Nevertheless, the madness of those men is blamed upon letters in vain. For in all arts, even the illiberal, there is a certain laborious and foolish subtlety. What garment did nature will to be ready for man? It is made from the hide or wool of animals. But how many kinds of clothing have leisure and luxury invented! A toga is scarcely completed in one year, the workmanship of which exceeds its material. Let courtiers themselves consider how much time they spend upon ceremonies and titles. In every matter there is something excessive, in every life something superfluous. Saddles, bridles, and the collars of greyhounds are burdened with elaborate expense. And now the evil has increased to such a degree that those things appear necessary, and the man for whom expenditures upon these follies are lacking thinks himself in need. Therefore, just as superfluities are introduced by human folly into every art concerned with every kind of thing and action, so too the liberal arts are afflicted by the same cause.

In the third place I said that it is not useless to the state for the cares and labors of certain men to be detained upon those curious, useless, thorny, and grim matters. Just as excessive diligence in the treatment of the liberal arts serves some advantage, and it is desirable for a prince to have certain craftsmen of the highest excellence in all arts, even those which are not necessary, so too it is conducive to many things that there should be a few men who have exceeded the measure in the liberal arts. He who draws a grain of millet through the eye of a needle will easily strike a designated enemy with a sure blow. He who could enclose the whole Iliad in a nutshell will easily write secret letters for his prince to men under siege. He who could walk upon a rope will proceed securely over the walls and battlements of the enemy. He who is an excessive investigator of history nevertheless carries a light before the rest.

Annaeus relates these superfluous matters: Duilius was the first to conquer in a naval battle. Curius Dentatus was the first to lead elephants in a triumph. Claudius Caudex was the first to board his own ship. Valerius Corvinus was the first to assume a name from a conquered city. Sulla was the first to exhibit lions released in the circus. Pompey was the first to present a combat of eighteen elephants. These things have their own utility and assist men who are occupied. For those leisured men are like nomenclators, who promptly supplied names to their masters; they arranged friends and clients in order by name and always had books at hand so that they could remember. The memory of so many names--of so many powerful men and so many childless old men--is an immense and fastidious labor; nevertheless, many men wore away a lifetime in it. At that time it was a profession: “to beat upon the proud doors of the more powerful, to arrange childless old men alphabetically,” as Seneca says in Epistle 68. And it is agreed that there were large books containing the names both of clients and of the more powerful. Labor in these excessive cares of letters is not dissimilar, because it is frequently of use in grave matters--not so that the intellects of youth may be distracted by these minutiae, but so that certain amusements of the arts may be preserved, just as those of other things in the state are preserved. Never will there be too many men in so grim a labor; in every other field more men transgress through curiosity than in the sciences.

§ 5. Will you therefore tolerate in the state a man counting the syllables of Homeric verses, one disputing about the mark behind Helen’s ear, one doubting Penelope’s chastity, one examining ancient stones, one writing three hundred volumes of dialectic or four thousand on grammar? Certainly: just as you tolerate an athletic trainer, a flute-player, arrangers of delicacies, and painters of faces. Yet that curiosity of grammarians is more honorable and is frequently useful to many; much more so is that of natural philosophers and mathematicians.

§ 6. Much greater is the assault of martial men upon men of letters: they contend that spirits are broken, grow languid in leisure, and lose their courage. Nor do they listen to an excuse, for there is not enough reasoning in arms; they advance with sheer force. Yet learned men ought not to yield. They possess the prerogative bestowed by the man who sang, to the disgust of all:

> Let arms yield to the toga; let the laurel yield to the tongue.

Once the eloquent man bore the arms of the brave man: Ulysses those of Achilles. Agamemnon desired not ten Ajaxes or Diomedeses, but Nestors. Many wars are brought to completion by counsel, few by strength.

> Ὅπλον τοι λόγος ἐστὶ τομώτερον ἀνδρὶ σιδήρου.

Speech is a sword sharper than iron for a man.

Two things perfect a warrior: prudence and courage. Without courage, prudence can resist for a long time; without prudence, courage is nothing, and the rashness which takes its place constructs its own ruin. It is truly said:

> Ἀλκὴ δ’ ἀνεμώλιος ἄφρων.

Foolish courage is weak.

It is truly said:

> Διπλοῦν ὁρῶσιν οἱ μαθόντες γράμματα.

Those who have learned letters see double. In war there is the greatest need of counsel, because counsel must be taken both most swiftly and most prudently. Most swiftly, because opportunities must be seized and counsel taken in the arena itself. Most prudently, because it is not permitted to err twice: the first error is fatal. A learned man, from history, from philosophy, and from stratagems, will decide the matter more swiftly and safely; others will decide more slowly. That error--that only fury is needed in war--is not the error of soldiers but of rustics. There is need of a commander who is pleasing to the soldier, who can temper the fierce, rouse the sluggish, and strengthen the fearful; who can retain allies, attract the wavering, and soften enemies; who can diminish an enemy's power, render his allies suspect, and set them against one another. If war were nothing other than a battle line, and if men fought in the battle line solely with the strength of their bodies, after the manner of the Andabatae, perhaps there would be less need to know human affairs.

Do you think that the philosophy of Socrates and knowledge of all histories hindered Xenophon? Did Julius Caesar conquer more slowly because he loved learning? Lucan, Book 10:

> The fame of my son-in-law indeed led me to the Pharian cities,
> Yet also fame of you; amid battles I always devoted myself
>
> To the regions of the stars and sky, and to the gods above;
> Nor will my year be surpassed by the calendars of Eudoxus.

Pericles, the thunderbolt of Greece, for forty years governed the people by eloquence, the soldier by courage, and both by prudence. He was a disciple of the philosopher Anaxagoras. Greece scarcely knows a better man than Dion, scarcely a wiser slayer of a tyrant; yet he professed that he owed all those ornaments to Plato. Greater in learning and in name, Timotheus, a most excellent general, emerging from the instruction of Isocrates, restored the affairs of Greece. Archytas of Tarentum instructed Philolaus, and Xenophon instructed Agesilaus.

The Athenians sent three philosophers to Rome concerning the greatest affairs--Carneades, Critolaus, and Diogenes--although the negotiation was chiefly instituted concerning war and alliance. Zeno of Elea taught military affairs by design, and very many slayers of tyrants came forth from his school. Whether rightfully or wrongfully, I do not dispute; this I assert: his school was plainly martial. By reading, Lucullus suddenly became a commander and so broke the forces of Mithridates that he handed the victory over him to others. Tullius himself both sought a triumph and judged more prudently concerning the civil war than Pompey.

§ 7. I do not judge either Virgil or Horace to have been unwarlike, and I judge Ennius also to have been a brave man. Alcaeus, Stesichorus, and Archilochus were also renowned in war, although the last resolved to abandon his shield rather than his life.

Letters, therefore, are equally necessary for peace and war. Agrippina acted wickedly when she denied that philosophy was suitable for Nero, who was to become emperor; for she feared that, if cultivated by letters, he would more quickly pass out of his mother's power. Nor was Louis XI right when he wished his son Charles to know no more Latin than these words: "He who does not know how to dissemble does not know how to reign." For certainly many things were found wanting in his reign.

Letters do not draw men away from the conduct of affairs if they are joined with prudence; for in letters we learn both things done and things to be done, and before all else to abhor idleness. Were Severus, Pertinax, and Antoninus less because they were learned? Men acclaimed to Tacitus: "Who rules better than a man of letters?" And indeed he would have ruled most excellently if customary treachery had not removed him from their midst. Gordian was an orator and a poet; he made Misitheus prefect and by his counsel rightly administered the empire. I shall close with the jeweled maxim of Pope Julius II: knowledge of letters is silver in common men, but jewels in nobles and princes. I shall add: in commanders it is victory.

CHAPTER XIII

Academies and Public Schools Must Be Established

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. Eupolis, Timon, and others testify that the Academy, so called from the hero Academus, was in a suburb of Athens, six stadia from the Dipylon Gate. Caelius relates that the place was unhealthy and arid. And he excuses Plato, who chose it for studies, on the ground that, because he enjoyed an excessively prosperous condition of body, he wished by the inconveniences of the place to restrain that condition in its luxuriance. But since students have the greatest need of suitable health and air, and since Plato sought renown and attendance for his Academy, I cannot persuade myself that he wished to deter his disciples and drive anyone away by the unpleasantness of the school. For how few are there who would not prefer to be in good health rather than to learn? Or who would wish, for the sake of learning, to enter a pestilential house? Another cause, therefore, must be sought for his establishing in the Academy a school sacred to Pallas. I think it was this:

ἵν’ μὴ ἀναπολήσειεν ἡδονάς, that he might not recall pleasures, a quiet place was sought, away from the crowds of sailors and from the luxury of the city gardens; for exercises of the mind rejoice in quiet and solitude. Nor was another place at hand or in Plato’s power. But concerning the healthfulness and pleasantness of the Academy, we must think somewhat differently if we listen to Plutarch in the Life of Cimon. For Cimon made the arid place well-watered by conducting the purest waters to it, and planted it with a shady grove. There were three schools at Athens: the Academy, the Lyceum, and the Stoa. Aristotle’s walk was in the Lyceum; Zeno, the chief of the Stoics, taught in the portico; Plato’s was the Academy. It retained the name, so that all renowned schools founded with the immunities of monarchs are called academies. An academy consists of a multitude of teachers and learners, privileges, and what is, as it were, a state of learned men.

§ 2. The right to erect an academy belongs to the pontiff, the highest monarchs, and all states, so far as letters and the civil sciences are concerned. For as regards sacred law and theology, the power to teach them with authority must be sought from the supreme prelate of religion.

Saint Thomas, in his treatise Against Those Who Attack the Religious Life, refers that power to the pope, king, and prince.

As concerns princes, it belongs to them to determine what faculties they wish to be taught in their provinces and who may occupy themselves in them, and to grant privileges and immunities. Yet they cannot bring it about that those schools are regarded as academies in the kingdoms of other princes; if, however, the approval of the supreme pontiff is added, those schools too are held valid. It is of great importance that the highest chairs of teachers depend upon the highest authority.

First, a place suitable for students must be chosen. In it I require fineness and healthfulness of air; fertility, or easy approaches by which necessities can be imported; renown; and also well-mannered citizens.

Above all, a prince will esteem healthfulness of air. For it conduces both to intellects and to bodily health, and it also produces better and properly mannered inhabitants. I should therefore be unwilling for an academy to be established at Thebes in Boeotia, lest in the thick air more polished intellects too grow brutish; but rather in Attica itself, at Athens, the inventress of the arts, where there is

Ἑλλὰς τῆς Ἑλλάδος,

"the Greece of Greece," where there is the common Museum of all Greece. For the gentler Muses cannot bear inhabitants of a harsh and uncultivated disposition.

No one fails to see that the fertility of the soil, or the convenience of rivers and harbors, is necessary so that food may be supplied to a great multitude. Otherwise students are exhausted by expense and the inhabitants are burdened.

From this it follows that academies must be established in renowned cities, or in cultivated towns near which there are rivers, marts, and a populous concourse. This was customary among the ancients. Athens, τῶν λόγων ἑστία,

"the hearth of eloquence," had the most acute citizens because of the temperateness of the climate, the convenience of the place, and attention to the best things. Cicero, For Flaccus; Eusebius, Book 10, chapter 2. And so it was most honorable to devote one's labor to the liberal arts or to philosophy at Athens. Cicero, Book 1 of On Duties: "Although, my son Marcus, since you have now been hearing Cratippus for a year, and that at Athens, you ought to abound in the precepts and principles of philosophy because of the very great authority both of the teacher and of the city--the one of whom can increase you in knowledge and the other by examples--nevertheless, just as I, for my own benefit, have always joined Latin studies with Greek, and have done this not only in philosophy but also in the exercise of speaking, I think that you must do the same, so that you may be equal in command of both languages."

And in Book 3: "You have undertaken, besides, the heavy burden both of Athens and of Cratippus. Since you have set out for them as though for a marketplace of the good arts, it is most shameful to return empty. Therefore, strive with as much exertion of mind as you can, contend with as much labor--if learning is labor rather than pleasure--and bring it about that you do so; and do not allow it to appear that, although everything has been supplied by us, you have failed yourself."

In that very place Cicero did not consider it beneath his dignity if he himself also professed philosophy, as he testifies in Book 3. Leading Romans indeed used to journey there; Aulus Gellius, Book 1, chapter 2. In Jerome's work addressed to Marcella, a distinguished orator is said to have reproached a certain man because he had learned Greek letters not at Athens but elsewhere. That distinction remained with the most renowned city for a long time. Nazianzen and Basil the Great studied there. But afterward both the glory of its studies and the city itself declined.

§ 3. Byzantium, nevertheless, transferred to itself a great part of the praise and renown of Athens. For the arts, following the majesty of the empire, placed their seat at Constantinople, to such a degree that Athens was now distinguished more by the shadow of its ancient name than by any present good. So Gregoras and Emperor Frederick to Nicholas V. Theodosius, Valentinian, and others assisted letters wonderfully. A royal house was also added, in which twelve of the most learned and select men were to dwell and answer those who consulted them; Zonaras, Book 3. Leo, because they opposed Iconoclasm, burned them together with the house and the books; and from that time studies languished in the imperial city, barbarism increased, and at last the harshest Turkish servitude was imposed. Bardas, Leo the Philosopher, his son Constantine, Constantine Ducas, Alexius Comnenus, and Andronicus the Logothete indeed attempted to restore the schools and studies to their former flower, but through schism, heresy, and wars all things fell.

§ 4. Nearly equal to the school of the Athenians in antiquity and renown was the Cranium, the phrontisterion of Corinth, in which even Dionysius, after being driven from his kingdom, taught letters as a mockery of fortune. That city was great and distinguished by two harbors, celebrated by the merchandise as well as the intellects of Europe and Asia. The sect of the Cynics especially flourished there, one in harmony with the most corrupt morals of the city. For the city, always infamous before, was in the time of Saint Paul, so to speak, a stable of shamelessness.

The school of the Rhodians was also most renowned, but mathematical study and the oratorical faculty especially flourished in it. This was not so only in the final times of the Romans, when the state was already tottering and tending toward monarchy; for Aristippus also discoursed there concerning mathematics, and when, shipwrecked, he saw the marks of learned work in the sand on the shore, he bade his companions be of good hope, because traces of men appeared there also. The Rhodians had Panaetius, Stratocles, Andronicus, Leonidas, Pisander, Eudemus, Dionysius Thrax, Apollonius, and, before these, the exiled Aeschines--all most learned men. It seems to me that Rhodes rivaled Athens because of the convenience of navigation and the pleasantness of the place, since the leading Romans sent their children there. Cicero had his son there, as well as his nephew, the son of Quintus. Nor were the Athenians ignorant of this, for many Athenians devoted themselves at Rhodes to the study of eloquence; Laertius, Book 4. I judge that this happened because of the city's frequent disasters: Sulla's siege and other misfortunes frightened away the professors of the arts. At Rome the studies of wisdom began late to be held in esteem, but were thereafter cultivated with great honor. Good letters and schools therefore flourished in the foremost cities. Among them the school of Berytus stands out; Berytus is the most renowned city of Phoenicia after Sidon, near the mouth of the river Lycus. Justinian calls it most beautiful and grants it the same prerogative in letters as new and old Rome. "We will," he says, "that these three volumes composed by us be delivered to students only in the imperial cities--Constantinople and Rome--and in the most beautiful city of the Berytians, which someone may rightly call the nurse of laws, because this was also established by earlier emperors; and not in other places which have not merited such a privilege from our ancestors. For we have heard that in the most splendid city of Alexandria, in that of the Caesareans, and in others certain unskilled men wander about and deliver adulterated teaching to their disciples. We repel them from this attempt under the following threat: if they dare hereafter to perpetrate this and to do it outside the imperial cities and the metropolis of the Berytians, they shall be punished with a fine of ten pounds of gold and shall be cast out of that city in which they do not teach laws but commit offenses against the laws."

§ 5. The ancient and most renowned academy of all must not be omitted, which the Jews placed not in some desert but in the principal city, where the royal seat, the temple, and all the sacred institutions of the nation had been established. We owe its enlargement to Solomon, who discoursed from the cedar of Lebanon even to the hyssop which grows out of the wall. There were very many schools there, belonging to different sects and different nations. Josephus denies that philosophy and the Greek arts were taught there; indeed, he denies that this was lawful. But this must certainly be understood with qualification. For they rightly excluded that erring philosophy. If anyone today were to teach that pleasure is the highest good; if with the Academics he were to doubt all things; if with the Peripatetic school he were to assert the eternity of the world; or if he were to introduce Stoic fate, teachers of errors would rightly be proscribed by laws and punishments.

The other studies were by no means forbidden. They learned Hebrew grammar for understanding the sacred writings and Greek grammar for instructing proselytes; all were taught the divine and ancestral laws according to an established system. No one who has considered that the Egyptians learned these sciences from the descendants of Abraham, and the Greeks from the Egyptians, can be ignorant that eloquence, poetry or hymnody, logic, natural philosophy, and the mathematical disciplines were held in esteem and flourished among the Jews. The Essenes, detesting the Epicureanism of the Sadducees and the hypocrisy of the Pharisees, established separate schools by the Asphaltite Lake, in which they also taught the liberal arts. There is no need to speak of the most renowned schools of Alexandria, Antioch, Ephesus, Caesarea, and Nicomedia, since even Heliopolis, Carthage, and Cyrene had very well-equipped public schools.

Later generations imitated the ancients, who judged prudently concerning letters. Bologna, Ferrara, Florence, Milan, Naples, Padua, Pisa, Zaragoza, Coimbra, Granada, Seville, Salamanca, Toledo, Valencia, Paris, Angers, Orléans, Bordeaux, Lyon, Poitiers, Reims, Toulouse, Leuven, Cologne, Trier, Mainz, Vienna, Prague, Erfurt, Cambridge, and Oxford have academies. I am not ignorant that in Germany especially there are sometimes public schools in smaller towns. But either their situation is most convenient and they have populous cities round about--as at Molsheim, where a year ago the Most Serene Leopold, Archduke of Austria and Bishop of Strasbourg and Passau, erected a new academy; and at Paderborn, where the Most Reverend Bishop and Most Illustrious Prince Theodor founded a public school for the ingenious and industrious Westphalian nation--or the place must possess some renown. This is attained not merely from a multitude of citizens but from the presence of princes and a court, and from the distinguished learning and splendor of the clergy. For no one can recall without laughter the vanity of Bion of Borysthenes, who, in order to acquire authority for his school, drew into it a crowd of sailors dressed in scholastic garments. How far he was from that philosophy which he taught!

I therefore demand an attendance of learned and honored men in academic cities. For this causes young men to imbibe civility and courtesy of manners together with letters. Next, the professors themselves, in the public eye, discharge the most difficult duty of teaching with greater diligence, dignity, and eagerness, and avoid before the eyes of magnates and censors those things which prudence counsels them to guard against. Finally, since honor nourishes the arts, and all academies distribute among their own members various degrees of dignities and honors, there is no esteem for those degrees except in great cities or before an assembly of princes and nobles.

CHAPTER XIV

Privileges Must Be Granted to Professors and Students, and Which Privileges Are Suitable

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. The privileges of private persons are not detriments to the state, as envious malice is accustomed to object against many brave men. For since in justice the mean is not established according to arithmetical proportion, so that Titus has as much as Gaius, but by geometrical reckoning, so that the recompense for the labors and dangers of Titus bears the same proportion that Titus bears to Gaius, and reward is rendered according to the magnitude of the work and the dignity of the person, it is not unjust to give unequal things to unequal persons. Since, moreover, among all human things the studies of wisdom claim first place for themselves, they must be adorned with great honor and immunities. If, therefore, a laurel is decreed to the victor, if maintenance in the Prytaneum, if immunity from taxes, if other incentives to courage, how great must be the care for wisdom, by which courage and the other virtues are governed?

Privileges, moreover, belong either to places or to students and professors devoting their labor to studies in privileged places, as they call them. Both things and persons receive them. All are deservedly granted; for it is also fitting that the citizens to whom an academy is entrusted should be honored, so that they may be rightly disposed toward learned men, studies, and students, and may both wish and be able to assist them.

§ 2. The first privilege is that provision be made for the advantages and liberty of an academic city. History relates that the Athenians were endowed with many privileges. For after losing the empire of Greece and their liberty, they flourished much more peacefully under Roman rule, by the protection of letters, than they had when they lived under their own laws. Hadrian especially favored them: he honored their studies with money and an annual supply of grain, and gave them Cephallenia; so Dio Cassius and Sextus Aurelius Victor. Yet Demetrius had long before surpassed Hadrian’s munificence: although offended by their defection and taunts, he nevertheless relieved them, when oppressed by want, with a distribution of grain. Emperor Severus avenged his injuries less civilly, for he diminished their privileges.

Everything, therefore, which, in accordance with the character of the nation and the nature, business, and situation of its towns, can adorn and enlarge an academic city may be granted. Such is a prerogative of dignity among other towns; for since academic cities contain an academic senate composed of the wisest theologians, jurists, physicians, and philosophers, there is no doubt that the civic council too will become wiser through familiarity with and the counsel of the most learned men. Next, I judge that immunity from certain taxes must be permitted, especially those which are accustomed to burden the grain supply and provisions. For this benefit is general, as one bestowed upon various nations. Accordingly, just as Aachen, the most noble seat of the German realm, received throughout the whole empire freedom of commerce and immunity from tolls because the august emperors had established their residence there, so too the kindness of a prince requires that, like a father, he support more magnificently, with no loss to the treasury, whatever city he has willed to be an abode of wisdom, virtue, and letters. The large multitude of students, however, will compensate that loss in another way. Third, if a prince is not free to bestow this indulgence upon the whole state, he can nevertheless be more liberal toward those in whose houses and at whose tables students lodge; for in this way they will obtain more honorable lodgings at less expense.

§ 3. The second privilege is that the arts be taught publicly in one or two designated places in the city. This appears altogether necessary, for private and clandestine teachers, who are all mercenary, can introduce great errors. Theodosius and Valentinian forbade teaching at Rome in any place other than the Capitol: the sole law On Liberal

Studies in the City of Rome, Book 21, chapter 18. Nor do I judge that anyone can enjoy the privileges except those who are taught publicly in a public place.

Julian indeed prohibited the profession of civil law to the Alexandrians and Caesareans, because unlearned men, intent upon gain, imbued youth with depraved opinions.

§ 4. The sciences may also be taught in monasteries and by religious. This was the practice of old. Trithemius, On the Praise of Scribes, manual, chapter 16: "Nor ought you to leave the monastery for the sake of study, because you can find at home the means by which you may advance. For we have known that many most learned monks formerly flourished in our order, and we know that they studied only in monasteries. Bede, priest and monk, most skilled in every kind of learning, was entrusted to a monastery at seven years of age; there he drank in whatever he learned of the Scriptures. Among his disciples were the most learned Alcuin, later the teacher of Charlemagne, Claudius, and John Scotus--monks excelling in all doctrine, divine as well as secular, and instructed in Greek and Latin speech--of whom many distinguished works survive.

"Rabanus, abbot and archbishop of Mainz, was entrusted to the monastery of Fulda while still almost a boy; how much he advanced in every science his volumes testify. His abbot of Fulda nevertheless sent him to Francia for the sake of study, to Abbot Alcuin, whom we have already mentioned; under his instruction he persevered for many years in the monastery. Strabo, a monk of Fulda, is said to have been the disciple and scribe of Abbot Rabanus; given to a monastery as a young man, he shone forth as a distinguished teacher. So too Haymo, Notker, Hermann Contractus, and almost innumerable other monks were regarded as excellent teachers. Living humbly under the Rule of Saint Benedict, they had monasteries for their schools.

"Nor do we say that those men who were regarded as the teachers of others lacked teachers. They certainly had teachers, but monks and companions in the regular life, who instructed them no less by life than by doctrine. Perhaps we too should find teachers if we were willing to be disciples. For unless humility and love of the Scriptures mutually agree with each other, the studies of monks are neither expedient for the order nor profitable. Love of the Scriptures without humility destroys the discipline of the regular life; humility without love does not attain knowledge of those Scriptures.

"Therefore, let the man who desires to become learned in a monastery preserve these two things inviolate. Let us imitate the holy Fathers, applying ourselves to the divine Scriptures with humble love; and what divine grace conferred upon them it will not deny to us as we pray and read diligently. For the more assiduous each man is in reading, the richer the fruit he takes from it. The fruit, moreover, which we seek in the Sacred Scriptures is love of God and of our neighbor, and knowledge of our most merciful Savior."

For this reason we see that most theological studies have been entrusted to religious houses or persons even today. Gregory the Great also once cleansed Britain of the Pelagian heresy by entrusting sacred lectures to monasteries. Nor are the treatments of letters foreign to their institution, because, apart from jurisprudence and medicine, the other sciences are customarily referred to theology, although scarcely anyone can be a theologian without a general knowledge of laws.

§ 5. I am not ignorant that the profession of monks and ascetics--the divine occupations--sometimes conflicts with the variety of sciences taught in academies, as Charlemagne rightly judged in the additions to his Capitularies, chapter 45. But since many are compelled to apply themselves to sacred sermons and to the care of preserving and governing affairs; since very many abbots administer provinces, govern subject peoples, and possess their station and dignity in the empire, it ought not to seem foreign to a servant of God, a religious man, or a hermit of a monastery, amid so great a scarcity of pious teachers, to profess grammar, poetry, eloquence, and philosophy, so that by this opportunity he may instill piety into tender minds. Indeed, in former times the sons of magnates were excellently instructed no more in piety than in every kind of learning. For until approximately the year of the Lord 1200, monasteries were almost the sole abodes of letters. From that time academies were established and monastic discipline declined. The study of civil law is also often useful to clerics; but there is another place for treating these matters.

§ 6. Very many personal privileges--that is, privileges of professors and students--have been established in various academies, both by reason of their dignity and because the greater part of the students are foreigners. No one is ignorant of the great injuries to which they are exposed while, as young men far from fatherland and kindred, they are compelled to live under foreign law. The poverty of many is worthy of compassion; the nobility of others is often exposed to the dangers of journeys and to the tricks of cheats and money-changing. Unless the kindness of the laws assists them in all these things, it is inevitable that everyone should be turned away from studies and from learning and esteeming wisdom.

No one except students can properly estimate the labors of study. I confess that men of ability find in the treatment of studies a great delight, one greater than all human pleasures; for this reason it is easy for studious and industrious young men to be chaste. Nevertheless, that most delightful recreation of the mind gradually consumes health and even the man himself, like a kind of fever. For in truth it produces melancholy, rheums, diseases of the head, chest, and vital organs, and various symptoms, to such a degree that the most eminent physicians prescribe a certain special regimen for students. For these reasons princes have conferred very many privileges upon doctors of the gown.

§ 7. The first privilege is that professors and students should in most causes, or in all, be exempt from the jurisdiction of the ordinary praetor or judge, but have their own senate and judge; and thus, although the academy is in a city, it nevertheless enjoys its own law as though it were a certain private state. The reason is just and has been approved by all academic cities. For academies consist of many most distinguished and learned men, to whose judgment one might more readily entrust a lawful cause than to the consul or prefect of the city. Next, many causes arise which need a swift judgment pronounced, as it were, upon a summary hearing. Since students, as foreigners, readily suffer injury from inhabitants, there is need of a judge who is in no way suspect. It is readily presumed that a consul’s disposition is more favorable toward his own citizens--often his relatives and connections--than toward strangers and, as frequently happens, toward a neighboring and hated nation. Judges are therefore deservedly selected from the professors and academic senators.

Nevertheless, in most places this common axiom of law is preserved: the plaintiff follows the court of the defendant. And I judge that it is the foundation of a true and free academy to possess a magistracy and tribunal. For this reason Julius, the magnanimous and most provident bishop of Würzburg, when he founded an academy, gave it power equal to the ordinary tribunal of his chancery and admitted no appeal except to the prince alone. This was deservedly so, since princes themselves very frequently submit the gravest causes to the judgment of academies.

Yet I have observed that this privilege is sometimes abused, when youth, relying upon the leniency of the courts, fight among themselves with swords or grow insolent in injuries against the citizens. Grave citizens not rarely object to this, to the great disgrace of the academies and harm of studies. Martin Luther, shortly before his death, writes that this happened at Wittenberg, addressing his own colleagues. For he complains that such outrages were committed and that there was such contumacy that the four elements could not bear it; the leading men of Saxony afterward complained in the same way about the insolence of the academicians. These things must be avoided. Nevertheless, an academy must not immediately be assailed and its privileges diminished whenever the ardor of youth is swept away into some levity, since the vices of youth are corrected most calmly and easily through their own moderators.

And indeed princes, induced by the centaur-like counsels of certain courtiers, gravely err when they diminish the authority of those through whom alone they can restore holy morals--as though there were not graver sins in the cities themselves, indeed in the courts of princes, than among the alumni of academies, and yet princes would not wish the transgressions of their household attendants to shake the scepters from their own hands. With great judgment so great a liberty has been granted to studies, as at Bologna, Paris, and Mainz.

The first privilege of the Academy of Mainz, which Archbishop Diether granted, reads thus: "We therefore bestow, grant, and concede by force of the present letters: first, to the doctors, masters, scholars or students of our said university of Mainz, the judges whom they can possess by law--the rector and conservator of the university and the ordinary of the place." Most equitable statutes command the plaintiff to follow the forum of the defendant, for the common law decreed this long ago.

Concerning judicial procedure our founder established as follows: "In order that provision may be made for those incorporated into our university concerning observance of judicial order and the decision of causes, we will and ordain that the rector shall have power to hear and determine every cause and question arising among the aforesaid incorporated persons. If he is rejected as suspect by either party, we will that arbitrators be elected and that the other provisions which the laws make concerning this be observed."

Consuls, satraps, praetors, and judges ought neither to be jealous nor to judge that anything has been taken away from their dignity if a certain part of the state has other, and indeed its own, governors, since they themselves entrust their sons to teachers and pedagogues. For when anyone sends his children to Padua or Bologna, to the marketplace of the sciences, who judges it equitable that the child should be subject to civic rather than academic magistrates?

§ 8. The second privilege is that professors of the arts, doctors of laws, and their wives should have immunity from all civic and public duties, even from the reception of guests; so Constantine judged. In this matter the founder of our academy was indeed munificent. The words of the grant read thus:

"Likewise, let the doctors, masters, and students of our university, as also the notaries and beadles, be immune, exempt, and free, in their persons and in things pertaining to their food, clothing, and use, from public payments and charges imposed and to be imposed throughout the city and diocese of Mainz, by land or by water, and pertaining for the time being to the archbishops of Mainz. Let them neither be held nor compelled to the payment of a tax, excise, impost, toll, or of anything of any other kind, by whatever name they may be designated, every manner of deceit and fraud being entirely excluded.

"And we will that this concession and favor be understood of masters and scholars who dwell collectively in houses or bursae, and of students who, after obtaining the rector's permission, dwell in houses or rooms outside the bursae and maintain themselves and their households at their own cost and expense.

"Likewise, since the greatest quiet is fitting for professors of letters and for those who are to be instructed in learning and morals, and since those who pursue better things will be strangers to tumult, we will and ordain that the houses and dwellings of the rector, doctors, masters, and students--and especially the schools in which the college, doctors, masters, and students live together, which in their common manner they call bursae, or in which honorable students dwell after the rector's permission has been sought and obtained, maintaining themselves and their household at their own cost and by domestic provision--shall enjoy this perpetual immunity: that no official or member of his household, of whatever condition or status he may be or by however extensive a commission he may be appointed, shall presume tumultuously to invade those houses or dwellings, or break into or violate them with ruinous force, every fraudulent fiction or false pretext being entirely removed.

"Moreover, let no official or any other ecclesiastical or secular person presume in the city of Mainz to attack or offend any one or more of the doctors, masters, students, or their household, or to inflict violence or injury upon them. But if anyone, which God forbid, is found to be a contemner of this our concession, let him know that he will incur our indignation and a penalty to be inflicted according to the measure of such offense, deceit, or fault.

“And seventh: likewise we will that none of our functionaries and officials, or any other laymen or citizens, shall injure, offend, disturb, or otherwise place in danger in any manner any doctor, master, or student, by word or deed, directly or indirectly, every fraud and deceit being removed, under the aforesaid penalty.”

But since all who attend the schools and do not live within the bursae, as they say, do this with the permission of the rector, they all also enjoy that privilege. These provisions are clear concerning personal burdens and those goods which are given as salaries; but I do not think that the law is understood of patrimonial goods, nor does custom permit this. And lest those privileges of the renowned academy be infringed by the ignorance or malice of other administrators, the most wise founder willed that all officials of the city of Mainz be bound by oath to preserve the academy’s immunity. The words read thus:

“Likewise, every official of this our city holding office for the time being shall swear into our hands to preserve unharmed the aforesaid doctors, masters, and students in their persons, affairs, and goods, and not to contravene the said privileges, but to uphold them and their affairs, goods, and privileges aforesaid and hereafter stated, to the extent of his ability and knowledge.”

CHAPTER XV

There Are Many Other Privileges of Students, and What They Are

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. The pontiff, the emperor, individual princes, and states have granted very many privileges. Since later academies are customarily endowed with the privileges of the older ones, it happens that very many are granted in a single phrase. We see this done in this most noble academy, concerning which Pope Sixtus IV speaks thus:

"For the praise of the divine name and the propagation of the same Catholic faith, by apostolic authority and the tenor of these presents we perpetually erect, constitute, and ordain a university in the same city of Mainz; and by the said authority we establish and also decree that henceforth, for all future time, a university shall flourish there after the pattern of the aforesaid universities of Bologna, Paris, and Cologne, both in theology and in canon and civil law, as well as in every other lawful faculty or science; and that masters in theology, doctors, lecturers, and students there may freely and lawfully use, possess, and enjoy each and every privilege, liberty, exemption, immunity, grace, and indulgence which other masters, doctors, lecturers, and students in the universities of Bologna, Paris, and Cologne enjoy and use. Moreover, those who in the course of time shall have merited degrees in any of the aforesaid lawful faculties in which they have studied may receive a license to teach, so that they may instruct others, and may have the honor of the mastership or doctorate bestowed by the masters or doctors of that faculty or science in which the examination is to be held."

The founder equates Mainz with the three most excellent academies of Bologna, Paris, and Cologne. It has hitherto maintained that dignity so well that it has numbered among its auditors illustrious and learned men not only from Germany, Poland, and Belgium, but even from most cultivated France.

Therefore, lest anyone be ignorant of the great favor with which monarchs have pursued studies, and lest students themselves be unaware of their own advantages, I intend to set down those one hundred and eighty privileges--or, rather, heads and rubrics of privileges--from the most learned jurist Pierre Rebuffi.

§ 2. The first privilege from Rebuffi:

First. It is permitted to study, teach publicly, and dispute on every feast day--after divine worship has, of course, been rendered in the offices. Rebuffi thinks it forbidden if done for the sake of gain, as when an advocate studies on a feast day principally for gain. In this matter I by no means agree with him, for although he studies for the sake of gain, study is nevertheless not servile work, and desire for gain can obtain an honorable end. Nor does ecclesiastical law forbid gain, but servile work.

Second. It is lawful to study even in a church. Rebuffi's exceptions are general: one must not study at a time when one is obliged to hear Mass, nor study forbidden arts--which is not lawful even outside a church. In a church, however, the offense is graver, because it makes the house of God a house of wickedness.

Third. Scholars may expel craftsmen from their own house if they disturb their studies with noise. This is a great and almost odious privilege. Rebuffi nevertheless cites laws concerning this matter. Indeed, at Montpellier he says that he drove away a weaver who impeded students with singing; for when the magistrate, after hearing the rights of the students, ordered the importunate musician either to sing more softly or to withdraw, he preferred to leave the house rather than moderate his voice.

Fourth. A case concerning this privilege may be conducted on a court holiday; so he says. But I judge that this must not be granted unless the cause is urgent. I judge the following a legitimate cause: if, because of the dog days or other vacations, there were an interruption of several weeks, then, lest an entire college of students be compelled to endure a prolonged disturbance, the matter could be decided even on a feast day.

Fifth. This case may be treated and concluded summarily and without formal proceedings. Otherwise studies could be impeded for entire years, since while the lawsuit is pending the hammerer retains the use of his possession, and students do not readily undertake long-lasting lawsuits.

Sixth. No appeal is granted from a sentence pronounced against the hammerer. This has been abrogated by practice and, unless I am mistaken, by equity; for why should this be denied if knowledge is in question?

Seventh. A scholar can compel someone to let him a house, room, or horse. But I have nowhere seen the use of this privilege, and indeed it is altogether better not to use it, since the right not to be compelled against one's will to let property to another or admit a stranger into one's household is highly consonant with reason; and it is a matter of great danger to let a house to another. I have indeed never observed its use in any place.

Eighth. A landlord cannot expel a student from a rented house, although the landlord himself needs the house--if, evidently, it would have to be relinquished for that reason.

Ninth. When the term of the lease has ended, students must be preferred if they are willing to pay as much as others, unless perhaps--as generally happens--the habitation of students makes a house worse than does that of others, or unless they are of insufficiently accommodating morals.

Tenth. If a doctor or scholar rents a house already let to another scholar before the term of the lease has ended, he is excommunicated.

Eleventh. If he withdraws for a just cause before the term has ended, he is bound to pay not for the whole year, but only proportionately.

Twelfth. A student withdrawing from a rented house may substitute another in his place, provided that the landlord's condition is made worse in no way.

Thirteenth. If a civic statute provides that no one may buy more grain than for his own use, and a scholar buys for a year but then withdraws after half a year, he does not incur the penalty if he had intended to remain in that place for the whole year. I extend this privilege to everyone, including citizens, for an intention consonant with justice ought not to harm them.

Fourteenth. A scholar who withdraws may seek his share of things held in common.

Fifteenth. Flight does not render a scholar suspect of an offense; rather, he is presumed to be visiting his parents or seeking money.

Sixteenth. A loan for use made by a scholar is revoked before the end of its use when he wishes to withdraw.

Seventeenth. When the course of study has ended, a person is compelled, although unwilling, to bring his action against the student; or, if he does not act within a time to be fixed by the judge, perpetual silence is imposed upon him.

Eighteenth. Students acknowledge no charge for the lodgings in which they reside.

Nineteenth. Books are not tacitly pledged for the rent of a house.

Twentieth. In Rebuffi's judgment, it is a wrong rather than a privilege that a student living dishonorably can be expelled less readily than another tenant. I judge that he must be expelled not only from the house but also from the city.

Twenty-first. It is similar and unjust that infamous prostitutes may be brought into a common lodging; but those things were drawn from the sewer of the gentiles into the books of Christians and must be condemned to eternal silence.

Twenty-second. It is peculiar to the French to obtain nominations, but Rebuffi complains that those laws have now been overthrown.

Twenty-third. A student who has gone home for the sake of seeking money and immediately returned retains the privileges of study, and that time is computed in the five-year period. But in most cathedral churches of Germany and in others this is not observed. If even a single night interrupts the biennium, the whole of the remaining time is lost. Evil morals produced this severity of the laws. This ought to be added: that they should carry testimony to their diligence and progress. As it is, many pass the biennium idly in wealthy cities or live luxuriously.

Twenty-fourth. When nominees present their nominations to prelates and seek benefices, they cannot be examined, because the university has already approved them by examining them and conferring a degree. These provisions are for the most part observed; indeed, here at Mainz masters of philosophy are not examined even for orders. Elsewhere, however, the Church examines even doctors of theology, and the Church altogether retains this right and does not depend upon universities. Nor is this safe now, since many academies promote unfit men to degrees; for that this happens is clearer than daylight. I have seen masters of arts and philosophy who knew no difference among the three figures of syllogisms. Nor does Italy cease daily to send us certain doctors with diplomas who can scarcely determine in what faculty they were promoted. Hence many dispute against the privileges of academies. Louis XII indeed punishes with suspension of privileges and another discretionary penalty those academies which promote men unfit in morals, knowledge, and merits. Every effort must therefore be made that academies reform themselves.

Twenty-fifth. In France, parish priests of towns must possess a degree or at least must have studied for three years; I judge that this study must be understood as theology. In Germany many prebends require a mastership or baccalaureate.

Twenty-sixth. If a student has let the revenue of a benefice for three years or a shorter term and dies in the meantime, his successor is bound to hold the lease valid, because it was made in favor of studies and therefore for the utility of the Church.

Twenty-seventh. Greater benefices are owed to learned men, provided that their life corresponds to their learning--and, as morals have now declined, provided that relatives are lacking. For vices have long since suppressed this privilege.

Twenty-eighth. A student who has a vicar is released from reciting the canonical hours if he recites each day the Office of the Blessed Virgin and the seven penitential psalms. So a few canonists hold, but the others and the theologians think otherwise. For cursed is the study through which the divine office is abandoned. It is certain that no one is excused, for the entire office can be completed in almost one hour. How little it is, if from twenty-four hours you spend one upon God and prayer, you who live from the patrimony of the Church! Will one hour, or one and a half spent in prayer, impede you from attaining learning? Do you so flee piety that you seek immunity from that hour? You spend entire days upon games, walks, and spectacles.

Twenty-ninth. Scholars are not bound to reside in their benefices. It has now been most excellently established that they may not be absent without the permission of their prelates and that they must present testimonials of their studies.

Thirtieth. They are bound to pay nothing to the bishop if they do not reside.

Thirty-first. They receive the revenues of benefices as though present. This is not customary in Germany. A definite sum is assigned to them in favor of their studies. They certainly never receive distributions.

Thirty-second. Though absent, they retain the right of option.

Thirty-third. They are never deemed to be absent fraudulently.

Thirty-fourth. If someone studies in a nonprivileged place for the sake of repeating his courses, he retains the privileges of students for six months in France; in Germany no account is taken of private study.

Thirty-fifth. Once entered in the matriculation register, one returning by right of postliminy is bound to pay nothing.

Thirty-sixth. A beneficed cleric who, for the sake of studies, is not ordained within a year can receive a dispensation from the bishop.

Thirty-seventh. The bishop cannot revoke that dispensation without an evident cause.

Thirty-eighth. Money ought not to be received for a dispensation. This, however, is common to all sacred things, which ought to be given without a price.

Thirty-ninth. Dispensation is more readily granted to students and learned men.

Fortieth. Those who possess a degree can, with a dispensation, obtain four benefices. I shall speak of this abuse in Book 6, on the ecclesiastical magistracy.

Forty-first. A pension granted by the bishop for the sake of study is not taken away if an equal benefice is granted, but one which requires residence is, unless the studies have been completed.

Forty-second. The bishop together with the chapter can establish that every canon shall contribute something annually for the support of a poor, able, and diligent student.

Forty-third. Knowledge makes a rich man from a poor one.

Forty-fourth. Hence many serve learned men.

Forty-fifth. Students who have attained knowledge are regarded as noble. Indeed, in Germany they are equated with nobles--in the Imperial Diets at Augsburg in the years 1530 and 1548--and both formerly and now in many kingdoms they are preferred. For virtue is the one and only nobility; knowledge is a nobility lesser than virtue but greater than nobility of lineage.

Forty-sixth. A doctor who answers without present labor deserves a fee, because he has already labored formerly.

Forty-seventh. Poor students who beg, if able-bodied, cannot be compelled to labor, just as nobles cannot.

Forty-eighth. When two men of equal merit are elected--the unlearned choosing one and the university the other--the judgment of the university prevails.

Forty-ninth. The state ought to be entrusted to learned men.

Fiftieth. A learned student is preferred to an unlearned doctor.

Fifty-first. A scholar becomes more learned by teaching.

Fifty-second. A larger dowry is owed to a learned person.

Fifty-third. A father can be compelled to supply the expenses of study to his son. This privilege has so many limitations that I judge it never rightly done--indeed, not to be done.

Fifty-fourth. A parent is bound to give an allowance to a student at the beginning of the month. This privilege too is placed in the parent’s hand.

Fifty-fifth. In the division of an inheritance, a scholar receives the books before the division and is not bound to bring them into the common stock.

Fifty-sixth. Books are not reckoned into the lawful share; in a doubtful case the father is deemed to have given the books.

Fifty-seventh. When students are compelled to bring the books into account, they may retain the books and contribute their assessed value.

Fifty-eighth. A loan given to a son by his father can be reclaimed.

Fifty-ninth. A debt contracted for the sake of studies must be paid from the common property.

Sixtieth. A gift made to a son under paternal power is valid if the son studies.

Sixty-first. Nor can that gift be revoked.

Sixty-second. The father does not possess the usufruct of goods so given.

Sixty-third. A student may revoke a gift made with the intention of departing from study if he does not depart.

Sixty-fourth. A gift made to a student, even if it exceeds five hundred gold pieces, does not require registration.

Sixty-fifth. A student who is the son of a professor retains his origin in his father's city.

Sixty-sixth. A doctor is bound to support his poor scholar. But this is fitting only when the doctor is rich and the student poor. There are now so many thousands of poor students that scarcely any king could support them.

Sixty-seventh. Doctors can be witnesses for their own students and disciples.

Sixty-eighth. He whom his auditors regard as learned must be deemed learned.

Sixty-ninth. A doctor cannot be rejected as judge in the cause of his own students. Scholars, however, can reject the ordinary judge.

There has been great controversy concerning criminal causes. Students are customarily judged by their own doctors, but in horrendous crimes they are remitted to the magistrate. The slowness and connivance of academicians in punishing offenses has abolished many privileges. Rebuffi says that the Bolognese renounced their privilege; those of Mainz defend their right and, so long as discipline flourishes, will defend it with the state's applause. For privileges are customarily lost only through offenses.

Seventieth. Students do not summon their doctors to court unless permission has been sought, for no less reverence is owed to them than to fathers.

Seventy-first. Doctors ought not to beat their auditors. A light chastisement, however, is granted to a master of arts and to a teacher.

Seventy-second. An auditor may follow the judgment of a learned, conscientious, and modest doctor even when it is contrary to the common opinion. I understand this, however, only if the doctor judges it true and persuades himself of it by probable reasoning.

Seventy-third. A student summoned by his father may withdraw, even if he has affirmed by oath that he would not withdraw. This is unjust and therefore not a privilege, if the oath was given in a lawful manner and for a lawful cause; and it is an occasion of wrongdoing and fraud, which greatly bring the best arts into disrepute.

Seventy-fourth. One who swears that he will accompany the rector is not always bound to accompany him, provided that he devotes himself to studies at home.

Seventy-fifth. Students disobedient to the rector, even if they are perjurers, are nevertheless not infamous.

Seventy-sixth. Even if they swear that they will not take a degree in some university, they will nevertheless be able to do so if there is a new cause, such as a new examination. I judge that they are bound by the oath.

Seventy-seventh. A father visiting his son at the place of study cannot be sued there concerning other contracts, unless he is bound to the place by another cause.

Seventy-eighth. Much less can he be seized under reprisals, for studies would be greatly impeded.

Seventy-ninth. One who inflicts loss upon the relatives, servants, messengers, or messengers of students is bound to make restitution fourfold.

Eightieth. A mandate in favor of students does not expire upon the death of the mandator. Titus orders his agent to give one hundred gold pieces to Gaius the student; if he dies before the money has been given, his heir is bound to pay it.

Eighty-first. Doctors and students are not bound to execute apostolic rescripts.

Eighty-second. When there are two rescripts of entirely equal force, the presumption is in favor of the student.

Eighty-third. The goods of students ought not to be seized.

Eighty-fourth. An able and learned man can be made a doctor even before the five-year period of studies.

Eighty-fifth. The desire to surpass others in knowledge is not a sin. But this must be properly understood, and it applies to many other things.

Eighty-sixth. A student who is notoriously expert ought not to be examined.

Eighty-seventh. A student can exclude from his examination a doctor who is suspect.

Eighty-eighth. In this matter the student's oath is accepted.

Eighty-ninth. Doctors ought not to demand a dinner for the beginning of a lecture which students commence.

Ninetieth. A doctor ought to demand nothing from the poor.

Ninety-first. A rescript against a student is not valid unless it mentions that he is a student.

Ninety-second. A rescript granted to a student is not void if he is designated not from his fatherland but from his place of study.

Ninety-third. A change of name is not forbidden to students.

Ninety-fourth. Garments of every kind and color are permitted to students, for they are foreigners. Individual academies, however, are accustomed to prescribe modesty to their own students.

Ninety-fifth. One who has promised that he will write a book for a student is not released if he pays the student's interest; rather, it is necessary to complete the work itself.

Ninety-sixth. He is bound to write even with his own ink and rubric.

Ninety-seventh. A student may by his own authority seize a scribe who promised that he would write in a certain place, if the scribe deceives him. This privilege has been altogether abolished.

Ninety-eighth. In ecclesiastical territories the emperor is accustomed to legitimize a student.

Ninety-ninth. The disadvantage of a purchased thing does not fall upon a student.

One hundredth. Someone can be compelled to sell a site for enlarging the schools or one suitable for a college.

One hundred first. No one can occupy the places of students.

One hundred second. A student cannot be seized in a school unless he is rebellious toward his doctor.

One hundred third. An injury done to one student is regarded as common to them all.

One hundred fourth. The greatest friendship is contracted through similarity of studies.

One hundred fifth. A judge inquires without an accuser against those who trouble students, for it is sacrilege to attack a student's house.

One hundred sixth. A student who has suffered injury together with another who is not a student grants his own privilege to his companion, so that both may conduct their case before the conservators of the city.

One hundred seventh. An association of a few students can create a syndic.

One hundred eighth. If a student is killed and the murderer is not apprehended, the ten nearest houses are placed under interdict for five years. If a thing is taken from a student by theft, the neighborhood is liable. But these provisions have never been employed in Germany.

One hundred ninth. A doctor or exceptionally excellent student condemned for a crime ought to be given his life because of his expertise.

One hundred tenth. Neither students nor their servants ought to bear arms in a crowd. Scholars who carry arms every day--a sword and other weapons--are presumed wicked and to possess a malevolent disposition; the gloss on the paragraph If Any Rustic.

One hundred eleventh. If a student unknowingly passes counterfeit money, he is not punished, because he is presumed to know laws rather than money.

One hundred twelfth. If students become rich after a cession of goods, although they are bound to repay their creditors, nevertheless their books ought not to be taken from them.

One hundred thirteenth. Books cannot be taken from him for any cause, not even for execution of a judgment, unless he is unruly.

One hundred fourteenth. Books ought not to be given to another without an express mandate.

One hundred fifteenth. Jews and other purchasers of students' books cannot retain them until they are reclaimed by their owners.

One hundred sixteenth. A bookseller is bound to produce books to scholars so that a scholar may see whether they are his. Thus defendants are compelled to produce books to the plaintiff in order to establish his claim.

One hundred seventeenth. Although Jews ought not to live with Christians, their children are nevertheless not excluded from Christian schools.

One hundred eighteenth. Students are preferred to the other creditors; indeed, they possess such preference in these matters that the goods of the city are judged mortgaged to professors for their salaries.

One hundred nineteenth. A student who has suffered loss can seek restoration to his original position during his studies.

One hundred twentieth. A student deceived by booksellers immediately possesses an action for rescission.

One hundred twenty-first. A student cannot be sued in an academic place on account of contracts entered into elsewhere.

One hundred twenty-second. Nor even on account of obligations contracted before his studies.

One hundred twenty-third. Indeed, not even on account of offenses committed at another university.

One hundred twenty-fourth. Repentance is also allowed to students, so that a student is not regarded as infamous if he restores what was taken away.

One hundred twenty-fifth. Students enjoy all the privileges of the citizens among whom they reside.

One hundred twenty-sixth. Yet students are citizens of the city in which they reside in such a manner that they experience its advantages, not its disadvantages.

One hundred twenty-seventh. Accordingly, they are not bound to the burdens of the city, even if something has been established concerning this matter contrary to their immunity.

One hundred twenty-eighth. A student can make a testament concerning goods given by his father or by others.

One hundred twenty-ninth. Students are regarded as foreigners, are presumed to be ignorant of the customs of the city, must be defended by everyone, and belong to the forum of the Church.

One hundred thirtieth. If a legacy of books is established, a doctor will possess all the books belonging to his faculties; if he has been promoted in several faculties, he will possess even those of medicine.

One hundred thirty-first. A legacy is owed to a student at the place of the academy, and is not diminished by the expense of conveying it unless the testator has provided otherwise.

One hundred thirty-second. If maintenance is bequeathed to a student, it must be paid in money.

One hundred thirty-third. An uncertain legacy for the sake of study is valid, because it is deemed to be for pious causes; the promise and stipulation are interpreted according to the judgment of good faith.

One hundred thirty-fourth. The Falcidian deduction is not taken from a legacy to students, just as it is not taken from legacies for pious causes.

One hundred thirty-fifth. A legacy made to mendicant religious for the sake of study is valid.

One hundred thirty-sixth. An annual legacy is owed at the beginning of the year.

One hundred thirty-seventh. A legacy left by an informal expression of will, if it has been furnished for three years, is also owed thereafter.

One hundred thirty-eighth. When books are bequeathed to students, money for purchasing them is deemed to have been bequeathed.

One hundred thirty-ninth. Students may confess to the parish priest in whose parish they reside or to others possessing lawful authority.

One hundred fortieth. A student cannot be deprived of his privileges or matriculation unless he has been warned three times.

One hundred forty-first. If someone has been ordered to be matriculated, he is regarded as matriculated for the purpose of undergoing the imposed penalty if he has offended a student.

One hundred forty-second. Even one struck from the matriculation register enjoys the privileges until he is enrolled in another university.

One hundred forty-third. In a city which is under interdict, students can hear lectures, although their doctors too are under interdict.

One hundred forty-fourth. If a student beats a cleric moderately, he can be absolved by the apostolic conservator.

One hundred forty-fifth. What students expend is deemed to be expended for the utility of the Church.

One hundred forty-sixth. They owe no tolls upon the things which they carry with them.

One hundred forty-seventh. If they assert that they are carrying books, credence is given to their oath and that of their messengers.

One hundred forty-eighth. Those who compel students to pay tolls are deprived of all their privileges.

One hundred forty-ninth. Students are immune from levies and public duties.

One hundred fiftieth. They cannot be seized under reprisals.

One hundred fifty-first. A student who is not otherwise proscribed is always safe while going, remaining, and returning.

One hundred fifty-second. A student has as judges the bishop, the civil authority, the rector, and the doctor.

One hundred fifty-third. Even after joinder of issue, he can choose another judge.

One hundred fifty-fourth. When summoned by a judge who is not his own, he is not bound to plead his privilege, because he is notoriously privileged.

One hundred fifty-fifth. In civil and criminal matters he can be a plaintiff without the consent of his father.

One hundred fifty-sixth. Indeed, some extend the privilege concerning a civil action to monks; I judge that this is forbidden by the vows and oaths of religious.

One hundred fifty-seventh. One who draws a student before a foreign tribunal loses his case.

One hundred fifty-eighth. Doctors possess jurisdiction over students by the law of all academies, and in many places those who appeal elsewhere are perjurers.

One hundred fifty-ninth. Even masters of arts are judges in controversies among their fellow students.

One hundred sixtieth. A student sued before his own judge can bring a counterclaim.

One hundred sixty-first. Students may draw their debtors as far as four days' journeys.

One hundred sixty-second. Students who are plaintiffs do not follow the forum of the defendant. But this is nowhere observed except where there are special conservators who are, as it were, judges of both parties.

One hundred sixty-third. Students may appeal from an interlocutory judgment.

One hundred sixty-fourth. Students may appeal directly to a superior judge without an intermediate judge, because the emperor by special grace offers himself for their defense.

One hundred sixty-fifth. A student loses his privilege when study ceases. If, however, he attends the schools from time to time and studies at home--especially if he is of advanced age--he retains it.

One hundred sixty-sixth. The servants and scribes of students, accessory persons, and even their entire colleges enjoy their privileges.

One hundred sixty-seventh. A student's servant cannot seek wages unless mention and agreement were made.

One hundred sixty-eighth. Setoff cannot be sought against students, for by this means a student could be reduced to extreme straits.

One hundred sixty-ninth. A student is never deemed to seek academic honors through ambition.

One hundred seventieth. A student can be a witness for his companion and friend, especially in a cause concerning studies.

One hundred seventy-first. A student may be given as surety, but he must renounce his privilege.

One hundred seventy-second. A student who is a surety and is about to depart for study can ask the creditor to substitute another.

One hundred seventy-third. A magistrate who seizes a student offering sureties and does not release him is liable for injury; but this applies in a civil, not a criminal, cause.

One hundred seventy-fourth. Maintenance unduly given to a poor student cannot be reclaimed.

One hundred seventy-fifth. A gift made by a wealthy wife to her student husband is valid.

One hundred seventy-sixth. For a doctor, the time during which he professed before his doctorate counts toward the comitiva which someone obtains by twenty years of teaching.

One hundred seventy-seventh. A father may cede a lawsuit to his student son.

One hundred seventy-eighth. All these privileges are deemed to have been granted to students motu proprio; therefore deceit is presumed absent, especially with respect to those privileges which are in the body of law.

One hundred seventy-ninth. When all privileges are derogated by an edict of the prince, those privileges which are in the body of law are not deemed included, and a special privilege is not derogated by a general law.

One hundred eightieth. Historians, rhetoricians, and grammarians also enjoy these privileges, but not those who teach or learn the first elements of letters, and in no way those who devote themselves to forbidden arts.

The privileges of Mainz likewise extend only to those who devote themselves to studies. “Likewise,” says the founder, “we will that the privileges, concessions, exemptions, and indulgences given and granted as stated above shall be understood only of doctors and masters incorporated into the university and its faculties, and of students who enter, attend, and are enrolled in the matriculation register of the university.”

I wished to collect all these things from a most diligent and most learned jurist, not being ignorant that not all are everywhere employed and that many have been privately granted in other places, but so that they might be ready at hand for readers and all might recognize with what great favor, liberality, and munificence princes, kings, emperors, and above all the Church and the supreme pontiff have pursued professors and pupils of the sciences. His sole care ought to be that learned piety and pious learning be preserved in the Christian world.

There are, however, very many times and occasions on which scholars do not enjoy these privileges. For some privileges, if they do not involve injustice, rightly carry offense to others, and have a just use only among the most just. Next, students have fallen from the right of privileges if a student is a wanderer; if he lives dishonorably; if he neither studies at home nor attends lectures; if he is a disturber of others and of discipline; if he beats, mocks, reviles, or hisses at others; if he is a gambler, bankrupt, or blasphemer; if he is excommunicated; if, being a cleric or monk, he studies without the permission of his superiors; if he refuses to obey the rector; if he devotes his labor to forbidden arts; or if he studies outside privileged schools.

Golden, therefore, is the law of our academy, which adorns golden Mainz. Although expressed in the words of an ancient age, it possesses the sense of true and genuine piety: “We further will and establish that doctors, licentiates, masters, and generally all incorporated into our university who wish to enjoy its privileges shall live honorably and according to the precepts of law and the statutes of our university. First, let them render due honor to the rector; then each to the other according to the preeminence of dignities and degrees. Above all, we require doctors, masters, and graduates to display gravity, constancy, and maturity of mind; in scholars, obedience, chastity, and diligent study; in all, finally, gentle and honorable morals; and, in sum, a life becoming disciplined men. We shall nevertheless punish the rebellious, disturbers of the peace, unruly men, night-wanderers, and all other delinquents whatsoever according to the atrocity of the offense, as follows."

To this pertains that noble exhortation of the Faculty of Philosophy to its pupils: "May it be happy and auspicious, and indeed for the entire literary state. We intend to publish our sacrosanct laws and statutes to our entire assembly. In this business of promulgation, you, studious cohort, present yourself to us as one who must first be admonished, lest you appear to have assembled for the publication of our statutes with unwashed hands and feet, as the saying goes, or with insufficient reverence. Indeed, we command and desire all comrades of our service to listen with purified ears and minds and to pay attention without yawning. We desire men who are properly well-born, tractable, intent upon the studies of the disciplines, and burning with love of them to be presented to us. But, on the contrary, we send far away from here the unruly, undisciplined, difficult, and morose, those born under an unfavorable genius and with the Muses and Apollo angry; and by manifest declaration we reject them as unwarlike, slothful, and useless for literary service."

The most provident care of our ancestors rightly enacted these things. For such great privileges were bestowed upon the study of wisdom, piety, and the liberal arts, and upon the utility of the state--not upon the wickedness, idleness, and luxury of wandering young men.

CHAPTER XVI

Degrees and Honors Must Legitimately Be Conferred upon the Learned, and Must Be Highly Esteemed

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. I have undertaken to treat separately a privilege of great advantage and great dignity, one which preserves most academies from destruction: namely, the honors, power, and titles which a university, as a certain state, is accustomed to confer upon those who have deserved well. For this shows much more clearly that an academy is a state than does the use of a scepter. The state alone distributes public dignities among its citizens. Therefore, just as every state is governed by expectation of rewards and punishments, so too are academies. It is rightly said:

> Οὔτε γὰρ ὁ μισθὸς οὐδέν ἐστ' οὔθ' ἡ τέχνη.

There is neither reward for the art, nor does the art itself flourish.

All honorable things languish unless value from honor also accrues to them. For who will consecrate his sons to study if no rewards are established for so prolonged and uncertain a labor? As it is, many din this into little children:

> Why do you attempt a useless study?

The other honors conferred by the multitude are indeed held in less esteem. But true honor is the judgment of wise men concerning the dignity of another. This exact judgment of learning began with the academies themselves. For although great honor was formerly decreed to learned men, nevertheless neither so exact a test by the Lydian stone nor a distinction of orders was instituted; that privilege is reserved for the worthy members of academies.

In Lucian, Solon desires that those who have conducted themselves rightly in the schools should be seen honored by all and magnificently proclaimed by the voice of a herald in the assembly of all Greece, so that all youth and the spectators might be inflamed with love of virtue and of the sciences. But as vices gained strength and wars caused disorder, no regular honor was accorded to learning. At Athens Basil was courted by the attentions of magistrates and magnates even to the point of envy. Some trace of these honors of ours appears in his case; for at Caesarea, as Gregory, that holy Achates of his, relates, the doctors of the school resolved to confer upon him the insignia of teaching and honor. Augustus also denied to everyone the authority to give legal opinions, except those to whom it had been granted by the examination of the schools.

§ 2. The Lateran Council procured the greatest authority for academic degrees or dignities, for it most diligently ordered that the studies of the good arts be defended, preserved, and promoted. The statutes and decrees of the Council of Vienne celebrated under Clement V are also excellent in this matter. Those who obtained degrees especially enjoyed all privileges.

Academic honors are public testimonies of learning conferred with dignity and reverence, and the power of acting and enjoying the goods which are connected with the dignity conferred.

That honor is great which is bestowed not upon fortune, bodily strength, or athletic exercise, but upon the goods of the mind.

Power is granted not only for giving opinions and teaching, but also for other summits of honors and dignities. For those approved by the examination of universities were sent to princes, civil as well as ecclesiastical, so that they might undertake a share in the care of the state; they also possessed by reason of learning a prerogative for benefices and prelatures. Accordingly, with this hope Justinian in the preface to the Institutes exhorts everyone to studies as necessary to the state: “Receive these laws of ours with the greatest effort and eager study, and show yourselves so learned that the most beautiful hope may encourage us that, when the entire legal work has been completed, our state too can be governed in the parts of it to be entrusted to you.”

For in a state philosophy and learning strengthen all things more than military affairs do. Valerius, Book 3, chapter 3: “There is also that vehement and constant warfare of the mind, philosophy, potent in letters, the priestess of the venerable mysteries of doctrine; when it has been received into human breasts and dishonorable and useless passion has been expelled, it strengthens them wholly within the solid fortification of virtue, rendering them more powerful than fear and grief.”

§ 3. There is variety in these dignities, first among different faculties and then within the same ones. Among different faculties the order is that theologians are placed first, jurists second, physicians third, and philosophers fourth. So Panormitanus, chapter Cleric, On Judgments; Silvester, On Doctors and Masters, number 2. Nor can the most honorable nation of physicians complain about the jurists because, while the latter protect property and riches but physicians protect life, which is greater than the accessories of life, they are placed after them. For a jurist teaches men to live well, justly, peacefully, and in a manner conducive to the common good, which is better than merely to live. I add that jurists also defend life by laws against plots and violence.

As for what some have judged--that those approved by a superior and more dignified authority ought to take precedence--I think that this is now done nowhere, so far as I know. Indeed, when doctors distinguished by diplomas from the pontiff or Caesar come to academies, for reasons which I shall state they are held suspect

§ 4. Another order exists within one and the same faculty, in which there are those now called bachelors, licentiates, and doctors, and in theology biblical and formed bachelors. Definite times, books, and degrees of knowledge are prescribed for each, and the purpose is that they should gradually reach the summit through intermediate honors. For in every state there are degrees of honors: among the Romans, the aedileship, quaestorship, praetorship, consulship, and, as the ornament of men of consular rank, the censorship and dictatorship.

Formerly there was a different system of names, which Justinian recounts concerning students of law. For those who devoted themselves to laws in the first year, as is stated in Justinian’s letter On the Method of Teaching Law, were called dupondii by a name as frivolous as it was ridiculous--as though “two-obol men,” as Cujas thinks. A dupondius was certainly a kind of very small coin. Seneca in a Controversy: “Shall ten young men thus perish on account of your two asses?” And Seneca to Lucilius, Epistle 18: “Then, believe me, Lucilius, you will exult when filled for two asses, and you will understand that fortune is not necessary for satiety; for even when angry she must still give what is sufficient for necessity. Yet there is no reason why you should think that you are doing anything great: for you will do what many thousands of slaves and many thousands of poor men do. Esteem yourself on this account: that you will do it without being compelled.”

They were therefore two asses, or still smaller coins, which nevertheless sufficed for the most meager hunger of a little slave. I indeed think they were two asses, since Seneca adds a little later that Epicurus wrote to Polyaenus and boasted that he was fed on less than a whole as, while Metrodorus, who had not yet advanced so far, was fed on a whole one. That it was a small amount is established from the words of Epicurus in Stobaeus:

> Βρυάζω τῷ κατὰ τὸ σωμάτιον ἡδεῖ, ὕδατι καὶ ἄρτῳ χρώμενος, καὶ προσπτύω ταῖς ἐκ πολυτελείας ἡδοναῖς, οὐ δι’ αὐτάς, ἀλλὰ διὰ τὰ ἐξακολουθοῦντα αὐταῖς δυσχερῆ, which the most learned Lipsius translates thus: “I am full and overflow with the pleasure of my little body, and that while using water and bread. But I spit upon costly pleasures, not because of the pleasures themselves, but because of the inconveniences which accompany them.”

Those dupondii, therefore, were so called in jest, almost in the same manner in which, at the beginning of logic in certain academies, they call dialecticians who have not undergone deposition Beani. But the prudent emperor softened the harsh beginnings by the honor of his own name and called the novices “New Justinians”; I see, however, that this appellation has now fallen out of use in most places.

The author himself states that auditors of the third year were called Papinianists. Auditors of the fourth year were called λῆται, or λυτοί, or, as it seems to me, λύται. For λῆται does not pertain to the matter, unless someone derives it from λάω, as though they were “seers.” Λυτοί signifies men “released” rather than “solvers” of questions. Turnebus judges that it means men fit for solving questions, by which reasoning λύται or λυτῆρες would be the best forms.

In the fifth year, in which they completed the study of law, they were called πρόλυτοι, or rather προλύται. Hesychius has προλυθείς, which he interprets by τῶν μελελυμένων, “of those who have been released”; by this he indicates that he read πρόλυτοι. But if they were “released,” those who were occupied in the fourth year had therefore not yet disentangled themselves from their difficulties. Accordingly, I prefer these men to be called λύτας, superior and more learned definers, and to have obtained this name from the honor of declaring law.

§ 5. Although the Chinese have no academies, they nevertheless confer great honors upon learned men. Thus the celebrated Nicolas Trigault, after traversing the world for the salvation of nations, explains concerning them in Book 1, chapter 5, of his Chinese Expedition:

“There is, moreover, no public school or academy, as some of our writers have asserted, whose masters have undertaken to expound these books to their pupils; rather, each chooses a teacher at his own discretion, by whom he is instructed in his own home and at his own expense. There is an immense multitude of these domestic schoolmasters, especially because, as I have said, it is customary for each man to open a school in his own house only for his sons, even if only one or two are counted, I believe so that they may not be turned away from application to study by association with others.

“In this learning three literary degrees are conferred upon those of their number who present themselves for examination and are judged fit. The examination, moreover, consists almost solely in writing. The first literary degree is conferred in individual cities, in the place which is called the school. Some distinguished man of letters appointed by the king himself for this purpose confers it. He is called Tihio by office, while the degree itself is called Sieveai and represents our baccalaureate.

“The Tihio, therefore, travels through all the cities of his province to confer that degree, before which a threefold examination is held. When that chancellor, to speak in our manner, arrives, all those from the city and its territory who aspire to that degree suddenly assemble and submit themselves to examination. The first is instituted by those schoolmasters who preside over the bachelors after they have obtained the degree while they seek to attain a further one. Anyone is admitted to this examination, and it often happens that four or five thousand are counted from one city. These schoolmasters are maintained by a royal stipend for this purpose.

“The candidates are then sent by the schoolmasters to the four prefects of the city--all of whom are learned, for no one else has a part in the state. After examining them again, the prefects present no more than two hundred from the whole number to the chancellor, those whom they have judged most worthy by reason of the better composition. The chancellor conducts the third examination, altogether more severe than the others; for from the two hundred he names as bachelors no more than twenty or thirty, according to the size of the region, whom he has found most worthy in the same examination, and joins them to the bachelors of previous years. All these represent by dignity a not inconsiderable part of the city, for all honor them in hope of the future dignity toward which they advance.

“They put on a long robe, cap, and boots as the peculiar insignia of their dignity, and it is forbidden for anyone other than a bachelor to appear in that apparel. In assemblies of magistrates they sit in a more honorable place, and weightier ceremonies of civility are shown to them which the common people are not permitted to employ. They also enjoy many immunities and are subject to almost no one except the chancellor and those four schoolmasters of theirs; nor do the other magistrates readily judge their causes or offenses. The chancellor’s office extends not only to the new bachelors but brings to the anvil even the older men distinguished by that degree in former years, and by a severe balance tests how far they have either advanced or declined.

“Accordingly, he establishes five orders according to the quality of the writing. To those who are judged to be in the first, as a reward he gives the power to discharge certain public offices--but not the highest--without a superior degree. He also grants a reward, though a lower one, to those enrolled in the second class. He judges those in the third worthy neither of reward nor of punishment. Those in the fourth are publicly beaten, paying the penalty for their indolence. Finally, those in the last are stripped of the insignia of the baccalaureate and cast back into the order of the common people. They do this lest, after the men have been enrolled among the bachelors, they hide in idleness and consign what they had learned to oblivion.

“The second literary degree of the Chinese is called Kiugin and is compared with the order of our licentiates. It is conferred only every third year in the metropolis of the province, around the eighth moon, and with still greater majesty. It is not conferred upon all who are judged worthy of it, but upon those who, among them, are most worthy within a fixed number--more or fewer according to the dignity and populousness of the provinces. For in each of the two royal cities, namely Peking and Nanking, one hundred and fifty licentiates are proclaimed from the entire number of bachelors; in the provinces of Cequiana, Quian-Sinensi, and Fuquiana, ninety-five; and in the rest, somewhat fewer according to the number of learned men and the dignity of the province.

“Only bachelors are admitted to this examination, and not even all of them; rather, from each city or school of the province, as I have already said, a minimum of thirty and a maximum of forty bachelors, selected by that chancellor from the whole number after their writing has been tested, are chosen.

“And yet by this method in the more populous provinces the number of those who aspire to the order of licentiates often grows to four thousand. Therefore, in that year which returns every third year for the initiation of licentiates--such, for example, was the year of the Lord 1609, and the next will return in 1612--a few days before the eighth moon, which often falls in the month of September, the magistrates of Peking present to the king in a submitted document one hundred philosophers selected from the whole kingdom, so that from them he may appoint thirty, namely two for each province, to preside over this examination of licentiates. One of the two must belong to the royal college which they call Hanlinguem, whose members are said to be the most celebrated in the whole kingdom.

“The king does not name them at all until the very point of time at which they will be able to arrive in the designated province by the most rapid journey. Very many guards are also employed, lest for any reason they speak with anyone from that province before the licentiates have been proclaimed. The more celebrated philosophers are also summoned from the same province by the magistrates; by them the two royal examiners are faithfully assisted in this examination and first review of the writings.

“In every metropolis one sees an immense palace constructed solely for this examination and enclosed by very high walls. Within it are very many separate dwellings removed from every disturbance, in which the examiners whom I have mentioned reside while they examine the writings. Besides these, in the middle of the palace there are more than four thousand cells, which can hold nothing beyond a small table, a stool, and one man. From these cells no one can speak with a neighbor or even see anyone.

“When the urban and royal examiners whom I have mentioned have arrived in the metropolis, each is first enclosed in his own dwelling in that palace before they can speak with anyone; indeed, they are excluded even from mutual conversation with one another during the entire time occupied in examining the writings. Furthermore, at that time long watches by night of many soldiers and magistrates investigate and prevent every exchange of letters and conversations between those who reside within the boundaries of the palace and those who remain outside them.

“The same three days are appointed everywhere throughout the whole kingdom for this examination: namely, the ninth, twelfth, and fifteenth days of the eighth moon. From the first light of dawn until the beginning of night time is granted for writing, the doors being carefully closed. A light refreshment, prepared the day before at public expense, is furnished to the writers. When the bachelors are admitted within the palace boundaries, they are examined most severely to determine whether they are carrying some book or writing with them. They are permitted to bring only some brushes which they use for writing, the writing tablet mentioned above, ink, and paper. Their garments, brushes, and writing tablets are examined lest they contain anything by fraud. If any fraud is discovered, they are not only excluded but also punished most severely.

“After the bachelors have been admitted into the palace, the doors closed and secured with public seals, the two royal presidents of the examination publish three sayings from that Tetrabiblion, chosen at their discretion, which each candidate sets before himself as the themes of as many compositions. Likewise, four sayings from those five doctrines are proposed as themes for as many other compositions. Each chooses those which are drawn from the doctrine which he professes. These seven compositions must be weighty not only with ornaments of words but also with weight of thought, the precepts of Chinese eloquence being accurately observed. No composition may exceed five hundred characters in number, each of which is equivalent to one of our words.

“On the second day--which follows two days granted for the repose of those being examined--when they have been enclosed in the same manner, three events are proposed which were drawn from the annals of the ancients and happened formerly, or certain other events which could occur hereafter. Each declares his judgment in three compositions, or advises the king by a submitted document what he thinks ought to be done in that case for the good of the kingdom. On the third day, similarly, three disputes are proposed to them from those which can require decision in discharging the offices of the state. Each again explains in three compositions the judgment which he would render in deciding that dispute.

“After each has received in this manner the subjects of the compositions on the appointed day and committed them to memory, the bachelors enter the cell designated for each of them by the persons responsible, in order to write; and in great silence each one writes everywhere. Each copies his compositions into a booklet prepared for this purpose, adding at the end of the compositions his own name and those of his father, grandfather, and great-grandfather, and seals the booklet so that it can be opened only by the deputies.

“When each has done this with each booklet, they offer them to the deputies. Before the booklets come into the hands of the examiners, they are copied by the hands of scribes who are already present and prepared. To prevent fraud, the copies are written in red, while the autograph texts themselves, without the names of their authors, are delivered to the examiners for review. The autographs, marked with numbers corresponding to the copies, are preserved in the meantime. This is done so that those who examine the writings may recognize neither the authors’ names nor their manner of forming the characters.

“Those first examiners selected from the urban magistrates examine all the compositions and reject every poorest one in such a manner that they offer the royal examiners twice the number to which the number of licentiates may rise. Thus, if one hundred and fifty must be proclaimed, three hundred compositions are set apart and transmitted to the dwelling of the royal examiners to be examined in the final scrutiny. From these they separate all the best ones, as many as suffice for the number of licentiates. From this number they next choose the first, second, and third compositions and arrange them carefully in order.

“When this has been accomplished, all the examiners together compare the copies with the autographs recognized by the numbers placed upon them, and read the author’s name in the autograph. They display these names, written in letters a cubit high, upon an immense tablet, at about the end of the eighth moon, amid a great concourse of magistrates and the applause of those who are connected by blood or affinity with the men proclaimed licentiates.

“This degree is far superior to and more celebrated than the former, enjoys other, more noble immunities, and possesses a distinctive ornament of dignity. Indeed, if its recipients lay aside the desire to aspire to the highest degree, they are capable of offices in the state which are not of the lowest rank. When this proceeding has been brought to completion in this manner, the royal presidents of the examination publish a book by which the outcome of the whole examination, the names of the licentiates, and the more distinguished compositions on each proposed subject are disseminated throughout the entire kingdom in this manner. Above all, the compositions of the man who obtained first place among the licentiates are printed with those types. In Chinese he is called Quiayuen.

“This book is printed in an especially elegant character and distributed throughout the whole kingdom; several copies of it are offered to the king and to the other courtiers. Those who are bachelors of another province are by no means admitted to this examination. Only in each royal city are a few men from other provinces admitted by a special privilege, because they have been enrolled in the royal school of which they are members. After obtaining the baccalaureate, they are admitted to that college upon paying a definite number of gold pieces to the royal treasury.

“The third literary order among the Chinese is called Cinsu and plainly represents our doctorate. It too is conferred every third year, but only in the royal city of Peking, and the year for initiating doctors is always the one which immediately follows the proceeding for licentiates. Only three hundred men from the entire kingdom obtain it, although licentiates from the individual provinces are admitted by law whenever they wish to undergo the hazard of the examination.

“This proceeding is instituted in the second moon on the same days which we mentioned above, and also in the same form, with altogether no difference except that, in accordance with the degree and its dignity, diligence in the examination is also increased, lest any fraud or favor perhaps creep in. The examiners themselves are selected from the gravest magistrates of the kingdom, whom they call Colaos, concerning whom below; one is appointed president of the examination.

“When the examination has ended and the doctors have been proclaimed in that same palace in which it is also customary for the licentiates to be proclaimed, all together in the royal palace, before the chief magistrates of the entire court--and formerly even the king himself was present--they compose a writing upon a proposed theme. By the judgment of this writing the order of the magistracies which they are to hold is proclaimed, divided into three classes. Great is the solemnity of this examination, which consists entirely in a short composition. The man who obtained first place in the examination of doctors has his third place in this second examination placed beyond hazard. The man who obtains first or second place in this examination is distinguished throughout his whole life by a remarkable dignity, besides the fact that he discharges all the greatest offices in the state. That dignity might most suitably be compared with the title of duke or marquis among us, if it passed to descendants by hereditary right.

“These doctors immediately enjoy their own robe, cap, boots, and also the other insignia of magistrates, and are advanced to the richer and more noble public magistracies. The order is always such that doctors are nowhere surpassed by licentiates. They are also numbered among the foremost men of the kingdom and suddenly become so superior to the other licentiates--their own colleagues the day before--to whom fortune did not fall equally, that it can scarcely be believed; for everywhere places of precedence are yielded to them, and they are addressed by more splendid titles.

“Those licentiates, however, who have been rejected from the number of doctors, if they have laid aside hope of obtaining the doctorate in the future, are admitted to the administration of the state. Although below doctors, they nevertheless hold magistracies which are not the lowest, either in the royal city or abroad. If they decide to try fortune again, they return home and exercise themselves assiduously in writing and reading throughout the following three years, until, when the cycle of years returns, they again descend into the arena of examination. They are permitted to attempt this as often as they wish. It happens not rarely that they undergo the hazard ten times, while fortune always resists; fed upon that hope, they spend their entire life without a public office, because they wish to be either the highest or nothing.

“The outcome of the men proclaimed to this rank also--one not slight or inferior--is printed by the examiners in its own separate volume, with the names and every more distinguished composition added as above. Besides this book, another is also published annually, in which are described the names, fatherlands, parents, offices, and places of office of all the doctors. Thus, anyone who examines this annual volume will know what dignity each man held, and where, from the first year of his doctorate until his death, and by what degrees of honors he either ascended or descended--which among the Chinese is an everyday occurrence according to each man’s merits.

“And in this obtaining of degrees, it is worthy of admiration what bond colleagues of the same year contract among themselves. For licentiates no less than doctors, whom fortune conspired to favor in the same year, regard one another as brothers throughout their whole life and mutually assist both one another and the relatives of their colleagues in all matters, always with a unanimous concord of affections. They also bind a still closer bond with the examiners themselves, such as customarily exists between parents and sons or disciples and masters, with due reverence always preserved, although it often happens that the disciples themselves ascend higher than their master through the individual degrees of honors.

“It is also customary to grant these degrees of honor in the same years, places, and titles to those who profess military service. Only the time is customarily deferred to the following moon. But because the military art lies prostrate among the Chinese, these degrees are conferred with far inferior ceremony. And so few aspire to them that the affair appears altogether wretched.

“This military examination is also threefold. In the first, the candidates discharge nine arrows while urged on in an equestrian course. In the second, standing with their feet fixed, they aim as many arrows at the same target. Those who have struck the target with at least four arrows from horseback and two from the ground are admitted to the third examination, in which, when a question concerning military affairs has been proposed, they are ordered to respond in writing. The judges then compare this threefold examination and proclaim about fifty licentiates from the whole number in each province.

“In the year in which doctors are named at Peking, military candidates selected from the entire number of licentiates of the whole kingdom, after the same threefold examination, are distinguished with the military doctorate, altogether one hundred in number. Doctors from this college are more readily appointed than licentiates to some military prefecture, though not without gifts. When both groups are first proclaimed, whether they belong to the philosophical or military senate, they inscribe above the threshold of their houses, for the commendation of their family, a title in letters a cubit high, by which the dignity each has attained is signified.

“Finally, this must not be passed over: the judges and presidents of all examinations, whether an inquiry is instituted concerning military affairs, the mathematical disciplines, the art of medicine, or--much more--ethical matters, are selected from the philosophical senate; nor is any general, mathematician, or physician joined to them. This will seem not a little astonishing and perhaps foolish to our Europeans. For so great among the Chinese is the reputation of those who excel in ethical discipline that they appear altogether able to render a suitable judgment concerning every subject, although they wander rather far beyond the bounds of their own profession."

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 6. I have related these things in the author's very many words, both that I myself may recall the memory of an excellent man, one who so often placed his life in his own hands in order to gain the souls of an unknown nation, and because our academies, in which discipline has fallen and the ardor for learning has been extinguished, can be restored to soundness in this manner. Let a prince dare something similar: he will behold the most noble academy in all Europe rise in his city.

What intervals of time are required for these degrees cannot be determined with certainty. Our Society has established three years for philosophy and four years for theology. Thus Rule 17 of the Provincial Superior provides: "They shall complete the philosophical course in three years, but not in a shorter time, where our members are present. But if the hearers are external students alone, let it be left to the Provincial's judgment. Every year, however, if it can be done, one course is to be completed and another begun."

And Rule 9, §1: "In accordance with the Constitutions, he shall take care that the course of theology is completed in four years, and that by two ordinary professors, or, if it could not possibly be done otherwise, by three, according to the different practice of the provinces. Where there are three, however, the third lecture will be moral theology, in which moral subjects that are customarily either wholly passed over or treated very briefly by the ordinary professors are to be explained expressly and solidly. Our members should hear this lecture for at least two years, and Sacred Scripture for the other two years."

§ 7. The laws of the Kingdom of France in this kind of matter are most severe, as the most prudent and learned writer on politics, Pierre Grégoire of Toulouse, relates in Book 18, chapter 9. He reports them thus from the concordats between the kingdom and the Supreme Pontiff: "The time that anyone has spent learning in schools contributes to a presumption proving his knowledge. Justinian taught that the study of civil law could be completed in five years, while the canons taught that canon law could be completed in seven. But by the prescription of the concordats between the French and the Supreme Pontiff, in order to obtain benefices in the Kingdom of France by force of the privileges of graduates and nominees, it was established that ordinary collators or ecclesiastical patrons are bound to confer dignities, personates, administrations, offices, and ecclesiastical benefices falling vacant in the months assigned to graduates and nominees upon those simple graduates or nominees, or at least to present them for those positions, who have studied for a competent period in a renowned university.

"A competent period is declared to be ten years for masters, licentiates, or bachelors in theology; seven years for doctors or licentiates in canon law, civil law, or medicine; five years for masters or licentiates in arts, with a rigorous examination, reckoned inclusively from logic, or in a higher faculty; six years for simple bachelors in theology; but five years for bachelors in canon or civil law. For bachelors in canon and civil law who are noble through both parents, three years are decreed sufficient. 'Simple graduates' there means those who do not possess nominations, and who are not endowed in obtaining benefices with favor as great as those who do possess them. Before the attainment of degrees, that period of study is required to have been completed for the purpose of obtaining the privilege of accepting benefices, vacant in certain months as was defined and distinguished, which are owed through the concordats to simple graduates or nominees."

The period for completing the studies in the foregoing cases belongs to positive law for the purpose of obtaining the privilege; but in other cases it can be left to the discretion of the masters, who by their own judgment may approve those to be promoted either before or after that time. The arts are long, life is short, and one who is to be able to learn needs time so that afterward he may be able to teach.

§ 8. Yet he admits that this belongs to positive law, while in other cases it is discretionary; for because of the diversity of abilities, some attain learning more quickly and others more slowly. Therefore, that calculation of time must be instituted which is sufficient for middling abilities, is not burdensome to the greatest abilities, and is scarcely attained by slow abilities with great labor.

The Theological Faculty of Mainz, which has now flourished for fifty years to the great benefit of all, thus established in title 4, §2: "We do not wish any account of age or duration of studies to be taken in promotions unless the candidate is also commended by a knowledge of theological matters appropriate to the degree sought and by testimony of honorable conduct and life. For we altogether exclude from promotions infamous apostates or persons notoriously endowed with corrupt morals, however greatly they may excel in learning."

For the loss of time without advancement contributes nothing to the matter. Nevertheless, it prescribed a period in §4: "Likewise, we establish and ordain that no one be admitted to the lecture or degree of biblical bachelors unless he has heard the ordinary lectures in theology for at least two years; but no one is to be admitted to the degree of bachelor of the Sentences before the completion of the third year, so that he may begin the lecture on the third book of the Sentences. Once this has been begun, they are considered formed bachelors. No one, however, shall obtain the degree of licentiate unless the fourth year of theological studies has elapsed."

§ 9. Now the evils of academies must also be enumerated; for it is not the part of a writer on politics to conceal those things which break forth to the destruction of the entire state. First, in many places, unworthy men are promoted to academic honors. That is an ancient complaint, on account of which many hate the academies and some desire them to be overthrown. But they do so unjustly. How often are those men whom an honorable man would not wish to have as slaves raised to civil magistracies, tribunals, the diadem, and scepters by fear, hope, payment, and even shameful services? The wealth of the Church, too, frequently falls to the worst and not often to the best. What wonder is it, therefore, if the vices by which the whole state is oppressed also breathe upon academics and gradually infect them? Let us therefore acknowledge that it is so and that the most learned men never lack something to correct. They will not have me as an accuser of the academy.

The Council of Constance warned long ago: "Likewise, that wisdom may flourish hereafter and the studies of letters thrive, let no one be raised to the titles of degrees and honors unless he is fit, approved in morals and knowledge, and well deserving; nor let promotion be so slight and excessively precipitate. For, as is known and is ridiculous to many, many obtain the name of masters whom it would be more fitting still to be disciples. Those who act or proceed contrary to this are by the law itself to be deprived of the royal privileges granted to those same universities."

The ambition of the unskilled imposed even upon the Pontiffs. Pierre Grégoire shows the practice in Book 18, chapter 9, §7. He relates that Julius III, the Supreme Pontiff, in a constitution issued on the sixth of February 1552, corrected a certain abuse: many men ignorant of civil and canon law, aspiring unduly to the degree of doctor, under the pretext that by devoting labor to a university of general study they had advanced so far that they were fit, obtained or extorted a license from the Apostolic See enabling them to receive the insignia of a doctorate in the Roman Curia from some prelate or person established in ecclesiastical dignity, even by extorting favorable letters. Under the pretext of that license, without employing the examination required for this or the other necessary measures, contrary to the statutes of the sacred canons and the provision of law, and to the disgrace of the dignity of that doctorate, they caused themselves to be promoted to that degree. Consequently, the degree was cheapened by the foregoing practices. Correcting this, the Supreme Pontiff ordained that thereafter no one could be created a doctor in the city of Rome except by the College of Consistorial Advocates, notwithstanding privileges and licenses granted to the contrary.

In Melander, Book 1 of Serious Jests, there are verses against unlearned men in scholars' gowns:

> A bull creates you a doctor; the bull is your ornament.
> The bull gives you powers; the bull procures titles for you.
>
> But take care lest perhaps the bubble endure less long than you:
> You are a bubble of a man and a bubble-doctor; why, then, are you puffed up?

Hence today nothing is cheaper or more suspect than doctors made by bulls, although many possess distinguished learning, whereas those whom the Pontiff or Emperor honored with that distinction were customarily held in the highest place. Fraud is presumed--not indeed in a court of law, but in human opinion. Yet the error in the academies themselves is no smaller. I appeal to experience: let the doctors defend causes; let the masters dispute. Let Rhodes and the leap refute my suspicion.

The cause of so great an evil is gold, more powerful than the world itself. For while some academics gape after money, they prostitute their honors to anyone whatsoever; and the unskilled, who soften the severity of the examination by gifts, are far more welcome than those who present learning and a distinguished proof of doctrine. I believe that the poverty of academics sometimes casts them down to these petty gains; but anything else whatever should be done rather than dragging cattle and logs to the chairs of doctors. For men of such a kind should be promoted that, even if the laws perished, they would nevertheless teach and live rightly. I therefore propose these matters for consideration both by academics themselves and by princes.

§ 10. First: a doctorate in the theological, legal, or medical faculty can neither be received without mortal sin by one who knows himself to be unworthy nor be conferred by others if they know him to be unworthy. Thus Sylvester, "On Doctors," §4; Navarrus, On the Sin of Masters and Doctors, chapter 25; Armilla; Álvaro Pelayo, Book 2 of The Lament of the Church; and Sá in the Aphorisms.

The reason is weighty: they deceive the state and the Church, and in a weighty matter. For men who would not dare to offer an unskilled flute-player for the prince's pleasure do not fear to expose the salvation of peoples and princes to another man's inexperience. Those degrees are given so that the Church may have competent doctors who resist heresies and convert unbelievers; princes and bishops therefore trust the academies, by which they cannot be deceived and mocked without grave wickedness. Through their own complaisance, those academies are guilty of all the evils that follow from it. If an ignorant theologian either betrays the faith through ignorance or, conscious of his weakness, flees adversaries; if an ignorant advocate ruins his client; if an inexperienced physician undertakes the care of a bedridden patient, they bind themselves by a deadly crime, because for the sake of gain they cast their neighbors into danger of salvation, life, and fortunes. And so that they might possess such power, they range about more freely, supported by academic authority.

To this is added the particular pledge and duty of each faculty. For the doctors who are in the academic senate are bound either by a promise or even by an oath not to admit the unfit. Our faculty in title 7, §4, binds all by an oath that, when they are lawfully asked, they will give faithful testimony concerning the bachelors in the theological faculty. Sylvester therefore rightly judges those who admit an unworthy man to be bound by perjury as well.

Although candidates may appear never likely to teach, plead causes, or indeed exercise the practice of medicine, so that danger seems absent, nevertheless a public testimony of learning cannot be decreed to the unlearned without mortal sin. For perhaps an occasion or necessity--as all human affairs are uncertain--will require it, and thus the person will bring nothing but an empty title and, if his ignorance has hitherto lain hidden, an authority that will do harm. It belongs to a prudent man to take care not to entrust a sword to a madman or the power of judging or teaching to an unskilled man. For although a madman sometimes uses a sword rightly, a sword is never rightly given to a madman. And although chance may sometimes make the work of an unskilled physician beneficial, nevertheless the rashness of the man who experiments with his art upon another's body is wicked.

But if men furnished with the privilege and title of a doctor are never going to cause any harm, it is nevertheless a grave sin and destructive to the state to fasten the insignia of learned men upon foolish cattle. Nor can the most honorable will of princes and founders be frustrated without wickedness. For if it is in the interest of the whole state that cunning and crafty men not divert to themselves the rewards of brave and well-deserving men, it will certainly feel the greatest harm if men adorned with a false testimony of learning and prudence walk about who are so uncultivated that they can scarcely be taught. For besides the fact that those honors are utterly despised if they fall to the unworthy as well as the worthy, another evil also arises which has ruined many academies: the idleness and inactivity of all the youths and the dissoluteness and lusts breaking forth from them. For if rich ignorance as well as laborious knowledge leads to the citadel of academic honors, many will readily redeem themselves from the greatest labors of a long period by the loss of a few coins. Many universities experience the most sorrowful effects of this academic perfidy: in them no one has for many years been excluded from degrees, and an examination is conducted merely as a ceremony. For who is more diligent in letters in order to obtain a degree, or whose fear of rejection shakes off his listlessness, if he sees the unlearned rich standing in the highest place as though made more venerable by learning?

§ 11. Nor are the resources of an academy served by that prevarication. For after the insignia have been made common to the unworthy and the crowd has made them contemptible, the nobility first despised those honors, which it would never have done if it had recognized true testimonies of learning in them. This is a great wound to universities: to have lost the noblest part of the youth. I have seen the most noble young men--sons of magnates and kinsmen of princes--treat every branch of study assiduously and diligently and seek the testimonies of their masters, yet despise academic degrees, that is, public testimonies.

"For what is granted indiscriminately to the learned and the unlearned," they said, "is not a testimony of learning, but a useless ceremony of idle and ambitious men." Yet the Church by no means wishes doctors to be despised, since it entrusts so many and such great matters to them. The Council of Trent explained how much it grants to doctors in Session 22, chapter 2, On Reform: "Whoever is hereafter to be appointed to cathedral churches is not only to be fully endowed with birth, age, morals, life, and the other qualifications required by the sacred canons, but also to have been constituted beforehand in sacred orders for at least the space of six months. Information concerning these things, if there is no knowledge of him in the Curia or only recent knowledge, is to be obtained from the legates of the Apostolic See or the nuncios of the provinces, or from his ordinary, and, if he is lacking, from the nearest ordinaries. In knowledge, moreover, let him excel, in addition to these things, in such a manner that he can satisfy the necessity of the office to be imposed upon him. Therefore, he is beforehand to have been deservedly promoted in a university of studies as a master, doctor, or licentiate in sacred theology or canon law, or to be shown by the public testimony of some academy to be fit to teach others. But if he is a regular, let him have a similar attestation from the superiors of his religious order. All the aforesaid persons, however, from whom the information or attestation is to be obtained, shall be bound to report these things faithfully and without payment; otherwise, let them know that their consciences are gravely burdened, and that they shall have God and their superiors as avengers."

§ 12. What more severe thing could be said by a general council against those who sell those public testimonies for little dinners and a few coins?

The same Synod in Session 24, chapter 18, On Reform, sets doctors over the examination of clerics: "Let these examiners be masters, doctors, or licentiates in theology or canon law, or other clerics or regulars, including those of the mendicant order, or even secular men who will appear more suitable for this. Let them all swear upon the Holy Gospels of God that, setting aside every human affection, they will discharge the office faithfully."

But what will they judge concerning the knowledge of others if through their own ambition and academic perjury they themselves were made doctors? If the salt becomes insipid, with what will things be salted? In the same session, chapter 12, the Synod commands archdeacons to be masters or licentiates in theology or canon law; and in chapter 16, episcopal vicars are appointed. When the Church establishes these things, it ascribes as much to academic testimonies as it scarcely does to any other; and therefore it deservedly invokes God as avenger against prevaricators. The same reasoning applies to doctors of law and medicine. For almost the whole state is involved in the counsels of the former, and the lives of many men--including princes and magnates--in the knowledge of the latter.

§ 13. But what is to be said of masters of arts and bachelors? There are some who excuse the unworthy from mortal sin, whether unskilled men receive the degree or confer it. For no part of the state is entrusted to them; and therefore, although they adorn blockheads in gowns with a hood, cap, and ring, they will nevertheless deceive no one, because these men have not yet been applied to affairs.

I hold the contrary: that to adorn unworthy men with the insignia of the baccalaureate or philosophical mastership is a mortal sin. First, on account of the oath by which examiners in many academies are bound to promise that they will not admit the unworthy. Accordingly, the founders and academies that require the oath judge the matter to be grave; from this it follows that even those who, although they have not sworn an oath, are nevertheless bound by a promise of fidelity cannot give false public testimony in a grave matter without grave sin.

Next, many things are customarily entrusted even to masters of arts: the power of disputing, teaching, examining others, and promoting them. When this has been conferred upon the unskilled, those studies which are necessary to the state must suffer great harms; and since these are greater than monetary losses, a crime is discerned here also. For since the youth who devote themselves to philosophy in the academies are numerous, it is evident that by contempt for academic honors they extinguish the youths' very ardor for study--that is, they deliberately corrupt youth itself. These honors are despised when they cease to be testimonies of learning. And the greater the apparatus of clothing, banquets, poems, and retinues with which those ceremonies are conducted, the greater the mockery in which they are held by those conscious of their own ignorance and that of others, because false testimonies and the frivolity of academics are paraded in a more conspicuous pomp.

There are not a few collegiate churches which require a baccalaureate or mastership; to deceive them is not only shameful but criminal. Finally, those who promote the unworthy gravely defame those whom they reject, since they cannot always promote everyone without overthrowing all discipline; for it is a great disgrace not to have had a place even among the unlearned, not to be even the lowest of the Mysians. And hence that contempt arises, since the first place is no great honor, while the last draws immense disgrace. But how shall I recognize the worthy and the unworthy? Or what are the standards of discrimination?

§ 14. It is a difficult matter, one which opens hiding places for excuses to those who dissolve discipline and measure academies not by the bloom and pursuit of the sciences but by empty displays. Nevertheless, I shall disclose those secrets and remove the pretexts.

Among those who are judged worthy of the doctorate, there is a great difference and, as philosophers say, latitude. Augustine and Jerome are doctors; yet Eucherius, Prosper, and others are not therefore unworthy of that name, for the Church had Augustine once, but it needs many doctors in every single year. Learning, therefore, is not to be exacted according to one standard. For who is now created a doctor or bishop who does not gladly and willingly confess himself Augustine's disciple?

No one ought to be created master or doctor of a science if he cannot teach it; for masters and doctors are so named from teaching. Next, in most academies those who are promoted are bound to teach even by oath. The philosophical faculty requires this oath from its members: "Lastly, they shall swear that for one whole year after promotion they will remain in our faculty lecturing and teaching, and that in the same year they are willing once to preside over a public disputation." How will a man swear that he will teach what he has not learned? This oath is an object of ridicule if an ass swears that he will teach letters.

The Church and the state established all those masterships and doctorates at so great an expense for teaching, as Sylvester excellently warned in "On Doctors," §4. The canons teach that the Church refers not only philosophy and the higher studies but even the knowledge of languages to teaching. The whole matter was expounded by Clement V in the Extravagantes, "On Masters," chapter 1, at the Council of Vienne:

"Among the concerns resting upon our shoulders, we revolve with perpetual care how we may be able, with his grace cooperating with us, to lead those who err into the way of truth and gain them for God. This indeed is what we seek with desire; to this we diligently direct the affection of our mind; and about it we watch with diligent zeal and zealous diligence. We do not doubt that, for attaining a desire of this kind, an exposition of the divine utterances is fitting and the preaching of their faith exceedingly opportune. But neither are we ignorant that these things are proclaimed in vain and return empty if they are put forth to ears ignorant of the speaker's language.

"Therefore, imitating the example of him whose place on earth we occupy, though unworthily, who willed that the Apostles who were to go throughout the entire world to evangelize should be learned in every kind of tongue, we earnestly desire the holy Church to abound in Catholic men having knowledge of the languages which the unbelievers chiefly use, men who know how and are able to instruct those unbelievers in the sacred institutes and to gather them into the fellowship of Christians through the doctrine of the Christian faith and reception of holy baptism.

"Therefore, that skill in languages of this kind might suitably be obtained through the efficacy of instruction, with this sacred council approving, we have provided for schools in the kinds of languages written below wherever the Roman Curia may happen to reside, and likewise in the universities of Paris, Oxford, Bologna, and Salamanca. We establish that in each of these places there shall be Catholic men having sufficient knowledge of the Hebrew, Arabic, and Chaldean languages--namely, two men skilled in each language--who shall govern schools there, faithfully translate books from those languages into Latin, and diligently teach those languages to others and transmit skill in them to those others by zealous instruction, so that, sufficiently instructed and taught in languages of this kind, they may, with God as author, be able to produce the hoped-for fruit and beneficially propagate the faith among the unbelieving peoples themselves.

"We wish competent stipends and expenses to be provided for those teaching in the Roman Curia by the Apostolic See; in the University of Paris by the King of France; at Oxford by the prelates, monasteries, chapters, convents, exempt and non-exempt colleges, and rectors of churches of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales; at Bologna by those of Italy; and at Salamanca by those of Spain--imposing upon each the burden of contribution according to the measure of its resources. No privileges and exemptions whatsoever to the contrary shall stand in the way; nevertheless, we do not wish prejudice to be generated for them in other respects."

This consideration ought to move all academics to admit candidates to honors with great selectivity and a severe examination. They will easily accomplish this if they judge the preservation of sound doctrine, and consequently of the state, to depend upon their fidelity. And when they observe bishops, kings, and princes seeking learned and industrious men for the Church and state with such concern, such expense, and such privileges, they will understand that it is an example of the worst kind for the very sanctuaries of the sciences to hold them in contempt and blunt the eagerness of those who learn.

§ 15. Once this has been established, let them test the learning of their hearers by an examination that is varied and not slight. The Academy of Mainz has strict laws, worthy of flourishing everywhere. For if anyone seeks academic honors in the theological faculty, it is first necessary that before the senate he have the testimony of his professors concerning the duration, exercises, and progress of his studies. Unless they testify that he appears worthy to undergo examination, he is repelled from the threshold. Next, after he has been admitted, he is compelled to prove his learning in five public disputations.

The jurists exercise their candidates in such a way that, if they approve a man in the first disputation, they then assign him another law, for the exposition and defense of which he prepares himself in the space of twenty-four hours. This interrogation and testing is so serious that no one readily commits himself to the hazard unless he is properly instructed. The physicians also have strict laws in examination and serious disputations, so much so that no unlearned man easily knocks here at the doors of the doctorate.

The faculty of liberal arts, in addition to daily exercises and the testimonies of professors, institutes examinations in all the arts, including eloquence, poetry, and mathematics, and, by testing each man separately, examines almost the whole of philosophy. For all the examiners promise that they will admit no one insufficient or inadequately qualified: § "Promise of the Masters Who Examine." There is, therefore, one examination which lasts through the entire duration of the studies, while the candidates either prove their progress in their own school, with their master and fellow students as witnesses, or offer a specimen of their ability in public disputations throughout the year and in the assembly of all the philosophers. There is another examination, in which they are questioned privately by masters appointed for that task.

Although at the entrance to the examination those masters furnish only a promise, they are nevertheless bound by oath from another cause as well. Before promotion, among other things, they swear thus: "Likewise, that they will give faithful testimony concerning bachelors to be promoted in the faculty whenever they shall have been duly required concerning this matter": § "Oath of Those Receiving the License and Insignia."

Through neglect of this care and precaution, not only unlearned men but even heretics are intruded into churches and academies in other universities; for unlearned academies cannot even recognize subtler heresies, much less keep them out. "It has also greatly harmed the state," says Pierre Grégoire in Book 18, chapter 9, On the State, "that some professors are found to possess a conscience insufficiently fearful and, often granting degrees through favor to profane men, do not consider what Arcadian beast they thrust into churches and benches. Nor do they consider that they will render an account before God and men for so great a negligence in approving studies. They also sometimes thrust heretics into chairs, from whom poison and destruction, or a plague of the state, must follow. In correcting these things, diligent reform is needed. It will be easy for rectors and conservators, or bishops and princes, if studies are recalled to the end intended at their foundation, if learned men of good conscience and sound faith are placed in command, and if those who obstinately persevere in error or malice are corrected."

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 16. But if the academics themselves lay aside the care of their own affairs and undertake no labor either for their reputation or for the safety of the state, that care will fall upon bishops and princes. Albert of Brandenburg, cardinal of the Holy Roman Church and archbishop of Mainz, did this, as both the acts and the preface of the statutes of the faculty of arts attest. I am not ignorant that visitation and reform appear difficult and harsh. But it is better that learned men be admonished and academies restored than that youth perish. Nor can a means of correcting everything be lacking.

First, let all licentiates and doctors also be examined for nominations to benefices and for orders; and let the academic judgment not be relied upon if the unskilled are customarily promoted by it to degrees. Lawsuits and disturbances will arise from this, but a prince will easily quiet those evils--otherwise he will leave them in place.

"A prelate," says Pierre Grégoire in Book 18, chapter 9, "appears to do injury to a university by wishing to examine one of its graduates; indeed, it would be an injury to princes that those whom they themselves judge fit should be considered unworthy. In other cases the law requires inquiry into the fitness of those seeking a grant and does not wish a person to be examined when he has already been approved.

"Thus a bishop cannot examine a person presented by an abbot, since the abbot's testimony is sufficient. For if an examination of graduates, nominees, or persons presented by universities and abbots were granted to a bishop, he would never find a graduate or nominee learned or sufficient--even if he were like Bartolus or Panormitanus--unless that graduate were agreeable to them. This also has place among those pharisaical censors, the bishop's vicars, who are blinded by such stupidity, presumption, and pride that they think no one knows anything unless he flatters or applauds them--unskilled men who think nothing right except what they themselves do. Therefore, one must always presume rather in favor of an act of the university, if it was done in due form, and in favor of the fitness of the person."

Thus he speaks most excellently and prudently concerning reform. Nevertheless, I do not agree when he denies that a graduate ought to be examined. For if there is a probable cause for doubting his learning, a bishop not only can but also ought to examine the man whom he places over souls. Pierre himself admits in the same chapter, §6: "From the abuse and corruption of professors, as we have learned by experience, many disadvantages and evils can be introduced into the state, especially when degrees are conferred upon the unworthy and by the marketing of money." If he learned this by experience, and if bishops and princes learn it daily through the evils and disadvantages of the state, why ought they to endure those evils rather than examine the man in doubt?

The Council of Trent, Session 7, chapter 13, subjects all to examination except those who are presented by universities: "Those presented, elected, or nominated by any ecclesiastical persons whatsoever, even the nuncios of the Apostolic See, shall not be instituted, confirmed, or admitted to any ecclesiastical benefices whatsoever, even under the pretext of any privilege or custom, even one prescribed from time immemorial, unless they have first been examined by the ordinaries of the places and found fit. And no one can protect himself by the remedy of appeal so as not to be bound to undergo examination. Those presented, elected, or nominated by universities or colleges of general studies are nevertheless excepted."

But in Session 24, chapter 18, the exception nevertheless appears to be revoked, when the Council had perceived more and more that the integrity of universities was corrupted. For since unlearned doctors do not enjoy the privilege, academies that promote the unlearned cannot communicate privileges to them; therefore, the unlearned cannot use the privileges of doctors. Thus Grégoire himself, Book 18, chapter 9: "Nor ought an unlearned doctor to enjoy the privilege of doctors."

And certainly men who are doctors in title alone, and those who through neglect of study have lost what they once learned, would be worthy of being examined again--not indeed by those who wish to appear rabbis, for the blind would lead the blind, but by learned masters, approved professors of good conscience who fear God, and by rectors and reformers of schools. These are certainly no less necessary in the state than visitors of churches. But men should be deputed who are most skilled in reforming the professions or faculties, who have discharged the office of professor with praise, and who are veterans and emeriti--not men from elsewhere or of another kind.

Nor do we deny that we judge it both equitable and beneficial to the state that a man once approved as a doctor can be rejected again if he is afterward found insufficient by the aforesaid reformers or by the very masters who approved him before; indeed, he can be deprived of the insignia, or at least the privileges, unless his knowledge was lost by accident, disease, or old age.

Thus the emperor Gordian: "It is not unknown that grammarians or orators approved by a decree of the order can be rejected again by the same order if they do not show themselves useful to students." For public utility is involved in these men also, since on account of the presumption of learning doctors are admitted to many public offices and ecclesiastical benefices, and their inexperience harms many people who are thus deceived. Therefore, a person examined and approved for the degree of licentiate can be rejected in the examination for doctors when through a new cause he has been able to render himself useless--for example, if there is a great interval of time between the licentiate or prolytate and the doctorate sought, or because he was approved in only one examination and others remain--according to the observations of Abbot Panormitanus.

Thus Sylvester, "On Doctors," §5: "Fifth, it is asked what things are required in one who is to be made a doctor, so that he may not be rejected but approved. And I say that a scholar can be rejected not only on account of a deficiency of knowledge--which is, of course, to be judged sufficient at the discretion of those making him a doctor--but also on account of morals, as is proved in law Magistros, Code, On Professors and Physicians, Book 10, joined with Clementine 11, On Masters; and custom observes this. Hence six things are required in one who is to be promoted to the dignity of mastership. First, skill in teaching, that is, knowledge. Second, eloquence in teaching. Third, subtlety in interpreting. Fourth, abundance in teaching. And these are found in the sole law of the Code, On Professors Who Are in the City of Constantinople, Book 12. Fifth, excellence of morals, as in the aforesaid law Magistros. Sixth, strength of courage, so that he knows how to resist the force of violence, law Reddatur, Code, On Professors and Physicians, Book 10. Hence few attain the dignity of the doctorate, as Bartolus says after Cynus in law Omnes populi, Digest, On Justice and Law.

"And one who possessed these conditions at the time of approval, if he afterward becomes useless, is to be degraded from the doctorate, as in law Grammaticos, Code, On Professors and Physicians, Book 10. For a doctor or master can be rejected, as in law 11 of the Code under the same title, and Bartolus notes in law Sed et reprobari, Digest, On the Excuses of Guardians, at the beginning, where the text says that a physician can be rejected; and the same in law Ut gradatim, § Reprobari, Digest, On Public Duties and Honors--but not without cause: law Pomponius scribit, Digest, On the Management of Affairs."

If, therefore, that doctor is to be degraded, he cannot be capable of nominations, for the law speaks of learned men who have been lawfully promoted. This can readily be recognized from the concordats of France and the Supreme Pontiff. The words of the agreement are: "But when a vacancy of this kind occurs in those cathedral churches, the King of France then reigning shall, within six months reckoned from the day of the vacancy of those churches, nominate to us and our successors, the Roman Pontiffs, or to the aforesaid See, one grave master or licentiate in theology, or doctor or licentiate in both laws or either law, from a renowned university and with rigorous examination, and established in at least the twenty-seventh year of his age; and provision shall be made for the person so nominated by the king, by us and our successors, or by the aforesaid See."

Who doubts that in the Council of Trent the Church seeks such a man as it describes in the French concordats?

§ 17. From Rebuffus, moreover, I learn that there are various titles of promotion in French and neighboring academies. For certain universities do not confer the license with this clause: "by rigor of examination," but either with the clause "by grace," for the ignorant; or "by good justice," for the moderately learned; or "by good and pure justice," for the rich and citizens; or "by good and pure justice and for merit," for the most learned or those possessing favor. No one fails to see that these titles are the destruction of all the arts and sciences, since the most learned man and the rich man, the most learned man and the man who is favored, are imposed upon the state with the same commendation.

If, therefore, in the Chinese manner the titular little doctors and little masters are recalled to the anvil by the laws of Europe, if academics are bound by a new oath, if other theologians already tested are ordered to be present at the examination, and if several doctors of law hear the candidates being examined, the integrity of the academies will easily be restored. The sum is this: if an academy persists in promoting the unworthy, let it be punished; and, if necessary, let the authors of destructive favor fall from their dignities. This care pertains no less to the prince than the restoration of roads, citadels, and a fleet, and all the more as the offense brings greater danger.

Formerly impostors, for the sake of gain, falsely said that they had been promoted and undertook to teach; the magistrate proceeded severely against them. Panormitanus in chapter Quoniam, Extravagantes, On Masters, and the other doctors in law Eos, On Forgeries, relate that this was done deservedly. It is not much less serious to lie about learning than about promotion; for promotion is the sign of learning, which those men falsely display. For that man too is an impostor who hangs ivy upon an empty cask and displays to wretched hearers the shadow of titles without the body of learning.

§ 18. Finally, let new and rival academies be erected to stir the torpor of the old. Many ancient ones are, as it were, exhausted, flourishing neither in youth nor in masters. They have unlearned what they knew. Seekers after reputation who now act the doctor at leisure console their solitude with applause for antiquity and do not repair their strength and former vigor, like that man of whom Lucan sings:

> The shadow of a great name stands,
> like a lofty oak in a fruitful field,
>
> bearing the ancient spoils of a people and consecrated > gifts of commanders, no longer clinging by strong roots.
>
> Fixed by its own weight, spreading naked branches through the air,
> it makes a shadow with its trunk, not its foliage.
>
> But although it totters, destined to fall beneath the first east wind,
> though so many woods around rise with firm strength,
> it alone is nevertheless revered.

In its neighborhood, at a lawful interval, let a prince who loves learning establish one that is vigorous, exercised by labor, and gleaming with new youth. Such an academy, I say, in which there is not only the name and reputation of an academy, but:

> Virtue that knows not how to stand in place, > and the only shame--not to conquer. As a soldier,
>
> this novice will strike the enemy squadrons with brave assault,
> fierce and untamed, wherever mind and laws have called him
>
> to bring his hand, and fearing no labors of study;
>
> pressing his successes, urging on the favor > of the divine power, driving away whatever envy
>
> casts before one seeking glorious things.

Make trial, prince: rival excellence will furnish spurs.

§ 19. Nor, however, should another means of preserving and enlarging academies be left unmentioned. Let provision be made for theologians and philosophers with a stipend that is not merely just and lawful but ample. Let a still richer grant be conceded to jurists and physicians. For since Galen gives wealth, since the practice of an excellent physician produces great gain, he cannot be bound to a chair and daily lectures by a slender salary. Therefore, let his honorarium be so great that he neither visits patients nor is compelled to visit them; indeed, let this very thing be forbidden to him. It will be sufficient if he teaches others and is consulted by the rest.

Justinian supplies riches and honors. Therefore, so great a salary should be established for a professor of civil and even canon law that he neither courts the prince's chancery nor admires the swift wealth and increases of advocates who are overwhelmed by crowds of clients. For it cannot be hoped that a man will endure the continual labors of a chair for five hundred gold pieces when many princes invite him with lavish stipends and great honors and magnates demand him as advocate in the greatest causes. Great doctors, therefore, must be hired at great expense. For to appoint over novices a man to teach laws to noble youth who has never won a cause, nor indeed could even have lost one because no client so simple was found as to entrust a dispute over dripping water to him, is just as if you were to appoint over recruits a commander who had seen no camp.

§ 20. Finally, let it also be a care of the state to furnish the best possible libraries of all the sciences, not merely for the adornment of the city but rather for the use of learned men. For as the founding of a library does not belong to private means, so it belongs especially to public magnificence--and indeed to the most useful magnificence of all.

Most noble was the library of Ptolemy, concerning which Philo, Josephus, Livy, Seneca, and Aulus Gellius write, although there is some discrepancy between Seneca and Gellius. Seneca, On Tranquillity of Mind, chapter 9: "I shall take account even of expenditure upon studies, which is the most liberal expenditure, for so long as it retains measure. To what end are innumerable books and libraries, whose owner scarcely reads their catalogues in his whole life? A multitude burdens the learner; it does not instruct him. It is much better to entrust yourself to a few authors than to wander through many. Four hundred thousand books burned at Alexandria, a most beautiful monument of royal opulence. Let another man praise it, as Livy does, who says that this work was outstanding for the elegance and care of kings. That was not elegance or care but studious luxury--indeed, not even studious, since they had procured them not for study but for display, just as for most men ignorant even of the literature of slaves, books are not instruments of study but ornaments of dining rooms. Therefore, let as many books as are sufficient be procured, nothing for show."

Aulus Gellius in Book 6, final chapter, says that there were seven hundred thousand volumes. I do not approve Seneca's reproach. He answers himself well: "'More honorably,' you say, 'would I have poured out expenditures upon these than upon Corinthian bronzes and painted panels.' What is excessive is vicious everywhere." Again he objects: "For whom do you have less pardon: one who seeks a name from marble and ivory, or one who seeks out the works of either unknown or disapproved authors and yawns among so many thousands of books, taking the greatest pleasure in the fronts and titles of his volumes? Among the most idle men, therefore, you will see whatever there is of speeches and histories, and shelves constructed up to the ceiling. For now, among baths and hot rooms, a library too is fitted out as a necessary ornament of a house. I would plainly pardon it if it arose from an excessive desire for studies; but now those carefully sought-out works of sacred talents, copied with portraits of their authors, are procured for the appearance and decoration of walls."

He says only this rightly: that works of disapproved authors are not to be sought, and that among so many good authors studies are not to be neglected. The Alexandrian library deservedly burned in civil war, for it was full not only of books by impious philosophers but also of superstitious books by magicians and documents of forbidden arts. But it is exceedingly useful for the state to procure in an academy, and for the use of others, an abundance of the best books; for nothing more retards the abilities of many men than a lack of books.

Jerome on Psalm 1 wonderfully commends the library at Caesarea, founded by Julius Africanus and enlarged by Pamphilus and Eusebius, which he himself often consulted. Although it had declined a little at that time, it was most renowned, as was the Alexandrian library. At Athens, the tyrant Pisistratus was the first to make books available for public reading. The Athenians afterward furnished a library; but after the city of Athens was burned in the common ruin of the Greeks, Xerxes sent the library into Persia. Seleucus restored it to the Athenians when, in turn, the plunder of the Elamites was carried back into Greece.

Aristotle himself also left a library to Theophrastus, while Theophrastus handed it on to Neleus. Neleus carried it to Scepsis, Strabo says, and left it to descendants who were unskilled men and kept the books shut up and carelessly stored. When they perceived the zeal of the Attalid kings for gathering books into the library at Pergamum, they concealed them in a certain pit. After the books had been corrupted by moths and dampness, they sold them to Apellicon of Teos for a great sum of silver--the Aristotelian and Theophrastan books, that is. But Apellicon, because he was more devoted to books than to wisdom and wished to repair the corrosions, had them copied, the writing being incorrectly supplied. He therefore published books full of errors.

Consequently, the ancient Peripatetics after Theophrastus, since they altogether lacked the standard books except for a few exoteric discourses, had nothing upon which to philosophize securely, but produced certain theses by night labor. Later men, however, after these books came to light, philosophized far better than the earlier men by imitating Aristotle. Yet because of the multitude of errors, they were compelled to say merely plausible things.

But among the ancients Theodosius shone with great praise. He surpassed Ptolemy in zeal for books and in prudence of collection, for he placed all the best codices of the holy fathers in his library and copied many with his own hand, as Nicephorus is the authority in Book 14, chapter 3. The Church of Hagia Sophia, the noblest that Constantinople possessed, preserved one hundred thousand books in its library.

Before our times Lorenzo de' Medici of Florence, through Markos Mousouros of Crete, searched the hidden libraries of Greece and furnished that noble library at Florence. Victor writes that formerly there were twenty-nine public libraries at Rome. The most noble are now the Vatican and Venetian libraries. Augustus, as Suetonius relates in chapter 29, built at home the Temple of Apollo in that part of the Palatine house which the soothsayers declared to be desired by the god because it had been struck by lightning. He added porticoes with a Latin and Greek library, in which place, now advanced in age, he often also held the senate and reviewed the panels of judges.

Domitian too restored the libraries consumed by fire, as the same Tranquillus relates, for he took care that corrected copies be transcribed from everywhere. Constantine the Great did the same at Constantinople. Nor does the statement that a multitude of books is said to disturb the mind establish anything against libraries, for since there are many men in the state, it is fitting to construct them for many. Each man will read whatever books he wishes according to his ability. And it is surely necessary to have read many and seen many. "Would," says Saint Jerome in Epistle 40, "that I possessed the volumes of all commentators, so that I might compensate for slowness of ability by diligence in learning." And: "I take many things into my hand, and from many men I shall learn many things."

§ 21. Therefore, the state will open the best library to men devoted to studies; and, that this beneficence may not be momentary, it will prescribe these laws:

1. Let no persons enter without the librarian's permission.

2. Let no one be admitted unless of tested fidelity and probity.

3. Let books of all faculties be arranged in good order.

4. Let all books display externally in a title their subject and the author's name.

5. Let there be another book containing a catalogue of all books in alphabetical order.

6. In that catalogue, let the author's name, the subject of the book, its size, and its color be described.

7. Let no one, not even the librarian himself or a consul, be permitted to carry a book out unless a signed acknowledgment has been given.

8. If anyone carries one out, let him return it after a month.

9. Let them take care of the cleanliness of the library and the books.

10. Twice each year let the librarian admonish the senate concerning the purchase of new books.

11. Let forbidden books be exiled.

12. Let no one impress a mark upon books either with ink or by folding back the paper.

13. But if the state shrinks from the expense, let it add another law, troublesome for enlarging the library and reducing expenditures.

14. If anyone increases the library by a book, let it be deemed a good deed; let the librarian courteously preserve his memory.

§ 22. The custom of academies indeed provides that doctors be created by doctors, theologians by theologians, jurists by jurists, physicians by physicians, and masters by masters. Nevertheless, it is not contrary to laws and common law for any men to be promoted by any men; there is no difficulty in the matter, nor are we forbidden by any law. The objection of those who deny that anyone can give what he does not possess is excessively crude. You would think them speaking about a ball or a knucklebone, not about a right or dignity, which is conferred even by one who does not possess a right or dignity of the same name but another, more eminent one.

An academic degree was formerly the ornament of magnates. Our archbishopric certainly had two doctors, Uriel and Sebastian. The two lights of Germany, Julius of Würzburg and Johann Gottfried, prelate of Bamberg and Würzburg, also possessed academic degrees. I pass over Philip II of Speyer; Matthew of Worms; Henry IV and Christopher of Augsburg; Reichwin, Duke of Lorraine and bishop of Strasbourg; Albert I, Count of Hohenberg and bishop of Würzburg. Eichstätt also had two prelates who were doctors, Philip and Johann III; Brescia and other dioceses have them now.

CHAPTER XVII

An Enumeration of the Things That Must Be Learned

§ 1. Immense is the force and multitude of the things proposed to us for learning, but so great is our weakness that we scarcely possess perfectly one part of them all. For who, after the studies of many years, understands those great mysteries concerning God, angels, and souls? That mind, so swift, so active, so curious about all things, cannot determine what it itself is. Concerning points and lines, concerning the connection of corporeal things and συνέχεια (continuity), after so many thousands of volumes, we all carry ignorance to the grave. But it is foolish to lament these things, since clarity and knowledge are promised to us in the future life; nevertheless, to subdue pride, our darkness must often be impressed upon us.

A twofold order of the sciences must be established, one of method, the other of nature. In method they generally observe this order: that youth is first polished by grammar, poetry, eloquence, and history; that it is next exercised in the subtlety of logic, physics, mathematics, metaphysics, and moral philosophy; and that from here some pass to the profundity of most sacred theology, others to the studies of law and legislation, and others to those of medicine. I too approve and confirm this method of teaching, approved by almost all academies and neglected by a few not without public harm to youth. This order, indeed, was established according to the convenience of learners. The other is natural: following the summits of things, it distributes the sciences to us according to their division. If we consult it, it does not readily appear how one ought to call a science one and by what limits it ought to be defined.

The philosophers indeed establish that one science is so called from one formal aspect of its object; but what that formal aspect which conciliates unity may be is not yet clear. Cajetan holds that formal unity is taken from being knowable, not from the being of the species. Light and color, for example, are objects of sight not from their nature and essence, which are diverse, but from the fact that they are visible. But he entangles the matter with a greater difficulty. For if body is the object of physics according to knowable being, what is that one knowable thing which makes one science? For there are many bodies and therefore many knowable things; and if they constitute one science because all can be known, spirits and bodies will also be joined into one because they can be known. Being itself, which contains all things, is also knowable.

The common distinction of the sciences is by three abstractions, which almost all the logicians whom I have seen put up for sale. For physics abstracts from singular matter, but not from sensible matter; it considers the species of bodies and their affections, not singular bodies. Mathematics abstracts from singular and sensible matter, for it considers points, lines, surfaces, and depths abstractly in themselves, and not as they are in matter. Metaphysics, however, abstracts from singular, sensible, and intelligible matter, because it considers only the most general or spiritual things, things which have no position and location.

I admit that there is something I miss in this matter. Those abstractions do not apply to rational and moral science, although their dignity is distinguished. Next, if a special abstraction is assigned to quantity, it can also be assigned to quality; for both quantity and quality are sensible, and writers on perspective treat light, while professing themselves mathematicians. And certainly it can be considered without matter. Finally, if physics expounds body, quality, and quantity, surely few things will be left for metaphysics. Therefore, a distinction of sciences must be sought which has been established by nature and exists in the objects before our mind has known them. I judge as follows.

§ 2. There is one peculiar science of each class of things and one general science of all. When I have demonstrated that every triangle has three angles equal to two right angles, I possess knowledge; when I have learned several propositions of the same kind, I have attained one total science from the likeness of things related to one another. But since the whole universe of things and system of all beings agrees in being, in like manner one most general science will be so called which corresponds to that whole. And just as Being taken most broadly is divided into its parts, so science will be divided into its parts. For just as being taken generally is intelligible, so the faculty of understanding extends to being and all its parts; in the same manner, a habit--either one or consisting of many--will bring the capacity of the power of understanding to firmness.

Thus formerly Plato, Book 7 of the Republic; Proclus, Book 1, chapter 4, on Euclid; and Giles of Rome, preface to the Metaphysics, question 22. Accordingly, Antonio of Mirandola is not the author but the elucidator of that opinion in Book 3 of The Overthrow of the Singular Contest, sections 6 and 7. Those who attack this reasoning do not sufficiently observe that, when they call physics one science, they force very many and very widely separated things into one object and cannot give a law to others preventing them from adding still more. They extend metaphysics itself to every class of things. But now, following the nature of things, let us divide the sciences.

Science taken most broadly is divided into that which treats spiritual being and is properly speculative metaphysics--its primary object is the uncreated spirit, its secondary object the created spirit. On account of the difficulty of its object, the general doctrines of the other sciences have been added to it. The other is physics, which treats material being and contains many practical and speculative sciences. By the name of material being we understand not only bodies but also all accidents of bodies and whatever things possess some order toward bodies, such as the rational soul, intellect, and human will, because the former is the form of the body and the latter are properties of that form.

Physics taken in this manner is divided into physics strictly taken, whose object is natural body, which Aristotle explains in his books of the Physics; and mathematics, which considers quantity, a part which Euclid and his interpreters chiefly expound.

Physics is again twofold, for it treats either simple body or body compounded from simple bodies. If it treats simple body, it treats either incorruptible or corruptible body; if incorruptible, it is celestial; if corruptible, elemental. Aristotle explains these parts in his books On the Heavens and On Generation and Corruption. This celestial science, which is physical, differs from astronomy, which belongs to mathematics. For physics considers the quantity of the heavens in itself, its matter, form, and efficient cause; but astronomy considers the proportions of quantity and the magnitudes from the principles of mathematics. The object of the science of mixed body is whatever is found in the whole universe besides the heavens and the elements. First, one science concerns imperfect mixtures, another perfect mixtures. Imperfect mixtures are snow, ice, mist, and the other things which Aristotle explains in the books of the Meteorology. The remaining mixtures are perfect, namely, those which possess a perfect tempering of the elements from which they are composed. Imperfect mixtures have one element so predominant that the powers of the others scarcely appear.

Of perfect mixtures, however, some are animate and others inanimate. Aristotle also treats mixtures in general in the two books On Generation and Corruption, and animate things in the three books On the Soul, the Short Natural Works, and On the Generation of Animals. The science of inanimate things has two principal parts, gemology and metallurgy, concerning which Aristotle says little, but Pliny, the alchemists, and Cardano say much in the books On the Variety of Things and On Subtlety.

The science that concerns animate things is held either concerning sentient things or those without sense. The latter is threefold: arboriculture, shrub-lore, and herb-lore; for root-lore, which others add, is common to all these. Aristotle treats these matters first in On Plants, as do Dioscorides, Theophrastus, and his interpreter Julius Scaliger. There are three species of sentient things, which both Aristotle and Gesner--above all a diligent investigator of natures--treat.

But since man is as it were a little world, there are several sciences concerning him as species of anthropology.

For if we consider the body, either its nature and parts are considered, and this is a species of the science of animate things--Vesalius treats it with the greatest accuracy--or the body is considered insofar as it is capable of being healed. This science is subordinate to the former, namely medicine, which they divide into active and contemplative medicine. The latter they again divide into physiology, which investigates the natures of things so that it may use their powers for health; this part they divide again into the physiology of elements, humors, temperaments, powers, and members; into etiology, which investigates the causes of all diseases and symptoms; and, third, into semiomantics, which infers from signs either past, present, or future things. All these matters were treated by Hippocrates of Cos and his interpreter Galen, and thereafter by Avicenna and others.

The science which treats the human mind can be called noetics and is threefold. First is that which explains the actions of the mind as such; this is customarily called animastics by the Latins. Two sciences are, as it were, subordinated to this: the first directs the operations of the intellect toward truth, namely logic; the other directs those of the will toward the good or honorable, and is moral philosophy. Moral philosophy is again twofold, principal and ministering. The ministering is called oratory and is divided into dialectic, rhetoric, and poetics; for those sciences were invented to incite the will toward the honorable. The principal is called ethics, or moral philosophy properly so called; its object is human actions insofar as they are good or evil. They divide this very variously, concerning which matters in their own proper place. Aristotle treated it in the Nicomachean Ethics, the Great Ethics, and the Politics. Jurisprudence can be referred here; one part of it is positive, the other epideictic or demonstrative. Its parts are various.

The science which treats quantity deals either with continuous or with discrete quantity. That which treats continuous quantity is generally called geometry by one name. It is divided in two: one part treats lines and surfaces and does not have a proper name but claims the general name for itself and is called geometry; the other treats solid body and is called stereometry, as though “measurement of solids.”

They further divide geometry in another manner: into that which discusses quantity as it exists by itself and contains the parts just named; and into that which treats quantity as joined with matter and subject to the senses. This, from its primary part, is called astronomy; others call it impure mathematics because it does not treat quantity considered in isolation. It is again divided into astrology, geodesy, perspective, and mechanics.

Astrology is that which discusses the motions of the world, the magnitude, figure, illumination, and distance of the heavenly bodies. It has three parts. The first is gnomonics, which measures time by the position of the gnomon or style. The second is meteoroscopy, which examines differences of elevations and the other theorems. The third is dioptrics, which investigates the distances of the planets and other stars with dioptric instruments.

Perspective is that which uses visual rays in the manner of lines and the angles constituted from those lines. This again is threefold. First is perspective properly so called, which gives the causes of those appearances in which things seem to us to be otherwise than they are, whether because of distances, position, or medium. The second is the science of mirrors, which is occupied with various refractions. The third is sciography, namely the delineator of shadows, which gives an account of various appearances arising from shadows.

Geodesy is the science which measures various things--such as fields, heaps, wells, and towers--by visible lines. If it treats the entire earth and sea, it is customarily called geography; if some one region, chorography; if some one place, topography.

Mechanics embraces various arts and therefore has almost the same definition as art, although properly those arts which leave no work behind them, such as the art of dancing, are not mechanical. Its parts are architecture, which constructs every kind of building; organopoetics, which constructs various machines and instruments; and, third, thaumaturgy, which effects certain wonders by air, weights, sinews, and fires. To this they refer the art which they call natural magic, which uses no magical deceptions but, on account of a hidden knowledge of things, produces effects of such a kind that they seem incapable of being accomplished naturally, but only by the aid of demons--as when Archimedes draws a ship by himself.

Arithmetic is occupied with discrete quantity. They call one kind speculative and another practical. Music is subordinated to the latter, which they likewise divide into speculative and practical. Both practical and speculative music are divided into melic, harmonic, and rhythm. Melic contains oratorical and poetical feet; and so, with respect to this part, poetry and rhetoric were subordinated to music. Harmonic is the account of acute and grave sounds, by whose proportion all songs are completed. Rhythm is the artful motion of the body according to harmony. A dance is constituted from harmony and rhythm.

It has been granted to us to know many things concerning uncreated being--God, the Best and Greatest--and concerning the holy angels, especially concerning God, who can in some manner be known from created things.

The sciences that I have named possess many parts under themselves, and in every single part difficulties which only those who have devoted themselves to them for a very long time and with the greatest diligence know to exist, but which they have never thoroughly penetrated. All these things must be taught in the state, and to excel in one part of them is glorious. But as one who treats on behalf of the state, my purpose is to follow the method and the ordinary manner of transmitting the sciences themselves. For confusion in learning prevents more people from attaining wisdom than does weakness of ability or the will to advance.

CHAPTER XVIII

How the Elements of Grammar Are to Be Taught

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. They have called grammar the foundation of all the arts. But it has been the foundation ever since, when an attempt was made to raise a tower to heaven, God confounded the languages of men at Babylon. They were undertaking that immense structure for no use but out of proud vanity, in order to cause wonder in posterity. We pay the penalty of that ambition even today, so that we spend our tender years upon letters and syllables; for many years we learn the signs of things and almost grow old before we know how to speak.

Happy was that offspring of men which did not twist the tongue into foreign words, which without labor drank its mother tongue with its milk. Now the intricacies and variations of conjugations and declensions, and three or four languages, detain us in a care that is most disagreeable but necessary. Yet because this yoke has been imposed upon us all, we must strive to bear it gently and render it lighter by prudence.

§ 2. First one must begin with little things, because, since all things cannot be grasped at once, everything must be instilled piecemeal into tender minds. A weak hand cannot break that bundle when it is bound together; the individual twigs must therefore be broken up. Accordingly, few and varied things are to be proposed to the earliest age. Let there be a class in which the rudiments and certain beginnings--or certain general precepts of syntax and of composing discourse--are transmitted.

The order of our Society provides that in the lowest class the master transmit a perfect knowledge of the rudiments and a begun knowledge of syntax. These things are taught for five hours each day. For I intend to show this because it will apply to many other things, especially since I observe that in this manner young boys and almost children complete an encyclopedic course in the more humane letters.

Two hours before noon and the same number after dinner are spent in exercises. The books are the Rudiments, Cicero, a Greek reading, the catechism, and the introduction to syntax. This variety is arranged into its own periods as follows.

In the first hour the assigned portions of the readings, which ought to have been committed to memory at home, are demanded and recited. For the master's labor brings no benefit unless the memory of the young men is cultivated by perpetual exercise. The more improvident youth flees this labor of learning, the more must a faithful master strive not to permit the vigorous little memories of the boys to be covered with mold and squalor.

Cicero's easier letters are learned by heart so that they may draw the Latin language from the source itself and become accustomed amid their beginnings to Ciceronian rhythms.

In the same hour, the theme that was given in the vernacular on the preceding day is offered to the master and corrected--if not that of everyone, at least of most--both publicly and privately, so that in another's writing they may recognize their own errors or κατορθώματα (successful usages).

The usefulness of this exercise is so great that it can almost by itself make learned men. For, made acute in the errors of others by mutual rivalry, they more easily avoid their own, especially when they see that everything is conducted publicly and in the light.

The second hour contains the exposition of Cicero, after the preceding day's reading has been repeated. No more than four lines are expounded, lest they be confused by a multitude of material. First, either the master reads them or causes them to be read, so that by this practice they may learn the perfect pronunciation of words and the quantity of syllables. Next, the subject is explained in the vernacular. Second, the text is translated period by period and word for word.

Third, returning to the beginning, the master is to indicate the structure; unweaving the period, he is to show what words govern what cases, weigh most things for explaining the laws of grammar, bring forward one or another observation concerning the Latin language--but one as easy as possible--demonstrate metaphors by examples of the best-known things, and dictate nothing except perhaps the subject.

The subject for a composition is to be dictated in the common speech, word for word, clear, and generally no longer than four lines, and it is chiefly to be related to the grammatical precept. The pupils are sometimes to be ordered to append to it a brief rendering or expression from Cicero, in accordance with the prescription of syntax, or those very things that must be learned from the Greek rudiments, or another thing of this kind.

In the final half-hour, some part of the declensions or other exercises is explained, or they contend in disputation, for which all ought to be prepared.

§ 3. The first fruit, therefore, is the exercise of memory and the polishing of the language; the other is the correction of the theme, which weighs everything according to the precepts of grammar. If anything has been committed against any rule, if there is an error of spelling or punctuation, the file removes it all.

Cicero, when already celebrated at Rome and numbered among the foremost orators, judged this to be of such importance that he journeyed to Greece and Asia and attached himself especially to Molon, concerning whom he glories in the Brutus: “Dionysius of Magnesia was with me most assiduously; there was also Aeschylus of Cnidus and Xenocles of Adramyttium. These were then numbered among the chief rhetoricians of Asia. Not content with them, I came to Rhodes and attached myself to the same Molon whom I had heard at Rome, both a distinguished pleader in real causes and a writer, and the most prudent in noting and observing faults and in instituting and teaching. He took pains--if only he was able to attain it--to restrain us, excessively redundant and overflowing through a certain youthful impunity and license of speaking, and, as it were, to confine us when flowing beyond the banks. Thus I returned two years later not only more practiced but almost changed. For both the excessive exertion of my voice had subsided and my speech had, as it were, cooled; strength had come to my sides and a moderate habit to my body.”

I warn of this because the labor of correcting the work of others is most tedious and often saddens the man upon whom this benefit is bestowed. It is therefore neglected with immense loss by masters who are under their own authority and teach under their own auspices and judgment. Nothing is more pitiable than noble young men who, through want of an admonisher, retain for their whole life certain troublesome habits and ineptitudes of words, gestures, and manners which a teacher could have removed with one word.

Great advantage is also brought by hearing a Latin reading in the vernacular, by its repetition and the writing of the theme, and by the exercise of the rules of grammar.

§ 4. This diversity is not burdensome to abilities. The gifted learn through play, the middling easily, and the slow with moderate labor the four lines which they heard explained in school on the preceding day. The theme too is brief, and aids for composing it are provided from the readings.

In this ordering, teachers of boys long ago erred in two ways. Some, making no mention of Cicero, syntax, or any book, inculcate the rudiments, declensions, and genders; by constantly repeating disagreeable matters and showing no use for so great a labor, they oppress and torment abilities and--what is most serious--do so without benefit. They sometimes wear down the wretched pupils for three or four years and do not lead them to the point of learning to speak three words correctly. Hence, formerly, before the industry of the Society laid out the schools, Pallas was indignant that grown, bearded young men sweated in composing a little letter.

The other error was still more serious: they mixed with the childish rudiments weightier readings which the children could not grasp. Therefore, they could neither be examined nor instructed. There are those who teach the same pupils rudiments, syntax, poetics, rhetoric, and dialectic. I remember that in the second grammar class I had a pupil of good ability and advanced age who, although in composition he stumbled on every other line, recited most readily the definitions and precepts not only of poetics and rhetoric but even of logic. In wonder, I began to test whether he understood any of them; but he answered in such a way as to show that, when he defined genus or species, he did not even suspect what things he was speaking about.

§ 5. I have spoken of the hours before noon. After midday, the first exercise of the memory consists in reciting grammar, both Latin and Greek. The written exercises are then corrected; next, grammar is expounded and illustrated with examples.

In the second hour the introduction to syntax--that is, the general rules--is explained. A fourth part of the hour, however, is allotted to Greek. In the final half-hour a little army is set in motion and fights with its voice; by the privilege of its seating, the distinction of titles, the enticements of little prizes, and the fear of disgrace, it is inflamed with the desire for victory.

To many, the mention of the Greek language at the beginnings customarily appears untimely. But experience has taught that, if very few things are proposed, they are gradually instilled with little trouble; but after pupils have already made proper progress in the Latin language, they can be brought back to the Greek elements only with the greatest difficulty. I shall speak of the Greek language elsewhere.

A boy who is gifted, diligent, and already endowed with some judgment can easily complete this course in half a year. Yet because most are of a weak little age and incapable of great labor, and indulgence is also granted them at home so that they do not render their assigned work, almost a full year is spent.

§ 6. From here, therefore, the step is made to the middle grammar class, in which a knowledge of the whole of grammar but only an imperfect knowledge of syntax is required. For only the easier appendices are joined to the general rules which they learned in the preceding class. From Greek they learn nouns, contracted verbs, verbs in -μι, and the easier formations; also the Greek catechism or the Tablet of Cebes. The authors proposed are Cicero's familiar letters and Ovid's easiest poems from the Tristia and Letters from Pontus.

The manner of exposition and exercise of memory are the same as shown above, but nevertheless different in part. First, more things, and more difficult things, are expounded in Cicero, for they have already understood the easier matters before. Next, they are explained more learnedly; the construction of the discourse and the exercises of syntax are especially inculcated. Third, verbal elegances and more exquisite phrases are transmitted. Fourth, an easy poet is expounded, not so that they should already begin to compose verses but so that they may gradually become accustomed to understanding more difficult things and imbibe the rhythms, whose system they nevertheless do not yet grasp. From this arises another advantage also: namely, that they are not only captivated by the sweetness of rhythmical speech but also observe the transpositions of words which the necessity of verse makes very great.

Those masters therefore erred who formerly expounded a poet late, and not until the precepts of rhetoric. But others erred far more destructively who, through premature haste in teaching, explained the system of verse at these beginnings. For they wonderfully disturbed little abilities not only by the multitude of things but also by confusion. They have not yet learned to speak, and you order them to sing? Their greatest labor is to weave words and nouns suitably into discourse without barbarisms and solecisms. Therefore, they ought not yet to be taught to learn those things upon which the system of verse depends.

I judge those who make poets prematurely to do the same thing as foolish nurses who teach infants to dance when, still among hoops and supports, they scarcely walk with a tottering step. Let them first speak readily, abundantly, and without fear of erring; then let them knock at the doors of the Muses. A slow or lame dancer is a ridiculous thing, for without agility and urbanity that harmonious motion of bodies is a ridiculous ineptitude.

§ 7. There is a highest grammar class, in which the remaining things that belong to this art are explained perfectly: namely, all the more difficult precepts of syntax, figurative constructions, all the precepts of metrical art, and all the Greek rudiments.

That order is most correct: they learn the easiest laws of constructing discourse in the lowest class, the easy laws in the middle, and the difficult laws in the highest. What happens to architects who build steps thus also happens to them, for whenever they build the upper steps upon the structure, they rest upon the lower ones.

As regards readings, from the orators there can be expounded in the first semester all the weightiest letters of Cicero to his Friends, to Atticus, and to his brother Quintus; but in the second, the books On Friendship, On Old Age, the Paradoxes, and others of this kind. From the poets, in the first semester some selected and expurgated elegies and letters of Ovid; in the second, certain passages likewise selected and expurgated from Catullus, Tibullus, Propertius, and Virgil's Eclogues, or even Virgil's easier books, such as the fourth of the Georgics and the fifth and seventh of the Aeneid. From the Greeks, Saint John Chrysostom, Aesop, Agapetus, and authors similar to them.

§ 8. The distribution of time and the other exercises possess an analogy with the things that have been said. Nevertheless, everything is to be expounded more learnedly, and the highest account is to be taken of elegance. Poetry must also be begun: first with verses given in prose order, which the novices are to restore; next, with certain words changed; finally, with a dictated theme which they themselves are to bind in feet by their own effort and clothe in rhythms.

If this order is observed constantly and suitably, it produces immense fruit by rapid labor. I have seen innumerable boys who, after being instructed by this method and entering the lowest class in the ninth year of age, spoke and wrote purely and in Latin when the twelfth year came round; they also composed easy verses and explained Latin authors.

And if an experiment is sought, our gymnasia exhibited hundreds of such pupils. It would be easy for me to prove this method of teaching from various authors. But I appeal to experience, the most certain witness of the things stated. Would that masters everywhere in the towns followed the same method, or that the magistrate labored so that they could. But frequently, because of the smallness of their stipends, they are drawn away elsewhere, since they are compelled to be pleaders of causes and scribes at the same time. Next, so great is the labor not only of teaching but of teaching by the water clock and changing at fixed turns that no one readily deigns to undertake this burden constantly except one who has devoted his life to God.

CHAPTER XIX

On Poetry

§ 1. We now lead our novice to the studies of eloquence, to the orator--not so that he may approach private or public causes, but so that he may learn the things which he may afterward bring forth opportunely when practical experience demands them. Eloquence is twofold: copious and expanded, which inundates like a river and which they properly call eloquence; and contracted or compressed, as Cicero calls it in the book On Famous Orators, which is dialectic.

Again, each kind--but especially that more abundant kind, which resembles an open palm, not a fist--is divided into prose and discourse bound by rhythms, or metrical discourse. I say "especially," for even the precepts of dialectic can be comprehended in meters; indeed, certain acute, brief, and exceedingly concise poems imitate dialectic by their pointedness. The sacred poems of David and Job are full of examples, as are some Latin epigrams, if we consult them.

If you weigh these things according to the common manner, you will divide them into three faculties whose perfection few have attained; but if you look to the nature of eloquence, you will understand one end: to teach, move, and persuade by speech, whether it drives or draws minds with a flood of words, or penetrates by pointed brevity and performs the office of an orator without commotion. I am indeed accustomed to wonder at those who measure eloquence by the ornament and majesty of words and thoughts. Whoever speaks suitably for persuasion is eloquent, whether he governs his words with Ciceronian eloquence or invades minds with Chrysippean subtlety. Not only experience but also the divine writings teach this.

Experience does so, for a brief admonition, a clear maxim, and a timely axiom are often more powerful than long speeches, since we see that the briefest speeches have possessed the greatest force. Second Kings, chapter 14, verse 5: "Alas, I am a widow, for my husband is dead. And your handmaid had two sons, who quarreled with each other in the field, and there was no one who could restrain them; and one struck the other and killed him. And behold, the whole kindred rises together against your handmaid and says, 'Hand over the man who struck his brother, so that we may kill him for the life of his brother whom he killed, and so that we may destroy the heir.' And they seek to extinguish my spark which is left, so that no name or remnant may survive for my husband upon the earth." And the king said to the woman: "Go to your house, and I shall give orders concerning you."

And the woman of Tekoa said to the king: "Upon me, my lord king, and upon my father's house let the iniquity be; but let the king and his throne be innocent." And the king said: "Whoever contradicts you, bring him to me, and he shall no longer proceed to touch you." She said: "Let the king remember the Lord his God, so that the blood relatives are not multiplied to take vengeance and so that they by no means kill my son." He said: "As the Lord lives, not one of your son's hairs shall fall to the earth." The woman therefore said: "Let your handmaid speak a word to my lord the king."

And he said: "Speak." And the woman said: "Why have you devised a thing of this kind against the people of God, and why has the king spoken this word so that he sins and does not bring back his own banished man? We all die and flow away like waters upon the earth which do not return. God does not will a soul to perish but takes thought, considering that the one cast away should not perish utterly. Now, therefore, I have come to speak this word to my lord the king in the presence of the people. And your handmaid said: 'I shall speak to the king, if in some manner the king may do the word of his handmaid.' And the king heard, so that he might deliver his handmaid from the hand of all who wished to erase me and my son together from the inheritance of the Lord. Therefore, let your handmaid say that the word of my lord the king be like a sacrifice. For as an angel of the Lord, so is my lord the king, that he may be moved neither by blessing nor by cursing; hence the Lord your God too is with you."

Thus she pleads before the king in the presence of the people--and eloquently, for she truly obtains what she sought. Abigail likewise, First Kings, chapter 25, verse 24: “Upon me, my lord, let this iniquity be. Let your handmaid, I beseech you, speak in your ears, and hear the words of your servant. Let not my lord the king, I pray, set his heart upon that wicked man Nabal, for according to his name he is a fool, and folly is with him. But I, your handmaid, did not see your servants, my lord, whom you sent. Now therefore, my lord, as the Lord lives and as your soul lives, the Lord who restrained you from coming into blood and saved your hand for yourself--and now let your enemies and those who seek evil for my lord become like Nabal.

“Therefore receive this blessing which your handmaid has brought to you, my lord, and give it to the servants who follow you, my lord. Take away the iniquity of your servant; for the Lord will surely make for you, my lord, a faithful house, because you, my lord, fight the battles of the Lord. Therefore, let no malice be found in you during all the days of your life. For if at any time a man rises, persecuting you and seeking your life, the life of my lord will be guarded as in the bundle of the living before the Lord your God; but the life of your enemies will be whirled about as by the force and circle of a sling. Therefore, when the Lord has done for you, my lord, all the good things which he has spoken concerning you and has established you as ruler over Israel, this will not be for you, my lord, as a sob and a scruple of heart--that you shed innocent blood or avenged yourself. And when the Lord has done good to my lord, you will remember your handmaid.”

These passages show an altogether different eloquence, accommodated to the manners and character of human beings. I warn of this so that we do not judge so great a matter by fluency and elegance of words alone. We must therefore now speak of these things, and first of eloquence bound by rhythms, or poetry. For the purpose of all is to teach and persuade, and this is done by speaking well. He speaks well who speaks well in the judgment of the judges or hearers. For if they reject you, if they judge that you speak falsely, vainly, and without elegance, you will have spoken well to no purpose. Concerning poetry I have chiefly these things to say: first, that it is useful to the state; next, what the method and system for it may be; finally, how varied it is.

§ 2. I easily show from many things that poetry is useful in the state. First, from its most praiseworthy antiquity, which always shone in well-established cities and kingdoms.

If we repeat the most ancient memory, we shall understand that poetry excelled not only among the Jews but also among neighboring peoples and was the work of princes. Although the true poetry of the ancients is unknown to us, we cannot be ignorant that poetry existed, and perhaps anyone will understand without much difficulty that hymns are rhythmical if he is willing to run through the various species of poems and their mixtures. Scaliger in the Hyle, or Book 2 of the Poetics, chapter 6, enumerates various kinds of verses: catalectic, acatalectic, brachycatalectic, hypercatalectic, pure, and impure. In some of these, as in melic and dithyrambic poems, hyporchemes, scolia, and paeans, they aim only that strophes and antistrophes correspond, and that at different intervals. Parts of verses are connected with different whole verses. He indeed goes so far as to recognize a verse or a degree of a verse in one foot or syllable.

Since, therefore, there are so many kinds of pyrrhics, iambics, dactylics, trochaics, spondaics, anapaests, ionics, aeolics, and paeonics; so many mixtures of feet in one poem; and so many compositions of poems, either recurrent or non-recurrent, it will not be difficult to refer most Hebrew poems to those kinds. Or surely you will understand many Greek poems of such a kind that, if they are written in the form of prose, you would scarcely believe from their rhythms that they were poems. I shall give examples. Bacchylides in Athenaeus, The Deipnosophists, Book 2: ἀναμιγνυμένα Διονυσίοισι δώροις,

Ἐλπὶς δ’ αὔξουσα φρένας,

ἀνδράσι δ’ ὑψοτάτω

πέμπεται μερίμνας·

αὐτίκα μὲν πόλεων

κρήδεμνα λύει,

πᾶσι δ’ ἀνθρώποις

μοναρχήσειν δοκεῖ·

χρυσῷ δ’ ἐλέφαντί τε

μαρμαίρουσιν οἶκοι,

πυροφόροι δὲ κατ’ αἰγλήεντα

νῆες ἄγουσιν ἀπ’ Αἰγύπτου

ὣς πίνοντος ὁρμαίνει κέαρ.

And hope strikes the mind when it is mingled with Bacchic gifts, and projects the deepest cares upon men. At once he storms the walls of cities and thinks that he will be monarch of all human beings. Indeed, houses gleam with gold and ivory, and ships laden with grain carry most splendid and abundant wealth from Egypt, as the heart of the drinker imagines.

Who, moreover, would suspect poems where all the syllables are short, as in these lines of Pratinas?

Τίς ὁ θόρυβος ὅδε;

τίνα τάδε τὰ χορεύματα;

τίς ὕβρις ἔμολεν

ἐπὶ Διονυσιάδα

πολύπαταγα θυμέλαν;

ἐμός, ἐμός ὁ Βρόμιος.

What is that tumult? What dances, what insolence, has invaded the altar of Dionysus, which possesses much clamor? My own, my own Bromius.

The scolion of Aristotle is better known, to which not a few Hebrew poems nevertheless correspond:

Ἀρετὰ πολύμοχθε γένει βροτείῳ, θήραμα κάλλιστον βίῳ,

σᾶς πέρι, παρθένε, μορφᾶς

καὶ θανεῖν ζηλωτὸς ἐν Ἑλλάδι πότμος, καὶ πόνους τλῆναι μαλεροὺς

ἀκάμαντας· τοῖον

ἐπὶ φρένα βάλλεις

καρπὸν τ’ ἀθάνατον

χρυσοῦ τε κρείσσω καὶ γονέων

μαλακαυγήτοιό θ’ ὕπνου.

σεῦ δ’ ἕνεκεν ὁ Διὸς Ἡρακλῆς

Λήδας τε κοῦροι πολλ’ ἀνέτλασαν, ἔργοις σὰν ἀγρεύοντες δύναμιν.

σοῖς δὲ πόθοις Ἀχιλλεὺς

Αἴας τε Ἄϊδαο δόμους ἦλθον·

σᾶς δ’ ἕνεκεν φιλίας μορφᾶς

Ἀταρνέος ἔντροφος

ἀελίου χήρωσεν αὐγάς.

τοιγὰρ ἀοίδιμον ἔργοις

ἀθάνατόν τέ μιν αὐξήσουσι Μοῦσαι,

Μνημοσύνης θυγατέρες,

Διὸς ξενίου σέβας αὔξουσαι

φιλίας τε γέρας βεβαίας.

Virtue, much laborious for the human race, most beautiful quarry of life: for the sake of your countenance, maiden, death is a desirable fate in Greece, and so is the endurance of fierce, untamed labors. You cast such a fruit into the mind, immortal and more excellent than gold and parents and sleep. For your sake Hercules, son of Jupiter, and the sons of Leda suffered many things, hunting your power by their works. Through desire for you Achilles and Ajax also entered the houses of Orcus. Indeed, on account of your lovely countenance the ward of Atarneus was deprived of the light of the sun. Therefore, most celebrated in works, the Muses, daughters of Mnemosyne, will exalt him as immortal, increasing veneration for hospitable Jupiter and the reward of firm friendship.

See most of the poems of that man whom no one has emulated without mishap, that is, Pindar. Unless you divide individual things in him, even sever words, and assign one word to the preceding poem and another to the following, you will assuredly show me a poem only with difficulty; nevertheless, we infer the poetry from a more divine manner of speaking. Behold, I propose that you read it thus:

Ὁ πλοῦτος εὐρυσθενής, ὅταν τις ἀρετᾷ κεκραμένον

καθαρᾷ βροτήσιος ἀνήρ, πότμου παραδόντος αὐτὸν ἀνάγῃ πολύφιλον ἐπέταν, ὦ θεόμορε Ἀρκεσίλα. Σὺ τοίνυν κλυτᾶς αὐτὸν ἐκ βαθμίδος σὺν ἀεὶ δόξᾳ μετανίσσεαι, ἕκατι χρυσάρματος Κάστορος, εὐδίαν ὅς

μετὰ χειμέριον ὄμβρον τεὰν καταθάλψει μάκαιραν

ἑστίαν.

Riches are widely powerful when some mortal man, fortune granting them, increases them tempered by pure virtue; they are companions who conciliate many friends. O Arcesilaus, you who have obtained a lot from the divine power, you surely exercise them from the highest steps of a renowned age, with glory, by the favor of Castor who is carried in a golden chariot, who after winter rain flashes tranquillity upon your blessed house.

You will observe all these things in the choruses of Euripides, Aeschylus, and others. From them, therefore, we shall gather that poetry does not fail to appear in Hebrew because it does not exist, but because we do not possess its system. I certainly recognize verses in many passages. The oracle given by Israel to the twelve patriarchs in Genesis 49 was composed in verse:

> Reuben, my firstborn, you are my strength and the beginning of my sorrow, first in gifts, greater in dominion.

In Hebrew they are thus:

> Ruben bchori, attha cochi
> Verheschith oni,
> Lether scheeth, veiether ghaz.

The remaining words, with some variation, can nevertheless be recognized as bound by rhythms. Antiquity also sang a song of victory when Sihon the Amorite had been conquered; its beginning is given in Numbers 21:27:

> Come into Heshbon; let it be built, > and let the city of Sihon be constructed.

The Hebrew words have this form:

> Bou Chesbon Thibane
> Veticonen ghir Sichen.

It is the form of an Anacreontic poem, or catalectic dimeter, except that there are spondees in place of iambs, for short syllables are rare among the Hebrews. The Song of Moses in Exodus 15 consists of the same mixtures of verses, although brachycatalectics are interposed there as well. The Song of Moses in Deuteronomy 32 does not differ much, although it intersperses very many brachycatalectics. But in chapter 33 he begins the blessing with verse, at verse 2: "The Lord came from Sinai and rose from Seir for us; he appeared from Mount Paran, and with him were thousands of saints, and in his right hand a fiery law."

Those words in Hebrew give us this harmony:

> Iehova Missinai -- catalectic verse
>
> Ba, vezarach mescheghir -- catalectic
>
> Lamo, hophigh meher Pharan -- acatalectic
>
> Veatha mirceboth codesch -- catalectic
> Mimino esch dath lamo, and the rest -- acatalectic.

In precisely this manner Deborah and Barak sang in Judges 5. But the Orpheus, Homer, and Virgil of the Hebrews--if it is lawful to compare sacred things with profane--King and Prophet David, adorned their poetry most greatly. His poems are more pleasing to us by their meaning of piety and mysteries than by their rhythms; nevertheless, in very many I have observed a certain exact measure of syllables, as also in the Lamentations of Jeremiah, who took care to begin the openings with the same letters according to a fixed manner.

No one doubts that Solomon's Song of Songs is sacred poetry, in which he sings the heavenly nuptial song of a blessed soul. Jeremiah, Job, and the Songs also have their own rhythms, pleasing by a certain more divine kind of speaking rather than by a perceptible sweetness of feet. For all recognize Pindar as the chief of lyric poets, and yet in him the system of verse is more often sought than felt. Thus Horace, who approaches nearest to him: "Whoever strives to emulate Pindar, Julius, relies upon waxen wings by the art of Daedalus, destined to give a name to the glassy sea. Like a river running down from a mountain, which rains have swollen above its familiar banks, Pindar boils and rushes immeasurably from his profound mouth, deserving to be presented with Apollo's laurel, whether he rolls new words through daring dithyrambs and is borne along in rhythms freed from rule."

That praise of Pindar is deserved: equally ἀμίμητος (inimitable) and ἄμεμπτος (blameless). Yet without discriminating the rhythms employed, you may read as follows:

> Ἄριστον μὲν ὕδωρ, ὁ δὲ χρυσὸς αἰθόμενον πῦρ ἅτε
> διαπρέπει νυκτὶ μεγανορῶς ἔξοχα πλούτου. εἰ δ' ἄεθλα
>
> γαρύεν ἔλδεαι, φίλον ἦτορ, μηκέθ' ἁλίου σκόπει ἄλλο
> θαλπνότερον ἐν ἀμέρᾳ φαεννὸν ἄστρον ἐρήμας δι' αἰθέρος.

Water indeed is best, and gold, like nocturnal blazing fire, flashes excellently among proud riches. But, my soul, if you desire to tell of contests, do not now contemplate another star more splendid than the sun, shining by day through the empty ether.

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 3. From these things I conclude that there was a use of poems among the Hebrews and that holy and great men were poets. Therefore, they were honored in the divine state and are not now lightly to be rejected.

Poets were once held in great honor among the Romans; among the Greeks I find them indeed cultivated excessively. Plato called them sons of the gods. An ingenious poet also said:

> There is a god in us; when he stirs us, we grow warm;
> this impulse possesses the seeds of a sacred mind.

And:

> That spirit comes from ethereal seats.

The sole reason why some denied poetry to the Hebrews is that they could find in that language no harmony similar to ours, but all things appeared similar to prose. Yet since the same thing must be conceded in the most eminent Greek poets, anyone will easily judge that what men admire in the Greeks must not be denied to the Hebrews.

Plato in the Cratylus, mocking philosophers and sophists, advises that poets be approached and an account of virtue sought from them. Democritus too believed that there was something divine in Orpheus, Homer, and others. Heraclitus says, τῷ ἀβεβήλῳ ἐντὸς περιῤῥαντηρίων ἡγνισμένος. "Holy with undefiled and sacred sprinklings." They carried laurel as an emblem of divination when they sang their verses. Still others delighted even more in declaring a mystery in the fables of poets, to speak seriously. For since they defended everything in the fables, even foul things, as coverings of a more sacred philosophy, the result was that the majesty of nature was polluted by the foulness of the narratives, and many eagerly clung to the delights of the fables but did not understand--or indeed despised--the mysteries feigned to lie beneath them. But I shall speak of the abuse afterward.

These things were practiced in antiquity; but more cultivated ages procured greater honor for poetry. After Homer had been despised in death, cities contentiously claimed him:

> Ἑπτὰ πόλεις διερίζουσι περὶ ῥίζαν Ὁμήρου.

Seven cities dispute concerning Homer's stock.

Cicero, For Archias: "And yet we have received from the greatest and most learned men that the studies of other things consist in learning, precepts, and art; but that a poet has power through nature itself, is aroused by the forces of the mind, and is breathed upon, as it were, by a certain divine spirit. Therefore, by his own right, our Ennius calls poets holy, because they appear to be commended to us as though by some gift and bounty of the gods. Therefore, judges, among you most humane men, let this name of poet be sacred, a name which no barbarity ever violated. Rocks and solitudes answer their voice; savage beasts are often bent by song and stand still. Shall we, instructed in the best things, not be moved by the voice of poets? The Colophonians say Homer is their citizen; the Chians claim him as their own; the Salaminians demand him back; the Smyrnaeans indeed affirm that he is theirs. And so they even dedicated a shrine to him in their town. Very many others besides fight and contend among themselves."

And it is certain that poets were valued among kings--not so much, I believe, because of any utility, although that also existed, as from a desire for glory and immortality; for many lack memory because they lack a sacred bard. Virgil was valued by Maecenas and Augustus; Archelaus of Macedon cultivated Euripides; Hiero, Aeschylus and Simonides; Dionysius, Philoxenus; Polycrates of Samos, Anacreon; Antigonus, Antagoras and Aratus; the Spartans, Tyrtaeus. As he was dying, Plato placed the books of Sophron beneath his pillow.

§ 4. But if we also regard the use of this most honorable and difficult art, it is certainly manifold. First, holy men employed verse in the praise of eternal majesty; then, by corrupt imitation, the gentiles employed it for encomia of idols. For the hymn is the most ancient kind of poetry. Many hymns of Orpheus and the ancients survive, and so both hymn-singers and hymn-makers were named. They composed a hypragon for Diana, a paean or hyporcheme for Phoebus, a processional song for both together, a dithyramb for Bacchus, and an iulus for Ceres. Scaliger enumerates more in the Idea, chapter 112.

The ancient theologians Orpheus, Linus, and Musaeus divided not only these powers, which are the greatest and primary, but also other, lesser powers in such a way that they established various and diverse divinities, whom they likewise called gods. Therefore, while they acknowledged Jupiter as the supreme God, they feigned him father of the others, from whom all things had proceeded. Thus they established Pallas, Mars, Vulcan, Proserpina, Venus, and Bacchus for those functions which are recognized by us as united in one. Therefore, it should by no means appear strange if they divided the nature of hymns into various kinds: ἱκετικούς, ἀποπεμπτικούς, φυσικούς, μουσικούς, γενεαλογικούς, πεπλασμένους, ἐντοπίους, ἀπευκτικούς, μικτούς--supplicatory, dismissive, natural, musical, genealogical, fictive, local, deprecatory, and mixed. If παιᾶνες (paeans) and προσόδια (processional songs) are not reduced to these kinds, species having different principles will be numbered with them. Didymus is authority that hymns with a cithara, τὰ προσόδια with pipes, were customarily sung by the Athenians at altars.

But we shall address a hymn to the one and only God, as that same excellent teacher of poetry rightly says. The praise of God should always occupy our entire mind and whole thought. Whatever you do without communion with him, do not judge that truly done; how much more must the mind be directed toward those modulations which receive as much of his divinity as they embrace of him, and become akin to those harmonies which have been assigned by the maker to the heavenly windings and proportions. The praise of God is called ὕμνος by the Greeks and celebratio by the Latins.

Since he is one and the same is three, a Christian man has the right either to sing of him alone or to celebrate the persons separately, adding their properties with reverence--not as morose disputants, but as pious poets have been accustomed to do. After many others, we too attempted this. For when we wrote a hymn to God the Father as creator of all things, we led it from the creation of the world itself down to us and our affairs. But we wrote of God the Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, as savior of the human race; in him we led our mind away from the prison of the body to the free fields of contemplation, which was to transform me into him. Then the ineffable power of the most holy Spirit was celebrated with such ardor that, although the hymn had begun in the gentlest rhythms, it blazed up under a sudden assault of divine fire.

Whatever is in God is God himself; but through the weakness of our knowledge, by the example and image of these lower things, many things are as it were distinguished: intellect, from which comes will, and afterward power. Yet nothing is before or after; they are not only simultaneous but also one. From these the ancients derived the two greatest principles of things and actions, Nature and Fortune. For Nature is the power of God, but Fortune is his will.

§ 5. A second use is in praises of heroes and great men. Thus Jeremiah praised Josiah; thus David praised Jonathan; thus Prudentius praised the martyrs. In this matter, indeed, poems are now for the most part consumed. Nor is the abuse new by which poets flatter powerful men without shame whenever they please to make poems. You will find plainly few men like Philoxenus. Virgil himself inaugurated his name with exquisite flattery:

> It rained the whole night; the spectacles return in the morning:
> Caesar possesses a divided sovereignty with Jupiter.

And our Lucan is thought deservedly slain by Nero because he flattered that monster so slavishly:

> But if the fates found no other way for Nero's coming, > and eternal kingdoms are procured for the gods at great cost,
>
> and heaven could not serve its own Thunderer
>
> except after the wars of savage giants,
>
> now, heavenly powers, we complain of nothing. These crimes and this wickedness
>
> please us at this price. Let Pharsalia fill its dreadful fields, > and let the Punic shades be sated with blood;
>
>
> let the final deadly battles meet at Munda.
>
> Let Caesar add to these fates the famine of Perusia and Mutina's labors,
>
> the fleets which rugged Leucas crushes,
>
> and the servile wars beneath burning Etna.
>
> Yet Rome owes much to civil arms, > because the business was conducted for you. When your earthly station is completed, > you will seek the stars late; the palace of heaven preferred for you
>
>
> will receive you while the sky rejoices, whether it pleases you to hold the scepters
>
> or to mount Phoebus's flame-bearing chariot
> and survey with wandering fire the earth, fearing nothing from the changed sun.
>
> Every divine power will yield to you, and nature will leave to your judgment > which god you wish to be and where to place the kingdom of the world.
>
> But choose your seat neither in the northern region
>
> nor where the warm pole of the opposing south inclines, > from where you may see your Rome beneath an oblique constellation.
>
>
> If you press upon one part of the immense ether,
>
> the axis will feel the burden. Hold the weights of balanced heaven in the middle of its sphere. Let that whole part of serene ether be empty, and let no clouds obstruct Caesar.

Then let the human race consult its interest after laying down arms;

let every nation love in turn; let peace sent through the world restrain the iron thresholds of warlike Janus.

But to me you are already a divinity; and if I receive you in my breast as bard,

I should not wish to trouble the secrets of Cirrha to move the god, or to turn Bacchus away from Nysa.

You alone are sufficient to give strength to Roman songs.

Nor are there lacking modern flatteries of souls that are not only profitable but also cheap.

The use of verse in transmitting history, laws, and arts is no smaller. The ancient laws of the Athenians were written by Draco in three thousand verses; Pittacus wrote those for his Mytilenaeans in fewer, namely six hundred. History too is written most elegantly in verse, and morals are taught, so that poets are called the fathers of wisdom even by Plato. Solomon's songs, τῶν ᾠδῶν, as the Septuagint translates, are numbered at five thousand; the Hebrew calls them three thousand parables, axioms, or distinguished maxims and, as it were, flowers of wisdom.

This is the primary purpose of sacred poetry: after praises have been sung to the divine power, to prepare the minds of men to approach God purely by a sweet melody which is readily retained. Horace attributes this to bards in Epistle 1 of Book 2:

The poet forms the tender and stammering mouth of the boy;

even now he turns his ear away from obscene speech;

soon he also forms his breast by friendly precepts, corrector of harshness, envy, and anger.

He recounts things rightly done and instructs the rising age with famous examples; he consoles the needy and the sick.

From where would the maiden ignorant of a husband learn prayers with chaste boys, had the Muse not given a bard?

In Aristophanes--otherwise a buffoon and a certain pus and poison of poetry--there is a useful conversation on this matter between Euripides and Aeschylus:

Αἰσχύλος: Ἀποκρίναι μοι· τίνος οὕνεκα χρὴ θαυμάζειν

ἄνδρα ποιητήν;

Εὐριπίδης: Δεξιότητος καὶ νουθεσίας, ὅτι βελτίους τε ποιοῦμεν τοὺς ἀνθρώπους ταῖς πόλεσιν.

Αἰσχύλος: Ταῦτα γὰρ ἄνδρας χρὴ ποιητὰς ἀσκεῖν. Σκέψαι

γὰρ ἀπ᾽ ἀρχῆς

ὡς ὠφέλιμοι τῶν ποιητῶν οἱ γενναῖοι γεγένηνται.

Ὀρφεὺς μὲν γὰρ τελετάς θ’ ἡμῖν κατέδειξε φόνων τ’

ἀπέχεσθαι,

Μουσαῖος δ’ ἐξακέσεις τε νόσων καὶ χρησμούς, Ἡσίοδος δὲ

γῆς ἐργασίας, καρπῶν ὥρας, ἀρότους· ὁ δὲ θεῖος Ὅμηρος

τάξεις, ἀρετάς, ὁπλίσεις ἀνδρῶν.

That is:

“Aeschylus: Answer me: for the sake of what ought a poet to be admired? Euripides: For skill and admonition, because we make the men of our country better. For poets ought to practice these things. Consider from the beginning how many of the noble poets have been useful. Orpheus showed us sacrifices and abstention from slaughter; Musaeus, cures of diseases and oracles; Hesiod, the working of the earth, the seasons of fruits, and plowing; divine Homer, the orderings, virtues, and armaments of men.”

Nature has indeed so arranged it that verses are heard more sweetly, cling more deeply, and move more readily. Hence we see not only philosophers but Paul too employ verses of noble poets. No one is more cultivated than Paul to whom many things of this kind are not already known.

Poets are not only pleasing and good teachers of virtue, but also the sharpest censors of vices; for what is more bitter, what more forceful, than satire? They alone lash the vices of magnates after steeping them in sharp vinegar. Then you may see:

Mighty Tituses tremble when poems enter their loins and their innermost parts are scratched by a quivering verse.

