, rewards for corruption, and fraud unpunished on both sides. The faith of citizens and country-dwellers is unstable in every kind of contract: for if a man does not wish to pay a debt or wishes to deny a deposit, he will migrate to the opposing camp, where he will be secure. The cause of so great an evil is that the generals can neither govern the soldier nor moderate victory, being beholden to every most loathsome man. Thus the Caesarian soldiers sing:

> Caesar was my leader in the waters of the Rhine;
>
> here he is my comrade: the crime which stains them makes them equal.

The soldier Gaius Antonius did not obey Augustus after Augustus had despised the Senate. Obedience must be given to those through whom he conquered. “Caesar demands money from me? Why rather than I from him? Did he conquer without me? Indeed, he was not even able to do so. I brought to him the cause of civil war; I proposed ruinous laws; I bore arms against the consuls and commanders of the Roman people, against the Senate and Roman people, against our ancestral gods, altars and hearths, against the fatherland. Did he conquer for himself alone? Since the crime is common, why should the booty not be common?” You demanded justice. Augustus was compelled to give Cicero to Antony, and Antony to give his maternal uncle to Augustus, because neither conquered without the other. Lepidus also, the last of the triumvirs, gave his brother Lucius to his enemies. In the civil war of his sons Suleiman purchased for a price the death of the one who had fled, although it would scarcely have befitted so great an emperor to purchase only his life with money.

[Printed page 707]

Nor is it wonderful that they give up their own people. Sedition is strong against every affection--of parents, sons, and brothers. To this pertains that famous fable about two enemies, one of whom was sitting in the prow and the other in the stern. When the ship was being torn apart by a storm and he learned from the shipmaster that the prow would sink first, the one who was sitting in the stern rejoiced because he would behold the destruction of his enemy.

§ 5. Finally, the end of wars and seditions is destruction through tyranny or an external enemy. There is scarcely any nation so small that it is conquered by an enemy unless it wears itself down by tumult and factions. There is no need of examples: the whole world is an example, so much so that crafty warriors especially desire discord among their enemies. Nor do men escape from sedition as warriors--a fact which has generally deceived the authors of tumults. For he who is keenest at stirring up sedition is useless in war. Few can fight; anyone can conspire. In contention the most cowardly prevails; in battle, the brave. And this is the reason why sedition, when a beginning has been made, grows most swiftly: because quarrels are intensified by the vilest and most worthless men, but when the true enemy is present, all flee away.

But if their strength is not worn away and consumed by an external enemy, nevertheless civil victory, after the war is already ended, rages more cruelly while enmities live on. When the Marian party despaired not only of victory but even of safety, they filled all things with slaughter of their own men and of others. Then Sulla entered the city as victor--Augustine says in Book III, chapter 28 of The City of God--who, while no longer war but peace itself was raging, had laid low in the public way seven thousand infantrymen gathered from every quarter and unarmed, not by fighting but by ordering it. In the whole city, moreover, every Sullan partisan struck whomever he wished. Hence the deaths could not be numbered at all, until it was suggested to Sulla that some men ought to be allowed to live, so that there might be persons over whom those who had conquered could exercise command.

Then at last, when the license of cutting throats which was being sown madly here and there had been restrained, that tablet was posted with great rejoicing which contained up to two thousand men of both distinguished orders--the equestrian, namely, and the senatorial--who were to be killed and proscribed. The number saddened; the limit consoled. Nor was there so much grief because so many were being slain as there was joy because the rest did not fear. But in the case of certain of those who had been ordered to die, even that cruel security of the rest groaned at the exquisite forms of death. For the hands of men tearing at one man rent him apart without iron; men tore a living man more savagely than beasts are accustomed to do, and the corpse was cast away. Another, with his eyes put out and his limbs amputated piece by piece, was compelled amid such tortures to live for a long time--or rather, to die for a long time. Certain noble cities also were put up for auction as if they were country estates. One entire city, as though a single defendant were ordered to be led away, was ordered to be slaughtered.

These things were done in peace after war, not that the victory to be obtained might be hastened, but lest the victory obtained be despised. Peace contended with war in cruelty, and conquered. For war laid low armed men; peace, disarmed men. War existed so that the man who was struck might strike if he could; peace, not so that the man who had escaped might live, but so that in dying he might not resist. Sedition, therefore, is a great evil and--what must be lamented--also frequent and customary.

CHAPTER III

That Seditions Are Most Frequent

§ 1. So grave an evil is also frequent. The cause is that the human race is querulous, and because it is easy for every most wicked man to murmur. God led the people of Israel out of Egypt, out of the iron furnace, out of the house of bondage, through so many and such great miracles that Pharaoh himself was stupefied; and yet within the space of fifteen months it stirred up sedition against God ten times. Numbers 14:22: "Nevertheless, all the men who have seen my majesty and the signs which I did in Egypt and in the wilderness, and have tempted me now ten times, and have not obeyed my voice." It might seem wonderful that even one sedition could have been possible. There was no injustice of the magistrate. "You know," says Moses, "that I have not taken even anyone's ass." There was no want: their garments were not worn away; the miracle of manna was daily; the Red Sea had withdrawn and swallowed the enemies; waters had been turned to sweetness, and new waters brought forth. Amid these wonders they murmur against God and persecute Moses the leader and Aaron, neither mollified by benefits nor terrified by plagues.

By the testimony of God that sedition lasted forty years: "Today, if you shall hear the voice of the Lord, harden not your hearts as in the provocation, according to the day of temptation in the wilderness, where your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my works. For forty years I was near to this generation, and I said: They always err in heart; but they have not known my ways." That state, therefore, beloved and chosen by God--that people whom the Lord blessed in its very liberation, in its departure from Egypt and from a barbarous people, in the very procession and triumphal passage while God was present--stirred up sedition ten times within fifteen months, and more frequently throughout forty years. What shall we judge concerning the peoples of the nations? They too had their tumults and destructions.

And, lest I withdraw far from Palestine, at the very time when the children of Israel wandered in the wilderness the neighboring kings waged wars among themselves. Sihon the Amorite obtained the kingdom of the Moabites from the Arnon as far as the Jabbok. The kings of the Canaanites, whose possession had been assigned to the Israelites, clashed among themselves so that, their strength now broken, they might be cast before the chosen people. For if Adonibezek had subdued seventy kings who gathered crumbs beneath his table with the extremities of their hands and feet cut off, who can doubt that very many of those kings were his kinsmen, since he dwelt in the midst of the Canaanites? Who also can doubt that those kings were conquered through war and sedition, with the destruction of many? Since, however, that calamity befell the most cruel tyrant after the death of Joshua, it is altogether certain that at the time when the Israelites were under Moses and Joshua there were already such great wars in Palestine, which was soon to perish. See the Book of Judges, chapter 1, verse 6. Now also, while I write these things, Christians are fighting before the gates of the Turks--lest they should ever be able to deny that they wish to perish.

§ 2 (part 1 of 3). Moreover, if from one and the same most powerful and best-known Roman state I collect the more notable seditions, I shall display the clearest example of human malice, which can bear neither empire nor liberty, and shall give all kings an outstanding lesson, so that they may be exceptionally cautious and well equipped to settle discords and remove tumults. Let us therefore weigh the contentions and conflicts of one city divided against itself; and, that we may summon all the graver ones from the beginning:

> The first walls were drenched with a brother's blood.

With this disposition the city grew up, which the characters of those brothers imparted to it. Nor was the end of Romulus happier: the plebs believed that, because of his rather harsh character, he had been torn apart by the hands of the Fathers, they say, and was hostile to the Fathers.

[Printed page 708]

Then there was contention between the ancient Romans and Sabines as to from which faction the kings should be chosen, and it lasted for the year during which there was an interregnum, until the indignant plebs murmured: “Their servitude had been multiplied; a hundred masters had been made in place of one.” The words are Livy’s. Nor did they seem likely to endure thereafter any king unless created by themselves. When the Fathers perceived that these things were being set in motion, judging that what they were about to lose should be offered voluntarily, they thus entered into favor, and so forth. Sedition, therefore, was then begun, but it was dispersed by the prudence of the Fathers.

Under the rule of Numa no sedition is recorded. During the reign of Tullus the Roman colony of Fidenae revolted. Mettius Fufetius attempted treason. Thereafter most things were neither quiet nor turbulent down to Tarquin, who, after suborning the Senate, expelled his father-in-law Servius from the kingdom and killed him. For the sons of Ancus also arranged for Tarquinius Priscus to be killed, although they did not obtain the fruit of the crime, that is, the kingdom. The cause why the people stirred nothing was monstrous slavery; and when I weigh the matter, the condition of the Roman plebs at that time seems no happier than that of the children of Israel in Egypt under Pharaoh, and nevertheless he is numbered among the good kings by Livy, Florus, and the rest.

Livy says concerning him: “Works of peace were begun with a spirit greater than the mass with which he had waged war, so that the people might not be quieter at home than they had been in the field. For he prepares to encircle with a stone wall the city which he had not yet fortified--the beginning of which work had been interrupted by the Sabine war. And because the lowest parts of the city around the forum and the other valleys lying between the hills did not easily carry off the water from the level places, he dries them by sewers conducted down the slope into the Tiber. And, with his mind already foreseeing its future extent, he occupies with foundations the site for the temple of Jupiter on the Capitol which he had vowed in the Sabine war.” Thus Livy, serving the praise of his fatherland. But under what tyranny this was repeatedly done Pliny teaches in Book XXXVI, chapter 15: “An example not to be omitted from memory, all the more because it was omitted by the most celebrated founders of histories: when Tarquinius Priscus was causing that work to be done by the hands of the plebs, and the labor was uncertain whether longer or more dangerous, the Roman citizens everywhere escaping weariness by self-inflicted death, that king discovered a remedy new and unimagined before or afterwards: that he should fasten upon crosses the bodies of all who had thus died, to be viewed by the citizens and at the same time to be torn by wild beasts and birds.”

And this is the reason why the plebs remained quiet, oppressed by royal fear. Tarquin the Proud follows, whom they drove out after the city had been aroused to rebellion, having risen in tumult because of his adulterous son, whom perhaps it would not have been difficult to punish by the laws. But the occasion, the anger of those injured, and estrangement from the proud king set the sedition in motion by one impulse, pressed it forward, and completed what they had dared.

After the kings had been expelled, although great fear from them and diverse enemies threatened, the age was nevertheless not passed without sedition. The offspring of Brutus conspired against the fatherland with the noble youths and attempted to restore the Tarquins. Valerius came under suspicion of aiming at kingship, and was not safe until the house which he had begun was pulled down and the fasces lowered before the people. And indeed there was a fearful quiet at home from the year of the City 244 to the year 257; afterwards there were continual seditions or plans for seditions.

In the sixteenth year after the kings were driven out, the second after the death of Tarquin, an immense discord arose at Rome. Livy, Book II: “But the Volscian war was also impending, and the city, at variance with itself, was burning with internal hatred between the Fathers and the plebs, especially because of those bound for debt. They murmured that while fighting abroad for liberty and empire, at home they were captured and oppressed by citizens; and that the liberty of the plebs was safer in war than in peace, among enemies than among citizens. And a signal calamity of one man kindled that odium, which was growing of its own accord.

"A certain man threw himself into the forum with a great commotion, bearing the marks of all his evils. His garment was covered with filth; the condition of his body, consumed by pallor and emaciation, was fouler. In addition to this, his long beard and hair had made the appearance of his face savage. He was nevertheless recognized amid such disfigurement; they said that he had led companies, and the people, pitying him, recounted other distinctions of his military service. He himself displayed upon his breast the scars, witnesses of honorable battles in several places. When they asked whence that condition, whence that disfigurement, and a crowd had poured around him almost in the manner of an assembly, he said that while serving in the Sabine war, because, owing to the ravaging of his field, he had not only been deprived of its produce but his farmhouse had been burned, everything plundered, and his cattle driven off, and because a tax had been imposed at a time ruinous to him, he had incurred debt. That debt, swollen by interest, had first stripped him of his paternal and ancestral field, then of his other fortunes; at last, like a wasting disease, it had been drawn to his body, and he had been cast by his creditor not into slavery but into a workhouse and torture chamber. Then he displayed his back, foul with the recent marks of lashes.

"At the sight and hearing of these things an immense clamor arises. The tumult no longer confines itself to the forum but spreads everywhere through the whole city. Those bound and unbound for debt rush from every side into public and implore the good faith of the Roman citizens. Nowhere is a voluntary companion of sedition absent; in many columns everywhere, men run with shouting through all the streets into the forum. Those of the Fathers who happened to be in the forum fell into that crowd at great danger to themselves; nor would hands have been restrained had the consuls Publius Servilius and Appius Claudius not hastily intervened to suppress the sedition. But the multitude, turning upon them, displayed their chains and other disfigurement, each reproachfully declaring that this was what they had deserved, one here and another elsewhere, by his military service. Much more menacingly than as suppliants they demanded that they summon the Senate; and they themselves surround the senate-house as future arbiters and moderators of the public counsel.

"Very few of the Fathers, whom chance had presented, were gathered to the consuls; fear kept the rest not only from the senate-house but even from the forum. Nor could the Senate transact anything because of its sparse attendance. Then indeed the multitude began to think that it was being mocked and put off, and that those Fathers who were absent were absent not by chance or fear but for the sake of obstructing the business; that the consuls themselves were temporizing; and that their miseries were without doubt being made a mockery. Matters were now near the point where not even the majesty of the consuls could restrain the anger of the men, when at last, uncertain whether they would incur more danger by delaying or by coming, they came into the Senate; and even with the house at last well attended, there was not sufficient agreement, not merely among the Fathers, but not even between the consuls themselves."

There were in fact so many bound for debt that a good part of the army was composed from them. The discords increased to such a degree that the Sabines took up arms, not from confidence in their strength but from contempt for the citizens who were quarreling. For the plebs held nightly meetings on the Esquiline and assembled on the Aventine. At last they resisted openly and seceded to the Sacred Mount. This was done in the year 260, when they created the tribunes of the plebs, a perpetual seed-bed of discords, until they were oppressed first by citizens and then by barbarians.

Then, in the year 262, they expelled Coriolanus, who after two years brought war upon his fatherland. Nor was there a long interval between. In the year 267, after the Volsci had been conquered, Spurius Cassius, aiming at kingship by an agrarian law and by the repayment of money for Sicilian grain, was put to death when accused of high treason.

[Printed page 709]

Nevertheless, the sedition of the plebs did not cease; it aroused an external war in the following year and was ended by it. But soon after victory it grew raw again, as Livy warns. The sedition in the year 271 was most bitter. The army came to such a degree of madness that, when the cavalry had routed the approaching enemy, the infantry refused to follow; and, without the consul's order, gloomy and cursing the cavalry's renewed exertion, they returned to camp. Nor, however, did the tumult cease in the year 273. Levies were obstructed, until by the counsel of Appius they set the tribunes against one another.

The Italian peoples describe most truly the condition of the city at that time. Livy, Book II: "The Roman resources were eternal unless they should rage against one another in seditions. That one poison, that plague, had been discovered for wealthy states, so that great empires might be mortal. That evil, long sustained partly by the counsels of the Fathers, partly by the patience of the plebs, had now reached extremes. Two states had been made out of one; each party had its own magistrates, its own laws. At first they had been accustomed to rage in the levies; nevertheless, the same men had obeyed their leaders in war. Whatever the condition of the city, so long as military discipline remained, it had been possible to withstand it. Now the custom of disobeying magistrates was following the Roman soldier even into camp. In the most recent war, in the very battle line, in the very contest, by the agreement of the army victory was voluntarily handed over to the conquered Aequi: the standards were deserted; the commander was left in the battle line; they returned to camp without orders. Certainly, if the matter were pressed, Rome could be conquered by her own soldier. Nothing else was needed than that war be declared and displayed; the fates and gods would accomplish the rest of their own accord." Who could say that Rome had been without sedition for any hour when in such a condition it raged against itself, when it preferred to be conquered and to lose everything rather than to conquer under a patrician leader?

Nor was it brought about by any means except deceit that they wished to fight, because they believed the commanders did not wish it. That estrangement and those contests between the orders persisted until, in the year 280, a tribune was killed at home and struck the others with fear. Yet it aroused greater hatred; they undertook the design of abolishing the consuls. Livy, Book II: "They said that it was all over." Then for the first time the tribunes were created in the tribal assemblies; Piso is an authority that three were also added, just as though there had been two before. He also names the tribunes Gnaeus Siccius, Lucius Numitorius, Marcus Duellius, Spurius Icilius, and Lucius Mecilius. The Volsci and Aequi, amid the Roman sedition, when war had arisen, had ravaged the fields, so that if any secession of the plebs should occur, it might have a refuge with them. Then, when matters were settled, they moved their camps back.

Appius Claudius was sent against the Volsci; the province of the Aequi fell to Quinctius. The same savagery of Appius was present in military service as at home, all the freer because he was without the bonds of the tribunician power. He hated the plebs more than with his father's hatred, because he saw himself conquered by it: and that with him alone chosen as consul a law had been carried against the tribunician power which earlier consuls, with less effort and by no means so great a hope of the Fathers, had prevented. This anger and indignation spurred his fierce mind to harry the army with a cruel command. Nor could it be tamed by any force, so deeply had they imbibed the contest in their spirits. They did everything sluggishly, idly, negligently, and contumaciously; neither shame nor fear restrained them. If he wished the column to be driven more swiftly, they deliberately walked more slowly. If he was present as an exhorter at a work, all of their own accord relaxed the industry they had set in motion. In his presence they cast down their faces; as he passed they silently cursed him--so that that spirit, unconquered by plebeian hatred, was sometimes moved. After every severity had been employed in vain, he no longer had any dealing with the soldiers; he said the army had been corrupted by the centurions, whom in mockery he sometimes called "tribunes of the plebs" and "Voleros."

The Volsci were ignorant of none of these things, and pressed on all the more, hoping that the Roman army would have the same contest of spirit against Appius that it had had against the consul Fabius. But it was much more violent under Appius than under Fabius. For it did not merely refuse to conquer, as the Fabian army had done, but wished to be conquered. Led out into the battle line, it sought the camp in shameful flight, and did not stand until it saw the Volscian bringing the standards against the fortifications and the foul slaughter of the rear of the column. Then force was wrung from it to fight, so that the enemy, already victorious, might be driven from the rampart. It appeared sufficiently, however, that the Roman soldier had been unwilling only for the camp to be taken; some rejoiced in their own disaster and ignominy.

The fierce spirit of Appius was in no way broken by these things. When he wished to rage further and summoned an assembly, the lieutenants ran to him and the tribunes warned him not to wish at any cost to make trial of command, whose whole force lay in the agreement of those who obeyed. They said that the soldiers everywhere refused to go to the assembly, and voices demanding that the camp be moved from Volscian territory were heard on all sides: the victorious enemy had shortly before been almost at the gates and rampart, and not merely suspicion but the manifest appearance of immense evil was before their eyes. At last he yielded--since in any event they would gain nothing except time for punishment--and, dismissing the assembly, after he had ordered the march to be proclaimed for the following day, at first light he gave the signal for departure by trumpet. Just as the column was in the very act of deploying from the camp, the Volsci, as if roused by the same signal, attacked the rearmost. The tumult, carried from them to the foremost with such panic, disordered standards and ranks so that neither commands could be heard nor the battle line arrayed. No one remembered anything except flight. Thus they escaped in a scattered column through a devastation of bodies and spirits, so that the enemy ceased pursuing before the Roman ceased fleeing. This occurred in the year of the City 282.

While discord remained, in 284 the utmost violence was feared. Then the plebs refused to take part in the consular elections, always restless, always hostile.

In the year 286 there were renewed contests over the agrarian law, and Volscian land was granted for founding a colony at Antium, but most disdained it. Immense dangers brought some quiet; but after they had been discharged from them in the year 291, all domestic evils grew raw again, so that the consul had to be recalled. For in the absence of the consuls the tribunes sought time for their actions. The struggle became more bitter in the following year. The consuls held a levy; if they seized anyone, the tribunes ordered him to be released. Caeso, driven out by fear of trial, was soon followed by a thousand Caesos in place of one, but they eluded the tribunes by art throughout the entire year.

Thus far there had been dissensions; but in the year 293, when a servile band under the leadership of Herdonius had occupied the Capitol and affairs were placed in the utmost crisis, the tribunes called the people away from arms. It was evident that the utmost violence would follow and that the Roman sedition would be a spectacle to the enemies; nevertheless neither could the law be carried nor the consul go to the Capitol. Night suppressed the contests begun; the tribunes yielded to night, fearing the arms of the consuls. When the authors of the sedition had been removed from there, the Fathers went around among the plebs, thrust themselves into their circles, and sowed speeches suited to the time. They admonished them to see into what crisis they were bringing the state: the contest was not between the Fathers and plebs; rather the Fathers and plebs together were surrendering to enemies the citadel of the city, the temples of the gods, and the public and private household gods.

How astonishing that Roman citizens had been blinded by such obstinate discord that, although Manlius, dictator of the Tusculans, was coming to their aid, they were nevertheless not moved by their own danger and had to be entreated to be willing to defend themselves against their own slaves. But the fact that the tribunes even then protested surpasses all madness. Rightly, therefore, did the consul Lucius Quinctius Cincinnatus affirm in the following year that the tribunes were enemies worse than Herdonius. But nevertheless they attempt to obstruct the levy-- § 2 (continued; part 2 of 3). --and the plebs reelects the same tribunes.

[Printed page 710]

In the year 295 Quinctius Cincinnatus, as dictator, dispersed the external dangers after the enemies had increased; the plebs reelected the same tribunes for a fifth time. And so in the year 296 they would have come to the most extreme contentions had not the Aequi and Sabines brought greater destructions. The garrison at Corbio had been lost through a nocturnal attack of the Aequi; the Sabines were ravaging the Roman fields. Nevertheless, the citizens had been unwilling to serve unless they extorted permission to create ten tribunes. This obstinacy lasted into the year 302, when envoys were sent to Greece and decemvirs constituted, by whose labor the laws might be written. But not even thus did they have more than one halcyon year. The plebs, offended by the lust of Claudius and by a judgment given in favor of slavery against liberty, went up from the camp to the Aventine, then to the Sacred Mount; they compelled the decemvirs to abdicate and restored the consuls and tribunes. They demanded the decemvirs for the funeral pyre. There had been no greater sedition up to that time, for they were armed.

The plebs, sated by the punishment of the Fathers, became somewhat quiet, but there was nevertheless no concord; for while the plebs was quiet, the younger Fathers did not cease from injury. Livy describes it thus: “Then Geganius Macerinus and Gaius Julius were made consuls. They quieted the assemblies of the tribunes which had arisen against the noble youth without assailing their power, preserving the majesty of the Fathers. By postponing the levy decreed for the war with the Volsci and Aequi, they kept affairs free from seditions, affirming that when there was tranquility in the city all things abroad also were tranquil; concern for peace was also the cause of concord at home. But the one order was always burdensome to the moderation of the other. When the plebs was quiet, injuries began to be done by the younger Fathers. When the tribunes came to the aid of the humbler men, at first they had too little power; then not even they themselves were inviolate, especially in the last months, both because injury was done through coalitions of the more powerful and because all the force of the power was somehow more languid in the latter part of the year. And now the plebs placed some hope in the tribunate if it had tribunes like Icilius; for two years it had had only the name.

“The elders among the Fathers, on the contrary, believed that the young men were too fierce; yet if measure had to be exceeded, they preferred that courage should be excessive among their own men rather than among their adversaries. So difficult is moderation in protecting liberty: while each man, by pretending that he wishes to be made equal, raises himself so as to press down another; and by taking care lest they fear, men make themselves objects of fear in advance. And we impose upon others an injury repelled from ourselves, as if it were necessary either to do it or to suffer it. Titus Quinctius Capitolinus, for the fourth time, and Agrippa Furius were then made consuls. They inherited neither sedition at home nor war abroad, but both threatened. Discord among the citizens could now be restrained no longer, with the tribunes and plebs incited against the Fathers, when the appointment of a day for the trial of some noble always disturbed the assemblies with new contests. At the first uproar of these assemblies, as if a signal had been received, the Aequi and Volsci took up arms.” These things were done in the year 306, and the discord of the orders remained, as Cincinnatus then used to say--the poison of the state--“while neither with us is there a limit to command nor with you a limit to liberty.”

In the year 308 a new flame of sedition blazed forth. For Canuleius proposed a law concerning intermarriage between the Fathers and the plebs; and gradually mention was introduced that it should be permitted to make one of the consuls from the plebs, and the proposal was carried. This seemed so grave to the Fathers that they heard with joyful spirits that three wars were arising at the same time; for they hated the fortunate seditions of the plebs and the honored authors of seditions more than external wars. Most truly they said that more war was being stirred up at home than abroad.

At last, in the year 309, after bitter contests, military tribunes with consular power were created. When the state seemed more peaceful, Spurius Maelius suddenly aimed at kingship and relieved the people by a distribution of grain. He was killed by Servilius Ahala; in the year 314 Servilius was driven into exile. But when the tribunes and leaders of the plebs perceived themselves to be despised by the plebs, they set many things in motion in the following years, especially in the year 329, but with fruitless effort. For although what was done in the year 330 against Sempronius was done with an evil intention, I do not number it among seditions. Then, two years later, when the number of quaestors was to be doubled, a contest arose that some should be created from the plebs. Although they obtained this and plebeians were passed over, the tribunes, inflamed by the rejection, began to rage. In the year 334 the slaves had conspired against the city, but, having been detected, they paid the penalty.

In the year 336 matters again came to the utmost danger because of the agrarian laws. The Fathers dispersed them by drawing certain tribunes over to their own party; their colleagues accused those tribunes before the people as traitors to their interests. In all these years, therefore, either there was sedition or it was being prepared.

In the year 339 a sedition begun at Rome reached the camp, in which a military tribune was buried beneath stones by the army. The offense arose from the words of Titus Postumius: “Evil to my soldiers unless they keep quiet.”

The year 341, full of sedition, was rendered moderate by pestilence.

In the year 344 the partisanship of the Fathers and plebs blazed forth because three plebeian quaestors had been created, by which the hope of the plebs was raised and fear cast into the Fathers. Livy, Book IV.

In the year 347, when the booty taken at Anxur had been divided among the army and pay had been decreed, there was greater affection between the plebs and the Senate than at any earlier time whatsoever, although in the same year the tribunes had repeatedly declared: “The greatest war of the Fathers is with the plebs. It is deliberately to be harassed by military service and cast before the enemy to be slaughtered.” But when pay was decreed, Livy says in Book IV: “Nothing, it is reported, was ever received by the plebs with such joy. And so there was a gathering at the senate-house, and the hands of those departing were grasped; they were called Fathers in truth, the plebeians confessing that it had been brought about that no one, so long as any strength remained, would spare either his body or his blood for so munificent a fatherland; since it pleased them that their household property at least should rest during the time in which their body was bound and devoted to the state.” The tribunes nevertheless grumbled against it, but were despised.

But soon, when they were making huts at Veii in order to winter there, the tribunes of the plebs rose up, but in vain. For when a defeat had been received at that same Veii, through a great renewal of concord between the orders new soldiers were sent, with the cavalrymen promising that they would serve upon their own horses and then the infantrymen offering their labor. But while money was being contributed by the unconquered, the tribunes, having again found an occasion, attempted to contrive discords. Livy, Book V: “One war had now been protracted into a third year and was deliberately being badly conducted so that they might conduct it longer. Then armies had been enrolled for four wars by one levy, and even boys and old men had been dragged out. There was now no distinction of summer or winter, lest the wretched plebs ever have any rest. It had now even been made tributary to the final degree, so that when they had brought back bodies exhausted by labor, wounds, and finally age, and found everything at home uncultivated because of the owners’ long absence, they should pay tribute from an impaired estate and return manifold to the state their military pay as if received at interest.”

Then there was a new discord because of the tribunes of the plebs, and a greater one because of the military tribunes. For in the year 353, when the tribunes of the plebs forbade the payment of tribute and pressed that military tribunes be created from the plebs, they filled the city and almost the camp with seditions. One tribune was created from the plebs and then one patrician; by this it came about that in the year 355 the Fathers, as if about to lose the supreme command, all exerted themselves and obtained their object. At last, in the following year, agreement was reached that the greater part should be created from the plebs.

[Printed page 711]

After Veii had been captured in the year 358, there was again an immense sedition, men continually saying that a colony ought to be led to Veii and demanding fields. This sedition was fouler than the rest. In the year 360 consuls were created and all things were conducted with the greatest bitterness; there was a greater war at home than abroad. And at last in the year 362 Camillus went into exile. Then followed the defeat at the Allia, the burning of the city, and the siege of the citadel. Not even by the very destruction of the city did they change their disposition, for it was urged with all their strength that they should migrate to Veii.

Then, in the year 368, when matters had come to extremes and the Senate stood as though in battle line against the plebs, Manlius was cast into prison, though nevertheless released; but when he was said to have aimed at kingship, he was cast down from the rock.

In the year 373 there was again sedition because of those bound for debt, which only the enemy near the walls suppressed. The plebeians now seemed oppressed and unable to oppose the Fathers in any way.

In the year 376 an immense contest arose from a small matter. For five years no curule magistrate was made, the elections being obstructed by the intervention of the tribunes. That sedition, therefore, lasted five years. At last, with Camillus as dictator and with Manlius and others resisting in vain, Lucius Sextius was made the first consul from the plebs. Livy, Book VI: "A triumph was decreed to the dictator Camillus by the agreement of the Fathers and plebs. When he had scarcely discharged the war, a more dreadful sedition at home received him; and through immense contests the dictator and Senate were conquered, so that the tribunician proposals were accepted, and the consular elections were held against the will of the nobility, in which Lucius Sextius was made the first consul from the plebs. Nor was even that the end of the contests, because the patricians declared that they would not furnish their authorization. The matter almost came to a secession of the plebs and other terrible threats of civil contests. Nevertheless, the discords were settled by the dictator upon conditions: the plebeian consul was conceded by the nobility to the plebs, and by the plebs to the nobility one praetor, who should administer justice in the city, to be created from the Fathers."

Then there was quiet for some time, until in the year 397 Gaius Marcius Rutilus, dictator from the plebs, named a master of horse from the plebs.

In the year 399 the contention was so great that Livy says: "They went down into the Campus several times in vain, and many electoral days were consumed by seditions. At last the grief of the plebs, conquered by the perseverance of the consuls, burst forth to such a degree that, while the tribunes shouted that liberty was at an end and that not only the Campus but even the city, captured and oppressed by the dominion of the patricians, must now be abandoned, the sorrowful plebs followed them."

In the year 401, however, spirits inclined toward concord, nor was there any great movement in the city until the year 411, when the soldiers who had been at Capua infected almost the entire army with their conspiracy.

But lest I pursue every individual thing, I shall send them all into a compendium. From the year 412 to 432 the Latins and Campanians rebelled and ordered that one of the consuls be chosen from their own body. The Privernates also rebelled; nor will you easily find so many years without sedition, but the causes were immense and the wars most bitter, and therefore they created very many dictators in those years. Nevertheless, because those wars were waged by subjects who were revolting, they can rightly be called seditions and rebellions.

In the year 439 an immense terror of factions and coalitions burst forth, not only at Rome but also at Capua and in other places, so much so that Gaius Maenius was designated dictator to conduct investigations. The result, however, was that the investigation was suppressed by the power of the faction against which it had been prepared. A rather long peace was then followed by a greater sedition. Few things are reported about it because its history has perished. It occurred in the year 467. Sigonius writes thus about it in the Fasti: "Zonaras adds that at this time a sedition was excited by a law concerning new account books promulgated by the tribunes of the plebs and obstructed by the creditors, and that it was not settled until the enemies invaded the city." Augustine, moreover, writes thus about the same affair in Book III of The City of God: "After grave and long seditions of the Romans, at last the plebs seceded to the Janiculum with hostile devastation. So dire was the calamity of this evil that for this affair the dictator Hortensius was created, who, after the plebs had been recalled, expired in that same magistracy, something which had happened to no dictator before." It must be noted that he says "after grave and long seditions," lest we suppose it a movement of only one year.

Down to the year 512 the wars of the Tarentines, Pyrrhus, Carthage, the Ligurians, and Sardinians diminished domestic seditions--although I think that writers were lacking for the seditions more than seditions for the Romans. There are certainly many and evident signs. What of the fact that not even when Hannibal was devastating Italy was there genuine peace at Rome? Livy, Book XXII: “In his interregnum elections were held amid a great contest of the Fathers and plebs. The populace was striving to draw even Gaius Terentius Varro to the consulship--a man of his own class, commended to the plebs by attacks upon the leading men and by popular arts, and shining through another’s unpopularity after the resources and dictatorial command of Quintus Fabius had been shaken. The Fathers resisted with their utmost effort, lest men accustomed to attacking them should be made their equals. Bibulus Herennius, a tribune of the plebs and kinsman of Gaius Terentius, by accusing not only the Senate but even the augurs because they had prevented the dictator from completing the elections, won favor for his candidate through hatred of them. Hannibal had been brought into Italy by noble men who for many years had sought war; when he could be utterly conquered, that war was being protracted by deceit by those same men.”

Nor were contests afterwards lacking, when the tribunes obstructed the elections lest Fulvius, the dictator designated, be made consul. In the eighth year after the battle of Cannae, twelve colonies refused auxiliaries, soldiers, and money, by which such great fear was cast into men’s spirits that most said that the empire was finished.

A tribune accused Marcellus and the whole nobility. Livy, Book XXVII: “By their deceit and delay it came about that Hannibal now had Italy as his province for a tenth year and had lived there longer than at Carthage. The Roman people possessed the fruit of command prolonged for Marcellus: his army had been cut down twice and was passing the summer under roofs at Venusia.” These things occurred in the tenth year of the Punic War, so that it may appear how entirely there was no concord in the state, unless the fear of the most cruel enemy effected some.

Hence it is that about the same time Livy introduces Marcus Livius full of anger against Hasdrubal. It has been handed down to memory, Livy says in Book XXVII, that when Quintus Fabius warned Marcus Livius, as he was departing for war still full of anger against the citizens, not to join battle rashly before he had learned the character of the enemy, he answered that he would fight when first he saw the enemy’s column. When it was asked what cause there was for haste, he said: “Either from the enemy I shall obtain outstanding glory, or from my conquered citizens joy--certainly deserved, even if not honorable.” What disorders would not such a spirit--

[Printed page 712]

§ 2 (continued; part 3 of 3). --would that spirit not produce, for which citizens and soldiers stood in the same place as enemies? Indeed, in a worse place: from enemies he was going to obtain outstanding glory; from slaughtered citizens, joy. For although Hannibal suppressed seditions, he nevertheless did not bind the citizens together by mutual affection. Certainly, in the year 549, when the Carthaginian had now been driven from Italy, the notable enmities of Marcus Livius and Gaius Claudius appeared in their censorship.

But that you may see that the tribunes had changed in no respect, read in Livy, Book XXXI, the things which they declaimed under a law against the Macedonian War in the year 552. Baebius, tribune of the plebs, entering upon the ancient road of accusing the Fathers, had charged that wars were sown from wars lest the plebs ever be able to enjoy peace. A sign of this also is that Scipio Africanus avoided tribunician harassments by exile; his brother Asiaticus was condemned in so great a sum that it was not found among his goods, when the praetor had sent quaestors to take public possession of them. Then followed the customary contests and the conspiracies and corruptions of the Bacchanalia, concerning which Livy, Book XXXIX.

It is also agreed that the same difficulties existed in levies, because the tribunes cast Aulus Postumius and Albinus into prison when they conducted the levy severely, because they were not able to obtain exemption for their kinsmen. And this is that age concerning which Florus writes in Book III, chapter 12: “The first hundred years of this age were holy, pious, and, as we have said, golden, without disgrace and without crime, while the integrity of that pastoral way of life was still sincere and harmless, and while the threatening fear of the Carthaginian enemies contained the ancient discipline. But the last hundred years, from the destruction of Carthage to Caesar, were wretched and worthy of shame because of domestic calamities."