Finally, the precepts of almost all arts and of philosophy itself are found comprehended in verse. Astronomy, agriculture, wars, laws, and whatever comes into use--the writings of bards disclose them to us.

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 6. Yet an ancient opinion recalls and draws some men away from this most liberal art: namely, that poetry obstructs prudence. Plato in the Phaedrus says:

ὃς δ’ ἂν ἄνευ μανίας Μουσῶν ἐπὶ ποιητικὰς θύρας ἀφίκηται, πεισθεὶς ὡς ἄρα ἐκ τέχνης ἱκανὸς ποιητὴς ἐσόμενος, ἀτελὴς αὐτός τε καὶ ἡ ποίησις ὑπὸ τῆς τῶν μαινομένων

ἡ τοῦ σωφρονοῦντος ἠφανίσθη.

Whoever has knocked at the doors of poetry without frenzy, persuaded that he can become a poet by art alone, finds his attempt fruitless, and his poetry likewise vanishes.

They therefore think frenzy necessary, for:

Father Ennius himself never leapt forth to arms unless he had been drinking.

For drunkenness is a voluntary frenzy, as anger also is.

"The mind," says Seneca, "cannot speak anything grand and above others unless it has been stirred. When it has despised common and customary things and risen higher by a sacred impulse, then at last it has sung something grander than a mortal mouth. It cannot attain anything sublime and placed on high so long as it is with itself."

Hence the Platonists taught that poems were poured forth by inspiration and madness. Ptolemy asserts that the soul is thus stirred by the stars.

§ 7. But slenderness of ability keeps very many away from poetry. I judge that in this way a great injury is inflicted upon compressed eloquence through this calumny. The reason is that no one can be a poet unless he is gifted. And this is the first testing of young men: it belongs to anyone to recite lessons with a faithful memory, to remember expositions and the meanings of words, and to translate Latin into the vernacular; it belongs to the gifted to compose a poem. An orator can be made; a poet must be born.

I interpret this so that I judge that a great ability, together with a knowledge of art and precepts, is necessary for poetry; small abilities knock at the doors of the Muses only with ridicule, middling ones without praise. Art and nature have great force if they are joined. Cicero, For Archias: "I also add this: nature without instruction has more often availed for praise and virtue than instruction without nature. And I likewise contend that when a certain systematic training and formation by learning has been added to an excellent and illustrious nature, then that unknown something glorious and singular customarily comes into being."

> Whether a praiseworthy poem was produced by nature or by art > has been asked. I see neither what study can do without a rich vein,
>
>
> nor what untrained ability can do: thus each thing
> seeks the aid of the other and conspires in friendship.

In other matters art can assist nature when it is deprived of aid; in poetry, without nature, art plays in a void. The same Cicero shows this in the passage already recited.

From the same opinion, therefore, comes what they write concerning a certain madness of ingenious men and poets, concerning which I have spoken in its place. This is also confirmed by the fact that a middling orator, a soldier neither timid nor very brave, and a certain mediocrity of industry in other matters are customarily commended. But among poets whatever is praiseworthy is magnificent:

> Neither men, nor gods, nor booksellers' pillars
>
> have permitted poets to be mediocre.
> If he departs a little from the summit, he inclines to the bottom.

§ 8. But it is most difficult to be a distinguished, grandiloquent, polished poet to whom you would wish to add nothing and from whom you would wish to remove nothing. Cicero truly said that scarcely in each age has one good poet been found. Since, therefore, good poets are so few, there are nevertheless many who seek the honor of this name, which is to sound out great things. No ape fails to love its young, and even a bear despises death for offspring which appears an unformed mass and leaps over hunting spears. Likewise, no poet ever wrenched from his talent a poem so gaping in words or tasteless in sense that he did not love it desperately--ὑπὲρ αὐτῶν γάρ, says Aristotle.

And so in no matter have more men endeavored to display their ability than at limpid Hippocrene and chilly Parnassus. Hence those ineptitudes; hence so many verses which we marvel could have been made by sane men. Compare the matter with morals: scarcely one age receives one poet. But I judge that there are ten myriads of men who even at this time judge themselves good poets. Horace deservedly says of them:

> Add poems now--that is, add oil to the furnace.
> If anyone made these while sane, you too act sanely.

Persius lashes the custom of his own age:

> Shut in, we write: one man in rhythms, another with foot set free, > some grand thing for a lung over-generous with breath to pant forth.
>
> Naturally, this is for the people, with hair combed and a fresh toga,
>
> gleaming at last in birthday white with sardonyx,
>
> reading from a lofty seat, when with liquid modulation you have gargled
>
> your mobile throat, languishing with a lascivious little eye.
>
> Here you may see mighty Tituses, neither in seemly manner nor with serene voice,
>
> tremble when poems enter their loins
>
> and their innermost parts are scratched by a quivering verse.
> Then, old man, do you gather bait for the ears of others--
>
> ears to which you, ruined in skin, may say, “Enough!”?
>
> What is the use of learning unless this leaven, and the fig tree
>
> once engrafted within, bursts the liver and comes out?
>
> Behold pallor and old age--O morals! Is your knowledge > altogether nothing unless another knows that you know this?
>
>
> But it is beautiful to be pointed out with a finger and to have it said, “This is he.”
>
> Do you count it nothing that you were the lesson dictated to a hundred curled youths?
>
> Behold, amid their cups the satiated sons of Romulus ask
>
> what the divine poems tell.
>
> Here someone with a hyacinth-colored mantle around his shoulders,
>
> after speaking something rancid through his stammering nostril,
>
> filters out Phyllises, Hypsipyles, and whatever is lamentable among the bards,
>
> and trips up words with his tender palate.
>
> The men assent. Is not that poet’s ash now happy?
>
> Does not his tombstone now press more lightly upon his bones?
>
> The dinner guests praise him. Do not violets now spring > from those shades, from that tomb and fortunate ember?
>
>
> You laugh, he says, and indulge your hooked nostrils too much.

Will there be anyone who refuses to wish to have merited the people's voice, and, after speaking things worthy of cedar oil, to leave poems which fear neither mackerel wrappers nor incense?

Among these, how many thousands are there whom it is harder and more laborious to hear than to work in the quarries, where all weariness must be driven from the body? Accordingly, good poets are few; many are, as Aristophanes jokes, ἐπεφύλλιδες καὶ φυλλώματα, χελιδόνων μουσεῖα, λωβηταὶ τέχνης: spurious excrescences which grow upon leaves, not clusters; chatterers, museums of swallows, disgraces of art. Refer here wandering beggar-poets and certain men who name themselves poets laureate. Because the race of bards is irritable, I certainly should not wish to irritate them. Yet it is necessary to acknowledge that many foreheads unworthy of so royal a foliage are shaded by it.

It is contrary to equity to impute the madness and stupidity of these men to true and prudent poets. Moses, Deborah, Barak, David, Solomon, Isaiah, and Jeremiah were most prudent men and nevertheless most excellent poets; their poems are sung daily to cast the seeds of wisdom and piety and to increase the virtues. Nor would you rightly call Homer imprudent in mind although blind. A bard is witness for a bard: Horace, Book 1, Epistle 2:

While you declaim at Rome, Lollius, I reread at Praeneste

the writer of the Trojan War, who tells what is beautiful, what shameful, what useful and what not, more fully and better than Chrysippus and Crantor.

Hear why I believe this, unless something detains you.

The tale in which Greece is related to have collided with barbarism in protracted war on account of Paris's love contains the passions of foolish kings and peoples.

Antenor judges that the cause of war must be cut away.

What of Paris? He denies that he can be compelled to reign in safety and live happily.

Nestor hastens to settle the quarrels between the son of Peleus and the son of Atreus.

Love burns the one; anger, indeed, burns both alike.

Whatever madness kings commit, the Greeks are punished.

Within and outside the walls of Troy men sin

by sedition, deceits, crime, lust, and anger.

Again, as to what virtue and wisdom can accomplish,

he proposed Ulysses to us as a useful example:

the conqueror of Troy, who prudently examined the cities and manners of many men and, while preparing a return for himself and his companions over the broad sea, endured many harsh things, incapable of being submerged by the adverse waves of affairs.

Inspect the subjects of Virgil, Lucan, Horace, Juvenal, and others. If you remove the wicked and impure things, you will clearly find that nothing in political life lay hidden from them; indeed, they understood most of the philosophers' deepest matters.

§ 9. But many have judged that poets should be expelled from the city. I admit it is so. Augustine relates the reasons in Book 2, chapter 14, of The City of God: "Next we ask: the poets themselves, composers of such fables, who are prohibited by the law of the Twelve Tables from injuring the reputation of citizens, while hurling such disgraceful revilings against God--why are they not held dishonorable like actors? And by what reasoning is it right that the actors of poetical fictions and of ignominious gods should be defamed, but their authors honored? Is the palm perhaps rather to be given to Plato the Greek, who, when he fashioned by reason what a city ought to be, judged that poets should be expelled from the city as adversaries of the city? He both bore indignantly the injuries done to the gods and refused to allow the minds of citizens to be painted and corrupted by fictions."

"Compare now the humanity of Plato, expelling poets from the city lest citizens be deceived, with the divinity of the gods demanding theatrical games for their own honor. Plato, lest such things should even be written, although he did not persuade the frivolity and wantonness of the Greeks, nevertheless advised it by disputation. Those gods, by commanding, extorted from the gravity and modesty of the Romans that such things should even be acted. Nor did they merely wish these things to be acted, but dedicated, consecrated, and solemnly exhibited to themselves. To whom, then, would the city more honorably decree divine honors: to Plato, who prohibited these foul and impious things, or to the demons who rejoice in this deception of human beings, whom he could not persuade of true things?"

There are two reasons: because they fashioned false gods--concerning which Augustine also complains in Book 18, chapter 14, of The City of God--and because they corrupted morals. By the best law, such men are expelled as corrupters of the state. In Book 2 of the Republic, Plato judges them to be expelled on account of the disgraceful deeds and crimes which they fasten upon the gods; and in Book 10, after Socrates has said many things against poets, he at last decides the suit by a just judgment in favor of good poets. For he judges that those poets should be retained whose poems induce courage and chastity. Pythagoras held no other opinion. From this it plainly appears that this corruption of morals was most ancient; indeed, the Sibyl too sang concerning them:

Poets will afflict thrice-wretched Greece.

Epicurus indeed has less authority in this matter. Although he may perhaps have proscribed the songs of bad poets from the state as the deliriums of little old women, nevertheless, because he condemned all the liberal arts by one ballot, he did no peculiar insult to poetry. It was more honorable for her to be proscribed with the rest as an honorable matron than to be retained alone in the kingdom of pleasure like a little prostitute. Eratosthenes and others, however, punished not the thing itself but its vices with exile.

It was charged as a fault against Fulvius Nobilior that he had taken a poet into his province. For at that time, as Cato is witness, if anyone pursued this study, he attached himself to banquets and was called a marauder. Fulvius therefore acted badly in taking him into the province, as though he were a flute-player, for the sake of pleasure. Would that today too the magistrate awakened to this matter, proscribed obscene and blasphemous little books with a grave penalty, and punished their authors. But I have said enough about these things where I treated the preservation of chastity in the state.

§ 10. I shall show briefly what method there is for attaining this eloquence, which ought to be stricter in rhythms, freer in words, and more sublime in thoughts. Aristotle wrote concerning poetry, but neither suitably enough for the abilities of learners nor in a complete treatise. Horace teaches how to avoid faults more than he instructs the beginner, and in his customary manner acts the satirist. In our time Vida and many others occupied themselves with teaching that art. Julius Scaliger snatched the palm from them all by writing seven books to his son Sylvius. I judge this a finished work, by which alone he merited more nobility than if, with Italy's approval, he had truly traced his stock to the family of the Scaligers of Verona.

But it was a great disgrace not only to poetry but also to philosophy and the other arts that Julius and Joseph, such famous alumni of those arts, labored with so persistent an imposture to insert themselves into another man's race and family. If they had possessed the strength, they would have attempted something after the ancient manner. As it is, they vigorously accomplished what they could and avenged themselves with savage poems, as dogs do by barking. Joseph wrote an elegant but bitter poem against the Most Serene Republic of Venice, in which he arraigns the Venetians as though they had unjustly wrested Verona from his ancestors, although his ancestors were no more counts of Verona than Irus was king of the πτωχῶν (beggars) of all the Achaeans.

But these are the errors of men who dream of great fortunes; when they fall upon great and troubled minds, they also stir great movements, as when a great force of winds has lain upon the great Ocean. Yet however his morals may have conducted themselves, Julius explained the art more accurately than everyone else and was himself a great poet. Nevertheless, his manner and system of writing were accommodated more to perfecting a bard than to instructing a novice.

Our Pontanus therefore undertook this care and disclosed the whole matter in an orderly and learned manner. I have seen no book more useful for learning poetry. Yet if anyone, after reading it, seeks more and more recondite matters, let him seriously unroll Julius. If he labors over comedy or tragedy, let him read through all of Martin Delrio upon Seneca; for he not only shows the road but carries and conveys a man, as though on swan's wings, to the high summit of Parnassus. Joseph Scaliger too, before their friendship was broken, preferred Delrio to everyone. Our Society imitates these authors in teaching poetry. I intend to place its method before the eyes.

§ 11. I said that in the middle grammar class an easy poet is explained and tender minds are thus gradually imbued with poetic rhythms; for although they do not know the system of verse, they are nevertheless delighted by measure and harmony.

In the highest grammar class, when they have now learned syntax, metrical art is learned. Thus the professor's rule provides: "On alternate days, the general precepts of metrical art are to be taught, with the exceptions omitted. In the later semester, however, for at least two months, let that part of grammar which is proper to the first class be reviewed; and on alternate days let metrical art be reviewed by running briefly through the rules already explained and dwelling upon the others as much as necessary. When the repetition of grammar has been completed, let metrical art thereafter be explained daily, with the exceptions, kinds of poems, and the things transmitted concerning patronymics and accent added."

Selected elegies of Ovid, Catullus, Tibullus, and Propertius and the easier books of Virgil are joined to this explanation. One hour each day is assigned to explaining and reviewing these authors. Accordingly, when the system of poems has been learned, they themselves are also gradually taught to compose, or to restore verses dissolved into feet and rhythms; next to compose Adonics, heroic verses, and elegies, and not attempt greater things. It will be sufficient if a student possesses the rhythms in his own poem and recognizes them in another's.

Thus instructed, he will be led to the humanities class, concerning which our method prescribes as follows: "The degree of this class, after the pupils have left the grammar classes, is to prepare, as it were, the ground for eloquence.

This occurs in three ways: through knowledge of the language, some erudition, and a brief instruction in the precepts pertaining to rhetoric. For knowledge of the language, which consists chiefly in propriety and abundance, Cicero is used in the daily lectures, generally in those books which contain moral philosophy; from the historians, Caesar, Sallust, Livy, Curtius, and any similar authors; from the poets, chiefly Virgil, with the Eclogues and the fourth book of the Aeneid excepted; in addition, selected odes of Horace, likewise elegies, epigrams, and other poems of illustrious ancient poets, provided they have been purged of all obscenity. Erudition is to be employed moderately, so that it may sometimes stimulate and refresh the ability, not impede observation of the language."

"A brief summary of the precepts of rhetoric from Cyprian will be transmitted, namely in the second semester. At that time, with Cicero's philosophy omitted, some of his easier speeches may be taken, such as For the Manilian Law, For Archias, For Marcellus, and the others delivered before Caesar. That part of the Greek language which is properly called syntax belongs to this class. Care must moreover be taken that the pupils understand writers moderately well and know how to write something in Greek."

The authors prescribed here will now be easy after the instruction of which we have spoken has preceded in the lower classes.

Here too, in the first semester, metrical art or prosody is expounded on alternate days with a historian so that it may cling more firmly to the mind; in the second semester, the precepts of rhetoric and a historian alternate.

There are besides exercises which are designated in these words:

"In the second morning hour, let the most recent lecture be repeated briefly and a new one explained for half an hour or a little longer; soon afterward let it be demanded, and if any time remains, let it be placed in mutual contention among the pupils.

"In the final half-hour at the beginning of the first semester, let a historian and metrical art alternate by days; but after metrical art has been completed, let a historian be treated daily. In the second semester, let Cyprian's Rhetoric be either explained, reviewed, or disputed every day."

Greek authors and syntax likewise; composition of poems. Because the precepts of rhetoric are also common to poetry--for the poet is neighbor to the orator--the ornament and method of verse and several precepts of the art are also expounded. Rule 5 comprehends the whole method: "Let the lecture be lightly sprinkled at times with ornaments of erudition, as much as the explanation of the passage demands. Let the master pour himself out rather wholly upon observations of the Latin language; upon the force and etymology of words, which he will seek from approved authors, chiefly the ancients; upon the use and variety of expressions; and upon imitation of the author. Nor let him judge it foreign to express something at times in the native language, if it is chiefly useful for interpretation or possesses something distinguished. But when he explains a speech, let him examine the precepts of the art. At the end, if it seems good, it will be permitted to translate everything into the native language, but as elegantly as possible."

And Rule 6: "The subject for writing is to be dictated. In the first semester it is generally to take the form of a letter, word for word in the common speech. It will often be useful to compose it so that the whole has been torn from passages already explained in the lectures, here and there. About once each week, however, let them compose by their own effort, after some kind of letter has first been explained and letters of Cicero or Pliny pertaining to it have been indicated. In the second semester, let ability then be stimulated; and let chriae first, then proems, variations, and embellishments be composed when an easy and copious subject has been proposed. Let the master dictate the subject of a poem in Latin, with much variety of expressions. The method for a Greek theme will be the same as for Latin prose, except that it should generally be drawn from the author himself and the system of syntax shown beforehand."

And Rule 10: "Let poems be affixed to the walls of the school about every other month to adorn some more celebrated day, to promulgate officeholders, or on some other occasion, with all the most select poems copied by the pupils.

Indeed, according to the custom of the regions, let there also be something in shorter prose, such as inscriptions for shields, temples, tombs, gardens, or statues; descriptions, such as of a city, harbor, or army; narratives, such as of a deed performed by one of the saints; and finally paradoxes. Let pictures corresponding to the emblem or proposed subject sometimes be added, but not without the rector's permission."

Concerning Greek reading, Rule 9 provides: "In the Greek lecture, grammar and an author will be explained on alternate days. As to grammar, after briefly running through the matters transmitted in the first class, let the teacher pursue syntax and the system of accents. In the first semester, an author in prose will be taken from the easier writers, such as some speeches of Isocrates and Saints Chrysostom and Basil, some of the letters of Plato and Synesius, or something selected from Plutarch. In the second semester, some poem will be explained--for example, from Phocylides, Theognis, Saint Gregory Nazianzen, Synesius, and authors similar to them. The explanation, as the level of this class permits, is to serve knowledge of the language rather than erudition."

As the year inclines toward its end, the system of Greek syllables can be transmitted on alternate days with an author. Poems dissolved into prose order can also sometimes be composed anew.

Ancient poetry transmitted good precepts of morals and did not minister to wantonness. The more cultivated Greeks and Romans afterward made a prostitute from a virgin.

By this exercise a future poet or orator is not yet perfected, even if he possesses ability. For many precepts necessary to know are lacking, and especially practice, which requires a longer time; moreover, in our gymnasia the pupils' age is frequently not yet mature for more difficult labors. Accordingly, there follows another class, which we call rhetoric.

CHAPTER XX

Eloquence in Prose Speech

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. Usage has customarily called this eloquence properly so called. Some define it as wisdom speaking copiously; others, as the art of speaking well. Aristotle, Rhetoric, Book 1, chapter 2:

Ἔστω δὴ ἡ ῥητορικὴ δύναμις περὶ ἕκαστον τοῦ θεωρῆσαι τὸ ἐνδεχόμενον πιθανόν.

Thus, therefore, rhetoric is the faculty which considers what has force for persuasion in each particular matter. For this is proper to no other art. For although both those who speak without art and those who proceed dialectically and philosophically endeavor to persuade, rhetoric nevertheless transmits the method of persuasion in all matters; for no one will have taught dialectic, medicine, or jurisprudence perfectly without eloquence.

No one can attain eloquence unless he has already become accustomed beforehand to speak correctly:

Ἀρχὴ τῆς λέξεως τὸ ἑλληνίζειν.

"The beginning of expression is to speak Greek correctly," says Aristotle, when discussing the eloquence of his native language. For the man who fastens the figures of eloquence upon faulty speech will do just what one does who sews golden borders and jeweled meanders upon a ragged and torn cloak. For he both dishonors the ornaments and makes poverty more conspicuous by the neighboring abundance, since contiguous contraries manifest one another. And, what is the chief point, he produces a monster fit to be laughed at: Irus in purple, golden sandals soiled with mud, a chamber-pot made of a gem.

Here there comes to my mind the premature haste of many parents in the education of their sons: they order those who do not yet speak to become orators. Hence we discern that the books of many theologians, jurists, physicians, and philosophers, though most polluted in their utterance, sometimes contain phrases and sentences ridiculously affected.

For it usually happens that the most infantile man is the one who most affects eloquence. Eloquence is altogether a rare thing. Cicero is witness, in Book 1 of On the Orator: "For what reasons should anyone not rightly wonder that, from the whole memory of ages, periods, and states, so small a number of orators is found?"

He gives the reasons in the same book: "But unquestionably it is something greater than men suppose, and gathered from more arts and studies. For amid the very great multitude of learners, the great abundance of masters, the most excellent abilities of men, the infinite variety of cases, and the most ample rewards proposed for eloquence, what else could anyone think to be the cause, except a certain incredible magnitude and difficulty of the thing? For there is both a knowledge of very many matters to be comprehended, without which fluency of words is empty and ridiculous; and the speech itself must be established not only by the choice but also by the construction of words; and all the movements of minds which nature has bestowed upon the human race must be thoroughly known, because the whole force and method of speaking must be displayed in either soothing or arousing the minds of those who hear. To this must be added a certain charm and wit, an education worthy of a free man, and speed and brevity both in replying and in assailing, joined with subtle grace and urbanity. Moreover, all antiquity must be grasped, together with the force of examples; nor must knowledge of laws or civil law be neglected. For why should I say more about delivery itself, which must be governed by bodily movement, gesture, countenance, and the formation and variation of the voice? How great this is by itself, the slight art of actors and the stage declares: although all labor over the regulation of face, voice, and movement there, who does not know how few there are, or have been, whom we can watch with an untroubled mind? What shall I say of memory, the treasury of all things? Unless it is applied as guardian to matters and words discovered and conceived, we understand that all of them, even if most splendid, will perish in the speech. Therefore let us cease wondering what the cause of the scarcity of eloquent men is, since eloquence consists of all those matters in each of which it is an exceedingly great thing to labor. Let us rather exhort our children and the others whose glory and dignity are dear to us to embrace in mind the magnitude of the matter, and not to trust that they can attain what they seek by those precepts, masters, or exercises which everyone uses, but by certain others. And in my judgment no one will be able to be an orator heaped with every praise unless he has attained knowledge of all great subjects and arts. For speech ought to flower and overflow from knowledge of things; unless the matter has been perceived and known by the orator, speech possesses a certain empty and almost childish eloquence. Yet I would not impose so great a burden upon our orators, especially amid so great an occupation with the city and with life, as to think that they may be ignorant of nothing--although the force of the orator and the very profession of speaking well seem to undertake and promise this: that upon every matter whatsoever proposed, he may speak ornately and copiously."

§ 2. Eloquence must indeed be maintained in a state because it conciliates the highest dignity for the state; but it must especially be cultivated by the nobility and by the prince. Aristotle truly says to Alexander:

> Ὥσπερ γὰρ ἐσθῆτα σπουδάζεις τὴν εὐπρεπεστάτην τῶν λοιπῶν ἀνθρώπων ἔχειν, οὕτως εὕρεσιν λόγων λαβεῖν ἐστί σοι πειρατέον τὴν ἐνδοξοτάτην. Πολὺ γὰρ κάλλιόν ἐστι καὶ βασιλικώτερον τὴν ψυχὴν ἔχειν εὐγνωμονοῦσαν ἢ τὴν ἕξιν τοῦ σώματος ὁρᾶν εὐειματοῦσαν. Καὶ γὰρ ἄτοπόν ἐστι τὸν τοῖς ἔργοις πρωτεύοντα φαίνεσθαι τῶν τυχόντων τοῖς λόγοις ὑστερίζοντα, καὶ ταῦτα εἰδότα ὅτι τοῖς μὲν ἐν δημοκρατίᾳ πολιτευομένοις ἡ ἀναφορὰ περὶ πάντων τῶν πραγμάτων εἰς τὸν δῆμόν ἐστι, τοῖς δ' ὑπὸ τὴν τῆς βασιλείας ἡγεμονίαν τεταγμένοις, πρὸς λόγον. Ὥσπερ οὖν τὰς αὐτονόμους τῶν πόλεων διορθοῦν εἴωθεν ἐπὶ τὸ κάλλιστον ἄγων ὁ κοινὸς νόμος, οὕτω τοὺς ὑπὸ τὴν σὴν βασιλείαν καθεστῶτας ἄγειν δύναιτ' ἂν ἐπὶ τὸ συμφέρον ὁ σὸς λόγος. Καὶ γὰρ ὁ νόμος ἐστίν, ὡς ἁπλῶς εἰπεῖν, λόγος ὡρισμένος καθ' ὁμολογίαν κοινὴν πόλεως, μηνύων πῶς δεῖ πράττειν ἕκαστα.

For just as you strive to excel other men especially in the adornment and magnificence of clothing, so you must also strive to receive that invention and force of speaking which is most beautiful and surpassingly most illustrious. For it is far more beautiful and more kingly to be well constituted in mind than to behold the condition of the body adorned with beautiful garments. For it is absurd that one who excels others in the glory of deeds should appear to yield in speaking to certain men of the lowest rank, especially since you are not ignorant that those who live under popular government refer all matters to the people, while those who have been placed under the guidance of one man's rule refer them to reason and speech. Just as the common law which leads toward some most honorable end has been accustomed to direct free states, so in the same manner may your speech also be able to lead those whom you hold under your rule to what is advantageous and useful. For law, so to speak, is a certain speech which, defined by the common consent of the state, commands in what manner each thing is to be done.

Certainly, speaking has been given commonly to all men; eloquence is what shows men to be learned, or makes them appear learned. Speech joined to learning is the guide of life. And certainly, after reason itself, nothing greater than the majesty of speaking has been given to man; for he who speaks well is heard both pleasantly and beneficially. Indeed, this is the chief ornament: as ability is the glory of a man, so eloquence is the light of ability. Afranius, when asked what he had learned in eighty-one years, replied: "Nothing except to teach well and to speak well," placing in this not only the whole dignity but even the majesty of life.

Nothing has raised more men to dignity than eloquence. Generals have attained the government of the state with greater danger, orators with greater labor. Yet there is this difference: orators hold authority both in war and in peace; generals hold it only in war and are neglected in peace. And certainly generals themselves who were distinguished in war, such as Vespasian, Hadrian, Domitian, and Alexander, established salaries for orators and immunity from burdens; thus Modestinus in Si duos, §6. Leo and Anthemius joined advocates and eloquent patrons of causes to them.

In free states, as there was always greater regard for eloquence, so there was also greater danger. Pericles held tyranny with arms.

Cicero, in Book 1 of On the Orator, commends it splendidly: "Nor indeed does anything seem to me more excellent," he says, "than to be able by speaking to hold assemblies of men, entice minds, drive wills wherever one wishes, and lead them away from wherever one wishes. This one thing, among every free people and especially in peaceful and tranquil states, has always flourished preeminently and has always held dominion. For what is so admirable as that, out of an infinite multitude of men, there should arise one who, either alone or with a few, can do what has been given by nature to all? Or what is so pleasant to know and hear as speech adorned and polished with wise thoughts and weighty words? Or what is so powerful and magnificent as for the movements of the people, the religious scruples of judges, and the gravity of the senate to be turned by the speech of one man? What, moreover, is so kingly, so liberal, so munificent as to bring aid to suppliants, raise up the afflicted, grant safety, free men from dangers, and retain men in the state? And what is so necessary as always to possess weapons by which you can either be protected yourself, challenge the wicked, or avenge yourself when provoked?"

I marvel at the great affection of the Athenians toward Gorgias of Leontini, for they called the days on which he had delivered a speech ἑορτάς (festivals), and named the speeches themselves λαμπάδας (torches). He was the first to adorn speech with antitheses, equal clauses, similarly falling endings, and other figures; and therefore Greece erected a golden statue at Delphi for him alone.

§ 3. This indeed is the dignity of eloquence; its force and efficacy in moving are far more conspicuous. Pyrrhus's orator Cineas is commonly adduced as an example: by speech he captured more cities than the most skillful commander captured by war. Cicero spoke most truly: "The authority and speech of a good citizen wrench weapons from the hands of angry citizens." More men have attained kingdoms and principalities through eloquence than through military courage. More men have also retained them. Caesar himself is an example. When the soldier enlisted for service against his fatherland had grown fierce because men stained by the same crime boasted that they had been made equal even to their commander, Caesar restrained them by a brief speech and brought it about that they inflicted punishment upon themselves:

> He stood upon a rampart of supported turf,
> Undaunted in countenance, and deserved to be feared
>
> By fearing nothing; and, as anger dictated, he spoke these words:
>
> "Soldier, who just now raged with face and right hand
>
> Against me while absent, you have my breast bare and ready for wounds.
>
> Flee from here, if the end of war pleases you, after abandoning your sword."
>
> The mutiny disclosed unwarlike minds, having dared nothing bravely;
>
> The young soldiery had contemplated only flight
>
> And had grown weary of the undefeated leader's successes.
>
> "Go, and leave me to my own fates for war.
>
> These weapons will find hands, and when you have been rejected,
>
> Fortune will restore as many men as spears will be vacant.

Or do the peoples of Italy follow the flight of Magnus
With so great a fleet, while victory will not give us a throng
Which, merely driven on, may carry off the prizes of war,
Seize the reward of your labor, and attend
Laurel-bearing chariots without a wound?
You, old men despised and a throng exhausted of blood,
Will behold our triumphs, now the Roman commons.
Do you think Caesar's course can feel
Any loss from your flight? Even if all the rivers
Should threaten to withdraw the springs which they mingle with the sea,
The deep would never sink more when those waters were removed Than it now rises through their waters. Do you think that you Have given me any weight at all? Never does the care of the gods Press itself down so far that the fates have leisure for your death
Or your safety. The movements of the great--all these things follow them.
The human race lives in a few. The terror of the Iberian world
And the northern soldier under my name
Would certainly have fled with Pompey as leader. Labienus was brave
In Caesar's arms; now, a worthless deserter,
With his preferred leader he traverses lands and seas.
Nor is your loyalty better to me if you wage wars
With neither enemy nor me as leader. Whoever abandons my standards
And does not deliver his weapons to Pompey's party Never wishes to be mine. Surely these camps are
The care of the gods, who wished me to engage in such great wars
Only after my soldiery had been changed.
Alas, how great a burden Fortune removes from shoulders
Now weary beneath its weight! It is granted to disarm right hands
That hope for everything, for which this world is not enough.
Now surely I shall wage wars for myself. Depart from the camp;
Cowards, hand over my standards to men--Quirites!
But a few, through whose instigation this madness blazed,
Are held back not by Caesar but by punishment. Prostrate yourselves upon the earth, Lower your guilty heads, and stretch forth your necks to be struck.

And you, raw recruit, upon whose strength alone the camp will now stand,

Behold the punishment, and learn to strike;

Learn to die." Under the savage voice of the threatening man

The inert multitude trembled, and so great a body of young men feared

One head, although they were about to make it a private man,

As though he commanded their very swords

And would set the steel in motion even against his soldiers' will. Caesar himself fears

Lest weapons and right hands be denied him for this crime.

Endurance conquered the savage leader's hope

And offered throats, not merely swords.

Nothing does more than readiness to die to destroy minds accustomed to crime.

And each fears to perish. By the stroke of so dreadful a compact

Peace was obtained, and the soldiery returned, reconciled by punishment.

There is certainly great force in speech, nor should the eloquence of Hegesias, the Cyrenaic philosopher, seem astonishing: he discoursed so effectively upon the good of death and the evils of life that many laid hands upon themselves and sought lakes and precipices. Valerius, Book 8, chapter 9: "How powerful in eloquence do we suppose Hegesias, the Cyrenaic philosopher, to have been? He represented the evils of life in such a way that, when their pitiable image had been planted in the breasts of his hearers, he engendered in many a desire to meet voluntary death. Therefore King Ptolemy prohibited him from discoursing further on this matter."

Hence also the tales of the Gallic Hercules, of Thebes built to the lyre, of trees and wild beasts led along, and of the underworld pacified are told for this reason. The discipline of speaking well pertains no less to the providence of a prince than that of acting rightly. For since the multitude which addresses the prince is infinite, and since many have deserved exceedingly well of him, he cannot satisfy everyone in deed; therefore kindly words are necessary, so that he may raise them up and sustain them. For an honorable profusion of words is more welcome to many than benefits--benefits which princes insufficiently skilled in eloquence bring into hatred through harshness of words and a haughty brow. Such is often their arrogance that one regrets having obtained the request. For a benefit is unwelcome when given with hateful speech.

Anger, consternation, and arms yield to eloquent words. For learned eloquence both leads kings wherever it wishes and draws peoples. "After the kings had been expelled," says Valerius, Book 8, chapter 9, "the commons, in dissension from the fathers, settled under arms beside the bank of the river Anio upon the hill which is called Sacred. And the condition of the state was not only disgraceful but also most wretched, the remaining part of the body being divided from its head by a pestilential sedition. And had the eloquence of Valerius not come to its aid, the hope of so great an empire would have collapsed almost at its very birth. For by a speech he recalled the people, rashly rejoicing in a new and unaccustomed liberty, to better and sounder counsels and subjected it to the senate; that is, he joined city to city. Therefore anger, consternation, and arms yielded to eloquent words."

He next produces from Greece an example not unlike it: "But Pericles, polished and equipped by the most earnest study under his teacher Anaxagoras, in addition to nature's most fortunate augmentations, placed the yoke of servitude upon the free necks of Athens. For he drove the city and turned it at his own judgment. And although he spoke against the will of the people, his voice was nevertheless pleasant and popular. Therefore the slanderous tongue of Old Comedy, although it desired to lash the man's power, nevertheless confessed that a charm sweeter than honey dwelt upon his lips, and proclaimed that certain stings, as it were, were left in the minds of those who had heard him. It is reported that a certain man, when already very old, attended the first public address of the young Pericles, and that the same man, as a youth, had heard the now decrepit Pisistratus address the assembly; he could not restrain himself from exclaiming that this citizen ought to be guarded against, because his speech was most like the speech of Pisistratus. Neither his assessment of the utterance nor his augury of the character deceived the man. For what difference was there between Pisistratus and Pericles, except that the former exercised tyranny armed, the latter without arms?"

Victor likewise relates concerning Constantine that by eloquence he accomplished what could either scarcely be obtained or could be obtained only with much blood.

§ 4. But two things must be considered by a prince. First, he must carefully take heed that wicked men are not cultivated by eloquence. Second, eloquence must be accommodated to his own state.

The first is necessary, for power generally follows eloquence. Curios, Alcibiadeses, and the others of that kind must be kept away, lest they be armed against the state.

The second is that eloquence is not to be considered true unless it is accommodated to the manners of the people. If an Asiatic orator brings verbal cosmetics and luxuriance to Sparta, he will accomplish this: he will be mad according to method. For streams of words are not agreeable to them. When the Samians, oppressed by the tyrant Polycrates, came as suppliants to the Lacedaemonians for aid and set forth their calamities in a long speech, the latter--certainly arrogant in the face of another's calamity--replied that they did not remember the earlier things and for that reason did not understand the later. Then the Samians, to show that they too could λακωνίζειν (speak laconically), brought forward a bread-basket and said that it needed bread. The Lacedaemonians said that "bread" was superfluous; and thus aid was then decreed and given to them. For since the end of speech is that you disclose your mind to another and persuade him of what you wish, one must not employ speech from which the other is estranged. He speaks best who speaks suitably not only to art but also to the minds of his hearers, for this is considered the highest art. A calamitous yet royal woman attributes everything to eloquence:

Τί δῆτα θνητοὶ τἄλλα μὲν μαθήματα

μοχθοῦμεν ὡς χρὴ πάντα, κἀματεύομεν;

Πειθὼ δὲ τὴν τύραννον ἀνθρώποις μόνην

οὐδέν τι μᾶλλον ἐς τέλος σπουδάζομεν, μισθοὺς διδόντες μανθάνειν, ἵν' ἦν ποτέ πείθειν ἃ τις βούλοιτο, τυγχάνειν θ' ἅμα.

Why, then, do we mortals labor in the other disciplines and, as is proper, investigate them all, yet not rather pursue Persuasion, or Suada, who alone is queen of men, giving payment so that a man may be able to persuade others of what he wishes and at the same time obtain it?

If, therefore, the hearer is devoted to brevity, you will persuade briefly. Demetrius of Phalerum thinks that concise expressions penetrate more vehemently and that brevity befits those who command. Brief are those replies of the Spartans: to the Argives, αἴκα (if); to Philip, Διονύσιος ἐν Κορίνθῳ (Dionysius at Corinth). Indeed, they also had laws written with the same brevity. Charilaus spoke truly: ὅτι τοῖς ὀλίγα λέγουσιν ὀλίγων καὶ νόμων ἐστὶ χρεία. "Since they speak with few words, they also have need of few laws."

Yet I judge that brevity so extreme should scarcely be used, for it indicates great contempt and can be drawn into various meanings. Certainly you will not easily render a man well-disposed by a single little sentence; you will, however, collect great and eternally enduring hatreds if, as with a sharp weapon, you dig into his innermost parts. For deep and small wounds can scarcely be healed. The brevity of Phocion is praised by the ancients. When someone said to him, Σκεπτομένῳ ἔοικας, ὦ Φωκίων--"You seem like one looking intently, O Phocion"--he replied that he was looking to see what he could remove from the things he was going to say before the Athenians. Certainly, he was considering most properly what he could remove without prejudicing the cause; otherwise brevity would be unadorned and harmful. For he who omits the things that ought to be said betrays his trust; and he too betrays the matter who touches only in passing upon things that must be driven home, impressed, and repeated. But he who drives home foreign, exotic, and obscure things does not speak in order to persuade, nor does he wish to be believed, but to seem learned.

CHAPTER XXI

The System and Method of Learning Eloquence

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. It is not my purpose to write a rhetoric. Many learned men have done that, especially Cicero, and Aristotle before him. But because I am instructing a prince who will place orators over his youth, I shall propose a brief practice for teaching this most beautiful science. For I protested above that nothing is more ruinous to academies than that each man should have the right to teach according to his own judgment: many lack prudence in establishing an order; more lack love of labor; and most lack constancy, for they gradually grow languid. I shall therefore propose the laws which our Society prescribes for the professor of rhetoric: both that I may answer those who criticize our method of teaching because they do not know it, and that I may show the reason by which it comes about that so many men distinguished in eloquence proceed from the schools of the Society. The professor's rules therefore read as follows:

"The level of this school cannot easily be defined by certain fixed limits, for it forms the pupil toward perfect eloquence, which embraces the two greatest faculties, oratory and poetry--of these two, however, the first place must always be assigned to oratory--and it serves not utility alone but also indulges ornament."

Eloquence certainly extends very widely, as I demonstrated in the preceding chapter, and it is not altogether perfect without knowledge of the other sciences. But young men must be instructed in such a way that they can carry the common precepts and the exercise of style over to the other sciences to which they will devote their labor. The first place is assigned to prose speech, because its use and necessity are chief in the state.

§ 2. Yet poetry must not be neglected altogether, even by those of middling ability. First, it confers a more perfect knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages, for poets speak, as it were, another language. Next, nothing is equally useful for abundance and elegance of speech, since the laws of verse compel a variety of words, thoughts, and figures to be devised. Nothing, however, is equally praiseworthy in young men as abundance of speech and a certain, as it were, luxuriance. For since wisdom is not yet mature enough to cut away and restrain everything that flows too excessively, there nevertheless ought to be something which a more mature judgment may one day remove. A vine which luxuriates prodigally is rendered fruitful by pruning; one which does not put forth superfluous shoots withers before autumn. Professors therefore provide very badly for abilities when they exercise with sharp epigrams and maxims those who do not yet comprehend them. For they confine abilities just as much as those who enclose growing bodies in garments smaller than their measure.

Let ample and customary subject matter be given: let them describe woods, seas, battles, and the common exercises of all poets--sunrise and sunset. The third utility of verse is that through practice they may learn thoroughly the quantities of syllables. I have indeed seen learned men who not only did not dare to pronounce and read but could not determine the quantity of syllables even while reading poets. This matter is so important that it impedes the freedom not only of delivering a speech but even of speaking privately. A constant fear of error threatens and oppresses speech with anxious dread.

This strict rhetoric therefore assists the other marvelously, renders it abundant, and adorns it; it brings it about that one dares to speak and read freely. Finally, prose speech also demands rhythms for itself, but generally avoids poetic rhythms, concerning which no one can judge unless learned. Cicero certainly labored very much in verse, but with neither Muses nor Apollo. Yet this exercise was an aid to him in eloquence. Nor, however, should Cicero's poems be judged so harshly; for before him, who among the Romans wrote better ones? He read the ancients and spoke in their manner. For in Cicero's time prose speech flourished, and poetry a little afterward. The words of the rule follow:

§ 3. "In general, it can be said that eloquence is contained chiefly in three things: the precepts of speaking, style, and erudition."

Those three perfect eloquence if the natural goods of ability, memory, and disposition have been added. The individual matters must now be discussed.

Concerning precepts, the rule decrees as follows: "Although precepts can be sought and observed from every quarter, nevertheless in the daily lecture none are to be explained except Cicero's rhetorical books and Aristotle's Rhetoric--if it seems good--and his Poetics."

And in the distribution of time: "The second hour before noon is to be given to a lecture either on the precepts, if a speech is explained after dinner, or on a speech, if the precepts are explained then, provided that constancy is preserved in what was begun at the start of the year. A repetition is to follow, and when necessary a subject is to be given for writing a speech or poem. Whatever time remains is to be assigned either to contest or to the things they wrote in the first hour." And: "In the first hour after noon, after repetition of the last lesson, a new lecture is to be held, either on a speech, if precepts were expounded in the morning, or on the precepts, if a speech was. A repetition is to follow this in the customary manner."

No one has doubted that precepts are necessary. And it indeed seems to me that, although men are lower and weaker in many respects, they especially excel beasts in this: that they can speak. Therefore he seems to me to have attained something glorious who excels men themselves in the very thing by which men excel beasts. If perhaps this is accomplished not by nature alone nor by exercise, but is acquired also by a certain artifice, it is not foreign to the subject to see what those men say who left us certain precepts concerning that matter.

But before we speak of oratorical precepts, it seems necessary to speak of the kind of the art itself, its office, end, material, and parts. For when these matters are known, each person's mind will be able to consider the system and life of the art itself more easily and readily. There is a certain political science which consists of many great matters. A great and ample part of it is artificial eloquence, which they call theoretical rhetoric. For we neither agree with those who think that political science does not need eloquence, nor dissent greatly from those who think that it is wholly contained in the power and artifice of the rhetorician.

The precepts of the rhetoricians are innumerable and their books manifold; they must be sought from every quarter, for no book is so bad that it does not confer something good. But our public law commands that in the schools they be sought by explaining Cicero and Aristotle alone. And indeed I marvel at Cicero when he says in Book 2 of On the Orator that he will transmit only those things which practice itself taught him, and adds that, with us as guides, one should come to the place to which we came without a guide, since we are able to teach better things. I marvel, I say, since he had so many books of the Greeks and heard their orators, as he acknowledges concerning himself in the book On Famous Orators; nevertheless, once carried higher himself, he left everyone below him.

He certainly had Aristotle's books, in which Aristotle treated those things accurately; he is, however, more obscure and concise than is suitable for his explanation everywhere, especially in the three books of the Rhetoric. In the Rhetoric to Alexander he is plainer and professes great diligence, for he begins thus:

> Ἐπέστειλάς μοι ὅτι πολλάκις πολλοὺς πέπομφας πρὸς ἡμᾶς τοὺς διαλεξομένους ὑπὲρ τοῦ γραφῆναί σοι τὰς μεθόδους τῶν πολιτικῶν λόγων. Ἐγὼ δὲ οὐ διὰ ῥᾳθυμίαν ὑπερεβαλόμην ἐν τούτοις τοῖς χρόνοις, ἀλλὰ διὰ τὸ ζητεῖν οὕτως ὑπὲρ αὐτῶν γραφῆναί σοι διηκριβωμένως, ὡς οὐδεὶς ἄλλος γέγραφε τῶν περὶ ταῦτα πραγματευομένων.

"I have been informed by your letters that you have often sent certain men to us to ask me to write out for you the precepts of civil causes. I did not delay the matter up to this time through any negligence, but in order to seek to write to you about these things so diligently that certainly no other person who had labored in these matters ever wrote more diligently."

Rightly and deservedly, therefore, do we follow those authors, but we Latins chiefly follow the Latin Cicero, who not only meditated upon the laws of eloquence in the shade but exercised them in the field and dust. He therefore transmitted genuine precepts and, what is chief, with such elegance and dignity that, while others are barren in them, he displayed the greatest eloquence in slender matters. Then, if we depart from Cicero, whom at last shall we explain? For what schoolman has lately arisen so speechless that some Rhetoric of his has not come forth into the light? Will you teach those laws from a compendium? It is not fitting: unless you teach eloquence eloquently, you will render pupils tongueless and mute. Soarius's Rhetoric itself is collected principally from Cicero and Quintilian; it is proposed to beginners at first, until they draw all the precepts from the fountains themselves. So much concerning precepts.

§ 4. Concerning style, the instructions for the rhetorician teach many things, especially those of Cicero. The chief point is that each person should propose someone to himself to be reproduced by imitation. Thus Cicero indeed says in Book 2 of On the Orator: "Therefore let this be first among my precepts: that we show whom he is to imitate, and in such a way that he most diligently pursues those things which excel most in the man whom he will imitate. Then let exercise be added, by which, in imitating, he may reproduce and so express the man whom he previously selected--not as I have often known many imitators to do, who in imitating pursue either things that are easy or even those that are conspicuous and almost faulty. Nothing is easier than to imitate someone's clothing, stance, or movement. If there is also something faulty, it is no great thing to take it up and be faulty in it. Thus that Fufius, who even now rages in the state after losing his voice-- does not attain the sinews in Gaius Fimbria's speaking, which Fimbria nevertheless possessed, but imitates the distortion of his mouth and the breadth of his words. Yet that man did not know how to select the person to whom he should especially be similar, and in the very man whom he had selected he wished to imitate even his faults. But anyone who does as he ought must first keep watch in selecting; then, in the man whom he has approved, let him most diligently pursue the qualities that excel most."

"For what cause do you judge there to be why individual ages have produced almost individual kinds of speaking? We cannot judge this so easily among our orators, because they certainly did not leave many writings from which a judgment could be made, as among the Greeks, from whose writings the system and inclination of speaking belonging to each age can be understood. The most ancient men whose writings survive are generally Pericles and Alcibiades, and in the same age Thucydides: subtle, acute, brief, abounding more in thoughts than words. It could not have happened that the kind was one and the same for all unless they had proposed someone to themselves for imitation. Critias, Theramenes, and Lysias followed them. Many writings of Lysias survive, some of Critias; concerning Theramenes we hear. All still retained at that time the sap of Pericles, but they were of a somewhat more abundant thread. Behold, Isocrates arose, the master of all those men, from whose school innumerable leaders issued as from the Trojan horse; but some of them wished to be illustrious in procession, others in battle."

§ 5. Whom, then, will a young man imitate, if not Cicero? Those who lived before Cicero did not leave many writings, and now none survive; those who followed him are inferior to Cicero, and each followed a certain peculiar kind of speaking. Each also had certain faults of his own, greater than Cicero's, and virtues much smaller. The first reason, therefore, why we propose Cicero is that no one has given us a better man.

No ancient author escaped criticisms. Pericles and Thucydides were judged acute and unadorned by many. Many blamed Plato's σύγχυσιν, his confusion; the ancients said that many things in him were useless and many foreign to the matter. Athenaeus, Book 11, chapter 22 of the Deipnosophists, and Theopompus in his book Against Plato's Manner. Aristotle's accurate diligence and often his μικρολογία (minuteness of discourse) were tiresome; because of his obscurity he displeased many, and to such a degree that they judged the ink of the cuttlefish to have been poured over his writings.

But, to withdraw from the quarrels and rivalries of the Greeks, let us treat the Latins. Lenaeus, Pompey's freedman, called Sallust a monster, a thief of Cato's words, and a most unlearned affecter. Trogus charged Livy with Patavinity; Caligula judged him verbose. Seneca, while he always desires to speak acutely, often drives home empty and frigid subtleties; nevertheless, Caligula almost removed him from the midst of life because of his eloquence. Quintus Remmius Palaemon called Varro, commended in so many ways by his contemporaries, a pig. All either had faults or envy fastened faults upon them. Terence, Virgil, and Cicero are accused by the Greeks of extortion; but Terence and Virgil gloried in having transferred Greek things to their own use. Cicero joined the force of Demosthenes, the sweetness of Isocrates, and the abundance of Plato, as Quintilian judged truly.

Nor ought it to deter us from him that he himself is not the author of everything; rather, it ought to allure us to imitate a man who so expressed by imitation the three virtues of the three most excellent orators that he surpassed them all. Yet among the men of his own age he was called rather swollen, Asiatic, excessively redundant in repetitions, sometimes frigid in witticisms, fractured and spineless in compositions. Indeed, Brutus called him soft, as the same Quintilian reports. He himself acknowledges the swelling, but, admonished by Molon, corrected it; and would that there were a similar swelling in all young men. Cicero, Book 2 of On the Orator. That swelling was ornament before the people, redundancy before the senate. The other faults belong to his rivals, not to Cicero; although nothing prevents a man who speaks daily in the senate or courts from having said many things which he would bring back to the anvil. Who does not know the difference between a public speaker who is well prepared and one who speaks for the occasion?

We speak of the speeches which have been left to us. They carried off this prerogative: the age was able to preserve no speeches of any earlier Roman orator besides them. Nor does the authority of Brutus move me. As a follower of Stoic discipline and an admirer of Cato, he despised a more polished and copious speech. But I shall convict those who censure the labors of our Society in this department and call men elsewhere, using as witnesses the very men whom they have cited to me; and I shall produce an argument to which not even calumny will attempt to reply.

He must be regarded as a great orator whose speeches brought it about that the speeches of all who flourished in the Roman state by the praise of eloquence ceased to be read--and this in a free state, not through fear or flattery but by the freest judgment, even that of his bitterest enemies--and whom posterity then imitated. But it is manifest that this happened to Cicero. In the Brutus, Brutus himself and the experience then present are witnesses. "Curio, therefore, was almost of the same age, certainly an illustrious orator, concerning whose ability one can judge from his speeches. For there are others, and also his noble speech For Servius Fulvius on Incest. When we were boys, it was judged the best of all; now it scarcely appears amid this crowd of new volumes."

"I understand excellently," says Brutus, "who brought about that crowd of volumes." "And I," Cicero says, "understand, Brutus, whom you mean. Certainly we both brought something good to the young--a kind of speaking more magnificent than it had been and more ornate--and perhaps caused harm because the ancient speeches, after ours appeared, ceased to be read, not indeed by me, for I prefer them to my own, but by most men." "Number me," he says, "among the most, although I see, on your authority, that many things which I formerly despised must now be read by me."

They will therefore concede this to me: even if we possessed an orator more ancient than Cicero, he should nevertheless not be proposed for imitation, since Rome ceased to read him when Cicero's volumes had been published and, as though acorns had been disdained after grain was discovered, rejected the ancient diction. Nor did the following age find anyone so foolishly arrogant that he would make himself equal to Cicero. Seneca, the most eloquent man of his time, acknowledges Cicero as the father of Roman eloquence. "Our Cicero too," he says, "from whom Roman eloquence arose, was a gradual worker." Let the same Seneca be heard concerning composition in Epistle 100:

"Read Cicero: his composition is uniform; it keeps its cadence, is carefully wrought, slow, and soft without disgrace. By contrast, that of Asinius Pollio is rough and leaping and will abandon you where you least expect. Finally, in Cicero everything comes to an end; in Pollio it falls, except for a very few expressions which are bound to a fixed measure and a single model."

But in Epistle 114 he seems to wish to censure Cicero. Yet because he speaks ambiguously, let us rather accept it in a good sense and not impute envy to Seneca, as if, because he himself followed another form of speaking, he had censured Cicero's style. Those who delight in criticisms of great men will believe this more readily, because writers transmit that Seneca turned Nero away from reading the ancient orators so that he might keep him longer in admiration of himself. I shall transcribe the whole passage because it treats imitation:

"Let us pass to composition. How many kinds of fault do you have in this? Some approve a stiff and rough composition. They deliberately disturb anything that has flowed out rather smoothly; they do not wish the joint to be without a rough place; they consider manly and brave whatever strikes the ear through unevenness. The composition of some is no composition but modulation, so greatly does it flatter and glide softly. What shall I say about that in which words are deferred and, long awaited, are scarcely returned at the close? What of that which is slow at its ending, as Cicero's is, sloping downward and ending softly, and answering in no other way than it customarily does, according to its own manner and cadence? The fault is not only in the kind of thoughts, if they are either petty and childish or shameless and have dared more than decency allows, but if they are flowery and excessively sweet, if they issue into emptiness and effect nothing more than their sound.

"Some one man under whom eloquence then stands introduces these faults; the others imitate and transmit them one to another. Thus, while Sallust was in vigor, amputated sentences, words falling before they were expected, and obscure brevity stood for cultivation. Arruntius, a man of rare frugality who wrote histories of the Punic War, was Sallustian and strove toward that kind. In Sallust there is: 'He made an army with silver,' that is, he procured it with money. Arruntius began to love that expression and placed it on every page. In one place he says: 'They made flight for our men.' In another: 'Hiero, king of the Syracusans, makes war.' And elsewhere: 'When these things were heard, they made the men of Panormus surrender to the Romans.' I wished to give you a taste. The whole book is woven from these expressions. Things which were rare in Sallust are frequent and almost continuous in this man--and not without cause, for Sallust happened upon them, whereas this man sought them.

"You see, however, what follows when someone's fault serves as a model. Sallust said, 'while the waters were wintering.' Arruntius says in the first book of the Punic War: 'Suddenly the storm wintered.' And elsewhere, when he wished to say that the year had been cold, he says: 'The whole year wintered.' And elsewhere: 'Thence he sent sixty light transports, besides the soldiers and the sailors' necessaries, while the north wind was wintering.' He does not cease thrusting this word into every place. Somewhere Sallust says: 'Amid civil arms he seeks reputations for equity and goodness.' Arruntius could not restrain himself from immediately placing in his first book: 'There were enormous reputations concerning Regulus.' These, therefore, and faults of this kind, which imitation has impressed upon someone, are not indications of luxury or a corrupted mind."

In Book 2 of the Natural Questions, Seneca says that Caecinna would have had some name for eloquence had Cicero's shadow not oppressed him. Lucan gave him the same testimony:

> The greatest author of Roman eloquence,
>
> Cicero, beneath whose law and toga fierce Catiline
>
> trembled before the peace-making axes.
> Eloquence added strength to a feeble cause.

What of Velleius Paterculus? “All eloquence burst forth under the leader of its own workmanship.” Pliny, Epistle 20: “The best speech of Cicero is the longest.” And Fabius 12.20: “Cicero is most eminent in all the qualities which are praised in each individual.” Indeed, even those who were his enemies charged him not with speechlessness but with immoderate eloquence; for no sane man denied that he was the most eloquent of Romulus’s descendants.

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 6. Nevertheless, some censure this: they say that those who imitate Cicero are not learned. They prefer Lipsius or another in whose individual periods and thoughts there is either a point worthy of an epigram, a precious word from antiquity, or a hemistich from the best Greek sayings. Those things do not move me; for while such men pursue them studiously and affectedly, they become not only dry but even barbarous.

In that kind of style Justus Lipsius had a most peculiar gift; yet he himself everywhere inculcates the imitation of Cicero, detests his own imitators, and no one ever--or certainly very few--has attempted without inept subtleties what Lipsius did. But if that charge is pressed against the Society, it will be repelled without great labor by those who understand that it is one thing to draw forth the thought of one’s mind evenly, in Latin, and considerately, and another to patch together rhapsodies by leaps.

Let Caelius Rhodiginus come forward, who opened the eyes of all antiquarians. Although he has often seemed to many to speak stones--for his whole speech is rough and rocky--he nevertheless pursues Cicero with true praises in Book 25, chapter 13: “And lest we seem through want to have passed over our own authors, what is more abundant than Cicero, whom Pliny admires as placed beyond every hazard of ability, Quintilian pronounces the best master of speaking, Jerome confesses to have stood upon the summit of Latin eloquence, and Augustine, so great an assertor of Christian truth, plainly acknowledged that he owed his salvation to the Hortensius? What is more eminent? What streams of water overflow so greatly? What sea inundates more spaciously? What thunderbolt flashes more impetuously? You would believe him to seize the judge, envelop him, drive him headlong, and trample him down; you would think him not merely to set the hearer on fire, but himself to burn. Finally, you would believe him a certain god of minds. Whatever opposes and resists that rushing violence is judged to be beyond human comprehension.

“In him the force of Demosthenes ranges widely, the abundance of Plato shines, and Isocratean pleasantness caresses, entices, and moves--the school and workshop of speaking belonging to the man whose house lay open, as it were, to all Greece. Nor would you seek in vain the subtlety of Lysias, the acuteness of Hyperides, the resonance of Aeschines, the gravity of Africanus, or the gentleness of Laelius. So much the less tolerable is the book of Largus Licinius, which was portentously entitled The Scourge of Cicero. The qualities which shone singly in others all blossom together in one man, and indeed at the highest degree, so that you might judge the others hay, as they say. If you think that they should be compared with him, you would accomplish no more than if you attempted to compare act with potency, or with the entelechy which lies hidden in matter. Yet you will find men who, swelling with a censorious brow, contend that they have scented something of Asiatic swelling in so great an orator.”

Marcus Cicero writes concerning himself and Demosthenes: “You see,” he says, “that he accomplishes many things and we attempt many; that he is able, while we wish, to speak in whatever manner the cause demands.” There are afterward those who extol to me the brevity of Sallust with praises. I pass over what Seneca writes: while Sallust was in vigor, amputated sentences, words falling before they were expected, and obscure brevity stood for cultivation, which Arruntius, a man of rare frugality, imitated in the books in which he embraced the histories of the Punic War. That brevity is certainly plausible. I add also what the gravest authors have called it: immortal. Yet what is it to a judge whose attention is already occupied? Nor would I greatly approve Thucydides for this use. And because we seem to be tearing down great names before which it would have been far more honorable to rise, this is Marcus Cicero’s own judgment, from whom we know it was elsewhere also transmitted thus: “Brevity,” he says, “is a praise sometimes in some part of speaking; in eloquence as a whole it has no praise.”

Speeches from Cicero's books are therefore expounded so that the precepts of eloquence may shine more brightly in them, with all antiquity approving this. Yet other writings are not rejected, for the sixth rule also permits the exposition of others. The lecture is twofold: one pertains to art, in which the precepts are explained; the other to style, in which speeches are explained. In each, however, two things must be considered: first, which authors are to be taken up for exposition; then, what method of interpretation can be maintained. Enough has been said concerning the first in the first rule: Cicero alone is to be used for speeches; for precepts, Aristotle is to be added to Cicero.

A speech must never be omitted; indeed, the explanation of precepts should be continued for almost the whole year, for the force of oratorical precepts is immense. Yet in place of this, where custom permits, as the year is now declining, the use of some author who contains greater erudition or variety is not forbidden. A certain lecture upon a poet may sometimes be interposed during the summer between lectures on precepts or on a speech.

§ 7. Of historians, Livy and Sallust are chiefly expounded. I do not trouble myself about the judgments of others; I shall use the testimony of the man whom I have already called forth on Cicero's behalf. "Moreover," says Caelius in Book 25, chapter 3, "that milky and overflowing amplitude of the Paduan historian, so often affecting the reader that it almost overwhelms him with a certain stupor, seems to me to nourish the ability far more richly; so much so that--as that man says of painters who did not know how to take their hand from the panel--you cannot tear your eyes away from the reading. In his speaking all things are not merely sketched but graphically expressed.

"That most sweet abundance, yet austere and not boiled down, shining and blossoming without labor--as Seneca writes of Theophrastus--is not merely poured over with nectar but anointed with a certain enchantment of Circe, whom Homer, the prince of letters, wished to be understood as a goddess. You desire to depart; the indescribable vastness of eloquence holds you with caressing loves. Yet it is not vast, but more honorably arranged, more preciously cultivated, divinely unencumbered. Nowhere is there childish paint or empty cosmetics, nowhere a more tightly curled lock. You are not present; the pleasantness already tasted summons you, far more powerfully than the songs of the Sirens, past which the deaf rower is at last said to have traveled. Not even a blind man could neglect this pleasantness if he perceived it only by its fragrance.

"What now shall I say of erudition? In this one man it so continually gushes forth, exults in such manifold fashion, and provokes every most ingenious man--his ear first well steamed and then washed with sharp vinegar--by a recondite knowledge of things, that in the very year when we were commenting upon these matters I drew this confession from my hearers for whose sake that labor was performed at Padua and whose inner fiber was by no means horn: that they carried away more benefit from one lecture dictated upon Titus Livy than from ten upon Sallust, whom we explained on spare days, that is, feast days."

Pollio Asinius nevertheless thinks that the phrasing of this man savors somewhat of Patavinity. I suppose this is because his speech is not colored with a certain urbanity, that is, the genuine propriety of the city of Rome--a quality which is perceived while reading rather than capable of being expressed in speech. For something greater rings and resounds more urbanely in Roman writers than in those of the other nations. Thus too Quintus Granius, a Roman herald, overwhelmed Tinca of Placentia, a most witty man, with some indescribable native flavor. And so a little old woman called Theophrastus, a man of divine eloquence, a foreigner, having marked his affectation of one word.

I believe that those Paduan hearers loved their fellow citizen too greatly. For who does not see that Sallust possessed greater ability and a more inward eloquence? Certainly Roman history has no men equal to these. Velleius is not to be despised; Curtius is customarily read in the humanities class. Tacitus surpassed all Romans and Greeks in prudence and judgment, but his style is more concise and weightier in thoughts than young men can comprehend or are able to imitate. Therefore he must be read by learned men, not proposed to beginners.

§ 8. But if someone asks me by what method those works are explained, I shall now state that too. Rule 7 speaks thus concerning precepts: “As to the method of interpretation, if precepts are being explained: first, the meaning of the precept is to be opened up, after the judgments of the interpreters have been compared, if it is rather obscure and they do not agree. Second, other rhetoricians who prescribe the same thing, or the same author if he prescribes the same elsewhere, are to be brought forward. Third, some reason for the precept itself is to be devised. Fourth, several similar and especially illustrious passages of orators and poets in which they employed that precept are to be adduced. Fifth, if anything from varied erudition and history contributes to the matter, it is to be added. Finally, it is to be shown how it can be accommodated to our own affairs; and this is to be done with the greatest possible selection and ornament of words.”

Rule 8 speaks in this manner concerning a speech or poem: “If a speech or poem is explained: first, the thought is to be expounded if it is obscure, and differing interpretations are to be judged. Second, the whole method of the art--namely, invention, disposition, and expression--is to be examined: how aptly the orator insinuates himself, how suitably he speaks, or from what topics he takes arguments for persuading, adorning, and moving; how many precepts he often mingles in one and the same place; in what manner he encloses reasoning for producing belief within figures of thought, and in turn interweaves figures of thought with figures of words. Third, several passages similar both in matter and words are to be brought forward, and other orators or poets who used the same precept to persuade or narrate something similar are to be produced. Fourth, the matters themselves are to be confirmed by the judgments of wise men, if the subject permits. Fifth, from history, fables, and all erudition, those things are to be sought which contribute to adorning the passage. Finally, the words are to be weighed, and their propriety, ornament, abundance, and rhythm observed. These things, however, have not been brought forward so that the master should always pursue them all, but so that he may select from them those which seem more opportune.”

§ 9. I do not think anyone will ask me about the utility or dignity of this interpretation, but rather that all will marvel how one man can be equal to so many and such varied labors. For it is the labor of a whole day, divided into various parts. First he reviews and corrects compositions. That immense labor is described in the fourth rule: “In correcting a composition, let him indicate if any fault has been committed in oratorical or poetic art, in elegance and cultivation of speech, in connecting the discourse, in arranging rhythms, in orthography, or otherwise; if any passage has been treated wrongly, obscurely, or humbly; if decorum has been insufficiently preserved; if any digression has been too long; and other things of the same kind. Finally, when the speech has been completed, let each pupil offer to the teacher the whole speech copied out together--or at least corrected--which he had previously brought in parts, so that it may appear that the speeches have been perfected by everyone.”

Ten things are proposed in the correction of a speech, five in its explanation, and still others in the theme; but I shall afterward explain the manner in which the Society forms its own instructors into professors.

§ 10. The exercises are daily, according to Rule 5: “The pupils’ exercises while the master corrects the compositions will be, for example: to imitate some passage of a poet or orator; to produce some description, such as of gardens, temples, a storm, and similar things; to vary the same expression in several ways; to translate a Greek speech into Latin or conversely; to embrace in prose the verses of a poet, both in Latin and in Greek; to change one kind of poem into another; to compose epigrams, inscriptions, and epitaphs; to excerpt expressions, whether Greek or Latin, from good orators and poets; to accommodate rhetorical figures to particular subjects; to draw forth from rhetorical and topical places many arguments concerning some matter; and other things of the same kind.”

Rule 9 determines the subject and kind of composition: “A subject for a speech is to be dictated, either the whole at the beginning of each month or in parts each week--for at most one speech is to be completed in each month. Let it be brief, but such as proceeds through all parts of a speech. Let the teacher indicate the topics of confirmation, the principal figures of amplification which could be employed, and, if it seems good, certain passages of good authors for imitation. Sometimes, after some writer according to whose imitation they should form the speech has been pointed out, let the matter be proposed word for word.”

And Rule 10: “The subject of a poem can also be transmitted either in writing or orally, either by indicating the matter alone or by adding a particular thought. Let it be either brief--such as the subject of an epigram, ode, elegy, or epistle--to be completed at one sitting; or longer, so that they may weave a poem, just as a speech, over several sittings.”

And Rule 19: “The master will sometimes be able to propose to the pupils, in place of a subject, some brief action--namely, an eclogue, scene, or dialogue--so that afterward the one which has been written best of all may be presented in the school, with the parts distributed among them, but without any theatrical ornament.” It is not merely to be presented to the master but also exhibited for public judgments.

Rule 18: “Let poems be affixed to the walls of the school about every other month to adorn some more celebrated day, to promulgate officeholders, or on some other occasion, with all the most select poems copied out by the pupils. Indeed, according to the custom of the regions, let there also be something in shorter prose”--

§ 11. All this exercise tends to this end: that they exercise themselves as much as possible in writing and speaking. For eloquence is learned chiefly by practice. It is pleasing to marvel at the negligence of our age when it is estimated from the diligence of the ancients. Suetonius writes concerning Octavian Augustus: “From his earliest age he eagerly and most laboriously practiced eloquence and liberal studies. During the war at Mutina, amid so great a mass of affairs, he is said to have read, written, and declaimed every day. For thereafter he never spoke in the Senate, before the people, or before the soldiers except with a speech meditated and composed beforehand, although he did not lack the ability to speak extemporaneously upon sudden occasions. And lest he incur a hazard of memory or consume time in learning by heart, he instituted the practice of reciting everything. More serious conversations also with individuals, and even with his Livia, he had only from writings and from a little book, lest he say more or less extemporaneously. He pronounced with a sweet and peculiar tone of voice, and continually gave attention to Phonascus; but sometimes, when his throat was weakened, he addressed the people through the voice of a herald.”

Every circumstance increases our wonder. He was already eighteen years old; from his earliest youth he practiced eagerly. During the war at Mutina, where he was contending for reputation, resources, and life against powerful enemies, he read, wrote, and declaimed daily, so that you may recognize the genuine pupil of Cicero. That he chiefly read Cicero is evident from what was said above.

Posted compositions and declamations are proposed for this reason: that they may exercise mutual criticism and publicly furnish a specimen of their progress. We certainly see abilities wonderfully aroused by this means. In vain will they learn all the laws of all oratorical precepts; in vain will they read everything; they will not become orators without practice. No one becomes a soldier by reading or watching the gladiatorial art: it is necessary to strike the stake, to be burdened with arms and palisades, and to have struck the target with a practice weapon, so that at some time you may cut down an enemy. Tullius, the best master and model of speaking, chiefly commends this in Book 1 of On the Orator: “But the principal thing is that which--to speak truthfully--we do least; for it is a matter of great labor, which most of us flee: to write as much as possible. The pen is the best and most excellent maker and master of speaking, and not unjustly. For if meditation and reflection easily surpass a sudden and fortuitous speech, surely assiduous and diligent writing will surpass meditation itself. For all the topics, whether of art or of a certain ability and prudence, which are present in the matter concerning which we write, show themselves and occur to us when we seek them and contemplate them with the whole acuteness of our ability. And all the thoughts and all the words of every kind which are especially illustrious must come beneath the point of the pen and present themselves. Then the very arrangement and formation of the words is perfected in writing, not by a poetic rhythm but by a certain oratorical rhythm and measure.

"These are the things which produce cries and admiration in good orators, and no one will attain them unless he has written long and much, even if he has practiced most vigorously in these extemporaneous speeches. And one who comes to speaking from the habit of writing brings this ability: even if he speaks suddenly, nevertheless the things which are said seem like things written. And even if at some time in speaking he has brought something written, when he has departed from it, the remaining speech will follow in a similar manner. Just as, when a ship has been set in motion and the rowers have ceased, the ship itself nevertheless retains its motion and course when the impulse and beat of the oars have been interrupted, so in a continuous speech, when the written portions fail, the remaining speech nevertheless maintains an equal course, set in motion by the likeness and force of the written portions."

§ 12. In the same place he relates a twofold exercise. For he used either to express a Latin speech or verses in other words--in which he says there was this defect, that others had already occupied the best words--or to translate Greek. "Afterward," he says, "it pleased me, and I employed this method as a young man, to translate the Greek speeches of the greatest orators. By reading them I attained this: that when I rendered in Latin what I had read in Greek, I not only employed the best words, yet words in customary use, but also formed certain words by imitation which were new to our people, provided they were suitable."

What hope of eloquence can there be for us if we stand so far from Cicero and every subject for writing is tedious? How slight a reason calls young men away from writing--indeed, from speaking! It is shameful to say: when they offer a theme, they believe that they are laboring for their teacher. Ludovicus Vives severely assailed that error in his commentary on Book 22, chapter 11, of Augustine's City of God: "Certainly there was a divine force of ability in Marcus Tullius, who, amid the affairs and commotions of the whole world, so withdrew himself whenever he pleased that he found time not only in which to read, but also in which to write those things which we are never sated with admiring. If a little priestly benefice worth one or two annual sesterces, or a very small and very easy procuratorship, falls to one of us, we judge ourselves so hindered and entangled that we suppose we have obtained a lawful discharge from all letters and that we are treated with no slight injustice if we are summoned back to them. But if we handle any letters at all, first of all we of course cast up and repeatedly urge to the point of disgust our enormous and intolerable occupations, continually lamenting them, displaying them to others as objects of pity, and charging much to the account of the public advantage if anything has been wrought by us for their sake amid so many pressing affairs by which we are overwhelmed. Let us blush, by all the Muses, when idle, to reproach the parent both of Roman eloquence and of Latin philosophy for any lapse whatever, since his errors are more learned than all our well-spoken things."

How far had those men withdrawn from Brutus, to whom Cicero's age yielded and lowered its fasces?

"Not so much the fruit and glory of speaking," says that man, "as its study and exercise delights me, and nothing will take it away from me, especially since you are so devoted to study." Thus plainly does Cicero describe his own youth in On Famous Orators: "The orators were heard by me every day in public assemblies. But grief first struck me, who was most eager to hear, when Cotta was expelled; while frequently hearing the others I was held by the keenest devotion, and every day, writing, reading, and preparing, I was not content with merely the exercises of an orator." And again: "Every day I practiced by declaiming, and I did this much in Latin also, but more often in Greek."

I had to set forth these things so that learned men who think otherwise may understand openly upon whose authority the schools demand daily writings--prose and verse, Latin and Greek--and resound with daily declamations. For at one time the frequency of compositions was objected to me; by displaying Cicero's example I answered them without words of my own. And certainly, if Tullius returned to life and watched those exercises, he would admonish this alone: that each should exercise himself with the greatest accuracy and labor. For by speaking wrongly men become accustomed to speak wrongly, and by writing badly to write badly. I have seen young men who changed their style in three months through diligent exercise; I have seen those who after two years wrote humbly and abjectly, because they never wished to lift their pen from the ground.

§ 13. I have spoken about writing; it follows that I treat of delivery. Thus Rule 16: "On alternate Saturdays, during the last half-hour before noon, with the humanities pupils assembled, a declamation, or a lecture, or a poem, or a Greek speech, or a poem and speech together, is to be delivered from the lectern by one or two of the pupils."

And Rule 17: "In the hall or church, a more serious speech or poem, or both--now in Latin, now in Greek--or a declamatory case, with arguments set forth on either side and a judgment delivered, is to be held about once each month; nevertheless, only after it has been reviewed and approved by the prefect of higher studies."

And Rule 19: "The master will sometimes be able to propose to the pupils, in place of a subject, some brief action--namely, an eclogue, scene, or dialogue--so that afterward the one which has been written best of all may be presented in the school, with the parts distributed among them, but without any theatrical ornament."

Rule 12 also pertains here: "The contest or exercise will consist both in correcting those things which one rival has detected in the other's speech, and in proposing to one another those things in which they practiced during the first hour; then in recognizing or composing figures; then in reciting or applying the precepts of rhetoric, letters, poems, or history; then in expounding more difficult passages of authors and explaining difficulties; then in pursuing the customs of the ancients and matters pertaining to erudition; then in interpreting hieroglyphics, Pythagorean symbols, apophthegms, proverbs, emblems, and riddles; then in declaiming, and in similar matters at the teacher's discretion."

All those things form and perfect the orator, even the performances of comedies and the contests of disputants. They shake off useless shame, furnish boldness, and strengthen the voice. For the majesty of an orator shines forth in delivery; the very countenance, voice, and breath are what rule the minds of the hearers. "There ought to be added," says Tullius in Book 2 of On the Orator, "a delivery varied, vehement, full of mind, full of breath, full of grief, full of truth. If in these works someone has comprehended that art by which, like Phidias, he can fashion the statue of Minerva, he will certainly not labor to learn how, like that same craftsman, to make the smaller works upon the shield."

§ 14. Nor is the voice alone polished and made illustrious; it is also rendered more urbane if the instruments of speaking are exercised by frequent delivery. For we distinguish different nations, even when they speak one language, from their sibilations and a certain peculiarity; there is something which can be heard but cannot at all be explained. Nature gave the same instruments of speaking to all--the tongue, lips, teeth, and palate. All those things are more rustic in the unpracticed and draw much from the common people unless they are diligently exercised. For in a marvelous manner the part of the upper lip which they call φίλτρον (philtrum), and the lower which is called τύπος (form), are adjusted by speaking; the prominence itself and προσωμία (facial configuration) produce certain marks of speaking. The tongue also is drawn by habit toward a particular part in such a way that it can hardly be changed. There is no other cause than custom and a nature made from motion. For just as the fingers of lyre players strike most softly and swiftly the distinctions of the strings, so too words are formed by use. Why, indeed, are the Chinese inhabitants unable to utter letters which are expressed by a swift curling of the air and by a stroke of the tongue as though of a plectrum--such as L and R--unless because they have not exercised the tongue for it? Nicolas Trigault of our Society certainly reported to me that those who associate familiarly with Europeans gradually learn to pronounce those letters.

§ 15. The most delicate judgment of the ears is also very greatly aided by rhythm, which is perceived only through the sound of the voice; because one who has not frequently heard men speaking, nor spoken himself, must necessarily be destitute of that faculty. Aristotle, in Book 3, chapter 8, of the Rhetoric, advises that speech ought indeed to possess rhythm:

> Τὸ δὲ σχῆμα τῆς λέξεως δεῖ μήτε ἔμμετρον εἶναι μήτε ἄρρυθμον· τὸ μὲν γὰρ ἀπίθανον (πεπλάσθαι γὰρ δοκεῖ), καὶ ἅμα καὶ ἐξίστησι· προσέχειν γὰρ ποιεῖ τῷ ὁμοίῳ, πότε πάλιν ἥξει· ὥσπερ οὖν τῶν κηρύκων προλαμβάνουσι τὰ παιδία, τὸ "τίνα αἱρεῖται ἐπίτροπον ὁ ἀπελεύθερος;" "Κλέωνα." τὸ δὲ ἄρρυθμον ἀπέραντον· δεῖ δὲ πεπεράνθαι μέν, μὴ μέτρῳ δέ· ἀηδὲς γὰρ καὶ ἄγνωστον τὸ ἄπειρον. περαίνεται δὲ ἀριθμῷ πάντα· ὁ δὲ τοῦ σχήματος τῆς λέξεως ἀριθμὸς ῥυθμός ἐστιν, οὗ καὶ τὰ μέτρα τμήματα. διὸ ῥυθμὸν δεῖ ἔχειν τὸν λόγον, μέτρον δὲ μή· ποίημα γὰρ ἔσται. ῥυθμὸν δὲ μὴ ἀκριβῶς· τοῦτο δὲ ἔσται, ἐὰν μέχρι του ᾖ. τῶν δὲ ῥυθμῶν ὁ μὲν ἡρῷος σεμνὸς καὶ λεκτικῆς ἁρμονίας δεόμενος· ὁ δὲ ἴαμβος αὐτή ἐστιν ἡ λέξις ἡ τῶν πολλῶν· διὸ μάλιστα πάντων τῶν μέτρων ἰαμβεῖα φθέγγονται λέγοντες.

"The form of expression ought neither to possess meter nor to be without rhythm. The former is less suited to persuasion, for it seems to have been fabricated, and at the same time it distracts; for it causes attention to be given to when the like will come again. Thus children anticipate the heralds: 'Whom does the freedman choose as patron?' 'Cleon.' But that which is without rhythm is without a limit. It ought to be bounded, but not by meter; for what is unbounded is unpleasant and not accommodated to cognition. All things are bounded by number. But the number of the form of speech is rhythm, of which meters also are sections. Therefore speech ought to have rhythm, but not meter; otherwise it will be a poem. Nor ought it to seek rhythm with exactness. This will be accomplished if it possesses it only up to a certain point. Among rhythms, the heroic is grand and suited to diction, but in need of harmony. The iambus, however, is the very expression of the multitude. Therefore those who speak utter iambics more than any other meter."

Indeed, the voice itself is made vibrant, the movements are made smooth, and confidence in speaking is prepared when one remembers that it has gone well. But nothing is equally necessary to the voice as moderation, or frequent change, so that it may be accommodated to every emotion. And this is the one reason why we frequently impose dialogues, little comedies, and contests upon youth who must be exercised; for by that method they learn to bend the voice to all movements of minds, much better than by the flute of Gracchus. But this matter also was once a concern to the greatest orators. Cicero, Book 3 of On the Orator: "For the use and praise of delivery, the voice without doubt obtains the greatest part. First it is to be desired by us; then, whatever it shall be, it is to be preserved. Concerning how the voice is to be cared for, nothing now pertains to this kind of instruction; yet I certainly judge that it must be cared for greatly. But it does not seem foreign to the office of this discourse of ours to observe that, as I said a little before, in very many matters that which is most useful is somehow also most becoming.

"For maintaining the voice in speaking, nothing is more useful than frequent change; nothing more destructive than an unrestrained exertion without interruption. And as regards our ears and the pleasantness of delivery, what is more fitting than alternation, variety, and change? Accordingly, that same Gracchus--as you can hear, Catulus, from Licinius, your client, a learned man whom he had as a slave at his hand--was accustomed to have a skilled man stand concealed behind him with a little ivory flute when he addressed the assembly. This man would quickly sound that note by which he might either arouse him when relaxed or call him back from exertion."

"By Hercules, I have heard it," says Catulus, "and I have often admired both the man's diligence and also his learning and knowledge." "But I," says Crassus, "have heard it too, and indeed I grieve that those men fell into that deception in the state--although such a web is now being woven and such a manner of life is being urged on in the state and displayed to posterity that we already desire to have men like those citizens whom our fathers did not endure." "Leave that conversation, I beg you, Crassus," says Julius, "and return to the flute of Gracchus, whose rationale I do not yet fully understand."

"In every voice," says Crassus, "there is some middle pitch, but one proper to each voice. To raise the voice gradually from this point is useful and pleasant. For there is something rustic in beginning with a shout, and that same practice is salutary for strengthening the voice. Then there is a certain extreme of exertion, which nevertheless is lower than the sharpest shout; the flute will not permit you to proceed to that shout and will nevertheless call you back from the exertion itself. Conversely, there is likewise a certain deepest point in relaxation, to which one descends as though by steps of sounds. This variety and this course of the voice through all its sounds will both preserve the voice and bring pleasantness to delivery. But you will leave the flute-player at home and carry with you into the forum the perception produced by this habit."

It is especially important, however, that by hearing and speaking the discourse should be colored, as it were, by a certain urbanity. But what is the color of urbanity? Tullius answers in On Famous Orators: "'I do not know,' I said; 'I only know that there is a certain one. You, Brutus, will now understand it when you come into Gaul. You will indeed hear certain words not current at Rome, but these can be changed and unlearned. The greater matter is that something more urbane rings and resounds in the voices of our orators. Nor does this appear in orators alone, but also in others. I remember Titus Tinca of Placentia, a most witty man, contending in sharp speech with our friend Quintus Granius, the herald.' 'Is he,' says Brutus, 'the one concerning whom Lucilius says many things?' 'The very same. But Granius overwhelmed Tinca, though he said no fewer things wittily, by some indescribable native flavor. Thus I no longer marvel that what is related happened to Theophrastus. When he asked a certain little old woman for how much she was selling something, and she answered and added, "Stranger, it cannot be sold for less," he took it ill that he could not escape the appearance of a foreigner, although he had passed his life at Athens and spoke excellently. In all our urbane speakers, as I think, there is a certain sound, just as there was among the Attic speakers.'"

§ 16. Therefore those who despise these things as though accidental deprive their pupils of a great and almost the whole fruit of their labors: either because the matter is one of great labor, or because the teachers themselves do not know the laws of delivery, or because instruction in this part is disagreeable to the pupils; for to correct the voice and gesture very often contains a silent reproach of rusticity.

§ 17. I wish the things which I have said concerning Latin to be understood concerning Greek also, although I observe that pupils generally make less progress in it, because that language is less loved and does not seem to many to possess the same utility. Nevertheless, I shall not omit the things which have been established among us concerning it.

"In the second hour before noon," it says in the distribution of time, "after the last lecture upon a Greek author has been repeated, a new one is to be explained and exacted. The remaining time is to be reserved now for correcting Greek compositions, now for Greek syntax and metrical art, and now for a Greek contest."

Rule 13 indicates to us a selection of authors and the most excellent ones: "The Greek lecture, whether upon orators, historians, or poets, is to be only upon ancient and classical authors: Demosthenes, Plato, Thucydides, Homer, Hesiod, Pindar, and others of that kind--provided that they have been expurgated--among whom, with the best right, Saints Nazianzen, Basil, and Chrysostom are to be placed. During the first semester, orators or historians are to be interpreted; yet once each week some epigrams or brief poems may be interposed. In the latter semester, conversely, a poet is to be explained, with an orator or historian interposed once. Although the method of interpretation ought not entirely to reject matters of erudition and art, it will nevertheless look rather to the propriety and use of the language. Therefore some expressions are to be dictated in each lecture."

Rule 14 provides thus concerning Greek precepts: "At the beginning of the year, Greek syntax and the measure of syllables are to be explained on alternate days, if there is need; syntax indeed briefly, by recalling certain principal heads."

The last part concerns erudition, about which Rule 15 is written thus: "For the sake of erudition, on a vacation day, in place of a historian and poet, it is permitted sometimes to bring forward other more recondite matters: such as hieroglyphics; emblems; questions pertaining to the poetic art--concerning the epigram, epitaph, ode, elegy, epic, and tragedy; concerning the Roman senate and the Athenian senate; concerning the military practice of each nation; concerning gardening, clothing, the dining room, the triumph, the Sibyls, and other things of the same kind--yet in moderation."

What we call erudition therefore extends very widely and embraces every knowledge of histories and antiquity. This is the knowledge of history and of those things which are attached to it, such as laws, institutions, and customs.

CHAPTER XXII

That a Prince Can Have Professors Who Accomplish All These Things

§ 1. To one considering the matter more carefully, it will certainly seem arduous to find a man who either wishes or is able to accomplish so many and such varied things. Nor do I deny that the labors in this matter are very great. I recall with grief that certain most able men among my colleagues lost their lives in that course, when, through ardor for study, they flew past the limit.

But I shall set forth without any concealment the method which our Society employs in this matter. For princes and states which do not employ the work of our Society will also be able to train other professors according to this norm; and these things cannot be useless to the other religious orders which educate youth. For it will be conceded that certain distinguished seminaries of the best teachers may be established with great utility.

§ 2. The first requirement, therefore, is that none but suitable men be admitted into that company of future professors. The Society determines in general as follows concerning those to be admitted into the number of its members, in Part 1, chapter 2, of the Constitutions: "Speaking universally of those who are to be admitted, the more gifts of God, natural and infused, with which they are endowed for advancing the divine service according to the institute of the Society, and the more certain the trials by which they have been examined, the more suitable they will be to be admitted into it.

"As regards externals, they ought to be endowed with an honorable appearance, health, age, and strength for enduring the bodily labors which offer themselves in the Society; and they should seem to possess, or certainly to be likely at some time to possess, some talent for assisting it.

"Although it would not be useless to the men themselves to be admitted, nevertheless, considering the end and manner of proceeding of our institute, we persuade ourselves in the Lord that it is not expedient for His greater service and praise to admit men of very intractable ability or men useless to the congregation.

"Those who would be admitted for this purpose, that they assist the Society in spiritual matters, ought--considering what a ministry of this kind requires in order that the souls of their neighbors may be assisted--to be adorned with the following gifts of God.

"As regards the intellect: with learning, or an aptitude for acquiring it; and with discretion in conducting affairs, or certainly a disposition of good judgment for acquiring it.

"As regards memory: with an aptitude for apprehending and faithfully retaining precepts.

"As regards the will: that they be devoted to universal virtue and spiritual perfection; calm, constant, and strenuous in the things which they undertake for the divine service; that they possess zeal for the salvation of souls and, for that reason, be well disposed toward our institute, which directly tends toward assisting those souls and disposing them to attain their ultimate end from the hand of God, our Creator and Lord.

"In externals, a grace of speech is desirable, as being most necessary for dealing with one's neighbors.

"An honorable appearance, which is accustomed to be edifying to those with whom one deals.

"Good health and strength by which they can endure the labors of our institute.

"An age suitable for those things which have been said: for admission to probation it ought to exceed the fourteenth year; for profession, however, the twenty-fifth.

"External gifts of nobility, riches, good reputation, and similar things, just as they are not sufficient if the others are absent, so, when the others are present, these will not be necessary. Nevertheless, insofar as they contribute to edification, they render more suitable for admission those who would otherwise be suitable without them on account of the other aforesaid endowments. The more one who desires to be admitted excels in these, the more apt he will be for this Society, to the glory of the Lord our God; but the less he excels, the less suitable he will be. Yet the holy unction of divine wisdom will teach those who have undertaken this care for His obedience and more abundant praise what measure ought to be observed in all these matters."

If a state assigns young men of this kind to a seminary, there is no doubt that it will shortly possess a great supply of learned men.

§ 3. The Society admits them either when they have completed these studies of rhetoric or when they have finished the course of logic, physics, metaphysics, ethics, and mathematics. Hearers of rhetoric are admitted with greater difficulty; for although many possess mature and prudent judgment, we nevertheless prefer both that their judgment should grow while they hear philosophy for three years and that constancy should be strengthened by duration.

§ 4. For two entire years they are instructed in piety in the house of probation, and every day all the labors to be undergone throughout their whole lives are impressed upon them. The rules of the master of novices explain this matter excellently, and I have shown it in the little book On the Secrets of the Society of Jesus. Every six months they examine the apostolic letters and the rules with renewed attention, and test their strength and spirit. Those who, when the two years have been completed, have been approved by us, if they themselves also wish it, offer to God vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. They must be prepared for any ministries and offices whatever; to labor, teach, preach, depart for either India, and go to death for the conversion of nations. And we are perpetually admonished not to seek any human recompense from our labors, but to offer the whole to God.

Although this does not pertain to studies, it is nevertheless the foundation of studies. For one who has some proposed aim for his labor other than the glory of God and the welfare of youth and of the state which depends upon it will never persevere amid so great labor. But those who have voluntarily chosen insults, mockeries, chains, prisons, shipwrecks, the ἀνθρωποφαγίας (cannibalism) of barbarians, and prolonged troubles throughout their whole lives are not wearied by the lesser labors of schools, although no remuneration answers to them in this life.

§ 5. If, therefore, some state trains professors in this manner and takes care that they do not aspire to repose and hunt after honors through the momentary labors of three or four years, it will protect and educate youth excellently. For men never treat studies seriously when they salute them as though from the road, tend elsewhere, and--as they are accustomed to say--judge themselves born for greater things.

§ 6. Although the two years of novitiate are spent in the exercise of virtue and Christian philosophy, they nevertheless produce no moderate progress in letters; for through companionship with learned men, the reading of sacred books, meditation, and preaching, it is necessary that they become more learned.

§ 7. When probation has been completed and the vows pronounced, if they have heard philosophy before, another two years are granted for the repetition of humane letters and philosophy. Everyone understands how important this is.

For young men who have already made good progress apply themselves to studies alone, without any other labor and without any care. During this time they recall the precepts of learning, orators, histories, and every memorial of antiquity; they look ahead to the lectures which they will one day explain; they note what will be useful; they conceive and write the subject matter to be dictated for speeches and poems. And just as Cicero did not come into the forum in order to learn, but brought there what he had already learned, so too our professors do not rush unprepared into their labors, but come after meditation.

§ 8. If they have not yet been imbued with the philosophical sciences, for three entire years they are educated most studiously in them, not only by the exercises of the academy but also by domestic instruction. Nevertheless, meanwhile there are daily exercises of some kind in eloquence, and toward the end of philosophy they devote themselves wholly for several months to the study of humane letters.

§ 9. These arrangements, therefore, contribute greatly to training teachers, and it would be worthwhile for all states to establish for themselves that law which was laid down for our provincial superiors and is the fourth in the order of those concerning studies: “Well in advance let him provide which professors he can have for each faculty, observing those who seem more apt for that matter--who are learned, diligent, assiduous, and devoted to the progress of the students both in lectures and in other literary exercises.”

For learned men are not born but made. But that they may become such, no expense is to be spared; they are to be invited by every method and advantage. The same matter is commended to the others; the ninth rule of the rector expressly provides concerning professors of humane letters: “Lest the teachers of the lower classes approach teaching while inexperienced in teaching, the rector of the college from which teachers of humane letters and grammar are customarily drawn shall select some one man most skilled in teaching. Near the end of their studies, those who are soon to be teachers shall assemble before him three times each week for an hour, to be instructed for their new teaching office; and this by turns through lecturing, dictating, writing, correcting, and performing the other duties of a good teacher.”

§ 10. But after they now proceed into the academies and seem instructed in everything, they are not immediately sent to teach those things which they are able to teach, but begin from the lower subjects. Those who were able to be engaged in poetry and oratorical ability with praise and distinction teach grammar. This has a twofold utility. The first is that those who were capable of greater things explain easier matters without great labor and anxiety. For those who can carry the palisade and provisions are no more wearied by carrying their arms than by carrying their limbs. For one who already knows the most difficult passages of Tullius, Virgil, Horace, and others, the exposition of easier passages is familiar conversation, not a profession.

The second is that in spare hours and private study they can treat greater things and thus proceed most fully prepared to the higher sciences. Finally, all these things overflow to the advantage of the pupils; for it cannot happen that a learned and widely read teacher, even while doing something else, should not scatter many learned things which, although they do not adhere in all, nevertheless adhere in more capable minds.

§ 11. When this course of humane letters has been traversed, they are sent to hear theology for four years; during this time they both repeat philosophy and equip themselves to teach it. Indeed, many who are already nobly educated in philosophical and theological studies return to those studies so that they may teach eloquence with greater judgment.

§ 12. Obedience first renders all those things light. Through it they cheerfully receive everything as though commanded by God; and they attend not to what they do, but to the diligence, charity, and humility with which they discharge their office. For they know that the highest reward is placed even in a humble station, and each chooses to be abject in the house of God.

§ 13. “Poems,” says that man, “seek the retirement and leisure of the writer.” The professors of the Society possess very much leisure--but busy leisure, literary leisure. This arises first from the freedom of a mind which has most fully claimed itself into its own power by submitting itself entirely to the will of another. Thus they neither complain about their present condition nor think anxiously about the future, while the rest of men, generally suspended upon what is to come, allow the present to slip past. No care for food, clothing, or provisions to be accumulated for old age torments them. There is no burdensome trouble concerning wives, children, or grandchildren; no banquets and drunken bouts which steal time by delighting and, after pleasure, assail them with diseases and pains. Dinner is finished in half an hour, and the little supper even more quickly; yet not even that refreshment is without the choicest reading. I have said more concerning these matters in the little book On the Secrets of Our Society.

The familiarity and conversations of many learned men, which are often more useful than study itself, also help very greatly. Finally, there is the abundance of books which each college is accustomed to procure according to its resources. After God, we are accustomed to call this also our treasure. If a prince were to establish some college in this manner from an order of religious or of canons, he would certainly provide most excellently for the provinces and would possess constant teachers of wisdom.

CHAPTER XXIII

Philosophy Is Useful to the State, and How It Is to Be Taught

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. The judgments of many concerning philosophers and philosophy are, and formerly were, bitter. For I said above that they were driven from the state, and the books of others were burned. The books of Numa, king of the Romans, written in the Greek language, were burned in the sight of the Quirites by authority of the Senate. Lactantius, Book 1, chapter 22. By the same judgment the memorials of Labienus were burned, Seneca, Controversies, Book 10; and Tacitus, Book 4 of the Annals and the Life of Agricola, laments that the memorials of the most illustrious abilities were burned. Alcius and Philiscus were driven from Rome when Lucius Postumius was consul. Antiochus also drove philosophers from his kingdom, threatening hanging to their followers and grave penalties to their parents. In the year 593 of the city, by a decree of the Senate, they were ordered to depart from the city. In the year 615, the Chaldaeans were ordered to depart from the city and Italy within ten days. Cato judged that Carneades and Diogenes, the philosophical ambassadors of the Athenians, should either not be admitted into the city or be dismissed at once. Plutarch, Cato. Indeed, he judged that the Greeks should universally be expelled. “Whenever that nation shall give us its letters,” he says, “it will corrupt everything.” Concerning Lysimachus, Sophocles, Agrippa, Tiberius, Nero, Domitian, Vespasian, and the Messenians, our Laelius writes at length in Book 3, chapter 7.

§ 2. Next, philosophers are accused of innumerable vices: with great haughtiness they despise everyone and admire themselves. Third, they are seen not only to be vicious--

--but nothing is more vicious than a vicious philosopher, since they are not sophi but asoti, as Salvian says in Book 1, chapter 4, On the True Judgment and Providence of God. “Nothing,” he says, “is more shameful than a philosopher pursuing obscene vices, because, in addition to that deformity which the vices possess in themselves, the name of wisdom is still more disgraced.” But philosophers were most vicious--not only those concerning whom Plautus writes in Curculio, Act 2, Scene 3:

> Then those cloaked Greeks, who walk with covered head,
> Who walk stuffed with books and with little baskets,
>
> Stand still and confer discourses among themselves like runaway slaves;
>
> They obstruct and stand in the way with their opinions;
>
> You may always see them drinking in the wine shop.
>
> There, what they have stolen, with covered head they drink hot,
> And go about gloomy and drunken;

but their leaders also. For apart from the fact that most of them learned the magical arts--as Pliny teaches concerning Pythagoras, Empedocles, Democritus, and Plato in Book 30, chapter 4--they went to the Egyptians and Chaldaeans, among whom there was little of purer philosophy and much of superstition. Concerning Pythagoras, Laertius certainly writes that he was seditious, furnished an occasion for sedition, and was desirous of tyranny. Indeed, how far from the precepts of philosophy is that which the same Laertius and Hermippus relate! For when he had come into Italy, in order to subdue the uncultivated peoples by imposture, he made an underground house. He instructed his mother to record upon tablets, with the time noted, whatever happened meanwhile among those above. And when, after a year, almost killed by filth and emaciation, he emerged and secretly read the tablets, he recounted everything to those who marveled, but lied that he had been among those below, so that by this method he might hunt after a reputation for divinity.

How destructive was Empedocles, who, through love of a famous death, cast himself headlong into burning Etna? Socrates also, if we believe Aristophanes, taught those tricks by which men are injured under an appearance of law--namely, to make τὸν ἥττω, τὸν κρείττω λόγον, to make a bad cause good by speaking. Porphyry, writing about him from Aristoxenus, says that he was lustful, accustomed to become most violently angry, burdensome to his parent, and most shameful in every vice. Plato, the pupil, was not much better than his master: a slave of foul lust, liable to anger, possessed of scurrilous sharp speech, initiated into the rites of Egyptian monsters, a reviler, abusive, vain, eager for glory--Athenaeus, Book 1, chapter 22--and finally a teacher of tyrants.

Aristotle possessed no smaller vices, if we believe Laertius. Through helplessness in his love of Hermias's concubine, he sacrificed to her as though to Eleusinian Ceres. Shame certainly forbids us to speak concerning Diogenes the Cynic and that entire cohort of dogs and herd of Epicureans. In how great crimes of teaching and living were the Stoics themselves engaged? They bound God's providence to fate and abolished freedom and every distinction in sin. Seneca the Stoic, who surpassed all philosophers in holiness of speech, is accused in Tacitus, Book 13 of the Annals, and in Dio's Nero, of adulteries with princely women. Hence Lucian also, the mocker of all men and especially of philosophers, compares philosophy to a poison, which, when taken immoderately, kills like hemlock and other poisons; and thus, lest it be harmful, it ought merely to be tasted.

They next allege in summary the doctrines of the philosophers, as absurd and altogether abhorrent from civil government: such as the community of all things, even of wives, which is found in Plato. Next, they were judged inept for civil affairs; Antonius, in Cicero, Book 1 of On the Orator, thinks that Socrates was condemned on account of his inexperience in speaking. Finally, that case is pleaded in Seneca, On the Happy Life, chapter 17:

"Why do you speak more bravely than you live? Why do you submit your words to a superior, regard money as a necessary instrument for yourself, become moved by loss, let tears fall when you hear of the death of your wife or friend, look toward reputation, and become touched by malicious reports? Why is your country estate cultivated beyond what natural use demands? Why do you not dine according to your own prescription? Why is your furniture more splendid? Why is wine older than your own age drunk in your house? Why, moreover, is a house arranged? Why are trees which will give nothing beyond shade planted together? Why does your wife carry in her ears the valuation of a wealthy household? Why is your troop of young attendants girded in costly clothing? Why is ministering an art in your house? Why is the silver not set down casually and as one pleases, but service is rendered skillfully, and there is someone who is master of carving the provisions?

"Add, if you wish: Why do you possess property across the sea? Why do you possess more things than you know? Shamefully, you are either so negligent that you do not know your few slaves, or so luxurious that you possess more than memory suffices to know. I shall presently assist your reproaches and shall cast up against myself more than you suppose. For now I shall answer you this: I am not a wise man, and--to feed your malevolence--I shall not be one. Therefore I require of myself not that I be equal to the best, but that I be better than the bad. It is sufficient for me to remove something from my vices every day and to rebuke my errors. I have not arrived at health, nor indeed shall I arrive. For my gout I compose palliatives rather than remedies, content if it comes more rarely and gnaws less. Compared with your feet, however, I am a feeble runner.

"I do not say these things on my own behalf, for I am in the depth of all vices, but on behalf of that man in whom something has been accomplished. 'You speak in one way,' he says, 'and live in another.' This was cast up against Plato, cast up against Epicurus, cast up against Zeno, by most malicious heads hostile to every excellent man. For all those men said not how they themselves lived, but how one ought to live. I speak concerning virtue, not concerning myself; and when I reproach vices, I reproach my own first of all. When I am able, I shall live as I ought. Nor will that malice of yours, steeped in much poison, deter me from the best things. Not even that venom with which you bespatter others and kill yourselves will prevent me from persevering in praising the life not which I live, but which I know must be lived; from adoring virtue and following it, crawling at an immense distance.

“Am I, to be sure, to expect anything to remain inviolate from malevolence, to which neither Rutilius nor Cato was sacred? Why should anyone not seem too rich to those for whom Demetrius the Cynic is not poor enough? O most vehement man, fighting against every desire of nature! In this he is poorer than the other Cynics: although he forbade himself to possess, he also forbade himself to ask. They say that he is not sufficiently in need. Do you see? He professed not the knowledge of virtue but of poverty.

“They say that Diodorus, an Epicurean philosopher who within the space of a few days placed an end upon his life by his own hand, did not act according to the decree of Epicurus when he cut his throat. Some wish this deed of his to seem madness, others rashness. He meanwhile, happy and full of a good conscience, bore witness to himself as he departed from life, praised the repose of an age passed in harbor and at anchor, and said what you heard unwillingly, as though it must also be done by you:

> I have lived, and completed the course which fortune gave.

“You dispute concerning the life of one man and the death of another; and at the name of great men distinguished by some exceptional praise, you bark like little dogs at the approach of unknown men. For it is expedient for you that no one should seem good, as though another’s virtue were a reproach of your offenses. Unwillingly you compare splendid things with your filth, nor do you understand at how great a cost to yourselves you dare to do it. For if those who follow virtue are avaricious, lustful, and ambitious, what are you, to whom the very name of virtue is hateful?

“You deny that anyone accomplishes what he says or lives according to the model of his speech. What wonder is it, since they speak brave and immense things which escape every human tempest, since they attempt to tear themselves loose from crosses into which each one of you himself drives his own nails? Those driven to punishment nevertheless hang upon single stakes. Those who exact punishment from themselves are torn apart by as many crosses as they have desires; and, abusive men, they are elegant in insulting another. I would believe them, were it not that some spit upon the spectators from their own gallows.

“Do philosophers not accomplish what they say? Nevertheless they accomplish much by saying it and by conceiving honorable things in their minds. For if they also did things equal to their words, what would be happier than they? Meanwhile there is no reason for you to despise good words and breasts filled with good thoughts. The pursuit of salutary studies is praiseworthy even short of the effect. What wonder if they do not ascend when they have assailed steep heights? But look up to men who attempt great things even if they fall. It is a noble thing, looking not to one’s own strength but to the strength of one’s nature, to strive after high things, to attempt them, and to conceive in the mind things greater than can be accomplished even by men endowed with an immense spirit.

“The man who has proposed this to himself: ‘I shall hear of death with the same countenance with which I shall see it. I shall submit to labors, however great they will be, supporting the body by the mind. I shall despise riches equally, whether present or absent: I shall not be sadder if they lie somewhere else, nor more high-spirited if they shine around me. I shall perceive fortune neither as it comes nor as it departs. I shall regard all lands as though mine, and mine as though belonging to all. I shall live as though I know that I was born for others, and I shall give thanks to the nature of things on this account. For in what better manner could it have conducted my affair? It gave me alone to all, and all to me alone.

“‘Whatever I shall possess, I shall neither guard sordidly nor scatter prodigally. I shall believe that I possess nothing more than what has been well given. I shall weigh benefits neither by number nor weight, nor by any valuation except that of the recipient. Nothing which a worthy man receives will ever be much to me. I shall do nothing for opinion, everything for conscience. Whatever I do with myself as witness, I shall believe to be done with the people as witness. The end of eating and drinking will be to extinguish the desires of nature, not to fill and empty the belly. I shall be pleasant to friends, mild and easy to enemies; I shall be persuaded before I am asked, and shall anticipate honorable requests. I shall know that the world is my fatherland, and that the gods stand above and around me, as judges of deeds and words.

"'But whenever nature reclaims my breath or reason dismisses it, I shall depart having borne witness that I loved a good conscience and good studies; that no one's liberty was diminished through me, least of all my own.' The man who shall propose, wish, and attempt to do this will make a road to the gods."

§ 3. The whole dispute comes back to this: ought the vices of philosophers to be prejudicial to philosophy? The answer is easy: they ought not. All things are full of evils; vices prevail publicly, but the vices of philosophers are noticed. The most cruel of tyrants and the most ruined of prodigals speak about Socrates, Plato, and Seneca.

Philosophy must therefore be retained, without which the state will end in barbarism. The Christian princes Theodosius and Valentinian embraced it. "And since we desire a glorious youth to be instructed not only in these arts, we also associate with the aforesaid masters authors of more profound knowledge and learning. We therefore wish one man to be added to the others who may search the secrets of philosophy." For philosophy is a divine gift, the love of wisdom--indeed, divine love. Moses, Solomon, and others most practiced in it joined integrity of life to knowledge. Nor was the mind of the most holy men otherwise: Dionysius, Heraclas, Pantaenus, Clement, Athenagoras, Justin, Basil, Nazianzen, Nyssen, Jerome, Hilary, and Augustine, who were not only philosophers but also advanced toward virtue from the books of philosophers.

Augustine wrote most truly: "No one is ordinarily considered a philosopher other than a lover of God." Theophrastus calls philosophy the guide of life and the expeller of vices; if someone should remove it from life, he would sin more than if he had extinguished the lamp at a banquet. Its advantages are many and frequently hidden. When the father of the Eretrian, threatening blows, imperiously demanded from his son, a pupil of Zeno, what he had learned, he was calmed by a prudent answer: the son declared that he owed this to philosophy, that he could bear his father's anger with an even mind.

§ 4. Next, the decrees of philosophy are excellent; they reproach every vice, even the smallest. Few apprehend virtue without them. "What, then?" says Seneca in Epistle 95. "Have not some without subtle instruction become upright and attained great advancement, while obeying only bare precepts? I confess it. But theirs was a fortunate disposition, and they seized salutary things in passing. For just as the immortal gods learned no virtue, since they were born with every virtue and it is a part of their nature to be good, so certain men, having obtained an excellent disposition, arrive without prolonged teaching at those things which are customarily transmitted, and embraced honorable things as soon as they heard them. Whence are those abilities so rapacious of virtue, or fruitful from themselves? But from those who are either dull and obtuse or beset by bad custom, the rust of minds must long be rubbed away. Moreover, just as one who transmits to them the tenets of philosophy more quickly leads those who are inclined toward the good to the summit, so he will assist the weaker and draw them out of evil opinions. You may see how necessary these tenets are. Certain things reside within us which make us sluggish toward some things and rash toward others. Neither can this boldness be repressed nor that inertia aroused unless their causes--false admiration and false fear--are removed."

Epistle 17, which sufficiently explains its power, should also be read. But now we dispute this question in vain, since the customs and laws of all Christian nations embrace philosophy. I must therefore explain how it is to be taught. For the state ought also to regulate it politically.

§ 5. At the outset, therefore, a state that loves philosophy will impose this law upon its professors, or even exact it by oath: that they teach philosophy in such a way that through it, as through aids, students may come to the more serious sciences--medicine, jurisprudence, politics, and theology. The Society chiefly regards theology, especially in its own members. Thus the first rule of the professor: "Since the arts or natural sciences dispose abilities toward theology, serve toward its perfect knowledge and use, and of themselves assist toward the same end, the teacher shall treat them with the diligence that is proper, sincerely seeking the honor and glory of God in all things, in such a way that he prepares his hearers, and especially ours, for theology, and above all arouses them to knowledge of their Creator."

Thus also the Constitutions, Part 4, chapter 12, §3. Dialectic is necessary to all, physics to physicians, ethics to jurists, and metaphysics to theologians; yet every part of philosophy is both an aid and an ornament to every science.

And this is what Saint Thomas admonished: that philosophy should serve theology as a waiting-maid. Thus it was also customary of old to say that the Christian mysteries begin where the dogmas of the philosophers end, and that Plato's summits are the threshold of Christians. Plato seems to have understood this through a shadow, since--as Augustine also recalls from him--he called a philosopher a lover of God. He said that the philosopher's office is to know divine things excellently and so far as reason permits, but in no way to abandon human affairs; rather, to place labor and zeal in disposing them according to the norm of prudence.

The state will provide for this not only with greater caution but also by command and punishments, because philosophers are an unbelieving nation and weigh everything in the deceitful balance of the understanding, unless you subject the judgment of reason to divine censure. Otherwise empty philosophy knocks at truth but does not enter it. Tertullian speaks excellently against heretics in Prescription, chapter 7: "These are the doctrines of men and demons, born for itching ears from the ingenuity of worldly wisdom, which the Lord, calling foolishness, chose the foolish things of the world even to confound philosophy itself. For worldly wisdom is the material of those very heresies: a rash interpreter of the divine nature and dispensation. Finally, the heresies themselves are suborned by philosophy.

"From it came the Aeons, and certain forms, I know not what, and the trinity of man in Valentinus: he had been a Platonist. From it came Marcion's better god, from tranquility: he had come from the Stoics. That the soul is said to perish is observed from the Epicureans. That the restoration of the flesh is denied is taken from the one school of all the philosophers. Where matter is made equal with God, it is the discipline of Zeno; and where anything is alleged concerning a fiery god, Heraclitus intervenes. The same subjects are rolled about among heretics and philosophers; the same reconsiderations are entangled. Whence is evil, and why? And whence is man, and how? And what Valentinus very recently proposed: whence is God? From an enthymesis, of course, and an ectroma.

"They insert Aristotle, who established dialectic for them: an artificer, changeable in form, of building and destroying; constrained in opinions, hard in conjectures, productive of contentions in arguments, troublesome even to itself, reconsidering everything lest it should have treated anything at all. Hence those fables and interminable genealogies, fruitless questions, and discourses creeping like a cancer. The Apostle, restraining us from these things, expressly testifies that philosophy must be guarded against, writing to the Colossians: 'See that no one circumvent you through philosophy and empty seduction, according to the tradition of men, apart from the providence of the Holy Spirit.' He had been at Athens and from its encounters had learned that human wisdom, the affecter and adulterator of truth, itself also divided into manifold heresies by the variety of mutually opposing sects.

"What, therefore, has Athens to do with Jerusalem? What has the Academy to do with the Church? What have heretics to do with Christians? Our institution is from the porch of Solomon, who himself had transmitted that the Lord is to be sought in simplicity of heart. Let those who have produced a Stoic, Platonic, and dialectical Christianity look to it. We have no need of curiosity after Christ Jesus, nor of inquiry after the Gospel."

§ 6. If Aristotle and others possess anything contrary to the orthodox faith, let them seriously refute it. This has been diligently provided for among our professors in Rules 2, 3, and 4: "In matters of some importance, let him not depart from Aristotle unless something occurs alien to the doctrine which the academies everywhere approve, and much more if it opposes the orthodox faith. If there are arguments of his or of another philosopher against it, let him strive vigorously to refute them, according to the Lateran Council.

"Let him neither read nor bring into the school interpreters of Aristotle who have deserved badly of the Christian religion without great discrimination; and let him take care that the pupils are not disposed toward them.

"For that reason, let him not gather the digressions of Averroes--the judgment is the same concerning others of that kind--into any separate treatise. If anything good is to be brought forward from him, let him bring it forward without praise and, if it can be done, show that he took it from elsewhere."

§ 7. But because contests of sects sometimes arise, it will be altogether fitting in every state that visitors and magistrates inquire what opinion each man teaches. For affection and admiration for those authors truly cast young men headlong into the dangers of empty and false opinions, magical impostures, and atheism. My mind shudders to remember Cardano, Massilio, and others whom an excessive eagerness for knowledge compelled to die doubtful concerning religion. "Depart from the heathen, heretic; give back to them their own opinions, because he too is not instructed from yours." Cyril already showed in Catechesis 18 that offense was once committed in this matter. Why does it help to animate impiety and license concerning the atheism of the ancients? Why, so that you may hunt after the glory of subtle speaking, do you desire to derive a name from condemned names and errors? The memorials of so many holy philosophers are in our hands; do you reckon it a glory to approach the patriarchs of heretics?

Formerly the battle lines of sects were innumerable: the Eretrian, Epicurean, Cyrenaic, Megarian, Theodorean, Pyrrhonian, Stoic, Peripatetic, Old and New Academic, Cynic, Potamonian, and Eleian. It would be more fitting for them to assemble among clocks than among philosophers. Those which quickly raised their head quickly failed. The Old and Minor Academics left no leader; who is there who transmits the precepts of Pyrrho? That hateful crowd of the Pythagorean school found no teacher; the new sect of the Sextians, possessed of Roman strength, was extinguished amid its beginnings, although it had begun with great impetus. Therefore, whoever is entrusted with Christian youth must teach truth according to the opinion of pious philosophers and academies.

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 8. Let him also recognize his office, which consists in life, not in disputation alone. Golden is the admonition of the Roman sage in Epistle 20: "But this, my Lucilius, I ask and exhort you to do: that you send philosophy down into your innermost breast and take proof of your advancement, not by speech or writing, but by firmness of mind and diminution of desires. Prove words by deeds. One purpose belongs to those who declaim and seek the assent of a surrounding crowd; another to those who detain the ears of the young and idle by varied or fluent disputation. Philosophy teaches doing, not speaking; and it exacts this: that each should live according to its law, lest life disagree with speech, and that the one life itself should be of one color throughout, without disagreement among its actions. This is both the greatest office and the greatest indication of wisdom: that deeds agree with words, and that a man should everywhere be equal to and the same as himself. Who will accomplish this? Few, yet some. This is difficult; nor do I say that the wise man will always proceed at one pace, but along one road." Let him therefore live according to the law of philosophy and teach men to live thus.

For if the professor of philosophy corrupts morals, as did the Epicureans and Cynics, the discipline of the state will suffer, and he will give himself over to delights.

§ 9. Let the teacher diligently apply himself to this: that pupils of philosophy, while they inquire into everything, should not only refrain from disputing against divine laws but should also render honor to magistrates and obey political laws. It was formerly objected to the Stoics that magistracy and laws were despised by them; and it certainly was ready to think this concerning men who were accustomed to say that all were insane, that there was no praetor, no consul, and no king. It is charged against Rubellius Plautus in Tacitus, Book 14, that he had assumed the arrogance and sect of the Stoics, which makes men turbulent and eager for affairs.

Seneca answered in Epistle 73: “Those who judge men faithfully devoted to philosophy to be obstinate and refractory, and despisers of magistrates and kings or of those through whom public affairs are administered, seem to me to err. On the contrary, none are more grateful toward them, and not undeservedly; for they accomplish more for none than for those who are permitted to enjoy tranquil leisure. Therefore those for whom public security furnishes an approach to their purpose of living well must honor the author of this good as a parent--much more, indeed, than those restless men placed in the midst of affairs, who owe much to princes but also charge much against them, whose desires, which grow while they are fulfilled, no generosity can ever encounter so fully as to sate them.”

And in Book 2, chapter 5, of On Clemency: “I know that the Stoic sect has a bad reputation among the unskilled, as though it were excessively hard and would give counsel by no means good for princes and kings. For it is objected against it that it says that the wise man does not pity and does not forgive. These things, if set down by themselves, are hateful. For they seem to leave no hope for human errors, but to bring every offense to punishment.”

He excuses them, but I fear whether forcefully and truly; for Augustine accuses them of hardness. There are everywhere many examples of the obstinacy which they called fortitude. Therefore the professor of morals especially will inculcate this part and the foundations which nature itself laid down. The rule itself requires this of the professors of the Society: “Let him understand that it is in no way part of his institute to digress into theological questions, but, proceeding through the text, to explain briefly, learnedly, and gravely the principal heads of moral science which are contained in the ten books of Aristotle’s Ethics.”

The principal doctrine, however, is that in the state they should observe the lawful order of obeying, and finally recognize the virtues themselves.

§ 10. Flee contentions. For philosophy contains an investigation of truth, to which nothing is equally opposed as the cheap little glory of conquering and triumphing--yet it is a keen tyranny in the minds of sophists. With peace and charity preserved, citizens contend before the judge’s tribunal concerning estates and inheritances; philosophers declaim with fury concerning little words, beings of reason, and relations. Our professors are admonished in Rule 5 to teach not only their own doctrines but also to refute those of others with modesty: “In those questions in which it is free to follow either side, let one side be so defended that provision is made modestly and benevolently for the reputation of the other side also--and much more for that of the preceding professor, if he had taught the contrary. Indeed, if authors can be reconciled, it is desirable that this should not be neglected. Finally, in naming or refuting authors, let him conduct himself modestly.”

Let it therefore be your concern to possess philosophy, not to make a display of it. If you are more perspicacious than your colleagues in little questions, rejoice that your own ignorance has been taken from you; do not reproach others with theirs. If you wish to philosophize without envy, philosophize without parade. Hateful is the man who speaks in such a way that he seems to condemn whatever he himself does not teach.

§ 11. Novelty of opinions must also be avoided. For what is accustomed to happen in calamities--that novelty strikes us and adds weight to grief--is also accustomed to happen in this fickleness of opinions: they come with great impetus and applause, and then are rejected with rapid disgust. Men are long tormented by the difficulty and obscurity of common opinions, which even great abilities cannot overcome except by great labor; when they hear new things, they ponder within themselves not what they possess but what they desire. Therefore a desire for innovation is the summit of evil for the unskilled. Whatever novelty alone has made precious is rendered cheap when it is present, and an author is not esteemed when he has ceased to be new.

That novelty is seriously forbidden to us even in matters otherwise indifferent, in Common Rule 6: “Even in matters in which no danger to faith or piety is present, let no one introduce new questions in matters of some importance, nor any opinion for which there is no suitable author, without consulting those who preside; nor let him teach anything against the axioms of the Doctors and the common sense of the schools. Rather, let all follow the most approved Doctors and those opinions which, as the use of the times has borne, have been especially received in the Catholic academies."

Indeed, I judge this matter to be so important that I think no one should be admitted to the profession of philosophy unless he is prepared to travel by the old and well-worn--that is, royal--road. For if he expounds to youth that philosophy which Aristotle, Pantaenus, Augustine, Saint Thomas, and innumerable others professed with great agreement and in which they became illustrious, the state already knows what young men are being taught. If he brings new things, although they might perhaps be good, they are nevertheless doubtful and dangerous; but the state desires its youth to be placed in safety. No novelty completes its work in a moment, nor is it on solid ground except through a space of time; new things must therefore be imperfect.

The Dutch have long attempted new routes across the Ocean through the Arctic regions; great hope and great rewards are proposed to those who hazard them. But no prudent man commits himself to an uncertain voyage when wind and wave furnish enough dangers upon the course of the known sea. Therefore this caution is fitting for the state: let them not entrust youth to new and unknown opinions unless it has first become established that some have attained erudition by that doctrine and method which is vaunted. When that has happened, novelty will already have ceased; for great things come forth slowly. And the man who admits the hazards of a new philosophy into himself acts no less imprudently than one who perceives that an experiment with an uncertain medicine is being made upon his own health.

§ 12. Not only new but also old and useless opinions, which bring philosophy into disrepute, must be avoided. Thus Common Rule 8: "Let him not adduce useless, obsolete, absurd, or manifestly false opinions." Nevertheless, there is nothing so absurd that some philosopher has not thought and said it; and if their absurdities are frequently recalled to memory, they will at some time find a follower. Philosophers possess much that is superfluous and will never come into use; let them not only cut those things away but omit mention of them altogether, lest abilities be made to struggle with unnecessary matters. I spoke above concerning excessive subtlety, which is hostile to truth. Now I admonish only this: that it pertains to public ordering to keep watch lest time and life be passed in empty little disputes.

and rational. The first orders the mind; the second searches the nature of things; the third, which is a part of eloquence, examines the properties and structure of words and arguments, lest false things creep in for true.

Let the industry of a good teacher be enclosed within these limits. Let him not draw in other matters--a thing which many will nevertheless neglect unless the care of their superiors restrains absurdities. Formerly it was done thus: philosophers descended even to distinctions of syllables and the properties of conjunctions and propositions, and envied grammarians and envied geometers. Whatever was superfluous in their arts, philosophers transferred into their own. Thus it was brought about that they knew more diligently how to speak than how to live. Indeed, even now many do not know how to speak, for while they entangle the mind in useless intricacies, they have not learned even to unfold and explain words.

§ 13. Let him cite illustrious philosophers, imitate them, and commend them to his pupils. Thus Common Rule 8: "In bringing forward the authorities of the Doctors, let him not be excessive. Yet if he possesses testimonies from more distinguished authors for confirming his opinion, let him recite the very words--as far as can be done, though few of them--and faithfully; much more those of the Sacred Scriptures, Councils, and holy Fathers." Moreover, it belongs to the dignity of a master to bring forward almost no author whom he himself has not read.

Yet let him not report everything; let the hearers be referred to reading the authors themselves, as is stated in Rule 10: "If things contained in readily available authors must be adduced, let him explain rather than dictate them. Indeed, let him refer the hearers to those authors who have treated some subject copiously and accurately."

§ 14. Let him exercise the young men in disputation: nothing is more destructive than Pythagorean silence. For five years, like mute fish, they heard no great wisdom. I wish the future philosopher to hear, reflect, and inquire assiduously and diligently. But because many things fall from memory, many doubts occur, and many reasonings arise in the opposite direction, it is necessary that hearers be exercised every day and have someone to whom they may propose doubts and whom they may consult. In one word a master explains what had to be sought by prolonged labor. Proud is the man who considers it more honorable to err than to have the road shown to him.

Our laws provide concerning this matter as follows. Rule 11: "After the lecture, let him remain in the school or near it for at least a quarter of an hour, so that the hearers may approach him to ask questions. And let him sometimes exact an account of the lectures and take care that they be repeated."

The varied exercises in disputations in Rule 12 and the following rules also pertain here. "At home also, every day except Saturdays, vacations, and feast days, one hour is to be appointed in which our men repeat and dispute, so that by this means both their abilities may be exercised more and the difficult things which occur may be made more clear. Therefore, let one or two be forewarned to repeat from memory for no more than a quarter of an hour. Afterward let one or two likewise argue, with as many answering. If any time remains, let doubts be proposed. But so that it may remain, let the master strictly maintain the form of argumentation and cut off the argument when nothing new is brought forward.

"Toward the end of the year, the repetitions of past lectures are to be so arranged that, unless something prevents it, an entire month may be left free even from them, not only from lectures.

"On Saturday, or on another day which the custom of the academy requires, let them hold disputations in the schools for two hours--even longer where there is a great concourse of outsiders. But if two feast days, or one feast together with the weekly vacation, fall in any week, let there be no disputation, but a lecture on Saturday. Yet if this should continue for three weeks, let one disputation be interposed.

"Where the received custom of the academy does not prevent it, on some appointed day each month--except the final three summer months--or every other month if the hearers are few, let common disputations be held both before and after noon. As many hearers as there are masters shall defend, each one the questions of one master.

"As far as can be done, let other Doctors and professors of ours also attend the disputations, even those of different faculties. So that the contest may grow warmer, let them press the force of the arguments which are being discussed--provided that they do not undertake to pursue an argument upon which an arguer is still dwelling usefully and vigorously. Let it be permitted even to outside Doctors to accomplish this same thing; indeed, they can be invited expressly to argue, unless that custom is less approved somewhere.

"Among the hearers, let only the more learned dispute publicly; let the others be exercised privately until they are so instructed that they are not judged unworthy of that place.

"Let him judge the day of disputation no less laborious and fruitful than the day of lecture, and that all the utility and fervor of the disputation depend upon him. Let him so preside over it that he himself appears to be the one who contends in each contestant. Let him praise anything good that is brought forward and command everyone to attend. When some more serious difficulty has been proposed, let him continually suggest something brief by which he may either support the respondent or direct the arguer. Let him neither remain silent for long nor speak always, so that the pupils themselves may also bring forth what they know; but let him correct or polish what has been brought forth. Let him command the disputant to proceed while the difficulty retains force; indeed, let him himself increase the difficulty, and let him not conceal it if the one who argues has crept forward to another argument. Let him not permit either an argument nearly solved to be pressed longer or an answer which does not cohere well to be sustained for long; but after some contest, let him briefly define and explain the whole matter. Finally, if anything else is anywhere in use by which disputations are customarily rendered more frequent and more fervent, it is to be retained diligently."

Let him sometimes deal with the assistant, or beadle, appointed by the rector, and question him concerning the condition of the whole class and the diligence and progress even of the outside hearers. Let him take care that the same man performs his office faithfully and accurately.

§ 15. Let the professor be such as Rule 20 describes: "Finally, in all things, with divine grace inspiring him, let him be diligent and assiduous, and devoted to the progress of the students both in lectures and in other literary exercises. Let him not show himself more familiar with one than with another. Let him despise no one. Let him provide equally for the studies of the poor and the rich, and procure particularly the progress of each one of his students."

But in order that he may be such, let a learned man be chosen who fears God and loves the state. And although he is such, let the eyes of the nobles nevertheless be fixed upon him, lest at some time he be changed by weariness.

CHAPTER XXIV

On the Study of Logic, Physics, Metaphysics, and Mathematics

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 1. It is not my intention to commend these faculties to states; those who became illustrious in each have accomplished that. Rather, it is to give counsel to the state which it may employ in admitting and teaching them. For concerning the necessity and use of dialectic--

--since it is the principal instrument of reason, it is necessary to say nothing; nor is anything in it censured except sophistically. Those who removed it from philosophy judged that its necessity was almost greater than that of philosophy. Laertius, in the Life of Epicurus, says that philosophy was divided by him into canonical, physical, and ethical philosophy. The canonical is that which furnishes the means, approaches, and entrances to the work; and it was transmitted by him in one book which is called by him the Canon. The Stoics divided the canon into logic and rhetoric. Thus, although the Epicureans wished to separate dialectic, they nevertheless admitted it by another manner and way. "The Epicureans," says Seneca in Epistle 89, "thought there were two parts of philosophy, the natural and the moral; they removed the rational. Then, when they were compelled by the matters themselves to distinguish ambiguous things and to convict false things lying hidden beneath the appearance of truth, they themselves also introduced under another name the rational part, a place which they call 'Concerning Judgment and Rule.'"

But I have resolved to write the laws which the state should impose upon one who will teach dialectic; for I do not doubt that very much error is committed everywhere in teaching it.

§ 2. The first law for teaching dialectic: in Europe, let it admit no one to learn dialectic unless he is moderately practiced in eloquence. This rule is so necessary, at least in those provinces which are devoted to more cultivated letters, that it cannot be neglected without the greatest disgrace. For since one must discourse in Latin, if pupils have not previously apprehended the precepts and exercises of eloquence, they must necessarily be rendered altogether speechless. Dialectic disputes concisely and obscurely and employs words of its own alien to common use. Thus it comes about that they neither retain their former ability nor understand the acuteness of the dialecticians, and, through fear of committing a solecism, do not dare to utter the things which they understand.

§ 3. The second law is that the precepts of dialectic should be received from Aristotle alone, and indeed also the most recondite knowledge of physical things. Such is the custom of our Society, and almost eight hundred years now agree. But because many have gravely attacked us for this reason, and Francis Patricius of Venice attempted to overthrow Aristotle's philosophy, I shall defend us not only by the judgment of all the Peripatetics but also by the opinion of others. Justus Lipsius, a most learned man who always referred the use of learning to public utility, discusses this matter thus in Book 1, chapter 4, of his Guide:

"But matters have now come to such a point that, the others yielding, two schools contend almost alone for sovereignty: those of the Peripatetics and the Stoics. For common agreement has slain the Epicureans; the Academics, by professing that they themselves know nothing, ceased to have pupils. Concerning the Peripatetics, if you hear the judgments of the present day, you have a settled matter: they alone reign in the schools, having been admitted among Greeks and Latins for more than eight hundred years. Who shall drive them out? Perhaps I neither wish nor ought to do so. Yet I do not know whether wisdom with me desires to make this kingdom divided and to give it colleagues.

"Who would deny that Aristotle, that king of the Peripatetics, was great among men? Great men themselves assign him a place thus. Cicero among the first: 'A man not only abundant in speaking but also singular in philosophy.'

Elsewhere: ‘Of the highest ability, knowledge, and abundance.’ And again: ‘Than whom nothing is more polished, nothing more acute.’ He is called by the same man ‘a golden river of eloquence,’ and by Plutarch ‘a most eloquent man and skilled in bending minds wherever he wished.’ Finally Cicero with full hand: ‘Who of all was more learned, who more acute, who keener than Aristotle either in discovering or judging matters?’ Nor do others turn away from these praises. Pliny indeed calls him ‘a man supreme in every branch of learning’; elsewhere, ‘of immense subtlety.’ What of Arnobius? ‘A man powerful in ability and preeminent in learning.’

“But Averroes, as though raving, rushes into his praises. ‘Aristotle,’ he says, ‘invented three sciences: logic, natural science, and divine science; and no error has been found up to this time, which is one thousand five hundred years. That one man should be such is miraculous rather than human.’ The same elsewhere: ‘Aristotle is the rule and model which nature discovered to demonstrate the ultimate human perfection.’ Finally, with similar praise: ‘Aristotle’s doctrine is the highest truth, since his intellect was the limit of the human intellect. Therefore it is well said that he was created and given to us by divine providence so that we might know whatever can be known.’

“These are great and admirable things, I confess, and nearly make the man equal to the heavenly beings. What, then, do others say? Other things. Tertullian censures his minuteness of speech, and Irenaeus with the same expression censures his ‘minuteness of speech and subtleties concerning questions’; Jerome, his artifices. What do they mean? That he was excessively and slenderly subtle, and often an inquirer with obscurity. Therefore Sidonius: ‘Plato explains; Aristotle entangles.’ But Gregory Nazianzen casts up both this and graver things:

> Βάλλε μοι, φημί, Ἀριστοτέλους τὴν μικρολόγον πρόνοιαν, ἢ τὸ ἔντεχνον, ἢ τοὺς θνητοὺς περὶ ψυχῆς λόγους, ἢ τὸ ἀνθρωπικὸν τῶν δογμάτων.

“‘Cast away from me Aristotle’s minuteness of speech, his sagacity and artifice; cast away those mortal discourses concerning the soul and, universally, those human dogmas.’ He condemns one who does not rise and remains fixed upon humble and earthly things.

“Atticus says this also in Eusebius:

> Ἀριστοτέλους λεπτὴ ἦν καὶ ταπεινὴ δριμύτης, ἥτις διαδῦναι μὲν τῶν ἐπὶ γῆς πραγμάτων ἢ τὴν ἐν τούτοις ἀλήθειαν ἰδεῖν ἐδύνατο, τῆς δ᾽ ὄντως ἀληθείας ἐποπτεῦσαι τὸ πανδήλιον οὐχ οἷά τε ἦν αὐτῷ.

“‘Aristotle’s subtlety was slender and humble; it could indeed penetrate earthly matters and perceive what was true in them, but he was not able to behold the clear and serene light of that solid truth.’ Lactantius likewise says: ‘Aristotle disagrees with himself concerning God, and says and thinks contradictory things.’ Again: ‘Aristotle neither worshiped nor cared for God.’ Philo the Jew:

> Ἀριστοτέλης μήποτ᾽ εὐσεβῶς, ἢ ὁσίως ἐπιστάμενος.

“‘Aristotle was never learned piously or holily.’ Therefore you see, my hearer, that he is raised up and you see that he is cast down, suspended as though upon this swing of judgments.

“Indeed, learn this also: that Plato was preferred to him by the almost unanimous agreement of the ancients. Cicero himself, his herald by profession--indeed, as though hired for it--takes away the palm and transfers it to Plato’s right hand: ‘Aristotle, excepting Plato, is the prince of philosophers.’ Does he not openly make him second? Again: ‘Aristotle, far surpassing all men--always excepting Plato--in ability and diligence.’ And very many of our own nobles also cast their vote to this side. Arnobius: ‘That divine Plato, thinking many things worthy of God and not common to the multitude.’ Again: ‘That great Plato, wisely pious and holy.’ Tertullian agrees and acknowledges that in Egypt Plato chiefly drew these dogmas from that Trismegistus and his writings. But others send him to the Prophets and sacred books, and Numenius says openly:

> Τί γάρ ἐστι Πλάτων ἢ Μωυσῆς ἀττικίζων;

"'What is Plato but Moses speaking Attic?' Augustine, however, that summit of our writers, far and widely prefers Plato to the other philosophers of the nations. Indeed, he almost places him in heaven, insofar as he piously can. 'Labeo,' he says, 'thought that this Plato should be numbered among the demigods; he places the demigods above the heroes and locates both among the divine powers. Nevertheless, I do not doubt that the man whom he calls a demigod should be preferred not only to the heroes but even to the gods themselves.' Elsewhere, in the same sense, he says that a temple should more justly be erected to him than to those gods of the nations. And he himself sets forth the reason why: 'The philosophers of the Platonic family can most easily of all, with few things changed, become Christians.'

"And certainly it is much in a philosopher--indeed, it is the principal thing--to rise to God and divine things, upon which all other wisdom is joined and depends. Therefore you see that in these matters Aristotle is far surpassed and left behind by Plato--and also by the Stoics; no prudent man would deny it.

"What, nevertheless, is the case? He transmitted dialectic firmly and systematically; likewise physics, concerning which there is this testimony of Tullius: 'Nature was so investigated by the Peripatetics that no part in heaven, sea, or earth was passed over.' And Laertius:

Ἐν τοῖς φυσικοῖς αἰτιολογικώτατος πάντων ἐγένετο, ὥστε καὶ περὶ τῶν ἐλαχίστων ἀποδιδόναι τὰς αἰτίας.

"'In natural matters he rendered reasons more than all men, even down to the smallest matters.' I therefore confess that, so far as these two parts are concerned, he was usefully received into the schools; for whom rather should they receive? The other ancients who transmitted these things perished through age. Youth also needs a fixed Doctor and dogmas to which it may become accustomed. 'Just as leaves,' says Seneca, 'cannot flourish by themselves but require a branch to which they may adhere and from which they draw sap, so precepts, if they stand alone, wither; they desire to be implanted in a sect.'

"Youth, I say, needs this. But as regards mature men, what envy or sloth is it not to send them farther? In theology, in ethics, and in physics itself, how many excellent and rare things did the Pythagoreans or Stoics say, and certain other men also! Shall I not approach and appropriate these things and regard them as an inheritance left by my ancestors? I shall act boldly and, as though I sat in the Senate, shall not only hear but examine, and, when asked, shall myself give my opinion. For always to follow that opinion of one man--as our Annaeus acutely says--is not the part of a senate but of a faction. I indeed rise and venerate the discoveries and discoverers of wisdom, but as a man venerates men, and men who are not our lords but our leaders. Who was ever so fortunately--indeed, so divinely--wise that he poured forth everything from a truth-speaking mouth? There was no such man, and there will not be. It belongs to that eternal benignity to scatter the gifts of abilities through ages and among men, and not to have conferred all things together and at once upon that one age or this one man. The best of poets says:

Ἀλλ᾽ οὔπως ἅμα πάντα θεοὶ δόσαν ἀνθρώποισιν.

"'But the gods do not give all their gifts together and at once.'

"The testimony of great men had to be employed, so that our cause, approved by such great authorities, might be protected by the dignity of its patrons. Concerning logic and physics no one will deny it, unless someone should show a better author, a more accurate one, and one more skilled in argumentation. Plato's dialectic is almost nonexistent; his physics is scanty and full of errors. His moral disputations are more numerous, but none transmit the whole of ethics compendiously. In the age of the Fathers he was considered great because he taught many things in moral matters, approached Christians in divine matters, and supplied many arguments to bishops against idolaters."

§ 4. The third law: in logic and physics, let Aristotle be expounded in such a way that whatever learned and useful matter can be collected from the ancients and moderns is accurately transmitted at the same time. For that others saw nothing besides Aristotle and that so many thousands of interpreters added nothing to Aristotle is not merely incredible; innumerable books also demonstrate it.

§ 5. The fourth: in dialectic, let the matter be expounded briefly; let useless intricacies and subtleties be removed. Let no new questions be added; let many of the old ones be cut away.

§ 6. The fifth law: in every kind of mathematical science, this must be accomplished--that the most perfect authors and professors should be possessed. For the very system of all machines, crafts, and time useful in the state flows from them. First, let there be one who contemplates the motions of the heavens and the stars and expounds all its parts. That matter contributes much to civil life and even to heavenly life: to consider the works of God, to know their magnitude and symmetry, and to divide the tracts of lands. Many ridiculous superstitions and fables have arisen from ignorance of these matters, even among barbarous nations; indeed, magical incantations rest upon nothing other than ignorance of such things. Therefore let geometers, geographers, arithmeticians, gnomonists, experts in optics, and even makers of instruments be joined to astrologers; for there is none of these arts which does not at some time possess the greatest necessity and use.

§ 7. Finally, let the highest care be assigned to metaphysics, which is nearest to theology--indeed, a certain natural theology--a principal part of which is even now taught in theology. Concerning this matter, Francis Suárez of our Society disputes very extensively and accurately at the beginning of his Metaphysics.

A prince ought to know letters, practical philosophy, the foundations of jurisprudence and theology, and politics, the art of arts. It is especially fitting for a prince to be wise, to judge, and to live well.

CHAPTER XXV

That the Greatest Care Ought to Be Taken for Medicine

§ 1. What was said to everyone by Ecclesiasticus, chapter 38, concerning honoring the physician has been commanded especially to the state and the prince. For it belongs to them to provide not only for themselves but for the whole fatherland, so that diseases may be encountered at the proper time and excellent physicians, surgeons, and apothecaries may be possessed. They must be maintained with such munificence that they do not wish for a crowd of sick people. And just as a prudent head of a household, when he has relieved hunger, nevertheless stores provisions for future necessity, so too let a city possess one or more physicians who may remedy private and epidemic diseases. Let it not only foster him in the state but also assign him an honored place. I shall embrace in perspicuous words what I think concerning this matter.

§ 2. Let singular honor be assigned to physicians in the state. Thus the divine writings, Ecclesiasticus 38:1: "Honor the physician on account of necessity, for the Most High created him. For all healing is from God, and he shall receive a gift from the king. The physician's learning shall exalt his head, and he shall be praised in the sight of the great. The Most High created medicine from the earth, and a prudent man will not abhor it. Was not bitter water made sweet by wood? Their power was made known to men, and the Most High gave knowledge to men, that He might be honored in His marvelous works. By these things the one who treats shall mitigate pain, and the perfumer shall make pigments of sweetness and compound ointments of health, and His works shall not be brought to an end. For the peace of God is over the face of the earth."

Τίμα τὸν ἰατρὸν πρὸς τὰς χρείας τιμαῖς αὐτοῦ.

"Honor the physician according to necessities with his honors." For it does not understand an honor by which you come to his aid lest he be in want. Rather, it means that you should honor him before the necessity of disease exacts it. Thus Ben Sira expounded it. And other Hebrews command gifts to be given to the physician and honor to be imparted to him, so that, remembering them, he may visit you willingly and promptly in time of illness.

§ 3. Let the dignity and rewards of a physician in the state be so great that even nobles and magnates aspire to them. Let there be no less an approach to undertaking the state for Machaon than for Demosthenes. For why should they not entrust a part of the state to the man to whom they entrust their own life and the lives of their children and wives--

The reason why I so judge is that I consider the health of the citizens and the prince worthy of being cared for by men of the first rank. Nor is it unworthy of a noble man to visit the cottages of the poor, feel the pulse of an artery, judge the signs and criteria of diseases, and prescribe pills. It is human malice which has detracted esteem from the guardians of its health and yet surrounded the avengers of its crimes with majesty. Fasces, axes, and a lictor are added to magistrates as insignia of power, yet they are instruments of executioners. Magistrates approach prisons and command the guilty to be stretched, cut by claws, burned, and driven to the cross; and the ambitious names of judges and prefects lead to this power. Why should there be less honor for a physician, the patron of life and health, than for a judge, the minister of death? Our nature, the corrupter of order, has envied its own goods and esteems the power of destroying guilty men more than the ability to preserve a citizen. Whence comes this great evil, that the man who preserves good men is lesser than the man who destroys bad men?

I do not wish this to be said as though I wished physicians to be preferred either to jurists or to magistrates. For their own honor remains to magistrates, and no one moves the palm from its place in the order; and according to the custom of the academies, physicians yield to jurisconsults. I say it so that I may show that physicians also are to be adorned with public dignities and that nothing in their functions is to be judged base.

Nevertheless, the controversy between physicians and jurists concerning dignity of place is ancient. I do not make another's suit my own. But I shall copy in his own words what the most illustrious Christoph Besoldus, primary professor of the Academy of Würzburg, thinks in his juridical-political dissertation On the Law of Academies, chapter 3, page 200: "Immediately after theologians, or in second place, jurisconsults take precedence over physicians. Whether this happens by right is an ancient question. See Lipsius, Oration 8; Rodericus a Castro, The Political Physician, Book 1, chapter 12; Alphonsus Moditius, § Prudentum, question 12; Limnaeus, Disputation on Academies 2, thesis 10; the most illustrious Hilligerus on Doneau, Book 3 of the Commentaries, chapter 9, letter N; Johannes Gerardi, Century of Political Questions, decade 9, question 6; Johannes Baptista de Plotis and Count Rogerius, Matrimonial Counsels, tome 1, counsel 87 and following; Benius, On the Privileges of Jurisconsults, Book 3, chapter 55; Jacobus Martini, century 9 of Various Questions, disputation 2, question 10.

"I would not wish anything to be detracted from either art. But if it is fitting to pronounce an opinion from the feeling of one's mind and judge from true foundations rather than begged votes, I would determine the matter by this distinction, with the most excellent physician Francisco Valesio in his Sacred Philosophy, chapter 74: that medicine must altogether yield to true jurisprudence, which is engaged not in pleading causes but in administering the state; but not to that petty practice which merely arranges lawsuits--or rather mixes them into entanglements." This says that man who takes precedence among the jurisconsults.

§ 4. It is advantageous to a free state to summon physicians into the Senate. Kings and princes, however, provide most prudently for their own safety if they employ them in public counsels, provided that they are good and prudent men. For by that honor they bind their fidelity to themselves, and by trusting them they make them faithful to themselves. Next, since physicians know nature and natural affections, they can frequently persuade things which are advantageous, or certainly judge from countenances and eyes what things may be considered to be in the prince's interest. The example in Antiochus, son of Seleucus, was pitiable, yet it was an example of medical sagacity. For Erasistratus detected the love of Antiochus, just as Hippocrates marked the madness of Perdiccas. Plutarch, Demetrius; Soranus, Life of Hippocrates.

Nor is it marvelous that great honors and dignities in the state are decreed to physicians. For formerly this was the care of kings. Solomon certainly, while enumerating the gifts of his wisdom in Wisdom 7:15 and following, acknowledges medicine: "But God gave me to speak according to judgment and to conceive things worthy of those which are given to me, since He Himself is the guide of wisdom and the corrector of the wise. For in His hand are both we and our discourses, and all wisdom, and the learning of the knowledge of works. For He gave me true knowledge of the things which are: that I might know the ordering of the world and the powers of the elements; the beginning, completion, and midpoint of times; the alternation, changes, and transformations of seasons; the courses of the year and dispositions of the stars; the natures of animals and rages of beasts; the force of winds and thoughts of men; the differences of shrubs and powers of roots. And I learned whatever things are hidden and unforeseen, for wisdom, the artificer of all things, taught me."

Knowledge of these things is necessary to the physician; and when he has acquired it, he easily maintains the method of healing. Therefore men learnedly and fittingly called medicine the sister of philosophy. For the state will admit no one who is not well practiced in philosophy into the innermost things of medicine--that is, to preserve or destroy the lives of men. Dionysius the tyrant at Syracuse acted not only as a physician but also practiced surgery, as Aelian is the authority in Book 1. It is established that Mithridates, king of Pontus; Hermes of the Egyptians; and Ganges, king of the Medes, were most skilled in medicine and preserved the lives of many by their counsel. The emperor Pogonatus also embraced that art. When many magnates are occupied with the labors of waters, oil, and sublimations, and adhere to their alembics, what else do they do than prepare medicines?

It is no less unbecoming that kings should be physicians than philosophers; for medicine is not only a most honorable but also a most useful part of philosophy. Formerly physicians were indeed called physicists because they not only knew the natures and changes of animals, plants, and elements, the constitution of man, the causes of diseases, and the method of health, but used their knowledge for the health of each individual. Among cultivated peoples physicians were once held in such esteem that they built shrines and erected altars to Apollo, Aesculapius, Chiron, Machaon, and even Hippocrates, and assigned them divine honors. Indeed, the fables appointed Paeon physician of the gods, because that uncultivated age--which attributed anger, childbirth, wounds, and pus to the wretched stars--judged that not even the gods could lack so divine a knowledge and its use. Nor did they relate that Apis of the Egyptians was worshiped so religiously for any cause as much as because he was held to be the inventor of medicine. Celtic Hercules also, who because of his skill in healing was called Alexipharmacus, attained authority and resources no more through strength or bodily mass than by healing diseases.

Nor did physicians themselves despise their knowledge. Philo called the most efficacious medicines either πολύχρυσα (worth much gold) or πάγχρηστα θεῶν χεῖρας (all-useful hands of the gods). For four hundred years there were no physicians at Rome, as among a most turbulent and rustic people. At Athens they lived both few in number and without honor--

But this is not marvelous, for κακοβουλία (bad counsel) was peculiar to the Athenians, and indeed was so well known that their prophet Aristophanes casts it up against them as a familiar fact:

Φασὶ γὰρ δυσβουλίαν τῇδε πόλει προσείναι.

"They say that rash and evil counsels are conducted in the city." What wonder, therefore, if they esteemed physicians little, when through their envy the best citizens were cast into exile?

ON THE EDUCATION OF YOUTH

§ 5. Finally, since very ready shortcuts to great riches are open to learned and faithful physicians, and since it is useful to the state that wealthy men should be in magistracies--both lest the dignity itself, having fallen into base men, be despised, and lest physicians, not bearing contempt for themselves, migrate elsewhere and abandon the state--the rulers ought to bind them to themselves by honor. Concerning the immense riches of physicians, others write, and especially our Laelius in Book 16, chapter 11, of Leisure Hours.

Erasistratus, who flourished about the year 600 of the city, after curing King Antiochus, as Pliny writes in Book 29, chapter 2, was given one hundred talents by King Ptolemy, his son--that is, sixty thousand of our gold pieces, as Budaeus calculates in Book 2 of The As. In the same place Pliny also numbers the Cassii, Carpitani, Arruntii, Albutii, and Rubrii, who received from princes an annual fee of 250,000 sesterces--that is, six thousand two hundred fifty gold pieces. Quintus Stertinius, however, charged the princes with the fact that he was content with five hundred thousand sesterces annually; for he showed that his gain from the city was six hundred thousand, the houses being named. That is, he obtained from citizens a sum greater by another such amount--fifteen thousand gold pieces--while the emperors themselves paid twelve thousand five hundred gold pieces.

Pliny adds: "An equal fee was poured upon his brother by Claudius Caesar; and although their property had been exhausted by works with which Naples was adorned, he left three hundred hundred-thousands of sesterces to his heir, as much as Arruntius alone had left up to that age"--that is, thirty million sesterces. "Recently," says Pliny a little afterward, "Crinas of Massilia left ten million sesterces for the walls of his fatherland, when another man had also constructed fortifications for almost no smaller sum." For it must be read thus, not "one hundred sesterces"; for how could so small a sum have sufficed for walls? Charnus likewise, from the same Massilia, contracted to cure a sick man from among his fellow Massilians or provincials for two hundred thousand sesterces--that is, five thousand of our gold pieces.

Why should I commemorate the resources of Archontius? Claudius confiscated from this man alone--he was a physician of wounds--when condemned, ten million sesterces, that is, two hundred fifty thousand gold pieces; yet within a few years no less was acquired by the same man in exile and when he had returned to Rome. The very ancient Democedes, as reported by Herodotus, Book 3, was hired for each year by the Aeginetans for one talent, by the Athenians for one hundred minas, and by the tyrant Polycrates for two talents. Thus it is in no way marvelous that Asclepiades, a master of rhetoric in the age of Pompey the Great, when he did not make good gain from that faculty, suddenly turned himself to medicine so that he might become wealthy. Pliny mentions him in Book 7, chapter 37, as the founder of a new sect, and in Book 26, chapter 3, and Book 29, chapter 1.

Conversely, a certain Gallus, a physician who was indeed most acute but most greedy for money, when he saw that he made little gain from medicine at Nicopolis, turned himself to pleading cases, as Antonius Panormita is the authority in Book 4, On the Deeds of King Alfonso. He turned the forum upside down with sophisms and cavils, but with a different outcome, since it was decreed by an edict of King Alfonso that a suit which had Gallus as patron should by that very fact be judged unjust.

We know that Galen was very wealthy. He himself testifies in Book 9, chapter 9, On Recognizing the Diseases of the Mind, that he was accustomed to spend a tenth part of his revenues annually and add the rest; thus he surpassed all his fellow citizens in riches, although he confesses that he was wealthy from his patrimony.

I come to the Christians. Thaddaeus of Florence, whose books concerning medicine are also read, when he departed from his fatherland for the sake of some treatment, hired out his work for no fewer than fifty gold pieces each day; and after curing Honorius, the Supreme Pontiff, he carried away ten thousand gold pieces. The same is related concerning Pietro d'Abano, who acquired the name of Conciliator.

Dubravius, Book 23 of Bohemian Affairs; Antonius Bonfinius, Book 2 of decade 3; and Aeneas Silvius, chapters 35 and 42 of his Bohemia, relate that a certain physician named Albicus, through the very ample riches which he had acquired by his art, made for himself with Wenceslaus, king and most indolent emperor, a step to the prefecture of the Church of Prague. You will read similar examples in The Theatre of Human Life, volume 10, Book 6, under the title Avarice ἐν λήψει (in receiving).

There is a saying of King Philip to a wealthy but avaricious and importunate physician. For when Philip had received a wound in the neck near the clavicle and was being treated by him, speaking as though whispering to the man in a low voice, he said, "Take as much as you please, because you have the key"--that is, λάμβανε ὅσα βούλει, τὴν γὰρ κλεῖν ἔχεις--as Plutarch reports in the Apophthegms.

With the best right, a physician will receive a gratuity for his labor, because it is advantageous that he be wealthy so that he may treat the poor without payment--or even treat everyone. Hippocrates certainly did so, and so did the parent of Ausonius:

> "I offered aid," he says, "to all who sought the service > of an art not purchased, and my office was joined with piety."

§ 6. Let no one be admitted to teach or practice medicine unless he has been taught for a long time and accurately. I spoke above concerning academic honors. Because they are often given to unworthy men, the prince ought not to rest upon that authority so that, if anyone comes from Italy or Gaul furnished with the testimony of some academy, he should thereby be judged a physician. For what is more unworthy than that a man who purchased the title of physician for a few gold pieces should possess a public right of killing and of seeking experiments of his art through deaths of obscure men and sometimes even of illustrious men? Too often the common proverb, derived from what was once done and said, is customarily bandied about:

Μόνῳ δ᾽ ἰατρῷ τοῦτο καὶ συνηγόρῳ ἔξεστιν ἀποκτείνειν μὲν, ἀποθνῄσκειν δὲ μή.

"To the physician alone and the advocate alone is it permitted to kill without the penalty of death."

§ 7. Let it be a capital crime for an unskilled physician if he has undertaken to treat the sick, even if by chance he has cured them. For a good outcome is from God; his own rashness had destroyed the sick man. Certain laws reject such men and prohibit their practice, Book 6, § Sed et reprobari. And deservedly; for it is better that practice should cease than that men should be killed by drugs. But those who learn through our dangers, who conduct experiments through deaths, deserve a greater penalty. Pliny already complained long ago, in Book 29, chapter 1, that there was no law which punished the capital ignorance of physicians. To have given a deadly love potion was formerly a capital crime, because to have offered a doubtful medicine renders a man guilty of killing. But an unskilled physician cannot be certain. Thus he always hesitates in uncertainty whether he offers a salutary drug or a poison; and if it benefits, he does so by chance, not by knowledge. The woman who--

A jealous adulterous wife gave poisons to her husband,

Nor believed that enough had been given for death;

She mixed deadly weights of quicksilver-- is not free from crime; yet the husband's life prevailed over the poisons fighting among themselves, and his survival does not thereby absolve the sorceress.

The law which I recommend is not severe. It concerns the life of men--

--and is on behalf of life. The man who treats a human life doubtfully has despised it. One who has led a city or army into danger is considered a traitor. What will you think concerning a man who, after receiving money, dispenses poisons and drugs with no certain discrimination? An unskilled advocate does less harm, because his error is more easily recognized and he has an opponent; therefore no one easily commits himself to the arena except with hope of victory. The affairs of physicians are secure: when they have killed, they are not accused; they deceive the sick. Thus there are few who plead cases while unskilled in law; but the error of physicians is recognized only when life has been despaired of, and it is frequently neglected by a greedy heir whom it benefited that the physician was unskilled.

I therefore think that, in a well-constituted state, this rashness must be restrained by a grave penalty, even a capital one. If this were done, not every village would abound with ignorant physicians. Otherwise there is no doubt that a physician of this kind binds himself by a crime. Navarrus, in chapter 25, concerning the sins of a physician and surgeon, says:

"It must be said, first, that a physician or surgeon sins when he practices without sufficient knowledge, even if he has been granted a laurel; and one who sufficiently knows the art but does not follow its precepts; and one who notably neglects to study or to visit the sick, although the sick man is cured--according to Saint Antoninus, with the obligation of restitution according to the opinion of Panormitanus and everyone; and one who applies medicines to a disease before he knows it. Nevertheless, one who through prolonged experience has learned to treat oblique maladies--for example scabies, a fracture of bones, a clouding of the eye, fistulas, and pain of the teeth, molars, ears, and other similar parts--can licitly treat them although he is ignorant of the rules of medicine, provided that he does it without any incantation or fascination, that when fever supervenes he employs a skilled physician for the sick man, and that he attempts nothing which he does not know.

"Second, one sins who, doubting whether some medicine was notably harmful or not, administered it so that he might experiment, make a profit, or not be regarded as ignorant, and so forth; and still more one who administers a thing which he knows to be notably harmful, even if he administers it from pity or in order to please the sick man; and one who abandons a sick man before he ought, from which death or prolongation of the disease results, with the obligation of restoring the loss; and one who, when some limb must necessarily be cut off, does not seek a man whom he believes will cut it off well, or who, doubting the necessity of amputation, ordered it to be cut off; and one who, not knowing how to let blood or cut off a limb, does either or both; and one who, knowing that an apothecary will use corrupted medicines, does not choose uncorrupted ones; and one who, in order that he may receive a greater fee, delays the treatment of a disease."

The opinion of others is the same, and the counsel of Sylvester must altogether be maintained. "First, therefore," says he, "it is asked what is required in a physician so that he can practice the art without sin. And I say that many things are required. First, it is required that he be so skilled that he is commonly considered suitable by men skilled in that faculty. It is not sufficient to possess a doctorate; otherwise, if from notable ignorance he harms the sick man in his treatment, he sins mortally, acting against the commandment 'You shall not kill,' De poenitentia, distinction 1, Homicidium. And according to Richard, he is held to make equivalent satisfaction to the sick man, since he cannot repair the principal thing. Indeed, even if health follows, he sins mortally, because he exposed himself to the danger of mortal sin--that is, to a work from which notable injury to his neighbor can follow. Nor is it an objection that he does not intend this, because he voluntarily places himself in a situation from which this is naturally able to follow: Article 15, question 1, Merito, and § Sed obicitur, concerning Lamech.

"Nor is he held only in the forum of the soul when he voluntarily harms--for example by prolonging illness and matters of that kind--but also when he harms from ignorance or inexperience or by not following the traditions of the art, as Petrus notes in Authentica Sed hodie, Code De iudiciis; because a physician's inexperience is numbered as fault, law Si quis fundum, § Celsus, Digest Locati, and law Imperitia, Digest De regulis iuris. Panormitanus, however, in chapter Ad aures, De aetate et qualitate, limits this to when he voluntarily assumed the office; it is otherwise if from necessity and in good faith he did what he could when other physicians were lacking. Therefore let the man who chooses such a person impute it to himself, since that person said that he was unskilled.

"Second, he ought to be diligent. Therefore one who, after having been requested, is notably negligent in reviewing books, visiting the sick man, examining the quality of medicinal things, and similar matters, if death follows, is irregular and sins mortally; and similarly if a great aggravation of the illness follows without death. But according to Antonius de Butrio, in chapter Tua nos, De homicidio, he is said to have employed all the diligence which he ought when he follows the traditions of the art, visits personally, and dictates a regimen to the sick man. He is not held to continuous personal watch, according to Hostiensis; and thus the outcome of death is not imputed to him: Digest De officio praesidis, law Illicitas, § Sicuti.

"Third, he ought to possess a justified intention, so that he does not intend to profit from another's loss: De regulis iuris, Nemo, Book 6. Therefore he ought to conclude the treatment as quickly as he can. If he extends and prolongs the treatment for profit, he sins mortally and is held to restore the excess. Likewise, if he permits the apothecary to place in the composition of a medicine ingredients which are insufficient through age or some other defect so that he himself may profit more, he sins gravely, and each is held to the sick man for every loss. Indeed, according to the Archdeacon, he ought not to trust an apothecary unless he knows that he is conscientious, skilled, and practiced; rather, the composition of the medicine ought to take place beneath his own eyes. Nevertheless, if he gave the medicine according to the art and displayed all due diligence, it is not imputed to him if through a defect in the ingredients or some other admixture it is harmful: De clerico excommunicato ministrante, chapter Apostolicae, according to Innocent and Hostiensis. In all the aforesaid cases, however, he is held according to the judgment of good men."

And again: "How ought a physician to conduct himself in applying medicines or remedies to bodies? I say many things. First, according to Innocent in chapter Tuo nos, De homicidio, he ought diligently to take care that he does not apply medicines concerning which he is not certain according to the art; because if he doubts whether they ought to benefit or harm, he sins by giving them. For in doubtful matters the safer road is to be followed: this is to leave the sick man to nature and the Creator rather than expose him to a medicine which he does not know."

Since, therefore, jurisconsults and theologians arraign unskilled physicians as guilty of killing, the vigor of the laws ought to be armed against them no less than against brigands, since they destroy more men; and magistrates who neglect their office in this part involve themselves in another's sin.

§ 8. Physicians, therefore, must be examined most diligently and severely before they are presented for the care of a state. Nor is an injury inflicted upon the academies which promoted a Doctor, for a great part are proclaimed Doctors before practice. But a prudent prince will admit no one unless he has already practiced under another master, lest he conduct experiments through deaths. Moreover, they must be examined in every part of medicine. Some establish three parts of medicine: dogmas, method, and experience. In academic promotions, dogmas, enunciations, and aphorisms are sought; their rationale, or method, is exacted; experience is not yet present. Yet this too must be known.

Plato divides medicine into that which assists a sick man with medicated plants, potions, and pastilles; then into surgery, to which belong emollient poultices, plasters, incisions, and cauterizations; third, into the care of daily diet and exercises-- fourth, into that which quickly recognizes diseases and at last treats them; finally, into that which comes to aid with great and swift assistance, as though by a divine hand, and drives away pains. But these methods are generally so connected with one another that, with surgery almost alone excepted, they cannot be separated.

Our men divide it into that part which treats the constitution of man and embraces anatomy and complexion, or temperament; then into that whose office is to preserve bodies from diseases. Since very few men employ this part and are accustomed to consult a physician only when the violence of disease cuts off the hope of life, so many cohorts of diseases therefore rush upon them--as though God sent the heavenly gift of medicine to us from those ethereal seats only so that we might drive out a plague which has slipped into our entrails, and not also so that we might turn it away as it comes.

The third part investigates the causes of diseases and, in diseases, the causes of symptoms; complete knowledge of the first part is necessary to it. Joined to this is the part which teaches concerning signs and critical indications, judges future crises, and knows which things are present and which have passed. An experienced physician does this so dexterously that Hippocrates asserts medicine to be akin to prophecy. Hence ignorant antiquity also attributed foreknowledge of future things to Apollo. The fifth part maintains the method of healing, whether it be by diet, by medicines taken in any manner, injected into the viscera, or poured on, or by a different kind of surgery. This extends most widely. For it is necessary that the physician know every kind of medicine, simple and compound, and take care that they are prepared with great care.

In all these matters he will have to be tested long and much before he is approved. Nor must the learning of the novice Doctor be explored only by disputation; he will also be compelled to mix and compound the pills themselves and to approve and disapprove the drugs of apothecaries. Sylvester certainly shows this when he denies that an apothecary is to be trusted unless the physician knows him to be conscientious, skilled, and practiced; rather, the composition of the medicine ought to take place beneath his own eyes. The physician will inspect it in vain if he is ignorant of practice. Therefore this part also must be cultivated. For if he knows it and then learns the prescriptions of noble physicians, he will easily treat common and familiar diseases; but if he is ignorant of the substances to be compounded, as they call them, those precepts will help nothing. He will insert a melon in place of a radish and wrench the soul from a wretched man by a medical death.

§ 9. Let none even of the most approved physicians employ a new medicine unless it has also been approved by others. I am not unaware that many things can be added to the discoveries of the ancients, nor do I condemn new things in the arts. For if all sciences have received great increases through an interval of time, I do not see why this should be denied to this one alone. Yet because experiments upon the human body are dangerous, he will also hear the opinions of others. The law of the Egyptians, concerning which Diodorus Siculus writes in Book 1, chapter 6, did not seem unjust to me: it freed from blame a man who did not heal the sick after administering medicine according to the precepts of the sacred book, but punished with death one who instituted a treatment contrary to those doctrines.

Nor should those be heard who allege that they are unwilling to disclose great secrets and efficacious remedies. Through that boasting of secrets they build up in advance authority for their idleness and ignorance--indeed, often for imposture. If the remedies are good and possess a rationale, it is better that they be made known than lie hidden. They propose poisons dangerously compounded, distilled waters, and violent remedies; and while they treat one disease or part, they consume the whole body.

§ 10. So that medicine may be rightly administered, the prince will establish academic professors with great stipends and gratuities. Then he will liberally support, for six or seven years in that study, three or four men born of distinguished ancestry, of good morals, and endowed with great abilities. So that lawful physicians may possess honor and recompense, however, he will forbid there to be a multitude of physicians--a multitude, I say, of physicians. It is now so great that there is no village so abject in which several are not found; for where no one is a physician, everyone professes medicine.

I laughed when, in a noble city of Germany, I learned that there was no Doctor of medicine and asked whom, therefore, the sick consulted. The answer was that, besides prophetic old women, a pharmacist, surgeon, apothecary, confectioner, bath attendant, Jew, and even executioner compounded doses, observed signs, and discharged every office of a physician. “And all,” they said, “grow rich by this art.” I did not conceal my opinion, but said that the magistracy sinned gravely: not only because it called the health of the citizens into danger and made simple persons the prey of cunning men, but also because by this method it furnished an occasion for superstitions and magical deceptions.

The desire of living is great and natural in everyone and excessive in most. A sick man is deceived by nothing more easily than the hope of health. Thus they descend to every measure and, if they cannot bend those above, they move Acheron. Pliny, in Book 30, confesses concerning magic truly and according to the opinion of all the Doctors: “No one doubts that it was first born from medicine and crept in under a salutary appearance as something higher and holier than medicine. Thus to the most flattering and most desired promises it added the powers of religion, before which the human race is still especially benighted.” And certainly, through the hope of medicine, the devil enticed many living men into this abyss. If, therefore, the magistracy desires to furnish a state pure from magic, let it forbid those clandestine physicians--or rather diviners--to exist. Let it enjoin silence upon them through fear of death.

I do not doubt that the custom of the Babylonians was foolish. They placed the sick in public so that, if anyone had at some time been healed of the same disease, he might transmit the method of healing to the sick man; nor was anyone permitted to pass by without learning about his disease. It was a foolish practice, I say, for the sick man was both afflicted publicly and made to struggle with so many counsels, and--what was gravest--he often had to trust an unknown and ignorant man. But such great ignorance existed publicly that they thought the same diseases in different men and at different ages were to be treated by the same remedies.

We therefore laugh at those things, but we see worse things committed by those who entrust the life and health of the body to unlearned men. For those men maintain some medical method by which they know that certain persons were at some time assisted; they apply it to everyone as a πανάκειαν (panacea), than which nothing is more destructive. They also often place souls in danger while they expect health through incantations from witches--that is, from the demon.

We marvel that the credulity of the ancients advanced so far that they believed still greater things. Democritus promised a composition of a medicine by which beautiful and fortunate children would be born, but we see such things every day. Asclepiades, the freedman of Pompey the Great, once innovated in medicine, and Pliny relates that "he turned almost the entire human race toward himself in no other manner than if he had arrived after being sent from heaven." Furthermore, he drew minds by a marvelous artifice, promising wine to the sick and giving it at the proper time-- and then cold water. Since Herophilus had first instituted the search for the causes of diseases and Cleophantus had made illustrious among the ancients the rationale of wine, Asclepiades himself preferred to acquire a name by giving cold water, as Marcus Varro is the authority. He also devised other flatteries: now suspending little beds, by whose rocking he might either lessen diseases or elicit sleep; now instituting baths for the most eager desire of men; and many other things pleasant and agreeable to say. He acquired great authority and no less fame when, having encountered the funeral of an unknown man, he brought the man back from the pyre and preserved him--lest anyone suppose that so great a transformation was produced by light causes.

This alone we can regard with indignation: that one man, sprung from a most insignificant nation and without any resources, for the sake of his own revenue suddenly gave laws of health to the human race, which many afterward nevertheless abrogated. Many things assisted Asclepiades: the excessively anxious and crude care of those men, such as burying the sick beneath clothing and inducing sweats by every means; now roasting bodies beside fires or continually seeking the sun in a shady city; indeed, when all Italy was mistress of the world, then first flattering desire without limit by the use of suspended baths. Furthermore, in certain diseases he removed the tortures of treatment, as in anginas, which they treated by an instrument lowered into the throat. He deservedly condemned vomitings, then excessively frequent. He also accused medicinal potions as hostile to the stomach, which for the most part has been forbidden. Therefore we mark above all the things which are useful to the stomach.

These things possess some rationale. But that which Pliny adds in Book 26, chapter 4, is detestable: "Above everything, magical vanities assisted him, raised to such a height that they could abolish confidence in all herbs."

§ 11. Let the care of an excellent physician be that, when it can be done, the sick employ simple and obtainable medicines. Pliny speaks truly in Book 22, chapter 14: "That parent and divine artificer of things did not make wax salves, emollient poultices, plasters, eye salves, and antidotes. These are inventions of workshops--indeed, more truly of avarice. The works of nature are born complete and perfect, with a few things assumed by reason, not conjecture: so that dry substances may be tempered with some juice for the passages, or moist substances with another body for cohesion. To collect and mix powers by scruples is not a work of human conjecture but of impudence."

Hence it has been brought about that a pharmacy is not permitted to physicians, lest they devote themselves to selling wares rather than to health. But because there can be a conspiracy between the apothecary and physician, the state will do excellently if it itself undertakes that care. Yet I do not see this done, although it would be most praiseworthy, while in many places princes and cities assume for themselves as though a royal care the selling of wine, the grinding of grain, and other matters.

Pliny praises the diligence of the ancients in Book 23, chapter 6: "One cannot sufficiently marvel at the care and diligence of the ancients, who, having searched everything, left nothing unattempted. In this very pomegranate there are little flowers which burst forth before the fruit itself appears, which we have said are called balaustium. Therefore, having tested this too, they discovered that it opposes scorpions."

But he says that that diligence was corrupted and removed and complains, in Book 24, chapter 1, that frauds succeeded in its place: "Hence medicine was born. These alone had pleased nature as remedies prepared for the common people, easy to discover and without expense, from which we live. Afterward the frauds of men and snares of abilities invented those workshops in which his life is promised for sale to each man. At once compositions and inexplicable mixtures are loudly proclaimed. Arabia and India are valued in their midst, and a medicine from the Red Sea is charged to a little ulcer, although the poorest man eats the true remedies every day."

The physician who heals without expense will not thus be less esteemed, but more readily available and more honored; for great care also exists in applying medicines liable to danger. Herophilus, the noble physician, said excellently that many herbs benefit when trodden underfoot.

§ 12. Let the state also possess men who gather medicinal plants at the proper time, for Pliny is the authority in Book 24, chapter 2, that the whole of medicine was once in these: "This was ancient medicine, which migrated entirely into the Greek language. But the reason why more plants are not known is that country people and those ignorant of letters test them, since they alone live among them; furthermore, the ready availability of a crowd of physicians gives security from searching. Names are also lacking for many discoveries, as for that plant which we reported in the care of grain and which we know, when buried at the corners of a field, causes no bird to enter. A most shameful cause of their rarity is that even those who know are unwilling to show them, as though what they transmitted to others would perish from themselves. Added to this is the uncertain method of discovery. Indeed, even among things discovered, chance finds some and--as I shall speak truly--God finds others."

And these things were once valued so greatly that it was sufficient for the Arcadians to employ as medicine the milk of cattle which grazed in places rich in plants. Pliny, Book 25, chapter 8: "Otherwise they relate that Mount Pelion in Thessaly, Mount Telethrius in Euboea, and all Arcadia and Laconia are rich in plants. The Arcadians indeed employ not medicines but milk around springtime, since then plants swell especially with juices and udders are medicated by the pastures. They drink cow's milk, since cattle are almost omnivorous among plants. The power of plants through quadrupeds is still made manifest by two illustrious examples."

But this practice is Arcadian and belongs to ancient foolishness; for since the kinds of diseases are varied, that γαλακτοποσία (drinking of milk) cannot remedy everyone, but only some.

§ 13. The prince ought to take great care that new medicines are not introduced, as I have said; for the trial is attended by uncertainty. Those whom they call Paracelsists must therefore be admitted cautiously. Pliny proves that no art has been more inconstant, and that it was changed rather frequently even in his own time. The cause of the change is desire for gain, so that they may attract men to themselves by novelty. New things, however, are eagerly taken up by the sick, because they perceive that they are being cured slowly by the old ones; and, just as they delight in changes of rooms and beds, so too they delight in variety of medicine.

Hippocrates long held sway over everyone; he became renowned around the beginning of the Peloponnesian War. They say that he drew his ability to heal from remedies written in a temple according to custom; for it was the custom that those who had been freed from diseases should deposit in the temple a written account of the kind and method of the remedy. Having used these, he is said to have gained fame after the shrine had already been burned. But so great a knowledge of things sufficiently shows that he employed another teacher. He indeed healed everyone without payment, but Prodicus, his disciple, made the art profitable and instituted iatroleptics. Chrysippus, however, altered their doctrines, and Erasistratus, the grandson of Aristotle, altered those of Chrysippus; and thus the disciples rejected their teachers.