What I said concerning the preceding years, however, must be understood thus: revolts of allies, treasons, and dissensions were not lacking; but because greater care held their spirits, discord in the senate-house and city languished. For in Spain the matter was conducted against subjects for twenty years, and likewise against the Ligurians, the Alpine peoples, and the Illyrians. Indeed, Andriscus wrested away subject Macedonia, and Alexander then occupied another part of it. Then, in the year 606, there was discord because of the consulship of Scipio, who set out for Africa and destroyed Carthage, and afterwards Numantia--wars which certainly arose from the rebellions of subjects.

In the year 618 Eunus and Cleon waged a servile war in Sicily, and not without immense loss to the state; for they captured the camps of four praetors: Manlius, Lentulus, Piso, and Hypsaeus. What sedition, moreover, is greater and more hostile than when slaves rise against their masters?

In the year 620 the sedition began which furnished the causes of the evils that followed, by which the state at last utterly perished. Epitome, Book LVIII: "Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, tribune of the plebs, when he proposed an agrarian law against the will of the Senate and equestrian order, that no one should possess more than ten iugera of public land, blazed forth into such madness that, after passing a law, he deprived his colleague Marcus Octavius, who defended the cause of the opposing party, of his power; and he created himself, his brother Gaius, and his father-in-law Appius Claudius triumvirs for dividing the land. He also promulgated another agrarian law by which, if anyone possessed land more widely, the same triumvirs should judge which was public land and which private. Then, when there was less land than could be divided without offense even to the plebs--since he had incited them to an ample desire by the limit of their hope--he showed that he would promulgate a law that the money which had belonged to King Attalus should be divided among those who ought to receive land by the Sempronian law. Attalus, king of Pergamum, son of Eumenes, had left the Roman people his heir.

"The Senate was gravely moved by so many indignities, and before all others the consul Titus Annius. When he had delivered a speech against Gracchus in the Senate, he was seized by him, brought before the people, and again addressed him before the rostra. When Gracchus wished to be created tribune of the plebs again, he was killed on the Capitol by the optimates upon the urging of Publius Cornelius Nasica, struck first with fragments of benches; and among the others who had been killed in the same sedition, he was cast unburied into the river."

After this calamity had been received, the following years were deadly. At Rome all things were dreadful because of investigations against the followers of Gracchus; in Sicily, because of the cruelty of the slaves. Then followed the Aristonicus war when a great part of Asia revolted, so that the state was harassed by an external and internal evil.

In the year 623, when Carbo proposed a bill that the people might reelect the same man as tribune as often as it wished, defeated by Scipio he was unable to carry it through. But in the following year all seditions blazed forth more sharply as the triumvirs for dividing the land stirred them up. Scipio, who spoke against it, was found dead on the following day; no one investigated the parricide. While the Gracchan sedition continued, Marcus Fulvius proposed other ruinous laws and incited the Italians to seek citizenship. Hence Fregellae was destroyed in the year 628; in the year 632 Gaius Sempronius Gracchus was killed, and the head of the slain man was purchased for gold.

In the year 642 Jugurtha prepared war; Nearer Spain rebelled. Amid these things the hatreds of the people and Senate remained, and a little later they poured themselves out upon Caepio, who had been defeated in the Cimbrian War. Cicero teaches in Book II On the Orator that it was a sedition, that in it there were violence, flight, stoning, and tribunician cruelty, in which Marcus Aemilius, leading man of the state and Senate, was struck with a stone.

In the year 650, amid the utmost fear of the Cimbrian War, Marius was designated consul for a fourth time through sedition. He had no other beginning of his rise than his persecution of the nobility; and so, as his consulships proceeded, contests lasted throughout them. Marius had scarcely triumphed over the Cimbri when an immense sedition burst forth. It is narrated thus by Livy's epitomator, Book LXIX: "Gnaeus Apuleius, with the aid of Gaius Marius and after killing Aulus Nonius, his competitor, through the soldiers, was created tribune of the plebs by force and administered the tribunate no less violently than he had sought it. And when he had carried an agrarian law by force, he appointed a day for the trial of Metellus Numidicus because he had not sworn to it. Since Metellus was defended by good citizens, lest he should be a cause of evil contests, he set out into voluntary exile at Rhodes, and there was free from great cares by reading and hearing."

Assuredly Gaius Marius, author of the sedition, who had purchased his sixth consulship with money scattered through the tribes, forbade him fire and water. The same Apuleius Saturninus, tribune of the plebs, killed Gaius Memmius, candidate for the consulship, whom he especially feared as an adversary to his actions. The Senate having been aroused by these events against him, and Gaius Marius--a changeable man of shifting counsel and disposition, who had always passed over to prosperous fortune--being utterly unable to protect him, he was overwhelmed by arms and killed with the praetor Glaucia and other companions of the same madness by a certain Rabirius. Quintus Caecilius Metellus was recalled from exile with the immense favor of the whole state. Marcus Aquilius the proconsul brought to an end the servile war stirred up in Sicily. At the same time Athenion the fugitive waged war in Sicily. Amid these things there was contention at Rome, until the Italian War began in the year 658.

There was indeed immense discord because the equestrians administered judgments and condemned innocent men. "Publius Rutilius," says Epitome LXX, "a man of the greatest innocence, because as legate of Gaius Mucius, the proconsul, he had defended Asia from the injuries of the publicans, was hated by the equestrian order, in whose possession the courts were; condemned for extortion, he was sent into exile. Gaius Geminius fought unsuccessfully against the Thracians. Since the Senate was unwilling to bear the impotence of the equestrian order in administering judgments, it began to strive with all its force that the courts be transferred to itself, Marcus Livius Drusus, tribune of the plebs, sustaining its cause. In order to acquire strength for himself he aroused the plebs with the ruinous hope of largesse." These things at Rome were done against Mucius; the Asians instituted feast days for him which they called the Mucian days.

[Printed page 713]

In the year 662 the Drusan sedition, which drew after it the Social War, was excited. Epitome LXXI: "Marcus Livius Drusus, tribune of the plebs, in order that the Senate might defend with greater strength the cause it had undertaken, solicited the allies and Italian peoples with the hope of Roman citizenship. With their help, after the agrarian and grain laws had been carried by force, he also carried the judiciary law, so that the courts should be in equal part in the possession of the Senate and the equestrian order. When the citizenship promised to the allies could not then be furnished, the angry Italians began to agitate for revolt." Epitome LXXII writes concerning it: "The Italian peoples revolted--the Picentes, Vestini, Marsi, Paeligni, Marrucini, Samnites, and Lucani--the beginning of the war having been made by the Picentes. Quintus Servilius the proconsul was killed in the town of Asculum with all the Roman citizens who were in that town. The people assumed military cloaks. Servius Galba, captured by the Lucani, was freed from captivity by the labor of one woman with whom he lodged. The colonies Aesernia and Alba were besieged by the Italians."

That war was most dangerous and most grave, with great defeats received and inflicted on both sides. When it was ended, a crueler civil war followed, than which nothing is better known in Roman history.

Nor were those parricides only among allies. Fimbria killed his commander Valerius Flaccus; meanwhile Asia was exposed to be devastated by Mithridates.

In the year 669 Sulla oppressed the Marian party; many perished. In the following year he entered Italy. In the year 671 there was that bloody dictatorship in which:

The guilty perished,

but when now only the guilty could survive.

Then there was the kingship of Sulla. He recovered Nola and Volaterrae, overthrew Mytilene, and distributed forty-seven legions among the captured lands.

In the year 673 the Sertorian War was waged in Spain. It arose from the remnants of the Sullan proscription, and in it Roman commanders were defeated.

Nor was there an end of factions when Sulla abdicated the dictatorship. Lepidus, his enemy and consul after his death, attempted to rescind his acts and recall the exiles, but was defeated. Even after Sulla died, sedition grew raw again. Sallust introduces a tribune complaining thus: "For you have understood that hope was vain. When Sulla, who had imposed a wicked slavery, was dead, you believed it the end of evil; there arose Catulus, far more savage. Tumult intervened in the consulships of Brutus and Aemilius; then Gaius Curio domineered to the point of destroying an innocent tribune. You have seen with how great a spirit Lucullus went against Lucius Quinctius in the preceding year."

In the year 676 Lepidus came with an army hostile to his fatherland, but was driven from Italy by Catulus and Pompey; and yet the Roman people hated Catulus more than Lepidus. In the year 678 this was the condition which Sallust describes. "You have made us consuls, Roman citizens," Cotta says, "when the state is most entangled at home and in war. For the commanders in Spain ask for pay, soldiers, arms, and grain, and necessity compels it, since through the revolt of the allies and Sertorius's flight through the mountains they can neither join battle nor prepare useful things. Armies are maintained in Asia and Cilicia because of the immense resources of Mithridates. Macedonia is full of enemies, and no less the seacoasts of Italy and of the provinces, while meanwhile the revenues, small and uncertain because of wars, scarcely sustain a part of the expenses. Thus we sail with a smaller fleet than before to convey provisions. If these things have been accumulated by our deceit or sloth, act as you please and exact punishment thus; but if our common fortune is rather harsh, why do you undertake things unworthy of you and us?"

In the year 680 the war of Spartacus began. In that same year Sertorius was killed and left Marcus as heir of the war. When these wars had been finished, in the year 683 Pompey the Great and Crassus the Rich as consuls restored the tribunician power entire and stabilized their own power. The matter came to such a point that in the year 687, through dissensions and ambition, certain men conspired--Piso, Catiline, and Antonius Paetus. At that time there was a great dissension among the army of the Mithridatic War between Lucullus and Pompey.

But the conspiracy of Catiline was detected in the year 690, when Cicero was consul. In the following year the conspirators were defeated. Nevertheless, seeds of war remained among the optimates.

In the year 693 a coalition was made among the three leading men Pompey, Crassus, and Caesar. For although they were enemies among themselves and powerful, and the people hated Pompey, the Senate Caesar, and most men Crassus, they equally mocked friends and enemies. Suetonius writes these things in his Julius: "Caesar courted Pompey with every service when he was offended by the Fathers because, after King Mithridates had been conquered, his acts were confirmed rather tardily; and he reconciled Marcus Crassus to Pompey, his ancient enemy from the consulship which they had administered together in the greatest discord. He entered into an alliance with both, lest anything be done in the state which displeased any of the three. In his consulship he gave Julia to Pompey and himself married Calpurnia, daughter of Piso, the future consul."

Caesar as consul carried agrarian laws, transferred Clodius to the plebs, and compelled his colleague Bibulus to keep himself at home. Clodius, now a plebeian and made tribune of the plebs, expelled Cicero; after Cicero's return Milo killed Clodius. The Roman people proscribed Ptolemy without cause. In the year 701 armed and contentious candidates for the consulship obstructed the elections. Then Pompey, having been made consul, scarcely suppressed the sedition.

He then carried a law that account should be taken of Caesar in his absence, which Marcellus attempted to break in the following year. These contentions afterwards became stronger in the years that followed, when on the occasion of the Parthian War two legions were led away from Caesar, until the civil war began in the year 704. In that war Pompey was driven from Italy; his lieutenants were defeated in Spain; Pompey was defeated at Pharsalus and killed by the Egyptian; the Pompeians were defeated in Africa; and at last:

> The final battles meet at deadly Munda.

But Caesar was killed in the year 710 and left behind the wars of Mutina, Philippi, Perusia, and Sicily, and the killings of the triumvirs, until, after Antony was conquered at Actium, Augustus alone obtained the Roman state. And such was the condition of the Roman state for more than seven hundred years: agitated by continual dissensions, it kept Senate and plebs exercised, and produced more evils at home than abroad. If princes consider these things and weigh the causes of seditions, they will procure great aids for settling or preventing them.

CHAPTER IV

Seditions and Conspiracies in the Time of the Monarchy

[Printed page 714]

§ 1. I have shown that seditions are the gravest and most frequent evil of the state, something that appeared in both the Roman aristocracy and the Roman democracy. But that I may more strongly arouse the prince to the protection of himself and his empire and to the avoidance of seditions, I have resolved to show this also in the Roman monarchy; for when these things have been read, a prudent prince who loves his fatherland will more easily attend to the cause, remedies, and outcomes of such great evils.

For among a thousand seditions there is none which does not make the prince more cautious, prudent, and moderate by some singular lesson. For the causes of each easily appear. Let us therefore look upon Augustus the prince, who passed the first twelve years in perpetual civil war or fear, and after the victory at Actium and in Egypt endured many seditions and conspiracies. Suetonius, chapter 19: “After this he suppressed tumults and even beginnings of revolutions, and several conspiracies detected by information before they grew strong--different ones at different times: that of the younger Lepidus, then that of Varro Murena and Fannius Caepio, soon that of Marcus Egnatius, then that of Plautius Rufus and Lucius Paulus, husband of his granddaughter. Besides these were Lucius Audasius, accused of forging records and impaired both by age and body; Asinius Epicadus, a half-breed of Parthian stock; and at last Telephus, a woman’s slave employed as a nomenclator. For he was not free from conspiracy and danger even from men of the lowest lot. Audasius and Epicadus had intended to carry off his daughter Julia and grandson Agrippa from the islands on which they were confined; and Telephus, as though dominion were owed to him by fate, had determined to attack both him and the Senate. Indeed, once at night beside his bedchamber a certain sutler from the Illyrian army was caught, after deceiving the doorkeepers, girded with a hunting knife. Whether he was not of sound mind or feigned madness is uncertain; for nothing could be wrung from him by examination.” Behold, besides foreign and civil wars, by how many enemies was the life of the reigning man sought?

Nor did he sustain few rebellions. The same author, chapter 21: “He never punished those who rebelled more frequently or perfidiously with a heavier penalty than that he sold the captives under the condition that they should neither serve in a neighboring region nor be freed within thirty years.” Dio teaches, moreover, in how great fear he lived, for when coming into the Senate he wore a breastplate beneath his clothing. The same Dio, chapter 17: “Many men made plots against Caesar, and especially Gnaeus Cornelius, the son of a daughter of Pompey the Great. Since he was unwilling to kill them, because he understood that he would not be more secure through their death, nor to release them, lest for that reason he incite the rest against himself, he came into so great a state of doubt that he was tormented by cares day and night.”

Since, moreover, we are dealing with a good prince, at least in the judgment of writers, I shall add what Pliny reports concerning him in Book VII, chapter 45: “In the deified Augustus also, whom the whole of mortality names in this assessment, if all things are carefully weighed, great volumes of human fortune are found: rejection in seeking office at the hands of his maternal uncle, and Lepidus preferred contrary to his request; the odium of the proscription; companionship in the triumvirate with the worst citizens, and not even in an equal portion, but with Antony having the weightier share; in the battle of Philippi, illness, flight, and concealment for three days while sick in a marsh--and, as Agrippa and Maecenas acknowledge, water flowing beneath him and his sides swollen; shipwrecks in Sicily, and there too another concealment in a cave; then, in naval flight with the enemy’s hand pressing, prayers to Proculeius that death be brought upon him; anxiety over the Perusine contest; solicitude over the battle at Actium; ruin and terror in the Pannonian war; so many seditions of soldiers; so many doubtful bodily illnesses; the suspected wishes of Marcellus; the shameful sending away of Agrippa; his life sought so many times by plots; the deaths of his children laid to his charge, and griefs sad not merely through bereavement; the adultery of his daughter and counsels of parricide openly disclosed; the insulting secession of his stepson Nero; another adultery, that of his granddaughter. Then so many evils joined together: lack of military pay, the rebellion of Illyricum, a levy of slaves, a scarcity of youth, pestilence in the city, famine and thirst in Italy, a determination to expire and, through fasting for four days, the greater part of death received into his body. Close upon these were the Varian disaster and the foul bruising of his majesty; the repudiation of Postumus Agrippa after his adoption, regret for him after his relegation, then suspicion concerning Fabius and the betrayal of secrets; thereafter the designs of his wife and Tiberius, the final care of his life. In sum, that god--I do not know whether he more attained or merited heaven--departed with the son of his enemy as his heir." Seneca recounts similar things in On the Brevity of Life, chapter 5, where he indicates that those terrors remained into old age: "He had not yet escaped the plots of these men: his daughter and so many noble youths, bound as if by an oath in adultery, were terrifying his now broken age; and once more a woman was to be feared together with an Antony."

No small storms shook Tiberius in a marvelous manner. First, the Gallic legions disturbed his accession when they called Germanicus emperor and detained his son Caligula. While Germanicus lived, Tiberius restrained his vices, Dio says. At last Germanicus and Drusus were removed, when the seditions in Pannonia and Germany had been settled. Meanwhile Libo Drusus, in part convicted of revolution, was killed; Clemens, a slave of Agrippa, stirred up sedition. There was war and revolt in Africa. Piso and Sentius, governor of Syria, disagreed and fought a civil war. The whole life of Tiberius thereafter was a slaughterhouse, until, when sick, he was suffocated by Macro. Caligula, ruling for a brief time, removed tumults.

More seditions and treasons harassed Claudius. Suetonius, chapter 13: "Nor, however, did he remain altogether exempt from plots; rather, he was assailed both by individuals, by a faction, and finally by civil war. A man of the plebs was found at midnight beside his bedchamber with a dagger. Two men of the equestrian order were found awaiting him in public, one with a sword-cane and the other with a hunting knife: the one had conspired to attack him as he departed from the theater, the other while he sacrificed at the temple of Mars. Asinius Gallus and Statilius Corvinus, grandsons of the orators Pollio and Messala, had conspired to effect a revolution, having taken to themselves his own freedmen and slaves. Furius Camillus Scribonianus, legate of Dalmatia, stirred up civil war; but within the fifth day he was suppressed, and the legions which had changed their oath were converted by religious scruple to repentance after, when the march to the new emperor had been announced, by a certain chance and divine act neither could the eagle be adorned nor could the standards be pulled up and moved."

And chapter 35 shows from his fear the disposition of the Romans: "But nothing was so characteristic as that he was timid and distrustful. In the first days of his reign, although--as we have said--he was a boaster of civil liberty, he did not dare enter banquets unless spearmen with lances stood around him and soldiers performed the part of servants. Nor did he visit anyone sick unless the bedroom had first been explored and the mattresses and bedclothes felt and shaken out. During the remainder of the time he always set searchers over those who came to salute him, and indeed over all, and the most severe. For only late and with difficulty did he relax the rule that women and boys and girls wearing the bordered toga should not be handled, and that pen-cases or stylus-cases should not be taken from every attendant or secretary. When Camillus, in a civil movement, not doubting that he could be terrified even without war, ordered him by an insulting, menacing, and contumacious letter to yield the empire and pass an idle life in private affairs, he deliberated, after summoning the leading men, whether he should obey." Chapter 36: "Certain plots rashly reported terrified him so greatly that he attempted to lay down the empire. When a certain man, as I related above, was caught with a weapon beside him as he sacrificed,

[Printed page 715]

he hastily summoned the Senate through heralds and lamented with tears and shouting his condition, in which nothing was safe anywhere; and for a long time he abstained from appearing in public. He cast away even his most ardent love for Messalina, not so much because of the indignity of the insults as through fear of danger, since he believed that the empire was being acquired for her adulterer's son. At that time, trembling in a foul manner, he fled to the camp, asking along the entire road nothing except whether the empire was safe for him."

Nero also, agitated by many seditions, at last, having been judged a public enemy, destroyed himself by his own hand. The first sedition blazed forth at Puteoli. Tacitus, Book XIII. Then there was a graver one in Britain because of the plunder and avarice of the governors, and another because of Octavia, Tacitus, Book XIII. Finally, amid many conspiracies he was killed almost while awaiting vengeance. The world was then thrown into confusion while Galba, Vindex, and Nymphidius sought the empire, and while Otho, Piso, and Vitellius attempted everything against the fatherland, until Vespasian was carried up to the empire.

At his beginning tumults received Vespasian as victor: Mucianus was a rival; Sabinus an aspirant to empire; Alienus and Marcellus, after forming a conspiracy, laid plots. The Batavians under the leadership of Civilis revolted, expelled the Roman garrisons, and overthrew fortresses. Piso was killed in Africa, and a tumult arose from it. In Gaul the Treveri and Lingones revolted; all Gaul wavered; the legions inclined to revolt and swore allegiance to the Gauls. The war in Judaea also, a province long since pacified, must be judged a civil war.

Scarcely any sedition afflicted Titus, who ruled for a brief time and was dear to the people; his brother had to be guarded against, by whom he is even said to have been killed. Domitian, always fearful, was killed by conspirators. Nerva saw no peace in his one year. At the beginning he was compelled to thank the brave men who had killed Domitian, to whom he was especially favorable; but when the soldiers had killed those men contrary to the emperor's command, he was compelled to thank the killers of his friends. And so he was so cast down in spirit that he himself pursued his lot with tears; therefore he declared Trajan Caesar and added: τίσειαν Δαναοὶ ἐμὰ δάκρυα. "May the Danaans pay for my tears." For he accomplished nothing in his command except to lament his unhappiness, elude the conspirators, and adopt Trajan.

Trajan, numbered among the best princes, had peaceful beginnings, except that it was necessary to fight rather frequently against the revolting Dacians; but his end was altogether pitiable. For when peoples revolted and stirred up sedition in Syria, Egypt, and Cyprus, and when the Jews raged monstrously against the Greeks, the whole empire, especially in the East, being disturbed, he died of more than one disease.

As soon as Hadrian obtained the principate, he killed those who plotted against him--Celsus, Nigrinus, and Lucius--because they were said to have laid plots against him during a hunt. When about to die he was also savage from suspicion and at the very end even greedy for death, fearing plots.

In the time of the Antonines the state was quieter; nevertheless Cassius, and then others, harassed the Philosopher, until he died by poison.

But the crimes and seditions of Commodus made compensation for this peace, whatever it was. Perennis attempted to remove him; Quadratus conspired; Maternus stripped him; at last he was killed by his most trusted men. Pertinax followed, who, betrayed by an associate, was killed through sedition. Soon Julianus, lest a cause of discords be lacking, bought the empire with money; Niger was chosen emperor; Severus removed them both. Although he was victor in the civil wars, he by no means administered the kingdom without disasters and seditions: Niger, Albinus, Plautianus, Britain, Saturninus, and finally his sons rendered everything turbulent and deadly, now by wars, now by deceits. He left the empire to discordant brothers, of whom one, Caracalla, soon killed the other, Geta, and was himself killed by Macrinus, in accordance with his deserts but with great loss to the state. Macrinus was killed by Elagabalus; the latter by a seditious army. Alexander, after treating the revolt of Ovinius lightly, was betrayed to Maximinus and indeed by the army.

Maximinus suffered the gravest seditions: from the Africans, Titus, Gordian, Maximus, Balbinus, and finally his own soldiers; he was killed with torture and mockery. The soldiers also butchered Maximus and Balbinus. Soon the Senate substituted Marcianus and Severus Hostilianus for Gordian; Philip killed Gordian, and Decius Philip. Thus at that time there were more seditions, continuous and bloody. When Valens had harassed Decius, Gallus betrayed him to the barbarians. The soldiers slaughtered Gallus and Volusianus, and after three months of rule killed Aemilianus, whom they had chosen.

The state was no better or quieter under Valerian, and most wretched under Gallienus, under whom one body, divided into thirty battle lines, fought against itself. The tyrants were, on the authority of Trebellius: Cyriades; the elder and younger Postumus; Lollianus; the elder and younger Victorinus; Marius; Ingenuus; Regillianus; Aureolus; both Mariani; Quietus; Odaenathus; Herodes; Maeonius; Ballista; the two Valentes; Piso; Aemilianus; Saturninus; the two Tetrici; Trebellianus; Herennianus; Timolaus; Celsus; Zenobia; Victoria or Victorina; Titus; and Censorinus. The empire was publicly agitated by so many movements; for I omit the seditions of certain cities as private evils.

Claudius received these affairs, and through the revolt of the Egyptians came into danger of losing everything. He killed the tyrant Quintillus; Victorinus, and finally Aurelius as victor, were among the factions. Aurelian seemed more moderate, but because he was savage against the senators he was harassed by the greatest discords. The Palmyrenes revolted from him and were torn out by the roots, to the great grief of all because they had had grave causes for rebelling. Under the same emperor Firmus, Quintillus the brother of Claudius, and other traitors were butchered through the entrails of the state. The Alexandrians rebelled; and lest any evil be lacking, the war of the mint-workers arose, of whom about seven thousand were slain. It has sometimes come into my mind to marvel how men were able to live amid continual evils.

After Aurelian was killed by his intimates, Tacitus was made emperor and not long afterwards was slain; then came Probus and Florianus, of whom the latter was quickly killed. The former, harassed by the revolt of his familiar Saturninus, the sedition of the Britains, the madness of the Lydian robber, the tumult of Ptolemais in the Thebaid, the tyranny of the Franks in Sicily and the capture of Syracuse, the audacity of the Roman gladiators, and the treason of Proculus and Bonosus at Agrippina, was butchered by the army. Hence Carus for a short time, and then Numerian, seized the empire. Diocletian fought against these men; Carinus stood on another side, who had slaughtered the emperor Julianus and fell only after many battles. Diocletian, anxious at the multitude of seditions and rebellions, associated Maximian with himself. Meanwhile there were various tumults, but three principal ones: those of Carausius in Britain, Julianus in Africa, and Achilleus in Egypt. But what had been established for pacifying and protecting the state--that several men should be called Caesars--was almost its destruction. Never was the state torn more foully than by the wars among the three Galerii, Constantius, Maxentius, Licinius, Alexander, and Constantine; and unless the torn members of the empire had fallen back into the hands of a moderate and religious emperor, by whom they might be cherished, there would without doubt have been an end of so great a mass, so gravely shaken.

[Printed page 716]

§ 2. Thus the empire was restless, turbulent, divided, and raging against itself down to Constantine and Christian times. Nor was it altogether pacified thereafter. Constantine, victor over all seditions and civil wars, by his authority and piety restrained the wicked somewhat, so that all could breathe again. But in the time of his sons it returned to its customs. Constans killed his brother Constantine; Dalmatius Caesar was put to death, and other famous and well-deserving men. Magnentius was declared emperor as a jest; Constans was killed. Nor was there one sedition or a simple evil: Vetranio seized tyranny in Illyricum; Silvanus in Gaul, which was wholly in tumult; Nepotianus at Rome put on the Augustan insignia. Julian carried off the palm among these, who, after Constantius died, striving to extend the empire which he had seized, almost betrayed it.

Then indeed under Jovian and in the beginnings of Valentinian there was peace from sedition through fear of the external enemy. But when Valens reigned impiously, Procopius brought the greatest disaster. Then in the times of Theodosius and Gratian followed the immense wars of Maximus and Eugenius. Under the sons of Theodosius, Arcadius and Honorius, amid the arms of the barbarians there were Stilicho, Rufinus, Eutropius, Gainas, Tribigild, Gildo, and Alaric; then, after Arcadius died, Attalus, Heraclianus, John the Notary, Castinus, Boniface, and the seditions and revolts of Britain and Spain. Under the younger Valentinian there was Aetius and Maximus. The emperors who followed thereafter were the mockeries and chattels of their own men: Maximus, Avitus, Majorian, Severus, and Anthemius, who were the chattels of Ricimer; and they perished by sword and poison when they had scarcely tasted the sweetness of command.

And so the remnants of the Western Empire changed their emperor almost from year to year. For those who followed--Olybrius, Glycerius, Nepos, and Augustulus--were placed upon and cast down from the throne partly at the decision of Aspar and Ardaburius, partly at that of others; while meanwhile the state was worn down by the ambition of weak princes. For although they were unequal to conquering the enemy, they nevertheless stirred up the gravest seditions at home. This, therefore, was the appearance of the Roman Empire; this the constancy of discords and theater of seditions. It ought to warn all princes and counselors to take care that all seeds of tumults and hatreds be removed.

CHAPTER V

That the Empire of Constantinople Was Agitated by Sedition and Rebellion

[Printed page 716]

§ 1. I shall take my beginning from Leo the Great. For, when the empire of the West was now coming to an end or falling, he ruled the East, and in the beginnings of his reign, after suppressing a sedition, he killed Aspar and Ardaburius. Zeno thereafter, when he had thrown everything into confusion, was driven out by Basiliscus; nor did the betrayal go unpunished: Basiliscus, captured with his family, was compelled to die of hunger. Zeno, returning from exile to the empire and stained by the slaughter of illustrious men, was himself at last buried alive. Great seditions attended Anastasius. Having Longinus as his adversary, he was endangered as to his life. Evis the logothete and the prefect scarcely escaped the hands of the people, lest they be torn apart. When Justin had gained the empire by artifice, he had Amantius the eunuch, Theocritianus, and Andreas the chamberlain as plotters against him; the Constantinopolitans thereafter killed Vitalian, who commanded the emperor.

The empire of Justinian was renowned, yet it too was agitated by many civil wars. Gelimer revolted and drew Africa away. The Samaritans also stirred up hideous wars. A grave sedition arose at Constantinople. Ammianus recounts it: Hypatius, Pompeius, and Probus, cousins by birth and nephews of the emperor Anastasius, because each desired the empire for himself with unworthy ambition, on the Ides of January, together with very many of the nobles who had conspired and with the entire multitude of the seditious, enticed after arms and gifts had been supplied, attempted to invade it by treachery; and for five whole days, while they ran through the royal city with plunder, sword, and fire by means of criminal citizens, without any fixed ruler in the interval, they devastated it with hostile impiety, while in our palace they dissemblingly professed themselves faithful to the state. But on the fifth day of this impious crime, while Hypatius, wreathed with a golden necklace by the hands of the criminals accompanying him, and Pompeius the count, armored in his own garment, were ascending from the forum to invade and hold the palace, each of them was captured before the palace doors; and immediately, at the command of our most pious prince, each was put in chains and slaughtered and paid the penalty, losing the empire before he possessed it, while countless persons among the people and the associates of the tyrants were slain here and there in the Circus and immediately proscribed.

Afterwards, when barbarians occupied the East and the Franks Gaul, Artabanes conspired with Arsaces and others against Justinian, although the same Artabanes had recently killed the tyrant Guntharis in Africa. Justinian deservedly suffered these things, having changed for the worse, so far that he sought domestic and civic discords. Evagrius, Book IV: “I must also speak of another deed of Justinian. Whether it arose from a defect of nature or from apprehension and fear I am unable to say; yet it was of such a kind that it far surpassed every bestial savagery. It took its beginning from that popular sedition which they call Nika, that is, ‘Conquer.’ It pleased Justinian to incline so vehemently toward one of the factions, whose members are called the Greens, that they could slaughter their adversaries in the city at midday with impunity and not only fear no punishments but even be honored with offices; and so many murderers arose from among them. For they were permitted to break into the houses of others, plunder the treasures stored within them, and deprive men of their very safety and life; and if any magistrate attempted to restrain them, he created danger for his own head. Hence certainly a certain man who held magistracy in the East, because he wished to chastise with scourges some of those who favored us, so that they might become more restrained, was led through the middle of the city and severely beaten with scourges. Callinicus, moreover, prefect of Cilicia, when two Cilicians, Paulus and Faustinus, both murderers, made an assault upon him and intended to kill him, because he punished them with the penalty established by the laws, was driven to the cross; and he was subjected to this punishment for his upright conscience and observance of the laws. Hence it came about that those who belonged to the other faction, when they had fled from their homes and were received nowhere by anyone with hospitality, but were hunted like criminals, began to lay ambushes for travelers, rob them, and commit murders, to such a degree that every place overflowed with premature death, plunder, and the other crimes of that kind. Sometimes, when his mind had changed to the opposite opinion, he killed men of that kind--

[Printed page 717]

--and permitted the power of the laws to extend even to those whom he had previously allowed, after the custom of barbarians, to perpetrate impious crimes in the cities. But for pursuing these matters one by one I have neither sufficient time nor ability of speech." For this reason Evagrius says that, when he had filled absolutely everything with disturbance and tumult, he was carried off to pay punishments among those below. Nicephorus says that he repented. A sedition was stirred up against him in his old age, and Belisarius is said to have been privy to it.

Justin, having first attempted to pacify the divided empire, suppressed the Alexandrian sedition at the beginning. He deprived Narses of his dignity, became angry with Marciana, and rendered everything untrustworthy toward himself; at last he was afflicted by magical enchantments. Tiberius, the colleague and successor of Justin and an excellent prince, suffered a plot on the first day of his coronation from Justinian, Justin's nephew; thereafter Sophia almost ensnared him in greater danger. Maurice followed, whom the soldiers killed. Phocas also paid the penalty of parricide: after a renewed conspiracy, Heraclius, a new emperor from Africa, killed and burned Phocas. During his reign the Persians came through Asia and Egypt as far as Africa and occupied Carthage, while meanwhile Caianus and other barbarians did not remain at rest. When the Persian had been conquered, the Saracens occupied Syria and the neighboring regions.

After him, Constantine, after four months, and Heracleonas, after a period of three months, were cast down, and Constans ruled; against him Valentinian the patrician soon attempted tyranny. But while he raged against the orthodox, he cast himself into the greatest danger: he lost Africa, Armenia revolted, and he became so hateful to his own people that, while dwelling in Sicily, he was suffocated in a bath. Constantine Pogonatus had bloody beginnings, the noses of his brothers having been cut off; he killed the rebel Mizizius and experienced everything as unsafe.

Justinian, receiving a harassed empire, was immediately agitated by the revolt of Sabbatius, praetor of Armenia. He incurred immense hatred and contempt for himself; the nobles conspired against him, and, after his nose and tongue had been cut off, he was relegated to Cherson. Leontius seized the empire; after Lazica was betrayed by Sergius, he was mutilated in the nose and handed over to Apsimar. The latter, ensnared by the plots of the exiled Justinian, was led in procession with Leontius and trodden under Justinian's feet. For Justinian raged against everyone with horrendous cruelty, as against the men of Ravenna and the nobles of Cherson and the Bosporus. Philippicus was chosen emperor and slaughtered Justinian together with Tiberius. Conspirators blinded Philippicus and drove him from the kingdom; Artemius was then driven out by Theodosius, and he yielded to Leo.

Leo suffered a conspiracy at the very beginning, and so ruled that Italy revolted from him and he divided the Church and the empire. Hence came civil wars and Italy's freedom from the yoke of the Greeks; because of iconoclasm the East was tossed by seditions. All these things raged more grievously against the empire under Copronymus. At the beginning he was in the most immediate danger of his life, and Artabasdus was saluted as emperor; his sons were partly killed and partly thrust into monasteries, while all men of sound mind detested the foul king. Hence there was a mournful civil war, in which Copronymus as victor produced examples of cruelty. But hatred of the victor remained; hence came the seditions of the Bulgarians, and at last a most wretched death carried him off in despair.

There followed the times of Irene and Constantine, not merely seditious but also savage against their own blood. For at the beginning there was a conspiracy against Irene; she reduced Constantine to the ranks of private men; the army restored him and abolished a woman's empire. But she was soon replaced upon the throne, suppressed the seditions of the Armenian legions, and at last, after her enemies had been oppressed, blinded her son through the soldiers, and likewise her kinsmen. Stauracius thereafter, while stirring up sedition, died of disease; his accomplices were killed; Aetius attempted tyranny. But Nicephorus, having ensnared Irene's guards by treachery, punished her with exile, although he had affirmed by oath that he would not do so. Nor did Nicephorus thereafter long enjoy the kingdom obtained through crime: for, aroused by a sedition of the Bulgarians, he was annihilated with his army. His son Stauracius was soon stripped of the empire by Michael Rhangabe. Leo drove out Michael, Michael the Stammerer drove out Leo; hence came other seditions, especially that of Euphemius, who promised to betray Sicily to the African Emir.

The empire of Theophilus was somehow pacified, but bloody, to such a degree that Theophilus, already about to die, killed Theophobus, adding this pronouncement: “Now neither shall I be Theophilus, nor shall you be Theophobus.” Michael, the son of Theophilus, wicked toward his mother, was killed by Basil; Sabbatius and George plotted against Basil. Leo then followed, who implored the loyalty of the Turks against the rebellious Bulgarians; hence various slaughters ensued, even in a church. Constantine, Leo's son, succeeded him. When the deceits of Samonas had been exposed, Alexander, Constantine's guardian, was killed. Constantine the Domestic attempted to occupy the empire of the ward, but, having fallen from his horse in battle, was beheaded. Then the disagreements of the commanders afflicted the army against the Pechenegs.