In Sicily there was a sect of Empirics, with Acron of Acragas as its founder. Since it rested upon opinions and experience, it was quickly dispersed into various little sects, all of which Herophilus deservedly condemned. The words of Pliny, Book 29, chapter 1, concerning the sect of Herophilus should be noted: "Then this sect too was abandoned, because it was necessary to know letters in it." I marvel and am almost stupefied that there were sects of physicians which did not know letters, and that the one which required a knowledge of letters-- was abandoned for that very reason. But even today, when illustrious physicians have been forsaken, do not many seek health from old women and country people, and embrace their sayings all the more because they come from the unlearned?

Asclepiades followed next. His hearer Themison altered his precepts; Antonius Musa altered Themison's doctrines when he had cured Augustus by a contrary treatment. But Valens Vectius, Messalina's adulterer and powerful for that reason, also founded another sect. Under Nero's rule Thessalus abolished all the decrees of the ancients and declaimed with a certain madness against the physicians of every age. He caused it to be inscribed upon his tomb that he was Iatronicen, "the conqueror of physicians." Meanwhile he drew the whole city after him; that age, Pliny says, "leapt over to him." No actor's or driver of a three-horse team of mares' appearance in public was more fully attended. But, while he was still alive, his own crowd deserted him. For Crinas of Marseilles, having doubled the art in order to appear more cautious and more religious, surpassed him in authority by giving foods according to the motions of the stars from a mathematical ephemeris and by observing the hours. "These men ruled the fates," says Pliny in Book 29, chapter 1, "when suddenly Charmis, from the same Marseilles, invaded the city. He condemned not only the earlier physicians but also the baths, and persuaded people to wash in cold water even amid the chills of winter. He plunged the sick into pools. We used to see aged men of consular rank stiff with cold even to the point of ostentation." Concerning this there also survives the supporting testimony of Annaeus Seneca.

Nor is there any doubt that all those men, hunting for fame by some novelty, immediately trafficked in our lives. Hence those wretched contests of opinions around the sick, with no one judging the same thing lest he appear to be another's appendage. Hence that inscription upon an unhappy monument: that he had perished through a crowd of physicians. "The art changes daily; so often are we altered, and we are driven by the breath of Greek talents. And it is manifest that, as each among them grows powerful in speaking, he is immediately made emperor of our life and death--as though thousands of nations did not live without physicians, yet not without medicine, just as the Roman people did beyond its six-hundredth year. Nor was that people itself slow in receiving the arts, and it was even eager for medicine, until, having tried it, it condemned it."

You indulge your pen too much, O Pliny. It did not condemn the art, but the vices of men: avarice, cruelty, and pride. The art is to be retained, the vices restrained, and, so that they can be restrained, their occasions must be removed. This is clear from the fact that the Roman people held Archagathus exceedingly dear; but since he was a wound-physician, through cruelty in burning and cutting his name passed over into "executioner," and the art into loathing. The very words of Cato show this:

"I shall speak about those Greeks in their proper place, my son Marcus: what I have discovered at Athens, and that it is good to inspect their literature but not to learn it thoroughly. I shall prove them a most wicked and unteachable race; and consider that a prophet has said this: whenever that nation gives us its literature, it will corrupt everything--even more so if it sends its physicians here. They have sworn among themselves to kill all barbarians by medicine. But they do this very thing for a fee, so that they may be trusted and may easily destroy us. They also repeatedly call us barbarians, and foul us more shamefully than others by the name of Opicans. I have forbidden you to have dealings with physicians."

And this Cato died in the 605th year of our city and the seventy-fifth year of his own life, lest anyone suppose that he lacked either public times or the private span of a life for making trial. What, then? Do we believe that a most useful thing was condemned by him? By no means, by Hercules; for he adds by what medicine he brought both himself and his wife to a long old age--namely, those very things which we now treat. He also declares that he possesses a notebook by which he may treat his son, his slaves, and the members of his household, which we set forth according to the kinds of its use. The ancients did not condemn the thing, but the art. Above all, however, they refused to let gain be made from life at a monstrous price.

§ 14. Let a sworn apothecary preserve all compositions and prescriptions of drugs; and every year let other physicians, with leading men from the senate joined to them, institute an examination not only of the apothecaries' shops but also of the medicines dispensed. For if an error has been committed, if a medicine was suited neither to the age nor to the person, many things will be able to be corrected; and if the matter rested upon injury to another's life, the physician can be warned not to sin further, and, if the error was more serious, can be removed. For since the people cannot judge, the prince ought to entrust that care to skilled men. In this matter nothing is more wretched than man, and so it was formerly as well. Pliny, Book 29, chapter 1:

"Roman gravity does not yet practice this one alone of the Greek arts, despite so great a benefit. Very few of the Quirites have touched it, and they themselves immediately became deserters to the Greeks. Indeed, authority does not belong to those who treat it otherwise than in Greek, even among the unlearned and those unacquainted with the language. And they trust less what pertains to their health if they understand it. And so, by Hercules, in this art alone has it happened that anyone professing himself a physician is immediately trusted, although in no falsehood is the danger greater. Yet we do not look at this, so beguiling for each person is the sweetness of hope on his own behalf.

"Moreover, there is no law which punishes deadly ignorance, no example of vengeance. They learn through our perils and conduct experiments through deaths; and for a physician alone, to have killed a man is the highest impunity. Indeed, abuse is passed onward, and intemperance is blamed, and those who have perished are accused besides. Yet panels of judges are, according to custom, examined by the censures of princes; an inquiry is conducted through walls; and one who is to judge concerning a coin is summoned from Gades and the Pillars of Hercules, while in a matter of exile a ballot is given only to forty-five selected men. But what kind of men enter into consultation concerning the judge himself, immediately about to kill him? Deservedly so, while none of us pleases to know what is needed for his own health. We walk with another's feet; we recognize with another's eyes; we greet by another's memory; we live by another's labor. The values of nature and the proofs of life have perished. We have nothing else as our own except pleasure."

Certainly, in civil cases an appeal is granted, and after the appeal a review, so that a good cause cannot perish through the law. Here, where human life may be lost, let an inspection be established, so that there may be some fear of killing.

§ 15. A physician who is to be admitted to practice in the state shall furnish an oath that he will be not only faithful, but will also, as much as he can, moderate expenses according to the circumstances of the persons. Let the inspectors also consider whether, in an ordinary disease curable by cheaper remedies, he has caused heavier expenses without reason. For why must pearls and gems be dissolved--a thing prodigious even amid royal luxury--if beet and mallow evacuate the bowels more beneficially? Things readily at hand are more harmless. For if God had willed that costly things alone should benefit, he would have provided only for the few rich men. I call things costly not only in kind, but also in mixture. Good God, how often have I heard that many things--seventy-four ingredients, if I am not mistaken--enter into a single most costly little powder. How are the powers of all of them tempered with one another? Pliny complained of these things long ago:

"A composition devised by luxury is called theriac. It is made from foreign things, although nature has given so many remedies which would suffice individually. The Mithridatic antidote is compounded from fifty-four things, with no two of equal weight, and for certain things the sixtieth part of a single denarius is prescribed. Which of the gods, by Faith, revealed these things? For human subtlety could not have been so great. A display of art and a portentous advertisement of knowledge-- is manifest. And not even they themselves know it. I have discovered that red lead is commonly added to medicines in place of Indian cinnabar through ignorance of the name; we shall teach among the pigments that it is a poison." Behold: through the physician's ignorance poisons are given for medicines.

§ 16. But we deal with private persons in vain unless a public law comes to their aid. For just as there is a certain luxury of life, so there is also ostentation in medicine. A philosopher says nothing so absurd that it is not believed through someone's levity; a physician prescribes nothing so poisonous or vain that it is not taken even with danger. They have handed down medicines made from the ash and nest of the phoenix.

"Thirdly, he sins who does not persuade a sick man to make confession before he applies medicine to him. This has no place when it is manifest that the disease is not dangerous, whatever Sylvester may say; nor even when he believes it to be dangerous and lethal, if, according to the custom of good and honorable physicians, he warns the man's parish priest, or those who have the care of him, that they should provide the sacraments to him, and physicians themselves omit to say this personally--not because they are unwilling to do it, but because they think, according to Cajetan, that it would harm the sick man. For, as he himself and we say, that constitution has been received and is observed in this manner; and although the sick man is unwilling to confess, he is not on that account to be abandoned by the physician, according to everyone."

§ 18. If any physician proposes shameful remedies for health, such as the warm blood of a slain infant, as was done for Constantine, drunkenness, γονόῤῥοιαν (seminal discharge), adulteries, or abortions, let him be intestabilis--legally disqualified--and let him be punished in proportion to his fault. For life ought not to be preserved through crimes. Therefore care must be taken that he be a good man, lest, while he treats diseases, he introduce greater evils of morals. Accordingly, let him believe that health is a gift of God, let him depend upon God, and let him not attribute this to himself, so as to assert that he can heal the sick when God does not approve.

Pliny testifies that morals have been corrupted under the appearance of medicine: "Those things destroyed the morals of the empire, those things which we endure while healthy: wrestling practices and wax salves, as though instituted for the sake of health; burning baths, by which they persuaded men that food was cooked within their bodies, so that no one came out without being weaker, while the most obedient were carried out for burial; then the drinking of those who were fasting, and vomitings, and again deep drinkings; and the emasculating removal of hair by means of their resins; and likewise the pubic regions of women actually exposed in public. Thus it is assuredly: a plague of morals, and none greater than from medicine, daily makes Cato altogether a prophet and his saying an oracle--that it is enough to inspect the talents of the Greeks, not to learn them thoroughly."

These things should have been said on behalf of that senate and the six hundred years of the Roman people against an art in which, under a most treacherous condition, the good create authority for the worst; and at the same time against the stupefied beliefs of certain men who think that nothing benefits unless it is costly.

I pass over Apollonides of Cos, who deservedly, after a year's αἰκισμὸς (maltreatment) and torture in the Persian manner, was buried alive, and others as well, because I treat of physicians, not of the vices of men, which are found monstrous in every class of men.

§ 19. The things said against physicians pertain to itinerant practitioners and impostors. There is scarcely any physician in Muscovy; the duke alone has one. Yet treatments are not lacking there, whether derived from experience or from superstition. The world has always wished to employ such things and has learned them by its own loss. See the Questions of Rodericus a Castro. At Rome medicine at first lay prostrate; afterward it ruled. Nor is that surprising in a rustic people which for many centuries lacked even bakers, when a dictator used to cook turnips for himself.

Many teach from Genesis 50:2 that physicians were slaves in Egypt; for Joseph commanded his servants, the physicians. But the proof is weak. For by that reasoning Joseph's brothers also would have been of servile condition: according to the custom of the East, magnates called themselves the servants of kings, not after the manner of chattels, but to declare their readiness for obedience. Nevertheless, nothing prevents the most wise Joseph from having willed that certain chattels be taught medicine.

Solomon was the prince of physicians: he embraced the whole of natural philosophy and discussed most wisely whatever was ever known. Even now diviners, enchanters, empirics, Hermetics, and observers of the stars and constellations bring medicine into disrepute, as do the inventors of weapon-salve, or the diabolical advocates of magnetic cures. Concerning them, see the most learned man Johannes Roberti against Goclenius, and the disputations of Gaspar Wenck published at Dillingen; and the work of the same Roberti against the Synarthrosis.

These things concerning education. What can be said concerning jurisprudence and likewise theology is more properly set forth in the book concerning laws and the ecclesiastical magistracy. Education for military service and war itself must be treated in a separate book. I shall conveniently speak concerning the mechanical arts when I give an account of acquiring power; for although they can have another end, they nevertheless almost always have χρηματοποιίαν (money-making) set before them. Nor must I treat of them in any other way than that they be adapted to the state. For all things have their true use if they are conducted for the public good.

CHAPTER I

The Rationale of the Undertaken Discussion concerning Laws

§ 1. To enact salutary laws for the state belongs to the highest prudence and authority; but to observe them belongs to a most excellent citizen. For nothing is more useful or honorable to a city than the guardianship of good laws. Therefore, to discuss laws, to judge laws, to recommend new ones, to amend old ones, and to pronounce that some must be abrogated appears to belong to a prince--and to a supreme prince; to venerate and kiss the laws and to undertake what has been commanded belongs to subjects. Shall I too, then, discuss laws? That, indeed, is necessary for the theologian and the philosopher; but the whole subject matter of the jurisconsult is law, for he blushes to speak without law. The statesman, however, will have constituted the state in the best and most solid manner if he brings it about that the best laws are enacted and flourish widely. For law is the soul of the city: by its vegetative influence this great body lives, and by its nod it is governed. And just as we greatly shudder at τὰς ἀνόμους κινήσεις, the lawless convulsions, of epileptics and the delirious, because they twist the members of the body contrary to the will of the mind, so too, when law has been lulled to sleep or suppressed, the state is agitated by violent movements, suffers from the falling sickness, and is about to fall suddenly with a tremendous crash. Therefore I too must speak concerning laws.

I shall not speak concerning individual laws, for that would be a work without end and would not belong to my profession. That discussion would encompass the whole of jurisprudence--the knowledge and treatment of sacred and civil laws. I shall therefore speak generally concerning the nature of right and laws, their causes and effects, and their properties and parts: those things which suffice for ordering a city and conduce to understanding and establishing particular decrees. And I shall do this chiefly according to the judgment of emperors, kings, and the most learned men, drawn from the trustworthy experience of histories--that is, of the human race.

Nor was the Persian law just--ἀνομίαν εἶναι πένθ᾽ ἡμερῶν--that there should be no law for five days after the king had died. For that period was long enough for crimes to be conceived and perpetrated.

§ 2. But since the institutions and customs not only of different nations but even of the same people are so various that, although falsely, someone once said nevertheless not without occasion, “The distinction between honorable and base rests upon opinion alone,” I shall be free to judge according to my own judgment concerning the institutions of all states. Nor ought my judgment to be constrained by the prior judgment of one state if the decrees of other cities support me. And let the judgments of others likewise be free concerning my own judgment.

I shall therefore weigh the laws and furnish the state with them. Divine law, indeed, must be considered day and night. “The law of God, therefore,” says Ambrose in On the Mansions of the Children of Israel, at the twenty-eighth mansion, “must be examined by every most exact test and observed with the greatest diligence possible, lest perhaps we fall away from it. This present mansion teaches us this. For Bene-jaakan signifies a stirring-up. But he who thoroughly cultivates the law of God observes diligently, lest even the smallest syllable or stroke slip away through negligence.”

§ 3. For this consideration directs the conscience, illuminates the mind, and gives form to the state. For this reason many of the ancients and not a few writers of the middle age treated laws, while in our own time innumerable writers have done so. The most ancient of all whose monuments survive is Plato, whose twelve books are still in our hands today: learned if you regard their antiquity, but insufficiently exact if you regard our times. Various writers then followed him, but their monuments have perished. Cicero, the foremost of the Romans, expounded Plato’s judgment in three books. Before him, the eminent men who flourished in the state gave opinions concerning right and laws.

Cicero, book 1 of On the Laws: “I remember that there were eminent men in our state who were accustomed to interpret it for the people and to give opinions; but, though professing great things, they were occupied with small ones. For what is so great as the power of the state? Yet what is so slight as the function of those who are consulted? How necessary it is to the people!"

Then, in the age of the emperors, hosts of jurisconsults followed. But they generally drew their doctrines from the Twelve Tables, decrees of the senate, plebiscites, decrees of princes, and opinions of the learned--not, as the ancients also had done, from the inner depths of philosophy. They discussed how people might make provision by law, how they might defend their property, and the law concerning walls, boundaries, roads, and rainwater falling from roofs. They touched sparingly upon the entire basis of universal right and law. Cicero therefore complains with justice that the ancients "professed great things but were occupied with small ones." For the civil law which they chiefly treat "is confined to a small and narrow place. But the nature of right must be explained by us, and it must be derived from the nature of the human being. The laws by which cities ought to be governed must be considered; then those rights and commands of peoples which have been compiled and written down must be treated, among which those of our own people, which are called civil laws, will not lie hidden."

Thus Cicero; and he had previously given the reason: "In no kind of discussion is it more honorably disclosed what has been bestowed upon the human being by nature, how great a power of the best things the human mind contains, for the sake of cultivating and accomplishing what duty we were born and brought into the light, what the association of human beings is, and what natural fellowship exists among them. For when these things have been explained, the source of laws and right can be found." You think, therefore, that the discipline of right must be drawn neither from the praetor's edict, as most now think, nor from the Twelve Tables, as earlier men thought, but from the inner depths of philosophy.

§ 4. This method was followed by St. Thomas in I--II, question 90; Antoninus, part 1, title 11; Hugo, On the Power of Laws; Gerson, part 3, On the Spiritual Life, and in the first part, On Ecclesiastical Power and the Origin of Right and Laws; Vincent of Beauvais in the Moral Mirror, book 1, page 2; Alfonso de Castro, On Penal Law; William of Paris; and Domingo de Soto, books 1 and 2. Among the theologians of the Society was Gregory of Valencia, who also illuminated Germany by published works covering the whole of theology and by refuting heretics. His hearer Clement VIII bore testimony to him and called him "the doctor of doctors."

Gregory of Valencia was followed by John de Salas, the Castilian, in whom, besides a profound knowledge of theology and philosophy, skill in every kind of law and equity is also apparent.

Gabriel Vásquez treated the matter in I--II, disputation 150 and those following, and did so with great and independent judgment. Martin Becanus, my teacher, treated it briefly, lucidly, and acutely, so that he could both instruct the learned and assist the busy. Francisco Suárez pursued the same material at length in ten books--yet briefly, if we consider the fertility of so vast an intellect and his other monuments. There is no need of a new encomium for me to commend those books to students of theology. I assert only that what his censors, Father Friar Luís dos Anjos, provincial of the Order of Friars Minor, and Father Friar Vicente Pereira of the Order of Preachers, pronounced is true. Luís's judgment is this:

> By command of the supreme senate of the Holy Inquisition, I have examined this treatise concerning laws, composed by the very reverend and most learned Father Francisco Suárez. In it, with the highest learning customary to him, he discusses and resolves the difficulties of this subject matter. Nothing repugnant to the faith is contained in this treatise; nothing contrary to the decrees of our nurturing Mother Church and the holy Fathers, or to good morals. Rather, I found in it so great a splendor of learning in the explanation of everything which can concern this discussion that nothing further seems capable of being desired, either for theological discussion or for the interpretation of pontifical law. I therefore judge it worthy to be offered to all in print, as necessary for those most learned in theology and canon law and most useful to the Christian state. Given at Lisbon, on 5 May, in the year of the Lord 1611.

Vicente's judgment is this:

> By command of the supreme senate of the Holy Inquisition, I have carefully read this treatise concerning laws, divided into ten books, whose author is the Reverend Father Doctor Francisco Suárez, primary professor in the Academy of Coimbra, and I judge it worthy of its author. For there is more in it that is approved by sight than can be praised by the mouth, as St. Ambrose says concerning light in book 1 of the Hexaemeron, chapter 9. It may therefore be committed to type for the common utility of all. Given in the convent of St. Dominic at Lisbon, on 5 August, in the year 1611.

§ 5. Theologians indeed discuss laws in order to lead the minds of human beings toward obedience and a desire for what is true and honorable. My purpose, however, is to show from the rationale and nature of right and laws by what means a city may be governed best. I therefore see that many of their disputations must be left aside, that I must take up those matters which they have discussed copiously, and that many matters more commonly employed in schools than in courts and tribunals must also be passed over; but everything must be accommodated to the use and utility of men engaged in the state.

There is one matter about which I wish all who either enact laws, defend them by reason of their office, or interpret them to be admonished: that they show regard for the laws which they themselves approve. Lactantius speaks excellently in book 4 of the Divine Institutes: "Whoever gives precepts to human beings fashions them for life and morals. The good things which he has prescribed belong, indeed, to others; but he himself must live in the same manner in which he teaches that one must live, lest, if he lives otherwise, he detract from the credibility of his precepts and render his doctrine less weighty--if in deed he loosens what in words he strives to bind. Therefore, when someone does not do what he has prescribed, what arrogance it is that he wishes to impose upon a free human being laws which he himself does not obey! For human beings prefer examples to words, because speaking is easy, but performing is difficult."

CHAPTER II

The Definition and Division of Laws

§ 1. There are many definitions of laws, which can easily be defended but much more easily attacked. For nothing is rarer than an exact definition. Indeed, every difficulty can be reduced to a definition.

Aristotle, To Alexander: Καὶ γὰρ ὁ νόμος ἐστίν, λόγος ὡρισμένος καθ᾽ ὁμολογίαν κοινὴν πόλεως, μηνύων πῶς δεῖ πράττειν ἕκαστα. For law too is a statement--or rational ordinance--defined by the common consent of the city, showing how each thing is to be done.

Cicero, book 1 of On the Laws: "Law is the highest reason implanted in nature, which commands those things that ought to be done and forbids their contraries." And in book 2 of On the Nature of the Gods: "Law is the prescription of what is right and the repulsion of what is depraved."

St. Thomas, I--II, question 91, article 4: "Law is an ordinance of reason for the common good, promulgated by him who has care of the community."

Papinian, Lex est, π. On Laws: "Law is a common precept, the considered judgment of prudent men, the coercion of offenses committed either willingly or through ignorance, and, finally, the common pledge of the state."

Alfonso de Castro: "Law is the right will of him who represents the people, promulgated by voice or writing, with the intention of obliging subjects to it."

Valencia: "Law is a certain right decree of practical reason, sufficiently sanctioned by him who bears the care of the community, and established so that by its force some mode must necessarily be applied, whether in a thing or in an action, for the sake of the common good."

John de Salas: "Law is a precept imposed upon a community, perpetually binding unless it is revoked."

Suárez, book 1, chapter 12: "Law is a common, just, and stable precept, sufficiently promulgated."

I willingly pass over other definitions, such as: "A law is a general command of the people or of the plebs, upon the senate's proposal." Gellius, book 10, chapter 20. And:

"A law is what the Roman people established when questioned by a senatorial magistrate, such as a consul." For these contain particular law.

Most of those definitions seem to me capable, by a suitable interpretation, of being referred to a true understanding and explanation.

Therefore, in order that we may place the thing itself before our eyes, many matters must be considered in the meaning of laws and in the thing itself.

§ 2. First, the Hebrews call law תורה, from תור, which means to explore, consider, and order. For תור is order, method, ordinance; for an investigation proceeds in a most orderly manner when it prudently examines a matter. At Esther 2:12 it designates a time or order. But I prefer to derive it from ירה, which means to teach; and among the Hebrews it is taken very broadly, so as to mean method, doctrine, disposition, judgment, and statute. Among the Greeks it is called νόμος, not so much from feeding as from distributing to each person his own right. Formerly, however, they called songs νόμους, as Aristotle is the authority, Problems, section 19, problem 28: "Why are most laws called songs? Is it because, before human beings knew letters, they sang their laws, lest they consign them to oblivion--a practice which even in our own age is customary among the Agathyrsi? Therefore they also called the earliest of the later songs by the same name by which all the earlier ones were called." Law, therefore, is called a measure, rule, norm, condition, and precept, even when inequitable; but we are speaking of law in its proper sense.

§ 3. Next, every law is composed of various parts. For in it there is a judgment, or an act of the legislator's intellect, by which he judges that something is to be done or not done and that the subject is to be bound. Next there is a decree, or an act of the will, by which he determines to bind him. Third, there is promulgation, by which the law is made known to the subject. Fourth, there is the subject's understanding, by which he recognizes his obligation--or, certainly, fails to know it through his own fault. Finally, there is the thing itself, or what they call the object, about which the judgment and will both of the legislator and of the subjects are occupied. The law in Paradise is: "You shall not eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil." This object, known by God and human beings, is called law and is the terminus of divine command and human obedience. For it directs both the intellect and the will of the human being. First God understands that this is to be commanded; next he wills to command it; and finally he declares it by his command, upon knowledge of which the obligation to obey arises. Therefore, the matters disputed at greater length here by the theologians--whether law is a work of the intellect or of the will--are in no way necessary for us, since it embraces both. Once these matters have been established, therefore, it is easy to comprehend the nature of law in a brief definition.

Law is an equitable precept of a superior, obliging a subject to act or not to act. For precept is the genus; equity excludes unjust commands, which are called laws only by an abuse; and the obligation of the subject includes promulgation and the other elements. I shall speak in its proper place about stability and the other attributes of laws.

§ 4. There is a great affinity between law and right, and they are frequently confused. Ius, right, is so called because it is just, and it is the object of justice. For that virtue establishes its own object, just as the other virtues do. For they say that this is right which has flowed from justice as its fountain. General right, I say, is that which corresponds to general justice: namely, that which in every thing and action is consonant with right reason and equity. Particular right is that which corresponds to justice strictly taken, and it is either what law prescribes or the faculty which law grants to each person. In the usage of jurists, ius frequently signifies law. "Right is civil equity," says Crispus, "either sanctioned by written laws or received in institutions or customs." And these are the beginnings and the nature of laws.

§ 5. The division of laws and of right is, by a certain proportion, the same. The ministers of Themis themselves establish a varied partition of right. They call the natural inclination of each thing primary natural right; next, secondary natural right, such as standing by promises and harming no one. This same thing is called by some primary law of nations. Third, what is derived from this they call secondary law of nations, as that which is gathered by practical reasoning in a manner so consonant with nature that all nations--or nearly all, unless they are exceedingly savage--agree upon it. Thus natural right is not altogether distinct from the law of nations. For the emperor calls that the law of nations which natural reason has established among all human beings. Necessity establishes secondary natural right, as Aristotle says in book 1 of the Politics, chapter 3. An example is servitude, which is not contrary to natural right--namely, that milder servitude amended by Justinian and others; for the ancient form was altogether barbarous and tyrannical.

They likewise call right that of τῶν νόμων ἐγγράφων, written laws, and ἀγράφων, unwritten laws; others call them θέσμια, ordinances, and τὸ νόμιμον, what is lawful. There is also the right of persons, things, and actions.

From this also arose what is called civil law, which neither departs wholly from natural right or the law of nations nor serves it in every respect. Thus, when we add something to or subtract something from the common right, we understand it as proper or civil law. But if it departs altogether from natural right, it is no longer right, but injustice and tyranny.

Thus servitude belongs to the law of nations. For although all are born free--because the whole human race is one and from one--nevertheless they can become slaves by the law of nations, which is not contrary to the law of nature. For he who brings an unjust war against another and contrives his death can himself be killed:

> In my judgment, guile is permitted to repel guile,
> And laws allow arms to be taken up against the armed.

Nevertheless, by the humanity of civilized nations, servitude was substituted for the penalty of death. Civil law, therefore, never corrupts natural equity, but determines it. But if at times it seems to depart rather far from it, it must nevertheless have a reason which, on account of some circumstance, makes what is prescribed just. It certainly seems harsh that by prescription one should lose possession of one's own property; but lest the ownership of things be tossed into uncertainty for a very long time when the possessor is uncertain, it is more prudent to provide for public tranquility at the cost of a few. Gregory of Toulouse speaks excellently in the Syntagma of Law, book 11, chapter 1, § 9 and following: "In the same way, civil reason too has natural reason almost always as its companion. For a reason can scarcely be named which is not natural; yet it does not always consider what accords with the common nature of all, but sometimes only the circumstance of a particular civil society, so that someone's life may be ordered more suitably, account being taken of the customs of the present place and of what happens there more frequently than elsewhere among human beings generally."

Hence civil law--which is proper to each city, that is, which is especially conformed to the rites and customs received in the city--partly agrees with the law of nature, as though with the leaven of equity, justice, and right, from which it has so much as is just; yet it does not serve it in every respect--that is, it does not enact altogether according to universal natural equity. For the necessity of societies sometimes commands a departure from that equity: penalties may be increased because of the frequency of crimes, or harsher provisions enacted because customs are more savage and barbarous; at other times penalties may be diminished for the contrary reason. It is expedient to temper laws in one way here and in another way elsewhere. All these laws, although different and contrary in different places, are nevertheless just and equitable, but by a different rationale and in a qualified sense--not according to the general consideration of the law of nature in the abstract, but according to natural right in the concrete, that is, according to the suitability of the subject for whom the legislator prescribes what is just. Thus I do not doubt that natural right also exists in civil law. Yet in that concrete case the designation civil predominates. And although civil sanctions, if they are not consonant with reason, do not make right, even though they are so named, but rather corruption; nevertheless, if they agree with reason, since that reason is natural, civil law will in this way also be natural law, and in the concrete it can be called both natural and civil law, by reason of its restriction to this or that city.

§ 6. These are the determinations they have made concerning right; the division of laws also is not dissimilar. In the Timaeus, Plato divides law into divine, celestial, natural, and human. He distinguishes celestial law from divine. He calls that divine which theologians call eternal law, which is the rational order existing in the divine mind and governing the universe. For Plato, celestial law is μοῖρα, or fate, which Christian piety does not admit except under a sound interpretation. Natural law is that which we defined above. St. Thomas divides law according to the same rationale into eternal, natural, divine, and human; others divide law or right into natural and positive. Jurists consider natural law, the law of nations, and civil law; they leave divine and canon law to theologians. Authors divide civil right or law into six parts.

For a law is what the Roman people established when questioned by a senatorial magistrate. But this definition concerns only Roman law and the law of the state while it stood. For Romulus had established that nothing should be sacrosanct unless the plebs or people had sanctioned it. What had seemed good to the curiae was referred to the senate. For the enactment of laws, the creation of magistrates, and the determination of war were in the power of the people. Indeed, the imposition of a more serious fine was also decreed by the people, Titus Livy, book 25.

A decree of the senate is what the senate determined. If any tribune interposed his veto, only a formal opinion was written down and the matter was referred to the senate and people. Many, however, exclude this kind of law; for decrees of the senate and magistrates did not possess the same force as commands of the people, since both magistrates and plebs swore to a law. Nevertheless, it can be called a true law; for lesser power or obligation does not cause it to cease being law, but causes it to be a weaker law, nor does it belong to the definition of law that subjects swear to it. For the senate is consulted in the place of the whole people, and therefore it possesses power over affairs to be conducted, except those which the people reserved.

Festus defines plebiscites as those measures which the plebs accepted in the tribal assemblies, without the Fathers, upon the proposal of a plebeian magistrate--that is, a tribune of the plebs.

Edicts were the measures which the other magistrates--such as consuls, aediles, and tribunes, but especially praetors--promulgated at the beginning of their assumption of office. For this reason it was called praetorian law, just as it was also called honorary law, because it had been declared by those who held honors.

At the beginning of their term the praetors declared what law they would pronounce concerning each matter, so that each person might prepare himself: book 2, § 5, On the Ancient Civil Law of the Romans, and Sigonius, book 3, chapter 5. In book 1 of the second pleading Against Verres, Cicero calls it an annual law. For the Kalends of January brought it to an end, and on the same Kalends its beginning arose. By this law the urban praetor pronounced judgment, not according to his own discretion, but in accordance with laws already enacted; for he assisted, supplemented, and sometimes corrected the laws of the Twelve Tables. Thus it belonged to his office to establish laws according to equity and the present condition of the city. That power was moderated, both because its end was equity and because it was annual; and if he had pronounced judgment inequitably, not only was his rejection from the consulship certain, but an accuser also threatened him. Nevertheless, it was later judged proper to make the praetors' edicts perpetual, as was provided by the Cornelian law.

The determinations of princes are those occasions when the emperor has either given a rescript, rendered judgment, or prescribed something by edict. That power was given to Caesar through the Royal Law, so that the whole ordering of laws, just as the state itself, came to one man.

Finally, the opinions of prudent men are the judgments of jurists who formerly gave opinions concerning right with public authority. A judge was not permitted to depart from their consensus. The Institutes, book 1, title 2, § 8, speaks thus about them: "The opinions of prudent men are the judgments and opinions of those to whom it was permitted to give opinions concerning right. For in antiquity it was established that there should be persons who publicly interpreted laws, to whom Caesar gave the right of giving opinions and who were called jurisconsults. The judgments and opinions of all of them possessed such authority that a judge was not permitted to depart from their opinion, as has been established. Unwritten law is that which usage has approved. For customs of long standing, confirmed by the consent of those who use them, imitate law. And it seems not inelegant that civil law has been distributed into two species, for its origin appears to have flowed from the institutions of two cities, namely Athens and Lacedaemon. In these cities it was customary to proceed in such a way that the Lacedaemonians committed to memory those things which they observed as laws, whereas the Athenians preserved those things which they had embraced in written laws. But natural rights, which are for the most part observed among all nations, remain always firm and immutable, having been established by a certain divine providence. Those things, however, which each city establishes for itself are often accustomed to be changed, either by the tacit consent of the people or by another law subsequently enacted. Moreover, all the right which we use pertains either to persons, to things, or to actions; and let us first consider persons, for it is a small thing to know right if the persons for whose sake it was established are unknown."

In this manner, therefore, the emperor himself defines and divides right--but written right, as he says. For customs, about which I shall speak in their proper place, pertain elsewhere. For Charles Sigonius, in book 1, chapter 5 of On the Ancient Law of the Romans, makes law twofold, namely, one part consisting in writing and the other in custom. And indeed the laws of some cities were not written, as Justinian testifies. Custom and the institutions of the ancestors brought unwritten right into the state, and by their equity the austerity of the law was often tempered.

§ 7. Certainly, among an uncultivated people there was no law at the beginning. A book of Roman law was compiled in the times of Tarquinius Superbus, concerning which Pomponius says: "At the beginning of our city, the people began at first to conduct affairs without fixed law and without fixed right, and all things were governed by the hand of the kings. Later, after the city had increased to some extent, Romulus himself is said to have divided the people into thirty parts, which he called curiae, because at that time he administered the care of the state through the judgments of those parts. Thus he himself proposed certain curiate laws to the people, and the succeeding kings also proposed them. All these laws remain compiled in the book of Sextus Papirius, who lived in those times in which Superbus, the son of Demaratus the Corinthian, was among the foremost men. That book, as we have said, is called the Papirian civil law--not because Papirius added anything of his own there, but because he brought together into one collection laws enacted without order."

But they lived more by royal will than by right. Therefore, after the tyrants had been expelled and liberty had been afflicted by the domination of the patricians, thought was given to laws. From this arose the Twelve Tables, which contained a threefold right, or three kinds of laws. Ausonius, in the Riddle of the Number Three:

> The threefold law of the Tables, which four times three sanctioned:
> Sacred, private, and whatever was common to the people.

Actions, procedures, and formulas were appended to the laws. At first these were employed to shorten lawsuits, lest each person conduct cases according to his own discretion; but afterward Gnaeus Flavius published the formulas, whence came the Flavian law. Aelius added other actions, which the uncultivated multitude called the Aelian law. For when contention occurs in the forum, the brawler generally gains more authority than the jurist. And these observations suffice concerning the descriptions and divisions of right and laws, about which novices in political philosophy are customarily instructed at very great length.

CHAPTER III

The Necessity and Utility of Laws

§ 1. We do not call law necessary in the same manner in every case. For eternal law, considered in itself--that is, the object of a just command, by which right things are commanded, and of the obedience by which commands are received--is everlasting. Thus it is necessary in such a way that its nonexistence is contradictory. For that an injury must not be inflicted and that equity must be cultivated is a most sacred law, and a necessary one which no reasoning can obscure and no force can break. For by no power--not even by the omnipotent power of God--can it be brought about that inflicting injury upon another is just.

§ 2. Eternal and natural law is necessary if creatures possessing reason and intellect exist. For those living beings, or spirits, endowed with a lofty and capacious mind and a free will, are by their nature subject to the command of a greater lord. For they depend upon the will and providence of him by whose power they were created; thus it is their nature to obey. Lactantius explained this excellently in book 6, chapter 8: “True law is indeed right reason, consonant with nature, diffused among all, constant and everlasting, which calls to duty by commanding and deters from wrongdoing by forbidding. Yet it neither commands nor forbids the upright in vain, nor moves the wicked by commanding or forbidding. It is not lawful for this law to be extended, nor is it permitted that anything be derogated from it, nor can it be wholly abrogated. Nor indeed can we be released from this law either by the senate or by the people; nor must another expositor or interpreter be sought. Nor will there be one law at Rome, another at Athens; one now, another hereafter. Rather, one everlasting and immutable law will embrace all nations and every time; and God will be, as it were, the one common master and commander of all--the inventor, judge, and enactor of this law. Whoever does not obey him will flee from himself and spurn the nature of the human being; by this very fact he will suffer the greatest penalties, even if he escapes the other punishments which are so regarded.”

Thus a rule has been implanted in the mind itself, and therefore in the nature of justice and holiness. Hence it was rightly said: God reigns where law reigns.

> For without law, what remains for earth and heaven
>
> To obey? All things are governed in succession,
>
> And by turns submit beneath their proper laws; the whole
>
> Earth submits, while fortunate Rome presses upon the diadems of kings.
>
> To rulers it was granted to restrain her; soon authority over them
> Grows for the gods above.

§ 3. Some cities were founded with laws from their very beginning; others gradually added and changed laws. Good laws have generally arisen from vices. Just as the onrushing force of diseases compelled the development of medicines, so human beings, driven by necessity, agreed upon various laws of living. Nevertheless, the condition of those cities which established laws together with their very walls is better; for since the safety of the city lies in its laws, as Aristotle advises in book 1 of the Rhetoric, chapter 4, fortifications of bodies give little assistance if little provision has been made for the integrity of minds.

§ 4. The principal difficulty concerns positive civil and canon laws, and even those which they call the positive laws of God. For many, hating laws and the order of laws, approve a lawless life and admire the ancient race among whom life was not conducted by law, among whom simple reason and charity stood in place of law:

> Nor did the suppliant multitude fear

The face of its judge, but without a judge they were safe.

But those men fabricate ideas and, as the poet says, ἀεροβατεῖ, walk upon the air; they seek or fashion a state such as no age has seen or will see. We know that the virgin earth was drenched with a brother's blood and that the whole world before the flood was destroyed by waters; and yet, soon after so great a shipwreck, an insolent son mocked his parent and the lust for dominion blazed up on the plain of Shinar. I therefore judge as follows. Just as all human beings--and indeed every creature--are by their nature flexible in either direction, for by the very fact that a creature is from nothing it is mutable, waxen toward both evil and good, and therefore needs law in order that it may live in conformity with a right norm, be held back from evil, and become accustomed to virtue; so also, since we see very many persons sinning very frequently in the state, there is need of a law which not only forbids sins but also cuts away occasions for sins. But I shall omit those disputations concerning the absolute power and necessity of laws. Concerning external political laws, which are properly called civil, it is established that no city can be administered without them. For since human nature is corrupt and inclined to evil from youth, it must be restrained by fear of the laws. Without laws the society of human beings is robbery and injustice; it is in no way a state. Nor would it be enough for there to be princes and magistrates, for they too are frequently drawn from the many and sometimes are worse even than the multitude. Certainly they do not always judge with the same disposition; nor is it enough that they have been well instructed, for commands change even good men. Formerly the judgments of princes stood for laws; but the proven faithfulness of the prince caused laws not to be missed. Augustine, book 4 of The City of God, chapter 6, from Pompeius Trogus: "At the beginning of affairs, the command of peoples and nations was in the hands of kings. Not popular ambition but moderation proven among good men raised them to the summit of this majesty. The peoples were bound by no laws; the judgments of princes stood for laws. It was customary to defend rather than extend the boundaries of command. The kingdoms of each ruler ended within his own homeland. Ninus, king of the Assyrians, was the first of all to change the ancient custom, as though ancestral to the nations, through a new lust for empire. He was the first to bring wars upon his neighbors and subdued peoples still untrained in resistance as far as the boundaries of Libya." So too in book 2, at the beginning, On the Origin of Right and Laws, and in On Constitutions, § "But also what has pleased the prince."

§ 5. But law is necessary not only for these reasons; primacy also must be given to it. For law is queen of all, as Pindar admonished: ὁ νόμος πάντων ἐστὶ βασιλεύς, θνητῶν τε καὶ ἀθανάτων. Law is queen of all human beings and gods. The angels too had their law, and private households have theirs. Marcianus speaks excellently in book 2 On Laws: ὁ νόμος πάντων ἐστὶ βασιλεὺς θείων τε καὶ ἀνθρωπίνων πραγμάτων, δεῖ δὲ αὐτὸν προστάτην τε εἶναι τῶν καλῶν καὶ τῶν αἰσχρῶν, καὶ ἄρχοντα καὶ ἡγεμόνα· καὶ κατὰ τοῦτο κανόνα τε εἶναι δικαίων καὶ ἀδίκων, καὶ ὅσα φύσει πολιτικὰ ζῷα, τῶν μὲν ποιητέων προστακτικόν, τῶν δὲ οὐ ποιητέων ἀπαγορευτικόν. That is: "Law is queen of all divine and human affairs. For it ought to preside over both good and evil, and to be prince and leader; and in accordance with this, to be the rule of just and unjust things and, for all living beings that are political by nature, the commander of things to be done and the forbidding authority of things not to be done."

The necessity of order in every state, in an army, and in courts is so evident that without it no community can endure. For since innumerable things are indifferent and can rightly be done in different ways, nevertheless, unless an order is prescribed so that they are performed in some fixed manner, they cannot be done at all without difficulty. Without some right not only can no state act, but not even a band of robbers can. Conspiracies established against the laws themselves possess certain laws, nor can they have strength without some appearance of justice. Laws forbidding disgraceful things and commanding honorable things are not the only laws necessary; there are also other laws about lesser matters--about the right of boundaries, dripping rainwater, servitudes, roads, light, and overhanging roofs--without which a city cannot long endure. For all things are uncertain: not only possessions and buildings, but life itself. No one can be certain what is his and what belongs to another in a city in which nothing is acquired or retained by any law. Everything must be tossed about. No one can determine what he may leave to heirs or bequeath to those who have deserved well. Demosthenes therefore spoke very well when he said that the whole life of mortals is governed by laws and by nature. Nature is not sufficient in a state, even when it is upright and morals are good. There is need to have, so far as possible, a fixed norm for all things, fixed orders and limits, and a method of acting. The law concerning prescription is a harsh one and, unless restoration to the former condition is granted, is sometimes unjust; nevertheless, without it the safety of the state cannot be preserved unimpaired, because ownership of things would remain uncertain for a very long time. Law therefore removes disturbances, establishes peace, and establishes charity among citizens. A multitude of lawsuits does not follow from the right ordering of laws; for it is not a moderate multitude and knowledge of laws, but ignorance, that is litigious, as Cicero very well admonished in book 1 of On the Laws.

Law is the eye and light of the city. When it has been removed, darkness will possess all things, together with the works of darkness--that is, crimes. But if light sometimes flashes amid that dense darkness, it nevertheless will not be capable of being seen if the eye trembles with continual shaking.

Therefore a prudent legislator will write laws concerning even small matters which will have no small importance--not only for inducing a habit and love of obedience, but also for avoiding disturbances. The Ephors' slight and ridiculous precept seemed so to many: ξυρεῖσθαι τὸν μύστακα, "To shave the beard." But the reason is added: καὶ πείθεσθαι τοῖς νόμοις, "and to obey the laws"; for there ought to be great reverence even for the smallest laws. How many laws concerning minute things did the immense majesty of God enact for the Israelites? Yet they had to be observed, and they possess a just reason. What of that law in Deuteronomy 23:15? "You shall have a place outside the camp to which you may go out for the requirements of nature, carrying a small stake in your belt; and when you sit down, you shall dig round about and cover with the displaced earth that of which you have relieved yourself." God therefore enacts a law even about the smallest and sordid things.

§ 6. Therefore, let no one esteem lightly laws concerning matters which are not great, for they concern things either necessary or useful. I have admired the care, solicitude, prudence, and vigilance of the princes of Germany--not only of each one in his own territories, but of them all together in public assemblies. Examine the imperial recesses: you will find sanctions worthy of German majesty concerning the most serious matters, and most prudent laws concerning the smallest as well--at Augsburg in the years 1530, 1551, 1559, and 1566; at Speyer in 1570; and at Frankfurt in 1577. Examine the headings: von den Schalcknarren / Pfeifferen / Trommetern / Spielleuten / Landfährern / Sängern / vnd Reimsprechern--concerning buffoons, pipers, trumpeters, players upon every kind of instrument, vagabonds, singers, and versifiers. For because the safety of all pertains to the care of princes, laws also had to be enacted concerning all. Nor does guardianship by laws obstruct liberty; rather, it is the fountain of liberty. It is wickedness to wish to be permitted what the laws forbid--not only in matters which nature has sanctioned, but also in those in which law has determined one part of what nature left free. The state has forbidden the carrying of swords; it is now contrary to nature for you alone to rise against all who obey and to go about girded with a sword. He who, with great labor, levels and paves roads through the rough places of hills and commands all to undertake their journey by a direct and safe route does not obstruct liberty. It is not the part of a free person, but of a madman, to run through thickets and rough places and to refuse to make use of another's kindness. Heraclitus therefore spoke very well when he said that one must fight more for laws than for walls; for a city can exist without walls, but not without laws. Sparta long held walls in contempt, and at that time was more fortunate. A bull can live without horns, a lion without claws, and a boar without the thunderbolt of its teeth, but none can live without a soul. Law is the soul of a city; therefore, the city cannot exist without it, since neither place nor any force of resources can preserve dominion without laws.

The state, therefore, will be safe if all fear the law as a tyrant, as Bias prudently judged, if the greatest authority resides ἐν τῷ ποικίλῳ ξύλῳ, in the variegated or inscribed wood.

Indeed, this too must be noted: excessive prosperity is most dangerous solely for this reason, that one who is excessively prosperous does not easily endure the yoke of laws, just as luxuriant horses throw off their rider. When Plato was once consulted about writing laws for a most flourishing and wealthy--and consequently most wanton--state, he replied: "It is not easy to write laws for such prosperous Cyrenaeans." Gregory of Toulouse also speaks excellently in the Syntagma of Law, book 47, chapter 3, § 2: "This is among legitimate acts, because it cannot be called a judgment unless it is made according to the laws. And magistrates then rightly administer the state if they follow the laws. For he who wishes law to rule wishes God and the laws to preside; but he who wishes a city to be governed by a human being's discretion adds a most savage beast, as Aristotle writes." Although I know that Aristotle examined most diligently whether it is more useful for the best man to command than the best law, I think it truer that laws established by the best deliberations ought rather to be followed, as inflexible things rather than the mutable wills of human beings. As Plato too rightly thinks, the destruction of the state is imminent when laws do not command magistrates, but magistrates command laws.

§ 7. The Church also approves the laws of the state and makes use of them. The bishop of Bagai sought assistance from the laws, and Augustine judged that he had done this not only rightly but necessarily, since he had followed Paul's example. Letter 50, to Count Boniface: "He therefore sought assistance from a Christian emperor, not so much for the sake of avenging himself as of defending the Church entrusted to him. If he had neglected this, his patience would not have been praiseworthy, but his negligence would deservedly have been blamed. For the Apostle Paul too was not taking thought for his transitory life, but for the Church of God, when he brought it about that the plan of those who had conspired to kill him was disclosed to the tribune. Hence it came about that an armed soldier escorted him to the place to which he was to be conducted, lest he suffer from their treachery. He also did not hesitate at all to invoke the Roman laws, proclaiming himself a Roman citizen, for Roman citizens were not then permitted to be afflicted with scourges. Likewise, lest he be handed over to the Jews who desired to kill him, he sought the aid of Caesar--a Roman prince, indeed, but not a Christian one. In this he sufficiently showed what the stewards of Christ ought to do afterward when they found Christian emperors while the Church was in danger."

The same Augustine, in Letter 48 to Vincentius, also approves that the impious be bound by the chains of civil laws as though they were frenzied; for laws, even when burdensome, correct in a salutary manner. Thus in Letter 50: "For this happened to the Donatists which happened to the accusers of holy Daniel. For just as the lions were turned against the latter, so the laws by which they wished to oppress the innocent were turned against the former--except that, on account of Christ's mercy, these laws which seem adverse to them are rather for their benefit, since many have been corrected through them and are corrected daily; and they give thanks that they have been corrected and freed from that furious destruction. Those who hated now love; and, when health has been restored, they rejoice over the most salutary laws which had been burdensome to them as greatly as they detested them in their madness. They are now aroused, with us and with a similar love, toward those who remain and with whom they would have perished, so that together we may press upon them lest they perish. For the physician is burdensome to a raging madman, and the father to an undisciplined son--the former by binding, the latter by beating, but both by loving. If, however, they neglect them and allow them to perish, that false gentleness is rather cruelty."

CHAPTER IV

The Matter of Laws Is Varied

§ 1. The matter of law is twofold: that in which law exists, which the schools call the subject of law, and that about which law exists. The subject of law is the intellect and the will. For we are not treating the law of sin about which the Apostle disputes in Romans 7. Every law, therefore, is in the mind and the will, as I taught above. Next, law exists in speech and in writings as in signs.

Nevertheless, it is not necessary that a law be written; consequently, parchments and tablets are not necessary subjects of laws. Thus, Digest, book 1, title 3, § 32: "In those cases in which we do not use written laws, that must be observed which has been introduced by customs and usage; and if this should be lacking in a particular matter, then that which is nearest and consequent upon it; but if not even that should appear, then the law which the city of Rome uses must be observed."

"Custom grown old is deservedly observed as law--and this is the right which is said to have been established by customs. For since the laws themselves bind us for no other reason than that they have been received by the judgment of the people, those things also which the people have approved without any writing will deservedly bind all. For what difference does it make whether the people declare their will by vote or by the things and deeds themselves? Hence this too has most rightly been received: that laws are abrogated not only by a vote of the legislator, but also through disuse by the tacit consent of all."

Lycurgus certainly did not write his laws, and formerly laws were also contained in songs, which individuals taught to their own people. The same rationale applies to canon laws, for which writing is in no way necessary. Suárez, de Salas, and Valencia teach this, and Aristotle before them in book 10 of the Ethics, chapter 9.

Nevertheless, it is most useful for a law to be written. First, God willed that his law, which he gave to a people now multiplied, be written; indeed, he himself inscribed it upon stone tablets with his own finger. He willed that the volume of the law should never depart from the hands of the Israelites. For writing is the principal aid to memory. Nations which are illiterate and afflicted by wars, floods, and epidemics easily change and forget all their institutions. Words easily escape; sentences are easily mutilated when trust is placed in memory alone. They must therefore be bound fast by durable characters suitable for eternity.

Basil speaks elegantly in Letter 178: "Words have a winged nature. Human beings therefore employ the characters of letters so that one who writes may catch the speed of flying speech. You, therefore, boy, must draw the characters of the letters perfectly and set their forms in the right order. For a slight error by the writer detracts very much from the discourse; but by the writer's diligence, what has been said is completed and brought to perfection intact."

The speech of one who is speaking cannot so easily be corrected, because it swiftly flies across after φύγεν ἕρκος ὀδόντων, it has escaped the fence of the teeth. Just as one cannot observe a bird flying beneath a cloud as readily as one which is confined in a cage.

Next, through the easiest repetition of written law,

all agreements, covenants, and contracts are directed. Nor can the memory of one human being, however prodigious, possibly be the repository of that multitude of all the laws. Thus Exodus 17:14 and Deuteronomy 31:22: "Moses therefore wrote the song and taught it to the children of Israel. And the Lord commanded Joshua the son of Nun and said: Take courage and be strong; for you shall bring the children of Israel into the land which I promised, and I shall be with you. Therefore, after Moses wrote the words of this law in a volume and completed it, he commanded the Levites who carried the ark of the covenant of the Lord, saying: Take this book and place it beside the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, so that it may be there as a testimony against you."

And Deuteronomy 17:18: "After he has taken his seat upon the throne of his kingdom, he shall write for himself a copy of this law in a volume, receiving an exemplar from the priests of the Levitical tribe; and he shall have it with him and read it all the days of his life, so that he may learn to fear the Lord his God and to keep his words and ceremonies which have been commanded in the law. Let not his heart be raised in pride above his brothers, nor let him turn aside to the right or the left, so that he and his son may reign for a long time over Israel."

Most nations followed God in this matter and committed civil laws to writing. For although Sallust defines right as civil equity either sanctioned by written laws or received in institutions and customs, and most distinguish custom from law in such a way that law is written while custom is ἄγραφος, unwritten, nevertheless this has not been deduced from the nature of laws, but from the practice of states, which have published all laws in writing and maintain customs without writing. Hence Isidore admonishes in book 2 of the Etymologies, chapter 10: "The difference between law and custom is that law is written, whereas custom is a usage approved by antiquity, or an unwritten law." And in book 5, chapter 3: "Law is a written constitution; custom is an unwritten usage approved by antiquity." For most laws not only are written but also ought to be written, although without writing they too contain the nature of law.

§ 2. In the Roman state writing was required for a law. For a magistrate who was to propose a law first weighed it himself at home in written form and summoned into consultation those skilled in law and customs. Next, he referred the question of its enactment to the senate or people. Third, he posted it in public--or published it beforehand, as Festus says--so that it could be inspected, assessed, and judged by anyone. The interval during which the examination of the law continued was a trinundinum, that is, twenty-seven days. Fourth, they recommended or opposed it and commanded that it be law, and this in writing with the letters V. R., that is, uti rogas, "as you propose"; or that it not be law, with the letter A., that is, antiquo, "I reject it in favor of the old." After the law had been accepted, all confirmed it by oath. Finally, it was cut into bronze, and the tablets were either displayed in public or deposited in the treasury. Roman laws, therefore, were not without writing. Hence some deny that a measure is law in the Roman Empire if it has not been written--a view which the emperor also seems to hold in the Code, On Laws, law Humanum. This practice is certainly so customary that a prince must deservedly be said to act imprudently if he promulgates a law without writing.

§ 3. The matter about which law treats consists in the actions of those who use reason and free choice. For whatever can be governed by some norm is capable of law. Various matters concerning this will occur throughout the whole book; for now I wish these few observations to be noted.

In general, therefore, laws command or forbid human acts, and civil laws are occupied with no other matter. But the actions of human beings are manifold--praiseworthy, depraved, or indifferent--and they are as many and varied as the chorus of virtues is great and the chaos of vices. Next, some actions are conceived in the mind and will alone; the work of others appears in words and deeds. Third, the performance of some works is ordinary and easy, but that of others rare, difficult, dangerous, horrifying, and full of torment. Concerning these I judge as follows.

§ 4. No civil law can command or defend any evils, even if pseudo-statesmen proclaim that this is necessary for the state. Thus civil law either forbids an evil or commands nothing concerning it, but wholly disregards it. Machiavelli therefore destroys the state when, for its protection, he admits crimes into the fellowship of the virtues as though they were useful. Sylvester asserts, under the word Law, § 10, that there are many unjust laws.

First, those laws which permit the son of one full brother to contract marriage with the daughter of another full brother, as in the Institutes, On Abduction, § Inter eas, and in the Code, On Nuptials, law Nemini; because according to the law of God such persons must be separated entirely: On Consanguinity and Affinity, Non debet, and 35, question 3, Progeniem.

Second, those laws which say that an abducted girl cannot contract marriage with her abductor, Code, On the Abduction of Virgins, sole law; because today she can do so according to the canons, On Abduction, final chapter, although according to the ancient canons she could not.

Third, those laws which permit an unmarried man to keep an unmarried woman as a concubine, as in the Authenticum, By What Modes Natural Children Are Made Legitimate, § Si quis; because according to the law of God even simple fornication is a sin and excludes one from the kingdom of God, 1 Corinthians 6.

Fourth, those laws which permit a husband to kill the adulterer of his wife when caught in adultery, if he is a lowly person and one to whom reverence is not owed: Digest, On Adulteries, law Marito, law 1, and law Si adulterium; whereas today, under the new law, he can kill him not only when caught in adultery, but anywhere after three denunciations, as in the Authenticum, That It Be Permitted to the Mother and Grandmother, penultimate and final sections. And those laws which permit a father who has his daughter under his power to kill the daughter's adulterer when he is committing fornication in his own house or that of the son-in-law, and to kill the daughter herself: Digest, On Adulteries, laws Pater and Non in ea; and even one found engaged in sexual preliminaries, by law Quod ait, Digest, On Adulteries, which according to the Gloss are things antecedent to the crime--namely preparations, conversations, an appointed place, banquets, kisses, and touches; and Bartolus holds the same. Likewise concerning a brigand and a plunderer of fields. For according to the law of God none of these killings is permitted, according to Exodus 20, "You shall not kill"; concerning which see also Homicide 1, § 2, part 5.

Fifth, those laws which condemn a man who retains a wife caught in adultery: Code, On Adulteries, laws Crimen and Castitati; because according to the law of God and canon law he can retain her without penalty, provided that she is willing to withdraw from adultery, 31, question 1, § Obauditur.

Sixth, those laws which permit repudiation of a wife and dissolution of a marriage duly contracted in many cases, especially in the case noted in chapter Lege, distinction 10, and 27, question 2. There are those who say that these laws are unjust because this is prohibited in those same chapters.

Seventh, those laws which condemn a wife who marries within the period of mourning for her husband--that is, within one year--to infamy and many penalties: Code, On Second Marriages, laws 1 and 2; because the Apostle says that a woman may marry whom she wishes, On Second Marriages, chapter 1, at the end, where Innocent notes that all penalties which are only for her punishment are remitted to her. It is otherwise if something thereby accrues to others, as Lord Antonius de Butrio declares more fully in the same place, saying that penalties founded upon hatred of second marriages or upon the haste of the transition have been corrected, as in the cited final chapter, because contracting marriage is neither hateful nor forbidden but permitted by the Apostle. Those penalties, however, which are founded upon favor toward the first marriage still endure. Thus, if a mother obtains anything intestate or by testament from any of the children of the former marriage, she has only the usufruct of it while she lives, while ownership remains with the children of the same marriage if any survive; if none survive, she obtains the full right, as in law Feminae, final section, On Second Marriages. Add that the penalties established in favor of children and on account of the mother's fault remain. Thus the law imposes a penalty upon a mother who has acknowledged the guardianship of her son and passes to second vows without requesting a guardian for her son, as in law Omnem matri, Code, To the Tertullian Decree of the Senate.

Eighth, those laws which say that a spurious son is not to be maintained, as above, Son, § 4.

Ninth, those laws which say that an heir, if he has not made an inventory, is liable for all the debts of the deceased; the contrary of this was stated above, Inheritance 3, § 5.

Tenth, those laws which say in certain cases that an heir is not liable for the wrongdoing of the deceased; because, as is evident above in the same place, he is liable for all his debts, even those arising from wrongdoing, insofar as the inheritance suffices.

Eleventh, those laws which will that a bequest in a last will is not valid unless it has seven or five witnesses: Code, On Testaments, law Si unus and the final law; because according to the law of God, three or even two witnesses suffice in bequests for pious causes, On Testaments, chapters Cum esses and Relatum.

Twelfth, those laws which say that a human being is not bound by a promise in a bare pact without another solemnity of law, since no action arises from it: Digest, On Pacts, law Iuris gentium; because according to the law of God and the canons one who withdraws from a pact sins mortally, Extra, On Pacts, chapter 1; 22, question 5, Iuramenti, together with the notes there. The same applies if I make a promise to one person receiving it on behalf of another, because according to the law of God I am bound, but not according to the civil laws--unless the promise has been made to a person existing under another's power, such as a slave or a son under paternal power, or to a procurator or manager of affairs; because through these persons an acquisition is validly made for the father and master: Institutes, Through What Persons Obligations Are Acquired for Us, throughout, and the Digest and Code, On Procurators and On the Management of Affairs.

Thirteenth, those laws which allow or permit deception between buyers and sellers, according to what was stated above under Purchase 7.

Fourteenth, those laws according to which it is not permitted to buy or sell, for a price less than the principal debt, rights and actions which someone has against another; otherwise the purchase is not valid, nor can more be sought than the amount which was paid. Nor can such rights be sold in part and donated in part: Code, Mandati, law Per diversas and law Ab Anastasio. But according to the law of God such a purchase is permitted, provided that it is not made as a fraudulent cover for usury, but on account of the interest or labor which may perhaps be involved in recovering the debt, or because it is feared that the debtor may flee or fall into poverty. But concerning this see below, Usury 2, § 1.

Fifteenth, those laws according to which a possessor in bad faith acquires by prescription over the longest period, that is, thirty or forty years; because this is false according to canon law, Extra, On Rules of Law, chapter Possessor, book 6. See below, Prescription.

Sixteenth, those laws which as a rule do not punish the crimes of thoughts: Digest, On Penalties, law Cogitationis; because every evil thought must be punished either by God or through penance, 33, question 2, Omnis.

Seventeenth, those laws which, although they punish magicians and poisoners, nevertheless reward according to their provisions those who have done these things against rains, winds, and hail: Code, On Evildoers, law Eorum; because according to the law of God, to do such things even in this manner is a most serious sin, as St. Thomas proves in II--II, question 96.

Eighteenth, those laws according to which it is lawful in a capital case to corrupt the accuser: Digest, On Collusion, final law; because according to the law of God this is not lawful, II--II, question 69.

Nineteenth, those laws which permit usury; but today they too have all been abrogated by the laws, as below, Usury, § 1, question 1, just as those laws which punished a woman in a brothel, as St. Thomas says. It would be easy to show that there are very many more inequitable laws in every kind of matter, although some of these seem capable of being excused.

§ 5. Civil laws are indeed chiefly occupied with justice, but nevertheless they also embrace the matter of all the other virtues. For they regard chiefly the public good and human concord and happiness in the city, for which justice is especially necessary. Augustine, book 2 of The City of God, chapter 27: "At the end of the second book Scipio had said that, just as a certain harmony composed of distinct sounds must be maintained in stringed instruments and pipes, and in song itself and voices--a harmony which trained ears cannot bear when it has been changed and become discordant--and yet that harmony is rendered concordant and congruous by the modulation of the most dissimilar voices, so a city, by a regulated proportion among the highest, middle, and lowest orders interposed like sounds, harmonizes through the consent of the most dissimilar persons; and what is called harmony by musicians in song is concord in the city, the closest and best bond of preservation in every state, which can in no way exist without justice." Law also strengthens and fortifies the other virtues and excludes vices. Aristotle, book 5 of the Ethics, chapter 1: "Law commands the performance of the offices of a brave man, such as holding one's position and rank in the battle line, and neither fleeing nor casting away one's arms; and those of a temperate man, such as not committing adultery or violating anyone; and those of a gentle and mild man, such as striking no one and reviling no one. Likewise in the other virtues and vices, partly by commanding and partly by forbidding: rightly, indeed, in the case of a law enacted rightly and salutarily, but wrongly in the case of one enacted negligently and inconsiderately." The strongest rationale is taken from the end, for the purpose of law is to make its citizens happy, which cannot be brought about in any other way than through the observance of all the virtues, as was demonstrated in the second and third books. Next, so many military and sumptuary laws and others which regard the public utility demonstrate this. Thus there is no act of any virtue which cannot sometimes be commanded by an enacted law. Civil law can also forbid all sins; but because it accommodates itself to a community in which not all things can be punished--and therefore it is not fitting that all things be forbidden--it disregards certain things, not by approving them, but because human power is unequal to human vices. Nevertheless, all are forbidden by natural and divine law, because God can both know and punish all things.

§ 6. Not every determination of good works is the matter of civil law, for civil law cannot command arduous fasts or perpetual chastity. Nevertheless, such a work can accidentally be the object of law, as when those things are commanded which demand works of this kind or cannot be accomplished without them.

CHAPTER V

The Legislator Is a Magistrate or the Whole State

§ 1. It has never entered anyone's mind to doubt that the divine majesty, to whom belongs supreme right over all creatures, can establish laws according to his own judgment. For to him to whom belongs the power of creating belongs also the whole jurisdiction of governing. "Behold, God is exalted, and there is none like him among legislators," Job 35:22. His goodness in enacting law is also supreme, concerning which the Prophet sang: "For the legislator will give a blessing; they will go from virtue to virtue; the God of gods will be seen in Zion." All ought to venerate his law; no one ought to judge it. "But if you judge the law, you are not a doer of the law but a judge. There is one legislator and judge, who can destroy and deliver," James 4:11.

§ 2. Most of the human beings who first founded states by laws either received laws from God or falsely claimed to have received them. Abraham and Moses, instructed by divine conversations and oracles, gave laws to their posterity. In emulation of them, the ancient νομοθέται, legislators, by a fraudulent fiction of religion referred the invention of new laws either to the true God or to fictitious deities.

Jeroboam attempted to found a new kingdom by superstition. Numa feigned nocturnal meetings with Egeria. Plutarch, Numa; Dionysius of Halicarnassus; Valerius Maximus, book 1, chapter 2. Lycurgus deceived the Spartans and Cretans by the same art: at Lacedaemon he pretended that Apollo was the author of the laws, but in Crete, Jupiter. Minos did no differently, for by withdrawing into a cave each new year he pretended that he was instructed by Jupiter's admonition. Nor is it necessary to recount ancient examples. Superstition created Muhammad's power, which he nourished with domestic blood and the destruction of nations. But in the book concerning religion I taught that those frauds always ended badly. Zoroaster, who put forward Oromasdes as the author of his laws, learned by experience that he had been an unsuccessful legislator. Trismegistus persuaded the Egyptians that Mercury gave them laws; and it is certainly credible that the demon who commanded such great and such ridiculous evils was most frivolous. Zamolxis likewise claimed that the laws which he gave to the Scythians had been received from Vesta. The Carthaginians claimed Saturn; the Athenians, the most cultivated of peoples, boasted rather than believed that Minerva was the author of their laws.

They therefore judged it a divine matter to enact law for human beings. For since human beings are free by nature, and no one--if you regard the first beginnings of birth and life--is subject to another, and since they are also tenacious of liberty and of their own right, it certainly seemed difficult and almost tyrannical for anyone to impose his own laws and for an equal to exercise power over equals. They therefore referred the authority of laws to some nature more sacred and divine. But they would have acted more rightly if they had taught that magistrates are necessary to the state and that, as a consequence, the power of establishing laws has been granted to magistrates. For since that superstition cannot be lasting and does not hold all persons equally, it also detracts esteem from the true authority of legislators. Every pretense, when it is exposed, does harm twice, for it detracts credibility both in the present and for the future.

§ 3. A private person cannot be the maker of laws; it is necessary that it be either the whole state or a magistrate. At present this belongs properly to the magistrate. For no one can bind anyone by his own laws except a subject. Political or civil dominion is required for commanding. The power of coercing and of sanctioning the observance of a law by penalties is also required, and this cannot exist in a private person. It can exist without jurisdiction strictly so called; for someone can enact a law although he lacks the power of judging, and one who lacks the power of establishing laws can judge.

§ 4. The power of establishing laws resides by nature in the state itself, or in the multitude of human beings, not in any one person. For the opinion of certain canonists who attributed this power by nature to the supreme prince and his successor has long since been rejected. The state itself, therefore, alone possesses by nature the right of its own government and laws. It can therefore establish laws and set a magistrate over itself, and it can also confer upon him the power of establishing laws. Thus St. Thomas, question 90, article 3, and question 97, article 3; Molina, volume 1, Institutes, treatise 2, distinction 22; Bellarmine, volume 1, book 3, On the Laity.

Clear reason demonstrates this, for it cannot belong to any one person to undertake care of the multitude. No one has power over another except by the other's will or offense. Nor is that power owed to old age, primogeniture, or paternal right. Nevertheless, it resides in the state itself because the state cannot be governed without laws and an order of right. Nothing is more certain if you read title 2 of book 1 of the Digest, for the laws were first made by the people; then that power was transferred to the senate; finally, to Caesar. It therefore seems necessary to us to demonstrate the origin and development of right itself.

1. At the beginning of our city, the people first began to conduct affairs without fixed law and without fixed right, and all things were governed by the hand of the kings.

2. Later, after the city had increased to some degree, Romulus himself is said to have divided the people into thirty parts, which he called curiae, because at that time he administered the care of the state through the judgments of those parts. Thus he himself proposed certain curiate laws to the people. The succeeding kings also proposed laws, all of which remain compiled in the book of Sextus Papirius, who lived in those times in which Superbus, the son of Demaratus the Corinthian, was among the foremost men. That book, as we have said, is called the Papirian civil law--not because Papirius added anything of his own to it, but because he brought together into one collection laws enacted without order.

3. Next, after the kings had been expelled, all these laws fell out of use through the Tribunician Law. The Roman people again began to be sustained more by uncertain right and custom than by enacted law, and endured this for nearly twenty years.

4. Afterward, lest this continue any longer, it was resolved by public authority that ten men should be appointed, through whom laws might be sought from the Greek cities and the city founded upon laws. They set these laws, written upon ivory tablets, before the Rostra so that the laws might be perceived more openly. Supreme right in the city was given to them for that year, so that they might both correct the laws, if necessary, and interpret them; and no appeal from them was permitted, as it was from the other magistrates. They themselves observed that something was lacking from those first laws, and therefore in the following year they added two others to the same tablets. Thus, from this circumstance, they were called the laws of the Twelve Tables. Some have reported that a certain Hermodorus of Ephesus, an exile in Italy, was the adviser to the decemvirs in enacting them.

5. After these laws had been enacted, it began to happen, as naturally occurs, that interpretation and the disputation of the forum, necessary through the authority of prudent men, were desired. This disputation, and this right, which came without writing and was composed by prudent men, is not called by any proper designation, as the other parts of right are designated by their own names; rather, it is called by the common name civil law.

6. Next, at nearly the same time, actions by which human beings might litigate with one another were composed from these laws. Lest the people institute these actions as they wished, it was willed that they be fixed and solemn. This part of right is called actions of the law, that is, lawful actions. Thus at nearly the same time these three forms of right arose: the laws of the Twelve Tables; the civil law which began to flow from them; and the actions of the law composed from the same. Nevertheless, both the knowledge of interpreting all these laws and the actions were in the possession of the college of pontiffs. From among them one was appointed each year to preside over the affairs of private persons, and the people employed this custom for nearly one hundred years.

7. Later, when Appius Claudius had published these actions and reduced them to form, Gnaeus Flavius--his scribe and the son of a freedman--stole the book and delivered it to the people. That gift was so pleasing to the people that he became tribune of the plebs, senator, and curule aedile. This book, which contains the actions, is called the Flavian civil law, just as the former book is called the Papirian civil law; for Gnaeus Flavius added nothing of his own to the book. As the city increased, because certain kinds of proceeding were lacking, not long afterward Sextus Aelius composed other actions and gave the people a book which is called the Aelian law.

8. Next, when the city possessed the law of the Twelve Tables and civil law, and also possessed the actions of the law, it happened that the plebs came into discord with the Fathers, seceded, and established rights for itself, which are called plebiscites. Soon, when the plebs had been recalled, because many dissensions arose concerning these plebiscites, it was resolved by the Hortensian Law that they too should be observed as laws. Thus it came about that a plebiscite and a law differed in the form of their establishment, but their power was the same.

9. Next, because it began to be difficult for the plebs to assemble--and certainly much more difficult for the people amid so great a crowd of human beings--necessity itself transferred the care of the state to the senate. Thus the senate began to interpose itself, and whatever it established was observed. This right was called a decree of the senate.

10. At the same time the magistrates too administered justice. In order that citizens might know what right each magistrate would pronounce concerning every matter and might prepare themselves, the magistrates published edicts. These edicts of the praetors constituted honorary law. It is called honorary because it came from the praetor's honor, or office.

11. Finally, as the course of establishing right seemed, under the compulsion of circumstances themselves, to have passed to fewer persons, it gradually happened that it became necessary for the state to be provided for by one man; for the senate could not administer all the provinces equally well. Therefore, when a prince had been established, the right was given to him that whatever he established should be valid.

12. Thus in our city a rule is established either by right--that is, by statute--or it is civil law properly so called, which, without writing, consists solely in the interpretation of prudent men; or there are actions of the law, which contain the form of proceeding; or a plebiscite, which was established without the authority of the Fathers; or an edict of the magistrates, from which honorary law arises; or a decree of the senate, which is introduced solely by the senate's establishment, without a statute; or a constitution of the prince, that is, a provision that what the prince himself establishes is to be observed as law.

§ 5. The custom of all kingdoms is that the supreme prince can establish new laws and abrogate old ones. Nevertheless, this is not necessary to supreme jurisdiction, for precept, government, and coercion are one thing, and law another. Thus, although this is customary and it could scarcely be done rightly in another way, supreme power and the faculty of establishing laws are not perpetually joined. For a magistrate will be able to govern the state and coerce the wicked according to laws enacted long ago. When the state chooses a king, it can, if it pleases, retain this greatest right for itself, so that he may neither establish new laws nor abrogate old ones. Indeed, many kings swear to the laws when they receive the diadem; thus they cannot abrogate those laws which they bind themselves by oath to preserve. If, therefore, a prince can be bound not to violate or abrogate old laws, who would doubt that the same prince can be bound not to impose new ones? For there is no less danger in the establishment of new laws than in the abolition of old ones, both because everything new is burdensome to many and because, by a new law in a state which possesses many laws, some old law is ordinarily derogated from. This practice became so customary that a clause was placed in every sanction of laws and was, as Cicero calls it, a customary clause transferred from old laws into new ones.

Cicero, book 3, Letter 23 to Atticus: "The second section is the customary one, concerning immunity if anything has been done contrary to other laws for the sake of this law. My Pomponius, consider by whose counsel and by whom the third section was pressed in; for you know that Clodius sanctioned his law in such a way that it could scarcely, or not at all, be invalidated either by the senate or by the people. But you see that the sanctions of laws which were abrogated have never been observed. For if this were so, scarcely any law could be abrogated, since there is none which does not surround itself with the difficulty of abrogation. But when a law is abrogated, that very provision prescribing the manner in which it must be abrogated is abrogated. Since this is in fact so, our eight tribunes of the plebs inserted this section: 'If anything is written in this proposal which by the laws and plebiscites--that is, by the Clodian Law--it is not or has not been lawful to promulgate, abrogate, or derogate from without personal liability; and if on this account a penalty or fine lies against him who has promulgated, abrogated, or derogated from it, concerning this nothing is proposed by this law.'"

Thus it will have been placed within the power of the state establishing a prince either to grant the prince the power of establishing laws or not to establish them, or to moderate that faculty so that he is permitted to establish some laws and forbidden to establish others. And that power ought altogether to be tempered and not exercised without the consent of others or mature deliberation. For there are never lacking persons who desire to increase private advantages through new laws.

§ 6. Nevertheless, because new controversies arise every day, and because through continual changes it frequently happens that laws which were salutary at the beginning are rendered harmful by some circumstance and must be removed, it has come about that nearly all states have granted this right to princes or senators. Thus monarchical power--whether it is called imperial, royal, or by any other name--provided that it is absolute, will possess in a well-constituted state the right and authority to establish, explain, and abrogate laws. For the state subjects the laws themselves to the emperor and king when it receives him as, in a manner, an animate law. Hence the power of granting privileges has also been conceded to the prince, by which the common law is always derogated from. Certainly all princes, even those who are not supreme, employ this right. For who among the nobles of Germany does not sometimes remit a penalty owed under imperial laws? Who does not mitigate it? Indeed, he sometimes aggravates it when the atrocity of an offense in a crime so demands. But he could not do this unless he possessed the power of tempering the law itself. Thus, when the state gave him the principate to be administered according to the laws, it is judged also to have given him the faculty of showing mercy. John de Salas judged this matter excellently in disputation 7 On Laws, section 3: "I say fifth that some were without doubt established specially by God as kings and princes with legislative power. Unless an exception is expressed, legislative power is always understood to be granted to kings and princes. This is evident concerning Saul and David, whom God established as kings, although Samuel anointed them and the people accepted them. But although God granted Moses, Joshua, and certain other judges and leaders judicial and military power, I do not know whether God gave some of them--such as Moses and Joshua--legislative power. I am certain that the other judges did not possess it, because they were not leaders and could command nothing except in relation to rendering judgments and sentences."

We must not therefore think that, when an association of human beings comes together as one and chooses a prince for itself, legislative power is also conferred upon him by God as though by a natural direction and consequence. Rather, that power is given only to the community itself as a property consequent upon nature. For when that body has been constituted, the necessity of right and laws, and therefore power, naturally arises; and it is communicated to the prince according to the will and usage of the state.

§ 7. This power cannot be taken away from any association without injury, unless the association itself has given cause. For just as a human being who uses reason is free by nature and cannot be dragged into servitude without the crime of kidnapping, so neither can this political body be deprived of its own right. Therefore a tyrant is more detestable than a kidnapper in proportion as he wickedly oppresses more persons. Nevertheless, a state can be stripped of its right on account of an offense if it abuses that right, attacks its neighbors, or refuses to render justice to those who seek it--just as in any private person the abuse of liberty is punished by servitude. For the public abuse of liberty is more harmful than a private abuse.

§ 8. The power of establishing law, all civil jurisdiction, and the government which either a part of the multitude or one person possesses over the multitude flow from the community itself; nor can they be just in any other way, except over those captured in war. For since that power is from God, and therefore from nature, in the association--not in individuals and not in a particular class of human beings--it cannot pass either to one person or to certain persons without the will of the others. For I am not treating kings established by God through revelation.

Not only does the first of a line of kings receive the diadem from the people, but all his successors do as well, since the people granted the right of succession.

§ 9. No civil law can bind the whole world, because no one is lord of the universe. Bartolus is mistaken at law Hostes, π., On Captives, when he condemns as guilty of heresy one who denies that the emperor is lord of the world--unless someone should perhaps wish to interpret this as referring to the Roman world. Yet even so I would not wish it to be called a heresy. Nevertheless, Panormitanus, part 2, counsel 6, number 2, Paulus Castrensis, and others hold the same opinion. But very many writers, together with history and geography themselves, teach that it is false; for the Roman never possessed even a tenth part of the world, even when he crossed the Euphrates and recovered the standards from the Parthians. Nor can a Christian emperor establish civil laws for all Christians; for although he is the supreme head of the state in temporal government and is held in the greatest honor among kings, he is nevertheless not the lord of kings.

§ 10. Just as no greater power of establishing laws has been given to supreme governors than was given by the Royal Law--that is, by the consent of the state--so no power belongs to princes and others established under a king except by permission of the supreme prince. This power is extensive for electors and others in Germany but restricted in Spain, for no one except the king can enact laws unless it has been conceded to him by a special privilege. The cause of the difference in law is the less dependent jurisdiction of the princes.

§ 11. The power of establishing and abrogating laws is deservedly judged the foremost among the heads of majesty. For he to whom that faculty has been conceded possesses the right of majesty; one who lacks it is not judged to possess the right of majesty. Deservedly so, for the power of establishing laws is such that it can easily change the whole state and transform it into another form. Augustus accomplished this most artfully by retaining the names and ceremonies of the magistrates while drawing right and power to himself. Thus, in a short time, governors and free magistrates were made slaves clad in purple.

CHAPTER VI

The End of Law Is to Make Men and Citizens Equally Good

§ 1. There is an ancient opinion, both shameful and destructive to the state, that a state cannot be administered without some injustice. For this opinion admits inequitable laws--indeed, demands them--and does not possess as its end the making of good citizens. Rather, the legislator, captivated by a false appearance of it, regards some utility, and will even perform and command detestable crimes if they seem likely to be useful. How much better is Plato, who defines law as a rational method of governing and a true norm which leads us by a suitable way to what is best, fixing a penalty for one who transgresses and a reward for one who obeys. For law is from the highest good, tends toward the highest good, and both leads and draws us to it. Its end is justice; law itself is necessary to the state, is its instructor, and is its director toward what is best.

Cicero explained that end excellently in book 2 of On the Laws: "It is certainly established that laws were created for the safety of citizens, the preservation of cities, and the tranquil and blessed life of all; and that those who first sanctioned decrees of this kind showed the peoples that they would write and enact provisions by whose inscription and acceptance they would live honorably and blessedly. Those provisions which were thus composed and sanctioned they evidently called laws. From this it is right to understand that those who prescribed destructive and unjust commands to peoples, since they acted contrary to what they had promised and professed, enacted anything rather than laws. Thus it can be evident that, in the very interpretation of the name law, there is contained the force and meaning of cultivating justice and right."

Plutarch also speaks excellently: in a city some things pertain to what is honorable and others to necessity; the highest and first of honorable things is τὴν εὐνομίαν, good order under law; of necessary things, τὴν εὐπορίαν, abundance. When he defines law as belonging to honorable things, he plainly judges that inequitable laws, laws commanding depraved things, and laws opposed to virtue in any manner are in no way worthy of so holy a title. For since law is the bond of the city, the foundation of liberty, and the fountain of equity; since the mind, spirit, counsel, judgment, and morals of the city are situated in its laws, it cannot have another end than the best end by which the whole community itself is governed. Therefore, those laws must be judged best which do not chiefly heap human beings with riches, but render them as thoroughly instructed as possible in civilized morals and prudence in civil affairs. Diodorus Siculus, book 1 of the History.

§ 2. In enacting laws, therefore, great care must be taken that they are occupied not with the instruments of life but with the whole of life itself. For the legislator is the craftsman of living; and although he embraces actions individually, they too are nevertheless directed toward virtue. He establishes an error at the very beginning who thinks that laws promise only earthly works: they breathe more loftily and are a gift of God. Just as medicine is established as a cause of health and is praised only if it applies manifold knowledge and a variety of herbs to strengthening and restoring bodies, who would consider someone a physician who arranged everything rightly but nevertheless had no concern whatever for health? The legislator, therefore, will hand down a method by which citizens may easily perform every part of their duties in every matter. Let laws fortify the city and protect security and tranquility, but let them chiefly comprehend the whole of life. For no one will rightly perform those intermediate or indifferent things unless he has an end to which he may refer them. Therefore, the first foundations of justice must be laid and virtue instilled. Seneca, Letter 95: "We must set before us the end of the highest good, toward which we may strive and to which our every deed and word may look, just as the course of sailors must be directed toward some star. Life without a purpose is wandering. But if a purpose must certainly be set before us, decrees begin to be necessary. You will grant, I think, that nothing is more shameful than one who is doubtful, uncertain, and timid, now drawing back his foot and now advancing it. This will happen to us in all things unless those things which restrain and detain our minds and prevent them from striving with their whole strength are removed."

§ 3. Even the best laws do not always make good citizens. This is plainly so. Precepts do not always lead to right actions, but do so when a compliant disposition is present; sometimes they are applied in vain if depraved opinions beset the mind. Nevertheless, the legislator must strive, and must strive with the whole mass of the laws. For although he establishes many things excellently, prudently, and holily, if in some part he nevertheless strikes against vice, the whole impetus will roll in the direction in which the slope lies. Although he sees that many things are not done rightly, he must nevertheless hold in his hand the rule to which distorted and projecting things are to be applied, so that even if they are not corrected, they may nevertheless see their own censure and be struck by fear of it, or at least by shame.

"Many violate the laws," you say; "vices are stronger than the good institutions of the fatherland." This complaint is ancient. The human race inclines by nature toward vice. How few devote themselves wholly to what is honorable? How few remove the obstacles to good laws? Nevertheless, one must strive in the contrary direction, so that, if sins cannot be removed, at least the fury and course of sinning may be checked. In this way some will be saved, and those who are going to perish will fall more slowly. Medicine holds to its purpose amid so many deaths. It now has more business because bodies have been corrupted by luxury, yet it struggles against diseases. It does not immediately abandon the person whom it sees nearly given up and mourned as dead, but by art holds back his fleeing life and mitigates his torments. Why should a prince not imitate this? Why should he not strive with all his strength at least to alleviate the evils of those whom he cannot persuade to perfect virtue and whom their own obstinacy prevents him from freeing from diseases of the mind? To diminish great assaults of fevers belongs to the art.

§ 4. Once the end has been established, the other things will succeed according to one's desire. Chief among them is that the means, or rational methods, be accommodated to the end. For just as shoes must be accommodated to feet and a bridle to a horse, so laws must be accommodated to customs--that is, to the disposition of a nation and region. When medicine has prepared excellent drugs, it examines before all things the constitution and temperament of the sick person, lest it cast him down by a remedy that is too strong or fail to move him by one that is too diluted.

Two things especially must be regarded in this matter: first, the disposition of the human beings themselves; next, the progress and increase of virtues and vices.

The legislator will consider the character of the people: whether it is hard, flexible, proud, humble, industrious, idle, frugal, luxurious, fickle, constant, irascible, or calm. Here there is need of great and almost divine prudence, so that there may be ὁ νόμος καθ' ὃν τρόπον, a law accommodated to customs, and precepts suited to actions. I do not mean that the law should be a Lesbian rule and bend itself toward the vices which it ought to overturn, or incite the inclinations of human beings which it is enacted to restrain; for in this way it would go astray at the threshold. I mean that it should lead every nation toward virtue according to its customs, opinions, and affections. Unless it maintains this principle, it will utterly overturn the state. Reason itself teaches this. Asians, Egyptians, and Arabs, a servile race, are governed by the harshest command because they cannot bear liberty, but would turn it toward mutual destruction. The Swiss enjoy a moderated equality and persist in it, except that within the memory of our fathers Zwinglian superstition, when its author sounded the trumpet, enraged some against kindred blood. Italians enjoy an intermediate liberty; and although they appear to be equals, they endeavor to be superiors. Therefore, they flourish under a moderated principate and milder laws. Some peoples approve what others cannot bear. Each must be commanded that one among indifferent things which suits it. It is rightly commanded of a Swiss that he never appear in public unless girded with a sword. For the honorable carrying of a sword is a certain rudiment of war and, lest it be in vain, also animates him toward exercise and the contemplation of war. But to an Italian or Spaniard, because they are ὀξύθυμοι and ἀκρόχολοι, hot-tempered nations, the legislator will not permit even a dagger. For they will quickly rush to slaughter. At Athens he advised badly who wished the most fickle people to be free; among the Lacedaemonians he advised well, for they were more temperate. Liberty established by equitable laws brought great increases of wealth to the German cities. Belgium, made very free by the truce, is agitated by perpetual seditions, because its character is settled only under one prince.

The second consideration is skill in observing the progress of virtues and vices. The more people have advanced in virtue, the more easily they are governed, because the road is more easily maintained when one is near the goal. In the correction of vices there is the greatest difficulty, both because they cling tenaciously and give pleasure and because every correction has change joined to it, and change is always hateful. But the more widely vices reign and threaten dangers, the more kinds of remedies must be sought on every side. When diseases are inexplicable and manifold, the physician too must be armed with many observations and kinds of things. He will not drive out bad humors with one assault, but will draw them off gradually, lest he also draw off the sound part. They advise that as much severity be added to the laws as vices have increased. This is a notable axiom, but it must be restricted--namely, to the case in which the vices of a few have increased. For if the vices of all have grown strong, they must be treated more gently, lest they overpower the physician. In an earlier age Christian emperors labored to abolish the bloody spectacles for which the Roman world raged. It would not have been safe even for an emperor to intervene in the midst of the fury of those turning their thumbs. What, therefore, must be done? First, provision must be made by law that a private person may not present gladiators unless he gives the citizens an equal value for a public banquet; that no one sell himself to the sword; that a trainer of gladiators may not belong to the number of citizens; that the conveniences of the amphitheater be removed; and that expenditures be transferred to distributions of meat and other gifts. In every way, finally, it must be brought about that that cruel pleasure is surrounded by many difficulties and that minds are drawn toward other things, the atrocity of the crime also being shown. Then, after minds have been prepared to respect what is honorable, those spectacles must be forbidden entirely by an enacted law. I understand these measures to apply when the power of the ruler is not equal to the vices; otherwise, such great savagery should quickly have been removed by a severe edict, as the emperors finally did. But I am speaking of the Roman senate, which, amid so many ambitious rivalries, vetoes of tribunes, and tumults of the people, I do not think was equal to abolishing so inveterate an evil.

In this manner, therefore, if some city or prince attempts to remove the vice of drunkenness from its dominion--and all ought to attempt it unless they wish to be guilty of all the evils arising from it--if they can indeed press the matter through, they will forbid drunkenness and establish a penalty which they will gradually increase. But if they cannot, first they will impose a measure upon banquets by sumptuary laws; next they will prescribe definite laws for innkeepers; and when this vice has been reduced to a few persons, they will mark it with infamy. These observations suffice concerning the end of laws and the general method leading toward the best end.

§ 5. Those persons must not be heard who seem to themselves to have invented a subtle and cunning distinction by which they may introduce license. For they maintain that the end of political laws is to make a good citizen, not a good man. In this the most cunning men stumble childishly. For those who are evil in morals are also evil citizens. How will one who neither takes account of his own life nor prudently administers his household and family be a good citizen and useful to the state, when he is not good for himself? There are evil persons whom desire carries headlong, ἀσύλλακτοι, disordered; and they are the more destructive because they cover their poison under a certain appearance and deliver their blow before they are detected. One who is evil in private will never be good in public. Aeschines, Against Ctesiphon: οὐκ ἔστι κακῶς κεχρημένον ἄνδρα τοῖς ἰδίοις εἶναι πιστὸν ἐν ἀλλοτρίοις--"It does not ordinarily happen that one who administers his own affairs badly is faithful in the affairs of others." Certainly least of all in public affairs, which are often neglected even by diligent men. Justinian, On the Composition of the Digest, and Leo, Constitution 19, Cassio, book 5, support this judgment.

There are nevertheless others who carp at law. St. Paul in Romans 3 calls the law "the law of death," and in chapter 4 says that it "works wrath," and in chapter 5 that "the law entered in so that offense might abound." But this argument contributes nothing to the present matter. For law does not by its own force or efficacy bring it about that you can follow virtue, but shows virtue, invites you to it by reward, and deters you from vices by setting penalties before you. Hence among the impious offenses are made more serious when they rage at the occasion presented by law.

CHAPTER VII

Law Is Imposed upon a Community for the Sake of the Common Good

§ 1. Jurists ask whether a law can be imposed upon one person alone. I judge this to be a dispute about a name. For most laws are public; the eternal law binds all; and the Digest, π., On Laws, law Iura, asserts the same: "Rights are established not for individual persons but generally." A norm too belongs not to one thing alone but to all similar things. When a law seems to be imposed upon a private person, they call it a precept, not a law. But, as I have said, the dispute concerns a name. For whether law is dictated to one or to many, it possesses the same force of binding. If we regard the present mode of speaking, we scarcely call it a law; if that of the ancients, we shall properly call even those measures which pertain to one person laws. Examples are the Clodian Law concerning the interdiction of water and fire to Cicero and concerning not receiving him beneath a roof; the Gabinian Law concerning entrusting the command of the war to Pompey; the Gellian and Cornelian laws concerning the same Pompey; and innumerable others which were enacted even for condemning or absolving defendants.

§ 2. All laws are referred to the common utility. For law is a common precept established for the common utility, so much so that, although it is imposed upon a private person, it is nevertheless referred to the public utility. Aristotle, book 3 of the Ethics, chapter 6; Plato, On Laws; Plutarch, problem 40. For although the good or evil of a private person is frequently embraced by law, it is nevertheless necessary that the state's own utility accrue from it. Concerning those measures which are proposed to the community there must be no doubt, for the public good must not be referred to the private good, but the latter to the former. Therefore, the legislator must regard not the advantages of the prince but those of the whole state. For the magistrate exists for the sake of the subjects, not they for the sake of the magistrate. Kings are ministers and must undergo dangers for the state. Even privileges themselves, which seem to derogate from the common good and favor private persons and are therefore invidious, nevertheless flow back to the common good by another route, because it is publicly advantageous for those who have deserved well to be adorned with privileges. But when privileges are given without a legitimate cause, they harm the state according to the circumstances. Some are judged to constitute a certain honor, such as the right to wear a laurel crown or dine at public expense, and other things of this kind which ambition has devised. Others benefit one person in such a way that they burden the rest, such as immunity from tribute and exemption from military service and other burdens. When some are exempted from these, the others are burdened so much the more.

§ 3. When a law is enacted publicly which indeed does not harm the community but harms a private person, and is proposed with this intention--not that provision be made for the state but that damage be inflicted upon rivals--if that law is useful to the state, it cannot be accused of injustice even though it results in the injury of private persons. Nevertheless, the legislator sins and exposes himself to great danger when he prescribes good things for an evil end. But here the seeds of great dissensions are sown, when one part of the state cries that something is not unjust and the prince judges otherwise.

For example, a privilege is given to certain churches that they possess the right of asylum, a right which has in great part been removed in France, Germany, and other places. But concerning privilege let us examine law Pateant 4, On Those Who Flee to a Church, book 9 of the Theodosian Code, title 45. The law commands that everything within the church as far as its doors be regarded as an asylum. Edward II, king of England, imposed exile after forty days and twelve hours upon an accused person who had fled to a church.

Augustine excommunicated Count Boniface because he had dragged a suppliant out of a church. Gelasius did the same for the same offense. This privilege, therefore, was customary, that persons might flee to altars and statues of Caesar.

But license turned what mercy established into an abuse. The right of asylum was first given to those places so that slaves might have a refuge from the savagery of masters. For an asylum is a sacred boundary by which security is given to slaves. Euripides, in the Suppliants:

ἔχει γὰρ καταφυγὴν θὴρ μὲν πέτραν, δοῦλος δὲ βωμοὺς θεῶν· πόλις δὲ πρὸς πόλιν ἔπτηξε χειμασθεῖσα.

For a wild beast has a rock as refuge, slaves the altars of the gods, and a city, when tossed by a storm, flees to another city.

There was an abuse which Tacitus describes in book 3 of the Annals: "But Tiberius, while strengthening for himself the power of the principate, offered the senate an image of antiquity by sending the petitions of the provinces to the examination of the Fathers. For throughout the Greek cities there had increased the license and impunity of establishing asylums. The temples were being filled with the worst of the slaves. By the same protection debtors against their creditors and persons suspected of capital crimes were received. Nor was any command sufficiently strong to restrain the seditions of a people protecting the crimes of human beings as though they were rites of the gods. It was therefore resolved that the cities should send their charters and ambassadors. Some voluntarily relinquished what they had falsely usurped; many trusted in ancient superstitions or services rendered to the Roman people. It was a magnificent spectacle on that day when the senate examined the benefactions of the ancestors, the treaties of allies, the decrees even of kings who had held power before Roman might, and the religious observances of the deities themselves, free as formerly to confirm or change them.

"First of all the Ephesians approached, recounting that Diana and Apollo were not born at Delos, as the multitude believed; that among them there was the Conchrian River and a place called Ortygia, where Latona, pregnant with her offspring and leaning upon an olive tree which remained even then, gave birth to those deities; and that the grove had been consecrated at the admonition of the gods. Apollo himself, after killing the Cyclopes, had there avoided the wrath of Jupiter. Later, Father Liber, victorious in war, had pardoned the suppliant Amazons who had occupied the altar. Thereafter, by the concession of Hercules when he possessed Lydia, the ceremony of the temple had been enlarged; its right had not been diminished under the dominion of the Persians, and afterward the Macedonians and then we Romans had preserved it.

"Next, the Magnesians relied upon enactments of Lucius Scipio and Lucius Sulla. The former, after Antiochus had been driven out, and the latter, after Mithridates, honored the fidelity and virtue of the Magnesians by establishing that the refuge of Diana Leucophryne should be inviolable. Afterward the Aphrodisians and Stratonicensians brought forward their ancient services to the party of Caesar the dictator and a recent decree of the deified Augustus. They had been praised because they endured an incursion of the Parthians without in any respect changing their constancy toward the Roman people. The city of the Aphrodisians defended the religious observance of Venus, that of the Stratonicensians the observance of Jupiter and Trivia. The Hierocaesareans traced their case more deeply, setting forth that among them was the Persian Diana, with a sanctuary dedicated by King Cyrus. They also recalled the names of Perpenna, Isauricus, and many other commanders who had attributed the same sanctity not only to the temple but to an area of two miles.

"Next came the Cypriots concerning three sanctuaries, of which the most ancient had been founded for the Paphian Venus by its author Aerias; afterward his son Amathus had founded one for Amathusian Venus; and Teucer, fleeing the anger of his father Telamon, one for Salaminian Jupiter. The embassies of other cities were also heard. Wearied by their abundance, and because the parties were contending through partiality, the Fathers permitted the consuls, after examining the right and whether any inequity was involved, to refer the whole matter back to the senate.

"In addition to those cities which I have mentioned, the consuls reported that the asylum of Aesculapius at Pergamum was established. They reported that the others relied upon origins obscure because of their antiquity: the Smyrnaeans upon an oracle of Apollo, by whose command they had dedicated a temple to Venus Stratonicis; the Tenians upon a poem of the same god by which they had been commanded to consecrate an image and temple to Neptune. The Sardians relied upon a nearer grant, that of the victorious Alexander, and the Milesians likewise upon King Darius; but the cults of their deities were, respectively, the veneration of Diana and Apollo. The Cretans also petitioned for the image of the deified Augustus. Decrees of the senate were made which, although highly honorable, nevertheless prescribed a limit. They were commanded to make bronze inscriptions in the temples as a consecrated memorial, lest under the appearance of religion they descend into ambition."

But nothing was accomplished by these measures, so much so that Tiberius was compelled to abolish every right of asylum. Thus Tranquillus, Tiberius, chapter 37: "He abolished the right and custom of all asylums, wherever they existed." But the more numerous and more criminal the persons who abused that right were, the more obstinately the people defended them. At Athens, citizens who killed aspirants to tyranny after they had fled to the altar of Minerva were themselves killed by their fellow citizens, because they esteemed privileged superstition more highly than liberty. Thucydides, book 1. The Sicilians spared Ducetius, a traitor to his fatherland, who had fled into a temple. A privilege must therefore be granted slowly, because, although it brings the greatest evils, it is abrogated with the greatest difficulty.

§ 4. Another difficulty also arises because privileges are so fortified that they surround themselves by the very difficulty of abrogating them. They do not cease at the death of the person who grants them. Often those who possess them cannot even renounce them, because they contain the right of another, or magistrates are bound by oath not to yield privileges. Some also have another precept annexed so that they cannot be relinquished voluntarily. Thus, if someone possesses the power of hearing Mass during a time of interdict, he cannot renounce it, because he is bound by another law to hear Mass; and because the privilege has removed the impediment, he is now bound by the law. Next, privileges which are not invidious cannot be removed by prescription; but when others are burdened by them, those persons can prescribe against them, and they set a period of ten years. Third, privileges which are not burdensome to others and in no way prejudice them are lost through nonuse only in the external forum, not in conscience, unless in certain cases the law has disposed otherwise. Fourth, a privilege is not lost, with respect to the whole faculty, through a contrary use, although this may appear to be a tacit renunciation. Finally, it is lost through abuse, as was stated concerning asylum. But in all these matters it is most difficult either to correct the privileged or, after the privilege has been removed, to bring them back under the common law.

§ 5. The abuse of a privilege is manifold.

1. It occurs when in actual fact more is done than was conceded. Thus, when a prince has been given the right to levy soldiers for the defense of his territory, he assembles them against neighbors with whom he can contend by right.

2. It occurs when he turns the use of the privilege into an occasion for crimes; this was stated concerning the right of asylum. We see this even today: very many murders are committed in those cities where asylums have been established for murderers. The citizens defend those asylums so greatly that it seems they can scarcely be removed without sedition.

3. The most customary abuse of privileges is that which conflicts with the end of the privileges. Such today is the privilege in churches by which a two-year course of study is completed at a university. For this it is almost sufficient to have been enrolled at the university and to have passed no night outside the university town; there is very little inquiry into study and morals. A similar privilege provides that those who have arrived by the Epistle, while the office is sung in choir, receive the distributions. This was granted in favor of those who, being occupied, are compelled either to arrive later or to depart earlier. But now the abuse of that privilege is that before the Epistle and after it they linger in the portico and the church--not without scandal to the Christian people--and suddenly enter at the Epistle, as though they had been hired not to pray but to transact every other business and to seek the reward of irreligious conversation.

Privileges are lost through these abuses. St. Augustine speaks truly in Sermon 247 On Time: "By the judgment of the laws, he who abuses a privilege conceded to him is cast down from the dignity obtained by right." Yet privileges are removed with difficulty and not without a disturbance of the people. One must therefore proceed cautiously, lest they be given. It is not difficult, under the shadow of a privilege, to do many more things than the force of the privilege permits. Finally, I judge thus: one who concedes many privileges and immunities cuts the strength and sinews of the principate, furnishes matter for seditions, and arms citizens and subjects against justice and the state. But since the abuse of privileges is great, it is necessary that one who, by gratifying many, has burdened many should now gravely offend those same persons or their successors.

CHAPTER VIII

The Effects and Offices of Law Explained

§ 1. Theophrastus spoke excellently: ὀλίγων ἀγαθοὶ νόμων δέονται. Good persons need few laws. The cause is that in most matters they direct themselves and are taught by nature to do those things which belong to law. Evil persons need very many laws, concerning whom Seneca rightly said: "It is a miserable innocence to be good only according to law." Virtue, anticipating law, directs the good; law deters the evil from crime and directs them toward virtue. The first office of law, therefore, is to direct the state and all citizens within the state.

§ 2. The second office of law is to command. The essence of law consists in commanding, for it is not law unless it commands. By commanding, it also forbids contrary things; and when it permits indifferent things, it commands that there be liberty in either direction and forbids impediments.

§ 3. Punishment also is an effect of law, about which we must speak later. Modestinus speaks truly in law 7 On Laws: "The force of law is this: to command, forbid, permit, punish, and affect with reward." These things are clear. But we must treat the primary effect of law.

§ 4. The primary effect of law is to bind. Suárez discusses this in book 3, as do many others; but our times have seen those teachers who, by removing the obligation of human law, overturn with great temerity all order and peace in the state and the authority of the magistrate. Concerning this we establish the following.

§ 5. The power of enacting laws is not only from God but also proceeds ἀμέσως, immediately, from God. "For there is no power except from God." This is indicated both by other acts and especially by punishment, which is inflicted upon bodies and above all is death, a power which cannot have been conceded to a human being except by God. But when human beings unite into one political body, they cannot prevent that power from existing among them, for it arises as a natural affection and property. Each person by his own nature is suited to entering a society of this kind; but when the state has been constituted, it is within its power to institute monarchical government, aristocratic government, or the polity of the people. Thus the state possesses power from God first and immediately; magistrates designated by it possess power mediately from God and immediately from the people. By the nature of the thing this power exists wholly in the community first and immediately. Nevertheless, if God establishes a king by revelation and by his command, or if some king has legitimately subdued a state by war, he will not be said to possess power from the people. Yet the power even of other kings is from God, because he approves it as legitimate; next, because he inclined the mind of the state to choose a king; finally, because when the king has been established, he now acts in the place of God, is greater than his own kingdom, commands the state which subjected itself to him, and writes laws. And the saying addressed by the emperor to rebellious soldiers is worthy of an emperor: "It was within their power not to choose; now that they have chosen, they must obey."

§ 6. This power can exist, and very frequently does exist, even in unjust human beings. Thus long ago the Church and all systems of law judged against Wycliffe and Hus.

§ 7. Civil laws, with God as their author and a faithful magistrate as their director, are directed not only toward temporal but also toward eternal happiness. Civil laws possess as their end the happiness of the whole state, of perfect human society, and of individual human beings insofar as they are its members.

§ 8. Civil law is occupied only with external acts. For internal thoughts and acts of will are judged by God alone and are not subject to a secular court, because by their nature they are hidden. Therefore, witnesses cannot be summoned against them, nor can proceedings be conducted against them by laws; much less does the legislator possess coercive power to compel someone to love, hate, believe, or hope. By what instruments of torture will you compel a human being to love you? Roman laws therefore rightly establish: “A bare thought must not be punished if the will has not passed beyond the bounds of thought.” For judges correct those crimes of which they possess full proof; they leave thoughts to him who searches hearts and reins, who gave them the precept, “You shall not covet.” Before a judge, one who has not been convicted is innocent. But God, who is present at the actions of hearts, also threatens vengeance upon them: “Woe to you who devise evils in your hearts.” Chapter Si quis, 15, question 1; law Illicitas, § Veritas, On the Office of a Governor; final law of the Code, On Proofs; canon Cogitatio and On Penance, distinction 1; canon Si quandoque, 15, question 6; canon Si omnia, 6, question 1.

§ 9. If, therefore, there is suspicion of a hidden thought, purgation by oath is instituted. Hostiensis, on canon Licet, On Rules of Law. But if hidden machinations have broken forth, the wickedness of the will is punished, not the outcome. For a will which has become known stands before the judge as the deed. Thus one who endeavors to create unchaste desires is held by law; one who has sought after a virgin is arraigned under the law concerning corrupters. Peter Gregory produces notable examples in the Syntagma of Law, book 24, chapter 12, § 12 and following.

Dio Cassius writes that certain men were condemned to death because they had encountered Livia, the mother of Tiberius Caesar, while naked. Nevertheless, she rescued them from death by a pardon, saying that to chaste women such men differed in no respect from statues. Among the islanders of Utopia, to have solicited someone to sexual violation is the same as to have committed the violation. The sacred page relates that Pharaoh was afflicted with many disasters merely for attempting the chastity of Sarah, Abraham’s wife, and Abimelech, king of Gerar, for the same causes. Marcus Claudius Marcellus, the curule aedile, accused Gaius Scantinius Capitolinus, tribune of the plebs, before the people because he had solicited his son for sexual violation; the defendant was condemned upon the testimony of the single person who had been solicited. Metellus Celer, likewise a punisher of an unchaste intention, brought Gnaeus Sergius Silo to trial because he had given money to a married woman. He was condemned, and not the deed but the intention was brought into question. The athletic contest among the people of Vienne was abolished by Trebonius Rufinus during his duumvirate, with Emperor Trajan confirming the measure, because the morals of the people of Vienne were being infected by this effeminate and unchaste contest. And things which give an occasion for wrongdoing must be removed.

Therefore, a will which has given sufficient signs of a crime is rightly punished, yet less than a will which has been put into daring action, because the latter was more deliberate, more obstinate, and more harmful in evil. For the mind could more easily have corrected things only contemplated.

§ 10. When civil laws command good works or prohibit evil ones, they consequently bind the act of mind and will joined to external obedience in such a way that it cannot be opposed to them. For law is given to human beings as free persons, so that they may act willingly. Thus, when a law of the emperor established that no one except an equestrian might wear a ring, it also forbade anyone to possess a will contrary to the law. For such a will is opposed to the law and therefore belongs to a disobedient person.

§ 11. When a civil law is enacted without the prescription of a definite time, it binds immediately if it is negative; if it is affirmative, it binds when the command of execution presses. It does not, however, bind in those places to which knowledge of it could not morally have arrived. For an emperor establishing a law at Vienna cannot at the same time bind those who dwell upon the Rhine, since they could not yet have suspected anything about the law. It is indeed a law, but it binds only those to whom it has been sufficiently made known; for one who is ignorant of it without fault does not offend against the law.

§ 12. A law must therefore be promulgated. Nevertheless, most persons think that an imperial law does not bind until two months after its constitution. Thus the Authenticum states: “But so that the matter may be declared still more openly, we sanction that, if a law of this kind has been written, it shall have force after two months from the date assigned to it.” Yet they do not extend this to the laws of inferior magistrates.

§ 13. Acceptance of a law is not an ordinary condition for its validity. When a law is just, it must necessarily be accepted by the peoples, for in the magistrate there is the authority and will to enact law and bind subjects. The subject must therefore obey, for violators are immediately punished. Acceptance is an effect which follows obligation; but the effect of a cause is not a necessary condition for the cause to exist or act.

§ 14. Once these matters have been established, there is a great controversy whether civil law not only binds but also binds the consciences of subjects, so that those who transgress it sin against God. For example, by a sumptuary law a prince defines a fixed number of guests at weddings, and likewise the duration and manner of the courses. Titius increases the number, the courses, and the duration. Does he not offend against the law in such a way that he sins?

§ 15. All who profess the Catholic faith agree in saying that civil law also binds consciences. Many heretics deny this; some concede it. In this year 1618, a certain Scharpius, a man of malicious ignorance, attempted by many arguments to persuade others that the laws of princes do not pertain to consciences. But the Apostle Paul himself refutes him most clearly in Romans 13:1 and following: "Let every soul be subject to higher powers. For there is no power except from God, and those that exist have been ordained by God. Therefore, he who resists power resists the ordinance of God; but those who resist acquire damnation for themselves. For princes are not a terror to good work but to evil. Do you wish not to fear the power? Do good, and you will have praise from it. For he is God's minister to you for good. But if you do evil, be afraid, for he does not carry the sword without cause. For he is God's minister, an avenger unto wrath against him who does evil. Therefore, be subject from necessity, not only on account of wrath but also on account of conscience. For this reason you also pay tribute. For they are the ministers of God, serving God in this very thing. Render, therefore, to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; tax to whom tax; fear to whom fear; honor to whom honor."

The same Paul says in Titus 3:1: "Admonish them to be subject to princes and powers, to obey what is spoken, to be prepared for every good work, to blaspheme no one, not to be contentious but modest, showing every mildness toward all human beings."

Nor is it surprising, since Christ commanded that those things which are Caesar's be given to Caesar and those which are God's to God. He himself also paid tribute, Matthew 17:24.

From this a firm and evident argument is taken: God commands obedience to the laws of kings; therefore, one who transgresses them resists God's command, and one who resists that command sins; therefore, one who violates royal laws sins.

Hence Augustine teaches that those who obey the just laws of princes merit a great reward, while those who neglect them merit a great punishment. Certainly, obedience is owed even to harsh masters, 1 Peter 2.

For since the magistrate enacts laws as a minister of God and exercises a power received from God, in contempt for him the divine majesty itself is contemned. 1 Samuel 8: "They have not rejected you, but me, lest I reign over them." But if the state established a prince under the condition that he not write constitutions binding conscience, it would not follow from this that no laws bind. For that state together with the king will be able to bind consciences if a law is written for that end by common consent.

Next, the law which commands obedience to princes is natural law--indeed, eternal law. "For this is the will of God," says the Apostle. But natural law binds conscience. Hence even the gentiles frequently commend obedience. Obedience is the greatest good in the state, in military service, and at home. Xenophon, On the Lacedaemonian State; and Augustine, book 14 of The City of God, chapter 12: "In a rational creature obedience is in a certain manner the mother and guardian of the virtues." Who would believe that the greatest good of the state, in a state established by God, does not bind citizens, or that they do not sin if they act contrary to it?

The command of masters over slaves, of a husband over a wife, and of parents over children is not only legitimate but also of such a kind that those who evade it sin gravely before God. In Deuteronomy 21 a disobedient son is commanded to be killed. Women are commanded to be subject to their husbands; why should citizens not likewise be subject to the magistrate? To obey kings, therefore, is to obey God; to rage against the just laws of kings is to overthrow the power of God. The disobedience of all these persons injures conscience; therefore, every such command binds it.

The nature of law is to bind and direct; therefore, when a law is proposed seriously, it also binds. Otherwise coercive power could often be eluded. For many can escape an external penalty, some hold it in contempt, and most transgress in the hope of impunity. But the Calvinists, although disagreeing among themselves, rise up vehemently against this.

§ 16. Pareus, on Romans 13:5, doubt 7, says that Calvin appears to defend the negative opinion in the Institutes, book 3, chapter 19, numbers 15--16, and book 4, chapter 10, numbers 3--5. Beza follows him in his notes, as does Sibrandus, On the Roman Pontiff, book 8, chapter 7. Stapleton assails this bitterly as an infamous doctrine in the Antidote, page 783. Bellarmine too reproaches Calvin with it in book 3, chapter 9 of On the Laity, and says that John Gerson had taught the same before him in lecture 4 of On the Spiritual Life.

But among them all John Scharpius pleaded the worst cause most gravely and shamelessly--not the Hercules, as his flatterers call him, but the Cacus of Britain, the Ives of France. Let us therefore examine his arguments.

Objection 1. God alone possesses right over the consciences of human beings. Romans 1:32 and 2:15; 1 Corinthians 7:25; James 4:12; 1 Peter 4:19; and elsewhere. Therefore, no law except divine law binds conscience.

I answer, first: nothing of this kind is found in Romans 1:32, nor is it there; there is only this: “Although they had known the justice of God, they did not understand that those who do such things are worthy of death--not only those who do them but also those who consent to those who do them.” Among the other persons, however, he enumerated those disobedient to parents and those without order, from which the contrary is inferred. Those disobedient to parents are worthy of death; therefore, so are those disobedient to magistrates; therefore, so are those who violate the laws of magistrates. For they do not obey the magistrate but are without order; therefore, disobedience injures conscience.

Second, in Romans 2:15 the gentiles who do not possess the law are said to show the work of the law written in their hearts. He does not say that the gentiles lacked civil law, since they possessed innumerable laws, but denies that they had received the law of God under which the Jews lived. Much less does he indicate that their consciences were not bound by civil laws.

Third, in 1 Corinthians 7:35 the Apostle denies that he wishes to cast a snare upon the Corinthians. He is treating the preservation of virginity and declares that he is not establishing a precept but giving counsel. But what sort of reasoning is this? Paul does not give the Corinthians a precept to preserve virginity and does not cast a snare upon their consciences; therefore, the laws of kings do not bind subjects in conscience. Would anyone who observed any law of argument speak in this way? What has the liberty of counsels to do with the necessity of precepts?

Fourth, James 4:12: “There is one legislator and judge, who can destroy and deliver.” But what has this to do with the olive trees? The Apostle admonishes them not to judge the law but to do it, because there is one legislator and judge. Yet it is not thereby proved that there are no other legislators, just as it is not proved that there are no other secondary judges. If there are other legislators and judges, but secondary ones, then there are also laws and therefore obligation.

Fifth, 1 Peter 4:19 says: “Let them commend their souls to the faithful Creator in good deeds.” What follows? Are they therefore not bound by the laws of their princes? The soul is commended to God by obeying magistrates. “But God alone possesses right over consciences.” Certainly, in the same way God alone possesses right over bodies and fortunes, yet he has communicated that right to others: he commanded some to reign, command, forbid, and punish, and commanded others to obey. When he gave makers of laws, he willed others to obey. The first and supreme right is in God; in God’s vicars, kings, there is a participated right, just as in parents, teachers, and husbands. A prince can therefore bind in what they call the forum of conscience, the forum of God, because God commanded that he be obeyed.

But it is preferable to answer the French minister from the opinion of another minister. Pareus, on Romans 13:5, doubt 7, objects thus: "Conscience regards God alone." He himself answers: first, conscience regards not only God but also human beings, as Paul testifies in Acts 24. Second, conscience regards civil laws, not as such, but as enacted by a minister of God and fortified by the authority of the general divine precept, "Honor your father," and so forth.

Pareus objects secondly: "To bind consciences belongs to divine law alone and therefore not to civil laws." He answers: "The fallacy of the non-cause. For God binds consciences either immediately, under the character of worship, through divine laws, or mediately, under the character of discipline, through the laws of his ministers," and so forth. By the judgment of his own people, therefore, that Calvinist who attacks the Most Christian king of France with these sayings is refuted.

Objection 2. Human law often must not be obeyed on account of conscience, Daniel 3 and 6. But divine law must always be obeyed on account of conscience. Therefore--

I answer: from this nothing against the truth is established, but only ignorance. For what sort of argument is this? Impious laws commanding idolatry must not be obeyed; therefore, the upright and useful laws of princes do not bind conscience. Augustine speaks very differently in Letter 50 to Count Boniface: "When emperors establish evil laws on behalf of falsehood against truth, those who believe rightly are tested and those who persevere are crowned. But when they establish good laws on behalf of truth against falsehood, those who rage are terrified and those who understand are corrected. Therefore, whoever refuses to obey the laws of emperors which are enacted against the truth of God acquires a great reward. But whoever refuses to obey the laws of emperors which are enacted on behalf of the truth of God acquires a great punishment."

When we say that laws must be obeyed, we are speaking of just laws. But if one reasons correctly who says, "Human laws often must not be obeyed; therefore no human law binds conscience," I do not see why we should not argue in the same manner: "A human magistrate must often not be obeyed--namely, when he commands depraved things; therefore, no commands of a magistrate bind conscience; therefore, there is no need for power, nor is a soul subject which can oppose him and even resist if he wishes to enforce his commands by punishments."

Objection 3. Laws of conscience cannot be changed, just as neither conscience nor God can be changed. But human laws are various and mutable. Therefore--

I answer that this argument too belongs to ignorant malice. It has neither the form nor the matter of a syllogism. For if it is to be put into a legitimate form, the argument must be made thus:

> No law of conscience is mutable.
>
> All human laws are mutable.
> Therefore, no human law is a law of conscience.

But the major premise, understood in this manner, belongs to the Manichaeans and removes nearly the whole Old Testament, for the ceremonial and judicial laws were changed. The general law of conscience remains unmoved: evil must be avoided and good sought; nothing must be done contrary to the dictate of conscience. But particular laws which at one time bind conscience are frequently changed. Formerly, unless a soul was circumcised, it was destroyed from among its people; but now the law says, "If you are circumcised, Christ will profit you nothing." Behold, one law contrary to another: a mutable law, but an immutable God, who from eternity immutably decreed to change the law at the appointed time, to abrogate the old, and to enact the new. If Scharpius pursues this argument, therefore, he will suddenly establish that the old law of God did not bind consciences.

Objection 4. Political power is temporal and concerns external things, not internal ones, and its end is external peace. Therefore, it cannot produce a spiritual effect, that is, bind conscience.

I answer that political power is of itself occupied with external matter and therefore cannot of itself and directly introduce a spiritual obligation in a spiritual matter. Nevertheless, because honorableness and baseness can be found in external and temporal things, temporal law can introduce obligation in that matter. For it is a participation in divine power. Pareus answers weightily: "It is the same fallacy"--of the non-cause--"for although the magistrate may not intend by laws to bind consciences, nevertheless the conscience of subjects senses itself bound to obedience under guilt on account of the general command of God: 'Honor your father and mother.'"

Yet he errs in this matter, for in reality a magistrate often enacts a law in such a way that he does not wish to bind consciences, and if he does not wish to do so, it does not bind. For the right of a law does not extend beyond the will of the legislator. Pareus himself testifies that a magistrate sometimes wishes to bind, though amid so great a rhapsody he is little mindful of himself. On Romans 13:5, doubt 7, proposition 5: "Civil laws by which a prince intends not only to make known or show what must be done, but seriously to command and to bind transgressors to guilt, bind consciences in particular and of themselves under mortal guilt and offense against God."

The disagreement lies here. But the affirmative reasons contend validly for this position, and especially the determination of the Apostle: it is necessary to obey not only on account of wrath but also on account of conscience. The reason is evident: violation of a particular law necessarily carries with it violation of the general law concerning obedience toward the magistrate. But violation of the genus injures conscience. Therefore, so does violation of the particular law. It therefore binds conscience. These are truly the words of Pareus.

But Scharpius's own reasoning destroys itself. He says that the end of political power is external peace. But we are bound in conscience to external peace and therefore to those things without which that peace cannot exist. Yet external peace cannot exist without laws, for laws are the bond of citizens with one another and with the magistrate. Laws therefore bind conscience.

Objection 5. Political power cannot inflict a spiritual punishment or absolve from it; therefore, neither can it bind conscience spiritually.

I answer that the punishment of some transgression can be understood in two ways. First, an altogether spiritual punishment may be imposed for violation of a command. Political power cannot do this, for it cannot inflict upon contemners of its laws a spiritual punishment such as suspension, interdict, or excommunication. Yet it can inflict a punishment through a certain consequence, because it can bind to guilt. For since God wills the magistrate to be obeyed, there is no doubt that the violator of the divine order incurs a spiritual punishment--not so much by the force of the human precept as of the divine precept, which is contemned through violation of the human one. Let the elder Eurystheus, his parent, teach the young Hercules.

Nor is the knot loosed or tightened by saying that the magistrate must be obeyed on account of conscience, not because he can enact laws for consciences, but because with a safe conscience you cannot resist him to whose power God subjected you. For by this very statement it appears that consciences are bound by the laws of the magistrate, because it is not lawful to resist them on account of God. To resist the magistrate is to resist his laws.

Objection 6. Political power cannot absolve conscience from an offense; therefore, neither can it bind.

I answer that in votis, vows, and laws it is not required that one who can bind must also be able to absolve. By a vow, contract, or stipulation anyone can bind himself, but he cannot absolve himself. Suárez says that this is true when the obligation is not imposed directly. Nevertheless, that general proposition can be true in this manner: whoever can impose the obligation of a law can also remove it. First, just as the legislator can establish a law which binds consciences, so he can remit that obligation either by abrogating the law or by indicating that his intention in this matter is to direct subjects but to bind no one's conscience. He can also dispense from his own law, provided this can be done without injury to a third party.

It is not necessary, however, that after the law has been violated he be able to remit the whole guilt. For if the just law of a viceroy is violated, not only the dignity of the viceroy but also the royal majesty, from which the authority of the inferior magistrate comes, is injured. The viceroy can remit his own injury, but not the king's, unless he has received special power concerning that matter. So too must it occur in these cases. One who transgresses a civil law is held under liability to the punishment which the magistrate established, and the same magistrate can remove that punishment. Yet he cannot bring it about that the person did not commit an offense, nor can he remit that guilt and punishment which pertain to God, for this is the power of a higher order. The transgressor acted against this will of God, which wills him to obey not only on account of wrath but also on account of conscience.

Thus the commands of parents bind the consciences of children, yet parents cannot absolve the disobedient from the offense. This belongs to divine right.

Objection 7. If civil laws bound no less than divine laws, then human laws would have to be obeyed no less than divine laws, and no one could exempt himself from the observance and punishments of human laws, because no one can exempt himself from divine laws. For where there is an equal reason, the same right ought to obtain. But the Papists teach that the latter is false when they contend for the immunity of clerics.

I answer that the question is not about equality between the obligation in divine laws and that in human laws. Divine laws bind more strictly, because they are always not only just, useful, and holy, but are also certainly known to be such. Next, in violating them divine majesty, from which they proceed immediately, is injured more greatly. Third, divine laws bind everyone; human laws do not bind everyone, because some are exempt from the jurisdiction of a political magistrate. All are equally subject to God. But just as God can exempt some from his own positive law, so too can a magistrate exempt some from his law, for someone can be given a privilege by which he is not held by a law.

Objection 8. If ecclesiastical laws do not bind conscience outside a case of scandal and contempt, then civil laws do so much less. But the former was proved above. Therefore--

I answer that we argue the contrary: if civil laws bind, ecclesiastical laws bind much more, as we shall teach in their place. The conflict between Scharpius and Pareus is extraordinary. Scharpius says that ecclesiastical law does not bind and concludes from this that civil law binds much less. But Pareus deliberately defends the contrary: ecclesiastical law does not bind for the reason that civil law does bind.

We have long experienced more than enough how much confusion this opinion produces, especially in the Roman Empire. Those who have imbibed these opinions think that neither the sentence of judges nor laws must be observed.

Objection 9. No law enacted by a human being, as such, can bind conscience, because a law extends no further than the legislator.

I answer that human law binds absolutely and that consciences are held by human laws. Whether they bind as human laws is not a question of morals; yet to deny it is contrary to good morals, since human magistrates, as such, possess the right of commanding and enacting laws. Thus this was formerly censured in Gerson, because he said that human law does not bind insofar as it is human, but insofar as it is a degree of divine law, lecture 4, corollary 4. Deservedly so. For the meaning is that the obligation to obey is founded not upon the power of the legislator but upon our reasoning, by which we deduce that the law which we obey is derived from divine or natural law. When this deduction is brought into morals, it must disturb the state; for according to the varying capacity of human beings, that derivation will be established variously. Next, an examination of all human laws will be undertaken by everyone, and the power of kings will be restrained according to the doubtful and most frivolous deduction of restless human beings. Finally, how much license is here conceded to the most cunning subtleties of legal instruments? They will compare contrary laws and will set before the laws by which they are governed other laws differing from them in any manner whatsoever. It must therefore be said that obligation arises from human power and consequently that the law of human power, even as such, binds, for even as such it possesses its whole force from God because it possesses it from the vicar of God. For the rest, it is not fitting to argue so subtly, lest real tumults arise from false trifles.

Objection 10. Human law establishes a means remotely, or mediately, toward an end, and a means for preserving human society invented by human thought, in which it often errs. Therefore human law, as such, does not bind conscience before God.

I answer that a knot is being sought in a bulrush. Although Pareus and Calvin appear to think in this manner, Pareus, by dissenting from the others, sufficiently shows that he thinks human laws bind of themselves, in proposition 5 cited above. But the French Hercules indicates his meaning through other things which he teaches unsuitably: namely, that they do not bind because they do not command acts of the virtues, as he says in his response to objection 4. And in response to objection 5 he says: "Next, the laws of kings bind conscience only when they promulgate those things which God has commanded." According to his opinion, therefore, whatever the king commands, unless God has commanded it beforehand, will be rejected with a free conscience. Nor must scandal be feared, because no one is rightfully scandalized if another exercises his own right. Therefore no Calvinist instructed in this heresy will be bound to obey the king unless the king shows his law plainly in the sacred Bible. What could be more seditious than this? Finally, if divine law is promulgated by royal law, it receives no new obligation beyond that which it possessed before. For if the king possesses no jurisdiction over conscience, no new obligation will be added even when he enacts divine law.

At last Scharpius, forgetful of what he has disputed, draws this conclusion in his response to objection 7: "We are commanded to obey the magistrate on account of conscience. Therefore--" He answers: "The inference is denied, because the Apostle treats only those who condemn and spurn the magistrate and withdraw themselves from obedience to him. Next, this is said with respect to the authority in commands which is from God, not with respect to individual laws. Finally, civil laws do not bind of themselves, because the necessity of observing them does not consist in the things commanded but depends upon the authority of the magistrate and the general end of laws."

These are so many arguments against himself. First, Paul reprehends not only contempt for the magistrate but disobedience. He wills obedience on account of conscience. But when someone does not obey a law because he thinks there is no power of binding, he contemns the authority of the magistrate. Second, he says that obedience is owed with respect to the authority which is from God. But this is sufficient, for that authority has been communicated by God to magistrates; therefore obedience is owed with respect to the authority given to the magistrate, and therefore with respect to individual laws insofar as they possess authority from the magistrate. It makes no difference that civil laws concern indifferent things, for many laws of God concern only means; yet when they are commanded by God, they cease to be indifferent, for they become necessary. So too these indifferent matters of civil laws, by reason of the power which God conferred upon the magistrate, are necessary means for preserving human society.

And at last he admits this when he says: "Because the necessity of observing them does not consist in the things commanded but depends upon the authority of the magistrate and the general end of laws." If necessity depends upon the authority of the magistrate, then that authority constrains consciences, upon which it imposes the necessity of obeying. He therefore appears to hold a milder opinion than he had declared in words--if, indeed, he knows what he thinks. For heresy draws him toward depravity, reason toward truth.

In question 1, where he asks whether it is lawful for a magistrate to establish laws, he answers that it is lawful and proves it by these arguments:

1. Princes are called legislators, Proverbs 8:11 and Isaiah 33:22. Therefore--

2. If Christians can be kings, then they can also establish laws, because supreme magistracy and νομοθεσία, legislative power, necessarily cohere according to the rule of law: when jurisdiction has been conceded, those things without which it cannot be exercised are conceded. But the former has been proved above. Therefore--

3. A law is nothing other than the command of a king. Therefore, if kings can command, they can also enact laws.

4. Christians are human beings and therefore citizens of a state. They must therefore possess a rule of civil actions. Natural law is insufficient as the rule because it shows only certain general principles, and evangelical law is insufficient because it treats only divine matters. Human law is therefore necessary.

5. If it were not lawful for a Christian prince to bind the people by laws, this would be because it is opposed to Christian liberty. But the latter is false, because Christian liberty is opposed only to the slavery of sin, to which a just law is also opposed. Next, what possesses its foundation in integral nature is not opposed to Christian liberty. But every just civil law is such. Therefore--

§ 17. From this a firm argument, necessary for peace, is deduced. Princes are legislators; therefore, they can bind subjects. Second, νομοθεσία, or the power of enacting laws, is connected with jurisdiction; therefore, it binds as jurisdiction does. But jurisdiction binds in conscience; therefore, so does νομοθεσία. For if a judge is bound in conscience to judge according to civil laws, subjects are also bound to obey. The example is clear.

Immovable things are acquired by usucaption among persons present in ten years, and among persons absent in a period of twenty years. §1 On Usucaptions; the single law On the Transformation of Usucaption. A judge is bound in conscience to judge according to this law and adjudge the property of Gaius to Titius if Titius has acquired it by prescription. There is no one who would not judge a judge deciding otherwise impious, unjust, perjured, and a robber. His conscience is therefore held by human law, for divine law did not define periods of usucaption. But if the necessity of judging in this manner rests upon the judge, Gaius will be held by the same necessity to obey and will act against conscience if he does not obey, since the necessity of judging according to this law and that of abiding by the judgment are reciprocal. Thus the whole force and determination are in human law, though derived from divine law.

But if Gaius is a Scharpian Calvinist, he will be able to obstruct execution by any means, for he will judge that law and judgment have nothing to do with conscience. Secretly or openly, now or later, whenever his strength gives him opportunity, he will go to recover the property. Thus the war could be just on both sides: Titius will retain the property by the privilege of the matter adjudged, while Gaius will say that without guilt he can resist the judgment of human law.

If, therefore, νομοθεσία is connected with jurisdiction, human law binds consciences. One who teaches otherwise introduces sheer brigandage and the overthrow of the state in place of legitimate judgments.

§ 18. I refute Scharpius from his own words as well. If a law is nothing other than the command of a king, and a command must be obeyed on account of conscience, then a law, which is nothing other than the command of a king, must also be obeyed. But a king is bound to command many things, and therefore a subject is bound to obey them. What the king is bound to demand, the subject is bound to furnish. Besides natural and evangelical laws, human law is necessary. If the law is necessary, obedience to it is therefore necessary. For it is ridiculous that in a city some law should be necessary for the city's safety, yet the observance of a necessary law should be optional and every citizen should be able to violate the necessary law.

Finally, if a just civil law does not obstruct Christian liberty, if it has its foundation in nature, and if a prince can bind his citizens, who would doubt that consciences too can be bound?

Nevertheless, these statements conflict with what he teaches in question 3 On Antichrist: that Christ does not wish our consciences to be pressed by this yoke. He speaks generally of the Church and secular princes. And argument 10 says:

"A human being cannot condemn someone to hell; therefore, he cannot bind conscience to observe a law under penalty of eternal death." As though a human being endowed with divine authority could not do this. For if someone sins against the law, he has already condemned himself. Thus it is not the father but God, the avenger of disobedience, who consigns a rebellious and contumacious son to hell.

CHAPTER IX

Not All Laws, Even Just Ones, Bind Consciences; Some Bind Unequally

§ 1. Civil laws sometimes bind immediately only to punishment, but not to guilt. On this point there is some disagreement among theologians. Some contend that every law which commands or forbids binds consciences, because in every law there is power together with a will to bind, and in its violation there is disobedience, which is a sin. Thus they think that it is not even within the power of the legislator not to bind if he wishes to enact a law. Others maintain that it can happen that a legislator truly commands, and does not merely ordain or direct, and yet the transgressor does not sin, because the legislator can will not to bind him to guilt but only to punishment. It is a true law, and yet the transgressor is not held by guilt.

For example, there was an ancient law of the Venetians that a fine should be imposed upon one who built the curia--which was then humble and in no way equal to the dignity of the state--with greater magnificence. One of the doges demolished the old building and raised a beautiful structure worthy of so great an assembly. When accused, he willingly and readily paid the fine. He did not sin by that magnificence, for it was not the intention of the state to bind him to sin, but through fear of punishment to preserve the frugality of the fathers.

I said “immediately,” for in reality that law too touched conscience: after he built the palace, he was bound in conscience to pay the fine. Many laws of religious orders are of this kind: they do not bind to guilt but only to punishment, either definite or indefinite. For the whole obligation depends upon the intention of the person commanding. The transgressor is compelled to sustain the punishment, because otherwise there would be no reason for compelling him if he were held neither by conscience nor by punishment.

§ 2. We have described that law according to common usage. For if we cut the matter to the quick, that whole law binds conscience, and the person who performs the deed to which the punishment is annexed--whether it is called a punishment properly or analogically--does not properly offend against it. Rather, the one who transgresses the whole law does so; that is, he both performs the deed and refuses the punishment. For the law is: “Either do not build, or pay the fine.” Nor is it necessary that the law always be enacted in that disjunctive form. A law can be established absolutely with the intention that it bind only to punishment.

In our Society there is a law that those who leave the house write their names--which are inscribed on a tablet near the door of the house--and inform the doorkeeper where they are going. No punishment is added, nor does the legislator declare that guilt is absent; nevertheless, because at the beginning he declared that he did not wish to bind anyone’s conscience, one who omits these things does not sin. Thus, whether a law is purely penal or mixed, it will sometimes not bind to guilt. It is agreed that a purely penal law, which says only, “Whoever does this shall undergo this punishment,” does not bind. Concerning a mixed law, which truly commands or prohibits something and assigns a punishment to the transgressor, the matter too is clear: when by the command the legislator wishes to bind in no way other than to punishment, there is therefore neither a will to bind otherwise nor disobedience until the punishment is refused after the deed.

§ 3. A law founded upon a presumption of fact which is false does not bind conscience. For example, if Gaius secretly married a woman and afterward celebrates solemn nuptials with another, in the external court judgment is rendered in favor of the second marriage because witnesses and all the proofs of marriage are present, and because he is presumed to lie about the prior marriage and not to have deceived publicly. Yet in reality he is bound to the former spouse.

If a presumption is founded upon fear of danger, the law binds even though in the particular case the rationale of the law ceases; it must nevertheless be observed on account of the common good. There is a law that no one make religious profession before completing his fifteenth year, for it is presumed that this would be done rashly from weakness of judgment. Thus, although it is done with mature judgment and prudence, it nevertheless does not bind, because the law, which regards ordinary dangers, renders the profession altogether invalid.

§ 4. Human law sometimes binds under mortal sin. For since it belongs to divine and natural right to obey just laws, the matter and circumstances can be of such a kind that transgression is judged grave and harmful. Whether a transgression is a mortal sin cannot be gathered from the words of the law alone, from the intention of the legislator, or from the severity of the punishment, but from the gravity of the matter. For since the intention of the legislator ought to be just and reasonable, he ought gravely to bind consciences only in a grave matter in which a great interest of the state is involved. But when the cause is grave, the legislator cannot bind under venial sin, because the transgression is grave by the nature of the matter.

For example, when a sumptuary law has been established and the manner and duration of courses defined, if someone violates it publicly, the act can redound to great evil for the state. But if contempt either for the legislator or for the matter of the law is added, the sin will be greater. Contempt for God is always mortal; contempt for human law in a small matter is venial; contempt for the civil legislator on account of human defects is sometimes venial and sometimes mortal. But if he is contemned insofar as he is a superior, or by reason of the power itself, the guilt is always mortal, because this contempt is insulting to divine majesty

§ 5. Civil law can bind even with danger to life. This is seen especially in war. A soldier must not desert the ranks even if he sees that he must die. The state can command this fortitude, for if it could not, insufficient provision would have been made for the common good and defense. That defense certainly belongs to natural right, but the magistrate can assign it to particular human beings and send these or those legions, cohorts, and squadrons into evident dangers. By military law they are compelled to obey.

§ 6. The observance of a law binds with danger to life when more utility redounds to the state from its preservation than from the life of the person held by the law, or when transgression of the law is more destructive to the state than the death of a citizen. That rule is commonly approved. In it we must consider first that the danger in question be true and certain; next, that there is the greatest difficulty in judging whether the good or evil is greater.

For there are many whose life does not greatly benefit the state and indeed appears even to burden it. For what benefit to the state is a leper who is also a beggar? How easily can a public good be found greater than his life, and a loss more grave than his death? Thus the matter must be determined not only from the public good considered precisely, but also from the private good or evil of the person who is a part of the state. For it pertains to the good of the state not to be prodigal of its own blood. Nor is the sin in this matter slight, especially on the part of commanders in war, when for the sake of a small advantage they expose a soldier to great dangers. “Who could endure an ignoble village being purchased with the blood of so great a king?” the Macedonians cry. Who does not see that Drances spoke rightly?

> Let the royal bride, of course, fall to Turnus,
> While we, cheap lives and unburied bodies,
> Lie scattered over the field.

What, then? At night enemies drive away herds stalled before a city. A leper sees them--an infirm old man, burdensome to the state. If he is silent, his silence causes public loss; if he cries out, death stands before his eyes. But there is a law which commands that the approach of an enemy be reported. I judge that even if the old man’s life burdens the state rather than benefits it, and the loss of the driven-away herd is great, nevertheless the old man is not bound to act with danger to his life. Rather, so great a good for the state, or so great an evil, is required that, all things considered, the matter is worthy of one for which a prudent person would lay down his life.

In this matter the following must especially be observed: in a well-constituted state there must be the greatest charity toward individual citizens. For just as we do everything to avoid cutting off bodily members, so too the life of every individual citizen ought to be highly commended. No one is bound to undergo death for a neighbor's cattle, nor can the state command it. For the protection of individuals, even the wretched, pertains to it, and it is of concern to all that the afflictions of no one be exposed to injury.

CHAPTER X

Penal Laws Are Necessary and Bind in Various Ways

§ 1. Very many human beings are restrained in their duty neither by kindness nor by benefits. Dio speaks rightly: "Human beings endowed with so evil a disposition are overcome by no benefits, since these persons prepared snares for him from whom they had received such great benefits." For so many evil persons, therefore, as for the sick, the medicine of legal punishments must be prepared.

Hence punishments are so frequent in the state, because very many are evil and must be restrained by fear of punishment. This was so little hidden both now and formerly that Seneca insulted the human race to applause when he said: "He who hates the evil hates everyone."

In punishment, therefore, care must be taken that it look to the future. For just as one is not worthy of the name of physician if he torments the sick person with loathing for medicines or the pain of cutting and burning because intemperance has afflicted his health, rather than in order to heal him, so too must the legislator act. For no prudent person, as Seneca says in chapter 16 of On Anger, punishes because a sin has been committed, but lest it be committed. Past things cannot be recalled; future things are prevented. Those whom he wishes to make examples of wickedness ending badly he will kill openly--not only that they themselves may perish but that by perishing they may deter others.

§ 2. There were eight kinds of punishments, themselves distributed into various forms: loss, bonds, blows, retaliation, ignominy, exile, servitude, and death. All the same forms are still in use, and in so great a variety of torments they all represent to us the severity of the future judgment.

§ 3. I think that three things must be observed in these matters. First, grave punishments must be established by laws, for they are fit to terrify. If human beings commit those things for which punishments have been established, they will commit much more those for which there are none. Great harms are introduced when, through confidence in impunity, they boldly perpetrate evils.

Next, no one's power or services toward the state should be so great that he is exempted from the punishments of laws. Unless this is observed, he will become insulting and injurious, judging license to be the reward of his virtue.

§ 4. Clemency must always temper the punishments of laws according to the circumstances of persons. But let us now treat the obligation of penal laws.

The following rules can therefore be established concerning them.

Rule I. A penal law binds the judge to punish the defendant according to it. For he ought not to judge laws but to judge according to laws.

Rule II. Another law can be enacted which binds to punishment before sentence, as do certain censures of excommunication and irregularity.

Rule III. This does not occur when a law threatens punishment or uses a verb in the future tense. But when it is said that punishment is incurred by the deed itself, or from that time--which is not customary in civil laws--the punishment binds conscience before condemnation by the judge. This is much more so when an express clause indicates that the punishment has already been incurred, as frequently occurs in deprivations.

Rule IV. After sentence has been rendered, the defendant is bound to undergo the punishment patiently, without resistance.

Rule V. Indeed, if some action by the defendant is necessary for the punishment, he is bound to it. Even when he has justly been condemned to death, he is bound to leave the prison for the place of punishment and not to fight against the ministers of justice. When prison, exile, or a fine is decreed, he is also bound to execute it.

Rule VI. A law which renders acts invalid can bind conscience so that they are not performed otherwise than according to the form which it prescribed. Yet it does not always prohibit performance of the act, for someone can perform an invalid act; in many cases, however, it is in no way lawful.

Rule VII. Laws always have this punishment annexed: acts done contrary to the laws--indeed, without the solemnity of the laws when the laws require it for the substance of the matter--are invalid. The law of Theodosius concerning decurions was enacted and concludes thus: "For we will that no pact, no agreement, and no contract be regarded as having been concluded between those who contract when the law prohibits them from contracting." Yet in civil law such a contract becomes invalid only when this is declared by a sentence.

Rule VIII. The supreme prince, who possesses the right of tempering laws, has power to moderate punishment. Indeed, every punishment is discretionary for the supreme prince, as Baldus says on the final law On Senators. But this must be understood in such a way that he does not depart from equity and just severity.

These rules generally contain those things which pertain to the judge and the defendant. Meanwhile, jurists treat punishments variously. It must be noted that they are imposed sometimes by canon law and sometimes by civil law, although they are often the same.

§ 5. The first punishment is νουθεσία, admonition. It is usually private and the mildest, when the obligation of someone's duty is recalled to his mind. This is followed by another admonition called παραίνεσις, which has rebuke joined to it, called ἐπιτίμησιν in Greek. In Synesius there is: νουθετήσας οὐκ ἔπεισα, ἐπιτιμήσας ἠρέθισα--"By admonishing I did not persuade; by rebuking I provoked."

Κόλασις is vengeance rendered to the state, and it regards the correction of the person punished. Τιμωρία is rendered to the person who was injured. Thus Aristotle, book 1 of the Rhetoric: ἡ κόλασις ἕνεκα τοῦ πάσχοντος· τιμωρία ἕνεκα τοῦ ποιοῦντος, ἵνα ἀποπληρωθῇ. Correction is punishment for the sake of the person who suffers it; retribution is for the sake of the person who exacts it, namely, that the punishment be fulfilled.

The state should direct great care to ensuring that judges do not neglect that form of punishment by which they make satisfaction for the losses or injury of others. For injured persons in reality turn their hatred against the prince, as Pausanias did against Philip, if they perceive that justice is denied them.

§ 6. The forms of punishments which are referred to those eight kinds are various.

First there is infamy, when someone's reputation is marked. Among jurists, reputation is the condition of unimpaired dignity approved by laws and customs. When it is diminished or removed, the person who has been marked is rendered infamous, and every gate of dignity is closed to him. Law 2 On Dignities; law 12 of the Code under that title. Infamy is either of law or of fact; infamy of law belongs either to canon or imperial law. Under canon law, murderers, evil-doers, thieves, sacrilegious persons, robbers, adulterers, incestuous persons, poisoners, perjurers, false witnesses, and others like them are infamous, as are heretics, actors, plunderers of ecclesiastical goods, calumniators, and simoniacs. More persons are infamous under civil law, although not all are infamous under both systems.

Next is deposition or degradation, whether from an office, a benefice, or a rank; confiscation of goods; confinement in a monastery; prison; condemnation to public labor or the mines; servitude; and exile. All these are of various kinds.

In this class care must be taken that persons who can avenge themselves and harm the state are not punished by infamy or exile. Greece and Italy have experienced this.

Next, another grave and useful kind of punishment, extremely customary in former times but now rare, appears altogether worthy of restoration: condemnation to the mines, to public labor, to service in a public work, to saltworks, sulfur works, or sand pits. Women were condemned to service. Now almost the only remaining kind, and not even in all places, is condemnation to the galleys, and elsewhere to various labors. If the other punishments also were renewed in place of temporary or perpetual prisons, the auction block, public chastisement, branding, mutilation of ears, and exile--which now, amid divided territories and so great a multitude and rivalry of dominions, neither constitutes a great punishment nor presents a danger--if, that is, laborious punishments which recall the mind to duty were renewed, fewer crimes would be committed and the state would be aided in expense. But I shall treat this elsewhere.

CHAPTER XI

It Is Best That Laws Be Few

§ 1. At the beginning the Roman city possessed few laws, as did all states at their origin; afterward, as morals declined toward worse things, the laws increased together with the vices themselves. Certainly very few laws of Romulus and the other kings are enumerated, although it is probable that they were in great part abolished through disuse and hatred of the kings. The laws of the Twelve Tables followed; from them law was pronounced for a very long time and with great constancy, as Cicero in the Brutus and On the Laws, and others, demonstrate.

Afterward, when the city and likewise lawsuits had increased, there was added the praetorian volume of edicts. Servius Sulpicius, most learned in law and justice, wrote two books On the Praetorian Edict, for so they called that book, and left nearly one hundred and eighty books. Yet Aulus Ofilius appears to have composed the Edict most diligently. But even then they labored under laws and vices. For Julius Caesar intended to reduce the civil law to a definite form and from the immense and diffuse abundance of laws to bring together all the best and necessary provisions in very few books. Thus even then there were many books and laws, which wicked human beings abused for sowing discord and lawsuits.

Vespasian followed, who had some regard for justice. For from Augustus down to him a certain rage for accusing, calumniating, and overturning everything had grown strong. When the succession of lawsuits had everywhere increased so greatly that, as Suetonius says, the lifetimes of the litigants scarcely appeared likely to suffice for completing them, Vespasian chose by lot persons to decide extraordinarily and reduce to the shortest number those cases.

But justice was tossed violently until the time of Hadrian. For the praetors possessed great and almost excessive power: they published edicts and pronounced law according to them. Yet there was great care for justice, because soon afterward they could be accused of injuries and punished by law if they had issued an inequitable edict or judgment. But through civil wars and then the rule of monsters among human beings, the license of the praetors became more unpunished, because those who held power were companions of thieves. The chief occasion for wrongdoing was that law was pronounced variously. Hadrian therefore approved the labor of the jurist Salvius, who composed the Perpetual Edict, and commanded the praetors to pronounce law from it. Nevertheless, codes of laws were soon added in no smaller number. Indeed, the opportune subtlety of interpreters increased. Gaius, Domitianus, Ulpian, and Paul published commentaries upon the Perpetual Edict. Paul wrote eighty books and Ulpian eighty-three.

It was the labor of most learned and most judicious men, but by its own mass it oppressed justice and gave pettifoggers and subtle pleading an occasion for injuries. A substantial witness to this matter is Justinian himself, who declares that the Perpetual Edict had been confused by the commentaries of interpreters. Having been taught by this evil, he wished to provide that his own Pandects not be burdened by additions of commentaries.

§ 2. Justinian's care was foremost in this kind, and the multitude of laws gave him the reason for establishing them anew. For he writes thus to Tribonian: "Since nothing in all affairs is found so worthy of study as the authority of laws, which disposes both divine and human matters well and expels all inequity, and since we have found the whole course of laws descending from the foundation of the city of Rome and the times of Romulus so confused that it extends to infinity and is comprehended by no capacity of human nature, our first concern was to begin from the most sacred former princes, to amend their constitutions, and to hand them down by a clear way, so that, gathered into one Code and freed from every superfluous similarity and most inequitable discord, they might offer to all human beings the ready protection of their integrity."

How great an abundance of frauds must there credibly have been where no human being could comprehend the multitude of laws? Justinian therefore acted excellently--if his other deeds had followed that measure.

And in the confirmation of the Digest addressed to all peoples: “Something wonderful has emerged from these books: the ancient multitude is found smaller in comparison with the present brevity. For persons who formerly conducted lawsuits, although many laws had been established, nevertheless carried their lawsuits through from a few of them, either because of the scarcity of books, which it was impossible for them to obtain, or because of ignorance itself; and lawsuits were decided more by the will of judges than by legitimate authority. But in the present completion of our Digest, laws have been collected from so many volumes that persons of former times--not merely, we say, did not know their names, but had never even heard them. All these have been collected and the most ample substance assembled, so that the ancient multitude is indeed found poor, but our brevity is rendered most wealthy. The excellent man Tribonian supplied especially the abundance of books of ancient wisdom, among which many were unknown even to the most learned human beings. When all had been read, whatever was most excellent in them was separated and passed into our best compilation. But the makers of this work read not only the volumes from which laws were placed; they also read many others and, finding in them nothing useful or new which they might extract and apply to our Digest, rejected them with excellent judgment.”

And to the great Senate: “Freed, namely, from the former disturbance and confused and endless establishment of law, they will hereafter employ laws which are upright, concise, ready to everyone’s hand, bring an abbreviation of lawsuits, and are prepared and exposed for easy acquisition by all who wish it. Nor will they any longer need great sums of money to collect a multitude of those useless books; rather, at the lowest price, the laws offer the means of obtaining themselves both to the richer and to those setting out from a more slender patrimony.”

The emperor taught how great the multitude was in the preface to the Pandects: “Formerly, as your prudence knows, from so great a multitude of laws--which extended to two thousand books and three million lines--students received from the voice of their teacher nothing other than merely six books, themselves confused and very rarely containing useful laws, while the rest were already obsolete and inaccessible to all.”

§ 3. There were therefore always persons who increased the laws, as can be seen in the history of law concerning professors and jurists. When their study and industry increased beyond measure, others reduced the confused prolixity to the brevity of the ancients.

That multitude nearly fell silent when Asia had been occupied by barbarians, Africa alienated from the empire, and kingdoms established in Europe. Lothair restored it to use. And now Germany is nearly submerged in the great multitude of laws and lawsuits.

That multitude is therefore harmful, since the work of those who cut it back is especially approved. I esteem highly the makers of laws, priests of sacred Themis; but if the emperor, employing the most learned jurists and the authority of the princes, restored this great chaos to order and transparent brevity, I would call him the savior of the state and father of the fatherland. To follow the examples of so many princes is glorious and necessary for the fatherland, which now spends more upon lawsuits than upon wars--lawsuits not to be ended, but to be continued, made harsher, quieted to the loss of the parties, or perpetuated.

§ 4. A multitude of laws is a witness to corrupted morals. For just as it is agreed that diseases existed before remedies were sought, so crimes and injuries harassed a city before laws were sanctioned by which wickedness might be opposed. Thus Demosthenes speaks in oration 2 On Laws: “The diseases which befall bodies are healed by the industry and aid of physicians; but the judgments of legislators repel and cast out the savagery of minds.” Where there are innumerable laws, therefore, innumerable crimes must have preceded them.

Seneca prudently explained this in Letter 95: “That ancient wisdom was without doubt, as you say, crude when it was first arising, no less than the other arts whose subtlety increased in their progress. But there was not yet any need for carefully devised remedies. Wickedness had not yet risen so high or spread so widely. Simple remedies could oppose simple vices. Now the defenses must be more elaborate in proportion as the things by which we are attacked are stronger.

“Medicine was once the knowledge of a few herbs by which flowing blood might be stopped and wounds gradually close. Afterward it arrived at such manifold variety. Nor is it surprising that then it had less business, when bodies were still strong and solid and their food simple, not corrupted by art and pleasure. After food began to be sought not to remove hunger but to irritate it, and a thousand seasonings were invented by which appetite might be aroused, things which were nourishment to the hungry became burdens to the full.

“Hence pallor and the trembling of sinews soaked with wine, and a wasting more pitiable from indigestion than from hunger; hence the uncertain feet of those who stumble, and a constant reeling like that of intoxication itself; hence fluid admitted beneath the whole skin and the distended belly, while it becomes badly accustomed to receive more than it could hold; hence the suffusion of livid bile, a discolored countenance, the wasting of those rotting within themselves, twisted fingers with stiffening joints, the numbness of unfeeling sinews, or palpitation without interruption. Why should I mention dizziness of the head? Why the torments of the eyes and ears, the crawling sensations of a fevered brain, and all the parts through which we discharge waste afflicted with internal ulcers? Besides these, there are innumerable kinds of fevers, some raging with violence, others creeping with a subtle pestilence, others coming with shivering and a great shaking of the limbs. Why should I recount the other innumerable diseases, the punishments of luxury? Those who had not yet dissolved themselves in delights, who commanded and ministered to themselves, were free from these evils.”

Against those monsters of diseases medicine arms itself; against crimes laws are established. And just as symptoms are aggravated by the multitude of physicians, so injuries are renewed by the variety of laws. Health is certainly restored by few medicines or none. Variety disorders all the viscera.

§ 5. A multitude of laws produces innumerable lawsuits. Plato speaks most truly: ὅτι παρ’ οἷς πλεῖστοι νόμοι, καὶ δικαστήρια τέτοια, καὶ βίοι μοχθηροί. Among those who possess the greatest number of laws, there are also lawsuits and likewise depraved morals. But why do laws--good laws, laws invented by the most skilled persons for ending lawsuits--generate new lawsuits? The laws are good and holy, but they are employed by depraved persons for injury. Where there are many laws, this cannot humanly happen otherwise.

First, human weakness is unequal to learning, remembering, or even understanding them all. For which advocate or judge, much less procurator, could not only embrace in memory two thousand books and three million lines, but compare them with one another, prefer one law to another, and adapt the efficacy of each to recollection and action?

Hence many, even the most skilled, must be ignorant of their own right; when that right occurs to the mind of another, it wins the case. Hence the slow progress of jurists; and when they are summoned from the schools to practice, they are regarded as though untrained in the laws. Third, the multitude is loved by those who are nourished and enriched by lawsuits. Just as wasting disease sets prices for physicians, so the forum does for them. Their sole concern is to bring forward laws of every kind--even obsolete and inequitable laws and those twisted into a depraved meaning--as did that advocate before Galeazzo, duke of Milan, concerning whom the most learned Lipsius relates in chapter 10 of the Political Admonitions.

What did Galeazzo, duke of Milan, do? When he had several times heard that there was an advocate of so cunning a disposition that he could sow lawsuits and prolong and nourish those already sown even when the law was clear, he summoned the man and addressed him: “I owe my baker one hundred gold pieces. I do not wish to pay. Can you defend me at law and draw out the matter?” He assented freely and readily placed himself at the prince’s disposal. But the prince brought evil upon him: when he had thus confessed his fraud, Galeazzo first rebuked him with words and then commanded him to be killed publicly by the noose.

Milder is what Lipsius relates about James, king of Aragon, who always showed himself hostile to lawsuits and litigants. Among these was Ximén Rada, a distinguished and foremost jurist in that age. Because many complained that they had been afflicted by his subtlety or malice, the king prosecuted him under the law against prevaricators and expelled him from the boundaries of the kingdom.

Everyone sees that persons of this kind must be restrained seriously. Having followed an honored art of plundering, they provide everyone assistance and courage for thefts which are safe and near to justice. They are far more harmful than open enemies, for without danger to themselves they make an assault upon the fortunes of others. More persons in the Roman Empire are stripped of property under the appearance of law than formerly by war. The old complaint is:

> The rage of arms and power of the sword press near;
> It will confound every right by force, and a wicked crime
>
> Will bear the name of virtue and endure through many years.

Our complaint is:

> The dark rage of the forum and the power of laws press near;
>
> It confounds every right by the pen, and a wicked crime
> Will bear the name of virtue.

There is another cause why laws are causes and nurses of lawsuits. Amid so great a multitude and so great a diversity of customs, those who enact new laws cannot remember the old. They must therefore be contrary, or at least ἀσυντάκτους, inconsistent with one another. Or if they do not conflict with one another, nevertheless very many are ἐναντιοφανεῖς, apparently contradictory, and appear to conflict. Justinian testifies that in his time there were many contrary laws. In the letter concerning the making of the new Code addressed to the senate of the city of Constantinople, he says that he specially entrusted John, Leontius, Phocas, Basilides, Thomas, and Tribonian to compose from the same three codes and the new constitutions laws which were certain and written in concise speech, and to place them under suitable titles. They were to cut away prefaces as superfluous as far as the solidity of the laws was concerned, together with similar and contrary provisions, except where they might be aided by another division of law, and also provisions which had passed into disuse. They were to add some things and remove others, and even change their words where convenience required it; to collect into one sanction provisions dispersed throughout various constitutions; and to render their meaning clearer, yet so that the temporal order of the constitutions might become clear not only from the added dates and consuls but also from their very composition.

Yet he does not dare to assert that his own laws are altogether free from defects. For in the letter to the senate and all peoples he says: “No contrary provision placed in this Code will claim a place for itself, nor will one be found, if someone with a subtle mind examines the reasons for the diversity. Rather, something new has been discovered or placed there secretly which dissolves the complaint of dissonance and introduces another nature escaping the bounds of discord.”

He certainly totters and is anxious about antinomy, and scarcely any jurist has solved this knot. Cujas attempts it. He says that many laws can be brought into agreement if some are referred to the benign right of constitutions and others to the old laws and severe right. I hear and approve the judgment of this most learned man, but I require that when the lives and fortunes of human beings are at issue there be something certain and established. While they litigate, while one presses severe right and another benign right, meanwhile a stranger holds my estate, or in an evil lodging I lament their long-lived disputations.

Why, therefore, do we not remove many lawsuits with one word and establish that among ἐναντιοφανεῖς, apparently contradictory laws, one is valid and the other abrogated? Volumes have already been written concerning laws which appear contrary either in words and meaning or by consequence. Lest lawsuits therefore be perpetual, let the worse of those laws which cannot exist together fall--or even the better, because in war even an indifferent peace is more desirable. The obscurity of many laws also produces immortal lawsuits; there is no reason why it should not be removed.

This certainly can and ought to be corrected. Peter Gregory speaks excellently in book 10: "Finally, in establishing laws there ought to be a manifest decision, not enveloped in obscurity of meaning or doubtful, lest it be capable of containing any snare; for laws ought to be a norm of living for everyone, the ignorant as well as women and children. Right is certain and defined, for over a doubtful matter the law, as rule, ought to remove doubt."

All therefore rightly require this: that they be able to understand what must be done.

§ 6. This is altogether necessary for peace; otherwise laws hand down not justice but ways of litigating. Hence the subtlety of the schools obstructs not only the wisdom but also the peace and quiet of the state. The oracles of sacred Scripture are obscure because the knowledge and wisdom of God are unfathomably profound, and the intellects and labors of so many excellent, holy, and learned theologians are the surest proof of this fact. We experience the same in laws: so many thousands of jurists dispute concerning the meaning of laws in universities; so many hundreds fight in the forum, grow hoarse at tribunals, and grow pale in the chancelleries of princes; and yet the mind and true opinion of the law has not yet been discovered.

Hence interpretations of laws have arisen--that is, new law. For it is not the law alone that is debated; rather, the decision of the law is sought from the multitude, dignity, and learning of interpreters. I desire that these ambiguities and labyrinths be dissolved by one utterance of the prince, cutting away the shadows of their winding paths, yet in accordance with the opinion of jurists. Everyone will know not only the law but also its meaning. In this matter I demand mature deliberation together with a clear decision. Emperor Alexander enacted many useful laws by which he removed many useless ones, but he sanctioned none except according to the opinion of twenty jurists. Let the emperor therefore establish what the law says. From this we plainly see that the whole of Europe is embroiled in lawsuits and, what is worse, cannot be released from them. They are perpetuated and are conducted among children's children as though hereditary.

§ 7. Finally, what cause is so openly inequitable that it does not appear capable of being defended by some law? Laws abolished by custom should therefore be removed; laws which are, or appear to be, contrary should be reconciled either by abrogation or harmonization. The counsel of the most prudent Lipsius is salutary, if it had an executor. I summon Plato again:

> εἶεν δὲ οὐκ ἄν ποτε πολῖται φίλοι, ὅπου πολλαὶ μὲν δίκαι ἐν ἀλλήλοις εἶεν, πολλαὶ δὲ ἀδικίαι, ἀλλ' ὅπου ὡς ὅτι σμικρόταται καὶ ὀλίγισται.

Citizens will never be harmonious or loving toward one another where there are many mutual lawsuits, but where these are shortest and fewest. Note the final words: he wishes lawsuits to be not only few but brief. I agree with you. Where are we now? A lawsuit of some size occupies a Metonic year. This happens through the wrappings of laws and the sordid practices of advocates; those adjournments are for gain and petty profit. One sails through the Symplegades to Colchis and the golden fleece.

Neither Plato nor I blame true counsellors learned in law and justice. We detest plunderers, pirates, and robbers who plunder securely in the forum before the eyes of the city, and we judge that the instruments of fraud and imposture must be removed.

Nor do the princes of Germany now think otherwise, for the complaint concerning reform of justice and tribunals is perpetual. Let all the imperial recesses be examined. Yet amid so great an army of those whom lawsuits nourish, they will not be able to attain this except by equalizing the laws. Weapons against right and equity will always be supplied from the very sanctuaries of justice and the laws.

§ 8. But learned men defend the variety and multitude of their laws by a great and difficult argument. First, the authority of Aristotle is brought forward for this opinion, book 1 of the Rhetoric, chapter α.: "It is therefore most fitting that rightly enacted laws themselves determine whatever they can and leave as little as possible to those who judge." But if laws must be established concerning very many matters and very few things left to those who will judge, very many laws are necessary.

Thus they turn their consideration to debating whether it is better that a city be governed without laws by the equity and prudence of magistrates and judges, or that everything be distinctly embraced by laws. In this matter I agree with them: laws must indeed be used. Thus Aristotle in the same place. First, because it is easier to find one or a few persons than many who judge rightly and are able to enact a law and establish right. Next, enactments of laws arise from considerations extending over a long time, but judgments are rendered suddenly, so that those who judge find it difficult to possess a right account of justice and utility. And what is greatest of all, the judgment of the legislator concerns neither singular nor present things, but future and universal things; an assembly and a judge judge present and definite things, with which love, hatred, and personal utility are very often joined, so that they can no longer perceive adequately what is true, but personal pleasure or distress obscures judgment. As we were saying, concerning other matters the arbitrator must be made master of as few things as possible. But judgment concerning whether a thing was done or not done, will or will not occur, exists or does not exist, must altogether be left to the arbitrators, for the legislator cannot foresee these things.

These arguments in no way move me to approve the present multitude of laws. For judges decide very many things from similarity of causes, conjectures, and the abilities of commentators. Many events and cases are not now embraced in that infinite multitude of laws and interpretations; in this respect, therefore, we are oppressed by a scarcity of laws. Next, abundance here is worse than scarcity. The multitude said to be accommodated to more events provides occasion for various calumnies, for by those laws through which justice could be protected in one case, many cases are oppressed. Third, this has no bearing upon so many similar, contrary, doubtful, and obscure laws. Let those be removed and the others enacted universally; where shameful subtlety inserts a lawsuit, let it be met by adding or changing a word. Fourth, if laws are clear and provision has been made for the integrity of judges, many extremely grave cases will easily be decided, and much free discretion will not be left to the judge; whereas now, amid our multitude of laws, nearly everything is left free. For what opinion will a judge pronounce today which cannot be fortified by the approval or distortion of some law?

Moreover, many things can restrain the license of a judge, such as visitation, examination of the sentence, appeal, the counsels of assessors, and the determinations of universities. Finally, what prevents laws from being much shorter? Do you desire an example? Law 2, π., title 7: "It is forbidden that anyone remove by force a person summoned to court." A clear matter is treated by these laws.

The praetor proposed this edict so that by fear of punishment he might restrain those who forcibly rescue persons summoned to court.

1. Pomponius writes that a noxal action must also be granted in the name of a slave, unless he did it with his master's knowledge; for then the master must accept the action without surrendering the offender. Ofilius thinks that this edict has no application if a person who could not be summoned to court was removed--for example, a parent, patron, and other such persons. This opinion appears to me more true. Certainly, if the person who summoned him offended, the person who removed him did not offend.

2. For when each acts against the edict--both the freedman who summons his patron and the person who forcibly removes the patron--the freedman who sustains the role of plaintiff is nevertheless in the worse position in an equal offense. The same equity applies to one who was summoned to court at a place other than where he ought to have been. But it must be said still more strongly that a person is not regarded as forcibly removed when the law grants him the right not to be sued there.

3. But if someone removed a slave summoned to court, Pedius thinks that the edict does not apply, because he was not a person who could be summoned to court. What then? An action for production will lie. If someone removes a person summoned before a delegated judge, the punishment of this edict will not apply. What the praetor commands is, "removes by force." Does this require force, or also evil fraud? Force suffices even if evil fraud is absent.

4. But the word "removing" is general, as Pomponius says. To rescue is to take from someone's hands; to remove is to carry away in any manner by seizure. Thus, if someone does not take the person away but causes a delay so that he cannot come to court--so that the day for the action expires or the thing is lost through time--he will be regarded as having removed him although he did not remove his body. If he detained him in that place but did not lead him away, he is held by these words. Likewise, it is agreed that if someone removes a person who is summoned through calumny, he is held by this edict. The praetor says, "or does anything with evil fraud whereby he might more readily be removed," for this can occur without evil fraud, as when there is a just cause for the removal.

5. If someone removes him through another person, he is held by this clause whether he was present or absent. Against one who removed him by force, an action on the facts is granted. It contains not what the thing is worth in truth, but the amount at which the plaintiff valued the matter in controversy. This was added to make clear that even if someone is a calumniator, he nevertheless pursues this punishment. He must show, however, that through this removal it occurred that the person was not brought to court. But if he was nevertheless brought forward, the punishment does not apply, because the words must be understood as requiring an effect. This is an action on the facts, and if several persons offended, it will be granted against each; nevertheless, the person who was removed remains obligated. It will be granted to heirs if they have an interest. It will not be granted against an heir or after a year. One who forcibly removed a debtor does not free the defendant if he pays, because he pays his own punishment.

So many disputes were generated by so few words. Why, therefore, is the law not proposed clearly and briefly? "Let no one, whether slave or free, remove or delay, by force or evil fraud, personally or through another, a person legitimately summoned to court before a competent judge, so that he cannot appear." These matters are indeed usefully explained at greater length, but they can be stated much more briefly and, amid so great a weakness of intellects, ought to be. In many things natural reason truly teaches justice. For what need is there to add that assistance can be given to one who is dragged before a tribunal contrary to right and equity, and that he can be freed from those who drag him away? For we rightly rescue a person surrounded by beasts or robbers from danger; why should we abandon one harassed and afflicted by calumniators? The bite of a calumniator is more poisonous than that of beasts. What remains, therefore, except that decemvirs be established for reducing the laws and that the laws be confirmed by the supreme magistrate?

§ 9. In the laws of the Roman Empire I also require something else which use and necessity have approved: namely, that there are too many general laws which had to be abrogated by municipal laws and provincial statutes. For since there is such diversity of persons, places, and affairs that what is most just elsewhere is inequitable in another place, it was necessary to establish laws accommodated to provinces, towns, and villages. We plainly see that natural equity requires different laws in cities and villages. In some places it is observed that the children of a first marriage are heirs in full to the immovable goods both of the father and of the mother, but the offspring of another marriage enters upon all movables, livestock, household goods, and money as its part of the inheritance. This does not appear unjust in places where the principal wealth is judged to consist in vineyards, fields, pastures, and houses; but in a city where there is a great abundance of merchandise and money and very few possess fields, another law must be established.

Hence it readily appears why all nations neither ought nor can use one law, and indeed why regions which once used Roman law have retained few of its laws. Even within Germany itself diverse laws are found. The territories of Belgium, Saxony, and Austria employ their own particular laws.

From these confusions another difficulty also arises, a fruitful mother of lawsuits: private agreements. The natural equity of the edict concerning agreements is π., law 2, title 14: "For what is so congruent with human good faith as to preserve those things which persons have agreed among themselves?" Hence come the dotal agreements of marriages, and hence the thousand conditions and securities of sales and contracts which mutually entangle one another. For very many exceptions are granted against agreements. Next, they can never be composed so cautiously that calumny cannot search out some fold or hiding place through which it may insinuate itself into the agreements; for it will say either that the agreement is contrary to common law or that there are other agreements. Hence the instruments concerning one little field are so manifold that to have lost or insufficiently understood them is as dangerous as for the field to have been submerged by waters. Thus, while brothers, kinsmen, and relations by marriage strive especially to flee lawsuits and foster concord, by their very diligence they cast themselves and their posterity into lawsuits and conflicts.

We therefore experience what Tacitus admonished: "In the most corrupt state, laws are most numerous"; and what follows from it, pettifoggers are most numerous--just as in houses where many extremely grave diseases rage, we see everything full of medicines. What formerly afflicted the state of the Thurians has occurred. Strabo, book 4, relates that Zaleucus formerly gave the Thurians few and simple laws, but others followed who added other laws through subtlety and superfluous care, from which it happened that they became more celebrated than good.

CHAPTER XII

Laws Ought to Be Just, Equal, and Moderate

§ 1. The laws and institutions of all nations are not just. Cicero truly says in book 1 On the Laws: "Now it is indeed most foolish to suppose that all things are just which have been enacted in the institutions or laws of peoples. Even if they should be laws of tyrants? If those Thirty had wished to impose laws upon Athens? Or if all the Athenians delighted in tyrannical laws, would those laws therefore be held just? No more so, I think, than that law which our interrex carried, that a dictator might with impunity kill whichever of the citizens he wished without hearing his cause. For there is one right by which the society of human beings is bound together and which one law establishes. That law is right reason in commanding and prohibiting; whoever is ignorant of it is unjust, whether it has been written anywhere or nowhere."

And thereafter: "But if rights were established by the commands of peoples, by the decrees of princes, or by the judgments of judges, it would be right to commit robbery, right to commit adultery, and right to substitute false wills, if these things were approved by the votes or enactments of the multitude. But if there is so great a power in the opinions of fools that the nature of things is transformed by their votes, why do they not ordain that things which are evil and pernicious be held good and salutary? Or why, since a law can make right out of wrong, can the same law not make good out of evil? Yet we can distinguish a good law from a bad by no other standard than the natural one. And not only is right judged by nature, but altogether all honorable and shameful things."

And Augustine says: "For then"--that is, between the Second and Third Punic Wars--"that Voconian law was also carried, that no one should make a woman his heir, even an only daughter. What could be said or thought more inequitable than that law I do not know."

It is certainly astonishing that not merely inequitable but also most foolish laws have publicly pleased nations. The Ethiopians chose as king from among their priests the one who most displayed himself, by a fanatical running about, as full of divine inspiration. Among the same people, if the king sent an attendant to someone to announce his death, he at once killed himself with his own hand. A certain Egyptian law granted confessed thieves a fourth part of the theft. The Carthaginians offered brides to the lust of their kings, so that they were not led as virgins into their husbands' homes. The Nasamones also offered them to the sport of the wedding guests. Among the Massagetae intercourse took place openly; among the Troglodytes wives were held in common. Certain Arabs, with no account taken of blood relationship, coupled in the manner of cattle, while intercourse with an outsider was regarded as adultery. The luxury of the Medes advanced so far that they provided by law that no one should have fewer than seven wives. Among the kings of the Indians, the guards were purchased women; if any one of them killed the king, she had as the reward of her parricide marriage to his successor.

Under the laws of other Indians the flesh of parents and companions became food for banquets; lest it be made worse by disease, they killed the sick, adding as their reason, "You are spoiling my meat." The Issedones were milder, for they ate their parents only after they were dead. The Romans cast away monstrous offspring. The Lacedaemonians cast rejected infants into the place which they called the Apothetae. There would be no end if I wished to enumerate inequitable laws. I should rightly deny that these are laws and rights. And with me does a just and holy man, Augustine, book 19 of The City of God, chapter 21: "But what he calls the agreement of right he explains in the course of his discussion, showing by this that a state cannot be conducted without justice. Therefore, where true justice does not exist, neither can right exist. For what is done by right is assuredly done justly; but what is done unjustly cannot be done by right. For the inequitable enactments of human beings are neither to be called nor thought rights, since they themselves say that this is right which has flowed from the fountain of justice; and that what is commonly said by some who think incorrectly is false: that right is whatever is useful to him who has greater power." If it is not right, therefore, neither is it a law, which establishes what is lawful and in which right resides.