But many then aspired to the empire, especially Leo Phocas, whom the emperor's tutor overthrew; then Romanus, but he reduced his son-in-law to the ranks of private men, although he was himself wearied by many machinations, such as those of Bardas and his associates, then of the Mystic, Micetas, and Pseudo-Constantine. Finally, the man who had been so faithless toward his ward was expelled by his sons. Another Romanus suppressed conspiracies, but, having died a little later, left the empire to Nicephorus Phocas, whom others compelled to undertake it. But the city was thrown into tumult for that reason, and as long as he lived he was in the greatest hatred; an occasion for vengeance was always sought, until his wife Theophano and Tzimisces accomplished it.

An eunuch removed Tzimisces by poison, after he had first scarcely suppressed the sedition of Phocas and Leo. Basil Porphyrogenitus then received the empire. Bardas revolted and became emperor; there was a battle between Sclerus and Peter the Eunuch; Contostephanus betrayed the army; Xiphias and Nicephorus, being seditious, were crushed. Constantine, the brother of Basil, followed, oppressive to the state through luxury and cruelty, without any memorable deed except that he cruelly avenged the sedition of the city of Naupactus.

Romanus Argyropulus, nearly an old man and deranged, labored under domestic evils and was agitated more by the laughter of the common people than by seditions. His wife Zoe suffocated him in a bath and advanced her adulterer to the empire; he soon reduced her to the ranks of private persons. Then came the sedition and disaster of the Antiochenes, many revolts and depredations, and Sicily was lost. Zoe attempted in vain to remove John, her husband's brother, from the midst; yet she compelled her husband to abstain from public affairs and adopted Michael Calaphates. He, cruel toward illustrious men, expelled Zoe, but was compelled by a tumult of the people to recall her and was at last blinded. Zoe and Theodora were restored to their former condition. Zoe recalled Constantine Monomachus and married him. Monomachus, ruled by his wife, experienced George Maniaces as a valiant enemy; thereafter he was attacked by the plots of Theophilus, Eroticus, the Orphanotrophus, Leo Tornicius, Aplespharis, and Romanus Boilas.

The empress Theodora designated Michael Stratioticus emperor. He ruled for one year--

[Printed page 718]

--and was severe toward the soldiers; hence sedition arose. Theodosius, its instigator, was relegated; the Easterners, repeatedly driven by various injuries, aspired to the empire; Bryennius was blinded; Isaac Comnenus at last occupied the empire. Since he was hateful to everyone, he laid down the empire and designated Constantine Ducas, whom plotters had resolved to drown, but he escaped by chance.

Constantine Ducas left three children with Eudocia, who wished Romanus Diogenes to be her husband, so that she might have him as emperor against the Persians. For a time he endured the woman's dominion; then, while waging wars courageously, he was deserted by Andronicus; John at last attacked him, and there arose the gravest civil war of all, in which, captured and blinded, he ended his life through grief. Nicephorus the eunuch thereafter administered everything under Michael Ducas. John was therefore saluted as emperor; Nestor revolted; Nicephorus Bryennius excited a sedition; when he had been routed, Botaniates was at last created emperor. The Varangians stirred up a movement against him; Nicephorus Basilacius contemplated a more dangerous sedition; Constantine Ducas a very great one; the logothete likewise came under suspicion.

At last the Comneni aspired to the empire. Alexius was proclaimed emperor and by betrayal occupied and plundered Byzantium, and he procured more enemies for himself than others had. When he returned to Constantinople, the plots of commanders, senators, and commoners received him; thereafter those of Humbertopulus, Ariebes, Nicephorus, and Anemas with the commanders of the soldiery. When the emperor's wife attempted to bar everyone from access to him, the courtiers, Pseudo-Alexius, and the Cilician rendered life scarcely preservable for him.

John Calo succeeded Alexius against his mother's will. He pacified the conspiracies begun against him and reconciled his mother and sister. He also experienced his brothers as adversaries; indeed, his son Isaac revolted to the sultan. He was harassed by a tyrant at Trebizond and at home. Manuel Comnenus followed, who prevailed more against Christians than against barbarians. For he was renowned for the arts by which he frustrated the expedition of the Germans; he afflicted Conrad's army in every way, waged wars against Roger, and stormed the Corcyraeans, in whose siege a bloody sedition arose between Greeks and Venetians. There were hostilities between him and the commanders, and, if it could have happened, there would have been wars.

The boy Alexius perished through the wickedness of his ministers. Andronicus especially plotted against him, and there was not one form of evil. Maria Caesarissa conspired against the Protosebastus, who administered the empire, and aroused the people to arms; a bloody contest arose. Afterwards Andronicus openly sought the empire. The Protosebastus prepared a fleet against him, but all the leading men revolted from the latter; Andronicus seized the reins of the empire, and John Comnenus afflicted him. Andronicus's first plots against the emperor fell in vain; the second succeeded.

Andronicus, harassed by Isaac Comnenus and the king of the Sicilians, had the most sorrowful end among all the emperors. Isaac Angelus waged civil wars against the Sicilian, the Cypriot, the revolting Vlachs, and Branas, by whom he was besieged at Byzantium. He was captured and blinded by his brother Alexius. Nor did Alexius long endure the joys of treason. The sedition of the Cilician Pseudo-Alexius and of Isaac Comnenus, the Vlachs, and the Asens exhausted him. Alexius Angelus experienced nothing except seditions and fears.

Under Alexius Comnenus great disagreements concerning the Eucharist held the Greeks. Besides these, John Comnenus Crassus stirred up sedition, and many others rose up for sedition. Alexius Angelus, the son of Isaac, came as a companion of the Venetians to assault Constantinople; the city was besieged and deformed by fire; Alexius went into exile. The tyranny of Alexius Ducas was brief; Ducas, who was also called Murzuphlus, fled. Yet amid the ashes of the city a new contest arose between Lascaris and Theodore Ducas. At last the Flemings gained possession of affairs; Theodore Lascaris, however, was saluted emperor at Nicaea and seemed about to return to Constantinople, but his father-in-law Alexius hindered him through the Turks, lest the son-in-law recover the empire which he himself had been unable to hold.

Alexius nevertheless, after collecting forces, founded the empire of Trebizond, to which he added Cappadocia and Colchis. Michael Angelus received Thessaly; Michael Palaeologus afterwards occupied it, for seditions and wars were not absent even among the mangled members. Palaeologus recovered Constantinople, and the family of the Palaeologi ruled--Michael, the two Andronici, Manuel, John, and Constantine--and did so amid great fear and the wars of the Turks, and with moderate concord. If, however, they had been fortified by the aid of their neighbors, they would not with difficulty have withstood the Turk.

Behold how difficult it is to rule man, how great things fall in upon themselves. The whole care of the prince, therefore, must be directed to this: that he guard against sedition, whence the greatest wars arise. For who will judge himself safe when he beholds these butcheries?

CHAPTER VI

The Seditions of Other States

[Printed page 718]

§ 1. Scarcely any city has been moved by seditions so Roman in character as Louvain; for all things are similar--the causes, methods, and effects--because, of course, the vices and passions of men are the same. Justus Lipsius recounts them in Book II, chapters 10, 11, and 13.

“I note,” he says, “that the first disturbances occurred in the year 1340, when most of the nobles--until that time they alone had governed the state--were at the siege of Tournai, rendering this service as a favor to the English king. But while, I say, they were absent, the plebs, judging that its time had come, seized the state; and, while altering other things, above all it recalled certain exiles of its own body who had been driven out by the laws in the preceding year. When the patricians had returned, there were complaints, quarrels, and arms; a fierce battle was fought in the middle of the forum. But the patricians conquered, supported by the band of their clients and superior through long practice with arms. There was, nevertheless, more flight than slaughter, except that cruelty followed the victory: men dragged from their homes, and even from sacred places into which they had fled, paid the penalty by sword, prison, and exile.

“There was then quiet for twenty years, but untrustworthy quiet, since men's spirits were ulcerated and the murmuring of the plebeians was not concealed. At the beginning of 1360 they burst forth again into movement and the trumpets of war, from a place whence it was not feared. Peter Couterel was mayor, a man who, although noble and one of the patricians, nevertheless, through perversity of character or ambition, already from his first mayoralty--which he had held for nine years--sought every opportunity to provoke or injure the Fathers. One was offered, or he seized it, in the year already named. A certain citizen, bringing fish for sale into the city by cart, when the cart had become stuck in the mud, suddenly brought a horse out from the pastures, harnessed it, and drew out the cart; and immediately--

[Printed page 719]

--returned the horse in good faith and unharmed. Couterel cast the man into prison as guilty of theft. The aldermen were appealed to; they took cognizance of the matter and pronounced him innocent. And when the mayor would not release him, they forbade him the exercise of jurisdiction because he held a citizen in chains contrary to the laws.

“The mayor immediately went to Brussels, to the prince, who was then Wenceslaus, husband of Joanna, a Bohemian by nation and brother of the emperor Charles IV, whom they relate to have come into the light when his mother's womb was cut open. It is permissible to say that this man was the best neither in peace nor in war, and certainly not the most fortunate; and the people of Louvain have no cause to love him greatly. To the matter: he lent credulous ears to the mayor as he slandered the power of the patricians and asserted that it ought, for the prince's own good, to be restrained by him. Nor could supporters of such counsels be lacking at court; among them was a certain Schoonvorst, a very powerful man, but little upright in spirit or counsel. He openly said that the horns of the patricians--these are his words--must be diminished, since they were now too insolent. The prince could do this without his own exertion or ill will, if the plebs were permitted to rise. The prince did not state his judgment openly; Couterel nevertheless readily saw that he had been heard with ears and minds not unfavorable.

“And so he returned home in high spirits, reported the matter to his followers, and put torches beneath every most factious person. Sedition was now at the point of breaking out; nor could the Fathers be ignorant of it, but they acted too remissly, whether expecting to mitigate it by kindness or through that fatal indolence which is usual. Gerard Vorselaer happened to be present during these days, a noble man and soldier, with a chosen troop of horsemen. He offered his service to the Fathers of his own accord and advised them to use it; they dismissed him. But Couterel did not dismiss his undertakings. On a certain day appointed for holding the Senate, he commanded his followers gradually to assemble in the forum, and that with arms. They came, and now there was a crowd; and he himself, in the manner of one haranguing an assembly, incited them and impressed upon them both the pride of the Fathers and their harsh commands. These were the men who alone occupied the state, who made its honors and money their own, who commanded so many most valiant men as slaves. Had so many innocent men of their own body, punished a few years before by sword, noose, and exile because of certain freer words and deeds, fallen from their memory? The same things awaited them unless they were men; but they were men, and whom did they fear?

"'It is in your hand,' he said, 'to make an end of your evils. Only dare: many against few, prepared against the unprepared, the injured against their assailants; God and men will favor you. By divine kindness we have the prince himself mild in spirit, and he will bear it calmly if you cause them to suffer anything. Keep your injuries before your eyes and liberty upon your lips; and let this be the watchword: go, assert the latter and repel the former.'

"He had spoken, and, while he was still speaking, there were murmuring, shouting, and threats; and, turned toward the senate-house, they directed hands and voices against it. Let the oppressors of the citizens, the plunderers of the treasury, come forth to pay the penalties for their crimes or injuries. And now each began to encourage the other, and they prepared violence. The senate-house was closed, and the Fathers were terrified and unequal to resisting, when Couterel rushed forth and, as though from kindness, counseled surrender and affirmed that they would suffer no further evil. It was prudent to yield to this storm. They yielded and surrendered themselves. But immediately he rushed in, laid hands and chains upon them, and they were led as captives into the citadel.

"Then they broke or unlocked the cabinets and archives of the Senate, plundered the armory likewise, tore apart what was there or carried away whatever was useful to them. The names and number of the captives survive: a little fewer than two hundred, and among them twenty-five knights; the rest had scattered into the neighboring cities or were hiding on their estates and in their country houses. When the tumult had been settled, and so that there might be some form of state, Couterel chose a new senate mixed from the plebs and patricians; for he also found among the latter certain pliant or indolent men suited to his counsels, who would exchange the common injury for a present honor.

"Then he sent men down to the captives to announce danger from the plebs; he sent certain men of the plebs themselves, who, with turbulent voices around the citadel, demanded them for slaughter. Thus, terrified, they became suppliants to Couterel; and at last, each making a separate compact for a great sum of money, they were released. Wenceslaus was in Luxembourg while these things were being done--distant by chance or counsel--but the exiles immediately approached him, made known what had been done, and demanded a remedy and vengeance. They were received coldly, although most of the nobility favored them, as did those among the counselors who had some care for equity and honor. Couterel himself also came, who had made many men his own through gold; and the matter was deferred until the prince should return. This was done in the following year, and meanwhile Couterel continued his command.

"Wenceslaus had now come to Brussels, and there the nobles approached him in a body, begged and urged him to avenge a matter of the worst example and not to open a field to sedition or licentiousness. Separately the people of Brussels pressed him and strove keenly on behalf of their allied city. At last they impelled him to move toward Louvain after gathering hired troops into one body. He came to the Banck. While he was there, the Couterelians, who had neither strength nor spirit against the prince, immediately came to him and promised that they would do what was commanded. Thus the prince, having been admitted, recalled the exiles, but displayed no anger or vengeance against the disturbers. He created Couterel himself, the head of the evils, an alderman in the new Senate, merely removing him from the mayoralty; and according to his institution he chose the Senate itself indiscriminately from Fathers and plebs--a nursery of later disturbances. Love of peace and concord was put forward as the pretext; but by this deed it became evident to the more prudent that the preceding affairs had been administered with the prince not unaware, and certainly not unwilling.

“Thus quiet, but quiet neither very certain nor long, was restored to the city. For the plebs exulted and insulted the patricians as conquered; Couterel himself exercised and increased his domination, until, from weariness with present conditions and fear also of future ones, most of the patricians voluntarily withdrew from the city. This delighted Couterel. His rivals having been removed, he now acted freely and designated himself consul for the following year together with Geldolph Rogge, a weaver. And because he knew from experience that protection lay in gold, he sought it from every quarter--not only at home, but also among foreigners, borrowing it upon the public faith of the city, for the seal was in his hand. He attained so great wealth and power that he gave his daughter in marriage to Henry, lord of Hoogstraten, with a great dowry, as great as Henry had demanded.

“But envy also accompanied him, and complaints before the prince were frequent; neither his son-in-law nor Schoonvorst could sufficiently excuse or protect him. Matters came to such a point that the prince again moved his camp toward the city. The same things happened again: they admitted the prince; he compelled both parties by oath to make peace and even took hostages--twelve from the patricians and forty from the plebs. Couterel retained the consulship, and nothing was changed in the sharing of honors. Yet he himself, frightened by conscience and because he perceived that the prince was now more alienated from him, voluntarily fled, after gathering his possessions, together with several standard-bearers of the factious, into the territory of Liège.

“There, since he kept the roads dangerous and halted or cast into chains merchants going from Louvain to Germany in order to extort money, he seriously stirred the anger of Wenceslaus, who proscribed him and twenty-five weavers. Not even then--

[Printed page 720]

--did he remain quiet, but he attempted, with the secret aid of conspirators, to break into the city and make it his own. He had no success, and punishment was exacted from the conspirators. Thus, his affairs being desperate, he turned to prayers and, chiefly through the work of the lord of Hoogstraten, obtained pardon from exile and returned to Louvain in the year 1369, where he ended an inglorious life under public execration. You may marvel either that he dared such things with so great a spirit or that he ended so meanly.”

In chapter 11 Lipsius says: “Now the deadly sedition must be narrated which, nine years later, flowed from that fountain. Wenceslaus, as I said, had shared honors with the plebs, and had kept matters so for several years, until in the unfortunate war of Jülich he himself was captured and many of the nobility, including those of Louvain, were slain. In this war, therefore, since the patricians had proved their loyalty and spirit, while the plebs had been slow or refractory and had furnished only sixty archers, the prince, returning from custody to Louvain, restored their former honor and magistracy to the patricians, except that thereafter twelve senators should be from the plebs. The plebs bore it with difficulty, but bore it for six years, down to the elections of the year 1378.

“At those very elections, when the Senate had been created according to the stated formula, but the Fathers were openly acting in discord among themselves, the plebs, having long watched for an opportunity, seized it. On the holy day of Mary Magdalene itself, three or four weavers from each district, running through the whole city with shouting and the din of basins, aroused the rest: ‘To arms, to arms!’ They assembled; the senate-house was immediately seized, and the consuls with the aldermen were put in chains. Walter Leidanus, a weaver, was named prefect of the city. Soon it pleased them, after the example of the people of Ghent, to assume white caps or hoods as the badge of the faction. It was done; and men were then carried so readily into novel and turbulent affairs that not a few patricians did not refuse but placed that same badge upon their heads and the faction in their hearts.

“Meanwhile Wenceslaus, returning from France--for he had gone there--and informed of these things, came to Louvain; and, once again to placate the plebs, he changed the order of the Senate and admitted them to one half. You may marvel at his inconstancy, and more if, believing the writers, you judge these concessions to have been made not only to the circumstances but also to money, of which he assuredly received some considerable sum from the public treasury. Moreover, he compelled the citizens by oath to deal peacefully with one another, as befitted members of one body. Certain patricians nevertheless refused this and chose to lack a fatherland rather than be subjected to the injuries or insults of the plebs.

“Thus most of these, living at Aarschot or Namur, harassed the plebs and carried off any of them caught in the fields or roads, and demanded ransoms. The latter in turn set fire to their estates, likewise seized those whom they could, and subjected some to the sword of the executioner. Finally, in the city itself those patricians who remained conducted themselves suspiciously or were suspicious, especially after the murder of Walter Leidanus, who was among the leaders of the White Caps. He happened to have been sent to Brussels on behalf of the state and, returning at night from dinner, was killed, as is thought, by the ambushes of John Calster and William Wilre, patricians who were then staying in that city.

“When the news was brought, Louvain was thrown into confusion; the plebs threatened and murmured; the optimates feared. And these, in order to show themselves innocent and unaware, sent envoys to Joanna--for her husband was still absent in Gaul--to ask that the authors of the murder be investigated and punished. When she delayed, the plebs, judging that they were being mocked or that the matter was being conducted by agreement, seized arms and came into the forum. The Fathers also were summoned into the senate-house. Some of them came; others, foreboding something sorrowful and deadly, changed their clothing and fled the city. Immediately a guard was placed at the Senate, and the seditious rushed to the doors with furious spirit and stood beside them; a part even entered, with no one preventing them. There voices were heard: ‘Give us that man, and that man--at once, at once!’ And those who had been admitted seized them one by one as their names were called and cast them headlong from the windows--I shudder to say it--while the plebs below received them upon lances and darts and tore them to pieces. About seventeen perished in this madness; and one man of the plebs was added to them because, taking pity on Platuotius, his former patron, he had hidden him beneath benches and covered him with his garment.

“These things were done on the sixteenth day before the Kalends of December, and those of the Fathers who remained and were found at home were put under guard. After the deed came coldness, and soon repentance or fear entered. For how would the prince receive these things? He would return shortly and exact punishments from guilty and innocent alike.

“And so they prepared as intercessors the people of Léau, Tienen, Diest, Lier, and Brussels, and also those of Liège and Tongeren; and behold, sooner than expected, Wenceslaus came to Brussels. He was preparing arms and engines, intent upon vengeance, when envoys from the aforesaid cities came to him and humbly sought pardon, offering whatever expiation of the slaughter he might wish. At last, after long deliberation, it was prescribed that fourteen principal authors from the plebs should be relegated to Cyprus and that a fixed sum of money should be given to the kinsmen of the slain. It seemed to everyone a mild settlement, falling short of the magnitude of the crime; then there was this disgraceful thing, that money for the journey was assigned to the exiles themselves from the state as though they were envoys.

“And so it did not serve to placate their spirits. For the patrician youth murmured that they did not regard the blood of their parents as for sale or as to be redeemed by that modest sum of money. And now, having occupied neighboring places or fortresses, they waged war upon their own citizens and drove off plunder from every quarter. Nor did the plebeians cease to return or augment violence and crimes; at last they went farther and struck secret treaties against the prince with the people of Ghent, who then bore arms against the count and ruled almost all Flanders.

“Finally, after mutual slaughters on both sides, Wenceslaus, at last taught that his indulgence to the plebs had been vain and rash, took up arms and besieged the city. They resisted, raised defensive works, and, being unequal by themselves, awaited aid from the people of Ghent. But when that aid failed, and the people of Ghent were themselves pressed by Count Louis and the French, recourse was once again had to prayers. Arnold of Hornes, bishop of Liège, coming into the camp himself, carried them to the prince and obtained pardon under fixed laws. A few were punished; more, through indignation or fear, changed their fatherland, especially the wool-workers, who went to England.”

Chapter 13 has it thus: “There is not yet an end: from the wool-workers we pass to the butchers; and from this body also there were men who disturbed the state. Paul Loenken, a butcher from the lowest plebs, after the slaughter of Charles the Bold and while deliberation was being held concerning the marriage of Mary with Maximilian, made himself and his plebs a part of the state. He spread rumors that Maximilian was being awaited falsely and that the senators were thus mocking them; it was better and safer for them to possess and exercise command themselves. He then aroused the aforesaid dregs of the people, unexpectedly seized and carried off certain men from the Senate, and was about to subject them to the sword, had not the public executioner withdrawn himself. The leaders of the Academy also now intervened and by their authority quieted the tumult.

“Mary herself came a little later to assume, according to custom, the auspices of the principate; the seditious neither admitted nor acknowledged her unless they had extorted new rights and immunities. Indeed, when she, in order to suppress them, had armed the archers of the city itself--the more honorable portion of the people--they made an assault and captured certain of the archers and four senators who happened to meet them. Only with difficulty could they be restrained even by Paul himself from punishing them in the same manner. Then they rushed into the citadel where Mary was staying, and compelled the maiden, trembling amid so many evils, to pardon what had gone before and to sanction other things according to their judgment.

[Printed page 721]

“Now, so that there might publicly be the appearance also of a new popular government, twenty guards were assigned to Paul for protection, together with a monthly stipend from the treasury. And thereafter they reveled at the expense of the same public money, drank, and held banquets as though to establish association and loyalty. But while they were carrying on these things, Maximilian arrived sooner than expected; as he drew near, Paul's power began to diminish, and his retainers were taken from him by the Senate. Yet Maximilian himself, although present, resolved to do nothing even as prince, nor to touch this ulcer, unless he became master of the marriage.

“Therefore, after his departure, the Paulians again began to swell up, demand back the retainers, and throw affairs into confusion. But Maximilian, at last informed concerning the whole matter and its danger, sent Engelbert of Nassau, seneschal of Brabant, ahead to Louvain with cavalry, and was himself soon to follow.

“Clouds and scoundrels scatter before the sun. Paul fled into Zeeland, and there, when recognized, paid with his head. Most of these things, and certainly their beginnings, were done in the absence of Louis Pinnoccius the mayor--for he had gone into Germany among the envoys--who, being the man he was, prompt in spirit and vigorous in hand, would have crushed or at least repressed them. God and fate judged otherwise.

“But, that I may finish, this sedition also diminished the city, since many not only of the plebs but also of the optimates scattered into the countryside or their strongholds and established their residence there from weariness with so many disturbances. You see the causes and the times by which a city once most flourishing lost its flower and possesses from its ancient glory and abundance nothing except this shadow.”

The first sedition arose through the absence of the aristocratic nobility, which ruled like the Roman patricians; so too did the Roman seditions, because many nobles had fallen in war, while the rest oppressed the citizens by an inequitable command. This also happened at Louvain; otherwise a just and innocent nobility would not have been hated.

Then the exiles were recalled. Hence came slaughter and flight, and the insolent victory of the nobility, which embittered the citizens. It grew raw again thereafter when the countryman was cast into prison, just as the Roman sedition once grew raw through the crime of Claudius when he gave judgment against freedom in favor of slavery; but here the more just cause was on the side of the nobility. Peace having been made, Couterel ruled; the nobility, after the slaughter of its members, prepared war. At last the seditions were ended by siege and punishment, through which they lost the power to rage.

CHAPTER VII

The Seditions of the Osmanids

[Printed page 721]

§ 1. I have very often made mention of the Turkish Empire and warned that those men err who contend that, because of the common servitude of all, it is free from sedition and tumults. The history of Turkish affairs itself refutes them, as does the nature of the monarchy, which, since it is savage and harsh, must necessarily also be engaged in perpetual fear and danger.

In the year 1328 from the Incarnation, Osman having died, his son Orchan took the prefectures away from his leading men and introduced that servitude which now exists; thereafter they struggled with great evils. For the leading men conspired against Gilderun and called upon the Egyptian. Indeed, deserted also by his Tatar auxiliaries, Gilderun came into the power of Timur and was cast into an iron cage, while the leading men were restored to their dignities.

Thereafter Musa, Suleiman's brother, harassed him, and the army declared Musa emperor. When Suleiman had been destroyed, there was war between Mahomet and Musa; Musa, deserted by his commander and fleeing his brother, was slaughtered by a servant. Meanwhile, while the brothers stirred up wars against one another, Caramanir the prefect revolted and brought hostile arms against Mahomet. But, after peace had been made with Caraman, Mustafa stirred up a greater sedition, and afterwards Torlac and Mustafa again; for it was very easy for them to entice rude men to themselves.

Murad thereafter, through Düzme Mustafa, and with almost all the leading men revolting, was not only cast down from the empire; but, when that Mustafa had been hanged, another Mustafa, the victor's brother, began new disturbances. And lest any evil should be lacking, the Wallachian revolted. Amid these events Ibrahim of Karaman also rebelled, whom Murad was compelled to receive into favor.

Mahomet ruled without many seditions; when he died, the Janissaries plundered Constantinople. The brothers Bayezid and Zizim fought; the Egyptian attacked the victor, not without a conspiracy of the leading men. But the victor over these and others was agitated by Chasan Calisa, a solitary man who feigned holiness; for by the pretense of holiness he easily enticed to sedition peoples who had suffered things deserved and undeserved. Scarcely had he been destroyed when Selim took up arms against his father; and, when the Janissaries conspired, the old man was compelled to lay down the empire. Selim also killed his brother Ahmed and ruled in great fear.

Ibrahim thereafter considered casting Suleiman down from the kingdom. Suleiman came to so great a depth of misery that, when discord arose between his sons, he obtained by great promises from Tahmasp, his host, that his son Selim should be killed together with his grandson--an act than which nothing more disgraceful could be conceived in a father and grandfather. Dragut also rebelled against him when he was now old. Nothing, therefore, is easier than to excite a notable sedition in that kingdom in which the subjects are oppressed and the leading men are in fear, something which we see that the basest of men have been able to do.

CHAPTER VIII

The Causes of Seditions and Tumults on the Part of Rulers

[Printed page 721]

§ 1. Daily losses show that disturbances and movements are frequent in the state. It is my intention to investigate their causes, so that they may be guarded against and, if perhaps no precaution has been employed, may be removed. Their causes arise either from the vice of princes and optimates, or of peoples, or of both; for if ever in any matter each party is guilty, it happens in tumults and civil wars. For there,

> In truth, guilt is committed within the walls and beyond them.

It is a sign of a state about to fall when the magistracy is ignorant of manifest vices or dissembles them; when those whom all men judge impious it holds in esteem as though they were upright.

There are, moreover, as many causes as there are vices. For although men are chiefly impelled to rebel by cruelty, avarice, and pride, nevertheless there have frequently been other causes also: fear, lust, luxury, and others. For just as every evil of the body, if it becomes severe, is capable of destroying life--

[Printed page 722]

--so whatever introduces hatred, envy, and contempt of others into the body of the state is accustomed to prepare discord, factions, tumults, and civil wars. The friends of princes destroy them more often than their enemies do.

§ 2. The first and most powerful cause of rebellion is the cruelty of magistrates. For since nothing is dearer to a man than life, men protect themselves in whatever way they can against the bloodthirsty and cruel. We always bear arms against lions, wolves, bears, and serpents, and fortify ourselves with the protection of others, for we know that their rage is always armed against us. The mind of an entire kingdom is no different when its people perceive that the king is cruel: clemency makes kings gods; cruelty makes them demons.

The impious and savage deeds of Mezentius are an ancient example. Hence:

> Etruria rises in righteous fury.

I have shown this sufficiently in the chapter concerning cruelty. For cruel men are feared most by those nearest them. Alexander of Pherae, whose savagery was celebrated, was killed in his sleep by his wife's brothers while she herself held the light before them.

We know that Augustus was agitated by many seditions; but when we consider his cruelty, we marvel that he escaped. Suetonius, chapter 27: “For ten years he administered the triumvirate for establishing the state. In it he indeed resisted his colleagues for some time, lest there should be any proscription, but when one had begun he exercised it more bitterly than either of them. For while they were often capable of being entreated by favor and prayers in the case of many persons, he alone contended earnestly that no one should be spared; and he proscribed even Gaius Toranius, his own guardian and the colleague of his father Octavius in the aedileship.

“Junius Saturninus relates this besides: that when, after the proscription had been completed, Marcus Lepidus excused the past in the Senate and held out hope of clemency for the future, because sufficient punishments had been exacted, Augustus, on the contrary, professed that he had fixed a limit to proscribing in such a way that he had left everything free to himself. Nevertheless, in repentance for this obstinacy, he afterwards honored Titus Junius Philopoemen with equestrian dignity because it was said that he had once concealed his proscribed patron.

“While in this same power he blazed with manifold odium. For when, while he was haranguing, he noticed that Pinarius, a Roman knight admitted among the soldiers with a crowd of civilians, was writing down certain things, he judged him inquisitive and a spy and ordered him to be stabbed before his eyes. And Tedius Afer, consul designate, because he had censured a certain deed of his with malicious speech, he terrified with so many threats that the man threw himself down to his death.

“And when Quintus Gallus the praetor, during the duty of salutation, was holding double tablets covered by his garment, Augustus suspected that he concealed a sword; but he did not dare investigate anything immediately, lest something else be found. A little afterwards, Gallus was dragged from the tribunal by centurions and soldiers and tortured after the manner of a slave; and although he confessed nothing, Augustus ordered him to be killed, first gouging out his eyes with his own hand. Augustus nevertheless writes that Gallus sought a conference and plotted against him; that he was cast by him into custody, then banished from the city and released; and that he perished by shipwreck or the ambushes of robbers.

“He received perpetual tribunician power, in which once and again, at each interval of five years, he chose a colleague for himself. He also received an equally perpetual governance of morals and laws; by this right, although without the honor of the censorship, he nevertheless conducted the census of the people three times--the first and third with a colleague, the middle one alone.”

It is monstrous how great a hatred the reputation of cruelty brings. Philippicus killed Justinian II amid the greatest joy of all because he had resolved utterly to destroy the people of Cherson, had even sent a fleet to kill the infants, and ordered a citizen to be slaughtered whenever, after his nose had been cut off, he blew it. Diaconus, Book XIX. The Locrians avenged the cruelty of Dionysius with greater savagery and injustice: for they prostituted his wife together with his daughters, killed them after piercing them with needles beneath the nails of their fingers, crushed their bones, and cursed those who did not taste their flesh. Aelian, Book IX. But enough has been done concerning this matter in the chapter on cruelty.

§ 3. A no less effective and much more frequent cause of seditions is the avarice of rulers. Aristotle noted this in Book V of the Politics, chapter 3:

> Τούτων δὲ ὕβρις μὲν καὶ κέρδος τίνα ἔχει δύναμιν καὶ πῶς αἴτια, σχεδόν ἐστι φανερόν· ὑβριζόντων τε γὰρ τῶν ἐν ταῖς ἀρχαῖς καὶ πλεονεκτούντων στασιάζουσι καὶ πρὸς ἀλλήλους καὶ πρὸς τὰς πολιτείας τὰς διδούσας τὴν ἐξουσίαν.

What force insult and gain have among these things, and how they are causes of seditions, is almost manifest. For when those who bear magistracies are insulting toward private persons and take more and greater things for themselves through injury and avarice, they excite sedition both among themselves and against those forms of administering the state which offer and permit this license.

If you weigh everything in the Roman state, you will find that most seditions arose from the avarice of the nobility. Hence the tribunes of the plebs were instituted, so that they might assist the weaker against the injuries of moneylenders. Hence the agrarian laws were attempted so often, when the plebs, conqueror of nations, wasted away from want while the nobility possessed vast estates.

There are exceedingly many Cleons today who have > τὴν χεῖρ ἐν Αἰτωλοῖς, τὸν δὲ νοῦν ἐν Κλωπιδῶν, their hand among the Aetolians, or in petitioning, but their mind in the district of Clopidae, or among thefts. Caligula stirred up everyone when he compelled wills to bequeath property to him and set a price upon foodstuffs. Galba, because of the reputation of avarice, was betrayed by the army. For the same cause Didius Julianus was deserted and killed in the palace. His own men betrayed Maurice for that reason when they neglected the protection of the avaricious prince, and they raised up Phocas the parricide for the same reason. Constantine was killed by his own men in Sicily because of the same sordidness and rapacity; his plunder was diverted by the Saracens into Africa. Perseus, king of the Macedonians, deserted by soldiers defrauded of their pay, was captured with his gold and led in triumph by Paulus Aemilius. Heraclius also, while depriving the Saracens of their pay, lost the empire of the East.

§ 4. Unjust exactions of tributes pertain to avarice; they rarely enrich princes, frequently bring destruction to them and profit to their officers. Darius, who first ordered the tributes of the Persian kingdom, was called κάπηλος, or a huckster; he also corrupted morals and was hated by the nation. The Lydians suspended King Achaeus by his feet for avarice in exacting tributes, so that his head emerged into the Pactolus and its gold-bearing water might thus satisfy his thirst.

Bato the Dalmatian freely reproached Tiberius that the Romans supplied the cause of war because they sent not dogs but wolves as guardians of the flock. If we consider present affairs, the exaction of tributes produced the war in Belgium, or furnished its occasion. One must therefore take great care that people not be burdened beyond measure or custom, for when they perceive that they are being despoiled they rise up grievously. For although there are extraordinary necessities, so that a prince is sometimes compelled for the public utility to impose assessments and superassessments, the people are nevertheless so disposed that they interpret what is done for their safety as being given to others. But the most bitter seditions are those which arise when tribute is refused and which assail the ministers above all. Thus the fury of the Israelite people raged singularly against Adoram, who was over the tribute, and stoned him.

[Printed page 723]

A king will therefore act most safely if he exacts small tributes in portions, with the estates consenting after the necessity of the kingdom has been demonstrated; if he preserves the ordinary ones and does not readily command new ones. In the time of Charles VI, new taxes almost overthrew king and kingdom, for the plebs, having risen in tumult, obtained their abolition after the most illustrious men of the magistracy had first been killed. For the same cause the French were expelled from all Flanders after the people of Bruges had made the beginning. The plebs indeed serves humbly and remains quiet so long as customary things are commanded; when it understands that it is being despoiled by unaccustomed methods, it turns to arms.

§ 5. Injustice is either that which truly opposes laws and right, or that which those living in a worse condition judge to be injustice. For although all demand right, that is, what is equitable, and put it forward as a pretext, they nevertheless do not acknowledge true equity. For those who are equal in some respect wish to be peers in all things, and by this reasoning violate justice, that is, equity itself. Although the people and the optimates are equally free, nevertheless equal honor is not therefore owed to a plebeian and a nobleman; for the former is κατ' ἀριθμὸν ἰσότης, "equality according to number," not ἰσότης κατ' ἀναλογίαν, "equality according to proportion." Again, those who are superior in some respect are willing to bear an equal in no respect, and they judge this just. Thus, when nobles are exempt from civil burdens, they judge it equitable not to pay their creditors, not to appear when summoned to judgment, to display honor to no one, and to exact the services of lesser men.

When, therefore, they perceive that right is denied to them or judgment rendered inequitably, they turn to force. The great commander Julius Caesar never entered greater danger than when, chosen as judge between Cleopatra and her brother and indulging his love of the queen, he pronounced an inequitable judgment against her brother. For then the Egyptians, turned to sedition and almost madness, rose against him with one mind, to such a degree that he was compelled to entrust himself naked to the river and thus escaped to his own men; nevertheless the Alexandrians carried his garments around in mockery. For the sacred writings teach us that a kingdom is transferred from nation to nation because of injustice.

§ 6. Fear is also a great incitement to sedition. For when men have sinned and fear the vengeance of the laws, or when innocent men foresee injuries, they prefer to anticipate them. Thus Aurelian was slaughtered by his own men, partly deserving punishment and partly innocent.

"It happened," says Flavius Vopiscus, "as events conduct themselves fatally, that he rendered a certain Mnesteus, whom he had as secretary of secrets--a freedman of his own, as some say--more hostile to himself because he had suspected I know not what concerning a certain matter. Mnesteus, who knew that Aurelian was accustomed neither to threaten in vain nor to pardon if he threatened, wrote a brief list of names, mixing those with whom Aurelian was truly angry together with those concerning whom he contemplated nothing harsh, and adding even his own name, so that he might impart greater credibility to the anxiety he had aroused. He read the brief to the individuals whose names it contained, adding that Aurelian had resolved to kill them all, but that they, if they were men, ought to come to the aid of their lives. These men--those who deserved his displeasure having blazed up with fear--mingling resentment with the benefactions and services for which Aurelian seemed ungrateful, suddenly attacked and killed the prince as he made his journey in the aforesaid place."

Rightly, therefore, Aristotle, Book V, chapter 3:

> Διὰ δὲ φόβον στασιάζουσιν οἱ ἠδικηκότες, δεδιότες μὴ δῶσι δίκην, καὶ οἱ μέλλοντες ἀδικεῖσθαι, βουλόμενοι φθάσαι πρὶν ἀδικηθῆναι.

On account of fear, however, those who have inflicted injury rise in tumult lest they pay the penalties, or those who suspect that they are about to suffer injury; for they prefer to anticipate it. Thus the Rhodians conspired against the plebs through fear of judicial proceedings. For vehement fear, when it produces despair of pardon, is the strongest of all passions. See that heroine:

> I would have cast myself upon them.
>
> What did I have to fear, being about to die?

Those whose life, fortune, and reputation are in another's power think more often about what their master is able to do than about what he ought to do. But if they are so conscious within themselves that they judge that their master not only can but also rightfully can and ought to act more harshly, and they now see him ready and prepared for torments and destruction, they will attempt everything in order to escape. If many are afraid, no force of command is so great that it can long endure under the pressure of fear. Hence arises swift and unconsidered rebellion, and indeed rebellion by many, because no one is faithful to the man whom he fears.

When Athens summoned Alcibiades to the tribunal because the affair in Sicily had been badly conducted, it overthrew the city. For he, despairing that he would obtain pardon from the hostile plebs for the disaster received, when he saw that those who had deserved best had suffered the extremity, preferred to entrust his safety to enemies rather than to citizens. Having set out for Lacedaemon, he was the author of the counsel that Gylippus should be sent to the aid of the Syracusans, that war in Attica should be renewed, and that assistance should be brought to the Chians, Lesbians, and others who had revolted from the Athenians; sailing to Ionia himself, he was successful in alienating cities from the Athenians.

Yet there was no loyalty for him among the Spartans either. Their insult and injury reconciled Alcibiades to his fatherland; for when the ephors commanded the commanders to kill Alcibiades, he again brought the Lacedaemonians into hatred, both among the cities and with Tissaphernes the Persian. Thereafter he defeated Mindarus and Pharnabazus in a mighty battle and, after wresting the empire of the sea from the Spartans, handed it to the Athenians. When he had again been reduced to the ranks of private men by them, he was compelled as an exile to see his fatherland captured.

[Printed page 723]

§ 7. Hope is akin to fear. For both those who struggle with adversity hope for better things and those whose affairs proceed prosperously hope for the best. Thus for a long time the Roman Empire was sold, when seditious men impelled military spirits, filled with hope, to crime, and the same men, when frustrated in their hope, deserted the princes.

Dio reports concerning Vespasian: “He was nevertheless not pleasing to the Alexandrians, who were so gravely hostile to him that they mocked and cursed him both privately and publicly. The cause was that, although they had hoped to receive from him, whom they had made emperor first of all, some great gift, he not only bestowed nothing upon them but even exacted money from them; and he collected so much, omitting no kind of tribute, that he did not spare even beggars and made money from divine and human affairs. For he renewed many taxes which had now ceased to be paid and increased many of those which were in force; and he did this in the other provinces subject to Roman command and afterwards in the city. For this reason the Alexandrians hurled many reproaches against him and said, among other things, that he exacted six obols.”

Hope, therefore, aroused the Egyptians, and when disappointed it raged. Those who attempt innovations know this: nothing impels spirits more toward sedition than to inflate them with hope of better things. Thus Cyrus induced the Persians to revolt from the Medes. Antiochus, in like manner, when he was besieging Cypsela, ostentatiously adorned with necklaces and silver arms the nobles of Cypsela whom he had in his camp. And so their kinsmen revolted to him and, as followed, betrayed the city.

Fear and the consciousness of an evil deed are cruel.

[Printed page 724]

Bagoas, through fear of cruelty, killed Ochus, king of the Persians. He raised his son Arsames to the kingdom and killed him in the same manner lest the latter avenge his father's slaughter, and he transferred the empire to Darius. Thus Marcus Duillius, tribune of the plebs, consulted no more for the Senate than for the state when, after the decemvirs had been condemned and all were afraid, he proclaimed that in that year no one should be permitted to appoint a day of accusation against anyone. But hope is sharper because it makes men active, fear sluggish.

§ 8. The license of magnates and princes toward women has excited many seditions. External wars also arose from it; a royal wife, foreign marriage beds, and the carrying off of betrothed women were the cause of many wars. But we are treating seditions.

Livy, Book IV, says that at Ardea civil discord arose between the plebs and the optimates because of the marriage of a certain maiden who was indeed of plebeian birth but most distinguished in beauty. Two young men sought her, one a plebeian and the other a nobleman. The former relied upon her guardians; the latter upon both the favor of her mother, who wished the girl to be joined in the most splendid marriage possible, and that of the optimates. Since the affair could not be completed within the walls of the house, they went to law. After the claim of the mother and that of the guardians had been heard, the magistrates awarded the right of marriage according to the will of the parent.

But force was more powerful. For the guardians, having harangued the men of their party in the forum concerning the injustice of the decree, formed a band and carried the maiden off from her mother's house. Against them arose a more hostile battle line of optimates, which followed the young man inflamed by the injury. A fierce battle took place. The armed plebs, driven from the city, went forth, occupied a certain hill, and made incursions with sword and fire upon the lands of the optimates; it prepared to besiege the city itself. No disaster of war was absent. It seemed to each party that too few arms were present in the city and for war; the optimates summoned the Romans to come to the aid of the city, while the plebs summoned the Volscians to storm Ardea with them.

The lust of Roderic, king of Spain, so inflamed Julian of Tingitana, whose daughter he had dishonored, to vengeance that he called the Saracen Mamolinus into Spain. Thus the intemperance of one man brought first rebellion, then war and the servitude of many centuries, upon the most noble kingdoms.

The people also expelled the Roman kings, despairing that they could otherwise avenge chastity. They also avenged themselves upon the decemvirs for this reason. The tyrant Pandulf, because the daughter of Bellantius had been carried off, was crushed by a conspiracy of her kinsmen.

Aristotle also numbers this among causes that are small but frequent. Assuredly among the people of God lust was expiated by the destruction of almost one entire tribe. Xerxes, the most powerful of kings, while violating his brother's wife and household with unspeakable lust and slaughtering his most beloved brother, was killed by his uncle Artabanus. But nothing was fouler than the contest between Artaxerxes and his son Darius over a concubine. Artaxerxes loved Aspasia and created Darius king. It was the custom that on the day of inauguration it was not lawful to deny the son a gift, requested separately, of whatever he wished. The shameless and ungrateful Darius sought Aspasia. Artaxerxes gave her according to the laws and, a little afterwards, overcome by desire, took her away. Darius plotted his father's death; when detected, he paid with his head. Just as the abductions of maidens and matrons are the most ancient causes of wars, so also the rivalries of leading men have thrown whole states into confusion.

§ 9. Desire for honors and ambition are scarcely absent from any rebellion; but of very many they are the sole causes. The matter seems clear to Aristotle, Book V, chapter 3:

> Δῆλον δὲ καὶ ἡ τιμή, καὶ τί δύναται καὶ πῶς αἰτία στάσεως· καὶ γὰρ αὐτοὶ ἀτιμαζόμενοι καὶ ἄλλους ὁρῶντες τιμωμένους στασιάζουσι· ταῦτα δὲ ἀδίκως μὲν γίνεται ὅταν παρὰ τὴν ἀξίαν ἢ τιμῶνταί τινες ἢ ἀτιμάζωνται, δικαίως δὲ ὅταν κατὰ τὴν ἀξίαν.

It is clear what honor can do and how it is a cause of sedition; for those who are without honor, seeing others honored, rise in tumult. This happens sometimes justly, sometimes unjustly. The desire to dominate is assuredly the torch of seditions just as it is of wars.

At Rome the Senate was burdensome to the plebs, and the plebs to the Senate. The younger men among the Fathers insulted the plebs; the older men judged their own young men too fierce, yet preferred, if a limit had to be exceeded, that courage should abound in their own men rather than in their adversaries. At first men wish to be made equal; then, lest they lose liberty and equality, they wish to cast others down and command others, and so to repel injury in order that they may inflict it upon others. This throws everything into confusion. For they do not think themselves safe unless they have so prostrated others who are rightfully their equals that they cannot rise again.

Good princes also perished in this way, but after being changed. Pausanias, an example of modesty and of a temperate spirit in victory, being raised up by prosperity, was preparing a Persian peace and had contracted for a royal marriage so that he himself might become king of Greece. For this reason, when he fled into a temple, he was walled in and there perished from hunger, after his mother Alcithea had placed the first stone in the blocking of the entrance.

In the Roman city very many seditions were excited by hope of domination. Whether you examine sacred or profane history, you will find very many things of this kind. Almost all the kings of the Israelites were killed by plotters, and the kings of the Jews also endured conspiracies. Sennacherib was killed by his sons, and other men by others; for those who come to a kingdom through slaughter are generally cast down in the same manner. This, therefore, is what they labor to effect: that no one be their equal and no one their superior, and that they be masters of some; with the outcome uncertain, they kill innumerable men.

§ 10. Overthrows of the state occur for the most part when the excessive power of one man is nourished and made firm. This has been treated rather often, but the evil clings with the greatest tenacity. The preeminence of one man is equally harmful to the liberty of peoples and to the majesty of kings. Aristotle prudently says: “Moreover, sedition arises because of preeminence when one man, or several, obtains ampler resources and greater power than the city or the power of the administration of the state can bear; for monarchy or dynasty is accustomed to arise from such conditions. For this reason in certain places they are accustomed to relegate the more preeminent men for a fixed time by means of a potsherd, which the Greeks call ὀστρακίζειν, as at Argos and Athens. And yet it is better to provide from the beginning that men so preeminent cannot arise in the city than afterwards to remedy an evil born from sufferance and negligence."

Hence Rome, through the conspiracy of three leading men, was made common to three masters. Hence come oligarchies, conspiracies, and the other plagues. If one man can do everything with the prince, he is unable to bear the envy; if a few obtain control of affairs, they are unable to agree among themselves and betray the prince rather than preserve him, because they turn the prince away from the friendship and society of others. Finally, out of so many thousands concerning whose power the provinces complained, scarcely ten used power moderately; rather, they turned it to the destruction of the plebs, the nobility, the prince, and at last themselves. The cause is that they possess hope neither in the will of the people or leading men nor in that of the king.

§ 11. The error of rulers is equal when they dishonor great men.

[Printed page 725]

For since these men are powerful, bear great spirits, and are unaccustomed to insult, they do not easily let an opportunity for vengeance escape. When Ish-bosheth charged Abner with embracing the royal concubine, he offended a man of great spirit and a support of the kingdom, so that he immediately revolted to David. David likewise, while attempting to reduce Joab to the ranks of private men by substituting Amasa in his place, gave Joab a man to fear not without reason, had Amasa not fallen by treachery.

Coriolanus would have avenged the disgrace of his judgment by the destruction of his fatherland, had his mother's prayers not stood in the way. The Athenians expelled Hippias, who had thus deserved it, but shuddered when he returned with one hundred thousand infantry and ten thousand cavalry. Miltiades nevertheless defeated him, furnished with eleven thousand men; yet toward Miltiades they were most ungrateful, and after fining him an immense sum of money they compelled him to die in prison. If he had wished to flee to the Persians, he could have overthrown Athens with small forces; for what would not the man who defeated one hundred and ten thousand with eleven thousand have done if he had possessed one hundred and ten thousand against eleven thousand? A foolish city, therefore, which, always inequitable and malevolent toward illustrious men, deprived itself of its own defenses.

Baldilus the Gaul, because he had been unjustly beaten by Childeric, killed the king himself and his pregnant wife. Colas the tutor incited three pupils to the murder of Galeazzo Sforza because he had repaid the blows which the boy had received from that tutor. Andrea Lampugnani killed Galeazzo Sforza because Galeazzo had not favored him against the bishop of Como.

Whole states sometimes commit an offense of this kind. Matho, punished with exile together with the army, set out for Carthage and besieged his ungrateful fatherland; he was mitigated only by prayers. The great man preferred to occupy and destroy his fatherland rather than, innocent, to pay the penalty of adverse fortune together with so many brave citizens.

There are, moreover, two ways in which offense is committed in these matters: when a prince admits excessive honors or contemns the other leading men. By that arrogance Caesar alienated his once most friendly and faithful soldiers and armed the leading men for his own destruction. Suetonius, in Julius, chapter 76 and those following:

"Yet his other deeds and sayings outweigh these, so that he is judged both to have abused domination and to have been slain rightfully. For he not only received excessive honors, such as a continuous consulship, perpetual dictatorship, and prefecture of morals, besides the praenomen Imperator, the surname Father of the Fatherland, a statue among those of the kings, and an elevated seat in the orchestra; he also allowed greater honors than were fitting to human eminence to be decreed to him: a golden seat in the senate-house and before the tribunal, a ceremonial carriage and litter in the procession of the Circus, temples, altars, images beside the gods, a sacred couch, a flamen, Luperci, and the naming of a month from his own name. And he took and gave certain honors according to his own caprice.

"He bore his third and fourth consulships in title only, content with the power of the dictatorship decreed together with the consulships; and in each year he substituted for himself two consuls for the final months, so that in the intervening time he held no elections except those of tribunes and aediles of the plebs. He appointed prefects in place of praetors to administer urban affairs in his absence. On the day before the Kalends of January, when the office of consul had become vacant through the sudden death of the consul, he gave it for a few hours to a man who sought it. With the same license, after despising the custom of his fatherland, he appointed magistrates for several years; he gave consular ornaments to ten men of praetorian rank; and he received into the senate-house men given citizenship and certain men from among the half-barbarous Gauls. Besides this, he placed his personal slaves over the mint and public revenues. He entrusted the care of three legions which he was leaving at Alexandria to the son of his freedman Rufinus, his own catamite.

"Chapter 77. He publicly uttered sayings of no less unrestrained power, as Titus Ampius writes: that the state was nothing, merely a name without body and form; that Sulla did not know his letters, since he had laid down the dictatorship; that men ought now to speak more considerately with him and to regard what he said as laws. And he advanced to so great a degree of arrogance that, when a soothsayer once pronounced the entrails sorrowful and without a heart, he said that they would be more favorable when he wished, and that it ought not to be taken as a portent if a beast lacked a heart.

"Chapter 78. But he especially aroused against himself the chief and inexpiable odium from this. When all the Conscript Fathers approached him with many most honorific decrees, he received them while seated before the temple of Venus Genetrix. Some think that he was held back by Cornelius Balbus when he attempted to rise; others that he did not attempt it at all, but even looked with a less friendly countenance upon Gaius Trebatius when he admonished him to rise. And this deed of his was regarded as all the more intolerable because, when he himself was triumphing and passing by the tribunician benches, he had been so indignant that one man from the college, Pontius Aquila, did not rise for him that he cried out: 'Then reclaim the state from me, Aquila, as tribune!' Nor for continuous days did he cease promising anything to anyone except with the reservation, 'If, however, Pontius Aquila permits it.'

"Chapter 79. He added to so signal an insult in despising the Senate a deed much more arrogant. For when, as he returned from the Latin sacrifices amid modest and novel acclamations of the people, a certain man from the crowd had placed upon his statue a laurel crown bound with a white fillet, and the tribunes of the plebs Epidius Marullus and Caesetius Flavus had ordered the fillet to be pulled from the crown and the man led into chains, grieving either that the mention of kingship had been moved with too little success or--as he claimed--that the glory of refusing it had been wrested from him, he severely rebuked the tribunes and deprived them of their power. From that time he was unable to cast off the infamy even of having aspired to the royal name, although he both answered the plebs when it saluted him as king that he was Caesar, not king, and at the Lupercalia, before the rostra, repeatedly repelled from his head the diadem offered by the consul Antony and sent it to the Capitol, to Jupiter Best and Greatest.

"Indeed, a varied report also spread abroad that he was about to migrate to Alexandria or Ilium, transferring there at the same time the resources of the empire, exhausting Italy by levies, and entrusting the administration of the city to friends. At the next meeting of the Senate a report spread that Lucius Cotta, one of the Board of Fifteen, was about to declare the opinion that, since it was contained in the books of fate that the Parthians could not be conquered except by a king, Caesar should be called king."

These things seemed intolerable in a new and raw servitude; afterwards they began to be regarded as virtues. There would assuredly be no end if I were to recount examples of brave men who, indignant at contempt of themselves, excited civic movements. Coriolanus, Belisarius, Narses, and others are witnesses. Victor Pisani indeed, when he had been cast into chains by the Venetian Senate and freed by the plebs, was admonished by a distinguished man to avenge the injury; he struck him with a slap and added a declaration greater than all his deeds: "Have I ever contemned the decrees of my fatherland?" But so great a virtue is rare; and if it exists elsewhere, nevertheless the fatherland cannot or ought not trust that it exists, because it can also easily be changed.

[Printed page 725]

§ 12. Many princes have been overthrown because of threats, as I taught above concerning Aurelian. Therefore a magistrate ought not readily to threaten unless it is so that an offense may be avoided; for he exposes himself to the most certain danger. If a prince threatens someone with death, that man considers either fleeing or causing death, and he labors so that the prince rather than he himself may perish. I do not doubt that this pertains to fear. Yet because threats produce the most powerful and violent fear, are very easily carried abroad among the common people, and are augmented, one must abstain altogether from threats.

[Printed page 726]

It is safer to have killed a guilty man than to threaten him with death. For threats are either those of a powerful man, which you cannot escape, and thus they are premature; or those of a weak man, and thus they are vain. In either manner they render execution more difficult. If the one threatening is powerful, his atrocity is odious; if weak, his authority is nothing. He who threatens admonishes his enemy; he does not harm him. For it is easiest for him to inflict upon you the evil which you threatened against another.

I add this also: the man against whom you have threatened evil appears to have an authorized cause to defend himself and to prepare himself for defense as though war had been declared. How imprudent was the declaration of the Roman emperor who was then a tribune with military power: “Evil to my soldiers unless they remain quiet!” For, inflamed by this word, they committed slaughter. He who threatens appears to be carried away by passion and anger and to judge when he has not yet taken cognizance of the matter.

§ 13. Opposing magistracies in the state must be guarded against. Thus the Romans acted most ignorantly when they gave tribunes to the plebs, a perpetual nursery of all seditions; they would have acted much more wisely had they created one of the consuls from the plebs. For the tribunes of the plebs first drove them to such a point that they were compelled to elect military tribunes with consular power; next they extorted intermarriage, thirdly one of the consulships, at last both, and finally the censorship, the dictatorship, and everything. Thus it befell the Romans that they perished through Δημαγωγούς, demagogues, and their own tribunes, something which Aristotle relates to have befallen many peoples in Book V, chapter 5.

“Democracies, therefore, are changed chiefly because of the petty wantonness of the tribunes. For in part, by burdening the wealthy with calumnies, they cause them to come together and conspire--for common fear reconciles and joins even the most hostile--and in part by collectively inciting the multitude against them. One may see that this has occurred thus in many cases. For at Rhodes also the democracy was changed when wicked demagogues arose within it. The nobles came together; for the popular haranguers furnished pay to the soldiers and forbade the commanders of the triremes to pay it out. But those commanders, compelled by fear of grave judicial proceedings--which they were to undergo if they did not sail according to law--formed an association and overthrew the power of the people.

“At Heraclea also the power of the people was broken and scattered immediately after a colony had been sent there by the Athenians, through the fault of popular and frivolous demagogues. For when the nobles were injured by them, they were compelled to depart from the city; then those who had been cast out, after assembling and gathering their forces into one body, returned from exile into the city and removed the democracy.

“Likewise the democracy which existed at Megara was dissolved and convulsed. For the demagogues, in order that they might confiscate the goods of private persons, banished many nobles from the city, until they had made a great number of exiles. But the latter, desiring to return from exile into the city, joined battle, overcame the people, and made an oligarchy from the democracy. The same thing, moreover, also happened at Cumae; in that city Thrasymachus utterly destroyed the democracy.

"And in almost all other cities, if anyone wishes to observe and consider them, he may see that the conversions and changes of states take place in this same manner. For sometimes, in order to enter into favor with the people, by inflicting injuries upon the nobles they impel them to make agreements and associations--whether they divide their goods among the people by agrarian laws and introduce an equalization of possessions, or exhaust them with taxes and the discharge of public burdens. Sometimes, by bringing them to judgment on false charges and summoning odium against them, they seek to confiscate the fortunes and resources of the rich. In ancient times also, when the same man became demagogue and commander, democracy was turned into tyranny; for almost all the ancient tyrants were made from demagogues."

§ 14. Very many men have also lost dominions when they admitted foreigners into the city. Aristotle, Book V, chapter 3: "That which is not of the same nation and stock also has force to excite sedition, until it has come to agreement and conspired together. For just as a city is not made from any multitude offered by chance, so neither is it made at any time whatever. Therefore those who received resident aliens or newcomers into a city have almost all, or certainly very many, struggled with seditions.

"For example, when Achaeans dwelt with the Troezenians at Sybaris, the Achaeans, having thereafter increased in number, cast out the Troezenians. Hence arose the Sybaritic pollution. At Thurii, when the Sybarites unjustly injured the peoples dwelling together with them and received into the city, and claimed the greater part of the territory as their own and indeed all superior things for themselves, they were driven out. When the Byzantines discovered that newcomers were plotting against them and caught them manifestly, as if in the very act of theft, they joined battle, conquered them, and banished them. When the Antissaeans perceived that the exiles of Chios whom they had received into the city were attempting revolution, they joined battle and cast them out. When the Zanclaeans received the Samians into their city, they themselves were conquered and expelled by them. When the Apolloniates who dwell upon the Euxine Sea invited certain newcomers, they excited sedition among themselves. After the tyrants had been driven out, the Syracusans, having made foreigners and mercenary soldiers citizens, dissented and disagreed among themselves and joined battle. And when the Amphipolitans received colonists from Chalcis, most of them were cast out by these men."

The Romans therefore prudently ordered the Gauls who had crossed the Alps without injury to withdraw. The Gauls plead their cause in Livy, Book XXXIX: "They had been compelled by the excessive multitude in Gaul, want of land, and poverty to cross the Alps in search of a dwelling place, and had settled without injury to anyone in places which they saw uncultivated through solitude. They had also begun to build a town, which was an indication that they had come to bring violence neither upon any territory nor upon any city. Marcus Claudius had recently been sent to them with the message that he would wage war with them unless they surrendered; preferring a certain, although inglorious, peace to uncertain war, they had first committed themselves to the good faith, then to the power, of the Roman people. A few days afterwards they were ordered to depart from both territory and town; they had intended to depart quietly to whatever place in the world they could. Then their arms, and lastly all the other things which they carried and drove, were taken from them. They begged the Senate and People of Rome not to rage more bitterly against harmless men who had surrendered than against enemies." The Roman people returned their arms and ordered them to depart.

Nations do not easily grow together unless they are gradually rendered similar by marriage, dress, and language. The Bebryces admitted the Phocaeans into the city. When the latter flourished in arms and resources, their hosts began to envy them and considered removing them from the midst. When this became known, the Phocaeans killed the Bebryces, conquered by a notable stratagem, and alone possessed the city.

Would that those who first called the barbarians into the empire and gave them lands had done this, and likewise those who afterwards let the Turks into Europe. And now also, while I write these things, what else are those men doing who, after gathering auxiliaries of foreigners from every quarter, rebel against the emperor Ferdinand--and do so in the sight of the Turks, aided even by a friend and vassal of the Turks--than bringing the tyrant into possession of Germany? But the sins of those who are perishing produce these discords of princes; and nevertheless those same discords will be quieted by the servitude or destruction of the princes.

§ 15. Arms given to the people for defense easily overthrow the state unless it is administered cautiously. Therefore they must be permitted not to all but to certain selected persons. When the rebels of Aachen had been armed, they expelled the Senate. This once befell many cities of the empire; indeed--

[Printed page 727]

--even countrymen sometimes took up arms. Justinian's Novel 85, under the title Concerning Arms, must therefore be restored to force:

"Always invoking our great God and Savior Jesus Christ and his aid, we are zealous to guard unharmed and without calumny all our subjects, whose government God has entrusted to us, and to restrain wars which they, undertaking them according to their own judgment against one another, carry on to their sorrow, thereby bringing a double punishment upon themselves: both that which they inflict upon themselves and that which they suffer from the laws punishing their madness.

"Chapter 1. Wishing, therefore, to free men from movements of this kind, we have provided that no private person engage in the work of manufacturing arms, but that only those make arms who are appointed in public armories or who are called fabricenses; and that those who manufacture arms sell them to no private person. Nor do we permit those armorers who are enrolled in the military units--whom they also call deputati and who receive rations from the fisc--to manufacture or sell arms to anyone, but only to exercise care over the arms of the soldiers enrolled in the unit in which they serve. If, however, they make anything new, it shall be taken away from them and brought into our sacred arsenal, to be added there to the public arms deposited within it.

"Chapter 2. We wish those who are in the orders of ballista-makers, whom we have stationed throughout various cities, to observe this also. We ordain and decree that they make arms in such a way that they themselves repair and renew only the public arms deposited in the public arsenals of each city. If any of them fashion any new weapon, they shall likewise furnish this among the public arms and shall sell it to absolutely no other person.

"Those appointed over the ballista-makers shall also guard this, at the peril of the fathers of the cities under whom we have stationed the ballista-makers themselves and established the care and custody of the public arsenals. Thus, if either the deputati or the fabricenses are seen selling arms, the judges in the localities shall take care to subject them to punishments and, in addition, to take the arms without payment from those who purchase them and claim them for the public.

"Chapter 3. Therefore, with God governing this counsel of ours, by the present law we decree that in no city or province of our state shall private persons or anyone else have license to make or sell arms, or to purchase them by any means whatever; rather, those alone who are enrolled among the fabricenses shall fashion them and convey them to our sacred arsenal. We decree that this be guarded by Your Highness and by those who shall receive the girdle after you.

"We appoint certain chartularies who are established under Your Highness in the bureau of the fabricenses, at the peril of the five chief men among them, men possessing a good reputation and fit for the task. Seeking out those who make arms in this most fortunate city and in the other cities of our state, they shall prohibit private persons or any others besides those who are appointed among the fabricenses from conducting the business of manufacturing arms; and in whatever places they discover private persons daring this, they shall cause these arms to be brought forward and applied to the arsenal of the fisc.

"If, however, they are able to find among private laborers artisans fit for the work, they may, if they wish, establish these men in the service, enter their names in a register, and send us the register of artisans, so that by our sacred rescript they may be stationed in those places in which there are public manufactories, and so that, while manufacturing arms, they may receive rations from the fisc.

“For when this has been done and has been scrupulously observed by the aforesaid persons, license will be given to absolutely no one--neither to private persons dwelling in cities nor to countrymen inhabiting villages--to use arms against one another, to presume to commit murders, and thereby to kill very many men, while public duties perish because cultivators of the land, fearing to lose their lives, resort to flight.

“Therefore those who are directed by Your Highness from the aforesaid bureau of the fabricenses to prohibit private makers of arms must receive a sworn declaration also from the local judges and the offices subject to them, and from the defenders and fathers of the cities, that henceforth they will have no power to do anything among those things forbidden by us, but will guard the things decreed by the present law, fearing a punishment both in money and upon the head itself.

“For we decree that the negligent judge of great Alexandria shall pay a penalty of twenty pounds of gold for the things decreed by us, shall fall from the girdle of office, and that his office shall likewise pay a penalty of twenty pounds of gold and undergo capital punishment. The judges of the other provinces, however, shall sustain a loss of ten pounds of gold; they and their offices shall likewise be subject to loss of the girdle. The defenders and fathers of cities shall be fined a penalty of three pounds of gold and shall sustain peril to their heads if, upon discovering any such deed, they do not punish it, or do not report those wishing to do it, but permit it to remain concealed.

“Chapter 4. So that the things which we have forbidden to be done by private persons and certain others besides those who are enrolled among our sacred fabricenses, or the arms forbidden to be sold to private persons, may be manifest, we have taken care that this also be signified through the present law. For we prohibit private persons from manufacturing and buying bows and arrows, broadswords and swords which they are accustomed to call semispathia, and those which are called zabae or cuirasses, and pikes and lances made in any manner or shape whatever, and those called monocopia among the Isaurians, and the things called sitinnes or missiles, and, in addition, aspides or shields, and galeae or helmets. For we permit none other to fashion these things besides those who are appointed among our sacred fabricenses. We permit only smaller knives, which no one uses in battles, to be made and sold by private persons and to private persons. Therefore Your Highness shall promulgate the present general law in this royal city and also throughout the other cities of our state, so that all, recognizing what has pleased us, may observe it.”

The kingdom is finally done for when things that are crimes are called remedies by cunning men and are judged necessary, as Antonio de Leyva was accustomed to boast.

Those, moreover, who must be trained are better trained with public arms, as was done among the Romans.

CHAPTER IX

The Causes of Seditions Arising from Subjects

[Printed page 727]

§ 1. The origin of seditions, just as that of diseases arises from the constitution of the body, so arises from the extent of the empire and its diverse parts. Augustine, Book XIX, The City of God, chapter 7: “Although enemies are lacking, nevertheless the very breadth of the empire has produced wars of a worse kind, namely allied and civil wars, by which the human race is shaken more miserably, whether war is waged so that at some time men may come to rest, or whether it is feared that they will rise again.”

Discords of the people therefore frequently arise from no cause, but only from the wickedness and wantonness of the people and of those who lead the people. Of this kind were the seditions of the Israelite people in the desert, directed against Moses and Aaron and against God himself. For what was more equitable and benign than Moses? What was more propitious than God, who overwhelmed the ingratitude of the rebels with daily miracles and benefits? Nor was there any cause of sedition in Samuel, and yet those who rose up rejected him and sought a king. What moved the madmen to follow Absalom and then Sheba as leaders and to bring impious arms against David? I can think of nothing other than the successful wars of the holy king and the spoils of neighboring nations, and thence the luxury which had engulfed very many. Hence Absalom was more suited than David to the vices of the people, and Sheba, as a man of Belial, subject to and a patron of every most shameful man, would permit everything.

[Printed page 728]

To this class I refer the most foolish spectacles on account of which frequent seditions were raised. Actors and pantomimes were expelled from Italy by Nero because various factions arose on their account, to such a degree that soldiers had to be stationed at the theater to restrain the quarrels of their supporters. Thus says Suetonius. Nerva restored them badly; Trajan again removed them well.

God often, on account of the sins of peoples, does not preserve the state even when the prince is excellent.

The Romans rose against Leo III without cause and occasion; the Venetians against Vitalis Michael, alleging that a plague had invaded the city after the fleet had returned; the Bolognese against their own magistrates and Neapolio the legate. Thus seditions frequently arise for which there is no cause in the rulers and no pretext of a cause at all.

§ 2. The cause of Sheba's war, indeed, was faction and envy, because the tribe of Judah had brought the king back while the others were not present. “Why,” they say in 2 Kings, chapter 19, “have our brethren the men of Judah stolen you and brought the king and his household across the Jordan, and all the men of David with him?” And: “I am greater by ten parts in the king, and David belongs more to me than to you. Why have you done me an injury, and why was it not first reported to me that I might bring my king back?” But the men of Judah answered the children of Israel more harshly. What is here other than pure love for the king? And yet see the changeable disposition of the people. In chapter 20, Sheba son of Bochri sounded the trumpet and said: “We have no portion in David, nor inheritance in the son of Jesse. Return to your tents, Israel.” And all Israel separated itself from David and followed Sheba son of Bochri. So easily does contentious envy change men's minds. The part that had been slighted at once attaches itself, not to some noble and brave leader, but to Sheba son of Bochri, a man of Belial. They therefore envied the tribe of Judah--whose perpetual kingdom had been promised--its good fortune, and through the contagion of one man they go mad; for when he had been slain, all came to rest.

The malicious common people, indeed, always behold the good fortune of the nobles with sidelong eyes and, when they can, oppose it. That rust sucks the state dry, and no one can break and lay it low; then it hands the bloodless state over to its enemies to be torn apart.

Such was that famous sedition of the peasants in England: for they complained not so much that they were oppressed as that they were not equal to the nobles. In the year 1381 the men of Kent refused every yoke and said that the nobles must be removed from their midst. They said that all had been born without distinction from the same Adam and that all were equal. And so, after taking up arms, the faction killed many of the magistrates and nobles, plundered their goods, and compelled the king to accept unjust conditions, until at length its authors were punished. Of this kind were the assemblies of the Athenians when they punished with exile illustrious and eminently deserving men.

§ 3. Another customary cause of seditions is when powerful men have consumed their patrimonies. Aristotle most wisely noted this cause in Book V of the Politics, chapter 6: "Changes also occur in oligarchies when a few powerful men who govern the state have consumed their family property by living intemperately. For such men are eager for revolution and either themselves seize a tyranny or prepare another man as tyrant: in this manner Hipparinus prepared Dionysius at Syracuse, and at Amphipolis a certain man whose name was Cleobinus brought the Chalcidian settlers into the city; and when they had come, he rendered them hostile to the wealthy and incited them against them. And at Aegina, the man who conducted that business which concerned Chares attempted to change the form of administering the state for such a cause."

Sometimes, therefore, they attempt to move and innovate something; sometimes they steal public money, from which either they disagree and quarrel among themselves or those who oppose and resist these men as they plunder the state do so--something which happened at Apollonia, I mean the city in Pontus. There is no need to recount modern examples after these ancient ones: those whose resources at home are bad or nonexistent, while their hope is far richer, are seditious. They seek abroad the means of living. In general it is accustomed to happen thus: they attempt to soothe their own evils by the common destruction. They are cheerful in disturbed affairs because some hope shines upon them; in peace their own troubles oppress them. Hence they prefer tumult and uncertain dangers to the certain evils of their own household.

Let the magistrate therefore hold it certain that there are as many enemies in the state as there are men who have ruined their property through wickedness and lust. Julius needed a royal fortune merely in order to have nothing, for he had poured everything out in largesses. There are Catilines and Cethegi for whom the disgraces of poverty arising from luxury are an incitement to crime. Demades, an Athenian orator, formerly very wealthy, was at length expelled from the state as a poor man, having been accused of falsehood seven times. But there is no need to seek foreign examples: the histories exhibit Curio, Milo, and the other wretched disturbers, and especially Julius Caesar and Antony the triumvir.

§ 4. The state is also overthrown when matters gradually reach the point that the power of the magistrate is diminished and those whom the laws command to obey are more powerful. For they do not obey the command unless it pleases their mind. Hence the Roman Empire is rendered weak when there are two or three princes who, if they oppose the emperor, would without doubt bring great difficulties upon the state. The cause is that power without strength is despised.

Thus, Aristotle testifies, the state of the Thebans was changed because there were more and better and stronger men who were not admitted to the administration of the state. The same thing happened to the Megarians, the Syracusans, and the Rhodians. Nor did anything else destroy the empire of Constantinople than princes dissenting from the emperor and possessing such power that he could not reduce them to concord. For in this way it happens that the power of the rich is such as utterly removes the vigor of the magistrate; and in a great empire the power of princes does the same.