§ 2. From this matter I also define what jurists and theologians are accustomed to propose: whether it belongs to the essence of a law that it be just. For the answer must be that a law which commands what is unjust is in no way a law. For it obliges no one to obey, and the law of the supreme divinity has been imposed upon all, by which they are commanded not to obey a law commanding unjust things. Divine law is always necessarily just, because the reason of divine law is his will, through its essence infinitely just. Therefore it can command nothing except what is just, although it sometimes commands what appears unjust but which his supreme power nevertheless makes just, as when he commands Abraham to sacrifice his only-begotten son. But things which can never be done honorably he cannot command--for example, to hate God, to be proud, or to envy.

§ 3. Next, not only must the things which a law commands be just, but it is necessary that the one commanding do so justly; that is, he must possess legitimate authority and jurisdiction. Otherwise it is not a law and has no force of obliging. Furthermore, unjust laws are made in many ways, but chiefly in one: when they are carried for the advantage of one party, to the detriment of others. The power of the nobles, the king, or the people is sought through the circuitous devices of such laws, whose malice appears in their execution and oppression. For in popular government it arms the plebs to seize the goods of the wealthy; in aristocracy it destines free citizens to be the slaves of nobles; in kingship it increases the fisc beyond measure. Sometimes it even rises to such madness that it establishes its enactments against divine laws. Thus Nebuchadnezzar ordained that the statue be worshiped; by not doing this, the Hebrews pleased God. The golden maxim of eternal truth remains: "Whoever refuses to obey the laws of emperors which are carried against the truth of God acquires a great reward." A law, therefore, will be just if it adheres to no party but regards the whole--that is, the common utility--if it guards and champions commutative and distributive justice. And in this matter indeed, when the advantages of some or burdens are transferred to others, there is great danger, as I have said.

§ 4. For a law, therefore, it is necessary, as I have often admonished, that it produce equality. This is the foundation of peace and charity in the state. Aristotle, book 5 of the Ethics, chapter 10: "It exists among human beings who are joined to one another by a community and fellowship of life, who are free and equal either proportionally or numerically, so that they abound of themselves in supplies of things necessary for living and require nothing from abroad. Therefore, among those for whom this is not so, there is no civil right among themselves, but a certain right so called from its likeness to that. For those among whom there is also a common law use a common right. But their law is common whose injustice also is common. For a judgment is an adjudication concerning right and wrong. But among those among whom injustice has a place there is also a place for the doing of wrong, though injustice is not immediately found in all of them. To do wrong is to assign to oneself more of those things which are absolutely good and less of those which are absolutely evil. Therefore, we do not permit a human being to rule, but the law or reason, because he is accustomed to do this for himself and becomes a tyrant. But the person who presides is the guardian of right; and if of right, therefore also of equality."

And with the same thought Cicero says in book 2 On Duties: "For when in the beginning the multitude was oppressed by those who possessed greater resources, they took refuge with some one person outstanding in virtue, who, when he protected the weaker from wrong, maintained the highest together with the lowest under equal right by establishing equity. The cause for establishing laws was the same as that for establishing kings. For an equal right was always sought; otherwise it would not be right. If they obtained it from one just and good man, they were content with him. When this occurred less often, laws were invented which would speak to all always with one and the same voice."

Pheidon of Corinth was indeed led by an argument not bad in appearance, but one least useful for carrying laws: for he wished households and their number to be equal, although at the beginning shares of goods unequal in size had fallen to them by lot. But no prudent legislator seeks this equality.

§ 5. The prince must take the greatest care that laws be moderate. This moderation is discerned both in the very kind of matters and in the punishment established for violators. In the laws themselves it must be observed that the things commanded can be done. For what is beyond our power cannot be commanded, much less oblige anyone or render him liable to punishment. Certainly, no one is capable of law unless freedom is in him; that is the faculty of doing what pleases each person, except what is prohibited by force or right, §1 On the Law of Persons, law 4. Faculty is δύναμις, by which we are able to act; it does not introduce a necessity that a thing be done, but makes it possible that it be done. No one except a madman will carry a law concerning things which altogether cannot be done--just as did that Egyptian tyrant, the archetype of all tyrants: "I do not give you straw; go and gather it wherever you can find it, and nothing shall be diminished from your work." Those who proclaim an impossible law fashion for us a God who is a tyrant of this kind. Dionysius of Syracuse imitated him, but more mildly. For after he had exhausted the people by exactions and saw them growing furious at new contributions, he vigorously pressed the business, not unaware that their anger was born from grief over money about to be lost. But when at last he saw them carefree and laughing, he believed that nothing remained, and therefore that a further law was impossible.

Yet many carry difficult and burdensome laws which, when human frailty and custom are considered, appear impossible. For laws must be adjusted not only to the common race of human beings but also to custom and the usages of the fatherland--to custom, I say, unless it is depraved. Therefore that Muhammadan law by which wine was prohibited was tyrannical, for so great a change of drink compelled many to meet death before their day. Lycurgus must be accused no less of the severity of the laws which Sparta rejected after a short time. The Romans refused to receive them, as Augustine says, book 2, chapter 16. For although he fabricated the claim that he had received them from Apollo, the Romans nevertheless prudently refused to believe it. Such was the law given by the Ammonite to the men of Jabesh-gilead concerning the gouging out of their right eyes.

Next, laws are judged inequitable when they lack just moderation of punishment. The laws of Draco sanctioned every smallest matter with capital punishment; therefore they were truly called cruel and Draconian, for they punished leisure and idleness with death. I shall speak of punishments in their own place. Here the legislator must be admonished always to wish to keep the punishment within the desert of the fault, mindful of human frailty, except in atrocious crimes, as was set forth in the chapter on clemency.

§ 6. First, therefore, savage laws must be cut away. Thus Solon corrected the laws of Draco; thus the Romans amended many. Tertullian's discussion of this matter in chapter 3 of the Apology is beautiful:

"But since our truth meets you at every point, and finally the authority of the laws is erected against it, so that either it is said that nothing is to be reconsidered after the laws, or the necessity of obedience is preferred to truth even by the unwilling, I shall first enter the contest with you concerning the laws, as with the guardians of the laws. Now first, when you harshly determine by saying, 'It is not lawful for you to exist,' and prescribe this without any more humane reconsideration, you profess force and exercise an inequitable domination, if you deny that it is lawful because you wish it, not because it ought not to be lawful.

"But if you do not wish it to be lawful because it ought not to be, without doubt that ought not to be lawful which is done badly; and by this very prejudgment it is decided that what is done well is lawful. If I shall find that to be good which your law has prohibited, does it not follow from that prejudgment that it cannot prohibit me from what, if it were evil, it would rightly prohibit?

"If your law has erred, I suppose it was conceived by a human being, for it did not fall from heaven. Do you marvel either that a human being could have erred in establishing a law, or that he came to his senses in rejecting it? Were not even the laws of Lycurgus amended by the Lacedaemonians, inflicting such pain upon their author that in retirement he passed judgment upon himself by starvation?

"And do not you yourselves daily, as experiences illuminate the darkness of antiquity, lop and hew down that whole old and squalid forest of laws with the new axes of imperial rescripts and edicts? Did not Severus, most steadfast of princes, only yesterday exclude the most empty Papian laws, which compel children to be begotten before the Julian laws compel marriage to be contracted, after the old age of such great authority? There were also laws that condemned debtors be cut into parts by their creditors; nevertheless, by public consent their cruelty was afterwards erased. The capital punishment was converted into a mark of shame: with confiscation of goods applied, it preferred to suffuse a person's blood rather than to pour it out."

In chapter 8 of the Laws of the Twelve Tables, concerning debtors in bondage: "On the third market day let him suffer capital punishment, or let him go abroad beyond the Tiber. But if there are several"--that is, if there are several creditors to whom the debtor has been adjudged--"on the third market day let them cut the parts. If they have cut more or less, let it be without fraud." They abrogated this cruel law, also attributed to Romulus, in the 630th year of the city. The most avaricious cruelty of the ancient laws against the most wretched of human beings, Roman slaves, was also removed. After they had endured the most toilsome slavery, they were sold to the beasts like useless cattle. A cruelty extending widely and raging against many hundreds of thousands was restrained at home only late. It was answered that one is held under the Cornelian Law concerning Assassins if he gave a slave to the beasts without a judge, or sold or bought one for that purpose: Modestinus, in law Circumcidere, §1, On the Cornelian Law concerning Assassins. But when cruelty increased, by senatorial decrees and the Petronian Law the power of masters to hand slaves over to the beasts at their own discretion, without the sentence of a judge, was taken away. Martianus prohibited the same; and at last that entire power of life and death was taken from masters. Indeed, provision was even made that they should not rage beyond measure, although short of death: Martianus, law Domini, 42, On Contracting a Sale.

CHAPTER XIII

Laws Are Not to Be Changed Easily

§ 1. That laws can be changed, and indeed ought to be, and have frequently been changed, I have already shown with Tertullian as witness. Julius Caesar wished this; it was attempted under Hadrian; Theodosius, Justinian, Charlemagne, Alfonso, Charles IV, and now princes daily have done it, because laws must be accommodated not only to places and customs but also to times. Indeed, the books of laws themselves teach that this can be done, as does Augustine, book 3 of the Confessions, chapter 7:

"And I did not know true inward justice, which judges not from custom but from the most righteous law of almighty God, by which the customs of regions and days were formed according to regions and days, while it itself was everywhere one and simple, not one thing elsewhere and another otherwise; according to which Abraham and Isaac and Jacob and Moses and David and all those praised by the mouth of God were just. Yet they are judged unjust by the unskilled, who judge according to the human day and measure all the customs of the human race by a part of their own custom--as though someone ignorant, in an armory, of what is fitted to each member should wish the head to be covered with a greave and the foot to be shod with a helmet, and should complain that it does not fit suitably; or, when a cessation of business has been proclaimed on one day from the afternoon hours, someone should be angry that he is not permitted to offer something for sale because it was permitted in the morning; or in one house he should see something handled by any servant which the one who serves the cups is not permitted to do, or something done behind the stables which is prohibited before the table, and should be indignant that, although there is one dwelling and one household, the same thing is not assigned everywhere and to everyone.

"Such are those who are indignant when they hear that in that age something was lawful for the just which in this age is not lawful for the just, and that God commanded one thing to them and another to these for temporal reasons, although both served the same justice; while in one human being and in one day and in one house they see one thing suit one member and another another, and one thing have been lawful a little while ago but not lawful an hour later, and something permitted or commanded in that corner which in this is justly prohibited and punished. Is justice therefore various and mutable? Rather, the times over which it presides do not proceed equally, for they are times. But human beings, whose life upon earth is brief, because they are not strong enough in perception to connect the causes of former ages and of other nations which they have not experienced with those which they have experienced--although in one body or day or house they can easily see what suits each member, what suits particular moments, and what suits particular parts or persons--take offense in the former matters but submit in the latter."

Aristotle also held the same opinion, book 2 of the Politics, chapter 8: "For some doubt whether it is harmful or useful to disturb and change the ancestral laws, if there is another law better than one of them. Therefore it is not easy to assent and concede to what has been said about decreeing a reward to such persons on the ground that it is something useful to the city, if it is not expedient that anything in the state be changed. For it can happen that some may recommend either the abrogation of laws or a change in the form of administering the state as though it were a common good. But since we have fallen into this discussion, it will be better to dispute a little further about this matter. For, as we have said, it involves doubt. And it certainly appears better to change. For in the other sciences this has been profitable: medicine changed from ancestral institutions, and the art of exercising bodies, which the Greeks call gymnastics; finally, all arts and faculties, when changed, have brought great advantages to states. Therefore, since political prudence is also to be numbered among these, plainly it is necessary to hold the same opinion concerning it as well. Someone might take an argument for what we say from deeds and events. For ancient laws are very simple and barbarous. The Greeks were accustomed both to carry swords and to buy wives from one another; and the remaining ancient institutions are altogether stupid and foolish. For example, at Cumae there is a law concerning matters which pertain to murder: if an accuser should produce a certain number of witnesses who are related to him, the accused is held liable to the penalty for murder."

Bad laws, therefore, must be removed very quickly; those which merely appear useless, slowly. Agesilaus suspended the laws for one day because of the battle of Leuctra, by which action he showed that laws ought both to be stable and not altogether immutable. It is better, however, to allow them to slip away and perish gradually.

§ 2. The continuance of laws is either altogether immutable or immutable in a certain manner. The eternal and natural law is simply immutable, for it was carried by God to remain eternally, and the matter which is its object is honorable of itself; therefore its obligation cannot be abrogated. But the old ceremonial law of God has now been abrogated; the new will continue to the end of the world. Human laws can be changed, nor can any be carried in such a way that it is forever immutable, because it can be abrogated by the legislator or by his successor, who is furnished with equal power, or by the state itself.

Francisco Suárez recognizes a threefold perpetuity of a human law. First, because it does not die with the legislator. Second, because it obliges posterity. Third, because it always endures until it is either revoked or its matter is so changed that it ceases to be just. In the first manner the legislator generally imposes an obligation, and this is the custom of laws; for thus they now distinguish a law from a precept, which is temporary. But this usage is now customary, whereas in former times it was also called a temporary precept or command. I should therefore prefer to distinguish law into temporary and perpetual. It is this duration, then, which must be discussed.

§ 3. I therefore think it must be said that a law whose foundation remains and whose matter is not made unjust is not to be changed easily, although its abolition may appear advantageous, unless it is manifest that the new law will be more advantageous to the present condition of the times and it is established that new disadvantages will not arise from that change. Cleon certainly judged prudently that the condition of a state which uses worse but stable laws is better than that of one which frequently changes them.

The primary reason is that novelty always produces suspicion; from suspicion come complaints, and thence a commotion of the people or the nobles. For the abrogation of old laws brings harm to some, while a new law does not make those whom it benefits friends of the legislator, because they regard it with suspicion, doubt his constancy, and fear that amid so many changes it too will be changed. Therefore, those for whom the change is burdensome impute the damage wholly to the prince; those for whom it is a source of profit or honor, because they do not think that account was taken of them personally in a common law, do not consider themselves bound by any favor. For each person judges that things given in common are owed to him.

Nor is it expedient for the opinion to gain strength that in carrying a law account was taken not of public advantage but of private favor or hostility toward a definite class of human beings. For this opinion will supply fuel for hatreds and discord, and it offends even those whom it assists and makes them objects of envy and therefore of hatred. Thus, to carry a new law is a matter full of danger--not only among the Locrians, where men recommended a law with a noose placed around the neck so that, unless they persuaded the people, they would immediately be strangled with their throat bound, but in every state, because it is necessary that very many be offended and none reconciled except slightly.

§ 4. A second reason is added, from the weakness of the human intellect and its slender foresight. It notices the offenses of the law which it uses, but cannot foresee all the offenses of another law which it is contemplating. The Romans established pay for their citizens serving in the army at Veii. The measure was pleasing to the army but burdensome to many, for there was need of a treasury, assessments, and exactions; and from this, I believe, it happened that they were offended with Camillus. Those eager for new laws are accustomed to experience what happens to those who travel along a difficult and broken road: they proclaim those happy whom they see gliding along in a gentle course of waters upon a favorable river, and compare their own evils with the goods of others; but when they observe the winds rising, the skiff being tossed, driven upon the sands, or dashed against the rocks, they now console themselves concerning their own labor.

With great struggles the Roman plebs obtained equality with its patricians. Laws were established concerning this matter; auspices, the curule chair, priesthoods, and the dictatorship itself came into the possession of the ignoble. But from that time the city was always hostile to itself, until through civil wars it slid into servitude.

We also see in the Church not a few laws changed in the succession of times. At one time the people elected bishops and presented them for consecration; but since ambition in that crowd often snatched the place from virtue, nomination was granted to neighboring bishops or the metropolitan, and sometimes to the emperor. But when it was evident that favor and gifts intervened here also, at last that power was delegated to colleges of clerics. That legitimate law stood for a long time and gave many distinguished prelates. Afterwards, however, in some places a depraved custom gained strength, so that they not only put bishoprics and votes up for sale, but by private statutes so ensnared and constrained the bishop that he could not exercise the force and vigor of the sacred canons against those upon whom above all he ought to exercise it. Before the election they established certain decrees concerning his freedom and the non-reformation of morals, to all of which they swore. If anyone refused, there was no doubt that he alienated from himself the minds of all the more frivolous persons. Thus new laws always draw new disadvantages after them.

§ 5. Nor indeed is it lawful to propose a new law in a matter of great importance unless the novelty is of great advantage to the state.

For there is scarcely any new law which does not privately harm many persons very greatly. It is therefore necessary that there be such a public utility or necessity as compensates for the losses of private persons. For since private persons are parts and members of the great body, they must suffer their own losses to be borne for the public good; but if the losses of individuals are balanced by no distinguished public advantage, the innovation is inequitable. Indeed, the state is injured when its members are harassed to no profit of its own.

By a most salutary law, upon the opinion of the council and the princes, the Most Christian Louis XIII, king of France, recently ordained that dignities and offices should not be bought with money, nor could they be sold by those who had bought them. That measure affected countless persons with great disadvantages; but because the safety of the fatherland required this most sacred law, consideration for or the loss of a few ought not to have intervened to impede it--especially since by it they might more honorably conduct a contest of virtue than promises concerning morals. That law, therefore, was most just and most sacred.

But if public benefit is absent and private burdens grow heavier, the proposal of a new law will be a crime. Indeed, so will the restoration of a law which has been abolished.

When the fatal names and factions of the Guelfs and Ghibellines divided Italy, the Guelfs held the principate at Florence and, as is accustomed to happen in the zeal of factions, by public law excluded the Ghibellines from holding magistracies. But in time the law became obsolete, and now persons who drew their origin from the Ghibellines as well as from the Guelfs occupied great dignities without distinction. Then Hunguerius, prince of the Guelfs, renewed the old law and, with the law, the hatreds, hostilities, and former calamities--to the great harm of the Ghibellines, then to the destruction of his own people, and to no advantage of the common cause. For nothing is more pernicious than to administer the state according to one’s own passion, and to fasten and unfasten laws in bronze.

§ 6. In change there is also this danger: those who are pressed by private evils are made eager for innovations. While they see many laws being abolished, they conceive wicked hopes that even the best can be abolished. For after an attack has once been made upon the laws, those whose destruction appears likely to carry the greatest rewards with it are especially attacked. Just as, when a city has been taken by force, men run not to plunder the fortunes of the most guilty but those of the rich, so also the best laws are attacked most fiercely by the vilest persons.

But since many are nauseated by present things and live suspended in expectation of future things, an ingenious poet spoke truly:

> The novelty of all things is also most pleasing.

For:

> Whatever we saw in former years is cheap to us, > and whatever we beheld long ago is sordid.

This propensity toward the pursuit of innovations ought not to be assisted and provoked by public leniency, for nothing will be so firm that it is not torn down. For in truth what Homer says happens in songs will occur:

> τὴν γὰρ ἀοιδὴν μᾶλλον ἐπικλείουσ' ἄνθρωποι
> ἥτις ἀκουόντεσσι νεωτάτη ἀμφιπέληται.

Human beings celebrate most highly that song which has come most newly to its hearers. Thus, just as they demanded νεαρὰ ἄνθεα ὕμνων, new flowers of songs, so also by an inborn curiosity they demanded new laws, νόμους ἀπ' ἀκροσφυρίων, fresh from the anvil and the bellows. Plato indeed stood so hostile to this curiosity that he forbade young men not only to dispute about the justice and integrity of laws but even to inquire into them.

For new things, although better, sometimes offend, as we perceive in a change of food, drink, or climate. Things to which we are accustomed please us as though natural and similar; new things strike us as though contrary. I shall close this place with the maxim of Augustine, letter 118 to Januarius: "For the very change of a custom--or law--even when it helps by its utility, disturbs by its novelty. Therefore, a change which is not useful is consequently harmful through fruitless disturbance."

§ 7. Laws in which there is some error, which are carried suddenly, or which appear to favor some vice are also abrogated with the greatest difficulty. By the most ancient laws the power of life and death was permitted to masters over slaves; with great effort and by many laws it could scarcely be revoked. I present an example in small matters which nevertheless cause grave harm. There is an old law, law 11, code, title 25, Concerning Able-Bodied Beggars:

"After all whom uncertain beggary has called to public gain have been inspected, let soundness of body and the strength of years be examined in each; and let necessity be imposed upon idle persons who are to be pitied without any debility, so that, in the case of those whom servile condition holds, the zealous and diligent informer may obtain them as master; but in the case of those whom freedom of birth alone attends, whoever has disclosed and proved indulgence of this kind may be supported by their perpetual colonate--saving to masters an action against those who perhaps furnished a hiding place to fugitives or counsel for undertaking beggary."

Who does not see what evils the abrogation or neglect of that law brings? Everything is filled with idle persons, thieves, and the most worthless gluttons, although the state could be assisted by putting them to work.

Public spectacles were granted by the worst custom and most cruel laws; scarcely could the clemency of Christian times and the power of the emperors remove them. Therefore laws must be carried and examined with great care, lest they be proposed through vice.

CHAPTER XIV

There Is an Eternal Law, and It Is the Source of All Laws

§ 1. Although my purpose is to transmit practical politics and to abstain from speculations, nevertheless, because it is true that honorable actions are produced by doctrines, not only by precepts, and most arts--and the most liberal among them all--have their doctrines, not only precepts, and no art is without its own doctrines, which the Greeks call dogmata, it seemed good to me to comprehend briefly those things which theologians and jurists teach concerning laws. For canon and civil laws are derived from these. They therefore define them thus.

§ 2. Eternal law is a dictate of the divine mind by which it judges that certain things are both right and to be observed by creatures, together with the will to oblige creatures.

§ 3. Second, eternal law is the rule of eternal and practical truth, to which all creatures are obliged by nature: irrational and brute creatures only naturally, intelligent creatures also morally.

§ 4. Third, that law is necessarily in God, because all things are governed by the providence of God; but law is the practical reason of the whole government.

§ 5. Fourth, it is distinguished by reason from an Idea, because it concerns not a thing to be made but a thing to be governed; next, it obliges, which an Idea does not do. This is called a law in God, although it has not yet been promulgated; if anyone contends about the word, we shall not be troublesome.

§ 6. Fifth, the necessary actions of God, such as the generation of the Son and the procession of the Holy Spirit, are not subject to the eternal law, because they are from natural necessity, not from providence.

§ 7. Sixth, the free actions of God are not properly said to be under the eternal law. Nevertheless, because, in a certain manner of conceiving, infinite prudence is the reason of the most holy will, just as immutability is the reason of eternity, we shall not unsuitably say that all the free actions of God are done according to the eternal law. For if the effects themselves of the divine mind, will, and power are under that law, then also the ordering and will of the effects are governed by that law; that is, it has from itself the ability and will to act with immutable rectitude.

§ 8. Without promulgation that law can be perfect, because its decrees are immutable by nature and always oblige without any variation as soon as a creature uses reason. Nevertheless, of itself it does not oblige immediately, but through other laws; therefore, when no creature exists, it obliges potentially rather than actually.

§ 9. Eternal law is one in itself, just as divine providence and will are one. Nevertheless, according to its multiple relations to diverse matter, it is called multiple--just as are Idea, providence, and will.

§ 10. From this law flows all the obligation which exists in the other laws. For all power is from God, and all direction proceeds from eternal wisdom. Natural law and the positive law of God, if they are considered not as they are in the conception and will of God but as they are in creatures and promulgated, are thus judged effects of the eternal law and have their force immediately from it. But the laws of princes and states are not derived from the eternal law in that manner, but with the power and will of a created legislator intervening.

§ 11. Eternal law is altogether immutable; for God cannot change, reject, or abrogate it, since he would deny his own intelligence and goodness. Nevertheless, some of its precepts are immutable, such as that one must not lie and that God must not be held in hatred, for they can never be removed. Others are mutable, such as circumcision, holocausts, and similar things, which by the prescription of eternal law were imposed until the time of correction.

§ 12. The foundation of natural law is eternal law. Hence a nature furnished with intelligence and choice is considered as possible; for what is consonant with it is good, but what is alien and repugnant to it insofar as it possesses reason and will is evil. Nevertheless, this is not properly natural law, because it is not a precept; indeed, it precedes the will of God. The same must be thought concerning maxims, or the general axioms of morals--that evil is not to be done and that God is to be worshiped--if they are considered in nature as they are conceived to exist in the judgment of God antecedent to his will. For in that state they do not possess the character of a precept.

§ 13. Natural law, as it is in creatures using reason, is a dictate of natural, and therefore right, reason which indicates the goodness and wickedness existing in necessary matter, and which promulgates the divine will commanding necessary goods and forbidding evils, together with the obligation to obey. For all the matter of natural law is necessary: it is therefore commanded because it is good, and therefore forbidden because it is evil. Hence no creature can be created with reason and freedom of choice which is not held by natural law. For it would be a creature to which it was lawful to sin, which cannot happen; for if it were lawful, it would not be sin. That law is not promulgated through human beings or signs, but is implanted in reason itself; nor is there any people so barbarous or corrupt upon whom it has not been imposed.

§ 14. Natural law contains various precepts of all the virtues and prohibitions of the vices. Nevertheless, it can be called one law, because it is observed under the one character of natural good.

This natural right remains firm and one among all nations if you consider first act--that is, the natural light of the human intellect. If you consider second act--whether actual judgment or even depraved habits born from that judgment--it has variation.

For some nations have so corrupted natural judgments by evil customs that they established inequitable laws contrary to natural right. The Sardinians killed parents weakened by old age after beating them with clubs, because they called it an outrage for them to lead idle and inactive lives. Other nations violated the right of nature in other matters.

§ 15. Hence it appears that we are obliged by this law above all, not only to do honorable things and flee shameful things, but also to do this honorably. For fulfillment of the law ought to proceed from knowledge and will.

§ 16. That natural law is altogether immutable is evident from its matter. When an honorable thing is commanded, it is of such a kind that it is always honorable; and when a shameful thing is prohibited, it is such that it can never be honorable. Therefore, both negative and affirmative precepts are always necessary, nor do circumstances ever cause a natural precept to be rendered useless, imprudent, or harmful.

§ 17. Therefore, when a sword is not returned to a madman, and when a robber is killed, no sin is committed against natural law, although it is commanded that a deposit be returned and the killing of one’s neighbor is prohibited. For the precept of the law is that a deposit be returned justly, without danger and wrong to another, and that a killing not be committed by private authority and unjustly. For the circumstances cause these particulars not to be contained under the general law, since it is a natural law not to return a sword to a madman.

§ 18. When natural law is restricted and determined to a definite kind by a positive law, whether divine or human, it is not changed, but, remaining wholly intact, receives a certain addition--or rather a mode, which nevertheless can be changed. God must be worshiped; positive law prescribes the mode of worship, adoration, and sacrifices. Parents must be honored by all, but the honor of parents varies according to the custom of regions.

§ 19. Therefore no one can dispense from the natural law, because no inferior can abrogate the law of a superior. But since natural law concerns necessary matter, it never ceases; nor indeed can God dispense from it. For things which are immutably evil, such as idolatry and similar things, he cannot make lawful by any law; and things which are good he cannot make evil by a law, such as loving God and willing to live well.

§ 20. The principal theologians teach that the law of nations is distinct in matter from natural law. For they say that the law of nations is a human law which, ἀγράφως, without writing, has been established by the consent of all peoples; its matter is in itself neither good nor evil but receives honorableness or shamefulness from the law, and therefore obliges because the nations have consented to that obligation. To this law belong receiving ambassadors and dismissing them in safety, conducting commerce, making contracts, pursuing enemies in war, and making those captured in war slaves. We see that all nations, unless they are altogether barbarous, live by this law. Therefore, if any nation violates ambassadors, it is oppressed by the just war of all nations.

CHAPTER XV

On the Adjuncts of Human Laws, and First of All on Interpretation

§ 1. There are certain affections and circumstances of laws which no less than the laws themselves either assist or oppress the state. The first of these is interpretation, by which laws are either extended or restricted and their meaning is in some manner expounded to us.

Next is ἐπιείκεια, when a law is understood according to equity and goodness, not according to rigid right. Third, dispensation. Finally, abrogation. These must be discussed briefly.

§ 2. Interpreters of laws were once held in the greatest honor and are so even now, for they are, as it were, living laws and speaking justice, no less necessary to the state than the laws themselves. For what are rights if there are no persons to give answers concerning right? But many abuse this sacred and royal office for pride and avarice. The reason why there is need of interpreters is that, in matters which are various, hidden, unusual, and possess names proper to their discipline, the mind of the legislator is not easily perceived without a great consideration of all things, unless a great part of those matters is understood. But I said above how the infinite multitude of laws now has produced more interpretations and interpreters, and how new interpreters multiply new expositions of laws.

§ 3. Interpretation of laws is threefold: authentic, customary, and doctrinal. Authentic interpretation is that made by the state or a magistrate possessing the legitimate power of carrying law. For it has the force of law when it does not decide a single case, but declares with authority that this is the meaning of the law. Constantine speaks of this, as it is in the Code, On Laws and Constitutions of Princes: “It both belongs and is permitted to us alone to examine an interpretation interposed between equity and right. Given on the third day before the Nones of December, in the consulship of Sabinus and Rufinus.”

The emperor must be judged to claim for himself alone authentic interpretation, which is in a certain manner a new law.

For the judgment of the supreme prince has the force of law and is extended to similar cases, as it is in the last law of the same title: “If the imperial majesty has judicially examined a cause and, with the parties placed face to face, has pronounced judgment, let absolutely all judges who are under our empire know that this is a law not only for that cause for which it was produced, but also for all similar causes. For what is greater, what more sacred than the imperial majesty? Or who is swollen with the disdain of such pride that he contemns the royal judgment? Since the founders of the ancient law also openly and clearly define that constitutions which proceeded from an imperial decree obtain the force of laws. Therefore, since we also find it doubted in the ancient laws whether, if the imperial judgment has interpreted a law, a royal interpretation of this kind ought to obtain, we have both laughed at their empty subtlety and judged that it must be corrected. We define that every interpretation of the laws made by the emperors--whether in petitions, in judgments, or in any other manner--is to be held valid and undoubted. For if at present it is conceded to the emperor alone to establish laws, it is fitting that to interpret laws also be worthy of the imperial power alone. But why, if a doubt arises in lawsuits and the leading men judge themselves neither fit nor sufficient for deciding the suit, is recourse made to us through their reports? And why do our ears receive all the ambiguities of judges which happen to arise from the laws, if pure interpretation does not proceed from us?”

Therefore, this ἀπόφασις of the prince--for thus the Greeks call the emperor’s judgment--makes a law which interprets the former law. This is the best Doctor:

> Who solves the knots of right and the riddles of laws.

Thus the axiom must be understood: “The prince is the sole founder and interpreter of laws.” O how great the disturbances, how destructive the subtleties, which royal majesty would remove with one utterance, if kings deigned to interpret ambiguous laws according to equity and goodness! Indeed, sometimes in interpreting they may take away, add, or alter certain things and accommodate them to the present time. Thus it was done in chapter 1, On the Oath of Calumny, and in the sole chapter On the Marriage of Clerics, in the Sixth.

§ 4. Customary interpretation is that which has now obtained by custom and use; precedents and judgments belong to it. This is chiefly employed today. Therefore, those who have devoted themselves to law in academies are trained in the imperial chamber and attend chiefly not to how variously teachers interpret a law, but to what judges pronounce in the supreme tribunal. For this knowledge is especially necessary to those about to plead causes.

§ 5. The third interpretation is that of Doctors, who expound a law not by pronouncing judgment but by giving an opinion. Their authority has now perished in great part through disagreements, nor can it be established except by laws.

In this matter, first, natural equity is considered; next, from the adjuncts, the mind of the legislator; third, the proper meaning of the words; fourth, the likeness of other laws, for a meaning of a doubtful law which conflicts with other manifest laws is false.

§ 6. There is a great controversy concerning the extension of a law, which is said to occur when a law is taken not only for the things immediately signified but is extended to certain other matters. This sometimes happens by understanding a law of all and only those things which are comprehended by the natural signification of the words, if it is favorable and no other law or equity obstructs. Thus, when a son under paternal power repels a creditor by the exception of the Macedonian senatorial decree, we understand a daughter under paternal power to enjoy the same right. For daughters also come under the name of sons.

Next, when there is the same disposition of right in a favorable law, the words are extended to a civil signification; for adopted sons, who are sons civilly, can use the same exception.

Third, when otherwise the law would be null, absurd, or unjust unless it were understood improperly, the words can be extended to an improper signification. Thus, when an interdict is imposed upon a city, the suburbs also are understood.

Fourth, when a law is extended because of similarity or identity of reason. Many think that, when the reason is equal, those in whom it is equal are comprehended by the law.

But this must in no way be admitted, because when a determination has been made concerning one deed or punishment, it is not therefore lawful to draw it from equality to another deed. If the legislator had wished this, he himself would have done it. For example, there is a law: “If a freeborn woman has joined herself to another person’s slave, let her be a fellow slave of his.” Equality of reason does not extend the law to a freeborn man; indeed, not even identity of reason, which exists here, does so. For the gravity of the sin is the same in either sex, although it is not estimated so civilly. Certainly, the conscience of no one will be obligated by this interpretation.

Fourth, restriction is contrary to extension. It is necessary when the words of a law, taken generally, contain injustice in some deed or harm an innocent person; for the legislator is never presumed to wish to harm the innocent. Very many laws require restriction, because many things which the legislator could not foresee are accustomed to occur, and justice compels that they be excepted. For a rule fails where equity advises something else.

CHAPTER XVI

Laws Sometimes Cease Although They Are Not Abrogated

§ 1. The highest right is sometimes the highest wrong, and this arises from a rigid interpretation of laws. What they call equity, or ἐπιείκειαν, remedies this. It then corrects a law when, in a singular deed which the legislator could not foresee but which, had he foreseen it, he would expressly have excepted, the law is judged not to oblige. Thus St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I--II, question 96, article 2.

§ 2. The interpretation of equity arises from a defect of a law which speaks universally; therefore it has no place either in natural law or in positive divine law, since their legislator foresaw all things. When this equity is evident, it is lawful for anyone; when doubtful, it must be determined by the superior.

§ 3. For a law to be judged not to oblige on grounds of equity, it is not a sufficient reason that the cause of the law ceases. It ceases in a particular case only when the law errs because of its universality, so that it would be either inequitable or harmful if it were observed. For example, let the law be: "Let no one ascend the wall; if anyone ascends it, let it be a capital offense." Gaius ascends the wall in order to repel the enemy. Who would doubt that Gaius is unjustly summoned as guilty of violating the law? But the legitimate reason must be of such a kind. For although the reason ceases negatively in the particular case, if it remains in common the will of the legislator can will to oblige the person in whom it ceases in the particular case.

Otherwise a great dissolution would arise in the state, and many laws would be violated without fraud. It is therefore necessary that the reason of the law cease in the particular case in such a way that the law would be unjust or very burdensome in that particular case. The matter is manifest from an example. The cause why ascending the wall is a capital offense is that an enemy or traitor may not seek an opportunity to destroy the city. Gaius is an excellent man, most loving toward his fatherland, and exceedingly rich; his safety depends upon the safety of his fatherland. There is therefore no danger that, by ascending the wall, he himself will create danger for his fatherland. The cause of the law therefore ceases in his case. Yet because it remains in common, and the legislator rightly comprehends even the best citizens under that law so that he may cut off the opportunity from the wicked, Gaius will be bound by that law. For if he ascends, many will follow who will also assert that they are most loving toward their fatherland, and thus it will be conceded to every most wicked person.

Next, it is necessary that it be the adequate reason of the law which ceases. Guardianship is entrusted to the nearest agnates, law 1, On Legitimate Guardianship, π. The reason of the law is that the law believed that goods could be administered no more safely and preserved no better than by the person who hopes that the same goods will at some time come to himself and his own. And thereafter, because it is equitable that the person who hopes for the profit should also undertake the burdens; a closer affection and friendship is added. It can happen that the reason of the law ceases, if it were known that the agnate would administer neither better nor more safely, and would not love the wards more; indeed, ordinarily a neighbor or some other person is more friendly than kindred. Nevertheless, the agnate is not to be repelled from the guardianship unless it is established that he would administer badly and had been hostile to the agnate.

The law of Solon was contrary to this: Τῶν ὀρφανῶν κληρονόμον ἐπίτροπον μὴ εἶναι. "Let the heir of orphans not be their guardian." The reason was that he judged it dangerous for the ward to be in the power of one to whom his death would be profitable. That law had to be maintained at Athens although the ward's heir was a man of the greatest integrity, from whom there was no danger. But if that heir were childless and rich, and had instituted the ward as his heir; if the ward had lawsuits which he would most willingly and ably prosecute; and if the ward would suffer great loss through lacking him as guardian--then the law would be abrogated through equity. Otherwise, if the reason is not grave, it is always expedient that particulars accommodate themselves to common rules.

§ 4. When a human law concerns indifferent matters, upon the cessation of its adequate cause, whether negatively or contrarily, the law itself altogether ceases. Thus, if there is a law for contributing taxes to build a bridge, once it has been completed the law of the tax ceases; indeed, it is unjust. For when its cause ceases, the law is useless to the state, and the state is not to be burdened by laws which contribute nothing to the public good.

§ 5. For this reason very many laws of the ancients were abolished by Justinian's jurists, as the emperor acknowledges in the prefaces, and so was a great part of the laws of the Pandects and the Codes which has now been amended by other laws.

§ 6. If a human law prescribes a law which commands some act of virtue, it will retain its force even when the cause ceases. For there is sufficient cause in the exercise of virtue itself for the law to have been carried, provided that it is not excessively burdensome. For that act is capable of law of itself and by its nature; therefore the obligation remains until it is taken away by the prince. An example is that it was ordained that at first, against the Arians, there should be sung in the churches: "Glory to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit." Because that act is good and religious by its nature, that law remains although in many places not even the name of the Arians survives.

§ 7. Dispensation in a human law occurs when, while the law and its cause remain, the obligation is removed from one, another, or several persons.

There was a law which guarded Roman liberty, that in the administration of provinces there should be annual succession. Released from the law, Caesar governed the Gauls for ten years. From another quarter it was arranged that Pompey should be released from the laws. They properly call it dispensation when someone is released from a law for a time; otherwise, when he is perpetually free from a law, it is called exemption. When it is converted into another obligation, it is called commutation of the law.

§ 8. A prince, whether ecclesiastical or secular, can dispense from his own laws and those of his predecessors. For since it is in their power to oblige, it will also be in their power to remove an obligation, and to do so from this or that person as reason dictates. Next, an inferior magistrate can dispense from the law of a superior with the tacit or express consent of the superior, or by custom. Indeed, if the matter is of small importance and frequent, he can do so without approaching the superior.

§ 9. For a dispensation to be legitimate, it is necessary that its cause be legitimate. For it is contrary to the common good that some be released from laws without any cause, since all ought to conform themselves to the community. Next, the prince is bound by his own laws; if he can dispense without cause, he will never be bound by them. Therefore, a prince sins by dispensing without cause. Next, one who uses the dispensation commits an offense against the natural law which commands that a part be conformed to the whole state. Nevertheless, the thing itself which is conceded is valid. But if the cause of the dispensation was just, when it ceases the dispensation also ceases; when the cause returns, the dispensation returns.

But if the law has simply been removed, although the cause ceases before execution, the person can use that removal. Thus, if someone has been dispensed from an irregularity because of a scarcity of priests, even if the scarcity ceases before he has received orders, the dispensation nevertheless remains, because the irregularity has been altogether removed.

CHAPTER XVII

A Law Can Be Abrogated for a Just Cause

§ 1. A law unjust either from the beginning or through a change of times is not worthy of the name of law; and when the condition of the times has changed and it begins to be unjust, it has also ceased to be a law. We therefore treat of the abrogation of a just and useful law, which is abrogated when it is burdensome and its abrogation appears more useful to the common good than its observance. In this matter it is necessary that grave causes intervene.

§ 2. The founder can abrogate it, as can his successor and the superior the law of his inferior, but the inferior cannot abrogate the law of his superior. Concerning the last point there are great disputes, for certain cities and princes establish municipal laws contrary to imperial law, although they do not possess the power to do so unless it has been conferred upon them by a superior. It is certainly dangerous that common law should be derogated by private laws. Therefore, for the laws of princes and of subordinate cities to be just, it is necessary that they be certain determinations of common law.

§ 3. Every later law contrary to an earlier law abrogates it, whether it contains mention of it or does not contain it. For since they cannot possess force at the same time, the later will revokes the earlier.

§ 4. Unless it possesses a derogatory clause, it does not remove the earlier law when it is opposed to it, for they can be reconciled and each retain its force. Nothing else occurs concerning this matter except that abrogation should take place considerately, rarely, and for great causes, because of the reasons which I brought forward above.

Meanwhile, laws must be abrogated slowly and with great deliberation. He is worthy to succeed his ancestors if he does not change their institutions unless a new order of affairs demands new laws; and thus he will not change former counsellors either, unless they are found guilty of wickedness or are openly unworthy. See Olaus, book 8, chapter 3. He who has no gratitude toward his author, but begins his power from contempt of him, is believed likely to be unjust toward many.

CHAPTER XVIII

Privileges Are to Be Granted, but for Merits and Moderately

§ 1. A privilege is, as it were, a private law, or a law conceded to a private person. It is defined as a power conceded by law to someone or to several persons to act or not to act, or to receive or not to receive, beyond common law. It is a great matter, and one from which very great harm can be brought upon the state unless careful provision is made.

§ 2. There are various kinds of privileges.

1. One privilege is divine, another human. Very many divine privileges were conceded to the ancient priesthood. The rest are human, such as those military privileges of the evocati, that, like the others, they should be exempt except for repelling the enemy. 2. Affirmative and negative. By the latter one is freed from some burden; by the former one obtains the faculty of acting. 3. Personal and real. The latter adheres to things themselves, the former to persons. 4. Gratuitous, which is given from benevolence alone, and remunerative, which is given in consideration of merits. 5. That which is against right and that which is beyond right. 6. Conventional and without an agreement, or pure. 7. Perpetual and temporary; favorable and odious. Every privilege is favorable, but here we call favorable that which results in no harm to another third person, and odious that which harms others. 8. Of one person or of a community which is nevertheless part of another state. 9. In the internal and external forum. 10. By concession and by custom. 11. Ecclesiastical and civil.

§ 3. A state which has the power of establishing law can also concede privileges contrary to the law; one which lacks this faculty cannot concede privileges. Therefore, privileges are given only to one's own subject or to one who is subject in some manner. Thus many concede privileges within their territories to neighboring cities and distant merchants, because in some part they are superiors.

§ 4. That privileges be given to the well deserving pertains to the good of the state. For virtue is aroused by honor and reward, and very many are sharpened for the defense of the fatherland. The Roman state, as the mother of soldiers, was especially liberal. The primary privilege was not to be drawn into the ordinary forum but to be judged by their own commanders.

Gregory of Toulouse enumerates very many of their privileges in book 19 of the Syntagma, chapter 16. Privileges were also conceded to the persons of soldiers, of which take some: namely, that ignorance of the law, or an error in an exception which was to be proposed in its proper place but was omitted by a soldier before sentence, should have restitution to the original condition. In other solemnities also introduced by law, the military office relieves them, since it is more expedient for soldiers to know arms than laws. Another privilege of military service is found in Juvenal:

> Let us treat, he says, of the advantages--first those common to all,
>
> among which this will be by no means the least: that no man in a toga
>
> dare strike you, or show the praetor his knocked-out teeth > and the black lump upon his face with swollen bruises, and so forth.

The sons of chief centurions follow their father's condition, and sons born from officials are summoned to the military service of their parents. Immunities from burdens and offices were conceded to veterans in all places: from civil duties, public works, contributions, and tolls which are furnished at fairs; so that they should neither be permitted to serve if they wished nor compelled to serve against their will; should be struck by no incongruous injuries; and should be separated from others in punishments, so that they should not be given to the beasts or beaten with clubs. The same honor is accorded to veterans and their children as to decurions. They are excused from the construction of ships and are not appointed collectors of taxes. If, however, veterans have permitted themselves to be enrolled in the order of decurions, they are compelled to perform the offices by their tacit consent. But if they have not been selected into the order, but voluntarily undertake some office of the city, they ought not from this to be compelled to undertake others. Veterans do, however, undergo tolls and the customary burdens of patrimony, such as the paving of a road and the compulsory service of ships.

Veterans lose their privileges if they have devoted themselves to brigandage. Nobility is especially favored when illustrious men are produced from it and when they serve as soldiers, so that in a trial concerning injuries they are not compelled to be present, but can conduct the lawsuit through a procurator. They can also by agreement give their inheritance inter vivos, although among civilians an agreement concerning it is disapproved. And certainly, when the affairs and condition of military service are reduced to the truth, scarcely any other persons seem to me worthy of privileges or greater compassion, whether soldiers are good or evil, on account of their use. Indeed, the worse and more savage are better for this office. Philemon says:

Στρατιῶτα, κοὐκ ἄνθρωπε, καὶ σιτούμενε

ὥσπερ ἱερεῖον, ἵν' ὅταν ᾖ καιρὸς τυθῇς.

That is:

O soldier, not a human being, who are fed like sacrificial victims, so that when the time comes you may be sacrificed.

And they must be incited by privileges to meet death, which all flee by nature. And thus, by the privileged life and death of criminals, the safety and goods of good human beings are preserved with slight detriment. There are equally good and strenuous soldiers, who are occupied for the safety of the state and are rightly honored with privileges as well deserving; others are allured by the same privileges to deserve well.

The cause was that military service was difficult, dangerous, and laborious: to dig a trench, carry a rampart, and pass one's life with slender provisions and under the harshest laws.

§ 5. Nevertheless, as formerly, so now also there have been abuses of privileges, and enormous disadvantages have arisen. For first, this is discerned in every kind of privilege: real privileges, while they are handed down through families and successions, gradually tend toward this, that they acknowledge no prince and obey in nothing. Personal privileges are less lasting, but they become cheap through their multitude, and persons upon whom too many are heaped generally fall headlong and are oppressed by their mass. Remunerative privileges are less odious but generally make men ungrateful and proud. Conventional privileges belong properly to sale, and recipients do not place among benefactions even those which they acquired for a small price.

Those which they call odious--that is, those which derogate from the right of others--must especially be guarded against. Thus, when immunity from tolls and public offices is given to many, it is necessary that the rest be burdened more heavily. Therefore Valentinian and Theodosius ordained that soldiers of the unarmed service should not be immune from public functions. But those privileges concerning forum and jurisdiction have now been removed, for they are summoned for civil matters and drawn for criminal matters to diverse judgments. For what will a soldier not dare when about to plead a bad cause before a centurion and companion in plunder? Hence so many extortions, exactions, and insults against provincials.

Next, privileges derogate from common law, either expressly, when the words themselves declare it, or in fact. Although common laws protect themselves and frequently possess an appended clause by which they remove all privileges conceded to the contrary, nevertheless privileges often elude the law together with the clause itself. But there ought to be a great cause for laws to be diminished by a privilege. For what is not observed by many, and by the more honorable, according to right, is easily contemned by all. For example, certain nobles possess a privilege that they should not be drawn into chains because of debts. Many use it, contract great debt, and moreover insult their creditors; others imitate them and cause the good faith of contracts to lie wholly prostrate.

§ 6. Since odious privileges, and those which tend to burden others, are to be restricted so that they endure for the least possible time and obtain the fewest possible effects, nevertheless, through the importunity of the privileged, they are frequently extended contrary to the norm of right to correlative persons and to others. And what is dangerous to kings when affairs or dangers are adverse, many nobles and cities defend themselves by privilege so that they need not be present with aid or labor for common affairs. Those upon whom taxes, ships, grain, soldiers, and money could rightly and deservedly have been imposed now leave room not even for entreaties.

By no other thing more than privileges do slaves gain strength against masters and clients against patrons. Nor do I fear to say that the origin of all the seditions which for two hundred years have shaken the principalities and cities of Germany flowed from privileges, many and great. Formerly, in the age of the emperors, although many cities possessed the right of Roman citizenship, nevertheless the privileges of the Quirites were distinguishing marks of the inhabitants. At last Constantinople was made equal to it. Code, law 1, title 20: "Let the city of Constantinople rejoice not only in Italian right but also in its prerogative," concerning which see also canon 28 of the Synod of Chalcedon.

§ 7. Although privileges cease for many causes, nevertheless they are revoked with the greatest difficulty, and with greater difficulty the more they incline toward the detriment of the state. For the more of the public good they draw to themselves, the more obstinately they are retained as though most useful. That matter must be explained more fully for the public advantage.

§ 8. A privilege which through a change of affairs is rendered unjust from just must be altogether removed. The emperors did this even in private possessions. Constantine ordained that a possessor should not be obligated to fiscal offices, law 11, title 25, Code: "It is our pleasure that our private possessions be immune from all sordid offices, and that neither their lessees nor their coloni be summoned to extraordinary offices or any superindictions."

Valens removed this privilege in the same place: "For the sake of relieving the provincials, we wish our private estate to sustain canonical necessities under the condition under which we wish all persons to sustain them. But occasion has exceeded the command, since grain which must be carried from diverse places is not drawn to the customary places, but is carried so far that conveying it is burdensome and harmful. Therefore, let Your Spectable Sincerity cause those remaining in the same places to fulfill the functions of their own by which they formerly furnished grain."

Honorius and Theodosius declared that those works were not sordid: "Far be it from us to number among sordid offices the construction of a public road and the works of bridges and paved roads, dedicated under the titles of greater princes. Therefore, no class of human beings, and no one by the merits of any dignity and veneration, ought to be exempt from the construction and repair of roads and bridges. We gladly enroll even the divine houses under so praiseworthy a title."

Theodosius and Valentinian nevertheless restored them again: "Excepting the patrimony of our piety, whose revenues indeed we very frequently assign to public necessities, we judge that all possessors ought to acknowledge the functions in the titles imposed above without exception of any benefice."

Privileges are taken away from the idle. When the cause ceases, the effect ceases: law 13, π., On Adoption; final law, π., On Testamentary Guardianship. Through neglect of letters and dissolution of life, students fall from their right. See Horatius Lucius, On the Privileges of Scholars.

CHAPTER XIX

The Legislator Must Take the Greatest Account of Custom

§ 1. Custom makes a law and abrogates a law; or, if the severity of a prince strives against it, the law produces hatred and this hatred sedition. Therefore, a prudent legislator must above all have at heart the customs of his state. Custom is that which, without a law, has become customary just as though it were lawful--namely, right instituted by usages, which is received in place of law. Thus the author To Herennius. Isidore, in Gratian, adds to the latter definition, "when the law is lacking"; this part of the definition was taken from Tertullian, On the Soldier's Crown. It is also called usage and practice, and signifies a frequency of acts. It is understood concerning things which someone does over a long and continuous period.

Frequency of acts introduces a habit or inclination and a certain right, from which arises an obligation to act in the same manner and to abrogate other contrary laws. Custom therefore makes right and law; prescription, however, transfers ownership, gaining strength and being confirmed by the deed of a private person, whereas custom belongs to a people.

§ 2. Custom is concerned with things and persons, with human actions, and with most matters in which law exists. One is most common and is almost the law of nations; another exists in some one state; another is private, belonging either to a person or to an imperfect community which cannot make law. Yet this is accustomed to clamor against common law. Custom is also divided into ecclesiastical and civil custom.

There is also custom according to right, beyond right, and contrary to right. Every good and legitimate custom is according to natural right--that is, consonant with it--and according to positive divine right. Next, natural right and divine right cannot be abrogated by any custom.

§ 3. A custom contrary to the law of nations can have force if you consider the nature of the matter, for the contrary of what has been received by the law of nations is not evil by nature; therefore it can be introduced by custom. By nature it can be, but in fact it cannot, because of circumstances and the enactments and concord of other nations. The example is usually brought forward of persons captured in war, who become slaves by the law of nations, although this does not occur in certain regions.

But I do not think that the law of nations is removed by Christian Europeans because they do not reduce other Christians to slavery. For the law of nations is that persons captured in war should not be killed but preserved, and for that reason they were called slaves. Therefore the primary agreement by the law of nations is that the savagery of wars should not be excessive and that the sword of the victor should not rage to extermination. Gentleness is approved in the manner of servitude, and much more if they permit the captives to be redeemed and exchanged and if they are treated kindly. I judge this to be much more according to the law of nations than the most cruel slavery under which masters possessed the right of life and death, and under which persons could be sold to wretched labors in the mines, to the beasts, and to unspeakable things. For when Cicero and others determine that liberty is to be defended even by death, they spoke not hyperbolically but from the experience of affairs; for ancient slavery was in truth more grievous than death.

Therefore, I deny that any nation can introduce a custom contrary to the law of nations, because with respect to nations and this law there is equality of the human race; nor can they change that law without the consent of the whole, since the others are bound by that law.

Next, the law of nations cannot be abolished by a contrary law of one prince, because this would occur with harm to other nations. He can determine and mitigate it, as if he should command that enemies who have surrendered be preserved; for they surrendered themselves to the mercy, not the cruelty, of the victor. He cannot abolish it except against an enemy who had himself previously violated the law of nations.

A custom beyond the law of nations can be given, just as another can be given beyond divine right. Thus, by divine right, forty blows were inflicted upon the guilty person; by the custom of the Israelites one fewer was given, lest by chance they exceed the number. Whatever custom is contrary to divine right is an abuse; it introduces no right but renders persons guilty of punishment.

Custom according to a human law confirms it; custom contrary to the law abrogates it.

To customs I refer style--that is, the manner and order of acting--and rite--that is, the solemnity of acts received by usage, so that it is now not lawful to institute the right otherwise.

§ 4. It belongs to every custom that it be just, useful, and for the sake of the common good; for what makes a law void must also be understood concerning custom. Therefore, just as bad laws, so also customs are to be abolished. Hence, just as a better custom can abrogate a worse law, so a better custom can abrogate a useless or burdensome custom. A law cannot prohibit for the future a custom contrary to itself, even if it forbids that custom to be introduced; for although it was introduced contrary to law, it is nevertheless reasonable. That it has been received into usages confirms the custom, since peoples observe the usage from agreement; for agreement inheres in custom.

Hence it is clear that a custom which is in the place of law can be introduced by a state or by a part of a state which possesses the power either to carry a law or at least to receive one; nor is it necessary that the custom be observed by all, but by the greater part.

§ 5. The force of custom therefore begins from acts and from tacit agreement, whether by acts or omissions, but is perfected through the consent of the prince. This consent is either known from a law, if, seeing a just and useful custom gaining strength, he approves it by carrying a law--and thus it is law--or, observing it, he dissembles, or at least by a common law approves all honorable and useful customs.

Now common law approves reasonable and legitimate customs. Thus distinction 1, Mos: “Because usages make a law, and common right consists of laws and usages”; distinction 1, Omnes; distinction 8, Mala; distinction 12, Omnia talia; question 16.3, Dicet: “Because the custom of those with whom we associate, if it is not depraved, must be observed”; and distinction 11, Quis: “Because the customs of the Roman Church are to be observed.”

Civil law has the same in law Forma censuali, § Si vero, On Censuses. Thus also a custom whose beginning is beyond memory sustains an aqueduct from public ground, for the prince appears to have held it valid. These things must chiefly be understood of the custom which is called prescriptive; prescription occurs between persons present over a period of ten years, and between persons absent over twenty.

A judicial sentence is not required for it to be approved; nevertheless, unless it is proved thoroughly, judgment must not easily be made according to it--except when it is prescriptive, or approved by manifest consent, or, according to most Doctors, is the interpreter of some law.

§ 6. An unjust, useless, or pernicious custom must be carefully investigated. A sign of it is if it is vehemently desired by one class of human beings, for since it is useful to them, it will be useless to the rest. Generally, the exceptional advantage of a part redounds to the harm of the whole. It must be seen whether the custom arose from evil usages; for just as good laws arise from evil usages, so depraved customs also arise from them.

Hence good laws opposed to evil usages generally appear burdensome and seem to those who prefer to live by their own usages rather than by public laws to be removable through customs. For example, it is the custom of many churches that, if someone is present on one or another day of the year, he receives what they call the Body, although during the rest of the time he has not even looked upon a church. That custom arose from plurality of benefices, and this from avarice; therefore the custom is rightly suspect.

When a custom conflicts with several laws, especially ecclesiastical laws, it is suspect. Isidore, in the Synonyms, chapter 16, says that custom yields to laws, but he appears to treat of a depraved custom. For depraved usage is overcome by reason and law. And distinction 11, chapter 2: "Let usage yield to authority; let law and reason overcome depraved usage." And canon 4: "The authority of custom and long-standing usage is not slight; nevertheless, its importance will not have such force that it overcomes either reason or law."

But canon 5 teaches that a custom which is shown to conflict with neither sacred canons nor human laws is inviolable. This must be understood of private and non-prescriptive customs, for it is evident that sacred canons concerning indifferent matters can be changed, as in distinction 12, chapter 7: "In those matters concerning which divine Scripture has established nothing certain, the custom of the people of God and the institutions of the ancestors are to be held as law. And just as transgressors of divine laws, so contemners of ecclesiastical customs are to be restrained."

§ 7. I judge that custom must be carefully examined, so that, if it is evil, it can be abolished before it is strengthened. For it generally has its beginnings from evil persons; for those who begin a custom which is contrary to laws undoubtedly sin by violating the law. A good custom therefore has its origin in transgression of laws and disobedience; laws, on the contrary, have their origin from deliberation, from the senate, and from the prince. Since this is so, custom is especially dangerous in ecclesiastical matters if it removes the canons from their place.

For in civil matters a law more easily begins to be unjust and accordingly is more rightly changed; nor does its change always take its beginning from evil usages, since in very many instances its matter is of such a kind that it does not pertain to morals. But canonical laws concern divine worship and morals; they have foundations and reasons from Scripture and apostolic sanctions, and also require severity and integrity of life, so that contrary customs are generally vicious. For canonical laws concern indifferent matters far less often than civil laws; therefore the examination of customs is more exact in sacred than in profane matters.

The eleventh canon is read in distinction 44: "For reverence toward God and priests, the whole holy synod ordained that--because idle tales are accustomed frequently to be interposed at tables--a reading of the divine Scriptures should be mingled in every priestly banquet. For by this both souls are built up toward the good and unnecessary tales are prohibited." Thus the Third Council of Toledo, chapter 7. Now that most beautiful law has been abrogated by a contrary custom, while the pontiff and bishops dissemble. Nevertheless, there is no one who does not prefer so holy a law to the custom; nor is there doubt that those who first violated the law sinned.

Therefore, the beginnings of a custom which is contrary to law are generally shameful, introduced by the worse part of the city, especially in ecclesiastical matters, which were established excellently from the beginning.

For the account of the earthly city is altogether different from that of the ecclesiastical city. The former began from a few and gradually, by experience, instruction, and the example of others, amended ancient and barbarous laws. The latter, instituted by Christ and the apostles, had the best precepts for living in its very beginnings and did not easily make a change except for the worse.

Basil the Great, On the Holy Spirit, certainly judged that customs which flowed from tradition must be seriously guarded. I shall transcribe the passage because it too was transferred into the Decree, distinction 12, canon 5:

"Of the doctrines and institutions which have been preserved in the Church, some indeed we possess from teaching consigned to writing, while others transmitted to us from the tradition of the apostles we have received in mystery. Both possess the same force for piety. Certainly, no one furnished with even slight experience of ecclesiastical laws will contradict these things. For if we undertake imprudently to reject those things which consist not in writing but only in custom, we shall harm the Gospel, and indeed in its principal parts, or rather shall reduce the institutions themselves to a certain empty name.

“For example--to commemorate in the first place what is first and most common--who taught in writing that those who have placed their hope in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ should be marked with the figure of the cross? When we pray, what writings taught us to turn toward the rising sun? Which of the holy Fathers left us in writing the words of invocation when the Eucharistic bread and the cup of blessing are offered? For we are not content with those things of which the apostle and the Gospel made mention, but we also say other things both before and after, as things which possess great importance for the mystery itself, instructed by teaching not written but handed down.

“We bless the water of baptism and the oil of anointing, and furthermore the person himself who is baptized--from what Scripture? Is it not from hidden and mystical tradition? What? What written discourse taught the anointing with oil itself? Whence have we received that a human being is to be immersed three times? What Scripture commanded renouncing Satan and his angels and all the remaining things whatsoever which we observe in baptism? Are they not from this teaching, not made public but secret, which our fathers guarded with quiet and altogether incurious silence? They understood well that the majesty of the mysteries is preserved by silence.”

I shall conclude with the golden maxim of Pope Nicholas to Hincmar, archbishop of Reims: “An evil custom, which is to be avoided no less than a pernicious corruption, unless it is more quickly torn out by the roots, is assumed by the wicked as a right of privileges; and transgressions and various presumptions, if they are not very swiftly suppressed, begin to be revered as laws and perpetually celebrated in the manner of privileges.” It is an oracle which is fulfilled daily.

CHAPTER XX

The Prince Is Bound by the Laws

§ 1. The theologians and jurists appear to me here not so much to hold different opinions as to employ different words. For the matter concerning a king, as it seems to me, can least of all be doubtful; for this reason I shall dispose of it in a few statements.

1. Every prince, and indeed the state, is bound in conscience by divine and natural laws no less than the subjects are. Indeed, by acting contrary to them, because the crime is more conspicuous and does the greatest harm by example, he sins more gravely than a subject. Plutarch speaks rightly about that law in On Kingship: οὐκ ἐν βιβλίοις ἔξω γεγραμμένος, οὐδέ τισι ξύλοις, ἀλλ' ἔμψυχος ὢν ἐν αὐτῷ λόγος, ἀεὶ συνοικῶν καὶ παραφυλάττων καὶ μηδέποτε τὴν ψυχὴν ἐῶν ἔρημον ἡγεμονίας. One must live by that law which is not written externally in books or upon tablets, but which is reason implanted in the soul, always dwelling with him and guarding him, and never leaving the soul without its own guardianship and care.

§ 2. Since in law there is a directive and a coercive power, the prince is bound neither to natural nor to civil law by coercive power. The reason is at hand: because that power comes from outside and acts against one unwilling; but none of the subjects can coerce the prince, because he possesses no legitimate authority over the prince. Nor is the prince said to coerce himself, but he does voluntarily what he does by his own choice. Still less can an external prince do this, because an equal has no power over an equal.

It is therefore pleasing that there be someone in the state who observes the laws from no fear of punishment--without fear of human punishment, that is, not without fear of divine punishment. For whatever the subjects fear in the prince, the prince expects from God.

§ 3. By violating divine laws, the prince incurs punishment and is rendered liable to eternal punishment; nevertheless, he is not punished with temporal punishment according to the laws. The precept of divine law is: "Whoever shall shed blood, his blood shall be shed"; and Deuteronomy 22:22, that both should die, the adulterer and the adulteress. King David committed both a crime and a shameful deed--the adulterer of the wife and the slayer of the husband--and owed punishment to God; yet he did not pay it according to the law, not because he was not guilty, but because an executor was lacking. For he was not obliged to accuse himself or hand himself over for punishment, but to await divine judgment, which he did.

For since he had no superior by whom he might legitimately be punished, and accordingly was compelled to obey no one in undergoing the punishment, he was not bound to that punishment except by a special command.

For the law was given to the magistrate so that, by ordinary power and after the case had been heard, he might kill the murderer and adulterer--not so that the murderer and adulterer himself should voluntarily present himself for judgment or inflict death upon himself. Kings therefore enjoy the same liberty, and by it they cannot be punished by a human being.

§ 4. The prince is bound to undergo certain penalties of divine law which bind others also in common, and which are of such a kind as neither to be unseemly for a prince nor to require the force of another, and which are laws rather than penalties, although they contain a penalty. For in the Old Testament both kings and the people were bound to offer the appointed victims for their sin, since in these matters each person was the executor of his own penalty. I do not dispute whether this was properly the act of unwilling persons, or whether they were properly penalties.

And certainly it is not expedient that persons be established in the state to punish the crimes of kings; for from this arise hatreds and wars. For if a king knows that he has transgressed, he will strive with all his power to escape punishment, and more evil will arise from fear of the punishment than from the offense. It is easy for him to be just whose breast is free from fear; if he has deserved punishment, by the death of those whom he fears he will procure security for himself.

§ 5. I judge that the prince is sometimes bound by the penalties of civil laws and sometimes free from them. He is bound by a penalty when the offense tends toward the harm of another, or when a tacit agreement has been interposed.

And indeed there is no doubt concerning an agreement, for this is a principal virtue of a prince: to stand by agreements and covenants. But when a penalty or satisfaction is expressed in agreements, it must be undergone by a prince no less than by a private person.

For that matter passes into a debt. For example: by common law, donations between spouses are prohibited--those, namely, by which the recipient is made richer. The prince is bound by that law, and if he neglects to restore the gift, he is compelled in conscience, because the rationale of the law has much greater force in the prince; for he can both wheedle it from her, and, if the things requested are refused by his wife, a greater evil is to be feared. Thus the laws, π., title On Doubtful Matters, law If between Husband and Wife. The cause is that they should not despoil one another through mutual love, failing to restrain themselves in donations but abusing their lavish liberality toward one another. And for this reason the law has barred the slippery roads to poverty. Here too the prince will be bound to make restitution, so that he may fulfill the law. And he is bound to this by natural right and by the common law according to which he is held to marry a wife. For what honorable man would give his daughter to a prince if the prince did not marry her according to the common law?

Next, whatever is conceded by way of agreement must be given, and a penalty, when it is to the prejudice of a third party, must be paid. An example is this: in a forest common to the prince and the nobility, let no one hunt except in autumn; if he does so, let him lack the right of hunting for two years. The prince hunts before the appointed time, catches nothing, and does not frighten the beasts away; consequently no harm was done. Nevertheless, because the law is common by agreement, he shall abstain from hunting for two years.

Next, when omission of the penalty tends toward the loss of others, he is compelled to discharge the penalty. For then natural reason, which forbids one to be troublesome to and harm others by violating the law, compels him to give satisfaction. For if it is the tutor's duty to appoint a judge, final law On an Arbitrator in a Guardianship, chapter And Whoever Neglects This, that person is infamous and the testator cannot remit it; if the prince undertakes a guardianship, he too must make an inventory, and if harm follows from its not having been made, he will be obliged to compensate the ward.

Next, sureties, guarantors, and nominators of tutors are bound for the giving of security, and sometimes also the magistrates who do not admit suitable tutors. In these matters, therefore, the prince is bound by natural right. For if he has compelled the tutors to give security that the ward's property will be safe, he has exempted himself from every penalty; if he has not observed the law, through which the ward suffered loss, let him impute it to himself.

If there is no loss to a third party, the prince will not be bound by the penalty of the law. German drinking challenges were prohibited at Augsburg in the years 1500, 1530, and 1548; at Cologne in 1512; and at Frankfurt in 1577. Let us suppose that a penalty was imposed whereby anyone who proposed a drink, or made another person or himself drunk, should offer a sextarius of wine to the poorhouse. The prince proposed a drink without drunkenness in himself or another; he is not bound by the penalty, although he contracted guilt.

For no injury is inflicted upon a third party such that he is thereby compelled to pay the penalty, nor can a judge compel him. No one is bound except by his own judge, chapter But If Clerics, On Judgments. Or, in his own case, he is not bound to be a judge against himself. Nevertheless, he sins more gravely and is left to be punished by God. Nor will he defraud that creditor: punishments will creep upon him in a slow column, and cares and sorrows wandering about his ensnared roof will make him wretched.

§ 6. The prince is civilly bound by his own law, and therefore he must stand by contracts whose validity arises from civil law alone. Accordingly, a subject can also prescribe against him, and he is bound to surrender the thing to that subject. A civil obligation, however, is not necessarily coercive.

Nor, nevertheless, is directive force without coercive force empty, nor is the state greatly burdened. First, because it gravely binds the conscience. Next, because there is no reason why the prince should wish to deceive in small matters. For where the leading men or the people hold the helm of the state, individuals can be coerced. Finally, the loss in one man's liberty is not great. Let the state see that it elects such a person as one to whom, although very much is lawful, very little is pleasing.

§ 7. Finally, a civil law, whether the prince's own or his predecessors', for as long as it remains--for he can abrogate it for a just cause--truly binds the prince in conscience, provided that the matter commanded is common to the prince and the people; for some laws are written for the common people alone, others for the nobility. For example, if just prices of things are established, or weights and measures, the prince's treasury cannot sell those things more dearly or institute a lighter weight. The same rationale applies to coinage: since its value has been assessed by the prince's law, he cannot alter the coin so as to diminish or increase its value. Let this, therefore, remain firm and fixed: "Obey the law, whoever you are who have sanctioned the law."

This obligation arises from the force and nature of law. For the legal authorities teach that the prince is bound by law; therefore he is bound by the force and rationale of law, not merely from some other source. Thus distinction 9, chapter 2: "It is just for the prince to obey his own laws. For then let him think that his laws must be guarded by everyone, when he too offers reverence to them. It is fitting that princes be bound by their own laws, nor that the laws which they establish for their subjects can be condemned in their own case. For the authority of their pronouncement is just if they do not allow themselves to do what they prohibit to the peoples."

If this is just, and consequently the contrary unjust, it is just from no other source than law; for law constitutes the mean of justice, both in the king and in the people. So also in chapter It Is Not Permitted to the Pope, question 17.1, and in civil law, Code On Laws and Constitutions of Princes, law 1, title 14: "It is an utterance worthy of the majesty of one who reigns for the prince to profess himself bound by the laws. To such a degree does our authority depend upon the authority of law; and in truth it is greater than sovereign power to submit the principate to the laws; and by the oracle of the present edict we indicate that what we do not permit ourselves is unlawful." Given at Ravenna, on the third day before the Ides of June, in the consulship of Florentinus and Dionysius, 429.

And law 3.1, On Testaments: "It is proper to the emperor to live by the laws." And Cato most excellently: "Submit to the law which you yourself have carried." And law 23, π., On Legacies: "Whatever rule of law each person has established against another, let him himself use the same," On the Praetor's Edict. "It is just for the prince to obey his own laws." Pliny speaks truly in the Panegyric: "The prince is not above the laws, but the laws above the prince." And Ambrose, Letter 32 to Valentinian: "What you have prescribed for others, you have prescribed also for yourself; for the emperor carries laws which he himself should be the first to guard." With the emperor justice avails more than license, as Symmachus wisely says. Indeed, this too is true: the prince is not exempt from the laws, but appears to be. Accordingly, when he is said to be ἐπάνω τῶν νόμων, "above the laws," this must be understood of penalties alone. Ἁμαρτίαις γὰρ οὐ κολάζεται--for he is not punished for sins.

He is worthy of great punishment if he subjects not only his dignity but also the instruments of virtues to vices; but this must be tolerated, because it cannot be avenged except by God. For the manifold offenses of others also are tolerated when they elude the severity of the laws.

§ 8. The state also binds the prince by the laws; for in truth, when he promulgates a law common to the whole state, he at the same time includes himself and by public will subjects himself to it. For the prince's authority depends upon right, and therefore whatever he has established is presumed to have been moved by a just cause. For that analogy and conformity is understood whereby the head is not unlike the rest of the body. How discordant would it be for a fast to have been proclaimed throughout the whole city and temperance to be observed, but for the prince alone to live festively in the court?

Since, therefore, the state cannot for a legitimate reason exempt the prince in laws common to every part and to the head, he will necessarily also be bound by his own law; for it is contrary to right reason, and therefore to natural law, which is right reason, for the head of the state not to agree with the body. For why should they bind heavy works upon the subjects, while they themselves are unwilling to move them with a finger?

Hence we also understand that ecclesiastical laws are not to be imposed upon others unless the legislators themselves wish to be bound by them.

§ 9. But because the observance of a law that has been carried pertains to natural right, Suárez rightly teaches in book 3, chapter 35 of On Laws that it is commanded by God. I answer, therefore, that God, who is the principal author of this power, confers it under the aforesaid condition and not otherwise, and that this very thing is gathered from natural reason itself without any other revelation or human agreement. It is explained in this way: every legislative power is principally from God, either immediately, as in ecclesiastical power, or through the mediation of the state, as in civil power. Hence, although a human being immediately carries a law, in that act he conducts himself as a minister and steward of God, as we have adduced above from Paul. Therefore the intention and will of the prince carrying the law must be conformed to the intention of God giving the power; indeed, the efficacy of the law for binding depends more upon the intention of God than upon that of the particular legislator. But God, not only as the author of grace but also as the author of nature, wills that a human legislator should not possess the power to carry laws except with their universal obligation, which comprehends the whole state as consisting of body and head. Therefore--

The minor premise is proved from the very necessity of the common good, to which this power is ordained; for it is given for edification, not for destruction. That it pertains to such a common good that this power be given to the prince in such a manner that, although it lies within his will to carry a law, nevertheless, if it is carried, it is universal and comprehends him, is sufficiently declared by the testimonies of Scripture and the reasons adduced, and by the common consensus not only of the Fathers but also of the philosophers. For this reason Aristotle said most excellently near the end of Politics 3.7 that law ought to rule in the state. For, as Saint Thomas rightly explains there, when a sufficient reason for excepting something from a law does not occur, even the prince himself must be subject to it and either act or judge according to that law, because otherwise the law is rendered useless and the state is disturbed.

If, therefore, the prince has the power of carrying laws immediately from God, then he has it under the condition that he carry them according to right reason. If he has it mediately from God through the state, he has also received from the state a limited power, so that he himself is held to be bound by God and by the state.

Accordingly, the obligation arises from positive and natural law; although he is not bound to carry a law, nevertheless, once it has been established, he is bound by it. And this is what is said: "Law is the common pledge of the city." Those therefore err who say that, when law is said to command princes, this must be understood not of written but of natural law; for both natural and written law subject the prince, provided that its subject matter also pertains to the prince.

And hence those things which are disputed in favor of the license of kings against the laws are easily answered: when some assert that princes are greater than the laws; when they say that the intention of legislators is not to subject themselves to the laws; when they say that law is the work of the prince and that there is a difference between the giver and the receiver. Those who say these things themselves sufficiently show that they are not firm. For, once a law has been established, the legislator's will, if it is right, must be that he be subject to the laws; for this has been established by God and belongs to natural right. God and the state, moreover, are distinct from the legislator.

Law is the work of the prince, and the prince is animate justice, but he is bound above all by his own work. So too a vow is manifestly the work of the person vowing, and nevertheless the vow cannot be violated. Certainly, those who make these objections nevertheless bind princes by the laws, as does Gregory of Toledo, book 7, chapter 20, §34.

Moreover, the laws which established the principate--such as those concerning the succession of the firstborn, the prohibition of alienating dominions, and the exclusion of women from succession to the kingdom--cannot, any more than other laws, be ruptured and broken by princes who attained the principate through law, unless the quality and condition of the kingdom and principate are also overturned. Nor can one who has wished to obtain the principate after the law of the kingdom has been changed escape the title of tyrant, because he will usurp the principate contrary to law. Therefore, when Samuel at God's command chose Saul as the first king in Israel, he spoke the law of the kingdom to the people in the king's presence, wrote it in a book, and laid it up before the Lord. And Plato says: "It is probable that this disease belongs especially to kings who live arrogantly on account of delights: they wished to strive to have more power than the laws, nor did they remain in concord in that which they had approved by words and oath; whence seditions arose."

Thus, by the peers of France, the agreements entered into at Troyes in Champagne between King Charles VI and Henry V, king of England, were declared void. By these agreements it had been resolved that the offspring born of Margaret, daughter of Charles VI, and King Henry should be successors in the kingdom of France, to the exclusion of Charles VII, because the agreements had been made contrary to the Salic law, which is fundamental to the kingdom of France. There will also be an example in the law of electing the emperor, which one who wishes to be called a legitimate emperor is not permitted to overturn. And if anyone wishes by his own rashness and forces to invert this law and overthrow in it the authority of the electors and the supreme pontiff, either he will accomplish little or he will stir up almost innumerable slaughters. Likewise, if anyone, scorning the laws for electing the supreme pontiff, should hasten to election, he will disturb with schisms the peace of the whole Christian state. In sum, gather this same conclusion concerning other principalities, in which, if anyone should wish at his own choice to shatter the laws of succession or election, it will come to pass that no state will be firm or safe, or preserved by upright laws or morals. The whole world in which such innovations are made will be nothing other than a cave of robbers and a Lerna of evils, and all things will be done by force rather than justice.

Now if I ask why princes cannot change the law concerning the succession of the firstborn, and if they adduce external causes--disturbances, scandals, and the like--it can come to pass that passing over the firstborn will produce neither sedition nor offenses. The cause, therefore, is the common pledge of the state and the will of God.

§ 10. Laws cannot be stable unless they are confirmed by princes, while the sinew and bond of law is usage. Drinking challenges have been prohibited in Germany by so many good and severe laws, yet moderation could never be introduced among the people because in the courts of certain princes compulsion to equal drinking challenges remains. Their drunken madness has extinguished all the vigor of the law, and the very assemblies in which sobriety was sanctioned resounded with the voices of drunkards. Within our grandfathers' memory, princes of Flaminia and Aemilia craftily carried laws sanctioned by great penalties, which nevertheless they themselves were the first to transgress; and when the laws were held in contempt and the number of transgressors was great, they exacted the most grievous fines. Those men were wicked tyrants, for they both carried laws badly and transgressed them worse, and punished those who had violated them worst of all. Nevertheless, by their example they showed how much power the life of princes possesses in the observance of laws. So indeed it is; Lorenzo de' Medici spoke truly: the city is such as are the morals of the prince.

§ 11. Those who exempt the prince from law are also accustomed to defend their opinion from Novella 105: "But from all things said by us let the fortune of the emperor be excepted, to whom God has subjected the laws themselves, sending him to human beings as animate law, because a perpetual and unceasing consulship has fallen to the emperor among all cities, peoples, and nations, as he distributes in each case the things that are pleasing."

Indeed, nothing is established from that law for this purpose. For the emperor writes to Strategius, count of the Sacred Largesses, and moderates the expenses of consuls, since they had grown excessive. The rationale of the law is that this customary honor, ordinarily given to the best men, should not diminish their property.

"But none of those who come to the honor of the consulship will experience difficulty if, making moderate expenditure in this manner, he should remain so at every time. And everything whatsoever that those who have hitherto possessed the honor of the consulship received both from the court of your Highness and from our most glorious prefects, or even from elsewhere through our munificence, we shall also now give to them, abbreviating the expenditures to be made by them but not diminishing our liberality. But from all things said by us let the fortune of the emperor be excepted, to whom God has subjected the laws themselves, sending him to human beings as animate law."

From this I answer first that this law belongs to the class which is not common to the prince and the people. For it pertains to relieving the expenditures of private persons, lest they incur loss from an honor. I answer secondly that the law does not extend more broadly than its rationale, while the rationale does not apply to the emperor, since it expressly says that the emperor's fortune is greater and that an unceasing consulship has fallen to him. Finally, the consulship follows the scepters of imperial power; he therefore adduces a cause not only just and equitable but also favorable for why he does not wish to use that law himself--namely, lest he restrict his benefactions toward peoples and cities. The pronouncement, therefore, accommodated to that present matter effects nothing against the emperor's obligation.

God subjected the laws to the prince because he can, according to the opportunity of the times, carry new laws and abolish old ones. Yet he did not subject them in such a way that the prince can at his choice violate them while they remain and bind the whole state.

For God also subjected the bodies of the subjects and their goods to the prince, but he possesses them only by sovereign command, not by ownership. Therefore, without legitimate cause he can neither take goods from the subjects nor use the labor of their bodies or rage against them. Book 5 of the same title, On the Julian Law of Treason, and title On the Goods of the Condemned. So too he cannot remove laws or dispense himself from them unless there is a legitimate cause for dispensing. Therefore, too lax was the royal law among the Persians which permitted whatever the king wished, and which was introduced by flatterers; for at the beginning the kings themselves also lived by the laws. Pernicious was the utterance of Julia, an incestuous woman: "Do you not know that you are emperor and give laws, not receive them?" Accordingly, in many matters the prince uses the same law as others. Novella 9, chapter 11, law 31, and π., Who May Make a Testament, penultimate book, and π., On the Institution of Heirs, book 15. Nevertheless, he enjoys his privileges, so that he is held greater than others. For the prince is animate law, as law is a mute prince.

Since, therefore, it is the emperor's office perpetually to take counsel for the subjects, and he is accordingly a perpetual consul, as that law teaches, while he takes counsel best if he himself observes the laws, he must not be exempted from the obligation of observing the laws. For besides the legitimate power which they exercise, they will arrogate to themselves a certain immeasurable license and on a slight occasion will be changed into tyrants.

§ 12. When a contract or some act is rendered void by a law, the prince also is bound by the same law, so that the act itself is in truth not valid. Thus law 3, title 23, law 6 of the same: "It has often been established that not even the emperor can claim an inheritance from an imperfect testament. For although the law of imperial power has released the emperor from the solemnities of law, nevertheless nothing is so proper to imperial power as to live by the laws." Promulgated on the eleventh day before the Kalends of January, in the consulship of Lupus and Maximus, 233.

Because the law of imperial power releases the emperor from the solemnities of law, it is certain that he is bound unless he has been released; therefore, from the nature of the matter, the emperor is bound by them. Here he does not use that law by which he has been released, because it appeared shameful for him to obtain an inheritance from an imperfect testament.

Since, therefore, for a just cause a dispensation has been granted from following the solemnities of law--so that, if the prince is present and acts, his person and good faith are held in place of the solemnities, lest what has been done be void--it is altogether sufficiently shown that in other matters he is bound. For although that invalidating law appears to be penal, nevertheless, because it intends in itself that the act not be valid, he is therefore bound by it.

The cause of this matter is that a certain manner of acting has been established for the common good in order to avoid frauds. Accordingly, an invalidating law regards the common good and the execution of right and justice, which the prince is bound not to diminish but to increase and confirm. Moreover, not every law invalidating an act is penal, because sometimes it gives form to the act, and therefore it also binds the prince. Thus Panormitanus on chapter 2, On Constitutions. For this is the directive law by which the state is bound.

The other solemnities, which are accidental, are supplied by the majesty of the prince, because law or custom has granted this to him. For unless we so establish, many disadvantages will follow. For by his testimony alone the prince will be able to raise up or ruin cases if no solemnity or number of witnesses is required. Nor is there another custom in most places, for all matters are transacted with princes in the same manner according to the forms of the laws as among private persons. And this is truly the majesty of the prince, which is greater than the prince himself.

CHAPTER XXI

The Old Law Was Useful for Morals and for the Polity

§ 1. The matters which are usefully disputed by theologians concerning the old law do not contribute much to politics; accordingly, I shall conclude them in a few propositions and prepare myself for other matters.

Certain laws besides natural law were established by God even before the law of Moses was given: in Paradise, the law concerning not eating from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil; afterward, the law concerning clean and unclean animals.

§ 2. The law given to Moses was holy, given by the good God through angels into the hand of Moses the mediator. Its end was supernatural: that they might be led to virtue and consequently to eternal life; that it might prefigure for us Christ, to whom the law led; that it might establish the worship of God amid so many discordant ceremonies of idolatry; and that it might strengthen political order.

§ 3. It was given to the Jews alone, and it bound them alone and those who, having received circumcision, passed over into the colony of the Jews.

§ 4. The precepts were of three kinds: moral, ceremonial, and judicial. The moral precepts bind everyone and always; the ceremonial have been abrogated; and the judicial, through the death of Christ, were first dead and afterward death-bearing.

§ 5. These matters are disputed in many ways, learnedly and most usefully, but they do not greatly pertain to politics. There is one matter which has sometimes been proposed by learned men. Why do Christian states not use the judicial laws carried by God himself? Although those laws do not bind, why do they not decide controversies according to the laws of God rather than those of impious Caesars? This is all the more so because we all ought to judge those judgments just, whereas we may deservedly doubt the laws of the emperors, many of which were unjust. God inculcates this upon his judges in Deuteronomy 1:17: “And I commanded all the things which you ought to do.”

Why, therefore, are the things commanded in Exodus 21 concerning servitudes not observed? Why, if anyone has stolen an ox, is he not compelled to give five for one, but is hanged? And in verse 16, for fornication are only marriage with the woman and a dowry commanded? And in verse 26, pledges are commanded to be returned before night? Since eternal truth weighed these and similar things in a just balance, why do we now use other laws? Why does a brother not take his brother’s wife into his house?

But however many laws there are of this kind, since they are mutable, it is not necessary for a state to adopt them; nor on that account were they carried less prudently by God. For they were accommodated to the capacity and character of the Jews. But since the beginnings of cities had other laws, there was no cause for changing them. Next, God carried those laws only for that state which he foresaw would be changed. When times are changed, laws also must be changed. Theft is now rightly punished by death; for if stolen things had to be restored, since thieves are generally poor, they would be bound all the more strongly to thefts.

Third, how great an incitement to wickedness would it be if marriage to a rich girl should fall as a reward to her fornicator? I am not unaware that this is the custom when they are equals; but when there is a great difference, the laws establish otherwise. Yet at that time those laws were just among that people and under that discipline; now the subject matter has changed among many nations, so that the laws cannot pertain to it.

CHAPTER XXII

Antinomians Must Be Expelled from the State

§ 1. The Gospel was handed down to us by Christ, the Son of God; hence he who is also Redeemer is the author of the new law which we call evangelical. Of him Isaiah 33:22 says: "The Lord is our judge, the Lord is our lawgiver, the Lord is our king; he himself will save us."

§ 2. Moral, sacramental, and faith-related precepts are contained in that law. Christ expounded the moral precepts more perfectly, and handed down wholly new sacramental precepts after the old ones had been abolished. He gave more explicit precepts of faith, for otherwise precepts concerning what must be believed were also given to the Jews and to the fathers before the Flood.

§ 3. Those precepts must be observed by us altogether, for all the precepts bind us, not only those of faith.

§ 4. In this matter there are heresies and errors which are most pernicious not only against piety but also in the state and in politics.

For first, the sectarians profess that the moral law can by no means be observed. Second, they profess that faith alone is accepted by God in place of the observance of all the precepts, as some say; or that faith alone is imputed for justice. They understand faith, of course, as confidence in justice and salvation. Third, they profess that no eternal penalties threaten believers for any commandment violated in any manner whatsoever.

Fourth, they profess that Christ is therefore not a legislator but only the promiser and giver of grace. Hence arose the Antinomians, who scorn every law, and the Müntzerians, who, employing Lutheran principles, rejected not only every law but even the magistracy. At the beginning I disputed against those who judge consciences to be altogether secure from obligation to human laws; I showed that they are pernicious to the state. Now these men indeed acknowledge that they sin by violating laws, but say that they do not fear punishment, because they have been freed from every active and passive curse; for God is neither angry with them nor punishes them, but in every crime fully justifies and beatifies them.

It belongs to theologians to dispute against their impiety; I shall discuss the disturbance of the state which this pestiferous sect contrives under the pretext of piety and Christian liberty.

But this must be noted especially: the very doctors of immeasurable license do not dare to assert in words the faith which they teach. For the Lutherans, although they gave the Antinomians their beginnings, pretend that they refute them; and the Calvinists pretend that they refute the Libertines, from whom they differ only in words. And indeed, those who profess to detest the Antinomians teach as follows.

§ 5. The Synod of Mansfeld: "The true understanding of the abrogation of the law consists in this: that at the beginning we know that the law in general has been removed by Christ in this manner, so that it cannot harm the sons of God by its curse, condemnation, and accusation, as is said in Galatians 3: 'Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, himself having been made a curse for us.' This was done, namely, according to his office, concerning which the Holy Spirit had long before prophesied through Moses: 'Cursed is everyone who hangs upon the tree.' And from this Paul reasons that we who have been redeemed through Christ are now under grace and not under the law, Romans 6."

Their error is that they say that, whatever they commit against God and their neighbor--even acts of arson, murders, and treasons--they are not only not cursed or condemned by God, but are not even accused. If this is to be taught concerning the law of God and natural law, how much more is the same thing to be taught concerning a political law carried about an indifferent matter? For how will a decree of the senate or an edict of the prince concerning the making of an inventory of a testament bind, if the laws of the eternal Emperor do not bind to accusation, curse, and punishment?

Whatever they seem to teach rightly concerning the law comes down entirely to this: they say that it must be observed, but that no punishment is to be feared from its violation. Finally, they say that the law cannot be observed.

From this foundation the Antinomians argue as follows.

Can we observe the Decalogue or moral law with respect to obedience? The Mansfeldians answer: we can, although in great weakness and imperfection. Nevertheless, things of this kind do not bring condemnation upon us, Romans 8, provided that we remain in Christ. Thus they speak more mildly, but they are condemned by others because they say that every good work is by its nature a mortal sin. But insofar as it is by nature a mortal sin, God's precept is not observed.

Yet they imagine for themselves a great distinction between the just and the impious; for they teach that the law was established for the unjust, but by no means for the just: "Because, as we said before, the law has not been removed for everyone, but only for those who are under grace and acknowledge and embrace the benefits of Christ through faith; indeed, it has been abrogated for the just, as Paul says in 1 Timothy 1. It follows from this that the unjust and those not yet converted, who do not acknowledge and apprehend the benefits of Christ through faith and who otherwise lead an evil and dishonorable life, are still under the law, and this during the whole time of their impiety, so that the law continually exercises its office upon them by showing sin, the wrath of God, and the consequent penalties; next also by showing our weakness and impossibility in observing the divine law for obtaining justice; and furthermore by terrifying, accusing, condemning, and mortifying, so that the unjust themselves feel and experience the tyranny and dominion of the law, its curse and condemnation. This is signified in 1 Timothy 1: 'The law is given to the unjust, the disobedient, the impious, sinners, the irreverent, and the violent'; and against sinners of this kind the law, as pedagogue, still takes punitive action, Galatians 3; and thus the law is our pedagogue until Christ."

They enumerate the following as the errors and false dogmas of the Antinomians.

The First Error

§ 6. "The law is not worthy to be called the word of God."

This indeed belongs to the Manichaeans, who proclaimed an evil God as the author of the law, against whom are the disputations of the holy Fathers, especially Augustine. For if that law, "You shall not kill," and so forth, is not worthy to be called the word of God, then idols, blasphemies, parricides, adulteries, and robberies are not prohibited by the word of God. Who, therefore, prohibits them, if so holy a law is unworthy of its author? How will human law possess reverence if there is no divine law from which it is derived? The Mansfeldians refute that error when they exclaim: "It is horrible to hear that the law is unworthy to be called the word of God. For Scripture says in Exodus 32 that God wrote the law or Decalogue with his own finger; why, therefore, shall we not call it the word of God?

"In Deuteronomy 8 the Lord says that he will place his words in the mouth of the prophet, so that he may speak whatever he has commanded him. And so thereafter in all the prophets the law is called the law of the Lord, which fact is an argument that the law is truly the word of God. If it is truly the word of God, it certainly deserves also to be so called. But what Paul writes concerning the dignity of the law is to be sought from 2 Corinthians 3, which dignity of the law the Antinomians plainly scorn and deride. Augustine, in book 2 of Questions on Moses, question 166: 'Hence the law is called the work of God, because he himself ordained it; God wrote this law.' Likewise, in tractate 3 on John: 'He who gave the law also gave grace.'"

Yet that struggle is one of words. For a penalty is added to those laws, so that the soul of whoever transgresses them should be destroyed from his people; they deny that this pertains to them. But this too is the law of God: "Whoever kills a human being shall surely die." The sectarians hold otherwise: although we have killed thousands upon thousands, nevertheless we shall not die, because we are free from the law. The law is dead to us--the law, I say, which forbids killing, is dead to us.

The Second and Third Errors

§ 7. "If you are a prostitute, if an adulterer, or any other sinner whatsoever, only believe, and you are on the way of salvation."

"When you are entirely fixed in the midst of sin, only believe, and you are in the midst of salvation."

The Mansfeldians profess that they detest these errors.

"These two errors," they say, "open the widest window to manifest crimes and shameful deeds, and despoil repentance of a certain great part of itself--namely, the good resolution to amend one's life."

Nevertheless, the shameless obstinacy of others remains: that in the midst of sins they are not only just by imputation, but also know this concerning themselves with certainty; and that David retained justice in adultery and homicide. What will citizens imbued with this opinion not dare? They deny that they are guilty of an offense against divine majesty; how will they revere human majesty? Deuteronomy 13: "If you hear in one of the cities which the Lord has given you to dwell in, persons saying, 'Let us go and serve alien gods,' killing you shall kill all who are in that city, and you shall burn it with fire, and it shall be without habitation forever, nor shall it be rebuilt." What if someone believes himself just in this matter and denies that the penal law pertains to him?

What if the son of Clytemnestra, or Nero, should come to judgment,

> For whose punishment there should not have been prepared
> one ape, nor one serpent, nor one sack?

Would he not, if he lived in our age, commit some crime greater than parricide, proclaim himself most just in the midst of the crime, and say that by the new law he was free from the curse of the law? The Argives, therefore, were excessively scrupulous; of them the parricide's sister complains:

> ἔδοξε δ' Ἄργει τῷδε μήθ' ἡμᾶς στέγαις
> μητροκτονοῦντας· κυρία δ' ἥδ' ἡμέρα,
>
> ἐν ᾗ διοίσει ψῆφον Ἀργείων πόλις,
>
> ἢ χρὴ θανεῖν νὼ λευσίμῳ πετρώματι,
> ἢ φάσγανον θήξαντ' ἐπ' αὐχένος βαλεῖν.

For it seemed good to the Argives not even to receive us matricides under a roof; but this is the decisive day on which the city of the Argives will deliver its judgment: for either we must die by a white stone, or the neck must be cut off with a sharpened sword.

But according to the prescription of the new Gospel, they are just, holy, and innocent if they believe themselves to be such. God is not angry with them, because they believe themselves to be sons; he does not punish them, because he does not impute sin. They say that they are on the way to heaven, on the way of salvation.

How much more will they ruin all civil laws? For why should solemnities and formulas bind those who trample upon all God's commands without fraud? Will those who judge themselves fully just and truly beatified delay for the order and procedure of the praetor if they fill the tribunal with the praetor's blood? Orestes, therefore, would be a fiducialist and would fear no vengeance from God.

The Fourth Error

§ 8. "The Decalogue pertains to the curia, not to the pulpit."

What do they mean by these words? Evidently, that when conscience is at issue, when justice, eternal life, friendship, and spiritual conversation are at issue, no mention of the Decalogue is to be made. Indeed, not even the law of God is to be expounded to the people. For the Decalogue does not

Therefore, in their judgment, knowledge or observance of the Decalogue does not pertain to living well or to salvation; much less, therefore, does observance of civil laws. But how does it pertain to the curia if it does not pertain to the pulpit?

The curia indeed punishes crimes and guards the tablets of the commandments; but why does the curia do this, when God is imagined to will that human beings not even be admonished concerning this matter? Next, has a command been given to the curia--that is, to the magistrate--that it should wish to guard the Decalogue? This, then, is a command of God. Is it therefore not to be spoken to them in an address? From where, then, will the magistrate learn it?

The Mansfeldians answer rightly, but by no means consistently with their opinion: "It is true that the Decalogue pertains in part to the court and the curia. For the civil magistrate ought to be the guardian of both tables of the law. Therefore in Deuteronomy 17 God commands that kings, sitting upon the throne or at the helm of the state, take care that a copy of the book of divine law be written out for them, so that they themselves may both perform the precepts of the Lord on their own part and take care that they are performed among the subjects of their kingdoms. Likewise, in Romans 13 it is written: 'The magistrate is also the minister of God for your benefit; but if you do evil, you will fear him, for he does not bear the sword in vain.' But that the Decalogue is therefore also to be removed from preaching is intolerable, for both spiritual and political magistrates ought to be guardians and promoters of the Decalogue. Likewise, if doctors of the word ought not to treat the Decalogue before the congregation, how would they lead human beings to acknowledgment of sins? How would they deter them from sins by fear of God's wrath and punishments? How would they invite them to repentance and sorrows of the soul concerning sin? They would necessarily omit the principal part in the preaching of repentance.

"Finally, what would become of conversion? How could God render an account with us, according to the parable in Matthew 18, concerning the debt arising from violation of the divine will, if preaching of the law were to be banished from the churches? Finally, if preaching of the Decalogue perishes in the Church, at the same time the preaching of repentance falls, all discipline perishes, and no one is converted to salvation through the ordinary means."

By this answer they condemn themselves. For by law they condemn the magistrate and absolve the subjects. For I ask whether the magistrate himself ought to fear the penalty of an offense if he neither reads God's laws, nor takes care that they are observed, nor bears the sword for vengeance upon evildoers. For if he too, without offense against God, is not compelled by a most hateful work to offend his subjects; if the preacher ought not to admonish him concerning the guardianship of the laws as though a penalty were prepared for the negligent, then the law does not even pertain to the curia.

The Fifth Error

§ 9. "All those who have dealings with Moses proceed by the direct road to the Devil--indeed, to an evil end with Moses."

The Mansfeldians answer: "All those who have dealings with Moses or the law in such a way that through it they wish to become just--that is, accepted before God--do indeed all proceed by the direct road to hell, nor does any one of them attain the blessedness of eternal life. For it is written in Romans 3 that by the works of the law no flesh is justified before God; and in John 3 eternal life is promised to believers alone. In Romans 10 Paul says: 'If you confess with your mouth that Jesus himself is Lord, and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved.'

"But what dealings they have with Moses or the law we handed down above, according to the agreement of Scripture, in the doctrine concerning the law: what remains for us in it and how far we can still use it. These do not proceed toward the Devil, nor are they condemned, but experience the great and ample fruit and usefulness of the divine law.

"Neither Moses nor the law itself ought to be sent to an evil end, but for those who do not live according to the laws and precepts of the Decalogue the matter very often comes to an evil end or to the rope. The Antinomians themselves provide the occasion for this evil when they counsel their people to scorn the law and the Ten Commandments of God without concern and to omit them at pleasure. By these outcries, I say, they drive many to the evil cross and the torments of various punishments."

But this is an impious confirmation of the blasphemous paradox, repeating the error in milder words. First, because elsewhere they teach that not even the commandments observed with the grace of God contribute to salvation, since all are mortal sins--even the best works done in the best manner. Therefore the Antinomians stand upon the foundation of the Mansfeldians and conclude irrefragably: every work of divine and human law done in the best manner is a sin worthy of eternal death; therefore it must not be done by us, lest with Moses we be thrust down to hell.

Next, they interpret "works of the law" most perversely, since the Apostle is speaking about those which are done without grace. Finally, others add that they say the law is dead, not because they observe it through grace, but because, when violated, it cannot harm those who believe themselves just amid its defilement--even though someone > has broken the aged throat of his parent.

When he has believed himself to be just, he will raise pure hands to heaven. Nor will he wait for a judge who is inquiring about the right of eavesdrip, boundaries, and windows. Indeed, he will not even dread the tribunal of God.

The Sixth Error

§ 10. "Human beings are not to be prepared for the Gospel through the preaching of the law; but it is necessary that God do this, whose proper work it is."

That reasoning is without the law of truth and right. For if God leads people through the preaching of the law, why does the preacher not also do so, exhorting in the place of God? But the Mansfeldians speak much more absurdly: "Nor is there any better preparation for the Gospel than the preaching of the law itself. For it terrifies, distresses, and wounds human beings, so that afterward they may experience the magnitude of evangelical consolation, joy, and salvation so much more pleasantly. For he also contemns the magnitude of aid who does not acknowledge the magnitude of the danger. Moreover, through the preaching of the law as preparation for the Gospel, nothing is taken away from God. For nevertheless true acknowledgment of sin, salutary acknowledgment of God's wrath and punishments, right fears, true contrition, and sorrows must be given by God."

For all this preaching falls among the jests of the Lutherans and Calvinists. Unbelievers are not terrified by those threats of the law, because they judge the shades of the underworld and the torments of the impious to be fables. Believers are not terrified because they are most certain that they are free from the curse, accusation, and condemnation of the law. Julius spoke contemptuously: "Will you proceed to cite laws to me while I am armed?"

Nero at last feared the punishments of the laws when, upon hearing the enemy's cavalry, he said:

> ἵππων ὠκυπόδων ἀμφὶ κτύπος οὔατα βάλλει.

The sound of swift-footed horses resounds about my ears.

Before that, as one greater than the laws, he used to sing this: “Let kings go by whatever road they please.” Yet even that impious man was terrified by the nocturnal specter of his murdered mother; but those who boast that they are just merely by believing, in their confidence violate the laws without fear, and will answer the magistrate with the freest indignation:

“We are not prepared for the Gospel and salvation even by the law of God; much less, therefore, by your law, which is neither from God nor concerns a matter which is good in itself, but concerns matters which can rightly be done otherwise.”

The Seventh Error

§ 11. “In the Gospel one ought not to treat of violation of the law, but of violation of the Son.”

An opinion unworthy of a human being, much less of a doctor. They do not think the Son of God is violated except by unbelief, although he is also violated by blasphemies, hatred, and contempt. Nevertheless, they do not lack a reason for so absurd a matter, drawn from the adversaries themselves. For if they are just by faith alone, if they are rendered unjust by no shameful deed except unbelief, what need is there to treat of things which can neither harm salvation nor promote it?

The Eighth Error

§ 12. “To hear the word of God and perceive it in the heart is the proper consequence of the Gospel.”

From this they concluded that it was enough to hear and perceive, even if they did not act, although the Lord condemns those who received the word in their heart but produced no fruit.

From this they reasoned further, according to the testimony of the Mansfeldians: “It is enough to hear and perceive; a work is not required. Accordingly, it is not a sin to be overthrown by a little prostitute.” What will the prince promise himself here concerning citizens of this kind? “We have heard the law and perceived it; it is not a sin if we act contrary to it.” In the morning hours they will wear away the thresholds of Socrates, in the afternoon those of Thaïs. Yet they learned all these things from Luther and the Lutherans, for those men teach that good works are not necessary for salvation. But if this is true, it is enough to hear and perceive the law--indeed, not even to hear it. For why should you batter the ears when there is no need of action? But so that it may appear where those preachers lead the citizens, I shall cite the things which the Mansfeldians assembled in their Synod:

“This proposition is papistic, devised by the pontiffs themselves and fashioned in this manner. For it is found nowhere in Scripture, nor is it readily found even in the books of the Fathers, especially with the understanding which the papists attach to it: that good works are partial efficient and meritorious causes of salvation. Even if this proposition is bent merely into another meaning by some gloss affixed to it, nevertheless this sense stands out above the others, which the context of the words represents. Nor do the papists, the first inventors of this proposition, permit a new meaning to be constructed for it contrary to the nature and proper meaning of their own words.

“The divine Luther attacked this proposition most sharply, as his books everywhere testify. For in the first German volume printed at Wittenberg he writes that this proposition, ‘Good works are necessary for salvation,’ confounds law and Gospel with such loss and detriment as human reason can neither comprehend nor understand. For through it the doctrine of grace is obscured, Christ is torn away with all his benefits, and the whole Gospel is overturned.

“In the same place he says: ‘It is a slippery and empty statement to pronounce thus: faith indeed ought not to rest upon works and merits, but nevertheless it is necessary to possess good works as necessary for salvation. This whole thing is nothing. For if they are necessary for salvation, salvation cannot come without them, and therefore we are not saved by faith alone. But this is false and dissents from Scripture.’ In the same place he writes that it was decreed in the Synod of Jerusalem that the works of the law are not necessary for salvation.

"In volume 4, page 550: 'Unless three apostles had stood firm, the entire little assembly would have fallen back and decreed that the works of the law were necessary for salvation.'

"In volume 7, page 61: 'Eighth, it must be carefully observed here and guarded with great zeal that faith alone, without any works, makes persons just, free, and saved.'

"Page 63: 'From this it is clearly perceived how a Christian human being is free from all things and above all things, so that he has no need of works for justice and salvation, but faith supplies all things to him abundantly. And if he should be so insane as to hope to become just, free, saved, and a Christian through any good work, he loses faith with all its supports, like that dog which, when it carried a portion of meat in its mouth and gaped at the reflection in the water, lost both the meat and the reflection at the same time.'

"Page 65: 'No work and no commandment is necessary for a Christian for salvation.'

"In the same place: 'Although in this life a human being cannot be without works, nevertheless they are not necessary to him for justice and salvation.'

"Page 66: 'Let a Christian human being be content with his faith, which is his life, justice, and salvation, and let him be persuaded that he requires nothing further for that matter than to believe that the matter truly stands so.'

"In a certain sermon on the Ascension published in the year 1523: 'Beware that gloss or disguise of the philosophers or universities: "He who believes and has good works will be saved." Christ does not speak thus, but only, "He who believes," he says.'

"In the Household Sermons published at Nuremberg in the year 1545, page 41: 'It falls to us to be saved only through the remission of sins.'

"In the Greater Postils, from Advent to Easter Sunday, page 102: 'Christ saved us once in a twofold manner. First, he did all things whatsoever which it is necessary to do so that we may be saved; next, in baptism he communicated all his benefits to us.'

"The books of Luther are filled with these and similar passages, and we shall not commemorate more. But Luther cast down above all this proposition, 'Good works are necessary for salvation,' most forcefully in the disputation on the works of law and grace held at Wittenberg in 1537. In that disputation he altogether rejects the necessity of works for salvation and by no means wishes to tolerate it. If, therefore, anyone had intended to introduce this proposition again after Luther's death and thus overthrow and rupture the peace and concord of the Church, these things ought at that time to have been disputed and decided with Luther himself.

"At other times also in our churches, throughout the whole time elapsed after Luther's death, no one made mention of this pernicious proposition; rather, as something unaccustomed it was perpetually suppressed by silence. For everyone was very readily content with the doctrine of the Augsburg Confession: 'It is necessary to act well'; and concerning this there was never any dispute.

"After Luther's death this proposition emerged again, and once its authors have been shown it is very easy to judge; for their disputations in favor of this proposition are extant. Although various causes are alleged by which the defenders of this dogma affirm that they were moved, nevertheless these are of no importance in comparison with that immeasurable loss and detriment to the Christian religion which follows from it. And if afterward they had wished to abstain from this dogma, as by God's beneficence has occurred, it would have been preferable never to have brought it back into the light, and many disputes could have been avoided in this manner. The papistic justiciaries would not have been confirmed in their impious dogma concerning the necessity of good works for salvation, and the weaker Christians in our churches would not have been disturbed."

§ 13. Experience has taught that the Antinomians were born from this; and we have as confessing culprits the adversaries of the Antinomians themselves. For since they could in no way avoid lawlessness and the confusion of all things if they condemned good works, many of the Lutherans themselves rejected such depraved teachings. The Mansfeldians narrate the matter thus in the controversy concerning good works:

"The following causes for restoring the proposition are brought forward: first, that the Antinomians manifestly teach that a human being, once regenerated, nevertheless retains grace and the Holy Spirit even if he rushes into sins against conscience, is an adulterer, drunkard, defrauder, or prodigal.

"Second, that there are said to have been some who jestingly and wittily declaimed that the salt of necessity had become putrid--or, as the proverb has greater charm in the vernacular language through the ambiguity of a word which signifies at one time necessity and at another seasoning: Das Muss ist versalzen.

"Fourth, that some were unwilling to bear the word 'debt.'

"Fifth, that all human beings have long since been remiss, sluggish, and idle with respect to good works.

"Sixth, that some understood the particle 'alone' in such a way that it excludes not only the merit of good works but also their presence."

Some of these causes are sufficiently honorable and suitable, and it is manifest that the Antinomians teach as has been stated; moreover, the idleness and languor of human beings with respect to good works is, alas, unknown to no one. The other causes are less known.

I now appeal to the conscience of all princes: whether they truly judge that a just and constant state governed by laws can be constituted from these human beings.

The Ninth Error

§ 14. "Peter did not understand Christian liberty; therefore he wished to observe the law by not eating unclean things."

What wonder if the Antinomians say this, since their masters and the antagonists among the masters agree? For when they treat of good works, they say not only that human beings are saved without them, but also deny that they are a condition without which persons are not saved, page 208. Much less is Christ's merit applied by good works. If, therefore, a magistrate cites Scripture, the ancestors, or any laws whatsoever, he will immediately hear: "You do not understand Christian liberty."

The Tenth Error

§ 15. "Peter's saying, 'Make your vocation certain through good works,' is useless."

The Lutherans answer: "Nor does this saying from the first chapter of the second Epistle support the Antinomians who cry out about Peter's ignorance, as if he had not sufficiently understood the doctrine of Christian liberty. For Peter's exhortation that we make our vocation certain through good works sufficiently declares that he understood the rationale of evangelical liberty: that it is not similar to carnal liberty, nor is wickedness to be clothed with the appearance of liberty. Christian liberty is not then drawn toward the carnal if through good works we establish our vocation; that is, if by good works we testify that our vocation to the kingdom of Christ and eternal life is certain. For where evil works are exercised contrary to the will of God, there we cannot be certain concerning our vocation, but must doubt whether we have truly been called to the inheritance of the kingdom of Christ and eternal life. By weakening this certainty of vocation, because they neither care about evil works nor greatly demand good ones, the Antinomians sufficiently show that they possess no sound judgment concerning evangelical liberty. Next, this too is manifest from the immediately preceding errors: that the Antinomians are enemies of good works and provide human beings occasions, with a certain horrible security, to do whatever has pleased their mind. And although they do not dare openly to profess that an evil life is good, nevertheless they diminish sins, so that they say we can be freed from them at a slight moment, provided only that we believe, while in the meantime omitting the resolution to reform the course of our former life for the better."

But the poet deservedly sings in response to them:

> Let the straight man mock the club-footed, the white man the Ethiopian.

For in their reply they embrace no less impious a doctrine. For Peter commands that vocation be made certain through works; without works, therefore, it is uncertain. They deny that those who practice evil works contrary to God's will are certain, although the Calvinists affirm this. Yet if those people are uncertain, all alike are uncertain; for all perform evil works, and they say that all their good works are mortal sins, while vocation is not rendered certain through mortal crimes. Therefore they make good works of less account than the Antinomians do, because they openly profess that a good life is evil. Indeed, they highly praise these propositions: "It is possible to be saved without good works. All who have been saved were saved without good works. Good works are not necessary for salvation; they do not preserve salvation; they are not a condition without which one is not saved; they are by their nature worthy of eternal death. Evil works are effaced by faith alone. If you have committed every shameful deed, as soon as you have believed that you are just through Christ, you are just." What greater security can there be for the wicked? But do you expect a person to submit to human judgment when he thinks that by one assertion of the mind he has escaped all crimes and their punishments?

The Eleventh Error

§ 16. "Whenever a thought of this kind occurs to you--that in this or that manner a matter ought to be conducted in the Church so that human beings may be good, honorable, modest, holy, and chaste--you have already wandered from the Gospel."

If these things are true, it is certainly preferable to return to Judaism, or indeed to profess any religion whatsoever; for who is certain in a religion in which no account is taken of uprightness and there is no shame at wicked deeds? What else would the Ephesians, the Sybarites, or the Cyrenians say? We read that they were the most corrupt of nations; yet they did not condemn the cultivators of virtues, although they hated and exterminated them. If, therefore, the prince, mindful of his office, acts so that the citizens become good, modest, holy, honorable, and chaste, he wanders from the Gospel. If a parent thinks in this way concerning the education of his children, he ceases to be evangelical; for in this respect the rationale of prince and father is the same. Οὐδὲν διαφέρει ἄρχων ἀγαθός, ἀγαθοῦ πατρός. A good prince differs in nothing from a good father. He will never be a good citizen who judges that a magistrate solicitous concerning the life of the citizens wanders from the Gospel. Finally, since the state rules its citizens by both punishments and rewards, one who equally removes the causes of rewards and punishments cannot belong to the state.

Certainly, from even this single error there seems to me sufficient cause for all Germany to be dashed together in mutual conflicts, when the office committed by God to kings and princes--that they should be τῶν νόμων φύλακες, guardians of the laws--is assailed so shamelessly and insolently.

CHAPTER XXIII

The Written Divine Law Necessary to the State Is Rightly Understood and Observed by Catholics Alone

§ 1. The adversaries have long accused us gravely; but in the year 1617 writers as frivolous as they were abusive poured out upon the Catholics the venom of all preceding times. The principal accusation was that the written law of God had been rejected by us, interpolated, corrupted, and oppressed by a bad translation, interpretation, and additions of traditions. Although I answered concerning this matter in the Conclusion of the Jubilees, the necessity of many nevertheless requires a repeated answer here also.

I shall take my beginning from that in which they especially glory: the word of God, Scripture. They say that it is contemned by us and that our faith is overturned by it.

I do not remember that there is anyone among the Jubilarians who does not accuse us of that crime. The Heidelberg Academic Jubilee, page 24, has the following:

"8. The principle of the faith which is believed, ultimately terminating Christian faith, is divine Scripture, comprehended in the books of the prophets and apostles, and indeed Scripture alone.

"9. For all Scripture is divinely inspired and useful for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction which is in justice, so that the man of God may be perfect, perfectly instructed for every good work.

"10. The Roman papacy long ago shook, and today continues to shake, this principle of the faith which is believed, not in one manner but variously.

"11. It teaches that nothing of divinity inheres in the sacred Scriptures except as much as Scripture receives from the Church.

"12. Nor does it hold the Scriptures as authentic except by the authority of the Church.

"13. Indeed, it does not believe God except on account of the Church.

"14. It suspends the divine authority of the Scriptures upon the judgment of the pope, because that authority resides in the pope as in the head of the whole Church.

"15. And because the pope alone, or with the prelates, is the Church, therefore the pope and prelates, if they believe the Scriptures, believe them on account of themselves; they wish the laity to believe the Scriptures on account of the pope and prelates.

"16. Thus the faith of pope, prelates, and laity concerning the Scriptures stands upon human testimony--that is, upon sand--and is nothing.

"17. It charges the Scriptures with such obscurity in matters which pertain to faith, worship, and morals that they can be understood by no one except from the interpretation of the pope.

"18. It makes the pope the supreme judge of all questions concerning faith, in whom our faith must ultimately come to rest, even in those matters which the evangelicals dispute with the pope.

"19. It accuses the Scriptures of imperfection, because they suffice neither for cultivating faith and piety nor for attaining salvation unless they are supplemented by traditions.

"20. Hence it calls its traditions the unwritten word of God, equally certain, infallible, canonical, necessary for salvation, and to be received with equal affection of piety and reverence as the written word of God.

“21. It blasphemes Scripture as a waxen nose, ambiguous, a dead letter, written in ink, made of paper, which needed the consensus of the Church for confirmation, like a sheath receiving any sword whatever--of steel, lead, wood, or bronze.”

Our Maximilian Sandaeus discussed these matters truly and learnedly in the Secular Thesis. More crudely, but more abusively, Jacob Martini, the dialectician of Wittenberg, treated the same matter in posted theses. Erhard Lauterbach, Sermon 2, says that the Romans neither read the Bible nor grammar, and that he believes no pontiff read through the Bible in his whole life. He says that Leo X, when Bembo brought forward a sentence from the Bible, said: “Why, Bembo, do you allege that fable to me?” And to Sadoleto, when he was writing commentaries on the Epistle to the Romans: “Omit those trifles; such follies do not become a serious man.” At these things Polycarp exclaims thus: “O you condemned Italian scoundrels, are your politics more serious than the word of God? Hear the most learned Leo and Bembo: if they esteemed Scripture as nothing, how would the unlearned esteem it?” Nearly all bishops, cardinals, and monks were of flour of this kind. Polycarp Leyser nevertheless writes that the Bible was not altogether lost, but hidden under a bench.

Christoph Schleupner, general superintendent and court stentor, when he wished to delight his people with pleasantries, made Catholic theology fivefold: canonical, scholastic, monastic, Interimistic, and Jesuitical, pages 8--11, Sermon 1. But he does this with such ignorance that he appears never to have seen any books of Catholics. I have named a few; all are engaged in the same cause, all labor to persuade the people that we contemn Scripture while they venerate and follow it, and therefore that we are governed by human law alone while they are governed by divine law. They especially call into odium our esteem for canons, councils, and pontiffs, as though we set those decrees before sacred Scripture. But let us explain the whole case.

§ 2. First, this is the common opinion and faith of Catholics: the sacred writings possess such depth, wisdom, and perfection that no writings of human beings can or ought to be equaled with them. For the law is the Creator’s.

Second, all hold by the same faith that sacred Scripture possesses infallible authority, divine truth mixed with no error, and the norm directing all things.

Third, whatever in the writings and sayings of others conflicts with even one sentence or one apex of the sacred writings is false.

Fourth, any Christian ought to die a thousand times rather than judge or say that even one saying of Scripture is false, or affirm that it can be false.

Fifth, whoever teaches or thinks the contrary concerning Scripture is not a Catholic; we say to him, Anathema, Maranatha. Therefore an injury, and indeed an extraordinary one, is inflicted upon us when we are accused of contemning Scripture, we who are prepared to pour out all our blood for its whole body and for each individual apex, as indeed we teach that it must be poured out. For it can happen that some Catholic experiences a spirit ready but flesh weak, desires to go to death and prison, but grows afraid at the voice of a maidservant and denies the Lord in his word. There is therefore no cause why they should depart from us in this respect, much less traduce us as violators of sacred Scripture and make two states from one.

Nor is this my judgment alone, but that of the whole Catholic world. The Council of Trent, session 5, chapter 1, seriously commands the prelates to take care that Scripture is diligently expounded, and affirms that this was cared for by synods and pontiffs. “The same sacred and holy synod, adhering to and embracing the pious constitutions of the supreme pontiffs and approved councils, and adding to them, lest that heavenly treasure of the sacred books which the Holy Spirit delivered to human beings with the greatest liberality should lie neglected, has established and decreed,” and so forth--namely, that it be expounded in cathedral churches, monasteries, convents of regulars, and public academies. Nor was this done for the first time then; examples of synods and supreme pontiffs preceded it.

And certainly there are many testimonies that Pope Leo held Scripture in the highest esteem, especially his constitution given at the Lateran Council in 1516, on the fourteenth day before the Kalends of January, where he not only cites Scripture and esteems it greatly, but also establishes excellent laws for its interpreters. Therefore what is invented about his having spoken into the ears of Bembo and Sadoleto was drawn from the same quiver from which myriads of calumnies came forth.

§ 3. We therefore follow Scripture as law, nor do we judge that it has been shown for a century that we have departed from its smallest particle. The sole reason, therefore, why the innovators departed from us is that they themselves utterly contemn the Scriptures which they cite and hurl about to the overturning of stomach and brain. I have already shown frequently that the matter stands thus. Weigh the matter: you will understand that they depart from the law of God.

For first, if among so many hundreds of those who departed from the Church there is one who rightly followed Scripture with an unerring footprint, let him be named, and I shall prove that the rest followed neither Scripture nor the Spirit of God, but their own sense, and set it before the truth of Scripture.

Second, when their leaders are pressed by Scripture, they turn to accusing it. When Vorstius had said that there were certain errors in Scripture, he defended his cause against the eternal truth of God by the authority of Calvin and Junius. I cited the passage elsewhere, but no one has answered me hitherto, and even now the importunity of the calumniators compels me to set forth the same things. “Finally, that especially is objected concerning the apostles and other writers of the New Testament: that they are said to have been able to err in slight matters or suffer a lapse of memory, and so forth. But does Calvin not have the same or similar things, when he writes not obscurely that the same writers of the New Testament sometimes hand down certain superfluous things, omit other things of great importance, disturb the order of time in a history, or cite certain things from the Old Testament less suitably, and so forth? In place of many examples let there be that one passage on 1 John 2:14, where he expressly says that those repetitions of the Apostle are superfluous, namely in these words, ‘I write to you, children,’ and so forth.

“But, to omit Calvin here, what seems to be the case concerning Francis Junius, who in his Commonplaces, recently printed here, book 1, chapter 19, does not fear to affirm that the writers of the New Testament sometimes knowingly and deliberately wrote certain things contrary to the truth of history? For he writes openly thus on pages 61 and 62: that they sometimes conceded something out of charity to a received error and, on account of public opinion, deviated from the truth of history, and even inserted certain things contrary to truth into the sacred text, and so forth. He confirms this by the particular example of Saint Luke, who, contrary to the truth of Mosaic history, placed the name Cainan in the genealogy of Christ, evidently so as not to offend those who had grown accustomed to the Greek version of the Old Testament, in which that name stood, and so forth.

“But if this assertion of Francis Junius can be excused--concerning which I now do not wish to deliver my opinion--why could not at least another similar hesitation or concession be excused? Certainly it is more serious knowingly and deliberately to write something contrary to the truth of history than to admit a σφάλμα μνημονικόν, a lapse of memory, in a slight matter. And again, it is something greater to assert the former certainly concerning someone than to grant the latter to an adversary by way of concession. But let these things now suffice. More examples of this kind from our doctors can be brought forward on another occasion, when there is need, at least so that it may appear that those suffer from great partiality who liberally excuse the same or similar sayings in one person which in another they traduce as heretical and impious.”

Calvin certainly, on Joshua 24:32, accuses Stephen in Acts 7:15 as if he had named Abraham for Jacob; nevertheless, among them the error indicated by Calvin remains. And in the Harmony on Matthew 20:26 he denies that the saying “Many are called, few are chosen” fits or is relevant; but it was Christ’s saying. If, therefore, one error is admitted into Scripture, all its credibility totters, for lying Scripture is not believed, and thus the foundation of all laws is weakened.

§ 4. Luther is no gentler in this respect; for he opposes Scripture to God, on Galatians 3, volume 5, folio 345: "I would prefer to hold in honor and believe Christ alone rather than be moved by all the passages which they could produce against the doctrine of faith for establishing the justice of works. Therefore one must answer them simply thus: here is Christ; there are the testimonies of Scripture concerning law and works. But Christ is Lord of Scripture and of all works." And a little later: "I pay no heed to passages of Scripture, even if you produce six hundred for the justice of works against the justice of faith and cry out that Scripture is fighting against me. I possess the author and Lord of Scripture, on whose side I prefer to stand rather than believe you." And after a few intervening words: "You urge the servant--that is, Scripture--and not the whole of it or its better part, but only some passages concerning works. I leave this servant to you. I urge the Lord, who is king of Scripture."

If, therefore, they object to errors in Scripture, how do they object to us contempt for it? These things were derived from the most impure fountains of the Ebionites, Cerdonians, Gnostics, Marcionites, Tatianists, Severians, Elcesaites, Manichaeans, Bogomils, and Albigensians, and flowed into the most poisonous lake of the Antinomians and Libertines as into a sewer. They labor to make the world lawless.

§ 5. Third, they held the worst opinions concerning those who left the sacred writings to us and who are commended in them. Scripture depicts Abraham for us as the father of the faithful, justified by faith and pleasing to God; Calvin charges both him and his wife Sarah, contrary to the divine oracles, as guilty of the gravest crimes. In his commentary on Genesis 16:3, he accuses Abraham of excessive facility and Sarah of haste. He says that Abraham's faith was shaken and that there was a middle pretext between fornication and marriage, cloaked with an honorable name. He says that they sinned in the manner or rationale of acting, not in substance, because they sought offspring outside God's legitimate ordinance. But that manner altogether removed the substance of faith. For, if we believe Calvin, they sought the blessing through adulteries and procuring; for he affirms that Abraham acted thus lest he be deprived of the blessing. But it is certainly shameful to commit adultery in order to obtain a blessing. Concerning Sarah he says: "Since she knew that in the seed of Abraham there were to be blessed all nations, it is not wonderful if she was unwilling to be deprived of the honor of partnership, lest, cut away from the blessed body like a putrid member, she also be made a stranger to the promised salvation." If these things are true, Sarah and Abraham were unbelievers. For to believe that she would be cut away from the blessed body unless she established a brothel in her own house, or that she would be a stranger to salvation unless she were her husband's procuress and the one who brought forward her maidservant, is to be an unbeliever. Nor is he gentler toward Moses on Exodus 2:12 and 4:10 and Deuteronomy 34:10. He says that Moses contemned divine obedience, wished as it were to compel God to break off the work, and possessed a mind forgetful of all things. He treats David, Elijah, Daniel, and others in the same manner. Therefore it is not we who contemn Scripture and its authors, but those who accuse us of that matter. They therefore affirm that the divine law was most shamefully violated by the prophets.

§ 6. Nor is the accusation just, nor is there a legitimate cause for departing from us because we number among the sacred books Judith, Tobit, the Book of Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, chapters 13 and 14 of Daniel, the Song of the Three Boys added to Daniel 3, the books of Maccabees, and the things which follow Esther 3:10. The first reason is manifest. Neither the Lutherans nor the Calvinists condemn their patriarchs because they removed from the canon certain books which they now judge true and legitimate books of Scripture. Therefore they ought not to be more inequitable toward us, even if contrary to their opinion we admit certain books into the canon.

Luther in the prologue to this Epistle, Brenz in the Wittenberg Confession, Chemnitz in the examination of session 4 of the Council of Trent, and the Magdeburg writers in chapter 1 reject the Epistle of James; yet the Calvinists do not flee the Lutherans on that account. They also reject the Epistle of Jude, doubt concerning 2 Peter and 3 John, and Luther and the leading Calvinists expunged the Apocalypse from the canon. Graser, in the hypothesis of the royal plague, acknowledges that because of its difficulty the Apocalypse was not received by his teachers. Later Calvinists received it; therefore it will be possible that at some time they will also receive into the canon these books which they now refuse to bear.

If, therefore, Zwingli and others diminished the Apocalypse at its head without crime and this is forgiven them by their successors, they ought not to be such inequitable judges toward us as to interpret our facility so gravely because we admit the books which the ancient Church judged canonical. The second reason is even more evident: we possess great cause to receive those books into the canon, or, to speak more properly, not rashly to expunge those received long ago. For although certain persons formerly doubted, nevertheless most admitted them; those who received them into the canon were both more numerous and more learned. Bellarmine proves this in book 1, chapters 7 and following of On the Word, as does Nicholas Serarius in the prefaces to the commentaries which he wrote upon most of those books.

The authority of Beza adds force to this argument among his own people. For after, against Erasmus and his own teachers, he had restored the Apocalypse to the canon, he answers thus to the argument of those who said that it did not appear to the most learned to be a canonical book because in it there was nothing of apostolic gravity: "Whoever at last those most learned men were, they deserve great reproach because they dared to assail with abuse a book which would certainly be very short if one removed from it the things transcribed word for word from the prophets. Basil, Gregory, Cyril, Epiphanius, Irenaeus, and Hippolytus, as Arethas testifies, acted far otherwise. They not only thought this book written by a holy man, as Dionysius of Alexandria did, but also openly claimed it for John the Apostle. They certainly would never have done this if they had observed no traces of apostolic gravity in it. Which shall we hold as the more learned: those whose singular piety and highest erudition are attested by very many monuments of their own, or rather those whose very names do not appear, while their arguments sufficiently indicate how deservedly they are called most learned?"

He speaks well indeed, but there are many more: Dionysius the Areopagite, Justin, Tertullian, Hilary, Athanasius, Origen, Cyprian, Damasus, Ambrose, Eusebius, Chrysostom, Jerome--who himself also thinks thus in the letter to Dardanus and affirms that this is the opinion of all the Latins--Augustine, Isidore, Gelasius, Innocent, Theophilus of Antioch in Eusebius, book 4, chapter 23, Apollonius in the same author, book 5, chapter 17, and Pamphilus. Next there are the Councils of Florence, Rome under Gelasius, Trent, Ancyra, Third Carthage, Fourth Toledo, and Second Nicaea. If we use for the books which we receive an argument similar to the one Beza uses against his own people in favor of the Apocalypse, I do not see why on that account we should be condemned as impious toward Scripture, when the ancient Church is under the same condemnation. Beza wishes thus concerning Erasmus: "And would that he had preferred to profit under these teachers rather than, relying upon confidence in himself, to make a name for himself."

If Beza himself had followed this, he would neither have fallen into so many heresies nor now be opposed by all the Lutherans and the more moderate Calvinists. Now, if I cannot obtain peace or bring the adversaries to agree with antiquity, I demand only latitude and moderation: let them not calumniate us as betrayers of the divine utterances because, with so many and such firm arguments and with the consensus of the most learned and holy, we defend the canon. In that for which we deserve praise, let them grant pardon. Luther rejected many books--the Epistles of James and Jude and the Apocalypse--yet the Lutherans worship him. After he had very frequently asserted that he knew more certainly than certainty itself that the word of God stood on his side and that his doctrine was the doctrine of Christ, he denied the word of God, for he erased part of it from the canon. What do the Lutherans do here? They were ashamed of the error of Luther, Brenz, and Chemnitz, for in certain books they rubbed out those statements of Luther concerning the Apocalypse. Therefore Hunnius denies that he found any such thing in Luther. But our Gretser showed it to him, for the Nuremberg Bible of the year of the Lord 1527 has those words in its preface. I beseech you, do not employ such open προσωπολημψία, partiality, that you first corrupt the writings of Luther rejecting the Apocalypse, then veil his error with a lie and deny that he wrote what you yourselves deleted from him, while you devote us to every curse because with the ancient Church, councils, and Fathers we retain certain books which displease you. Behold, it is still in question who keep the law.

§ 7. But if we weigh your arguments in the balance, we shall find them lighter than a feather. In this year 1618 John Sharp published at Geneva a theological course. His companions, in order to make him insane instead of foolish, call him Hercules returned to life. Gathering his errors into a bundle, he attacks the truth thus on page 11:

"All the canonical books of the Old Testament were written by prophets. But none of these books was written by a prophet. Therefore they are not canonical books." The proposition is proved from

2 Peter 1:19--21; Romans 1:2 and 16:26; Luke 1:70, 16:30, and 4:27; Ephesians 2:20; Hebrews 11; and the same can be proved by induction. But the assumption is confirmed by three arguments:

"1. By the confession of all the Jews, Malachi was the last prophet. Between him and John the Baptist no prophet intervened. But these books were written after Malachi, as is evident from the books of Ecclesiasticus and Maccabees. Therefore they were not written by a prophet.

"2. All books composed by prophets were written in the language which the prophets used--that is, Hebrew or Chaldean, then the vernacular and common language. But these books were written not in it, but in a foreign and unknown language, as the Fathers affirm, the matter itself proves, and the pontificians concede for the greatest part. Therefore, and so forth.

"3. If these books had been written by prophets, then Christ and the apostles would have used them as witnesses of their doctrine--for all prophetic Scriptures testify concerning Christ, and Christ and the apostles used them. But neither Christ nor the apostles used the testimony of these books. Therefore they were not written by prophets.

"II. The Church receives all the canonical books of the Old Testament. But it does not receive these books. Therefore they are not canonical. The proposition is proved: if that Church had rejected some part of canonical Scripture, it would have been guilty of the greatest crime in this, and Christ and the apostles would have reproved it under this name. For if Christ reproved them in Matthew 5 because they interpreted the Scriptures badly, he would have reproved them much more if they had rejected part of Scripture as noncanonical. But he did not reprove them for this cause. Next, in Romans 3:2 they are called τὰ λόγια τοῦ θεοῦ, that is, the sacred Scriptures entrusted to the Jews. But Justin, Address to the Greeks; Augustine, book 1 of On the Harmony of the Evangelists and Letters 3 and 59, testify that the Jews diligently preserved the entire ancient canon. Finally, if the books were then canonical and were not received by the ancient Church, it follows that many canonical books were not received by the whole Church. But it is most absurd that the whole Church--in which were prophets and priests and afterward Christ himself and the apostles--rejected the will of God. Therefore. The assumption is proved by the consensus of all the Fathers and even of the pontificians themselves, and it will appear afterward. Therefore.

"III. A book is known to be canonical in only two ways: 1. By the testimony of some prophet or apostle. 2. Or by the testimony of those who lived at the time when that book was published, to whom it could be certainly established whether it was published by a prophet or apostle or not. But by neither of these ways do we know that the disputed books are canonical. Not by the first, because there are now no prophets or apostles. Not by the other, because so far is anyone from being able to testify that a prophet or apostle published or received these books that not even in the time of Jerome, by his own testimony, were they received into the canon. But if the apostles had received and acknowledged these books, as Bellarmine wishes in book 1, chapter 10 of On the Word of God, the ancients would have used the testimony of these books as they did the others. But they did not use them; therefore these books are not to be acknowledged as canonical."

§ 8. Let us therefore examine these arguments by which the greater part of the Christian world is condemned. I do not labor greatly over the major premise; it is certain that the name "prophet" is not accepted in the same manner. Let us examine the proof of the minor, for it truly contains many errors and much ignorance--but bold ignorance, which opposes itself to the word of God and casts out the law of God.

Malachi was almost contemporary with Haggai and Zechariah, who prophesied about the twentieth year according to a probable chronology. Malachi followed them after a short interval. Sharp denies that there was a prophet throughout that entire period of more than four hundred years, until John.

Yet this conflicts with the Gospel, for Zechariah, the father of the Baptist, was a prophet, Luke 1:67; as was the elder Simeon, Luke 2:27; and in verse 36 Anna the prophetess, daughter of Phanuel, who was already at least eighty years old. Next, during the time of the Maccabees, when there were so many distinguished martyrs, who would doubt that there were also prophets? For although there was no ordinary office at the time when Judas died, 1 Maccabees 9:27, nevertheless afterward prophets were not lacking, who, just as they prophesied, could also write books. Nor is it an obstacle that they appointed Simon leader until a faithful prophet should arise, 1 Maccabees 14:41 and book 1, chapter 4:46. They awaited a prophet, but the one whom Moses foretold in Deuteronomy 18: "The Lord will raise up a prophet from your nation, like me." Since, therefore, there were prophets who expounded the law, exhorted to martyrdoms, and consoled persons in the bitterest persecution, there were also prophets suitable for writing books. For why could God not give infallible authority to them also?

For although those who foretell future things are prophets in the most proper sense, prophecy is nevertheless also properly attributed to others who reveal hidden things. Thus the Samaritan woman, because Christ had disclosed to her the deeds of her own life, calls him a prophet; and this is a very customary account of prophecy in the Scriptures.

Second, workers of miracles are also accustomed to be reckoned under the name of prophets, for almost all the prophets were distinguished by miracles: Moses, Aaron, Joshua, Elijah, Elisha, and others. For the divinity procured authority for his servants through wonderful works; accordingly, since those who performed miracles were also endowed with the spirit of prophecy, it came to pass that τὸ θαυματουργεῖν, working miracles, was called "to prophesy." Thus Ecclesiasticus 48:14: "Elijah's body prophesied." Καὶ ἐν κοιμήσει ἐπροφήτευσε τὸ σῶμα αὐτοῦ. And chapter 49:18, concerning Joseph: "And his bones were visited, and after death they prophesied," although that latter part is lacking in most Greek copies.

Saint Jerome on 1 Corinthians 14: "Prophets are those who explain the obscure things of the prophets and who exhort human beings, as he says elsewhere: 'For he who prophesies speaks to human beings for edification, exhortation, and consolations.'"

Third, they extend the word "prophesying" even more broadly, so that those are said to prophesy who, by admonishing, reproving, teaching, and consoling, call persons away from vices, lead them to the pursuit of virtue, interpret the Scriptures, and expound questions of Christian doctrine. For this was the office of the prophets, by performing which they are intermediaries of the divine will. Thus in Exodus 4 and 7 Aaron is the prophet of Moses; thus in 1 Corinthians 14:5 the Apostle admonishes Christians to take greater care that they prophesy.

Fourth, those who, inspired by the Holy Spirit, sing psalms to God are sometimes called prophets. In 1 Chronicles 25:1--3 they are said to prophesy with lyres, psalteries, and cymbals; to prophesy with a lyre while standing above and praising the Lord. Although in verse 1 the Seventy read ἀποφθεγγομένους, "those uttering forth," for nebî'îm, nevertheless in verse 3 they use the verb προφητεύεσθαι. Some wish this to mean "to sing prophecies"; but they sang the psalms which we possess. Now this is rightly called prophesying. In this signification they accept 1 Kings 10:7, where there is a band of prophets and Saul among the prophets. This signifies not singing God's praises in any manner whatsoever, but by a singular impulse; for it is not to be denied that many were accustomed to sing God's praises concerning whom there was nevertheless no such wonder, nor is it to be denied that many were accustomed to sing God's praises concerning whom there was nevertheless no such wonder, nor is it to be denied that among these were some who were called prophets properly and in the first manner.

Fifth, “to prophesy” is taken in a bad sense, so that it is the same as to be agitated by a fanatical spirit in the manner of demoniacs. Thus 1 Kings 18:10: “But on the following day an evil spirit of the Lord invaded Saul, and he prophesied in the midst of his house.” For because the seers of the gentiles, with foaming mouth and savage heart, agitated by madness, drove the nations mad with tortuous oracles, it came to pass that for them to rage was to prophesy, when the seers reveled in the cave. For in a most dissimilar thing there is a certain similarity: just as the holy prophets were driven by a good spirit so that their deeds and sayings were composed according to his will, so the false prophets were dreadfully agitated by an evil spirit so that they did all their things at the spirits’ command. Thus Scripture calls the unformed cries, gestures, leaps, incisions, and little wounds made by the prophets of Baal--the whole action of their impious ceremonies--“to prophesy,” 3 Kings 18:29: “But after midday had passed, and while they were prophesying, the time came at which the sacrifice is customarily offered.” Nor is this wonderful or new, since the name “prophet” is frequently attributed to false prophets and impostors, as in Jeremiah 6:13; 26:7, 8, and 11; 27:7; 28:1; and 29:1; Zechariah 13:2; Ezekiel 22:25, in which place the Seventy rendered ἀφηγούμενοι, “leaders,” whereas in the previously cited passages they rendered ψευδοπροφῆται, “false prophets.” We treat of prophets properly so called and deny that there was none during so great an interval.

To the second argument I answer: first, that certain of those books were written by prophets in the Hebrew or Chaldean language. Let Nicholas Serarius be heard concerning this matter, prologue 3 on Tobit: “In Letter 100, which is to the bishops Chromatius and Heliodorus, Saint Jerome relates that this book was written in the Chaldean language. There exists today a Greek version of the same book and two Hebrew versions, one of which, received from Constantinopolitans, this Germany of ours published more than forty years ago. Thus I greatly wonder what ignorance or impudence entered that Briton, enemy of the most learned Bellarmine--or rather of Catholic doctrine--the Calvinist Whitaker, when within this very decade he wrote, ‘Tobit is read only in Greek and Latin.’ For this is condemned as false even by other heretics themselves: Fagius, Münster, Vatablus--or rather Bedwell--of the Geneva edition, and Drusius. Indeed, a Syriac version is also found in certain libraries, as the most learned Andreas Masius relates concerning his own library in the dedicatory letter on Joshua to King Philip.”

Jerome himself translated Judith from Chaldean, as Letter 3 testifies. Mordecai was the primary author of Esther. Concerning Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, and Maccabees, I judge that the first two were written in Hebrew and afterward translated into Greek; they certainly could have existed in the time of the prophets. The author of Maccabees, as it seems to me, wrote in the vernacular language--that is, Greek--in which most Jews living in the kingdom of the Greeks were skilled. For we readily gather that more Jews were ignorant of Hebrew than of Greek from the fact that they changed their ancestral Hebrew into Syriac, and next from the fact that Josephus, learned among the Jews, was ignorant of that language. Finally, there were colonies of Jews throughout all Asia and Greece; therefore the Greek language was not unknown to the Jews after the Maccabean wars. Otherwise, by that argument the entire New Covenant would be overturned, for it is certain that it was written in Greek. But the Hebrew language was no less foreign while a Latin prince ruled than while a Greek prince ruled. Certainly it is established that the Greek language was commonly known everywhere even to the Jerusalemites, both from many other things and from the fact that Acts 22:2 says: “But when they heard that he was speaking to them in the Hebrew language, they kept the greater silence.” They therefore thought that he would deliver his address in Greek. Both they would have awaited this in vain after making silence and Paul would have attempted it in vain, unless the raging crowd had also understood Greek.

The third proof can stir up disturbances and overturn many other books. For Christ and the apostles did not use the authority of all the books of the Old Testament. They did not mention Obadiah and Zephaniah, while from others only a few things occur here and there in their writings, so that, if we rest upon this argument, we must erase two prophets from the canon. Behold with what arguments ancient truth is attacked by the Jubilarian Hercules.

Sharp’s second argument is much weaker, column 12: “The ancient Church of the Old Testament did not receive these books and nevertheless was not reproved by the apostles, although rejecting any part of canonical Scripture is the greatest crime. Finally, the whole Church would not have received all the canonical books, which is most absurd.”

I answer that what he pronounces concerning the Church applies to the Lutheran and Calvinist church. By Sharp's testimony, the Lutheran church is guilty of the greatest crime because it rejects part of canonical Scripture, and the first Zwinglian church is guilty of no lesser crime, since it exterminated the Apocalypse. As concerns the ancient Church: although they were not in the first canon of the Hebrews, nevertheless the Church of Christ receives them, as Saint Isidore and Augustine, book 18, chapter 26 of The City of God, admonish. They were not in the first canon of the Jews; they were relegated to the second and were not accepted by everyone; afterward, nevertheless, they were judged canonical by the Christian Church. For it can happen that a book is doubtful for some time and is afterward held as canonical, as was said concerning the Apocalypse in the Calvinist assembly.

The third argument: it is established neither by the testimony of an apostle or prophet nor by that of anyone who lived at the time when they were written that they are canonical; therefore they are in no manner canonical.

I answer that we possess testimonies of Hebrews who had them in the second canon. The first canon was made in Ezra's time; they could not be in it because they were later. They were afterward in the other, as it is permissible to gather from Josephus, book 2 of Against Apion. For he cites those words of Ecclesiasticus 42:14, κρείσσων πονηρία ἀνδρὸς, ἢ ἀγαθοποιὸς γυνή--"Better is the wickedness of a man than a woman who does good"--in this manner: γυνὴ δὲ χείρων, φησὶν, ἀνδρός, εἰς τὰ πάντα, καὶ ἡ πονηρία αὐτῆς ὑπὲρ ἀγαθοποιὸν γυναικός--"A woman, he says, is worse than a man in all things, and her wickedness surpasses the good-doing of a woman." But the book from which he cites these things he calls νόμον, law, so that it plainly appears that he refers Ecclesiasticus to the law. Junilius Firmus says that the books of Maccabees possessed the same authority among the Jews as Chronicles, Job, and Ezra; why, therefore, should they not hold the same place among us? But if testimony is needed, what sort do you possess concerning the Apocalypse? You will say that you possess many, but not those of everyone; we too affirm the same concerning these books. Concerning the difficulties which they object from individual parts, I refrain from answering, because they have been explained sufficiently and more than sufficiently by the interpreters, and otherwise all books could be attacked by the same reasoning.

§ 9. "In only TWO ways," says Sharp, "is a book known to be canonical: first, by the testimony of some prophet or apostle; second, by the testimony of those who lived at the time when it was published, to whom it could be established whether it was published by a prophet or apostle or not." He denies that it can be known in the first manner, because there are now no prophets or apostles.

I deny that the Calvinists can know it in the second manner, because the testimony of any other person whatsoever, although he lived at that time, is human testimony, as they always boast; but faith cannot rest upon human testimony. For by this argument they attack the authority of the Church. If they truly do so, they no longer possess any Scripture which they believe, for there is now no apostle or prophet, as the British Alcides, Sharp, acknowledges, and the testimony of all others, even of the whole Church, is fallible and uncertain. By arguing thus, therefore, they bring it about that while they praise Scripture, they at the same time abolish it.

CHAPTER XXIV

We Are Unjustly Accused of a Corrupt Version and Interpretation of the Divine Law

§ 1. A manifold dispute is raised against us in this place: our version is rejected, our interpretation is attacked, and liberty of prophesying--that is, of interpreting--is sought. To this pertain conflicting versions, vernacular readings, the interpretations of the unlearned, the easiness of Scripture, and adulterations of divine law and right.

The accusations are various and come from various persons. John Gisenius, in The Remembrance of the Reformation, thesis 14: "The authentic edition in the Old Testament is the Hebrew, and in the New the Greek"; and thesis 18: "Scripture is clear, perspicuous, and manifest in the doctrines which it is necessary to know for salvation." So also thesis 22; and thesis 20: "The interpretation of Scripture is not to be brought in from elsewhere, but must be derived from Scripture itself." Yet John Salmuth claims for himself the palm of malicious speaking in this part, page 10 and the following pages. He says that the book of the law was as it were lost, partly through contempt, partly through corruption, and partly through burning; that a bad Latin version of the Bible was preferred to the Hebrew and Greek; that the Bible is doubtful, has no certain meaning that can be had from it, and is called the book of heretics, the mother of all heresies, a dead letter, a waxen nose, a Lesbian rule; that the Pope is said to have greater authority than the Sacred Writings; that the decrees of the Pontiffs are preferred to Scripture in many ways; that in sermons Saint Thomas and others were cited more frequently than Scripture, and that Scripture was rarely explained; that Paul's Epistles were held to be fables; and that power to act contrary to them is asserted for the Pontiff. Balthasar Meisner of Wittenberg calls the festival of their jubilees the festival of the Bibles' discovery. Wolfgang Franz, in his sermon, approves Luther's hyperbolical calumny, in which Luther writes to Johann Sylvius that there was no preacher of his time who could expound even a single chapter of Scripture, and he asserted this under oath. The same Meisner, in his sermon for the second day, says that Scripture is called by us the black Gospel, ink theology, and the express word of the devil unless it is understood according to the meaning of the Church.

Indeed, Pareus formerly imposed the same things upon us in the prologue to Hosea 3, question 1, page 13, and now repeats them in his thesis. Erhard Lauterbach does the same in his preparatory sermon and in the second sermon, in which he says that there had been no public preaching, but only preaching in the hearts of the pious. But Catholics judge most rightly in this matter, sectarians most badly. I explain the matter in the following propositions.

First proposition. It is not enough to acknowledge the authority of Scripture; it is also necessary to possess a certain and known exemplar which is authentic. Otherwise it will have no authority among the ignorant. For no one doubts that the word of God is of the highest truth and the highest authority, but one must know that this very thing is the word of God--a true and authentic exemplar. This is beyond controversy.

Proposition 2. The authentic exemplar of the divine law was deposited in the ark; from it various exemplars were copied. Then, as the number of sacred books increased, the prophets' autograph exemplars were without doubt preserved publicly, and many copies were made; these, however, I do not think were placed in the ark.

Proposition 3. Some think that the Bible wholly perished in the war of Nebuchadnezzar; Bellarmine, book 2, chapter 1 of On the Word of God, and Serarius, prolegomena, chapter 12, question 1, refute them well. Ezra therefore established the order and perhaps, admonished by the Spirit of God, added certain small portions on account of chronology, such as those concerning the death of Joshua and of Samuel. Nor do we dispute concerning this controversy. This alone must be noted: Ezra changed the ancient characters of the Jews into Chaldean ones, for ancient shekels exhibit different characters.

Proposition 4. The Old Testament, if one excepts a few things in Chaldean, was written in Hebrew, and certain things in Greek; the New Testament was written in Greek, although others contend that Matthew's Gospel and certain other things were written in Hebrew. But however that matter may stand, the Hebrew editions now in circulation do not possess authority.

Proposition 5. The ancient Hebrew text was not wholly corrupted by the malice or negligence of the Jews--neither before Christ's advent nor afterward. Not before it, because there was no cause, and they were not accused of that matter by Christ or the apostles. Next, since they were variously dispersed, they could not agree upon one error. Third, Christ himself refers the Jews to the Scriptures, cites them, and explains them: John 5:39; Luke 4:17; Matthew 2:47.

Saint Jerome indeed says in his letter to Augustine that he translated the Bible in order that he might bring forth those testimonies which had been omitted or corrupted by the Jews. But he means the Jewish translators who translated it into Greek: Aquila and Symmachus.

Proposition 6. Nothing has been maliciously changed by the Jews during the last one thousand one hundred years; for the Masoretes counted all the verses, words, and letters, so that none could be removed. Rabbi Saadia counted them thus:

Aleph 42,377 Beth 38,218 Gimel is found 29,537 Daleth 32,530 He 47,554 Vau 76,922 Zain 22,867 Chet 23,447 Tet 11,052 Iod 66,420 Caph 48,253

Lamed 41,517 Mem 77,778 Nun is found 41,696 Samec 13,580 Ain 20,175 Phe 22,725 Tsade 21,822 Koph 22,972 Resch 22,148 Schin 32,148 Tau 59,343 Total 8,211,081.

Proposition 6. In Jerome's time the Hebrew text had not been maliciously corrupted. Thus he says on Isaiah 6: "If some say that after the advent of the Lord and Savior and the preaching of the apostles the Hebrew books were falsified, I shall not be able to restrain my laughter: as though the Savior and the apostles had brought forth testimonies in such a way as the Jews were afterward going to falsify them."

Proposition 7. Nevertheless, afterward they changed certain things in those exemplars in which they were able to do so. Examples are found in Bellarmine, book 2, chapter 2 of On the Word of God, and in Serarius, chapter 12, question 2. Broughton on Daniel 9, page 45; Hunnius against Bellarmine, book 2, chapter 2; and Junius on Psalm 22, chapter 2, book 2, confess the same. Nothing is more tasteless than this reading which the Jews now defend, οὐδὲν ὑγιές, nothing sound; scarcely a word is complete, nor is there sense. Let Serarius be read in the place cited.

Proposition 8. Therefore, as Serarius rightly teaches in question 12, chapter 2, proposition 7, the Hebrew text which is commonly seen in present-day exemplars, if it is considered mathematically or physically, must be said to be corrupted absolutely; morally, however, it must be said to be corrupted not wholly but in a certain respect: namely, with respect not to all exemplars but to certain ones, or with respect only to certain passages. The former part is evident because, both from the human weakness of either carelessness or someone's lack of skill, it contains certain errors, and from the wickedness of the Jews it contains some corruptions, as was shown. Now, when the integrity and due perfection of any whole is in question, that is certainly said to be absent both mathematically and physically if even one part is missing or is distorted and corrupted. The latter part is proved because, morally, that author or text does not seem to be wholly corrupted and lost which either is sincere and complete in certain exemplars, or whose true and genuine reading is noted in other books and preserved by the memory and judgment of the learned.

From this, therefore, it is apparent that the source which they boast to be most pure is not so--not only because through the negligence of scribes and human weakness it happened that errors occurred, but because malice revealed itself here and there.

Proposition 9. Bibles as they are now generally published, with vowel points, are not authentic exemplars, for since the points themselves did not exist at the beginning but were added afterward, they are not part of sacred Scripture. Most authors teach this, and Nicholas Serarius does so most learnedly in the prolegomena to the Bible, chapter 3, question 5. Münster says that they were invented at Tiberias, the one in Paphlagonia. But Serarius reports more correctly that it was done at Tiberias in Palestine, about the five-hundredth year of the Lord; even the innovators agree with him. Zwingli, in his preface to the Explanation upon Isaiah, says: "The letters of the Hebrews lacked vowel signs, which their Rabbis, with little civility, both devised and foisted in. This is gathered not only from the fact that Saint Jerome made no mention at all of them, but also from the fact that their most ancient codices, although they now possess those signs, nevertheless did not once possess them, as is detected both from the difference of the ink and from their position." And a little afterward: "Therefore the reading of this kind was established by usage." His disciple Pellican says: "Great men think that the Hebrews formerly lacked the signs of vowels and diphthongs; and one may even now find authentic books of the Jews, of venerable antiquity, written with the characters of consonants alone, not of vowels." The Wittenberg and Tübingen defenders of Lutheran theology, in their book against Scherer, say: "At the beginning the Bible did not possess vowel points." And a little afterward: "If at the time when the Latin translation which we use was made the Bible had possessed points, the Latin translator could not have changed anything among the vowels. And therefore the points ought not to occasion any difficulty for anyone when true knowledge is sought in the books of the Old Testament."

The innovators, therefore, cannot appeal to pointed Bibles as authentic, since the points are the work of treacherous Jews. From these things I conclude thus: since the Hebrew text has been corrupted in certain things by human weakness, negligence, and wickedness; since half of it as it is read today does not pertain to the text but is an addition--namely, all the vowel points--one ought not to appeal to it as the purest and most inviolate source, nor to correct all other versions from it.

Proposition 10. Our Latin version is sincere and learned, partly from Saint Jerome as translator and partly from him as corrector. For all confess that he was most learned in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages; Luther alone, in Table Talk, chapter 69, denies what the world concedes: Wer Hieronymum für einen Hebreer schildt / der thut ihm gewalt und unrecht. "He who calls Jerome a Hebraist does him an injustice." But Luther is not a competent witness in so great a matter, since in the same table conversations he admits himself ignorant of the Hebrew and Greek language: Ich kan weder Griechisch noch Hebräisch; and then: Ich bin kein Hebreer nach der Grammatica, dan ich lass mich nicht anbinden / sondern ich gehe frey hindurch. "I know neither Greek nor Hebrew," and so forth. "I am not a Hebraist according to grammar, for I do not allow myself to be bound, but pass through freely." Cochlaeus much more correctly reports concerning Rabbi Elijah: "While I was staying at Rome and employed Elijah the German as my teacher in such rudiments of Hebrew as I possessed, he told me that if someone were to give him payment for his labor, he wished, with my assistance--for he himself was ignorant of the Latin language--to defend Jerome's interpretation--which, as I read, I compared with his German interpretation from the Hebrew--against all its assailants, whether they were Jews or Christians, from the Hebrew in such a way that it could seem to be justly attacked by no one."

To the highest skill he added a diligence more than human, concerning which he himself testifies and appeals to all persons skilled in the Hebrew language: the letter to Sophronius; book 2, letter 6 of the earlier Apology; Letter 65 to Pammachius; Letter 4 to Rusticus. Erasmus, in the preface to volume 4, describes him thus:

"In the best kind of theology," he says, "Saint Jerome holds the first place--I speak of the Latins--and so holds the first place that he leaves all others far behind him. Indeed, we possess no one whom we could in any way compare with him, so that even learned Greece itself, among so innumerable theologians, scarcely possesses anyone who may equal our Jerome, if only you weigh not merely some one excellence but all his endowments together. In one man you will find so great a knowledge of secular letters, as they call them, so great a knowledge of all antiquity, so complete a knowledge of so many languages, so admirable an acquaintance with all places and histories, so uncommon an erudition in the mystical volumes, so great an inimitable eloquence, so exact a judgment indeed, so sacred an ardor of a divinely inspired breast, so well-arranged and ready a memory of such diverse matters, so felicitous and rich a mixture, and finally a severity seasoned with so great a charm, that, just as men eloquent in themselves, if compared with Cicero, immediately seem to become mute, so all the Doctors whom we admire without comparison, when compared with Jerome, scarcely seem to know, scarcely to speak, scarcely to live." And David Chytraeus in the Onomasticon: "Jerome, pleasing in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin eloquence alike, an exemplar of morals and teacher of the world."

Proposition 11. It received authority from the time of Saint Gregory the Great, until thereafter, by the approval of the Doctors alone, it began to be in use. Hugh of Saint Victor, question 9: "The Church of Christ throughout the whole Latin world established that this version alone was to be read and held in authority." But this was not in use immediately from the time of Gregory.

Proposition 12. The Council of Trent approved this version, but wished its edition to be as emended as possible. And rightly so, for it is most ancient, is from the best author, is praised by many, and was approved by the Churches even of old.

Proposition 13. That at last I may repel so many calumnies in one word, I freely affirm that our Latin version is approved in such a way that nevertheless their own authority remains to the Greek and Hebrew sources. Reader, accept the opinion of Nicholas Serarius, my teacher, which is in the prolegomena, chapter 9, questions 11 and 12, and is worthy of being read in more than one codex.

How Great an Authority Was Attributed by the Council of Trent to Our Vulgate Version

The quantity or greatness of the authority which is attributed by the Synod of Trent to our Vulgate edition can be considered in two ways: 1. Absolutely. 2. Comparatively. For that phrase in the preamble of the decree, "from all the Latin editions," signifies a comparison. And because the innovators press and demand this very strongly, it will be treated in the following little questions; for now, only the authority acquired for our edition without comparison will be treated.

§ 2. The authority which in that decree is attributed to our edition is contained within the class of version alone. To understand this, it must first be noted that a writing can be authentic and its version not authentic. Second, a version can be authentic and the writing not authentic. Third, both the writing and the version can be authentic. An example of the first class is found in so many heretical versions of the Bible. For the Bible is authentic; those men's versions are not. An example of the second class would exist if someone faithfully translated a false letter, or a pseudepigraphical and mendacious book--for example, Origen's books περὶ ἀρχῶν, On First Principles; or some papers and doctrines of Calvin or Luther, so that they might be examined in a Council. An example of the third class is found in the Bible and in our version of it. I say, however, that although both the Bible and our version of it are authentic, nevertheless in this decree the authority only of the version itself is sanctioned. First, because both the aim and the words of the decree show this. Second, because the authority of all the biblical books and parts had already been sanctioned by the earlier decree concerning the canonical Scriptures.

§ 3. How this authority of our version is to be understood is customarily explained in two ways. First, without limit and without any restriction. Second, definitely and restrictively. In the former manner the heretics of whom question 10 treats appear to understand and assail this decree; certain Catholics also sometimes appear to intimate this, such as Suárez in part 3, volume 1, question 7, disputation 21, and the declarations concerning session 4 of the Council of Trent recently printed at Frankfurt in this very year 1603. Many Catholics understand it in the latter manner.

For first, Driedo, book 2, chapter 1, frequently--as on folios 33 and 35, but especially in conclusion 3, folio 24--says that this edition is declared authentic not in every manner, but only in this: that, diligently collated, examined, and tested against the Scriptures in their source, it contains nothing deceitfully added or altered.

Second, Cano, book 2, chapter 13, conclusion 1, says that this edition must be retained in all those matters which concern faith and morals.

Third, Andrés de Vega, book 15, chapter 9, says that this version is authentic in such a way that the faithful may know certainly that no pernicious error can be derived from it, and that it can be read safely and without danger. And afterward: "The Synod wished it to be held authentic to this extent: that it should be certain to all that it is defiled by no error from which any pernicious dogma in faith and morals could be gathered."

Fourth, Andradius, book 4, follows Driedo on folios 254--256 and Vega on folio 257.

Fifth, Sixtus of Siena, at the end of book 8, although conceding that errors and slight defects are found in the Vulgate edition, nevertheless wishes it to be authentic, "because it is certain," he says, "that neither in the old nor in the new edition has anything ever been found which departed from the truth of the Christian faith; was false and mendacious or contrary to orthodox dogmas and rules; was added beyond the truth, changed contrary to the truth, or omitted to the prejudice of the truth; was so corrupted that it furnished occasion for pernicious error; supplied matter and fuel for heresies and depraved dogmas; or was translated so obscurely and ambiguously that it concealed the mysteries of our faith or failed to explain them sufficiently and as much as is enough for salvation." And again a little afterward he says that those slight defects are indeed in the edition, but without any detriment to faith and morals.

Sixth, Bellarmine, book 2, chapter 11: "The Church wished to make us certain that, especially in matters which pertain to faith and morals, there are no errors of translators in this version."

Seventh, Bellarmine's own opponent, book 2, chapter 0, page 537, explains the authority of this edition in such a way that it everywhere attains the meaning of the Holy Spirit so far as doctrine and morals are concerned. There is a similar restriction on page 542: "so far as the dogmas of faith and morals are concerned"; and on page 565: "Did Saint Jerome err in those things which the Church approved as authentic and which pertain to dogmas of faith and morals?"

Eighth, Father John Sacrobosco, cited by the same author on page 541: "When we say that we possess Scripture authentic in the Latin language, we wish to say nothing other than that our translation is the true word of God, complete and incorrupt, from which Christ's flock may be taught and questions concerning faith and morals may be defined without fear."

Ninth, Alfonso Salmerón, prolegomenon 3, in question 2 concerning the Vulgate edition: "The Council of Trent leaves liberty to all who meditate more profoundly upon the Scriptures," and so forth, "yet not so that they may condemn it as falsely interpreted, especially in matters concerning faith or good morals, or as containing an intolerable error."

Two propositions.

I. The authority attributed by the Council of Trent to the Vulgate version must not be understood without limit, but definitely, with certain qualifications. This is evident:

1. Because the aim of the council and the cause of the decree are best preserved with qualifications of this kind.

2. Because so many and such competent authors think thus.

3. Because through just qualifications of this kind, as though by a certain bridle and bit, the unbridled and immoderate insolence and abusive speech of the heretics against this decree are restrained.

4. Because the grave and trustworthy theologian Andrés de Vega, cited in the place indicated, solemnly affirms that he frequently heard from the president of the council himself, the Cardinal of the Holy Cross, that the council's intention was that qualifications of this kind should be understood. He wrote this while that cardinal was still living and could be questioned about the whole matter. Indeed, this is the very man who afterward, in the year 1555, between sessions 16 and 17 of Trent, was called to be Supreme Pontiff Marcellus II.

5. Andradius recalls the same matter in book 4, folio 257: "That most learned man, Brother Andrés de Vega," he says, "who participated with the greatest praise in the Council of Trent under Paul III," is confirmed by many.

6. Vega proves the same matter not by authority alone but also by reason. He says that this was the mind of the Synod and that it wished to establish nothing further; you can gather this from the words themselves and from other customary approvals of the council.

7. The heretics cannot deny that it is just for sound qualifications to be employed in explaining this authority, because they either do the same regarding the authority of their own versions, or, whether they wish it or not, ought to do it. For:

1. Whitaker, controversy 1, question 2, chapter 8, says: "Although some of our interpretations differ in certain passages, nevertheless they do so neither in many nor dangerously." Behold a qualification and limitation in these last words.

2. They confess that they do not yet possess versions which are perfect and in which nothing ought to be changed. For this reason, first, they frequently alter and correct the versions they possess, as was stated in chapter 18, question 1, and as is apparent in Beza's version of the New Testament, in Letter 80, page 348, and in the Genevan correction and edition of the Bible in 1588. Second, for this reason the Dutch are still considering and preparing new versions, as John Drusius testifies in the preface to the book On the Tetragrammaton, the Name of God; and the English likewise do so, as Hugh Broughton often related to me. He had been invited and almost drawn to that work by the studies and letters of many persons and even by royal rewards, so that he had already applied his hand to both Testaments, but especially to the New, and had interpolated very many things, as I myself saw in the English Bible of the London edition of the Old Testament in 1578. And Robert Gentilis, in the year 1605, says in a prefatory little letter to John Howson, in his father's previously cited little book On the Latinity of the Old Version of the Bible Wrongly Accused: "You are now engaged with others, by the king's command, in preparing the English version"--in the year 1605.

Indeed, the pastors and professors of the Church of Geneva, as they call themselves, write in the preface to the previously mentioned Genevan correction: "Versions are perfected little by little, so that at last one may be possessed"--therefore one is not yet possessed among them--"which, if it is not altogether perfect, a thing rather to be wished than hoped for"--behold, they despair of a perfect translation--"may nevertheless be at least so pure that those who are not endowed with that knowledge by which they can hear the Lord speaking with his own mouth--that is, in the Hebrew and Greek language--in the prophets and apostles may be able to rest upon that version, or to establish and confirm themselves in it. Thus whatever should still appear to be lacking would be noted with great care by diligent pastors as they teach their flocks."

There is added the fact that, as was stated in chapter 11, question 2, these innovators do not think that the word of God is authentically contained in the versions themselves. It is therefore necessary, for the sake of all their own people, that they variously qualify and restrict the authority of the versions which they either read or set before the people to be read. Thus they cannot blame us when we attach sound explanations and qualifications to our version.

II. The qualifications with which the authority of our version must be understood are principally four. Of these, the first pertains to the subject of this assertion, "The Latin version is authentic"; the remaining three pertain to the predicate.

1. That this version be emended, or rather most emended.

2. That it contain nothing opposed to truth, faith, and good morals.

3. Likewise, that it contain nothing which may furnish anyone a just occasion for any harmful or useless opinion whatsoever.

4. That it be good within the very class of version--that is, that it translate the original text and render its meaning.

The several points are proved.

I. From the preceding question 10. But I have now added "or rather most emended," because the superlative by which the Synod of Trent commands this edition to be printed--the adverb "most emendedly"--shows that it speaks of the edition itself insofar as it is most emended, namely by paronymy and by an argument from conjugates. Therefore Andradius, book 4, folio 257, after exposing the cunning and malice of Chemnitz, who enumerates many errors which he contends were imposed upon us as divine oracles by the Fathers of Trent, adds: "For he could not have failed to read that part of the decree in which the sacred Synod established that henceforth sacred Scripture, especially this very old and Vulgate edition, should be printed as emendedly as possible, in order to demonstrate that it approved only that Vulgate edition which had been purged from all errors with the greatest diligence." And on folio 257: "When we have received from the Apostolic See the old Vulgate Latin edition as emended as possible, we shall be free from all concern and doubt."

2. From the concordant explanation of the many theologians who have been cited, almost all of whom indeed fight against the heretics; and, as was said, from the very aim and words of the decree.

3. From the same source.

4. From the nature of the very matter treated here. For to approve any version is nothing other than to judge that it renders well what had been written in another language. Thus it can happen, and indeed frequently does happen, that a book or letter written in some language is authentic while its translation is not; and conversely that a book or letter is not authentic while its version is. Gregory of Valencia, book 8 of the Analysis, chapter 5, says: "That any version is authentic means nothing other in this place than that it conforms altogether in meaning to the original writing."

Now it is evident that this explanation must be joined to the preceding ones, because otherwise the Synod would scarcely attribute anything more to our Vulgate version than a sound and accurate censure customarily attributes to the books of those whom Catholics judge. From this explanation, moreover, just as from Gregory of Valencia in the passage cited, it follows that the Council here declares the authority of our version to be divine, for the reason, namely, which was explained in chapter 11, question 2. But I always say "well" and "good" in the positive degree, because comparison will be treated in the following questions, as I said at the end of the preceding question.

Besides the things objected in the preceding little question, one thing occurs which can be objected. Declarations of the Council of Trent were recently published at Frankfurt in this year 1608. At their beginning, concerning session 4, it is read thus: "Vega, book 15, chapter 9 of On Justification, who spoke so boldly concerning this, must be sharply reproved--"

But I answer: while revering, as is proper, the authority of declarations of this kind--whether they are judgments of judges, opinions of doctors, responses of wise men, or some other thing of this kind--it can be doubted whether they were published without corruption and error. For neither is the grammar sufficiently sound in the words immediately preceding, nor does Vega appear in that passage to affirm anything opposed to them. Next, the typesetters, the other workmen, and the master of these declarations were heretics. And in his own preface to the reader he intimates that something somewhere is corrupt, which he nevertheless ascribes to the intricate hand of the exemplar itself.

I myself have seen the same declarations in manuscript, in which none of these things existed.

2. That declaration pertains to the words which precede the decree that we are treating, "with all their parts," and declares that the complete books of the Bible with all their parts are to be held sacred and canonical. For it adds: "Even if it were only one period, one clause, one word, syllable, or iota which conflicted with the Vulgate Latin edition." But not only we, but Vega himself, willingly confesses this whole matter concerning the emended or most emended version.

§ 4. I brought forward the grave accusations above. Sharp rubs anew the old falsehoods in controversy 6.

Eck is cited as though he said that Scripture is not authentic except by the authority of the Church. Next, a certain Hermann is produced by Pareus, Sharp, and others as though he said that the Scriptures are of no greater force than Aesop's fables if the authority of the Church is absent. But Eck speaks of the Bible with respect to our knowledge; that Hermann is nowhere and never existed except in the brain of those who fashioned an enemy for themselves so that they might conquer him. And nevertheless a great part of the Jubilarians have covered their own inventions with this fable as though with snow. But so that they may perceive in this part also the true and stable faith of Catholics, I shall explain the matter in a few words.

First proposition. The authority of sacred Scripture is supreme: efficiently from God, and formally in itself on account of truth, which is the conformity of the utterance and the things, or of the sign and the things signified. In this matter the more cautious do not dissent from us, except that Calvin and certain others impute some false things and petty lies to it, as I taught a little above.

Second proposition. In order that any truth may be known and approved, it is not enough for it to be in itself ἀξιόπιστον, to possess firmness from itself and to be worthy of belief; it is also necessary that it be taught through competent witnesses and instruction. There are three persons in the Godhead; the world was created in six days; man fell; the world was overwhelmed by the flood. These things are certain, but in order that they may be believed, it is not enough for them to be certain in themselves; it is necessary that their certainty be explained to the ignorant and the doubtful.

These things must also be applied to the Bible itself. For just as I believe that Moses led the people out of Egypt and promulgated the law on Mount Sinai, so too I believe that he wrote those books which are called the books of Moses. For with the same faith I embrace the truth of the books and of the history. Yet this is not established sufficiently from the Bible itself, because history is not known from the nature of the matter, nor is a thing heard believed unless there is some reason which persuades us of its truth. Robert Rollock, Calvin, Pareus, and the fervor of the Jubilarians therefore err when they deny that there is need of anything else by which we may discern the Scriptures, just as we know the sun, discern darkness from light, white from black, and sweet flavors from bitter.

For if someone relates Mosaic history to an ignorant person or reads it to him, will he not still doubt the truth of the history and consequently the credibility of the book in which it is contained? The Calvinists rejected the Apocalypse; now they approve it. Were the former men therefore blind, or did they not distinguish the sun from darkness? And if in a matter αὐτοπίστῳ, by its own nature most known and most clear and the cause of that light which is in the Church and in the hearts of human beings, they erred, why do they still retain authority among those who err?

Third proposition. With respect to human beings, God first gave the authority of Scripture to the person to whom he revealed it, so that he might know certainly that he possessed those things from God. Next he made them known to the people and confirmed them by miracles. Hence the Church which then existed received them and handed them down to posterity--the Church, that is, the assembly governed by the Spirit of God. Hence comes that saying of Augustine, book Against the Fundamental Epistle, chapter 5: "Indeed, I would not believe the Gospel unless the authority of the Catholic Church moved me."

Fourth proposition. The authority of Scripture and of the Church is believed by us under this formal reason: because God revealed it. Besides that revelation there are motives of credibility which induce us so that it may be evident that the matter can prudently be believed. They are not, however, the reason of believing itself, but only motives, which can be proposed to someone concerning Scripture in such a way that he believes its authority although he does not expressly think about the authority of the Church; nevertheless, the authority of the Church is implicitly believed even in this act.

Fifth proposition. The Church is not only a known object, or an object of faith believed, as it is in the Creed, "I believe the holy Catholic Church," but also one of the motives. It is indeed older and better known than Scripture, and therefore its authority possesses very great weight in believing the Scriptures. Yet it would not be necessary if there were other arguments by which the authority of the Bible could be proved perspicuously and without suspicion of falsehood. But this cannot be done. For how can not only the West Indians, ignorant of reading, but also the Japanese and Chinese immediately read through all the books of the Bible and know their authority? Indeed, how can those who cannot pronounce Hebrew and Greek learn those languages?