Indeed, magistrates elected by lot and commoners destroyed the state of the Athenians. For it is shameful that those should be elected to command others whose relatives, parents, and children no one would dare to name because of shame. Hence noble men endowed with a great spirit, through contempt for base rulers who are mocked even by the common people, can easily conspire and transfer the power to themselves.

§ 5. Dissimilarity also can easily stir up seditions, as when different nations are under one king and some cannot endure the others. Aristotle records that this happened at Clazomenae and Athens. In our own time also we have frequently seen armies collected from various nations mutiny among themselves. We have also seen most illustrious cities agitated by the seditions of admitted foreigners. At Aachen especially the Belgian settlers, who had left their homeland because of errors and rebellion and were already practiced in civil evils, caused disturbance and expelled the Catholics. They did the same at Wesel and Bremen after the Lutherans had been reduced to order.

[Printed page 729]

In former times there was greater danger from this circumstance, when colonies were sometimes led out from different peoples, especially if they were mingled with the old citizens. Thus we frequently read that the beginning of slaughter occurred in colonies. Diversity of regions, however, has more force toward discord than diversity of nations.

§ 6. But if we regard the matter itself, the same cause of seditions arises from the people as from rulers, since, just as men possess the same nature, so also their vices have an affinity. Florus admits this concerning his own Rome in Book V, chapter 12: “For what other thing produced civil madnesses than excessive prosperity? Conquered Syria first corrupted us, and soon thereafter the inheritance of the king of Pergamum in Asia. Those resources and riches ruined the morals of the age, and cast the state, drowned as in a sewer by its own vices, into destruction. For whence would the Roman people have demanded lands and provisions from the tribunes, unless through the hunger which luxury had made? Hence, therefore, the first and second Gracchan seditions and that third, the Appuleian.

“Why was the equestrian order commanded by the Senate to rule through the judicial laws, unless from avarice, so that the revenues of the state and the very courts might be held for profit? Hence again citizenship was promised to Latium, and through this came the arms of the allies. But what of the servile wars? Whence did they come to us, unless from the abundance of households? Whence came armies of gladiators against their own masters, unless lavish largesse, when it indulges the favor of the plebs with spectacles, makes an art of what were once punishments of enemies?

“Now, that we may touch upon the more specious vices, was not canvassing for honors incited by the same riches? Yet thence came the Marian, thence the Sullan tempest. Or did not the magnificent provision of banquets and costly largesse arise from opulence, soon to produce poverty? This drove Catiline to become an enemy of his own fatherland. Finally, whence did that very desire for principate and domination come, unless from excessive wealth? Yet this armed Caesar and Pompey with the torches of the Furies for the destruction of the state. Therefore we shall pursue in order all these domestic disturbances of the Roman people, separately from external and lawful wars.”

All these things are assisted and intensified when they rage among the people: both because they are spread abroad among very many and because the people do not readily resist vices. There is more spirit than counsel in them; they are unstable and change their opinions as the breeze changes storms. They are desirous of movements and changes because there are many agents among them, many who desire revolution. For just as every land is welcome to sailors suffering from hunger and thirst, so every change seems likely to bring something better to poor, restless, afflicted men. This is Plato's oracle in the Axiochus: “The people are ungrateful, easily wearied of things, changeable, cruel, envious, unlearned, since they are collected from the dregs of the plebs and from violent impostors. They regard as honorable that which is praised by the majority.”

§ 7. The greatest and almost incurable kind of sedition is that which arises from superstition. For its principle arises from the innermost mind and drives men to every deed, lawful and unlawful, nor does it cease so long as superstitions occupy their minds. It is pleasing in this place to repeat the warning which Justus Lipsius, a most illustrious man and the great glory of our age, gives in his book Against the Dialogist. His words are these: "Therefore I warn you princes earnestly: beware. From nothing does greater danger come to empires and scepters than from an innovated or deceitfully simulated religion. For such men move especially the minds of the plebs and under the appearance of piety impel them where they wish.

"Shall I give examples? Behold these few. Eunus formerly lived in Sicily as a slave (Florus, Book III, chapter 9, and Diodorus Siculus in the Fragments); after feigning fanatical madness, while he tossed about the hair of the Syrian goddess, he stirred slaves to liberty and arms as if by command of the gods. Having gathered an army of more than sixty thousand, and openly bearing himself as king, he had subdued all Sicily, had Roman arms not with difficulty restrained him.

"What of that Egyptian false prophet under Claudius, who in Judaea (Josephus, Book II of the Jewish War, chapter 12), through this very appearance of piety, attached to himself as many as thirty thousand men? With them he sought Jerusalem, intending to possess that citadel and seat of kingship, had he not been met by the governor Florus and defeated and slain in battle.

"Was not the deed of that Maricus under Vitellius very similar? He, the 'liberator of the Gauls and god'--for he had given himself that name--after stirring up eight thousand men, was drawing the nearest villages of the Aedui with him and was himself about to dare greater things, when the fanatical multitude was crushed or scattered by picked soldiers.

"What of Elmaheli in Africa? He, as Johannes Leo relates in Book II, having won over the people by a marvelous reputation for holiness, openly brought war upon his own king, the king of the Moroccans--Abraham then held that office--defeated him in battle, and deprived him of kingdom and life.

"A different impious man in the same Africa--called Chemen Mennal--practiced a fraud and met a fate not unlike his (the same Leo, Book III). He stirred against the king of Fez a people enticed by the vanity of rites and religion, forbade tribute to be paid, and finally drove the king by open force to the point that by agreement he handed over to him the kingdom of Tlemcen.

"Among the Turks themselves, as the Turkish annals relate, were affairs not stirred several times under this pretext? There was a certain Schaecoculis, a man of simulated holiness, who for this purpose generally dwelt in solitary places; the Turkish prince Bayezid himself, from veneration for his piety, was accustomed to send him annual little gifts in his cave. When the time seemed ripe, after seven years he came forth, disseminated a new sect, and found patrons and followers. With these he invaded and plundered several cities of Asia and defeated the pasha of Anatolia himself in a regular battle. Indeed, a little afterward he also defeated Corcut, son of Bayezid, and soon Ali Pasha, who came against him with strong and veteran forces.

"Why say more? He had brought the Turkish state into the greatest danger when it seemed good to him to turn toward the borders of the Persians, whose king belonged to that same sect. For this is the sect of the Sophilarians, which even now is a chief cause of war between those two peoples. But when on the journey his soldiers attacked and plundered a certain Persian caravan--for thus they call a company of travelers--and killed most of the travelers, Ismael Sophi, king of the Persians, bore it so ill that he immediately exposed the man himself and all his commanders to his guards to be slaughtered, while the rest of the multitude was adjudged and distributed into servitude. This just Nemesis overtook that scoundrel.

"In the same Asia, very recently under Prince Suleiman, as the Turkish annals relate, a certain Calender Zelebis rose up to make a revolution, covered with this very veil of piety. With some number of dervishes he routed several sanjaks and called all Anatolia to arms. But Ibrahim Pasha, sent under the authority and auspices of Suleiman, destroyed him and his faction after a battle of uncertain issue.

"What of the island of Crete--for we must come to ridiculous matters? How wickedly and dangerously did a certain Jew impose upon his own people under the emperor Theodosius, as Socrates relates in Book VII of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 37? He pretended that he was present as a new Moses, sent from heaven to rescue them from long servitude. He therefore went about from town to town and exhorted them to leave wealth and friends and to follow him into that land of promise; and he added, after the example of the ancient Moses, that he would lead them across the sea itself. They believe him; they assemble; an immense multitude, every age and every sex, proceeds to the promontory under his leadership; they set out for the blessed land. He orders them to leap down, and this was done by very many with insane confidence. They were immediately drowned, with only a few of them caught up by fishing boats.

[Printed page 730]

"The chief author of the crime appeared nowhere, whether he was a man or an evil spirit in human appearance. Finally, were there not such monsters in our own age or that of our fathers? That famous John of Leiden, the welt and stain of his city, a tailor by trade, dreamed of kingdoms and scepters and would have attained them after the city of Münster had been captured, had not the princes of the empire besieged and recovered it with a powerful army and visited him and his followers with condign punishments. Thus I may rightly conclude these things with Livy's saying in Book XXXIX: 'Nothing is more deceptive in appearance than corrupt religion, when the divine power of the gods is put forward as a pretext for crimes.' But if you seek the madnesses of religions and superstitions, read the histories of our age: you will understand that nothing is more efficacious for tumult, slaughters, and tortures."

[Printed page 730]

§ 8. Guilds and associations also are frequently accustomed to be the seeds of discord, when, not as members of the whole state but as certain independent cities inserted into a great city, they arrogate to themselves more power than is expedient for the common good. Hence ἑταιρίαι ("associations") and assemblies are prohibited in the laws of the empire, and on this occasion persecution sometimes raged against the churches of the Christians.

Augustus, as Suetonius is our authority, abolished all guilds except the ancient ones. All, that is, except the ancient ones; for those established by Numa remained, as Plutarch is our authority. The various artisans had been distributed into groups, as is accustomed to happen now in cities. There was one law common to all: "That associates who possess the right of assembling shall have power to establish for themselves whatever compact they wish, provided that it does not impair anything in the public law."

This law must especially be maintained, and all associations must be judged unlawful which have not united under the authority of the magistrate; they must therefore be dissolved, as Marcian laid down. But when others too are rendered suspect in any manner whatever, they must immediately be prohibited, as was done in Italy to the guilds of the Pythagorean philosophers. Yet in former times these men were dealt with barbarously: by a public judgment the philosophers were burned together with their schools--unless perhaps most of them were magicians, which indeed seems probable to me.

Guilds, therefore, must be governed by laws so that they may serve the public good; or, if anything is done privately against the public good, the law of Marcian, Digest 47, title 22, must be observed: "Provincial governors are instructed by imperial mandates not to permit guilds or associations to exist, nor soldiers to have guilds in the camps. But men of slender means are permitted to contribute a monthly payment, provided, however, that they assemble only once in a month, lest under the pretext of this sort an unlawful guild assemble. The deified Severus also declared by rescript that this has place not only in the city but also in Italy and the provinces. They are not, however, prohibited from assembling for the sake of religion, provided that by this means nothing is done contrary to the senatus consultum by which unlawful guilds are restrained.

"It is not lawful, however, to belong to more than one lawful guild, as was established both by the Deified Brothers; and if anyone shall belong to two, it was declared by rescript that he ought to choose in which one he prefers to be, and that from the guild which he leaves he shall receive that which belongs to him by reason of the property that was held in common. A penalty has been established: whoever assumes an unlawful guild is held by the penalty by which those are held who have been judged to have occupied public places or temples with armed men.

"Concerning guilds not specially authorized the law is: If any guilds shall be unlawful by mandates, constitutions, and senatus consulta, they are dissolved; but when they are dissolved they are permitted to divide the common funds, if they have any, and to distribute the money among themselves. In sum, unless a guild or any such body has assembled by authority of a senatus consultum or of Caesar, its members hold a guild contrary to the senatus consultum, the mandates, and the constitutions."

§ 9. No war in Greece was more destructive than the Peloponnesian War. It was civil; the victors over the Persians contended among themselves; it lasted twenty-seven years; many cities were destroyed, all were made mournful by slaughters, fields were ravaged by flame and sword, and the destruction of Athens was deliberated. But what was the cause of the war? The Megarians had burned a grove. Moved by this deed, the Athenians barred the Megarians from their own harbor and from Attica. The Megarians refer the matter to the Spartans; the Spartans desire the law to be repealed. Pericles admits that the cause is of no great importance, but says that liberty is at stake and the patience of Athens is being tested. For if they accept the command now, it must thereafter be endured. He persuaded them of this not only as the greatest orator but also as a trusted counselor. For in truth the Lacedaemonians were threatening the liberty of all, and the other cities sought dominion, for which reason they also destroyed them all.

§ 10. A most slight sedition in Otho's time is famous, arising from an inconvenient distribution of arms. Tacitus, Book I of the Histories, recounts it in this manner: "A sedition which under Otho arose from a small beginning, from which nothing was feared, nearly proved the destruction of the city. Otho had ordered the Seventeenth Cohort to be summoned into the city from the colony of Ostia. The care of arming it was given to Varius Crispinus, a tribune of the praetorians. The more freely to execute his orders while the camp was quiet, at the beginning of night he ordered the wagons of the cohort to be loaded after the armory had been opened.

"The time became a ground of suspicion, the reason an accusation, and the pursuit of quiet grew into tumult. The sight of arms among the drunken stirred a desire for them. The soldiers roar and accuse the tribunes and centurions of treason, as though the households of senators were being armed for the destruction of Otho. Some were ignorant and heavy with wine; every worst man sought an occasion for plunder; the common people, as is customary, desired any novel disturbance; and night had removed the obedience of the better men.

"They cut down the tribune who resisted the sedition and a most rigorous centurion; the arms are seized, swords drawn, and, mounted upon horses, they seek the city and palace. Otho was holding a crowded banquet; he himself fears and is feared by his guests. Magistrates and old men and women scatter through the darkness and seek uncertain hiding places by diverse routes through the city. The onset of the soldiers was not restrained even by the doors of the palace from breaking into the banquet, while they demanded that Otho be shown to them. Julius Martialis the tribune and Vitellius Saturninus the prefect of the legion were wounded while they resisted those rushing in. On all sides were arms and threats, now against the centurions and tribunes, now against the entire Senate, their minds frenzied by blind fear; and because they could designate no one man for their anger, they demanded license against all, until Otho, standing upon the banquet couch contrary to the dignity of imperial command, with prayers and tears restrained them with difficulty. They returned to camp unwillingly."

Otho did this in a sedition most dangerous to the city of Rome: after the first disturbance he entered the camp of the mutineers, calmed or rebuked the soldiers with a gentle speech, and ordered that punishment be taken upon no more than two, who were corrupt and drunken. This measure of severity was gratefully received, and for the present the soldiers who could not be restrained were pacified.

§ 11. Ill-considered liberality of princes also frequently gives cause for discords. For when something is given to one man which another contends is his own, the disputes grow to such a point that not even the giver can quiet them. Thus it happened in the Low Countries in the year 1007. Baldwin the Bearded, count of Flanders, after many services to the emperor Henry II and after winning his favor, obtained from him as a gift Walcheren together with the other islands of Zeeland--and at the same time the material of discord, quarrels, and wars between the Flemings and Hollanders. These were so bitter and protracted that at intervals they lasted for the space of four hundred years, the Hollanders referring their right and the liberal donation to Emperor Louis, son of Louis the Pious, while the Flemings in no way yielded because of Henry's more recent donation.

[Printed page 731]

§ 12. It also seems difficult to me to preserve liberty where there is indeed one duke, but one whose power is small and, as it were, held on sufferance, whom, while they elect him for the sake of honor, they guard as if suspect, so that neither they themselves nor the duke appears safe. Marino Faliero, elected duke by the Venetians, resolved to destroy the Senate; and had the affair not been revealed through accomplices, he would have perpetrated the crime. Baiamonte Tiepolo had also undertaken to do this through treachery and, after a great slaughter had been committed, was finally defeated. Egnatius, Book IV. Hence it is advisable either to elect no duke or such a one as through guards can accomplish nothing throughout his lifetime; for laws are not sufficiently strong to restrain ambition, and the minds of men are insufficiently steadfast.

§ 13. A marvelous contention about empty things is a cause of seditions and war. Gaspard de Coligny judged it a just cause of war that a place more honorable than that of the French envoy had been given to the Spanish envoy before Maximilian. A greater controversy between the Englishman and the Spaniard obstructed serious business in the year 1598. There was a similar quarrel between the Florentine and the man of Ferrara. Opportunities to wage war against the Turk have sometimes escaped through those trifles.

CHAPTER X

A Fuller Discussion of Seditions Arising from Religion, and the Condition of the State and of Religion in the Year 1617

[Printed page 731]

§ 1. A great part of wars, calamities, and seditions arises either from religion or under the pretext of religion; wherefore the matter must be treated at greater length. Although I treated it in my book On the Peace of Germany and in the conclusion to the Jubilee of Jubilees, nevertheless this book demands the same subject for itself here. For I think that posterity will be so eager to know about no other matter as about what was done in our most celebrated age. If anyone desires fuller details, let him consult the Jubilee of Jubilees.

§ 2. There are altogether two kinds of men who judge the affairs of religion. Some, considering the multitude and variety of opinions and their frequent change, utterly despise every religion; nevertheless they procure and read contentious books and disputations, so that they may feed their minds upon the quarrels of others. Having experienced their sneers and mockeries, Sibrandus Lubbertus avenges himself and describes them thus in his preface Against Faustus Socinus:

"The greatest part of men judges perversely concerning the labors and cares which doctors expend in explaining and defending Christian doctrine. For many laugh and scoff at Religion as empty fables and terrors contrived to strike the minds of men. These think that all controversies concerning the dogmas of Christian doctrine are merely disputes about words; and because in their own heart they laugh at every Religion and profess it for no other end than that they may rise in position, they measure the minds of others by their own. They are indignant and rage when they see that there is anyone who refuses to serve their desire and applaud their judgment.

"These men, swollen with worldly glory, complain that the common tranquility is disturbed by diversity of religion, although they themselves are often of so wanton a disposition that they suborn crafty men to forge new dogmas, so that, while pious doctors oppose them, they themselves may take pleasure in these spectacles and render hateful to the people the doctrine which they hate and nevertheless wish to appear to favor. It also happens that, when they intend in their mind to turn everything upside down, they stir up doctrinal disputes, or favor those who stir them up, and prevent the controversies raised in doctrine from being settled or decided by lawful judgment.

"And what is most miserable of all, although they are ignorant of the dogmas of Christian doctrine, they arrogate to themselves supreme judgment concerning them, just as if a blind man could judge rightly concerning colors. Those who are a little more moderate indeed take pleasure in purity of doctrine, but do not think it of such importance that for its sake we ought to undergo such great controversies and contests."

§ 3. These men indeed are impious and abominable to God. The prophet David in Psalm 1:1 calls them לצים, "mockers." They are more pestilential than all heretics; for heretics drive men into one error or more, but these despise every faith and every error and pass entirely into atheism. Thus they are χλευασταί, "reproachers, mockers," as Aquila of Pontus translates it; they are παράνομοι, "transgressors," as the fifth and sixth editions translate it; and ἐπηρέται, "impostors," as Symmachus translates it.

Rabbi David says that לצים are men crafty in knowledge for evil, and cunning, and speaking evil above the sons of men, and placing reproach and evil upon the sons of men. For this reason the ancient translator of the Bible rendered the word "pestilential," when he said: "And he has not sat in the chair of pestilence." So also the Seventy translators: καὶ ἐν καθέδρα λοιμῶν, "and in the chair of pestilential men." Indeed, Symmachus also says in Proverbs 20:1, λοιμὸς ὁ οἶνος, “wine is a pest.” And in Proverbs 9, where our translator renders לֵץ as “mocker,” the Seventy have κακός, “evil”; Symmachus says κἂν λοιμὸς γένῃ, “even if you become a pestilential man.”

Holy Scripture wished in so many ways to restrain mockers, so that it might be firmly established that nothing is more pestilential, especially in the cause of religion, than mockery and contempt. For they violate all the laws of nature, spread their poisons most swiftly, and oppose the truth more than any heretics. There are two causes of this.

§ 4. The first is the difficulty of the matters proposed for belief and their profundity, which is liable to the sneers of the ignorant. The gentiles formerly mocked Jews and Christians when they related the innocent nakedness of the first-created humans, the deceit of the serpent, and the flood of the world; they evaded all these things with sarcasms and blasphemous taunts. When had serpents ceased to speak? With what knife had God cut a rib out of Adam? Hence they wished either their own fables to be believed in the same manner or these things not to be believed. In our religion, how many things have mockers impiously jested against the most holy Trinity, the Incarnation, and the Cross of the LORD?

The other cause is that every true religion has certain laws and ceremonies by which humility of mind and patience are gravely and religiously exercised, and which appear to oppose liberty and human pride, which is most tenacious of its own dignity. Of this kind among the Jews was circumcision, on account of which they were a mockery to the gentiles. By way of insult they were called verpi, Apellae, and recutiti. Hence in Aristophanes, after a little slave had uttered many taunts against an old man, he closes them as if with a crowning flourish and swears that he thinks him Ἀπολίκωτον εἶναι, “to be circumcised.” Among Christians there are more such things, as to be baptized, anointed, to confess, to wash the feet of the saints, and other things which, as they are the power of God to us, so are foolishness to mockers.

[Printed page 732]

Bitter sayings and jokes, however, possess great force to break men's spirits. Hence many Jews who were ashamed of the sign of the covenant drew forward their foreskins, so that in any manner they might withdraw themselves from the impious witticisms of unbelievers.

Among these I also number those who profess a definite religion, but only for the sake of their own advantage; yet another religion, from which they know that their associates differ in the most fundamental way, they sometimes persecute with the greatest hostility and at other times acknowledge as true. Thus Bucer and others formerly acted.

§ 5. The year 1617 gave innumerable examples of τῆς χλευαστικῆς κυβείας, “derisive imposture”; for the subjects of all the jubilee sermons pertain to mockery of Catholics, by which nevertheless the entire Church of the martyrs together with the holy Fathers is treated with insult. But concerning that inconstancy in censuring and praising the same religion, reader, receive two notable demonstrations: Abraham Scultetus of Heidelberg and Matthias Hoe von Hoenegg, the Dresden preacher.

In an epistle to the Most Illustrious Louisa Juliana, widow of the Most Illustrious Frederick IV, Abraham numbers among the Evangelical princes the Most Serene Christian, king of Denmark; the Most Illustrious John George, elector of Saxony; likewise the Most Illustrious John Casimir and John Ernest, dukes of Saxony; likewise the princes of Brunswick and Württemberg and other princes who are Lutherans and would not tolerate Scultetus himself in their dominions. But in his sermon he enumerates many princes who expelled from their dominions that faith which the Dane, the Saxon, and the others profess, and proscribed Lutheran preachers; and on this account he praises GOD and insults the Lutherans.

Matthias Hoe practices altogether the same imposture upon both his prince and his helpers. For in his epistle to the Most Illustrious John George, elector of Saxony, page 2, he speaks thus:

> Ja Ew. Churf. Gn haben vngezweifelt mit ihrem Christ=Löblichsten Exempel veil andern Potentaten/ vnd furnehme Euangelische Stände und ausserhalb dess Römischen Reichs angereitzet/ dass in underscheidenen Könichrichen/

Chur= vnd Furstenthumben/ Landen und Herrschafften/ die Euangelischen eben umb die Zeit/ ihr Jubelfest auch aussgeschrieben/ vnd mit grosser Andacht gehalten haben. Dann so viel nun mit der Zeit Nachrichtung zukommen/ so ist dergleichen geschehen/ in den beyden Königreichen Dennemarck vnd Schweden/ dergleichen ist geschehen in der Chur=Pfaltz/ vnd Brandenburg.

"Yes, Your Electoral Grace, by your most Christian and praiseworthy example, has undoubtedly incited many other potentates and eminent Evangelical Estates within and outside the Roman Empire, so that in various kingdoms, electorates and principalities, lands and lordships, the Evangelicals at the same time also proclaimed their jubilee festival and held it with great devotion. For, so far as reports have now reached us in the course of time, the same occurred in the two kingdoms of Denmark and Sweden; likewise it occurred in the Electoral Palatinate and Brandenburg."

Behold, he calls the Palatine and Brandenburg jubilee Evangelical and says that it was completed with great devotion. Is it so, Matthias? Do you too Calvinize? Does the Calvinian jubilee seem to you Evangelical and devout? If it is so, it is therefore true; if Evangelical, if devout, then yours is false. Or are you one of those concealed Calvinians whom the Saxons fear?

"By no means," you will say. "I hate the Calvinists; I ἴσον ᾄδω σύμπαντι--'sing the same song to everyone'--for in my third sermon, page 15, I placed the Sacramentarians among the fanatics. These are my words":

Hieher gehören insonderheit die Sacramentirer/ Zwinglianer/ vnd Calvinisten. Dieses Geschmeiss/ ihr meine geliebte im Herren/ hat in Warheit grosse Zerrüttung vnd Verwürrung/ hat ein grosses Gestenck in die Hochzeit Gottes gemacht/ vnd der reinen Göttlichen Lehr sich bösslich muthwillich vnd halssstärrig widersetzet.

"To this class belong especially the Sacramentarians, Zwinglians, and Calvinists. This dreg, my beloved in the Lord, has in truth brought great disturbance and confusion, and also a great stench, into the wedding feast of God, and has maliciously, wantonly, and stubbornly opposed itself to pure divine doctrine."

These things indeed you say, and in the same sermon you approve everything whatever Luther said against the Zwinglians. But your cunning and cold words, coming from the same mouth, prove you an impostor and a mocker. The Calvinists celebrate a jubilee; in the court, as a political man, you profess that they do so piously, but in the church you condemn them. If in the Palatinate and the province of Brandenburg they maliciously, wantonly, and stubbornly oppose pure doctrine, then they cannot piously celebrate a jubilee amid so great an evil. It is the supreme degree of malice to glory in malice. These, then, are pests and mockers, one of whom speaks one way in the palace and another in the church.

§ 6. The other kind of men is vehement, harsh, zealous, ruinously in love with its own opinions, and eager to propagate the religion upon which it has fallen. Of this kind today are generally the Lutherans, who defend ubiquity, and the Calvinians whom they call the Rigid; for others generally call these men Zealots. But Sibrandus, in an epistle to the church which is in London, page 2, nevertheless depicts for us such men also among the "Soft" in the Low Countries:

"There are also arrogant and proud men who measure everything by vainglory and empty pomp and honor. When they see that it is reckoned a praise to learned men if they discover something new in other disciplines, they think that it will likewise be praiseworthy for themselves if they can innovate something in sacred Theology. Because they are ignorant of true Theology, they despair of being able to gain glory and a name by explaining or defending orthodox doctrine; yet because they swell with vainglory and burn with desire for praise, they disturb everything in order to become known. They prefer to become renowned by disturbing churches rather than to grow old without glory in the true and orthodox Religion.

"When they perceive that learned men are preferred to them, they are indignant; and because they can surpass those men neither in knowledge, nor piety, nor learning, nor eloquence, nor skill in action, nor any honorable art, they turn themselves to evil arts. They insinuate themselves into the court, so that they may crush, by the assistance and aid of courtiers, those whom they cannot conquer by virtue. And what is most shameful of all, they feign the orthodox religion, display zeal for defending sound doctrine, swear to the received confessions and catechisms, and attest this very oath by the signature of their own hand; and nevertheless with all their strength they attack sound and publicly received doctrine, cunningly instill a depraved and new doctrine into their disciples, denounce orthodox pastors and doctors through calumny, stir the civil magistrates against them, expel them from their seats, and substitute in their place pupils of their own errors, which they have sown."

Religion, therefore, is tossed about between these men, for both parties threaten the pious and orthodox: the zealots press them with quarrels, calumnies, and war; the mockers rejoice inwardly, secure concerning the outcome.

§ 7. I showed in my books On the Peace of Germany that there is a great affinity between religion and political government. For the one draws the other with it and frequently changes it. All are led by religion, but in Germany among many men the ordinance of princes is more venerable than that of God. Hence religion has more frequently been changed in most parts of Germany, even in certain free cities of the empire, which nevertheless, because they do not depend upon the will of one man, are generally more persevering in their resolution than the others. Bremen, Wesel, and some other cities, after greedily drinking in Lutheranism, shortly afterward cast it out in disgust, not without a convulsion of the government and exiles among the leading men. Other cities, to the contrary, after initially professing Zwinglianism--as Memmingen, Lindau, Strasbourg, and Orlamünde--later inclined toward Lutheranism. But of these matters elsewhere and at another time. In order that you may see as if in a synopsis the condition of the princes with respect to religion, understand it thus: all the kings and princes of Europe, if you except the Turk, profess either the ancient faith, the Lutheran, or that which they call Reformed, whose leading standard-bearers were Carlstadt, Zwingli, and Calvin. Abraham Scultetus enumerates the Evangelical kings and princes in the following manner in his epistle to the Most Illustrious widow Louisa Juliana.

[Printed page 733]

§ 8. At Heidelberg, 11 November 1617, at which time the following Evangelical kings, electors, princes, and magnates were alive and retained their dominion:

James, king of Great Britain.

Christian IV, king of Denmark.

Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden.

Frederick V, count palatine of the Rhine, duke of Bavaria, elector.

John George, duke of Saxony, elector.

John Sigismund, margrave of Brandenburg, elector.

The archbishops of Magdeburg and Bremen.

John, count palatine of the Rhine, duke of Zweibrücken.

John Casimir, duke of Saxony.

John Ernest, duke of Saxony.

George William, margrave of Brandenburg, duke of Jülich, Cleves, Berg, Prussia, etc.

John George, margrave of Brandenburg, duke of Prussia, Silesia, etc.

Joachim Ernest, margrave of Brandenburg and Ansbach.

Christian, margrave of Brandenburg and Kulmbach.

Frederick Ulrich, duke of Brunswick.

John Albert and his lord brother, dukes of Mecklenburg.

John Frederick, duke of Württemberg and Teck, count of Montbéliard.

Louis Frederick, duke of Württemberg and Teck, count of Montbéliard.

Frederick Achilles, duke of Württemberg and Teck, count of Montbéliard.

Magnus, duke of Württemberg and Teck, count of Montbéliard.

The dukes of Holstein, Pomerania, Lüneburg, and Lauenburg.

Maurice, landgrave of Hesse.

Louis, landgrave of Hesse.

Philip, landgrave of Hesse.

George Frederick, margrave of Baden.

John George, prince of Anhalt.

Christian, prince of Anhalt.

Augustus, prince of Anhalt.

Louis, prince of Anhalt.

Rudolf, prince of Anhalt.

Henry Wenceslaus, duke of Münsterberg and Oels, duke of Silesia, Berg, and Liegnitz.

Charles Wenceslaus, duke of Münsterberg and Oels, duke of Silesia, Berg, and Liegnitz.

John Christian, duke of Münsterberg and Oels, duke of Silesia, Berg, and Liegnitz.

George Rudolf, duke of Münsterberg and Oels, duke of Silesia, Berg, and Liegnitz.

Lord Maurice, prince of Orange.

Lord William, count of Nassau, governor of Frisia.

IN FRANCE, the chief lights and pillars of the Reformed Religion were:

Henry, duke of Bouillon, supreme marshal, father of two sons, of whom one was Frederick, prince of Sedan, the other Henry, viscount of Turenne.

Henry, duke of Thouars and La Trémoille, together with his brother, the lord de Soubise.

The duke de Sully and his son, the marquis de Rosny.

The duke de Lesdiguières.

The marquis de Candale, elder son of the duke d'Épernon.

The count de la Suse.

The count de Russy.

The lord vidame de Chartres.

Lord Philippe de Plessis Mornay.

The lord de la Force. And many other leading men, not to mention nobles in great number.

THROUGHOUT HUNGARY AND TRANSYLVANIA, patrons of the Reformed Churches:

Gabriel Bethlen, prince of Transylvania, lord of parts of the kingdom of Hungary, count of the Székelys.

Stephen Bethlen, captain of Huszt, prefect of Máramaros.

Francis Rhédey, count of Bihar county, captain of Várad.

Francis Perényi, count of Abaúj county.

George Perényi, count of Abaúj county.

Gabriel Perényi, count of Abaúj county.

Stephen Török, count of Hunyad, heir and captain of Pápa.

George Rákóczi, count of Sáros, captain of Ónod, and his brother,

Sigismund Rákóczi.

Francis Batthyány, count of Sopron county.

Nicholas Zrínyi, count of Zala county.

George Zrínyi, count of Zala county.

Paul Nádasdy, count of Vas county.

Thomas Nádasdy.

Stanislaus Thurzo de Bethlenfalva, count of Szepes.

Emeric Thurzo, count of Árva.

Peter Révay, count of Turóc.

The widow of Stephen Illésházy with her son, count of Trencsén.

Peter Forgách de Ghymes, free baron.

Nicholas Forgách de Ghymes, free baron, captain of Szécsény.

Michael Károlyi, free baron.

Stephen Nyáry, free baron.

Stephen Thököly, free baron in Késmárk.

Thomas Széchy, free baron, and his son George Széchy.

Sigismund Prépostváry, free baron.

John Lisztius, free baron.

Stephen Lisztius, free baron.

Nicholas Bocskai, free baron in Kővár.

Francis Bánffy de Losoncz, free baron.

Stephen Kákonyi, free baron.

David Zólyomi, free baron in Székelyhíd.

The widow of Francis Paczot.

Sigismund Máriássy.

Paul Máriássy.

Andrew Kapi.

Stephen Korlát, captain of Szendrő.

John Bakos in Osgyán.

Ladislaus Barkóczy, vice-count of Zemplén county.

Stephen Pétnéházy, count of Szaránd, captain in Jenő.

Wolfgang Kamuti.

Caspar Pető, captain of Gesztely.

Balthasar Kovács, captain of Galánk.

Thomas Oknai, captain of Szodény.

[Printed page 734]

And very many other nobles and most distinguished citizens of cities and towns, Orthodox men.

IN THE KINGDOM OF POLAND, the following professed themselves followers of Evangelical truth:

Lord Rafał, count Leszczyński, castellan of Wiślica; the counts Ostroróg; the lords Łaski.

The lords Firlej, Sienieński, Urowiecki, Gorajski, Zbąski, Przyjemski, Orzechowski, Gołuchowski, Rej, Sieniuta, Broniewski, Dunikowski, Potocki, and innumerable others.

IN LITHUANIA, the most praiseworthy princes Lord Janusz and Krzysztof Radziwiłł were putting spurs to the course of the Gospel; for in other respects also they rendered helpful service to the Evangelical Church.

IN BOHEMIA, the baron Lord Wenceslaus of Budovitz.

IN MORAVIA, the baron Lord Charles of Zierotin.

IN SILESIA, the baron Lord George of Schönaich.

§ 9. Yet it must be particularly observed among these that those princes and provinces are partly Lutheran and partly, as they call it, Reformed. Next, a great part of the subjects of Reformed rulers are Lutherans and judge themselves to be placed under great persecution. Hitherto they have indeed awaited deliverance from the Evangelical Lutherans in vain; now they are compelled to condemn their hope and gradually receive the bridle. The Saxons bear witness to their vain hope in motive 12, why peace should not be made with the Calvinians:

“The Protestants would earn little gratitude--indeed, they would rather stir curses and groans against themselves--among those who live among the Calvinians and confidently and earnestly expect that they will shortly be liberated by the Estates of the Augsburg Confession and that Calvinism will be abolished, if those men should hear that the Protestants now play the same pipe with the Calvinists and concede, as the saying is, that five is even. If this were done, an occasion and cause would assuredly be furnished for no slight disturbances and movements in the Church of God among weak Christians.”

[Printed page 734]

§ 10. The following princes cultivated and defended the Catholic Religion and celebrated a true Jubilee of constancy.

IN GERMANY, FROM THE HOUSE OF AUSTRIA:

Matthias, august emperor.

Ferdinand, king of Bohemia and Hungary.

Maximilian, archduke of Austria, grand master of the Teutonic Order.

Albert, archduke of Austria, duke of Brabant, etc.

Leopold, archduke of Austria, bishop of Strasbourg and Passau.

Charles, archduke of Austria, bishop of Brixen and Breslau.

John Schweikhard, archbishop of Mainz, elector, etc.

Ferdinand, archbishop of Cologne, elector, etc., duke of Bavaria, etc.

Lothar, archbishop of Trier, elector, etc.

William the Elder, duke of Bavaria, count palatine, etc.

Maximilian, duke of Bavaria, count palatine, etc.

Albert, duke of Bavaria, count palatine.

Wolfgang William, duke of Bavaria-Neuburg and Jülich, etc.

Emmanuel Philibert, duke of Savoy.

Henry of Lorraine, etc.; Francis of Lorraine, etc.

Very many bishops in Germany:

Mark, archbishop of Salzburg, legate of the Roman See.

John Gottfried, bishop of Bamberg and Würzburg, duke of East Franconia.

Philip Christopher, bishop of Speyer, supreme judge of the Imperial Chamber.

The reverend bishop of Chur.

George Gottfried, bishop of Worms.

Theodore, bishop of Paderborn.

James, bishop of Constance.

Henry, bishop of Augsburg.

William, bishop of Basel.

I omit the other princes, counts, barons, and magnates, as also the free cities and states in Germany and Switzerland.

IN ITALY:

Paul V, pontiff of the first See and of the Church, the mother of all, together with what they call the Ecclesiastical State. Next, the kingdom of Naples with Sicily, Sardinia, Corsica, and Liguria. In these there is a great number of dukes, counts, and nobles.

If we add to these the noble and wealthy city of Venice, its dominions, and its islands, we shall produce such a great army of Roman blood and illustrious men that from one state we shall equal half the opposing party.

But what if I enumerate Etruria and the grand duke of Florence and his sons, and the family now grafted into the House of Austria? Their distinguished piety in defending the faith and religion is illustrious, and the Ottoman forces are cut down by their fleets.

In France the greater number are Catholics. These names were sent to me by a friend:

The King.

My lord the King's brother.

The prince de Condé, prince of the blood.

The count de Soissons, prince of the blood.

OTHER PRINCES:

The lord de Guise.

The lord du Maine.

The lord de Nevers.

The lord de Longueville.

The lord de Vendôme.

The chevalier de Vendôme.

The lord de Saint-Paul.

The lord de Nemours.

The prince d'Auvergne.

The lord d'Elbeuf.

The prince de Joinville.

The lord de Chevreuse.

The count d'Harcourt.

The lord d'Alès.

The lord de Lauragne.

The duke de Retelois.

The duke de Fronsac.

[Printed page 735]

DUKES:

The duke d'Épernon.

The duke d'Angoulême.

The duke de Montbazon.

The lord de Candale, duke d'Halluin.

The duke de Montmorency.

The lord de la Valette, colonel-general of France.

The Grand Esquire of France.

The duke de Ventadour.

The duke de Retz.

The duke de Roannez.

The duke d'Uzès.

MARSHALS OF FRANCE:

The marshal de Roquelaure.

The marshal de Brissac.

The marshal de Bois-Dauphin.

The marshal de Souvré.

The marshal de Vitry.

The marshal de Thémines.

The marshal de la Châtre.

MARQUISES:

The marquis de Rouillac.

The marquis de Mirebeau.

The marquis de Mortemart.

The marquis de Trans.

The marquis de Canisy.

The marquis de Vieuville.

The marquis de Villaine.

The marquis de Ruffec.

The marquis de Thémines.

The marquis de Sablé.

The marquis de la Verdin.

The marquis d'Éternel.

The marquis de Beuvron.

The marquis de Cœuvres.

The lord de Saint-Chamond.

The marquis de Moüy.

The marquis de Villeroy.

The marquis de Cortaubau.

The marquis de Villars.

The marquis d'Oraison.

The marquis de Marigny.

The marquis de Portes.

The marquis d'Allègre.

The marquis d'Estin.

The marquis de Ravel.

The marquis d'Omtesort.

The marquis d'Alluy.

The marquis de Sidul.

The marquis de Fimarcon.

The marquis de Mirepoix.

The marquis de Timbrune.

The marquis d'Araigny.

The marquis de Bressieulx.

The marquis de Cessac.

The marquis de Gimolz.

COUNTS:

The count de la Rochefoucauld.

The count de Saint-Aignan.

The count de Gramont.

The count du Lude.

The count de Lauzun.

The count de Torigny.

The count de Termes.

The count de Grampe.

The count de la Marque.

The count Chombere.

The count de Treme.

The count de Sancerre.

The count de la Voute.

The count de Curson.

The count de Carton.

The count de Mauleurier.

The count de Cars.

The count de Tonnerre.

The count de Cremail.

The count de Susse.

The count de Grignan.

The count de Vertu.

The count de Breme.

The count de Pegnillem.

The count de Tournon.

The count de l'Estrange.

The count de la Vedan.

The count de Frasque.

The count de Mauret.

The count de la Roche-Guyon.

The count de Carsses.

The count de Crisse.

The count de Gransay.

The count de Maille.

The count de Maran.

The count d'Aubigon.

The count de Sanzay.

The count de Chantel.

The count de Chasteau-Vilain.

The count de Chasteau-Neuf.

The count de Monranel.

The count d'Ax.

The count de Chiverny.

VISCOUNTS:

The viscount Duza.

The viscount de Pompadour.

The viscount de Brigul.

The viscount de Polignac.

The viscount d'Ambeterre.

The viscount de Pomy.

The viscount de Foncande.

The viscount de l'Arboust.

The viscount de Saint-Girons.

The viscount de Bordes.

The viscount de Poise.

The viscount de Cere.

The viscount de Chanemy.

The viscount de Clere.

The viscount de Marcossy.

The viscount de Dune.

THE CARDINALS:

Cardinal de Guise.

Cardinal de la Rochefoucauld.

Cardinal de Sourdis.

Cardinal du Perron.

Cardinal de Verneuil, bishop of Paris.

Cardinal de Verneuil, bishop of Metz.

The duke de Joyeuse, son of the lord de Guise, abbot of Fécamp and coadjutor of the archbishop of Narbonne.

BISHOPS:

The archbishop of Toulouse, son of the lord d'Épernon.

The bishop of Agde, son of the count d'Auvergne.

[Printed page 736]

The bishop of Lodève, son of the lord de Ventadour.

The bishop of Comminges, son of the marshal de Souvré.

The bishop of Le Mans, son of the marshal de la Verdin.

The bishop of Viviers, son of the count de Suze, nephew of the lord du Maine.

The bishop of Marseille, brother of the lord de Saint-Luc.

More than forty knights of the Holy Spirit.

Moreover, many lords of rank bearing the titles of the King's lieutenant in all the provinces of France, whom I would not know how to number for you, such as the lords de Goudrin, de Cregny, de Pralin, Bassompierre, d'Orlame, d'Alincourt, Montauban, who is prince of Guéméné, de Bordeille, d'Ambleville, de Montpessart, Denis the brother of the lord du Maine, de Liancourt the King's first equerry, d'Andelot de Saint-Géran, and de Saint-Luc; and more than four thousand, if it were necessary to set down the whole.

Moreover, all the Parlements of France, which are all Catholic: namely, the Parlement of Paris, the Parlement of Toulouse, the Parlement of Rouen, the Parlement of Bordeaux, the Parlement of Rennes in Brittany, the Parlement of Dijon, the Parlement of Aix, the Parlement of Grenoble, and Sens.

But if one has a mind to proceed also westward from France and to behold the great kingdoms beyond the Pyrenees--kingdoms now allied to France by a double marriage--we shall find very many cultivators of the ancient religion. First, Philip III, the Catholic king, his three sons and two daughters. Next, the most powerful princes, whose catalogue, in the same manner in which it was transmitted to me by a most learned and most friendly man, I shall gladly render here to you, reader.

A Report of the Titles of Spain, the Amount of Each Man's Annual Income, and Where Each Man Has His Estate

THE DUKE OF FRÍAS, marquis of Berlanga, count of Haro, lord of the house of los Siete Infantes de Lara, lord of the seven daughters, constable of Castile and great presiding judge, head of the house of los Velascos. His ancestral house is in Burgos; his estate is in Old Castile, the forests of Biscay, and Soria; annual income, 80,000 ducats.

THE DUKE OF MEDINA DE RIOSECO ("of the torrid river"), count of Módica and Melgar, viscount of Esterlin, admiral (thalassiarch) of Castile. He was born of royal blood from Don Fadrique, master of Santiago, who was a son of King Alfonso XI and natural brother of King Peter, surnamed the Cruel. He is head of the Enríquez family; his house is at Valladolid; his estate is in the province of Campos, Catalonia, and Seville; his income is 100,000 ducats.

THE DUKE OF ALBA and Huesca, marquis of Coria, count of Salvatierra, viscount of Saldires, lord of Valdecorneja ("valley of crows"), head of the house of Toledo. His ancestral house is at Salamanca; his estate is in Old Castile, the kingdom of Granada, and the borders of Portugal; his income is 80,000 ducats.

THE DUKE OF INFANTADO, marquis of Cenete and Santillana, lord of el Real de Manzanares--of the royal domains which derive from apples and the things pertaining to them--head of the house of los Mendozas. His house is at Guadalajara; his estate is in the kingdom of Toledo, the mountain forests of Old Castile, and the province of Álava; income, 80,000 ducats.

THE DUKE OF ALCALÁ DE LOS GAZULES, marquis of Tarifa, count of Burno and Villamartín, adelantado mayor of Andalusia, head of the house of Riberas. His ancestral house is at Seville; his estate is in the same kingdom; income, 150,000 ducats.

THE DUKE OF ALBURQUERQUE, count of Buendía, head of the Cuevas family. He has his estate in Alburquerque and a house in Extremadura and Old Castile; 40,000 ducats.

THE DUKE OF ESCALONA, marquis of Villena and Moya, count of Saint Stephen, head of the Pacheco family. His house is at Toledo; his estate is in the kingdom of Murcia; he has 130,000 ducats annually.

THE DUKE OF OSUNA, marquis of Peñafiel, count of Ureña, head of the house of Girón. He has his house or seat at Peñafiel, and his estate in the kingdom of Seville; 100,000 ducats yearly.

THE DUKE OF ARCOS, marquis of Zahara, count of Marchena, head of the Ponce de León family. His house is in Seville, and his estate there also; 80,000 ducats yearly.

THE DUKE OF BÉJAR, marquis of Gibraleón, count of Benalcázar, head of the Zúñiga de Sotomayor family. His house is in Seville; his estate is there and in Old Castile; 70,000 ducats annually.

THE DUKE OF GANDÍA, marquis of Lombay, head of the Borja family. His house is at Valencia, and his estate in the same kingdom; 60,000 ducats.

THE DUKE OF SESSA, count of Cabra and Baena, head of the Córdoba and Aguilar families. His house is at Córdoba and Granada; he has his estate in the same kingdom of Granada; annual income, 70,000 ducats.

THE DUKE OF MEDINACELI, marquis of Cogolludo, count of El Puerto de Santa María, head of the Cerda family. He has his house at Medinaceli and his estate in the kingdom of Toledo; 50,000 ducats.

THE DUKE OF MEDINA SIDONIA, marquis of Sanlúcar de Barrameda, count of Niebla ("cloud or vapors"), head of the Guzmán family. He has his house in Seville and in the port of Sanlúcar, his estate in the kingdom of Seville, and an annual income of 130,000 ducats.

THE DUKE OF MAQUEDA, marquis of Elche, head of the Cárdenas family. He has his estate in the kingdoms of Toledo and Valencia; 40,000 ducats yearly.

THE DUKE OF NÁJERA, count of Treviño, Valencia, and Don Juan, head of the house of Manríquez de Lara. He has his house in Nájera, his estate in the province of La Rioja, and an income of 50,000 ducats.

THE DUKE OF FERIA, marquis of Zafra, head of the Figueroa family. He reports his estate in Extremadura, his house in Zafra, and 50,000 ducats.

THE DUKE OF CARDONA AND SEGORBE, marquis of Comares, lord in Lucena, alcaide of los Donceles, joined by blood to the kings of Aragon and to the house of La Cerda. He has his house at Valencia, Cardona, and Barcelona, his estate in the kingdoms of Valencia and Catalonia and at Córdoba, and an annual income of 110,000 ducats.

THE DUKE OF SOMMA, marquis of Palamós, Neapolitan admiral from the house of Córdoba. He has his house at Belpuig and an income of 40,000 ducats.

THE DUKE OF VILLAHERMOSA (καλοπόλις, "beautiful city"), count of Ribagorza, from the family and blood of the kings of Aragon. He has his house at Zaragoza, his estate in the kingdoms of Aragon and Valencia, and 25,000 ducats annually.

THE DUKE OF PASTRANA, prince of Éboli, head of the Silva house of the kingdom of Portugal, whence Ruy Gómez de Silva came into Castile. He has his house at Madrid and Pastrana and an income of 50,000 ducats.

[Printed page 737]

THE DUKE OF FRANCAVILLA, prince of Mélito, from the house of Mendoza. He has his house at Toledo, his estate in the same kingdom, and reckons 40,000 ducats yearly.

THE GREATER MARQUISES:

THE MARQUIS OF ASTORGA, count of Trastámara, lord of the house of Villalobos, head of the Osorio family. He has his house at Astorga, his estate in the kingdom of León and the province of Campos, and 50,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF AGUILAR, count of Castañeda, from the house of Manríquez de Lara. He has his ancestral house at Carrión and Aguilar de Campos, his estate in the mountains and the province of Campos, and an income of 40,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF DENIA, count of Lerma, head of the Rojas family. His house is at Denia and Valencia, his estate in the same kingdom and in Old Castile, and his income 25,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF MONDÉJAR, count of Tendilla, from the house of Mendoza. He has his house at Mondéjar, his estate in the Alcarria, and an income of 36,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF NAVARRÉS, master of Montesa, chief and head of the Borja family. He has his house at Valencia, his estate there, and an income of 20,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF PRIEGO, lord of the house of Aguilar and Córdoba. He has his house there at Córdoba, his estate in the aforesaid kingdom, and an income of 50,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF SARRIA, count of Lemos and Castro, lord of Villalba and Ulloa, head of the house of Castro. He has his house at Lemos and Sarria, his estate in the kingdom of Galicia, and an income of 80,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF LOS VÉLEZ, adelantado of Murcia, from the house of Fajardo. He has his house at Los Vélez, his estate in the kingdom of Murcia, and an income of 60,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF SANTA CRUZ, from the house of Bazán, created a judge with supreme authority on 23 January 1584. He has his house at Granada and 36,000 ducats annually.

THE MARQUIS OF VILLAFRANCA, from the house of Toledo. He has 30,000 ducats annually.

THE MARQUIS OF VELADA, from the Ávila Toledo family. He has his house at Ávila and Velada and an income of 20,000 ducats.

THE LESSER MARQUISES:

THE MARQUIS OF AYAMONTE, from the house of Zúñiga. His ancestral house is at Seville, his estate in the same kingdom, and his income is 26,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF ALTAMIRA, from the house of Rojas. He has his house at Altamira and an income of 12,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF VIANA, from the Pimentel family. His house is at Valladolid, his estate in the kingdom of Galicia; 14,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF CAMARASA AND SABROSO, count of Ricla, adelantado of Cazorla, from the house of Cobos and Mendoza. His house is at Valladolid, his estate in Catalonia, and his annual income 50,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF CORTES, from the house of Toledo. His ancestral house is at Cortes, his estate in the kingdom of Navarre; 16,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF MONTEMAYOR, from the house of Silva. His house is at Montemayor, his income 15,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF LA GUARDIA DE SANTA EUGENIA, head of the Mexía family. His house is at Salamanca, his estate in the kingdom of Jaén, and his income 40,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF MONTESCLAROS, from the house of Mendoza. His house is at Guadalajara; 16,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF LAS NAVAS, head of the Ávila family. His house is in the city of Ávila, his estate in its neighboring district; 16,000 ducats annually.

THE MARQUIS OF POZA, from the house of Rojas. His houses are at Valladolid, Poza, and Madrid, his estate in Old Castile; 20,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF ESTEPA, from the house of Centurión of Genoa. His house is at Estepa, his estate in the kingdom of Seville; 25,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF TÁBARA, from the Pimentel family. His house is at Valladolid, his estate in Old Castile; 16,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF VILLAMANRIQUE, head of the Portocarrero family. His house is at Seville, his estate in Extremadura; 16,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF VILLANUEVA DEL RÍO, head of the Enríquez family. His house is situated at Seville; 25,000 ducats annually.

THE MARQUIS OF LA ADRADA, from the house of la Cueva. His house is situated at La Adrada, his estate in the kingdom of Toledo; he has 10,000 ducats annually.

THE MARQUIS OF CAÑETE, from the house of Mendoza. His house is at Cañete, his estate in its district and borders; 15,000 ducats annually.

THE MARQUIS OF FRÓMISTA, from the houses of Benavides and Enríquez. His house is at Frómista, his estate in the province of Campos and Old Castile; he has 10,000 ducats annually.

THE MARQUIS OF FALCES, head of the Peralta family. His house is in the city, his estate in the kingdom of Navarre; 8,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS DEL VALLE, from the house of Cortés. His house is at Seville, his estate in New Spain; 50,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF ARDALES, count of Teba, head of the Guzmán family. His house is in the city of Málaga, his estate in the kingdom of Seville; 16,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF ALCALÁ DE LA ALAMEDA, from the Portocarrero family. He has his house at Seville and 1,000 ducats each year.

THE MARQUIS OF ALCAÑICES, from the Enríquez family. He has his house at Alcañices and his estate in its district; 16,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF AGUILAFUENTE, from the house of Zúñiga. His house is at Ráfales, his estate in Old Castile, and his income 12,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF PIOZA, from the Ulloa family. His house is at Valladolid; 12,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF VILLAMANRIQUE, from the house of Zúñiga. His house is at Seville, his estate in the same kingdom; 16,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF AUÑÓN, from the house of Herrera. His house is at Madrid, his estate in the Alcarria; 25,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF MOLINA has his house in the same place and an income of 6,000 ducats.

THE MARQUIS OF CERRALBO, from the house of Castro. He has his house at Ciudad Rodrigo, his estate in its borders or jurisdiction, and 8,000 ducats.

COUNTS OF THE FIRST CLASS:

THE COUNT OF BENAVENTE, head of the Pimentel family. He has his house at Valladolid, his estate in the region of Campos, and an income of 100,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF ALBA DE LISTE, from the Enríquez family. He reports his house at Zamora, his estate in Old Castile, and an income of 40,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF MIRANDA, head of the house of Acuña and Avellaneda. He reports his house at Peñaranda--

[Printed page 738]

--his estate in Old Castile, and an income of 35,000 ducats.

THE CONSTABLE OF THE KINGDOM OF NAVARRE, from the house of Toledo. He has his house at Pamplona, his estate at Aoiz in the kingdom of Navarre, and an income of 25,000 ducats.

COUNTS OF THE SECOND CLASS:

THE COUNT OF SALINAS AND RIBADEO, from the houses of Avellaneda and Mendoza. The ancestral seat is at Burgos and the estate in Biscay and its mountains. On account of the brave deeds of his ancestors for the king of Castile in the conquest of the city of Toledo, he has the privilege of dining together with the king of Castile on the days of Easter and the Nativity; and the royal garments fall to him, likewise the horse and drinking vessel which the king uses on those days. He has 20,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF AGUILAR, head of the Arellano family. He has his seat in the city of Demanda, his estate in La Rioja and the jurisdiction of Cameros, and an income of 15,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF ARANDA, from the house of Urrea, lord of Almormo. He has his seat or family--that is, ancestral--house at Aranda, his estate in Aragon, and an income of 16,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF ALCAUDETE, from the house of Córdoba. He has his ancestral seat at Alcaudete and reckons 8,000 ducats in annual income.

THE COUNT OF AYTONA, from the house of Moncada. He has his ancestral seat at Barcelona, his estate in Catalonia; 14,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF ALTAMIRA, from the house of Moscoso. He has his seat at Altamira and an income of 8,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF BUENDÍA, lord of Dueñas, from the house of Acuña. He has his seat at Dueñas, his estate in the land of Campos, and reckons 20,000 ducats annually.

THE COUNT OF AYLLÓN, from the houses of Ayllón and Córdoba. He has his seat at Ayllón and an income of 8,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF BELCHITE, from the house of Híjar. He has his house at Zaragoza, his estate in Aragon, and an income of 10,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF CASTELLAR, head of the Saavedra family. He has his seat at Seville, his estate in the same kingdom, and an income of 14,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF CASTRO, from the houses of Mendoza and Manríquez. He has his house at Castro and 10,000 ducats annually.

THE COUNT OF CHINCHÓN, head of the Bobadilla family. He has his seat at Madrid, his estate in the kingdom of Toledo, and 40,000 ducats annually.

THE COUNT OF CIFUENTES, head of the Silva family. He has his house at Toledo, his estate in the same kingdom of Toledo; 25,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF CORUÑA, from the house of Mendoza. He has his house at Guadalajara and an income of 20,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF FUENSALIDA, head of the Ayala family. He has his house at Toledo, his estate in the same kingdom, and an income of 20,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF CANIMO has his house there at Canimo and 6,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF GELVES, head of the house of Portugal. He has his house at Seville and his estate in the kingdom of Seville; 22,000 ducats annually.

THE COUNT OF GOMERA, from the house of Ayala. He has his house at Gomera; 16,000 ducats annually.

THE COUNT OF OLIVARES, from the house of Guzmán. He has his house at Seville, his estate in the same kingdom, and an income of 40,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF COCENTAINA, head of the Corella family. He has his house at Valencia, his estate in the same kingdom of Valencia; 14,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF FUENTES in Aragon, head of the house of Heredia. He has his estate in that kingdom, his house at Zaragoza, and 10,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF MEDELLÍN, from the Portocarrero family. He has his house at Medellín, his estate in Extremadura, and 35,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF MONTEAGUDO, marquis of Almazán, from the house of Mendoza. He has his house at Almazán, his estate in the kingdom of Aragon, and 18,000 ducats annually.

THE COUNT OF MONTERREY, from the house of Acevedo. He has his house at Salamanca, his estate in the kingdom of Galicia, and an income of 18,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF OROPESA and of La Deleitosa ("the delightful"), lord of Segulla, from the house of Toledo. He has his house at Talavera, his estate in the kingdom of Toledo, and an income of 35,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF ISERNO, from the Manríquez family. He has his house at Valladolid, his estate in Old Castile, and an income of 20,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF OÑATE, head of the Guevara family. He has his house at Oñate, his estate in the province of Álava, and an income of 10,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF MORATA, from the house of Luna. He has his house at Morata, his estate in Aragon, and an income of 12,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF ORGAZ, from the house of Mendoza. He has his house at Orgaz and 12,000 ducats annually.

THE COUNT OF LA PUEBLA, from the house of Cárdenas. He has his house at Llerena, his estate in Extremadura and the kingdom of Granada, and 18,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF PRIEGO, from the houses of Carrillo and Mendoza. He has his house at Guadalajara and Priego, his estate in the mountain forests of Cuenca, and 12,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF PUÑONROSTRO, head of the Arias family. He has his house at Madrid, his estate in the kingdom of Toledo, and an income of 20,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF PAREDES, from the Manríquez family. He has his house at Paredes, his estate in the province of Campos, and 14,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF RIBADAVIA, from the house of Avellaneda. He has his house at Valladolid, his estate in the kingdom of Galicia, and 10,000 ducats annually.

THE COUNT OF SÁSTAGO, from the house of Alagón. He has his house at Zaragoza, his estate in Aragon, and an income of 18,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF SAINT STEPHEN, head of the Benavides family. He has his house at Úbeda, his estate in the kingdom of Aragon, and an income of 15,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF GELVES, from the house of La Cerda. He has his house at Gelves and 8,000 ducats annually.

THE COUNT OF BARAJAS, head of the Zapata family. He has his house at Madrid, his estate in the kingdom of Toledo, and an income of 12,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF LA PUEBLA DE MONTALBÁN, from the houses of Girón and Pacheco. He has his house at Puebla de Montalbán, his estate in Extremadura, and an income of 20,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF BAILÉN, from the house of Ponce de León. He has his house at Bailén, his estate in the kingdom of Jaén, and 16,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF NIEVA, from the Velasco family. He has his house at Nieva, his estate in La Rioja, and reckons 12,000 ducats from his annual income.

THE COUNT OF SALVATIERRA, from the house of Ayala. He has his house at Salvatierra, his estate in the province of Campos, and 10,000 ducats from his annual income.

THE COUNT OF LUNA has his estate in León and his house there, and 20,000 ducats.

[Printed page 739]

THE COUNT OF LA GUERRA, from the house of the Carrillos, has an income of 60,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF UCEDA, from the house of the Mexías, has his house at Ávila and reckons 10,000 ducats from his annual revenue.

THE COUNT OF FUENSALDAÑA has his house at Valladolid, his estate in Old Castile, and 8,000 ducats from his annual income.

THE COUNT OF LODOSA, from the house of ... has his house in the kingdom of Navarre, together with his estate, and has an income of 8,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF SANTA GADEA, adelantado of Castile, from the house of the Padillas and Acuñas, has his house at Santa Gadea and an income of 20,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF ALMENARA, from the house of the Próxitas, has his house at Valencia, his estate in the same kingdom, and an income of 8,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF OLIVA, head of the family or house of the Centellas, has his house at Valencia and his estate in the same kingdom; 18,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF ALBAIDA, head of the family, or chief of those bearing the surname of Milán, has his house at Albaida, his estate in the kingdom of Valencia, and an income of 10,000 ducats.

THE COUNT OF ELDA, chief of his family, of the house of the Colomas, has his estate in the kingdom of Valencia and his house at Elda; 8,000 ducats.

VISCOUNTS:

THE VISCOUNT OF PERALTA has an annual income of 6,000 ducats.

THE VISCOUNT OF GUEBULI has an income of 8,000 ducats.

THE VISCOUNT OF CHELVA has an income of 6,000 ducats.

ADMIRALS, OR COMMANDERS OF THE SEA:

THE ADMIRAL OF CASTILE has an income of 40,000 ducats.

THE ADMIRAL OF ARAGON has an income of 80,000 ducats.

THE ADMIRAL OF VALENCIA has an income of 10,000 ducats.

ADELANTADOS:

THE ADELANTADO OF ZARAGOZA, 12,000 ducats.

THE ADELANTADO OF GALICIA, 8,000 ducats.

THE ADELANTADO OF CANANA, 10,000 ducats.

THE ADELANTADO OF CASTILE, 12,000 ducats.

PRIORS OF SAINT JOHN:

THE PRIOR OF SAINT JOHN OF THE KINGDOMS OF CASTILE AND LEÓN has an income of 100,000 ducats.

THE PRIOR OF SAINT JOHN OF CATALONIA, 14,000 ducats.

THE PRIOR OF SAINT JOHN OF VALENCIA, 7,000 ducats.

THE PRIOR OF SAINT JOHN OF ARAGON has an annual revenue of 6,000 ducats.

THE PRINCE OF ASCOLI, head of the Leyvas, has his house in the city of Santo Domingo, his estate in the province of La Rioja and in a duchy of the kingdom of Naples, and an income of 50,000 ducats.

MASTERS:

THE MASTER OF SANTIAGO, who is the king himself, has 200,000 ducats annually.

THE MASTER OF CALATRAVA has 100,000 ducats.

THE MASTER OF ALCÁNTARA, 100 ducats.

His Royal Majesty claims these three masterships for himself.

ARCHBISHOPS:

The archbishop of Toledo, 200,000 ducats.

Of Seville, 100,000 ducats.

Of Santiago, 60,000 ducats.

Of Granada, 50,000 ducats.

Of Zaragoza, 50,000 ducats.

Of Valencia, 60,000 ducats annually.

Of Tarragona, 20,000 ducats.

Of Burgos, 40,000 ducats.

BISHOPS:

Of León, 16,000 ducats.

Of Úbeda, 12,000 ducats.

SUFFRAGAN BISHOPS UNDER THE ARCHBISHOPRIC OF TOLEDO:

Of Sigüenza, 40,000 ducats.

Of Cuenca, 36,000 ducats.

Of Córdoba, 40,000 ducats.

Of Segovia, 20,000 ducats.

Of Palencia, 30,000 ducats.

Of Osma, 20,000 ducats.

SUFFRAGAN BISHOPS OF THE ARCHBISHOPRIC OF SANTIAGO:

Of Plasencia, 40,000 ducats annually.

Of Salamanca, 20,000 ducats.

Of Coria, 25,000 ducats.

Of Astorga, 20,000 ducats.

Of Badajoz, 20,000 ducats.

Of Ciudad Rodrigo, 14,000 ducats.

Of Orense, 8,000 ducats.

Of Tuy, 7,000 ducats.

Of Mondoñedo, 7,000 ducats.

Of Zamora, 16,000 ducats.

Of Lugo, 6,000 ducats.

SUFFRAGAN BISHOPS OF THE ARCHBISHOPRIC OF ZARAGOZA:

Of Pamplona, 16,000 ducats.

Of Calahorra, 16,000 ducats.

Of Huesca, 12,000 ducats.

Of Barbastro, 8,000 ducats.

Of Tarazona, 16,000 ducats.

SUFFRAGAN BISHOPS OF THE ARCHBISHOPRIC OF SEVILLE:

Of Cádiz, 14,000 ducats.

Of Jaén, 30,000 ducats.

Of Ávila, 20,000 ducats.

SUFFRAGAN BISHOPS OF THE ARCHBISHOPRIC OF VALENCIA:

Of Cartagena, 12,000 ducats.

Of Orihuela, 8,000 ducats.

Of Segorbe, 8,000 ducats.

Of Albarracín, 8,000 ducats.

Of Majorca.

SUFFRAGAN BISHOPS OF THE ARCHBISHOPRIC OF GRANADA:

Of Málaga, 30,000 ducats.

Of Almería, 13,000 ducats.

Of Guadix, 12,000 ducats.

SUFFRAGAN BISHOPS OF THE ARCHBISHOPRIC OF TARRAGONA:

Of Girona, 10,000 ducats annually.

Of Lérida, 10,000 ducats annually.

Of Urgell, 8,000 ducats annually.

Of Elna, 7,000 ducats annually.

Of Urque, 6,000 ducats annually.

Of Barcelona, 8,000 ducats annually.

Of Cerdanya, 4,000 ducats annually.

Of Tortosa, 12,000 ducats annually.

But if one should also choose to traverse in thought the kingdoms of the Indies, their nations and powerful peoples, we shall produce a number twice as great as that of those who are scattered among the various sects. So many names of praetors, governors, and naval commanders--

[Printed page 740]

--would have to be recounted that I think I would produce weariness and resentment.

But now let us revisit the North and enter Poland, noble in men, arms, and--what is chief--in cultivated nobility. There first come before us King Sigismund, of pious and courageous spirit and experienced in achievements, his son Vladislaus, the emulator of his father's virtue, and the rest of the royal offspring.

There follow the princes and lords of the court of the Most Serene Archduke Albert.

The prince of Orange, who died most steadfast in the Catholic faith in the year of the Lord 1618, on 20 February.

The duke of Aerschot, count of Azenberg, knight of the Golden Fleece.

The duke of Chimay, count of Beaumont, lord of Avesnes and count of Zevenbergen.

The knight of Arenberg.

The duke of Croÿ, marquis of Havré, count of Fontenoy, knight of the Golden Fleece.

The baron of Fénétrange, brother of the duke of Croÿ.

The prince of Ligne, knight of the Golden Fleece, governor and captain of the county of Artois.

The marquis of Roubais, his son.

The count of Egmont, knight of the Golden Fleece, governor and captain-general of the county of Namur.

The prince of Gavre, his son.

Frederick, count of Bergh, count of Boxmeer, knight of the Golden Fleece, governor and captain-general of Guelders, the duchy, and the county of Zutphen.

Count Henry of Bergen, lord of Stevensweert, his brother.

The count of Berlaymont and of Lalaing, knight of the Golden Fleece, governor and captain-general of the duchy of Luxembourg and the county of Chiny.

The count of Champlitte, knight of the Golden Fleece, vice-captain-general of Burgundy and Charolais.

The marquis of Varambon, knight of the Golden Fleece.

The baron of Balançon, his brother.

The marquis of Marnay, count of Pont-de-Vaux, knight, etc.

The count of Solre, knight of the Golden Fleece.

The count of Hoogstraten.

The count of Bossu.

The count of Bucquoy, knight of the Golden Fleece, lieutenant and captain-general and grand bailiff of Hainaut, and count of Hautekerke.

The prince of Barbançon.

The count of Reulx.

The count of Megen.

The marquis of Renty.

The marquis of Trazegnies.

The count of Vertain.

The count of Hénin, duke of Bournonville.

The count of Beaurieux.

The count of Frezin.

The count of Sainte-Aldegonde, governor and captain of the duchy of Limburg, of Valkenburg, Dalhem, and Rode-le-Duc.

The count of Noyelles.

The count of Warfusée.

The count of Middelburg.

The count of Enghien.

The count of Falais.

The count of Croix.

The count of Estaires.

The count of Willerval.

The count of Bailleul.

The count of Bassigny, baron of Boxtel.

The baron of Grimbergen.

The lord of Bredam.

The lord of Marle, in whose hands is the highest charge of the treasury.

The lord of Coppigny, who also is a treasurer.

The marquis Spinola, captain and commander, governor-general of Belgium in the name of the Catholic king and of the archduke.

The count of Añover, prefect of the archduke's court and stable.

The marquis of Belvedere, commander-general of the cavalry.

The count of Fürstenberg.

The marquis of Malaspina, an ordinary officer in the court of the Most Serene Archduke.

When I showed Abraham Scultetus's catalogue to a noble and learned man born in Poland, he wrote back to me in this manner; for I thought it advisable to set down his own words:

“Of all those families which the heresiarch cites on his own behalf, some persons have denied the faith; nevertheless, the chief heads of those same lines have remained uncorrupted from the ancient time when the Roman Catholic faith was brought in, and they persevere steadfastly to this day. For of the Lesnow family of Lesno, and of their line, which he cites on his own behalf, even at the present time there exist as many ardent Roman Catholics as neither the man who cites them nor the man cited by him can number the hairs upon their heads.

“Moreover, all the counts of Ostroróg--with the exception of the one cited--exist not only as defenders of the Roman Catholic religion but also as its most vigorous champions, distinguished for faith, wisdom, and power. Their head and chief, the palatine of Poznań, in a recent judgment at the public disputation at Lublin, condemned the new Gospel and its followers with a most weighty judgment.

“Of the very numerous progeny of the Firlejs, if only two, enveloped in the deadly darkness of the new Gospel, are unable to break forth into the discharge of public office in religion or in the state, to the supreme grief of their kin, the whole family is not therefore to be judged from them. From that family as many princely men, palatines and bishops, and as many other powerful senators, have flourished in the Roman Catholic faith at every time, and flourish now, as are recounted in the annals. Among them now the Most Illustrious and Most Reverend bishop of Płock, a little before vice-chancellor of the kingdom, so restrains the defenders of the new Gospel by doctrine and power that throughout his entire diocese they are permitted neither to open schools of the new Gospel nor even to open their mouths.

“Moreover, Nicolaus Firlej, a most worthy senator of the kingdom, publicly suppressed the seducers of the new Gospel by his authority and prudence in the aforesaid disputation at Lublin.

“The others whom the heresiarch reports as entangled in the errors of his Gospel are such that, in the very numerous families and ranks of their lines, which have always professed and now profess the Roman Catholic religion, they are not even noticed.

“But as for the heresiarch's adducing one or another of the princes and counts on his own behalf, his very poverty is readily proved by the fact that out of the almost innumerable number--

[Printed page 741]

--of princes, dukes, and counts he was able to recount a sufficiently scanty supply.

“For our part, against those adduced we can present to his eyes, in troops, as many men of the Roman Catholic religion as he has never seen, nor will ever be able to see, with eyes darkened by the shadows of his Gospel.

“First of all, Lesser Poland offers itself, in which the whole house of the marquises of Mirów and of the Gonzagas maintains and defends the Roman Catholic faith from antiquity.

“The whole family of the Komorowskis, counts of Árva and Liptó.

“The entire, very ancient line of the counts of Tęczyn.

“The whole family of the Lubomirskis, counts of Wiśnicz.

“The palatine himself and the castellan of Cracow, princely men in power and authority, together with all the senators, profess and maintain the Roman Catholic religion.

“In Greater Poland, moreover, the count of Górka, general of Greater Poland.

“Count Stanislaus Karnkowski of Górka, together with all the ranks of his family, professes the same religion.

“The palatine of Poznań, count of Ostroróg.

“The counts of Tarnów. All the senators, too, as many as are found in that duchy, declare themselves by daily proof to be the most ardent defenders and champions of the Roman Catholic religion.

“From the duchy of Masovia it is not expedient to recount any of the princes, senators, or nobles, since all and each of them so cherish and defend the Roman Church, embraced from antiquity, that the seducers of the new Gospel experience not only that they cannot flow in with crafty words, but that not even the journey there is safe.