Sixth proposition. The authority of Scripture in itself is absolutely greater than that of the Church, because the whole of it and all its apices are from the Holy Spirit. But in the definitions of the Church only the judgment which is defined is believed to be from the Holy Spirit; the preceding disputations and arguments are not of faith, and even the words can be unnecessary and superfluous. Next, Scripture was handed down by holy and most wise prophets; without the labor of meditating, studying, or disputing, they wrote entirely by heavenly instruction and confirmed their writings by miracles. Finally, all and each of the things in the Scriptures are most certain, whether they treat generally of faith and morals or of individual things, past or future. But only those definitions of the Church are believed by faith which have been sufficiently proposed, are general, and concern faith or morals.

Seventh proposition. When, therefore, the authority of councils, the Supreme Pontiff, or, in one word, the Church is equated by some with Scripture, this is to be understood only of the truth of their decrees. Thus the words of Saint Gregory, book 1, Letter 24, must be understood: "As I venerate and confess that I receive the four books of the holy Gospel, so I venerate and receive the four Councils." Here the particle "as" is one of similarity, not equality, as Bellarmine and Serarius teach in the prolegomena, chapter 7, question 12. Nor ought anyone to be offended by this proposition, for Saint Athanasius rightly says in his letter to the African bishops: "The word of God, through the ecumenical Synod of Nicaea, remains forever." For the Holy Spirit assists his Church and governs it forever. Nor ought it to seem wonderful to any human being that the authority of the Church is constantly true and never fallacious, when we see that those who spurn it attribute wholly to their own authority what they took away from the Church. For they profess themselves to be certain by private impulse. If any unlearned person possesses such great certainty in his own judgment, why do they deny it to the Church, since God himself testifies that the word of the Church is the word of God and that those who contemn it reject God himself? Matthew 16:18 and 18:17; Luke 22:32.

Eighth proposition. In some respect, with regard to certain human beings, the authority of the Church is greater than that of Scripture. No one who has observed something similar in every sect will wonder at this. First, the Church proposes Scripture as something to be believed, expounds it, and proves its authority in whatever manner it can to catechumens. They believe the Church which proposes it, and its authority is more evident than that of Scripture, many parts of which they do not know. The Lutherans value their own church more highly--the church which rejects the Epistles to the Hebrews and of James. Indeed, this is altogether necessary for them, as is established from the things said before. For since most do not possess Hebrew and Greek exemplars, scarcely anyone has examined all things according to the original languages, and no one at all has read the αὐτόγραφα, the autographs, they believe their churches. The Lutherans say that their own Bible is rightly translated and condemn the Zurich Bible; the Calvinists, conversely, condemn the Lutheran Bible and believe their own. Thus each person so claims the sacred law for himself that he denies it to others.

CHAPTER XXV

Sectarians Cannot Possess the True Law of God

§ 1. Certain persons cause harm by loving too much; hypocrites do so much more by an excessive pretense of love. For our ministers, by daily shouting "the pure word of God" and "the pure sources of the Hebrew, Chaldean, and Greek language," have now come to this point: if the things which they say against us are true, they must be altogether without the Bible. My reasoning is this.

Whoever until now have read or heard no authentic Bible in their churches have not, according to their own judgment, possessed the word of God. For it belongs to the rationale or essence of the divine word to be τὸ αὐθεντικὸν; indeed, in order also to profit souls, it must be known and loved as authentic and as the word of most immutable truth. But until now no one in the evangelical churches has possessed an authentic Bible which, according to their doctrine, they could believe as authentic. Therefore they have not possessed the Bible; indeed, while their opinion remains, they cannot possess it.

The major proposition is granted by consensus; I prove the minor.

First, they possess neither the Hebrew, the Greek, the Latin, nor any version in another language; therefore they have never possessed any Scripture which they can acknowledge as authentic. They do not possess the Hebrew, because they have not seen the first original exemplar published by Moses and the other writers; they have received only copies transmitted to us through a long succession. They cannot know certainly that these were copied by a faithful hand and an unerring pen. For they cannot establish this certainly from Scripture itself, since this is τὸ κρινόμενον, the very thing judged and drawn into controversy: whether Scripture, which calls itself divine, is truly such, and whether this exemplar was written correctly. Accordingly, they must do the same with the law of God as is done with a prince's diploma.

Zwingli and others, to be sure, denied that the Apocalypse was divine. Those who repudiated the Apocalypse judged those words with which the prophecy begins--"The Apocalypse of Jesus Christ, which God gave him"--false and imposturous. Now they admit it, not because those words are placed at the head of the book, for they did not move the Calvinists and Luther, but for other causes--namely, so that they may speak evil of the Roman pontiff. But I am now speaking of the trustworthiness of notaries and copyists, and I ask by what argument they were led to persuade themselves that it was correctly copied. Not from Scripture, for nowhere does it testify that through two or three thousand years, amid the deceits and boastings of so many heresies, it came down to us unharmed and uncontaminated.

§ 2. Nor can this be known from a private impulse of the Spirit for the edification of the Church. The reason is manifest: although God can illuminate the mind and reveal his mysteries, nevertheless certainty concerning another person's mind is not sealed by a hidden impulse. For why should I believe those who thrust their enthusiasms and impulses upon me? I seek the word of God.

Nor does the attestation of the primitive Church pertain to the matter, because it is human and fallacious testimony, as they maintain, and it could not judge concerning the copyists who followed.

But if they have cut off from themselves every path by which they could reach certainty concerning the original Scripture, much less are they certain about any version; and indeed they themselves confess this. Above I cited Luther's words: Ich kan weder Griechisch noch Hebräisch. "I know neither Greek nor Hebrew." If he speaks truly, he taught without the word of God, for his disciples and the Calvinists say that only the Hebrew Scripture and the Greek are authentic. Thus Sharp in controversy 2 concerning Scripture, and Cameron in his little book against James Suárez, page 12, professes that he is unwilling to stand by any version of the Bible, but only by the native languages--Hebrew for the Old Testament and Greek for the New. Rightly, however, do they trust no version, for there is none which they do not possess in a most defective form. Thus the king of England at the Hampton Court Conference declared "that some uniform translation of the Bible must altogether be published, because he had hitherto seen no good English one and judged the Genevan the worst of all; and he considered its notes added in the margin partial, false, seditious, and too strongly redolent of the contrivances of a dangerous and most perverse mind. It was to be published in such a way that, after the labor of the two universities and after the review of the bishops and the more learned clerics, it should be offered to the Privy Council, finally receive authority from the king, and the whole English Church be compelled to embrace that one version."

§ 3. Since, therefore, they can stand by no version as authentic, mutually object to one another that their versions are erroneous, and cannot all have recourse to the source, they are destitute of every aid. For how few are so skilled in Hebrew that they draw from the pure source with certain knowledge? The remaining crowd is given drink from muddy streams poisoned by various heresies.

I do not grant this to those who confess that they have translated the Bible from the Hebrew, a thing which Beza in the preface to the New Testament denies to be the work of one man. For although they seem learned to themselves, since they are not Hebrews by birth and use glosses, lexicons, and the interpretations of the Rabbis, unless they think that they cannot err in memory and judgment they are the vainest of all human beings. After nearly twenty years Luther confessed that Sanctes, Münster, and he himself had frequently erred because they had trusted too much in the glosses of the Rabbis. Münster says that very many verses were omitted in Sanctes, just as in

Luther's revision. Luther revised his version several times; the Zurich theologians received it with mockery; and in the Mansfeld Confession the Osiandrians say that passages of Scripture were interpreted by Luther with great falsehood and deceit.

They are not certain concerning their own version--that it is a version of Scripture--unless with the most insane arrogance they resolve their faith ultimately into their most exact knowledge of four languages: Hebrew, Chaldean, Greek, and Latin.

Second, we can validly turn and retort upon the heretics the arguments which are invalid against the old edition. Let us therefore suppose someone from any religion who is in great part ignorant of the languages I have named, but desirous of salvation and zealous for truth. Let us offer him a German Bible so that he may learn truth from the word of God. If it is Luther's or the Zurich theologians', Sharp will say, in controversy 2 concerning sacred Scripture, calumny 7: "If this version is authentic, it is so either because of the translator Luther, because of the Church's approval, or because it agrees with the Hebrew text. Not for the first reason, because not even Luther thought it authentic. Nor because of the Church's approval, because approval cannot make a noncanonical thing canonical. Much less because it agrees with the Greek or Hebrew, because that man cannot judge this but must believe some Lutheran minister who perhaps is himself neither a Hebrew nor a Greek." But what if he believes Matthesius, who disciplines Luther's version with rods in a departing sermon and says, "Learn better"?

§ 4. Consequently, until now we have possessed no Bible except the Hebrew and Greek alone. Therefore, according to the sectarians, there has been no Lutheran or Zwinglian church. For let them show me one person who understood the Hebrew and Greek Bible and belonged to their religion. What, then, will you do with this man? Will you send him away to the grammar schools of the Greeks, Latins, and Hebrews? This would certainly be in vain. Nevertheless, there is no authentic Scripture if the Greek version of the Seventy and the Latin version are rejected, for the Hebrew was understood by almost no Christians except a very few. But our adversaries judge that Scripture alone--the Hebrew alone for the Old Testament and the Greek for the New--is to be used. Although it is authentic, this nevertheless cannot be established for those who have never seen Hebrew codices. "It is false," says Sharp. "The Greek Church possessed the Old Testament authentically in the Greek language." Next he says: "The true Church ought to possess, and still possesses, men who understand these languages, although perhaps the Roman Church has none or few." I shall see to the Roman Church elsewhere; now I examine those words.

§ 5. Ought the true Church to possess persons skilled in the Greek and Hebrew language? If it does not possess them, will it be a true Church? If you affirm that it will not, what will become of so many of your churches over which square preachers, tailors, and others whom the Arminians so often name in Belgium preside? If you concede that there will be a Church without preachers skilled in Greek and Hebrew, you must also establish that it will exist without Scripture. Since Scripture alone is the word of God, it will be a Church of God without the word of God, which is most absurd. But let it possess the German or British word. This does nothing for your imaginations. No German or British Scripture is authentic; every word of God is authentic; therefore no German or British Scripture is the word of God.

They therefore necessarily take away all faith from the unlearned, who are compelled to believe so many things of which they cannot be certain: first, that the books were written by prophets; 2. that they were copied correctly; 3. that they were translated well; 4. that these things are taught clearly from Scripture; 5. that they possess such an impulse as does not deceive. Each of these contains very many things: namely, that the translators were most learned in languages and most diligent, that their copyists were most faithful, and that, although many erred, their own men nevertheless did not err in their version. By translating the Bible, therefore, they overturn it, and bring it about that nothing is believed sincerely and that curiosity and contention exist in place of faith.

Beza noted this on Acts 10, in the digression: "For the matter has now come to such a point that not only do those who devise something from their own talent recoil from the customary and familiar words of Scripture as though they were obscure, tasteless, and obsolete, but now those who translate Scripture from Greek into Latin or some other language think that anything whatsoever is permitted to them in interpreting. If you reprove them, you immediately hear that the office of a translator is discharged not by one who translates word for word but by one who expresses the meaning. Thus it happens that, while each person prefers freely to follow his own judgment rather than religiously to act as translator of the Holy Spirit, he does not so much translate as pervert very many things. Unless this lust and audacity are opposed, assuredly either I am greatly mistaken or within a few years we shall gradually be driven even from possession of the things themselves."

That lust is not opposed; rather, it is inflamed by glory, rewards, and infidelity. Therefore they have now been driven from possession of the things themselves.

From these things it is most manifest both that we possess a Church constituted by divine law and that they do not possess one.

Next, our state is most excellently constituted, since in it the supreme legislator is adored, his law is preserved, expounded, understood, and observed. These things concern the written law of God, from which comes the soundness and sanctity of all laws in the state.

§ 6. I have shown in various ways that the sectarians cannot defend the authority of the written divine law; now let us see what they wrote repeatedly in the year 1617. Sharp, column 6, enumerates four offices of the Church concerning Scripture. 1. It is a witness, guardian, and like a notary. 2. It is an avenger, because it discerns false writings from true, as a goldsmith discerns gold from copper, since it possesses the Spirit of God for this purpose. 3. It is a herald of Scripture. 4. It is an interpreter, but so that it interprets Scripture from Scripture, mixing in nothing of its own.

§ 7. He likewise gives four means of knowing Scripture. The first is the testimony of Scripture itself, or of God speaking in Scripture. The second is private impulse. The third is the substance of the doctrine, its quality, the form of teaching, events, miracles, Satan's fury against it, and the punishment of enemies. The fourth is the testimony of the Church. He says that this pertains to those who are outside the Church, but the former testimonies by no means do; the faithful know the authority of Scripture more certainly from the former testimonies, but principally from the testimony of the Holy Spirit.

I settle the matter concerning the offices with one syllogism. According to Sharp, the Church is a fallacious guardian, witness, avenger, and herald; therefore it does not possess the Spirit of God for judging genuine and authentic books from false and supposititious ones, just as the first Calvinist church did not judge rightly concerning the Apocalypse when it denied that it was the voice of Christ the bridegroom. Those offices, therefore, have not been established rightly. Consequently, the Church affords nothing certain from these things.

The means which are proposed utterly overturn belief in the Scriptures among them. He says that the first is the testimony of Scripture itself--that is, of God speaking in the Scriptures--through which the first motions are excited in hearts. This testimony is not distinct from the second, that is, the testimony of the Spirit; or if it is distinct, it effects nothing.

For if it excites a motion of believing, it must necessarily effect this by testifying. I shall speak afterward concerning this testimony; because it contains more, I shall defer it to the last place. There is nothing certain in the third means. For first, "the substance of the doctrine," Sharp says, "contained in the Scriptures surpasses every earthly capacity," 1 Corinthians 2:14. Therefore the authority of Scripture cannot be proved from the substance, because it is not yet understood by catechumens; next, many parts of it are not understood by the very learned; third, certain things are unknown even to the most learned. Therefore the authority of Scripture cannot be known certainly from the things contained in Scripture unless all the things in it are understood accurately. For although certain truths are perspicuous, many hidden ones nevertheless remain which cannot prove it while they are unknown.

That manner, therefore, is most difficult, requires the longest time, and, as I certainly judge, is τὸ ἀδύνατον, impossible, at this time. For how will anyone so resolve the whole of Scripture--that is, all its ἐναντιοφανῆ, apparent contradictions--amid so many thousands of conflicting interpreters that he remains stuck in no matter? Yet this must be done if the authority of Scripture depends upon the things contained in it. For if someone says concerning the book of Heraclitus or of other σκοτεινῶν, obscure writers, "The things which I have understood are excellent; I think that those which I have not understood are excellent also," I readily permit it. But those who gather the authority of sacred Scripture from their perfect understanding of it cannot speak thus concerning sacred Scripture.

§ 8. Sharp adds a proof "from purity, because it contains nothing defective." I believe most truly that it contains nothing defective; but in order that I may establish its authority from this, it is necessary that I possess not only a most thorough understanding of all its parts and members but also compare all things with the Hebrew, Chaldean, and Greek exemplars--and indeed with diverse exemplars. For, to say nothing of this major premise, "Every book which contains nothing defective is divine," no one will persuade himself of this minor premise without immense knowledge: "This book contains nothing defective." For it must be proved by induction: neither this part nor that part contains defect. It must be proved from the things contained in it, but in this manner no one will be able to prove it except one who labors over it with supreme talent, the longest life, the most tranquil leisure, and adamantine labor.

I demonstrate this by the example which Sharp supplies to me. The Church proves and judges the Scriptures as a goldsmith does gold. But if a goldsmith must explore and test one hundred thousand gold coins contained in one vessel, from the very things contained in the vessel, without employing another's testimony, he must surely rub each one upon a Lydian stone. For he will not know that no gold coin is adulterated until he has perceived the δοκίμια, assays, of each.

This, I say, is necessary if it must be known from the things contained in the vessel that no gold coin is defective. Accordingly, those who preach these things lead even the most learned human beings to despair; they themselves believe nothing in the Scriptures and permit others to believe nothing. I am not ignorant that, from the fact that nothing defective is shown in Scripture, it becomes credible that it is divine. But most persons, led by the testimony of the Church, judge that "nothing of this kind is shown" to be so; they do not place the foundation of faith in experience.

But Scripture carries one into admiration. So it does; but certain other things also carry one away when they are spoken gravely, simply, well, and truly.

He also affirms that the consonance of the things which are in the Scriptures is a means, but no one knows that consonance from his own experience unless he compares all things with all. Miracles, punishments, and the wrath of enemies against Scripture make it credible; they cannot make the sectarians most certain, because many Scriptures lack miracles and were not sanctioned by punishments of enemies.

But, these things at last being omitted, in which not even they place much protection, let us attack the citadel of all heresies and their hiding place. It is each person's private impulse, which brings it about that each knows which Scripture is canonical and which is not, just as if you received or annulled the law of a prince by your own spirit.

But when this is established as the chief point of the matter, despair is cast into miserable souls and Scripture is overturned. For first, how does an unlearned person learn by his own impulse that this Scripture was well translated from Hebrew into French, when he has never seen Hebrew? Next, if that impulse suffices, what need is there of other criteria and arguments? Third, those who employ those impulses cannot even teach, for that impulse lies hidden in the inmost breast and does not come to the knowledge of others. Fourth, it differs: Castellio rejects the Song of Songs, others reject other books, each according as enthusiasm has granted. Fifth, impulse contains a circle: "Why do you believe Scripture? Because the Spirit testifies that it is true. How do you know that this is a true testimony? Because Scripture asserts it thus." Sixth, it is blasphemy to prove the authority of the divine word from one's own impulse in such a way that one ultimately resolves all things into one's own judgment. For this reasoning supplied an opportunity and pretext to all heresies. Sharp also acknowledges that not all churches which possess the Spirit of God agree concerning Scripture.

Finally, by disputing they at last unwillingly slip down into our opinion and understand under the name of Scripture even unwritten doctrine. For Sharp, lest he be compelled to acknowledge that the Church is older than Scripture, since it is manifestly established that the first Church was content with tradition alone, writes thus in column 63: "In the prosyllogism there is a deception of homonymy in the name 'Scripture.' For the name 'Scripture' is sometimes taken for the substance of Scripture and the thing written--that is, the word of God--and then it is nothing other than doctrina ἄγραφος, unwritten doctrine; at another time it is taken for the accident of this doctrine, namely its writing and inscription in books. In the first sense Scripture is older than the Church, and thus the proposition is false. For Scripture, or the word of God, is the foundation of the Church, Ephesians 2:20. But a foundation is older than the building. Thus Scripture is the seed of the Church, Matthew 13:1; 1 Peter 1:23. But seed is older than that offspring of which it is the seed. Finally, this same word which is now written was then unwritten."

Here he openly calls the unwritten word of God "Scripture." When it was afterward written, it was not at once written in its entirety; nevertheless, it could have been retained unwritten by many. But there will be mention of this matter when traditions are treated.

CHAPTER XXVI

The Written Divine Law Is Truly Difficult

§ 1. The sectarians are accustomed to teach that Scripture is most clear. Jacob Gualterius, in the Chronographic Tables, century 1, chapter 4, reports that John Faye, minister of Aubenas, said in a sermon: “There is no craftsman who, provided that he knows how to read, does not understand the Gospel.” Jacob Martini, in the jubilee theses, thesis 91: “Refrain, therefore, you pontificians, and especially you Jesuits, from your most foul cuckooing, by which you not only cry out that the sacred Scriptures are obscure, difficult, and intricate, but also calumniate them as so ambiguous and tortuous that, flexible like a waxen nose, they furnish no certain, constant, and unmoved meaning; indeed, you blaspheme them as the hiding place of many errors, and those most grave.”

And thesis 92: “Admit the laity also to the reading of the sacred writings. Why do I say ‘admit’? Since they have not only been admitted by the Lord himself, but also invited to it and bound by certain commands, so that they cannot be kept from it except with the greatest sacrilege.”

It would be superfluous to enumerate the others. Of those who composed or assisted the jubilees in this year, Pareus and Sharp alone thought otherwise. In this year Pareus published his final work of abuse on the Apocalypse, for he called it his supreme sacred χαριστήριον, thank-offering. In it he acknowledges that the Apocalypse is difficult, first in the admonition: “That he leaves it to his sons as their private possession, especially because he perceived that he had not yet attained the height of its mysteries, and that he would not satisfy others when they had not satisfied him in many things; that he had sought out the judgments of interpreters more exactly.” He also asks pardon for things not investigated. He follows Clémanges, a man of suspect faith, falsely represented by the most suspect Luther. He treats obscurity in chapter 3 of the prolegomena. “Writing concerning the obscurity of the Apocalypse, Augustine says: ‘In this book, whose name is Apocalypse, many obscure things are said so that the reader’s mind may be exercised; and there are a few things in it from whose manifestation the rest may be investigated with labor, especially because it repeats the same things in many ways so as to appear to say different things, although upon investigation it is found to say these same things in different manners.’”

And Jerome: “In the Apocalypse a book sealed with seven seals is shown. If you give it to a man who knows letters so that he may read it, he will answer you: ‘I cannot; it is sealed.’” And afterward: “The Apocalypse of John has as many mysteries as words. I have said too little for the merit of the volume; all praise is inferior. Multiple meanings lie hidden in the individual words.”

It is certainly so. For both in all the rest of sacred Scripture and particularly in this one, the acuteness of the human mind, unless illuminated by the rays of the divine Spirit, is more blind in understanding it sufficiently than the eyes of owls are blind before the midday light. The causes of this obscurity, however, are not obscure.

First, the whole book is prophetic concerning future things. “Write,” says the angel, “the things which you have seen, the things which are, and the things which are to come.” Future things as future, because they do not yet exist in any sense, are either altogether unknown or, if foreknown, are conceived not so much by understanding as by hope.

Add that these future things are not announced in open words, nor defined by indications of times, places, and persons, but are revealed to Saint John to be written in direct enigmas of visions. There are indeed in the Scriptures many open visions presented to the eyes of the mind or body: how King Belshazzar saw a hand writing on the wall; Elisha saw fiery chariots around him; Moses saw the burning bush before him; Peter saw a sheet containing four-footed animals let down to the earth; Paul saw the Lord standing above him at night, and so forth. These lacked great difficulty. But there are other visions more direct, when images signifying some mystery are read to have been presented to the minds of sleeping or waking persons. Unless their mysteries were revealed, they would possess an obscurity incapable of being investigated by human inquiry. Of this kind were the dreams presented to Pharaoh and Nebuchadnezzar, and likewise the visions of Ezekiel, Daniel, and Zechariah, to which we rightly refer the apocalyptic visions. God, by a singular benefit, not only revealed the mysteries of those dreams to the dreamers but also willed them to be written for the understanding of all. But although he also disclosed the mysteries of the visions to his servants the prophets, he nevertheless left them hidden from all others--evidently so that profane human beings would always disdain matters so obscure, while the pious would be excited all the more by the very obscurity to investigate the divine mysteries.

And on page 18: "Although we can penetrate the understanding of all the mysteries of this book only with difficulty and scarcely at all, the difficulty ought not nevertheless to deter us from investigation."

§ 2. Next, in chapter 4, when he treats of interpreters, he concludes that the Apocalypse has been understood by no one. His words on page 21 are: "Among our own men in the century just elapsed, no fewer theologians illustrious in learning applied their hand to this book. Yet in my judgment Henry Bullinger, the ecclesiastic of Zurich, surpassed them all; nearly following him were others: David Chytraeus, Alfonso Conrado of Mantua, Francis Lambert, Sebastian Meyer, Nicholas Collado, John Foxe, Benedict Aretius, Matthias Flacius Illyricus, Augustine Marlorat, Peter Artopoeus, Francis Junius, and Daniel Tossanus. And recently, in the new century: John Napier the Scot, Thomas Brightman the Englishman, Raphael Eglinus of Zürich, Conrad Graser the Frank, John Piscator, Matthias Hoë, Matthew Cottière the Frenchman, and others unknown to me.

"But to what end, you ask, so many of these? Evidently so that I may show what I undertook to show: that nothing of the authority of this book is diminished because it was objected that certain more distinguished theologians abstained from interpreting it.

"It would be too long to explain the manner of interpretation which each of them followed, and whether so many accomplished what they wished and ought to have accomplished; it would also be foreign to the present undertaking. Perhaps someone could affirm this one thing without injury to them all: that what Mark the Evangelist wrote concerning the woman in the Gospel subject to a flow of blood happened to this book--she suffered many things from physicians and was helped not at all but rather became worse; perhaps not so much through the physicians' lack of skill as through the obstinacy of an incurable evil, whose cure indeed was reserved for the illustration of Christ's glory.

"For while so many, each following the power and rationale of his own talent, brought forward such various things concerning these enigmatic visions--pious conjectures indeed, as I judge, but generally agreeing little with one another or corresponding little to the aim and mind of the Spirit--it happened that accumulated commentaries upon this book are extant, not one of which fails to promise a new light. Its obscurity, however, not only has been little diminished but in some places has been enveloped in denser darkness. For some accommodate the enigmas of Revelation to the history of the ancient people; others apply them in different ways to the continuous course of the new Church; others, searching in each particular as though for gold beneath every stone, as the saying is, fashioned mystical senses for themselves; others converted everything into tropologies and moral allegories; others, as though from the cave of Apollo, attempted by divinatory investigation to draw from it foreknowledge of future things even beyond what it is lawful for human beings to know. In so great a number you will scarcely see two or three agree--a thing commonly said of chronologists. This confusion surely indicates that the difficulty of the book has not yet been exhausted by so great a variety of interpreters, but rather increased and entangled--not so much through the culpable ignorance of the interpreters as through the unsearchable wisdom of the prophecy, whose full revelation has without doubt been reserved for the manifestation of Christ himself, the heavenly judge."

These things are said by the man who otherwise, in earlier writings, vauntingly proclaimed the facility and perspicuity of Scripture. Sharp also brought forward eight causes of difficulty in controversy 7, column 72: "We concede, however, that many things in Scripture are obscure with respect to us, because God wished this to occur for the following causes. First, so that he might excite us to diligent reading, meditation, searching, and comparison of Scripture, and lest we be sluggish in searching the mysteries of our salvation. 2. So that we may be assiduous in prayers, seeking God's aid and the light of the Holy Spirit for understanding them. 3. So that he might remove weariness from us, because we more frequently weary of easy things. 4. So that truth may be held by us at a greater price, since τὰ καλὰ χαλεπά, noble things are difficult. 5. So that he might tame our arrogance and convict our ignorance, since we sometimes glory and triumph greatly concerning our knowledge and our very selves. 6. So that the holy mysteries might be so many gems for the holy and not be prostituted indiscriminately to swine. 7. So that he might accustom us to a certain inward holiness of thoughts; for those who bring impure minds to the reading of Scripture lose their oil and labor."

§ 3. If the opinion of these προμάχων, champions among the Jubilarians, is upheld, the vote of the others, as though they merely went on foot, will be contemned, and their grandiloquence and trappings will fall before the people. For Sharp at last returns to the question whether Scripture is so perspicuous that the people can read it usefully and controversies can be decided from it. The same Sharp confesses that the things necessary for salvation are clear and that very many things not necessary are obscure. The same man in column 71 says: "The cause why certain things appear obscure to us is that we are not content with the things proposed in the Scriptures, but investigate certain things more curiously than is proper." But I shall also explain this part in a few words.

First proposition. Sacred Scripture is most clear in many things and does not need exposition if it is considered absolutely and cursorily; in others it is most obscure, in whatever manner it is weighed. Its perspicuity is plain, as when it is said: "You will conceive in the womb and bear a son." If you consider it cursorily, the meaning is clear; if you begin to dispute, you will entangle yourself in great difficulties. Concerning this difficulty of easy passages Luther says in Table Talk, chapter 1, folio 2: "In the Scriptures we scarcely know the A, B, C, and not yet rightly." Folio 3: "The word of God is unsearchable; to search even a single word of sacred Scripture and draw it forth from the depth is altogether ἀδύνατον, impossible. I deny that the learned and theologians can do it, even if they wish it most greatly. For because they are words of the Holy Spirit, Christians newly born in Christ possess only first fruits, not tithes. I have sometimes wished to meditate upon the Decalogue, and when I considered those first words, 'I am the Lord your God,' I began to hesitate over that first pronoun, 'I'; and I cannot yet rightly understand this 'I.'"

But concerning Scripture universally, on 16 February 1546, as Aurifaber reports, he wrote those things which stop the mouths of all preachers:

1. "No one can understand Virgil in the Eclogues unless he has been a shepherd for five years.

2. "No one can understand Virgil in the Georgics unless he has been a farmer for five years.

3. "No one understands Cicero completely in the Letters--so I declare--unless he has been engaged for twenty years in some distinguished state.

4. "Let no one suppose that he has sufficiently tasted the sacred Scriptures unless for a hundred years he has governed churches with the prophets, such as Elijah and Elisha, John the Baptist, and the apostles.

> Attempt not this divine Aeneid;
>
> But bowed down, adore its footprints."

Scripture is therefore difficult.

Second proposition. Scripture, even in those things which are necessary for salvation, both needs interpretation and is obscure in many things. I do not speak of obscurity which exists by nature, but of that which pertains to us, for something is said to be obscure to someone not absolutely but comparatively. There is no need of proof. The whole world, even that part of the world which glories in the perspicuity and understanding of Scripture, experiences it as difficult. Therefore all draw it into such various senses, and from it so many heresies are forged--not through a defect of Scripture, but through the ignorance and malice of human beings. For, with a very few exceptions, all heresiarchs have been accustomed to cloak their errors in the words of Scripture. Those who glory in their understanding of its clarity strike against the articles of faith, against the foundation, and overturn Scripture. Accordingly, the wretched people are ensnared in endless polemics when no certain form of exposition is handed down, and when there are such contrary senses concerning the meaning of Scripture, whose words all sound forth: senses concerning the person of Christ, concerning God, justice, the sacraments, and election, all of which are necessary for salvation.

Next, in the Church there is the gift of interpretation and the office of teaching in schools and the church, not only for expounding abstruse questions which are not necessary for salvation, but especially for those which are required for salvation. Thus Sibrandus, book 4 of On the Principles of Christian Dogmas; the disputants at Regensburg and others acknowledge that these offices are necessary.

Third, a thing concerning which there are the greatest and most pernicious controversies, even among learned human beings, is not by its nature most clear in its own light. But concerning the meaning of Scripture, which contains dogmas of faith necessary for salvation, there are almost as many controversies as heads. Therefore that meaning is not by nature most clear. Indeed, this one matter weakens the authority of the sacred writings among most people, for when they seek not the words but the true and genuine meaning of the sacred writings, they fall into conflicting opinions and can obtain the authentic meaning by no reasoning. For all sectarians, without exception, flee to this: they say that they are certain concerning the meaning from private impulse. If that impulse were one and concordant in all, perhaps they would persuade; but now, since it is most diverse, it cannot happen that all except one do not err and deceive.

They object: “The word is neither hidden nor remote from us, but is in our mouth and heart,” Romans 10:8. “It is a lamp to the feet,” Psalm 118, and so forth; “a shining lamp,” 2 Peter 1:19. It is clear, not hidden, 2 Corinthians 4:2. We are commanded to search it, John 5:39 and elsewhere. The Fathers use the Scriptures; the primitive Church understood them without commentaries. If the Holy Spirit wrote obscurely, he wrote in vain.

Indeed, the faithful understand all things necessary for salvation, John 10:17. These things are scattered through the jubilees, and Sharp gathered them into one in column 74. But the error common to all sectarians is that they understand Scripture simply and without the sense of the Church and the interpretation of the Doctors. The word of God is not hidden because certain parts of it need no exposition, while others are explained to us by the Church, so that if one wishes to learn, it is not hidden. It is a lamp, but when it is lit--that is, when it diffuses the rays of the true meaning. We are commanded to search the Scriptures because their profundity is not everywhere obvious. The Fathers use the Scriptures to establish sacred dogmas, and they expound them or set them forth as explained by more ancient persons. Did the primitive Church understand the Scriptures without exposition? Indeed, not even the apostles, already faithful and familiar with Christ, did so; for Christ expounded them to them. So far were they from understanding that they did not know that Christ had to suffer and so enter into his glory, Luke 24:25.

Next, when the apostles expounded the Scriptures and refuted the Jews, did they not expound the faith and those things which were necessary for salvation? And Apollos, Acts 18:24, was mighty in the Scriptures, but was taught the way of the Lord more diligently by Aquila and Priscilla. Nor did he understand all things by himself, but learned from others that there was another baptism besides John’s baptism, which was given in water alone. But if the primitive Church understood the Scriptures without an interpreter, and the Church which followed afterward did so as well, there was no need of so many interpreters--indeed, there would not be even now--although the whole world today groans beneath the commentaries of the innovators. Concerning the single article of justification there are twenty conflicting opinions, and Sharp resolves this by nothing other than a manifest lie when he says: “Among the Reformed there is great agreement concerning this article, as concerning the others.”

From these things I conclude that the true meaning of Scripture must be sought from Scripture and from the true interpretation of the Church. Certainly it was thus formerly in the Israelite Church. For since the ancient Hebrews wrote without vowel points, they learned from their teachers with great labor the method of reading and of understanding the things which depended upon it. A perpetual tradition therefore accompanied Scripture, in which pronunciation and the substitution of vowels were contained. Accordingly, just as no point was to be supplied unless it agreed with the mind of the Holy Spirit, so now no interpretation is to be admitted unless it is from him.

§ 4. Finally, no end of controversies and no concord can ever be hoped for when interpretation is relegated to each person’s private spirit. For how will enemies be convinced or the doubtful instructed if nothing other is cried out from the chairs than certainty concerning the meaning of Scripture from a private impulse of the Holy Spirit?

CHAPTER XXVII

Reading the Divine Law Is Not Prohibited by Us

§ 1. Nearly all who make mention of the Bible in their jubilees have this one complaint. One of the cruder stentors relates that Luther was accustomed to read the Bible but was prohibited by the brothers and sent to clean bedrooms and upper chambers with brooms. Chemnitz long ago preceded all the others in his Examination of the Council of Trent, session 4, when he said that we persecute vernacular editions with iron and flame. Several sermons dwell most odiously upon this one matter. But I ask that the reader, setting accusations aside for a little while, deign to give ears and mind to the truth.

First proposition. It is not commanded to all persons that they privately read the sacred Scriptures translated into the German or another language. The reason is manifest, because such a law is found nowhere in sacred Scripture, canon law, or civil law. Next, among all nations the greatest part of the faithful has hitherto not known how to read; and although many in the more cultivated towns now learn letters, the crowd in the country, which is the greatest, is for the most part ignorant of reading and writing. Therefore there is no law which commands reading, since there is none which commands the knowledge of letters. And certainly, if there were one which commanded that knowledge to the people generally, I would judge that it should immediately be abolished. For there is now so great an abundance of scurrilous, frivolous, abusive, lustful, and magical books that it is preferable not to know letters than to fall upon writings so pestilential.

Third, it was not the custom of the Church for the Scriptures to be read in the vernacular language; therefore no law concerning that matter was divinely enacted. For although from Moses to the Babylonian captivity, while the Hebrew language remained intact, the Bible could be read by all the Jews, nevertheless a most particular instruction and tradition was necessary on account of the vowel points. From this it is apparent that reading was customary among few and that great practice was necessary even for those to whom the Bible was vernacular. After the captivity the Jews had passed into the language of the Chaldeans just as into their dominion. The remnants which afterward returned to their homeland mixed this language with Syrian, and it could in no way be brought about that ancient Hebrew was vernacular.

Nevertheless, a certain translation into the Chaldean language was made by Onkelos, whom some think to be Aquila, who likewise translated into Greek; Serarius treats of him in the prolegomena, chapter 14, question 4. If he was Aquila, he therefore lived in the time of Hadrian. If he was more ancient, the Church nevertheless could not use his version, since he acted as a paraphrast, omitted many things, and perverted many things, so that this paraphrase can in no manner be called the word of God. All the monuments of the ancients show that Aquila was a heretic, but I cannot be induced to believe that Onkelos and Aquila were the same person, for in the more obscure passages of Scripture those two versions differ exceedingly. The Targum of Onkelos and the fragments of the Greek version cited from Aquila do not appear to have been the work of a cautious man who would bring forward most diverse interpretations when, with less labor, he could have prepared authority for himself by agreeing with himself. The former wrote the Pentateuch. About the birth of our Lord Jonathan translated the Former and Latter Prophets. Afterward, in the year of the Lord 400, Joseph the Blind translated the Hagiographa. That there was nothing sincere in these is taught both from the fact that the latter two were unbelievers--and perhaps Onkelos also--and especially because there is no chapter in which they do not depart from the original and mix in dreams and trifles. Accordingly, from the Babylonian captivity until Christ, the Church possessed no vernacular Scripture; nor was Ezra, Nehemiah, Malachi, Zechariah, Haggai, Onias, the Maccabees, and other most holy men concerned to translate it. Therefore they possessed no command.

§ 2. Nor in the times of the apostolic Church and those which followed did any churches except a few--that is, the Greek and Latin--possess versions in their native languages; neither the apostles nor their successors translated the Bible into various languages. There were multiple Greek versions. The first was before the monarchy of the Greeks. The second, at the beginning of that monarchy. The third, that of the Seventy interpreters. The fourth, the Herodian. The fifth, Aquila's. The sixth, Symmachus's. The seventh, Theodotion's. The eighth, the Jericho version. The ninth, the Nicopolitan. The Origenian,

Lucianic, and Hesychian are also named, but they received their names from the correction of errors which had crept into the version of the Seventy interpreters and ought not to be called new versions. The tenth, therefore, is derived from Jerome's, for the Greeks translated the Bible from Saint Jerome's Latin version into their own language.

But the peoples to whom the Gospel was preached were of various languages. Acts 2:7 and following: "All were astonished and wondered, saying: 'Behold, are not all these who speak Galileans? And how have we each heard our own language in which we were born? Parthians and Medes and Elamites and those who inhabit Mesopotamia, Judaea and Cappadocia, Pontus and Asia, Phrygia and Pamphylia, Egypt and the parts of Libya which are around Cyrene, and Roman visitors, Jews also and proselytes, Cretans and Arabs--we have heard them speaking in our languages the great things of God.' But all were astonished and wondered, saying to one another, 'What does this mean?' But others, mocking, said: 'These men are full of new wine.'" If anyone says that all those peoples knew Greek or Latin, he does nothing other than become insane with reason.

§ 3. Second proposition. Hence it is also established that neither a version nor that reading was necessary. For why would the Church of the Jews for so many centuries and afterward that of the apostles neglect a matter so necessary? Why would they not do what all the innovators have done and translate the Scriptures into all languages, a thing most easy at that time, since all the apostles and many others spoke in various languages? Therefore, when they reprove us for the omission of vernacular versions and odiously exaggerate the fact that not all read the Bible, do they not under our name speak evil of the apostles, who neglected a translation of the Bible so easy to make and which they could have made authentic in each language by placing their own names before it? But the apostles judged that sufficient provision had been made for the churches if they instructed each nation and left teachers and bishops who would explain the faith and Scripture to them.

§ 4. Third proposition. To translate the Bible into the vernacular language for a good end, and to read it, is at times good and is absolutely prohibited by no law. For no law of this kind exists, and it was permitted in the Church to use versions and by reading them to incite minds to piety.

Whitaker teaches that this is the opinion of Catholics, controversy 1, question, chapter 13: "The first opinion," he says, "is that of those who deny altogether that the Scriptures ought to be translated into vernacular languages. The second and contrary opinion is that of those who establish that sacred Scripture must altogether be translated into all the common languages of peoples. The third is that of those who neither condemn vernacular versions of Scripture absolutely nor permit them absolutely, but in this matter wish a certain exception and account of times, places, and persons to be maintained."

The last opinion is the position of the papists and the decree of Trent. Next, the Council of Oxford established against Wycliffe that the editions of Wycliffe or others should not be read unless approved by the diocesan bishop; therefore there was no question then concerning approved editions. Next, many read them usefully, as formerly among the Hebrews when they were vernacular. Third, the Fathers frequently exhort persons to read the Scriptures, as my teacher Serarius shows in the prolegomena, chapter 20, question 3.

§ 5. Fourth proposition. Although, therefore, the translation and reading of the Bible are not absolutely forbidden, it can nevertheless happen that they are useless or even harmful.

First, on account of versions which are not good, or certainly are not of tested goodness. Thus I showed above that the most serene James, king of Great Britain, approves no edition; that the Genevan Bible is the worst; and that its notes are false, seditious, and too strongly redolent of the dangerous and most perverse contrivances of a mind. But since it is better not to read the Bible than, under the name of the Bible and of the word of God, to read the word of the devil, who does not see that a reading which does not edify but destroys is harmful? And certainly there are now many versions: Italian, Spanish, French, the Genevan and another by Castellio, the Zurich, Belgian, English, and Lutheran; most are various, as their editions are various. There are also Bibles published at Hamburg in various languages, even in Saxon and Slavonic. There are Bibles of Eber, Neander, Caspar Carolus, and a Hungarian Bible. The Calvinists condemn all Bibles made by Lutherans and receive them with mockery, as is established from Stoltz in his defense of Luther. The Osiandrians and Bucer judge the same. The Lutherans establish the same concerning the Calvinist versions, and the most serene king of Great Britain concerning all. Therefore they do not read the true word of God, or certainly cannot be certain that they read it. For how, I address you, rustic Lutheran, were you certain by faith that Luther's Bible is authentic when all Catholics, Calvinists, Anabaptists, and Osiandrians protested, when Matthesius chastised it, and Luther himself acknowledged errors?

Second, reading the Bible is harmful to very many who at this time are not Catholics, because when they judge it most easy they immediately undertake to interpret it, lest they become objects of ridicule if they deny that they understand a most evident matter. Luther said in his book On the Bondage of the Will that there is no difficulty in the sacred writings and that no passage can be brought forward to him which he himself cannot easily interpret. Therefore they judge that they can understand what they suppose to be open and clear, and consequently they interpret it. But an ignorant person who supposes a difficult matter easy falls into paradoxes and ridiculous opinions.

Third, reading the Bible also inflicts injury upon many when it raises them into pride and causes them to disdain being taught, on which occasion they necessarily fall into heresies. Luther himself experienced this, for he says that the Anabaptists and Sacramentarians, if they have read even one book, think that they know all things, Table Talk 1, folio 5. And next: "Luther once said that the nobility, citizens, peasants, and almost persons of every highest and lowest condition knew the Gospel better than Doctor Luther himself knew it, or even Saint Paul himself, as at least they appeared to themselves; for they considered themselves to be wise and more learned than all parish priests." He adds that they contemned not the parish priests but the Lord. Such also were the Hussites, as Cochlaeus recalls in books 1 and 4 of the history; such were the Wycliffites, as Waldensis states in book 2, chapters 70 and 73; such were the people of Orlamünde in Luther's time. This appears to be the reason why Luther, in the history which occurred at Staßfurt in 1536, calls the Bible "the book of heretics."

Fourth, from these things it is established that very many heresies arise and that many things are perverted by the unlearned. Indeed, nearly every person now possesses preconceived judgments and draws Scripture toward them. Calvin certainly sufficiently indicates in book 4 of the Institutes, chapter 8, §11, that the interpretation of Scripture is promised to individuals.

§ 6. Fifth proposition. In the Catholic, Apostolic, Roman Church, versions and readings of the Bible are not forbidden but permitted under a fixed law, and this rightly and deservedly. The foundation of the adversaries is therefore calumnious and their disparagement wholly malevolent.

§ 7. Here, above all, it admonishes that reading not be permitted without discrimination, and adds the cause: because through the temerity of human beings more detriment than utility arises from it. The Lutherans and Calvinists judge this to be so, since every day they are divided into more sects. Hence they too prohibit books of diverse sects. For the books of Zwingli, while he was still living, were forbidden in Saxony and Hesse, as Zwingli states in the Exegesis of the Eucharistic Matter; thereafter they always did this, as Lavater, Micronius, Utenhovius, Danaeus, and others testify. Yet the Calvinists do not cease to do the same concerning the Lutherans to the present day. Thus Schlusselburg, book 3 of Calvinistic Theology, article 4: "From this it appears that the Sacramentarians apply themselves especially to this: that their blasphemous books alone be read by all, while our writings are utterly rooted out from the nature of things as unworthy of public circulation and reading." Nor did they do only this, but also what Luther writes in volume 7, Letter 2 to Linck, folio 272: "The peasants of Orlamünde wipe their buttocks with my little book." Calvin, Letter 1, says "that magistrates who not only permit bad books to be published but approve all the worst ones by their vote provide most badly for the state by their immoderate facility."

And Schlusselburg says in book 3 of Calvinistic Theology, article 4: "We do not deny that our magistrates in certain places forbid booksellers indiscriminately to sell to anyone the books of heretics, pontificians, Anabaptists, Calvinists, and fanatical human beings of that kind. But, account being taken of the persons who buy, let them take care not to communicate poisonous and erroneous writings to the unlearned and inexperienced, who, not yet confirmed in the foundations of Christian doctrine, could easily be seduced by reading them without any judgment."

Among the sectarians, therefore, there are a great many catalogues of prohibited books, among which are also versions of the Bible.

But you will say: "We prohibit not sacred Scripture but bad books." Nor do I say this; rather, I admonish that, since there are many very bad versions of the Bible--as all testify, even the adversaries--and since there is none which is approved by the most serene king of Britain, it is rightly prohibited that they be permitted indiscriminately to the unlearned and inexperienced.

For if this is done, how easily among so many versions will the rustic fall upon an Anabaptist, Socinian, or Arian version? For it cannot happen that he judges which version agrees with the Hebrew or Greek. Therefore a choice ought not to be permitted to one who cannot distinguish between a salutary medicine and poison. He will incline the law toward his own vices.

But if the version is approved by the bishop, account of times, places, and persons must be maintained in granting permission. For if someone is eager for novelties, puffed up, lustful, restless, and an admirer of himself, if you give him the Bible he will do the things of which Luther complains concerning his own people. Tell me, Lutherans: did not reading the Bible make the Calvinists sevenfold worse than the papists? Luther said that they were such and Jacob Andreae confirmed it in the Herzberg Colloquy.

If anyone with a good mind and a desire to advance wishes to read the Bible, he will never perceive it to be denied him; it is necessary only that he approach his pastor concerning the matter. But when Bibles are permitted to be published, sold, and bought publicly, it is judged that a general faculty of reading has been granted, which certain persons without doubt abuse. Yet all scandals cannot be guarded against. Accordingly, a thing to whose permission a condition is added is not prohibited. Thus, when a prince forbids arms to be carried without his permission, he does not absolutely wish no one to be armed, but wishes to strip the furious, turbulent, and irascible of instruments of malice and to have the strong and just armed with defenses of the state.

So too, if a bishop sees an atheistic man, lacking the Spirit of God, walking along the whitewashed ways of the age, and seeking fuel for his vices from the polygamy of Abraham and David, he will rightly keep him from reading the Bible, which is understood only by the Spirit of God that this man lacks; he will instruct him himself and command him to hear pastors. For Calvin himself is witness that a certain instruction truly ought to precede. For in the preface to the Institutes in 1559 he thrusts the reading of his own Institutes upon readers as a certain εἰσαγωγὴν, introduction to reading the divine books: "This was proposed to me in this labor: so to prepare and instruct candidates of sacred theology for the reading of the divine word that they may both possess an easy approach to it and be able to proceed in it with an unoffending step."

If, therefore, Calvin judges that candidates of theology must be prepared for reading the divine word, why should a Catholic bishop not first prepare an unlearned person before handing him the Bible? Certainly, candidates of theology are more apt than the unlearned. If Calvin instructs them through such long Institutes, why does an unlearned person have less need of instruction? If without Calvin's Institutes candidates of theology do not possess an easy approach to reading the divine word, why is it charged as a crime against Pius IV that he grants access through bishops, parish priests, and confessors, yet only if they have been so instructed that they can obtain from that reading not injury but an increase of piety and faith? If Calvin's Institutes carry a light before candidates of theology so that they can proceed with an unoffending step in the reading of Scripture, why should a Catholic bishop not also fortify his subjects beforehand so that they do not stumble? And if candidates of theology need those Institutes lest they stumble, therefore without them they could stumble; therefore someone can also stumble in the Catholic Church; therefore reading the Bible is rightly denied to him until he is so instructed that he can proceed in that reading with an unoffending step.

I end this part concerning Scripture and protest before God and human beings that we are assailed with the greatest and unheard-of calumnies. Formerly calumny placed its summit in the Arians against Athanasius; now our Jubilarians have surpassed all the calumnies of the ancients. And certainly, if they learned anything from the ancients, they imbibed the art of calumniating so exactly that nothing is now safe. They can accomplish nothing by truth; they trust in shouting and falsehood.

We permit the law of God to be read, but prohibit harmful reading and an interpretation which corrupts the law--the thing which we said the magistrate does in civil laws.

CHAPTER XXVIII

The Law Handed Down by Tradition Is Joined to the Written Law

§ 1. No one of all the Jubilarians, so far as I know, omitted this part. Therefore there is no need to name them all. The Heidelberg Evangelical Academic does so in theses 19 and 20. But in this matter scarcely anyone lies more bitterly than Erhard Lauterbach, who endeavors to show that the papists act contrary to the word of God and follow their own traditions. And in sermon 1, part 1, he concludes: alles wider die H. Schrifft, also dass es der Teuffel auss der Hellen nicht wol köndte ärger machen--"all things are contrary to Holy Scripture, so that the devil from hell could scarcely do worse." Polycarp Leyser does so in sermon 1. Baldwin Frederick, on page 7 of his preparatory sermon, defames all Catholic states because they make much of human laws after abandoning the word of God, and because in their churches they do nothing but kill souls: Es werde mit falscher Lehr vnd verbottenen Gottesdienst nur eitel Seelmordt begangen--"through false doctrine and forbidden worship, nothing but murder of souls is committed by Catholics in their churches." Paul Laurentius, in his second sermon, page 24, affirms that the cause of all evils is that human traditions have prevailed against the divine word: Dass auss dess verfluchten Bapsts Gebott und Tyranney alles in Abgötterey sey verwandelt worden, da man an statt dess reinen Wort Gottes dess Bapsts Lügen und Menschen Satzungen wil getrieben haben--"Through the command and tyranny of the accursed pope all things have been transformed into idolatry, because the pope's lies and human ordinances have taken the place of the pure word of God."

Nor only in churches before the people do they fill ears with lies; poets also do so in the assemblies of ministers. It is pleasing to hear one of these, because his malevolence is clearer in it. It is Albert Otto Bilgenius, court tutor of Solms:

> From the writings of these men? Tell me, I ask, O man.

These are his words. We shall explain the whole matter briefly in these propositions.

§ 2. First proposition. The Church has always used the unwritten word of God--that is, tradition. For before Moses, and indeed before the flood, there was a Church of God, yet there was no written word of God. Sharp acknowledges this in controversy 6, response to the first objection: "In the prosyllogism there is a deception of homonymy in the name 'Scripture,' for the substance of Scripture and the thing written--that is, the word of God. And then it is nothing other than doctrina ἄγραφος, unwritten doctrine. At another time it is taken for the accident of this doctrine, namely its writing and inscription in books. In the first sense Scripture is older than the Church, and thus the proposition is false. For Scripture, or the word of God, is the foundation of the Church, Ephesians 2:20. But a foundation is older than the building. Thus Scripture is the seed of the Church, Matthew 13:1; 1 Peter 1:23. But seed is older than that offspring of which it is the seed. Finally, this same word which is now written was then unwritten."

But if the matter is dealt with sincerely between us, and "Scripture" signifies a written thing or a doctrine θεόπνευστον, divinely inspired, we now possess agreement. For when we say that certain unwritten things must be believed, we do not affirm that any doctrine not θεόπνευστον--that is, not revealed by God--is to be received as though it were revealed by God.

Next, after the coming of Moses it was written, but not all the heads of things necessary to be believed were immediately explained. There were therefore other things comprehended in the unwritten word, for it was not Moses' purpose to write a catechism.

Third, this very word which Moses wrote could neither be read nor understood without tradition, as I showed above, on account of the omission of the points. Fourth, nowhere does God profess that he bound his doctrine only to ink and parchments. Therefore the laws of God are twofold, ἄγραφοι καὶ ἔγγραφοι, unwritten and written.

Fifth, there are many things which the adversaries are even now compelled to believe from the unwritten word: namely, that the word of God which was written has come down to us inviolate, and that the Apocalypse is the word of God. Indeed, the adversaries acknowledge, as Sharp does in column 123, that from Adam to Moses there was Scripture, but not the written word; for writing was not necessary except upon a hypothesis. Finally, many nations possessed no Scriptures for a long time.

§ 3. Second proposition. Sacred Scripture as it is now possessed is not sufficient to decide all controversies, nor was it formerly sufficient. For at the beginning they possessed only the Pentateuch, but it is not sufficient for all dogmas to be declared most openly from it. Likewise, even now the entire body of the canon does not suffice, for nowhere in it is it said that this whole body, and no other book outside it, is canonical; and yet we believe this. Accordingly, those who reject every tradition also cut down the canon of Scripture. This is so true that Sharp this year cast shame upon everyone. For in controversy 9, column 143, he proposed to himself objection 5: "It is not enough to know that Scripture is divine, but it is necessary to know which Scripture it is. But this cannot be known from the Scriptures. Therefore. The assumption is proved: how do we gather from Scripture that the Gospels of Luke and Mark are true, but those of Thomas and Bartholomew false, when reason dictates that a book bearing the title of an apostle ought to be believed more than one bearing the title of one who is not an apostle? And whence shall I gather that the Epistle to the Romans is truly Paul's, but the Epistle to the Laodiceans is not Paul's, when in Colossians 4 he says that he wrote to the Laodiceans, but nowhere says that he wrote to the Romans? Therefore."

He answers himself in this manner: "The proposition is distinguished. It is indeed necessary to know this, but not absolutely necessary for salvation and in the same manner for all, because formerly many doubted concerning various canonical books, at least for a time, whom for that reason we shall not exclude from salvation. Next, those who possess the Holy Spirit, through whom we recognize the canonical books, do not possess him in the same measure. The same must be established concerning the other operations of the Spirit."

If, therefore, it is not necessary for salvation to believe that these are divine books, then, according to the opinion of the Jubilarians, neither is it necessary to believe that what is contained in them is divine. For this alone must be believed which is in divine books. Just as, if someone says that he must do only what is commanded by a royal diploma, if he is not bound to believe that the diploma offered is royal, he is excused from executing those things. A little afterward Sharp likewise answers: "It is not necessary to know that this or that book was written by this or that author, provided that I admit the writing itself as divine." But he is bound more tightly by this. For if I do not know the author--if, for example, the author of the Apocalypse is unknown--whence shall we know, that is, from what Scripture shall we know, that it is divine? This is not established from Scripture; they have nothing else whence they may know it.

§ 4. A dreadful confusion followed contempt for the unwritten word of God in the Church--but in the church of the malignant. For first, when they said that they relied upon Scripture alone and all scattered into contrary parties, they published the Augsburg Confession as though it were a symbol of concord. After that had been changed and deserted, they composed the Book of Concord; but from it the greatest discord deprived all Lutheranism of life.

And certainly in this part also they overthrow all faith in Scripture and altogether deny Scripture. Libavius has these things in his book against Gretser:

I. The written word of God is not that description by characters.

II. Sacred Scripture and the written word are not that word of God concerning which Catholics and Lutherans dispute, but some other thing. For the written word can be changed and indeed burned. But the word of God remains forever, Isaiah 40.

III. If writing, or sacred Scripture, were the word of God, then it would be the word of God not only with respect to human beings but also with respect to angels. But sacred Scripture is not the word of God with respect to angels. Therefore neither is it the word of God with respect to human beings.

IV. If Scripture truly were the word of God, then it would be the power of God unto salvation for everyone who believes. But it is not the power of God unto salvation for everyone who believes. Therefore this Scripture is not truly the word of God.

V. If sacred Scripture truly were the word, it would be the wisdom and truth of God. But it is not the wisdom and truth of God. Therefore sacred Scripture is not truly the word of God.

VI. If the written word truly were the word of God, then it would be a light shining in darkness. But it is not a light shining in darkness. Therefore the written word is not truly the word of God.

VII. "Finally," he says, "when I had come to this point, that from the word of God I had learned that the word of the Lord is living, that it is eternal, that it does not perish when the world perishes, that it will judge on the last day, that it is truth--which possesses such kinship with Christ that hence the Son of God is also called the Word and the Truth, and so also the Holy Spirit is Truth, just as the word of Christ is Spirit, John 6--I immediately saw that the written word, or Scripture comprehended in the volumes of the Bible, is not the word of God but something else. For Scripture, insofar as it is Scripture, does not live, is not life, is not truth, and does not remain forever."

§ 5. If, therefore, Scripture is not the word of God, or it is not necessary to believe that it is the word of God, and yet it is the principle of faith, it follows that faith is uncertain. For that whose principles are uncertain is itself also uncertain; neither is a conclusion more certain, nor assent to that which follows from a principle firmer, than the principle itself upon which alone it depends. But knowledge of Scripture is not certain, because it is neither certain by faith nor certain by natural light. Therefore it is certain in no manner.

But so that the reader may see how great an injury they inflict upon us, and what they themselves say among themselves when they are alone, I shall append the propositions which Adolphus Venator Tectander promises in his Apology against the Dordrecht Men, pages 174, 175, and 176, that he will prove concerning the Counter-Remonstrants:

1. The right, best, safest, and perfect rule, square, and Lydian stone, not only of doctrine in the Reformed Church among the Belgians, but also of the whole Christian faith, is the Belgic Confession and the Heidelberg Catechism.

2. In the Confession and Catechism it is commanded that sects must be reviled and those who differ from us in even a little word in the confession must be condemned.

3. Without insults, sects and errors cannot be refuted.

4. The office of preachers is to indulge in abuse and insults.

5. If anyone does not understand that Scripture is imperfect and that, besides it, human traditions and formulas are necessary, he makes diversity of religion of little account.

6. Purity of doctrine cannot be preserved, sects cannot be averted, nor heresies refuted, without human constitutions and formulas.

7. The word of God by itself suffices neither for salvation nor for the good condition of the Church.

8. Scripture alone, without the statutes and decrees of the Church, is the chaos of all religions, the refuge of all heresies, and the way--if you insist upon it alone--to introduce every liberty into the Christian state.

9. Scripture is obscure and can be understood in various ways, and therefore it has need of the decrees and doctrines of the Church.

10. The Confession and Catechism alone are manifest, but Scripture is not; and these formulas cannot be explained in two or diverse ways.

11. The authors of the Confession and Catechism were wiser and more prudent, indeed more faithful to the Church and truth, and left better and more perfect writings to the Church, than the Evangelists and apostles themselves.

12. Pure doctrine cannot be known certainly from the word of God, but only from the Confession and Catechism.

13. The prophets and apostles left behind imperfect and doubtful writings, which cannot benefit even themselves, as writings from which we cannot recognize the way of truth certainly unless they are strengthened and illuminated by the additions and decrees of a particular church.

14. Scripture by no means comprehends all that must be believed absolutely for someone to be saved or to be a member of the Church.

15. Scripture has twofold meanings and is uncertain and imperfect.

16. Human traditions, decrees of councils, words, and explanations of matters of faith invented long after the times of the apostles must necessarily be believed for attaining salvation.

17. The word of God is not so necessary and useful to Christians as the Confession and Catechism are.

18. We can lack the word of God, provided that we preserve the Confession and Catechism.

19. It is not necessary to convince heretics and erring persons by Scripture or the word of God, or to refute their errors, but only by the Confession and Catechism.

20. It is not necessary to prove the Confession and Catechism by the word of God.

21. The authority of the Church surpasses the authority of Scripture.

22. Certainty of pure doctrine must not be sought from the word of God, but from the traditions and formulas of those human beings who followed long after the times of the apostles.

23. Scripture is not a suitable judge of controversies concerning religion.

24. No one possesses the right faith, nor is a Christian or a member of the Church, who does not receive the Confession and Catechism.

25. One must adhere to the Confession and Catechism further than insofar as they accord with the word of God.

26. The Confession and Catechism ought to be the norm of the meaning of Scripture, and human formulas ought to set the measure for explaining the word of God. But the word of God ought not to establish limits for understanding the writings of human beings.

27. No Christian is free to bind himself to the word of God alone, and one who presumes to do this shows that he departs from the true Christian religion.

28. Although the apostles themselves had made a creed or faith, nevertheless it would not be Scripture.

29. The Christian religion does not consist in a pious life but in much knowledge--not in how far each person lives, but in how far each person understands.

30. The doctrine concerning love of God and neighbor pertains to the law alone, not to the Gospel, and Jesus was a teacher of the law.

31. Those who are gathered to hear divine and spiritual things and who profess God and Christ are not the Church, likewise if they wish to adhere to the words of Christ and the apostles alone and not also to receive the decrees of councils and traditions of human beings.

32. Although some follow Scripture absolutely in all things, they are nevertheless heretics and cannot be the Church of God.

33. Papists and heretics are not Christians.

34. What the first planters of the Reformation confessed, and the martyrs of this land also sealed with their blood--namely, that in matters of faith Scripture alone must be adhered to and human institutions must not be received--is an invention for recalling all heresies from the abyss of hell.

35. One who understands that the word of God alone must be insisted upon proposes a means through which no peace can be possessed with God.

40. Neither Moses and the prophets nor the Evangelists and apostles of the New Testament can be understood in any manner, or be the foundation of doctrine or the square of the doctrine of the Old Testament.

63. Jeremiah, Paul, the Evangelists, and the angel Gabriel are Socinians and heretics.

65. To confess or say something which heretics also say is heretical and erroneous; and thus the prophets and apostles are all heretics.

68. The Evangelist and the angel Gabriel think nothing better concerning Christ than the Turks do.

The same Venator has the following on page 74:

“The Dordrecht brothers are not content with Scripture, but dare to speak of it so contemptuously that they say: ‘If Scripture alone had to be adhered to, everyone in Christianity would dare to say and do whatever he wished; and the Bible would become the manifest hiding place of all heresies, Libertines, and all others.’”

Add to these also the things which our Maximilian Sandaeus most truly reports concerning the preaching synagogue in his secular theme, and Heidelberg theme 11: “It teaches that sacred Scripture, which, insofar as it is the word of God, is the norm, rule, square, and gnomon of believing and living well, is not truly the word of God: 1. because it is not the power of God unto salvation for everyone who believes; 2. because it is not the wisdom and truth of God; 3. because it is not a light shining in darkness; 4. because it does not remain forever. 12. It asserts that knowledge for distinguishing divine Scripture from nondivine is not necessary for salvation. 13. It denies that it must necessarily be believed with saving faith that the Scriptures which we possess are divine, or that the Gospel of Matthew which is read in the Church is divine and belongs to Matthew the apostle. 14. It contends that sacred Scripture is not certain of itself, nor free from error or falsehood. 15. It affirms that the writers of the New Testament sometimes knowingly and deliberately wrote contrary to the truth of history. 16. At times they conceded something from charity to a received and common error. 17. On account of public opinion they departed from the truth of history.”

CHAPTER XXIX

The Study of Law Commended to Princes and Private Persons

§ 1. Jurisprudence is knowledge of divine and human affairs, the science of the just and the unjust. Thus the emperor defines it in book 1 of the Institutes, title 1, law 1. And not undeservedly, for law is twofold, divine and human, and both must be known by one skilled in law. Therefore the definition has not been taken too broadly; for that science is in truth most broad and truly public. Moreover, in the affairs in which prudence is engaged, jurisprudence consists much more fully.

§ 2. It befits princes, chief men, and nobles to devote effort to jurisprudence; indeed, it is necessary.

The primary reason is valid. Just as there can be no state without laws, so there can be none without the soul of the laws--that is, their true meaning and true use, which is rather the indicator and guardian of justice and equity than the words of the legislator are. But princes and chief men themselves ought to possess the meaning. Πᾶσα πόλις ἄπολις ἂν γένοιτο, says Plato in book 6 of the Laws, ἐν ᾗ δικαστήρια μὴ καθεστῶτα εἴη κατὰ τρόπον. "Every state ceases to be a state in which tribunals have not been constituted in right order." But they cannot be constituted rightly if princes are ignorant of their manner. The primary office of a prince is to pronounce law. How will one ignorant of law pronounce law justly, consistently, and certainly?

Jurisprudence is therefore rightly called ἐπιστήμη βασιλικὴ καὶ τῶν βασιλέων, "royal science and the science of kings," for it is both worthy of kings and necessary for kings. For this reason, in certain universities, as in the most celebrated University of Würzburg, we see that in solemn acts the professors and doctors use purple insignia, which is the royal color.

It is established that kings formerly pronounced law. Romulus and the other kings sanctioned laws and ended controversies. The consuls followed the kings and devoted effort to conducting trials. In Varro an attendant cries thus: "All Quirites involved in lawsuits, come here to the judges." Augustus was wholly occupied in pronouncing law. Severus was intent upon civil business above other affairs. Vespasian heard cases to the point of wonder; reclining, he heard embassies, which were generally those of the oppressed, and when his bowels were loosened, while he strained and rose, he died amid the hands of those supporting him. Trajan approached a dangerous popularity; Pliny describes it, unless perhaps he granted something to his ears: "Freedom is available, when the prince goes through public places, to stop, meet him, accompany him, and pass him. You walk among us as though you could be touched, and you make access to yourself available, not so that you may charge it against us. Whoever approaches remains at your side, and each person's own modesty, not your pride, makes an end of his conversation."

Lampridius writes thus concerning Alexander: "He commanded that business and cases first be treated and put in order by the chiefs of the bureaus and by the most learned jurists faithful to himself, of whom Ulpian was then the first, and thus be reported to him. He sanctioned moderate and innumerable laws concerning the right of the people and of the fisc; and he consecrated no constitution without twenty jurists and most learned and wise men, and finally no fewer than fifty most eloquent men, so that there might be no fewer opinions in his council than would constitute a decree of the senate. And this was done in such a way that the opinions of individuals were taken and what each had said was written down, yet with time given for investigating and thinking before they spoke, lest they be compelled to speak without thought concerning immense matters. Moreover, it was his custom that, if he treated of law or business, he summoned only learned and eloquent men; but if of a military matter, veteran soldiers who were sound, deserving, and skilled in places, wars, and camps, and all men of letters, especially those who knew history. He inquired what, in recorded cases like those under deliberation, the ancient emperors, either Roman or of foreign nations, had done."

Since, therefore, it is necessary for them to judge, necessity compels them to be skilled in justice. The greatest care of judging lies even upon the most just and equitable judge, because frequently, although he has done all things according to the laws, he nevertheless condemns and kills an innocent person. How much more is this so if he himself is ignorant of laws and rights? The conduct of trials is wretched medicine, but nevertheless necessary for a state. Augustine, book 19, chapter 6 of The City of God: "What of the judgments of human beings concerning human beings, which cannot be absent even from cities remaining in however great a peace? What do we judge them to be--how wretched, how lamentable--since those judge who cannot discern the consciences of those concerning whom they judge? Hence they are often compelled to seek the truth by torturing innocent witnesses in a matter pertaining to another person's case.

"What when someone is tortured in his own case, and when it is sought whether he is guilty, he is tormented, and the innocent man suffers most certain punishments for an uncertain crime--not because he is discovered to have committed it, but because he is not known not to have committed it? And thus the ignorance of the judge is very often the calamity of the innocent. And what is more intolerable and more to be lamented, and, if it could be done, watered with fountains of tears: when the judge tortures the accused for this reason, lest he unknowingly kill an innocent person, it happens through the wretchedness of ignorance that he kills a tortured and innocent person whom he had tortured lest he kill him innocent.

"For if, according to the wisdom of these men, he chooses to flee from this life rather than endure those torments longer, he says that he committed what he did not commit. After he has been condemned and killed, the judge still does not know whether he killed a guilty or an innocent person--the one whom he tortured lest he unknowingly kill him innocent. And thus he tortured an innocent person in order that he might know, and while he did not know, killed him. Amid this darkness of social life, will that wise judge sit, or will he not sit? He will certainly sit. For human society binds him and draws him to this office, which he judges it wicked to desert.

"For he does not judge this wicked: that innocent witnesses are tortured in the cases of others; that those who are accused, generally overcome by the force of pain and falsely confessing concerning themselves, are punished while innocent, when they had already been tortured while innocent; that even if they are not punished with death, they very often die in the tortures themselves or from them. What of the fact that sometimes even the accusers themselves, desiring perhaps to benefit human society lest crimes remain unpunished, are condemned by an ignorant judge when the witnesses lie and the accused himself withstands the tortures savagely and does not confess, and they are unable to prove the things which they charge, although they charged true things? He does not reckon these so many and so great evils to be sins, for the wise judge does not do these things by a will to harm but by the necessity of not knowing; and yet, because human society compels him, also by the necessity of judging.

"This, therefore, is what we call certainly the wretchedness of a human being, even if it is not the malice of the wise man. Or does he torture the innocent and punish the innocent from the necessity of not knowing and judging, and is it too little for him that he is not guilty unless he is also blessed? How much more considerately and worthily of a human being does he acknowledge wretchedness in that necessity, accept it in himself, and, if he is wise, cry to God: 'Deliver me from my necessities.'"

§ 3. These matters are entrusted unsafely and dangerously to the counsellors of princes and others unless the prince attends diligently and zealously. For very many things are transacted through favor, money, and hatred, and the prince's ignorance falls to the profit of rapacious human beings. The agentes in rebus know how to seize, not to receive, says Julius Capitolinus. And Cyprian, Letter 2: "Although laws have been engraved upon the Twelve Tables and prescribed rights have been affixed upon public bronze, transgression is committed amid the very laws and sin amid the rights; innocence is not preserved even there where it is defended. The fury of those at discord rages mutually, and, peace having been broken among the togas, the forum roars with mad lawsuits. For them the spear, sword, and executioner are ready, the claw which digs out, the rack which stretches, the fire which burns; for the body of a human being, more punishments live than there are limbs. Who among these things will bring aid to truth? An advocate? But he prevaricates and deceives. A judge? But he sells his sentence. He who sits to avenge crimes commits them, and so that an innocent defendant may perish, the judge becomes guilty."

These things are committed especially if the prince is farther away or casts all care of justice upon those whom he trusts. Since afterward they are generally dismissed either with ill favor or even punished capitally, it is sufficiently apparent to what purpose they turned the excessively simple credulity of their prince. Nor can the prince be secure when others sin through his negligence. But a prudent and learned prince is the greatest bridle upon unjust judges. The prince's inexperience makes the judges themselves negligent through security; learning and study make them cautious and diligent.

Ignorance of law and laws--that is, of the state over which he presides--also greatly diminishes authority. Many will deceive one whom they can deceive, but they contemn him. Next, although at times such rulers can judge truly, they cannot judge consistently; wherefore it is necessary that judgments frequently destroy judgments. This is not only ignominious but also dangerous for the prince, when in a similar case some prevail and others are defeated. Crafty and cunning architects of lawsuits will raise their horns and toss justice about. And the name "virtue" will be given to abominable crime.

§ 4. Finally, the laws assist those who are awake, not those who sleep. Therefore let the guardian of law keep watch, for on both sides the matter is conducted with the greatest industry--indeed, with fraud, falsehood, and perjury--so that each may make the judge his own. Those skilled in law also approach, who always leave an occasion for litigation, as inept craftsmen do for correction. Nevertheless, the prince must not yield, but must venture against it. The evil is continuous, always arising anew, and continuous medicine must be applied to it. Seneca speaks excellently in a similar case, book 2 of On Anger, chapter 11: "Surely the man whose ship takes in much water because its joints have loosened on every side is not angry with the sailors and the ship itself. Rather, he meets the danger, excludes one wave and bails out another, closes the manifest holes, and by continual labor resists those which lie hidden and draw bilge-water secretly. Nor does he therefore desist because as much arises as has been exhausted. A slow remedy is needed against continuous and fertile evils--not so that they cease, but so that they do not conquer."

Perseverance is needed here. I affirm boldly that there is need of a hundred eyes, or, if it could be done, that the prince be an Argus--that is, wholly made of eyes--with which he may discern frauds and punish those discerned.

Therefore let the prince be skilled in law and equity, and after the prince the counts, barons, and nobles. He will easily attain this if he appoints no judge or governor unless he is well skilled. This was certainly the intention of Justinian in the proem of the Institutes, §7: "Therefore receive these laws of ours with the greatest effort and eager study, and show yourselves so instructed that the most beautiful hope may foster us that, when the whole work of law has been completed, our state can also be governed by you in the parts to be entrusted to you."

But because he himself was ignorant of letters and law, it came about that, by altering the laws so often, great but avaricious jurists fixed and refixed them according to their own advantages. Poor men, forgive me: I speak in a public cause and speak concerning what is accustomed to happen frequently; I would not wish poor men to devote effort to law and plead cases. For amid an excessive occasion of sin, poverty and squalor are the worst counsellor and impeller. One whose condition is cheap sells justice cheaply; one who, by studying in want, sought through long patience an occasion of profit sells judgments dearly. I am not ignorant that among the poor there are good, just, and holy persons and that God chose the poor. But I now speak of those poor persons who studied law for the sake of riches and honors, and bring a long hunger and dry throats to suck out the marrow of the litigating parties. They wish to become rich, and to become rich quickly.

Meanwhile they magnify the dignity of their station and dress splendidly, lest they appear to have been poor; and when law does not supply enough, riches are sought through injustice. When the crowd of these has prevailed, they turn all things upside down and hold their own prince for sale. Base avarice can indeed rage in high birth; but generally, when such persons take account of their family and dignity and are opulent, with a loftier spirit they do not pursue such abject spoils. Nevertheless, let the prince apply care to these also.

The condition of our law has never been so happy that its very sanctuaries did not beget injustices. Consider Justinian the legislator himself: how the forensic harpies surrounded him with their arts. Evagrius writes thus: “But in Justinian there was so insatiable a desire for money, and so shameful and indeed absurd an appetite for the property of others, that for love of gold he sold all the goods of his subjects to those who administered magistracies, those who collected tribute, and those who wished to lay snares for human beings without any cause. But very many--indeed, innumerable--persons who possessed many good things he deprived of all their fortunes after a false and fictitious charge had been fashioned. And if any prostitute, casting the eyes of cupidity upon someone’s goods, feigned that she had possessed some familiarity or union with him, immediately all rights and laws lay turned away for her sake, provided that she made Justinian a partner in shameful profit; and the possessions of the man who was falsely charged were transferred into her house.”

§ 5. Law cannot stand unless there is one skilled in it through whom it can be preserved; otherwise it will waste away like a corpse. There must be an interpreter of the laws even when the words appear clear, for at times one must depart from them. Charondas, while holding to the words too impiously, killed himself.

True jurisprudence can never be praised sufficiently; the jurisprudence which sows lawsuits can never be punished sufficiently. Jurisconsults hear evil things on account of petty lawyers and, as Besold says in book 2 of the Politics, chapter 2, because most are now occupied with lawsuits and procedures and neither wish nor know how to benefit the state by any other matter, their art, or their knowledge. Hence it is said among the Italians: “A mere legist is a pure and utter ass.” He adds: “Procedures are generally nothing other than the refuge and hiding place of guilty and criminal human beings, but the weariness and affliction of the innocent.” Thus he affirms that methods of shortening lawsuits must be sought diligently.

I set his following words before the prince to be weighed: “The form of judgments and the judicial order which we use in certain places appears to be neither order nor procedure, but rather confusion and a labyrinth. We do not proceed; we wander. The altercation over ceremonies and writings, outside every cognition of the case, is calumnious. Hence formulists, who handle the secrets of procedure, and masters of cautions are held in greater value than artificers of equity. Indeed, the peremptory terms of instances have now been abolished by a most evil custom. Certainly there is now everywhere so great a multitude of laws and rights, and such confusion born from it, that there has been no age from the beginning of the world, nor is there even today any other kingdom or state, in which under the appearance of law error is committed more dangerously, justice is more oppressed, and execution of adjudged matters is more impeded than is now accustomed to happen after we imagine that law has been reborn and, as it were, fallen down to us from heaven--than is accustomed to happen in those places where the rationale and science of law are proclaimed to be more flourishing and more vigorous.”

The same Besold also complains concerning Roman law in book 1, dissertation 14: that it abounds in subtleties and fictions which, after so many years, emperors--or rather the ill-employed interpreters of law--invented.

CHAPTER I

Magistrates Must Be Instructed without Flattery

§ 1. Laws were treated in the preceding book, and their necessity, utility, and force were explained; but without an eminent magistrate the support furnished by laws is weak. Laws are inanimate instruments of peace and happiness; magistrates are living instruments, which administer the state by the use and application of the laws, protect the good, and correct the bad. But those who cannot be corrected, in whom there is nothing capable of good hope, they remove from the midst of mortals--persons who would do worse things than those which occur--so that, in the one way in which they can, they may cease to be bad. Without a magistrate, therefore, laws have no efficacy and inspire no fear; good laws prudently administered by a good magistrate make a state most happy.

For this reason I undertake to set forth the magistrate's dignity, authority, and office. Here I see the rock upon which many political writers have struck--namely, the desire to flatter. For they have wished either to please some king or to commend themselves to the leading men, and they have written things which are accustomed to delight kings and princes more than to instruct and improve them. "In their malice they gladden the king, and in their lies the princes." Many exalt the magistrate's power beyond truth and beyond measure; others even praise vices extravagantly. The slanderer says that good is evil; the lover delights in the vices themselves. Both evils are in the flatterer, whose error is therefore most difficult to cure because it is akin to truth: for since flatterers are the worst of enemies, they seem to be the most benevolent of friends; certainly they are the most agreeable. Flattery not only imitates friendship but conquers and surpasses it: it is received by open and favorably disposed ears and descends into the deepest recesses of the heart, pleasing by the very thing by which it harms.

§ 2. At the outset, therefore, I have resolved to walk upon the straightest road and to offer nothing to the ears of kings and princes except what is true and salutary, altogether unconcerned about how each thing is received. For to put anything into the ears of powerful men profits neither those who are led astray by deceptive praise nor him who, a fawning enemy in place of a friend, makes human beings--weak in judgment by nature--still more foolish.

§ 3. Nothing is more hostile to pontiffs, kings, and powerful men than flattery. For as rust is the peculiar defect of iron, the woodworm of wood, sourness of wine, and mold of bread, so flattery is the peculiar vice of courts. Hence even its name has been taken, so that adulatores are called, as it were, adaulatores--court-attendants--who overthrow the resources of kings more by sycophancy than enemies do by the sword. This poison is powerful and effective because it is admitted most eagerly into the heart and feeds upon its innermost parts. It also inflates minds and distends them with windy swelling, so that they commonly depart from themselves. Hence the most shameful of human beings wished themselves to be believed gods, as did Alexander the Great and the Roman emperors. Flattery made others savage, as Constantius, whom sycophants made cruel. It makes others foolish in great fortune, as Valens, when they repeatedly called his rustic expressions "Ciceronian flowerets." Finally, it makes everyone inhuman, morose, irascible, and eager for vengeance.

Rome flattered Caligula servilely. By blandishments they wished to please a stupid and cruel prince, but the result was that he learned to despise flatteries and, when he interpreted them otherwise, punished them with death. Dio relates in his Caligula: "But when at one time the people shouted, 'Young Augustus,' he thought an injury had been inflicted upon him and ordered very many to be killed. Some of them he ordered to be dragged away from the spectacles and others to be seized as they left the theater, for he was often accustomed to do this." The prince's ears had thus grown accustomed to the most pleasing things, so that pleasing words were received as harsh ones. By the same plague they destroyed Vitellius. "The most intimate of Vitellius's friends," says Tacitus, "kept away those who would have given good counsel, the prince's ears having been so formed that he received harsh things that were useful, and nothing except what was pleasing and would harm him."

§ 4. Nor do flatterers obtain lasting fruit from sycophancy, because, since no one is content with one flatterer, his favor must flourish for only a short time. New men entice minds to themselves by more exquisite blandishment, and swift disgust follows things which have greatly delighted them. Then the nature of dissimulation is ἐφήμερος, "for a day"; but flattery is the most destructive of dissimulations. Nor has anyone thus far been a flatterer of such talent that it did not readily become apparent that he was mocking powerful men. For if they commend things that are not praiseworthy or magnify middling things, they cannot remain hidden for long from the prince unless he is a beast. And although human beings readily allow themselves to be deceived by these men, nevertheless, once flattery has been discovered, they hate it. Elagabalus moved the whole empire to laughter when he smothered parasites with roses or bound them to a waterwheel, so that through pleasures he might kill those who assailed the lives of princes through luxuries.

But if a prince is nevertheless so dull and so much a lover of himself that he cannot recognize those συγκατανευσιφάγους, "fellow-feeders by assent," and ψωμοκόλακας, "bread-flatterers," who for their belly's sake assent to everything, their colleagues and fellow-parasites will nevertheless easily expose them. For nowhere is flattery more recognized and ridiculed than in courts, where witty men also complain that people sin against an eleventh commandment of the Decalogue: "Thou shalt not flatter."

Although that vice is most shameful in every class of human beings, it is truly monstrous in priests, whom the sacred canons teach that it is much better to suffer punishment for truth than to receive a benefice for flattery: cause 11, question 3, Nemo peritorum. St. Gregory attacks flatterers most gravely in book 18 of the Moralia, part 4, chapter 3: "There are some" (distinction 46) "who, while they extol the misdeeds of human beings with praises, increase the things which they ought to have rebuked. Hence it is said through the Prophet: 'Woe to those who sew little cushions under every elbow of the hand and make pillows under the head of every age.' A little cushion is placed for this purpose, that one may rest more softly. Therefore, whoever flatters those who act badly places a cushion under the head or elbow of one who lies down, so that he who ought to have been rebuked for his fault may, supported by praises in that very fault, rest softly. Hence it is written again: 'He was building the wall, but they were coating it.' By the name of a wall the hardness of sin is designated. To build a wall, therefore, is for someone to construct against himself the obstacles of sin. But those who flatter the perpetrators of sins coat the wall, so that the thing which the former, by acting perversely, build, the latter, by flattering, may render as it were shining. But the holy man, just as he does not think evil concerning the good, so refuses to judge good concerning the evil, saying, 'Far be it from me that I should judge you righteous; until I fail, I shall not depart from my innocence.'"

The Fourth Council of Carthage, canon 56, joins flattering clerics with traitors: "A cleric who is discovered to devote himself to flatteries and betrayals shall be degraded from office."

§ 5. Remedies must always be ready at hand for magistrates, and defenses against the flattering doctrines of political writers. For unless they perceive this danger, they will turn away even the counsels of good men; for good counsels are not easily given to a foolish prince or one ensnared by flatteries. The first remedy, therefore, is to be unwilling to be praised. Pescennius Niger said, not altogether imprudently, that while alive he wished to please, but when dead to be praised. The second is this: if this vice has not yet been shaken from the mind, the prince should nevertheless strive to advance so that he willingly hears truths and indicates that he understands and detests mocking encomia. He will recognize clearly that he is being ridiculed if they praise evil things, if they disguise vices under the name of virtues, and if they admire the prince's error. Was he drunk? They raise his affability to heaven. Did he grow angry? They proclaim his magnanimity and his clemency because he did not rage. Did he deceive someone? They cry out that it was prudence. Believe that the man who is a zealous praiser of your offenses will dare great crimes together with you.

Who would not marvel at the folly of Dionysius of Syracuse, a most cunning man, from whom flatterers were called κόλακες? When the flatterers saw that he was growing blind, they too pretended to be blind: they struck against doorposts and walls and eagerly wished to be led by the hand by him to their couches. Wretched were those upon whom tyranny imposed the necessity of such foul flattery; most wretched was the man himself who wished to be mocked in this way.

Next, he will recognize mockery in praises if they pursue true goods with an encomium greater than they deserve; if they make a god from a human being. Such was that flatterer who said:

> All night it rains; the spectacles return in the morning:
> Caesar holds an empire divided with Jupiter.

Third, if they offer an occasion for sinning. Alexander the Great lived in such a way that he was held most shameful by all. Yet Eudaemonicus, his sycophant, in order to show him ἀναμάρτητον, free from sin and altogether immune from every fault, was accustomed to admonish him that at last he should commit some evil. Behold how monstrous is the desire to flatter. The flattery of Anaxarchus belongs here, when he said that whatever the king did was right and lawful. Laertius, book 9, chapter 10. The man who advises these things is a traitor; the man who instills in a prince confidence in evils wishes to harm him.

Fourth, when they praise and ask; for that is accustomed to be the aim of court dogs, who flatter with the tail while you throw out a morsel, but when you have given it they go away; if you ask it back, they snarl. You will never give when flattery precedes, for he will think that you have given to your pride, not to him, since you had to be made senseless before you gave. But if he speaks more humanely about you because of his own art, he will give thanks to his art, not to your munificence.

§ 6. Another remedy is that you show openly that these men are hateful to you. And so they must be assailed with words, as Alexander Severus wished them to be cast aside and received with a guffaw. More high-spiritedly, Ladislaus, king of Poland, caressed them with slaps, with the excellent saying, “I strike back those who strike me.” Vitellius also furnished a remarkable example. After Galba had been killed, Vitellius later found more than one hundred and twenty petitions from men demanding rewards for some notable service on that day. Behold flattery offering itself for sale to the new prince. But what did Vitellius do? He ordered all of them to be sought out and killed--not from regard for Galba, but according to the traditional custom of princes: protection for the present, vengeance for the future. Therefore, O prince, I wish a great and constant hatred of these men to be impressed upon you, and I desire your palace to be purged of them as of mice.

Never believe that those will be faithful to you who either praise your sin or are ready to sin for your sake, who accommodate philosophy, politics, jurisprudence, and theology to your will. Accustom yourself, O prince, to hearing truths, and store these things, such as they are, in your mind. He who willingly hears truths offers great hope of right deeds. For τὸ κατόρθωμα ἐστὶν ἀληθείας ἔγγονον. Every duty arises from truth.

CHAPTER II

That a Magistrate Is Necessary for the State

§ 1. No state can exist without an order of commanding and obeying, just as a human being will not exist unless the members are joined to one another in their natural order, are fitted to one another, and sustain one another by reciprocal assistance and influence. Therefore, without a magistrate the law is, as I have said, inanimate; but that man spoke truly:

> Ἰσχυρὸς ὁ νόμος, ἢν ἄρχοντ᾽ ἔχῃ.
> The law is strong if it has a ruler.

For the whole mass of laws, without this bond and, as it were, cement, is nothing but a ruin. Domestic examples show us this. If the master's stern countenance is absent from the school, if the little servants know that the father of the household has departed from the house, if neither a censor nor a steward acts as his deputy, everything is changed; the insolence of one man, suppressed by reverence, immediately puts itself forth. What, then, happens in a kingdom, where not merely many but very often most, and sometimes all, are bad? Therefore Aristotle truly says in book 6 of the Politics, chapter 8, ἄνευ τῶν ἀναγκαίων ἀρχῶν ἀδύνατον οἰκεῖσθαι πόλεις--without the necessary offices, it is impossible for cities to be inhabited--and Cicero in book 3 of On the Laws says that there is need of magistrates, because without them a city cannot be rightly constituted. This is so true that those who wage war upon the magistracy can in no way do so without another magistracy. The plebeian Romans refuse the authority of the consuls and nobility and withdraw to the Aventine Hill, but they can do nothing without a new magistracy against the old one: they create tribunes and impose laws upon the Fathers. So necessary, indeed, is a magistrate in the state that it is better for there to be a bad one than none.

§ 2. Although this is so, there are nevertheless not lacking in our age--into which all accursed things have flowed--those who have attempted to oppose so evident a light of nature and experience, and to overthrow the entire order of things by a criminal opinion. In former times the Donatists, although they had previously appealed from the Church to the emperors, afterwards rejected every authority of the magistrate. Now the Libertines and Anabaptists introduce all the confusion of anarchy. The Libertines do so because they deny every law and every sin, for they assert that everything is done by God. The Anabaptists invent the claim that the magistracy is opposed to Christian liberty.

But Holy Scripture refutes them, for it commands every soul to be subject to the higher powers, which it would not command unless it willed powers to exist. It calls them διακόνους, ministers of God, and λειτουργοὺς θεοῦ, servants of God, Romans 13:4, 6--indeed, gods. Then, in Matthew 22:21, Christ the Lord commands obedience to Caesar's laws, although Caesar was impious; Paul at Titus 3:1 and Peter in his First Epistle, chapter 2, verse 13, proclaimed what they had received from the Lord's mouth. Hence magistrates and kings are called the Church's nursing fathers and defenders. God sends them as his servants and ministers: Moses, Joshua, Jephthah, Samson, Samuel, David, Solomon, Asa, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and the Maccabees. For Psalms 2:11, Isaiah 60:3, Proverbs 8:15, Isaiah 10:5, Jeremiah 27:6, and Daniel 2:34 bear witness to these things for us. He also commands us to pray for them, 1 Timothy 2:2. Many theologians and jurisconsults have disputed against the Libertines, and the whole world opposes them. Yet those who deny that laws bind the consciences of subjects secretly defend them, as I taught in the book on laws.

§ 3. This is also consonant with natural reason; for unless there is a magistrate, no one will have care of the whole state at once, but its parts here and there will be administered only piecemeal for the advantage of a few. But because haters of magistrates--and therefore of all order and good--disturbers of peace and patrons of robberies, creep up upon the simple and attempt to overthrow the state by sophistries, their frauds must be laid open. For even today there are not lacking those who urge country people, agitated by some commotion, to turn their weapons against their lords. Nor would they act more timidly than Müntzer if only a hope of success appeared. But what can be brought forward for so remarkable a paradox?

§ 4. First, they assail kings in this manner: Christ alone is king in the New Testament; therefore it is unworthy that a human being be joined to God as a colleague. Οὐκ ἀγαθὸν πολυκοιρανίη· εἷς κοίρανος ἔστω. "The rule of many is not good; let there be one lord." Εἷς βασιλεύς, "one king."

But if the power of kings must be eliminated by that argument, nothing prevents children from also fleeing the honor owed to parents and servants the services owed to masters. For one God is said to be Father and Lord. Christ is king, but a king μέγας, κράτιστος, great and most powerful, the King of kings and Lord of those who exercise lordship; all pious kings obey him, and by him all impious kings will be condemned. He is the priest, and yet he did not remove the offices of other priests who serve him. This argument has been taken from the foul cesspools of the Calvinists, who reason thus: Christ is the one pontiff, the sole mediator; therefore there is no other pontiff or mediator. For it is transferred from those claims to these others on an exactly equal basis of reasoning. But if they distinguished between him who is king by nature, the supreme pontiff in office and dignity, and the mediator who has perfectly reconciled us and paid the price, and those who, inferior in infinitely many ways, are called pontiffs and mediators, there would long ago have been no dispute.

§ 5. They say that in Genesis 49:10 political kingship was to endure until Christ, and therefore was taken away at his coming. For Christ fled when a kingdom was offered to him, John 6; and when he was asked to judge between brothers, he rejected the jurisdiction, Luke 12:14. Indeed, he expressly denied that his kingdom was of this world, and, not without just rebuke, denied secular power to the disciples when they ambitiously sought it.

These things too were fashioned from the same mud. For sayings originally uttered by the leading sectarians against the power of ecclesiastics were twisted by their disciples against secular power. Both groups acted impiously and seditiously. For all the deeds of Christ have not necessarily been proposed for all to imitate. Christ lived a celibate and poor life, yet neither the Libertines nor the Anabaptists judged that by Christ's example a law of poverty or celibacy had been imposed upon them.

§ 6. They also deny that any pious man can undertake or govern a state, for in Judges 9 the olive tree refused to leave its fatness and the vine its sweet wine in order to be promoted among the trees, but the bramble accepted the kingdom. Hence Satan is the prince of the world, John 12:3 and 16:11.

This is a great injury to pious kings: to impose upon all magistrates the things which were said concerning a rebellious and impious people and a most cruel tyrant, a killer of his brothers. Nor is Satan king of any kingdom; rather, he is king over all the children of pride, king of the world--that is, of the body of the impious. No right over anyone and no power has been given to the devil; instead, by persuading to evil and dissuading from good he usurps a right for himself. This fruit too has sprouted from the bastard shoot of the new heresy. Luther said many things against princes. Aretius the Calvinist pronounced that the ornaments of empire were affixed by the devil. He said that persecution extends as widely as the Roman Empire.

§ 7. Finally, they put forward liberty. The human being was created free by God; why, therefore, is he oppressed by servitude to a king? First Corinthians 7:23: "Do not become servants of human beings." And Romans 13:8: "Owe nothing to anyone." A magistrate was imposed upon the imperfect Jews because they were children needing a pedagogue, but an anointing teaches Christians all things. Therefore the magistrate must not be obeyed. All these arguments tend toward this: that each person may live by his own choice and that there may be neither coercion of the harmful nor vengeance for injuries--as though the highest liberty were not to obey a lawful magistrate, that is, the divine ordinance.

And these were the beginnings of Europe's disturbance by civil wars and discords. For we have seen men learned in letters, who boasted that they were advocates of piety and justice, teach in public writings--a thing belonging to savage nations--that hands could be laid upon magistrates. How much more prudently, and how much more agreeably to peace, reason, and the laws of God, Aristotle judged that the man who cursed a magistrate should be heavily fined, because he was held to have offended not so much against the magistrate as against the state. Right must therefore be heard, and it must be held as certain that the magistrate is sacrosanct and must be obeyed, and that every injury inflicted upon him is graver. For the laws rightly call every injury inflicted upon a magistrate atrocious. Π, book 47, title 10, law 7, Atrocem autem iniuriam: "Labeo says that an injury becomes atrocious either because of the person, the time, or the thing itself. Because of the person, an injury becomes more atrocious when it is done to a magistrate, a parent, or a patron. Because of time, if an injury was done at the games and in public view, or in solitude.

He says that it makes a great difference because one done in public view is more atrocious. Because of the thing, Labeo says an injury is held atrocious, for example, if a wound was inflicted or someone's face was struck."

The reason is taken from natural law, because all owe singular honor to a magistrate; then, because he is the minister of justice and must therefore undergo the hostility of many, for which reason the state has armed him with a bodyguard; finally, because when his authority is violated the public safety is endangered.

I do not see, therefore, how anyone can rise against magistrates--unless he seeks his own safety from confusion--when he sees that in the Old Testament priest succeeded priest and king succeeded king, and that now each has been transferred into another priesthood and kingship. Among other nations the right of magistrates has rested upon that common law which they call the law of nations. Yet God sometimes establishes a presiding magistrate immediately by himself, and sometimes through an assembly and the public meetings of princes or peoples. Irenaeus speaks truly in book 5, chapter 24: "By the command of him by whose command human beings are born, kings also are established who are suited to those who are governed by them at that time."

And these things are against the despisers of magistrates and of the divine ordinance. No less must the flatterers of magistrates be restrained: they grant kings some things which are owed to them, but other things that are ὑπέρογκα, over-swollen and too exalted. True reverence is owed to them, as is a testimony of love and honorable opinion. For the king's reputation and honor are necessary for protecting the state. Yet the misdeeds of an impious king must not be approved. For Samuel honored Saul before the people only when induced by great entreaties. The king's dignity and power demand this, and therefore an attack by a curse upon the prince's majesty is avenged by death. Next, kings must be obeyed unless they command crimes. Assistance also is owed to the king, not only when he needs money and a soldier but also when he is in danger. Indeed, one's life must be laid down for the person of the prince if that person is endangered to the public harm. It belongs here that they should not inflict loss upon him and should not aid his enemies, either in deed or counsel. These things, and matters connected with them, are truly owed to the prince.

Flattery has invented other things: that whatever the king commands is right and lawful; that all things belong to the king; that the government of one--namely, monarchy--is the sole form arising from nature, whereas in all the others human beings have deviated from the straight path of nature; and that those who introduced the rule of aristocrats or of the people in human affairs erred no less than those who introduced presbyterianism in divine affairs. Thus says that new-fledged petty parasite William Barrett in book 1 of The Right of the King, chapter 1. Although this error may appear speculative, if it is accepted it will disturb every kingdom; for wherever there is another form of government, the state is accused of having departed from natural law.

§ 8. But he surpassed the talents of all sycophants when he permitted an unrestricted tyranny to kings, whom alone he allows to be rulers by natural law. For he judges that the right of the king which Samuel sets forth in 1 Kings, chapter 8, is a true right. Thus in book 1, chapter 1: "The right of the king is set down expressly and deliberately by Samuel in 1 Kings, chapter 8, where kingship itself is instituted and inaugurated. Nor does the man of God instruct a tyrant or an unjust king, as Becanus rashly holds with Calvin; for in the following chapter he intimates to Saul himself that the very things which he recounts fully and explicitly in that same chapter as to be exacted by the king and endured by the people can be arrogated and appropriated to himself by the king through princely right: 'And to whom will all the best things of Israel belong? Will they not belong to you?' and so forth. Yet to say or think that the Prophet wished or endeavored to entice him toward tyranny is sacrilege. Nor does Becanus appear to have paid sufficient attention to the king's right or dignity when he denies to the king the things granted by the Prophet, especially since it is not doubtful, by almost the common consent of theologians as well as jurisconsults, that all these things belong to the prince, and, among them, the best things mentioned by the Prophet, provided that what is just and equitable is observed; nor do they savor of tyranny unless the burden is immoderate.

"For who denies to the king horsemen, tribunes, centurions, and servants of different kinds, noble as well as plebeian, and that they should be maintained at the expense of the subjects, at least in a new principate? Likewise, that he can impose tributes and taxes under the name of tithes, by which his dignity is sustained and public expenditures are discharged? But when Samuel predicts that the Jews will earnestly pray to be freed from these things, this is the meaning: when you perceive that the royal pomp will be burdensome to you because of the aforesaid charges--as is fitting to its rank--whereas I administered the governorship without ostentation--as befits a priest--and without expense, and did not inconvenience you even in the smallest matter, then you will cry to God, but he will not hear you. The reason is that you asked for a king, who must be supported in keeping with his dignity.

"But let us examine briefly, if you please, the things here called royal rights, and compare them with those which in empires and kingdoms of the Christian faith are imposed and exacted from the nobility without the calumny of tyranny. First, that the king should have a royal retinue: nothing is more becoming or more honorable to the attendants themselves. Hence arises the origin of secular dignities, their subordination, and the distinction of their names.

"Second--which is especially exposed to calumny--'he will give your fields,' and so forth, 'to his servants.' That the king's servants should be maintained and supported is just and equitable. But where nothing is masterless and a kingdom must be founded by a new right, a despotic right must necessarily yield to the royal right, unless the subjects themselves voluntarily confer what is just. Third, 'he will tithe your crops.' In place of this, landed dues are paid under the name of tribute; and in another form, according to the differing condition of the kingdom, princes who were not avaricious have decreed not a tenth but an eighth: the law Praestatione, Code, On Taxes. In some places, even in our own times, a tenth itself is imposed, namely upon things sold and exchanged and also upon provisions; elsewhere another tax, but one no smaller, is imposed according to the variety of kingdoms, as are customs duties, tolls, and other things of this kind, while the right of the fisc remains unimpaired.

"Fourth, 'he will put your servants and asses to his work,' and so forth, 'and you will be his servants.' The kinds of these are the burdens which we call public services, and in accordance with the divine concession they are threefold: real, personal, and mixed. Real services are those rendered to the prince by means of the subjects' property, as by draught animals, wagons, and so forth. Personal services are those furnished by the persons themselves, as to serve at court or elsewhere at certain times. Mixed services consist of both, as when someone serves or accompanies the prince at his own expense upon a journey or to war, and so forth.

"Tyranny can therefore be avoided and equity observed in these things--and it will always be observed--if these four things are not wanting in royal impositions: if there is a just cause for imposing them; if the burden is proportionate to the tax; if the payment is adjusted to each person's means, so that the poor are not compelled to contribute by lot more than those who are richer; and if it is not prolonged beyond necessity. Nor do the theologians dissent. Although all these things, therefore, have been decreed by human law, they are nevertheless owed by divine right, because by the same right the power is ordained. Hence the divine writings say: 'Give the census to Caesar'; 'Render tribute to whom tribute is owed, and taxes to whom taxes are owed.'"

But many things teach, and many persons--not only Becanus and Calvin--maintain, that this supposed right of the king is not equitable and not granted, but usurped. Let us draw back for a little while that royal dog, that new Aristippus creeping into courts.

§ 9. First, the words themselves show that it is not a lawful right but a depraved one, for they are of such a kind as to display tyrannical rapacity. For although our translator has rendered it most excellently "the right of the king," and τὸ δικαίωμα, nevertheless the Prophet did not judge it true right and equity but that which the king would employ. For משפט signifies not only right, judgment, power, and norm, but also custom, state, condition, manner, example, crime, and punishment. But let us hear the words, verse 11: המלך משפט יהיה וזה.

> And he said: This will be the right, state, and condition of the king who will rule over you. He will take your sons and place them in his chariots, and he will make horsemen for himself and forerunners of his four-horse chariots. He will appoint for himself tribunes and centurions, plowmen of his fields, reapers of his crops, and makers of his weapons and chariots. He will also make your daughters his perfumers, cooks, and bakers. He will likewise take your fields, vineyards, and best olive groves and give them to his servants. He will also tithe your crops and the revenues of your vineyards, to give them to his eunuchs and servants. He will also take away your servants, handmaids, best young men, and asses and put them to his work. He will likewise tithe your flocks, and you will be his servants. And on that day you will cry out from before your king, whom you chose for yourselves; and the Lord will not hear you on that day, because you asked for a king for yourselves.

God clearly taught us that this is not a lawful right, for he prescribed a different one in Deuteronomy 17:

> When you have entered the land which the Lord your God will give you, and possess it and dwell in it, and say, "I shall set a king over me, as all the nations round about have," you shall set up the man whom the Lord your God chooses from among your brothers. You shall not be able to make a man of another nation king, one who is not your brother. And when he has been appointed, he shall not multiply horses for himself, nor lead the people back into Egypt, supported by the number of his cavalry, especially since the Lord commanded you never again to return by the same road. He shall not have very many wives who entice his mind, nor immense weights of silver and gold. But after he has sat upon the throne of his kingdom, he shall copy out for himself the Deuteronomy of this law in a volume, receiving the exemplar from the priests of the Levitical tribe; and he shall have it with him and read it all the days of his life, so that he may learn to fear the Lord his God and to guard his words and ceremonies which have been commanded in the law. Nor shall his heart be raised in pride above his brothers, nor shall he turn aside to the right or left, so that he himself and his son may reign for a long time over Israel.

He shall not multiply horses for himself, for that pomp must greatly burden the people, just as happens also when kings indulge the treasury too greatly. Then he is not to multiply numerous wives, for the multitude and intolerable luxury of queens is burdensome to subjects. Finally, he shall read and observe the book of the law; but thrift and brotherly charity are prescribed in it, and acts of plunder are forbidden, however just and specious the names for plundering which they receive.

Certain words indicate open tyranny, verse 17: "And you will be his servants. And on that day you will cry out from before your king, whom you chose for yourselves; and the Lord will not hear you on that day." The cry of oppressed subjects--oppressed not by war but by the king's rapacity--signifies not a just and paternal prince who, with a good affection, takes counsel for subjects as for children, but a harsh exactor who makes slaves from free persons and rules with the tears of many of his people. Servitude is the ultimate evil; but your kings will use you as servants, while you, voluntarily, though you are free, bring a master upon yourselves. When necessity was throwing Pompey into the power of the boy-king and the hand of the half-man, he did not forget himself, but complained that the very meeting was a compact of servitude. Whoever enters a tyrant's palace is his servant, even if he came free. No one doubts that this is tyrannical. Nor does he speak according to the common usage by which some eastern peoples called themselves servants, but concerning that harsh servitude which they bore unwillingly.

Yet the flatterer excuses that right: horsemen, tribunes, centurions, and attendants must be maintained. We do not deny that this is so. But these things were also necessary in an aristocracy and in popular government if war had to be waged, and in peace, so that they might be prepared for wars. Here, however, the Prophet speaks about pomp which is superfluous and burdensome to peoples. Moderate pomp is not condemned--pomp suited to majesty and protection which cannot burden the people, for what suffices for moderation can generally be collected from many light tolls.

He offers no excuse concerning the daughters, although to take freeborn virgins as servants of royal luxuries is contrary to right. Let the king use the service of freeborn women if any wish, for pay or in hope of favor, to expend their labor. Therefore, he is speaking about injury; otherwise it is not tyranny, nor even harshness, that persons who voluntarily offer themselves for service at courts and seek rewards should be employed there. Experience teaches that very many aspire to such service even today. Here, however, freeborn women are taken like slaves as perfumers, cooks, and bakers, and with such bitterness that they and their parents cry out from before the king.

He says it is equitable that the king's servants be supported; but where nothing is masterless and a kingdom must be founded by a new right, a despotic right must necessarily yield to the royal right.

Right reason, and indeed justice, counsels that the royal household be supported. But let the household be moderate, not excessively large, not clothed too expensively, and not nourished delicately. Let no fields, olive groves, or best vineyards be given to it, but an honorable wage; or, in turn, let its members guard the king without pay.

But if subjects are unwilling to contribute for the protection and dignity of the king, he will nevertheless not be able to seize the fields or vineyards of private persons. Then, if so great a door is opened to the supreme power, there will be no end to plundering. Who doubts that Ahab was punished because he took Naboth's vineyard against its owner's will? But we are disputing about the meaning of Scripture. The Prophet Samuel by no means threatens that, if the subjects refuse to give what is just, the king will procure it for himself. For when the Jews sought a king according to the custom of neighboring nations, they did not deny him his just ornaments. Rather, this is the punishment--so that the flatterers, informers, calumniators, and inventors of pleasures belonging to the king may know that they are to be enriched from the resources of the provincials.

Fourth, he also asserts that tithes are lawful, indeed that certain princes took eighths, and that this is a right of the kingdom. But the right of tithes is another dispute. It is not a sin, but altogether just and according to nature, that people contribute tithes and other aids. Here, however, the tithes are given to the most wicked of human beings, eunuchs--and tithes from so fertile a kingdom! Malevolent and avaricious eunuchs, when they attained favor with princes, were a certain plague of the state; among so many myriads scarcely ten were good. Castrated men were prohibited in Judaea, and so the foreigners who were fattened by tithes were eunuchs.

Nor is it relevant that he proposes four things in these matters for avoiding tyranny: (1) that there be a just cause for imposing; (2) that the burden be proportionate to the tax; (3) that payment be adjusted to means; and (4) that it not be prolonged beyond necessity. Those things are most true, but the Holy Spirit speaks of the things on account of which they will cry to God and will be servants. Yet no one will cry out if tributes are to be given justly, proportionately, according to means, and for a necessary cause. For this is the safety of a well-constituted state. Nor could anyone have been burdened if Judaea had sustained a moderate court for the king, since it had previously supported very many kings. Moreover, the things which had to be done in time of war ought no less to have been exacted by the commanders and judges. Justice and equity demonstrate how narrowly the power of kings has in truth been confined.

CHAPTER III

Magistracy Is Twofold: Ecclesiastical and Civil

§ 1. Just as the nature of the human being consists of soul and body, so too there are two principles by which, according to nature, he is directed and led to his proper ends. The first is political power, which God willed to exist for the safety of bodies, peace, and the natural honorable conduct of life; the second is spiritual power, which raises the soul toward divine and supernatural things.

§ 2. The rivalry between priesthood and kingship is ancient. Many, admiring or flattering royal majesty, place the scepter before the miter; wiser and more eminent men, remote from every suspicion of flattery, prefer the priesthood. The rights of kings are great. In the king is the fountain of dignities and the image of the highest glory. Cyril says in On the Right Faith in Christ: "To them it is said, 'You are gods, and all of you sons of the Most High.'" They sit upon God's throne, are avengers, and bear the sword; they are the Lord's anointed, lights of the Church, sacrosanct, together with the very many other things which eternal Majesty has sanctioned for the stability of human majesty.

Nevertheless, the priesthood is greater than kingship, for to it it was said: "Whatever you loose upon earth will be loosed also in heaven, and whatever you bind upon earth will be bound also in heaven." The priest, therefore, will loose or bind the king, and the priest's judgment will be ratified in heaven before God. Ambrose, bishop of Milan, who was praised for the lot of a priest and for the judgment of a good king, testifies that kings are not exempt from that jurisdiction. Nor do those deny it who transferred the dignity of the old priesthood to the curia and royal diadem, for they have arrogated this power to themselves and to their churches, as they call them. I shall treat that matter when I discuss political magistracy; now I shall set forth the difference between the two powers and the eminence of the spiritual power.

§ 3. The first difference between sacred and civil power is seen in the end of each. The end of the ecclesiastical magistrate is to lead subjects to piety, religion, and supernatural happiness, and that by virtue of his office and a singular obligation. The political magistrate looks to peace, public tranquillity, and moral virtue. Yet because he is sometimes a Christian, he must refer all those things to God's glory and eternal salvation. Therefore these powers must be joined with the greatest zeal, so that by mutual assistance they may make good citizens. Hence the ecclesiastical magistrate will make provision in every way for public quiet, and the prince will remove from the midst those things which obstruct religion, such as blasphemies, the frenzies of the circus, and the obscenities of the theater.

Next, they also have a different efficient cause. For although both kingship and priesthood are from God, there is nevertheless generally a difference in the manner of conferral. The people, or the whole state, confers civil jurisdiction; although that right resides in a few, the few nevertheless received it from the whole state. The right of the priesthood is greater and more divine than to be conferred by the people or a prince. The right of civil power arises from nature and is assigned by the state to one or more persons; but among sacred prelates the person is designated by human beings and the power is conferred by God.

§ 4. They differ in the manner of governing and in the means tending toward their different ends. The pontiff, by teaching, exhorting, and proposing eternal rewards, calls people away from vices and leads them to virtue. The emperor also employs these means, but uses command more than admonition. The reason for the difference is that civil power in itself regards external acts only; ecclesiastical power presses upon minds and inward piety. Hence civil punishments are generally external, such as infamy, exile, and death; ecclesiastical punishments are mostly internal, such as excommunication and irregularity, which pertain to souls, although it employs external punishments too.

§ 5. If civil and spiritual power are compared with one another, civil power has a prerogative in certain things; spiritual power is more excellent absolutely. If contention is absent from either side, this readily becomes clear.

Civil power has certain things which are not fitting for sacred power. The first of these is the insignia and display of majesty and the multitude of guards. For a bishop is not to be approved if he proceeds with royal or princely splendor, unless he is also a prince.

The second is that civil authority has a right over bodies--to cut them down and kill them. Spiritual authority, however, cannot exceed paternal correction in punishments of the body. Of itself it has no power to kill, mutilate, torture, cut to pieces with whips, punish by exile, or consign someone to a severe and perpetual prison. For these are works of the corporeal sword. Thus Gregory writes to John, bishop of Constantinople, in book 2, epistle 52: "Your Fraternity knows well what the canons say concerning bishops who wish to be feared through blows. For we have been made shepherds, not strikers; and the eminent preacher says, 'Reprove, entreat, rebuke, in all patience and doctrine.' But this preaching which exacts faith by blows is new and unheard of."

Moderate correction is nevertheless permitted; persons are rightly chastised with blows, prisons, and exiles according to the prescription of the canons when their deserts so require. But when this power exercises graver punishments, it has been received from the secular power and employs the secular hand.

The third is that kings have power even over priests themselves unless they are exempt, as they now are in fact and by law. I shall speak about this later, when I treat exemption.

§ 6. Spiritual power is absolutely more worthy and more excellent than civil power. For it is architectonic, and civil power is subordinated to it, since the end of sacred power is far more excellent. Therefore Christ, the king of the daughter of Sion, the meek king, always exercised the former power, but scarcely ever the political power.

§ 7. The prerogative of sacred power is manifold.

The first dignity is certainly attributed to the priesthood by the judgments of all nations; its cause is that the priest is placed as an intermediary between God and the people. Hence too the priest is protected more by divine power than by his own power. Thus an otherwise atheistic writer and denier of divine providence judges concerning this matter; looking upon the effect, he did not know the cause. Machiavelli says in chapter 11 of his Prince: "Now there remains for us only to discuss the pontifical and sacred principate. All difficulties surround it before it is possessed. For it is sought either through the favor of virtue or of fortune; yet it is preserved by the effort of neither. It is maintained by institutions which have now grown old by antiquity in religion itself, and the force and nature of all these is so great that they preserve their princes in authority, however they conduct themselves or order their life. These alone among all persons possess dominion,

"yet do not defend it. They also possess peoples subjected to them, but no care of governing those peoples touches them. Although their provinces are undefended, there is no one who takes them away. Likewise, although the peoples under their administration perceive themselves neglected, they give it no consideration. So far are they from thinking that they should withdraw or free themselves from these princes that they are not even able to do so. These alone among all persons, therefore, possess secure and happy dominions."

Yet amid his calumnies and impiety these words shine forth: that they are ruled by a heavenly divinity and that God bears them on high.

Indeed, not only the true and Christian priesthood possesses this praise and power, but also that of the Jews, which was held in great honor because it was a type and image of that supercelestial light which Christ--the true priest according to the order of Melchizedek and the true king of the Church--introduced through himself and through his legates and vicars, the pontiffs. The authority of the typological priesthood is fortified by the most holy law of God, Deuteronomy 17:

> If you perceive that a difficult and ambiguous judgment exists among you between blood and blood, cause and cause, leprosy and non-leprosy, and you see the words of the judges within your gates vary, arise and ascend to the place which the Lord your God will choose. You shall come to the priests of Levitical stock and to the judge who shall be at that time; and you shall inquire of them, and they will indicate to you the truth of the judgment. You shall do whatever those who preside over the place which the Lord has chosen say and teach you according to his law; you shall follow their sentence and shall turn aside neither to the right nor to the left.

Hence superstition also transferred power to the impious and idolatrous priests of the nations. "In ancient times," says Strabo in book 17 of his Geography, "at Meroë, which is the metropolis of the Ethiopian kingdom, the highest power was in the hands of the priests, and their authority was so great that sometimes they commanded the king to die by sending a messenger and substituted another in his place."

They possessed the same power in neighboring Egypt, according to Aelian in book 14, chapter 34, of the Varia Historia; for among the Egyptians the judges were the same persons as the priests. In former times the Magi, who were both wise men and sacrificers, ruled in Persia. "But now," says Agathias, "the Persians honor the Magi of this time and venerate them exceedingly, so that by their counsel and predictions all public matters are administered. Presiding and judging separately, they determine what reward each person merits for a thing well done and what punishment one who has committed a crime merits; nor indeed will anything seem either lawful or equitable to the Persians which has not been confirmed by the sentence of the Magi." Thus he writes in book 2 of his Histories. The cause of so honored a superstition was that they regarded the divinity itself as venerable and therefore thought that its worshipers also ought to be revered.

And so the Romans likewise conferred many matters upon the jurisdiction of the priesthood: they sought from the priests the reckoning of treaties, wars, and peace.

§ 8. A second prerogative lies in exemption from laws and civil burdens, and it is a liberty greater than all others. This has been granted partly by divine and partly by human law. By divine law they possess the immunity which is necessary for the office of sacrificing, teaching, binding, and absolving.

For when Christ sent his Apostles into all the earth, no power in the entire world could impede, delay, or in any way restrain them. And so, against the edicts of the Jews, Roman governors, and barbarian kings, and against persecutions, prisons, torments, and crosses, they announced the name of the Lord without fear. They can be impeded in their office neither by express decrees nor through indirect measures and cunning craft. They cannot be so occupied with curial offices that they cannot be free for studies, prayers, and exhortation. This reason applies to all civil burdens which prohibit spiritual exercises. For if God established Apostles, Doctors, Evangelists, and Bishops, and if he willed them to perform their office, then that which opposes the divine hierarchy is tyranny and impious dominion. Nor is their mission a just one if there is another power in the Christian world which can lawfully overthrow and impede it. For example, it is the Bishop's office to feed the sheep, preserve them whole, bind up the broken, strengthen the weak, be present to all through admonition, exhortation, counsel, and aid, and profit them through consolation and rebuke. Therefore, the emperor cannot occupy him in court business, embassies, warfare, or provincial administration in such a manner that he is compelled to desist from his function, for it is altogether necessary that provision be made for that function through the Bishops themselves or other suitable and diligent laborers lawfully substituted for them. This immunity, therefore, belongs to divine right. For St. Paul or Peter was not compelled to answer Nero when he called their names or to go campaign against barbarians; nor were Bishops and presbyters such as Timothy, Titus, and others, upon abandoning the word of God, bound by imperial commands, nor could they have been bound.

Another exemption belongs to human law and was granted by the munificence and authority of pious princes. All the legal defenses are full of such things, as is the law of Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, Augustuses, title 2 of book 1 of the Code:

> It pleases us, after the tenor of reasonable counsel has been weighed, to prescribe with strict moderation the particular necessities of the individual cities from which churches shall be immune. For first the injury of that usurpation must be driven away, lest estates dedicated to the uses of heavenly mysteries be harassed by the dregs of sordid public services. From this time forward let nothing extraordinary or superindicted be demanded; let no anxiety about transport be invented; finally, let nothing be ascribed to their functions beyond the canonical contribution which the sudden burden of an unforeseen necessity has demanded. If anyone contravenes this, after the sharpness of the vengeance which must rightly be exacted against sacrilegious persons, let him be subjected to perpetual deportation into exile.

And there is the constitution of Emperor Frederick II:

> We command it to be proclaimed throughout Italy that all statutes and customs introduced against the liberty of the Church and her persons, contrary to canonical and imperial sanctions, are null and void; a new constitution commands that they be utterly abolished from the capitularies, and decrees that similar attempts shall henceforth be null by the law itself. If anything contrary is done, the appointed penalties will threaten. But if any despisers of this new constitution are found within a year, their goods throughout our entire empire may be occupied by everyone with impunity.

And that of Constantine:

> Let the injustice of every undue summons and the wickedness of unjust exaction be repelled from clerics, and let there be no summons against them for sordid public services. And when merchants are called to some suitable contribution, let every disturbance of this kind cease with respect to clerics. For if they have amassed anything either by thrift, foresight, or commerce--yet commerce conscious of honor--it ought to be administered for the use of the poor and needy. Let them consider that whatever could have been sought and collected in their workshops or shops has been collected as the profit of religion. Moreover, the statutes of the deified prince my father provided by manifold observance even for their people who engage in commerce, so that these clerics might abound in more privileges. Therefore, let the necessity of extraordinary services and every molestation cease with respect to the aforesaid.

> Let them not be called to any compulsory transport service, nor their resources and property. Let a prerogative of this kind come to the aid of all clerics, so that the wives of clerics and their children too, and their servants, males as well as females, and their sons and daughters, may remain forever immune from public services of this kind.

The whole third title of the first book, On Bishops, Clerics, and Orphanages, pursues these matters.

This exemption of property and persons is consonant with divine law, but was granted by human laws. It could scarcely have been denied, because it was becoming and nearly necessary that God's ministers should be endowed with that immunity. But that all those things be preserved for the sacred order is required by the covenants and agreements and by the sanctity and good faith of those who granted them.

§ 9. The third prerogative is that the emperor or prince has no right in ecclesiastical matters. Thus King Uzziah too, says Cyprian in his book On the Unity of the Church, "when, carrying the censer and violently assuming for himself a sacrifice contrary to God's law, he was unwilling to obey and believe Azariah the priest when he resisted him, was confounded by divine indignation and marked on his forehead by the variegation of leprosy. When the Lord was offended, he was marked in that part of the body where those who merit the Lord are marked. And the sons of Aaron, who placed upon the altar strange fire which the Lord had not commanded, were immediately extinguished in the sight of the avenging Lord."

Therefore, in the Third Roman Synod under Symmachus it was decreed that kings should not involve themselves in sacred affairs, distinction 96, chapter 1, Bene. Thus also at the Council of Chalcedon Marcian wished to be present not as judge but to protect the decrees: "We wished to be present," he says, "to confirm the faith, not to display power, according to the example of the most religious prince Constantine." Finally, in chapter 5 he denies that he judges divine matters. No less did Theodosius, when he sent Candidianus, count of the household troops, to the Council of Ephesus, forbid him to involve himself in ecclesiastical discussions. Hence Constantine the Great, when the Donatists appealed to him, referred them back to Melchiades. Valentinian too, when Hypatianus, bishop of Heraclea, consulted him about the location of a council, replied: "It is not lawful for me to involve myself in ecclesiastical business; let them assemble wherever they please." Socrates, book 4, chapter 3. The same emperor fined a Bishop who appealed from a synod to a secular tribunal and prohibited such appeals. Emperor Gratian referred the causes of Bishops from the secular tribunal to the Metropolitans.

Therefore, the constancy of Ambrose is deservedly praised. In the presence of the younger Emperor Valentinian and secular judges, he refused to dispute against Auxentius, the Bishop of the Arian party, and yielded nothing of his liberty either to threats or to reverence for the August power. This reverence for pontiffs came upon even impious emperors and kings. Theodoric, the Arian king of the Goths, wished the judges in the accusation of Symmachus to be Bishops, to whom he remitted the inquiry. His grandson Athalaric imitated him and refused to allow clerics to be judged by secular men.

But more will be said about these matters elsewhere. For now these things had to be said concerning the difference between empire and priesthood, a difference which Ambrose in chapter 2 of On the Dignity of the Priesthood reports to be so great that, if you compare priesthood to kingship, priesthood will be what gold is among metals. Gregory Nazianzen says: "We too exercise authority--and one more excellent, unless indeed it is equitable to subject the spirit to the fasces of the flesh." Chrysostom says the same in homilies 4 and 5 on Isaiah.

Gelasius therefore truly distinguished these two powers when he wrote to Emperor Anastasius: "There are two things, Emperor Augustus" (distinction 96, chapter 10), "by which this world is principally governed: the sacred authority of the Pontiffs and the royal power. Of these, the burden of the priests is so much the weightier because they will have to render an account at the divine judgment even for the kings of human beings." Gregory VII adduces these words in confirmation of the truth.

§ 10. The civil magistrate is the priests' advocate and defender. "Most Christian prince," says Boniface to Honorius, "Mother Church would be afflicted with many more things if her causes were not secure before you and if, in the suppression of idols and the correction of heretics, she had not prevailed by your faith, divine worship always flourishing together with the empire." Hence the emperor is also bound to the pontiff by oath. His oath in the constitution of Otto is this:

> To you, Lord Pope John, I, King Otto, make promise and oath through the Father and the Son, through this wood of the life-giving cross, and through these relics of the saints: that, if by the Lord's permission I come to Rome, I will exalt the holy Roman Church and you, her ruler, according to my power; and never by my will, counsel, consent, or exhortation shall you lose the life, limbs, and honor which you possess. In the city of Rome I shall make no assembly or ordinance concerning anything which pertains to you or to the Romans without your counsel; and whatever of the land of St. Peter comes into our power I shall restore to you. Whoever I entrust with the Italian kingdom, I shall cause him to swear that he will be your helper in defending the land of St. Peter according to his power. So help me God and these holy Gospels of God.

And so kings and princes have been accustomed to call themselves sons of the Church; tyrants call themselves her masters. Gregory VII speaks excellently: "Who doubts that the priests of Christ are accounted fathers and teachers of kings, princes, and all the faithful? Is it not recognized as wretched madness if a son endeavors to subject his father to himself, or a disciple his teacher, and to submit him by unjust obligations to his own power--the man by whom he believes that he can be bound and loosed not only on earth but also in heaven?" A judge of kings, at least in the manner in which he judges kings, is greater than kings.

> Over kings, fearful among their own flocks,

The priest has authority even over the kings themselves.

§ 11. The civil power honors the priesthood exceedingly. Thus Marcellus writes to Maxentius: "It belongs to a good and religious prince to restore churches that have been crushed and torn apart, to build new ones, and to honor and protect the priests of God. Hence we read that the holy Apostles and their successors established under divine attestation that persecutions ought not to be made, disturbances ought not to be inflicted, those laboring in the Lord's field ought not to be envied, and the dispensers of the eternal king ought not to be expelled."

Nor is excess in that honor easy, since God is honored in his minister.

§ 12. In sacred matters the royal will is subject to the priest. Thus distinction 10, chapter 3: "It is certain that this is salutary for your affairs: when the causes of God are treated, in accordance with his constitution, you should endeavor to subject the royal will to Christ's priests, not to prefer it; you should learn the sacrosanct things from their prelates rather than teach them; you should follow the ecclesiastical form, not prescribe by human agency rights which it must follow; and you should not wish to rule over the sanctions of him to whose clemency God willed the neck of your pious devotion to be submitted, lest, while the measure of the heavenly ordering is exceeded, an insult be made against the one who orders."

The reason is set forth by Clement I in epistle 3, On the Office of Priests:

> For because you perform the Lord's embassy, it is yours to teach the peoples; it is theirs to obey you as God. But if all presbyters, deacons, subdeacons, and the remaining clerics, and all princes of both higher and lower rank, and the remaining peoples, tribes, and tongues do not obey you Bishops, they will be not only infamous but exiles from the kingdom of God and the fellowship of the faithful, and strangers to the thresholds of God's holy Church. For it is yours to instruct them; it is theirs to obey you as God, whose embassy you perform, since the Lord says, "He who hears you hears me, and he who despises you despises me. He who receives you receives me, and he who receives me receives him who sent me." For nothing is more unjust or dishonorable than for sons to exist rebellious against fathers, or clerics or laymen disobedient to their teachers, or disciples disobedient or insolent toward their masters.

§ 13. Hence we read the very free rebukes of many priests directed to the highest princes. Gelasius, epistle 13 to Emperor Anastasius: "Supported, therefore, by such institutions and authorities" (distinction 96, chapter 10), "many Pontiffs have excommunicated some Kings and other Emperors. For if some particular example concerning the persons of princes is required, blessed Pope Innocent excommunicated Emperor Arcadius because he consented that St. John Chrysostom be driven from his see. Blessed Ambrose, although holy but not Bishop of the universal Church, excluded from the Church the great Emperor Theodosius, excommunicating him for a fault which did not appear so grave to other priests. He also shows in his writings that gold is not so much more precious than lead as sacerdotal dignity is higher than royal power, writing in this manner near the beginning of his Pastoral: 'The episcopal honor and sublimity, brothers, can be equaled by no comparisons. If you compare it with the brilliance of kings and the diadem of princes, it will be much farther beneath it than if you compare the metal lead with the splendor of gold, since you see the necks of kings and princes submitted to the knees of priests and, after kissing their right hands, believe themselves fortified by their prayers.'"

§ 14. Kings can be excommunicated by Bishops. See distinction 96, chapter 10, Duo sunt. For since the offenses of princes can deserve this and the princes are subject to priests, it follows that priests have the power to punish them. But the primary spiritual punishment is excommunication. This power existed also among the Jews and was exercised first against the impious, then against the faithful. For they made those men "without the synagogues" who were impious or whom they regarded as such. This censure flourished among the Essenes as the gravest of all. As Josephus reports in book 2, chapter 7, of The Jewish War: "Those discovered in sins they expel from their congregation; and the man condemned in this manner is generally consumed by a pitiable death. For, bound by their oaths and customs, he cannot receive food offered by others, but, plucking grasses in the manner of beasts and wasted by hunger, he decays in his limbs. For this reason they often took pity upon many and received them when they were breathing their last, judging that they had paid a punishment sufficient for their sins, which had brought them as far as death."

In exactly the same manner excommunicated men wandered among the Gentiles, as did Thyestes and others, by whose fellowship people believed themselves contaminated. Such were those consecrated to Dis, who could be killed by anyone with impunity, as Dionysius reports in book 2. And Caesar in book 6 of The Gallic War says that among the Gauls those who did not obey the Druids were held in the place of criminals, everyone fled their approach and conversation, judgment was not rendered for them, and no honor was accorded them.

§ 15. The Christian priesthood is royal. First Peter 2. For Christ was both king and priest. He answered Pilate: "You say it, because I am a king." And Nathanael truly says in John 1: "You are the Son of God; you are the King of Israel." Nor did the whole people, knowing the Messiah's dignity, fail to acclaim him when he came, John 12: "Hosanna! Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord, the King of Israel." For the Prophet had foretold that the meek king of the daughter of Sion would come. Therefore, when he transferred the priesthood, he also added kingship.

Christ did not abolish political dominion, but nevertheless willed it to be subject to spiritual power. In this respect, indeed, the latter can be called more than royal. Ignatius says truly in epistle 10: "For if the man who rises against a King will rightly be judged worthy of punishment, as one who violates the good constitutions of the laws, how much graver a penalty do you think the man will undergo who wishes to act without the Bishop, breaking concord and confounding the proper order? For the priesthood is the summit of all the goods which exist among human beings."

Although these things sometimes provoke the indignation of political writers, the matter itself nevertheless remains clear by natural, divine, ecclesiastical, and civil law. For the dignity of the priesthood cannot be moved from its place without shaking religion.

§ 16. Many others have defended the Church's sacred right, but Gregory of Toulouse did so eminently in book 15, chapter 1, of On the State. These are his words, §11:

"Zacharias, supreme Pontiff of God's Church, transferred the Gallic kingdom from Louis to Pepin. [Diodorus Siculus, book 4 of the Library, chapter 1.] And Stephen II, supreme pontiff, transferred the empire from the Greeks to the Germans and to Charlemagne, the son of Pepin. [Canalius, cause 16, question 5.] Gregory V, the Saxon supreme pontiff, about the year 995, confirmed for the Germans by a greater privilege the power of electing. [Chapter Venerabilem--perhaps 'the Venerable Bede'--On Election, book 1, title 6, of the Decretals; Blondus, book 3, decade 2; Platina, Gregory V; Krantz, book 4, chapter 25.]

"And St. Ignatius commands: 'Let the presbyters,' he says, 'and all the clergy, together with all the people, with the soldiers and princes, and even the Caesars, obey the Bishop; the Bishop, Christ.' [St. Ignatius, epistle 9.] No one doubts that St. Ambrose exercised this power against Theodosius I, Caesar, for he interdicted the sacred rites to the Emperor and removed him from the barriers of the Church until he repented of the crime that, in Thessaly, on account of an insurrection and the killing of a single tribune, he had killed seven thousand. [Ambrose, book 5 of the Epistles, epistle 28; Rufinus, book 2, chapter 18; Eutropius, book 12.] Innocent I approved the same thing against Arcadius Caesar. [Chapter Nos si incompetenter, §1, cause 2, question 7.] Liberius, the supreme pontiff, also resisted the gatherings convoked by Caesar against Athanasius. [Ammianus Marcellinus, book 15, and Athanasius.] Tertullian calls the Supreme Pontiff the king of the age. [Tertullian, book To His Wife.]

"Peter had two swords, bearing a symbol of each jurisdiction, which the Lord God Jesus Christ said were enough; nevertheless, he prohibited him from the exercise of the material and corporeal sword and ordered him to keep it in its sheath. [St. Matthew, chapter 26.] Nor did he wish his Church indiscriminately to inflict temporal death. [Chapter In archiepiscopatu, On Abduction; chapter Sententiam sanguinis, Lest Clerics or Monks, and so forth; Occidit; and canon Legitur, cause 2, final question; chapter Nos si incompetenter, § Iis ita, cause 2, question 7.] Although, in the old law--which foreshadowed our Church--the priests employed that sword: Samuel against King Agag [1 Kings 14 and 15]; Elijah against the prophets of Baal [3 Kings 18] and against the captains of fifty belonging to Ahaziah [4 Kings 1]; Elisha against the mocking boys [4 Kings 2]; Jehoiada against Athaliah [4 Kings 11; 2 Chronicles 22]; Eliakim against Holofernes [Judith 4]; and St. Peter himself against Ananias and Sapphira [Acts 5]."

Thus the Church's right remains: the right which she received from God, which she held by the will and covenant of kings, and which she rendered ratified and certain by long possession.

CHAPTER IV

The Christian Sacrifice and Its Rationale

§ 1. The duties of ecclesiastics relate either to God, to their neighbor, or to themselves. The first and holiest duty is to sacrifice to God, to pray, to sing psalms to the Lord, and to devote oneself to divine reading. The second is to teach, admonish, and judge, whether concerning ecclesiastical or secular matters. The third is to exhibit integrity of life in all these things toward God, oneself, and one's neighbor. These duties must therefore be treated in order. First, concerning sacrifice.

[Printed page 380]

§ 2. A sacrifice has been offered to the divine majesty in every age. Concerning Christian times also, the Prophets said that a sacrifice was to be offered in every place, and indeed a clean oblation, Malachi 1:10--11. Justin in the Dialogue with Trypho, Irenaeus in book 4, chapter 31, Cyprian in book 1 Against the Jews, Jerome, Augustine, and the others interpret this as referring to the true Eucharistic sacrifice. Dionysius the Areopagite himself, a disciple of the Apostles, calls it θεοτάτην καὶ ἱερὰν τελετήν, a most divine and sacred sacrifice.

With the same meaning Blessed Andrew calls it ἄρτον θεόσωμον and says:

> Κύριος ὢν τῶν ὅλων, ὁ ποιητὴς Θεός, τὸ πάσχα ἐκείνοις ὑφ' ὧν θνήσκειν ἔμελλες, αὐτὸς ὢν, σεαυτὸν προέθηκας, "φάγετε" βοῶν, "τοῦτό ἐστι τὸ σῶμά μου," καὶ πίστει θεμελιοῦσθε. Συνήθης γὰρ αὐτοῖς ἀρχὴν τῆς ὑπουργίας, εὐλογήσας τὸν θεόσωμον ἄρτον καὶ καινὸν καθαγιάσας ποτήριον, τὸ δεσποτικὸν αἷμα, μετέδωκεν αὐτοῖς ἀχράντων καὶ ἀθανάτων τοῦ Χριστοῦ μυστηρίων.

Existing as Lord of all and God the Creator, you proposed yourself as the pasch to those who had delivered you to death, crying, "Eat; this is my body," and "Be established in faith," says Andrew. But in the ministry customary among them, when he had blessed the bread changed into the body of God and had consecrated a new chalice of the Lord's blood, he made them participants in the undefiled and immortal mysteries of Christ.

§ 3. It must be earnestly ensured that the sacrifice is offered to God rightly and with the worship that is owed.

For if the divine majesty required purity of soul and integrity of body in the ministers who slew victims of bulls and sheep, what innocence and sanctity are required in those who offer to God the Holy of Holies, the Son of God, the eternal splendor, born of the Virgin? Certainly the blood of God's Son demands hands purer than the blood of animals. John Chrysostom speaks truly in his commentary on John:

> Τὸ "ἔνοχος τοῦ σώματος καὶ αἵματος" τοῦτο δηλοῖ, ὅτι καθάπερ παρέδωκε μὲν αὐτὸν ὁ Ἰούδας, παρῴνησαν δὲ εἰς αὐτὸν Ἰουδαῖοι, οὕτω ἀτιμάζουσιν αὐτὸν οἱ τὸ πανάγιον αὐτοῦ σῶμα χερσὶν ἀκαθάρτοις δεχόμενοι· ὡς Ἰουδαῖοι κρατήσαντες, οὕτω καὶ οἱ ἀναξίως προσφέροντες στόματι. Διὰ τί δὲ τὸ εἰπεῖν πολλάκις τὸ σῶμα καὶ τὸ αἷμα τοῦ Κυρίου δηλοῖ; Ὅτι οὐχ ἁπλὸς ἄνθρωπος, ψιλὸς ὁ θυόμενος, ἀλλ' αὐτὸς ὁ Κύριος, ὁ ποιήσας τὰ ὅλα, ὡς δῆθεν διὰ τούτων ἐκφοβῶν αὐτούς· καὶ "τοῦ αἵματος τοῦ Κυρίου," ὡς αὐτὸς ὁ ἐκχέας αὐτό· οἱ γὰρ ἐφόνευσαν αὐτόν, ὁ δὲ τῇ ἀναξιότητι φονεύειν δοκεῖ.

The words, "he will be guilty of the body and blood," signify this: just as Judas betrayed him and the Jews mocked him, so those who receive his most holy body with impure hands are injurious to him, just as were the Jews when they held him; such are those who bring it to a polluted mouth. But the fact that he repeatedly uses the words "the body and blood of the Lord" shows that the one who is sacrificed is not a mere human being, but the Lord himself, the creator of this universe. By this he terrifies us: "He will be guilty of the body of the Lord," as one who has shed his blood. For the Jews killed him, but this man who eats unworthily appears to kill him.

§ 4. God killed the sons of Eli together with their father and on one day delivered the camp of Israel and the ark into the hands of the enemies because they had kicked away the victim of the Lord, 1 Kings 2:29 and following. "Why," he says, "have you kicked away my victim and my offerings which I commanded to be offered in the temple?" In Hebrew: בזבחי תבעטו למה, "Why have you kicked at my victim?" For it is a great contempt to trample something under one's feet, and a greater one to strike it with the back part of the feet. The Septuagint rendered the sense: Καὶ ἵνα τί ἐπέβλεψας ἐπὶ τὸ θυμίαμά μου, καὶ ἐπὶ τὴν θυσίαν μου ἀναιδεῖ ὀφθαλμῷ; "Why did you look contemptuously upon my incense and my victim with a shameless eye?" How much more gravely, therefore, do those sin who look with a shameless eye upon the highest and most divine mystery?

I think that this shamelessness caused the exiles and deaths of so many priests, the devastation of temples, and the demolition of altars, while in the place of reconciliation, in the sanctuary of holiness, the Son of God is crucified again by impious priests and the blood of the covenant is held up to mockery. One ark was captured, two priests fell, and Eli, falling, broke his neck because the typological sacrifices, shadows of the true ones, had been despised, because the blood of bulls and calves had not been offered according to rite. The Christian world mourns that so many temples have been burned, changed into profane workshops, and converted into Turkish mosques and schools of heresies; and it fears for the others, because the evil life of priests had already dishonored them beforehand. Let us blame the errors and frenzies of manifold heresies in such a way that we nevertheless know that they arose from the vice of priests. The impious life of the sacrificing priest drove the people of God away from God's temple, and drives them away today. Yet together with bad priests the people is punished, as is the parent who dissembles crimes and thrusts badly reared sons upon the Church.

§ 5. Therefore the Supreme Pontiff, Metropolitans, Archbishops, Bishops, Provosts, Deans, official Vicars, and the rest bind themselves by mortal sin when they are negligent in this class of matters. For they permit God to be afflicted with insult, turn the people away from the temple, and furnish enemies an occasion for cursing and insulting. For what was less fitting than that those whose eyes are full of adultery and of unceasing sin should offer the blood of the Lamb and feed upon it? Why do they permit the bellies and crimes of impious human beings to be fattened from Christ's patrimony? Why do they not prevent them from eating and drinking judgment for themselves every day? Formerly, if anyone unworthy approached the table of the Lord, he was frequently punished with sickness and death. "Therefore," says the Apostle, "among you many are weak and feeble, and many sleep," 1 Corinthians 11, because God pursues an insult inflicted upon his body with swift punishment.

St. Cyprian, in On the Lapsed, testifies that this was customary in his own time:

> Still almost belching forth the death-bearing food of idols, their jaws even now breathing out their crime and reeking of deadly contagion, they invade the Lord's body, although the divine Scripture meets them, cries out, and says: "Everyone who is clean shall eat the flesh, and whatever soul eats of the flesh of the saving sacrifice, which belongs to the Lord, while his uncleanness is upon him, that soul shall perish from his people." The Apostle likewise testifies and says: "You cannot drink the chalice of the Lord and the chalice of demons; you cannot share the Lord's table and the table of demons." He likewise threatens and denounces the obstinate and stubborn, saying: "Whoever eats the bread or drinks the chalice of the Lord unworthily will be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord." All these things having been spurned and despised, violence is inflicted upon his body and blood; and now they sin against the Lord more with their hands and mouth than when they denied the Lord. Before their offenses have been expiated and confession of the crime made, before their conscience has been cleansed, > by the sacrifice and hand of the priest, before the offense of the indignant and threatening Lord has been appeased, they think there is peace--the peace which certain men sell with deceptive words. That is not peace but war; nor is the man joined to the Church who is separated from the Gospel.
>

If these things are said concerning all Christians, why are they not said still more concerning priests, who both confect the Lord's body, receive it, and distribute it to others? With defiled hands and a polluted mouth they invade the Lord's body; to others, who detest them, they hand it with scandal. They ought not to give it to the unworthy, but they themselves handle it most unworthily.

St. Cyprian admonished this long ago:

> Behold what punishments we discern among those who denied! What mournful ends of theirs do we lament! Nor can they be here without punishment, although the day of punishment has not yet come. Certain persons are punished meanwhile so that others may be corrected. The examples belong to all; the torments, to a few. One of those who voluntarily ascended the Capitol to make a denial, after he denied Christ, became mute. The punishment began from the place where the crime also began, so that he who did not have words with which to entreat mercy could no longer entreat. Another woman, stationed in the baths--for this was lacking to her crime and evils, that she who had lost the grace of the life-giving washing should proceed at once to the baths--was seized there by an unclean spirit, unclean as she was, and fell. With her teeth she tore the tongue which had either fed or spoken impiously. After the criminal food was consumed, the madness of her mouth was armed for her own destruction. She became her own executioner and could not survive long thereafter; tortured by pains of the belly and entrails, she died.
>
> Receive what happened with me myself present and as witness. Parents, perhaps fleeing, while in their fear they took too little counsel for themselves, left their little daughter under a nurse's care. The nurse took the abandoned child to the magistrates. At the idol where the people were assembling, because on account of her age she could not yet eat flesh, they handed her bread mixed with wine, which nevertheless was itself left over from the sacrifice of those who were perishing. Afterwards the mother received her daughter. But the girl was as unable to speak and disclose the crime committed as she had been unable to understand or prevent it. It therefore happened through ignorance that the mother brought her with herself when we were sacrificing. But the girl, mingled with the holy ones, unable to bear our prayer and supplication, now began to be shaken with weeping, now to be tossed about, wavering in an agitation of mind; and, as if under the compulsion of a torturer, by such indications as she could give, her untaught soul in its still innocent years confessed consciousness of the deed.
>
> But when the solemn rites had been completed and the deacons began to offer the chalice to those present, and, after the others received it, her place came, the little girl, by an instinct of the divine majesty, turned her face away, pressed her mouth closed with resisting lips, and refused the chalice. The deacon nevertheless persisted and, although she struggled against him, poured into her from the sacrament of the chalice. Then there followed sobbing and vomiting. The Eucharist could not remain in a violated body and mouth. The drink sanctified in the Lord's blood erupted from the polluted entrails. So great is the Lord's power, so great his majesty. The secrets of darkness were detected beneath his light; not even hidden crimes deceived the priest of God.
>
> This occurred concerning an infant who did not yet have the age to speak of another's crime concerning her. But a woman of mature age and advanced years, who crept in secretly among us while we were sacrificing, took for herself not food but a sword, and, as if admitting certain deadly poisons between her jaws and breast, then began to be strangled and shut in by a soul boiling over. Having suffered the pressure not of persecution but of her own offense, she fell down trembling and palpitating. The crime of a dissembled conscience did not long remain unpunished or hidden. She who had deceived a human being perceived God as her avenger.
> And when a certain woman attempted with unworthy hands to open her chest in which the Lord's holy thing had been, she was frightened away by fire rising from it, so that she did not dare to touch it. And another man, who was himself defiled, after the sacrifice had been celebrated by the priest, dared secretly to receive his portion with the others. He could not eat and handle the Lord's holy thing; when he opened his hands, he found himself carrying ashes. By the example of one it was shown that the Lord withdraws when he is denied, and that what is received does not profit the undeserving unto salvation when, while the sanctity shines forth, saving grace is changed into ash.

> How many every day, not performing penance nor confessing their consciousness of their offense, are filled with unclean spirits? How many, mindless even to insanity of mind, are shaken by the fury of madness? Nor is it necessary to go through the ends of individuals, since throughout the manifold ruins of the world the punishment of offenses is as varied as the number of offenders is numerous. Let each person consider not what another has suffered, but what he himself deserves to suffer. Let him not believe that he has escaped if meanwhile his punishment has been deferred, since the man whom the sentence of God the judge has reserved ought to fear all the more.

§ 6. Thus Christ the Lord, by the terror of the few whom the tower crushed and whose blood Pilate mingled with sacrifices, reveals the punishments of all who sin: "Unless you do penance, you will all perish in like manner."

St. Dionysius testifies in his Hierarchy that this occurred not only in the time of Cyprian but also in the most ancient times--namely, that many persons were vexed by demons on account of receiving the Eucharist unworthily. After Cyprian, Chrysostom says in homily 3 on 1 Timothy: "Very many things of this kind occur even now. For because the priests do not know those persons who, being liable to sins, receive the venerable mysteries unworthily, God frequently acts and hands those same persons over to Satan. Finally, how often illnesses, how often losses, how often griefs and calamities occur; they occur on account of this matter. Paul also expressed this pointedly: 'Therefore among you,' he says, 'many are weak,'" and so forth.

Indeed, wicked priests are now frequently punished with diseases, death, and in other ways, but more frequently through the despoliation of temples and loss of all revenues, so that they may be corrected by poverty. Many have fallen into heresies because they rejected conscience. Nor must the end of the punishments be awaited.

§ 7. The canons which bar impious and concubinary priests from the altars must not only be praised, but recalled into use and vigor. For if matters come to such a point that laws are overcome by vices, they are consumed by sedition, war, famine, and pestilence.

There are various canons, and I shall set down some of them, so that prelates may have a norm according to which they may reform their clergy; for unless they do so, either the heretic or the Turk will do it, or some barbarian fouler than the Turk.

Canon 24 of the Apostles:

> Ἐπίσκοπος, ἢ πρεσβύτερος, ἢ διάκονος, ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ, ἢ ἐπιορκίᾳ, ἢ κλοπῇ ἁλούς, καθαιρείσθω, καὶ μὴ ἀφοριζέσθω· λέγει γὰρ ἡ γραφή· οὐκ ἐκδικήσεις δὶς ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό. ὁμοίως καὶ οἱ λοιποὶ κληρικοὶ τῇ αὐτῇ αἱρέσει ὑποκείσθωσαν.

A bishop, presbyter, or deacon who has been caught in fornication, perjury, or theft is to be deposed; nevertheless, he is not to be deprived of communion. For Scripture says: "The Lord will not avenge twice for the same thing." Likewise, let the remaining clerics be subject to the same penalty.

Although only deposition is commanded by that canon, excommunication is nevertheless often added because of the nature of the offense, or its circumstances, or certainly the neglect of amendment, as the most learned Severinus Binius shows in his most exact notes on the Councils.

There are other canons which deny clerics the use of a wife; how much more do they detest fornication? Thus Distinction 32, chapters 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 10, 11, and 17, and Distinction 81, chapter 3 and following.

Much more severely, however, they forbid not only consorting with harlots but even cohabitation with women. The Council of Nicaea, canon 3, Distinction 22, chapter 16: "In every respect the holy Synod has forbidden a bishop, presbyter, deacon, or anyone at all who is in the clergy to be permitted to keep a woman introduced into his household, unless perhaps a mother, sister, or paternal aunt, or also those suitable persons who escape suspicion."

To this I also refer Distinction 33, chapter 2. There orders are denied to a bigamist; how much more to adulterers, if they commit adultery while in those very orders? And Distinction 34, chapter 7. There also a man who, before he was named Bishop, is said to have had a concubine is commanded to withdraw from office if the report was true; thus Gregory to Andrew of Tarentum:

> When the truth was disclosed, we learned that you had had a concubine, concerning whom suspicion against you has also arisen among certain persons. But because there ought not to be an absolute judgment in doubtful matters, we choose to entrust this to your conscience. Therefore, if you remember that, while constituted in sacred order, you were stained by union with her, lay aside the honor of the priesthood and presume in no way to approach to minister; knowing that you minister at the peril of your soul and will without doubt render an account of yourself to our God, if, conscious of this crime, you wish to remain in the order in which you are by concealing the truth.

But let us hear those who wished sacrifice to be offered by good and chaste priests. The canon of the Roman Synod of 113 Bishops reads thus: “Let no one hear the Mass of a presbyter whom he knows without doubt to have a concubine or a woman introduced into his household.” Hence the holy Synod itself also established this chapter under pain of excommunication, saying: “Whoever among the priests or deacons,” and so forth. Who will restore to us, if not the practice, at least the fear of the ancient discipline?

Yet this is not forbidden as though the sacrifices were not true sacrifices and the sacraments true sacraments, but in order that impious priests may be corrected; thus Augustine, tractate 5 on John, 1, question 1, chapter 30:

> If the minister is just, I reckon him with Paul, who does not seek his own glory, saying, “I planted, Apollo watered, but God gave the increase.” But if the minister is proud, he is reckoned with the devil; yet the gift of Christ is not defiled, because through him the pure river passes and comes to fertile soil. I know that a stone cannot bear fruit from water; and if water passes through stone channels to the garden-plots, nothing is generated in the stone channel, but nevertheless the garden bears very abundant fruit. For the spiritual virtue of the sacrament is received as pure light by those who are to be illuminated; but in passing through the unclean it is not polluted.

Since, therefore, the cause of the law still persists, there is no doubt that the obligation of the law also remains. For why, if citizens, nobles, and farmers have a concubinary parish priest, should they not rather betake themselves to those by whom the sacrifices are performed without scandal? For in the sacrifice itself it occurs to the hearer that God is being offended by the sacrificer with mortal crime--with manifold crime.

What, then, is to be done with those clerics who cast the sacrifice away with their heel? The Third Synod of Orléans, chapter 7, defined this long ago, as it stands in Distinction 81, chapter 10: “If any cleric shall have confessed or been convicted of having committed adultery, let him be deposed from office, be granted communion, and be thrust into a monastery for the whole time of his life.” Deservedly is he thrust back into hiding who, placed upon the lampstand, did not shine but poured the darkness of offenses over the Church.

And in the same Distinction, chapters 11, 13, 14, 16, and 17, they are commanded to be deposed. Indeed, Gregory VII forbids them to enter the church, Distinction 81, chapter 15:

> If there are any presbyters, deacons, or subdeacons who lie in the crime of fornication, on behalf of almighty God and by the authority of St. Peter we forbid them entrance into the church until they repent and amend. But if any prefer to persevere in their sin, let none of you presume to hear their office, because their blessing is turned into a curse and their prayer into sin, as the Lord testifies through the Prophet: “I shall curse,” he says, “your blessings.” But whoever refuses to obey this most salutary precept incurs the sin of idolatry, as Samuel testifies and Blessed Gregory confirms: “Not to obey is the sin of divination, and not to acquiesce is like the crime of idolatry.” Therefore, whoever, while asserting that he is a Christian, disdains to obey the Apostolic See incurs the sin of paganism.

Even conversation and suspicion are forbidden in Distinction 81, chapters 26 and 27. The same judgment of the Church remained also in the times of our forefathers; for in the Lateran Council under Leo X it was established as follows, chapter 1, in the Septimum, book 5, title 1, constitution 16:

> We establish that every cleric, of whatsoever condition, status, religious order, or dignity, even if he be of pontifical or some other preeminence, who, after obtaining knowledge of the present decrees--which he is presumed to have obtained after two months following the publication of these same present decrees in the cathedral churches, which the diocesan bishops themselves are absolutely bound to effect after the present decrees have come to their knowledge--is a public concubinary, shall by the very fact be suspended for the space of three months from the receipt of the fruits of all his benefices; his superior shall convert these fruits to the fabric, or to another evident utility, of the churches from which those fruits are received. Moreover, as soon as his superior knows him to be such a public concubinary, he shall at once be bound to admonish him to dismiss his concubine within the shortest term; and if he does not dismiss her, or publicly takes back the woman dismissed or another, we command that the superior deprive him altogether of all his benefices.
> And nevertheless, until their superiors have dispensed with these public concubinaries after the dismissal of the concubines and the manifest amendment of their lives, they shall be ineligible to receive any honors, dignities, benefices, or offices whatsoever. If, after dispensation, they return like the dog to its vomit, to public concubinage of this kind, they shall be altogether ineligible for the aforesaid things, without hope of any dispensation. And if those to whom the correction of such persons belongs neglect to punish them as aforesaid, their own superiors shall in every way punish with a worthy penalty both them for their neglect and those others for concubinage. In provincial and synodal councils as well, action shall be taken against those who neglect to punish such persons, or who are accused of this crime, even by suspension from the conferral of benefices or by another fitting penalty. And if those whose removal belongs to us and the aforesaid See are found by provincial Councils or superiors to be worthy of deprivation because of public concubinage, they shall immediately be brought before us together with the inquisitorial proceedings. The same diligence and inquiry shall be observed regarding them in all general and provincial chapters, while the other penalties established by law against the aforesaid and other public concubinaries remain in their force.
>
> Those, however, are to be understood as public concubinaries not only whose concubinage is notorious through a sentence, a confession made at law, or evidence of the fact which can be concealed by no evasion, but also those who keep a woman suspected and accused of incontinence and, having been admonished by their superior, do not effectually dismiss her. But because, in certain regions, some persons possessing ecclesiastical jurisdiction > are not ashamed to receive monetary gain from concubinaries, allowing them to wallow in such foulness, under penalty of eternal malediction we command that henceforth they neither tolerate nor dissemble such things in any way under an agreement, composition, or hope of other gain. Otherwise, in addition to the aforesaid penalty for negligence, they shall be bound and compelled to restore twice what they received on that account and to convert it entirely to pious uses. But the prelates shall take care by every means to keep the concubines themselves, or suspect women, entirely away from their subjects, invoking the help and arm of the secular power if necessary; and they shall not permit sons begotten from such concubinage to live with their fathers. We command in addition that the aforesaid things be published in the aforementioned Synods and chapters, and we diligently enjoin them to admonish each of their subjects to dismiss these concubines.

> Furthermore, we command all secular men, even if they shine with royal dignity, not to bring any impediment whatsoever, under any color sought, against prelates who by reason of their office proceed against their subjects for concubinage of this kind and in other cases permitted them by law. And since every crime of fornication is prohibited by divine law and must necessarily be avoided under penalty of mortal sin, we admonish all laymen, married as well as unmarried, similarly to abstain from concubinage. For he is exceedingly blameworthy who has a wife and approaches another wife or woman; but he who is unmarried, if he is unwilling to remain continent, should take a wife according to the Apostle's counsel. For the observance of this divine precept, those to whom it belongs shall labor with every zeal, both by such salutary admonitions and by other canonical remedies. Rome, on the fourteenth day before the Kalends of January, 1516.

§ 8. Likewise the Council of Trent, session 25, chapter 4, On Reformation:

> How shameful and unworthy of the name of clerics, who have devoted themselves to divine worship, it is to live amid the filth of immodesty and unclean concubinage, the thing itself sufficiently attests, to the common offense of all the faithful and the supreme disgrace of the clerical soldiery. Therefore, so that the ministers of the Church may be recalled to that continence and integrity of life which befits them, and so that the people may thereby learn to reverence them the more, the more honorable they have recognized them to be in life, the holy Synod forbids all clerics whatsoever to dare to keep concubines or other women concerning whom suspicion can be entertained, either in or outside the house, or to have any association with them; otherwise, let them be punished by the penalties imposed by the sacred canons or the statutes of the Churches.
> But if, after being admonished by their superiors, they have not abstained from them, by the very fact let them be deprived of a third part of the fruits, emoluments, and revenues of all their benefices whatsoever, and of their pensions; this part is to be applied to the fabric of the church or to another pious place at the discretion of the Bishop. But if, persisting in the same offense with the same or another woman, they have still not obeyed a second admonition, not only shall they by that very fact lose all the fruits and revenues of their benefices and their pensions--which shall be applied to the aforesaid places--but they shall also be suspended from the administration of the benefices themselves for as long as the Ordinary, acting also as delegate of the Apostolic See, shall judge proper. And if, thus suspended, they nevertheless do not expel the women or continue to associate with them, then let them be deprived in perpetuity of their benefices, portions, offices, and all ecclesiastical pensions, and be rendered ineligible and unworthy of all honors, dignities, benefices, and offices in future, until, after manifest amendment of life, their superiors shall for cause judge it proper to dispense with them.
> But if, after they have once dismissed the women, they dare to renew the discontinued association or attach to themselves other scandalous women of this kind, in addition to the aforesaid penalties let them be struck with the sword of excommunication. Nor shall any appeal or exemption whatever impede or suspend the aforesaid execution. Cognizance of all the aforesaid matters shall belong not to Archdeacons, Deans, or other inferiors, but to the Bishops themselves, who may proceed without the clamor and formality of a trial, considering the truth of the fact alone. But clerics who possess no ecclesiastical benefices or pensions shall, according to the nature of their offense and their persistence in contumacy, be punished by the Bishop with imprisonment, suspension from order, ineligibility to obtain benefices, or in other ways according to the sacred canons. Bishops also--God forbid--if they have not abstained from a crime of this kind and, after being admonished by the provincial synod, have not amended themselves, shall by the very fact be suspended; and if they persist, they shall also be reported by that same Synod to the most holy Roman Pontiff, who shall punish them according to the nature of the fault, even by deprivation if necessary.

Nor is it strange or novel that superiors pay the penalties for the faults of their subjects, for in truth these faults are imputed to them, Distinction 86, chapter 1: "The faults of the lower orders are to be referred to none more than to sluggish and negligent rulers, who often nourish a great pestilence while they dissemble from applying a harsher medicine." If a physician betrays his duty when, through cruel mercy, he allows a contagious plague to increase unto the destruction of the sick man, how great is the sin of a prelate who idly watches the destructions of souls?

All these things tend to this end: that sacrifices may be offered purely, chastely, and uprightly by holy priests, and that because of contempt for it the Church and the state may not come into danger.

§ 9. Nor ought it to be a matter of little care to us that the external majesty of ceremonies, churches, and sacred furnishings should be such as, turning minds away from earthly thoughts, may lead them by the hand, as it were, to the contemplation of heavenly things, and as is fitting for the divine majesty. It is therefore fitting that these things be done in a well-ordered state.

There ought to be daily sacrifices, lest the Christian Church be less pleasing to Christ than the Hebrew Church had been. For in the latter, besides the morning and evening sacrifices, the altars glowed with perpetual fire.

It has furthermore been provided by law--and indeed by a most ancient law--that the mysteries be celebrated and received by those who are fasting, although Christ himself gave them to men who had eaten supper. For it was established thus from Apostolic times, after some were approaching the table of the Lord hungry and others drunk.

Let him who celebrates the mysteries have an assistant and minister. The canons profess that they establish this because of the various contingencies which arise.

Let the chalices and the other instruments and vestments be becoming, and indicative of the mysteries; and let there be that ornament which displays a modest magnificence. For it is not fitting that the furnishings of the church be squalid, since they are accustomed to shine upon tables.

But if cemeteries must be fenced lest the places in which Christians rest be disturbed by the incursion of animals--see volume 4 of the Councils, part 2, folio 437, and the Fourth Council of Milan, section On the Ornament, Beauty, and Cleanliness of Sacred Places--if, I say, such great cleanliness and ornament are required, how much more the purity of souls, without which the splendor of walls cannot be pleasing to God?

Concerning external ornament it was established thus in the Fourth Council of Milan: “Let no animals, larger fish, or members of them be hung in churches, except those which the Bishop shall judge should be permitted for the sake of a vow or pious signification.”

> Let the consecrated tables of the altars, even if in some part they are made of brick, be entirely covered with waxed cloth in such a way that the cloth cannot easily be removed from the table.
>
> When the doors of the Church are open, let each altar be clothed with three clean cloths--one long one which reaches to its lowest part, and the other two shorter--in such a way that even the wooden step placed behind upon the altar is not bare of covering, but is entirely spread with a clean cloth. Let each altar likewise always be fittingly adorned with a frontal of the color proper, insofar as this can be done, to the feast-day or feria, and covered with a green cloth so that the cloths may not be soiled by dust or other filth; and let it furthermore be furnished and adorned with a cross placed in the middle and two candlesticks, one placed on the right and the other on the left. Let this be done daily in churches which are frequented, but in other churches at least on feast-days.
>
> Let there likewise be a tablet of the secrets upon each altar, but on this condition: that when Mass is completed it is not to remain upright, but is to be laid down and concealed beneath the covering or cloth.
>
> In those Churches in which, on the Thursday of Holy Week, a sepulcher is adorned or erected where the body of Christ the Lord is reserved, since Isaiah foretold that it would be glorious, just as it must be decorated with precious ornament, so care must be taken in them that the arrangement of the ornaments not be profane and little becoming. Therefore, let no coverlets, curtains, canopies, or tents employed for profane use in bedchambers be used to clothe and adorn it, unless they have been offered to the Church, have already become its property, and have been dedicated to sacred use.
>
> The same is established concerning the garments and ornaments with which the sacred images of male and female saints are clothed.
>
> Let neither Churches nor oratories become filthy with mold, dust, or other squalor.
>
> Where, moreover, a place of no great space, however small, which does not contain the choir, is given or left between the high altar and the wall which is behind it, let that place also be kept pure and clean from every mold, squalor, and filth.

Let no box, small vessel, table, or any other thing of that kind be placed, even extraordinarily, in a Church, before its doors, in oratories, or in another sacred place for the sake of collecting alms--not even in the name of that Church, its fabric, or its rector--or, if already placed, be permitted in future, except by the Bishop's permission expressed in writing. Then let two keys, fashioned with different workmanship, be fitted to that box or other object prepared for this purpose; one of them shall be kept by the person whom the Bishop has named, and the other by those in whose name the alms are collected. If it is done otherwise, let the penalty be at the Bishop's discretion; likewise, let the alms collected be assigned to pious places at his discretion.

If, by the Bishop's permission, any chests are placed in the Church, into which--as happens in very many places through the devotion of the faithful--grain, pulses, or anything else is cast as alms, let them not be placed inside the rails or iron lattice of the chapel or altar to which the faithful who offer things of this sort resort, so that it would be necessary for the faithful who are to contribute alms to enter the rails.

In order both that provision may be made for the cleanliness of Churches and that the disturbances and quarrels which often arise from the placing in Churches of women's seats, which they call bradellae, may be forestalled, and at the same time that more space may be given to the throng of the people in those Churches which especially are very narrow, let all those seats be removed wherever they have been placed, and let none ever be placed in future. But with the Bishop's permission it shall be lawful to place and set up certain common seats, low and fashioned with simple workmanship, in the measure and form prescribed in the book of our instructions. These common seats may be made at the expense either of the confraternities established in the Churches or of money contributed by the people, or in any other way which shall seem preferable to the Bishop.

Likewise let the altars, sacred panels and images, and the walls themselves perpetually shine; then let the windows be not somewhat dark but translucent; and let the pavement be carefully swept at least every eighth day. Let it be the care of the rector of each Church that all these things are performed.

Let diligence likewise be applied, and action taken with grave punishment and fine, so that the walls of the Church, oratory, and cemetery may be kept clean from urine or any other kind of filth.

Let trees, stocks, and other shrubs of that kind be removed from all Churches and oratories, lest their spreading roots damage the walls or their extended branches cover the roofs, whence damage may arise to those roofs themselves. But if any branches of this kind already damage the roofs, let them be cut away completely.

Furthermore, let vines, ivy, and other plants of this kind which, as they grow, cling to the exterior walls of churches or oratories be entirely pulled up.

Moreover, let those same walls be kept clean of brambles, thorns, and other things of that kind which are accustomed to grow up outside them, and free also from heaps of rubble and stones.

From cemeteries, moreover, let vines, fruit-bearing trees, and also other trees of every unfruitful kind, or shrubs and stocks, be entirely pulled up and cut down.

And let nothing be planted or sown in these sacred places in future.

Nor let hay be cut from them, nor likewise let the green grass which may serve as fodder be given to beasts.

Nor let anything with a heavy or foul odor be cast within their boundaries, nor let anything else be done there dishonorably toward those sacred places.

Let stables of cattle and animals of every kind also be far from them.

In these same places, let no stack of wood be made; let no beams be heaped up; let there be no pile of rubble or stones; finally, let there be nothing opposed to the beauty, cleanliness, religious character, and sanctity of that place.

On Removing Profane Use from Sacred Places

Let no notices or writings concerning houses, fields, and other things of this kind which are commonly offered or publicly advertised for lease or sale, nor indeed concerning any profane thing whatever, be affixed in future to any doors, leaves, or walls of churches, oratories, or cemeteries, or in any sacred place.

Likewise, let no goods for sale be hung upon the walls of churches, oratories, or cemeteries, nor within the space which is sprinkled with holy water when a Church is consecrated, or within the limits of the drip from the eaves, or within another greater interval of ground to be prescribed by the Bishop's judgment.

Likewise, let no workshops or shops, made from material of any kind, even boards or planks, either adhering to the walls themselves or situated in cemeteries or sacred places--or indeed anywhere within the limits of that space or interval--be erected or placed in any way. But let those which have already been built or placed be removed entirely from there as soon as possible.

Let the roofs of a Church, chapel, or even an oratory in which the sacrifice of the Mass is sometimes performed not be burdened with heaps of straw or any stack of wood; and let them not have above them any upper room, bedchamber, or indeed any place in which people sleep or dwell or anything profane is done. But let places which are already of this kind be removed altogether.

Let it be lawful for no person whatsoever to store or preserve in a Church, even one not consecrated, or in an oratory or cemetery, wheat, millet, barley, or any kind of grain, or pulse; likewise fruit, implements prepared for the use of rural estates, or household furnishings of any profane kind--as was established by Pope Innocent III in the Lateran Council--or finally anything foreign to the house of God. Furthermore, unless the Bishop shall at times judge that it should be done otherwise, let it be forbidden for the key of that Church or oratory, whether diocesan or rural, to be entrusted to, kept by, or preserved by lay persons, but especially by tenants or lessees of the houses or estates of that Church. Let no bells be cast in them, nor anything soldered; and let no smith's work or anything else of this kind be done there, except those things for the use or ornament of that same church or oratory which cannot be done elsewhere.

Let no grain be winnowed in a cemetery as if on a threshing-floor; let no threshing be done; let no straw, grain, or produce be spread out; nor indeed let linen cloths or fabrics, soaked with lye or water, be exposed there to the sun. Let neither women nor men spin anything there with the distaff, sew, or do any other work foreign to the character of those sacred places. Let the entrances of Churches and likewise cemeteries not be used either by the rector or by others who, carrying profane things or burdens, pass this way and that through the Church and sacred places as if along a public road; and in order that this may be entirely prevented, let the Bishop employ every precaution.

Let neither the rudiments of grammar and humane letters, which are often handed down in the empty fables of the gentiles, nor indeed any other letters besides sacred ones be opened and explained to boys in a church as in a literary school; but only the rudiments of Christian doctrine and the other things customarily handed down to boys in those schools.

If, however, in any place, for reasons approved by this council, it has been permitted to the parish priest to teach other things, we do not forbid it; if the narrowness of the parish house necessarily demands it, this office may be performed by him in the Church on weekdays with the permission of the same Bishop.

Let this faculty of permission be given in writing; then, moreover, let a definite place, as far removed as possible from every altar and especially the high altar, be selected for that duty. Let the boys not wander outside the bounds of that place, nor indeed remain in the Church on that account unless the parish priest who has taken them under his discipline is present.

It seemed good to set down these things as an example, on account of the memory of the most holy Bishop Charles Borromeo, so that the other Bishops may have something to imitate.

CHAPTER V

On the Primary Office of the Christian Priesthood and the Truth of the Most Holy Eucharist

§ 1. I cannot pass over in silence, even in this place, that which is assailed by the mockeries of pseudo-politicians and the execrations of sectarians, and which is a laughingstock and scandal to the profane, but to us who believe is a saving mystery: the sacrament of the Most Holy Eucharist. I have treated of it elsewhere also, but now both the dignity of priests and the multitude of those who err demand it again.

No one fails to acknowledge that this dissension is most unhappy and that it especially incites peoples to mutual derisions and hatreds. In the year 1603 Pareus composed five books on this matter, by which he shows the most wretched condition of Europe, even if that controversy alone is considered. Indeed, in the preface he himself adds an admonition to all, which will be read with great profit because it graphically depicts for us from experience the condition and dispositions of the sectarians. It reads thus:

> How long at last, O brothers, will human envy and contention vex you? How long will you continue, with the peace of Christ despised, to wage a most irreligious war of religion? To what end will the audacity of certain Stentors vaunt itself--men who, without conscience and fear of the divine power, disturb your Churches? Among you one hears, “I am of Luther”; “You are of Calvin”; but to say, “I am of Christ,” is nothing among you. O times! O morals! Was Luther crucified for you? Was any one of you baptized in the name of Calvin? Is Christ, who was crucified for all of you, nothing? And who was Luther? Who Calvin? Ministers, certainly, through whom you believed, and this as the Lord gave to each. Are you not therefore carnal, and do you not walk according to man?
>
> What will you answer to the God of peace, you who lay waste his Church with contentions? What to Christ the Lord, whose commandment concerning charity you despise? Whose sons, therefore, will you be, if you are not sons of God? But how are you sons of God if you are not peacemakers? How do you profess Christ as master if no one recognizes you as his disciples? But who will recognize you as disciples of Christ if you do not love one another? Does pity not at last seize you for so many brothers for whom Christ died, whom by your altercations you destroy, so far as lies in you? Indeed, let pity at last seize you for yourselves, for whom salvation has been prepared in peace and certain destruction in contention. For if with one heart and mouth you invoke God the Father on earth, surely the one inheritance of sons will be set before you in heaven. But if you continue to bite and devour one another, what remains but that you be consumed by one another?
>
> Do you not see what Satan has long been contriving against Christ? What the Roman Antichrist is attempting? How he conspires with tyrants? How through his Sinons he leads away captive the consciences of men? How at the same time he lays snares for you and prepares your destruction? Do you think that he will be more merciful to the one party than to the other if his contrivances should at some time succeed? And why should they not at last succeed, with the divine power angry at you and every one of you attending, not to the things which belong to God and to peace, but only to those which are your own and which splendid bile dictates, and rushing in hostility into opposing factions? What destroyed the East? Was it not internal dissensions? Was it not the schism of the West?
> Why, therefore, do you not, after omitting these things and bidding them a distant farewell, at last return to yourselves? And, bearing with one another through charity, if you cannot yet establish peace by perfect agreement in all things--which in this infirmity has rarely been granted to the Church--nevertheless, in those things in which you truly hold the same, and by the grace of God you hold the same in very many things, establish peace and fraternity after the example of the Polish brothers, so that with united strength and arms you may fight against so many columns of common enemies. In the principal heads of doctrine, the three confessions of faith--the Augustan, Bohemian, and Helvetic, which is also the Palatine--agree according to the sacred Scriptures: concerning Holy Scripture, the true God, the person of the Son of God, the God-man (θεανθρώπου), the providence of God, Sin, Free Will, the Law, the Gospel, Justification through CHRIST, Faith, regeneration and good works, the CATHOLIC Church and its sole and supreme head CHRIST, the Sacraments and their number, end, and use, the condition of souls after death, the resurrection, and eternal life.

In the single article concerning the Holy Supper it has not yet been granted to you to think one thing; and yet the disagreement does not concern the whole. For you think one thing concerning the spiritual presence and eating of the body of Christ, which is the thing signified and the kernel of the Sacrament; and just as it alone is necessary for salvation, so it alone suffices. The disagreement concerns the bodily and oral eating common to the pious and the impious; yet you agree that this is not necessary for salvation, that without the spiritual eating it profits nothing, but is pernicious to many. Why, then, do you not at last agree even upon the Formula of Sandomierz or some similar formula and, passing over the impious or unbelieving, embrace in common only what the faithful receive in the Eucharist?