“From the grand duchy of Lithuania we do not deny that two Radziwiłłs have rather frequently applied spurs to the new Gospel; but we know that far more powerful dukes of the same line, by applying the same spurs, have so driven and goaded that very new Gospel as to dispatch it, together with its defenders, all the way to hell.

“From the same duchy, those men would now gladly remove the applied spurs if they could, lest through the disturbance of the whole duchy, and with the spurs of the new Gospel applied to them, they themselves should be driven forward and trampled down. For Duke Radziwiłł, palatine of Vilnius; Duke Radziwiłł, palatine of Troki; Duke Albert Radziwiłł in Ołyka and Nieśwież; and Duke Nicolaus Radziwiłł not only have been of the Roman Catholic religion from antiquity, but have also built very many splendid churches and magnificently endowed them; they also erected a college of the Society of Jesus worthy of their name and religion.

“In the same duchy, all the dukes of the royal Jagiellonian family.

“All the dukes who derive their origin from the line of the grand dukes of Lithuania disdain even to look upon the darkness of the new Gospel down to the present day.

“Count Chodkiewicz, commander-general of the forces of that same grand duchy, persecutes the new dogma of the pestilential Gospel as vigorously as he does the enemy of his country, together with the power of his very extensive family and the whole order of senators, of whom not one is found in that duchy to be a follower of the new Gospel.

“From the duchy of Volhynia and Ruthenia: Duke Janusz Ostrogski, lord of Cracow.

“Duke Janusz Ostrogski of the same name, palatine of Volhynia.

“Duke Alexander Ostrogski, palatine of Bracław.

“Duke George of Zasław.

“All the Sanguszko dukes.

“All the Czartoryski dukes in Czartorysk.

“All the Wiśniowiecki dukes.

“Duke Constantine in Jarosław.

“Duke Janusz in Jarosław.

“All the Korecki dukes, of Korets.

“All the Koszyrski dukes.

"And the remaining ducal families deriving their origin from the grand dukes of Lithuania, Ruthenia, Masovia, Halicz, and Volodymyr--to recount their number would be idly to fill innumerable leaves--profess the Roman Catholic faith. They oppose the invaders of the new Gospel in actual fact no less than the faithless incursions of the Turks and Tatars, and, together with His Royal Majesty and all the orders of senators and dignities, strengthen and champion the Roman religion by piety, zeal, arms, and, whenever it is expedient, by life itself."

Nor are there lacking in the most noble kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia those to whom the ancient Catholic religion and piety are dear and who have defended it with great constancy. The diets themselves, the labor and expenditure lavished for their princes, and faith preserved amid disasters demonstrate this.

Since, therefore, this is the condition of the religions, if one attends to their defenders, one will not easily be able to overpower another by force and arms. But if arms and wars should in some measure press the Catholics, nevertheless the victors will not be able to enjoy a lasting peace, since they disagree bitterly among themselves, and there are not lacking those to whom a partnership in victory will prove burdensome.

CHAPTER XI

The Condition of the European Religions, If One Considers Their Doctrine and Doctors

[Printed page 741]

The following, for the most part, are the doctors and prelates of the dissenting sects whose names especially I found in the catalogue of the spring fair of the year 1618 and whose writings I acquired--although the writings of some could not be obtained, either because they had not yet appeared or because their printers were ashamed of them:

The academics of Strasbourg.

Andreas Finnolot.

An anonymous author, Unbekant gegen Christian Gottliebs.

The preachers of Strasbourg.

An anonymous author on the Jubilee.

Andreas Cramerus.

Abraham Scultetus.

Adrianus Smoutius.

The Arminians and Gomarians in Holland.

Balthasar Meisnerus.

Caspar Holstenius.

Caspar Melissander.

Caspar Finckius.

Christophorus Schleupnerus.

Christophorus Zieglerus.

Conradus Dietericus.

Christophorus Adolphi.

Christophorus Walpurger.

The Danish preachers.

Daniel Angelocrater.

[Printed page 742]

David Pareus.

Ehrhardus Lautterbach.

Aegidius Strauch.

Fridericus Helbachius.

Friderich Franck.

Fridericus Balduinus.

Georgius Engelman.

Georgius Zeaeman.

Gaudentius, on the celebrants of the Jubilee.

Guilielmus Barret, an Englishman.

The academics of Heidelberg.

Hartmannus Braun.

Henricus Altingus.

Henricus Eckardus.

Henricus Hopffner.

Henricus Hirtzwigius.

Iacobus Martini.

Ioannes Gisenius.

Ioannes Simonius.

Ioannes Grocius.

Ioannes Tarnovius.

Ioannes Affelmannus.

Ioannes Staden.

Ioannes Schröder.

Ioannes Heinrich Hiemer.

Ioannes Schneider.

Ioannes Pandocheus.

Ioannes Salmuth.

Ioannes Ioachim Beutherus.

Ioannes Michael Beutherus.

Ioannes Leibius.

Ioannes Georgius Siegwart.

Ioannes of Rochester, against Robert Bellarmine.

Ioannes Schreiter of Annaberg.

Ioannes Sharpius.

Maximilianus Rittern.

Martinus Rober.

Matthias Hoe von Hoheneck.

Matthias Haffenreffer.

Melchior Schaererus.

Michael Mulingus.

The Popish Market, by an unnamed author.

M. M. D.

Nicolaus Hartkopfius.

Nicolaus Martini.

Nicolaus Pomeranus.

Nicolaus Grevinchovius.

Paulus Laurentii.

Polycarpus Leyser.

Fourteen sermons by various authors concerning the Jubilee feast.

The academics of Rostock.

Robertus Sarisburiensis.

Sibrandus Lubbertus.

Sigismundus Evenius.

Simon Gediccus.

The scholastics of Neuhaus.

The academics of Tübingen.

Thomas Weinrichius.

Thomas Tuke the Englishman's Index of Faith and Religion.

Vincentz Schmucken.

Wilhelmus Alardus.

The professors and doctors of Wittenberg.

The preachers of Württemberg.

Wolffgangus Frantzius. And

Others whom obscure fame conceals.

Their multitude forbids the naming of the Catholic doctors of this time. The academies themselves, and the colleges both of canons and of religious, would fill many pages.

As regards doctrine, it is one and the same among all Catholics, namely that which was explained in the Council of Trent and in other synods. Once you depart from it, you will behold a vast multitude of all the sects, each of which claims for itself the most certain truth and the most thoroughly tested sanctity, and most boldly condemns the others. Since, therefore, a later age will marvel at the variety, absurdity, and blasphemies of the heresies, something must be said briefly about their authorities and opinions.

Saint Augustine, Philastrius, and, before them, Epiphanius once compiled catalogues of the various heresies; in our own time Lindanus, Prateolus, Sanderus, and, in an abridgment, our own Iacobus Gualterus in his chronological table, in which he compared the new heresies with the old, have done so.

Martinus Lutherus was the first to begin the innovation and to seek liberty for ambition and lust. The proclamation of indulgences furnished him the occasion, but internal evils--which have always disturbed peaceful affairs--avarice, illicit loves, and the pride of an unquiet disposition furnished the cause. But because he did not have all things settled, and because not only do true things conflict with false ones but false things also conflict with one another, he could never suitably weave and arrange that work without destroying one thing after another. So, if anyone should construct a great building without a plan, he necessarily has to tear down many things, because his hands were swifter than his counsel. Hence, at the very beginnings, not only sermons and writings but even the merriments and pleasantries of the table, about which the Lutherans have written entire books, were fruitful in new heresies. And indeed, as Lutherus himself and Matthias Hoe in his third Jubilee sermon confess, he himself encountered thirty fanatical spirits, just as that huge sow beneath the holm oaks lay after bringing forth a litter of thirty heads.

Ioannes Gisenius, professor at Giessen, admits this either candidly or when driven by the necessity of truth, in thesis 7: “Although in his first writings he defended certain things that manifestly favor the papists, in the following writings, nevertheless, he cast them off and condemned them. For successively, by assiduous prayer, meditation, and trial, he was led into the truth and learned to recognize and soundly refute the impieties of the papists.” Luther himself explains this in the preface to volume 1 of the Latin Jena edition: “Before all things,” he says, “I beg the pious reader--and I beg him for the sake of our Lord Jesus Christ himself--to read these things with judgment, indeed with much compassion, and to know that I was once a monk and a most insane papist when I undertook this cause.” And a little later: “Thus you will find in these earlier writings of mine how many and how great things I most humbly conceded to the pope, which at a later time and at the present time I regard as the highest blasphemy and abomination, and execrate. You will therefore ascribe this error, pious reader, or--as they themselves slanderously call it--contradiction, to the time,” etc.

Since, therefore, at the beginnings he did not speak by the Spirit of God or by heavenly grace, he contradicted himself. For if God had placed the word in his mouth, he would not have asserted with such certainty anything abominable or anything contrary to manifest truth. Saints and learned men indeed err at times; but one who condemned the whole Church and antiquity and professed himself to be a new Elijah ought not to have erred in all things and altered everything.

Furthermore, of those who altered the faith preached by Luther, some wholly defected from Luther and condemned him; others made little sects under a famous name that enjoyed favor--

[Printed page 743]

--among the Germans.

His most bitter enemy was the man who had promoted him, Andreas Bodenstein of Carlstadt, who was bought so that he might attack his client, as many celebrants of the Jubilee relate the history, especially Matthias Hoe in his third sermon, page 116. The Lutherans attribute the Sacramentarian and Anabaptist heresies to him, as Erasmus Alberus does in his book On the Accursed Doctrine of the Carlstadtians. Melanchthon, in his commentary on Colossians, says that he denied infant baptism. Others credit Zwingli with Anabaptism because in his book on baptism he writes that it is more useful for baptism not to be conferred upon children; indeed, Balthasar Pacimontanus, whom most affirm to be the father of the Anabaptists, defended himself by a writing of Zwingli that rejected infant baptism. But one ought not to labor greatly over the author of the evil; reasons for averting the evil must be sought. Thomas Müntzer and Nicolaus Storch held the leading parts in that tragedy.

The first branch of Lutheranism, therefore--though torn from the tree--was Anabaptism, and it was divided into very many sects. They deny that the Son of God took flesh from the Virgin; approve promiscuous intercourse; issue commands; do not acknowledge the magistracy; seek a reputation for innocence through outward masks; indulge dreams; study magic; and think that those who do not follow their sect can be killed. They have many things in common with the others and many peculiar to themselves. Their leader was Christophorus Schaplerus, who incited the peasants to wars. Campanus, akin to this group, also added this: he denied the distinction of persons in the Trinity. I think the Scripturarians, Paulinians, Batenburgers, killers of pastors, Blood-men, Aegidians, Demoniacs, and Sabbatarians pertain to these, holding even wives in common; also the Sleepers and the Wailers, among whom there are as many sects as heads. With Carlstadt acting as midwife on one side, Zwingli giving birth, and Oecolampadius assisting, Sacramentarianism was born. The Lutherans are accustomed to call it Zwinglianism and Calvinism and especially detest it.

Zwingli imitated the errors of Berengarius, but added more; Carlstadt and Oecolampadius assisted him. With the Pelagians he rejected original sin and the necessity of grace. But all the Lutherans charge him with Nestorianism. Calvin followed Zwingli, adding many errors: that faith is not one; that it is not without unbelief; that there is no implicit faith; that Scripture is uncertain and easy to understand; that faith cannot be lost; that God predestined men to evils and sins; that there is a real distinction in the divine essence; that the Trinity is not to be adored; that Christ, according to his human nature, was ignorant; that he refused the office of mediator, despaired, and endured the punishments of a damned man; that he merited nothing for himself; that the glory of the pious is not granted before the last day; and that the Church can fail. Certain Lutherans enumerate three hundred and more errors of the Calvinists: Eckard's Fasciculus, Cramerus, and others.

The Sacramentarian heresy was divided into many sects, as Luther warned. From it arose the Bucerians and Melanchthonians, occupied in perpetual reconciliations, although they defended errors peculiar to themselves. Martyr likewise taught a singular opinion. Castellio permitted whatever religion each person wished. He removed the Song of Songs from the canon because he said that it was an immodest song.

Łaski wholly rejected baptism. Valentinus Gentilis mixed the Qur'an with the New Testament. Ludovicus Alemannus denied that the body of Christ is received even by faith. Petrus Richerius denied that Christ is to be adored in human flesh; at last he judged that the Father alone is to be adored. There are also others whom they call the Significatives, Tropists, Energetics, Arrhabonarii, Adessenarians, Metamorphists, Iscariotites, Metaphorists, Antipuritans, Pseudo-Irenics, Arminians, Sibrandians, Vorstians, and Venatorians. The polemical writings of the Netherlanders show the various and pernicious errors of these men, especially of the later ones.

And these are the men who wholly opposed Luther. Yet no fewer wage bitter wars among themselves under his name and hurl thunderbolts against one another. There were two parties, the Rigid and the Mild. The head of the latter was Melanchthon, together with the Wittenbergers and academics generally; the head of the former was Illyricus Flaccus. Their errors grew cruel even to exiles and proscriptions. Then the Brentians, or grosser Ubiquitarians, became strong. At the same time, especially in Prussia, arose the Osiandrians, who taught that we are justified by the essential righteousness of God. Stancarus so opposed him that he attributed the power of justifying to Christ's humanity alone and denied it to his divinity, being an Arian in this respect. Andreas Musculus, a distinguished Ubiquitarian, attacked both positions; for he attributed justification to both the divine and the human nature and, to make his position more vehement, said that the divine nature died on the cross. The Tübingen theologians adhered to Osiander in part, saying that the essential righteousness of God is imputed to us. Thereafter Nicolaus Amsdorff and the Mansfeldians tore Saxony apart in a great dispute, when they opposed the Majorists, the Antinomians, defenders of free will, the Adiaphorists, and the Stancarians concerning good works, and condemned them in a synod that had been held. Chytraeus, Functius, the Pastillarians, Interimists, Anti-Adiaphorists, Lutheropapists, Luthero-Zwinglians, Heshusians, and Hutites revived the errors in various quarters with various opinions and multiplied them so greatly that there is scarcely agreement among any of them.

The Concord of Berg was vaunted about the year of the Lord 1580, and in the following years most conspired to support it--but with the result that soon most Lutherans defected from it, and most provinces from the Lutherans.

Those who openly fight against the Lutherans, Calvinists, and Anabaptists are the Ostorodians--or, if you prefer, Socinians--deniers of Christ's merit, redemption, and divine righteousness, Arians throughout Poland, Hungary, and Transylvania; Servetians, who mingle Sabellianism, Eutychianism, and Anabaptism; the Effrontes, who shaved their foreheads until they drew blood, anointed them with oil, boasted that they were Christians without baptism, and said that the Holy Spirit was a certain motion and therefore could not be adored without the crime of idolatry; the Ochinists, who admit polygamy; the new Sabellians; the Bacularians; and those who form the greatest crowd, the Epicureans, atheists, and Libertines. This is the condition of the religions that contend most vigorously in Europe. A great part of the people either does not care about the controversies or is certainly ignorant of them. The more learned men are partly on others' sides and partly on their own, for by the vehemence of disputing they generally lose the truth and strike against some heresy. There are many Lutherans, and of various stamps; many Calvinists; and perhaps no fewer Anabaptists and Socinians--

[Printed page 744]

--but very many who have determined to fuse all the religions into one.

The Novatians once did this, as the author of Heresy 38 and Epiphanius in Heresy 59 attest. They declared that they and the Catholics were imbued with nearly the same faith, but that they nevertheless differed in doctrine; and they blamed the Catholics in the time of the Arian emperor Valens: “You contend on account of a trifling subtlety of doctrines.” There were also Rhetorians, who taught that all heresies walked on the right path and taught the truth. So Philastrius relates in his Catalogue, and Augustine in Heresy 72; and Augustine marvels that it could enter anyone's mind to judge thus. That opinion always gains strength when provinces fall into the manifold labyrinths of errors. For profane men are thereby led, provided only that they preserve the peace of the state, not to fear conspiring together in one error.

Zeno's peace taught this: his ἑνωτικὸν πρόσταγμα, his pacificatory or unitive edict, by which he wished the Eutychians, Dioscorians, and Catholics to remit something of their own opinion so that they might unite in one religion. That measure nevertheless produced greater dissensions, just as the Lutherans weakened themselves by nothing more than when they forced otherwise incurable errors together into the single Book of Concord. By a not dissimilar reasoning, Ioannes Sturmius in 1578 established a middle way: he wished a new religion to be fused from the opinions of Protestants and Catholics by the judgment of seventy men; but he aroused against himself the anger of all theologians. Our most learned Gualterus relates in his chronological table, page 380, column 2, that Ioannes Serranus, minister of Orange, said to a certain powerful Catholic lord that his religion differed from the Roman religion only in ceremonies, that his own had too few ceremonies and the Roman too many, and that it was not difficult to reconcile the one with the other, namely by increasing the number of the former and diminishing that of the latter. Prevented by death, he did not finish the book he had begun on this subject. A certain conciliator under the fictitious name Christianus Constans attempted the same thing. He asserts that the Roman and Calvinian religions are not two religions but one, if the matter is to be judged truly and genuinely, as Gualterus himself explains at length under the year 1600, page 8, column 4, section 1. If Gualterus had seen Pareus's Irenicon and the polemical writings of the Lutherans--all of which were published after his chronological tables--he would have marveled far more than Augustine did at the Rhetorians.

Since, therefore, there are so many heresies, and they increase day by day, draw states into factions by their increase, rend apart the members of Europe, set some against others and the whole before the Turks: recognize, O kings and princes, the condition of your religion; take thought for your own souls, for the salvation of your subjects, and for the state and civil order. A return must be made to one religion. For either each of you will obstinately defend his own opinions, and thus there will be as many dissensions as men; or you will give each person the power of holding and teaching opinions, and thus in one word you will overthrow the state. For men will come who will deny that the magistracy has any right, who will say that all things are common, and who, with pleasure pandering to the efficacy of their errors, will introduce them into morals.

This change of religion was brought into Europe by many seditions and wars; it cost altogether much blood, with which Africa, Asia, and India could have been acquired. From it, even now as I write these things, civil wars rage in many places, are being prepared in more, and are feared by all. Alas, will you descendants deny it? Amid so many faiths, will the Son of Man, when he comes, find faith?

CHAPTER XII

The Unexpected Origin of Seditions, and Their Origin from Small Things

[Printed page 744]

Aristotle gives a most true warning in Politics V.4:

γίγνονται μὲν οὖν αἱ στάσεις οὐ περὶ μικρῶν, ἀλλ᾽ ἐκ μικρῶν.

Seditions arise not concerning small things, but from small things; for men disagree and excite seditions concerning great things. In these cases, nevertheless, you will observe that, when a small matter has kindled a great fire, it has generally arisen from the corrupt morals of the people, or that great contempt and wickedness were displayed in a small matter.

Tarquinius was expelled from Rome because of his son's adultery. The chastity of wives is not a small matter but a great one, for which it is right that a husband fight as for a sacred thing; yet amid the lusts of gentile and barbarian kings it was not esteemed so highly that Brutus and Collatinus, if this alone had been the crime, could have stirred Rome and Collatia. But they had been embittered by the king's crime, pride, and tyranny. For Livy says of him in book I: “Then, conscious that from himself an example of seeking the kingship wickedly could be taken against himself, he surrounded his body with armed men; for he had no right to the kingship apart from force, since he reigned neither by command of the people nor with the senators as his sponsors. Added to this, since he placed no hope in the affection of the citizens, was the necessity of securing his kingdom by fear. In order to instill it in more persons, he conducted trials of capital charges by himself alone, without counselors. For that reason he was able to kill, drive into exile, and deprive of property not only those suspected and hated, but those from whom he could expect nothing other than plunder.” And when he was constructing the Capitol, the Great Sewer, and other works by the hands of the oppressed plebs, he was the object of great hatred, which lacked only an occasion.

Aristotle relates things not dissimilar. At Syracuse a tumult arose because of the crimes of two men, one of whom was guilty of adultery and the other of a more loathsome crime. But when each attached a part of the citizens to himself, they stirred up a sedition by which the form of the state was changed. Yet the sedition indicates the corrupt morals both of the magistrates and of the people: these fighting for adultery, those for παιδεραστία (pederasty). For in a vicious people, since each of the worst men is very prone to tumult, sedition arises most easily.

At Histaea a sedition arose from a dispute between two brothers over the division of an inheritance, as Aristotle attests. For when the wealthier brother injured the other and detained the paternal property, the other, poor brother called the poor citizens to his aid, while the former called the wealthy; and a battle of the poor against the rich was produced, which would never have occurred if even a shadow of justice had appeared in the courts.

It is established from the history of the Delphic sedition that there was an appearance of right on both sides. The sedition of the Mytilenaeans, moreover, had its origin in the neglect of justice. Timophanes left two wealthy daughters surviving him; Doxander sought them in marriage for his sons, suffered a refusal, and stirred the Athenians to an impious war.

The matter that made the consulship common to the plebs was also small: a sister married to a plebeian was mocked by her sister, who had entered a patrician house, because she was terrified at the unfamiliar sound of the lictor striking the door. Certainly that mockery would have had no power to produce a sedition if it had fallen in peaceful times of the state. But the tribunician disputes about making the consulship common to the plebs had already preceded it--

[Printed page 745]

--and an author was being sought who would renew the contests that had been broken off.

Suetonius, in his Augustus, reports a ludicrous cause of great danger. For when, at a spectacle of games, Augustus had ordered through an attendant that a common soldier sitting in the fourteen rows be made to rise, and a rumor had been spread by his detractors that he had soon afterward killed the same man under torture, he came within very little of perishing through the gathering and indignation of the military crowd. It was his salvation that the man who was being sought suddenly appeared, unharmed and without injury. From what a cause, small in appearance, did Philip the Macedonian perish! It was because he did not avenge an insult done to a young man. But it arose from a great fault and error of government, because the king, intent upon wars, was neglectful of justice and honor.

Trebellius Pollio relates that Regillianus was made emperor by a joke. "For when," he says, "certain soldiers were dining with him, Valerianus, a tribune, stood beside them and said, 'From what do we believe the name Regillianus to be derived?' Another immediately said, 'We believe it, because it comes from regnum, kingship.' Then a learned man who was present began, as though grammatically, to decline and say, 'Rex, regis, regi, Regillianus--king, of a king, to a king, Regillianus.' The soldiers, since mankind is very prone to those things which it is thinking, said, 'Therefore can he be king?' Likewise another: 'Therefore can he rule us?' Likewise another: 'God has imposed upon you the name of king.' Why say more? After these words, when he came forth on the following morning, he was hailed as emperor by the officers." Thus jesting cleverness bestowed upon this man what either boldness or judgment bestowed upon others. It was plainly a ridiculous designation of a prince; but if you consider the condition of the state, you will understand that there was plainly nothing strange in the chief power being handled so lightly. For the soldiers regarded making and killing an emperor as a matter of sport. This was the time in which, under the rule of Gallienus, thirty tyrants tore apart the Roman world. By no dissimilar levity Claudius was once dragged forth and placed upon the throne while trembling and expecting death. And before this, two common soldiers undertook to transfer the Roman Empire, and transferred it, as Tacitus attests. Proculus was made emperor at dice: for when "emperor" had come up ten times, one man cried, "Hail, Augustus," and the rest of the crowd, with similar madness, hailed him as emperor.

Zosimus reports concerning Magnentius: "Magnentius, rising from the table as though for the sake of some necessary business, when he had withdrawn from the guests for a very short time, again presented himself for them to behold, wrapped in a royal robe as though upon a stage. There, when the guests had called him king, all the inhabitants of the city of Autun--where these things were done--likewise came to the same opinion. And because the fame of the matter extended farther, the rural plebs also streamed together from outside the city." But the state was sick at that time, and the soldiery gained profit from sedition; otherwise the entire vicinity would have mocked the masquerading king. Now, advancing with great power, he inflicted great disasters.

There are innumerable such cases. In a sportive contest at the castle of Treviso under Otto IV, when the Venetian standard was torn, a vast sedition was stirred up. At Florence, when the young men Donatus and Cerchi disturbed the horses of others at dances, the city received a great calamity from the tumult. But the causes had already preceded these incidents. For the minds of the Venetians and Italians had been embittered, and the factions of the Florentines thought any cause sufficient for oppressing their enemies. These, therefore, are signs of a state constituted in the worst manner: when states fall at the slightest impulse, it is proof that they had stood in a slippery place. For those things are prone to fall which, when an impediment has been taken away or any weight added to the other side, rush down.

CHAPTER XIII

Chance Events Sometimes Furnish a Cause of Sedition

[Printed page 745]

I call those things fortuitous which are not committed through the fault of princes or of the people and which by their own nature have no reason why they should stir up sedition. God has his own fixed reason why he brings them upon us or permits them to occur. Nothing is fortuitous to eternal providence, which numbered the hairs of our head before the foundation of the world. We judge something to have happened by chance because it was contrary to expectation. The fortuitous causes of seditions, however, are calamities, such as famine, fires, floods, and other things that make spirits sorrowful and imbue them with much hatred. For since there is a very great number of evil men in a state, they are embittered by calamities and grow savage, like wild beasts, rather than becoming tame. Thus provoked, they easily make an attack upon the magistracy and others, although these have not injured them. Prudent princes will assuredly attempt what Fabius did:

> Fabius, soothing these complaints, taught that it was shameful
>
> To rage against disasters, and kept the crowd from anger;
>
> For to be broken by adversities was not the part of men.

The Hebrews in the desert, if Pharaoh rages, if water is lacking, if they desire flesh, do not deal by prayers, but murmur against God and Moses and rage against their disasters. The good are tested by adversities as gold by fires; the evil are burned up like chaff. The cause of this fact is that the unhappy, since they bear evils impatiently, become angry, envy the fortunate by comparison with their own fortune, and grieve. Hence they are readily indignant at all by whom they are not assisted, and especially at the magistrates.

Among the other hardships from which seditions arise, famine is the chief. The cause of this is that, when bodies have been emptied, it stirs the humors and renders men malevolent and bilious. Léry, in his History of the Voyage to Brazil, relates that, when the Calvinian church, after its affairs among the barbarians had gone badly, was afflicted by famine on the return voyage, its members became fierce, morose, and irascible. These are his words, page 325:

“Before I put an end to this discourse, I should like to observe in passing something that I noticed in others, indeed most of all in myself, for I experienced two famines, and such that I believe no men ever escaped more horrible ones. When bodies have been weakened by want of food, nature is failing, the senses are disordered, and the spirits dispersed, men become not only fierce but also morose and irascible. Moreover, that irascibility may deservedly be called a kind of madness. Hence it comes about that in our vernacular speech one who is oppressed by hunger is aptly said to rage with hunger. Furthermore, because experience teaches all things more distinctly, I see that it is not without cause that God, when threatening his people with famine unless they obey his commandments, expressly declares that it will come to pass that the eye of the man who had been tender and delicate will be very evil toward his brother, his dearest wife, and his children, so that he will not give any of them some of the flesh of his children which he will eat. For, in addition to the examples that we have related from sacred history concerning parents who ate one of their children, and concerning certain soldiers who, after they had tasted the corpses of those who had died in war, declared that they had resolved to lay hands upon the living if that evil had lasted longer, I can affirm that during that famine at sea we could scarcely, indeed hardly at all, converse peaceably with one another, although we were restrained by the fear of God; indeed, that--may the Lord pardon us--we looked upon one another with evil eyes.”

From this, therefore, arise bitterness of spirits, complaints, and tumults. Under the emperor Claudius there was an immense famine in the Roman-- --Empire. Dio recounts the tumult that arose from it at Rome; scarcity of grain, too, and the famine arising from it, was taken as a prodigy. There were not merely secret complaints: they surrounded Claudius while he was administering justice with turbulent shouts and, driving him to the farthest part of the forum, pressed him until he broke through the hostile crowd with a body of soldiers. It was established that no more than fifteen days' provisions remained for the city. By God's great kindness and the mildness of the winter, relief was brought to affairs at their extremity. Yet, by Hercules, in former times provisions were carried from the regions of Italy into distant provinces; nor is sterility the affliction now, but rather we put Africa and Egypt under exertion, and the life of the Roman people has been entrusted to ships and accidents.

[Printed page 746]

Hence came the monstrous savagery with which men devoured one another. This happened in the siege of Jerusalem, when mothers themselves cooked their children. The army of Cyrus in Scythia had already raged against its own men in this manner, and, as Herodotus says in book III, the army of Cambyses ate every tenth man selected by lot. The seditious soldiers of the Carthaginians were subdued by famine alone, although before that they had consumed the bodies of captives and slaves. Sabellicus, Enneads IV, book 9: this happened also at Numantia, Saguntum, Calagurris, Tauromenium, and Rome at the time of the Gothic siege, when men cried out, “Set a price on human flesh.” Byzantines and Placentines suffered the same thing under Totila; the Nevomantini and Samanduni in the siege of Sinderovia gnawed their own hands. Cromerus relates that it happened in Poland in the year 1315, book XI. What wonder is it, therefore, that seditions arise from famine, since it changes men into beasts?

There is a second reason why men riot on account of famine: they think that by the providence of the prince grain could have been gathered in good time or brought from elsewhere. Thus Octavius, Antonius, and many others were endangered because of famine. Wicked citizens, however, abused that occasion to seize the state, as did Spurius Maelius and others. Tiberius and other princes therefore prudently assumed the care of the grain supply themselves, lest anything be neglected by ministers.

The whole Senate was never in greater danger than when it was unwilling that Pompey be put in command of the fleet against the pirates; for the plebs blazed up with such anger that it hastened to destroy the Senate. The cause was that navigation, obstructed by the power of the pirates, had produced famine. Dio, in his Pompey.

Disasters in war also stir up domestic seditions, either by fear or by contempt. When it was announced in Mithridates' camp that his commanders had been slain by Lucullus, so great a terror suddenly invaded the army that they departed from the camp, abandoning the king; and, reverence for his authority having been removed, they plundered from others as much as each could, pillaged the king's own precious furnishings, and killed a commander in order to take his costly garment.

A prince must always fear a sedition arising from contempt if a defeat suffered in war is announced, if it is serious, dangerous, and difficult to repair. For men think that a prince placed in danger and afflicted has fallen beneath them. But if they hated him before, they exult vehemently and cast off the yoke. When the city had been burned by the Gauls, the Latins and others moved war out of contempt for it. After the defeat at Cannae the allied cities defected. Once the prince's authority and the fear of him have been removed, hatreds break forth most freely; and when men have hope from the opposite side, they incline toward it.

Pertinent here is what Herodotus reports in book II concerning Apries, king of the Egyptians, when he was defeated by the Cyrenaeans. When Apries, having sent an army against the Cyrenaeans, suffered a great defeat, the Egyptians imputed it to him and rebelled, thinking that they had been sent down by him to manifest destruction so that, once they had been annihilated, he might rule the other Egyptians more securely. Both those who returned and the friends of those who had perished bore this most grievously and openly defected.

When Apries learned of this, he sent Amasis to pacify them with words. When Amasis had arrived and was rebuking them and dissuading them from doing such things, one of the Egyptians, standing behind him, placed a helmet around his head; and, when it had been placed upon him, he said that he had put it on him for the kingship. Nor was this done against Amasis's will, as he showed. For as soon as he had been declared king by the Egyptians who had defected, he prepared himself as though about to march against Apries.

When these things were learned, Apries sent to Amasis one of the Egyptians who were with him, a respected man named Patarbemis, with orders to bring Amasis to him alive. When Patarbemis arrived, he summoned Amasis to Apries. But Amasis--he was sitting insolently upon a horse to exhort his men--foolishly ordered him to take this to Apries; and when Patarbemis asked him to go to the king, since he had been summoned, he replied that he had long been devoting his attention to doing so, and that Apries would have no complaint about him, for he would both present himself to Apries and bring others with him.

Patarbemis, not ignorant of Amasis's purpose, both from his speech and from the preparations he saw, judged that it belonged to his diligence to inform the king as quickly as possible of what was being done. When he returned without bringing Amasis, Apries, moved by anger, without uttering a word ordered his ears and nose cut off. When the other Egyptians who until then had sided with Apries saw a man most highly approved among them treated so shamefully and unworthily, they did not delay even so long, but passed over to the others and surrendered themselves to Amasis. Having heard these things also, Apries armed his auxiliaries--for he had around him about thirty thousand auxiliaries from the Ionians and Carians--and advanced against the Egyptians. He had an immense royal palace in the city of Saïs, worthy of being seen. Thus the Aprians and Amasians took their stand against one another at the city of Memphis, intending to attempt the decision of battle.

CHAPTER XIV

The Order and Method of Stirring Up Seditions

[Printed page 746]

Since so great a wickedness has no need of instruction, I think it the act of an insane man to teach the art of stirring up sedition. But to set forth publicly the things that histories furnish and that princes must know is the task of the political writer; for in this way the prince will recognize the signs and indubitable prognostics of sedition and, when he perceives that matters are tending toward it, will meet it in good time. Therefore, when either the people itself, or the nobles, or some one man from the crowd does those things which inspire or reveal in the multitude or the nobles a hatred of the present condition, sedition is not far away. This generally is not believed until it has begun to rage.

And indeed, when the people itself inclines toward tumult, the contrivance cannot be secret. For free and ill-considered words against the chief men or the prince, heard with attention and applause, indicate that the minds of the people are estranged and that they will dare something if they find a leader. When the mime is ordered to repeat these words, “Magnus, you are our misery,” who could doubt that favor had already been transferred from Pompey to Caesar and that, when an occasion was given, Pompey would be cast down? But when a private person or one of the chief men attempts a revolution, he carries on secret counsels, and the treason is not recognized until everything has been prepared and arranged.

Those, therefore, who attempt to move the people or the chief men to sedition do this in order to bring them into hatred of the magistrates. Then, because hatred languishes when hope and fear are absent--for it ventures little besides abuse--they remove fear of punishments, but instill a fear of many hardships if men remain quiet. Finally, they bring hope of better things and fill light minds with empty things. Sometimes they also set forth money as the rewards of treason.

[Printed page 747]

They procure hatred of the magistrate by relating true things and by calumniating. Calumnies are of two kinds: either they artfully invent false things, or they increase beyond measure things that are true.

A sedition is most dangerous when it is born from true evils, for it never ends except with the destruction of one of the parties or with a change of the state. Scripture presents an example in 3 Kings 12. For they complain truly: “Your father imposed a most harsh yoke upon us; you, therefore, now lessen a little the rule of your father and the most grievous yoke that he imposed upon us, and we will serve you.” Nor does Roboam deny it: “My father made your yoke heavy.” This had been done by the old man when his expenditures upon seven hundred queens and three hundred concubines became immoderate. Jeroboam therefore easily led away ten tribes here, and, so that the defection might be ratified with blood, Aduram, Roboam's treasurer, was overwhelmed with stones. And in truth, seditions arise for the most part from a true beginning and from true evils, as what I taught concerning the causes of seditions has demonstrated. For either kings conduct themselves wickedly and tyrannically, or subjects unjustly oppose good kings.

But this is the worst thing: although sedition can be healed at its beginning, within a short time, when there is no measure in avoiding or avenging evils, the injury increases. And thus, while each party executes vengeance not by reason but by anger, it always inflicts a more grievous evil than it suffers. This customarily occurs because vengeance for a civil injury seems to provide two things: consolation to the man who received the injury and security for the future. It always provides the first for angry men, but not the second. It provides the first because to give back is sweet. For in anger there is a mixture of pain and pleasure. The man who returns pain thinks himself excused, even if it is greater than what he received. Truly and philosophically Homer says:

ὡς ἔρις ἔκ τε θεῶν, ἔκ τ᾽ ἀνθρώπων ἀπόλοιτο, καὶ χόλος, ὅς τ᾽ ἐφέηκε πολύφρονά περ χαλεπῆναι, ὅς τε πολὺ γλυκίων μέλιτος καταλειβομένοιο, ἀνδρῶν ἐν στήθεσσιν ἀέξεται ἠΰτε καπνός.

But may contention and anger perish from gods and men--

Anger which compels even the wise man to blaze up,

Which is much sweeter than dripping honey,

Growing in the breasts of men like smoke.

They therefore do not weigh injuries with equal weight, but pain against pain, so that, as though they had equalized the law of retaliation, they inflict something greater in return for the offense. Like men who strike back a ball they have received, they drive it back more strongly, assisted by the impetus of its coming. So greatly has this seemed good to many that they think vengeance is well sought even by death:

Though the gods destroy me, nevertheless they desire that I be aided,

Because before I perish they will give me time to take vengeance.

This evil, therefore, is sweet; it increases with practice; and although "vengeance" is an inhuman word, the thing itself is most eagerly sought and grows beyond measure. Hence it is the custom not only of barbarous peoples but also of the most cultivated to take vengeance; so little do they differ from those whom vices close to those of beasts have brutalized far from every fellowship of human law. Amid laws and magistrates, each man is the avenger of his own pain, and continual precautions against crimes are thrown off, while vengeance not only imitates the crime but exceeds it, and while men hate all whom they have injured and by whom they are injured. But the second thing, that is, security, it rarely brings, because the defeated man rarely remains quiet. And we have seen slaughters go round in a circle until power was transferred to foreigners.

Sometimes there is need of the greatest art and diligence in order that a defection can be foreseen. The Ionians who inhabited Asia suddenly defected from Darius and, after auxiliaries had been assembled in Greece and especially at Athens, burned Sardis. The cause of the defection was given by a plan of Darius that seemed safe but was unjust: he had planned to transfer the Ionians to Phoenicia and the Phoenicians to Ionia, so that he might thus tear the Greeks away from intercourse with Greeks and from their συμμαχία (alliance), and place in the midst another nation friendly to neither. When Histiaeus the Greek learned this in Persia, he burned letters onto the shaven head of a messenger, by which he disclosed the matter to Aristagoras, leader of the Greeks. The latter, when the messenger's head had again been shaved and he had read the letters, began a savage war as though for altars and hearths. Darius could not have foreseen this sedition in any other way than by suspecting that his purpose would not remain secret. And Aristagoras indeed was killed, and Histiaeus was driven onto a cross; nevertheless Darius could not accomplish the migration of the nations.

They openly sow calumnies in order to disturb quiet men and stir up seditions. Tarquinius Superbus furnished an example in the council of the Latins. Another was furnished under Aurelian, when a secretary displayed a document upon which he said that the names of men destined for death had been written. Absalom also overreached his father by manifest calumny, 2 Kings 15: "Your words seem to me good and just, but there is no one appointed by the king to hear you." And Absalom would say: "Who will appoint me judge over the land, so that everyone who has a suit may come to me and I may judge justly?" Yet the greatest regard for justice was maintained by David. Thus Valerius came under suspicion of seeking the kingship because of the house he had built, nor could he dispel the calumny except by its demolition. Aulus Albinus was stoned by the army because of false suspicions his enemies had spread, Valerius

Maximus IX.8. These things have now become excessively customary in our own times, in which every deed and saying of princes is taken in the worse sense. Homer once presented Thersites as the example of those who railed against kings and moved sedition.

Enemies, too, when they could not calumniate brave men with words, disparaged them by the facts themselves. Coriolanus devastated the fields of the plebeians and left those of the patricians untouched, in order to kindle manifest dissensions. Hannibal likewise refrained from the fields of Fabius Maximus in order to render him suspect; but Fabius broke the force of the calumny by declaring the field public property. The Romans did not do these things without a precedent. The Lacedaemonians left the fields of Pericles untouched so that they might create resentment against him and a suspicion of treason. But he gave them as a gift to the state, by which act he obtained great praise and proved his fidelity more fully to the Athenian people.

Another kind of calumny occurs when all things that are vicious, or seem so, are raised to a greater degree, and good things are taken in the worse sense. This became so manifest at Rome in the tribunes of the plebs that there is no need of another proof. Nothing ever done by the Roman Senate was so pleasing as when it decreed pay for the soldiery, and nothing was received with such great joy: men flocked together, praised the senators, grasped their hands, and said that they had truly been called fathers. What did the tribunes do? Alone untouched by the common joy and concord of the orders, they denied "that this was as joyful to all the senators, or would prove as prosperous, as the senators themselves believed," Livy IV. "The plan was better in its first appearance than it would prove in practice. For from where could that money be raised except by imposing a tribute upon the people? From the property of some, therefore, they would be generous to others.

[Printed page 748]

"Nor, even if the others endured it, would those whose terms of service had already been completed suffer others to serve under a better condition than that under which they themselves had served, and the same men both to have made expenditures for their own pay and to make them for that of others."

But when they heard that the army was also to winter in the siege of Veii, they magnified everything and twisted it to the worse sense. They repeatedly said: "This was the thing for which pay had been established for the soldiers; nor had they been mistaken that this gift would be smeared with the poison of their enemies. The liberty of the plebs had been sold; the youth had been removed forever and banished from the city and the state, and now did not yield even to winter or the season of the year so as to see their homes and affairs. What did they think was the cause of this continued military service? They would surely find no other than that nothing might be done for their interests through the frequent presence of those young men in whom lay all the strength of the plebs. Moreover, they were harassed and subdued much more bitterly than the Veientes. For the latter passed the winter beneath their own roofs, defending a city with excellent walls and by its natural position; the Roman soldier endured under skins amid work and labor, buried beneath snow and frost, not laying down his arms even in the span of winter, which is a rest from all wars by land and sea.

"Neither kings, nor those proud consuls before the tribunician power was created, nor the grim command of the dictator, nor the oppressive decemvirs had imposed this form of slavery, that men should perform perpetual military service. The military tribunes exercised kingship over the Roman plebs. What, then, would those men do as consuls or dictators who had made their proconsular likeness so savage and cruel? But this happened not undeservedly: not even among eight military tribunes had there been a place for any plebeian. Previously the patricians had been accustomed to fill three places with the utmost contention; now they went eight abreast to obtain commands, and not even amid the crowd did any plebeian cling on who, if nothing else, might remind his colleagues that those who served were their free men and fellow citizens, not slaves; that at least in winter they ought to be led into homes and beneath roofs; and that at some time of the year they ought to see their parents, children, and wives, exercise liberty, and elect magistrates."

What could have been more shameful than for citizens thus to rage against the concord of their fellow citizens? But it was done, nor was it passed over by the senators. For Appius depicts for us the nature of these calumniators in its native colors:

“If it was ever doubted, Quirites, whether the tribunes of the plebs have always been the authors of seditions for your sake or for their own, I hold it certain that in this year the doubt has ceased. I both rejoice that at last an end has been made for you to a long error, and, because this error was removed especially amid your prosperous affairs, congratulate both you and, on account of you, the state. Is there anyone who doubts that the tribunes of the plebs were never so offended and agitated by any injuries done to you, if perhaps there ever were any, as by the senators' gift to the plebs when pay was established for those serving as soldiers? What else do you believe they either feared at that time or wish to disturb today except the concord of the orders, which they judge to be the thing most capable of dissolving the tribunician power?

“Thus, by Hercules, like wicked craftsmen they seek work: they always wish something in the state to be sick so that there may be something for whose treatment they are summoned by you. For do you defend or attack the plebs? Are you the adversaries of the soldiers, or do you plead their cause? Unless perhaps you say this: ‘Whatever the senators do displeases us, whether it is for the plebs or against the plebs.’ And just as masters forbid their slaves to have any dealings with other men and judge it right that others refrain equally from kindness and injury toward them, so you forbid the senators intercourse with the plebs, lest we call forth the plebs by our courtesy and generosity, and lest the plebs be attentive and obedient to us. How much more, if there were in you anything--I do not say of a citizen, but of a human being--ought you at last to favor and, so far as lay in you, to indulge instead the courtesy of the senators and the obedience of the plebs? If that concord should be perpetual, who would not dare promise that this dominion will in a short time be the greatest among its neighbors?”

No one doubts that such men must be eliminated from the state as pests. The reason is that even the best princes have many things that must be amended; their administrators commit many faults; the princes themselves seem to commit more, and they actually commit some. If all these are gathered together, exaggerated, understood with a hostile mind, and infected with the poison of a malevolent tongue, the state must necessarily collapse.

[Printed page 748]

Calumnies are indeed effective for stirring up hatred, but sometimes by the same means men produce fear, as in the death of Aurelian. Sosis of Syracuse contrived plots and a tumult against Dion by this art. Stained with blood and speaking in a lamentable voice, he delivered himself to the multitude, asserting that he had suffered these things from Dion and that all men must expect all the same things. The sedition was indeed composed at that time; its author afterward paid the penalty at Athens. Pisistratus had long before cast the Athenian people into the same fear. For in order to oppress Megacles and the wealthy, he inveighed bitterly against him in an assembly; on the following day he came wounded, complaining that he had been treated so unjustly and insultingly by the nobles. The people, agitated by anger and fear, since they believed that this savagery threatened the bodies of them all, gave Pisistratus three hundred bodyguards for the protection of his life; with these he seized the tyranny. Dionysius obtained bodyguards through the same fear and seized power. For since fear is a most effective passion, and one that makes men anxious and suspicious, it is easily employed for sedition.

They oppose all things, lest the adverse party should be rendered stronger in any manner. Herodian demonstrates this concerning Antoninus Caracalla and Geta. But their hatred and dissensions increased day by day. For whether certain commanders and magistrates were being chosen, each particularly favored his own friend; or whether they pronounced judgment, they always held different opinions, sometimes with great danger to the man whose case was at issue. For they valued their own partisan zeal more highly than right or equity. Even at the games themselves they always belonged to different factions. Besides this, they omitted no form of plots, repeatedly attempting to impel cooks and cupbearers to poisonings. This was almost the perpetual work of the Roman tribunes: to obstruct levies, magistracies, and trials.

Those men act more criminally who bring the state and the army into danger so that they may make the magistrates hateful and overthrow them. By this fraud Philip, as Capitolinus attests, deprived the younger Gordian of both empire and life. First, through Philip's artifices, the grain ships were turned away; then the soldiers were led into those places in which a grain supply could not be obtained. Hence he immediately rendered the soldiers hostile to Gordian, for they did not understand that the young man had been deceived by Philip's artifices. But Philip also added this: he spread a rumor through the soldiers that Gordian was a young man and unable to govern the empire, and that it was better for the man who governed the soldiery and understood the state to rule. He also corrupted the officers and brought it about that Philip was openly demanded for the imperial power. In the same manner Stilicho spared the barbarians so that he might raise his son to the imperial power.

When magistrates see a prudent, active, and keen man doing this--that he may grow famous, come forward by means of expenditure, and lead clients--and when he does it neither from prodigality nor folly, they ought to determine with certainty that something greater is being constructed by these beginnings. Thus Caesar acted. Plutarch, in his Caesar: “In addition to these things, by the splendor of his dinners and table and, in sum, of the rest of his life, he gradually gathered power in the state. His enemies, judging that this power would soon vanish when his expenditures failed, securely permitted him to become famous in the state. But too late, when it had already become immense and overwhelmingly strong, and they perceived that it was openly breaking forth into a revolution, did they notice that no beginning of any affair is to be judged small, because continuation does not immediately render it great, and because, from the very fact that it is despised, it succeeds in not being impeded.

[Printed page 749]

“Accordingly Cicero, who was the first to regard Caesar's conduct in the state with suspicion and fear, and who, as in a calm sea, perceived the fierceness concealed beneath his humanity and flattery, used to say that in all Caesar's other undertakings and actions he discerned a tyrannical disposition. ‘But,’ he said, ‘when I see his hair so carefully arranged and the man himself scratching his head with one finger, on the contrary, that man does not seem to me likely to conceive so great an evil in his mind as to overthrow the Roman state.’”

This, too, was an art of the ancients. Manlius had freed debtors and bought favor by the loss of his wealth, which he thought he would recover when he had seized the state. Spurius won over the people by an agrarian law, Maelius by largesse. All were men of excellent spirit and not unworthy of command, and perhaps would have been most excellent kings if they could have come to the scepter without crime.

In addition to immense hopes, they also scatter money. Herodian, in his Elagabalus: “His mother also secretly gave money for him to distribute privately among the soldiers, so that he might possess their goodwill, increased also by the pledge of money--for this is what they chiefly regard.” Many Romans, so that they might hold the first place in a sedition and crush the opposing parties, poured out their patrimonies. Marcus Livius Drusus, tribune of the plebs, promised the courts to the Senate, the Senate to the equestrians, lands to the plebs, and citizenship to the Latins, so that he said he had left nothing for anyone else to bestow except heaven and mud. Agrippa also came under suspicion because he bestowed many things upon the people, adorned Rome, and gave oil and salt to all. Sejanus tested the dispositions of the citizens, and especially of the soldiers, by gifts.

It would be a long and unnecessary discussion to speak of those who overcame citizens and enemies by money; men give all things for money. When Seleucus had proclaimed a reward of one hundred talents for the head of Theodotus, who had charge of the treasury at Sardis, and now all things were full of suspicions, Theodotus himself opened the citadel to him. For when he saw that money was stronger than fidelity among his own men and observed that amid civil wars he was not safe, he preferred to hand over both the entire treasury and himself rather than to die honorably and prove his fidelity to his prince.

They are accustomed to make a show of zeal for peace so that all things may be received more gently. Tacitus: “A few days after the Kalends of January, letters were brought from Belgica from Pompeius Propinquus, the procurator: the legions of Upper Germany, having broken their reverence for the military oath, demanded another emperor and permitted the Senate and Roman People the decision of choosing him, so that the sedition might be received more gently.” We have seen the rebellions of France, the Low Countries, and Bohemia; nothing could have been said or done more gentle in appearance, more artfully colored, or more disguised. They said that they loved their kings, obeyed them in all things, acted against hidden enemies, and wished the royal majesty to be defended by all. “For king and law,” they inscribed upon their standards. Yet Caesar displayed nothing other than the safety of the state, nor did Pompey display anything else. And Cato deservedly reproaches the soldiers:

> You were Pompey's army,
>
> Not Rome's.

The shameless boldness of many has also raised itself up to stir peoples by inserting themselves into a favored and illustrious family. Smerdis pretended that he was the son of Cyrus and the brother of Cambyses whom Cambyses had killed, and, because of the hatred for Cambyses, who ruled most cruelly, he was eagerly received, until, when the fraud had been discovered, he was killed by seven nobles. Herodotus, book I.

In the same manner, the man whom they pretended to be the son of Antiochus Epiphanes was assisted by the cities. He grew so powerful that he killed Demetrius Soter; and if, corrupted by the kindness of fortune, he had not acted with excessive intemperance, he could have held the kingdom for a long time. Archelaus, Andriscus, Anarhates, Alexander, Herophilus, Chamaces, the false Neros, Scriboniani, Commodi, Frederici, Henrici, and Richardi practiced a similar kind of fraud. But men do not readily believe them unless a change is already desired. Thus these dangers hang over a state when its present condition is hated. Here also care must be taken that such men do not grow strong in power; for in this way they establish the belief more firmly, and those to whom that error is profitable maintain and defend it even knowingly and willingly.

Some states have been so constituted that they do not easily admit civil disturbances, as among the Chinese. For the people cannot easily move itself, since it is oppressed by the immense power of the governors; nor can the mandarins who govern do so, for they are from the common people, and, in the second place, they lack military force. Third, they have ministers assigned by the king, and the military magistrates are subject to the civil. Our Jarric describes these things in the Indian Treasury, volume II, book 2:

“The third good that arises from this form of state is that civil wars and internal disturbances, which rise here and there, are wholly cut off and removed. For the king's sons and brothers can stir up none while grasping at the kingdom. Although they are kept splendidly, nevertheless, in the place to which they are banished, it is unlawful for them to set a foot outside, under the appointed penalty of death, unless the king's permission has been obtained--a permission that he will never give. In addition, they govern no affairs, but power has been entrusted to the mandarins alone; nor is it easy for the mandarins to stir up any disturbances. For those who are permanent and military are subject to the civil officials, while the latter hold power for only three years. Moreover, because they generally reach this summit of honors through learning and virtue, and since most are plebeian and humble, they cannot therefore rely upon the aid of friends or blood-relations; and if perhaps relatives by marriage pressed them or suggested loftier ambitions, it would be in vain. For mandarins are always appointed on foreign soil.

“Furthermore, they are so distinguished from one another that those who preside over military affairs do not involve themselves in political and civil affairs; those who care for the state have no care of the royal treasury; and the prefects of the treasury do not concern themselves with either civic or military affairs. Finally, because magistrates are not permitted to attach to themselves any ministers other than those whom the king assigns, no handle is thereby given to anyone for secret disturbances or the stirring up of civil wars.”

Nevertheless, just as that arrangement, now tested in China, is praised during a long peace, so in European, Asian, and African kingdoms it is altogether useless, indeed very pernicious. For when the state is constituted in this form, no man of any ability and prudence devotes himself to military service. Hence they are by no means safe by their own strength. A proof is that the Japanese, whose resources do not equal a hundredth part of those of the Chinese, assembled one hundred and fifty thousand men and attacked the kingdom. Although they were repulsed after suffering a defeat, nevertheless everyone sees how greatly the Chinese are held in contempt if one considers military affairs, since the lord of that island dared to attack so great a kingdom with a fleet and thought that he could possess it. This hope would be no less foolish and wicked than if the king of Britain trusted that by the strength of his islands--

[Printed page 750]

--he could reduce all Europe, united under one king, into his power. The form of their state therefore renders the Chinese unwarlike; and if some one keen and able man rebelled with the aid of neighboring kings, he would easily seize or tear apart China. Thus one must not greatly praise a state that is composed of slaves and, as it were, women--certainly of men unwarlike and therefore more exposed to warlike nations.

Other states have been so constituted either by their laws or by the custom of the people that at a slight impulse they are borne up and down, as was the kingdom of the Egyptians. Therefore the disposition of the people must be known; for some have been so disposed that they cannot and will not act without sedition. Trebellius Pollio attests concerning the Egyptians: “And this is familiar to the people of the Egyptians: as though furious and mad, they are led by every trifling matter to the greatest dangers of the state. Often, because salutations were neglected, a place in the baths was not yielded, meat and vegetables were withheld, slaves' footwear was involved, and on account of other such things, they advanced through sedition all the way to the greatest danger of the state, so that armies were armed against them.

“Accordingly, in their accustomed madness, when on a certain day the servant of a certain governor who then ruled Alexandria had been beaten in military fashion because he said that his sandals were better than a soldier's, the assembled multitude came in uncertainty to the house of the commander Aemilianus and pursued him with every instrument and fury of sedition. He was struck with stones and attacked with the sword; no weapon of sedition ceased. Therefore Aemilianus was compelled to assume the imperial power, since he knew that he must perish from every quarter.”

Meanwhile the Jews who lived around Cyrene, under a certain leader named Andrew, slaughtered Romans and Greeks alike. They ate their flesh, girded themselves with their intestines, smeared themselves with their blood, and clothed themselves in their skins. They sawed many in two from the crown of the head, threw many to the beasts, and also forced many to fight one another, so that as many as two hundred and twenty thousand men perished. In addition, in Egypt and Cyprus under the leadership of Artemion, a similar slaughter of the Cypriots was perpetrated, in which two hundred and forty thousand men were lost. From this it comes about that a Jew is not permitted to enter Cyprus. If one should perhaps be driven to the island by the force of a storm, he is killed. But the Jews were subdued both by others and especially by Lucius, whom Trajan had sent. A prince, therefore, ought to know the nature and morals of his people.

CHAPTER XV

Remedies against Seditions and Civil Wars

[Printed page 750]

The remedies are altogether of two kinds. Some are prophylactic: they remove the causes and preserve beforehand. Others are applied when affairs have already been disturbed, in the midst of their heat. Of the former kind are those things already said concerning right instruction; for if they are observed, tumults will not easily arise and can be quieted with little labor. For if the prince preserves his authority and power and consults the safety of his subjects, he will easily regulate a quiet state by laws. To this pertains the enumeration of seditions and of the causes of tumult, so that by considering them a prudent magistrate may render his city immune from those evils by which he has seen others perish. But since plots are laid even against the holiest and most just magistrates, either from the depraved nature of the people or from the vices of certain men, we must treat of guarding against them and restoring peace.

The first and safest remedy is to meet the beginnings; for here plainly:

> Medicine is prepared too late
>
> When evils have grown strong through long delays.

The first movements subside under modest remedies; when they have gathered impetus, they devastate everything. And it is established that it is easier to exclude pernicious things than to govern them, and not to admit them than to moderate them once admitted. Nevertheless, admitted things, when they are small at the beginning and have not yet placed themselves in undisturbed possession, readily allow themselves to be cut back. The reason why all things are easily corrected at the beginning is that the contagion has not seized many; next, the few who are the authors conduct everything timidly; many are ignorant of the causes and attach themselves through folly.

Thus, in the affair of Saint Paul, when the city of Ephesus was filled with confusion, most did not know for what cause they had assembled, yet they cried for two hours, “Great is Diana of the Ephesians.” How easily did the town clerk restrain such great movements? Acts 19:35: “Men of Ephesus, what man is there who does not know that the city of the Ephesians is the worshiper of great Diana and of Jupiter's offspring? Since, therefore, these things cannot be contradicted, you ought to be quiet and do nothing rashly. For you have brought forward these men, who are neither sacrilegious nor blasphemers of your goddess. But if Demetrius and the craftsmen who are with him have a case against anyone, court days are held and there are proconsuls; let them accuse one another. If, however, you seek anything concerning another matter, it can be resolved in a lawful assembly.” If the magistrate had not met the affair at the beginning, it would have come to slaughter and plunder; then the mere investigation of questions and judgments would have hurled them into further evils.

Histories teach that very many seditions were suppressed at their beginning. For although many conspiracies were entered into and plots laid against individual emperors and kings, they were nevertheless removed from the midst only by the last of them; they therefore suppressed very many. The Spartans quieted a most dangerous sedition with a word. The Partheniae had established as their signal that they should throw mud into the middle of the forum to begin the tumult. When the ephors learned of it, they ordered it proclaimed by the herald: “Those of you who wish to remove mud from the forum, depart”; and thus the sedition was dispersed. Polyaenus IV. If they had begun to remove the mud, that tumult would have raged with the slaughter of the magistrates and the state.

All tumults indeed must be treated immediately, but they must not immediately be met by an assault; for when resistance is made to an evil that cannot be conquered, it is provoked and rages farther. When the people is in motion and fury, measures that soothe it must be taken, and the people must be questioned gently. Thus it was done in the Roman secession. The counsel is no different in individual cases. Caesar, already supported by legions, secure through magistrates he had bought, pleasing to the people, and strong through his conspiracy with Pompey and Crassus, ought not to have been provoked; but he should have been permitted the powers which they could not take from him. Tiberius approached Sejanus cautiously and gradually. Nicolaus Utranus forbade anything to be done against Cosimo de' Medici once he had already been strengthened. Thus, when a sedition burns with a great cause, or when it has been strengthened through delay, it must be attacked not by engines but by mines.

Seneca puts it beautifully. They say that a physician, when he had to treat the daughter of a king and could not do so without iron, while gently warming the swollen breast, applied a scalpel covered with a sponge. The girl would have resisted the remedy if it had been applied openly; because she did not anticipate it, she endured the pain--the woman who is healed secretly only when deceived. This must be done in a fresh sedition when men have, or seem to themselves to have, great causes for rioting. For the first onset of the plebs must be guarded against; presently--

[Printed page 751]

--when it has subsided, individuals flee apart in fear, no one trusts another, and all are anxious for their safety.

Yet in this matter nothing is more pernicious than through delay and negligence to give men time to compare counsels, strengthen themselves, gather auxiliaries, and--what contributes most to breaking their hope of pardon and is an impediment to quiet and peace--to commit offenses. For the farther they advance, the more gravely they transgress, because they injure others more in order to protect their own position. By this slowness, too, while they fight for altars and hearths, they are rendered bold, contemptuous of dangers, and altogether warlike; for this reason they cannot be compelled to their duty except by great expenditures and wars. Caesar warned that dangerous and great things must be done, not deliberated about; this must be said especially of seditions. Here assuredly that saying has a place: the swifter an onset is, the stronger it is. Hence in the Capitol, in the forum, in the very gathering of the people, seditious men were killed by the Romans. Courts did not sit against violence; the sword was drawn.

Despair must never be cast upon rebels. He who hopes for nothing despairs of nothing and dares everything. He thinks anything preferable to perishing amid mockery and the insulting of enemies. Despair is always dangerous; for after a man has renounced safety, he seeks consolations for destruction and companions in death. Severity must therefore be used in such a manner that a hope which is not vain is shown to those who return to their senses. The Roman state was tossed by such savage wars because the defeated placed no protection in the mercy of the victor. They renewed the war in Africa, in Spain, at Pharsalus, and in Sicily because they preferred to drag out their life through unhappy wars rather than be slaughtered like sheep. They remembered the times of Marius and Sulla.

Alexander Severus overcame a conspiracy by kindness. Lampridius relates a witty history. When a certain Quintius Camillus, a most delicate senator of an ancient family, wished to rebel and aimed at tyranny, and when this had been reported to Alexander and immediately proved, Alexander summoned him to the palace and thanked him because, when good men declined it, he voluntarily undertook the care of the state that was to be imposed upon them. Then he proceeded to the Senate and called the man--who was afraid and wasted away by so great a corruption of conscience--a partner in the imperial power. He received him into the palace, admitted him to his table, and honored him with imperial ornaments better than those he himself used. And when an expedition against the barbarians was announced, he either urged him to go himself, if he wished, or to set out together with him. When Alexander made the journey on foot, he invited him to the labor; when Camillus held back after five miles, he ordered him to sit upon a horse; and when after two stages he was wearied even by the horse, he placed him in a carriage. When Camillus refused this too, whether from fear or shame--indeed, when he even abdicated the imperial power and was prepared to die--Alexander dismissed him; he commended him to the soldiers, by whom Alexander was singularly loved, and ordered him to go safely to his estates, where he lived for a long time.

In a similar manner the tyrant of Athens recalled his seditious friends. When the friends of Pisistratus had withdrawn from him, he came to them with his bedclothes. When they marveled, he said that he had come so that, if he persuaded them, he might bring them back, but if not, he might remain with them. Severus certainly acted more rightly than if he had raged against a most delicate man unused to labor. For dangers and fears, when the counsels and examples of others are added, arouse even cowards. Otho was soft and ruined by pleasures, yet he fought bravely and accomplished death by his own hand--not bravely indeed, but nevertheless obstinately, and showing what more he could do when so prepared to die. Even Sardanapalus, an example of luxury, did not fear the flame of his burning palace.

Men must therefore not be reduced to despair, even when unarmed. Weapons remain to the despoiled; and if those are lacking, fury will furnish weapons. But if the fury has cooled, others will be inflamed for vengeance. The speech of a Campanian citizen sufficiently demonstrates this, Livy XXVI, where he introduces Vibius Virius speaking thus:

“What sort of surrender do you think that will be, by which we once surrendered ourselves and all our possessions to the Romans in order to obtain aid against the Samnites? Has it already departed from your memory at what time and in what fortune we defected from the Roman people? Have you forgotten how, in the defection, we killed with torture and insult the garrison that could have been sent away; how often and with what hostility we broke out against those besieging us; how we attacked their camp; how we summoned Hannibal to crush them; and, as the most recent act, how we sent him from here to attack Rome? Come, on the other side, review the hostile things they have done against us, so that from this you may know what you are to hope.

“When a foreign enemy was in Italy, and Hannibal was the enemy, and all things blazed with war, they omitted all else, omitted Hannibal himself, and sent both consuls and two consular armies to attack Capua. For a second year they keep us encircled and shut in and waste us with famine, themselves undergoing with us the utmost dangers and most grievous labors; often slaughtered around the rampart and trenches and nearly driven from their camp at the very end. But I omit these things. It is an old and customary matter to suffer labors and dangers in attacking an enemy city. This is the proof of execrable anger and hatred: Hannibal attacked their camp with immense forces of infantry and cavalry and captured part of it; they were not moved from the siege by so great a danger. He crossed the Volturnus and burned the Falernian territory; they were not called away by so great a disaster to their allies. He ordered hostile standards to be borne against the city of Rome itself; they despised even that storm hanging over them. He crossed the Anio and placed his camp three miles from the city; at last he approached its very walls and gates; he showed that he would take Rome from them unless they abandoned Capua--and they did not abandon it.

“If you go toward the lairs and cubs of wild beasts stirred by a blind onset of rage, you turn them aside to bring aid to their own. Rome besieged, wives and children whose wailing was almost heard even here, altars, hearths, temples of the gods, and the tombs of their ancestors profaned and violated did not turn the Romans away from Capua. So great is their eagerness to exact punishment, so great their thirst to drink our blood. And perhaps not unjustly: we too would have done the same if fortune had been given us. Therefore, since it seemed otherwise to the immortal gods, although I ought not indeed to refuse death, while I am free and master of myself I can escape by death the tortures and insults that the enemy hopes for, and by a death not only honorable but also gentle. I shall not see Appius Claudius and Quintus Fulvius supported by insolence in victory; nor shall I be dragged in chains through the city of Rome as a spectacle in a triumph, then in prison or bound to a stake, my back torn by rods, to submit my neck to the Roman axe. Nor shall I see my country destroyed and burned, nor Campanian mothers, virgins, and freeborn boys carried off for violation. They overthrew Alba, from which they themselves had sprung, from its foundations, so that neither the stock nor the memory of their origins might remain; much less can I believe that they will spare Capua, toward which they are more hostile than toward Carthage. Therefore, for those of you whose resolve it is to yield to fate before they see these many and great bitter things, a banquet has today been furnished and prepared at my house.”

Twenty-seven senators accompanied him and took poison after the banquet. How greatly could Rome have profited if it had conducted its wars more mildly! They rebelled for so long because they feared tortures.

[Printed page 751]

Furthermore, just as a sedition sometimes arises from fortuitous events, so at times it is quieted by them.

[Printed page 752]

The annals of Tacitus furnish an example. Chance softened a threatening night that was about to break forth into crime. For the moon was seen to grow dim in a clear sky. The soldier, ignorant of the reason, accepted this as an omen of present affairs and compared the failure of the star to his own labors, supposing that the things they pursued would turn out prosperously if brilliance and splendor were restored to the goddess. Therefore they made a din with sounding bronze and a harmony of trumpets and horns, rejoicing or grieving as it became brighter or darker. After clouds arose and obstructed it from view, and it was believed to have been buried in darkness, as minds once struck by superstition are changeable, they lamented that eternal labor was portended for them and that the gods abhorred their crimes. If such events obtain a true or skillful interpreter, they effect the greatest change in the rude crowd; if a malicious one, they customarily make it more savage.

It is customary, if the authors of seditions cannot be removed, to win them over by gifts and soften them with the hope of pardon. For if they hope for pardon and trust that they will obtain it by a lawful way, they will easily turn their sails backward and be reconciled to the state. If, moreover, they abandon those whom they have stirred up, all things will soon become tranquil; for when the wind has fallen, the sea lies placid. Nor is it contrary to the authority of the prince to strengthen public peace by the safety of one wicked man, to remove civil wars, and, so that many good men may be preserved, to preserve even some wicked men. No one treats this wound more easily than the man who made it.

Nevertheless, I would not wish this to be done in the manner in which the sophist spoke. For when the law was that whoever had moved a sedition should die and whoever had quieted one should receive a reward, and the man who stirred it up had himself quieted it, a question arose concerning the reward. The sophist replied: “Which comes first, to move a sedition or to quiet it?” When the answer was “to move it,” he said: “Let him first die, therefore, and then, if it can be done, let him receive the reward.” Far from the state be public fraud, by which the fellowship of the human race is altogether dissolved. Let the prince remember that it is much more beautiful and praiseworthy to make a friend from an enemy than to kill an enemy. The people drove Cimon into exile, but, when the necessity of the state pressed, it acted to have him recalled. Gracchus prevented Scipio from being led to prison, although before this they had lived as bitter enemies.

But at this point the man who has been injured must be warned to propose and maintain a reconciliation truly, not feignedly. Antigonus treacherously punished with death the man persuaded by his promises. Leucon likewise postponed his vengeance but exacted it grievously. Certain trierarchs were attempting treason. He ordered them to remain quiet, lest, if the enemy conquered, it should seem that a calumny had been constructed against them; meanwhile he adorned their relatives with dignities and prefectures, but when the war was ended he killed them all. Agathocles killed all the suspected men, up to five hundred, at a banquet, after he himself had played the flute and danced at the banquet. Polyaenus V.

If the authors of sedition can be recalled to duty neither because they are elated by prosperity nor through fear of punishments, occasions of discord and distrust sought among them disarm the seditious. It is exceedingly customary to render the enemy's commanders suspect. But it is a strong protection, especially when the rioters are governed by the command of several nobles or of the people. How easily did the envoys of the Tarquins incline noble young men, even the Brutuses themselves, toward the kings? Livy I: “A king was a human being, from whom one could obtain something wherever there was need of right or of injury; there was room for favor and for a benefit; he could both become angry and forgive, and knew the distinction between friend and enemy. The laws were a deaf and inexorable thing, more salutary and better for the needy than for the powerful; they had no relaxation or pardon if one exceeded the limit. Amid so many human errors, it was dangerous to live by innocence alone.”

This is more readily done in sedition than in war, for many reasons. Behold how great a crime: not merely to act so that kings might be brought back upon equal conditions, but, when a reward was offered from the other side, to betray everything. Behold: in that very year they brought themselves to betray their liberated country, their father the liberator, the consulship that had arisen from the Junian house, the senators, and the plebs to a king who was formerly proud and was then a hostile exile. Rebels of other nations will do the same if there is a reward for the work. If they do not, nevertheless they can be rendered mutually suspect, when some nourish rivalries against others and exercise private enmities; when some come to honors through canvassing, others are rejected, and merits are not weighed, but wealth or affinities. Hence come the offenses and indignation of many men against kings.

When subjects seek from a magistrate something not unjust or wicked by nature, it must be granted in such a manner that he does not appear compelled by force or fear--or else one must yield altogether; for it is better to escape the blow than to be wounded. When the Roman Senate had granted the people the power of creating military tribunes, all those created were patricians; the bitterness of the plebs showed itself not so much in the execution as in maintaining the right. But if a king or Senate, when it sees some one man employing largesse, wishes to allure the people by its own beneficence, it will also render the attempt of others ineffectual. For several men can give many more things, and give them from the public treasury, than private persons can. Xenophon yielded his horse to a common soldier who murmured against him and ran up a mountain on foot. His fellow soldiers, indignant and stirred by the danger, urged Xenophon to preserve himself for the duties of a commander and execrated the detractor.

Those who desire revolution must frequently be confronted with this fact: the men whom they themselves place over affairs are not better than the others. If this is done suitably and opportunely, a bridle can easily be imposed upon all seditions. For since the most loathsome men stir up sedition, they can hardly be judged worthy of command. There is a remarkable example in Livy XXVI:

“Thence he turned his course to Capua, which was luxuriating in long prosperity and the indulgence of fortune. Above all amid all its corruptions, Pacuvius Calavius, himself a noble and popular man but one who had obtained wealth by evil arts, had rendered the Senate subject both to himself and to the plebs by the license of a plebs exercising liberty without measure. When he happened to hold the highest magistracy in the year in which affairs had gone badly at Lake Trasimene, he judged that the plebs, long hostile to the Senate, would dare a great crime when an opportunity for revolution arose: if Hannibal came to that place with his victorious army, it would slaughter the Senate and deliver Capua to the Carthaginians. Although a wicked man, he was not utterly ruined; since he preferred to rule over an unharmed rather than an overthrown state and believed that none could remain unharmed when deprived of public counsel, he devised a plan by which he might both preserve the Senate and render it subject to himself and the plebs.

“Having summoned the Senate, he first declared that a plan of defection from the Romans would in no way be pleasing to him unless it were necessary--for he had children by a daughter of Appius Claudius and had given his daughter to Livius in marriage at Rome. Yet a much greater and more fearful danger was at hand: the plebs did not aim to abolish the Senate from the city by defection, but wished by slaughtering the Senate to deliver the state, emptied of it, to Hannibal and the Carthaginians. He could free them from this danger if they entrusted themselves to him and, forgetting their contests in the state, trusted him. When all, overcome by fear, entrusted themselves to him, he said: ‘I shall shut you in the senate-house and, as though I too were a participant in the contemplated crime, shall find a way for your safety by approving counsels which I would oppose in vain. Receive from me whatever pledge you yourselves wish for this.’

[Printed page 753]