"We cannot," you say, "for what has light to do with darkness?" Nothing indeed. But we are not darkness; and would that you all were light. "But what part has the faithful with the unbeliever?" None. But how are we unbelievers, we who love Christ the Lord and invoke him with sincere faith? "We fight for the glory and majesty of Christ." Would that it were not for your own. "Our conscience does not admit peace with you." Rather, your passions do not admit it. "You err more horribly than the Papists themselves." Truly, you who commonly inculcate these things know or weigh too little what the Papists err in, or rather blaspheme. But why do you not bring those who err back to the way with all meekness and teaching? The Apostle admonishes that a heretical man is to be avoided after one and a second admonition. Produce, then, your admonitions! What do you do but thunder anathemas? Produce also our heresies!

"You defend grave errors," you say, "concerning universal grace and redemption, predestination, the promises of the Gospel, and Baptism." But we do not acknowledge as our own the errors concerning these matters which you cast against us; rather, we say that they are just so many calumnies of certain Stentors. Our Apologies and declarations are extant; why do you not receive them? Indeed, why do you not permit them either to be read or to be sold? And, I ask, how do your own men agree concerning redemption? How concerning the cause of predestination? But we teach from the Gospel that all those controversies recently stirred up are to be decided by the condition of faith. For all and only believers are participants in Christ's redemption; those who pass their life without faith remain empty of it. We acknowledge all and only believers as predestined to life, and this not on account of foreseen faith or works, nor because they were foreknown as persons who would believe and work well--for this was the heresy of the Pelagians--but by the mere εὐδοκία, good pleasure, of God, who wills to have mercy upon them rather than upon others and to give them grace so that they might believe and be saved.

We have learned that the promises of the Gospel and salvation properly belong to all and only believers, and in no way belong to unbelievers so long as they remain such, from that saying of Christ: "He who believes in the Son of God has eternal life; he who does not believe, upon him the wrath of God remains." In Baptism all and only believers put on Christ and are regenerated by the Holy Spirit; unbelievers and hypocrites have no part in this word, even if they are externally dipped a thousand times: taught by the apostolic voice, we firmly establish this. Behold, then, our heresies.

Behold the dissension, behold the hatreds, behold among them the lies concerning concord. Unity cannot persevere amid these mutual combats and anathematizings, and therefore neither can the Church nor the state. Let us therefore seek peace and hold the true meaning concerning the sacrifice.

§ 2. We hold the literal exposition, τὸ ῥητόν, the express wording: what the Lord Jesus said to be his body and blood, this we say is his body and blood. In this matter we agree with the Lutherans, and he himself admits it in book 2, chapter 1, of the controversy concerning the Eucharist.

If you consider Luther and the Lutherans, their doctrine differs very greatly. Indeed, Pareus boldly and truly asserts in book 2, chapter 1, that Luther and the Lutherans differ so greatly that among the Lutherans, beyond the name and that common assertion, you will scarcely find anything Lutheran. The errors of the Lutherans and of others, however, are these:

1. “This is my body”--“This bread is my body.” On the Babylonian Captivity, in the year 1520.

This cannot be understood in any other way than by admitting transubstantiation; for “is” is understood by Luther substantively, not as “signifies,” and “my body” as Christ’s natural body. But this bread cannot truly be called Christ’s body unless transubstantiation occurs, although not even thus is it correctly expressed. Therefore neither the ancient Church nor Catholics ought to be blamed for believing transubstantiation, which Luther could not deny, which he at first approved, then regarded as an indifferent matter, and finally rejected with the greatest dishonesty.

2. “The bread is my body”--“My body is in the bread.”

3. In the Greater Confession, page 530, he concedes that Christ’s body is worn away and crushed by the teeth.

4. “This” signifies the bread and the body of Christ together.

5. Others understand “This is my body” adjectivally; Hunnius, page 393.

6. “This is my body,” that is, “Behold my body.” Flacius in the gloss.

7. It is permissible to use signs other than bread and wine; thus, after others, Sharpe this year, column 1293. And indeed he adds: “things which we commonly use for food and drink.” Therefore we shall employ vegetables, tree-fruits, roots, cheeses, milk, and meats, and we shall say that this agrees with the intention of the institutor; for he himself professes this.

8. Some say that the breaking of bread belongs to the essence, and deny that all others have a true supper. Others will have it to be commanded but not essential to the Sacrament; others, entirely indifferent.

9. The Calvinists condemn both our hosts and those of the Lutherans, and indeed Beza, volume 3, folio 220, prescribes household bread. Neum, page 18, calls it not bread but the foam of bread. Yet this is altogether false, for that bread of ours is made from the purest flour and from dough kneaded together, and nothing belonging to the nature of bread is lacking in it. Moreover, Christ prescribed neither large nor small loaves, much less a definite shape. “But Christ,” they say, “used a larger loaf, which he broke.” Certainly; he also used unleavened bread, and yet the Calvinists do not do this. Not everything that he did must necessarily be imitated, for he gave his body in the evening and after supper, whereas now most prefer the morning time.

Bucanus, page 710, argues even more ineptly: “All must partake of one loaf; therefore a large loaf is needed.” For if that is necessary, a loaf in the likeness of a mountain will have to be baked so that it may suffice for all, or for a single most numerous Church. Moreover, concerning those hosts of ours, Epiphanius may be seen in the Ancoratus.

10. Eating takes place only by the worthy--although many both eat and drink judgment for themselves, not discerning the body of the Lord, as the truth teaches.

11. Zwingli, writing to Matthew Alber, interprets “Eat” as “Believe.” But if this is true, when the Lord said, “Take, and eat, and drink,” they ought not to have brought it to the mouth but merely to have believed--which they could do even if they put it away in a cloth. If “Drink of this, all of you” is metaphorical and signifies “Believe,” then also “And they all drank of it” means “They all believed,” and thus, with the significations of words changed, we shall have nothing certain in Scripture. These things could not be borne if they raved only to themselves; but now they strive to propagate those corruptions and accuse of heresy those who understand Christ’s words in the way in which the Apostles understood them. Why do we now dispute concerning the meaning? The Lord said, “Eat, drink”; the Apostles judged that one must eat and drink. And lest we suspect that they did not understand the intention of the Lord, Paul explains it to us in the same way in 1 Corinthians 11:20.

12. The Synusiasts dream of impanation; for Luther calls the bread artocreas and ἀρτόσωμα, "bread-body," in the Greater Confession, page 540. Hence those expressions: flesh-bread, Fleischbrot; blood-wine, Blutswein; vessel-wine, Weinfass; wood-wine, Weinholtz.

13. Carlstadt understands Christ's words, "This is my body," thus: "Here sits my body." Zwingli deservedly refutes him, as do Beza and others.

14. In their very errors they disagree. Zwingli to Matthew Alber, folio 156, Polanus, page 257, Danaeus, and Beza place the trope in the verb, or the copula "is." On the contrary, Keckermann argues thus in the Theological System, page 445: "Others will have the trope to be in the copula, which itself also cannot be proved. For if they take the copula for the copulative word and verb, there cannot be a trope in it, since a trope has a place in categorematic words, that is, such as signify a definite thing by themselves, but not in consignificative words, such as that verb which is put in the place of the copula. Indeed, if the trope is in the copula, there cannot be a predication of one disparate thing concerning another disparate thing."

But a trope cannot be in the copula; for if it signifies the body of Christ, it is therefore not κοινωνία, that is, a participation in the body of Christ. Meanwhile, unwittingly, Zwingli pleads the cause of truth in his Brief Instruction, folio 575, when he says: "If the verb 'is' is understood substantively, it cannot happen otherwise than that the substance of the bread is converted into the substance of the flesh itself." By this single utterance he asserts the Catholic truth. Namely, if the copula "is" is understood properly, there is true transubstantiation in the Eucharist.

15. Others interpret "body" as "the sign of the body." But the Apostle resists them, for "body" is understood in the same way by Christ and Christ's Apostle; but when the Apostle says that the bread is a communion of the Lord's body, he understands the true body, not a sign.

16. Jerome Zanchi, in his Confession, page 171, interprets the words "Which is delivered for you" as "insofar as"; Piscator likewise in question 3 on the Supper. But the interpretation is novel and forced; next, it contradicts the text, for it reads thus:

Τοῦτό ἐστι τὸ σῶμά μου, τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν διδόμενον· τοῦτό ἐστι τὸ αἷμά μου, τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν ἐκχυνόμενον.

"This is my body, which is delivered for you; this is my blood, which is poured out for you." Or: "This is my body delivered for you," and so forth. For the relative article is not ὃ, "which," or ὅτι, "that" or "because," but τὸ, "the." Next, what meaning is this: "This is my body insofar as it is delivered for you"?

17. Many of the Lutherans teach that the Eucharist exists only in its use, and this manifestly against Luther, Pomeranus, and others.

18. Musculus, page 863, and Ant. Sadeel, volume 3, page 143, condemn private use of the Eucharist and do not wish it to be carried to the sick. Yet Christ by no means condemned it, and the primitive Church always used it. Beza, nevertheless, does not dare to condemn it. But he is impious even in this, because he doubts; for why is there not a little Church in the houses of the sick, since in 1 Corinthians 16 there is a domestic Church? If Christ is present where two or three are gathered in his name, why is there not a communion of Christ? What does the circumstance of place or multitude contribute to the matter, so that the consolations which we read were employed from all antiquity should be denied to the sick?

19. The Calvinists who deny the truth of the Sacrament of the Eucharist deny that it is to be adored; much more absurdly, certain Lutherans, although they acknowledge Christ God as present, deny that he is to be adored. Certainly Luther judged that he was to be adored, and Calvin reproaches him with this in letter 72 to Bucer: "His ravings also brought idolatry with them. For to what end is that 'adorable Sacrament' of Luther, unless an idol is to be erected in the temple of God?"

20. They teach that both species must necessarily be supplied to all and always, because Christ did this, although they themselves omit so many things which Christ did. Indeed, they remove Christ himself from the Eucharist and substitute a sign for the truth. Do you insist upon the chalice and wine? But at your own discretion you change the entire matter. Beza, letter 25: "If wine is lacking," he says, "simple water can be substituted, or another kind of drink not unusual in that place." He himself teaches that this was Calvin's opinion and that those who depended upon wine, so that under the compulsion of necessity they were unwilling to use an ἀνάλογον, an analogous symbol, were regarded as superstitious. And in letter 2: "Where bread or wine is either not used at all or at a definite time is not available, will no Supper of the Lord be celebrated? Rather, it will be celebrated rightly if that which takes the place of bread or wine, either by common use or according to the condition of the time, is employed in the place of bread or wine. For this was the intention of Christ when he chose bread and wine for these mysteries: that, by setting before us the signs of those things by which our body is nourished, he might represent true spiritual nourishment as if before our eyes. Therefore, he departs in no respect from Christ's intention who, with no zeal whatever for innovation, substitutes for bread and wine those things which, although they do not possess an equal analogy of nourishment, nevertheless possess a similar one."

He asserts that this is Christ's intention, but with no witness, unless it is that he imitates the abominable heresies concerning the matter of the Eucharist--namely those of the Gnostics, Montanists, Artotyrites, Aquarians, and Manichaeans.

§ 3. We say that the whole Christ is under one species; we deny that both species were commanded, for that law cannot be fulfilled among those who abstain from wine, and in many places a scarcity of wine would impede communion. Nor is the end of communion denied, which is that we receive Christ, whether under one species or under both. He who eats Christ likewise also drinks, since blood is also present in a living body. There are other causes, such as the danger of spilling and the horror felt by some who are unwilling to drink from the same cup with many persons. Indeed, in Christ's time one species alone was frequently employed. And yet at this point the sectarians are most especially mad and utter calumnies.

21. At last they proceed so far as to deny that one body can be in several places. Thus Sharpe, On the Eucharist, controversy 3, question 1. This seemed ridiculous and impious to all Lutherans and to the more prudent of the Calvinists. For why can God not establish in India the one and same body which he placed in Germany? Can a body which is in Germany restrain God's power so that it may not be in India?

But what contradictions does he collect? First, it would be in India and not in India; it would at the same time be lower and higher than itself. In one place it will be cold, in another it will be hot. It will be outside itself. Angels cannot be in different places. It will be in a place and not in a place. It cannot exist at the same time in different times, and therefore neither in different places. Amid jubilation he serves up anew these childish things, refuted a thousand times. For why would that body be in India and not in India? It would certainly be in India, while the assertion that it was not in India would be false; but it would be true that it was also outside India, or had another presence besides that which is in India. The matter is clear: the whole soul is in the head, and the whole is in the feet, yet we do not deny that it is in the head because the same essence is in the feet; rather, we say that there are several presences of one essence. Thus the soul is, without contradiction, lower and higher, because these things are not said according to the same presence; but for a contradiction it is necessary that the things said be said in the same respect. And so those bodies will be able to experience contrary things, if it shall seem good to God, but in different places.

He nevertheless continues: "A body in two places will be outside itself." If he means alien to its own nature, this is false; but if he means that it will be in different places and, insofar as it is in one, will be distant from itself as it is in the other, this is readily admitted. For the indivisible soul, as it is in the feet, is distant from itself as it is in the head. But by his omnipotence God can preserve the head living and animated, and likewise the feet, while the intervening body dies; by that fact the soul will be altogether distant from itself by reason of place. By the same reasoning we also assert that Angels can be in different places.

What next from Sharpe? “It will be in a place and not in a place. In a place, from the hypothesis; not in a place, because that which is in a place is so circumscribed that it is not in another place.”

An acumen worthy of dull Sharpe. For it is not merely in a place, but in several places. Thus the assertion that it is not in a place is false. But what he adds--that what is in a place is so contained by the place that it is not in another place--is true if you regard the order of nature, but false if you regard the power of him who created nature operating above nature. For the question concerning that power is whether it can place some whole thing in one place in such a way that the same thing is nevertheless also in another place.

Finally, the most acute Sharpe, the Alpha of the jubilators, fights with a Chrysippean subtlety: “The same thing cannot at the same time exist in different times, past and future; therefore neither in different places.” You have touched the matter with a winnowing-fan, not a needle. Set before me two times, past and future, existing simultaneously, and I shall simultaneously dispute with you in the past and future--and I have disputed. Two places, Germany and India, exist simultaneously; two times cannot exist simultaneously, because the past has been and the future does not yet exist.

§ 4. If they were to rise against the unbloody sacrifice as truly as they do furiously, they would long ago have possessed the whole people. There is no part of the sacrifice, no ceremony, which they do not receive with thoroughly buffoonish sneers and shameful taunts. Matthias Hoe, in Saxony, speaks thus in his second Jubilee sermon:

> The Papists object in addition that it is novel that we do not celebrate the Mass, which nevertheless was celebrated for many centuries without interruption.

He replies:

> Neither Christ Jesus himself nor the holy Apostles celebrated it; and, what is more, the Holy Spirit long ago described the Mass, or the idol Maozim, as a horrible abomination, Daniel 12. Therefore we deservedly ought to flee and avoid it as a most shameful corruption of our Lord’s testament, Galatians 3, because Christ was offered only once upon the cross, and that oblation was sufficient to expiate our offenses, Hebrews 9 and 10.

It is no wonder that many rise against the sacrifice of the new law, and do so most furiously, since Satan himself, present, has assumed this role for himself and persuaded Luther that that sacrifice is idolatry. Luther himself writes the history in volume 7, Wittenberg 1558, folio 228, and it has often been related by many Catholics. But let us examine the imposture of Matthias Hoe. Missa is either a Latin or a Hebrew name; among the Greeks it is customarily called λειτουργία, “liturgy.” In Deuteronomy 16:10, missa is called an oblation. From this either the Latins borrowed the name or they employed their own, to signify a sacrifice and prayers sent to God. Greek writers, as I said, call it λειτουργίαν, a liturgy. Sometimes they call it προσφοράν, θυσίαν, ἱερόν, θυσίαν ἀναίμακτον, μυστήριον, μυσταγωγίαν, τελετήν, τελετὴν τελετῶν--an offering, sacrifice, sacred rite, unbloody sacrifice, mystery, mystagogy, rite, and rite of rites. All these terms contain within themselves the rationale of sacrifice.

But the Evangelists and Paul teach us that Christ offered this sacrifice. “This is my body, which is given for you,” Luke 22:19; and then he says concerning the chalice, τὸ ἐκχυνόμενον, “that which is poured out”; and Paul in 1 Corinthians 11:24 calls it τὸ σῶμα τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν κλώμενον, “the body which is broken for you.” Therefore, in Christ’s supper itself his blood was being poured out for us and his body was being broken for us, that is, it was being immolated and sacrificed. For he was truly handing over the body and blood, the bread and wine having been changed. Next, not even the Lutherans can deny this, since they say that the body handed over is under the bread and in the bread. But that which is thus poured out and broken for others, and by that change or transubstantiation comes to exist in a new and ineffable mode, is rightly said to be sacrificed.

§ 5. "The Apostles," he says, "did not sacrifice." But the Liturgies of the Apostles cry out against him. The first is Peter's, concerning which the ancients speak, especially St. Isidore of Seville in book 2 of the Offices, and Paschasius of Corbie in On the Body and Blood of the Lord. The second is that of James, as Clement of Rome testifies. The third is that of James the Less, who is called the brother of the Lord. The fourth is that of Matthew the Apostle, which the Ethiopians generally use; they call the sacrifice Corbon. In this they speak as follows, according to the Apostle's institution:

> You are the bread of life descending from heaven, who, before you came, were present in the figure of the immaculate lamb for the redemption of the world. Now, O lover of human beings, we humbly implore your goodness that you show your face upon this bread and chalice on this portable altar. Bless, sanctify, cleanse, and change this bread into your immaculate flesh and this wine into your precious blood. Let it become a burning and acceptable sacrifice, a remedy and salvation for our soul and body, and so forth.

The fifth is St. Mark's. All these agree with one another as to substance, but differ in ceremonies and rites. St. Andrew himself thunders these words against the tyrant and all sectarians: "I sacrifice daily to almighty God an immaculate lamb which, although it has truly been sacrificed and its flesh truly eaten by the people, remains whole and one." Thus the presbyters of Achaia. But if for this reason the innovators drown out the truth with a discordant sound, the cause is common to the ancient Church: we say that Christ offered an unbloody sacrifice before his Passion, and we assert that the Apostles and their successors did the same. We cannot lose a cause which has such great patrons. Dionysius, Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, chapter 3: ὦ θεοτάτη καὶ ἱερὰ τελετή, "O most divine and sacred sacrifice"; likewise Martial, letter to the people of Bordeaux, chapter 3. Clement of Rome, Apostolic Constitutions:

> Ἀντὶ θυσίας τῆς δι' αἵματος, λογικὴν, καὶ ἀναίμακτον καὶ τὴν μυστικὴν, ἥ τις εἰς τὸν θάνατον τὸν τοῦ κυρίου συμβόλων χάριν ἐπιτελεῖται τοῦ σώματος αὐτοῦ καὶ αἵματος.

He says that Christ gave us, in place of a bloody sacrifice, a rational, unbloody, and mystical one, which is of his body and blood and is celebrated as a symbol toward the death of the Lord.

With the same meaning Alexander I, in the letter to all the Orthodox, says: "In the oblations of the Sacraments which are offered at the solemn rites of Masses, the Passion of the Lord must be mingled," and so forth.

And Justin Martyr, in the Dialogue with Trypho: "Therefore, concerning all who offer sacrifices in his name which Jesus Christ handed down--that is, those of the bread and chalice in the Eucharist, which are made by Christians in every place on earth--God, anticipating them, testifies that they are pleasing to him." Sixtus I inserted into his Decrees the requirement that, when the priest begins the action of the Masses, the people should sing a hymn. Telesphorus, in the letter to all, and Hyginus establish the same; all basilicas must be consecrated with Mass. One may see the testimonies of Pius I, Soter, Irenaeus, and others. Hence I argue thus:

We say that Christ and the Apostles truly sacrificed; all the Fathers whose writings make mention of the Christian sacrifice constantly profess the same, with none excepted. There was no Bishop in the past who did not offer sacrifices. No orthodox person condemned those who sacrificed. Therefore the swarms of mutually battling sects ought not to condemn the ancient Martyrs, nor to rejoice against us because, at the Devil's persuasion, they have exterminated the sacrifice from their territories.

But what they say--that the Mass is Moghozim or Mahuzim--is plainly ridiculous; for there is a great difference between Missa and Maghuzim, and they agree only in the single letter mem. It is just as if we were to pretend that Cerdo and Calvin are the same because the initial letter of each heresiarch's name is the same.

"But Christ was offered once upon the cross and made satisfaction once." We too teach this, and it is found in the writings of all the Fathers. And we hear the Apostle saying that we have been perfected by one oblation. We confess this and give thanks to the kindness of the Redeemer, who offered for us a price of infinite valuation, a price most sufficient. Nevertheless, the consensus of the Catholic Church has always taught that this price is applied to us through the Sacraments, through faith, and through the unbloody sacrifice. Otherwise Abraham or Moses would not have offered holocausts and victims without crime, for they too were saved by the sacrifice of the cross which was to come. But they were also made participants in it through those sacrifices which they offered either voluntarily or at God's command.

Indeed, prayer would be not only superfluous but also blasphemous, for Christ prayed for us and was heard because of his reverence. Does he therefore not now intercede for us? Can we not pray if he obtained by his prayer the things which must be sought? Does our prayer not render Christ's prayer void--indeed, his sacrifice void? For if the unbloody sacrifice renders void and destroys the fruit and honor of the bloody sacrifice, why does the prayer of a sinful human being, asking anew for what Christ obtained both by sacrifice and by prayer, not issue in the ignominy of the sacrifice and prayer of Jesus Christ, to which it appears to be added as though Christ's were insufficient?

And this is the exposition of sacred Scripture which speaks of a unique sacrifice. The whole Church, from the Apostles onward, has held this exposition not only in writings and sermons, but in oratories, chalices, altars, basilicas, and the perpetual use of the sacrifice itself. No petty reasonings of so many sectarians have destroyed it. Those, therefore, who have made a secession in this cause have withdrawn not from Monks or Jesuits, as they boast, but from the whole ancient Church, and they interpret Scripture in a novel manner.

CHAPTER VI

That the Office of Psalm-Singing in the Church Was Entrusted to Clerics and Must Be Cultivated Holily

§ 1. That the custom of celebrating the divine praises with song was most ancient can be doubted by no one who has read Exodus 15: that the children of Israel, after Pharaoh was drowned, when they had crossed the Red Sea, divided into choirs and sang thanks together to God, not with the voice alone but also with drums and musical instruments.

§ 2. The Israelites imitated them thereafter, especially after David and Solomon prescribed the orders and turns of the singers. When their devotion had vanished, the Essenes succeeded them, concerning whom Philo, in On the Contemplative Life, relates in these words:

> When all have risen, two choirs are formed in the middle of the dining-hall, one of men and the other of women; over each is placed its own leader, eminent in honor and skill in singing. Then they sing hymns composed for praise in various kinds of meters and songs, now with one voice, now in alternation, not without becoming and religious gestures and accents, at one time standing, at another moving their step forward and backward, just as the matter demands. Then, after each choir has completed its part separately, delighted by these pleasures as if drunk with divine love, they form one mixed choir, in imitation of the one established long ago when the sea, at God's command, brought salvation to the one party and destruction to the other, with Moses leading the men and Miriam the prophetess the women.

§ 3. The same custom of singing was transferred into the Church immediately with the very beginning of the faith. For thus Paul, Colossians 3: "Let the word of Christ dwell abundantly in you, in all wisdom, teaching and admonishing one another in psalms, hymns, and spiritual canticles, singing in grace in your hearts to God." He also admonishes the same things in Ephesians, chapter 5. We have as a witness of the Christians' songs Lucian the apostate, in the Philopatris, for night and day they persevered in that kind of piety; and also the persecutor Pliny, book 10, letter 97, who testifies to Trajan that he found no offense among the Christians except that they celebrated assemblies before dawn and sang praises to Christ. Justin Martyr, in his oration to Antoninus, and Clement of Alexandria, in the address to the gentiles, are witnesses to the same custom.

§ 4. Indeed, Basil, against the heretics, letter 69, teaches that there were despisers of sacred song even long ago:

> But concerning that for which we are accused on account of the psalmodies, by which especially those who traduce us terrify the simpler people, I have this to say: namely, that the rites which have now prevailed agree and harmonize with all the Churches of God. For by night the people rise and, before dawn, seek the house of prayer; and there, after confession to God has been made with toil and tribulation and unfailing tears, at last, rising at the signal, they are set to psalmody. And now, divided into two parts, they sing antiphonally, taking up the song by turns; and by this they at the same time strengthen their exercise and meditation in the utterances of God and supply to their hearts a more attentive firmness, having cast away the vain thoughts of the mind. Then, when to one of them has been given this office, that he should first begin what is to be sung, the rest take it up; and thus, amid variation in the psalmody and prayers interposed from time to time, they pass the night. When day is already dawning, all together, as if with one mouth and one heart, offer to the Lord a psalm of confession, and each professes repentance in his own words. If on their account you flee from us, you will at the same time flee from the Egyptians; you will flee from both Libyas, the Thebans, the Palestinians,
>
> the Arabs, Phoenicians, Syrians, those who dwell by the Euphrates, and--to say it once--all among whom vigils, prayers, and common psalmodies are held in esteem.

Thus far Basil. Innumerable testimonies of the holy Fathers would have to be adduced to this effect, but for the sake of brevity we restrain ourselves. Hence, what is read in the life of Damasus--"He established that Psalms should be sung day and night through all the Churches," and "he commanded this to presbyters, Bishops, and monasteries"--must be understood not of the first institution, but of a general precept by which the churches which had not yet begun to do it were also to be instituted. For under the Emperors Valentinian and Valens, after the persecution of Constantius and then of Julian, the Churches flourished again, so that singing could be done publicly.

§ 5. The ancient psalmody and hymnody were more convenient for the people and the clergy; certainly the people responded to the priest, as Ausonius shows:

> And celebrating the harmonious songs of tuneful David,
> He strikes the air with voices that will answer, "Amen."

At Rome also "Amen" re-echoes in the likeness of heavenly thunder, as Jerome is witness in book 2 of the commentary on the letter to the Galatians. As the multitude of the faithful increased, when the Churches often resounded with discordant voices and unformed howling--a thing which impeded devotion, stirred laughter, and offended unbelievers--the Bishops applied themselves with great labor to this end: that the chant should be perfected with religious gravity and measures suited to piety. This was so not only in the Church, but also in the agapae, that is, the feasts of charity; thus Clement of Alexandria, Paedagogus, book 2, chapter 4, and Tertullian, Apology, chapter 39. Therefore, in order that it might be corrected and recalled to modesty, the arrangement was that this province should be entrusted to definite and skilled persons.

In the Council held under Pope Martin it is established that no one may sing psalms in the pulpit who has not been ordained a reader by the Bishop. And in Distinction 92, chapter 2, the order of the singers is established:

> In the holy Roman Church a very reprehensible custom arose long ago, that certain persons should be chosen as singers for the ministry of the sacred altar and, constituted in the order of the diaconate, should be devoted to the modulation of the voice, although it was fitting that they should have leisure for the office of preaching and the pursuit of almsgiving. From this it generally happens that, while a pleasing voice is sought for the sacred ministry, the search for a fitting life is neglected, and the minister who is a singer provokes God by his morals while delighting the people with his voice. Concerning this matter, therefore, by the present decree I establish that in this See the ministers of the sacred altar ought not to sing, but should perform only what belongs to the office of the Gospel reading among the solemn rites of the Masses. But the psalms and the remaining readings I judge should be performed by subdeacons or, if necessity demands, by the minor orders. If anyone attempts to act against this decree of mine, let him be anathema.

§ 6. The song of the Church is corrupted in three ways. First, when one sings with the voice, not with the mind; when God is celebrated with the lips by those whose heart is far from God. Attention, moreover, is necessary either to the words, the meaning, or God who is entreated; if it is directed to all, however, it is best. Yet, because of the weakness and wandering of the human mind, it is not easily actual at all times; it is sufficient that it be virtual, as the Theologians teach by consensus: St. Thomas with his interpreters, II--II, question 83, article 13; Suárez, treatise 4 On Religion, and books 3, 4, and 5; Lessius, On Justice and Right, book 2, chapter 34, doubt 11; Valentia, II--II, disputation 6, question 2, point 10; Reginaldus, book 18 of the Penitential Forum, chapter 12, section 1; and likewise others; Navarrus, in the Enchiridion, chapter 25, number 105. For the voice is empty if the mind is distracted elsewhere and God is honored by the lip alone.

Second, when the modulation is broken lightly, loosely, and indecorously. Jerome on Ephesians, chapter 5:

> Let the young men hear these things; let those hear whose office it is to sing psalms in the Church. One must sing to God not with the voice but with the heart; nor must the throat and jaws be smeared with a sweet medicament after the manner of tragedians, so that theatrical melodies and songs may be heard in the Church, but one must sing in > fear and deed, in the knowledge of the Scriptures. Although someone may be--as they are accustomed to call it--κακόφωνος, "ill-voiced," if he has good works he is a sweet singer before God. Let the servant of Christ sing in such a way that not the voice of the singer but the words which are read may please; so that the evil spirit which was in Saul may be cast out from those who are similarly possessed by him, and not be introduced into those who have made the house of God a stage for the peoples.

Third, when things are sung whose recitation is contrary to good morals. Such were the songs devised by the Donatists themselves; thus Augustine, letter 119:

> Concerning this thing, so useful for moving the mind piously and kindling the affection of divine love, there is a varied custom, and very many members of the Church in Africa are sluggish, so that the Donatists do not reproach us for soberly singing in the Church the divine canticles of the Prophets, while they themselves inflame their drunken revels to the song of Psalms composed by human ingenuity, as if to trumpets of exhortation.

In this matter, indeed, our own sluggishness must also be lamented with tears, because although the Anabaptists, Lutherans, Calvinists, and Arians proclaim with such great vehemence their hymns opposed to morals and the faith, we respond in many Churches with negligent and languid singing. And yet ecclesiastical song, as Justin teaches, arouses the mind by a certain pleasure and makes it burn with desire for that which is celebrated in song; it quiets the affections and concupiscences of the flesh; removes evil thoughts arising at the suggestion of enemies whom one cannot see; waters the mind for the fructification of divine goods; makes those who contend for piety noble and brave through constancy in adverse circumstances; and brings to the pious a remedy for all things which occur in life that are sad and mournful.

Corruptions of songs of this sort existed long ago among the Arians, composed by the Heresiarch himself in Sotadic measures, concerning which St. Athanasius speaks in oration 2 against the Arians. The Meletians imitated these men, singing hymns with profane clapping of hands and a kind of dancing. Paul of Samosata also had taught women to sing praises to him in the Church in place of Psalms. Thus the Synod of Antioch to Dionysius of Rome. Apollinaris of Laodicea afterwards attempted similar things by composing impious psalms--as Epiphanius relates, heresy 67--and the Synod of Laodicea reports this in chapter 59. The sects of our time vigorously imitate them; for there is scarcely one which does not sing its own orgies and propagate impiety by sweetness of voices, as though by Enthusiasm. Hence they have introduced all the allurements of singing into their assemblies, so that they may exterminate the hymns and psalmody of the ancient Church.

§ 7. All musical instruments are rightly and lawfully employed in ecclesiastical song. For the Psalms frequently admonish us to sing with lyres, with well-sounding cymbals, with strings and organ, upon the ten-stringed psaltery. Nevertheless, the Church did not make great use of them at the beginning of the Gospel, both because that little flock generally met in private houses and because the obscenities of the gentiles as well as idolatry had polluted all those kinds of organs and stringed instruments--so much so that song seemed scarcely honorable if instruments were added, whose use at that time was almost wholly in wantonness.

The provincial Council of Siena commands that the holy use of organs be maintained: "The Church received the use of organs > from the Fathers for divine worship and service. Therefore we do not will that an immodest or lascivious melody be played upon instrumental organs in the Church, but an altogether sweet sound which represents nothing besides divine hymns and spiritual canticles."

§ 8. The utility of singing is manifold; Chrysostom expounded it in homily 41 on the Psalms:

> Nothing equally raises the soul and in some measure makes it lofty, frees it from the earth, releases it from the bonds of the body, affects it with the love of wisdom, and brings it to despise all things pertaining to this life, as > does measured verse, a divine song composed in rhythm. Certainly our nature is delighted with songs and poems to such a degree, and has so great an affinity and congruity with them, that even infants hanging at the breasts, if they weep and are distressed, are soothed in that way. Indeed, nurses who carry them in their arms, often going away and returning and singing certain childish songs to them, thus lull their eyes to sleep.

>
> For this reason travelers driving yoked animals at midday also often do this, singing and consoling the weariness of the journey with those songs. And not only travelers, but also farmers treading grapes in the winepress, those gathering the vintage and tending vines, and those performing any other work, often sing. Sailors driving the oars do this as well. Indeed, women too, while weaving and separating tangled threads with the shuttle, very often sing, sometimes individually and sometimes all together in concord, one particular melody. Women, travelers, farmers, and sailors do this because they wish to console with song the labor received from performing the work, since the soul, if it hears poems and a song, will bear troublesome and difficult things more easily.
>
> Therefore, because this kind of delight is very closely related and familiar to our soul, lest demons, by introducing wanton and meretricious songs, overturn all things, God constructed the Psalms so that pleasure and utility might be received from them at the same time.

And after many things concerning the utility of singing psalms, he adds these:

> I say these things not so that you alone may praise, but so that you may teach your sons and wives to sing such canticles, not only while weaving or performing another work, but especially at the table. For when the Devil most commonly lies in wait with insults, using the aid of drunkenness, gluttony, profuse laughter, and a relaxed mind, then especially, both before the table and at the table, one ought to fortify oneself with the protection of the Psalms and, rising from the banquet together with wife and children, to sing sacred hymns to God.

Would that sacred songs succeeded in the place of light, foolish, and filthy ditties among all people. Would that at least upon the feast-day the piety of those singing psalms were heard.

§ 9. Nevertheless, the Church does not reject the sacred hymns of the holy Bishops or Doctors. In the time of Pope Honorius I there were some who rejected them. The Fourth Council of Toledo, chapter 2, approves and receives them:

> Concerning the singing of hymns, we also have the example of both the Savior and the Apostles. For the Lord himself is reported to have recited a hymn, as Matthew the Evangelist testifies: “And when the hymn had been said, they went out to the Mount of Olives.” And the Apostle Paul wrote to the Ephesians, saying: “Be filled with the Spirit, speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual canticles.” And because certain hymns are known to have been composed by human study in praise of God and of the triumphs of the Apostles and martyrs--such as those which the most blessed Doctors Hilary and Ambrose published, which nevertheless certain persons particularly reject because they do not exist from the Scriptures of the sacred Canons or Apostolic tradition--let them therefore also reject that hymn composed by human beings which we recite daily in the public and private office at the end of all the Psalms: “Glory and honor to the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, for ages of ages. Amen.”
> For ecclesiastical Doctors composed the remaining words which follow there even in that hymn which the Angels sang when Christ was born in the flesh: “Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to human beings of good will.” Therefore, are those words themselves not to be sung in the Churches because they are not found in the books of sacred Scripture? Masses are composed--whether prayers, orations, commendations, or impositions of hands--and if none of these is sung in the Church, all ecclesiastical offices are empty. The Apostle admonishes that these things be done and exhorts Timothy, saying: “I beseech, therefore, first of all, that supplications, prayers, petitions, and thanksgivings be made for all human beings, for kings, and for all who are in high station.” Therefore, just as prayers, so let none of us hereafter disapprove hymns composed in praise of God; rather, let them celebrate them in like manner in Galicia and Spain. Those who have dared to reject hymns are to be struck with excommunication.

§ 10. Therefore, it was most rightly established by the Church long ago that we should employ a definite form of singing psalms in the Church. Thus the Fourth Council of Toledo, chapter 2, commands that one manner of praying and singing psalms be retained. Thus the Council of Braga, chapter 10, which was celebrated during the reign of Ariamir; the Council of Vannes under Leo I, chapter 15; that of Gerona under Hormisdas, chapter 1; and that of Épaone under Gelasius I, chapter 4. Finally, the Council of Trent commanded that all things be reduced to the best order. The Council of Siena, chapter 17, also speaks excellently:

> And since psalmody is commanded to be sung in the Churches of God so that the devotion of the faithful may be aroused, for this purpose let the night and day office and the solemn rites of Masses be sung continually by the clergy and people with a measured tenor and distinct gradation, so that they may take pleasure in that same distinctness and be delighted by the measuredness. Therefore we command that in the churches the musical chants be distinct and discrete, moving the heart to devotion and compunction. Furthermore, under the pretext of musical song, public and lascivious ditties are not to be heard in the Churches. For, as Jerome says, the throat and jaws must not be softened with a medicament after the manner of tragedies, lest, while a pleasing voice is sought, a fitting life be neglected.

§ 11. The Fifth Council of Milan contains distinguished instructions concerning ecclesiastical song, which flowed from the most holy soul of Charles Borromeo. It admonishes, first, that every Canon or other minister whatsoever who is bound to the offices of the choir should train himself in the discipline of the choir with a certain zeal for inward piety, whose splendor should also shine outwardly.

Before he assembles there, however, let him reflect attentively with himself for a little while upon the sanctity of that place, the cause of assembling, and the offices of divine praise--which are the duty of Angels and ought to be celebrated most chastely by all.

Firmly adhering to this very thought, he will not even conceive in his mind and soul anything alien to the religious character of that place, much less do anything which would offend the eyes of God.

Therefore let him prepare himself again and again, diligently, by holy meditation in the inward soul and by religious prayer, so that he may perform the outward worship of the divine offices salutarily.

While he puts on the surplice, which is a garment made from white linen cloth, let him consider what person he sustains--namely, one pure from filth and stain, such as that vestment indicates.

When a Canon places upon his shoulders or arms, according to custom, the fur almuce, which is the insignia of Canons, let him take up this thought: that the affections and desires for worldly things ought to be extinguished and altogether dead in himself, as is signified by that skin of a dead animal which he puts on according to custom.

But if, as is the institution or custom in very many Churches, he puts on a cope which covers his shoulders and as it were binds his arms, let him understand from this garment that he ought to keep his appetites restrained, as though bound, and accommodate his whole self to the will of God.

Therefore, when, clothed in the vestments of the choir, he covers the other clothing which he uses outside and thus bears another person in his apparel, let him beware lest, even in the sacristy, he do or admit anything which does not rightly agree with the action on account of which he put on that apparel.

Indeed, let him not occupy himself with conversations alien to that action, unless he presides over a duty which necessarily requires it.

Let him always abstain--but especially while clothed in the vestments of the choir, wherever he may be, whether in the sacristy or another place--from jokes, ridiculous or witty sayings, loud laughter, and futile and empty words which are poured out rashly and imprudently.

Let him not approach the choir hastening as though incited by gain from the distributions, but with a grave step.

And while he proceeds to the choir, although another companion is joined to him, let him approach as though alone, fixed in this meditation: let him reflect within himself that he is approaching the choir--that is, the holy of holies, as an ancient canon provided--and the sacrifice of public prayer.

When he is in the choir, let him withdraw his soul and mind, insofar as it can be done, from all cares, disturbances, and thoughts alien to the sanctity of the matter being performed, and gather his whole self into the worship of God.

Let him also consider for what reason he has betaken himself there; then let him establish for himself that he is in the sight of almighty God and in the company of innumerable Angels and Saints.

In this thought let him see and continually consider that he stands in that place in order to offer most holy worship and veneration to God and to entreat from him every good thing both for himself and for others.

But let him consider God himself as a most loving father and redeemer, most good, most wise, and most merciful, who beholds all things and is everywhere and always.

Then let him suppliantly seek from God purity of heart and the gift and grace of praying well, and let him direct the sacrifice of his prayer, together with the merits of Jesus Christ and of the saints--especially of the saint whose memory the Church celebrates on that day--to the glory of the holy and undivided Trinity and to the utility of himself and his neighbors.

When one must sing psalms, first let him conceive in his mind and soul the subject of the psalm.

Let him observe, moreover, who speaks in the psalm: whether God, the Church, a penitent, or one aspiring to perfection.

Let him likewise attend to the salutary affection to which the psalm especially refers.

When he has thus prepared himself religiously, let him accommodate himself with great attention of soul to the words and sentiments of the psalm, so that he praises, groans, and trembles with fear, just as the expressions of the psalms indicate; and, finally, let him first conceive in his soul what he brings forth with his mouth.

Then let him note the individual words and diligently attain their interpretation, whence his mind and soul may be kindled toward some salutary affection.

Let him also join to the words in his soul a thought either of love, reverence, or humility. And let him indeed arouse some affection in this way: if he brings forth the words of a psalm concerning virtue, let him be kindled with a desire to imitate it; if they concern sins, let him grieve inwardly that he himself, or certainly his neighbor, has been in that condition. And so likewise concerning the other things which are signified by the Psalm.

Moreover, let him endeavor to renew and arouse that attention at the beginning of each psalm, prayer, and other part of the divine office, and then of each canonical hour, especially while he pronounces those words which have power to kindle the spirit of holy prayer: “O God, come to my assistance,” and so forth.

Let him do the same when he notices that he is distracted elsewhere by his thoughts.

At the end of each psalm also, let him arouse himself by those words, “Glory be to the Father,” and so forth.

Likewise, at the conclusion of the prayers, when it is said, “Through our Lord Jesus Christ,” let him strengthen himself with holy hope toward him who is the author of our redemption.

And because attention is very greatly aroused if each person rightly understands what he utters, for this reason let him be continually engaged above all in an exposition of the psalms which is not varied, but is wholly occupied in arousing and exercising holy affections.

But since a great part of the fruit of singing psalms consists in the affections of the psalms, whether one prays in the choir or privately, with a subdued or a loud voice, for this reason let him define for himself certain topics of the Psalms in which this whole method is comprehended.

Let the chief topics beyond the rest be these, from which salutary affections arise: the praise of God, the memory of our good things, the commemoration of our misery, and the rebuke of those who act wickedly.

When the goodness of God is proclaimed in the words of the Psalms, let him kindle himself with his whole soul toward love of him and thanksgiving for the benefits which proceed from divine benignity. When his infinite wisdom and power are commemorated, let him be affected with admiration; then let him inwardly rejoice when something well accomplished by God's aid is related.

When the memory and recollection of good things is aroused by the words of the Psalms, let him conceive a certain desire to obtain them for himself and for others; then let him seek those same things from God, and then take up hope in God in his soul that by his divine aid he will not only obtain those things which are good and salutary, but avoid those which are evil and bring destruction.

Sometimes also let him rejoice inwardly in the Lord that, with God's help, he has obtained good things and avoided evils.

From the commemoration of miseries let him conceive fear, grief, and humility when he recognizes his infirmities.

From the rebuke of those who do evil, let him recognize zeal for divine vengeance and indignation against wickedness. And thus indeed from these salutary affections he will obtain the richest fruit of singing psalms.

When the Psalms have been prayed through and the office of the canonical hours completed, let him remain silent for a little while and, with knees bent, entreat pardon for negligence, distraction, or any other fault which he committed in that office of prayer. Then let him pray that, through the merits of Christ and the whole Church, the homage and ministry of his prayer may be pleasing and acceptable.

In that office of singing psalms, just as attention of mind and salutary affection are required, so is a becoming disposition of the body.

Therefore, in addition to the things established in the first Council concerning bending the knees, inclining the head, standing, sitting, and the other parts, we also forbid certain things in the choir which, as being less becoming and alien to the worship of that place, ought to be avoided. These things are described upon a tablet which will be published by our care and shall be permanently affixed in each sacristy of the Churches, cathedral, collegiate, and parochial.

Moreover, let these very admonitions, described upon another tablet, likewise be kept in each sacristy.

Not only in sacristies and upon tablets, however, but upon the fleshly tablets of the heart; for to what end is all the ornament of churches and apparatus of ceremonies, unless God is served with upright souls? But if it shall seem good to prelates to hang these admonitions also in the choir, they will bring incitements to the pious and instill shame into the negligent and those disdainful of sacred things. At the same time, they will easily restrain those who most shrewdly hunt after free benefices and fruits without a burden.

§ 12. For this reason the first Council gravely admonishes the person who presides over the choir concerning his office:

> In cathedral and collegiate Churches, let him who presides over the choir watch diligently lest anything be omitted in the institution or progress of the divine office, or in the remaining things which pertain to the approved manner > of the Choir, or in the other things which are prescribed by common or particular constitutions in the performance of the divine offices. And let nothing be done absurdly, indecorously, or in an inverted order. If any do not satisfy their office, let him rebuke them gravely and lovingly; if they do not come to their senses, let him command the attendance-marker to record them in the book and report them to the Bishop, to whom they shall pay worthy penalties. But if he himself has been negligent in the performance of his duty, let him be punished by the Bishop or by another who presides over the Church.

But if any Church does not have a person specifically placed over this duty, or if it has such a person but he is not present in the choir, let the person who then sits in the first place in the choir among those who possess dignities or Canonries in that Church discharge the office of presiding.

§ 13. The Council of Basel instructed all no less carefully in session 21:

> If someone who is about to petition a secular prince endeavors to compose himself in word, with honorable apparel, becoming gesture, utterance not hasty but distinct, and an attentive mind, how much more diligently ought one who is about to pray to almighty God in a sacred place take care to do all these things? The holy Synod therefore establishes that in all cathedral and collegiate Churches, at the due hours, after the signals have first been rung with a suitable peal, the praises of the divine majesty shall be reverently discharged by all at each hour, not rapidly and hastily, but slowly and deliberately, and with a becoming pause, especially in the middle of each little verse of the Psalms, making the due difference between the solemn and ferial office.
>
> Let those who are to recite the canonical hours enter the Churches wearing an ankle-length tunic and clean surplices extending below the middle of the shins, or copes, according to the diversity of times and regions; wearing not hoods upon their heads, but almuces or birettas. When they are in the choir, let them preserve the gravity which both the place and office demand, not conversing or speaking there at the same time with others, or reading letters or other writings. And since they assemble there for the sake of singing psalms, they ought not to keep their lips joined and closed, but let all--especially those who discharge the greater honor--cheerfully sing Psalms, hymns, and canticles to God.
>
> When “Glory be to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Spirit” is said, let all rise. When that glorious name Jesus, at which every knee of those in heaven, on earth, and under the earth is bent, is named, let all incline the head. Let no one there, while the hours are publicly sung, read or say the office privately. For he not only withdraws the service which he owes to the choir, but disturbs the others singing psalms. Let the Dean, or the person upon whom the burden rests, watch diligently over the due observance of these things and of the other things pertaining to the performance of the divine office and the discipline of the choir, looking about on every side lest anything be done in disorder. Transgressors of these things shall be punished by loss of the distribution for that hour in which they offended concerning the aforesaid things, or by another greater penalty, as the gravity of the transgression demands.

If prelates seriously take care of these things as they ought, at peril of eternal salvation, we shall in a short time behold another form of the Church.

§ 14. In the same session it also taught concerning attendance in the choir those things whose neglect has ruined the clergy and invited new heresies:

> Whoever at Matins has not been present at the divine office before the end of the Psalm “Come, let us exult,” at the other Hours before the end of the first Psalm, and at Mass before the last Kyrie eleison, and has not remained until the end--unless perhaps, when necessity compels, he must depart after requesting and obtaining permission from the President of the choir--shall be considered absent for that hour, without prejudice to the customs of Churches, if any happen to be stricter concerning this. Let the same be observed regarding those who have not remained in processions from the beginning all the way to the end. For the execution of this, let someone be deputed who has the burden of noting the individual persons who do not assemble at the established time; being bound by oath, he is to act faithfully and spare no one.

> This holy Synod also commands that in Churches in which definite distributions are not established for the individual hours, they shall nevertheless be assigned even from the gross fruits, if necessary, so that each person may receive more or less emolument according to the measure of his labor. It thereby removes entirely that abuse by which one who is present at only one hour appropriates the distributions of the whole day, and that abuse by which Provosts, Deans, or other officials receive the daily distributions solely because they are officials, although they are not actually absent for the utility of the Church.

From this we certainly infer:

First, that those persons offend gravely who, although they live--and often live sumptuously--from the Church, regard the duties of singing and celebrating the praises of God in the Church as beneath their dignity and delegate them to poorer Priests, vicars, students, and hired singers. David, singing to God by nights and days, did not act thus; nor Charlemagne, who himself handed down the modes of singing; nor the greatest and holiest Pontiffs, who together with kings and emperors endowed the Churches most munificently so that the divine majesty might be worshiped publicly by the most learned and illustrious men.

Second, that the custom and opinion of those who possess ecclesiastical benefices but judge that the church is to be approached only rarely, or boast that mere presence suffices for receiving revenues, is damnable. For since a benefice is given on account of an office, one cannot make its fruits his own by idleness alone, much less by business which is worse than idleness. For who would believe either that it was the intention of the founders or that God has any care for the most corrupt custom of those who are intent upon empty tales in the portico or the Church itself while others sing the divine offices? Do you not have houses, covered walks, and gardens for walking and talking, that you despise the Church of God? The Church of God, from which it is provided for you that you can talk idly? With what countenance, moreover, do you see your fellow citizens, who maintain the Churches by tithes and contributions, praying and singing psalms in that church which resounds with your tales?

A Priest, Canon, or Deacon, laughing and chattering in the sight of the Angels, amid the Psalms and the tremendous mysteries, in the middle of the church and in the presence of the Holy Eucharist--although their office is to give examples of modesty, devotion, and reverence toward the Church to all--is present to the great scandal of everyone and perhaps treats of trifling secular business. If he sometimes speaks of piety, nevertheless, because it takes place in a place not granted for it, it is not free from blame, because he makes the house of prayer and sanctuary of the Lord's body a house of business, recreation, wandering discourse, and trifles.

Third, that the cause of so many evils has arisen from this, because the house of God is despised by its own ministers. In Haggai 1:2 God says that neglect of sacred things is the cause of evils:

> This people says: "The time for the house of the Lord to be built has not yet come." And the word of the Lord came by the hand of Haggai the Prophet, saying: "Is it time for you to dwell in paneled houses while this house is desolate?" And now the Lord of hosts says these things: "Set your hearts upon your ways. You have sown much and brought in little; you have eaten and have not been satisfied; you have drunk and have not become drunk; you have clothed yourselves and have not become warm; and he who gathered wages put them into a bag full of holes." The Lord of hosts says these things: "Set your hearts upon your ways. Ascend the mountain, carry timber, and build the house, and it will be acceptable to me and I shall be glorified," says the Lord. "You looked for more, and behold, it became less; and you brought it into the house, and I blew it away. For what reason?" says the Lord of hosts. "Because my house is desolate, and each of you has hastened to his own house. On account of this the heavens above you were forbidden to give dew, and the earth was forbidden to give its produce; and I called drought upon the earth and upon the mountains, upon the wheat and the wine and the oil, upon whatever the ground brings forth, upon human beings and beasts of burden, and upon every labor of the hands."

But now the house of God is not only not built; rather, one already built is turned to profane uses. Therefore, where evil morals have grown so strong that they cannot be corrected by ordinary power, the clergy which despises its own church will be rooted out--a thing which has already happened in many places.

Fourth, reformation is easy if those who ought to will it are willing. For who, if he sees that a thing from which there is no emolument displeases his superiors, would dare shamelessly to offend in it? Next, just as an absent man is deprived of distributions, so let those wanderers be punished with a double fine, so that they both lack their distributions and pay an expenditure for the fabric of the Church. For the religious magnificence of our forefathers erected such great churches not for license, but for devotion. But our discourse will return again to this error, because that which is often committed must often be reproved.

CHAPTER VII

That the Canonical Hours and Vigils Were, and Are, Customary in the Church

§ 1. The Canonical Hours were instituted in the Church so that the divine praises might be sung or recited in a definite order by God's ministers. For after sustenance was appointed for Christian Priests, definite tasks of divine praises and prayers were also defined. In ancient times, although they were not contained within a definite number of Psalms, prayers, or readings, they were greater than in ours.

Thus the singing and recitation of the Canonical Hours in the Church is a most ancient thing. Indeed, their beginnings are in the Church of the Jews. Tertullian, Against the Psychics, chapter 10:

> Moreover, since in the same commentary on Luke both the third hour is shown as an hour of prayer--at which those initiated by the Holy Spirit were regarded as drunk--and the sixth, at which Peter ascended to the upper part of the house, and the ninth, at which they entered the temple, why should we not understand, while plainly preserving the indifference that one must pray always and everywhere and at every time, that these three hours nevertheless, as the more distinguished in human affairs--which distribute the day, distinguish business, and sound publicly--were thus also the more solemn in divine prayers? Daniel's example, too, praying three times a day, also recommends this, certainly by the selection of certain hours, and of none other than the third, sixth, and ninth, which thereafter became the more distinguished Apostolic hours.

Tertullian therefore recognizes three hours customary among Christians and the more distinguished or solemn hours of prayer. Cyprian proves the same in the same way in his book On the Lord's Prayer. I intend to adduce the words of the most holy martyr and prelate, so that the Christian Clergy may recognize with what zeal it ought to perform the sacred offices commended to us by such venerable antiquity, and so that heretics who mock our prayers may understand that they fight against antiquity and all the saints. Cyprian therefore speaks thus in the book cited:

> In the celebration of prayers we find that Daniel and the three youths--strong in faith and victorious in captivity--observed the third, sixth, and ninth hour, evidently in the sacrament of the Trinity which was to be manifested in the last times. For the first hour, advancing to the third, shows the consummated number of the Trinity. Likewise the fourth, proceeding to the sixth, declares another Trinity. And when the ninth is completed from the seventh, the perfect Trinity is numbered through three hours at a time. Long ago, the worshipers of God, spiritually determining these spaces of hours, served at established and lawful times for prayer; and afterwards it was manifested that these had formerly been sacraments, because just persons had previously prayed thus.
> For at the third hour the Holy Spirit descended upon the disciples and fulfilled the grace of the Lord's promise. Likewise Peter, ascending to the housetop at the sixth hour, was instructed by both a sign and the admonishing voice of God to admit all to the grace of salvation, although he had previously doubted concerning the cleansing of the gentiles. And the Lord, crucified at the sixth hour, washed away our sins with his blood at the ninth and, so that he might redeem and give us life, then perfected his victory by his Passion.
>
> But for us, dearest brothers, in addition to the hours observed from antiquity, both the periods and the sacraments of prayer have increased. For one must pray also in the morning, so that the Lord's resurrection may be celebrated by morning prayer, which the Holy Spirit formerly signified in the Psalms, saying: "My King and my God, because to you I shall pray, O Lord; in the morning you will hear my voice; in the morning I shall stand before you and contemplate you." And again the Lord speaks through the Prophet: "At dawn they will keep watch for me, saying: Let us go and return to the Lord our God."
> Likewise, when the sun withdraws and the day ceases, it is necessary to pray again. For because Christ is the true Sun and the true day, when the sun and day of the world withdraw and we pray and ask that light may come upon us anew, we entreat the advent of Christ, who will furnish the grace of eternal light. But the Holy Spirit declares in > the Psalms that Christ is called the day: "The stone," he says, "which the builders rejected, this has been made the head of the corner. This was done by the Lord and is wonderful in our eyes. This is the day which the Lord has made; let us walk and rejoice in it." Likewise the Prophet Malachi testifies that he is called the Sun, saying: "But for you who fear the name of the Lord, the Sun of justice will arise, and healing is in his wings."

> Therefore, if in the holy Scriptures Christ is the true Sun and the true day, no hour is excepted by Christians from the requirement that God should be worshiped frequently and always; so that we who are in Christ--that is, in the true Sun and day--may persist in prayers throughout the whole day and pray. And when, by the law of the world, night revolves and follows in alternating succession, no harm can come from nocturnal darkness to those who pray, because for the sons of light it is day even in the nights. For when is he without light who has light in his heart? Or when is the Sun and day absent from him to whom Christ is Sun and day? Therefore, we who are always in Christ--that is, in the light--must not cease from prayer even during the nights.

Cyprian therefore adds the morning, evening, and nocturnal hours to the Tertullian hours.

Jerome, in his letters to Demetrias and Laeta, also shows that this was the custom of his own time. Therefore this institution is not Damasus's, Jerome's, or Ambrose's, except insofar as all things were reduced more fully to order by their counsel and command. Sigebert in the Chronicles and Radulf of Tongeren must be understood in this way when they name these fathers as institutors of the hours.

Athanasius, On Virginity, teaches that the system of the hours was more ancient:

> Let the rising Sun see the book in your hands. After the third hour you will perform the Synaxes, because at that hour the wood of the cross was affixed. At the sixth hour you will complete supplications with Psalms, weeping, and entreaties, because at this hour the Son of God hung upon the cross. At the ninth hour you will again be engaged in hymns and glorifications; with tears and confession of your sins you will supplicate God, because at this hour the Lord, hanging upon the cross, gave up his spirit. And after the Synaxis of the ninth hour eat your bread.

And after several things:

> If you enter the temple at the twelfth hour, you will perform a greater and longer Synaxis with virgins in agreement with you; but if you have no one in agreement, you will complete the Synaxis alone, with God present and hearing. It is good, however, to pour out tears before the Lord and to be mindful of the twelfth hour, because at that hour the Lord descended to those below.

Farther down he adds these things:

> At midnight you will arise and celebrate the Lord your God with hymns, for at that hour the Lord your God rose from the dead and celebrated his Father with hymns; and for this reason he enjoined us to sing hymns to God at the same hour. As soon as you arise, recite this verse: "At midnight I arose to confess to you, on account of the judgments of your justice"; and pray, and begin to recite Psalm 50 until you complete it.

The author of The Shorter Rules, question 37, Jerome to Eustochium, on Daniel chapter 7, and letters 7 and 37 also treat of these matters.

§ 2. Moreover, the holy Councils teach with what spirit they acted even in our own age, including the Council celebrated at Trier under the most reverend and illustrious John in the year 1549:

> Let all who are deputed to discharge the Canonical Hours take care that, with their minds recollected insofar as can be done, they complete the task due, and let them not conduct themselves in such a way that, while they sing psalms with their voice, they seem in their mind to think of anything rather than God. Let them always beware lest they hear that prophetic saying: "Indeed, they honor me with their lips, but their heart is far from me." But what is it to sing psalms with the voice while in the mind going around the house or marketplace, except to deceive human > beings and mock God? Very grave is what Scripture says: “Cursed is he who performs the work of God negligently.”

> We therefore establish that the divine praises shall be discharged at each hour, not rapidly and hastily, but deliberately, with becoming intervals observed and account taken of distinguishing feast-days from intervening ferial days, reverently and cheerfully, with the voice in no way raised to a shout, lest they seem rather to be insane or to be capering from wantonness of soul than to exult through fervor of spirit, always turning over in the mind the verse so often sung.

§ 3. Clerics initiated into the major orders, professed religious who have a choir, and beneficed clergy are bound to the Hours. Thus the canon A Presbyter, concerning the celebration of Masses, and the canon If Any Presbyter, Distinction 92; likewise Grieving, concerning the celebration of Masses.

§ 4. A great injury is inflicted upon the divine name and the Church by omission of the Canonical Hours. This can be amended as follows:

1. If most benefices are converted into daily distributions for those present and singing.

2. If benefices are not so easily conferred upon boys; or certainly, while they devote themselves to letters, if they are taught to read and read accurately. For now experience teaches that those who are burdened with benefices as youths become either the best or the worst. For if day by day they discharge their task of prayers with attention and devotion, they make great progress in piety and letters. But if they enjoy the revenues of priestly offices and neglect prayers, since they bind themselves every day by grave sin, it is no wonder that, abandoned by divine grace, they become the worst. For they are, as it were, embezzlers of the ecclesiastical treasury, living as though from plunder of ecclesiastical goods, while they entirely evade the office on account of which those goods are given.

But concerning the Hours the Canonists have written more, as has my colleague Father Gisbertus Sceuickhavius in his most useful book On the Ecclesiastical State. Those who occupy the places and functions of the holy Fathers ought deservedly to hear him speaking with the mouth of the holy Fathers.

CHAPTER VIII

That Ecclesiastics Can Be Judges of Civil Matters and Controversies

§ 1. This is a great privilege of the Church: the power to erect its own tribunal in the midst of the Roman Empire and of other kingdoms. Yet Paul, the Doctor of the Gentiles, taught us that this is lawful. 1 Corinthians 6:1 and following:

> Does any one of you, having a matter against another, dare to be judged before the unjust and not before the saints? Or do you not know that the saints will judge concerning this world? And if the world will be judged by you, are you unworthy to judge concerning the smallest matters? Do you not know that we will judge Angels? How much more secular matters? If, therefore, you have secular judgments, appoint those who are held in contempt in the Church to judge. I speak to your shame. Thus is there no wise man among you who can judge between his brother and his brother? But brother contends with brother in judgment, and this before unbelievers. Now there is indeed altogether a fault among you, because you have judgments among yourselves. Why do you not rather receive injury? Why do you not rather suffer fraud? But you inflict injury and commit fraud, and this against brothers.

The Apostle indeed desires Christians to be so disposed that they prefer to suffer injury rather than to inflict it. Yet because, in a great multitude, there were not lacking those who were accustomed obstinately to defend their own possessions and greedily to seek those of others, there was need of a judge. But lest the suit be conducted among the Gentiles, he judged that judges were to be chosen in the Church. This, therefore, is the royal priesthood before which the laws of Gentile Caesars had to yield. If, therefore, the Apostles could erect tribunals in cities and appoint judges, who would doubt that they also judged, and much more that they could judge? For to give the power of judging is more than to judge; it belongs to architectonic power.

§ 2. The judges of ecclesiastics are ecclesiastics alone. Thus Cause 11, Question 1, canon 15:

> By the present authority we command Your Experience that, in causes in which any person holding ecclesiastical office stands in the place of plaintiff and is about to bring an action against any layman, he shall not fail to present his actions before the judge of his province. But in those matters in which a person holding ecclesiastical office is proceeded against, with every obstacle to the accusation removed, he shall resort without distinction to the examination of the bishop, or of the presbyters appointed in the place where the question is at issue.

And canon 2:

> Let no judge, on his own authority and without the Pontiff's permission, constrain or presume to condemn any presbyter, deacon, cleric, or junior servant of the Church.

[Printed page 396]

> But if he does so, let him be separated from the Church upon which he is known to have inflicted injury until he acknowledges and amends his deed.

And canon 5:

> By a continuous law we decree that no bishop, nor any of those who serve the necessities of the Church, shall be dragged before the courts of either ordinary or extraordinary judges. They have their own judges, and they have nothing in common with public laws.

Likewise the Emperor Constantine, presiding in the holy Synod that had assembled at Nicaea, when he saw that a complaint made by certain persons had been brought before him, said:

> You can be judged by no one, because you are reserved for the judgment of God alone.

But this matter belongs to the privilege of exemption, which will be treated in its own place.

§ 3. Those held in contempt are ordered to be appointed as judges in the Church--not so that just anyone may be a judge, for that is not Paul's meaning. For he requires a wise man who can judge between brother and brother. But he calls him one held in contempt because he speaks to their shame, since it is acknowledged that the least of the saints, though he may appear insignificant, is wiser than the wise men of the Gentiles to whom they brought their lawsuits. And so those of a lower condition can be judges, just as if someone were to say that judges can be appointed from the lower-ranking members of an Academy in towns and villages.

§ 4. In former times Christians tried their cases before clerics. Clement, Constitutions, book 2, chapter 49:

> Let your judgments take place on the second day of the week, so that if any controversy arises from your sentence, you may have free opportunity until the Sabbath to settle that controversy and reconcile peace between those who litigate. Let deacons and presbyters, who will judge with integrity, be present at the judgment as men of God, with justice. When each party has come, as the law commands, let both who litigate be stationed in the middle of the tribunal; and, after hearing them, pronounce judgment in holiness, striving to reconcile them before the bishop's sentence, lest judgment against the sinner go forth over the earth.

Chrysostom explains this excellently, interpreting it as referring to Priests:

> Ὃ γὰρ λέγει τοῦτόν ἐστιν· ἴσως ἐρεῖ τις ὅτι οὐδεὶς ἐν ὑμῖν σοφός, οὐδὲ ἱκανὸς διακρῖναι, εὐτελεῖς προήχθησαν πάντες· καὶ τί τοῦτο; κἂν γὰρ μηδεὶς ᾖ σοφός, φησί, τοῖς ἐλαχίστοις ἐπιτρέπετε. Τοῦτο δὲ πρὸς ἐντροπὴν ὑμῶν λέγω· ἐλέγχοντος δὲ τὴν τούτων ἀντίθεσιν, ὡς σκῆψιν οὖσαν περιττήν. Διὸ δὲ ἐπήγαγεν· Οὕτως οὐκ ἔνι σοφὸς ἐν ὑμῖν οὐδὲ εἷς; Τοσαύτη, φησίν, ἀπορία; τοσαύτη σπάνις ἀνδρῶν συνετῶν παρ' ὑμῖν; Καὶ ἡ ἐπαγωγὴ δὲ μείζονα τὴν πληγὴν ἔχει. Εἰπὼν γάρ, Οὕτως οὐκ ἔνι σοφὸς ἐν ὑμῖν οὐδὲ εἷς; ἐπήγαγεν, ὃς δυνήσεται διακρῖναι μεταξὺ τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ αὐτοῦ. Ὅταν γὰρ ἀδελφὸς δικάζηται μετὰ τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ, οὐδὲ προσδεῖται τῆς συνέσεως, καὶ τῆς δεινότητος τῷ μεσιτεύοντι τὴν δίκην, τῆς διαθέσεως καὶ τῆς εὐπειθείας πολλὰ συμπραττούσης πρὸς τὴν λύσιν τῆς τοιαύτης φιλονεικίας.

Perhaps someone will say that there is no wise man among you, nor anyone fit to discern and adjudicate. And what then? For even if there is no wise man, he says, entrust the matter to the least among you. "I speak to your shame." This is the language of one refuting their objection as an unnecessary excuse and pretext. And therefore he added: "Thus is there no wise man among you?" Is there, he says, so great a lack, so great a scarcity of intelligent men among you? But what he added inflicts a greater blow. For when he had said, "Thus is there no wise man among you?" he added, "Who can judge between his brother and his brother?" For when brother contends in judgment with brother, intelligence and dexterity are not needed for the arbitration of the suit, since affection and kinship bring great assistance toward resolving a contention of this kind.

Augustine's opinion is the same in Letter 47 to Proculeianus and in On the Work of Monks, chapter 29:

> I call as witness upon my soul that I would prefer, during fixed hours on every single day--as has been established in well-regulated monasteries--to do some work with my hands and to have fixed hours for reading and praying, rather than to endure the most tumultuous perplexities of other people's causes in secular business, either by deciding them in judgment or by intervening to bring them to an end. The same Apostle afflicted us with these troubles--not according to his own decision, assuredly, but according to the decision of him who spoke in him. Yet we do not read that he himself endured them, for the course of his Apostleship was differently constituted. Nor did he say: "If, therefore, you have secular judgments, bring them to us," or, "Appoint us to judge"; but: "Those who are held in contempt in the Church," he says, "appoint these. I speak to your shame. Thus is there no wise man among you who can judge between his brother and his brother? But brother is judged with brother, and this before unbelievers." He therefore wished wise, faithful, and holy men who remained in their own places--not those who traveled here and there on account of the Gospel--to be examiners of such matters. Hence it is never written of him that he ever had leisure for such matters, from which we cannot excuse ourselves, even if we are held in contempt, because he wished even such men to be appointed.

§ 5. The examples of the most holy and most laborious bishops show us their judicial power. Gregory of Nyssa, in his oration on the virtues of Gregory Thaumaturgus, Bishop of Neocaesarea:

> They judged that no other adjudication even of secular and temporal controversies was more valid and firm for them, or of greater authority; but every question and dispute, and every intricate and difficult entanglement of affairs, was resolved and decided by his counsels and admonitions. Hence, through his beneficence, there was both for everyone collectively and for each person individually not only equity and an upright settlement of law, but also peace.

Moreover, by a miracle God showed that the distinction he won in calming disputes was pleasing to him. Yet he was not on that account negligent in prayer, reading, works of mercy, or teaching. He found seventeen Christians when he received the episcopate; when he died, he left seventeen Gentiles.

Ambrose was so occupied in deciding lawsuits that Augustine says he could not breathe, book 3 of the Confessions, chapter 3:

> For I could not ask of him what I wished, in the manner I wished, because crowds of busy people, whose infirmities he served, shut me off from his ear and mouth. When he was not with them--which was for only a very small portion of time--he either refreshed his body with necessary sustenance or his mind with reading.

And a little later:

> And we conjectured that during that little time which he obtained for restoring his mind, when he was free from the clamor of other people's causes, he did not wish to be called away to anything else. Perhaps he was taking care that, if an attentive and intent listener were present and the author he was reading had set down something rather obscurely, it should not also become necessary to explain it or to discuss certain more difficult questions, and that, with time spent on this work, he would turn through fewer volumes than he wished.

Yet Ambrose did, said, and wrote so many things that, to one who examines his works, he might seem to have lived in the greatest leisure.

Nor did he voluntarily bind himself to so laborious and so hateful a charge; rather, in Letter 49 to Marcellus, he writes that he was clothed with that necessity by the authority of blessed Paul. Augustine, Ambrose's disciple, says in the place cited above:

> Malicious people clamor for it, or certainly they oppress the weak, so as to compel them to bring their causes before us. We do not dare say to them, "Man, who appointed me judge or divider over you?" For the Apostle appointed ecclesiastics as examiners of such causes.

He frequently complains of the multitude of business; yet he acknowledges that he is not worn away by the faithful through their litigation, but that rather, by obeying him, they console him.

There survives a complaint of Synesius, who was compelled to accept the episcopate, in Letter 57:

> He who exercises the priesthood together with Philosophy has need of leisure. I do not condemn Bishops who are engaged in the business of affairs, but rather I admire those who can do both; it is not within my ability to serve two masters. But if there are others who are not harmed by condescension, they will certainly be able both to exercise the priesthood and to be Prefects of cities. For if a ray of the Sun comes into contact with dung, it remains pure and is not defiled; but when I do this same thing, I have need of fountains and of the sea.

Synesius was denied the release he requested, and he excommunicated the governors Andronicus and, afterwards, Tonans. He could not have done this unless he had first investigated and judged the case. See Letter 58.

§ 6. Beza is therefore injurious to the most holy men in his notes on chapter 6 of First Corinthians:

> Ministers, whose office is widely different, must by no means be employed to hear disputes of this sort, but rather any others among those who were afterwards called Laymen, who are least occupied of all with other more useful affairs. For thus I interpret those called τοὺς ἐξουθενημένους--"those held in contempt"--hyperbolically, not as those who are most unlearned or who are most base. This, therefore, is that Apostolic doctrine, confirmed in very many places by both the command and example of CHRIST himself: so far was he from granting both swords either to Peter or to any other pastors descended from Peter. But if this had been attentively considered, as it ought to have been, by those ancient Bishops--who were, I acknowledge, far removed from the ambition which presently followed them, yet nevertheless departed from the Apostolic rule--neither would they have wearied themselves with so many labors, of which Augustine complains in some places, nor would they have opened to posterity an entrance for seizing the authority of Magistrates, certainly followed at length by the destruction of the human race.

But those most holy Bishops undertook that laborious and hateful business for the sake of piety and judged that it had been laid upon them by the Apostle.

Yet nothing here is more true than that Calvinist ministers must not be employed to adjudicate controversies. The Apostle nevertheless bound Bishops in this way, not contrary to the precept of Christ or of Peter. They did not judge contrary to the Apostolic rule, much less did they seize a tyranny; rather, they aided the oppressed against the violence of the more powerful. The fact that Silvanus, a most holy man and Bishop of Troas, took the power of judging away from his clerics is proof that they possessed that power. Since they were abusing it, and since suitable clerics were lacking, he appointed trustworthy laymen. For Nicephorus says that they had set up a market; Socrates says that they made profit from the controversies of litigants. Nor is this surprising: that part of Asia was troubled by various heresies, and the Clergy's integrity and constancy in both faith and morals had been weakened. Nevertheless jurisdiction is not for that reason not owed to the order, merely because one Bishop of a little Church transferred judgments to Laymen because the clerics judged badly. Indeed, I judge that clerical judges must be diligently investigated every year, and, if they depart from justice, punished with the greatest severity.

§ 7. Finally, the Council of Trent (session 13, chapter 1, On Reform) variously constrains those accused of crimes who were striving to escape episcopal judgments. Accordingly, it denies that deference must be shown to a frivolous appeal:

> Since, therefore, those accused of crimes very often feign complaints and grievances in order to avoid punishments and evade the judgments of Bishops, and impede the judge's proceeding by recourse to appeal, lest they abuse, for the defense of iniquity, a remedy instituted for the protection of innocence, and in order that their cunning and evasion of this kind may be forestalled, it has thus established and decreed: in causes of visitation and correction, whether of fitness and unfitness, and also in criminal causes, no appeal shall be made from the Bishop, or from his Vicar General in spiritual matters, before a definitive sentence, from an interlocutory sentence or from any other grievance whatsoever; nor shall the Bishop or Vicar be bound to defer to an appeal of this sort as frivolous.

§ 8. The reasons why this was useful to the state were certainly many, and they remain so today.

1. Causes are handled more sincerely by the Lord's priests and ministers than by profane judges. For they preserve more closely the clearer rule of justice and equity. This is also the reason why the people themselves appealed to the episcopal audience. For just as civil laws ought to be accommodated to ecclesiastical laws, so it is also fitting that secular judges should listen to bishops and priests. The constitutions of emperors possess the force of law, but the canons of the Apostles possess a firmer force. Hence it came about that Innocent said, nearly in these words, that the Church is not constrained by worldly laws; and Jerome in the Epitaph of Fabiola and Letter 30 to Oceanus: "The laws of the Caesars are one thing, the laws of Christ another; Papinian commands one thing, Paul another." Hence it came about that Constantine decreed that the sentences of governors could be rescinded by Bishops. Ambrose himself is witness, in book 2 of On Duties, chapter 25, that this was done by him.

2. Litigation before Bishops was conducted at less expense. For those judges were both distinguished in piety and knowledge and, for the most part, rich and liberal toward the poor; thus it seemed in no way probable that they would conduct themselves so that their possessions increased from lawsuits. Even now they live from the Church and have no heirs for whose sake they might violate justice and sell their sentence.

3. The civil power of the Church seems necessary, amid so great a degree of human malice, arrogance, subtlety, and obstinacy, for suppressing errors, and therefore it was deservedly granted to bishops. Before Constantine more heresies arose because they were restrained by no force; and under blasphemous emperors there was the greatest liberty for heretical blasphemies, so that the Church was rent more grievously by domestic dissensions than by persecution.

§ 9. But if civil dominion is rightly granted to the pastors of the Church, as I have proved in The Conclusion of the Jubilees, the judicial power inhering in and connected with it must also be granted. But this dominion was formerly given and accepted by many, and is retained even today--not only by those whose virtue could be called into doubt, but by absolutely all who have obtained those churches. John of Palomar, Archdeacon of Barcelona, treated of them with the greatest learning at the Council of Basel. These are his words; for thus he says:

> I shall begin with the Church of Mainz. Behold Saint Boniface, who possessed such authority that in his time it was said that the times of the Apostles had returned; he illuminated many provinces by his preaching. In the same Church was Saint Lullus the Confessor. Likewise Rabanus, a great Doctor, is cited daily. Likewise in the same Church of Mainz was Archbishop Bardo; in the same was Willigisus. In the Church of Trier, which Helena, the mother of Constantine, who was born at Trier, endowed with many relics and temporal goods in addition to its first endowment, there were ninety-nine Archbishops down to the Lord Otto, the last to die; of these, twenty-five are Saints, as is contained in the Calendar of Archbishop Baldwin, which is preserved in that Church.
> In the Church of Cologne was blessed Severinus, who was and is renowned for many miracles; likewise Saint Remedius; likewise Saint Cunibert; likewise Saint Haymo; Aglolfus the martyr; likewise Evergissus the martyr; likewise Heribert: all these were holy Archbishops of Cologne. In the Church of Liège, which is most opulent in temporal goods, were Saint Maternus, Saint Hubert, Saint Theodard, Saint Servatius, Saint Lambert the martyr, and Saint Geregisilus, all Bishops. Likewise in the Church of Lorch was Saint Maximianus, consecrated Bishop by Saint Sixtus around the year of the Lord 223; he conferred upon the said Church the patrimony which is now called Enns, with all the neighboring towns and secular jurisdictions, which remains to the present in Austria and is possessed by that Church of Passau. Likewise Saint Adalbert happily governed for many years the magnificently endowed Church of Prague. Likewise Saint Procopius had a most opulent Monastery in Bohemia; those who disturbed its possessions have sometimes experienced divine vengeance upon themselves. Likewise Saint Wolfgang at Regensburg. Likewise Saint Corbinian, Bishop of Freising, acquired estates for that same Church which are known today. Likewise Saint Ulrich of Augsburg governed a Church opulent in estates and civil dominions. Likewise Saint Conrad, Bishop of Constance. Likewise Saint Virgil endowed the Church of Salzburg with dominions. There was also a Saint Virgil, Bishop of the Church of Trent, which was opulent in civil dominion. Nor must Saint Stanislaus, Bishop of Krakow, be passed over: when he suffered a controversy concerning a village of the Church, he raised from the grave a man who had died three years before and led him to the judgment as a witness. Without falsehood, if I had searched well, I could have found many more holy Bishops and Abbots who presided over churches and monasteries possessing temporal goods and civil dominions. Pious ears surely recoil from hearing it called into doubt whether that is lawful which, by so great a multitude of saints through so many courses of time, was held, practiced, and observed as lawful.

And these examples are more recent and transalpine, yet they rest upon the deeds of the most ancient and most holy men. For the same Archdeacon continues thus:

> I shall begin with blessed Sylvester, to whose holiness and learning the exaltation of the Catholic faith after the chief men of the Jews had been defeated bears testimony. Under him was the first holy and venerable Council of Nicaea, and it was after the endowment of the Church; from this Constantine's deed is sufficiently authorized, because, if it had been unlawful, so celebrated a Council would have condemned it. But I also have the testimony of blessed Ambrose, who, speaking on the death of the Emperor Theodosius, says that Constantine was of great merit before God because he was the first of the Emperors to believe and left after him to princes an inheritance of faith and devotion. And our Spaniard Isidore testifies to the same thing in his Chronicles. And the Greeks, who were then Catholics, number Constantine himself in the Catalogue of Saints and celebrate his feast with solemnity on 21 May. Next I shall speak of Saint Mark, under whom the holy Synod of Nicaea was celebrated; and in his time and afterwards Saint Athanasius, Eusebius, Nicholas, Hilary, and John Chrysostom were illustrious. Likewise Saint Leo the Pope, who was the forty-third after Saint Peter. Likewise Felix II, who was crowned with martyrdom. Likewise Damasus I, under whom was the Synod of Constantinople of 150 Fathers; to him Jerome wrote that letter: "Because the ancient East, dashed against itself in fury, tears the Lord's seamless tunic into tiny pieces." He was also asking that his confession of faith be approved by him, and wrote many other letters. Likewise Cyriacus, who was crowned with martyrdom at Cologne with eleven thousand virgins. Likewise Saint Symmachus the Pope, concerning whose life and miracles see Vincent in book 23 of the Historical Mirror, chapters 1 and 2. Likewise Saint John the Pope, concerning whom see the same Vincent in the same book, chapter 33. Likewise Saint Agapitus, in the same book, chapter 61. Likewise Saint Gregory, one of the four Doctors of the Church, whose holiness and learning are known. Likewise Saint Martin, concerning whom see Vincent, the same book 23, chapter 84. Likewise Saint Stephen the Pope, concerning whom see the same Vincent, the same book, chapter 167. Likewise Pope Honorius was of wondrous piety; a certain demoniac put on his tunic and was delivered. Likewise Saint Severinus, a kind lover of the clergy and the poor, enlarged the possessions of the Churches. Likewise John IV, after selling the treasures of the Church, redeemed many thousands of people throughout Istria and Dalmatia. Likewise Saint Martin of Todi, whose feast is celebrated on the day after that of Saint Martin of Tours. Eugenius I was kind and lovable to all and of the greatest holiness. When Agatho kissed a certain leper, the man was cleansed. John, a Greek by nation, was crowned with martyrdom. Paul, a most mild and merciful man, used to go by night with a few intimates to visit the poor and sick and minister to them. Leo IV, a man of great patience and great humility, performed wonderful deeds in his life; his feast is celebrated on the seventeenth day before the Kalends of August. Nicholas after him was a most holy man, scarcely equaled in the Roman See by anyone after Gregory the Great. All the aforesaid were holy men, of approved sanctity, in the Roman See after the endowment of the Church. There were also many others illustrious in virtue and knowledge, such as Innocent III, who is so reverently cited in the treatise On the Mass and in other works; Peter of Tarentaise, called Innocent V, a most illustrious Doctor; and many others whom it would be lengthy to name. I wished to name only the aforesaid, who are entitled saints, while omitting many others. But I do not wish to omit this one thing, because it is highly pertinent to the proposal: what Vincent relates in book 25 of the Historical Mirror, chapter 25, concerning Gregory VI. He expended great efforts and labors to recover the Church's temporal goods occupied by tyrants; and when he could not accomplish this either by exhortations or by censures, he did it by force of arms. Hence, as he lay under the illness from which he died, the Cardinals, calling him a bloodthirsty man, said that he ought not to be buried in the Church of Saint Peter with the other Pontiffs. When he learned this, he summoned the Cardinals and, after holding a conference with them, at last said: "Because both our thoughts and yours can be mistaken, let us commit everything to divine examination. Set my body, prepared according to the custom of my predecessors, before the doors of the Church, and let the doors be secured with locks and bars. If God wills that I enter, applaud the miracle; but if not, do with my corpse as you please." Thus it was done. And as soon as his body had been placed before the doors of the Church, which had been closed with locks, a mighty whirlwind sent by God shattered the obstacles of the bars and drove the doors themselves, thrown open with violent force, against the wall with a great crash.

For this reason Bernard says in book 4 of On Consideration, to his disciple Eugenius: "In these things you have succeeded not Peter, but Constantine"; and in book 2: "Grant that you claim these things for yourself by any other title, but not by Apostolic right." That they are possessed by good right is taught both by these things and by the consensus of the Christian world, by which they were defended. When the Romans, with an untimely desire for their former liberty and majesty, strove to bring all the kingdoms once under their dominion back into their power, they also attempted to reduce the Pontiff to order and take away all his royal rights; but the Frankish and German Emperors punished them, as they also punished the Lombards. They saw that the dignity of the scepter and principate was appropriate for the Pontiff who would govern the Church. Barretus, book 2, chapter 1, teaches that the Pontiff possesses his own goods by good right, although he is otherwise a flatterer of kings. Indeed, he adds that the rights are more ancient and more equitable--which must always be regarded. Then he accuses Constantine's successors rather of having withheld them than he derogates from the Pontiff's right. Constantine gave wealth and honor. Charles restored them; other things were added:

the Cottian Alps, the Exarchate, the dominion of Benevento, Sicily, Tuscany, Liguria, Apulia, Ferrara, and other dominions.

§ 10. Finally, I conclude that it is to the singular advantage of the state that great power of judging and governing be permitted to Bishops and Priests. The fruit ought to be that those who are capable of amendment may more readily hear the word of God, obey it once heard, and correct their morals, and that the obstinate may be terrified, if the mysteries are administered and doctrine is explained not by a powerless and contemptible Priest but by a regal Pontiff. Constantine himself adduces this cause for his donation: that the Pontifical summit should not be held in contempt, but should be adorned with glory and power more than the dignity of an earthly empire.

Yet that honor is not the primary end, but the safety of the state. For whence can judges more skilled, more equitable, less in need of money, and less desirous of gifts be obtained than from the most honorable assembly of Bishops, from the multitude of the Church's Prelates? This now obtains in the principal parts of Europe--in Germany, France, and Spain; indeed also in Britain itself, which employs Bishops in the administration of civil affairs.

CHAPTER IX

Against the Sectarians, the Civil Jurisdiction of Prelates Is Defended

§ 1. I have shown that the power of ecclesiastics to govern and pronounce law is legitimate, just, customary, and useful to the state. Now, because heretics rise up vehemently against it, let us answer them as well from divine law, human law, and approved custom.

Their first axiom is that the Pope, all Bishops, and Prelates can possess no civil administration. Most of them vehemently cry this out; Sharpe treats it in a long disputation in question 6, On Antichrist. For after he had objected to himself that ecclesiastics possess jurisdiction by the gift of Princes, he replies:

> Although the antecedent is controversial, as was said above, nevertheless the conclusion does not follow, because both the Pope's acceptance and the Princes' donation were contrary to Divine law and even contrary to Pontifical law. For in the Decrees, canon Dicenti, 25, question 11, Pope Pelagius says that rescripts which are obtained by deception or false petitions confer no right; and in the gloss, that Clerics who use them must be stripped of offices and benefices, while Laymen must be excommunicated. But the Princes' rescripts by which the Pope obtained jurisdictions were deceptive, if not by reason of their drafting and issuance, at least by reason of the cause alleged in them, which was that Christian piety demanded that Bishops be adorned with those gifts and privileges--expressly contrary to the word of God.

And a little later he says that the Pope acquired temporal power in no other way than through robberies. Then he continues:

> Pope Alexander III by a rescript in chapter Vigilanti, and Pope Innocent III in chapter Si diligenti, and the Lateran Council in chapter Quoniam, and the Canonists in canon Placuit, 16, question 3, say that, just as time does not remove the obligation from a possessor in bad faith, neither does it acquire any right. And the Bishops did not obtain those Principalities in good faith, who acted contrary to Christ's institution, as above. Bellarmine therefore rightly compares the Pope's right with a kingdom acquired through robberies.

Finally, he accuses the Princes who donated goods to the Church:

> Princes who donated to the Church that from which Pastors can support themselves are to be praised. But those who handed over those immense riches, from which they live sumptuously and idly, acted badly, because they thus corrupted the Church; and therefore that saying is right: "Religion gave birth to riches, but the daughter devoured her mother." The Princes indeed had zeal, but not according to knowledge. But those who conferred temporal jurisdictions acted impiously, because they violated Christ's institution. Nor did the Popes follow the example of Christ, who fled when the Jews wished to appoint him King: John 6:15. See Bernard in the books On Consideration.

§ 2. Hence it is easily apparent that, if the matter is decided by the opinion of the preachers, all temporal jurisdiction must be taken away from Bishops and Prelates; for they judge it to have been impiously donated and accepted, to have been acquired through robberies, and now to be held unjustly by possessors in bad faith and robbers, with no right of prescription. Therefore, when an opportunity is given, it can altogether be seized from them by secular Princes.

Nor can any treaties, compacts, or laws of the Empire stand in the way, because he says that it is contrary to divine law. Hence it is clear that, so long as that heresy holds dominion, peace cannot be established, since one party judges the other--although it alleges rights of donation, purchase, and prescription--to possess unjustly and defend itself by robbery. Hence, by necessary consequence, they strive to extinguish all force of laws and judgments. For whatever the judges of the Imperial Chamber decree in favor of any ecclesiastic, those impostors affirm to have been decreed contrary to right and equity in favor of a robber. If a secular Prince invades and occupies the wealth and dominion of some Bishop, they declare that possessions have rightly been seized from robbers.

This opinion produces the greatest dissension among the Estates and an ἄσπονδον--implacable--war, which, although it is not always waged, is nevertheless always feared and prepared. Nor can any Bishop be secure if secular Princes should at some time believe their own ministers, whom the ministers' madness continually endeavors, by hope of ecclesiastical wealth, to drive into the slaughter and destruction of their fatherland. But after bishoprics have been subdued and plundered, and Bishops and Pastors have been driven out or slain, they trust that their Doctors will be able freely to vaunt and spread their heresy. But they err, and God has already long since shown their error to the world.

§ 3. It is certain that by natural law the priesthood and kingship, or civil jurisdiction, do not conflict. For under the law of nature the same persons were both Kings and Priests. In Genesis 14, Melchizedek; Moses in Exodus 18 is judge and Pontiff; and Eli in 1 Kings 1. The Maccabees were Princes and Pontiffs. Sharpe replies that these things were lawful then, but by no means now, and, secondly, that those instances were extraordinary.

The first point is altogether sufficient for us: namely, that the firstborn were at once Princes and Priests, and that Patriarchs, Prophets, and others exercised those two offices. The second point is false. For under the law of nature the same persons were ordinarily both Princes and Priests. Furthermore, the Maccabees were ordinary Pontiffs and Princes.

§ 4. Next, no law has provided in the New Testament that the same person may not be both Prince and Bishop, or possess both civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction. For the laws which they allege in favor of this opinion do nothing for it, and their arguments are frivolous. Yet it will have been worth the effort to weigh them, if only so that the ignorance and intellectual weakness of the seditious may appear.

Argument 1.

Those things which God has separated and distinguished must not be confounded by human beings, Matthew 19:6. But God distinguished civil and ecclesiastical offices, both under the Old Testament and under the New, in the persons administering them, their causes, laws, punishments, and so forth--except extraordinarily and at certain times--as in 2 Chronicles 19 and Matthew 18:15. Therefore these cannot exist together in one person.

I reply: In Matthew 19:6 it is written, "What God has joined, let man not separate"; but it treats of marriage. Next, in 2 Chronicles 19 Jehoshaphat distinguished the offices of the temple from the civil offices. But it is not consonant with reason that, although they have sometimes been separated, they can never be joined. For they are of such a kind that they change according to the conditions of the times. In Moses, Eli, Samuel, and the Maccabees both powers were joined. Indeed, Eleazar the son of Aaron and Joshua the son of Nun divide the land among the sons of Israel, Joshua 14:1; but to give land, as is written there, pertains to secular jurisdiction. But what appearance of an argument is this: God did not wish those joined in marriage to be separated; therefore a Bishop cannot be a judge in a civil cause or administer a part of the state, not even a village?

Argument 2.

That which Christ himself denies pertains to him and refuses cannot pertain to his successors and ministers, because no one's authority can be greater than Christ's, Matthew 10:24. But Christ denies that civil jurisdiction pertains to him, Luke 12:14, John 6:15 and 8:11. Chrysostom therefore rightly says in Homily 42 on John that he did this to admonish us to despise human dignities and to show that he needed no secular things. Therefore--

I reply: In Luke 12:14 Christ avoided the office of judging: “Man, who appointed me judge or divider over you?” In John 6:15 he fled when they wished to make him King. In John 8:11 he asks the adulteress, “Has no one condemned you?” and, when she answers, “No one,” he says, “Neither will I condemn you.”

But these things establish nothing against the temporal jurisdiction of Bishops. For Christ rejected that division not because he could not judge, but because he did not wish to do so for a legitimate reason. First, those men had their own magistracy. Next, from that division an opportunity could have been given to the Pharisees to calumniate and to the magistracy to rage against him. Finally, he had not come to divide small fields. But if this deed is understood so that all jurisdiction and civil office are taken away from a Bishop, Gospel Ministers will not be able either to divide fields, to be arbitrators, or to be witnesses concerning political affairs. For who appointed them dividers? Christ fled kingship because he taught by his example that honors are to be fled. Many holy and prudent men have fled kingdoms and Bishoprics; others, however, accepted the same without fraud or fault. If the example given imposes an obligation, therefore it excludes everyone from kingship. For that which Christ fled must be fled. Indeed, the Donatists, Libertines, and Anabaptists use these words against the Magistracy; for they say that the office of ruling is evil in itself. And would that the ministers lived according to Christ’s example rather than according to their own morals. For Christ had nowhere to lay his head; Christ did not take a wife, yet thus far he has found no imitator among the ministers. Let those who say Christ fled them therefore flee possessions and a wife.

If Christ’s kingdom is not of this world or concerned with the affairs of this world, then the office of Ministers ought not to be concerned with political affairs and civil principalities. But the former is true, John 18:36, 1 Corinthians 4:1, 2 Corinthians 10:4. Therefore Ambrose rightly says: “It does not befit one man to possess a double possession”; and Lyra on John 6: “Christ did not accept the honor, giving an example of fleeing honors.” Therefore--

I reply: Christ’s kingdom was not of this world in the sense that it was supported by worldly power and wealth; for he had come in order not only not to employ a kingdom but not even to possess property. Yet he did not forbid Christians to possess kingdoms, even if they are Bishops, just as he did not forbid them to possess property. They can be occupied with civil business, and indeed sometimes ought to be, if the safety of the state and the cause of religion so demand. Certainly, if a noble, a baron, a count, a Prince, or a King wished to devote himself to the ecclesiastical ministry, and if he were ordained by the imposition of hands, they could not by right deprive him of his jurisdiction and kingdom. For why would they judge him worthy of so great a penalty that, by undertaking the office of preacher, he should strip himself and his sons of them? A Calvinist or Lutheran Superintendent can therefore retain both jurisdictions; why, then, could a Catholic not do so?

Argument 4.

That which was forbidden to the Apostles, who were the primary Ministers of the Church after Christ, is not lawful for others. But the exercise of principality was forbidden to the Apostles without qualification, Matthew 20:25, Mark 10:43, Luke 22:25. Tertullian therefore rightly says in On Idolatry, chapter 18, “Christ judged the glory of the age foreign to himself and his own”; and Bernard in book 2 of On Consideration, chapter 4: “Lordship is forbidden to the Apostles; therefore dare to usurp it yourself. Either the Lord exercises the Apostleship, or the Apostle exercises lordship: you are plainly forbidden from both”; and Cyril in book 3 on John, chapter 20: “The honor and glory of the world must be fled by those who wish to attain the glory of God.” Therefore--

I reply: The passage Matthew 20:25 is a support, but a ruinous one, of the caviling heresy. “You know,” says the Lord, “that the Princes of the Gentiles lord it over them, and those who are greater exercise power over them. It shall not be so among you,” and so forth. But this has nothing to do with the present matter. For by those words harsh and imperious lordship, such as belongs to people seeking their own advantages, is forbidden. For this is κατακυριεύειν: to oppress by violent domination; this is κατεξουσιάζειν: to exercise power over subjects with arrogance. Thus it is not rule, but the abuse of rule, violence, and pride that are censured by those words.

The Anabaptists object with the same passage against the magistracy. Sharpe replies to them: “For Christ distinguishes the ministry from civil dominion, even legitimate dominion, because he does not wish ministers to exercise lordship in the Church as kings do in a kingdom.” One must add, “as the kings of the Gentiles do in a kingdom,” such as Herod, Tiberius, and others at that time.

Argument 5.

Christ does not send Pastors to exercise any office other than that to which he was sent by the Father, John 20:21. But Christ was not sent to exercise political principality, as Bellarmine concedes above, chapter 4. Chrysostom therefore rightly says in Homily 11 on the Epistle to the Ephesians: “The teaching of the word has been entrusted to us, not the authority of power.”

I reply: Pastors are sent by Christ to exercise a spiritual office, and civil command is not given by that mission, for these are distinct commands and offices. Yet Pastors are not forbidden to undertake even civil care for the safety of the Church and the state. Certainly, teachers are appointed over pupils in order to examine their abilities and form their morals; yet they are not forbidden also to plead their causes and to make provision for their health, food, and lodging. Indeed, this is often necessary.

Although, therefore, their mission does not bind them to civil offices and solicitude, that care is nevertheless frequently useful and sometimes necessary; it is not, however, forbidden. Unless perhaps someone should censure Ambrose when he undertakes dangerous embassies for the sake of peace, or condemn other Bishops keeping watch over the safety of their people. Moreover, what will the Lutherans do about the Lutheran Bishops of Germany, or the Calvinists about the Calvinist Bishops in England, who not only rule widely, but also administer royal offices at court?

Argument 6.

If necessary offices, even natural ones, must be omitted so that ministers may discharge the ecclesiastical office, then much more ought a minister to abstain from political office and principality. But the former is true, Luke 9:60. Therefore the Council of Chalcedon, canon 7, rightly forbids a Bishop under penalty of excommunication to accept secular honors; and canon 3 forbids any Cleric to undertake the guardianship and care of an Orphan.

I reply: Christ did not forbid natural offices. He was calling the disciple; the man asks leave to bury his father; Christ denies it to him. “Allow,” he says, “the dead to bury their own dead. But you, go and proclaim the kingdom of God.” He was asking for a delay and respite, and indeed one of uncertain duration, until the death of his father. For what if the father prolonged his life not merely for a long time but even beyond the years of the son? Christ cuts off these slow endeavors. For the father was not dead, just as those dead men who were going to commit the dead to the tomb were not dead, but dead perhaps because they had lost the life of grace. Beza indeed interprets it thus: “Namely, those devoid of true life and obstinately resisting the doctrine of eternal life.” But if this opinion of Christ the Lord commands the ministers of the Church to abstain from every natural office, so that they cannot even be present at the funeral of their parents, who will attempt to excuse preachers who bury their parents, enter upon an inheritance, and often divide it with others by litigation and law? Indeed, they contract marriages and arrange them for others; they give their daughters in marriage and bring wives home for their sons. Are these not secular things?

Argument 7.

He adduces the example of soldiers who do not entangle themselves in secular business. Does he not know that these things are harmful only insofar as they impede spiritual things, but are otherwise useful and divine? Civil business can be conducted spiritually by a spiritual man to the glory of God. Certainly Augustine not only judged causes but indicates that this was customary, Letter 147:

> And indeed, when people desire to finish their secular causes before us and have need of us for them, they call us saints and servants of God in order to transact the business of their earth. At some time let us also conduct the business of our salvation and theirs--not concerning gold, not concerning silver, not concerning estates and livestock, on account of which things we are greeted daily with bowed head so that we may bring people's dissensions to an end; but concerning our Head himself there is so shameful and destructive a dissension among us.

But these matters are to be handled as secondary, and in such a way that they do not impede spiritual matters. No one fails to understand that hearing and bringing to an end the causes and controversies of the state is a holy and most useful work, unless he is so contentious that he delights in discords and lawsuits.

Argument 8.

He who ought to be wholly engaged in reading and preaching, in season and out of season, so that he may render an account of souls, ought not to exercise a civil office in addition to his ecclesiastical office. But the Minister of God ought to be such, Romans 12:17, 1 Timothy 4:15, 2 Timothy 4:2. Therefore the Fourth Council of Carthage rightly commands a Bishop to attend only to preaching, reading, and prayer; and the Canons of the Apostles command that a Bishop who entangles himself in secular affairs be excommunicated.

I reply: The Apostle says, "Meditate upon these things; be in these things"; and, "Preach the word," and so forth. These things were said to all Bishops, but in such a way that they omit neither hospitality nor other duties. They can perform those things without omitting these. Could not David meditate on the law of the Lord by day and night and nevertheless wage wars, administer a kingdom, and subdue neighboring nations? Did not many holy Kings do this, although they ruled many and very great kingdoms? Why, therefore, could some Bishop not administer a small territory and at the same time keep watch over the salvation of souls? The King of Great Britain administers three kingdoms reduced into one body and is nevertheless the head of the Church; why could the Bishop of Cambridge not take care of a few towns? Nor can ministers complain about these things when, entangled in domestic and public affairs, they assign the smallest part of their time to meditation upon divine things.

Argument 9.

If the Apostles, who were not inferior to the many ministers of the Church in gifts, could not exercise two ecclesiastical offices, between which there is a greater affinity than between political and ecclesiastical office, then much less can other ministers administer civil and ecclesiastical principality. But the former is true, Acts 6:2 and 4. Therefore--

I reply: The Apostles, living among the magistrates of the Jews and Gentiles, received no jurisdiction from them. Yet they could judge. Indeed, the Apostle Paul did what is more than judging: he erected a new tribunal, 1 Corinthians 6:4: "If, therefore, you have secular judgments, appoint those who are held in contempt in the Church to judge." Behold, without Caesar's knowledge, he himself appoints judges of secular matters in the midst of the Church. If he did this without jurisdiction, why did he do it? If with jurisdiction, then he possessed the power to command it. Therefore those two offices can be exercised by one person. Why, then, could one Pastor of the smallest village not govern the same village with both civil and spiritual jurisdiction, when one King administers so many kingdoms?

Arguments 10 and 11 have already been answered. The spiritual care of Pastors exercises only spiritual offices; their civil care exercises civil offices as well.

Argument 12. If no one is fit to exercise the spiritual office alone, then he who is called to it ought not to exercise another, civil office. But the former is true, 2 Corinthians 2:16. Therefore--

I reply: Plainly no one administers civil command unless called. For all Bishops who handle the secular business of their dioceses are called to it by legitimate election.

Argument 13. If it is lawful for the ministry to exercise political principality, then it is lawful for a political Magistrate to discharge ecclesiastical office, because the reason for each is equal. But the consequent is absurd, as is evident from Scripture, for those who arrogated this to themselves were gravely punished by God, as may be seen in the example of King Uzziah and others. Therefore--

I reply: The reason is widely different, because sacred power is much more eminent than civil power. Next, this can be conceded in a legitimate sense. Just as a Bishop can govern a city politically if this government is offered to him, so a Prince, if he is initiated into sacred things, can retain secular jurisdiction. For the Christian Priesthood is not restricted to definite families as the Levitical priesthood was. Thus the example of King Uzziah does nothing for this matter.

Argument 14 has been answered. For Bishops are not, by vocation and office, judges of secular affairs or rulers of the state, but they are so by the donation and summons of Princes--although the Church, by command of the Bishops, possesses a certain freedom of its own in appointing judges, as I have taught from Saint Paul. In the primitive Church, however, Princes were not the supporters or patrons but the executioners of Bishops; nor were the Bishops eminent in dignity, but lay hidden in caverns and caves of the earth.

He advances these things not only against Catholics but also against Lutherans and Calvinists, who in various places employ the episcopal title and power, both secular and spiritual, but more secular than spiritual. Others object that many abuse the wealth of the Church. It is true, but abuse pertains to the vices of human beings, not to the confusion of the order.

Many of the rich are wanton in their luxuries, yet they do not therefore cease to be lords of their own possessions. Thus Sharpe himself, On the Magistracy, question 1, objection 7, proposes an Anabaptist argument: “Many Princes abuse their power, and few have been good.” He replies: “It is a fallacy of Accident, because the vices of the person do not vitiate the office. It is similar to saying: Judas was evil; therefore the Apostolic office must be rejected.” The inference is denied. Next, more Kings were good.

Let those who desire the things themselves to be abolished because of abuse suppose that precisely the same answer has been given to them.

§ 5. The second axiom of the Sectarians is that civil laws, or the laws of magistrates, do not bind in conscience. Thus Sharpe, On the Magistracy, question 2.

From this it follows, first, that according to the opinion of our adversaries all force of laws and all authority of the magistracy are weakened and cast away. For if civil laws do not bind the conscience, neither, therefore, does the command of the magistracy. For Sharpe defines law thus in question 1: “A law is nothing other than a king’s command.” If, therefore, his principal command, which consists in the enactment of laws, does not bind the consciences of subjects, much less do other commands, which are promulgated with less effort, solemnity, and care. Secondly, from this we see the origin of the peace disturbed in Germany. For after people whom the laws had scarcely governed before heard that they could transgress civil laws without sin, they deemed lawful whatever they could contrive against the laws. Hence Imperial edicts are despised, the judgment of the Chamber is eluded, and all laws and judicial sentences are harassed. For if the legislator does not bind the conscience and no fear of vengeance hangs over them, why should those to whom it is harmful obey the laws? To this opinion, therefore, we owe the discords and disasters of the tribunals; hence arose so many lawsuits and the contentious immortality of causes pending and to be reviewed.

Many considerations teach us how perniciously and gravely they err. For it is the common character of law that it binds not only to punishment but also to guilt, unless this is specifically excepted. Sharpe does not weaken this reasoning when he says that no one possesses right over the conscience except God alone. For this right over the conscience flows from the law of God. If the magistrate is God’s vicar, then he commands in the place of God; he must therefore be obeyed as one sent by God, and consequently those who resist him sin. Next, Sharpe says in question 2 that it is lawful for a father of a household to govern his children and servants by discipline, punish them, and affect them with rewards; therefore it is lawful also for the magistrate, who is the father of the state. Draw the conclusion farther: therefore subjects must obey just as children do. For failure to obey one's parents is reckoned among the grave sins of children. Hence the same Sharpe says in question 1: "Magistrates are called Gods, because, having been instituted by God, they hold God's place," Joshua 10, verse 35; and concerning those who reject the magistracy, 1 Samuel 6:7. Therefore--"An office for which God prescribes laws is from God; but the magistracy prescribes laws," Deuteronomy 17 and elsewhere; therefore--

> Those who are given and sent by God as servants of God, also for the good of the Church, possess an office that is good and to be tolerated among Christians. But Magistrates are such. Therefore--See Proverbs 8:15, Isaiah 10:5 and 45:1, Jeremiah 27:6, Ezekiel 29:20, Daniel 2:24, and elsewhere.

And thereafter it is commanded in the New Testament that we subject ourselves to the magistrate, even a Gentile one, Matthew 22:21, Romans 13:1 and following, Titus 3, 1 Peter 1:13. Therefore it is much more lawful to be subject to a Christian magistrate. And if it is lawful to be subject rather than to preside, then to be subject is more contrary to Christian liberty than to preside. But what God commands is good and to be tolerated among Christians. Therefore--

But since a law is the command of a magistrate, it altogether binds, even if it concerns a matter otherwise indifferent. Let the English law be an example: that the inhabitants shall not eat meat on Wednesday. If the King cannot bind consciences to this, then, in secret, it is as free for everyone to eat meat as it was before the law, and the King possesses no right whatsoever over their minds.

Satan's design in overthrowing order and discipline must not be passed over in silence. At the beginning of the disturbances, by their disputations they tore down the authority, power, and laws of the Church's Prelates. They professed that they were defending the political Magistracy; indeed, of their own accord they even lavished much right over the Church upon it. But after they oppressed ecclesiastical laws by force, artifice, and vices, they assail political laws and dissolve their sinews. For they attribute less to them than to ecclesiastical laws. Thus Sharpe says in question 2: "If ecclesiastical laws do not bind the conscience outside a case of scandal and contempt, then much less do civil laws." Behold: they place civil laws below ecclesiastical laws. What else remains but that, just as Luther reduced the Canons to ashes, so they should burn the Pandects, the Code, all the Novels, all the laws of Germany, the entire Chamber, and indeed justice itself?

The third axiom is that it is lawful to kill the magistrates themselves. I treated that error in the book On Syncretism, but I have learned that certain things have been scattered abroad by some anonymous man; concerning these the reader must be briefly instructed elsewhere.

CHAPTER X

The Praiseworthy Life of Ecclesiastics Is Commended

§ 1. Every age has taught that the morals of Priests contribute to the safety or overthrow of the state. For the examples of the powerful flow down among the common people; the examples of priests break through every barrier. As the priest is, so is the people; indeed, the common people judge God to be such as they have seen his ministers to be. Antiquity fashioned gods who were adulterers, murderers, thieves, and perjurers, so that it might excuse its crimes by the example of heavenly beings. Hence they were worshiped with obscenity in the theater, with frenzies in the circus, with cruelty in the amphitheater, and everywhere with crimes. The followers and ministers of demons most closely expressed in their own morals the character of their gods. Priests owe sacred examples to the whole world, but all things to God--and the more earnestly, the more closely they are joined to him.

Our laws teach us this, Cause 2, Question 7, canon 41:

> If we have done anything suitably but have not preserved for our subjects the path of a just law, we wish everything to be amended by your judgment and that of your envoys; because if we, who ought to correct the sins of others, commit worse ones, assuredly we shall not be disciples of truth but--what we say with grief--teachers of error before all others. Hence we earnestly implore the clemency of Your Greatness to send into these regions such Envoys to investigate the things we have mentioned as fear God in all things and will diligently investigate everything, just as if your imperial glory had been present. And we ask not only that they examine to the utmost exactness these things alone which we have said above, but that, whether lesser or even greater matters concerning us have been reported to them, all of them be brought to an end by their lawful examination, so that henceforth nothing among them may remain undiscussed or undetermined.

§ 2. Although, therefore, all the reasons why one must live well apply to Clerics, that reason which pertains to example is nevertheless most especially their own.

For since they are in a high place, since they live under a stricter discipline, and since they adhere more closely to the immovable First Mover, their faults are more conspicuous, deflect others more greatly, and throw all things into confusion more effectively. Yet they ought not so to fear reputation as to trust that they can also avoid reproaches and calumnies. The canons rightly instruct us concerning this matter, Cause 11, Question 3, canon 55:

> Amid the words of those who praise or blame us, we must always return to the mind. If the good that is said of us is not found in it, this ought to engender great sorrow; and conversely, if the evil that people say of us is not found in it, we ought to leap into great joy. For what if people praise us and our conscience accuses us? Or what sorrow ought there to be if everyone accuses us and conscience alone shows us to be free? We have Paul saying, “Our glory is this: the testimony of our conscience.” Job also says, “Behold, my witness is in heaven.” Therefore, if we have a witness in heaven and a witness in the heart, let us allow fools outside to say what they wish. What else do detractors do but blow into the dust and stir up earth into their own eyes, so that the more detraction they blow out, the more they see nothing of the truth? Yet they themselves must also be summoned and calmly admonished, and satisfaction ought to be given to them in every way, knowing what the Truth says concerning the Jews: “Lest perhaps we scandalize them.” But if they are unwilling to be satisfied by the truth, you have the consolation which you may perceive in the holy Gospel. For when it had been said to the Lord, “Do you know that the Pharisees, upon hearing this word, were scandalized?” he answered: “Let them alone; they are blind and leaders of the blind.” Paul the Apostle also admonishes us, saying: “If it is possible, insofar as it depends upon you, have peace with human beings.” Since he was about to say, “Have peace with all human beings,” because he foresaw that this was difficult, he premised, “If it is possible.” Yet he added what could be done when he said, “Insofar as it depends upon you.”

> For if we desire to preserve love in our mind toward those who hate us, then, even if they do not have peace with us, we nevertheless undoubtedly have it with them.

§ 3. The Apostle Paul describes the Christian Clergy for us, and it is necessary that the Church not depart even a nail's breadth from his law. 1 Timothy 3:1:

> If anyone desires the episcopate, he desires a good work. Therefore a Bishop ought to be irreproachable, the husband of one wife, sober, prudent, decorous, chaste, hospitable, a teacher, not given to wine, not a striker, but moderate; not contentious, not covetous, but one who presides well over his own household, having children subject with all chastity.

And verse 12:

> Let Deacons be husbands of one wife, who preside well over their children and their households. For those who have ministered well will acquire for themselves a good degree and great confidence in the faith which is in Christ Jesus.

And 2 Timothy 2:1: "Fit to teach others"; "a good soldier of Christ"; and verse 15: "Be solicitous to present yourself approved to God, a workman who need not be ashamed, rightly handling the word of truth." And Titus 1:5:

> For this reason I left you in Crete, that you might correct the things that are lacking and appoint presbyters in the cities, as I also directed you. If anyone is without crime, the husband of one wife, having faithful children, not accused of riotous living or insubordinate.

Let this be the Christian Clergy, this the Lord's portion. Let us examine the particulars separately. And although we have treated abundantly above of the virtues to be pursued and the vices to be fled, nevertheless this passage cannot be passed over without the life of clerics being described in a brief compendium. These, therefore, are Paul's decrees.

§ 4. "He who desires the episcopate desires a good work."

> Εἴ τις ἐπισκοπῆς ὀρέγεται, καλοῦ ἔργου ἐπιθυμεῖ.

If anyone desires it, let him not do so from ambition for honor, for this ought to be a holy desire for labor. Formerly it could more readily be pure, when in a poor flock the first leader was sought for the slaughterhouse, when they were honored by the shouts of the Gentile people and sought a Bishop to be thrown to a lion. Now, amid such great honor and wealth, desire for dignities is more readily found than desire for hardships.

§ 5. A Bishop ought to be irreproachable. What he requires here in a Bishop, he demands likewise of a presbyter in the Epistle to Titus. For in a Bishop it is not sufficient that he not be evil; rather, not to be as excellent as possible causes very great harm both to those who are better than he and those who are worse. Mud does not offend upon a workman's leather apron; a faded color is despised upon purple. It is therefore necessary that he be ἀνεπίληπτον, "irreproachable." How will he correct another when he himself refutes his own censure? Titus 1:5 calls him ἀνέγκλητον, so that he cannot lawfully be accused.

§ 6. The husband of one wife. He does not require marriage of Bishops as a necessary thing, as Calvin rightly teaches against certain men of his own party. Yet Junius the Calvinist contends that a Bishop is bound always to have a wife on account of the signification of the mystery; by this opinion he casts Paul out of the episcopate. Indeed, he contradicts Paul when the latter exhorts to continence in 1 Corinthians 7. Finally, in chapter 20, number 7, he wishes marriage to be free for Bishops. But the meaning is that a Bishop can have neither several wives simultaneously nor successively, and that anyone who has had several ought not to be ordained. Thus Tertullian, To His Wife; Epiphanius, Heresy 59; Chrysostom, Theophylact, and Oecumenius on this passage; Ambrose, Letter 8 and book 1 of On Duties, final chapter; the book On the Dignity of the Priesthood, chapter 4; Augustine, On the Good of Marriage, chapter 18, and book 22 Against Faustus, chapter 47; Jerome, Letter to Oceanus; Pope Cyriacus, Letter 1, chapter 11; Leo, Letter 58; Gelasius, Letter 1, chapter 5; Innocent, Letter 27. Their reason is that this practice of the law has always prevailed in the Church, and custom is the best interpreter of law. Nor at any time was polygamy, by which several wives were held simultaneously, customary among Christians. Chastity of priests is certainly useful for the sanctity and tranquility of the divine offices and for the study of the Scriptures. It also serves this end: lest care for an expensive wife and desire and solicitude for educating and enriching children claim for themselves the hours owed to doctrine and prayer; lest hospitality be neglected; and lest the alms of the pious be diverted to domestic luxury. The vices of the times show that the dangers of this matter are great. For many, after fattening nephews and kinsmen from the Church's goods, consign them to hell. What would they do if they had sons--that is, their most intimate objects of affection?

§ 7. He wishes the Bishop and presbyter to be sober--νηφάλιον--for sobriety is necessary to great care and vigilance, just as generally the luxury and drunkenness of Clerics arise from idleness. Sobriety and vigilance are inseparable companions. The Aaronic priests were forbidden to drink wine when they performed sacred rites; our sacred rites too are νηφάλια, "sober." A drunken priest is a monstrous thing. How greatly drunkenness harms the state I have taught in its own place. Now Clerics must be discussed. Among them drunkenness is not punished in Germany, which is so lawless in this respect that it often imposes upon laymen the necessity of drinking. Yet the law of God promulgated by the Apostolic mouth remains firm and unshaken amid our vices, 1 Corinthians 5: "If anyone who is called a brother is a fornicator, or covetous, or a drunkard, do not even take food with such a one."

> Ὢ Θεός--φησὶ Χρυσόστομος--πόση ἡ ἀκρίβεια· ἡμεῖς δὲ οὐ μόνον οὐ φεύγομεν τοὺς μεθύοντας, ἀλλὰ καὶ περιερχόμεθα πρὸς αὐτοὺς μεθέξοντες τῶν παρ' αὐτῶν.

How astonishing, what exactness! But we not only do not flee drunkards; we even approach them, intending to partake together of what comes from them.

It by no means befits him to be weighed down by surfeiting and drunkenness whose mind ought always to be occupied in prayer. Accordingly, a drunkard ought not even to be ordained, much less left without punishment. For, first, Canons 42 and 43 of the Apostles depose such persons:

> Εἴ τις ἐπίσκοπος, ἢ πρεσβύτερος, ἢ διάκονος, κύβοις σχολάζων, ἢ μέθαις, ἢ παυσάσθω, ἢ καθαιρείσθω.

A Bishop, presbyter, or deacon who gives himself to gaming or drunkenness shall either desist or be condemned--that is, deposed. And canon 43:

> Ὑποδιάκονος, ἢ ψάλτης, ἢ ἀναγνώστης τὰ ὅμοια ποιῶν, ἢ παυσάσθω, ἢ ἀφοριζέσθω· ὡσαύτως καὶ οἱ λαϊκοί.

A subdeacon, psalmist, or reader who does similar things shall either desist or be deprived of communion; likewise laymen. Now the tables of Clerics and Laymen are full of vomit and filth. If discipline does not wipe these away, the δίαιτα, manner of life, and abstinence of the Turks will overthrow them. Moreover, it is shameful and harmful. Jerome, Letter 83 to Oceanus, Distinction 35, chapter 4:

> The prophetic discourse describes the princes of the Church who abound in pleasures and believe that they preserve chastity amid feasts and wantonness: they are to be cast out of spacious houses and sumptuous banquets and meals acquired with much labor, and cast out because of their evil thoughts and works. And if you wish to know where they are to be cast, read the Gospel: into the outer darkness, namely, where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Is it not confusion and disgrace to preach Jesus crucified, the teacher of the poor and one who hungered, with well-fed bodies? And to set forth the doctrine of fasts with red cheeks and swollen faces? If we are in the place of the Apostles, let us imitate not only their discourse but also embrace their manner of life and abstinence.

But if the Apostle condemns not merely a Priest given to wine, but even the old law, Numbers 6 and Leviticus 10, forbids the one serving at the altar to drink strong drink because it overturns the condition of the mind, how much more does it befit the Priests of the New Testament to hate drunkenness? If it is a crime to move about drunk amid the fumes of beef and mutton, amid the blood of goats and calves, amid fires and frying pans, will it not be a crime to mingle, amid drunken belches, the blood of the Son of God, the blood of the Testament, with one's mind? To consume God and the Lord amid the next day's burnings from wine? Excellently, therefore, the Council of Agde, chapter 4:

> Before all things, drunkenness must be avoided by Clerics, for it is the tinder and nurse of all vices. Accordingly, when it has been established that someone was drunk, as his order permits, we decree either that he be removed from communion for the space of thirty days or that he be subjected to corporal punishment.

I would wish these canons to be recalled into use. For if the ancient discipline is not only relaxed but even dissolved, what at last is to be hoped concerning morals? How great must the temperance of Christians formerly have been, when Pope Eutychianus decreed:

> We command Christians in every way to guard against the great evil of drunkenness, from which all vices spring. But we decree that anyone who refuses to avoid it is to be excommunicated until suitable amendment.

And certainly great men did not lack the endeavor. Otto, Cardinal and Bishop of Augsburg, celebrated a Synod in the year 1548 in which it is thus established:

> Likewise those who are perpetually given and attached to drunkenness, surfeiting, and feasting--and especially those who spend feast-days or nights in taverns--must, after sacred confession, be forbidden the reception of this venerable Sacrament for thirty days, so that they may amend themselves of these vices. But if they refuse to do so, according to the decrees of the Canons they must even be punished with death.

That censure is not excessively severe. For in Deuteronomy 21:18 God judged thus:

> If a man fathers a stubborn and insolent son who does not listen to the command of his father or mother and, when chastised, scorns obedience, they shall seize him and lead him to the elders of that city and to the gate of judgment, and they shall say to them: "This son of ours is insolent and stubborn; he scorns to hear our admonitions and devotes himself to feasting, luxury, and banquets." The people of the city shall overwhelm him with stones, and he shall die, so that you may remove the evil from your midst and all Israel, hearing it, may fear.

§ 8. Prudent: the Greek calls him φρόνιμον, which some interpret as temperate. Both temperance and prudence are required. Here I understand prudence, for mention is made more frequently of the parts of temperance. Holy simplicity certainly does not suffice for rightly administering an Episcopate; rather, great circumspection is necessary amid so many evil men. The man to be ordained ought to be prudent. This must be noted against those who excuse the stupidity of Priests under the name of simplicity. Distinction 39: "The lips of Priests shall guard knowledge, and they shall seek the law from his mouth." But it is evident that this passage treats of prudence in governing, which is sometimes lacking even in otherwise excellent and holy Doctors. Therefore he also ought to be experienced in secular business, for the handling of such matters is often useful and sometimes necessary to piety. Thus Gregory, Letter 40 of book 8, to the Clergy and nobles of Naples. Peter the Deacon, Distinction 39, chapter 1:

> The man whom you assert was elected by you is altogether--as is said--simple; and you know that at such a time there ought to be appointed to the summit of government one who knows how to be solicitous not only for the salvation of souls but also for the outward advantage and protection of his subjects.

§ 9. Decorous: κόσμιον. Others translate it "well ordered," or "of well-ordered bearing." I understand one who displays becoming modesty in food, habitation, and clothing and uses words with moderation. Plato in book 1 of the Politics calls κοσμίους those who are tractable, and εὐκόλους those who are affable and companionable. For a physician of many must accommodate himself to everyone and benefit everyone. Under this κοσμιότης, or decorous modesty, I understand the commands of so many canons in Distinction 41, chapter 5:

> We do not condemn thrift together with humble clothing--as in the final chapter of the Council of Granada--just as we also praise ornament because care of the body is not superfluous and is ἀπερίεργον, unstudied; but we do not accept dissolute men and broken manners of walking in their clothing.

And the rule of the Fourth Council of Carthage is golden: “Let a Cleric prove his profession by both his bearing and his gait, and therefore let him seek adornment neither in clothing nor in shoes.” For it had not entered the Council’s mind to condemn beforehand the posthumous vanities of anklets. A disordered body indicates inequality of mind. He is changeable and afflicted in conscience whose gait is now rapid, now slow.

§ 10. Hospitable. He must therefore be rich, or receive from the people that from which he can exercise hospitality--φιλοξενίαν--perseveringly. But a Priest ought to be hospitable, Distinction 42, lest he be numbered among those to whom it will be said in the judgment: “I was a stranger, and you did not receive me.” For how will one who follows the Apostle and ought to invite others to hospitality be able to exhort hospitality if he closes his own house to guests? For if a Priest ought first to require of himself and of his domestic Church what he later commands the people, and if, first imitating Christ, he himself ought to do the things which he later teaches the people, he must receive the poor as guests, so that by his own example he may more readily draw his subjects to hospitality.

The canons admonish us that zeal must be shown for guests, because hospitality is preserved inviolate even among barbarians: Cause 32, Question 7, Offerebat; indeed Cause 16, Question 1, Quoniam. It wishes the goods of Clerics to be common, especially for receiving guests. Yet this virtue especially befits prelates, because, since they possess the means by which they can be liberal, they ought also to will it: Distinction 89, Volumus, and Cause 12, Question 1, Quia. Formerly this matter was certainly considered so important that Gregory denies confirmation in the episcopate to the Archdeacon of Florence if he is so close-fisted that no friend enters his house: Distinction 85, Archidiaconum. It therefore befits those who are obliged by office to exhort others to hospitality to be hospitable. Would that there were now in the Clergy that φιλοξενία, hospitality, which formerly existed among laymen. Charles, King of the Swedes, ordered the house of one who had denied lodging three times to be burned: Johannes Magnus, book 4, chapter 2. Nor do I doubt that many houses of prelates and many monasteries which stood open to flatterers rather than guests have gone into the flames.

§ 11. A teacher, so that he may be able to exhort in sound doctrine and refute those who contradict. Thus indeed is explained what we read in Greek, διδακτικόν; our translator reads διδασκαλικόν in the same sense, for it is necessary that one who truly acts as teacher be fit to teach. Formerly the Latin had “teachable,” which Jerome deservedly censures. The greatest and holiest function of Bishops is to teach. They ought to perform it themselves; if not from the pulpit, they are bound to appoint suitable men in their place, since they themselves will pay the penalty for those men’s errors.

§ 12. Not given to wine. Chrysostom interprets the Greek text πάροινον as one who, inflamed by wine, is carried away and revels; the Syriac has “a pursuer of wine”; Beza, “winy,” as though one sitting beside wine; and the Apostle in verse 8 interprets it, “not given to much wine.” But παροινεῖν is to inflict reproaches and injuries through wine and wantonness. Hence it appears that πάροινοι are worse than drunkards, since they add insults against others to drunkenness.

§ 13. Not a striker. Πλήκτην, says Chrysostom: Paul’s saying is to be understood of one who reviles and abuses, but not of injuries by blows. Yet in Distinction 86, canon Non liceat, one is forbidden to strike with one’s own hands even those over whom one possesses the power of correction. And in Distinction 45, chapter 7, a Bishop, presbyter, or deacon who strikes offending faithful persons or unbelievers acting unjustly is ordered to be deposed. For thus they do not correct vices, but burden themselves with hatred and their subjects with fear. Therefore those Clerics who pursue soldiering, who infest the streets of cities by night and beat those they meet, must be deposed. You would call them domestic and urban robbers rather than Clerics. For if a Cleric in sacred orders cannot be a notary in a criminal cause, as is stated in book 3 of the Decretals, title That Clerics, and so forth, chapter 8, Sicut te; if Clerics ought neither to dictate nor pronounce a sentence of blood, nor exercise anything through which a sentence of blood is approached, as they teach in this place; if a Cleric carrying arms loses the Clerical privilege after a threefold admonition, On the Sentence of Excommunication, chapter In audientia--what do those men deserve who strike others unlawfully?

§ 14. But moderate: ἐπιεικῆ, equitable, readily yielding his own right. For nothing is more grievous than the exaction of strict right if it is found in a prince. From this contention and hatred arise. Therefore the Lord also commands that a brother be forgiven as many as seventy times seven times.

§ 15. Not contentious: ἄμαχον, one foreign to contentions and fights. Against such men, Distinction 46, chapter 1:

> Behold why contentious men are prohibited from being ordained as bishops. There is also another cause for this prohibition. For contentious men either reconcile the minds of princes to themselves by flatteries, or inflict the mark of infamy by detracting from their brothers, or never cease to create sedition by sowing discord among brothers. All these things are proved condemnable in prelates.

Finally, Distinction 90: "A Priest ought to call litigants to concord; therefore he ought not himself to litigate."

§ 16. Not covetous. Not pursuing shameful gain: αἰσχροκερδῆ, not a seeker of shameful gain, as Jerome speaks to Heliodorus. Desire makes Clerics greedy for secular business, in which some, to our sorrow, are more practiced than secular men themselves. The Synod of Mainz under Charlemagne, chapter 14, and under Bishop Rabanus, chapter 13, embraced all these things. It is recited in book 3 of the Decretals, title 50:

> There are many secular businesses, of which we shall touch briefly upon a few, to which all carnal concupiscence pertains. Whatever a person seeks beyond what is just is shameful gain: to accept, or even to give, unjust gifts; to hire someone for pay for the sake of some secular profit; to love contentions, lawsuits, or quarrels; to dispute in secular courts, except in defense of orphans or widows; to be lessees or procurators of secular affairs; to be a jester in shameful word or deed, or to love secular jesting; to love games of chance; to seek ornament unsuitable to one's profession; to wish to live in pleasures; to follow gluttony and drunkenness; to possess unjust weights or measures; to conduct unjust business. Yet just business must not be forbidden on account of various necessities, because we read that the holy Apostles conducted business, and in the Rule of blessed Benedict it is commanded that provision be made for those through whose hands the business of the monastery is administered. To pursue dogs and birds for hunting, and to participate in any superfluous causes whatsoever--behold, we altogether forbid such things and things like them to ministers of the Lord's altar and also to monks. Concerning them the Apostle says: "No one serving as a soldier for God entangles himself in secular business."

And in the Lateran Council he is forbidden to be a prince's general procurator or justiciar. In the Council of London, commerce for the sake of profit is prohibited.

§ 17. Presiding well over his own household. In order to preside well over his household, he must neither dissipate his property nor increase it by evil arts, and then he must keep his household members in duty and discipline. How will one who is not master of a single household administer an entire diocese? How will he command so many prudent and noble men--to which I add cunning and malicious ones--if he needs a guardian at home? If he does not know how to preside over his own household, this proceeds either from signal negligence or from imprudence, each of which is harmful to the state.

§ 18. Having children subject with all chastity. "If anyone has faithful children, not accused of riotous living or insubordinate." Our translator understood chastity by σεμνότητι, because he removes the accusation of riotous living. But if he neglects his children--that is, his own blood--how will he have care of the Church?

§ 19. Not a neophyte. He does not forbid the election of a young man, but of a neophyte--one recently converted and imbued with religion--lest, lifted up into pride, he fall into judgment and condemnation, because the devil was condemned who fell from heaven on account of pride. Gratian speaks altogether excellently in Distinction 48:

> Neophytes also are forbidden to be ordained as bishops, so that one who yesterday was a catechumen may not today become a Bishop; one who yesterday was in the theater may not today sit in the Church; one who in the evening was in the circus may not today minister at the altar; one who a short time ago was a supporter of actors may not today be a consecrator of virgins. The cause of this prohibition, according to the Apostle, is lest, lifted up into pride as though the Christian religion greatly needed him, he fall into the ruin of the devil. For an instantaneous Priest does not know how to possess humility, observe distinctions among persons, or despise himself. He has not fasted, has not wept, has not corrected himself, and has not distributed to the poor. Those fall into arrogance--which is the ruin of the devil--who in the space of an hour, while not yet disciples, become teachers.

That is the canon of the Council of Nicaea:

> Because many things, either through necessity or from some other cause, have occurred contrary to the rule--so that people recently come from Gentile life, and only lately catechized or instructed, came immediately to spiritual baptism and, as soon as they had been baptized, were advanced at once to the episcopate or presbyterate--it has therefore rightly seemed that henceforth nothing of this kind ought to be done. For there is need both of time for him to be a catechumen and, after baptism, of much probation. For the Apostolic command is evident, saying: "Not a neophyte, lest perhaps, being lifted up, he fall into judgment and the snare of the devil." But if, as time proceeds, he commits some sin and is convicted by two or three witnesses, let one of this kind cease from the clergy. But if anyone acts contrary to these things, as one who conducts himself contrary to the statutes of the Holy Council, he himself will also imperil his clerical status.

§ 20. But he must also possess a good testimony from those who are outside, lest he fall into reproach and the snare of the devil. Jerome speaks excellently to Oceanus: "As the beginning is, so is the conclusion. He who is irreproachable is praised with concordant voice not only by his own household but also by strangers." So great formerly was the esteem of Bishops that Gentiles themselves frequently brought their causes before them.

§ 21. Likewise let a Deacon be grave: σεμνούς. Chaste in mind and then in body, Cause 32, Question 5, Itane. For chastity is not in the body unless purity has been implanted in the spirit. Nor is one of chaste spirit immodest in tongue or eye. Σεμνότης, gravity, is moreover a beautiful virtue, a companion of chastity: a becoming modesty and gravity in words and gestures, altogether such as a strict father loves and approves in a daughter and son honorably and chastely educated. Aristotle, Rhetoric, book 2: Σεμνότης ἐστὶ μαλακή τις καὶ εὔσχημος βαρύτης--gravity not harsh or proud, but well-mannered.

§ 22. Not double-tongued: μὴ διλόγους. God detests a double tongue. Proverbs 8:13: "The fear of the Lord hates evil; arrogance and pride and the wicked way and a double mouth I detest." And 18:8: "The words of the double-tongued are as though simple, and they themselves reach to the inward parts of the belly." And Ecclesiasticus 5:17: "For upon a thief there is confusion and repentance, but the worst mark is upon the double-tongued." And 6:1: "Do not become an enemy instead of a friend to your neighbor; for the evil man will inherit reproach and abuse, and every envious and double-tongued sinner." And 28:15: "The whisperer and the double-tongued is accursed, for he will disturb many who possess peace."

It is therefore no wonder that the Apostle requires Deacons not to be double-tongued, since divine sincerity detests double-tongued people of every kind.

§ 23. But in Deacons there is a peculiar reason. A Deacon is the minister of Priests, Distinction 99, Dominus, yet more honored than the common people. He must not speak in one way to the common people and another way to the Priest, lest he make a schism. He is the wandering and all-surveying eye of the Bishop, Distinction 93. Therefore great caution is needed lest he either observe incautiously or report carelessly or perversely, becoming an informer instead of an admonisher. He assists the Bishop while he preaches, lest the Bishop be harassed by rivals, Distinction 93, Diaconi qui. He presides over the goods of the Church. Therefore Deacons have often raised themselves above Priests and Bishops after courting popular favor. This especially makes them double-tongued, while on one side a Deacon insinuates himself ambitiously with the people and on the other with the Bishop by deceitful flattery. Certain Deacons long ago equated themselves with presbyters: Council of Nicaea, chapter 14; Fourth Council of Toledo, chapter 38; and Jerome to Evagrius, Letter 85. Sincerity is therefore required in a Deacon, so that he may honor God, the Bishop, and the presbyters from his heart, minister to them, and in no way strive to become greater himself by detracting from his superiors.

What, then, is a double mouth? The Hebrew calls it תהפכות, which among the Seventy is rendered διεστραμμένας ὁδοὺς κακῶν, "perverse ways of the wicked"; others, "a mouth of perversities," "a mouth of cunning"; Theodotion, στόμα στρεβλόν, "a twisted mouth." Our translator is the most accurate of all: "a double mouth." For הפך is to turn, overturn, or change into another form. Therefore the Seventy are accustomed to translate it στρέφω, διαστρέφω, μεταστρέφω, μεταβάλλω, κυλίω. And that which is placed here, תהפכות, is σκόλια in Proverbs 23:33. And in Proverbs 17:21 איש תהפכות is called εὐμετάβολος: a changeable man, a versatile man, a man of changes; properly, a man of contrarieties. For הפך, or הפכי, is a contrary or contrariety, Ezekiel 16:34. It therefore signifies perversities when one turns contrary things over in the heart and speaks variously, which is properly to be δίλογον, or δίγλωσσον. That serpent's tongue is forked, an instiller of poison; that tongue is called ἀγκύλη by the Greeks. It either deceives in such a way that the speech uttered disagrees with what is within, or among different people it is one thing and another. In Ecclesiasticus 28:16 it is called γλῶσσα τρίτη, "a third tongue," because, situated as though midway between two, it sows disagreements on each side. See the most learned Delrio in the Sacred Adages. Tongues of perversities are those which invert the truth, promise vainly, blame things worthy of praise, extol wicked things, flatter those present, gnaw at the absent, and speak contrary things to please their hearers.

§ 24. Holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience. He does not admonish them not to disclose the things done at home, for this is not to hold the mystery in a pure conscience. Rather, he altogether wishes the sacred mysteries to be believed by them, since Deacons, after receiving authority, can teach; and then, because, when conscience has been abandoned or suppressed, shipwreck of the faith is imminent. For nothing has ever yet made an apostate except a conscience of crimes committed or a hoped-for license to commit them.

§ 25. But let these first be proved: δοκιμαζέσθωσαν πρῶτον. Now this is neglected; and, what must be lamented, even where discipline flourishes, those to be ordained are not sufficiently proved. Hence is the origin of all evils, while the unworthy are admitted to sacred orders--if not by money, at least by favor, ignorance, or omission of probation. In certain Churches nobility is sought with the greatest scrupulousness, while virtue is neglected. As long as this is not corrected, reformation is not to be hoped for, because a Cleric is cast out more shamefully than he is refused admission. Nor can any appearance of excuse be adduced for this negligence, since there are so many canons which require probations and testimonies. This matter has given all heresies material for speaking against us; indeed, it has created heresies, while people see admitted into the Lord's sanctuary those who lived in the world under an unfavorable reputation.

The invectives of them all proclaim what the heretics object. I shall give a specimen from Erasmus, their forerunner, on the third chapter of Timothy:

> Indeed, this is more astonishing: although Paul requires so many excellent gifts in a Bishop, all the others are passed over and account is taken of one wife alone. An incestuous man is admitted, a murderer is admitted, a pirate is admitted, a sodomite, a sacrilegious man, a parricide--in short, who is not admitted? Only a twice-married man is excluded from this honor, who alone has committed nothing. But it is astonishing that we press certain things and hold them with more than tenacious teeth while utterly closing our eyes to others. If anyone weighs the condition of these times--what portion of humanity the flocks of monks occupy, what portion the colleges of priests and clerics--and then weighs how few from so great a number truly preserve chastity of life, into how many kinds of lust innumerable men decline, and with how great a disgrace many are openly incestuous and unchaste, perhaps he will judge it more expedient that those who are altogether incontinent be granted the right of public marriage, which > they may cultivate purely and holily without evil reputation, rather than that they exercise lust unhappily and shamefully. Now the world has very many celibates, very few chaste persons; although not even he is chaste who does not touch Venus because it is not permitted. But again and again I fear that ecclesiastical revenues geld clerics today more truly than piety does, while we fear that what we possess may be taken away or that certainly nothing may be added.

He exaggerates the vices hyperbolically. He himself was an apostate and deserter who could not speak well of those whom he wickedly deserted without accusing his own flight. Yet this is true: among the Lord's Priests there have been Ophnis and Phinehases, Jasons and Caiaphases; nor is it more astonishing that this has sometimes happened through the course of ages than that it happened in the Lord's time, when Judas betrayed and the disciples denied. Yet the remedy is the probation instituted before orders are given. When it is neglected, Bishops and prelates are the cause of the evils; and although they themselves preserve the mystery in a pure conscience, nevertheless, if they quickly impose hands upon men who have not been proved, they share in the sins of others and are to be condemned for those sins as though for their own, because by their own negligence and cooperation they caused them. But I shall treat of them at another time. For that which is public and notorious must not be concealed.

§ 26. Having no crime. "If anyone is without crime." He calls them ἀνεγκλήτους, men whose integrity, and also reputation for integrity, is such that a crime cannot be laid upon them and they cannot be called into judgment. For an ἔγκλημα, a criminal charge, is an atrocious injury on account of which the praetor is accustomed to grant an action. If a Cleric labors under infamy but cannot be convicted, he purges himself by oath: Cause 15, Question 5, Omnes; Cause 4, Question 1, Diffinimus. How can a Cleric be infamous, when the infamy of Clerics especially demands purgation on account of the scandals of others? Cause 2, Question 2, Presbyter.

§ 27. God's steward. For he is God's οἰκονόμος, the steward of the greatest goods--that is, heavenly goods. His care for accounts and advantages must therefore be secondary. Concerning the Bishop's office in dispensing external goods, the Council of Antioch established, Cause 12, Question 1, chapter 23:

> Let the Bishop have authority over ecclesiastical property for distribution to all who are in need, with the greatest reverence and fear of God. Let him himself also partake of those things which he needs--if indeed he needs them--for necessary uses beneficial both to himself and to the brothers whom he receives, so that under no circumstance are they defrauded in anything, according to the holy Apostle, who speaks thus: "Having food and covering, with these we are content." But if he is by no means content with these things and converts the Church's property to his own domestic uses and does not handle its profits or the fruits of its fields with the knowledge of the presbyters and deacons, but entrusts authority over them to members of his household, kinsmen, brothers, or sons, so that through persons of this sort the Church's property is secretly injured, let him pay the penalties imposed by the provincial synod. But if the Bishop, or the presbyters who are with him, are accused in another way--that they usurp for themselves what pertains to the Church, whether from fields or from any other ecclesiastical resource, so that the poor are afflicted by this and both the discourse of preaching and those who dispense the goods are thus exposed to accusation and blasphemies--they too must be corrected, with the holy synod approving what is fitting.

§ 28. Not proud. They call αὐθάδεις those who are obstinate and rely excessively upon their own judgment. For this vice belongs to τῶν ἐρημιτῶν, solitary men, not κοινωνικῶν, sociable men; for those who are content with themselves and do not live in the fellowship of others more readily become obstinate. Humility is therefore commended to a Priest: lest he fashion new opinions from Scripture, Distinction 30, Haec autem; and lest he correct his subjects austerely rather than gently, Distinction 45, Licet nonnumquam.

§ 29. Not irascible: ὀργίλον. The source of anger is pride, for anger is an opinion that one has been despised. It is a great vice, because an angry man thinks everything he does just. Concerning this see Cause 11, Question 3, Ira; Cause 5, Question 1, Velut; and Cause 5, Question 2. For angry men, while striving to correct the sins of others, commit graver ones.

§ 30. Benevolent: φιλάγαθον. They refer it to things and persons. More correctly it refers to persons, for benevolence toward good men is a distinguished ornament of a Bishop; toward the wicked, frivolous, and covetous, austerity is approved. For no one judges a person devoted to such men to be upright. A suspect Cleric or layman brings infamy upon an episcopal household; a Jew makes it detestable. An excellent statute was enacted concerning a Bishop's household, Cause 2, Question 7, canon 58:

> Since the life of a pastor ought always to be an example to his disciples, Clerics very often do not know what their Pontiff's life is like in private, although, as has been said, secular servants know it. Concerning this matter I establish by the present decree that certain persons chosen from the Clerics, or even from monks, shall attend to the ministry of the Pontifical chamber, so that he who is in the place of government may have such witnesses as see his life in private association and, from diligent observation, take an example for their own advancement.

§ 31. Just. He must practice justice not only in life but in judgment. For since he judges as though in God's place and is frequently chosen as arbiter by the parties, let him strive accurately to understand and observe every requirement of justice.

§ 32. Holy: ὅσιον. There is a twofold holiness in a Priest: the first sacramental, the other innocence of life. Cause 1, Question 1, Dominus. The judgment of Distinction 40, chapter 3, is noble:

> We who preside ought to become known not from the dignity of our places or birth, but from nobility of morals; not from the distinction of cities, but from purity of faith.

And chapter 2:

> It is not easy to stand in the place of Paul and hold the rank of Peter, who now reign with Christ. Hence it is said: those who hold the places of the saints are not the sons of saints, but those who perform their works.

And chapter 12:

> Many Priests and few Priests: many in name, few in work. See, therefore, how you sit upon the chair, because the chair does not make the Priest, but the Priest the chair; the place does not sanctify the man, but the man the place; not every Priest is holy, but every holy man is a Priest. He who sits well upon the chair receives honor from it; he who sits badly does injury to the chair. Therefore an evil Priest > acquires from the priesthood a charge against himself, not dignity. For, sitting in judgment, if you live well and teach well, you are the judge of all; but if you teach well and live badly, you will be the condemner of yourself alone. For by living well and teaching, you instruct the people how they ought to live; but by teaching well and living badly, you instruct God how he ought to condemn you.

In vain do those congratulate themselves upon their orders who defame them by their vices. Augustine to Valerius, Letter 148, Distinction 40, canon 7:

> Before all things I ask that your religious prudence consider that nothing in this life--and especially at this time--is easier, more joyful, and more acceptable to human beings than the office of Bishop, presbyter, or deacon if affairs are conducted perfunctorily and flatteringly; but before God nothing is more wretched, sorrowful, and damnable.

§ 33. Continent: ἐγκρατῆ. Concerning the continence of Clerics, many statutes were enacted by the Fathers in councils, as at Nicaea, canon 3; Distinction 32, Interdicit; Nantes, chapter 3; Trent, session 28, On Reform, chapter 14. Nicholas V, chapter 2, On the Life and Honesty of Clerics, established thus:

> If we diligently attend to the individual vices which, in the sight of the people, cause clerical honor to become vile, and how hateful incest is in the Clergy, we are not undeservedly compelled to restrain a crime of incest of this kind--which very many, on account of its impunity, flatter themselves is scarcely shameful, indeed as though it were not a sin--and especially the more readily in our Curia, inasmuch as it appears more scandalous there and is > more dangerously drawn into example by others. Hence it is that, by the edict of the present constitution, we more strictly prohibit each and every official of the Apostolic See, and also those exercising any offices of the Roman Curia--even if by reason of offices of this kind they are not considered officials of the See itself--and any other Clerics following the same Curia, that none of them keep a concubine publicly in his house or elsewhere in order to make freer use of her shameful commerce, nor keep any woman for the shameful use of others in this manner. Whoever presently keeps any woman whatsoever must, after the publication of these presents upon the doors of the Basilica of the Prince of the Apostles in the City and in our chancery--which publication we also wish to possess the force of a peremptory warning--within nine days desist really and effectively from an excess of this kind and dismiss the concubine or woman herself utterly and altogether. Whoever hereafter presumes to keep a concubine or such a woman shall by the deed itself be deprived of all his ecclesiastical benefices and also of the offices which he possesses or exercises in the said Curia; and from that time these may freely be sought by any other persons. The same deprived persons, and any others who presume to keep concubines and women of this kind contrary to the present prohibition, shall be judged incapable of obtaining benefices and exercising offices of this kind in the said Curia, nor shall they be made capable of them unless they first obtain, by letters of the said See, the abolition of their incapacity; and meanwhile the things transacted by them in the aforesaid offices shall be regarded as not having been done.

§ 34. Embracing the faithful word which is according to doctrine. Rightly handling the word of truth. The latter expression is taken from sacrificers: ὀρθοτομοῦντα τὸν λόγον τῆς ἀληθείας, rightly cutting the word of truth, just as all parts are rightly cut in sacrificial victims. That is, he must read the word of God and interpret it rightly, not devising a meaning of his own, but drawing it from the context, the Fathers, the Councils, and the Church. Proverbs 11: δικαιοσύνη ἀμώμους ὀρθοτομεῖ ὁδούς: "the justice of the blameless rightly cuts paths." That very fact shows that great study is required, because he says ἀντεχόμενον: holding fast against those who strive to snatch it away, guarding and defending it.

§ 35. A good soldier of Christ. There is a twofold warfare, spiritual and secular. All wage the spiritual warfare except those who, having been conquered, are captives of the enemies; but Clerics are the leaders and standard-bearers of that warfare. If they show themselves lions, they readily preserve the whole army. How will they fight? Our arms are prayers and tears. Cause 23, Question 8, chapter 19:

> It is established to be highly reprehensible that you added that the greater part of all the Bishops keep watch by day and night with your other faithful against maritime pirates, and that for this reason the Bishops are prevented from coming; since it belongs to the soldiers of Christ to serve Christ, but to the soldiers of the age to serve the age, according to what is written: "No one serving as a soldier for God entangles himself in secular business." But if the soldiers of the age devote themselves to secular warfare, what remains for Bishops and soldiers of Christ except that they devote themselves to prayers?

§ 36. Let them solicitously take care to present themselves approved to God. For in truth the priesthood does not remove the inclination to sin, but restrains it. With an increase of honor, the care of solicitude also ought to increase, Distinction 100, Rationis. Let their care be to prove themselves to God and to gain others for God.

§ 37. A workman who need not be ashamed: ἀνεπαίσχυντον, one who does not blush. Saint Ambrose calls him shameless in the good sense. This is in the manner in which Paul glories when he says: "I am not ashamed of the Gospel." This is not a great thing when Christ's prelates are honored among Christians, but it is so when Christ's reproach must be borne among Gentiles, heretics, or impious Catholics. First, he is one who need not be ashamed when, overcoming empty shame, he omits no part of his office. Next, he is one who is hindered from the work by no insults, mockery, or derision. Formerly there was a great danger of shame concerning the Gospel, and now there is amid heresies, because religion requires humility, which is despised. Nor without reason does Paul say in Romans 1:16, "I am not ashamed of the Gospel." Why does he not rather glory in the Gospel? Because it was a scandal to the Jews and a laughingstock to the Gentiles.

These things, when neglected, bring infamy upon the sacred order. Long ago Nazianzen, in his work on the praises of Saint Basil, complained that, on account of the morals of those who are ordained, the holiest order was imperiled and made exceedingly ridiculous. “We make one-day saints,” he says, “and command those in whom there is no wisdom to be wise.” Ambrose makes the same complaint in On the Dignity of the Priesthood, chapter 5.

CHAPTER XI

That the Reformation of the Clergy According to the Apostolic Standard Must Be Earnestly Urged

§ 1. Whatever things have become deformed through negligence, wickedness, the lapse of time, and antiquity itself must be reformed. All, from the first head of the Church down to the lowest Chaplain, and from Caesar Augustus down to the praetor of the smallest little village, ought according to their office and powers to will, attempt, and accomplish this. To impious men who disdain sacred things and seek fattening from the patrimony of the Crucified, the name of reformation is hateful and the thing itself abominable, because the belly has no ears, nor do the things beneath the belly possess understanding. Nevertheless reformation must be urged and altogether accomplished.

§ 2. The primary cause is and ought to be the obligation by which the Supreme Pontiff, Bishops, and Prelates are most strictly bound; concerning this I shall speak elsewhere. Another cause is that it is known from experience and the whole history of antiquity that provinces and kingdoms have been publicly punished, overthrown, and deformed by devastation and slaughter when vices grew so strong that the authority of the laws yielded to them and the magistracy did not labor to eliminate them. Thus the first-created world perished in the Flood; thus Sodom sank into flames; thus the Canaanites were extirpated when their iniquities had been carried to the highest point. For this is the vicissitude of affairs, this the circuit of calamities, which do not spread by chance but exact deserved punishments by divine judgment. The Babylonians overthrew the Assyrians, the Medes and Persians the Babylonians, the Macedonians the Medes and Persians, the Romans the Macedonians, and every form of barbarism the Romans--and this at the time when each nation was most vicious. Consult Augustine concerning Africa's struggle against the Vandals, and Prosper concerning Gaul and Spain. Consider present events and those nearest to them: has not a great part of Hungary received the Turkish bridle, and does it not harass its neighbors with either a cruel or a faithless peace? This has place especially in the people of God, whom the providence of the divine power, raging mercifully with swift punishment against those ungrateful for its beneficence, has been accustomed to recall. Let the books of Judges and Kings be read: fortune always followed morals. It will be so also in the Christian world, which will be preserved so long as vices are punished and virtue is pursued; if the vices burst forth more unbridledly, it will be overthrown either by mutual slaughter or by a more powerful enemy. But vices will be extirpated by the reformation undertaken by rulers.

§ 3. The ambitious sloth of certain Prelates is damnable and will be punished with eternal fires. With soft words they enervate minds and grant room to vices growing of their own accord. They say that the times are now different; that things which can scarcely be amended must be dissembled; that the rigor of the canons must be relaxed; that reformations bring disadvantages; and that heresy impedes discipline. These words are destructive and impious. For laws were established not for times but for minds; nor do the common vices of the times excuse the deeds of individuals. No times have been so vicious as not to be bound by laws. Those who can be changed can also be amended. Those who despair of correction are injurious to the grace of the Redeemer. Will not God preserve his Church even to the end of the ages and purify for himself an acceptable Church? How, therefore, can the sins of its members not be at least diminished, if not altogether removed? How many things did one Ezra, one Maccabee, correct? When the entire nation was hastening headlong into the morals and vices of the Gentiles, he brought back the greatest part to piety. The hand of the Lord has not been shortened so that it cannot save; rather, the will of human beings has been cut off so that they do not labor to be saved. Since one century, so many thousands of barbarous nations, after acknowledging Christ and renouncing usury, slaughters, polygamy, and cannibalism, have handed themselves over to be formed in Christian morals--the two Indies and the regions of the Ethiopians scorched by the suns. Why, then, do we deny that the Christian people and Clergy can return to that place to which that barbarism has preceded them, coming from East and West and reclining with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, while marveling at the sons of the kingdom departing into the outer darkness? They cannot be ignorant that the most holy canons according to which I demand reformation can be observed not only by the best but even by those of middling quality, and that those who made them seriously commanded their observance. Within a few years there have been many provincial synods; the voice of them all is one: the Canons must be recalled into use. If one intends to count them, we shall find scarcely fewer canons of Councils by which we are ordered to observe the ancient canons than there are ancient canons whose observance is at issue.

But if one wishes to inspect our world more closely, many things have already been thoroughly amended, so that the rest appear easier. A hundred years ago great ignorance possessed the world; now there is almost an excess of arts, talents, and disputants. Now some single university city possesses more learned men than all Germany formerly did. Great progress has therefore been made. And so, as soon as the heresy snapped its fingers, almost half the Clergy and religious looked back and entered the broad and whitewashed roads of the age. Now, although apostates are precious in the camp of the sectarians, they are nevertheless rare.

There has been less, yet some, progress in morals. For the ancient religious families have recovered their former integrity and rigor and flourish more and more each day, with great hope of better times, since they show to a darkened world hearts so holy, brave, and entirely consecrated to God, despise the pomp of the age, and interpose themselves for us before God. And a select multitude of new religious, displaying the first fruits of the spirit, strive to bring aid to the aging world. This matter must therefore be urged, and care taken that the things which are lacking be added. In some places very many things are lacking, in others very few, according as the Bishops' diligence or negligence has prevailed.

CHAPTER XII

The Easiest Method of Reformation Is the Selection of Those to Be Ordained

§ 1. Since in ecclesiastical benefices those things which bear the appearance of hereditary succession are odious to the sacred constitutions and contrary to the decrees of the Fathers, as is stated in the Council of Trent, session 25, chapter 7, it follows that no Cleric is born evil. Therefore, if anyone lives contrary to the canons, it is either because an evil man was chosen or because after being ordained he departed from virtue. Bishops will prevent both by sagacious caution. For scarcely anyone is evil for long without the fact becoming known to someone; wickedness always betrays itself by some indication.

§ 2. The reason Clerics generally turn out evil is their parents, teachers, guardians, and kinsmen, because they are educated either negligently or vainly. Therefore the complaints of secular people concerning the vices of Clerics are dishonest. Do you marvel that your son is vain, proud, and drunken? He takes after his father; he drew your vices from paternal authority. Or tell me, what has he done which he did not learn in your house or among the intimates to whom you committed him? Yet if he did not learn from you to be evil, see whether it was not brought about by your indulgence, peevishness, or imprudence that he did not remain good.

§ 3. Those who are not suitable must in no way be admitted. Thus the law and the Councils. A golden canon is that of the Fourth Council of Milan:

> By the authority handed down to him by the law of the canons and by the Council of Trent, the Bishop, if he does not find suitable those presented even by any patrons whatsoever, shall neither approve, admit, nor institute them, nor provide for them under any title whatsoever, but shall reject them outright. Moreover, he shall not judge suitable those whom, after the test of an examination has been diligently made by questions, he does not see to be endowed with learning, skill in chant, and the other qualities necessary for rightly and duly performing the duties incumbent upon or connected with the benefice to which the person is presented.

Furthermore, by canonical law the ordainer of an unworthy person is deposed: Distinction 50, chapter 55, Ex paenitentibus; and Distinction 59, chapter 1:

> He who has not been imbued with ecclesiastical disciplines in due order and trained for divine service by the approval of time shall by no means presume to aspire to the supreme priesthood of the Church. Ambition shall be regarded as effective not only in him but also in his ordainer, so that they may lack the order which they believed should be presumed without order > contrary to the commands of the Fathers.

This canon must be recalled if priestly piety and sincerity are to be restored.

The mode and method of establishing who are suitable are also gathered from Distinction 77 and other sources.

§ 4. The greater the dignity of the order to which someone is assumed, the greater the care that must be taken concerning the abilities and virtues of the one to be ordained. The first care must be expended in choosing Bishops. For the Church cannot be healthy in its members if it suffers in its head. Therefore the electors of Bishops sin most gravely when they take no account of their duty.

§ 5. Account is indeed taken of years in the orders, but not according to the ancient custom. The Sixth Synod, canon 15; Distinction 77, chapter 4:

> Let a subdeacon be ordained at no less than twenty years. But if anyone has been ordained in any priestly order before the established times, let him be deposed.

And the Third Council of Carthage, canon 4:

> It has pleased us that neither Deacons be ordained nor virgins consecrated before twenty-five years of age, and that readers not salute the people.

The Council of Agde establishes the same in chapters 16 and 17:

> Let a Bishop in no way confer the blessing of the diaconate upon those younger than twenty-five years. Certainly, if married young men consent to be ordained, the will of their wives must also be required in such a way that, after separation of their dwelling and bedchamber has been made and religious life promised, they may be ordained after they have afterwards been converted in like manner. But let none of the metropolitans presume to ordain a Presbyter or Bishop before thirty years--that is, before he reaches the age of a perfect man--or Deacons before twenty-five, lest through their age, as sometimes happens, they be blamed for some error.

They require thirty years in a Priest, Distinction 78, chapter 4:

> Let a Presbyter not be ordained before thirty years of age, although his life is approved; rather, let him wait until the appointed time. For our Lord Jesus Christ was baptized in his thirtieth year and then preached.

The same things are in the Novels, in the Authentic On the Most Holy Bishops, 9, Clericos, and in Leo, Letter 83, chapter 1, to the African Bishops. Yet Pope Zachary, in a case of necessity, permitted ordination to the priesthood at twenty-five years.

I judge that in so many cases of younger Priests it is expedient for a greater age to be established, especially when necessity is absent and the diaconate or subdiaconate is sought not from necessity but from desire for greater revenues. For that age which is now priestly through dispensation and the necessity of the Church permitting it is not such by free judgment. Next, I do not think that one must labor greatly concerning the minor orders, because they do not bind to perpetual chastity. Yet haste is harmful for another reason, since readers, exorcists, and acolytes are appointed who can neither read nor even conjecture what those orders mean. Such was not the standard of Peter and the ancients. The laws require twelve years in these orders, but presume that they have been suitably instructed. Thus Distinction 28, chapter 5:

> Concerning those whom the will of their parents has bound to clerical office from the first years of infancy, we establish that the following be observed: immediately after being tonsured or handed over to the ministry of readers, they ought to be educated by an appointed master in the house of the Church under episcopal supervision. But when they have completed the eighteenth year of their age, let their will concerning the seeking of marriage be investigated by the Bishop in the sight of all the people. If, with God inspiring, the grace of chastity is pleasing to them and they promise that they will preserve their chastity without the necessity of marriage, let them, as seekers of the very narrow way, be subjected to the most gentle yoke of the Lord; and, after probation of their profession has been held, let them first undertake the ministry of the subdiaconate from their twentieth year. But if they pass the twenty-fourth year of their age blamelessly and without offense, they ought to be promoted to the office of the diaconate, if the Bishop finds that they are able knowingly to fulfill it. Yet they must beware lest at any time, forgetful of their promise, they return again to earthly marriages or secret concubinage. But if perhaps they do so, let them be regarded as guilty of sacrilege and strangers to the Church. Yet from those whose own will at the time of questioning has persuaded them to desire marriage, we cannot take away the license granted by the Apostle; but when, placed in marriage and advanced in age, they promise by equal consent that they will renounce works of the flesh, let them aspire to sacred orders.

I altogether require maturity and constancy, especially since they will live in the world and contend amid daily dangers and shipwrecks of chastity.

§ 6. Let no one be admitted to the Clergy without a lawful examination. Distinction 24, chapter 2: “Let no Cleric be ordained unless he has been proved either by the examination of Bishops or by the testimony of the people.” I ask: in certain places, who is ordained in this way? Where is so great an account taken of morals and learning? Distinction 24, chapter 4:

> Let Bishops be advanced to ecclesiastical dignity by the judgment of the metropolitans and of the Bishops who are round about--those, namely, who are proved over a very long time both in the word of faith and by the example of an upright manner of life.

For in truth a teacher of virtue must also be a leader. If the salt becomes insipid, with what shall it be salted?

The method of examination is in the same place, chapter 5:

> When the Bishop proposes to conduct ordinations, all who wish to approach the sacred ministry must be summoned to the city on the fourth weekday before the ordination itself, together with the archpresbyters who ought to present them. Then the Bishop shall choose from his side Priests and other prudent men, knowledgeable in divine law and practiced in ecclesiastical statutes. Before all things, these shall diligently investigate the life, lineage, homeland, age, education, and place where the candidates were educated; whether they are well instructed in letters; whether they are instructed in the law of the Lord; whether they firmly hold the Catholic faith and can assert it in simple words. But those to whom this care is entrusted ought to beware lest, either for the sake of favor or enticed by desire for any gift, they depart from the truth and apply an unworthy and less suitable person to the Bishop’s hands for the reception of sacred grades. If they do this, both the man who approached unworthily will be removed from the altar, and those who attempted to sell the gift of the Holy Spirit, already condemned before God, will lack ecclesiastical dignity. Therefore let them be diligently examined for three continuous days; and thus on the Sabbath let those found approved be presented to the Bishop.

Yet they are not examined if a Bishop has given testimony to a Cleric or an Abbot to a monk--unless perhaps the Abbot himself is judged unlearned, for in that case his testimony refutes itself: Cause 16, Question 1, Si quis. The method of a true examination is described in the Fifth Council of Milan:

> As regards the collation of benefices: when someone is examined for an ecclesiastical benefice for which provision must be made, let a trial of him be made by examination not only in knowledge of letters but also in skill in chant, for duly and rightly performing the statutes of that benefice, and, furthermore, in the practice and knowledge which he possesses in reciting the hourly prayers of the divine office. When either a theological or penitentiary prebend becomes vacant, even if the right of conferring it pertains to someone other than the Bishop--apart from the Apostolic See--let the customary notice be posted, by which all who wish to undergo an examination for the sake of that office, or to nominate others to undergo it, are called to the competition. After the appointed period has elapsed, let a trial or test of each of those who have assembled under that title be made in letters and doctrines by every, or the most diligent, method of inquiry and questioning. The Bishop, after associating with himself at his discretion other skilled and upright men, shall also inquire accurately into their life, morals, age, degree, order, and the other conditions necessary for such an office.

> Only then, after all these matters have been accurately weighed, let the Bishop himself deliberate maturely in the Lord and freely choose the man whom, according to the religion of his conscience, he judges more worthy and suitable, to whom an office of such weight may rightly be committed. In this consideration and deliberation, especially as regards the Penitentiary, let him see that, in addition to the necessary skill, he weighs above all innocence of life, gravity of morals, zeal for spiritual exercises, more experienced prudence from longer practice in hearing confessions, and the other virtues of religious piety.

You, great God, give us such a Charles in Germany--not one who merely establishes these things, but one who executes them. For now prebends of Doctors and populous parishes are frequently possessed by boys, nobles, scribes, and idiots, to their own most certain damnation and the destruction of others.

§ 7. Because questions are frequently raised concerning what each person ought to know, and many frauds lie hidden under this pretext and devices are sought for evading the examination, it seemed good to me to present the method of examination which the Fifth Council held at Milan composed at length. It reads as follows.

In the administration of the Church the office of examination concerning skill in letters and discipline is as necessary as it is manifold. At one time it is employed by the Bishop both for those who are to be initiated by the sacrament of Order and also for the approval of preachers and confessors; furthermore, for investigating and observing the condition and progress of the Clergy in literary studies; and it likewise assists and serves the Bishop in many other matters. At another time it is instituted and completed not only concerning those who are placed over parochial churches and other benefices having the care of souls, but also concerning those upon whom ecclesiastical benefices of any kind are conferred either by the authority of Apostolic letters customarily drawn up in the form DIGNUM, or by another right, or who are instituted to them by presentation, nomination, or election. Therefore, so that this method of examining, undertaken for any cause whatsoever, may be completed by the examiners as rightly as possible, in addition to certain things more fully explained and decreed especially in the Fourth Provincial Council, we have judged that these instructions also should be drawn up. Some pertain to this whole method of examination, while others are proper to particular examinations.

And each Bishop, according to his own piety and prudence, may add other instructions to all these or remit something from them, according as he sees that it serves the conditions and practice of his own diocese.

Let it be the care of the same Bishop and of the Vicar who presides over the examination that these instructions be introduced into custom and use.

Moreover, first of all, when the examiners appointed in the diocesan synod enter upon the examination of those who are to be placed over parochial Churches, let them remember the oath by which they publicly bound themselves in the synod when they were first chosen. Let them see that, after laying aside every human affection, they rightly care for and administer the office they have undertaken, lest they violate what they holily and religiously promised and thereby become perjurers.

On account or by occasion of the examination, let them accept absolutely nothing, not even the least thing, either before or afterwards. Otherwise let those who give know that, under the Tridentine statute, they have incurred the crime of simony; moreover, neither they nor even those who give may be absolved unless they resign whatever ecclesiastical benefices they possess. Let them likewise know that they have been rendered incapable of having these or other benefices conferred upon them in the future.

For every fault committed in the office they have undertaken, let them also render an account in the provincial Synod and there be gravely punished by the authority of the Council of Trent.

Likewise, those who at the Bishop’s free discretion are associated as examiners for examining others under any title or for any cause must never accept anything by occasion of the examination, not even food or drink. Whoever acts contrary to this shall both henceforth be judged unworthy to discharge that office and be affected with another punishment at the Bishop’s discretion.

Let all examiners, whoever they may be, know that an office so grave is entrusted to them that, if they conduct themselves negligently or badly in any manner, they will have to render to God before all an exact account of the fault committed in that office.

Therefore let them exercise the care of the office committed to them, led neither by hope, fear, reward, regard for persons, nor any affection.

With the fear of God set before them first, let them not approve anyone whom they know to be unworthy; conversely, let them not reject one whom, after a trial or test has been made, they find suitable and worthy. Therefore let them deliberate gravely, maturely, prudently, and rightly both concerning approval and concerning rejection.

When they have assembled in the place where it is customary for the trial of Clerics to be made, before they begin, let them commence with the appointed prayer prescribed for the use of assemblies, which the one presiding over the examination shall pronounce from the book. Let them devoutly and inwardly pray especially that by God's help they may accomplish it rightly, prudently, and in conformity with the divine will.

Let no examiner recommend in any way to his other colleagues anyone concerning whom an examination or trial is being made.

Let no one take part in anyone's examination or possess the right to vote unless he has been summoned to it by command of the Bishop or Vicar.

If anyone has privately taught a person who is to undergo the examination, let that teacher not even be present when the person undergoes it, much less be employed in the examination; but let another be summoned in his place at that time by command of the Bishop or Vicar.

Let diligent precaution be taken lest anyone experience the examination or undergo the trial in another person's name, which has sometimes been found to have occurred.

Let diligent inquiry also be made concerning those who have approached to undergo the examination: whether at other times they have made a trial or test of themselves by questions instituted according to custom for examining, and whether anything exists which has been discovered or determined concerning them.

Let no examination begin unless the Bishop or Vicar is present and also at least three examiners according to the prescription of the Council of Trent, when an examination is instituted for conferring a benefice with cure by any right. Let this also have place thereafter when an examination is completed either concerning one to be initiated into major orders or concerning the approval of a preacher or confessor.

When anyone comes to the examination, let his face, bodily bearing, clothing, gait, gestures, and speech be diligently inspected.

If anyone approaches either clothed in clerical dress deformed and foreign to the decorum or discipline of the ecclesiastical order, or without a tonsure suitable to the bearing of his own status and order, let him not be admitted to any method of examination or trial unless, clothed in becoming dress and with the prescribed tonsure, he returns to it.

Concerning anyone to be initiated--unless the Bishop has at some time judged otherwise--let no examination or trial be held before he has brought or presented written attestations of age, birth, or a granted dispensation, and of an ecclesiastical benefice, pension, or patrimony, which have been inspected by the Episcopal Vicar and signed and approved by his subscription, unless at some time the Bishop has ordered that they be produced or inspected after the examination.

Nor likewise shall an examination be held unless he has given the other attestations prescribed by provincial decrees or an Episcopal edict.

Nor, moreover, shall this be done unless the examiners have heard and learned from the Episcopal Chancellor whatever investigations concerning him, made at the Bishop's command and prescribed by office, have been signified, denounced, or reported in the letters of others.

Let all attestations presented either by the one to be initiated or by anyone else on occasion of the examination be restored or handed over to the Episcopal Chancellor.

It shall belong to him to enter a summary of these attestations in a definite register prepared for that purpose and finally to preserve it in the Episcopal Archive. But let the same Chancellor preserve the attestations of age and birth and, if the matter concerns one to be initiated into major orders, of patrimony or ecclesiastical benefice; and in the public letters which he shall draw up concerning the person who has received the order, let him make attestation concerning these according to the method prescribed to him.

Therefore, when an examination is instituted of one to whom the care of a particular parochial Church is to be entrusted, let the examiners first consider who and of what kind, and how numerous, is the people whose parochial care he will undertake.

After this matter has been diligently investigated, let them propose to themselves in the examination they enter upon that they will ascertain accurately whether he is altogether suitable for undertaking and discharging that care.

After all these things have thus been prescribed, let the examiners proceed in order to interrogations or questions. In the examination let the following method be entered upon: let that examiner propose the interrogations or questions whom, by a system of alternation and according to the kind of learning or discipline, the Bishop or Vicar presiding over the examination has ordered to question--now this man, now that man--in that same examination, so that one may not interrupt another competitively by a varied and manifold method of questioning.

Moreover, let the examiners maintain this method in their interrogations and questions: after these have been distributed among them, full satisfaction shall be given, as is fitting, to the purposes of the examination instituted. Let each one inquire or question concerning the category which he has undertaken to investigate in such a way that, as is proper, the questions or interrogations of that category have been sufficiently explained.

While the examination is being held, let them keep silence and hold no conversation or discussion among themselves. Likewise let them not propose mutual questions or explanations of doubts to one another; rather, attentive to the answers of the person whose learning is investigated by questions, let them apply their mind to him with studious attention so that he may rightly explain the questions proposed to him. Nor let another disturb the examiner questioning in his own place; rather, let each await the time when it falls to him in order to question according to the category or method of the question.

In proposing questions or interrogations, let them show themselves severe or vehement neither by words, appearance, nor in any manner, lest those who undergo examination, frightened by severity, lose courage and their memory grow languid and falter, not without some disgrace. Rather, let them hear them disputing or answering with signs of a benevolent and gracious mind, and let them not interrupt them with little questions or in any other way.

But if they observe them to err in disputing, reading, pronouncing, or answering, let them not then teach, rebuke, or even admonish them, unless something pertains to rightly instituting or completing the examination. Rather, after the examination has been completed, let them briefly admonish or teach them if they judge that it is then necessary for them to be admonished or taught concerning anything.

In all and each interrogation of the examination, regard shall be given not only to the knowledge of each person examined but also to his practice, judgment, intellectual power, and dexterity.

Let this method therefore be instituted for all examinations:

First, inquiry shall be made concerning the vow, state of life, lineage, homeland, or domicile of the person undergoing examination.

Whether he has any impediment by which, being entangled, he cannot be initiated, receive and exercise the ecclesiastical benefice in whose name the trial is made, the office of preaching, or the hearing of confessions. If anyone is bound even secretly by such an impediment, let him disclose it at least to the Bishop, lest anyone be unlawfully initiated, obtain a benefice, or undertake and discharge another office.

Whether he is practiced in the study and use of holy prayer.

With what meditations he has been instructed silently to pray to God.

What is the method of prayer.

What are its fruits or benefits.

Of how many and what parts it consists.

How many are the rules of preparation for prayer, and many other things of the same kind, according as a prudent and pious examiner sees need for them by reason either of the person concerning whom inquiry is made or of the cause for which the examination occurs.

After these things have been investigated, let the examiners descend to a trial of knowledge or learning. But so that they may set before themselves a fixed form by which they may test both the literary learning, the discipline of clerical life, and the experience of ecclesiastical affairs of those who are examined, in every method of trial or examination let them employ the sacred Bible, the Roman Catechism, especially the Council of Trent, the decrees of the sacred canons, other Pontifical constitutions, and both provincial and diocesan synods. From these let them draw their interrogations, by which, according to the capacity of the candidates' intelligence, they may investigate their knowledge and their acquaintance with and practice of ecclesiastical affairs.

But let care be taken that, if anyone while being questioned shows himself so untrained and ignorant that he possesses no knowledge or practice of easy and very small matters, time is not consumed by questions concerning other, difficult matters.

Conversely, when it has been ascertained that someone is skilled in learning and literary practice to whatever degree, there is no reason to deal with him longer by further questions.

Now, therefore, we shall prescribe generally below the things which pertain to the method of each examination of those who either are initiated by the Sacrament of Order, undertake the care of parochial Churches or the office of another benefice, assume the office of hearing sacred confession, or are sent to preach the word of God. But in particular, far more or indeed fewer matters are left to the judgment of the prudent examiners--and especially of the Bishop or the one presiding over the examination--according to the capacity of those who approach the examination, the order into which one is to be initiated, the character of the places to which they are sent, and the kind of doctrine which they profess.

Those, however, who show themselves less instructed in the matters contained in this instruction and indicated by definite questions, let the Bishop admonish to apply themselves diligently to learning in the future and strive especially to acquire experience and knowledge of these very matters, so that when the duty of visitation or another review of their studies and progress in letters is employed, they may be found rightly and skillfully instructed in every such category of learning.

First, therefore, let the examiners command the person concerning whom an examination must be made to read, until by trial they see whether he reads rightly and distinctly.

Then, if a trial is made on account of an order, a benefice, or the review of some Cleric's progress in literary study, let them propose the construction of words according to the custom of grammarians. In this category, if he errs or slips so that he does not possess their practice or skill even according to the method of grammar, let them not on that account disturb, interrupt, or impede him from returning to the proposed method of grammatical instruction.

Then let them ask him for the sense of the words which he has read and construed. So that he may rightly elicit and express it, let the passage which they propose to him for reading be of such a kind that a whole and perfect meaning is concluded within it and that it contains nothing which falls under an understanding of history or whose explanation depends upon another preceding or following chapter; and then to § 7 (continued). other more serious tests of his learning or discipline let the examiners proceed.

From each and every one of those who are to receive the first tonsure or minor or major orders and who approach for a trial or examination, let it further be asked, both generally and individually, whether they are held entangled in the impediments which were enumerated in the decree of the Fourth Provincial Council concerning those to be initiated; namely, whether they are:

Advanced in age.

Untrained and ignorant.

Criminals.

Solemn penitents.

Neophytes.

Given to drunkenness and gluttony.

Unchaste.

Fallen after receiving an order.

Perjurers.

Manifest usurers.

Infamous.

Bound by accounts to be rendered.

Slaves.

Defective in body.

Remarkably deformed.

Illegitimate by birth.

Foreigners and unknown persons.

Bigamists.

Irregular in any other way.

In this category let care be taken that, among other things, the following be sought from him particularly:

Whether he has served for military pay, from which killings of men have resulted.

Whether he has discharged the office of a criminal judge in a secular court.

Whether he has pronounced a sentence of death.

Whether he has dictated or written the proceedings, sentence, and testimonies concerning a crime in whose name someone was condemned to death.

Whether in such a matter he administered the office of procurator or fiscal advocate and exercised other functions from which he contracted the stain of irregularity.

Whether they are suspended.

Whether interdicted.

Whether excommunicated.

Whether insane.

Whether suffering from the falling sickness.

Whether possessed.

Or whether they have not been examined and approved.

Let it likewise be investigated whether he has received an order secretly or by leaping over a grade.

Furthermore, when anyone who is to receive an order comes to the examination, let it be investigated how long it has been since he received another order, so that ascent to a higher grade may lie open to no one unless he has remained for a suitable space of time in each of the other grades of inferior order, according to the prescription of the Tridentine decree.

Whether he knows the force and nature and the mysteries of the order which he is to receive.

Likewise, whether he knows the rites and ceremonies which are employed from the Pontifical when they are initiated.

Likewise, whether he knows their more sacred significations.

Likewise, whether he knows the mysteries and things signified by the sacred vestments with which they are clothed.

Whether he has knowledge of the functions of the order into which each is to be initiated.

Whether he rightly possesses their use and exercise, both in reading and also in chant; in this trial let those skilled in chant be employed.

Let these matters be investigated generally in all and each. Now, in addition, there follow those matters proper to each order which, prescribed in their own place, are to be sought individually--yet in such a way that the examiners, according to the method of their prudence, may sometimes seek even from those who are initiated into a higher order the matters required in the examination or trial of an inferior order.

Concerning those who are to be initiated by the first tonsure, let it first be asked and investigated for what reason they wish to become Clerics.

Whether they seek to be initiated for the purpose of avoiding secular judgment.

Whether they are entangled in contentious lawsuits.

Whether they engage in quarrelling and enmity.

Likewise, what craft they possess, or in what art or manner of life they have hitherto been occupied.

Whether they are such as give hope that they will become useful ministers of the Church.

By what priest, a master of a more holy life, they have been instructed in the manner of clerical life.

Whether they know how to read, pronounce, and write; and let a trial of them be made in both categories.

Whether they know the precepts and institutions of Christian doctrine.

Whether they possess an understanding of the Epacts.

Furthermore, whether they have received the sacrament of Confirmation.

But concerning those who wish to be enrolled in minor orders, let it be asked and learned by trial:

Whether they understand at least the beginnings of grammar and the Latin language.

Whether their promise of learning shows them to be such as are worthy sometime to ascend to major orders.

But since those who are to be initiated into sacred orders--namely the subdiaconate, diaconate, and priesthood--ought to be adorned and cultivated with those virtues which are required in Clerics of inferior orders, just as they ascend to a higher grade of order, so they ought to manifest, as it were, an ascent in virtues, probity, and learning.

For this reason let the examiners see before all whether those who are initiated by the sacrament of Order have made greater progress through each of its grades and in the discipline of spiritual life.

Whether they possess the Breviary and sacred Bible, likewise the volumes of the holy Fathers, the Council of Trent and also the provincial councils, the synods of the diocesan Bishop, the Roman Catechism, the Rationale of Divine Offices, and some books written concerning the methods of spiritual life and adapted to the use of their office.

From subdeacons especially let inquiry be made concerning the difference between minor and major orders.

Whether he has been approved in minor orders.

Likewise concerning the vow of continence which is joined to the order of the subdiaconate.

Also concerning the doctrine of the sacraments, at least generally. Then let a trial or test of them be made in the method of reciting the divine office.

Let an examination or test of deacons furthermore be made somewhat more diligently concerning the doctrine of the sacraments.

Likewise let some trial be made in delivering sermons, according to the method prescribed below for the examination of preachers.

From those who wish to be initiated into the priesthood, let these matters be sought individually with care:

Whether they have conducted themselves piously and faithfully in the ministries previously performed.

Whether they are of proven piety and chaste morals.

Whether a distinguished example of good works and evidences of life may be expected from him.

Let these matters also be asked:

What the sacrifice of the Mass is.

What the effects of that sacrifice are.

What its parts are.

What mysteries are present in it.

What the significations of the sacred vestments are.

What is required in offering that office.

Where and when it is not lawful to do so.

What doubts can sometimes arise.

What matters require explanation in order that it may be performed rightly.

Then let a trial of them be made according to the rules prescribed below.

Whether they possess some skill in sacred confession.

Whether they are suitable for rightly and duly administering the other sacraments likewise.

Whether they have a more explicit knowledge of them, according to the prescribed interrogations, as below concerning the Parish Priest.

Whether they likewise possess the learning by which they may treat the word of God rightly or deliver a sermon.

And whether concerning sacred matters, the duties of Christian virtues, and everything necessary for salvation they can suitably instruct or teach the people.

But whereas inquiry is to be made of all the others, as prescribed a little before, who are enrolled in the clerical soldiery concerning the institutions and exercises of a spiritual and more holy life, it is to be made especially of those who either are initiated into the priesthood, undertake a parochial cure, assume the office of hearing sacred confession, or wish to be occupied in treating the word of God and in sacred sermons.

When all and each of these come to the examination, in addition to the other things which pertain to the practice of a holy spiritual life, let those matters especially be investigated which have been handed down concerning the method of praying and concerning every exercise of holy meditations or heavenly contemplations by others who have exercised themselves religiously in that category.

But concerning those priests who are to undertake the cure of parochial Churches, let it further be asked and first learned by trial:

Whether they are capable of perceiving senses, not only those which are taken for grammatical understanding, but also those more interior and more sacred senses which pertain both to the mysteries of Christ and the Church and to the manner of spiritual life.

Whether they know how to compose or deliver discourses.

If they have delivered any, whence they took them or what method they employed in composing or writing them; and indeed, if they then have any written out in their possession, let them show and hand them over.

Whether they can do something extemporaneously in that category; then let a trial be made, by an extemporaneous and brief discourse, of how much power they possess in preaching.

And if the character of the parochial Church which is to be committed requires a parish priest more experienced in the practice of treating the word of God, let an examination be entered upon in some part which seems preferable in the judgment of the examiners, according to the norm of interrogations established below for the examination of preachers.

Let it further be asked whether they have ever at another time discharged the care of souls; but if they affirm it, let them then also be asked both where they discharged it and why they departed thence.

Whether they understand how great a thing it is to undertake and, in turn, discharge the care of souls, and what those duties and virtues are with which a good and vigilant curator of souls must be endowed.

Likewise, whether they know all the impediments on whose account it is forbidden that anyone administer a sacrament and that anyone receive one.

Whether they understand the force and nature of the sacraments, but especially of those of which he is the minister; and concerning these let the following matters first be asked individually:

What is the matter of each of the sacraments, and likewise what is the form.

What is their principal efficient cause.

What is the instrumental efficient cause.

What is the final cause.

What is their difference.

What are the effects, or what are the fruits.

What are their rites, or what are their ceremonies.

Whether above all they possess skill in hearing sacred confession.

What books of this kind, and indeed what Summas, they possess.

Then let a trial be made of how experienced by practice they are in cases of conscience and how skillfully they are versed both in these and in other matters of that kind, and especially in ecclesiastical constitutions which pertain to the right practice of life and to the morals and virtues of the Christian people.

Whether they know the cases reserved by law and by man to the most holy Pope and likewise to the Bishop.

And indeed, more diligently, according as there shall be need, let them be asked concerning each of the matters which will be prescribed below for the method of examining priest-confessors.

Furthermore, let the examiners see whether they possess some knowledge of the sacred canons and, especially as regards the Tridentine and provincial councils and diocesan synods, whether they know the following:

Namely, whether they know the doctrine concerning the principal articles of the Christian Religion which that ecumenical Synod of Trent defined against the heretics.

Likewise, what it prescribed concerning residence.

Also what it established concerning parish priests and parochial Churches, the worship of the divine offices, and other matters of the same kind.

What it further decreed concerning the honorable conduct of Clerics.

Finally, the other things which it established concerning the discipline of the Clergy or the people or the reformation of other matters, which it is in the interest of parish priests to know and understand well.

From the provincial councils let them ask individually:

What has been established concerning the honorable conduct of clerical life and the duties of parish priests.

Likewise, what concerning the right administration of the sacraments, what concerning the sacrifice of the Mass, and what furthermore concerning the divine offices.

Also what concerning sacramentals; what concerning the veneration of feast days; what concerning the worship of Churches; what concerning schools of Christian doctrine; what concerning the instruction and moral discipline of the Christian people; and what concerning other matters especially pertaining to the office of parochial life has been decreed.

From diocesan synods let them enter upon that same method of examination, divided into definite heads, according to the kind of decrees which the Bishop has composed in them.

Concerning one who approaches the examination on account of a benefice of any kind, provided it does not have cure, let these matters be investigated:

Whether he knows how to recite the office of the canonical hours according to the institution and rubrics of the Breviary.

Whether he is instructed in all the learning and discipline which the order into which he ought to be initiated demands, according to the character of the benefice, office, or dignity on whose account the examination is instituted.

Likewise, whether he possesses skill in the functions which the character of that benefice, dignity, or office requires.

Whether he possesses those things which it is necessary to know for rightly and duly performing those functions or the benefice, including those which pertain to the method or system of singing rightly.

And these indeed are the matters which pertain to the instruction for the examination of those who either are to be initiated by the sacrament of Order, are to be placed over parochial Churches, or are to have benefices conferred upon them.

But now there follows the method of examination for confessors, concerning whom, in addition to the other matters which are joined to the office or duty of a priest and parish priest, let these also be sought individually and by a more searching method:

Concerning the necessity of the Sacrament of Penance.

Why this sacrament was instituted, and by whom it was instituted.

What is the matter of this sacrament.

What is its form.

What is its effect.

Who is its minister.

What conditions are required in it.

What are the rules for discerning and distinguishing mortal sin from venial.

What are the parts of penance.

What is the character of those parts.

What Contrition is.

What things are necessary for true contrition.

What are the fruit and utility of contrition.

§ 7 (continued). By what method anyone may exercise himself toward contrition.

What are the signs of true contrition.

Let it likewise be sought what is the nature and substance of confession, which is the second part of penance.

Whether he knows how diligently to inquire into the circumstances of the sinner and likewise of the sin.

Which circumstances change the species of the sin and which must be explained in confession.

Which matters demand restitution and what are the roots or causes of restitution.

Whether they know doubtful or suspect contracts, or at least know how to institute or enter upon doubts and questions concerning them.

To which crimes censures are annexed.

Likewise, whether they possess skill in and knowledge of their force.

Whether they know the cases in which the stain of irregularity is contracted.

Whether at least in all these and in the other matters which pertain to a true and perfect minister of this sacrament of Penance they know how to doubt and know how to consult the skilled concerning how that matter about which they are brought into doubt is to be handled.

Likewise, what are the rites and sacred ceremonies of confession.

What conditions are necessary for the confession of one who is truly penitent.

What is the order of confessing; when anyone ought to confess immediately; likewise when he ought to repeat a confession.

Concerning satisfaction, which is the third part of penance, let it be asked:

What are the parts of satisfaction.

What is the end of satisfaction.

What are the fruits or utilities of satisfaction.

What things are required in satisfaction.

Of what kind and how great a penance ought to be imposed upon the penitent.

Whether they know how to enjoin salutary and suitable satisfactions according to the gravity of the crimes and the capacity of the penitents.

Likewise, whether, according to the prescription of Innocent III, after the manner of a skilled physician they know how to pour wine and oil into the wounds of the injured person, and what remedy or counsel they ought to provide.

Furthermore, whether they rightly possess the penitential canons.

What is the difference among satisfactions, penances, and so forth.

Concerning absolution let it be investigated:

What formula of words is required.

What prayers or orations are further employed.

What order must be observed in absolving both from sins and from excommunication or suspension.

Likewise, let several questions be asked concerning the seal of confession, and especially what is the force, and how great the force, of the seal.

What things fall under it.

From ecclesiastical decrees--the Council of Trent and both provincial and also diocesan synods--let it be investigated what things established in them pertain to the sacrament of Penance, and what things have been established concerning the discipline and morals of the Clergy and the people, as was demonstrated a little before in the examination of parish priests.

But thus far concerning the method of interrogations which are employed in examining priest-confessors.

Now is the place for the examination of preachers and interpreters of sacred Scripture, from whom let these things be asked:

First, concerning the articles of doctrine or dogmas explained by the Council of Trent, namely concerning the canon of Scripture, original sin, justification, the sacraments, and generally the sacrifice of the Mass, purgatory, the invocation and veneration of the Saints, sacred relics, images of the Saints, indulgences, the power and authority of the Pope, fasts and feast days, and many remaining matters.

Whether he furthermore possesses the remaining known and treated topics of Theology.

What author he has made familiar to himself especially among the Scholastics.

Whether he has very frequently and studiously gone through the volumes of the sacred Bible with a gloss or another commentary, and whether he has been so diligently versed in them that he can readily and suitably bring forth passages from them for every kind of sacred treatment.

Whether he is learnedly versed in the practice of holy interpretations.

Whether he knows how to elicit the true sense of Scripture from what precedes and follows; and likewise whether he knows how to compare these things in the Evangelists when they treat the same kind of narrative.

Whether, conversely, he rashly and according to his own pleasure twists sacred Scripture away from its true sense.

Whether he devises tropological or moral senses that cohere with the literal sense.

Whether in explaining parables he regards the right and principal sense of the matters, passing over explanations which contribute nothing to the purpose.

Whether he has knowledge of Apostolic and ecclesiastical traditions.

Whether he is skillfully versed in the writings and discourses of the holy Fathers.

Likewise, which of the Fathers he especially follows and imitates in preaching.

Whether he knows the mysteries of the sacred seasons, or possesses the significations of sacred rites.

Whether he possesses knowledge of affairs transacted in the holy Church, and especially of the universal Councils.

Whether he knows the lives of the Saints and true history.

Whether he possesses a suitable knowledge of the canons.

Whether he knows the laws and institutions of the Supreme Pontiffs.

Whether he has at hand the decrees of councils, especially provincial and diocesan ones, as was prescribed in the examination of parish priests.

Whether he is instructed in the learning of cases of conscience.

Whether he knows well the precepts and exercises of that mystical Theology which is wholly occupied with handing down the institutions of spiritual life and with purifying the affections and interior reformation.

Finally, whether he has practice in holy meditations and mental prayer.

Whether he possesses the topics of moral teaching and Christian discipline, not only collected in order, but rightly known.

What topics he possesses by which the minds of his hearers are stirred either to love of God, desire for the heavenly fatherland, zeal for the virtues, detestation of crimes, mercy, or, furthermore, definite affections which, when raised toward heaven, produce Christian virtues.

Finally, whether they are capable and suitable for conceiving and explaining the treatment of topics of Theology not only in itself, but by similitudes which are drawn from agriculture, a vineyard, sowing, and other matters which fall under sense and the understanding, especially the understanding of even the untrained to whom the sermon is delivered.

Whether he employs a right method at the beginning of a sermon and avoids those faults which very many admit in this category.

Whether he rightly and orderly disposes the whole sermon.

Whether he relates matters clearly and distinctly.

Whether he pronounces well.

Whether his words have weight and also force, so that they not only touch the ears of the hearers but penetrate their minds inwardly.

Whether throughout the whole sermon, according to the character of each matter which he treats, he acts rightly, suitably, becomingly, and congruently.

In investigating this whole category and making trial of it, and in more diligently examining other matters, the examiners, as occasion permits, shall employ as diligently as possible the instructions concerning preachers which were issued by our command, by the authority of the Provincial Council, for the use of the whole province.

When an examination of someone is instituted not on account of a definite cure or another benefice, office, or duty, but only on account of reviewing his learning or progress in literary studies, by that diligent and principal inquiry and by the interrogations variously described above, according to the condition of each person, let his learning and his skill and practice in ecclesiastical ministries be investigated.

But at least four classes of these, or even more, may be established, to which they may be assigned according to the measure of their skill as demonstrated by trial.

Let there be assigned to the first class those who show themselves so capable both in perfect skill in preaching and in the explanation of cases of conscience that they can benefit and preside over many others, and who accordingly are suitable not only for the office of parish priest, but also for the office of provost, rural Vicar, or visitor, or for discharging the office or attaining the dignity in a cathedral Church of a penitentiary prebend, a doctoral prebend, or a theological prebend, and other matters of that kind.

To the second class are to be assigned those who, if they cannot preach perfectly like the former, nevertheless can do so moderately, even from the pulpit, and who have been studiously versed in the Summas of cases of conscience and indeed diligently possess the doctrine of the Roman Catechism.

Of the third class will be those who attain only enough understanding that, if not by an accurate and learned sermon, they can at least deliver a discourse from the altar and relate and explain the Gospel as occasion occurs; and who are so experienced in the practice of administering the Sacraments and cases of conscience that, with some study employed, they can suitably unravel and explain those which customarily occur more frequently.

Of the fourth class are those who, if not by great literary study, are nevertheless by some practice fitted for some brief explanation of the Gospel, and who have some knowledge of the things necessary for salvation that pertain to teaching the people, administering the Sacraments, and explaining cases of conscience, so that on account of a scarcity of priests and a necessary cause some spiritual cure may sometimes be entrusted to them, according to the character of the place and especially for a time.

In an inferior class let the rest be enrolled, of whom no account at all ought to be taken in entrusting the cure of souls, in granting the faculty of administering a sacrament, or in delivering discourses to the people.

In this whole method of examining, let the Chancellor perform the following things by virtue of the duty of his office.

Let him possess a definite book of provisions to parochial Churches and other benefices which, after an examination has been employed, are to be conferred, including by Apostolic letters.

In this book let the following be noted by him rightly and in order:

The proceedings of the examination which occur on each day, as occasion for examining arises.

The day on which a definite benefice became vacant, and likewise the manner of its vacancy, and other matters of that kind.

Also the day of promulgation or prolongation of the edict which is customarily proposed concerning the competition, when the character of the benefice's vacancy requires it, and the remaining matters which pertain to the promulgation.

Likewise, the names of the examiners whom the Bishop has chosen by name to conduct the examination on account of that definite vacant benefice.

Also the names of those who are proposed for examination on that account.

Furthermore, the day on which each underwent the examination.

Also the names of the examiners who were present.

The approval or rejection which, by their judgment, each received.

Likewise, the name and surname of the one whom the Bishop chose as more suitable and more qualified, to whom the benefice is conferred by him or by the one to whom it pertains.

To this book let him further add other things which the Bishop has judged proper.

Let him prepare another book in which he enters all and each whom the Bishop, after employing an examination, either approves or disapproves for the purpose of preaching, hearing confession, or interpreting a sacred reading.

In this same book let him also note both the names of the examiners and the day on which they conducted the examination, and likewise the causes of rejection, if anyone received one.

Let him observe the same concerning the definite day, examination, approval, or rejection of those whose trial is made on account of sacred ordination.

Let him possess a third book in which he enters the examinations which are generally instituted and indeed conducted to investigate and examine the progress of the Clergy in literary studies.

See also the Council of Cologne in the year 1549. And this is the intention of the Council of Trent, Session 7, chapter 13: "Those presented, elected, or nominated by any ecclesiastical persons whatsoever, even Nuncios of the Apostolic See, to any ecclesiastical benefices whatsoever, shall not be instituted, confirmed, or admitted--even under pretext of any privilege or custom, even one prescribed from time immemorial--unless they have first been examined by the Ordinaries of the places and found suitable. And no one may protect himself by the remedy of appeal so as not to be bound to undergo examination. Those presented, elected, or nominated by universities or general institutions of learning are nevertheless excepted."

§ 8. A simoniac is not to be ordained. The first cause is wholly occupied with this matter, and the Church always fights against this vice, while the world bears arms in its defense. The judgment of Saint Gregory, Epistle 110, Book 7, is approved by me: "Whoever is ordained through money" (Cause 1, question 1, canon 5). "Those things which were established by the holy Fathers concerning simoniacs we too confirm both by the judgment of the Holy Spirit and by Apostolic authority. Therefore, whatever has been acquired either in sacred orders or in ecclesiastical affairs by money given or promised, we judge to be void and never to possess any force."

And canon 6: "Those who are found to have purchased sacred dignity at a price, although unworthy by their merits, ought, when convicted, to be restrained, for they perpetrate such a deed not without peril, because the condemnation of Simon, to which sacred reading bears witness, enfolds both giver and receiver alike."

§ 9. Let neither an unwilling nor an ambitious man be ordained. Cause 1, question 6, Sicut. For orders cannot be given to one unwilling; they ought not be given to one ambitious.

§ 10. Homicides cannot be ordained, distinction 50, canon 4, Miror. Indeed, neither can soldiers and others, distinction 5, canon 1: "We have learned that certain men from among those who, after receiving the grace of baptism, were occupied in forensic practice and assumed obstinacy in winning their cases were summoned to the priesthood, among whose number Rufinus and Gregory are said to be; certain men from the military, who, when they obeyed the authorities, necessarily executed savage commands; certain men from among the curials, who, while obeying the authorities, did the things commanded them; and certain men who celebrated pleasures and public shows for the people have attained the honor of the highest priesthood. None of all these ought to have attained even to fellowship in the order of Clerics. If we command each of these things to be investigated, by our zeal for correction we shall introduce no small disturbances or scandals into the provinces of Spain, which we desire to heal; therefore we think that these things should rather be remitted. But lest similar things be committed hereafter, the maturity of your charity will have to provide that at least now a necessary end be placed upon so great a usurpation, with this provision, namely, that whoever shall have been ordained in such circumstances be deposed together with those who ordained them."

And canon 2: "The classes of laymen from which men cannot attain to the Clergy have been designated; that is, if any of the faithful has served as a soldier; if any of the faithful has pleaded causes, that is, has acted as an advocate; if any of the faithful has administered office. Concerning curials, however, it is manifest, since even if men of this kind are found who ought to be made Clerics, nevertheless, because they must rather frequently be reclaimed by the curia, one must beware of these because of the tribulation which frequently comes upon the Church from them."

§ 11. Nor is a Cleric to be ordained from among penitents, distinction 50, canon 15: "Although he may be good, let no Cleric be ordained from among penitents. If it shall have been done through the Bishop's ignorance, let him be deposed from the Clergy, because at the time of ordination he did not disclose that he had been a penitent. But if the Bishop knowingly ordained such a man, let even he himself be deprived solely of the power of ordaining in his Bishopric. A Bishop shall be subject to a similar sentence if he knowingly ordained as a Cleric one who had a widow, a divorced woman, or a second woman as wife."

And canons 57 and 58: the same Nicene Canons exclude penitents even from the lowest offices of Clerics. These things, however, are understood concerning public penitents, by whose crimes the Church has been struck with terror; Augustine, Epistle 54, calls this the humblest penance, and the Council of Agde describes it in canon 15. This decree was mitigated at the First Council of Toledo, distinction 50, canon 68: "It has pleased us that penitents not be admitted to the Clergy unless only necessity or utility demands it, and then let them be assigned among the doorkeepers or among the readers, yet in such a way that they do not read the Gospel or the Epistle. But if any were ordained deacons before, let them be regarded as subdeacons, in such a way that they do not impose a hand or touch the sacred things. But we call him a penitent who, after baptism, either for homicide or for diverse crimes and very grave sins, performing public penance under sackcloth, has been reconciled to the divine altar."

The cause which moved the Fathers to exclude solemn penitents was that they did not wish those who must teach and administer the sacraments in the Church to be publicly known for very grave sins, on account of which penance is imposed, and to be in some manner infamous. So much the more must vigilance now be exercised lest not only penitents but even impenitent men should hold an honored place in the Church after very grave sins.

§ 12. Usurers are not to be admitted, distinction 47, canons 1, 2, and 4. Not only are they not to be admitted; they are not to be retained either, but are rightly judged to be cast down from their rank. That avarice is unjust and is a subtler but more wicked invasion of another's property than theft or robbery. Even now, when all things are going to ruin, when Christians organize and encourage the usuries of Jews so that this is the business of many cities, and the senate itself in many places of Germany seems to have entered into partnership with Jewish usurers and to use those wretched men as ministers--from here, I say, the Jews penetrate even into some houses of Clerics, although some men generate gold from gold even without Jews. If these men are Clerics, the canons judge that they must be deposed; if laymen, that they must not be admitted to orders. The civil laws also hold them infamous, nor is it lawful to choose any moneylender as a senator; but it is much more unworthy for the senate itself to fill its treasury with usuries, that is, with subtler and more harmful thefts. Senators of that sort, once the case has been heard, ought to be cast down from their dignity and offices. But another place is mine for speaking about usury. Now let each person consider how shameful that is in a servant of God which the laws punish in the princes of the world.

§ 13. Apostates also are not admitted to the Clergy. For if they have made void their first pledge to God, how can the Church honor them as faithful ministers of God and entrust herself to them? Thus from the Council of Arles, distinction 50, canon 69: "Those who apostatize after a holy profession of religion and return to secular conduct, and afterwards do not seek the remedies of penance, shall receive no communion at all without penance. We also command that they not be admitted to the office of the Clergy. And whoever he may be, let him not presume to assume secular dress after penance. But if he shall have presumed to do so, let him be regarded as alien from the Church." Much less are those who so rashly cast away their own soul and destroyed it by their example for others to be employed in the care of souls.

Therefore praiseworthy is the statute of the Theological Faculty in the Academy of Mainz, that apostates not be admitted to Theological degrees or into the senate, although after penance they may have crept into some Church.

§ 14. Slaves and curials are excluded. For a slave is made free by ordination, and injury is therefore done to his master. Thus Leo, First Epistle to the Bishops of Campania, distinction 54, canons 1 and 2: "If a slave has secretly crept into the priesthood, he must be punished by the loss of his peculium and remains subject to servitude," canons 9 and 10. Indeed, he cannot even be admitted to religious life. If he is ordained while his master is present and does not contradict it, the dignity of the order and consequently freedom remain to him; nevertheless, neither the one who presented him nor the Bishop who ordained him will go unpunished, for they are bound to make double restitution. But the slave is made free, distinction 54, Si servus. Indeed, the master is seen to consent unless he shall have brought forward a just cause for his silence.

He must therefore be presented with freedom, for a freedman can become a Cleric. Formerly, when there was a multitude of slaves, the Church had very many slaves and freedmen, from whom she frequently chose the suitable for the Clergy. Concerning the making and defense of freedmen, and so forth, see Binius's volumes of the Councils: tome 2, part 2, folios 372 and 535, column 1; folio 566; folio 357, columns a--b; folio 38, column 2; folio 32, columns e--f; folio 499, column 1d; tome 2, part 1, folio 555, column 1c; folio 267, column 2c; folio 356f; folio 280d; folio 516f; tome 1, part 1, folio 197f; tome 1, part 1, folio 767, column 2c; and tome 3, part 2, folio 650, column 2d.

Thus much concerning slaves; concerning bigamists it has already been said above.

§ 15. The illegitimate are excluded from orders, distinction 56 and many subsequent precepts. At the Council of Poitiers under Paschal: "The sons of priests and others born in fornication shall not be promoted to orders unless they either become monks or live regularly in a canonical congregation; nevertheless, they are commanded to be altogether incapable of prelacies."

§ 16. Nor is ordination performed without a title approved. Thus the Council of Chalcedon, canon 6, distinction 70, canon 1: "Let no one be ordained absolutely as a priest or deacon or as anyone constituted in ecclesiastical ordination, unless the one ordained plainly deserves the designation of an ordination publicly declared in the church of a city or estate, or in a martyrium, or in a monastery. But concerning those who are ordained absolutely, the holy Synod decreed that the imposition of hands be void and that no such act have any force, to the reproach of the one who ordained him."

In the Latin, "and that no such act have any force" is obscure; in the Greek it is clear, μηδαμοῦ δύνασθαι ἐνεργεῖν, "that he cannot exercise it anywhere," for it is not lawful to use an order received in this manner. A title, therefore, is necessary, so that either he may have a title and maintenance in a Church, or certainly be maintained by the Bishop, or possess such resources that he can live sufficiently from his own patrimony--lest he wander about as a vagrant and, pressed by poverty, turn to unlawful things.

§ 17. The sons of ravishers of virgins are not admitted to the Church, Council of Meaux, canon 64, "unless perhaps either the greatest necessity or utility of the Church demands them, or an evident prerogative of merits commends them."

§ 18. Eunuchs are not admitted to orders unless it was done because of disease or by the violence of another. The first canon of the Council of Nicaea reads as follows:

> Εἴ τις ἐν νόσῳ ὑπὸ ἰατρῶν ἐχειρουργήθη, ἢ ὑπὸ βαρβάρων ἐξετμήθη, οὗτος μενέτω ἐν τῷ κλήρῳ· εἰ δὲ ὑγιαίνων ἑαυτὸν ἐξέτεμε, τοῦτον καὶ ἐν τῷ κλήρῳ ἐξεταζόμενον συμφέρει παύσασθαι· καὶ ἐκ τοῦ δεῦρο μηδένα τῶν τοιούτων χρὴ προάγεσθαι. ὥσπερ δὲ τοῦτο πρόδηλον, ὅτι περὶ τῶν ἐπιτηδευόντων τὸ πρᾶγμα καὶ τολμώντων ἑαυτοὺς ἐκτέμνειν εἴρηται· οὕτως εἴ τινες ὑπὸ βαρβάρων δεσποτῶν τε εὐνουχίσθησαν, εὑρίσκοιντο δὲ ἄλλως ἄξιοι, τοὺς τοιούτους εἰς κλῆρον προσιέναι ὁ κανών.

If anyone has been cut by physicians because of sickness, or castrated by barbarians, let him remain in the Clergy. But if anyone, being healthy, has cut himself, it is fitting that he, even though constituted in the Clergy, abstain, and that henceforth none of such men ought to be promoted. But just as this is clear--that it has been said concerning those who affect this deed and dare to cut themselves--so the rule admits to the Clergy those whom either barbarians or masters have castrated, if they are found otherwise most worthy.

Leontius supplied the cause of the canon. Having been commanded to cease from association with a suspect young woman, he gave himself over to be castrated so that he might not be separated from her and yet might escape suspicion. Nevertheless, he was deposed and, overcome by indignation, defected to the camp of the Arians as if in revenge. The Apostolic Canon which the Council of Nicaea cites is 22. But it is better to hear the words of the Apostles.

Canon 21:

> Εὐνοῦχος εἰ μὲν ἐξ ἐπηρείας ἀνθρώπων ἐγένετό τις, ἢ ἐν διωγμῷ ἀφῃρέθη τὰ ἀνδρεῖα, ἢ οὕτως ἔφυ, καὶ ἔστιν ἄξιος, γινέσθω.

If a eunuch was made so through the malice of men, or if his male members were amputated in persecution, or if he was born so, and he is worthy, let him be made a Bishop.

Canon 22:

> Ὁ ἀκρωτηριάσας ἑαυτὸν μὴ γινέσθω κληρικός· φονεὺς γάρ ἐστιν ἑαυτοῦ, καὶ τῆς τοῦ Θεοῦ δημιουργίας ἐχθρός.

If anyone has cut himself--that is, if anyone has amputated his male members--let him not become a Cleric, because he is his own murderer and an enemy of God's creation.

Canon 23:

Εἴ τις κληρικὸς ὢν ἑαυτὸν ἀκρωτηριάσει, καθαιρείσθω· φονεὺς γάρ ἐστιν ἑαυτοῦ.

If anyone, being a Cleric, mutilates himself, let him be deposed, for he is his own murderer.

A layman who cuts himself shall be deprived of communion for three years, because he has proved an assailant of his own life.

Canon 24:

Λαϊκὸς ἑαυτὸν ἀκρωτηριάσας, ἀφοριζέσθω ἔτη τρία· ἐπίβουλος γάρ ἐστιν τῆς ἑαυτοῦ ζωῆς.

A layman who cuts himself shall be deprived of communion for three years, because he is an assailant of his own life.

Nor does the command in Deuteronomy 23 differ from this Apostolic command: "A eunuch whose testicles have been crushed or amputated shall not enter into the Church of the Lord." I think that in that Church, even if the defect of nature or the injury of men had produced it, it was nevertheless prescribed in the Law that they not discharge the priesthood; but in the New Church voluntary cutting is in question, such as Origen wished to undergo, who for that cause was deposed by Demetrius, Bishop of Alexandria. Eusebius, Book 6, chapters 7 and 17.

There are several reasons why the canons detest that deed so greatly. First, because that mutilation is accomplished at great peril to life, and therefore such men are regarded as αὐτόχειρες, murderers of themselves. Next, because even the vigor of the mind perishes and a certain malignity and pusillanimity enter in; the bodies themselves become worse. This is also perceived in beasts. Third, not even thus is temptation avoided, nor is the will toward pleasures cut out. Fourth, it was also forbidden by the civil laws; Epiphanius, Heresy 64. Justin, in his oration to Antoninus, relates that a young man, in order that he might be free from every irrational movement of the flesh, presented a petition to Felix the Augustal Prefect that a physician might be permitted to do it. The same sin was committed by two Egyptian monks whom Theophilus of Alexandria cast out; Epiphanius admonished and corrected them while they wandered about, cast out from everywhere. Fifth, it was insulting to so many virgins and continent persons if it were believed that chastity must be sought by iron by Christians, rather than from the grace of the Lord. Sixth, the ministers of Cybele and others removed their members with sharp flint, as he says, and served the demon by cruel and foolish superstition; others feigned a brief continence by the coldness of lead and hemlock. Therefore the Church did not wish her own to be or appear similar to them, mindful that continence is a gift of God which, with the integrity of God's work preserved, would consecrate us to its Author.

CHAPTER XIII

The Learning and Other Endowments of Those to Be Ordained

§ 1. I therefore demand the most accurate selection in this sacred soldiery, contrary to what is now done in many places. It shall be instituted according to those things which I have said, so that crimes and canonical defects may be absent and those virtues which the Apostle requires may be present. But if boys or adolescents are assigned to the ecclesiastical order, let them be of such disposition, intelligence, and morals that they are judged to be as capable as possible of virtue and learning.

§ 2. Let Clerics possess distinguished learning; but let Bishops, and all who are in a Cathedral Church as their assessors and colleagues--the Prelates and Canons--and those who preach in those Churches and teach in Academies, excel in the Church in as much true wisdom and knowledge as is necessary for those who institute and govern learned Clerics. I shall address all these by the name of Doctors, for their principal office is to teach. For the proper office of Bishops is to teach; that of cathedral Canons, to teach and admonish on behalf of their Bishop; that of preachers and Academics, to instruct secular persons and Clerics and to explain the Scriptures. All these are duties of Bishops, as the learned works of those who have discharged the Episcopate show. For very many Doctors of the ancient Church were Bishops, nor was this changed until, after occupation in governing and adjudicating disputes had grown, the function of teaching was transferred to others as auxiliaries. Thus the laws of the ancients, distinction 36, canon 2: “Let him who has not been imbued in order with ecclesiastical disciplines and instructed for divine service by the approbation of time by no means presume to aspire to the highest priesthood of the Church; and let ambition not only be held ineffectual in his case, but let those who ordained him also be deprived of the order which they had believed should be presumptuously conferred without order, contrary to the precepts of the Fathers.” Therefore unworthy men creep into the Clergy who luxuriate here and there upon benefices in Academies until, infected with foreign vices, they bring back to their Churches attestations of two years’ idleness.

The Fourth Council of Toledo, canon 24, distinction 38, canon 1, teaches us that ignorance must especially be avoided in priests: “Ignorance, the mother of all errors, must especially be avoided in the priests of God, who have undertaken the office of teaching among the peoples. For Paul admonishes priests frequently to read the holy Scriptures, saying to Timothy, ‘Attend to reading, exhortation, and doctrine, and always remain in these things.’ Therefore let priests know the holy Scriptures and the canons, so that their whole work may consist in preaching and doctrine, and let them edify all both by knowledge of the faith and by discipline of works.” The Prophets rebuke nothing more gravely in priests than ignorance.

The Seventh Council commands Bishops to know the whole Bible, canon 2, distinction 38, canon 6: “All of us, while singing psalms, promise God: ‘I shall meditate upon thy justifications; I shall not forget thy words.’ It is most salutary indeed that all Christians observe this, but especially those who have attained hierarchical dignity. Hence we define that everyone who is to be advanced to the grade of the Episcopate know the Psalter in every respect, so that from this all the Clergy who shall be under him may likewise be admonished and imbued. But let it be diligently investigated by the Metropolitan whether he has readily at hand the ability to read searchingly and not cursorily the sacred canons and the holy Gospel, as well as the book of the divine Apostle and all divine Scripture, and to conduct himself according to God’s commands and teach the people committed to him. For the substance of our high priesthood is the sayings divinely handed down--that is, true knowledge of the divine Scriptures--as the great Dionysius declares. But if he shall have hesitated and by no means promised that he would willingly do and teach thus, let him in no way be consecrated. For God says prophetically: ‘Thou hast rejected knowledge, and I shall reject thee, that thou mayest not discharge the priesthood for me.’”

§ 3. Some mediocrity of Theological knowledge is not sufficient for the Church; rather, care must be taken that, so far as it can be done, there are as many excellently learned men as possible. Therefore Bishops must apply themselves to this matter. The reason is manifest: just as mediocrity can suffice for one man or for a part, so the excellence of some is necessary for the whole body. In political government the highest power of one or of a few is required; in war the highest training and industry of certain men. For if difficulties arise which surpass middling powers, all are stupefied. Next, if no one surpasses mediocrity, there will be no hope of more excellent men, for rarely is the disciple above the master. Hence middling intellects are not aroused, while distinguished ones grow torpid or are exalted too greatly; for a great part of excellent intellects flee from labors and possess changeable affections. Finally, it is impossible to resist heresies unless there are many so learned that they both understand Theology and can solidly refute the arguments of the adversaries. Just as in new and dangerous diseases there is need of the most sagacious, most learned, and most experienced physician, so much more in the most poisonous sewage of so many errors is there need of distinguished Theologians who skillfully dispense antidotes and saving medicines.

§ 4. Hence the Council of Trent exhorts that the Canons of distinguished colleges be holders of degrees, Session 24, chapter 12 On Reformation: "The holy Synod also exhorts that, in provinces where this can conveniently be done, all dignities and at least half of the canonries in cathedral and distinguished collegiate Churches be conferred only upon Masters or Doctors, or even Licentiates, in Theology or canon law. Furthermore, it shall not be lawful for those possessing dignities, canonries, prebends, or portions in the same cathedral or collegiate Churches, by force of any statute or custom, to be absent from those same Churches for more than three months in any year, saving nevertheless the constitutions of those Churches which require a longer time of service. Otherwise, in the first year let each be deprived of half the fruits which he made his own by reason also of the prebend and residence. But if he shall again have employed the same negligence, let him be deprived of all the fruits which he shall have gained in that same year. But if contumacy increases, let proceedings be taken against them according to the constitutions of the sacred canons."

The levity and perfidy of certain Academies oppose this precept: after receiving money they adorn any persons whatever with the insignia of honors, through which it has come about that it is easier to obtain titles of doctorate or mastership in universities than to be admitted into the guild of tailors or shoemakers. Hence counts, barons, and nobles, even if they possess learning, nevertheless spurn titles as doubtful attestations of learning.

§ 5. But the method by which studies may flourish is that there be rewards for labors and diligence--not the empty titles of Academies, but much more the conferment of prebends. Honor and utility arouse study. Provision was made for this matter by the Council of Basel, Session 31, in the year of the Lord 1438, On the Qualifications and Order of Conferring a Benefice: "First, since it is holily ordained by statutes of the General Council that every metropolitan Church is bound and ought to have one Theologian who brings the fruit of salvation by his doctrine and preaching, this holy Synod ordains that an ordinance of this kind be extended also to cathedral Churches, in such manner, namely, that every collator of their prebends be bound and ought to confer a canonry and prebend, as soon as the opportunity shall offer itself and one can be found, upon a Master, Licentiate, or formed Bachelor in Theology who has studied for ten years in a privileged University, who is willing to undertake the burden of residence, lecturing, and preaching, and who must lecture twice or at least once in every week, in the absence of a lawful impediment; and as often as it should happen that he fails in a lecture of this kind, he may, at the discretion of the chapter, be punished by subtraction of the distributions of the whole week. And if he abandons residence, let provision be made with another. Nevertheless, so that he may attend more freely to study, let him lose nothing when absent from the divine offices. Furthermore, in every cathedral or collegiate Church, beyond the aforesaid prebend to be assigned to a Theologian as premised, let a third part of the prebends be conferred upon other suitable graduates in the manner and form written below, so that the first one to become vacant be conferred upon a graduate of this kind, and then, after two others, the next be so conferred, and so thereafter: namely, upon Masters, Licentiates, or formed Bachelors in Theology who have studied for ten years in some privileged University; upon Doctors or Licentiates in either law or in medicine who have studied for seven years in their faculty at a University as above; upon Masters or Licentiates in arts, with the rigor of an examination, who have studied for five years in some University in arts from and including logic onward, or in another higher faculty; and also upon Bachelors in Theology who have studied for six years, or in both laws or either law who have studied for three years if noble on both parents' sides and of ancient lineage, but otherwise for five years, in like manner in some privileged University at least. They shall be bound to establish proof before the collator concerning the aforesaid degrees, time, and nobility by lawful documents.

"Nevertheless, we exhort the Ordinary collators that in conferring benefices of this kind, especially as regards dignities, they have particular regard for Masters and also Licentiates and formed Bachelors in Theology. But in non-elective dignities, personates, administrations, and offices of the said Churches, the same order, method, and form shall be observed in all things. But if any one of the said qualified men, at the time when a prebend or dignity of this kind becomes vacant, already possesses two other prebends, or dignities and prebends, or another benefice or benefices which, by residing in one of them and attending the divine hours, would be worth up to the sum or valuation of two hundred florins of the Camera, likewise if anyone possesses two cathedral prebends, let him by no means be judged to be included or comprehended in that third part. But in parochial Churches which exist in cities or walled towns, let persons qualified as above be instituted, or at least those who have studied for three years in Theology or in either law, or Masters in arts who have studied in some privileged University and attained a degree of this kind, if such persons can be found who are willing to serve benefices of this kind. And so that they may be found more easily, this holy Synod establishes that every year, during the season of Lent, all and each qualified in this manner from the diocese itself, and others who wish, shall have their names submitted, by themselves or by a procurator, to those to whom the collation or presentation of benefices having cure pertains, or to their Vicars. But if they have not done so, a collation, presentation, or disposition made otherwise than as premised shall not on this account be judged void. And likewise in the collation of the third part of prebends mentioned above, it is to be understood thus: if so many graduates or qualified men in the aforesaid manner can be found, those graduates and qualified men shall be bound, as premised, to submit their names at the aforesaid time, by themselves or by a procurator, to those to whom disposition of the benefices pertains, or to their Vicars. But if they have not done so, a collation, presentation, or disposition made otherwise than as premised shall not on this account be judged void. But if those to whom any disposition of benefices pertains have conferred any benefice contrary to the designation and order of the aforesaid qualifications, or presented someone to it, or disposed of it in any manner whatsoever, let it be void and empty ipso facto, as was premised above. And nevertheless, when they have failed in these matters or have made provision in any manner for unsuitable persons, let them be corrected and duly punished by the provincial Councils, according to the tenor of the constitution of the General Council concerning prebends which begins Grave. But let those to whom the collation or disposition of regular benefices pertains, passing over the unworthy, confer and assign them to suitable religious according to the same rule. But if they have acted otherwise, let them be corrected and duly punished by their superiors and provincial chapters."

Thus, when the Council of Aquileia had introduced the decree of Trent, it extended the same to monasteries: "In monasteries of Monks also, even Carthusians, where it can conveniently be done, a lecture on sacred Scripture shall likewise be held; in this matter, if Abbots shall have been negligent, the Bishops of the places, as delegates of the Apostolic See in this respect, shall compel them to it by suitable remedies, as is providently established by decree of the Council. But in convents of other regulars in which studies can conveniently flourish, a lecture on sacred Scripture must similarly be held by the prescription of the Council of Trent; this lecture shall be assigned by general or provincial Chapters to the worthier ministers. In public Schools also, if a lecture on sacred Scripture has not hitherto been instituted, it must, for the preservation, propagation, and defense of the Catholic faith, be instituted as soon as possible, and if it had been instituted and was neglected, it must altogether be restored by the decree of the Council of Trent; lest, if the principles and teachings of the arts and sciences are studiously handed down everywhere so that nothing be lacking for perfect knowledge, the studies of sacred Scripture, the food of the Gospel word, the majesty of the divine sayings, and the magnitude of the heavenly promises--which is the sole support of the present life and proof of the age to come--lie neglected."

§ 6. A second method is that schools and seminaries of Clerics be instituted. Concerning this matter there is extant a canon on schools in the Synod of Trier celebrated in the year 1549 under Archbishop John. Thus Cause 12, question 1, canon 3: "For necessity itself demands that cloisters be established next to the Church, in which Clerics may devote themselves to ecclesiastical disciplines. Therefore let there be one refectory and dormitory for all, or the other workrooms necessary for the uses of Clerics."

In the Council of Paris the Fathers petitioned Louis, chapter 12, that public schools be established by his authority in at least three of the most populous places of the Frankish Empire. But I have spoken about Schools in Book 4.

§ 7. Since a scarcity of books retards the studies of many Clerics, provision must also be made for this matter. I have likewise treated the Library above; but so that Bishops and colleges of Canons may possess a form for establishing a Library and a method for increasing it, I shall set forth in this place the decree of the Fourth Council of Milan concerning the Library: "Just as the industry of our forefathers was diligent and accurate in copiously and sumptuously procuring sacred books, volumes of the Saints, and other ecclesiastical codices of every kind, so in preserving them the study of those who succeeded must not be negligent, nor indeed their care less; for from manuscripts and rightly copied volumes, amid so great a corruption of books introduced especially in these times by heretics, very great assistance is brought to public ecclesiastical affairs, both for defending the truth of Catholic doctrine and for refuting the rashness of those who viciously corrupt those books.

"Therefore, where no definite place has been established for the library of a Church in which the ecclesiastical volumes and other codices are kept, let one be established, by the Bishop's care, in the Episcopal or canonical buildings of the Church.

"In that place let several bookcases be constructed and divided into compartments, in which whatever codices and volumes exist there may be disposed not in heaps but in order.

"Furthermore, let a catalogue be made in which each volume is noted according to the category of disciplines or according to alphabetical order.

"And let this catalogue be preserved perpetually in a definite place, with other books whatsoever which shall in future come to the same library in any manner being thereafter also noted in order.

"Therefore, since most private persons lack suitable means for furnishing a library, this ought to be a public office, so that an abundance of means for learning may not be lacking to all who possess the will and intelligence."

§ 8. The first means by which studies are stimulated is honor and utility. Therefore, in provinces in which prebends and priesthoods are given by competition to approved learning, there is an immense abundance of most learned men. But where a place is given only to lineage or favor, wisdom lacks assistance and therefore proceeds at a slow pace or migrates elsewhere. For by what argument shall we persuade a young man of honorable birth, intelligence, and studiousness to apply himself seriously to Theological studies unless, besides the heavenly reward, he will also possess a worthy place in the Church? This is especially so since young men have little capacity for higher philosophy, and their parents also very often desire it less. Does not the objection, which cannot readily be solved, force itself upon the eyes? In the richest Churches the stupid offspring of the wealthy, the scribes of magnates, the flatterers of Prelates, and the little relatives of Canons are fattened. If Jerome himself, Augustine, Gregory, Aquinas, and Suárez were present, they would have to yield to favor. For what benefices are conferred upon the learned because they are learned? This, therefore, must be reformed; sloth must be shaken off; and the excellent beginning made by many colleges, which admit none unless distinguished by some degree, must be continued. But because many Academies deceive, another examination would further be necessary. Therefore, where these things either are not in use or are handled languidly and perfidiously, they must be sustained by other aids. This is done in Germany by the institution of seminaries of Clerics; experience has indeed taught that in this manner both letters and religion have flourished again. Even the sectaries imitate this, for they have their own phrontisteries and pens, in which seduced youth is corrupted and sharpened for the infamous ministry of lying and attacking the Church. Concerning seminaries the Council of Trent, Session 23, chapter 18, establishes as follows:

"Since the age of youth, unless it is rightly instructed, is prone to follow the pleasures of the world, and unless it is formed toward piety and religion from tender years, before the habit of vices possesses the whole men, it never perfectly perseveres in ecclesiastical discipline without the greatest and almost singular assistance of Almighty God, the holy Synod establishes that individual cathedral, Metropolitan, and greater Churches be bound, according to the measure of their resources and the extent of the diocese, to maintain, religiously educate, and instruct in ecclesiastical disciplines a definite number of boys from that city and diocese--or from its province, if they are not found there--in a college for this purpose near those Churches or in another suitable place to be chosen by the Bishop. Into this college let those be received who are at least twelve years old, born of lawful marriage, know competently how to read and write, and whose disposition and will offer hope that they will serve perpetually in ecclesiastical ministries. It wishes that the sons of the poor especially be chosen, yet it does not exclude those of the wealthier, provided that they are maintained at their own expense and manifest zeal for serving God and the Church. The Bishop shall divide these boys into as many classes as shall seem good to him, according to their number, age, and progress in ecclesiastical discipline; in part, when it shall seem opportune to him, he shall assign them to the ministry of the Churches; in part he shall retain them to be instructed in the college, and shall substitute others in the place of those led out, so that this college may be a perpetual seminary of God's ministers. But so that they may be instructed more conveniently in that same ecclesiastical discipline, they shall immediately receive the Tonsure and always use clerical dress; they shall learn grammar, chant, ecclesiastical computation, and the discipline of the other liberal arts; they shall learn sacred Scripture, ecclesiastical books, the homilies of the Saints, the method of administering the Sacraments--especially those things which shall seem suitable for hearing confessions--and the forms of rites and ceremonies. Let the Bishop see that every day they are present at the sacrifice of the Mass, confess their sins at least every month, and, according to the judgment of the confessor, receive the body of our Lord Jesus Christ; and let them serve the cathedral and the other Churches of the place on feast days. Each Bishop, with the counsel of two older and graver Canons whom they themselves shall choose, shall establish all these and other things suitable and necessary for this matter, according as the Holy Spirit shall suggest, and by visiting frequently they shall take pains that these things be always observed. They shall punish sharply the unruly, incorrigible, and sowers of evil morals, even by expelling them if there shall be need; and, removing all impediments, they shall diligently care for whatever things shall seem to pertain to preserving and increasing so pious and holy an institution.

"And because definite revenues will be necessary for undertaking the construction of the college, paying wages to teachers and ministers, maintaining the youth, and other expenses, beyond those things which in some Churches and places are destined for instructing or maintaining boys--which by that very fact are judged to be applied to this seminary under the same Bishop's care--the same Bishops, with the counsel of two from the Chapter, one of whom is chosen by the Bishop and the other by the Chapter itself, and likewise two from the Clergy of the city, the election of one of whom shall similarly pertain to the Bishop and the other to the Clergy, shall deduct some part or portion from the entire fruits of the Episcopal mensa and the Chapter and of all dignities, personates, offices, prebends, portions, Abbeys, and Priories, of whatever Order, even Regular, or of whatever quality or condition they may be; and of hospitals which are given in title or administration according to the constitution of the Council of Vienne which begins Quia contingit; and of any benefices whatsoever, even Regular ones, even if they are of any right of patronage whatsoever, even if exempt, even if of no diocese, or annexed to other Churches, monasteries, hospitals, and any other pious places, even exempt; and from the fabrics of Churches and other places; even from any ecclesiastical revenues or proceeds whatsoever, including those of other colleges in which, however, there are not actually seminaries of learners or teachers for promoting the common good of the Church--for it wished these to be exempt, except as regards revenues which would be superfluous beyond the suitable maintenance of those seminaries; and from bodies or confraternities which in some places are called schools; and from all monasteries, but not those of mendicants; even from tithes pertaining in any manner to laymen from whom ecclesiastical subsidies are customarily paid, and to soldiers of any soldiery or Order, the brethren of Saint John of Jerusalem alone excepted. And that portion so deducted, and also certain simple benefices of whatever quality and dignity they may be, or even what are called praestimonia or praestimonial portions, even before vacancy, without prejudice to divine worship and those who possess them, they shall apply and incorporate into this college. This shall have place even if the benefices are reserved or affected; nor may the unions and applications be suspended or impeded in any manner by resignation of those benefices, but they shall altogether take effect upon any vacancy, even if they attain their effect in the Curia, notwithstanding any constitution whatsoever.

"But the possessors of benefices, dignities, personates, and all and each of the things commemorated above shall be compelled by the Bishop of the place, through ecclesiastical censures and other remedies of law, to pay this portion, not only for themselves but also for the pensions which they might pay to others from the said fruits, nevertheless retaining proportionately whatever must be paid by them for those pensions; the aid of the secular arm may even be invoked for this if it shall seem good, notwithstanding, with regard to all and each of the foregoing, any privileges, exemptions--even those which would require a special derogation--any custom, even immemorial, or any appeal or allegation which may impede execution. But if the case should arise in which, through unions taking effect or otherwise, the seminary itself is found to be endowed in whole or in part, then the portion deducted from each benefice and incorporated as above shall be remitted in whole or in part by the Bishop as the matter itself requires. But if the Prelates of cathedral and other greater Churches shall have been negligent in this erection of the seminary and its preservation and refused to pay their portion, the Archbishop ought sharply to rebuke the Bishop, and the provincial Synod the Archbishop and superiors, and compel them to all the foregoing; and it shall studiously take care that this holy and pious work be promoted as soon as possible wherever it can be done. But every year the Bishop shall receive the accounts of the revenues of this seminary in the presence of two appointed by the Chapter and as many by the Clergy of the city.

"Next, so that provision may be made for instituting schools of this kind with less expense, the holy Synod establishes that Bishops, Archbishops, Primates, and other Ordinaries of places shall constrain and compel, even by subtraction of fruits, those possessing scholasteries and others to whom the office of lecturing or teaching is annexed to teach in those schools, either by themselves if they are suitable, or otherwise through suitable substitutes to be chosen by those scholastics and approved by the Ordinaries. But if in the Bishop's judgment they are not worthy, let them name another who is worthy, with every appeal removed. But if they neglect this, let the Bishop himself appoint one. The aforesaid shall teach those things which shall seem expedient to the Bishop. Moreover, henceforth those offices or dignities which are called scholasteries shall be conferred only upon Doctors, Masters, or Licentiates in sacred Scripture or canon law and other suitable persons who can discharge that office by themselves; and provision made otherwise shall be null and invalid, notwithstanding any privileges and customs, even immemorial.

"But if in any province the Churches labor under such poverty that a college cannot be erected in some of them, the provincial Synod, or the Metropolitan with the two most senior Suffragans, shall take care that one or more colleges, as it judges opportune, be erected from the fruits of two or more Churches in each of which a college cannot conveniently be instituted, in the Metropolitan Church or another more suitable Church of the province, where the boys of those Churches may be educated. But in Churches possessing extensive dioceses, the Bishop may have one or more seminaries in the diocese, according as shall seem opportune to him; nevertheless, in all things these shall depend upon that one which shall have been erected and established in the city. Finally, if any difficulty should happen to arise, either on account of unions, the assessment of proportions, assignment and incorporation, or for any other reason, by which the institution or preservation of this seminary might be impeded or disturbed, the Bishop with those appointed above, or the provincial Synod according to the custom of the region and the quality of the Churches and benefices, may have power to decree and provide all and each of the things which shall seem necessary and opportune for the happy advancement of this seminary, even by moderating or increasing the things written above if there shall be need."

§ 9. That institution brought the greatest benefits to Germany, and by that means Gregory XIII restored many Churches of Germany. But now seminaries have advanced in such a manner that, whereas at the beginning twelve-year-old boys were admitted, as is permitted by the Council, it has finally come to this, that even students of philosophy and Theology are received, in whom the utility is as much greater as they are more quickly admitted into the harvest of the Lord.

In the territory of Milan they devoted to this the tithes of all benefices, even of Episcopal mensas; but in most places so many benefices are held by idle men that the expense could easily be met.

In the same territory the Bishop visits the seminary every month. By decree 26 of the Second Council of Milan and by the Fifth Council, he is commanded to choose two Canons whose counsel he may employ in the administration.

The Council of Aquileia celebrated in the year 1596 considers that the Church can scarcely subsist in this age without a seminary of Clerics. It says: "We have heard in the cities of the province of Aquileia, and have seen with incredible delight, that the institution, preservation, and advancement of seminaries in the Church of God--by which the order and progress of the clerical soldiery are propagated--is supremely fruitful and so necessary that ecclesiastical discipline can scarcely stand without their aid and support. But we grieved that our Metropolitan Church has hitherto lacked a seminary because of the greatest difficulties; yet we now rejoice that it lacks one in such a manner that it can almost be said to possess one."

And thus much concerning the selection and institution of Clerics, upon which all things depend; integrity will be capable of being preserved if only the Bishops obey the Councils and canons. Many religious orders, such as the Carthusian, preserve their institute inviolate for so many years; they remit nothing of its rigor; while public prayers remain, private prayers increase daily; and yet there is no lack among them of a multitude of distinguished young men and men who daily seek the narrow gates to heaven in that Hermitage. What prevents that which is done in the Charterhouse from being done in the Church of Christ, of which the Charterhouse is indeed a noble but nevertheless small portion? Whence comes to them this so long-lasting and persevering good? First, from the accurate observance and institution of their Rule. For where God beholds an easy and happy journey to eternal joys, thither he calls his elect; and therefore there grace and uprightness of life flourish. Next, all who are held by desire for their own salvation flock to that place where a more expeditious method of it is perceived. This ought to be done in the Church: let there be that guardianship of discipline, that vigor of sacred laws, which may easily lead Bishops, Canons, and all constituted in any order whatsoever to virtue and convey them to heaven. Let the appearance, modesty, institution, and care of Colleges of Canons be such that it is easier for a Canon to be saved than for a secular man. So long as this is not done, there will never be that fruit which the Church regarded. For as affairs now stand, how few are those who seek a canonry so that they may possess an easier way of salvation rather than so that they may live more quietly? But if men are admitted to the Clergy with great selection, if those admitted are instructed toward piety with the greatest care, and if the incorrigible or pernicious are rejected so that ecclesiastical ceremonies, religious charity, and devotion may flourish, they will come to the Church for the sake of salvation, not from desire for wealth; and the Clergy will be holy and pious, surpassing even the holiness of the best monasteries. For the status of Clerics is more worthy in the Church than that of monks and is also more holy by sacrament. Would that it might be recalled to its beginnings so that it might also be more spiritual. Now--alas!--in the midst of the Church, in the very sanctuary of Christ, in the midst of the priests of the Lord, is the world; and, what I say with grief, the world reigning with greater peril than in the world.

For many so enjoy the riches of the Church that they seem not to have fled the world, but to have sought the world in the house of the heavenly Father, in the patrimony of the Crucified, in the blood of him who conquered the world. Hence they rejoice both to be and to be called secular priests--deservedly, since they daily turn the house of the Lord into a worldly palace. But let us leave these things, which must daily be lamented by the pious and corrected by the Prelates. Let them keep watch lest, through those by whom justice is taught, the disease of sin creep in and death pass over to the people. This now, alas, we daily see with grief, and with all the greater grief because the remedies are ineffectual in some places, nonexistent in others, and victorious in few.

CHAPTER XIV

Visitations Ought to Be Frequent

§ 1. Such indeed is the majesty of Christian sacred things that they readily lead men dedicated to God to virtue and integrity, and neither art nor punishment would be needed for governing the priests of Christ. Nevertheless, because nature is fragile and it is of great importance that the leaders of piety be pious, no remedies are to be spurned by which religion is both introduced and fostered and vices are restrained. Of these I judge the first to be frequent and serious visitations by Bishops or by those chosen by them.

§ 2. Almost all the monuments of the Christian religion teach us that visitations of Churches have certainly been customary and that they pertain to Bishops. Acts 9:32: "Peter passed through all." Paul himself had as much care to visit and confirm the converted as to convert the nations. A canon of the holy Council of Nicaea also entrusts visitation to Bishops. Athanasius visits the monks of Egypt in the year 382. In the same manner Chrysostom visits his Churches; Augustine, at Zosimus's command, visits the interior regions of Africa and corrects many things in the year 418; Cyriacus visits Gaul and Spain in the year 599; Boniface promised Gregory that he would visit the Churches and refer the greater difficulties to the Pontiff in the year 740. Louis sent Archbishops with a count to conduct visitation in the year 819; Charles did so in the year 853. For abuses readily creep in, which inspection, instruction, and punishments correct.

From ancient practice, therefore, comes that law, Cause 10, question 1, canon 4: "The complaint of the peoples was related before the holy Synod that there are certain Bishops unwilling to travel through their parishes during the year for preaching or confirming, who nevertheless demand that those who ought to prepare the lodgings which they should have used on the journey redeem them for a price. This double infamy of negligence and avarice was a great horror to the holy Synod. They therefore established that no one should further exercise that contrivance of avarice and that Bishops should be solicitous in visiting their flocks."

§ 3. The visitation ought to be annual. Cause 10, question 1, canon 10: "We have decreed that the order of ancient custom be observed, that the dioceses be visited annually by the Bishop, and that, if any basilica should happen to be found destitute, its ordainer be commanded to repair it, because we know it to have been established by ancient tradition that a third part of all things be received by the Bishops."

But if he himself, detained by disease or occupied in another manner, cannot perform the office of visitor, it must be entrusted to another, Cause 10, question 1, canon 11: "The Bishop ought to go through all his dioceses and parishes every year, so that he may inquire what each basilica needs for its repair. But if he himself, detained by illness or entangled in other occupations, shall be unable to discharge this, let him send approved priests or deacons to inquire into the revenues and repairs of the basilicas and the life of those who minister."

The Council of Aquileia urged the same severely.

§ 4. Visitation was judged so necessary that the canons wish no one to be excepted and have cut off all exemptions, evasions, and appeals. Thus the Council of Trent, Session 24, chapter 8 and the following chapters. That right is extended to all monasteries, provided that they are not visited by their own Prelates. Thus also the old law, Cause 18, question 2, canon 28. Nor is prescription admitted, as in the Second Council of Ravenna under Clement V, rubric 8: "Likewise we establish and, by the authority of the same Council, prohibit that any religious or secular persons of the aforesaid province of Ravenna, under pretext or by occasion of lapse of time, desuetude, or prescription, dare or presume to resist or contradict their Ordinaries and Prelates when they visit or wish to visit. Otherwise, beyond the punishments established by law, by authority of the present Council we pronounce sentences of excommunication against the persons who contradict and those who knowingly favor them, but sentences of interdict against the Churches."

Deservedly so; for every soul ought to be subject to the authorities, nor has anything shattered the morals of the Church more than exemptions. But by common law after the Council of Trent, all Bishops are Pontifical Legates as regards visitation. Therefore all statutes, agreements, and ordinances contrary to this right of visiting, correcting, and punishing are unlawful in whatever manner; they can neither admit nor exact them, and if they have been made they must be remitted by both sides, because they are bonds of impiety by which unpunished license is sought. Consult also the Council of Trent, Session 14, chapter 2. Indeed, the Synod ought to rouse a negligent Bishop.

§ 5. The disadvantages of visitation are excessive rigor and the expense of those who are visited. As regards each, the Council of Trent requires rigor tempered by mercy and moderation of expenses.

Session 24, chapter 3: "But let the principal object of all these visitations be to introduce sound and orthodox doctrine after heresies have been expelled; to protect good morals and correct wicked ones; to incite the people by exhortations and admonitions toward religion, peace, and innocence; and to establish other things, according as place, time, and occasion permit, by the prudence of those visiting, for the benefit of the faithful. So that these things may succeed more readily and happily, all and each of the aforesaid to whom visitation pertains are admonished to embrace all with paternal charity and Christian zeal; and therefore, content with a modest retinue of horses and servants, let them strive to complete the visitation itself as quickly as possible, yet with due diligence. Meanwhile, let them take care not to be troublesome or burdensome to anyone by useless expenses; and let neither they nor anyone of theirs accept, by reason of procuration for a visitation, including the visitation of testaments for pious uses, anything beyond that which is owed by law from pious legacies, or under any other name whatsoever--neither money nor any gift, whatever it may be, even however it may be offered--notwithstanding any custom, even immemorial; only provisions are excepted, which shall be supplied frugally and moderately to themselves and their people merely for the necessity of the time, and no further."

Concerning expense, provision has also been made by many canons. The Council of Valencia under Leo IV, chapter 17: "Let the visitation itself of the peoples and parochial priests be made so moderately, and so far as can be done according to canonical institution, that it may be manifest that, whether by us or by our men, only gains of souls are sought there and that no one is burdened and saddened by importunity and excess, lest the word of the Lord and doctrine be blasphemed." It has pleased us; it is confirmed. But this was expressed particularly against expenses in the Lateran Council under Alexander III, chapter 4: "Since the Apostle decreed that he and his men were to be maintained by their own hands, so that he might remove an opportunity for preaching from false apostles and might not be burdensome to those to whom he preached, it is recognized as exceedingly grave and worthy of correction that certain of our brethren and fellow Bishops are so burdensome to their subjects in procurations that on occasion of this kind the subjects are sometimes compelled to expose ecclesiastical ornaments for sale, and the sustenance of a long time is consumed in a brief hour. Therefore we establish that Archbishops visiting parishes, according to the diversity of provinces and the resources of the Churches, shall not exceed a number of forty or fifty mounts; Cardinals shall not exceed twenty-five; Bishops shall by no means exceed twenty or thirty; Archdeacons, five or seven; and Deans constituted under them shall be content with two horses. Nor shall they travel with hunting dogs and birds; rather, let them proceed in such a way that they may be seen to seek not their own things but those of Jesus Christ. Nor let them seek sumptuous feasts, but with thanksgiving let them receive what shall have been honorably and suitably supplied to them. We also prohibit Bishops from presuming to burden their subjects with levies and exactions."

What was said concerning feasts is also the subject of an admonition by Alexander to the Bishop of Vigevano. Nevertheless, in the appendix to the Lateran Council, necessary things are permitted: "Since the Roman Church, over which, though unworthy, we preside, is the mother and mistress of all Churches, we are compelled by the duty of the honor and government undertaken, according as the Lord shall have granted us, to respond to the consultations of each, so that doubtful questions may be unraveled by the providence of the Apostolic See. But you have asked, brother Bishop, that a response be written to your fraternity as to whether, for the consecration of Churches, you ought to have anything beyond a moderate procuration. Since the Apostle says, 'No one is compelled to serve as a soldier at his own expense,' you may exact it from that same Church." Sumptuary laws were also made for the monasteries themselves in the Council of Salzburg under Archbishop Frederick, in the time of Martin IV. It says thus: "Likewise, lest monasteries be gravely burdened by the immoderate expenses of visitors, we establish that any Abbot who for the time is a visitor or attends a general Chapter shall not exceed the number of eight mounts; but let inferior Abbots be content with fewer."

For how will they preach fasting and penance if they burden monasteries belonging to others with splendor and delicacies? For piety must not be compelled but persuaded. Nor is it to be hoped that amid the splendid banquets of Abbots the love of strict poverty and fasts will remain among the brethren when it has been shaken by the domestic example of the Prelates. The whole matter has been defined by the Tridentine Fathers, Session 24, chapter 3, to which I refer the reader.

Concerning gifts, the Council of Lyons under Gregory X had already made provision in chapter 24, and concerning revenues and procurations. But the Fifth Council of Milan and the Council of Aquileia restricted all these matters more greatly.

§ 6. Let the visitor himself be a pattern of Christian life; next let him first visit his own household and set it in order. Golden are the admonitions of the Council of Aquileia: "When a Bishop has resolved to set out upon a visitation, let him recollect himself for a little while and meditate upon the cause of his journey. For if he shall perceive in his reflection that he is undertaking to examine the life, morals, and actions of others in order to correct, amend, and restore them, he will certainly understand sufficiently that the visitation must be instituted from his own house and household, by whose example, even when silent, he will preach Christian virtues to the rest. Thus, if through negligence he shall present to others for inspection a house and household not well ordered, flowing away in idleness and levity, he will have lost the fruit of the whole visitation." Although this may seem to be proposed in a certain simple train of discourse, it nevertheless pertains to two things which are the greatest in this category.

The first is that the Bishop present himself as such a pattern of life, of service, and of the modesty of his household as the people may be able to have set before them in place of an exemplar for imitation.

The second pertains to the visitation itself. For what if the Bishop declares, preaches, and inculcates chastity, modesty, piety, and all Christian virtues, while vices, wantonness, lasciviousness, and temerity flourish in his house? But if he has corrected and well ordered his own people, he will have them all as helpers in the work of God.

Therefore the malice of certain visitors is to be detested, who, themselves avaricious and drunken, correct nothing among the people and Clergy, judging it sufficient if they scrape together money. But if the salt has lost its savor, wherewith shall it be salted?

CHAPTER XV

The Method of Visitation Prescribed in the Fourth Council of Milan

§ 1. That profit or feasting should be sought in visitation is shameful and plainly perverse; therefore the salvation of souls unto the divine glory is the object of visitation. It is astonishing that these vices have broken into the Church. There is a notable specimen from the Fourth Council of Toledo, or from the Council of Tribur, Cause 10, question 1, canon 9.

But it is too little that the vices of those conducting visitation be absent unless the morals of the Clergy and the people are corrected. For, in order that a physician be judged good, it is not enough that he himself be healthy; there is need in addition that he heal the sick person. Visitation is described in many ways by the Fourth Council of Milan, which was held by Saint Charles the Archbishop in the time of Gregory XIII, in the year 1573. I have judged it worthwhile to reproduce this so that Prelates may adapt it to their own dioceses according to that model, with certain things removed, added, or changed according to the diversity of times, places, and affairs. This is the order of visitation.

§ 2. Let the Bishops of our province so solicitously discharge that necessary and plainly obligatory office of visitation which must be performed under the Tridentine decree that each of them personally complete the visitation of his city and diocese every year, or, if they cannot do so because of the extent of the diocese, within two years at most. But if, impeded by a lawful occupation or cause, they are sometimes unable to discharge that office personally, let them employ Vicars General or other visitors experienced and suitable in the practice of this matter, who may diligently perform the office of visitation at the prescribed time, as is fitting.

But when they personally discharge the office of visitation, let them employ with them in that care of visiting either one or two Canons or any other ecclesiastical men whom they shall judge will be useful and an aid to them, according as they prefer.

Henceforth let them lead with them in visitation no more than ten men and seven beasts of burden at most, with the person of the Bishop and of that ecclesiastical man whom each Bishop shall sometimes send ahead under the decree of this Council also counted in that number. Nevertheless, it shall be lawful for them to hire more at their own expense. But those who are of a rank inferior to Bishops shall employ far fewer men and beasts of burden in visitation.

And by this decree let derogation be made from the other decree issued in the First Provincial Council.

Let all avoid the lodging of laymen, and much more their banquets, as far as they possibly can. But if it should at some time be necessary to turn aside to them, while they observe the other rules, let them take care above all that nothing whatever be prepared or set before them by their hosts beyond the measure of the Episcopal and clerical table and the rules prescribed for visitation.

Let neither the notary nor the Chancellor exact anything for the visitation from those who are visited under any name whatsoever, nor accept any kind of gift, even a small one offered in any manner. Nor likewise shall he exact anything for the execution or writing of decrees or ordinances composed in the visitation, or for a copy of them issued at the visitor’s command even to individual Churches, Clerics, or others who are visited. But for the work or labor which he shall expend in writing copies of them at another subsequent time at the request of another person whose interest it is, it is lawful for him to receive payment according to the rate fixed or to be fixed in the Episcopal court.

Bishops, who ought to go before others by every example of acting well and holily, before they enter upon the visitation of the Clergy and the people, will usefully make the beginning of visitation from themselves and their own household, so that all the rest, incited by the conduct and execution of that domestic visitation, may execute more readily and studiously the pastoral commands which the Bishops themselves shall prescribe in the course of visitation.

But let them employ every diligence in visitation, not only in preserving or increasing the worship and ornament of the Churches, but especially in restoring the ancient Christian discipline of both the Clergy and the people in every respect, and likewise in learning the morals of each and correcting them when corrupted. And in that visitation or correction of morals, acting also as delegates of the Apostolic See by authority of the Council of Trent, let them establish, regulate, punish, and execute according to the prescription of the sacred canons whatever shall seem necessary to them in their prudence for the correction of their subjects and the utility of their diocese. Nor let any inhibition, appeal, or anything else impede or delay the execution of those things which they themselves shall have commanded, judged, or decreed.

CHAPTER XVI

The Offenses of Clerics Are to Be Punished More Severely Than Those of Laymen

§ 1. Visitation has two purposes: namely, to correct sins committed and to forestall those which will follow. We must now speak concerning correction or punishment, which ought to be more severe in the sins of Clerics.

Nor does canon 77 of the Council of Nicaea oppose this; in it a Bishop discovered in adultery is deposed forever, yet is not deprived of communion, which is also established in canon 25 of the Apostles. The reason assigned is that the consideration of the sin of a priest and of a layman is not the same. For the sin of a priest is not said to be lighter, but a different consideration is regarded if you consider the punishment. For a Bishop to be deprived forever of office and dignity is a great punishment; therefore the canons were content with it, as Saint Basil teaches. The excommunication of laymen requires penance, upon whose completion they are restored to their order in the fellowship of the Church. But if Clerics are discovered in adultery, they cannot be restored, distinction 50, Si quis. For a Cleric convicted of adultery is shut up in a monastery for the whole period of his life, distinction 51, Si quis Clericus. Therefore, if we consider the matter, the punishment of the Cleric is more severe because it is perpetual, while that of the layman is temporary. So too in the First Roman Council held by Cornelius in the cause of the Lapsed. For it was established that priests, after penance and satisfaction, should be received into the Church, but altogether abstain from priestly functions.

Cyprian, Epistle 67 and Epistle 52: “For concerning Trophimus also, about whom you desired information, the matter is not as rumor and the falsehood of the malicious reported it to you. For, as our predecessors frequently did, our dearest brother Cornelius yielded to necessity for the gathering of our brethren; and since the greatest part of the people had departed with Trophimus, when Trophimus now returned to the Church, made satisfaction, confessed his former error with penitent entreaty, and recalled with full humility and satisfaction the brotherhood which he had recently drawn away, his prayers were heard; and not so much Trophimus as the very great number of brethren who had been with Trophimus was admitted into the Church of the Lord. None of these would have returned to the Church unless they had come with Trophimus accompanying them. Therefore, after deliberation was held there with very many colleagues, Trophimus was received, for whom the return of the brethren and the restored salvation of many made satisfaction. Trophimus was nevertheless admitted in such a way that he communicates as a layman, not according to what the letters of the malicious reported to you, as though he usurped the place of a priest.”

The same, Epistle 68: “In vain do such men attempt to usurp the Episcopate for themselves, since it is manifest that men of this sort can neither preside over the Church of Christ nor ought to offer sacrifices to God. Especially since long ago, together with us and with all the Bishops constituted throughout the whole world, Cornelius also--our colleague, a peaceful and just priest and honored by the Lord’s condescension even with martyrdom--decreed that men of this kind can indeed be admitted to perform penance, but must be prohibited from ordination into the Clergy and from priestly honor.”

And Stephen, in Eusebius, concerning the Bishops who ordained Novatian, says that he received one into lay communion. In the same manner the Council of Sardica, canon 1, the Council of Agde, canon 33, and the First Council of Toledo, canon 4: “After abstaining for two years, let the subdeacon afterwards communicate among the laymen, reconciled through penance.” Therefore they performed a penance more severe than laymen and thereafter forever lacked the fruit and honor of orders. They were not excommunicated, lest the punishment be threefold more severe.

§ 2. A Cleric who sins ought never to go unpunished, nor should dissimulation be employed, which frequently has place among laymen. For the wicked are to be tolerated in the Church because they exercise the good, and through the wicked the good are aroused toward better things. But the sins of Clerics seduce the good and harden the wicked, and therefore must never be tolerated. The sins of a multitude or of a depraved custom are to be rebuked neither harshly, severely, nor imperiously, because whatever is sinned by many is great. But Clerics are few in comparison with the rest of the multitude; therefore they can be punished very readily, provided that gentleness and the good of the Church, not a display of power, prevail in punishment.

The laws also dissemble many sins of laymen which they punish sharply in Clerics. Concerning wicked laymen it is rightly said that they are to be tolerated and associated with so long as correction of them is not despaired of, Cause 23, question 4, canon 1: "The wicked indeed are to be tolerated for the sake of peace, nor should there be a bodily departure from them; but to go out spiritually is to do what pertains to the correction of the wicked, so far as is lawful according to each person's rank. To be displeased while peace is preserved is not to touch. For the Prophets who said these things did not abandon their people, but dwelt among those whom they rebuked; they entered one temple with them and celebrated the same sacraments. This is to go out: not to spare with the mouth. This is not to touch the unclean thing: not to consent with the will."

But this has no place in a Cleric, because he ought to correct others by word and example.

§ 3. The sins of priests deserve a more severe punishment because they offend more persons. Therefore they are to be punished more severely. For superiors are truly bound to give examples to inferiors. Cause 8, question 1, Qualis; Cause 12, question 1, Nolo. The threat is severe but nevertheless true, Cause 11, question 3, canon 3: "Above all, avoid communion with your concubine Gualdrada, long since repudiated by you; for she is excommunicated and separated from every fellowship of Christians until our presence. Therefore care must be taken lest you be struck together with her by the equal edge of the sentence and, bound and fettered by passion for one little woman, be drawn to perpetual destruction. For Prelates sin worse in the eyes of God and thereby are themselves punished more cruelly than others, as Blessed Gregory says. For Prelates ought to know that if they ever perpetrate perverse things, they are worthy of as many deaths as the examples of perdition which they transmit to their subjects. Hence it is necessary that they guard themselves from fault so much the more cautiously inasmuch as, through the wicked things which they do, they do not die alone. Moreover, take care lest at some time, according to the Lord's command, we employ two or three witnesses against you--indeed, lest we tell it to the holy Church, and, what we do not wish, henceforth you become to all as a heathen and a publican." The laws inculcate the same in Cause 2, question 7, Paulus, and distinction 93.

§ 4. Because they have professed a better life and are honored as magnates, they therefore forcibly extend their fault into an example, distinction 83: "For no one harms the Church more than one who, while acting perversely, possesses the name or order of holiness. For no one presumes to rebuke such an offender, and his fault is vehemently extended into an example when, out of reverence for his order, the sinner is honored." Therefore a Bishop who does not correct the crimes of such men should be called an impudent dog rather than a Bishop.

What wonder is it, therefore, if he is punished more severely, when his sin is more severe? Thus Cause 17, question 1: "Those who perform good things, if they resolve to perform better ones and after resolving do not perform them, although they persevere in their former good things, have nevertheless fallen in the sight of God by their resolve." Likewise a little above: "There are those who resolve to abandon all things, submit themselves to God's service, and restrain themselves by the bridle of chastity; but when they perceive that others have fallen after adopting chastity, by drawing themselves back they lose their merit."

§ 5. Because knowledge, instruction, and grace are greater in them. Cause 6, question 1, canon 21: "I ask, therefore, who sins more gravely: one who unknowingly has fallen into heresy, or one who knowingly has not withdrawn from avarice, that is, idolatry? According indeed to that rule by which the sins of those who know are placed before the sins of the ignorant, the avaricious man lives knowingly in crime. But lest perhaps this be so, the magnitude of the crime itself produces in heresy what the admission of knowledge produces in avarice, so that the heretic who does not know is equated with the avaricious man who knows." Likewise canon 20 of the same book: "But whether we ought to prefer a Catholic of the worst morals to some heretic in whose life men find nothing to rebuke apart from the fact that he is a heretic, I do not dare to precipitate a judgment." Thus Augustine.

But from him to whom more has been given, more will be required.

§ 6. The canons ordinarily punish the sins of priests more severely. For in most cases he is deposed from office, distinction 50, canon 7: "If a Bishop, priest, or deacon has committed a capital crime, falsified a document, or uttered false testimony, let him, deposed from the honor of office, be thrust into a monastery and there, for as long as he lives, receive only lay communion."

Nevertheless, by authority of several canons in distinction 50, those who are truly penitent are restored to their former rank. Those do not reconcile these canons sufficiently who judge that the truly penitent can be restored, while those who feign falsely cannot be restored. For the canons speak concerning the truly penitent. It must therefore be said: first, that this is the law--that they ought not be restored, and however much the Church sees their long-lasting and most humble penance, she is nevertheless not bound to restore them to their former honors. And this is for the reason that they not feign penance in hope of restoration. Second, that in public and detestable sins which produce vehement infamy, while the infamy remains they are not to be restored. Such are heresy, apostasy, homicide, and adultery. Thus canon 34, distinction 50: "But it has seemed good to us that something be written concerning those who, possessing sacred orders, confess that before or after ordination they were contaminated by capital crimes. In these, as it seems to me, this distinction ought to exist: those who have been detected or publicly caught in perjury, theft, fornication, and other crimes of this kind, according to the institutions of the sacred canons, should fall from their own rank, because it is a scandal to the people of God to have placed above them persons who are known to be vicious beyond measure. For men are thereby drawn away from the sacrifice of God--as they are read formerly to have done when the sons of Eli sinned--and, becoming rebellious and contrary on that account, they grow daily worse through their depraved examples. But those who, by secret confession before the eyes of God and also in the presence of the priest who will enjoin penance upon them, confess the aforesaid deeds secretly committed by themselves and lament that they themselves have sinned gravely, if they shall strive to purify themselves by fasts, alms, vigils, and sacred prayers, to these, with their rank also preserved, the hope of pardon from God's mercy must be promised." Nevertheless, I do not doubt that, in the case of those crimes upon which the punishment of deposition is imposed with an annexed clause against restoration, the punishment must be observed and not removed without a lawful cause. A heretic is deposed; one teaching another faith is deposed. Concerning these there are many canons, and they are received again with the greatest difficulty. Not so others who were educated in error and, by great misfortune, lacked true teachers. One who swears is deposed if he swears by the hairs of God, thus in the decrees of Pius, canon 7, Si quis per capillos.

A perjurer is also deposed. See the appendix of the Lateran Council concerning the keeping of oaths.

A homicide, distinction 50, canon 5: even if he killed a pagan while defending himself, he is advised not to discharge the priestly office. The law commands a Bishop to perform penance for fifteen years, a priest for twelve--three of these on bread and water--and a deacon for ten, on bread and water, distinction 50, canon 41: "If anyone has committed homicide, if he is a Bishop, let him perform penance for fifteen years and be deposed; let him also end all the days of his life in pilgrimage. Let a priest perform penance for twelve years, three of these on bread and water, and let him be deposed by the sentence above. Let a deacon perform penance for ten years, three on bread and water, and let him not presume to attain the rank of any priest."

A forger is deprived of his benefice. Thus in the appendix to the Lateran Council, canon 113: "One who has forged the letters of the Pontiff must be thrust into a monastery of strict religion, despoiled of benefice and office." Thus distinction 50, Si Episcopus.

And distinction 19, canon 3, In memoriam: "If indeed--which is unbecoming--anyone, whether a priest or a deacon, by contriving some disturbance and plotting against our ministry, is convicted of having brought a false letter from the Apostolic See or something else which did not come from there, with faith preserved and humility toward the

Apostolic one intact, let the Bishop possess the power to thrust him into prison or another confinement until, by a letter or suitable legates of his party, he appeals to the Apostolic Sublimity, so that especially by its holy legation it may deign to decree what the Roman law determines should be defined concerning such men in just order, so that he may both be corrected and a limit imposed upon the rest."

A keeper of a concubine is deposed; their concubines are driven from the cities. See Binius's edition, tome 2, part 1, folio 36, column 2c. They themselves are condemned, tome 3, part 2, folio 293, column 1c and following. See also tome 4, part 2, folio 555, column 1d--e and following, and folio 234, column 1d.

A usurer is degraded, distinction 47, canons 5 and 1, whether he does it in his own name or another's. In these and similar matters punishment is not lacking for secular persons, but nevertheless no punishment is equal to that of Clerics, who are generally deposed. Deposition is indeed grave, since, being ignominious, it also takes away the means of life.

§ 7. Even lighter faults which the laws do not punish in citizens are nevertheless customarily punished gravely in Clerics, because nothing can be light in that state which is the beginning of immense evils.

Namely:

1. It is lawful for a regular advocate to accept nothing; for a secular one, many things. Cause 15, question 3, Observandum.

2. A Bishop is said to plunder when he gives nothing, Part 1, Cause 2, Si quis propter.

3. A Cleric is convicted of plundering another's goods when he is proved to retain for himself more than necessities. But laymen increase their patrimonies without reproach.

4. If a priest belongs to a college and in adversity withdraws himself from the aid of the Church, he is judged more a schismatic than a priest, Cause 3, question 1, Nulli. But flight through fear is not imputed as a fault to laymen.

5. Those who grow their hair, if they are unwilling to lay it aside, are to be shorn against their will by the Archdeacon. Who judges the hair of laymen worthy of censure?

6. It is not lawful for a Cleric to enter taverns, distinction 43, canon 3: "It is lawful for no Cleric to keep a tavern or workhouse. For if he is prohibited from entering a tavern of this kind, how much more from serving others in it? But if anyone has done some such thing, let him either cease or be deposed."

Yet secular persons are not even accused in this matter.

7. Distinction 44, canon 1 and following, Non liceat: if feasts are condemnable in laymen, how much more in Clerics.

8. Curiosity in reading philosophers and poets is punished, distinction 37, Sacerdotes.

9. It is ignominious for Clerics to abound in delicacies and preach Christ poor, distinction 35, Ecclesiae.

10. Prelates and Clerics who, after admonition, frequent the houses of women are deposed and degraded, distinction 81, Clericus. The laws punish so gravely even the cause of suspicion.

11. Gamblers, drunkards, and those given to dishonorable games are deposed, distinction 35, Episcopus.

12. A dilapidator of ecclesiastical property is deposed, Cause 10, question 2, and Cause 12, question 2, Diaconi; nor ought one deposed to live in a secular manner, but he ought to perform penance. This indeed is grave, but if the law treats one who squanders his own fruits, it decrees concerning such an offense as the civil law rarely punishes.

13. Irreverence is punished by deposition, Cause 11, question 3, Si quis.

14. A Bishop, priest, or deacon who devotes himself to gaming is to be deposed unless he ceases, distinction 35, Episcopus, and distinction 64, Clericum.

15. A Cleric who is a merchant must be shunned as a pest, distinction 83, Negotiatorem. But we readily allow others to engage in trade.

16. Hunting is prohibited to Clerics and a punishment is imposed, Decretals, Book 5, title 24, canon 1: "It is not lawful for a Bishop, priest, or deacon to possess dogs, hawks, or things of this kind for hunting. But if any person of this kind has been detained rather frequently in this pleasure, if he is a Bishop, let him be excluded from communion for three months; if a priest, for two; if a deacon, let him be suspended from every office."

And canon 2: "We forbid all servants of God hunts and woodland wanderings with dogs, and hawks or falcons."

Therefore, since either the small offenses of Clerics or those smaller than the greatest offenses are punished more gravely than those of laymen, this part of discipline must not be neglected. But where it is despised, integrity of morals cannot stand. It is not charity but weakness where wicked morals are not corrected, Cause 23, question 5, Non putes. I shall add that it is frequently ambition; for many Prelates do not correct because they fear offense, lest votes for a greater dignity be denied them because of the severity of their discipline. Indeed, many conduct themselves as though they were approvers of the vices committed by their subjects, lest they be feared as censors if they are raised to the Episcopate. In this matter a Prelate acquires certain damnation for an uncertain hope of dignity, and ordinarily God punishes so wicked a presumption with infamy and rejection.

Next, he destroys his subjects. For not to correct the wicked, but to foster them, is to kill them, Cause 23, question 5, Qui vitiis; distinction 45, Sed illud. Many also fail in their office because of reproaches. For through a false and dangerous mercy they indulge the wicked when the correction of offenders is postponed because of the harshness or flatteries of the tongue, distinction 50, Si diaconus. But a true Prelate ought not to love the praises of the wicked, because they are reproaches, nor to fear their reproaches, because they are praises. Let him hear the canons to which he swore. They say: "A Bishop who does not correct crimes is called not a Bishop but an impudent dog," distinction 73, Nemo. For it is not cruelty to punish crimes for God, but piety.

CHAPTER XVII

Common Life Contributes Very Greatly to the Good Morals of Ecclesiastics

§ 1. In the morals and discipline of the Church, antiquity must especially be regarded; for all things were more sincere the nearer they were to their beginning. The earliest Church of Christ, freshly empurpled with the blood of her Redeemer, approved common life among the Apostles, and afterwards among the faithful following the Lord's Ascension. Thus the Epistle of Clement: "To the most beloved brethren and fellow disciples dwelling at Jerusalem with our dearest brother and fellow Bishop James, Clement the Bishop: A common life, brethren, is necessary for all, and especially for those who desire to serve God blamelessly and wish to imitate the life of the Apostles and their disciples. For the common use of all things which are in this world ought to have belonged to all men; but through iniquity one said that this was his own and another that that was his, and thus division was made among mortals.

"Finally, a certain most wise man among the Greeks, knowing that these things are so, says that all things ought to be common among friends. And just as the air and the splendor of the sun cannot be divided, so, he says, the other things which were given in common in this world for all to possess ought not to be divided, but ought to be possessed in common. Hence the Lord also speaks through the Prophet, saying: 'Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity.' Retaining the custom of this practice, the Apostles and their disciples also, as was said above, led a common life together with us and with you. Hence, as you well know, the multitude of them had one heart and one soul; nor did any of them or of us say that anything among the things which he possessed was his own, but all things were common to them and to us, nor was anyone in need among us. But all who possessed houses or fields sold them and brought their prices and the remaining things which they possessed, laying them before the feet of the Apostles, as some of your number learned and saw together with us; and they were distributed to individuals according as each had need. But Ananias, a harsh man, and Sapphira his wife, who lied to the Apostles concerning the price of their fields which they had sold, were, in our presence and in the sight of all who stood around, both carried out dead from the sight of the Apostles because of their sin and the falsehood which they committed. And the other things which we learned and saw concerning such persons are worthy neither of recollection nor demonstration. Therefore we command you to beware of these things and order you to obey the doctrines and examples of the Apostles, because those who put aside their commands become not only guilty but banished. These things must not only be guarded against by you but also preached to all."

That the Epistle is authentic we are taught by Eusebius, History, Book 3, chapter 32; Jerome, in the Catalogue and in his commentary on Isaiah 55, chapter 10; and Epiphanius, Heresy 30. And that custom long existed at Jerusalem.

§ 2. Urban I afterwards testifies that the possessions of the faithful were conveyed to the Church so that they might live from the estates themselves. Thus the Epistle: "Therefore the chief priests and the others, and the Levites and the rest of the faithful, seeing that they could confer more utility if they handed over the inheritances and fields which they used to sell to the Churches over which Bishops presided, because from their revenues many more and finer things could be supplied, both in present and future times, to the faithful who led a common life of faith than from their price, began to hand over to the mother Churches the estates and fields which they used to sell and to live from their revenues. But these properties were, and remain even until now, under the jurisdiction of the Bishops of the individual parishes, who hold the place of the Apostles, and they ought always to remain so in future times. From these the Bishops and their faithful stewards ought to supply all necessities, as best they can, to all who wish to live a common life, so that no one among them may be found in need. For these properties are called the offerings of the faithful because they are offered to the Lord. Therefore they ought not to be converted to uses other than ecclesiastical ones and those of the aforesaid Christian brethren or the needy, because they are the vows of the faithful, the prices of sins, and the patrimonies of the poor, and were handed over to the Lord for fulfilling the aforesaid work."

§ 3. Hence Jerome admonishes that Clerics possess nothing of their own, in the Epistle to Nepotian, Cause 12, question 1, canon 5: "Let the Cleric who serves the Church of Christ first interpret his own designation, and, after the definition of the name has been set forth, let him strive to be what he is called. For if κλῆρος is called lot in Latin, Clerics are therefore so called either because they are of the lot of the Lord or because the Lord is the lot, that is, the portion, of Clerics. But he who either is himself the Lord's portion or has the Lord as his portion ought to show himself such that he himself possesses the Lord and is possessed by the Lord.

"He who possesses the Lord and says with the Prophet, 'The Lord is my portion,' can possess nothing outside the Lord. But if he possesses anything else besides the Lord, the Lord will not be his portion--for example, if gold, silver, estates, or varied furnishings; together with these portions, the Lord does not deign to become his portion. But if I am the Lord's portion and the cord of his inheritance, I do not receive a portion among the other tribes; rather, like a Levite and priest, I live from the tithes and, serving the altar, am sustained by the altar's offering. Having food and clothing, I shall be content with these, and naked I shall follow the naked Cross."

And Gregory, to Augustine, Bishop of the English, responses 1 and 2: "Your Fraternity, instructed in the rules of a monastery, ought not to be separated from your Clerics in the Church of the English, which has recently been brought to the faith by God's authorship. You ought to institute that manner of life which existed among our Fathers at the beginning of the nascent Church, among whom none said that anything among the things which he possessed was his own, but all things there were common."

§ 4. Saint Augustine and Ambrose attempted to restore the common manner of life of Clerics, as is clear in their lives and books. Augustine shows the great utility of that matter in his book On the Common Life of Clerics. Mark instituted all the Christians of Alexandria in this manner, as Jerome testifies in On Ecclesiastical Writers, under Mark. Nevertheless, that same Augustine permitted his Clerics to live from their own property. "Because," he says, "I preferred to have them blind and lame rather than dead." For he who is a hypocrite is dead, and there was great danger from hypocrisy for those who lived a social life with Augustine unwillingly. Therefore he removed from them the necessity of pretending.

§ 5. Since, therefore, Clerics are permitted to possess property of their own and to dwell privately in their own houses or in the common fellowship of several persons, I judge this second manner more useful to the Church and to morals. Therefore labor must be expended so that, as far as it can be done, Ecclesiastics dwell together. That which the holiest men in the Church always both desired and did must also be done now. Therefore statutes which impede the common habitation of Clerics are contrary to common law and thus void by the law itself. Nor can any be compelled to dwell alone in their own house, to maintain a hearth, and to be administrators of their own household; rather, they can dwell near their Church with any honorable ecclesiastical man, with colleagues, or with Prelates, unless the necessity of separation is evidently shown. Concerning boys and adolescents it was established in the Council of Aachen, chapter 135. But the causes have force at every age; thus the Council judged: "The rulers of Churches ought vigilantly to keep watch that boys and adolescents who are maintained or instructed in the congregation committed to them be so corrected by continual ecclesiastical disciplines that their wanton age, very prone to sinning, can find no place in which it may rush into the commission of sin. Therefore, for guarding and spiritually instructing those of this kind, the Prelates must appoint a brother of approved life who may exercise care of them with the greatest industry and restrain them very strictly, in such manner that, imbued with ecclesiastical doctrines and clothed in spiritual arms, they may both serve the utilities of the Church and sometime be worthily promoted to ecclesiastical grades. Furthermore, for suitable edification and instruction in the matter which is treated, it has pleased us to insert into this work a certain judgment of the holy Fathers, which reads as follows: Every age from adolescence onward is prone to evil. Nothing is more uncertain than the life of adolescents. On this account it was necessary to establish that, if anyone in the Clergy is a boy, or if there are adolescents, they all dwell in one chamber of the court, so that they may pass the years of slippery age not in luxury but in ecclesiastical disciplines, assigned to a most approved elder whom they may have both as master of doctrine and witness of life, and so forth. With these things thus premised, boys ought to be assigned to a most approved elder for custody, although they may be instructed by another. But if the brother to whom this care is entrusted esteems their care lightly, teaches something other than what he ought, or inflicts upon them in any respect the stain of any injury whatsoever, let him, most severely rebuked, be removed from office, and let it be entrusted to another brother who may both form them by examples of innocent life and incite them to accomplish good work."

§ 6. And so that I may touch the matter more closely, I shall speak about Canons and their Vicars, although formerly there were no Vicars in the manner in which they now exist. It would be expedient, and altogether to the greater glory of God, for Canons, with whatever splendor of birth or dignities they may shine, to perform all the divine offices and worship God with their whole heart and inward humility, whom God deigns to preserve and maintain so splendidly in his Church. Nevertheless, I should wish either all or several of them to dwell together, take food together, read, and converse. For this was their original institution. Read chapter 117 of the Council of Aachen under Stephen V, in the time of Louis the Pious: "It is the duty of Provosts continually to fortify the minds of their subjects with readings from the holy Scriptures, lest the invisible wolf find an entrance by which he may enter the Lord's sheepfold and be able to carry off one of the sheep. And although this ought to be done by them spiritually with the greatest urgency, it is nevertheless necessary that they surround on every side with firm defenses the cloisters in which the Clergy committed to them must live canonically, so that there may be no entrance at all for anyone to enter or depart except through the gate. Let there also be within dormitories, refectories, storerooms, and the other dwellings necessary for the uses of brethren living in one fellowship. But he who refuses to do these permitted things according as ability suffices is to be held unequal and insufficiently suitable for performing the other ecclesiastical offices. And although he is worthy of divine vengeance, he must nevertheless be struck by a synodal sentence."

Behold, the Council confirms not only the union of the Canons but the fortification of the cloisters; and lest you suspect that they are monks, in chapter 115 and chapter 125 it distinguishes them from monks.

For they were not monks, since they are expressly prohibited from putting on monastic clothing unless they also wish to assume the profession of monks. Therefore I am not writing a new counsel, but pointing my finger toward ancient and more approved things.

§ 7. The mutual cohabitation of Canons is most useful for the study of letters and divine matters. For they can both possess a Library in the same place, and then consult one another, inquire, dispute, and employ all the exercises of the disciplines in most pleasant fellowship. The progress of some incites others, charity advances them, and learning perfects them. For we have hitherto seen no persons whom solitary studies have brought to the height of learning. Learning requires varied agitation, the judgments of many, and disputation; therefore it is a public affair, and the more it is in public, the more it flourishes and thrives.

What I say concerning the more liberal studies or those of philosophy and other sciences, I affirm likewise concerning wisdom, prudence, and affability in conduct; for the principal fruit of this exists in fellowship with many. For just as metals become bright by mutual friction, so the human mind, while it is solitary or lives with only one or another person, grows sluggish in some manner and contracts rust; while it is exercised in the fellowship of many, sees many things, and hears more, it is wonderfully polished toward prudence and familiarity and affability in living. This will be most useful if the younger are given into companionship with the mature and the aged, as I should wish. Seneca truly says in Epistle 11: "Among all fellowships none is more excellent, none more firm, than when good men, similar in morals, are joined by familiarity."

§ 8. This one advantage alone outweighs all the disadvantages which can be imagined in fellowship: suspicions arising from hazardous cohabitation, true dangers and occasions of sinning, and sins themselves are avoided.

The Church laments the falls of very many; good men are ashamed of the relatives of very many; and heresy is strengthened and increased by the scandals of very many, for no other cause than that companionship, lodging, and association offered an occasion of sinning together with hope of concealment. Occasion possesses great power, which suddenly casts down well-ordered minds and entangles them before the danger is perceived. Formerly certain Provosts gathered several Canons, seeking empty glory from men so that they might appear to possess a numerous congregation of Clergy, for whom they cared to provide neither consolations of body nor of soul, as the Council of Aachen complains. What followed from this? It is explained in the same Council, chapter 118: "For those gathered in this manner, when they do not receive necessary stipends from their Prelates, neither preserve the canonical order nor apply themselves to the divine offices; abandoning the cloisters and the fellowship of the rest, they become wandering and lascivious, given to gluttony, drunkenness, and their other pleasures, and make lawful whatever has pleased them." The cause of such great evils was that they abandoned the cloisters and fellowship. What, then, is now to be hoped concerning Clerics who do not preserve the canonical order, do not apply themselves to the divine offices, live outside the fellowship of the good with wicked or suspect persons, and receive immense revenues from the Church, which some most vainly believe they merit by one little walk? The ruin of many bears witness to how great incitements to crimes solitude, riches, and idleness provide them. They would remove all these occasions if they procured food and habitation for themselves with some one of the Prelates or more mature fellow brethren. For I urge this: if many do not yet consent to assemble into one or another house, let at least some do so--three or four Canons and as many Vicars; let their zeal be commended and let the Prelates approve it. Let every Cleric have a Cleric as witness of his life.

§ 9. I have spoken of the danger in the promiscuous habitation of Clerics and laymen, because they have no witnesses of their life except at the time when they assemble in the Church. Saint Charles Borromeo and the First Council of Milan agreed with me in this, and from that judgment he gave good laws concerning clerical houses: "Since it is necessary not only to avoid evil but also to flee every suspicion of evil, lest we fall into offense for anyone, we prohibit any women whatsoever, even those joined by any bond of blood relationship or affinity, from dwelling in houses built for the residence and use of Canons or other Clerics, or in other houses in which they dwell, unless the Bishop shall have declared in some case of urgent necessity that it must be done otherwise; we burden his conscience greatly in this matter.

"Let neither parish priests nor Clerics generally, even those endowed with any dignity, in any manner lease to a layman the houses of a Church--even a commended one--or parts of them situated in a city or towns, in which they themselves are accustomed or bound to dwell, unless the Church is pressed by great poverty and that house can conveniently be divided in the Bishop's judgment.

"But if the houses are situated in the country outside the city and towns, let them possess the faculty of leasing them, provided that their division can be made rightly and conveniently in the judgment of the same Bishop.

"Let the Bishop also take care that houses of this kind, either in the city or outside it, or other houses separated from the Church, even if they are patrimonial and privately owned, not be leased to those whose faith, life, or morals he has judged to be suspect."

§ 10. There is no one who does not understand how honorable it is for a younger Canon to live with his Prelates and the most distinguished men of his Church and to have present one whom he reveres. Indeed, we value highly certain men whose virtue is unknown to us for this reason, that they associate with the good. Indeed, if they have contracted some stain, it is worn away and washed out by companionship and familiarity with grave men. Nothing recalls dishonorable minds inclined toward wickedness to what is right more than intercourse with good men. For to be frequently seen and frequently heard descends gradually into the breasts and obtains the force of a precept. For when among them there are pious, honorable, and learned conversations, ingenuous recreations, and even games and relaxations of minds that are cheerfully conducted with maturity and liberal jests, not dissolute, the mind drinks in these things in such a manner that it passes wholly into honorable conduct. It has a witness of its life, retains modesty, and soon becomes itself worthy of reverence to others.

It is indeed becoming both to the dignity of Prelates and to the venerable gray hair of the aged to draw a company of younger men or even brethren of their own age; to live publicly and have witnesses of all their acts, words, and indeed proceedings; and to possess such a reputation that every most honorable man desires his intercourse and familiarity. It is not unworthy of a Prelate to have Clerics of the Church, whom he has been accustomed to call fellow brethren, as his companions at table. For he opens his house not from desire for gain but from love of discipline, as a refuge for those who would otherwise be in danger and a school for studies and virtues for those who would otherwise make less progress. The First Council of Milan, section On the Bishop's Household: "But we vehemently exhort him to have as many Clerics as possible in his household, who use only clerical dress, and among them, if it can conveniently be done, namely two initiated into sacred orders and of good reputation, who may more studiously attend the Bishop while he keeps vigil, prays, applies himself to works of mercy, and searches the mysteries of divine letters, and may be, as it were, witnesses and imitators of his actions and holy conduct. Let him then possess an ecclesiastical person, proven and approved, who is placed over the morals of the household and solicitous for the salvation of all, who may sustain spiritual life and take care that it is instructed in good and pious arts, and especially sacred letters, according to the sense and intelligence of each."

If a multitude of Clerics is an honor of a Bishop, why is it not so in Germany for Prelates or distinguished Canons?

§ 11. But all colleagues ought to favor this matter, for both a good name is thereby acquired for the Church and there will be greater attendance at the divine offices. For if ten others dwell with some Canon, while present they will observe the diligence of others and will not readily remain at home or take themselves elsewhere. For modesty causes them to offend rarely; rare offending introduces the practice of virtue, because a rare evil exists only together with a dense good. Never will all ten remain away at once, both because we suppose them to be good and because they will never all conspire in culpable negligence. Indeed, the father of a household of so honorable a fellowship will not bear with equanimity the sloth of those whom he has as members of his household. Those evils and dangers which wholly call men away from the divine offices will also be absent.

§ 12. How much will be subtracted from expenses will be felt especially by those who are willing to give themselves to a common life. One fire will burn in place of ten; there will be no need to maintain furnishings, repairs of roofs, or services of attendants that are either perilous to chastity or unfaithful to patrimonies; no expenses of banquets or contracts. Yet there will be no need to abandon hospitality, for it will be common, and individuals will be able to contribute more to guests than all do now.

But lest this matter be called into doubt, I assert that by the theft and malice of their household the wealthier Canons now lose more than they would expend upon a year's sustenance if several wished to dwell together. But what, you will say, will become of that priestly opulence? I reply that riches must be restored to Christ. It is a good deed to live sparingly so that you may feed the poor liberally. He who denies that this pertains to his dignity considers it equitable that, while Christ hungers, he himself should live sumptuously.

§ 13. Finally, necessity itself counsels this union of several persons, so that when sick and dying they may furnish consolations to one another. For harsh indeed is the condition of those who when sick scarcely have faithful aids and whose property is seized amid their very funerals. It is certain that this has sometimes happened not only to Canons but to Bishops and Cardinals.

Therefore it would be prudent to assist by expense, privilege, and favor those who wish either to admit their fellow brethren in collegiate Churches to their table at a fair price or to be companions at the table of others.

And more spacious houses and gardens could be granted for this end.

But where it can be done, this must be effected: either that most dwell together or certainly that no one dwell among secular persons.

Nor does anything prevent the establishment of a rule that all who are not members of Chapters and are not occupied in studies should not freely and at their own discretion choose lodgings for themselves, but by a capitular statute should be commanded to dwell with some grave man of their own or another Church and to bring an attestation of their life when they are to be admitted to the Chapter.

But by judgment of the Chapter or Bishop prudent and grave men of good example could be designated. For when their studies have been completed or broken off, younger Canons readily go astray in the highest liberty.

And I judge that this must gradually be introduced not only among the younger but even among those more advanced in age, although they have been admitted to the senate or Chapter. The reins must be placed upon license by a salutary decree. For what burden would there be if such a statute were made? “Since, alas, the falls of many have taught us that in promiscuous habitation with secular persons there are great dangers and that many young men and men of good purpose have been drawn from piety by evil association, the Chapter, wishing by virtue of its office to provide for the salvation of all and each, establishes that the following be inviolably observed.

“First, younger Canons who devote themselves to studies, whether they do so in the city of their residence or in distant Academies, shall take lodging only with the consent and approval of the Scholasticus and shall change it if it shall seem good to him, knowing for certain that throughout the whole time the fruits will be denied to those who have not obeyed, as though they were suspended. But the Scholasticus shall establish that they lodge only with parents or guardians, in seminaries, or with an Ecclesiastic of exemplary life and a modest household, who shall also be bound to render an account to the Chapter concerning their domestic conduct. But if they wish to dwell with honorable and pious citizens, this shall not be permitted without the consent of the Chapter. The same is established concerning those who do not devote themselves to studies and yet are not in the Chapter, whom we altogether wish to dwell near the church with their fellow brethren. Finally, we have judged the same concerning all who are under twenty years old, whom it is fitting to make progress in piety by the example of the aged and not to be occupied by the care of domestic affairs.”

If these or similar things, whether stricter or more lenient, are introduced gradually, reformation will follow of its own accord without labor.

I shall speak concerning parish priests in a particular place.

CHAPTER XVIII

Chapters Were Instituted for the Sake of Discipline, and Their Constitution

§ 1. I call a Chapter a select senate of the Church congregated by law and in order. It is of two kinds: the Cathedral Chapter and that of private Churches, for we are not now treating the Chapters of religious.

§ 2. The name of Chapter flowed from the Chapters of religious. For since there were religious in most Churches where Clerics or Canons now dwell, it thereby came about that, after they were changed into Canons, they retained certain names and ceremonies of religious. Nevertheless, the institution is most ancient; for formerly Bishops deliberated upon difficult affairs with their brethren, that is, with the council of priests, and executed them by their counsel. Thus we possess the Apostolic norm. For the Apostles were in the place of Bishops, while the presbyters were in the place of priests. There were then presbyters or elders who sit in council with the Apostles in Acts 5: "The Apostles and elders assembled to consider this word." Likewise, not only the Apostles but also the elders write to the Antiochenes. Jerome also relates that the Churches were governed by the common counsel of the presbyters; nevertheless, after schisms arose, the presbyters were only assessors of the Bishops. Yet the Bishops were judges of the presbyters. Thus 1 Timothy 5: "Do not receive an accusation against a presbyter except under two or three witnesses." A presbyter could therefore be accused before the Bishop; the Bishop was therefore the judge of the presbyter. Chapters, then, reproduce for us this council of presbyters, although not all their members are priests. In this matter practice has indeed prevailed contrary to the ancient canons, so that even subdeacons and deacons are equated with priests as regards government, and Archdeacons also frequently exercise power over priests.

§ 3. The authority of Chapters, especially Cathedral Chapters, is now great in the Church, and it is useful and preservative of Churches. For Chapters keep watch over discipline when the absence, negligence, occupation, or health of Bishops cannot care for it. The Second Council of Cologne, celebrated in the year 1536, admonishes in chapter 14, part 3: "Let the Chapters of discipline, as they call them, be observed with much greater diligence than hitherto. This shall be done if not so much profane as sacred matters are treated in them; if inquiry is made concerning morals; if the life of each is examined; and if, as the holy Fathers are known formerly to have done, the brethren are sometimes admonished by an occasional address. And above all, let them be incited to undertake sacred letters and to place their best hours in them; let them be stirred by the fact that here is found the gushing fountain of life, from which he who drinks will not thirst forever; here is hidden the Gospel treasure for whose sake one ought to sell all things, from which that prudent father of a household brings forth new things and old."

Concerning the Chapters of monks, the Council of Augsburg, celebrated in the year 1548, chapter 12, speaks in the same manner: "We command that monasteries of every Order be reformed according to the Rules which they have professed; that the monks themselves be contained in obedience and the religion of their Order; that the Chapter of discipline be held frequently; that vices daily springing up there be corrected severely; that divine worship be observed reverently and duly; that keepers of concubines, adulterers, drunkards, criminals, infamous persons, and those suspected of heresy or other crimes be chastised with due punishments; that the habit and tonsure be diligently preserved; and that buildings and libraries be studiously cared for and estates, revenues, and rights preserved. We shall chastise by severe coercion and due means those who resist or are impatient of reformation."

But since it is easy to assemble when rights, revenues, and other affairs are treated, while in certain places assemblies concerning discipline were held rarely, some Churches wisely and piously established that greater regard for piety should be had in Chapters. Thus the Second Council of Milan, decree 13: "Every week let the Canons of each Church hold a Chapter in which, besides inquiry whether the decrees of the former Council concerning the divine offices are observed, and likewise whether any errors have been committed in the rite of sacred ceremonies, some portion shall then be read of those matters prescribed in our constitutions concerning the life and honorable conduct of Clerics, or of those expressed in the Roman Catechism or other books which pertain to the doctrine of Christian piety and the discipline and method of ecclesiastical life. Then let them also be occupied in other exercises of spiritual life, and all this according as shall seem good to the Bishop or the Superior of the Chapter. In this Chapter let nothing else which pertains to the care and administration of temporal affairs be treated or transacted before regard is had for that treatment which is wholly placed in spiritual affairs."

Let all Churches imitate this. For the extent of a Church, the multitude of ornaments, its rights, wealth, and nobility--all are directed to this: that piety may flourish and that the worship of the divine office may be performed with devotion and purity of minds.

§ 4. It is altogether expedient that the Bishop possess great power over the Chapter, and the Chapter in turn over the Bishop. That power is not contrary to itself, but salutary to the public good and necessary to ecclesiastical discipline. First I shall speak concerning the power of a Cathedral Chapter.

The first is that heretics can be excommunicated by it while the see is vacant. Thus the Decretals, Book 5, title 7, chapter 9: "All who do not fear to think or teach otherwise concerning the sacrament of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, or concerning baptism, the confession of sins, matrimony, or the remaining ecclesiastical sacraments, than the sacrosanct Roman Church preaches and observes--and generally all whom that same Roman Church, or individual Bishops throughout their dioceses with the counsel, if need be, of neighboring Bishops, shall have judged heretics--we bind with the bond of perpetual anathema."

The second is that they may restrain individual colleagues from sacred functions and deprive them of their fruits. Thus in all places. And beautiful is the constitution of the Synod of Cologne in the year 1549: "If the Dean perceives any to be rebellious; negligent in divine worship and their office; quarrelsome; litigious; strikers; gamblers; harborers of prostitutes; or entangled in other public crimes, and if these refuse to hear fraternal correction, let him do in these Chapters what Paul commands: 'Rebuke those who sin before all.' Then, if they are unwilling to recover their senses, let him restrain them from sacred functions and prohibit them from sharing in the fruits until they return to a better fruit of life, yet in such a way that this Apostolic rule is observed: 'Rebuke the restless, console the fainthearted, be patient toward all,' and let neither anger, hatred, nor rancor claim any part for itself. For that solicitude of superiors is useful and that caution praiseworthy in which reason does everything and fury claims nothing for itself. For anger frequently brings even the innocent into crime. For while we grow angry beyond what is just and wish to restrain the sins of others, we commit graver sins.

"Nevertheless, by these things we prejudice neither our privileges and those of the Churches of our province nor their lawful customs, and especially not the practice and custom which exists in some Churches--namely, that cases of discipline are adjudicated by the deacons--provided nevertheless that the deacons, at the Dean's demand, apply themselves gravely and vigorously to their office and fulfill it. But if the Dean and Chapter shall have been negligent or entangled in the same crimes, it will be necessary to return to the disposition of common law."

The third is that they may bind members of the Chapter by oaths to pronounce judgment faithfully and to perform other things, and especially to obey the Dean. This too is in use; but sometimes excessively many oaths are exacted, which deservedly displeased the Synod of Cologne, chapter 20: "And since Christ prohibited the faculty of swearing with such seriousness that we ought not to swear at all unless we are compelled by necessity concerning truth or something else in danger, that immoderate exaction of oaths in Chapters must be restrained. Through it, it is necessary that many fall into perilous perjuries, of which not only those who forswear themselves are guilty, but also those who provide the cause of perjury by rashly exacting it. For the word of Christ is: 'Let your word be, Yes, yes; no, no; what is more than this is from evil.' And in Ecclesiasticus we read: 'A man who swears much will be filled with iniquity, and the plague will not depart from his house.' If we judged ourselves, we would certainly not be judged."

The fourth, by which the authority of Cathedral Chapters has grown very greatly, is the power of electing Bishops and Archbishops. For since cunning men frequently crept into the Pontiff's favor, since the election of the people was tumultuous, and since Emperors sold prelacies, that power devolved upon the Chapters, which conducted elections more faithfully, sincerely, and constantly. And as the aristocrats of the Church they are accustomed to elect the high priest. I do not deny that the errors of certain Chapters were shameful when they elected a Bishop advantageous to themselves or their vices but useless or pernicious to the Church. Nor have examples of these disgraceful things been lacking in our times; yet they have been far fewer and less harmful than the ancient ones.

For all the members of a Chapter, since many good, learned, and prudent men live among them, will not readily conspire in favor of one wicked man.

Moreover, election belongs to Chapters under these laws:

1. Let the Canons elect the Prelate unless that right belongs to another.

2. Let boys and any who are not subdeacons not elect.

3. Nor let the excommunicated, suspended, heretics, or absent elect, unless there is a lawful cause of absence.

4. If they do not elect at the prescribed time and in the prescribed manner, the right of electing devolves upon the next superior.

5. If knowingly they elect an unworthy man, such as a keeper of a concubine, they lose the right of electing and it is transferred to the Pontiff.

6. Those who elect an unworthy man are incapable for three years of a passive voice, for those who elected a wicked or unworthy man ought not themselves to be elected.

7. But the one elected must possess confirmation from the Pontiff.

8. Before all things they give their vote under oath and, according to their custom in most places, after receiving the sacrament of the Eucharist.

9. Let them bind the man elected or to be elected by no promise contrary to the canons.

The fifth: they can also abolish certain prelacies, but they require confirmation of the act. Thus the Canons of Toul abolished the office of Primicerius, with the revenues distributed among the Canons. In our time they also divided certain provostships in poor Churches because they denied that they had need of a Provost.

The sixth: the Canons can establish a definite number of Canons in the Chapter, but they cannot divide or suppress prebends. When resources have increased, they can admit more Canons. But just as they cannot suppress prebends, so neither can they add new burdens, whether corporeal or pecuniary, unless they are common ones, so that the benefices of all are burdened in equal proportion; otherwise the condition of the younger members would daily be rendered worse. Concerning this matter many things are established everywhere in law, against which private law or capitular statutes effect nothing. For things established by a few to the prejudice of common law are void by the law itself.

The seventh: no one unless a subdeacon shall possess a voice or the right of voting. Thus the Council of Trent, Session 22: "Whoever, in a Cathedral or collegiate Church, secular or regular, is devoted to divine offices and is not constituted at least in the order of the subdiaconate shall not possess a voice in the Chapter in Churches of this kind, even if this has been freely granted to him by others. But those who possess, or in future will possess, dignities, personates, offices, prebends, portions, and any other benefices in the said Churches to which various burdens are annexed--namely, that some say or sing Masses, some the Gospel, and some the Epistles--with whatever privilege, exemption, prerogative, or nobility of lineage they may be distinguished, shall be bound, in the absence of a just impediment, to receive the required orders within a year. Otherwise they shall incur the penalties according to the constitution of the Council of Vienne which begins Ut ii, qui, which it renews by the present decree. And let the Bishops compel them on appointed days personally to exercise the said orders or all the other offices which they ought to perform in divine worship, under the same and other, even graver, penalties to be imposed at their discretion. Nor henceforth shall provision be made for others except those who are known already to possess the age and the other qualifications completely; otherwise let the provision be void."

Thus the statutes of all the Churches which I indeed remember, common laws, and custom confirm it.

The eighth: they can restrain depraved junior Canons from the Chapter, nor can the Bishop compel them to receive such men. The Council of Mainz, celebrated under Sebastian in the year 1549, establishes as follows:

"We perceive, not without the ruin of the Churches, that hitherto sufficiently negligent watch has been kept in Cathedral and collegiate Churches--at least in that part in which our Forefathers, not without great reason, wished younger Canons, whom they call Domicellares, not to be admitted to Chapters immediately upon receiving benefices, but to be detained for a time under the yoke of the Prelates--while those upon whom this care falls, paying little attention to the studies and morals of the Domicellares, admitted any persons whatsoever into the Chapters without further selection, provided only that the Domicellares had passed a definite time in possession of the benefice or paid the money established for emancipation, even those whom they knew to be neither sufficiently suitable by honorable conduct of life or learning nor likely to be useful to the Churches. Hence it comes about that Churches, sometimes burdened by a less useful crowd of Canons, are administered with due services neither in spiritual nor temporal matters.

"Wishing to provide for their indemnity, we have judged that the consciences of Prelates, Chapters, and others whose interest it is must be burdened, and by strict command we enjoin upon them that hereafter, not according to the alleged custom--which in this respect, as pernicious to the Churches, must be judged irrational or rather a corruption--but according to conscience, they admit only suitable and worthy persons into the Chapters, especially Metropolitan and Cathedral ones. But let them restrain those given to depraved morals and the slothful from capitular dignity and emolument until they seem by amendment of life to deserve this place; or if, stubborn against every amendment, they persevere in showing themselves incorrigible, let them altogether compel them, as incapable, insufficient, and less suitable, to resign their benefices by remedies of law. By this our constitution, we judge that occasion is afforded both to the Prelates and Chapters to keep diligent watch over their office, and to ecclesiastical youth to undertake the cultivation of life and intelligence with more accurate study."

The ninth: alienation by a Bishop without the consent of the Chapter is void. Thus the Council at Valencia and the Decretals, Book 3, title 10, chapter 1: "A donation, sale, or exchange of ecclesiastical property by Bishops shall be void without the approval and subscription of the Clerics."

The reason is lawful and arises from equity. For since ecclesiastical properties are of such a kind that by them ministers and Churches are supported, the poor and justice are defended, and the roofs of churches are restored, they ought not to be alienated without the knowledge of those whose interest it is. But the vices of many Prelates produced those laws, for they were accustomed to give the goods of the Churches to kinsmen, ministers, and flatterers or sell them for a trifling price; a Chapter cannot readily be brought to approve those matters.

The tenth: indeed, for the same reason a Prelate ought not to treat the public affairs of the Church without the counsel of the Chapter.

Alexander III established this law, Decretals, Book 3, title 10, chapter 4: “The prudence of your discretion knows how you and your brethren are one body, such that you are proved to be the head and they the members. Hence it does not become you, after omitting the members, to employ the counsel of others in the affairs of your Church, since there is no doubt that this is contrary both to your honorable character and to the institutions of the holy Fathers. For it has become known to our ears that without the counsel of your brethren you institute and remove Abbots, Abbesses, and other ecclesiastical persons”; and below: “Therefore we prohibit it by Apostolic authority”; and below: “For we decree that such institutions and removals lack the strength of firmness.”

And chapter 5: “We command your Fraternity that in concessions, confirmations, and the other affairs of your Church you seek your brethren and, with their counsel or that of the senior part, accomplish and treat them; that you establish the things which must be established, correct errors, and scatter and uproot the things which must be uprooted. Nor shall you allow the names of absent brethren to be entered, because such instruments are void and false, and on that account you can deservedly fear a charge of falsity.”

The eleventh: nor can he give other Churches to others without the consent of the Chapter. In the same place, chapter 8: “You also added the question whether it is lawful for a Bishop or Elect, together with the Archdeacon alone and apart from the assent of the greater Church--since the Bishop is elected from it and the Archdeacon is assumed from it--to confer perpetually vacant baptismal Churches upon monasteries or conventual Churches to which the right of patronage belongs”; and below: “The solution of the other question is also gathered evidently from the Epistle of Pope Leo, in which it is read: ‘Let no Bishop dare to give, exchange, or sell anything from the goods of the Church, unless perhaps he does one of these things in order to provide for better things, and, with the deliberation and consent of the whole Clergy, chooses that which is undoubtedly profitable to the Church. For a donation, sale, and exchange of ecclesiastical property by Bishops shall be void without the agreement and subscription of the Clerics.’ By this you will know that the question proposed in the second place is solved, since there is no doubt that perpetual concessions of Churches pertain to alienations.”

The twelfth: nevertheless, the Bishop’s concession is valid if the Chapter afterwards ratifies it. In the same place, chapter 3: “It is certain, by rigor of law, that the concession which it is established was made by your predecessor while the Chapter protested is not valid, unless it afterwards ratified it.”

Formerly the silence of the Chapter produced ratification, in the same place, chapter 2. Now they deservedly require from the statutes a consent that is open and consigned in writing. For good laws have arisen from evil morals.

The thirteenth: it is a privilege of Cathedral Chapters that they be admitted to provincial Synods. Thus the Decretals, Book 3, chapter 10, Provinciae Senones: “The Chapters of the Cathedral Churches have sent a complaint to us that the Archbishop of Sens and his Suffragans were unwilling to admit their procurators, recently summoned to the provincial Council, to its deliberation”; and below: “It has seemed good to us and our brethren that the Chapters themselves ought to be invited to Councils of this kind and their envoys admitted to the deliberation, especially concerning those matters which are known to affect the Chapters themselves.”

Hence, therefore, it appears that the Church is best ordered when the Bishop possesses very great power for edification, so that the whole discipline is in his hand and no one can appeal from it; but the least power for destruction--in selling, giving, or alienating rights and goods under any title, and in admitting Canons without lawful examination.

The fourteenth: in the Chapter the greater and sounder part prevails unless the lesser part contradicts it with reason. Thus the Decretals, Book 3, title 11, chapter 1: “Since in all Churches that which has seemed good to the more numerous and sounder brethren ought to be observed without hesitation, it is exceedingly grave and most worthy of rebuke that in certain Churches a few sometimes do not permit an ecclesiastical ordinance to proceed so much from reason as from their own will. Therefore by the present decree we establish that, unless something has been reasonably objected and shown by the fewer and inferior members, with appeal removed, that which has been established by the greater and sounder part of the Chapter shall always prevail and attain its effect. Nor let our constitution be impeded if perhaps someone says that he is bound by oath to preserve the custom of his Church. For those things which come against the utility of the Church and the institutions of the holy Fathers are to be called not oaths but rather perjuries. But if anyone has presumed to swear to customs of this kind, which are neither supported by reason nor congruent with sacred institutions, let him be excluded from reception of the Lord's body until he has performed worthy penance."

Therefore, if the greater part of a Chapter were to elect as Bishop an unlearned or avaricious man, a keeper of a concubine, or one infamous through another vice, the lesser part will contradict it with reason and the authority of the canons and will render the election void.

But as regards his saying that oaths are perjuries, this is the sense: to swear to that which is contrary to the canons or justice is as much a sin as perjury and must no more be observed than perjury. Therefore it would be prudent for the oaths of all Chapters to be proposed and examined in a provincial Synod and for a determination to be made concerning confirming or abolishing them, and that new ones not be imposed upon those who come without public authority. Next, mutual connivance has introduced many abuses, as concerning the distribution of revenues, which in some Churches are given in great amount to absentees, as the Council of Mainz under Sebastian complains in chapter 70: "It is a pernicious abuse, joined with shameful disgrace to the Clergy, peril to souls, and grave detriment to Churches, that in certain Cathedral and collegiate Churches the largest portion of the revenues is distributed to Canons even when they do not reside at the Churches and perform no useful or necessary ministry, while to the Vicars, who by labor by day and night sustain all the functions of the Church, there is left scarcely a meager income, which barely suffices to sustain life wretchedly. Hence we exhort the Chapters and Canons of Churches in the Lord that, mindful of equity and of the account someday to be rendered to God, from the fruits of the Churches they assign sufficient and honorable sustenance for the functions necessary to their Churches to those who perform them, lest they provide cause for necessarily disposing otherwise of the revenues of the Churches."

And indeed the Council of Trent recently, and God from eternity, disposed otherwise. This is his command: "He who does not labor, let him not eat." For this reason the treasury, the soldier, and the robber seize so many things: because sufficient labor is not yet performed for that which remains, and the smallest portion is distributed to the one who labors--not by the law of the canons, but by a depraved abuse contrary to the canons.

§ 5. The Bishop also possesses great and ordinary power over the Chapter and all members of the Chapter, and this power is Apostolic. Thus the Council of Trent, Session 6, chapter 3: "Let the Prelates of Churches prudently and diligently attend to correcting the excesses of their subjects; and let no secular Cleric, of any personate, or regular Cleric dwelling outside a monastery, be judged protected by pretext even of the privilege of his Order from being capable, if he has offended, of being visited, punished, and corrected by the Ordinary of the place, acting as a delegate of the Apostolic See in this matter, according to the canonical decrees."

And chapter 4: "The Chapters of Cathedral and other greater Churches, and their persons, shall not be able to protect themselves by any exemptions, customs, judgments, oaths, or agreements which bind only their authors and not their successors, so as to prevent them from being capable of being visited, corrected, and amended by their Bishops and other greater Prelates, either by themselves alone or with those associated whom it shall seem good to them to employ, according to the canonical decrees, as often as there shall be need, even by Apostolic authority."

Therefore no exemption can protect any member of a Chapter from correction by the Bishop; and all statutes made toward that end are void because they are contrary to law--I add, contrary to justice. For the Bishop is the Bishop of the members of the Chapter just as of the rest of the Clergy and laymen; therefore it falls upon him to employ his power over them, otherwise they would be without a spiritual head. But if perhaps they allege that they are immediately under the Pontiff alone, as many are, they are nevertheless not thus exempt from the Bishop's jurisdiction; for he is the Pontiff's Legate, against whom every exception and exemption is invalid. Therefore the Bishop is the censor of morals even in an exempt Chapter. Hence it was most rightly established in the Third Council of Milan: "So that the Bishop may more readily increase divine worship in the Church committed to him, preserve the concord and mutual charity of the Canons, and protect canonical discipline, let him strive to be present at the canonical Chapter every month, or at least frequently during the year, either in the place where it is customarily held or in another place to which he prefers to summon it to himself. But let him summon it on account of any matter for which he shall have judged it expedient. In this Chapter let him sometimes see whether those things prescribed concerning the worship of the divine offices are performed rightly, duly, in order, and with dignity."

Nor does it exempt an exempt Chapter, for it adds: "But if the Chapter is exempt, the Bishop may, under the decree of the Council of Trent, summon it at his discretion in that case alone when he himself wishes to propose something to the Canons in a matter which does not pertain to his own advantage or that of his people, and then only in the place in which the Chapter was previously accustomed to assemble."

Therefore he can be present at an exempt Chapter, order morals, correct the wicked, and establish things pertaining to divine service. For this is not to act concerning his own advantage or that of his people, but the common advantage, since ecclesiastical discipline generally depends upon exempt Chapters.

§ 6. Nor can recourse be had to capitulations and agreements, for the Bishop is the ordinary judge and superior of his Clergy. Next, a Cleric exempt in whatever manner is subjected by the precept of a General Council to the Bishop as regards visitation and correction; therefore they cannot exempt themselves by any agreements or constitutions.

But if before the election of a Bishop all exact the oath, "If I shall be elected, I swear that I will admonish, summon, or judge no member of the Chapter, and that I will permit them every liberty," this oath is one of iniquity, because he swears that he will not discharge the office of a good man, much less of a good Bishop. And all who exact or take such an oath can be deprived of the right of election. But more concerning these things when Bishops must be treated. For from this abuse it follows that certain Canons scarcely recognize any superior. The Pontiff is far away; they are protected from Apostolic Nuncios; they do not care for the Bishop. Therefore some of those who ought to furnish an example of obedience to all live altogether at their own discretion and think lawful whatever pleases them. But this is contrary to the law of nature.

CHAPTER XIX

The Various Orders of Ecclesiastics

§ 1. Ecclesiastics are customarily divided in two ways. The first division is, as it were, essential, according to order, taken from the sacrament itself, as of priests, deacons, subdeacons, and so forth. Others are distinguished according to offices, the institution of life, and proximate end; thus there are the Pontiff, Patriarchs, Metropolitans, Archbishops, Bishops, Archpriests, Archdeacons, Canons, Monks, Chaplains, and Vicars. Something must be said briefly concerning each, insofar as it pertains to the body of the Church and the state; for Theological disputations demand another place, just as they also possess another object.

§ 2. Seven sacred orders are numbered in the Church: the priesthood, diaconate, and subdiaconate; then the minor orders of Readers, Acolytes, Exorcists, and Doorkeepers. Authors teach that all these are one sacrament in genus but diverse in species; concerning the minor orders some have doubted. But I leave these matters to be considered by Theologians and those who treat controversies. I must treat them practically, as they are suitable for constituting the Ecclesiastical State. Therefore let us treat the hierarchical order, principally that by which the Church is governed in what they call the external forum. In it the Bishop holds the first place. The power of order of Bishops is one, but their power in government is varied, and some preside over others: Archbishops over Bishops, Patriarchs over them, and the Pontiff over all, in that manner and order, and with that utility to the state, that the world has never beheld anything more wonderful, nor anything more suitable to the morals and tranquility of the state. Therefore let us speak concerning this order.

CHAPTER XX

On the Roman Pontiff

§ 1. No Catholic can speak of the Roman Pontiff without provoking the indignation of heretics; nor is this new. In him Christian unity is bound together and faith is founded--not as in its principal cause, but as in the vicar of the supreme shepherd. Nevertheless, it ought not to seem wonderful that to every sectary the name of the Pontiff is hateful, his very person abominable, and his office Antichristianism; for long ago no one contradicted the truth who was not also an enemy of the Pontiff. To us, indeed, it is exceedingly marvelous that among so many centuries of heresies there has been none which did not set itself against the Roman Pope. This monstrous dissension arose at the Lord's table, at which Peter, the more fervent lover of the Lord, inquired concerning the betrayer of the Savior; and in the garden he cut off the ear of the enemies' attendant; finally, he himself condemned Simon. A hereditary hatred belonging to all the enemies of Christ has been joined to the supreme priesthood. Indeed, I have long been seeking one out of so many heresiarchs--from them all, I say, from the Capharnaites themselves down to the newest disciples of the Vorstians--who was not exceedingly hostile to the Pontiff and his power. What wonder is it? Between the chair of truth and the benches of errors there can never be concord. No contumacious defendant has loved his judge. It is therefore no new thing that our Pontiffs endure the hatred of all sects, since all their predecessors, the martyrs and confessors, were assailed by the calumnies, snares, and weapons of the heretics of their time.

§ 2. The end of pontifical power is that the whole Church may be governed under one visible head, the vicar of Christ, and the occasion of schism may be removed. For that reason schism in the election of a Pontiff is altogether abominable. For the head upon which the mind and sense of the Church converge is not divided without great destruction. Hence provision has been made by so many laws lest two heads appear to be elected and it be doubtful which must be obeyed. All schisms are hateful to God and destructive to mortals. The gaping earth swallowed Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (Numbers 16). It was not lawful for the high priest to rend his garment (Leviticus 10). Not even the soldier divided the Lord's seamless tunic. The first schism occurred when three Bishops secretly elected and ordained Novatian as Roman Pontiff. Thus in Epistles 48 and 52 of Cyprian, and that of Cornelius to Fabius or Flavian of Antioch; afterward one schism followed another. That schism was vast and long-lasting in which different men were elected through the faction of nations: when in the year 1376 the Italians, as Blondus records in Decade 2, book 10, elected Urban VI, a Neapolitan of their own nation, as Pontiff, while the French elected Clement VII. That schism was removed after thirty-nine years at the Council of Constance. But if there is no single head and no teacher of religion, all things are confounded by dissensions; for all heresies have waged wars in their cradles, as I taught in the book On the Synod of the Evangelicals and the Peace of Germany, and also in the Jubilee of Jubilees.

§ 3. The election of the Supreme Pontiff, upon whom the safety of the Church depends, has always been a matter of great care to prelates, and indeed also to princes. The people do not possess by divine right the power of electing Pontiffs and Bishops. For Christ himself chose the Apostles; he himself appointed the seventy disciples; the Apostles appointed Bishops and presbyters throughout different places. The office of the people is to hear and to be fed, not to ordain rulers. The Council of Nicaea likewise established that it should not be permitted to crowds to make the election of those who are to be advanced to the priesthood. Thus canon 13 of Nicaea. But concerning this matter there are the propositions of Bellarmine, book 1, chapter 7 and the following chapters, On Clerics, approved by Catholics and taken from the ancient Councils.

Fifth Proposition. The right of electing the Supreme Pontiff and the other pastors and ministers of the Church does not belong to the people by divine right; but if at any time the people have possessed some power in this matter, they possessed all of it from the sufferance or concession of the Pontiffs.

Sixth Proposition. The election of Bishops does not belong by divine right to the Clergy, but to the Supreme Pontiff, so that he may either elect them himself or prescribe the manner of electing.

Seventh Proposition. The manner of electing the Supreme Pontiff by the Cardinals alone is the best of all and is deservedly to be preserved, although absolutely speaking the Pontiff could change it if he wished.

Eighth Proposition. If no pontifical constitution concerning the election of the Supreme Pontiff existed, or if by some accident all the electors designated by law--that is, all the Cardinals--perished together, the right of election would belong to the neighboring Bishops and the Roman Clergy, yet with some dependence upon a general Council of Bishops.

But concerning this matter the disputations of many authors exist, and it is not now my purpose to treat the law, but to explain that which conduces to the peace of the Church.

§ 4. Hence it is evident that electors can be constituted by the Church, and for that reason the practice in election has often been varied. Concerning this Gregory of Toulouse writes most learnedly (Syntagma of Law, book 15, chapter 3, from §19): "By whom the Supreme Pontiff is elected admits of a distinction according to times. The sacrosanct Roman and Apostolic Church obtained the primacy, not first from the Apostles, but from our Lord and Savior himself; for he said to the blessed Apostle Peter, 'You are Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church,' and so forth.

"Thereafter, although Clement did not immediately succeed Saint Peter in the see, and although Linus and Cletus, or Anacletus I, held it before him while Peter himself so willed, this was because, while Saint Peter was still living, Linus and Cletus were taken as assistants in the administration of external goods, an office such as the deacons then possessed and the Pope's chamberlains now possess. Thus Clement was second according to election, but fourth in administration, as Supreme Pontiff. Thereafter, because it appeared to be a pernicious precedent for anyone to choose a Bishop as his own successor, and for the things of God to be given by men, another form of electing the Supreme Pontiff was approved, and he was chosen by ecclesiastics alone.

"After the Church obtained peace, the people participated, and the approval or authorization of the Emperors followed. The Emperor's approval was omitted in the election of Pelagius and Gregory I. Benedict II, Supreme Pontiff, established that thereafter the Supreme Pontiffs should be elected by the Clergy and the Roman people without the consent of the Emperor. Thereafter laymen were prohibited, both by Adrian, Supreme Pontiff, and in the Eighth Synod, from involving themselves in the election of Pontiffs; provision was also made that the Emperor's consent should not be employed and that an election made by Emperors should not be valid, although at one time it was pleasing that the people should also be present at the election. Under Agatho, the Sicilian Supreme Pontiff, a definite sum of money was given to the Emperor for the ordination of a Pontiff, and therefore his authority was required, about the year of the Lord 680. A decree of Pope Stephen also exists that the Supreme Pontiff should be ordained in the presence of the Emperor's legates, evidently so that they might restrain the scandals which customarily intervene in an election.

"Adrian I, who obtained the Apostolic See in the year of the Lord 772, after Charlemagne had come at his request to defend the affairs of the Church, held a Synod with 153 Fathers and granted to Charles the election of the Supreme Pontiff, Archbishops, and Bishops, together with all investitures and the dignity of the patriciate. Louis I, son of Charlemagne, ceded this right of election in perpetuity to Paschal I, Supreme Pontiff, who occupied the see in the year 817 and who himself had previously been elected by the Roman people without the Emperor's consent. For this reason the legates of Emperor Louis II were not employed in the election of Adrian II, although they were then in the city, in the year of the Lord 869, even if a certain usurped custom had previously prevailed. Emperor Henry V dared to contend with Paschal II concerning the primacy and the investitures of Bishops; he was excommunicated and finally compelled to beg pardon for his fault, as Godfrey of Viterbo, an author of that time, committed to writing in book 17 of the history entitled Pantheon, under Henry V. Adrian III, who occupied the pontificate in the year of the Lord 886, was the first to refer the matter to the people, so that the Emperor's consent should not be awaited in creating a Pontiff.

"Nevertheless Leo VIII, Supreme Pontiff, who occupied the see about the year of the Lord 968, renewed and confirmed for Emperor Otto II the power of electing the Pontiff, issuing definite letters for this purpose, so that he could oppose the enemies of the Empire more securely. Otto, however, had previously sworn fidelity to John XII, his predecessor, and that by his counsel, consent, or exhortation he would destroy nothing, and that without his counsel he would hold no assembly concerning those matters which belonged to him or to the land of Saint Peter.

"From these various concessions, remissions, and decrees the Church finally received nothing except frequent seditions and schisms, until Nicholas II, the Savoyard, who occupied the see about the year 1065, established by a decree of the Council held at Mantua that the Supreme Pontiff was to be elected by the Cardinals alone, after previous deliberation. Alexander III of Siena, again, about the year 1165, added the provision that, if the Cardinals disagreed among themselves in the election, the election of the one whom two parts out of three of the Cardinals elected should be valid--except in a case of necessity, in which two parts of the Cardinals are not awaited, and indeed sometimes the electors can renounce even this solemnity."

§ 5. In the year 1059, in the Roman Council of 113 Bishops under Nicholas II, it was established as follows:

"First, with God as witness, it was established that the election of the Roman Pontiff should be in the power of the Cardinal Bishops, so that if anyone is enthroned in the Apostolic See without their preceding concordant and canonical election, and thereafter without the consent of the following orders of religious, Clerics, and laymen, he shall be regarded not as Pope or Apostolic, but as apostate.

"When the Roman Pontiff, or the Bishop of any city, dies, let no one presume to invade his goods, but let them be preserved intact for his successors."

The robberies of many men have erased this law: they plundered the wealth of the dying, although it belongs to the Church and to the poor. Therefore even the canonical electors cannot now divert it to their own uses.

The entire order of election and of conclaves is described in the Synod of Lyons under Gregory X; for by adding those provisions to the constitutions of the First Lateran Council and of Alexander III, the procedure was perfected. Moreover, in Session 23 of the Council of Basel many most useful provisions concerning election were established, and the consent and profession of the Pontiff-elect are required. There are also further provisions in the same Council, Session 37, and likewise Session 38, concerning the electors and the confirmation of the Pope. The Council acknowledges that there have been various modes of election according as the necessity and utility of the Church required; now, however, he is customarily elected from the Cardinals.

§ 6. The morals of the Pontiff ought to be of the best kind, so that all those qualities which have been spoken of concerning Bishops and priests may be more excellent in the Pontiff by as much as he is greater than all Bishops. Thus, while true and solid virtues are required in the others, the summit of all the virtues is demanded in the Pontiff.

The Cardinals bind themselves by a great crime when they raise to the supreme dignity a man not sufficiently approved. When this has happened, the Church has been shaken by a great commotion and the morals of the Clergy have been turned toward the worse.

His power is the same as that of the other Bishops, but it is greater inasmuch as it extends over the Bishops themselves, and no ecumenical Synod can be convoked without him. His care is universal, and his obligation is for all souls, but it is greatest for his household and his court. All Pontiffs are bound to constitute it in such a manner that modesty, chastity, and justice befitting the household of a priest may exist in it. For if he does not take care of his household, judges, and officials, he denies the faith by his deeds, and the shepherd of all the faithful is worse than an infidel. For since his jurisdiction on earth is supreme, from which no appeal is granted; since his judgment can be retracted by no one; since all men from every place appeal to him; since the cases of Bishops, princes, and kings are referred to him; since he judges concerning all judgments and is himself judged by no one--in order that he may judge justly, it is necessary that he have just and diligent assessors, examiners, and subordinate judges.

But since Emperors venerate the Pontiff for the sake of piety and religion, as is stated in the epistle of Nicholas to the Emperor of Constantinople, the Pontiff must be guilty of an exceedingly grave crime when he begins to fail in his office and to disappoint the Christian world. Indeed, unless he exhibits greater zeal for the honor of God than the other Christians, he is a prevaricator.

How great, indeed, ought to be the innocence of the man who purges himself of charges not from necessity but of his own will?

§ 7. To this great power the Christian Church has added honor. For he is encircled with a diadem and is honored by the services of kings, humility proceeding even to kisses of his feet. The sectaries blame this; and if it were done from pride and not on account of office, it would deserve blame. Saint Thomas, II-II, question 102, shows that this honor is not inordinate. For the observance with which we attend those who excel in dignity, if they discharge a public office, pertains not to their honor but to that of God and the state. The honor offered to the Pontiff is exhibited not to him but to Christ, whose vicar he is; for this reason he also bears the cross, so that he may testify that the honor is given to the Crucified, not to himself. And since he is also the head of the whole Christian State, honor is deservedly offered to the Church herself in her head. Henry Kalteisen formerly defended that ceremony at the Council of Basel, and now it offends no one except a heretic. He is called Most Holy because his office is most holy. He himself is sometimes impious and is condemned eternally.

He is called Blessed and Most Blessed from the same excellence of power. The same Henry Kalteisen, On the Liberty of Evangelical Preaching, in volume 4 of the Councils, page 339, explains it thus: “The venerable Thomas of Walden, book 2, chapter 36, says that general Councils also are called holy and most holy, not because of the holiness of the persons existing there, but because of the fullness of the office of sanctifying and the infallible assistance of the Holy Spirit. Thus the Catholic Church also is called holy, not because of the holiness of all those existing in her, since there are many sinners, but because of her most holy offices and because of the holiness of the sacraments existing in her; for such things are not called holy from the work of the one working, but from the work wrought. Therefore Saint Cyril, in the synodical epistle directed to Nestorius which begins, ‘To the religious and God-loving,’ calls the Pope most holy and most venerable, and likewise the sacred general Council. Similarly Saint Jerome calls the Pope most holy, magnifying the glory of His Holiness in the book entitled On the Deeds of the Roman Pontiffs, writing at its beginning to Pope Damasus.

“Third, the Pope by reason of his office is often most suitably called Blessed or Most Blessed, not as if, outside the state of the wayfarer, he had been established eternally blessed, but because of the admirable excellence of his power, which reaches near to Christ. For whatever power, whatever sacramental grace, whatever heavenly dispensation has been entrusted by Christ, the head of the Church, the Church herself dispenses; and, provided that the Pope does not err in faith, the whole has been entrusted to his dispensation. Hence blessed Hilary also, on account of imperial authority, called Emperor Constantius most blessed in his epistle to him concerning the faith. And blessed Ambrose, writing to certain evil Bishops and priests whom he reproves for simony and many transgressions, calls them most blessed and most holy fathers in his pastoral book which he entitles On Their Observances.

“Fourth, therefore, I say that if the Pope commands something to be done which is not expressly contrary to the law of God or to any statutes of the holy Fathers, even if it is not truly founded according to the letter in the law of God, he must be obeyed.”

§ 8. Since the care of all rests upon the Pontiff, nevertheless there is one way of caring for all things: if he frees his court from vices; if he has around him men experienced in affairs, justice, and government, truly pious, and haters of avarice and gifts. Otherwise he will neither understand a case nor judge rightly. Therefore he will strive to preserve his court, and to reform it if there is need. Nor can he offer any excuse. For if he admonishes, corrects, and punishes Bishops, princes, and kings, will he be unable either to dismiss his own ministers or to compel them to honorable conduct? This matter was treated at the Lateran Council, and the bulls of Leo X exist. It befits not only his own court but also the courts of the pontifical Legates--who possess episcopal and sometimes cardinal dignity--not merely to have upright morals, but also to have a modest household; otherwise the disgraces rebound upon them and upon the Apostolic See.

§ 9. Beza, on Matthew 18:17, commands the government of the Church to be either aristocratic or democratic. Meisner follows him in On the Government of the Church, as does Parker in On Ecclesiastical Polity, book 3, chapter 13. They constitute kings members of the Church, though noble ones. Hugo Grotius assigns judgment concerning the Church to the political magistrate in The Piety of the States of Holland. Thus Pareus in the preface on Hosea to the Landgrave of Hesse. But Chemnitz in the Commonplaces, chapter 4, On the Church, says that the magistrate is guilty of sacrilege when, after excluding the ministers and the rest of the Church, he claims for himself alone the power of constituting the Church. Leyser, in his disputation On Concord, and Herbrand, On Adiaphora, say nearly the same. Besold says that such a magistrate would be the Political Antichrist. See what he disputes in chapter 3, On the Ecclesiastical Right of Majesty, against Rittershausen, Richard Hooker, Grotius, and James, King of England. His argument in §4 is weighty: if religion depended upon the judgment and power of the king, it would be mutable. Indeed, he says that controversies have arisen from the fact that they wish to preserve the state. He denies that Christ wished his spiritual kingdom to be strengthened by the aid of kings.

CHAPTER XXI

Many Unjustly Secede from the Ancient Church out of Hatred for the Roman Pontiff

§ 1. That which pertains to every age--namely, that men should acknowledge the lawful magistracy in the Church--I directed, in my concluding work, against those who were declaiming their jubilees when I wrote these things, so that I might vindicate from false calumnies the true shepherd of all Christians, even of kings. This office also pertains to the political order, since our state is within the Church, and the Church within it.

I set this forth generally because the greatest part of their sermons is spent in invectives against the Pontiff, to such an extent that, if those curses were taken away, from many volumes there would result one small book. The subject of very many sermons is drawn from Daniel 11:31 and the following verses, and Revelation 12, 13, 14, and 17, so that they may impute to the Pontiff absolutely everything that Scripture has ever said against Antiochus and Antichrist. Thus Matthias Hoë in his third jubilee sermon, Baldwin Frederick, Wolfgang Franz, Erhard Lauterbach, Michael Müling, Vincent Schmuck, Paul Laurentius in two sermons, and John Pandocheus; there are also theses and declamations of others.

In these writings I have observed that all of them do three things. First, whatever has ever been wickedly done by any Pontiff they impute to the whole order, and exaggerate it, just as if someone attributed the crimes of Ahab or Manasseh to all kings and therefore took away the force of scepters, because many kings have obeyed their own passions more often than the laws. Second, whatever has ever been invented against Pontiffs by their enemies they set forth with an increment as though it were an oracle; but things spoken rather fervently in favor of the Pontiff they drag into calumny. Thus, when it is said that power has been given to the Pontiff on earth to absolve sins as God absolves them in heaven, and that the judgment of the Pontiff is also that of God, they immediately cry out that the Pontiff is equated with God, God is cast down from his throne and the Pontiff exalted, and that the Pontiff is established by us as God--although the particle ὡς, or "just as," is a mark of similitude no less than of equality, since we teach nothing other than that the things which the Pontiff absolves or binds on earth by the use of lawful power are absolved or bound in heaven, and that Christ regards as ratified the sentence of his servant and Vicar.

Third, they attack the doctrine of the Pontiff. In this conflict I have observed three stratagems. The first is to impute by calumny to the Pontiff and Catholics those dogmas which we condemn and anathematize most expressly. The second is to traduce as new inventions of the Pontiff, monks, and Jesuits those things which the most ancient Church taught, for example concerning purgatory. Thus they say that purgatory is an invention of monks. But Zanchi, book 4, chapter 4, question 5, On the Nature of God, speaks as follows: "In truth, however, I have not yet been able to discover anything certain concerning the first point. Nevertheless, it is an ancient custom and doctrine. For Tertullian made mention of those prayers for the dead in his book On the Soldier's Crown, page 449; but he plainly numbers it among those things which flowed from custom alone and were by no means drawn from the Scriptures. He writes concerning the same matter in the book On Monogamy, page 578. He likewise makes mention of offerings for the dead in the book Exhortation to Chastity, page 564. But he never teaches or intimates that those prayers or offerings were from the word of God or even from Apostolic tradition."

Dionysius who is called the Areopagite, in the final chapter of the book Ecclesiastical Hierarchy and elsewhere; Cyprian, book 1, Epistle 3 and book 4, Epistle 5, and often elsewhere; Ambrose, volume 3, in the funeral oration on the death of Theodosius, likewise the other on the death of Valentinian, and in the oration on the death of his brother Satyrus; Chrysostom in the Liturgy and elsewhere; Augustine, volume 1, Confessions, book 9, chapters 12 and 13, asks God to forgive the sins of his deceased mother. Likewise, in On the Care to Be Taken for the Dead, chapter 4, he says that supplications for the spirits of the departed must not be omitted; likewise volume 4, in the eight questions to Dulcitius, question 2, and elsewhere.

I wished to present an example of cunning and at the same time unskilled malice. Zanchi and others who have sometimes read the ancients acknowledge that already in the time of Dionysius the Areopagite and Tertullian there was such a custom, and they cite Cyprian, Augustine, and other Fathers. Therefore, since these things would have had little force for stirring up hatred against the Pontiff, they omit them cunningly, yet at the same time foolishly and unskillfully. For even though they impose upon their own people and appear to be orators, they ought nevertheless to fear the conscience of the Christian world. Their third stratagem is to render Catholic dogmas hateful and to polish their own more horrible ones with gentle words.

§ 2. They render our doctrine hateful by a perverse interpretation. Many began doing this long ago, especially the anonymous buffoon who wrote against the Privileges of the Calvinists published by Father Martin Becanus. He was followed by the anonymous writer against Ungersdorf, and now by the jubilators, especially Zeaemann and the others who are accustomed to read nothing except the infamous little books of their own men. They read the words of the buffoon from Oppenheim, who falsely calls himself William of the Meadows, in his epistle: "That Pope can dispense against natural and Apostolic law. For Gratian's Glossator writes this expressly at cause 15, question 6, chapter Auctoritatem; distinction 32, chapter Presbyter; distinction 34, chapter Lector."

But this is a great calumny, for the Pontiff pronounces anathema upon all who teach that the Pontiff can dispense against natural law. Therefore it would be the fault of the Glossator, not of the Pontiff; moreover, that gloss is not present in the current canon law. Nor has any of these men seen the gloss: they hand on to others a lie received from one another. Nevertheless, there are certain things which canonists and jurists call matters of natural law because they accord with the law of nature, although they can be changed because they do not bind at every time and place. For example, it belongs to natural law to return another's property; civil law transfers ownership by prescription. It is Apostolic law that a Bishop should not be a neophyte, should be the husband of one wife, that every man should pray and prophesy with his head uncovered, and a woman with hers covered. Yet we see that all sects, not Catholics alone, sometimes dispense in these matters. Some Glossator could have spoken with this meaning, and Pareus teaches, on 1 Corinthians 11 and 14, that dispensation can be made in these matters.

Next, the title of the canon repels the calumny; it is: "Apostolic authority renders wholly void unlawful oaths." But to render unlawful oaths void is not contrary to natural law. Then there is the canon itself, which belongs not only to Pope Nicholas but also to the ancients: "Following the authority of our venerable predecessors"--at cause 15, question 6--"and expressly of the most blessed Pope and martyr Alexander, the fifth from blessed Peter, we absolve from all oaths and obligations of whatever kind by which they had bound themselves under compulsion through the violence of the impious; and we prohibited both the aforementioned Archbishop of Trier and his Provost, and all who at that time, having been taken captive, bound themselves to them in any manner, from observing those things. Nor, by the authority of God, the holy Apostles, and our predecessors, do we permit them consequently ever to suffer any infamy, calumny, or separation from their goods; as the Lord says through the Prophet: 'Loose the bonds of impiety.' Moreover, we give these commands to our aforementioned brother and to the sons and defenders of the Church of Trier: that with both the spiritual and the material sword they pursue those wicked men and their supporters until the possessions, or whatever ecclesiastical properties have been alienated or seized by this deed or by any agreement, are recalled intact."

§ 3. Nor is the calumny more tolerable when they say that Panormitanus, in the final chapter On Divorces, says that the Pope can dispense against the New Testament. So says this buffoon; and the calumny possesses an appearance of truth because the words of Panormitanus are: "Second, note that the Pope, for a most weighty cause, could dispense against the New Testament." But how these harsh-sounding words must be understood is to be learned from the additions, by which the reader is referred in the same place to chapters 13 and 14, Who Are Legitimate Sons. There he speaks as follows: "Nor does it stand in the way if it is said that the Pope can for a cause dispense in degrees prohibited by divine law, as certain men note in chapter Litteras, On the Restitution of the Despoiled; because that is true according to him by dispensing and legitimating the marriage from the present time, but not from the past, so that the children previously begotten are deemed legitimated."

This dispensation is not in something which has simply been commanded in the New Testament, but it disposes concerning something which is not contrary to the New Testament. For the matter concerns things not altogether necessary, such as the fact that Ambrose, a neophyte, came to the episcopate contrary to the New Testament. Next, the matter is clear from the canon itself. Panormitanus explained that chapter in which Innocent III permits men recently converted to the faith, who had contracted marriage with the widow of a brother according to the law of Moses, on account of their weakness to continue using that marriage after baptism. Nevertheless, it would not be lawful for baptized men to contract such a marriage. He then adds: "Second, note that the Pope, for a most weighty cause, could dispense against the New Testament." This is not to dispense concerning something written in the New Testament as something to be observed, but concerning some law of the Church which is observed in the New Testament; for there is not one iota in the New Testament by which a man is prohibited from marrying the widow of a deceased brother, and in the Old Testament there was even a law which commanded that marriage. He therefore dispensed not against the written New Testament, but against a law of the Church of the New Testament. Nor does it stand in the way that in Matthew 14:3 John says to Herod, "It is not lawful for you to have your brother's wife"; for the matter there concerns the wife of a living brother, as Jerome, Bede, and others attest. Philip died in the twentieth year of Tiberius. But the mind of Panormitanus in the same place--namely, the final chapter On Divorces, book 4 of the Decretals, title 19--is clear, for he teaches that the Pope cannot dispense against divine laws.

The same buffoon, and from him the Innovators, also fight against the authority of the Pontiff with naked lies. "Bertachinus says the same," he declares, "in his Repertory under the word 'Pope.'" The jubilators allege the same thing. But in that repertory the precise contrary is found: "The Pope cannot dispense in things prohibited by the Old and New Testaments"; Antonius de Butrio and John Andrew in chapter Super, On Usury, Antonius de Prato in the said counsel 11, column--nor against the Gospel, nor divine law, distinction 20, and then 14, as also the gloss in chapter Litteras, On the Restitution of the Despoiled.

Thus Bertachinus accuses them of falsehood and cites authorities for the matter. There are countless other things: that we make the Pope a true God, and similar claims which, once uttered without shame by one man, are thereafter repeated by all.

Therefore in these matters we protest before God and men that injury is done to us; for they ἐν πλεονεξίᾳ πλαστοῖς λόγοις ὑμᾶς ἐμπορεύονται: in avarice they make merchandise of souls with fabricated speeches. Their life is a meditation upon deceit and a threshing-floor of falsehood.

Ψευδῶν ἄνακτες, μηχανορράφοι κακῶν ἑλικτά.

Kings of lies, builders of devices, wallowing-places of evils.

They reason with themselves thus:

Τὸ κέρδος ἡδὺ κἂν ἀπὸ ψευδῶν ἴῃ.

Gain is sweet, even if it comes from lies.

§ 4. Since, therefore, they fall away from ancient truth through great error, the things which they set forth must be considered. Now, because we are treating the matter generally, we protest only this: there will be no excuse for those who secede for these reasons, any more than there was for the ten tribes because they seceded from the temple at Jerusalem. For in no age have any defected from the Roman Pontiff except those who were heretics, whom our adversaries also condemn. Next, those who departed from us differ more among themselves than most of them differ from us: some have been carried to the east, others to the west.

But nothing is more astonishing among their errors than the fact that, already convicted, they have arrived at the point of counting the ancient martyrs among the Antichristians. Frederick Braubom did this most shamelessly in the Flaminian Flowers, and I refuted it in the book On the Increase of Heresies; but Wolfgang Franz discussed it most extensively in thesis 300 and the following theses:

301. The beginnings were indeed slight under Linus, Cletus, and Clement; and yet Linus, from the sacred ordinations which he held in the city, created eighteen presbyters and eleven Bishops, whom he would undoubtedly place in authority elsewhere; Cletus, at Peter's command, as he said, reduced twenty-five presbyters to order; Clement wrote an epistle to other Churches which was not approved by all, as these things are read in Platina.

302. Anacletus, who followed, established that Clerics should not grow a beard or long hair; Evaristus, that an accusation by the people against a Bishop should not be received; and he created Bishops for different places. Alexander commanded that holy water mixed with salt, with sacred prayers interposed, should be kept both in temples and in chambers for putting demons to flight. He also wished water to be mixed with wine in the consecration of Christ's blood; and commanded that the oblation should be made from unleavened and not, as previously, from leavened bread.

303. Sixtus I established that Bishops summoned to the Apostolic See--BEHOLD AND NOTE, READER: the Roman Bishops soon dared to command foreign teachers of other cities--should not be received by their own people when they returned unless they carried with them letters greeting the people--BEHOLD AND NOTE again, reader: thus the Roman Bishops, even amid persecutions, relying on the protection of other rulers, nevertheless insinuated themselves not only into foreign Bishops but also into Churches as their heads--and see the example in the life of Sixtus.

304. Telesphorus established that the fast should be observed for seven weeks before Easter. Pope Hyginus established that churches should not be dedicated, enlarged, or diminished without the judgment of the Metropolitan or Bishop. Pius I dedicated the baths of Novatus in the Vicus Patricius in honor of his sister, Saint Pudentiana. Anicetus established that a Bishop should not refer an accusation against his Metropolitan to any see other than the Apostolic See; likewise, that not all Bishops should be called Patriarchs. Soter established that no nun should touch the pall or place incense in the censer while the sacrifices were being performed.

305. Eleutherius, at the very beginning of his pontificate, immediately received a letter from Lucius, King of Britain, in which he was asked to receive him and his subjects into the number of the Christians. He therefore sent Fugatius and Damianus there to baptize the king and the people. Victor I, who followed him, excommunicated the Bishops of the East who refused to celebrate Easter on the appointed Sundays. Zephyrinus I established that a Bishop summoned to judgment by his Patriarch, Primate, or Metropolitan should not be condemned without Apostolic authority. Callistus I established that four fasts should be held in the four seasons of the year; he is said to have built a basilica in honor of the Blessed Virgin in the Transtiberine region. But we are unwilling to proceed further, because--to the extent that credit is to be given to the pontifical historians--from these claws it is easy to estimate the lion and to understand what is meant when it is said that in those times the mystery of iniquity was already at work.

§ 5. Behold, reader: Linus, Cletus, Clement, Anacletus, Evaristus, Alexander, Sixtus, Telesphorus, Hyginus, Pius I, Anicetus, Soter, Eleutherius, Victor I, Zephyrinus I, and Callistus I were already working the mystery of iniquity, because they did the things which the heretical man relates. And although they poured out their life for the glory of Christ, nevertheless to him they are Antichrists because they worked the mystery of iniquity; nor are they innocent because they were unable to ascend higher, but must be deemed Antichrists because they sought the seat of Antichrist--if we believe the heretic. But far be it from us to condemn as Antichristian the martyrs of the primitive Church, contemporaries of the Apostolic times. Let us rather rejoice that they lived in the same faith as ourselves, as the most ancient canon of the Mass has concerning Linus; Irenaeus, book 3, chapter 3; Jerome in the Catalogue;

Eusebius, book 3 of the History, chapter 12; Epiphanius, heresy 27. Concerning Clement, those same authors testify. In Epistle 3 he prohibits the celebration of Masses without the Bishops' permission. So many thousands of martyrs of the first century were in communion with him, whom the Innovators now call Antichristians. The epistles of Anacletus which are contained in the first volume of the Councils will show that he was of our faith. This Pontiff ought to be the most Antichristian of all, for in Epistle 3 he asserts the primacy from the institution of the Roman Church. "These things are true," he says, and so forth.

Irenaeus, book 3, chapter 3; Epiphanius, heresy 27; Optatus, book 2 against Parmenian; and Augustine, Epistle 165, acknowledge Evaristus as a martyr of Christ, not as Antichrist.

Alexander, in the Epistle to the Orthodox in volume 1 of the Councils, and in On Consecration, distinction 2, canon In Sacramentorum, teaches that the body and blood are confected in the Eucharist.

Sixtus, among other things, teaches in volume 1 of the Councils that appeals from Bishops summoned to the Apostolic See are to be received.

Telesphorus, in the Epistle to All in volume 1 of the Councils and in On Consecration, distinction 1, canon Nocte sancta, commands that Masses be celebrated and the body of the Lord confected. He likewise says that the Lenten fast is to be observed for seven weeks before Easter and that one must abstain from meat, in the Epistle to All the Churches, distinction 4, canon Statuimus.

Hyginus says: "All basilicas ought to be dedicated with a Mass," in volume 1 of the Councils and On Consecration, distinction 1, canon Omnes Basilicae.

Pius celebrates Masses in the house of his sister Euprepia and confects the blood of the Lord, as is evident from the epistle to Justus, Bishop of Vienne, and On Consecration, distinction 1, canon Si per neglegentiam. He likewise speaks concerning a consecrated cross in volume 1 of the Councils, and in cause 22, question 5, canon Romanam Ecclesiam, he says that the Roman Church is the head of all Churches.

The epistles and decrees of Anicetus which are contained in volume 1 of the Councils show that he was of the same faith as ourselves.

Soter established that if one priest, impeded by illness, does not complete the Mass, another should complete it, in volume 1 of the Councils.

Eleutherius says that final judgments concerning Bishops are reserved to the Roman Pontiff; his other decrees are Catholic. Saint Irenaeus came to him as a legate from the martyrs of Lyons. Victor says that judgment concerning Bishops is reserved to himself; he acted against the Quartodecimans.

Several decretal epistles of Zephyrinus are read in volume 1 of the Councils, by which he establishes our faith. He was an illustrious martyr in the year 203; Eusebius, book 5, chapter 27, and Optatus, book 2. Callistus was crowned with martyrdom in the year 226. He wrote concerning the fast of the four seasons, for previously it had been maintained by Apostolic tradition. But, as it appears, it had formerly been performed three times in the year, because they did not number that fast which fell during Lent as a fast of the four seasons.

Now I appeal to the conscience of all: those martyrs taught the same things on account of which we are condemned as Antichristians. Why, therefore, is their condition better than ours? For it is right that we should believe them rather, since they were both near to the Apostolic times and consecrated their faith with their own blood, and since no one either in that Church or in the following age accused them of errors. Why, therefore, do you depart from them? Why do you canonize the persecutors--Neros, Domitians, Trajans, Nervas, Hadrians, and Antonines--as though they were the judges of Antichristian Pontiffs and their avengers by lawful right?

§ 6. That condemnation of the martyrs suffices for our religion. We are unwilling to be separated from them; with them it is pleasing to go into prison and death, and indeed into your hatreds and insulting jubilees. If these things in them were venial and did not deprive them of the heavenly vision, why in us are they evils as great as you pretend them to be? O Christians, do not listen to the posthumous calumniators of Christian martyrs.

§ 7. But it is too little for them to be harsh toward the Martyrs: they spare neither the Apostles nor John the Baptist. It is horrible to hear what Wolfgang Franz dared to defend amid the exultant madness of the jubilees at the University of Wittenberg. In order to deny works of supererogation and to remove the treasury of indulgences from their midst, he accuses John the Baptist.

Thesis 191. "Furthermore, the following things are believed to augment works of supererogation: 1. the exceedingly austere life of John the Baptist, concerning which, among other things, it is said that we cannot show in the Scriptures where God commanded that austerity; 2. his repentance and newness of life, which he, who was never alienated from God, never needed."

192. "As regards the history of the austerity of John the Baptist's life, the question there is not about the fact, for we grant it because it is recounted by sacred Scripture, but about the right: whether John acted rightly in pursuing such austerity."

193. "That John did not act rightly is evident from this: 1. because the ceremonial law of Moses had not yet been abrogated. That law admitted more foods than those alone which John ate. Hence Christ, sending the disciples to the Jews, says to them in Luke 10:7, 'Eat whatever is set before you'--that is, whatever was not prohibited by the law of Moses. 2. Because Christ himself censures that Essene and likewise Pharisaic rigor in Matthew 9:16--17, Mark 2:21--22, and Luke 5:36--39, where he calls the Pharisaic doctrine, and also John's doctrine concerning excessive fasts, an old garment and old wineskins. Before others, let Jacob Faber Stapulensis be read, who explains this passage most correctly in the introductory commentaries upon the four Gospels."

194. "John the Baptist contracted that depraved custom, contrary to the law of God and then condemned by Christ, among the Essenes, since it is evident from historians that such were the customs of the Essenes: namely, they rejoiced in being remote from company, cultivators of retreats and solitude, in having a diet of herbs and fruits of trees, and in avoiding animal foods, just as the Pythagoreans had previously done."

What wonder is it that they are enemies of martyrs and Pontiffs, when they so petulantly assail the forerunner of the Lord, than whom there is none greater among those born of women, praised so many times by Christ, who was a burning and shining lamp?

He concedes that the history is true, contrary to the exceedingly empty interpretations of other Lutherans; for some interpreted ἀκρίδας, "locusts," as tender shoots of herbs or as crabs, a wilderness as a suburban villa, and a garment of camel's hair as a Damascene toga. Thus, since they were unwilling to be like John, they made him like themselves; for they preferred to present John as relaxed amid luxuries rather than to disturb their own delights by his austerity.

But let us examine the arguments. The law of Moses admitted more foods than John ate; therefore John acted wrongly. In order that there may be the appearance of an argument, let the major premise be added: "Whoever does not eat all the foods which the law permits acts against the law." Where, I ask, have those who argue thus left their mind? They are ignorant of the distinction between the command and the permission of a law. The Christian law permits to all men mullets, oysters, heathcocks, and whatever other foods there are; yet those who abstain from most of them do not sin. Is it not a virtue to have abstained from agreeable goods? In the royal array of tables is it not lawful for one, content with one or two kinds, to appease his hunger with a few things? But Christ said to the disciples in Luke 10:7, "Eat whatever is set before you." Be it so: they used this power. John imposed upon himself a stricter law of abstinence. He did not therefore sin by renouncing his own right because the disciples acted rightly by using theirs. It was lawful for the Apostle Paul to live from the Gospel, just as it was for the other Apostles; but he preferred to set forth the Gospel without expense. He could live from the altar, nor was the mouth of him who threshed to be muzzled any more than those of the brethren of the Lord and Cephas; nevertheless, he preferred to die rather than have his glory made void.

But his statement that John's fasting was censured by Christ is a calumny. In Matthew 9:16--17, Mark 2:21--22, and Luke 5:36--38, he does not call John's fasts excessive, nor does he call them old wineskins or an old garment. Rather, he calls his own disciples recruits and weak, not yet hardened to endure new and weighty things. He therefore excuses his own; he does not accuse John. This is evident from the passage, for he says that it is not fitting for the sons of the wedding or bride-chamber to fast for as long as the bridegroom is with them; the time would come when they would fast, and their histories and epistles teach that they performed this. But if John's fasts are called old wineskins and an old garment, what then is the new wineskin and the new garment? Next, if John's fast was vicious, it was through ἐθελοθρησκείᾳ, self-imposed religion, badly chosen by himself; John was therefore not a true Teacher--especially according to the heretics, who compare ἐθελοθρησκείαν, self-imposed religion, to idolatry. Third, Christ himself praised John's fasting. For after he had praised John in Matthew 11, from verse 7 through verse 18, he adds: "John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say, 'He has a demon.'" He therefore says that generation was like children who say: "We piped for you and you did not dance; we lamented and you did not mourn." Therefore, by so great an austerity of repentance, by which eternal life was shown and not merely taught, they ought to have been roused to virtue; and because they were converted neither by John's severity nor by the Lord's kindness, he reproaches them for their contumacy.

But if that austerity of clothing and diet had been contrary to the law of Moses, the Jews would deservedly have said, "He has a demon," as of one who violated the law of God. Yet both Lutherans and Calvinists acknowledge that the Jews most shamelessly and calumniously reproached both John and Christ. The academic of Wittenberg now succeeds them; in order to overthrow the Pope, he sets John the Baptist against Christ.

Finally he calls John an Essene, imbued with their customs and their disciple. The histories praise the Essenes exceedingly. The book of the Hebrews which they call Juchasin calls the Essenes Nazarenes, whom the Seventy customarily name ἡγιασμένους, "sanctified." Their origin was from the Rechabites; some of them were Κοινόβιοι, living in community, others μονάζοντες, living alone, according to Josephus and others. Abraham Zacuto says that they possessed the best morals, hated gain, and avoided fornication; and Josephus says they were καταφρονητὰς τοῦ πλούτου, despisers of wealth. In book 18, chapter 2, he calls them βελτίστους δ' ἄλλως ἄνδρας τὸν τρόπον: endowed with the best morals, celibate, farmers, and without luxuries such as anointing and ornament. As regards fate, which they believed in, it can possess a good meaning. If the Essenes were good and holy men, they did not teach John customs contrary to the law of God; if they were heretics, as the Innovators generally think, they must also make John their disciple and imitator a heretic, since his whole life would have been contrary to the divine law and condemned by Christ. Yet concerning him it was said: "And you, child, shall be called the Prophet of the Most High; for you shall go before the face of the Lord to prepare his ways, to give knowledge to the people unto the remission of their sins."

I wished to give this general admonition lest anyone be moved by so many calumnies, which they convey by wagonloads full of lies, when he sees not only Pontiffs and the Clergy, but--what is impious--the ancient martyrs and their Churches accused of Antichristianism, and indeed Saint John the Baptist accused of impiety and error. We ask this of God: that we may never be praised by the mouth by which men so imprudently accuse such saints, nor by those who have departed no more from us than from the Baptist.

Nevertheless, not all feel equally bitterly concerning the Pontiff. In a speech in the public assembly on 9 November 1605, the King of Britain acknowledges many men of excellent virtue among Catholics. George Cassander, century 1, Epistle 21, concedes the Pope the primacy and the prerogative of oversight. Brocard concedes that there are pious and impious men in the papacy.

CHAPTER XXII

The Other Causes for Which They Have Departed from Us Are Unjust

§ 1. I have shown that the cause for which they are carried with such hatred against the Pontiff and Catholics lies not in us but in the malice of apostates, for in the same manner they attack the ancient martyrs and John the Baptist. Now it is pleasing to examine the particular causes. They allege as many causes as there are articles differing from ours which they defend; but I shall explain them individually hereafter. Let us now examine the things which they censure particularly in the Pontiff. They can be referred to three heads: 1. pride, because he equates himself with God, commands Kings, and usurps a twofold power; 2. lust, because he approves fornication and lives impurely; 3. avarice, because, circumventing all men by frauds, he gathers riches. These are the subjects of all their sermons. Even one Pandocheus can be read--not because he is more learned than the others, but because, wandering as though in a public inn, he has crowded lies together in a sermon--or Vincent Schmuck in his theses. Or, indeed, if variety is pleasing, Simon Stenius the poet, who dispersed throughout the University of Heidelberg a ridiculous, mendacious, wretched poem. At least he gives thanks to the reader, and indeed in the poem with which he concluded his most wretched little verses:

> For what remains, my Muse declares herself grateful
>
> For so great an honor from the crown of hearers,
>
> Because it wished, by its presence, to adorn an aged man.

But because all attack the Pontiff from Daniel and Revelation and attempt to establish heresies by the corruption of the Scriptures, I too have undertaken to explain those passages, so that it may be evident to all how far they wander from the truth. In this matter I again, both deservedly and earnestly, protest that they cannot establish their faith from Revelation, since the foremost Lutherans and Calvinists rejected that book, and their successors cannot be more certain than they were. Second, they wrest against the Pontiff, and against all Catholics, the exceedingly obscure prophecies of Daniel and Revelation, understood variously by interpreters; and from the lightest conjectures they condemn them and decree the most atrocious punishments. Pareus--who in the year 1618, as the culmination of all the jubilees, published commentaries on Revelation--confesses: “Many Theologians of greater renown in our age--Luther, Melanchthon, Bucer, Martyr, Calvin, Beza, and others--abstained from the interpretation of Revelation. But this can neither diminish the authority of the book nor prejudice other interpreters. For who knows whether they were deterred by its obscurity, impeded by the mass of their labors, or hindered by lack of time, since they doubted very little concerning the authority of the book?”

Finally he confesses that they produced inventions which possessed little coherence or correspondence with the mind of the Holy Spirit. “From this it has come about that accumulated commentaries upon this book indeed exist, of which none fails to promise new light, while its obscurity has not only not been diminished but has in certain places been enveloped in denser darkness.” Pareus has never said anything truer in these matters; and if he continues thus, he will deserve some pardon for so many lies. It is therefore not just that we should be condemned from things so obscure. But let us examine the matter itself so that we may establish the Ecclesiastical magistracy, without which neither concord nor discipline can stand.

CHAPTER XXIII

The Angel of Revelation 14:6 Is Not Luther, nor Should Luther Be Heard against the Pontiff

§ 1. Revelation 14:6 reads as follows: "And I saw an angel flying through the midst of heaven, having the eternal Gospel, to evangelize those who sit upon the earth and every nation and tribe and tongue and people, saying with a loud voice: Fear the Lord and give him honor, because the hour of his judgment has come; and adore him who made heaven and earth, the sea and all things which are in them, and the fountains of waters. And another angel followed, saying: Fallen, fallen is that great Babylon, which made all nations drink from the wine of the wrath of her fornication. And a third angel followed them, saying with a loud voice: If anyone shall adore the beast and its image, and shall receive its mark upon his forehead or upon his hand, he shall drink from the wine of the wrath of God, which has been mixed with pure wine in the cup of his wrath, and he shall be tormented with fire and sulfur in the sight of the holy angels and before the sight of the Lamb."

For the jubilators this angel is Luther; he is not Luther for the older Lutherans or for the Calvinists. Many have used these words as the theme of sermons, especially Matthias Hoë, the Saxon Archpreacher, in five sermons On Luther the Wonder-Man and Triumphant, to whom I see the others fawning as a man to be venerated on account of his power at court. But it is marvelous that in so many sermons they do not prove by even one argument that Luther is the angel; they only affirm it and, as if it were certain, draw consequences from it and proclaim exclamations. Yet he is so foolish as to suppose that he preserves the Augsburg Confession intact or teaches the Gospel from Luther's opinions. For this reason in the first sermon he inveighs angrily against the Calvinists. Very many others occupied with this argument have interpreted this angel as Luther. Their reasoning is this: The angel who, flying through the midst of heaven, bears the book of the eternal Gospel must be heard. But that angel is Luther; therefore Luther must be heard; therefore the Pontiff is Antichrist.

Everyone sees that the whole difficulty consists in the minor premise. For if this is so, all of us must depart from the ancient faith; the Calvinists also must set sail back toward the Lutherans, from whom most of them departed.

Therefore it must first be considered diligently and in the fear of God whether this article is contained in the word of God: "Luther is the angel who possesses the book of the eternal Gospel." And if it is not in sacred Scripture, does it follow from it by an evident consequence? Our jubilators act ridiculously when, by praising Luther hyperbolically, contrary to truth and beyond faith, they suppose that they have finished the matter if they have invented some similarities between the two. The little pigs of Epicurus once praised Epicurus in his gardens with greater probability, believing him to have fallen, as it were, from heaven, than the worshipers of Luther transfer these oracles to Luther.

The reasons why I think thus are many.

The first. Because no one except a few Lutherans has interpreted the prophecy in this manner. Moreover, they agree in no manner. For Hutter, in the book On the Sacrifice, judges Luther to be the first angel; others judge the first angel to be Luther, but determinately insofar as he preached against indulgences; the other angel to be the same Luther when he reveals and condemns Antichrist; and the third angel to be Luther and the Lutherans who opposed the Interim and all compromises with the Pope. Third, the Calvinists have supposed that John Wycliffe, the Angelic Doctor, was this book-bearing angel. Thus Pareus on this passage:

"This angel is the English Doctor John Wycliffe, public Professor at the University of Oxford, a man most renowned throughout the whole world. When the whole West, marveling, followed the Roman beast, in the year 1371 he began in England to thunder against Antichrist in sermons and writings, teaching from the Gospel that there ought not to be any supreme Bishop in the Church of Christ; that the Pope is not the vicar of Christ but Antichrist; that his privileges, bulls, dispensations, and indulgences are empty, useless, and impious; that political dominion should not be given to spiritual men," and so forth.

Thus there is scarcely room for doubt that the Anabaptists will call their own men by the same name, the Socinians will call Ostorod, others Schwenckfeld; certainly no one among the others will deem Luther worthy of so great an honor. Therefore it is not fitting to rely upon this foundation to establish the faith, since the matter has not yet been proved.

The second reason. The nature of an angel differs exceedingly from the morals of Luther. I am unwilling to repeat the best-known things from his table-talk and his obscene language, which the whole world of Germany casts against him, and which posterity here and there, from shame at such great αἰσχρολογίας, erased. I ask only this: let Luther the Angelic be read. No other speech will be needed.

The third reason. He does not fly through the midst of heaven, ἐν μεσουρανήματι--that is, in a conspicuous place throughout the whole world--but in one part alone, which nevertheless was soon cut into fragments; and now even the name of the Lutheran Gospel is nearly extinguished, for the matter has long since gone away into nothing. For how small is the part of Germany in which the name of Lutheranism remains intact! And in those very corners it trembles most wretchedly under alien heresies; indeed, it is so despised that nothing is more abject than the ministers who worship Luther. As a prompt witness take the aged Paul Laurentius, preacher at Meissen, jubilee sermon 2, page 47: "Now churches are attended neither so diligently nor so piously, and sermons are heard less; everywhere men believe that they can learn these things by themselves. Not only do those eager to hear new things so disdain the office of preaching that many utterly refuse to allow their sons to enter the number of Preachers, but many sons of preachers also, after they have been raised to other degrees of honors and offices, are ashamed that they were begotten while their father was a preacher." Thus not even the adherents of Lutheranism regard their own preachers as angels of this kind, but hold them in contempt and derision as actors and patchers of lies.

The fourth reason. Luther's Gospel is not eternal; for no one knew it before Luther, and Luther survived it. If anyone denies this, he must name even one man before Luther, with Luther, or after Luther who agreed with Luther. Indeed, it must be shown that Luther remained consistent with himself--a thing which not even the Lutherans believe. The words of Pareus, book 4, chapter 13, On the Lord's Supper, are:

"Nor do I assume for myself judgment concerning so great a man and God's singular instrument against the papacy. At least, as regards this question, I shall say what I have answered more than once when asked and what his writings and the histories confirm: Luther must be distinguished from Luther. For he was a man who in controversy was often more fervent--as customarily happens to great intellects--than circumspect or observant of truth and right.

"Embrace him as an Augustinian until the year 24.

"Do not hold him as a Synecdochist until the year 29.

"Accept his Concord until the year 43.

"But flee him confessing little until the year 44.

"Again endure him confessing until the year 46."

Therefore that Gospel is not eternal which belongs now to an Augustinian, now to a Synecdochist, now to a man agreeing with Zwingli, then to one confessing little and perversely, and finally to one confessing his error, yet not without another error even when confessing an error.

Nevertheless, they object to us that Luther is therefore the angel because his flight was free from the Pope's jurisdiction. But this argument is of no weight. For all the heresies which formerly, and all those which now have emerged from hell, have usurped that liberty and license, although otherwise they are slaves of sin. Nor is it praiseworthy to despise the judgment of the Church and antiquity and to strive for glory under one's own auspices by an unaccustomed way. On this account, however, his flight was Icarian, and he fell into the Saxon papacy, as the Calvinist Clebitius writes; and Melanchthon complains that an iron yoke was imposed in place of a wooden one. But if the Ministers could see the truth, they would certainly perceive, more clearly than the sun, that there was and is greater liberty of teaching among us than among those who, bound by so many chains, imagine that they are apocalyptic Daedaluses. Do they not receive laws for teaching from kings and courts? I entreat them to examine the acts of Marburg from the year 1606, Antwort auff den Historischen Bericht der Marpurgischen Kirchhändel, pages 49 and 50. The most illustrious Landgrave of Hesse explains to the Lutherans who refused to yield their Churches and ministry his own right. The exiles themselves relate the matter in these words:

> Dass wir aber vns beschweren/ vnsere Diensten selbsten Ihr. Furstl. Gn. auffzutragen/ vnd zu resignieren/ käme Ihr das wunderbarlich für/ da sie uns noch nie nicht angenommen/ sondern es weren solche Aempter allbereits loss gestorben mit dem Herrn/ dem wir zuuor gedienet/ vnd ipso facto vns resigniert.

"That we are aggrieved at ourselves delivering and resigning our ministries to His Princely Highness appeared astonishing to him, since he had not yet accepted us; rather, all those offices had become vacant and expired with the death of the former lord whom we had served, and by that very fact had been resigned to His Highness." Behold the liberty of angels flying through the midst of heaven. Secular princes can not only dismiss, receive, and issue commands concerning preaching; rather, with their death, just as the palatine offices of scribes and grooms cease, so also do the ministries of preachers, and they are not valid except by the will and acceptance of the new lord.

The sixth reason. The speech of this angel and that of Luther do not agree. The angel's words are: "Fear the Lord and give him honor, because the hour of his judgment has come; and adore him who made heaven and earth and the sea and all things which are in it and the fountains of waters."

Luther's word is that the fear of God is pernicious and makes men greater sinners. He prohibits Christ from being considered as judge and avenger.

Then he teaches a confidence which excludes all fear. The angel commands that the Lord be feared because the hour of his judgment has come. But both Lutherans and Calvinists judge that to fear the judgment of God and the punishments decreed by his judgment is a murmuring against God and leads to despair. Yet this angel by no means exhorts men to crimes and blasphemies.

Nor is that angel Wycliffe, as Pareus supposes. For this angel does not teach heresies, but Wycliffe brought forth many heresies which even Pareus cannot deny are heresies. In Sessions 8 and 45 of the Council of Constance, forty-five articles which the Council condemned are numbered, and Pareus also ought to condemn some of these:

The fourth article: If a Bishop or Priest is in mortal sin, he does not ordain, consecrate, confect, or baptize.

The sixth: God ought to obey the Devil.

The tenth: It is contrary to sacred Scripture that ecclesiastical men should possess property.

The eleventh: No Prelate ought to excommunicate anyone unless he first knows that he has been excommunicated by God; and he who excommunicates in this manner thereby becomes a heretic and excommunicate.

The fifteenth: No one is a civil Lord, no one a Prelate, and no one a Bishop while he is in mortal sin.

The seventeenth: Common people can correct offending Lords according to their own judgment.

The twenty-seventh: All things happen from absolute necessity.

The twenty-ninth: Universities, schools, Colleges, degrees, and Masterships in them are empty things introduced by paganism and profit the Church as much as the Devil does.

The forty-third: Oaths made to confirm human contracts and civil commerce are unlawful.

The forty-fifth: All religious orders without distinction were introduced by the Devil.

Others have collected other teachings: that marriage between brothers and sisters is lawful by divine law and prohibited only by human ordinance, thus book 4 of the Trialogue, chapter 20. And this, which is altogether blasphemous: that any creature whatsoever can be and be called God, because its perfection is in God as in its cause, and indeed in an ideal and exemplary manner.

But what of the fact that he acknowledges true Pontiffs down to Urban, while Calvin thinks Gregory was the last, and others begin the Antichristians with Linus and Cletus? His words are in error 9: "After Urban VI no other Pontiff is to be received." But he had communion with Urban. Therefore, if Wycliffe is a true angel, all the Preachers are condemned because they possess property--not as much as they would wish, but as much as the court permits.

He retained many Catholic teachings which the Calvinists detest. In book 2, chapter 4, and book 3, chapter 2, he acknowledges merit.

He places faith in the intellect and distinguishes it from hope, book 3, chapter 2, which is contrary to the Calvinists.

He says in the same place that faith possesses merit.

He distinguishes faith and hope in three ways, book 3, chapter 3: 1. hope concerns only eternal reward; faith concerns every other truth. 2. Hope rests in a certain act midway between doubt and belief. 3. Hope concerns only a possible good; faith also concerns evil. These things are contrary to Calvin.

In chapter 3, book 3, he says that God approves and necessitates sin, and thus necessitates a peccable creature to sin. Many Calvinists deny this, and rightly.

In chapter 5 he says that grace is extinguished by some sin. In this part, therefore, he is rigorous.

In chapter 6 he says that many of the foreknown--that is, the reprobate--are presently in grace.

In book 4, chapter 1, he acknowledges seven Sacraments.

In book 4, chapter 20, he calls Matrimony a venerable Sacrament.

In book 4, chapter 22, he acknowledges purgatory.

In book 4, chapter 24, he calls contrition sorrow sufficient for the erasure of sin, and says that to repent is to lament sins and not to commit things which must be lamented.

He teaches these and other things alien to present-day Calvinism, so that Pareus appeared more ridiculous to me when he canonized Wycliffe and made him an angel than when he said that Calvinists and Lutherans disagree in only one article, and not in that whole article. But a most black demon cannot be made into an angel without enormous lies.

Nevertheless Pareus excuses himself: "Brichmann's conjecture does not displease me: that by this flight is signified the imperfection of the doctrine first brought forth by those Doctors. For although they saw and reproved the grosser errors of the Pope, nevertheless something of the earthly dregs still adhered to them in many things, so that they could not raise themselves upon full wings into the highest heaven. For just as a man who has long lain hidden in darkness, suddenly coming forth into the light, sees all things with dimmed eyes, so those who had been detained in the darkness of so many centuries of papacy could not immediately behold the light of the Gospel except with dimmed eyes."

But first, this is absurd: that an angel should be so ignorant, so blasphemous, and should be sent as a Teacher to all who sit upon the earth, over every tribe and nation and tongue and people; that an angel, I say--a universal Teacher of the world, holding the eternal Gospel and sent so solemnly by God--should carry about so many errors under the name of the eternal Gospel. If, therefore, the angels err in so many matters, there is no reason why we should believe them. For Wycliffe agreed with us in more matters than with the Calvinists.

Moreover, since that angel comes at the time when the second beast makes men adore the image of the first beast; since, according to the adversaries, the first beast is the Empire or Emperor and the other is the Pope or papacy; and since the Pope has not yet commanded the image of the Emperor or Empire to be adored or his mark to be borne, that angel has not yet come either. Therefore he was not Wycliffe. Accordingly, those three angels will be three principal Teachers in the time of Antichrist, who will oppose the beast and promulgate true doctrine.

CHAPTER XXIV

The Roman Pontiff Is Not Described by the Words of Daniel 7:21 and 8:23

§ 1. The words of Daniel 7:21 are: “I was looking, and behold, that horn was making war against the saints and prevailing over them, until the Ancient of Days came and gave judgment to the saints of the Most High; and the time came, and the saints obtained the kingdom.” And thus he says: “The fourth beast will be the fourth kingdom upon the earth, which will be greater than all kingdoms, and it will devour the whole earth and trample and crush it. Moreover, the ten horns of that kingdom will be ten kings; and another will arise after them, and he will be mightier than those before him, and he will humble three kings. And he will speak words against the Most High and wear down the saints of the Most High; and he will think that he can change times and laws, and they will be delivered into his hand until a time and times and half a time.”

The words of Daniel the Prophet in chapter 8 are: “And after their reign, when iniquities have increased, a king shameless of face and understanding propositions will arise; and his strength will be made strong, but not by his own powers; and beyond what can be believed he will lay waste all things, and he will prosper and act. And he will kill the mighty and the people of the saints according to his will; and deceit will be directed in his hand, and he will magnify his heart, and amid an abundance of all things he will kill very many; and he will rise against the Prince of princes, and without a hand he will be crushed. And the vision of evening and morning which was spoken is true. You, therefore, seal the vision, because it will be after many days.”

And chapter 11:36: “And the king will act according to his will, and he will be raised up and magnified against every god; and against the God of gods he will speak great things, and he will prosper until the wrath is completed, for the determination has been accomplished. And he will have no regard for the God of his fathers, and he will be among the lusts of women, nor will he care for any of the gods, because he will rise against all things. But he will venerate the god Maozim in his place, and a god whom his fathers did not know he will worship with gold and silver and precious stone and precious things; and he will act so as to fortify Maozim with the foreign god whom he has known, and he will multiply glory and give them power over many, and he will divide the land freely. And at the appointed time the king of the South will fight against him, and like a tempest the king of the North will come against him in chariots and horsemen and a great fleet; and he will enter the lands and crush and pass through, and he will enter the glorious land, and many will fall.” They say that the Pontiff does all these things. I shall report them from Paul Laurentius, for many write the same things.

First, he says in sermon 1 that the Pope’s legate Tetzel taught that the red cross bearing the Pope’s insignia had the same power as the cross of Christ.

Second, that indulgences are justifying grace.

Third, that through indulgences sins are forgiven without repentance.

Fourth, that he even remits future sins. These concern doctrine.

Fifth, that the Pope is called המלך, “that king”--the certain king who corresponds to Antiochus in malice and crimes.

Sixth, that Boniface VIII denied confirmation to Albert, saying that he himself was both king and Pontiff; that he also went about in royal attire and said, “Behold the two swords here.”

Seventh, that he wrote to Philip, King of France: “We wish you to know that in both spiritual and temporal matters you are subject to us.”

Eighth, that he is above the law and wishes to be judged by no one.

Ninth, that he will do whatever he wishes.

Tenth, that he will exalt himself against God.

Eleventh, that he says he can do all things which God can do.

Twelfth, that he makes himself God, distinction 96, canon 7, Satis, and sermon 2.

Thirteenth, that he calls himself the vicar of Christ.

Fourteenth, that he equates an Agnus Dei with the blood of Christ. Thus Urban V sent one to a certain Emperor of Greece and wrote: "It breaks sin as does the blood of Christ, and constrains it."

Fifteenth, that he abolishes marriage and permits the other lusts.

Sixteenth, that he worships Mauzim and becomes an idolater.

Seventeenth, that Pius IV ordered eighty Evangelicals to be killed, and that others instituted many persecutions.

Matthias Hoë, in the preface to Luther the Wonder-Man, says that under Julius II one million were killed.

§ 2. But these things have been related partly with the greatest falsehood and partly with the greatest malice. Let us interpret Scripture, though it is best to begin with chapter 7, verse 24:

"Moreover, the ten horns of that kingdom will be ten kings, and another will arise after them, and he will be mightier than those before him, and he will humble three kings."

In the Chaldean it is מִלְכְוָתָא מִנַּה, minnah malkhuta, "from the kingdom," for they will arise from the kingdom. But that other one is said to be mightier than they--or, as the Chaldean has it, יְשַׁנֵּא, "differing," surpassing the others, or differing beyond the others. The Roman Greek edition interprets this not simply of power, but of impiety: ὃς ὑπερίσει κακοῖς πάντας τοὺς ἔμπροσθεν, "who will surpass in evils all those before him"; other editions, however, have omitted the expression τοῖς κακοῖς, "in evils." Porphyry formerly said that the little horn was Antiochus, who was called Noble, or Epiphanes. So also Bruchthon, Junius, and Tremellius, who enumerate these ten horns as follows:

1. Seleucus Nicanor. 2. Antiochus Soter. 3. Antiochus Θεός, Theos. 4. Seleucus Callinicus.

5. Ptolemy Euergetes. 6. Seleucus Ceraunus. 7. Antiochus the Great, or Hierax. 8. Ptolemy Philopator. 9. Seleucus Philopator. 10. Antiochus Epiphanes.

Three kings humbled by Epiphanes:

Ptolemy Philopator.

Seleucus, brother of Epiphanes.

Demetrius.

§ 3. This opinion is easily refuted by all those arguments by which it is proved that the little horn belongs to the fourth beast, which is the Roman Empire. Nevertheless, that error of the Calvinists is advantageous to us, because from it it is evident that the conjecture concerning the Pontiff is uncertain, since the leading men among them do not at all extend this prophecy to Christian times. But because we rely upon truth, not upon another's error, let us refute this opinion also.

First, that opinion contains an ἀνισορίαν, an inconsistency in its reckoning. For either, when they make him the tenth, they enumerate only the Seleucid kings of Syria--and in that manner Epiphanes would be the eighth--or, if they add the two Ptolemies Euergetes and Philopator, then by the same reasoning Ptolemy son of Lagus must be joined to them, who, as Josephus attests in book 13 of the Antiquities, occupied Syria and the city; and also Ptolemy's son, who was called Philadelphus, under whom the translation by the seventy-two interpreters was made.

Second, they do not agree concerning the three humbled kings. Porphyry judges them to have been Philometor and Euergetes, the Egyptians, and Artaxias the Armenian. The Calvinists appoint this Demetrius. But he did not greatly humble the Egyptians, for he was forced to depart with his purpose unaccomplished. Nor was Epiphanes mightier than the others, but was wretched and needy after the treasury had been exhausted, as the history of the Maccabees testifies. Certainly Seleucus Nicanor, after defeating Lysimachus, ruled more widely, as did Antiochus the Great himself and others.

The other opinion is that the little horn is the Turk; so Annius, Pintus, Vatablus, Luther himself, and Strigel. But among them there is nevertheless no agreement concerning the three kings whom the Turk humbled. Some name the Arabian, Egyptian, and Asiatic kingdoms. In place of the Arabian kingdom Luther put the Greek kingdom. And he adds that the Turk will cast down no more before the final day of judgment. But if that is true, neither Germans nor Italians can be held in fear of that tyrant; even Pannonia itself will not dread his proximity. Daniel refutes this opinion when he says that they are kings, not kingdoms, and that kings are to be cast down. When Luther boldly pronounces that the Roman Monarchy was divided into ten kingdoms--namely Syria, Egypt, Asia, Greece, Italy, Gaul, Spain, Africa, Germany, and England--he speaks in his own manner, more freely than considerately. For what shall we say of Illyricum, the regions of Istria, and even Mesopotamia? Then the Turk holds several kingdoms: Syria, Egypt, Asia, Greece, and Africa. To say nothing of the Spains possessed by the Saracens for eight hundred years, five or six horns, therefore, have been cast down.

§ 4. Impious and blasphemous is the opinion of the Jews that the little horn is Christ the Lord, who began from small beginnings--the son of a carpenter and companion of robbers upon the cross--and whose Apostles were fishermen. Second, he spoke immense things: that he was the Son of God. Third, he changed times and laws. Fourth, he reigned for a time and times and half a time, for from his baptism to the cross are three and a half years. Fifth, this horn was crushed by the people of the saints, by the Synagogue. But Christians and Turks receive them with hisses, particularly because after this horn was crushed the kingdom was not given to the people of God, that is, to the Jews; rather, destruction befell them and captivity lasting so many centuries. Then, if the little horn is the kingdom of the Christians, how does it obtain only three kingdoms in the Roman Empire? Which are those three, and which the remaining seven? Then it was not Christians who destroyed Judaea, but enemies of the Christians--Vespasian, Hadrian, and others. That the remaining details do not agree will be said in the explanations that follow.

The sectarians of our time imitate these men, and what they do not dare direct against Christ they vomit forth against his vicars.

§ 5. The true opinion, therefore, is that of very many Fathers: that the little horn is Antichrist. "Therefore let us say," Jerome says upon this passage, "what all ecclesiastical writers have handed down: that at the consummation of the world, when the kingdom of the Romans is to be destroyed, there will be ten kings who will divide the Roman world among themselves; then an eleventh, little king will arise, who will separate three kings from those seven, that is, the kings of Egypt, Africa, and Ethiopia; and after these have been killed, the other seven kings also will submit their necks to the victor."

Antichrist, therefore, is one king who will subject three kings reigning at the same time, as Theodoret rightly says. "But if," he says, "they did not rule at the same time, but singly succeeded those before them, different men succeeding others, how will he humble these three predecessors at the same time?" Graser, in The Plague on Revelation 13, says that that chapter of John leads us into the citadel of Antichrist and agrees with Daniel 7. But I prove in explicit words that these things have no relation to the Pontiff.

§ 6. First, the Pontiff did not humble three kings. For either we speak of his temporal dominion, and this is contained within no great part of Latium, or of his spiritual power, and that was always over all Christian kings and kingdoms, not merely over three. Germany, Gaul, Italy, Spain, Poland, and other kingdoms still acknowledge it. Accordingly, nothing in this part coheres, and an invincible argument for the Catholic faith arises: the Roman Pontiff did not arise after the ten kings who held the Roman world divided, nor did he humble three of those kings; therefore the Pontiff is not this little horn.

From here I proceed to the other matters. In the judgment of very many, the Pontiff is not this little horn, nor can he be; therefore he is also not that king treated in chapter 8, nor the apocalyptic beast. For the sectarians affirm that this horn, that king, and the apocalyptic beast are one kingdom or monarchy. If, therefore, this horn has no relation to the Pope's kingdom, neither do those beasts. For things which do not agree with something also do not agree with that which is identical with that something.

Then verse 25: "And he will speak words against the Most High," and so forth.

The Chaldean text which Daniel used says עִלָּאִ֔ין לְצַדִּ֖יק, which properly means: "He will speak words toward the side, or on the part, of the Most High." The Septuagint translates: λόγους πρὸς τὸν ὕψιστον λαλήσει--"He will speak words toward the Most High." Symmachus, according to Jerome's testimony, translates: "He will speak words as God," so that he who assumes the power of God also claims for himself words of divine majesty. Second Thessalonians 2: "He will show himself as though he were God." The Pontiff does not do this; therefore he is not that horn of which the Prophet Daniel speaks. The minor premise is certain among all legitimate judges. For the Pontiff professes himself to be a man, a sinner, a servant of God, the servant of the servants of God. Every day he confesses his sins to God, and often also to priests; he prostrates himself upon his face before God. All these things belong to a man, and to a man who knows God and groans over his own weakness, not to one who aspires to divinity.

§ 7. Here they all rise up. First: he who wishes to be judged by no one makes himself God; but the Pope wishes to be judged by no one; therefore he aspires to divinity. For if the Pope drags innumerable souls with him to hell, such is his pride that he does not wish anyone to say to him, "Why do you act thus?" I shall transcribe for you the complete passage from the epistle of the most holy Archbishop of Mainz and martyr Boniface, for part of it is found in distinction 40, canon 6, Si Papa. Boniface's words are as follows:

"The holy Roman Church, made by divine and human privilege of special authority the head of all churches after Christ Jesus, affects the members of the whole of Christendom according to the character and health of its Bishop or ruler, so that they answer to its soundness with their own soundness and rejoice with it; and, no less, accord with its illnesses by their own illness. And just as, according to the Apostle, they are glorified together with its glory, so are they cast down by its abasement, so that in it especially that prophetic saying is found to be fulfilled: 'Every head is diseased and every heart grieving; from the sole of the foot even to the crown there is no soundness in it.' And, in truth, all men look up to the summit of the aforesaid Apostolic See with such reverence that some seek the discipline of the holy canons and the ancient institution of the Christian religion more from the mouth of its prelate than from the sacred pages and paternal traditions. They so investigate his willing and his refusing that, according to his judgment, they themselves relax or intensify their conduct.

"But if--as is supremely expedient for himself and all--consumed without interruption by zeal for the house of God, existing as a faithful and prudent steward, he shall have striven to preserve himself irreproachable before God and men in deed and speech, then, to speak almost truly, he makes nearly the whole world, astonished and solicitous, run with him after God; he leads in ranks peoples of each sex and of diverse profession, condition, and age, to be set by their Lord over all his goods. But if he is found negligent of his own and his brethren's salvation, useless and remiss in his works, and moreover silent concerning the good--which harms himself and all men more--he nevertheless leads innumerable peoples in ranks with himself, as the first slave of Gehenna, to be scourged with him by many blows for eternity. No mortal presumes to reprove his faults here, because, although he is to judge all, he is to be judged by no one, unless perhaps he is found to have strayed from the faith. For his perpetual condition the whole body of the faithful prays the more earnestly, the more keenly they perceive their salvation after God to depend upon his soundness.

"For, with the mystery of divine omnipotence preserved as is fitting, in the place second after him that saying of blessed Job can not unfittingly be applied to the holy Roman Church: 'If he destroys, there is no one who may build; and if he shuts a man in, there is none who may open to him; if he withholds the waters, all things will be dried up; and if he sends them forth, they will overthrow the earth.' Nor is this without reason, since she especially retains in Peter the reins of heaven and earth. Since she is the spiritual mother of all the faithful in Christ, no one ought to refuse to be struck by her discipline or corrected by her censure, according to those Proverbs of Solomon: 'Do not forsake the law of your mother; bind it continually upon your heart. For he who casts away discipline is unhappy, and a foolish man despises his mother'; and again: 'He is accursed by God who provokes his mother, and the curse of a mother uproots foundations.' Those things, indeed, which arrogantly are divided from her see--to which it was said, 'You are Peter, and upon this rock I shall build my Church'--are proved to have been placed upon the sand of carnal desire or human presumption. The course of a stream can by no means prosper if it is divided from its source."

§ 8. This is the passage which fills everyone's books, as though we attributed such great right to the Pope. Here come exclamations and stamps of the feet. Yet it is right that we too be heard. First, the words are those of Boniface, a holy man. Second, the words can have a true sense. For the sense of the whole canon is what its title presents: "An Apostolic Pontiff who is negligent of his own and his brethren's salvation is condemned." For there are two antithetical statements. The first is: "A Pope who is a faithful steward makes the world run after God." The other is: "But if he is negligent, he nevertheless leads many peoples with himself who are to be scourged in Gehenna." For because of either his examples or his negligence many perish. Condemnation, therefore, hangs over him if he is negligent.

But this gives offense: that no one reproves his faults. Yet the sense of this too is not that no one is permitted to admonish the Pontiff; for many grave men admonished many Pontiffs, and Paul gave an example when he resisted Peter to his face. Certainly a confessor can reprove and rebuke him, and no less can Cardinals, Bishops, and those whose concern it is. What, then, does Boniface mean when he denies that the Pontiff can be reproved? What he adds: "Because, although he is to judge all, he is to be judged by no one." It is because there is no tribunal before which he can be summoned as a subject. For no subject can judge anyone by authority.

And this is what is said in cause 17, question 4, canon 30, Nemini; cause 9, question 3, canon 17, Cuncta; and other places. For judicial reproof is excluded. Nor ought this to appear astonishing to our sectarians, who so exempt kings from every judgment that they say kings are nearest to God and that above them there is only almighty God. See William Barrett's books On Royal Right, in which he places truth and flatteries side by side, yet is overcome by the desire to flatter. If, therefore, kings are not compelled to stand as defendants before the tribunals of their subjects, why should the Pontiff be compelled, since he too is not the subject of other Bishops and kings?

§ 9. They object, second, that Antichrist wears down the saints of the Most High; the Pontiff does this; therefore he is that horn, he is Antichrist.

But it will be easier for me to interpret those words so as to show the Pontiff's innocence and to turn them back against our adversaries. The words themselves indicate a great persecution: יְבַלֶּא עֶלְיוֹנִין לְקַדִּישֵׁי leqaddishe ʿelyonin yeballe', "he will wear down the saints of the Most High," or "of the high ones." For it uses that עֶלְיוֹנִין "high ones," just as the Hebrews use אֱלֹהִים Elohim, in the plural number. Accordingly, some do not translate correctly, "the highest or supreme saints"; since they did not attend to the government of the word, they ought not to have preferred themselves to the Septuagint interpreters, who translated τοὺς ἁγίους τοῦ ὑψίστου, "the saints of the Most High." "He will wear down." The Roman edition of the Septuagint has παλαιώσει, "he will make old," or "consume with age"; the Genevan, however, πλανήσει, "he will deceive"; Justin, καταφθείρει, "he will overthrow"; others, ταπεινώσει, "he will humble." The question is whether the Pontiff has done these things. They bring forward various matters, but examples from their own people. For what the Lutherans think of the Calvinist martyrs, and conversely what the latter think of the former, I have said in the Jubilee and in the instruction On Chronology.

§ 10. Before all others Sigismund Evenius objects to this in the Secular Lutheran-Evangelical Palm, page 27:

"After the descent from these kings to their subjects had been made--just as immediately at the beginning of the Reformation the Papists, and in the year 1524 the Archbishop of Mainz, raged against the Evangelicals even here in our Halle--they sowed one persecution after another and multiplied martyrdoms without end, so much so that from the year 1550 to 1580, within the span of thirty years, nine hundred thousand men were slain and butchered by Antichrist. Nor were all of them commoners, but 39 Princes, 148 Counts, 235 Barons, 147,511 Nobles, and the rest from the common people. The histories establish how much Christian blood the Parisian nuptials poured out in the year '72: more than 30,000 miserably perished in that slaughter. When the Duke of Alba was about to bid farewell to the Low Countries, he boasted that within a span of six years he had killed 18,000 on account of religion. And while Charles V was still alive, as many as fifty thousand Christians were butchered in the same Low Countries; likewise, from the year '76 until the Pacification of Ghent, 30,000 had perished under Spanish tyranny.

"Nor did they rage only against the living, but corpses were not spared. Hence the bodies of Bucer and Fagius were dug up and burned in 1556 at Cambridge in England, under the pious pretext that not only had both of them spread pernicious and erroneous doctrine, but both had also led a family among the sectarians; that not only had they themselves strayed from the Catholic Church, but by defecting from it had also given others an example; and that it was contrary to the sacred decrees and discipline for even the bodies of such persons to be given ecclesiastical burial.

"To these were added fires and poisons, by which certain agents might destroy and butcher those freed from these snares. Various fires were heard of throughout Saxony around the year '41; finally, several of the arsonists were detected and captured in different places. When put to the question, most testified even to their last breath that, after receiving money from the officials and household of Henry of Brunswick--against whose calumnies Luther had written in the same year in invective writings, because he had proclaimed the Duke of Saxony a heretic, seditious, a Cain, a monster, an Aesop endowed with no virtue either of body or soul--they had been hired and sent to do this.

"Indeed, concerning the Roman Pontiff, Antichrist and instrument of Satan, it was spread abroad by trustworthy persons in the year '46, when the war of the Protestants was raging--a war of which the Pope himself was the principal author--that not only had he afflicted Saxony grievously by fire through hired arsonists during several preceding years, but that at that time he had also purchased poisoners to corrupt wells and standing waters, so that these men might destroy by poison whatever survived the sword and weapons. Therefore the Protestants admonished all men generally, and especially those under their dominion, to take care that those commissioners be apprehended and, when the crime was established under torture, pay the penalty. For John William, son of the Elector, adds that not long before, not far from Weimar, a certain man suspected of being an Italian had been apprehended, who confessed that money had been given at Rome to him and certain others in the name of the Pontiff, so that throughout Germany they might do as much damage as they possibly could by fires and poison.

"Nor does Satan cease to be like himself. For in the most recent year 1610, on the eleventh day of June, a monk who had disfigured by fire two villages belonging to the Emperor's Master of the Horse was brought as a prisoner to Prague and handed over to the Archbishop, together with a list found upon him of other Bohemian nobles whose estates he was to set on fire.

"I pass over exiles. How great a tyranny occurred in them is evident from this alone: as Maurice, Duke of Saxony, wrote to the Estates in the year '52, they everywhere cast preachers and ministers of the Church beyond the boundaries of the Empire, and await the decree not only of no legitimate council, but not even of a papist one, and they regulate the matter immediately from the execution itself. I pass over prisons and the other kinds of punishments inflicted under and by the Roman Antichrist."

§ 11. Thus he speaks. If he considers that Lutherans were driven into exile by Lutherans and by Calvinists, he will marvel not at all that Catholics also did this at some time. But the matter itself teaches that this accusation is unjust, for the Pope neither ordered all those men to be killed, nor were there so many. But that they were not saints of the Most High, since most were Calvinists, and that these were not martyrs, the Secular Palm itself teaches. On page 55 it has this:

"The martyrdoms appeared both too weak as ὀρθοδοξίας τεκμήρια, proofs of orthodoxy--since they not rarely embrace heretics and ruined scoundrels--and inflicted for the Lutheran profession and the abnegation of papal tyranny, not for Zwinglian novelty and blasphemies. The very slight straws or splinters of opinions which they vaunt are instead the thickest beams of errors and of most impious blasphemies against God's omnipotence, holiness, and mercy and Christ's merit. Finally, the deception in their confessions and reformations is more manifest than to require adjudication, since practice has not rarely uncovered it until now."

Then he believes the Calvinists concerning the number of martyrs, which he ought not to have done, since on the same fifty-fifth page of the Palm he says: "Among the reckoning of these falsehoods--of which a very fertile crop is to be found among the Sacramentarian nation, so that blessed Luther not undeservedly judged that the Zwinglians should no longer be called liars, but falsehood itself--that claim is almost chief," and so forth.

Third, this same man of ours acknowledges that those accused men who were slain had committed offenses. Second, that they were Sacramentarians. Third, that they were punished by the sectarians themselves. Fourth, that those men procured those dangers for themselves. Fifth, that they acted impetuously and were punished by the Lutheran populace. Sixth, that the Calvinists themselves act cruelly where they hold power. On folio 94 he describes all these things:

It is known how in the year '29 the Sacramentarian spirit began the Reformation at Basel with iconoclasm. For when a certain man tore down with his spear the statue of one of the saints so that it fell to the earth and was broken, on that occasion hands were then laid upon several more, and three hundred armed men were sent to the church to demolish everywhere in the churches the idols, or statues. And when certain men from the Senate came running to quiet the disturbance, the iconoclasts answered: "What you have already been deliberating for a whole three years--whether it ought to be done--we shall complete in one hour, so that henceforth there may be no dissension among us on account of idols." On the third day nine piles were assembled before the principal church and, when set on fire, were burned.

The Waldensians followed this example in the year '61; they similarly cast images and altars to the ground and broke them. Something similar happened in Dauphiné in the year '62, where it was decreed that destroyers of statues should by no means be called seditious, since, having undertaken the defense of truth, they said it was their duty to remove from men's sight so detestable a spectacle, hateful to all the pious.

Especially in the year '66, such great violence of iconoclasts gained strength throughout the whole of the Low Countries that within the span of a few days it overran Antwerp and very many neighboring places with the greatest tumult and great speed. They thrust a sword into the side of one statue; they cut off the head of another with an axe; with ropes they pulled down from on high an image of Christ hanging from the cross; after pulling it down, they crushed it into pieces; they overturned altars, cast down and plundered reliquaries, ornaments, and the other apparatus of sacred things; and finally they perpetrated things which no sane or prudent man ever approved. At The Hague the people had been so inflamed against statues and idols that they professed that they would not be quiet until not only those which remained in the churches, but also all the statues which some men kept hidden in their own houses, were brought into the public square and crushed into little pieces, putting an end to their fury.

But this rashness and sedition did not lack its own reward. For the confederate nobles and other patrons of the churches, unwilling to be called by the hateful name of iconoclasts, not only severely disapproved the deed of the statues cast down in this manner, but, after collecting an irregular soldiery for these operations, seized very many everywhere and put them upon the cross in various places.

This the Prince of Orange also accomplished at Antwerp, when he apprehended the principal seditious men and on 18 October put them upon the cross in the public square, so that they might be a terror to others. But if the same thing had been done in the Palatinate, Anhalt, Hesse, and other places, the riotous Sacramentarians, constrained by their own great evil, would certainly have experienced less danger and fewer disturbances.

Certainly, in 1605, when in the Marburg Reformation, in the second of three articles proposed for changing doctrine and ceremonies, it was determined that statues and images were to be cast out of the churches, and on the sixth day of August the same thing was inculcated in a sermon, such disturbances and tumults followed from this single violent principle that the Calvinist theologians were almost punished with death by blows and beatings from the maddened populace, says Artus in volume 10 of the continuation of Sleidan, book 4, page 50. Such catastrophes must, to be sure, follow methods of reforming alien to the word of God.

> Da man alles schnell Purdi/ Purdi anfengt/ mit Fäusten hinein treibet/ vnnd so unvorsichtig hinein plumpet/ vnnd noch den Ruhm dauon haben wil/ als sey man besser/ denn ein ander.

These things follow when action is suddenly taken with weapons, when men rush in without foresight, and nevertheless seek from it a reputation for excellence above others. Thus Luther wrote in the year ’22 concerning the similar Carlstadt Reformation, adding the wise ἐπικρίσει, judgment:

> Da hastu weit gefehlet/ du wilt Gott damit dienen/ vnd weist nit/ dass dit eben des Teuffels Vorlauffer bist/ der hat dich auff das Kleinen Narrenwerck geführet/ das Sacrament anzugreiffen/ vnd sihet mich gleich an/ als hetten die ienigen/ so dieses Spiel angefangen haben/ ihren Ruhm gesuchet/ so hat auch ihnen der Teuffel ihren Lohn gegeben.

“You have strayed far. You wished to perform service for God, and you do not know that you are precisely the Devil’s forerunner, who reduced you to such folly that you violated the Sacraments. It is entirely evident to me that those who began the business sought their own glory. Therefore the Devil gave them their reward.” Thus Luther.

Add the prisons by which they rage against those who contradict their error, as Crell did in the year ’91. He had prepared a prison in the castle of Hohnstein for Doctor Martin Mirus, the Saxon court preacher; but by the just judgment of God, after the death of Christian I, he himself was accused of having advised Duke Christian to change the religion in Saxony and introduce Calvinism, and of having resolved to remove from their midst all who opposed this purpose of his, and so forth. Ordered to mount the cart, he was fastened into it before the eyes of a very great multitude of men.

All these and many other things are so great, so insidious, and so atrocious that to guard against them, preserve life and fortunes safely, and keep doctrine itself undefiled by them plainly lies ὑπὲρ ἀνθρώπους, beyond human powers. But it is by God’s grace that we have not been entirely consumed. For although he sometimes, as it were, closed his eyes and fell asleep, and loosened the reins for Sacramentarian lust, yet at last, as a father, he undertook the defense of his cause, routed and confounded the enemies by himself alone, and furnished to his people and Church a most ardently desired liberation, so that mighty Ilium fell, great Troy perished in one moment, and the fable of the Sacramentarians passed out into a fable and ended in a joyful καταστροφήν, catastrophe, which they had resolved in their own mind to close with a τραγικωτάτῳ, most tragic, ending.

§ 12. Finally, why does a Lutheran object to us the punishments of the Calvinists as though they were innocent men, when he knows that they dared monstrous things in France and the Low Countries, such as historians describe, since they cannot believe those men when they boast of their innocence?

For first, on folio 55: “Among the reckoning of these falsehoods--of which a very fertile crop is to be found among the Sacramentarian nation, so that blessed Luther not undeservedly judged that the Zwinglians should no longer be called liars, but falsehood itself--that claim is almost chief by which, throughout nearly this whole century, they have not feared to proclaim blessed Luther the first author of the Sacramentarian conflict.”

If they are falsehood itself--falsehood itself, I say--why do you believe falsehood itself when it asserts its innocence against the Kings of France and Spain and other Princes? First examine the proceedings of the judgments and the archives; and do not so hate the Pontiff that you prefer to believe not merely liars, but falsehood itself, rather than refrain from defaming him and the Most Christian and Catholic Kings.

But I meet you in your own house; you will fight among your own defenses. The Calvinists say that those afflicted with martyrdom by the Pontiff are martyrs--that is, innocent men killed for the true faith. If you believe this, admit testimony against your own men also. For why are martyrs worthy of trust against us, but, if their words act against your men, incapable of giving testimony? You order the Calvinist Scultetus on page 59 to swallow back, together with the rest, the calumny which he breathed out. Then you proceed: “If there were a mind to discuss these calumnies individually, the day would fail me sooner than speech.”

We shall show a compendium of the calumnies. They called the teachers of our churches: men most stupid; fanatics; self-lovers; petty theologians; vain talkers; most wicked sophists; sycophants; theosophists; corporalists; morose; ambitious; papal proscribers; men keeping the minds of Princes in ignorance through their calumnies; progenitors of Pandora; men driven by madness; forgetful of all moderation and shame; proud; fierce; most infamous tyrants over faith; Nestorians; Eutychians; patrons of Mohammedanism; obstinate; introducers of paradoxes and scandals; inhuman; bewitched by hatred and ambition; men offering vinegar mixed with gall to those hanging upon the cross; fathers of ubiquity; new dogmatists; dinner-table sophists; word-artificers; men contentious and obstinate beyond every measure; recent Capernaïtes; malicious old deceivers; infamously and impiously fickle; Ubiquitarians; sworn enemies of truth; most shameless cavillers; revivers of the Acephali and the Eutychian heresy; phantasmatics who mock the true incarnation of Christ; a conspiratorial faction of schismatics; restorers of bread-worship; delirious Sacramentarians; assertors of sincere doctrine concerning the Lord’s Supper who, like pirates sailing through the Church upon ambition and opinions, plunder truth together with peace; men blinded by hatred and envy; most wicked sophists; new masters of the faith; deceivers; enemies of truth and peace; conspirators for the oppression of truth; most shameless cavillers; men infamously ignorant of the matters; manifest enemies and deniers of God’s omnipotence; pseudo-Lutherans and a Flacian faction; ἀνθρωποφάγους, κρεωφάγους, σαρκοφάγους--carnivores.

But they called the doctrine of our churches, contained in the symbols of the Augsburg Confession and the Formula of Concord: a most infamous error; an unhappy offspring; a Pandora; a phantom and specter; a theatrical mask; a most absurd impiety; a most putrid and sophistical vanity; a heresy mixed from the Eutychian and Nestorian; phantastical imaginations; a most insane opinion; an execrable blasphemy; a ludicrous fiction; a sacrilegious impanation; an idol and fiction of bodily presence; doctrine worthy of impostors, not theologians; a trifling fiction; an execrable theology; Nestorianism; Antichristian worship; an idolatrous dogma; and six hundred other epithets of this kind--the judgments of these men’s brotherly affection toward us.

If, as is right, we bear all these things with perfect indifference, behold the snares prepared for the life and persons of orthodox Doctors! Doctor Mylius says in the Synopsis of the Meissen Comedy: you would see spies appointed after the death of Elector Augustus to observe the sayings and deeds of the more sincere theologians; men hired to bring unjust suits against them and, when they could not prevail by the cases themselves, at least to overcome their spirits merely by the proceeding; prayers and supplications, dangerous admonitions, seditious defenses, and accusations all beginning to be regarded and named capital offenses. For the space of several months the crossroads of the public ways in both directions not far from the city were beset. These men opened and searched the baggage of all messengers traveling either to the city or even back from it, seeking all letters written either by the Wittenberg theologians to others or by others to them, so that from those unsealed letters they might draw out something from which they could create dangers for the theologians' heads.

Indeed, there was something more atrocious. Fictitious letters were written to the theologians, in which great συμπάθεια, compassion, toward the miserable face of religion was signified; consolation concerning aid that would follow was communicated; assistance was promised to those who would be exiled; and, moreover, splendid gifts were sent together with these fictitious letters, so that, if they held anything most deeply hidden in their breast by whose disclosure danger could be created for them, their interrogators might extract it by this device. In this business that John Major, the Wittenberg poet, was industrious; by this art he stripped and despoiled the excellent man and distinguished theologian Doctor John Matthaeus both of his academic station and of this mortal life.

The altered Augsburg Confession--a buskin suited to either foot--perfidy, and similar impostures served this scheme; by them Peucer and his associates formerly circumvented, mocked, and deceived their supreme Magistrate. Ambiguous writings and defamatory little books came together, accepted almost as though by some right of their own by men of this kind, and indeed most recently defended publicly. In them the reputation of good men is marked and traduced without shame and without source, so that a nearer step might be laid toward the unjust condemnation both of teachers and of doctrine. Edicts and decrees served it, concerning the Sacramentarians' not being named or condemned, and concerning their blasphemies in sermons to the people, with threats added of banishment or exile and other more horrible penalties--those bloody scourges finally not resting until fulfilled in the deed itself. Indeed, fulfilled through so many exiles and similar penalties, in which men scarcely more merciful than Antichrist himself appeared.

The words of that courtier in the time of Christian I, Duke of Saxony, are known: "If those βλακικοὶ--fools--continue to be troublesome to you, at least cast them out on this ground, because they attempt to canonize Ubiquity." And another saying of the same man: "Affairs will never proceed rightly unless the veterans, and those who possess a memory of earlier times, are first rolled away from the midst." I shall say nothing of personal contentions and appeals to a Synod.

How can an unjust death be inferred from such things, or how can you, who judge them to be such men, make the severity of Christian Princes an object of hatred because by just vengeance they exercised the force of the laws against them? If you truly judge them martyrs, acknowledge those deeds of your men. You proclaim them scarcely more merciful toward your men than Antichrist himself, bestow upon your men the encomium of martyrs, and afterward canonize Ubiquity. Would you do these things if hatred and envy had left you any remnant of prudence? Read their deeds. A single year or two saw more Catholics slaughtered by Calvinist furies in France and the Low Countries alone than papal tribunals removed as guilty men in the whole of six hundred years.

But if we truly consider the times, we shall find among the Calvinists' saints the Berengarians, Wycliffites, Hussites, and even Copronymus, the Isaurian Leos, the Henries, and others whom they canonize through hatred of the Pontiff. Accordingly, from Scripture I argue against the Lutherans in this manner:

The little horn, or Antichrist, will wear down the saints of the Most High and stir up a persecution as great as none has been from the time when men began to exist; but the Pontiff has not instituted so great a persecution against the Lutherans, for they afflicted far more Catholics with death, exile, and prisons than they themselves suffered from us. For how many Lutherans perished on account of faith? What Ubiquitarian gave his blood? For they can complain only concerning pure Lutherans and Lutherans of one nation; as for the others, they acknowledge that other scoundrels mingled with them. But we deny the claim concerning the whole of Lutheranism. Did they not rule nearly the whole of Germany and accomplish such slaughters that even now the mournful altars lie squalid in ruined churches?

CHAPTER XXV

The Pope Does Not Think That He Can Change Times and Laws

§ 1. The Chaldean text of Daniel says: "He will think to change times." The Greek has ὑπονοήσει, "he will suppose," for he will not be able to do it. Thus the Greek scholiast: προσδοκήσει, οὐ μὴν ὅλως ἰσχύσει, "he will expect to do it, but will by no means succeed at all." What ἀλλοιῶσαι τοὺς καιρούς, "to alter the times," means is understood from what is joined to it, because it says καὶ νόμον, "and the law." Saint Jerome: "He will be raised to such pride that he will attempt to change the laws of God and the ceremonies, and will be lifted above everything that is called God, subjecting all religion to his own power." Theodorus: "He will suppose that he can overthrow from its foundations the piety which will then flourish." They therefore understood "times" to mean an alteration of the Church. Those who interpreted the passage concerning Antiochus understand by the name "times" the solemnities of the Jews: Sabbaths, Passovers, Pentecost, the Feast of Tabernacles, days of expiation, new moons, sabbatical years, Jubilee years, and similar observances.

But because we are speaking of Antichrist, he will change times and laws; he will take care that feast days are instituted in his honor. Mohammed has already given some indications, then the Lutherans, but more effectively the Calvinists, so that it appears that the mystery is already beginning in its forerunners. And this is the sense of Scripture.

They borrowed their calumnies from Powell and others: because the Pontiff is said to be released from the laws, to transfer empires, and so forth.

§ 2. I answer that by these matters no more is conceded to the Pontiff than, in a certain proportion, they themselves permit to their Bishops and kings. First, indeed, we deny that the Pontiff can change any divine laws. Anathema if anyone asserts that the Pontiff is released from the divine laws. The canonists who are said to assert it are cited partly falsely, as I proved above, and partly in a sense foreign to them. This is certainly established for me: if anyone says that the Pope can remove one iota from the law of God, he will first be struck by a spiritual thunderbolt from the Pope.

He is bound to ecclesiastical and civil laws, where the Pope also holds temporal government, in the manner that a prince is bound to his own laws--a prince whom some wholly, others partly, exempt from the laws. It is sometimes useful for those laws to be changed, and therefore they can be abolished and exchanged for better ones. Those who deny that a prince is subject to the laws as regards coercive power also deny that he can be judged by another; for he who has another as judge must receive and undergo the judge's sentence. From this I make an invincible argument for the Pontiff:

The Roman Pontiff denies that he can change the law of God; he teaches that death must be met a thousand times rather than that he should call himself exempt from God's law; by his own sentence he condemns all who affirm it. Therefore the Pope is not Antichrist. This is the opinion of all of us who acknowledge the Pope as shepherd of the Church: that the Pope is subject to the divine laws; that if he violates them, he sins most gravely; and that unless he repents of his sin, he will perish eternally. The universality of Catholics, and indeed the Roman Curia itself, subscribes to this opinion of mine. But what the Pontiff thinks concerning the laws of God is expounded in distinction 8, canon 2:

"Crimes which are contrary to human customs must be avoided according to the diversity of customs, so that what has been confirmed by the custom or law of a city or nation as a compact among themselves may be violated by no citizen's or foreigner's lust. For every part which does not agree with its whole is base. But when God commands something contrary to the custom or compact of any people, even if it was never done there, it must be done; and if it was omitted, it must be restored; and if it was not instituted, it must be instituted. For if a king is permitted in the city over which he reigns to command something which neither anyone before him nor he himself ever commanded, and obedience to it is not contrary to the fellowship of his city--indeed, disobedience to it is contrary to that fellowship, for it is a general compact of human fellowship to obey its kings--how much more must God, the ruler of his whole creation, be served without doubt in those things which he has commanded? For just as in the powers of human society the greater power is set above the lesser so as to be obeyed, so God is set above all."

And in distinction 9, canon 2, it commands princes to obey their own laws. These are the words of the canon:

"It is just that a prince obey his own laws. For then let him think that his laws must be observed by all, when he himself also shows reverence to them. It is fitting that princes be bound by their own laws, nor can they condemn in themselves the laws which they establish for their subjects. For the authority of their utterance is just if they do not allow themselves to do what they prohibit to the peoples."

§ 3. By equal reasoning the Roman Church teaches that especially the constitutions of general Synods must be observed, cause 25, question 1, canon 1:

"We trust that no one who is truly a Christian now fails to know that the decree of each Synod which the consent of the universal Church has approved ought to be executed by no see before the others more than by the first see, which confirms each synod by its authority and guards it by continued moderation."

With this mind Gregory writes to Bishop Felix, book 12, epistle 31, found in cause 25, canon 4:

"If I destroyed the things which our predecessors established, I should justly be proved not a builder but an overthrower, as the voice of Truth testifies when it says: 'Every kingdom divided against itself will not stand'; and every science and law divided against itself will be destroyed."

§ 4. But the manner in which the Pontiff is permitted to establish new laws is expounded by Pope Urban in cause 25, canon 6:

"There are some who say that the Roman Pontiff has always been permitted to establish new laws. This we not only do not deny, but even affirm strongly. Yet it must be known above all that he can establish new laws in matters concerning which the Evangelists and Prophets have said nothing at all. But where the Lord, or his Apostles, and the holy Fathers following him have openly defined something by a sentence, there the Roman Pontiff ought not to give a new law, but rather to confirm what has been preached even to the surrender of soul and blood. For if he strove--which God forbid--to destroy what the Apostles and Prophets taught, he would be proved not to give a sentence but rather to err. But let this be far from those who have always guarded the Lord's Church most excellently against the snares of wolves."

That nothing can be established against the divine laws is taught in cause 25, canon 8:

"The Catholic Church defends everything that is irreprehensible." And below: "An unjust judgment and an unjust definition arranged by judges through royal fear or command has no force. Nor will anything stand which has been done against the ordinance of evangelical, prophetic, or apostolic doctrine, or against the ordinance of their successors or of the holy Fathers; and what has been done by unbelievers or heretics will be made wholly void."

From this, therefore, it is clear that what is said concerning changed times and laws does not fit the Pontiff. For some things are changed in the Church only when necessity and utility demand it. He therefore spoke very well: "The authority even of this see cannot establish or change anything against the statutes of the Fathers; for among us antiquity lives with unshaken roots, and the decrees of the Fathers have ordained reverence for it."

But if you seek true abrogators of the divine laws who change times and morals, you will find them without difficulty in the opposing camp. For he who thinks that he is bound to observe the law only by a law of gratitude, and who thinks the law impossible to observe--with what mouth and what face does he accuse the Pontiff as though he were a violator of the law? What is harsher than those words of Luther: “He who apprehends Christ as legislator and avenger apprehends the Devil in place of Christ”?

I cannot pass over one matter which is preeminent in this place, for it is the clearest testimony of preachers’ ignorance and shamelessness. The most obtuse of the Lutheran ministers accused the Pontiff of changing the times because he had brought the astronomical calculations of the erring year back to the true rule. Thus the little bachelor Powell did in theses printed at the University of Oxford. I marvel at it the more because troublesome prophets came out of England for Scaliger, men who were able to write books on the correction of the Calendar; it is like a portent that no one came forth from the University to admonish Powell concerning such rustic ignorance. For who would not marvel that a disputation was held on that matter in that University, a pretender to learning, when men proclaiming themselves pagans in Germany grieved, not without the mockery of their own people, that they had stumbled over it? But more astonishing is that a great part of Germany, Gaul, Spain, and England acknowledged the error of the preceding calculation and admitted the new correction.

CHAPTER XXVI

"They Will Be Delivered into His Hands for a Time, Times, and Half a Time" Does Not Pertain to the Pontiff

§ 1. The Chaldean text has ויתיהבון, "they will be delivered," because divine providence permits it. A kingdom and power are delivered to him, which he then abuses against the saints. Junius and Tremellius translate thus: "For a time and times and a small part of a time"; but they say that this small part of a time is ten days. That is, they say, for three years and ten days. They prove it because this was accomplished on the fifteenth day of the month Kislev in the one hundred forty-fifth year of the kingdom of the Seleucids, 1 Maccabees 1:57; but afterward, on the fifth day of the month Kislev in the one hundred forty-eighth year, the lawful worship of God was restored, 1 Maccabees 4:52. For this reason the first word, "time," signifies an incomplete year, or one consisting of parts of two different years; "times," a full two years; and the small part of a time, ten days.

The foundation of this interpretation is that they think the passage treats of the profanation of the temple committed by Antiochus, and the Chaldean text does not contradict it, for פלג means "division of a time" and "a part." For although it more frequently signifies a half, Joshua 10 and Judges 9, and is customary as the Syriac פלגא in the titles of the Gospels, it nevertheless does not reject this signification. Pagninus also translates "a part of a time."

All the Doctors refute this opinion by silence, and no one among the moderns follows it. For even Münster, Luther, Pellican, and Castellio--heretics--follow the ancient Greek version, which has ἥμισυ, "half." Indeed Bruchthon, who elsewhere is accustomed to follow the common Calvinist version, here translates, "and half a time." "And 'time,'" he says, "here signifies a year, just as χρόνος; 'a time and times and half,' that is, half a week--forty-two months--as Josephus testifies."

Finally, the following fact stands against this opinion: in chapter 12:7 the words "a time, times, and half a time" are accepted in the same manner, and yet in the Hebrew there is not פלג, "division," but חצי, "half," just as in Revelation there is ἥμισυ, "half." Accordingly, these words are most correctly spoken of Antichrist: "half a time," where "time" signifies a year.

§ 2. From this passage Bellarmine, book 3, chapter 8, On the Pontiff, argues as follows. Antichrist will reign for three and a half years--that is, a time, times, and half a time; but the Pope's reign is much longer; therefore the Pope is not Antichrist. The minor premise is beyond controversy; the major is proved because "a time, times, and half a time" are three and a half years. For so the ancients from Papias himself onward interpreted them, as Pareus's jubilee commentary on Revelation acknowledges at chapter 11, verse 2.

Then it is proved from Revelation 11:2, where Antichrist treads the temple and city for forty-two months. But forty-two months are three and a half years. Pareus himself acknowledges that the same time is being treated in chapter 12, verse 14:

"But how long will the woman be an exile in the wilderness? A TIME, TIMES, AND HALF A TIME. This threefold designation of time is taken from Daniel 7:25 and 12:7, where Antiochus, bearing the type of Antichrist, is said to be about to trample the saints for a time, times, and half a time. What it means here is evident from verse 6: 'They will feed her there for 1,260 days.' These days were mentioned in chapter 11:2. There it was the time of the prophecy of the two witnesses. Here it is the time of the woman's exile in the wilderness. The same time of forty-two months was there the trampling of the holy city; and it will be, in chapter 13:5, the beast's raging against the saints. At the same time, therefore, the Church will be exiled in the wilderness, the holy city will be trampled by the Gentiles, the two witnesses will prophesy, and the beast will pursue the saints by war. These events will therefore proceed with equal steps, and this observation will illuminate the prophecy greatly. For from one thing better known, the others less known will become clear."

§ 3. That old man made Bellarmine's argument invincible against himself and all the Pope's calumniators. For Antiochus afflicted the Church for a time, times, and half a time, as he himself teaches; and the same is the time of Antichrist's raging. Therefore Antichrist will not reign longer. How, then, does Pareus make Antichrist's reign much longer? I answer: because he does not know what he is saying and does not remember what he has said; the many errors of many men, but most of all his own, have reduced him to madness. These are his words on chapter 11, verse 2:

"(For forty-two months.) Here is wisdom. That the time of the Antichristian persecution is designated is manifest by the consent of nearly all interpreters. But what kind of time and how much it is, where the beginning and where the end must be fixed, is obscure to me and to other interpreters, and perhaps hidden from human investigation. For as far as the times are concerned, the Spirit wished us to investigate certain things rather than to know them, which the Lord also intimated when he said to the disciples who wished to know the hidden time: 'It is not for you to know the times and opportunities which the Father has placed in his own authority,' Acts 1:7."

He can therefore determine nothing concerning this matter, because he cannot know the times and moments. The ancients, such as Hippolytus, Irenaeus, Jerome, Augustine, and the others whom Bellarmine cites, are of our opinion. Junius, Tremellius, and Bruchthon, Calvinists, agree with them, as does Münster, a man of his own judgment and not bound to Luther.

§ 4. Then no one answers in such a manner that he does not collide with very many falsehoods and ἀσύστατα, inconsistent assertions. Chytraeus, cited by Bellarmine, says that the time is uncertain; Pareus proves the same and concludes: "Concerning the forty-two months I have nothing to determine." But since Daniel and John determine it in so many ways, we ought not to assert that it is uncertain, since all the ancients have expounded it to us as certain.

§ 5. Third, however we interpret these things, they cannot fail to show that the Pope is innocent. For Pareus prophesies that there are 1,260 years, that they began in the year of Christ 606, when Boniface III presided over the Church, that it has thus far been trampled for 1,003 years, and that it must still be trampled for 257 years, until the year of Christ 1866. Yet he admits that this boundary is uncertain to him and will be shortened by God on account of the elect. But other considerations refute him, and especially the fact that Christ calls the time of that persecution very brief. It is not very brief if it is 1,260 years, which is longer than the period for which Satan is bound; for his malice is constrained for a thousand years, and afterward he rages, knowing that he has a short time, Revelation 12. After he has been bound for a thousand years, he must be released for a short time. Certainly a time of release is not short if it is longer than the time for which Satan is bound.

For although a thousand years are like one day before God, before men they are nevertheless a long time, and here it is in no manner brief, because it is called a short time in comparison with a thousand years.

§ 6. Fourth, those who describe this time most precisely stray in the foulest manner. Conrad Graser, on Revelation 12, page 73: "It signifies definite periods of years: one time from the Babylonian captivity to Christ; two times to the sixteenth century; half a time from the beginning of the sixteenth century, when the papacy began to collapse." These monsters never entered Luther's mind; for even amid the swiftest contagion of errors, spread abroad in a few years, he did not think that so long a life and reign of the Pope would endure. And rightly so, for this opinion contradicts all interpreters--Jews, Greeks, Latins, and the sectarians themselves.

Second, nowhere in sacred or profane writings, in no calculation, does "a time" signify five hundred years and "times" a thousand years.

Third, these things have no relation to the Babylonian captivity. For this horn is upon the fourth beast, but in the time of the captivity Chaldaea reigned, and the Persian beast--namely Cyrus--ended the captivity. Accordingly, the Leopard then held power. But the little horn is not upon the head of the Leopard, but of the fourth beast. But if he imagines the fourth beast to be the kingdoms of the Seleucids and Lagids, not even thus will he be able to weave together his fable without betraying himself by its incoherence. For how does that horn, crushed by the Romans, finally come to life again in the year of Christ 500?

Graser proceeds: "John understands three πεντακοσιάδας, periods of five hundred years, after Christ's birth, by 'a time and times,' and from the year 1500 reckons 250 years." But he contradicts himself, because he had asserted that Daniel and John speak of the same matter; now he assigns different material to each, since he begins Daniel's "time" from the Babylonian captivity but John's from the birth of Christ. Then the months and days can in no manner be accommodated to this matter, much less to the apocalyptic beasts, which must be treated afterward.

§ 7. Behold, in a most grave matter by which the whole Christian world already existing from Christ's birth is condemned--for I showed above that the first Pontiffs are called Antichristian by many--there is dissension among them all. No one can fit his opinion to the text. From a most obscure matter an article of faith is forged, namely this: "The Pope is Antichrist."

Nor does this calumny assail only the Pontiffs, but all martyrs, confessors, Doctors, and churches which communicated with the Pontiffs. But it is no marvel if such things concerning the Pontiff are vaunted by men for whom that great angel, John the Baptist, is a heretic.

§ 8. Yet they object--for a pretext is never wanting to garrulous wickedness--"The three and a half years are a dream of the monks," say Chytraeus and Powell, and after them the jubilators.

I answer: first, this is the opinion of the most ancient and most learned Doctors of the Church, as Pareus acknowledges. Second, what they say is blasphemous against sacred Scripture. Daniel and John say that there are a time and times and half a time, forty-two months, and 1,260 days, during which the witnesses prophesy and the woman is fed in the wilderness. These things, spoken so distinctly, we accept in the manner in which they were spoken. For forty-two months are three and a half years; 1,260 days are three and a half years and several days, during which the Church will flourish after Antichrist has been killed. Who, therefore, is so tyrannically imperious that he calls me a dreamer when I say the same things which the Prophets and Apostles say, while by his own monstrous dream and uncertain opinion he condemns the Pontiff to every punishment?

§ 9. Pareus objects: "The things which are said of Antichrist cannot be accomplished in so short a space; therefore the space is not so short." Let us hear the words of Pareus:

"It does not agree with itself, because the things which they imagine their Antichrist must accomplish can no more possibly be completed by him within the space of three and a half years than a snail can crawl over the entire globe of the earth in the space of three days. He must be acknowledged as Messiah by the Jewish nation dispersed throughout the whole world. He must sit in the temple at Jerusalem, which has lain in ashes for so many centuries. He must butcher three kings of Egypt, Libya, and Ethiopia; subjugate seven other kings; restore Rome after it has been burned by those ten kings; cast out the Pontiff and sit there as Monarch. He must persecute the Christian religion throughout the whole world, destroy the Church, and finally bring the empire of the whole world under his power, and so forth. Who, I ask, would dream in a fever that these things will happen in less than four years? What Mercuries, therefore, will Antichrist send to announce suddenly to the Jews dispersed throughout the whole world the coming of their Messiah and persuade them of it? He will evidently rebuild in three days the temple which Solomon, with all the materials prepared, completed in seven years, and which Zerubbabel could scarcely restore in forty-six years. This four-year-old Antichrist will, of course, in a moment expel the Turk from Syria, the Persian from the East, the Khan from the North, and Prester John from the whole South. What could be more trifling? Will all the Christian Emperors and Kings snore so deeply that all of them together are suddenly oppressed by one man? Will the Roman Pope and his Cardinals so keep watch that Rome becomes pagan from Catholic, and all Christians rashly give their hands to the coming Antichrist? O theatrical trifles! This fiction, therefore, in no way agrees with itself."

I answer: the sectarians fight against phantoms. No one has said that all those things must be done by Antichrist within the space of three years and six months. No one ascribes so many deeds to less than four years. First, he will be the little horn; when he has subjected three kings, won the Jews to himself, built the temple, and cast down the empire, then, exalted by so many victories, his heart will speak great things. Alexander did not wish to be God until he had been inflated by many victories. Then that persecution will rage, when he appears to have established his power; for at the beginning and during his progress he has need of a reputation for clemency.

Antiochus himself acted less tyrannically in the first six years, for although he treated Jerusalem cruelly in the sixth year of his reign, he had nevertheless not yet climbed to the summit of malice. For he both wept on account of the murder of Onias, remembering the dead man's sobriety and faithfulness, and avenged his death. But in the eighth year he seriously enacted the type of Antichrist and violated all things. Accordingly, that desolation must be begun from the eighth year of Antiochus, not from the beginning of his reign. In the same manner, the times of Antichrist growing and of Antichrist established at the summit must be distinguished.

Accordingly, in this matter Pareus shows himself a boy, and so does that entire νεκυία, necromantic farce, of the sectarians. For Antichrist will gradually conquer different men one after another, and he will use victory so that he proceeds from one to others until he oppresses them all. Meanwhile, these things are the most certain proof that the prophecy does not treat of the Pontiff. For he is not accepted by the Jews as Messiah, does not sit in the temple at Jerusalem, did not butcher three kings, and did not do the remaining things; therefore he is not Antichrist.

§ 10. Pareus proceeds: "It also variously contradicts the sacred Scriptures. These teach that Antichrist will come only through a universal apostasy from the faith, 2 Thessalonians 2:3 and 1 Timothy 4:1, while at least the elect marked upon the forehead are preserved. But who would say that all Christians, even the Bishops together with their Pontiff, can be led away from the faith within four years?"

I answer: they were not led away from the faith within four years; rather, many have already suffered shipwreck of the faith. Many heresies have gone before so as to bring about the general apostasy; Antichrist himself will complete it. Thus also the abomination which existed in the time of Antiochus had preparations and causes. First Maccabees 1:11:

"There came out of them a sinful root, Antiochus the Illustrious, son of Antiochus the king, who had been a hostage at Rome; and he reigned in the one hundred thirty-seventh year of the kingdom of the Greeks. In those days there came out of Israel sons of iniquity, and they persuaded many, saying: 'Let us go and establish a covenant with the nations which are around us, because since we departed from them many evils have found us.' And the speech appeared good in their eyes. And some of the people determined to do it and went to the king; and he gave them power to enact the justice of the nations. And they built a gymnasium in Jerusalem according to the laws of the nations, and they made foreskins for themselves, and they departed from the holy covenant, and were joined to the Nations, and were sold to do evil."

§ 11. So also now, if we behold the multitude and foulness of the heresies, we shall easily find that all things are prepared for apostasy. For if we consult Pareus, how small a part of men acknowledges and follows the rigid Calvinism into which he himself was initiated; and within that very Calvinism how great are the dissensions! And among those who appear more sincere, scarcely one in ten, in Calvin's judgment, is not a hypocrite.

At last he concludes thus against Daniel and John:

"Scripture testifies that the day, month, and year of the Lord's final advent are hidden from all creatures and known to God alone; but that the Lord will come suddenly like a thief in the night, when the world says, 'Peace, and all things are safe.' Yet according to the opinion proposed, the day, month, and year of judgment would by no means be hidden.

For from the rise of Antichrist to his death three and a half years would remain, and from his death forty-five days until judgment. For Bellarmine writes explicitly that after Antichrist's death there will be only forty-five days until the end of the world. Since, therefore, a falsehood follows from the opinion proposed, the opinion itself must necessarily be false."

I answer. Bellarmine says that it is established because, according to a probable interpretation of Daniel, certain men reason in this manner: Daniel 12:12 reads, "Blessed is he who waits and arrives at one thousand three hundred thirty-five days," as though the recompense of the good will then occur. But that interpretation is not certain and will be unknown to most men. Then, if they substitute years for days, the matter too will then be certain, and that day will be foreknown. For Pareus also prophesies that the Church must be trampled until the year of the Lord 1866; and since he thus disputes concerning a time and times and forty-two months, there can be no doubt that with an equal degree of certainty he conjectures concerning half a time. Braubomus certainly proposed all the years to us in the Flaminian Flowers and boasted that he had known them, although the soul of Christ did not know them.

Third, he who survives to that time can be called blessed, because then, after Antichrist's death has been very swiftly announced in the principal parts of the world, the persecution will cease, and the agents who believed dead the man whom they had believed immortal will waste away with horror.

Let us therefore rather hear Jerome speaking in this manner:

"A time signifies a year; 'times,' according to the peculiarity of the Hebrew language--for the Hebrews themselves also have a dual number--prefigure two years; but half a time, six months, during which the saints are to be permitted to the power of Antichrist, so that the Jews may be condemned who, not believing the truth, received a lie."

It must be noted, I say, that what he says concerning the dual is the case neither here nor in chapter 12, for in both places the number is plural; and the Jews generally use the dual only in things naturally paired--unless this is a convention by which, when they utter "a time, times, and half" without qualification, they understand "times" as a dual. Jerome does not say this because the form either here or in Daniel 12 is dual, for the Hebrews generally use that only in things naturally paired. But because that age lacked vowel points, he could read מֹוֲעַדַיִם, moʿadayim, in the dual, just as readily as מֹוֲעָדִים, moʿadim, in the plural; for there is no difference in the letters, but only in the points.

CHAPTER XXVII

Daniel Does Not Prophesy Concerning the Pontiff in Chapter 8, Verse 23

§ 1. These are the Prophet's words:

> And after their kingdom, when iniquities have increased, there will arise a king shameless in face and understanding propositions; and his strength will be made strong, but not by his own powers. And beyond what can be believed he will lay waste all things, and amid an abundance of all things he will kill very many, and he will rise against the Prince of princes, and without a hand he will be crushed.

First, he says, "after their kingdom," namely, that of the kings of Syria, who were nineteen in number. Antiochus, who was called Epiphanes and, from his character, Ἐπιμανής, "the Mad," was not among the last of them, but the eighth. He therefore began to reign after the reign of certain kings of Syria. Yet because our interpreter translates generally, "after their kingdom," while the Hebrew text has באחרית, beʾaḥarît, "at the end," and the Septuagint has ἐπ' ἐσχάτων τῆς βασιλείας αὐτῶν, "near the ends of their kingdom," the phrase of the Holy Spirit must be considered more accurately. For in truth the final days of the kingdom of the Greeks were already at hand. When Antiochus began to reign, Greece and even Macedonia were already in the power of the Romans, and a great part of the kingdom had also been alienated. Sixteen years earlier tribute had been imposed upon Antiochus the Great, his father, who had been stripped of a great part of Asia and of the islands, compelled to surrender his arms, elephants, and fleet, and ordered, though himself a king, to reign within modest boundaries on this side of Taurus. Antiochus Epiphanes himself had been a hostage at Rome and a pledge of servitude; nor was the condition of Egypt better, for the Romans protected its boy king. Since, therefore, the kingdom of the Greeks then clung to one part alone, and was not free but subject to another, the Holy Spirit rightly says, "after their kingdom."

§ 2. Second, the cause of so great a persecution is stated: "when iniquities have increased." Others translate: "when those transgressors will complete their defection." Luther: Wann die Übeltäter überhand nehmen, "when the evildoers gain the upper hand." Others: "the wicked have been brought to completion." Thus there is a twofold interpretation. The first is: when God brings the transgressors to an end, for this was done under Antiochus by Judas and others. The second is the common interpretation, τετελεσμένων τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν, "when the sins have been completed"--when they were already ripe for punishment. Thus Moses speaks concerning the Amorites, and 2 Maccabees 4. The Hebrew is behattēm happōšeʿîm. Our interpreter, with altered points, read it according to the second sense, "when the transgressors are to be brought to an end." This is explained more clearly in chapter 11, in 1 Maccabees 1:11, and in 2 Maccabees 4:7 and following; and verse 12 indicates this: "But strength was given to him."

§ 3. Third, all these things agree with Antiochus, and some with Antichrist. For, first, Antiochus is the little horn: a horn because, although born of a royal father, he himself obtained the kingdom when outsiders were invading it; little because he was the younger of the brothers, had been a hostage at Rome, had flattered all the powerful, and had all but served as a slave--yet, coming from exile to rule, he reigned through much bloodshed.

It became great by occupying Palestine and establishing garrisons in Egypt, which was overcome in various wars; yet it did not equal the power of the ancient kings.

Fourth, "a king shameless in face." The Hebrew ʿaz pānîm means "strong of faces," ἀναιδὴς προσώπῳ, "shameless in face." There are two features in that shamelessness on account of which Polybius, Athenaeus, Cedrenus, and Gorionides call him Ἐπιμανής, "the Mad": for there was in him both the greatest ambition of one aspiring to divinity and the greatest lack of shame, since he gratified his lusts in public and in the sight of the people.

Fifth, “understanding propositions.” The Hebrew text calls them ḥîdôt, riddles. Some translate φρονῶν κρυφὰ τοῦ σκότους, “devising the hidden things of darkness.” For he was extraordinarily skilled in frauds and deceits.

Sixth, “his strength will be made strong, but not by his own powers.” Jerome explains that these things were permitted on account of the people’s sins, since otherwise he could have accomplished nothing. This is true both in the taking of Egypt, whose king was altogether languishing in sloth, so that excessive fatness deprived him not only of the duties of royal majesty but even of human feeling, while the corruption of the court, the nobles, and the cities was equal to his; and also because Antiochus accomplished few things by force, but most by fraud and perjury.

§ 4. Seventh: “Beyond what can be believed he will lay waste all things, and he will prosper and act, and will kill the strong and the people of the Saints.”

The Hebrew niplāʾôt means “wonders” or “marvelous things”; the Septuagint has θαυμαστὰ διαφθερεῖ, “he will destroy marvelous things.” Graser translates, “he will destroy most secretly.” But he has the authority neither of a good nor of a bad interpreter.

Eighth, the success of so wicked a man is also indicated in verse 25:

> According to his will he will be directed; deceit is in his hand, and he will magnify his heart, and amid an abundance of all things he will kill very many, and he will rise against the Prince of princes, and without a hand he will be crushed.

The Hebrew שכלו על, ʿal śiklô, means, “upon his understanding his deceit will prosper.” That is, as the man himself used to say, he will handle deceits astutely and the outcome will be successful. The Septuagint interpreters translate thus: ὁ ζυγὸς τοῦ κλοιοῦ κατευθυνθήσεται, “the yoke of the collar”--or of punishment--“will be directed.” They read ב, a letter akin to it, in place of כ, namely שבלו על, ʿal šiblô, “the yoke of his bond.” For שבל, šābal, means “a bond”; hence šibbōlet, “association,” and sablōnôt, “ornaments, little chains, rings,” among the Chaldeans. The Greek reading thus has a twofold sense. The first is that Antiochus himself was the yoke of a bond, or the yoke of a bound man and hostage, which prospered when he was made king from being a prisoner. The other is that he bound many and led them into captivity, so that the prediction is of what is said at 2 Maccabees 5:14: “Within the whole space of three days eighty thousand were killed, forty thousand were bound, and no fewer were sold.” And these things happened in a single disaster.

We, however, following the Hebrew and the ancient interpreter, understand it of Antiochus’s temporary good fortune.

§ 5. Ninth, “he will magnify his heart.” Some join the Hebrew words ûbilbô, “and in his heart,” to the preceding words: “his deceit will be directed in his hand and in his heart.” But our interpreter has: “And in his heart he will magnify”--that is, he will magnify his heart, when he ought to have magnified the Lord. Thus the Septuagint: καὶ ἐν καρδίᾳ αὐτοῦ μεγαλυνθήσεται, “and in his heart he will be magnified.” The same thing is related in 2 Maccabees 5:1: “Thinking in his pride that he could make the land navigable and the sea traversable on foot, because of the exaltation of his mind”; and in chapter 9:7:

> Moreover, filled with pride on this account, breathing fire in his spirit against the Jews, and commanding that the business be hastened, it happened that as he was rushing onward he fell from the chariot, and through the severe collision of his body his limbs were tormented. And he who seemed to himself even to command the waves of the sea, filled with pride beyond human measure, and to weigh the heights of mountains in a balance, now, humbled to the ground, was carried in a litter, bearing witness in his own person to the manifest power of God, so that worms swarmed from the body of the impious man and, while he still lived in pain, his flesh flowed away; his army also was burdened by his stench and foul odor. And no one could carry him who a little before thought that he touched the stars of heaven, because his stench was intolerable. Hence, therefore, cast down from his grave pride, he began to come to a knowledge of himself, admonished by the divine scourge, while his pains increased at every moment; and when he could no longer bear even his own stench, he said thus: “It is just to be subject to God, and for a mortal not to think himself equal to God."

§ 6. Tenth, "and amid abundance he will kill very many." Bešalwâ, which others interpret "in peace"; the Septuagint has καὶ ἐν δόλῳ πολλοὺς διαφθερεῖ, "and by deceit he will destroy many." All these things are true. For when he returned from plundered Egypt, abounding in all things, he perpetrated slaughter at Jerusalem and elsewhere; and he did it in peace, for there was no war, but he sought an opportunity to rage and plunder; finally, all those things were accomplished by deceit. Nor does the Hebrew term resist this, for šālâ means to act in peace and to be prosperous. Thus Jeremiah 12:1, Psalm 15:7, and Psalm 72:21.

Eleventh, "he will rise against the Prince of princes." Thus the Hebrew. The Roman edition of the Septuagint does not have ἐπ' ἄρχοντα ἀρχόντων στήσεται, "he will rise against the Prince of princes," but ἐπ' ἀπωλείᾳ πολλῶν στήσεται, "he will rise for the destruction of many." Thus it read daleth in place of resh. Other editions too, the Frankfurt edition and others, combine the readings in one fashion or another: ἐπ' ἀπωλείᾳ πολλῶν στήσεται, ἐπ' ἄρχοντα ἀρχόντων στήσεται, "he will rise for the destruction of many; he will rise against the Prince of princes." But the latter reading must be retained as authentic and the others omitted.

§ 7. Twelfth, ὡς οὐ χειρὶ συντρίψει, "so that he will be crushed not by a hand"; for the reading expounded by Theodoret is found in Greek books as ὡς ᾠὰ συντρίψει, "as eggs he will crush." Although the Hebrew אפס, 'epes, has various significations, it is taken for "egg" only in this place; but I rather believe that ὡς was made from οὐκ. Otherwise, they read כ in place of ב, and the active yišbōr, "he will crush," in place of the passive yiššābēr, "he will be crushed." From this it is apparent how necessary it is for tradition to be joined to Scripture; for without the tradition of the points I may read both "he will crush" and "he will be crushed." Serarius, on 1 Maccabees 6 and 2 Maccabees 9, shows that the two books of Maccabees do not contain contradictory accounts of Antiochus's death.

Thirteenth, our adversaries labor to accommodate all these evils to the Pontiffs in the manner I described above. But there is no argument for it; or, if there is one, it is turned back upon them.

For, first, all these things can be said of any impious king--of Muhammad and of the others. Second, if we read the records of France, England, and Belgium, we shall without doubt find that everything which the Calvinists have done cruelly, sacrilegiously, and lustfully surpasses these deeds of Antiochus. Third, the Lutherans complain--as is manifest from the words I cited from the Secular Palm--that the Calvinists are scarcely more merciful toward them than the Papists are. Melanchthon complains, as I showed in the Jubilee, that the rigid Lutherans impose a heavier yoke upon the moderate than had been imposed by the Pontiff. The Arminians in Belgium complain that the Gomarists exercise a greater tyranny against them than the Spanish Inquisition did. The Calvinists complain that the Lutherans are more savage against them than the Papists are. Since their complaints are mutual, therefore, there is no reason why they should cast everything upon the Pontiff.

Fourth, this one king Antiochus, having risen from modest beginnings, shameless in face, and so forth, is set against one Antichrist. One man is established as a type--an evil man of the worst man--not one man of an entire kingdom, nor one man of many men. What cause or basis of likeness is there for one Antiochus to be chosen from the nineteen kings of Syria to be the type of all the Pontiffs, rather than all the kings or the kingdom of Syria? For although Antiochus wrested the palm of wickedness from all the others, they were nevertheless all extraordinarily wicked, cruel, and lustful--even that Seleucus who in some fashion worshiped God with sacrifices. Consideration of this history removes every force which our adversaries, by lying and trifling in their jubilees, endeavor to smear upon an unwilling history.

Fifth, Scripture too removes the whole charge from the Pontiff. For thus Daniel 8:8 says:

> But the he-goat became exceedingly great; and when he had grown, the great horn was broken, and four horns arose beneath it toward the four winds of heaven. But from one of them there came forth one little horn, and it became great toward the south and toward the east and toward the host. And it was magnified even to the host of heaven; > and it cast down some of the host and of the stars, and trampled them. And it was magnified even to the Prince of the host; and from him it took away the continual sacrifice and cast down the place of his sanctuary. But strength was given against the continual sacrifice on account of sins; and truth will be cast down upon the earth, and it will act and prosper. And I heard one of the saints speaking; and one saint said to another whom I did not know, who was speaking: "How long will be the vision, and the continual sacrifice, and the sin of desolation which has been made, and the sanctuary and the host be trampled?" And he said to him: "Until evening and morning, two thousand three hundred; and the sanctuary will be cleansed."

Daniel describes the times of desolation and tyranny as 2,300 days, and he takes them as true days, not enigmatic ones. But since our adversaries admit that Daniel and John speak about the same things, they must also accept John's days and months properly. Then days are accepted properly in this passage; therefore they must also be accepted properly in chapter 12, verse 12. For there is no reason why we should accept enigmas elsewhere but proper speech here, especially since the discourse concerns the same things. And since the tyranny of Antiochus is explained in true and proper days, the affairs of Antichrist, which are signified by them, ought not to be indicated by improper days. Hence Pareus admits that thus far no interpreters have been able to connect that prophecy which concerns Antichrist, because they torture either Daniel or John. Moreover, those days must not be begun from the time when Antiochus placed the idol of abomination in the temple, but from the time when Jason began to rage in slaughter. But if they interpret these days enigmatically concerning Antichrist, they must still grant him many years, for 2,300 days will be the same number of years.

Sixth, Antichrist, like Antiochus, will be crushed without a hand; but now all their ministers exhort their kings to pursue the Pope in war and devour his flesh. They advise this in vain if the Pope is not to be crushed by hands.

CHAPTER XXVIII

What Is Said in Daniel 11:31 and the Following Verses Does Not Pertain to the Pontiff

§ 1. The text reads thus:

> And arms from him will stand, and they will pollute the sanctuary of strength and take away the continual sacrifice; and they will set up the abomination unto desolation. And the impious will deal fraudulently against the covenant; but the people who know their God will prevail and act. And the learned among the people will teach very many, and they will fall by the sword and by flame and by captivity and by plunder for days. And when they have fallen, they will be raised up by a little help, and very many will be joined to them fraudulently. And some of the learned will fall, that they may be smelted and chosen and made white until the appointed time, because there will still be another time. And the king will act according to his will, and he will be raised up and magnified against every God, and against the God of gods he will speak great things; and he will be directed until wrath is completed, for the determination has been accomplished. And he will not regard the God of his fathers, and he will be among the desires of women, nor will he care for any of the gods, because he will rise against all things. But he will honor the God Maozim in his place, and a God whom his fathers did not know he will worship with gold and silver and precious stone and costly things. And he will act so as to fortify Maozim with a foreign God whom he acknowledged, and he will multiply glory and give them power over many, and will divide the land without charge. And at the appointed time the king of the South will fight against him, and the king of the North will come against him like a tempest, with chariots and horsemen and a great fleet; and he will enter the lands, crush them, and pass through. And he will enter the glorious land, and many will fall; but these alone will be saved from his hand: Edom and Moab and the first of the sons of Ammon. And he will send his hand into the lands, and the land of Egypt will not escape. And he will rule over the treasures of gold and silver and all the precious things of Egypt; he will also pass through Libya and Ethiopia. And a report from the East and from the North will disturb him, and he will come with a great multitude to crush and kill very many. And he will plant his tent Apadno between the seas upon the renowned and holy mountain; and he will come even to its summit, and no one will help him.

Of whom these things are said cannot be understood unless the sense is understood accurately; for this reason it is doubtful among many, because they do not know to whose deeds these words must be applied. For even some of the innovators accommodate all things to Antiochus in such a way that they stop with him; others are carried elsewhere.

But it must be said that the discourse concerns Antiochus, because his lineage and deeds are described, and this most certainly from verse 24. Then Antichrist is described in Antiochus as in a figure, but in such a way that some things agree with Antiochus alone and others with Antichrist alone. Yet because the sectarians accommodate all these deeds to Antichrist, we shall follow their tracks and show that they do not pertain to the Pontiff. They are not concerned to expound Daniel, but to set forth his words and then, gathering notorious pamphlets and public calumnies from every side, fasten them upon the Pontiff.

§ 2. Verse 31: “And arms from him will stand.” The Septuagint has σπέρματα, “seeds,” which they interpret of Eupator, the son of Antiochus, who himself also oppressed the Jews. They read זרעים, zerāʿîm, “seeds,” in place of זרועים, zerôʿîm, “arms.” But I do not think this must be understood of Eupator.

For he did not take away the continual sacrifice; indeed, he could not, because it had already been restored and the Maccabees were defending themselves bravely. The arms, therefore, are the men whom Antiochus set over the Jews with the greatest savagery. Thus 2 Maccabees 5:22: “He left governors to afflict the nation: at Jerusalem, Philip, a Phrygian by birth, more cruel in character than the very man by whom he had been appointed; and at Garizim, Andronicus and Menelaus, who pressed upon the citizens more grievously than the rest.” And when he was set against the Jews, he sent the hateful prince Apollonius with an army of 22,000, commanding him to kill all who had reached perfect age and to sell the young and the women.

Their deeds were to pollute and profane the sanctuary. The event is described in 2 Maccabees 6 and 1 Maccabees 1 from verse 40. Then šiqqûṣ mêšômēm: "they will set up the abomination of desolation," or "the desolating" or "stupefying abomination." The Septuagint calls it βδέλυγμα ἠφανισμένον, "an abomination made to disappear"; thus the Roman codex has it. Other copies read better: καὶ δώσουσι βδέλυγμα τῶν ἠφανισμένων, "and they will set up the abomination of the things removed from the midst"--the image of Jupiter, which was nothing, because an idol is nothing.

Verse 32: "And the impious will deal fraudulently against the covenant; but the people who know their God will prevail and act."

The Hebrew words are emphatic: בחלקות להחניף ברית ומרשיעי, ûmaršîʿê berît lehaḥănîp baḥălaqqôt, which in Greek is translated καὶ οἱ ἀνομοῦντες διαθήκην ἐπάξουσιν ἐν ὀλισθήμασι. The Hebrew may be translated word for word thus: "And he will cause the sinners against the covenant to sin, to dissemble, and to act impiously through flatteries." The Greek means: "Those sinning against the covenant will lead others into falls," or slippery places--that is, into a slippery fall. Our interpreter read yaḥănîpû, "they will sin, they will dissemble"; for this verb signifies to sin, but particularly with hypocrisy and pernicious dissimulation, and the Greeks read it in the same manner. Thus at Job 34:30 and 36:13 there is חנף, ḥānēp, "a hypocrite." These, however, are those who in 1 Maccabees 1:12 resolve to establish a covenant with the Nations, and afterward all who fraudulently deceived the people of God or attempted to deceive them. Antiochus Eupator also did this in 1 Maccabees 6:61, as did Nicanor at 7:5, 10, and 28 and 9:58.

§ 3. This profanation and abomination is not in the Pontiff, but in the two hundred sects which defected from the Pontiff. We have remained in the first religion and changed nothing from the first faith, as I have proved from the adversaries themselves, who begin our so-called Antichristianism from thirty-three martyr-Pontiffs. If you seek the fraudulent, see the testimonies of the Lutherans and Calvinists against one another; no doubt will remain. They took away the sacrifices and profaned the Sacraments, so that the Calvinists are called by the Lutherans scarcely by any other name than Sakramentsschänder and Sakramentsschwärmer, profaners and fanatics of the Sacrament. They killed priests, dug up the very bodies of the saints, and reduced them to ashes. What follows pertains to the Pontiff and the Catholics: "But the people who know their God will prevail and act."

§ 4. Thus the strong people against Antiochus were victorious in battle and victorious under torture, 1 Maccabees 1:56 and following, and 2 Maccabees 5, 7, and 9. It will be no different with the most noble martyrs in the time of Antichrist. For if within the memory of our fathers and in our own days they endured the theater of Calvinist cruelty in France, and even now endure it in various places, and if by their patience they overcame the dispositions of their executioners, why should they not set themselves against that bloodiest beast when Antichrist rages at his highest pitch? Indeed, in 2 Maccabees 2:47 the Maccabees are said to have pursued the sons of pride, to have prospered in the work of their hands, to have obtained the law from the hands of the Nations and of kings, and not to have given a horn to the sinner.

We give thanks to you, great God, because the people who know God have even now prevailed and acted, and have remained in the ancient faith amid so many thousands of errors. My mind shudders when I see that within a few years innumerable heresies have come forth and that each convenient man has been swept away by one or another of them; that those very heresies have collided with one another and entered into the most hostile conflict. Yet meanwhile I see so many thousands remaining in the ancient faith of the Martyrs, in the canon of the Apostles, and in the Churches which received the transmitted succession of doctrine and Bishops from the primitive Church; I see so many thousands coming from the Nations, and so many thousands returning from error. Blessed be God, who has caused his people to act and not to give a horn to the sinner.

§ 5. Verse 33: “And the learned among the people will teach very many, and they will fall by the sword and by flame and by captivity and by ruin for days.”

These things too must be understood of the time of the Maccabees and the Antichristian persecution. For both then the fury of the impious bore down especially upon the teachers of the people, and in our own time many thousands of priests and monks have been slaughtered, indeed slaughtered by a new kind of torment.

“The learned among the people”--ûmaśkîlê ʿām, those understanding among the people, or also those causing the people to understand. For they persecute them in marvelous ways: by sword, fire, and iron when they can, and by calumnies when they cannot. Who, from the foundation of the world, ever experienced more savage calumnies than the most illustrious and learned Bellarmine? What order today is exposed as a mark for arrows in the way the Society of Jesus is, whose institution is to benefit every class of men by teaching, from which the other orders also flourished again, and which Clement VIII was accustomed to call a society of talents?

Here they are tossed and harried “in the plunder of days”; in some Hebrew copies rabbîm, “many,” is added. But so that the reader may judge which party persecutes which, let him weigh the freedom--and sometimes the insolence--of the pseudo-Evangelical ministers in Catholic cities. By contrast, the pupils of our Society are scarcely permitted to pass through a little town governed by preachers without mockery, abuse, and sometimes unjust detentions and stonings; neither the peace of religion nor the authority of the magistrate who forbids it is of any help. Ministerial fury imbues everyone with hatred of truth and of those who teach the truth.

§ 6. Verse 35: “And some of the learned will fall, that they may be smelted and chosen and made white until the appointed time, because there is still another time.”

The end of tribulations is the advancement of the faithful and the saints. For they fall not by defecting from the faith, but by falling bravely for the faith: lehāṣērāp bāhem, “for smelting among them,” just as in Malachi 3 God sits like a smelting fire. For metals are purified by fire and the faithful by tribulation. Stubble is burned up; gold comes out purer. “That they may be chosen”: the Hebrew ûlebārēr carries the signification both of choosing and of cleansing; the Greek text has ἐκλέξασθαι, “to choose.” “To make white” in Hebrew is ûlelabbēn, “and for whitening”; certain Greek copies have ἐκλευκᾶναι, “to whiten,” while others have ἀποκαλυφθῆναι, “to be revealed.” Now these things begin; when Antichrist rages, the pious and steadfast will advance extraordinarily.

Of this too we now see examples: how many faithful princes and nobles, how many colleges of canons, how many assemblies of monasteries have reformed themselves and, by new laws, excluded every enticement of vice.

§ 7. Verse 36: “And the king will act according to his will, and he will be raised up and magnified against every God, and against the God of gods he will speak great things; and he will be directed until wrath is completed, for the determination has been accomplished.”

There is a twofold opinion. The first is that this must be understood of Antiochus alone. Bruchthon, Junius, Tremellius, and other Calvinists interpret it so, thereby showing that those who strive to fit these things to the Pontiff labor in vain. Pellican accommodates it first to Antiochus and then to the Turks.

The second opinion interprets it of Antichrist, but in two ways: first, of Antiochus and Antichrist together; others, of Antichrist alone. The Catholics understand the true Antichrist, the antitype of Antiochus; among the sectarians, some understand the Turk, others the Roman Pontiff, and others both together. The jubilators, in accordance with their purpose, refer all things with enormous abuse to the Papacy--that is, to all Catholic princes. Erhart Lauterbach briefly reports the calumnies of others in his first sermon. “Because,” he says, “the general mark of Antichrist is that he will act according to his own will. ‘Thus I will, thus I command; let my will stand in place of reason’: so it is in canon law. For the Pope, in those things which he wills, his will stands in place of reason.” He cites canons in the manner of men who have not seen them: Distinction 19, chapter Si Romanorum; Cause 9, question 3, chapter Cuncta; and Cause 16, question 3, chapter Nemini. In these canons the Pope is not granted power to do anything whatsoever at his pleasure, whether just or unjust, but only the supreme power of judgment in spiritual affairs, from which there is no appeal, just as the same power is given to a king in political affairs. Nothing else at all can be concluded from these words. Accordingly, whatever he commands lawfully and honorably must be followed. The Pope is not to be obeyed if he commands evil; and if he inflicts an injury, lawful defense under the protection of blameless self-defense is permitted against him, which jurists and theologians grant against a tyrant. Nevertheless, there is no superior judge before whose tribunal the Pope may be summoned.

§ 8. This passage, therefore, proves that there will be another Antichrist. For he who governs the Church not according to his own will but according to the divine laws, the canons, and the statutes of the Fathers is not Antichrist. But the Pontiff governs in this manner; and if anyone departs from that law, he is rejected by God and disturbs the Church. As for the saying that the will sometimes stands in place of reason, the canons do not affirm it, but jurists sometimes use it in a sense applicable to all judges. For he who, after weighing the considerations in controversies, decides the suit does not provide an account, but judges by authority so that the matter is not perpetually agitated and controversies never ended.

Then, in indifferent matters which must be done, but which can be done in diverse ways--and must indeed be done rightly, though a uniform and harmonious manner of action is needed--the Pope may determine one good and honorable way, even though the matter by its nature does not demand this way more than another. Thus in the state a law is called the will of the prince; by it many things are established which could also rightly be done in another manner, but nevertheless, for the peace and tranquility of the state, the prince's will must be observed, and subjects ought not to oppose their own reasons to his just discretion.

Thus Charles the Great must be understood in the twenty-three capitularies which he sent to all the provinces, which are found in Ivo and the Council of Tribur, and so forth, at Distinction 90, chapter 3:

> In memory of blessed Peter the Apostle, let us honor the holy Roman and Apostolic See, so that, as it is for us the mother of priestly dignity, so it should be the mistress of ecclesiastical reason. Therefore humility must be preserved with meekness, so that although a yoke scarcely to be borne should be imposed by that holy See, we nevertheless bear it and endure it with pious devotion. But if--which is not fitting--anyone, whether presbyter or deacon, is convicted of contriving some disturbance and lying in wait for our ministry, falsely claiming that he has brought a letter from the Apostolic See, or anything else which did not come from there, let the Bishop have power, while faith is preserved and humility toward the Apostolic See remains intact, to cast him into prison or other custody until by letter, or by suitable legates from his own party, he appeals to the Apostolic sublimity, so that it may especially deign by its holy legation to determine what the Roman law establishes should be defined concerning such persons in due order, so that both the man may be corrected and a limit imposed upon others.

For subjects do not rightly judge those things which the Roman law defines in due order, and which are often thought scarcely bearable by men whose judgment or will has been preoccupied. Meanwhile this law is laid down for all Pontiffs, Cause 25, chapter 9: "The first salvation is to keep the rule of faith and in no way depart from the constitutions of the Fathers." The Pope, therefore, does not act according to his own will, but accommodates his will to the prescriptions of the laws.

§ 9. Nor does the Pontiff do what Daniel prophesies concerning Antichrist: "And he will be raised up and magnified against every God." In Hebrew there is ויתרומם, wayyitrômēm, "he will raise himself," ὑψωθήσεται, "he will be raised up," which certain preachers greatly exaggerate as if, by saying "at Rome," they held Rome itself. Then ויתגדל, "and he will magnify himself." This does not seem to agree with Antiochus, who worshiped Olympian Jupiter, Bacchus, and other gods with most perverse superstition. Accordingly, that is the insanity of Antichrist, who will be restrained from crimes by reverence neither for the true God nor for any false god.

Erhart Lauterbach says that the Pope cares neither for God nor demon, neither for heaven nor hell, and that Luther heard these words at Rome: Ist ein Helle, so stehet Rom drauf--"If there is a hell, Rome stands upon it." He proves it thus: because the Pope commands angels to carry the souls of those going to Rome into heaven; prohibits foods and days; makes a sin of what is not sin; and finally is called God by the canonists. He says that Augustine Boetius writes that the Pope can do everything God can, and Philip Decius likewise.

Let us consider these things accurately. As far as King Antiochus is concerned, he worshiped the gods extraordinarily. Thus Polybius in Athenaeus:

> ἐν δὴ ταῖς πρὸς τοὺς πολέμους ἐξόδοις καὶ τοῖς πρὸς τοὺς θεοὺς τιμαῖς πάντας ὑπερέβαλε τοὺς βεβασιλευκότας, τούτου τις τεκμήραιτο ἂν ἔκ τε τῶν ἐν Ἀθήναις Ὀλυμπιείων, καὶ μετὰ ταῦτα περὶ τῶν ἐν Δήλῳ ἀνδριάντων.
>
> "In his expeditions for wars and in his honors toward the gods he surpassed all who had been kings. One might infer this both from the Olympieum at Athens and, after these things, from the statues at Delos."

Nor does this seem a sufficient reason for despising them, that reverence for no god restrained him from crime; for very many atheists, Epicureans, and others have done this--and indeed worshiped their divinities by crimes. Let another passage in Athenaeus concerning the procession which he led also be considered:

> τὰ ἀντίτυπα τῶν παρὰ τοῖς ἀνθρώποις λεγομένων ἢ νομιζομένων θεῶν, ἢ δαιμόνων, προσέτι καὶ ἡρώων εἴδωλα διήγετο, τὰ μὲν κεχρυσωμένα, τὰ δὲ ἠμφιεσμένα στολαῖς διαχρύσοις· ἐπὶ πᾶσι τούτοις δὲ προσήκοντες μῦθοι κατὰ τὰς παραδεδομένας ἱστορίας ἐν διασκευαῖς πολυτελέσι παρείχοντο.
>
> "Representations of those who among men are spoken of or regarded as gods, and images of daemons and also of heroes, were led in procession, some gilded and others clothed in robes interwoven with gold; and in addition to all these, the appropriate myths according to the traditional accounts were presented in costly settings."

Then he says that Antiochus danced with the mimes, καὶ μετὰ τῶν γελωτοποιῶν, "and with the buffoons." Finally, at the end, he adds: ἱεροσυλήκει δὲ καὶ τὰ πλεῖστα τῶν ἱερῶν, "he also sacrilegiously plundered most of the temples." Behold, the same man appears to be most superstitious and yet most impious toward the gods.

§ 10. But Antichrist will care for no God. Rather, as it is said in 2 Thessalonians 2:4, he "opposes and is exalted above everything which is called God or worshiped, so that he sits in the temple of God, showing himself as though he were God"; and in 1 John 2, he will deny Christ.

The innocence of the Pontiff, therefore, is strongly established in this passage. For he venerates God and professes himself the servant of the servants of God. He does not command the Angels, but prays to them. There is a certain prayer of the most confident friendship which employs the imperative: every day he prays, "Saint Michael, Saint Gabriel, all holy Angels and Archangels, pray for me." He is not called God except in the manner in which Scripture calls princes gods and vicars, and in a degree proportionately greater as spiritual power is more exalted than temporal power. The statement about Augustine and Decius is a manifest lie. Then who among men is so unacquainted with human affairs as to believe that anyone said the Pope can do everything God can--a man commonly weak and old? It is a foul calumny invented by some and seized upon by others. We pronounce anathema upon anyone who says that the Pope can do everything God can.

§ 11. Good God, if it is permissible to snatch at words--even if I pass over the old ones which were not written this year--behold, the ignorant and abusive scoundrel Sharpe is called Alcides, and the most serene James, King of Great Britain, is called the British Jupiter; for in this very year Stephen Gilbert, Doctor of Laws, flatters them both thus:

> Once sent from highest Jove to earth,
>
> Alcides with a mighty hand laid low

the monsters that infested the world from its tender cradle.

Wishing to destroy the final monsters which the languishing old age of the world brought forth upon the earth, the BRITISH JUPITER sends SHARPE from his gracious bosom.

Advance, returned conqueror, go beneath so great an auspice;

whatever Cacus, Lycos, and the very Beast displaying seven heads the Vatican cave of the god has brought forth--the certain destruction of Christ's worshipers-- subdue it with both sword and fire. By as much as these new monsters are worse than the ancient ones, since they consign not only the body to savage death, but the soul as well, by so much, by Hercules, do you come to us greater than the old hero.

But passing over these things, let us examine the matter more accurately. Antichrist will deny, not only by deeds but by profession and openly, that Christ is the Redeemer; and because he will oppose Christ, he will therefore win to himself the Jews, enemies of the cross of Christ. The Pontiff has not done this, but condemns it; therefore he is not Antichrist. Then he confesses Christ to be the Christ and the Savior; he confesses that he has all his power from him, that without him he can do nothing, and that he has been redeemed by his blood; he calls everyone to Christ.

Third, they themselves distinguish Antichrist into the one who is called Antichrist commonly and the one who is so called properly. Powell, book 1, chapter 1, §3, says that they commonly call Antichrist anyone who in any manner opposes Christ, such as Jews, Gentiles, and heretics; properly, some kingdom opposed to Christ's kingdom, or the head of that kingdom. But those whom they improperly call Antichrists openly deny Christ; therefore so also will he who is properly called Antichrist, since he is both more powerful and worse than they, and sits in the temple, showing himself as though he were God.

Fourth, the holy Fathers interpret it thus. Hilary, book 6 On the Trinity; Hippolytus says that his mark will be that men deny baptism; Jerome, on this passage of Daniel, says that he will pretend to be the leader of the covenant; Gregory, book 11, epistle 3, says that he will compel men to Judaize. Fifth, he will come in his own name; therefore he will not put forward Christ and the vicariate of Christ as a pretext for his blasphemies. Beza therefore rightly warns on 2 Thessalonians 2 that Antichrist will transfer to himself not only all the honors of men but also whatever glory has anywhere been exhibited to any divinity whatsoever. This does not agree with the Pontiff, who daily bends his knees to God publicly and privately, who not only adores God as the highest beginning and highest good, but also follows the friends of God with a lesser worship.

There is an example in Gregory XIV. Thus Ciccarelli writes of him:

> He fasted on every Friday and abstained from meats on Wednesdays, unless perhaps hindered by ill health. He always discharged upon bended knees the allotted burden of his prayers, both the ordinary ones and those of the Lady, as they call them. Rising from sleep in the morning, he immediately began the seven penitential psalms and continued them while clothing himself. He meditated for a full hour in the morning, reading the works of the honey-flowing Bernard; and if he drew any good conceptions of mind from them, he diligently noted and elegantly wrote them down. As long as he was a priest, he omitted saying Mass on no day; there was no day on which he did not confess, unless illness prevented him from doing so. But when he was ill, he received the Eucharist daily from the hands of another. And if the illness appeared likely to be mortal, he commanded that extreme unction be procured for him with much devotion.

Antichrist will do nothing of the kind. They will see him ἀποδεικνύοντα ἑαυτὸν ὅτι ἐστὶ θεός, "showing himself to be God." Irenaeus, book 5; Ambrose, on Luke 21, says that he will argue from the Scriptures that he is Christ. Theodoret, on 2 Thessalonians 2: he will name himself Christ. In no way, therefore, does the Pontiff exalt himself above every σέβασμα, "object of worship," which the more ignorant Lutherans also interpret perversely when they wish it to signify worship, while the Calvinists refute them well by translating it "divinity."

§ 12. Nor does he rise against the God of gods or speak great things, or ὑπέρογκα, "exceedingly swollen things," as the Septuagint has it; in Hebrew it is niplāʾôt, that is, marvelous things. For he professes that the works of God are marvelous, and teaches that all things stand by his omnipotence. I call all Catholics and heretics alike to witness that the majesty, power, goodness, and persons of God have never been taught and written of more accurately than by those who have lived and now live in the Papacy. The books themselves speak. Why, then, could so many and so learned men, who investigate the infinite nature of God in this manner and know so many things, endure the Pope if he placed himself before God in any manner or made himself equal to him? Or how could the Pope, chosen from among theologians and mindful of his own weakness, raise himself to a place from which not only the writings of theologians but even the swords of kings would drag him down?

But if they heard the Pope praying on his knees or prostrate on the ground, "Have mercy upon me, O God," and so forth--if they saw him confessing his sins and weeping--would they still make τῇ ἀποδείξει, "the demonstration," a matter of dispute for him? The same reasoning is confirmed: "And he will not regard the God of his fathers." The Hebrew text, ʿal ʾĕlōhê ʾăbōtāw lōʾ yābîn, means, "concerning the gods of his fathers he will not understand": ἐπὶ πάντας τοὺς θεοὺς τῶν πατέρων οὐ συνήσει, "concerning all the gods of his fathers he will not understand." Nor only this, but he will care for none of the gods, because he will rise against them all.

Antichrist will care for no God, whether true or fictitious, but will magnify himself, lehitgaddēl, against all gods. If he who is properly Antichrist does this--that is, the Pope's kingdom, or the head of that kingdom, namely the Pope himself--let them at least cease accusing us of manifold idolatry. For if we care for no God, then we do not make the saints into gods.

CHAPTER XXIX

The Pontiff Is Not Rightly Accused from the Statement That Antichrist Will Be among the Desires of Women

§ 1. In the Hebrew text the expression יבין לא אלוה כל ועל נשים חמדת ועל, weʿal ḥemdat nāšîm weʿal kol ʾĕlôah lōʾ yābîn, is ambiguous: "concerning the desires of women and concerning God he will not understand." The Greek text has nothing else concerning this mark of Antichrist than καὶ ἐπιθυμίᾳ γυναικῶν, "and the desire of women." Thus is the present reading. But Saint Jerome shows that the Septuagint had it otherwise, and his words must be set down:

> For what we have interpreted, "and he will be among the desires of women," the seventy-two translated, "and he will not be subject to the desires of women," and so forth. But because in the Hebrew, for what we said, "and he will be among the desires of women," it has been stated ambiguously, Aquila, who expressed it word for word, saying, καὶ ἐπὶ θεὸν τῶν πατέρων αὐτοῦ οὐ συνήσει, καὶ ἐπὶ ἐπιθυμίαις γυναικῶν, καὶ ἐπὶ πάντα θεὸν οὐ συνήσει--"and concerning the God of his fathers he will not understand, and concerning the desires of women, and concerning every god he will not understand"--by these words it is understood that he both has the desires of women and does not have them. If we understand the words ἀπὸ κοινοῦ, "as shared in common," he does not understand concerning the desires of women. With respect to Antichrist the easier interpretation is that he feigns chastity for this reason, so that he may deceive very many. But if we read, "and concerning the desire of women," with "he will be" understood, it will be fitted better to the person of Antiochus, who is said to have been most lustful and to have descended through debaucheries and corruptions into such disgrace of royal dignity that he publicly joined himself even to mimes and prostitutes, so that he might gratify his lust in the presence of the people.

If, therefore, it is understood of Antiochus, it is sufficiently understood that that monster was above all others γυναικομανῆ, "mad for women," and most womanizing, and that not only his chastity but even his sense of shame had been prostituted; the histories testify to this. Those, therefore, who interpret it of cruelty from 2 Maccabees 5:13 labor in vain: "For he did not spare even women"; and they translate, "He will not even attend to tenderness toward women." For it has always appeared savage to be cruel toward women:

> For there is no memorable name
> in punishing a woman, nor does victory have praise.

But as far as the matter itself is concerned, ḥāmad is not "tenderness," but "desire" and "beauty"; and not to understand concerning desire is not to desire. Thus also Job 31:1: ûmâ ʾetbônēn ʿal betûlâ? "Why should I make myself understand concerning a virgin?"

The opinion of Pererius and others does not displease me: namely, that the words "concerning the desire of women" are set down separately, and hûʾ or yihyeh, "he" or "he will be," must be understood, in the manner in which the Greeks and Jerome also explain them. For, first, it is the opinion even of all the heretics that Antichrist will be lustful; and although at the beginning he will feign chastity, he will soon express his Antiochus to the life and outstrip him by white horses. Second, his wantonness is shown from Revelation. Third, his cruelty does not stand in the way, for one who is cruel is also rotten in lust, and one who is lustful is also cruel, for the physiognomic signs of each passion are not different. Finally, he will be an instrument of the devil, which I would not believe will be chaste and pure--especially since the ancient and modern forerunners of Antichrist, votaries of Venus, have disgraced themselves by vice. Lusts drove Luther headlong; Carlstadt entered the first marriage; Calvin's brands and Beza's paradigms are known; Ochino instituted polygamy.

§ 2. The jubilators object from Powell, notes 18 and 27, that the Pope forbids marriages, and they add that he permits fornication. They adduce examples.

I answer that marriage is prohibited to no one except one who has bound himself to chastity by a vow. It is not lawful to make void the pledge of chastity given to Christ. He gravely prohibits adulteries and fornications. The Pope's judgment is proposed in various places; for me Cause 27, question 1, chapter 20, suffices:

> Permission to marry is granted to some, namely those who have in no way professed either virginal or widowed chastity; but to some it is not granted, namely those who have resolved to be virgins or continent. Fornication, however, is permitted to no one with impunity.

And chapter 21:

> It is manifest that women who have fallen from the better purpose of a holier chastity which is vowed to God, if they marry, are worse than adulteresses.

Concerning the whole class of the matter, see the canons of Cause 32, question 4, and likewise questions 5, 6, and 7.

For by these marriage is praised, while adulteries and fornications are forbidden. But certain Pontiffs lived impurely. I cannot deny it, nor is it necessary for the defense of the Church. Yet the ministers are not therefore to be excused. They argue thus: "Some Pontiff is a fornicator; Antichrist is a fornicator; therefore the Pontiff is Antichrist." Who does not see that such things agree with many of their magnates? Who does not see that the miserable consequence must be chastised with the rod? For if, whenever some king or prince sins, the kingdom is immediately to be stigmatized with Antichristianism, nothing in the whole world is pure.

Produce a series of innocent kings or princes--even among those taught by you--and show that the law against adulteries cannot be observed. If the matter comes to reasoning, we shall prevail. To the examples I answer: some are manifestly false, such as those concerning Gregory VII and others; some were invented by enemies; some men lived a more licentious life before the Pontificate and corrected it in the supreme dignity. At most there were six or eight whose life was wicked in so holy an office. I speak of Pontiffs, for I no more concern myself with pseudo-popes than with the Jasons and Menelauses who disturbed the ancient Church.

It is the greatest glory of the Church that 237 Pontiffs are now counted, among them thirty-three martyrs in an uninterrupted succession, and among their successors so many martyrs and so many illustrious in holiness and learning that not even their enemies, although aided by all the calumnies of every age, can name one unchaste man among thirty chaste men. Give me a kingdom, principality, or county in which there have been so many good rulers and so few bad. I know that this cannot be done by you. Yet this is the perversity of the adulterous generation of viperous offspring among the preachers, whose lies bear damnation: they impute to others the things they themselves do. Who should marvel that they invent stories concerning the ancients, when knowingly and willingly they invent everything against the living? They all bring forward Alexander VI, who was indeed wicked but was compelled to hear of more evils than he committed.

But why do they omit the others whom the histories praise extraordinarily? Why do they not remember the crimes of their own men?

CHAPTER XXX

The God Maozim Is Not the Sacrifice of the Mass

§ 1. In verses 38 and 39 that God is described thus: "But he will honor the god Maozim in his place, and a God whom his fathers did not know he will worship with gold and silver and precious stone and costly things, and he will act so as to fortify Maozim with a foreign God." The Hebrew text has כנו על מעזים ואלה, weʾĕlôah māʿuzzîm ʿal kannô, "the God Maozim in his place or upon his throne." The Septuagint translates θεὸν ἰσχυρότατον, "a most mighty God"; Aquila, θεὸν ἰσχύων, "a God of strengths"; yet others read θεὸν ἰσχυρόν, "a mighty God."

The Greeks translate verse 39 thus: Καὶ ποιήσει τοῖς ὀχυρώμασι τῶν καταφυγῶν μετὰ θεοῦ ἀλλοτρίου, "And he will act upon the fortifications of the places of refuge with a foreign God." Another reading is: Καὶ ποιήσει τοῖς ὀχυρώμασι τῶν πόλεων μετὰ θεοῦ ἀλλοτρίου, "And he will act upon the fortifications of the cities with a foreign God." Theodotion translates thus: Καὶ ποιήσει ταῦτα ὥστε στερεῶσαι τὰ ὀχυρώματα μετὰ θεοῦ ἀλλοτρίου, "And he will do these things so as to make the fortifications firm with a foreign God." Luther translates: Aber an dess statt wird er seinen Gott Mausim ehren--"But in its place he will honor his God Mausim"; and in verse 39: Und wird denen, die ihm helfen, stärken Mausim mit fremden Gott--"And he will strengthen Mausim for those who help him, with a foreign God." In verse 38, without understanding the Hebrew language, he translates ʿal kannô as an dess statt, "in its place," although it expressly means "upon its place" or "upon his place." In verse 39, if he changed the points in the word lemibṣerê, he showed that they do not pertain to the essence of Scripture.

The sense of the words is that Antichrist will worship the God Mausim, the god of fortifications--a new God whom the ancients did not know--but will fortify these strongholds with a foreign God. For he will place impious and superstitious men in the fortifications; in them they will worship the devil himself. Nor is it marvelous that he worships no one and yet now worships. For he will be great and will openly put himself forward as God, as impious kings once did; but because he will use the aid of a daemon, he will dread and secretly worship it, while even his familiars are occupied in the same daemon-worship.

§ 2. Yet they interpret it variously. The Greek scholia have:

> τὸν θεὸν τὸν ἰσχυρόν, ὃν προσποιοῦνται οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι σέβεσθαι, ἐν τῷ ναῷ δεξάσεται, ὅπερ εἰς ἀπάτην τῶν Ἰουδαίων ἀνέξει.
> "He will receive into the temple the mighty God whom the Jews pretend to worship, whom he will indeed raise up for the deception of the Jews."

Thus also others interpret it, for the true God is called in Scripture the God of strength, Psalms 26:1 and 30:3. Thus the heretics Bruchthon, Junius, and Tremellius, who call him the God of Israel. Theodoret says that Antichrist himself is the God Mausim, for it will come to pass that he glorifies himself; for the Greek has δοξάσει, "he will glorify," and the Hebrew has yekabbēd. Nor is this marvelous: formerly there were examples of such great madness. When Caligula had made himself a God, he offered sacrifice to himself.

In a marginal note Luther calls him "the God of garrisons"; but in the preface he asserts that "the God of fortifications" is in the temples and monasteries, which are like citadels and fortifications: their colleges, he says, serve the Pope. But specifically he claims that Daniel wished to say "the God of the Mass," but in indignation broke the word Mass and called it Mausim; and that "to fortify Maozim" is to care for everything which pertains to the Mass. The Lutheran Strigel says that Maozim is every idolatrous worship: the adoration of the Eucharist and the prohibition of marriages.

§ 3. It must be said, first, that he is not the true God of the Israelites, for Antichrist will rise against that God, the God of gods. Therefore he will not venerate him.

Second, he is not Antichrist himself, because Antichrist will worship him with gold and silver, in which manner he will by no means worship himself. Then Scripture speaks of Antichrist and his God as two different beings.

Third, he is not the sacrifice of the Eucharist, or Christ in the Eucharist or in the Mass, because Christ is worshiped not in fortifications but in all temples and in the public squares; then our fathers worshiped Christ thus. Third, Antichrist is himself publicly worshiped above every God; therefore he does not publicly say that Christ is his God.

Fourth, the God Maozim is not fasts, celibacy, and similar things. First, because these are worship of God, but Maozim is the God himself. But if the God Maozim is called the God of fortifications or of strength, the interpretation is most inept if "the God of strengths" is said to mean "the God of the selection of foods, of celibacy, and of similar things." Second, who worships celibacy and fasts with gold and silver and costly things? Thus feasts and marriage-beds are worshiped. Third, assemblies of virgins and vows of chastity were already used in the ancient Church, as were many fasts; they are therefore not new gods whom our Fathers did not know. Therefore the Pope does not worship or fortify the God Maozim.

That God, therefore, is the God whom Antichrist, supposing him to be the author and preserver of his strength and power, will worship with his followers with great care and expense, and that in fortified places and places containing treasures. The continual sacrifice, the spotless Lamb, is as far distant from Maozim as Christ is from Belial.

CHAPTER XXXI

The Kings of the South Will Not Fight against the Pope

§ 1. Verse 40: “And at the appointed time the king of the South will fight against him, and the king of the North will come against him like a tempest. The king of the North will come against him in chariots and horsemen and a great fleet, and he will enter the lands and crush them and pass through, and he will enter the glorious land, and many will fall; but these alone will be saved from his hand: Edom and Moab and the first of the sons of Ammon.”

Most of the ministers omit these words and those which follow, because they see that they can in no manner be accommodated to the Pontiff. In this matter they thoroughly betray a seared conscience. For if the things attributed to this king do not agree with the Pope, with what face do they attribute the rest to him? Yet now someone has been found who opposes us and asserts that these very things too were said against the Pontiff: Paul Laurentius, who in his preface confessed that he lacked abundance of wisdom--out of truth, not humility--and foolishly believed and published another preacher’s encomium which had called his sermons learned. It is useful, therefore, to hear the delirious man. On page 38:

> Third, the Angel in the Prophet speaks of the fall of this idolatry and what sort of end it will have: namely, when its pomp and arrogance are at their summit, it will begin to fall and pass into nothing. Concerning this the text reads thus: “The king of the South will fight against him, and the king of the North will come against him.”
>
> Here we hear that this impiety is tending toward its end, for express mention of the word “end” is made in the text. At such an end it will happen thus, says the text: “The king of the South will fight against--
>
>
> --the king of the North.” At that battle wondrous things will be seen; what the end will be will be manifest.
>
> Here before all things I shall ask who are those two kings who are to fight against one another. And if someone should perhaps suspect the king of the South to be Ptolemy, king of Egypt, and the king of the North to be Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, of whom mention was made in the preceding chapter, nevertheless the Angel says to the Prophet that the words have been sealed; therefore it could not be understood who these kings are. But after the prophecies have been fulfilled and the battle completed, it will then appear whence it arose and for what cause it happened.
>
> But now the Lord God has raised up Christian men who from time to time opposed the Pope’s immoderate arrogance and in some manner showed men what they ought to think of him, and thus they crushed him. For example, when Pontiff Boniface VIII was altogether swollen with pride, so as to call himself Lord of the whole world, in spiritual as well as temporal matters, and thus wished to command the whole world, Christ the Lord raised up Philip, king of western France, who in the year 1303 so overwhelmed the Pope at Anagni, led him captive, and fought him down so that he died a short time afterward. Concerning him it was afterward written and said: “He entered like a fox, reigned like a lion, and died like a dog.” Perhaps he breathed out his spirit beneath a club.
>
> About twenty years afterward, Pope John XXII was deposed from the Pontificate through public letters on account of excessive avarice; John XXIII, in the year 1415, was cast down from his See on account of various wicked deeds. Afterward also at the Council of Constance the Pope received no slight blow through the martyr John Hus.
>
> The gravest blow of all the Pope underwent through Doctor Martin Luther a hundred years ago, who preached and wrote against him, so that whole kingdoms and nations have now withdrawn from him. Christ the Lord brought about all these things--all the doctrine and writings by which the Pope has been manifested--and caused him to receive a mortal blow and begin to fall; he ordained and raised up men to accomplish it. Therefore Christ the Lord is the king of the East who inflicted the blow upon the Pope’s Mausim of the Mass. For Christ the Lord is the Sun > of justice rising from on high and the true light which illuminates the entire world. On the other hand, the king of the North who fights against him must be the Pope himself, for no one opposes the splendor and shining dawn except the Pope alone, as experience has proved: he himself rushed with horsemen, chariots, and ships by land and sea, attempting to destroy all his adversaries, and indeed killed very many. He is called king of the North because darkness lies toward the North; he himself is darkened by spiritual darkness and driven by the devil, the god of darkness. And this is the Pope's end: he will begin to fall, but will rebel violently and kill many in the renowned land.

§ 2. Let us expound the words and then investigate the prophecy and its times.

First, "at the appointed time": beʿēt qēṣ, "at the time of the end," καὶ ἐν καιρῷ πέρατι, "and at the end-time." Around the end of the time, when it is already near that there should be no more time. Vatablus also has "at the appointed time," which is the same as if he said, "at the time established by God."

"The king of the South will fight against him": weyitnaggaḥ ʿimmô meleḵ hannegeḇ, συγκερατίσεται μετ' αὐτοῦ ὁ βασιλεὺς τοῦ νότου, "the king of the South will strike at him with the horn." For God values the struggles of kings fighting with great armies no more highly than those of bulls fighting one another.

"And the king of the North will come against him like a tempest, in chariots and horsemen and a great fleet; and he will enter the lands and crush them and pass through." The Hebrew is weyistaʿēr; the Septuagint has συσταραχθήσεται, "he will be violently disturbed." The Hebrew means to bristle, move, be stupefied, and be tempest-tossed. They think śāʿar was put in place of another form, meaning to cast down like a tempest. The Greeks are accustomed to translate it by καταιγίζειν, λικμᾶν, ἐξαίρειν, φυσᾶν, φθείρειν--"to storm, winnow, raise up, blow, destroy." See Jeremiah 23, where there is σεισμός, "shaking"; Zechariah 9:14, σάλπιγξ, "trumpet"; Job 38:1, λαῖλαψ, "hurricane"; Isaiah 29:6 and Psalm 148:8, πύριον, "a fiery thing"; Psalm 54:8, καταιγίς, "tempest." The king of the North will therefore enter with great violence and destroy everything. Now let us see who these kings are and how certain is the faith of those who confidently assert all these things concerning the Pontiff and disturb the world by playing with riddles and allegories.

§ 3. Saint Jerome says that near the consummation there will be ten kings who divide the world among themselves, three of whom--those of Egypt, Africa, and Ethiopia--are to be killed by Antichrist; afterward, the remaining kings will submit to him. The ministers cry out that the Pope has done these things; we deny it and assert the contrary. The Pope is not the king of the North; he did not rush upon the king of the South or do the things which are written here; therefore the Pope is not Antichrist. Luther interprets these things allegorically, as is now evident from the words of Laurentius. But because this is ridiculous and contrary to the text, the rest were ashamed of it. Finally, nothing in matters of doctrine is concluded from such ill-fitting allegories.

I show that it contradicts the text. It names real kings of Persia in verses 2 and 3, and real kings of the South and North in verses 5 and 6; Egypt too is named in verses 8 and 17. It comes into no one's mind to understand the king of the South as anyone other than the king of Egypt, or the king of the North as anyone other than the king of Syria. We must therefore remain with the same signification here, so that they are real kings, one of Egypt and the other of Syria, who fight one another.

Accordingly, wearied by such puerile trifles, Junius, Tremellius, Abbot, Bruchthon, Sutcliffe, and Danaeus altogether deny that anything in Daniel treats of Antichrist; they say that all these things pertain to the wars of Antiochus, Physcon, and Philometor. Why, then, do others most laboriously bring forth these things concerning Antichrist and the Pope and twist them to their own purpose?

§ 4. The Lutherans object: Edom, Ammon, and Moab will escape Antichrist's tyranny, but those peoples do not now exist; therefore they must be understood allegorically. But from the same antecedent the Calvinists conclude differently: those peoples do not now exist; therefore those who will escape do not exist now; therefore this does not concern Christian times, but those of Antiochus. These latter propose nothing against the Pontiff from Daniel. But the former err gravely, for the peoples are called by those names by reason of their places, although they have in great part ceased to exist as peoples. For amid so many migrations, mixtures, and destructions of peoples, the certain origins of any nation cannot easily be established; indeed, I do not think that αὐτόχθονες, "people sprung from the soil itself," now exist anywhere, unless perhaps in the western and most remote Indies.

Nor did the kingdoms of those peoples still survive in the time of Antiochus; only scattered remnants did. David destroyed the Ammonites, 2 Samuel 11, 12, and 23. Ptolemy Philadelphus occupied Rabbah and called it Philadelphia. Zephaniah 2:8 indeed says, "Moab will be like Sodom and the sons of Ammon like Gomorrah"; nevertheless they survived the captivity, 2 Esdras 9, for they contracted marriages with the Israelites. There were also sons of Ammon in 1 Maccabees 5:6: "And he passed over to the sons of Ammon." Moabite women also survive in 2 Esdras 13:23. Indeed, 2 Maccabees 10:16 names the fortifications of the Idumaeans, and Herod the Great was an Idumaean. Those most numerous peoples were therefore not so destroyed that remnants did not remain in the same places and survive even today, who will evade the savagery of Antichrist, I believe by the benefit of mountains and hiding places.

§ 5. Finally, the mystery fashioned in the name is now vain: that the elect are meant, who always bore the type of the reprobate. Edom himself certainly was not so named because of martyrdom, but from his profane desire for red pottage. Nor should the Ammonites and Moabites be numbered among the saints on account of the incestuous origin of their names, since they were always enemies of the people of God and cursed by God. Deuteronomy 23:3: "The Ammonites and Moabites will not enter the Church of the Lord in eternity, even after the tenth generation." It is therefore injurious that, on account of someone's grammatical or Cabalistic interpretation--on account of an enthusiastic interpretation of Edom, Moab, and Ammon--all Catholic kings should be condemned with the Pontiff and Bishops for Antichristianism.

Finally, not even such tasteless fictions cohere with one another. For how do the martyrs escape the persecution of which Daniel makes mention in this passage? He speaks of chariots, horsemen, and fleets; those peoples will escape these evils, but the martyrs will be oppressed by the armies and fleets of Antichrist. Much less, therefore, does this agree.

"And he will enter the glorious land, and many will fall." In Hebrew the land is called צבי ארץ, ʾereṣ ṣeḇî; they call it γῆν σαβί, "the land Sabi," or σαβαείμ, "Sabaeim." The Greek scholia interpret: τὴν γῆν τῆς ἀξιότητος· ἀπόγονον δὲ παρὰ ἀρετῆς, "the land of worth, a derivative from excellence." In chapter 8:9 it is called the glorious land, where the Septuagint translates δύσιν, "the west," appropriately, because the horn came forth against the south and the east and the host, as our interpreter translates. The Roman edition of the Septuagint has πρὸς τὸν νότον, καὶ πρὸς τὴν δύναμιν, "toward the south and toward the host." In verse 16 of this chapter: "And he will stand in the renowned land." Jerome testifies that the Septuagint translated it "the land of desire." The Greek scholia have this on the passage:

> Ἀντίοχος ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ· αὕτη γὰρ διὰ τὸν νόμον ὑπῆρχε χώρα τῆς τοῦ θεοῦ θελήσεως, δόξης, δυνάμεως· τούτων γὰρ ἕκαστον τὸ σαβὶ ἑρμηνεύεται.
> "Antiochus [will stand] in Judaea; for on account of the Law it was the land of God's will, glory, and power, since sabi is interpreted as each of these."

Thus the other reading found in Theodoret, σαβεὶς, must be corrected from this.

This land is Judaea, not Rome. Josephus writes the history thus: after the cities in Syria and Samaria had been conquered by Antiochus, the Jews surrendered themselves to him voluntarily; and after receiving him into the city, they abundantly supplied all things to the whole army and the elephants and assisted him when he attacked the garrison left by Scopas. Accordingly, since the Pontiff did not stand in Judaea, this cannot be attributed to him. For the fact that certain men have referred these things to the holy expedition is exceedingly impious and insulting to the best princes, who snatched the holy land from the hands of a most savage tyrant.

CHAPTER XXXII

The Pontiff Will Not Set Up His Tent between Two Seas and Capture Egypt

§ 1. Daniel prophesies in this manner: “And he will send his hand into the lands, and the land of Egypt will not escape; and he will rule over the treasures of gold and silver and all the precious things of Egypt; he will also pass through Libya and Ethiopia.”

None of these things agrees with the Pontiff, but the Lutherans and certain Calvinists attribute them all to Antichrist; therefore the Pontiff is not Antichrist. It has always been asked by our men: when did the Pontiff occupy Egypt, Libya, and Ethiopia? When did he set up his tent between two seas?

As far as the word Apadno is concerned, the Greek retains it as ἀφαδνῷ; another reading is ἐφαδνῷ. Symmachus has τὴν σκηνὴν δ’ ἱπποστασίῳ, “the tent at the horse-station”; and the Greek scholia interpret τὸ ἱπποστάσιον as τὸ ἱππικὸν στρατόπεδον, “the cavalry camp.” Certainly a king’s retinue is mounted, and his principal power is in his cavalry. But because Antichrist will arise at Babylon, Daniel, when he speaks of his court and domestic camp, wished to use a Babylonian term. The same word is frequent among the Talmudists. Bruchthon maintains that this was done by Antiochus when, as he was about to set out for Persia, he entrusted his son to Lysias, together with the destruction of the Jews.

§ 2. But where will he set it up? On the holy mountain, between two seas. What mountain would Daniel call holy except the one which all the Jews would understand--the holy mountain, Mount Zion, between the Sea of Tiberias and the Phoenician Sea? The Pontiff did not come there.

Those who say that the Church is signified will never explain why it is placed between two seas, since it is spread throughout the whole world. But concerning these matters see Bellarmine, book 3, chapter 13, and his defender James Gretser.

CHAPTER XXXIII

The Apocalyptic Beasts of Chapter 13 Do Not Pertain to the Pontiff

§ 1. A great part of the Flaminian Flowers is spent in expounding chapters 13, 17, and 18 of Revelation. For it says that a mouth speaking enormous things was given to the Pope; it attributes to the Pope the mark and the number of the name; it says that the woman is the Roman Church and that the seven mountains are the Roman hills. In sum, all Roman things are abominable. The abusive reviler must be answered, and in this passage too the calumny must be shown to surpass the malignity of every previous age.

§ 2. There are two beasts in Revelation 13: the first seven-headed and ten-horned, the other a two-horned helper and flatterer of the first. I must prove that neither the Ten-Horned Beast is our Emperor nor the Two-Horned Beast the Pontiff.

§ 3. First, the Emperor is not the Ten-Horned Beast. For at Revelation 13:2 it is said, "And the Dragon gave it his strength and his great power," and, as certain Greek copies add, καὶ τὸν θρόνον αὐτῷ, "and his throne." But the Dragon--that is, Satan--did not give our Emperor strength, δύναμιν, but the state did, and the most reverend and most serene College of Electors. For even princes of the opposing religion call it the Sacrosanct Roman Empire. Graser indeed asserts that the Church is necessarily afflicted by it and that the fullness of diabolism dwells in it. But with a monstrous malignity of abuse he addresses the Emperor with his proper titles--titles with which even the most serene King of England abundantly refutes him. And a book On the Union and Synod of the Evangelicals, published at Heidelberg in 1614, bears this subscription: "With the grace and privilege of the Vicar of the Holy Roman Empire." What Aretius says, therefore, is false: "The devil fastened his--

--ornaments upon the Empire." I conclude my reasoning and leave it to the princes to consider where those words tend.

§ 4. Second, verse 3: "And I saw one of its heads as though slain unto death, and its mortal wound was healed; and the whole earth wondered after the Beast, and they worshiped the Dragon who gave power to the Beast, and they worshiped the Beast, saying, 'Who is like the Beast?'" These things do not occur in the Empire; therefore the Empire is not that Beast. Yet Aretius says that the head slain in Julius Caesar, Nero, or other Emperors, when they were overcome by the Lombards or the Turk, was restored by Vespasian, Antoninus, or Charles the Great. It is an impious exposition and one which overthrows itself. For the devil is not worshiped in the Empire, nor is the Emperor worshiped because some Caesar died and the Empire was restored. Theodosius the Great, Charles, the Ottos, and others would be held by the same charge.

§ 5. Third, verse 8: "And all who inhabit the earth worshiped it." But not all worship the Emperor; therefore he is not the Beast. For how many lands and kings both are and always have been free from the Roman scepter? How many arms of the Persians, Goths, Huns, Vandals, Lombards, Normans, Saracens, and Turks have afflicted the Empire? Surely they did not worship what they opposed with such great fury and in part conquered.

§ 6. Fourth, in this whole mode of abuse they disagree shamefully among themselves. Illyricus and others join the Turkish Empire to the Roman; others expound that worship with enormous insult to the princes. Aretius, on Revelation 13:7: "To wonder at the Beast is to wonder at the succession and felicity of the Empire, proclaiming it august, holy, sacrosanct, and immortal." Aretius proceeds: "Second, they worshiped the Dragon; that is, in its person they worshiped and adore the Devil. For the Dragon is the devil, who fastens his ornaments upon the Empire." Behold where the hatreds which you have rashly professed drive you. The Pope is Antichrist to you, the second Beast. So that this may seem true to the wretched, you establish that the first Beast, ten times more wicked than the second, is the Roman Empire. You are so shameless and so rash that, although you declare that the second Beast which serves the first must be killed, torn by torments, and burned, you fail to observe that the first is worthy of a greater punishment.

Then you also make your own princes worshipers of the Beast, for in their speech and public documents they call the Empire holy, august, and so forth. He proceeds: "See what it is to worship the devil: that is, to wonder excessively at the majesty and felicity of the Roman Empire." He professes to treat even of the reformed Empire at verse 8, and in the margin at verse 2 he notes: "The devil is the σύνεργος, co-worker, of the Roman Empire." Finally, he adds that those who do these things are not written in the Lamb's book of life. Therefore, O Antibellarmine colleagues, in your judgment are your princes and counts not written in the Lamb's book of life? Do you exclude all subjects of the Empire from heaven? For they honor the Empire with that title which your colleague in Switzerland--or in a city of the Swiss Confederation--with such zeal and hatred describes as idolatry, that is, worship of the devil.

I ought not to doubt that you think thus, since you assert that there is such great agreement of doctrines among you; moreover, you cannot harm the Pope by any other reasoning unless you pierce him through the flanks of the Roman Empire. Nor is it marvelous or novel that, if only it is permitted to ruin the Pope, you are ready to bore through the ship in which you sail. I know where consistorial violence draws you. These matters belong to another disputation; I now propose one question. The Aphoristic Disputation against Bellarmine was printed at Heidelberg by John Lancellotti, printer to the Academy, and subscribed with these words: "With the privilege of the Vicar of the Holy Roman Empire." Is this your idolatrous madness, or the printer's? For to call the Empire holy is, as your men teach, to worship the devil and adore the Dragon. Or perhaps the Roman Empire is holy when it has the Vicar as its head, but profane when it has its primary, proper head bearing its own name--in which, as Graser says, there is the fullness of diabolism?

§ 7. You owe yourselves as an object of mockery not only to Turks and Persians but to Frenchmen, Italians, Spaniards, and Poles when you ascribe your Empire to Satan as its Author. Many of you have labored to show that the translation of the Empire was not effected by the Pontiff, nor its confirmation or coronation, and that it receives no ornaments from the Roman Priest. And why, I beg you? See the monstrous malice, deserving vindication by the laws of both doctrine and the Empire. "The devil," says Benedict Aretius, your colleague, "fastens his ornaments upon the Empire"; the devil is the σύνεργος, "co-worker, helper," of the Roman Empire. Was it of such great importance to deny communion with the Pope that the ornaments had to be attributed to the Devil? It is enough--more than enough--that there is hatred of the Apostolic priesthood; now there is love of the daemon. I shudder as I relate it.

So many minds among your writers labored at this, that they might withdraw the Empire from every jurisdiction which antiquity gave to the Pontiff--not so that that majesty might be free and in every manner without law, but so that it might be bound by contract to Satan; so that the Vicar of Christ, the Servant of the servants of God, might be excluded, and that σύνεργος, "co-worker," and decorator might be the accuser of the brethren, the adversary of Christ, the Daemon. Rome is so hateful that you prefer the diadem to come from Tartarus. At this point, therefore, impiety holds its highest summit. Hatred of the ancient Church has advanced so far that it has enrolled the infernal Dragon in her place and attributes kingdoms to him. What remains except that they believe him when he says, "All the kingdoms of the world are mine," and promises, "All these things I will give you if, falling down, you worship me"; that in hope of a kingdom they fulfill the condition, fall down, and worship the devil? They will refuse nothing, those for whom to call the Roman Empire holy is to worship the devil, and to call the Empire holy is daemon-worship.

Is it a sin to subscribe one's book as your pseudo-prophet did:

> Anno MatVresCentIs sponsae DIVae?

Again I ask: if it is idolatrous madness to call the Roman Empire august, as Aretius the Calvinist maintains, did Beza bind himself by that crime when he writes that he published his version of the New Testament under the august name of Elizabeth of Britain? Is the name "August" in the August Empire worship of daemons, but in the dominion of a single island ὑποχρεωτικόν, "a binding token," and a mark of fidelity?

§ 8. Third, I ask whether Caspar Waser, who offered Graser's Royal Plague for sale to the most serene King of Britain, is guilty of idolatry. For in that preface he says:

> The third reason was the authority of Your Majesty, which resides in Your Majesty at the highest degree and is plainly divine, and which long ago likewise resided in your forefathers of immeasurable greatness and splendor, and so forth.

He continues:

> Consideration of all these things most justly moved and impelled the author of this work to hang these studies, as it were, upon the altar of the most sacred patronage and most exalted protection of Your Majesty.

Are not the authority of majesty that is plainly divine, immeasurable greatness and splendor, most sacred patronage, and most exalted protection--especially when an altar is added--are not, I say, these so ample words a defense of the German Princes when they call the Roman Empire holy? Pareus, in his book On the Union and Synod of the Evangelicals, calls the most serene Monarch of Great Britain "D. James VI." If he is Divus, divine, why is the Emperor not Augustus? For that "D." signifies Divus, not Doctor.

Even a blind man would see where these things tend; would that our Germany may not learn it through its own destruction. All kings are sacrosanct, are honored by their subjects, and are objects of admiration; their injured majesty avenges itself through punishments of rebels. Is it idolatry to call, honor, and admire only the Emperor as sacrosanct? Is this kingdom alone diabolical? What else do these prophets do than hand over wretched Germany, shattered by fraternal warfare, to the servitude and lust of the Muhammadan tyrant?

CHAPTER XXXIV

Concerning the Same Beasts, from Revelation 13, Beginning with Verse 11

§ 1. The other Beast is treated from verse 11 to the end of the chapter, which our prophet maintains is the Pontiff or the Pontificate. But the Holy Spirit, who opened the mouth of John the Evangelist, added such symbols to each Beast that from them it is certainly established that neither the former is the Emperor nor the latter the Pontiff.

§ 2. The first argument. The second Beast exercises all the power of the first in its sight, verse 12. The Pope does not exercise that power before the Emperor; therefore he is not the other Beast, nor is the first Beast the Emperor.

§ 3. The second argument. "And it caused the earth and those dwelling in it to worship the first Beast, whose mortal wound was healed." The Pontiff did not do this; therefore he is not the other Beast. Graser answers that the Pontiff keeps men in the worship of the former Beast, even though it now no longer exists.

I answer in turn that this is as manifest a lie as it is manifest that the sun shines at midday. For the Roman Empire still exists, and all its princes both call themselves such and are so called by everyone. I answer, second, that what is worshiped is not a Beast which does not exist, but one which truly exists; for the Holy Spirit opposes it to the lying spirit: "whose mortal wound," he says, "was healed." I answer, third, that even in the judgment of their own men the princes of the Empire owe much to the Pontiff, who endeavors so diligently to procure authority for them. For Aretius maintains that to cause the Beast to be worshiped means nothing other than to desire that the Empire be sacrosanct, august, and venerable, as it formerly was under the Gentiles. The Pontiff desires this, yet he does not desire the blindness of the Gentiles or the ἀποθεώσεως, "deification," of the Emperors to be introduced.

If we who desire the Empire to be sacrosanct, august, and venerable are evil; if for that reason we are Antichristian and condemned to death by men who live under that same Empire, what do those men deserve who do not desire it to be august, sacrosanct, and venerable--who desire it to be lowly, profane, and contemptible? Their hatred of the German-Roman Majesty is so great that they desire those who wish the Empire well to be worthy of the most extreme examples of punishment. Do we suppose that different wishes are conceived and pronounced in the mosques of the Muhammadans? Yet our Calvinist Turks act with greater criminality, because they are citizens and because they are bound to the Empire by the sanctity of an oath.

I cannot pass over in this place the ridiculous delirium of Illyricus. He interprets "to exercise power before the Beast, so that the Beast itself is worshiped" as: "to exercise power against the will of the Emperors and to subject the Emperors."

§ 4. The third argument. "And it performed great signs, so that it even caused fire to descend from heaven to earth in the sight of men," verse 13. No Pontiff, by calling fire down from heaven, procured worship for the Emperors; therefore the Pope is not the second Beast, nor the Emperor the first. For what Pontiff compelled anyone to worship the title of the Empire? If "to worship" is to call it august and unconquered, Waser too worships a title of the British kingdom, for he calls its auspices "most august," and the king himself unconquered.

§ 5. The fourth argument. Verse 14: the second Beast "said that they should make an image of the Beast which has the wound of the sword and lived." What image of the Emperor did the Pontiff order to be made and worshiped? To what image did he give life? Illyricus interprets the image of the Beast as the form of the state; others interpret it as the Golden Bull of Charles IV, an enfeebled shadow of the Empire; others interpret it as something else. If matters stand thus, we no longer have a living and true Empire, but shadowy magistrates. Then the image is of the Beast which came to life again; therefore it is the image of a living Beast.

Thus Aretius says that the image of the Beast is the elected Emperor, while its life is confirmation. But this is blasphemous and foolish. For the second Beast compels both the Beast and the image to be worshiped together; and there is both the image of the Beast and afterward the Beast itself. Then the living and speaking image is not the Beast itself, but the image of the Beast; for it was a new thing for an image to speak, since the Beast had already uttered blasphemies against God and the Saints in verse 5.

§ 6. The fifth argument. The second Beast will cause everyone to have the mark of the first Beast, or its name, or the number of its name. The Pontiff did not procure this for the Emperor; therefore the former is not the second Beast, nor the latter the first. For who has been forbidden to buy or sell without an imperial mark?

While we seek the mark, Bullinger says it is chrism; Chytraeus, the oath of fidelity; Aretius, both of these, and also that of doctors and masters when they are inaugurated. Illyricus extends it to the tonsure and the mark of orders; Graser, to the mark of orders, exorcism, and the sacrament of confirmation; Sutcliffe, to the common manner of life of the Papists. These interpretations mutually destroy one another and have often been refuted by our men. For me it is sufficient to display the remarkable instability of the sectarians in their abuse; for none of all these things accomplishes anything against the Pontiff, as I demonstrate in the following manner by an irrefragable ἀποδείξει, "proof."

There are five things which the Evangelist and Prophet John proposes as symbols of the Beast: the image of the Beast, the life of the image, the mark of the Beast, the name of the Beast, and the number of the Beast's name. Everyone attributes the last three to the Pontiff, and our deceiver does so most of all. To prove that he is Antichrist, they devise and devise anew marvelous names, which are found in Luther, Chytraeus, Graser, and the prophet whom we now refute; for he fills the whole sixth book with the mark. He says that the mark of the Beast is its own proper name, either signified by numbers or enigmatic. I am weary of trifles, and so proceed to explain the argument.

He is Antichrist whose image, mark, name, and number of the name are described in Revelation; but these are not the Pontiff's; therefore the Pontiff is not Antichrist. The proposition is not disputed, for each party attributes these things to Antichrist. The assumption is proved. The image, mark, name, and number of the name belong to the first or primary Beast, not to the second, which serves the first. But according to the sectarians' abuse, the Pontiff is the second Beast, not the first; for they say that the Empire is the first Beast.

Therefore, if their heresy is true, the mark, name, and number of the name pertain not to the Pontiff but to the Emperor and the princes of the Empire. It must now be proved that these belong to the first Beast, not the second.

§ 7. First, the context itself teaches that the image belongs to the same Beast as the mark, name, and number of the name. The image is that of the first Beast: "Saying to those who dwell on the earth that they should make an image of the Beast which has the wound of the sword and lived," verse 14. It continues in verse 15: "And it was given to it to give spirit to the image of the Beast, and that the image of the Beast should speak, and to cause all who did not worship the image of the Beast to be killed." There is therefore no dispute concerning the image, for it is the image of the Beast which has the wound of the sword and lived. But the mark and name belong to the same Beast, which I prove from verse 16: "And it will cause all, small and great, rich and poor, free and slaves, to have a mark on their right hand or on their foreheads." And verse 17: "And that no one may buy or sell except one who has the mark or the name of the Beast or the number of its name." It is not said that the second Beast acts so that its own image or mark is possessed, but that of the Beast--namely, the first; nor does it say "the number of its own name," but "the number of his name."

Second, chapter 14:9--11: "If anyone worships the Beast and its image and receives the mark on his forehead or on his hand, he also will drink of the wine of the wrath of God," and so forth. "Nor do they have rest by day or night who worshiped the Beast and its image, or if anyone received the number of its name." The Holy Spirit could not have said more clearly that the image and the mark belong to the same Beast. The image is that of the former Beast; therefore so is the mark. According to the seditious opinion of the sectarians, the former Beast is the Empire. The mark is therefore that of the Empire, not of the Pontificate. Thus the whole pestilential exhalation of calumnies and abuse breathes upon the August Emperors, the Electors, and the princes of the Empire, which all subjects rightly abominate; but the Pontiff is free of it.

Third, chapter 15:2: "And I saw as it were a sea of glass mingled with fire, and those who had conquered the Beast and the image of the Beast and the number of its name, standing upon the sea of glass," and so forth. The image does not belong to one Beast and the number of the name to another. By the agreement of the Pontiff's enemies, the image is not that of the pontifical Beast; therefore neither is the number of the name. Thus the vanity of so many names invented against the Pontiffs strikes the princes, for the ungrateful and criminal Calvinist subjects falsely charge that the first Beast pertains to them.

Fourth, chapter 16:2. The punishment which followed the guilty indicates the same thing: "And a savage and exceedingly evil wound came upon the men who had the mark of the Beast and upon those who worshiped its image." Whose image did they worship? The image of the one whose mark it was.

Fifth, chapter 19:20: "And the Beast was captured, and with it the false prophet who performed signs before it, by which he seduced those who received the mark of the Beast and who worshiped its image." The false prophet is the second Beast, lesser than the Beast which is simply called "the Beast." Therefore not even by the sectarians' obstinate malice can the Pontiff be called the second Beast. For since they say that he exalts himself above every σέβασμα, "object of worship," how does he, neglecting himself, act so as to procure for the first Beast an opinion of divinity?

In vain, therefore, with such great madness and such great apparatus, are the mark, the name, and the number of the name brandished against the Roman Church; in vain do they contrive wars and bloody slaughters. She is not the wild Beast which they pursue. They seek to strike their tooth against fragile flesh--that is, according to Graser's interpretation, against the clergy--but they break it against the solid--that is, according to the same interpreter, against the laity.

The simplicity of many Germans, even Princes, is worthy of pity rather than persecution or laughter. When they heard that their men had found the number of the name 666 in some little word, such as רומיית, Rômîth, or λατεῖνος, Lateinos, or another, they immediately admired such ταχυσοφίαν, "ready cleverness," and by an imperious ostracism ordered all adherents of the Pontiff to be exiled from the Christian state, unaware that by this subtlety they were casting the political magistracy, the Emperor, and the most noble lords of the Empire, as though they were the Beast, into the lake of sulfur and fire.

CHAPTER XXXV

Cardinals Are Joined to the Pontiff for Counsels and Government

§ 1. The name of Cardinals is recent, but the institution most ancient. For they are the principal senate of the Supreme Pontiff; they are governors, counselors, and assessors. They are so called because the affairs of the Church turn upon them as upon hinges, and because they are prelates and leaders of religion. Thus Chalcondyles, book 6, where he treats of Bessarion and Isidore being elected Cardinals at the Council of Florence. He errs, however, when he relates that thirty were elected.

Sylvester, in the Roman Council, names a Cardinal presbyter and Cardinal deacon, Cause 2, question 7, chapter 5:

> A prelate will not be condemned except with witnesses; nor will the Supreme Prelate be judged by anyone, because it is written, "The disciple is not above the master." But a Cardinal presbyter will not be condemned except with forty-four witnesses; and a Cardinal deacon of the city of Rome will not be condemned except with twenty-seven witnesses.

From this we gather that other Churches also had Cardinals, and that the Cardinals of the city of Rome were far below Bishops; for they are condemned by twenty-seven witnesses, while Bishops are condemned only by seventy-two, which is also repeated in chapter 3. Volaterranus, in the Anthropology, thinks that under Benedict IX they began to be so named in the year 1031. But already in 950, under Louis IV and Otto the Great, this name was in common use. Afterward, as the multitude of affairs increased and the civil dominion of the Roman Church in Italy, Sicily, and other places was strengthened, their authority, dignity, and wealth increased. Chalcondyles therefore rightly says that the Pontiff gives them sufficient revenues by assigning regions from which some receive more and others less.

§ 2. By command of the Council of Basel, Cardinals are elected by scrutiny. These are the words of Session 23:

> Let the election of Cardinals not be made by whispered votes alone; rather, only those may be assumed concerning whom, after a true scrutiny has been conducted and published, it is established that the greater part of the Cardinals have collegially consented by the subscription of their own hand. Apostolic letters shall also be drawn up thereupon with the subscription of the Cardinals, while the decree of this sacred Council solemnly published in the fourth session, which begins "Likewise, since the multiplication of Cardinals," and so forth, is to remain inviolate in its force. When the Cardinals receive the insignia of their dignity, whose signification is that they should not fear to shed their own blood, if need be, for the good of the universal Church, they shall swear in public consistory--if they are in the Curia; but if absent, publicly in the hands of a Bishop to whom it has been committed by Apostolic letters in which the form of the oath is inserted--in this manner: "I, N., recently assumed as a Cardinal of the holy Roman Church--
>
> --from this hour forward will be faithful to blessed Peter, to the universal and Roman Church, and to the Supreme Pontiff and his successors entering canonically. I will labor faithfully for the defense of the Catholic faith, the extirpation of heresies, errors, and schisms, the reformation of morals, and peace among the Christian people. I will not consent to alienations of the possessions and goods of the Roman Church or other churches, or of any benefices, except in cases permitted by law; and I will labor according to my ability to recover things alienated from the Roman Church. I will advise nothing to the Supreme Pontiff, nor subscribe my name, except according to God and my conscience. I will faithfully execute the things committed to me by the Apostolic See. I will preserve divine worship in the Church of my title and its goods. So help me God."

Today too they are sometimes elected in this manner; but when they are nominated at the Pontiff's discretion, the consent of the other Cardinals is added. Prudence and sincerity in appointing good Cardinals is one of the Pope's chief virtues. For the purpose of so great a dignity is not that they shine in purple, but that they be prepared to shed their blood for the faith and religion. Thus the Church wished the insignia to be signs of honor in such a way that they also contain an admonition of duty. The purple robe and red hat are a royal color, but also the color of martyrs; for the Church uses that color on the solemnities of martyrs.

§ 3. There is no fixed number of Cardinals. If they are suitable, it is most desirable and best that there be very many. The statement by the glossator that there were 236 in the time of Pontian, in the year of the Lord 234, is not so foreign to truth as some think; for even if the name was lacking, the council of the Roman clergy was nevertheless great and numerous. The Council of Basel prescribes a moderate number, Session 23:

> Since the Cardinals of the holy Roman Church assist the Supreme Pontiff collaterally in directing the Christian state, it is necessary that such men be appointed as may be, in fact as in name, hinges upon which the doors of the universal Church turn and are sustained. The holy Synod therefore decrees that henceforth their number be so moderated that it neither be burdensome to the Church--which now, because of the wickedness of the times, is afflicted by many grave disadvantages--nor become cheap through a superfluous multitude. They shall be assumed from all regions of Christendom, insofar as this can conveniently be done, so that knowledge of matters arising in the Church may be obtained more easily and deliberation concerning them may be more mature; yet in such a way that those now existing and those to be assumed do not exceed the number twenty-four. From one nation there shall not be more than a third part in relation to the Cardinals existing at the time, nor more than one native of a single city and diocese; and no one may be appointed from a nation which now has more than a third part until it is reduced to its third part. Let them be men excelling in learning, morals, and experience of affairs, not younger than thirty years, masters, doctors, or licentiates, after rigorous examination in divine or human law. Let at least a third or fourth part be masters or licentiates in sacred Scripture. Among these twenty-four there may be a very few sons, brothers, or nephews of Kings or great Princes, in whom competent learning, together with circumspection and maturity of morals, shall suffice.

Some judged that seventy-two should be appointed, because this was the number of the elders among the Jews and of the Lord's disciples. Sixtus V decreed that there should not be more than seventy, and that among them at least four doctors of theology should be assumed from the mendicant orders. If you ask what I advise, I shall say it openly. If they are many, costly, and little industrious, they are a great burden, weigh down the Church, and offend the weak. If they are many and are moderate, laborious, and prudent, there can be no multitude so great that a greater would not be better. For the safety of the state is a multitude of wise men; the safety of the Church too is dignity joined with virtue. For where those two are joined, authority is greatest and its use best.

§ 4. It must be no less a concern that the Cardinals be of diverse nations than that they be many and approved. Thus Bessarion and Isidore were prudently admitted at the Council of Florence to preserve the union of the Greeks. For not only are there many advantages in this, but it appears almost a necessity.

First, lest national partialities be perceived in the consistory and judgment of the Church, which is the holiest of all; lest any nation think itself despised; and lest it complain that it lacks a patron before the Apostolic See. Second, because dealings must be conducted with the princes, states, and kings of all peoples, it is advantageous in this matter to have in the council the leading men of all peoples, through whom affairs may be transacted. Third, this is also necessary for knowing the causes and condition of all peoples. No greater errors are committed in government than through ignorance of the state, but it does not ordinarily happen easily that foreigners have thoroughly perceived everything which pertains to instructing, conciliating, and governing other peoples.

How many Italians judge the Bishops of Germany equal to themselves in external government and compare fir trees with tamarisks? How many imagine that Germany is a great city? A certain German of no mean standing used to ask whether Caesar too possessed many villages.

It is probable that so foul an ignorance of history and peoples cannot exist in so great a dignity; yet other things of no less importance are unknown, such as particular laws, rivalries of princes, disposition, manner of acting, and customs. In these matters not only do leading men of diverse peoples go astray, but Apostolic Legates too, when they are of another nation, sometimes stumble and, as if ignorant of the matters for which they are sent, lose their authority. Cardinals, therefore, ought to be diverse according to the diversity of nations, and the most select men from every people, many also distinguished in nobility and station, not only in holiness and learning. For through them affairs of the greatest moment are frequently accomplished: treaties of kings, peace, and the tranquility of the state are obtained.

§ 5. The Council of Basel taught what sort of men Cardinals ought to be, Session 23, decree 2:

> Let them be men excelling in learning, morals, and experience of affairs, not younger than thirty years, masters, doctors, or licentiates, after rigorous examination in divine or human law. Let at least a third or fourth part be masters or licentiates in sacred Scripture. Among these twenty-four there may be a very few sons, brothers, or nephews of Kings or great Princes, in whom competent learning, together with circumspection and maturity of morals, shall suffice. Let no nephews through the brother or sister of the Roman Pontiff or of any living Cardinal be made Cardinals; nor men born illegitimately, blemished in body, or stained with the mark of any crime or infamy. To the aforesaid number twenty-four there may be added, for a great necessity or utility of the Church, two others in whom holiness of life or extraordinary virtues shine, although they do not possess the aforesaid degrees; and when the Greeks have been united with the Roman Church, certain distinguished men from among the Greeks may be added. Let the election of Cardinals--
>
> --not be made by whispered votes alone; rather, only those may be assumed concerning whom, after a true scrutiny has been conducted and published, it is established that the greater part of the Cardinals have collegially consented by the subscription of their own hand. Apostolic letters concerning the Cardinals shall also be drawn up thereupon with their collegial subscription, while the decree of this sacred Council solemnly published in the fourth session, which begins “Likewise, since the multiplication of Cardinals,” is to remain inviolate in its force.

Without doubt the Pontiff may arrange these things otherwise, after taking account of time, place, and necessity; but whether it is expedient to do so must be weighed diligently. This surely must be maintained: no one is ever to be chosen as Cardinal so that the man elected may himself be raised to honors, wealth, and power, but for the sake of the public good, so that the utility and necessity of the Church may be provided for.

But the Lateran Council, Session 9--Book 7 of the Decretals, book 1, title 4--fixed excellent laws for the Cardinals:

> Since the Cardinals of the holy Roman Church precede all others in that Church after the Supreme Pontiff in honor and dignity, it is fitting and due that they excel everyone in purity of life and splendor of virtues. Therefore we not only exhort and admonish them, but also decree and ordain that henceforth every Cardinal existing at the time, according to the teaching of the Apostle, should live soberly, chastely, and piously, so that, abstaining not only from evil but also from every appearance of evil, he may shine before men and honor God chiefly by his works. Let them all be vigilant and intent upon divine offices and the celebration of Masses, and let them have their chapels in an honorable place, as they have been accustomed to do.
>
> Let their house, household, table, and furnishings be neither ostentatious nor pompous, nor filled with superfluous things, nor reprehensible in any manner, lest license for sinning and exceeding proper limits arise from them; rather, as is right, let them deserve to be called a mirror of moderation and frugality. Therefore let them be content with those things which display priestly moderation. Let them treat prelates and all other distinguished men coming to the Roman Curia kindly and honorably, both publicly and privately; and before us and our successors let them graciously and liberally undertake the affairs entrusted to them.
> Moreover, let them not have Bishops and Prelates in dishonorable service in their households, lest those who have been appointed to preside over others and distinguished by a sacred character descend into base services and everywhere introduce contempt for the pastoral office. Therefore let them treat honorably, as brothers and in accordance with the fittingness of their station, those whom they now have or will have in the future.

Since they assist the Roman Pontiff, the common father of all Christ's faithful, it is exceedingly unfitting that they should become respecters of persons or their advocates. We therefore decree that they should assume no partiality and should not become promoters or defenders of princes, communities, or any others against anyone, except insofar as justice and equity demand and their dignity and condition require. Rather, separated from every private passion, let them devote and apply themselves with all diligence to calming and composing disputes among any persons whatsoever. Let them promote with pious affection the just affairs of princes and all others, and especially of the poor and religious, and assist the oppressed and those unjustly burdened according to their strength and the duty of their office.

If they are present in the Curia, let them visit personally the places of their title at least once every year; but if absent, through a suitable Vicar. Let them diligently inquire into the clergy and peoples of the churches subject to their title, and be watchful concerning divine worship and the goods of those Churches; above all, let them carefully examine the morals and life of the clergy and parishioners, and admonish them all and each with paternal affection to live rightly and honorably.

For the increase of divine worship and the salvation of his soul, let every Cardinal either give during his life or leave at the point of death to his title enough to support one presbyter there suitably; or, if the Church needs repair or other assistance, let him leave or give to it as much as shall seem right to his conscience.

And although it is by no means fitting to neglect relatives and kindred, especially those who have deserved well and need assistance, but is just and praiseworthy to provide for them, nevertheless we do not therefore judge it fitting to fill them with such a multitude of benefices or ecclesiastical revenues that others suffer loss from the immoderation of such liberality and scandal arises from it. We therefore decree that they should not rashly pour out the goods of the Churches, but expend them upon those pious and holy works for whose sake great and excellent revenues were established and ordained by the holy Fathers.

We also will that they should procure and provide by every exertion that the same Churches entrusted to the Cardinals be duly served, even if they are Cathedrals or Abbatial Churches, Priories, or any other ecclesiastical benefices whatsoever, without any excuse at all. Let them appoint to Cathedrals worthy and suitable Vicars or suffragans, according to custom, with worthy and competent compensation; and provide the other Churches or monasteries entrusted to them with the appointed service of clerics, chaplains, religious, or monks serving God sufficiently and laudably. Let them also preserve the buildings, possessions, and all rights in a suitable condition and restore those which have fallen into ruin, as pertains to the office of good prelates and commendatory holders.

§ 6. Just as Canons elect a Bishop from their own body, so Cardinals elect the Pontiff; and this is their first and most excellent office. For they elect and are elected, and this frequently, because only Cardinals of advanced age are chosen as pastors of the Church and therefore cannot preside for long; for the Church has seen few young men in that See.

Concerning the manner of election, conclaves, and other circumstances, the Council of Lyons under Gregory X gave laws, in the constitution In Nomine; likewise throughout Distinction 70 and Distinction 79, chapter 1.

The oath to be administered to them is proposed in this form by the Council of Basel, Session 23:

On the following day, all the Cardinals, in the presence of those who are in the conclave, after hearing the Mass of the Holy Spirit, shall receive the sacred Eucharist. Before they begin the scrutiny, with the holy Gospels placed before them, they shall swear according to this form: "I, N., such-and-such a Cardinal, swear and promise to Almighty God, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and to blessed Peter, Prince of the Apostles, to elect as Pontiff the man whom I believe useful to the universal Church in spiritual and temporal matters and suitable for so great a dignity; and not to give my vote to one whom I shall probably know to have procured election for himself, directly or indirectly, by a promise or gift of any temporal thing, or by a petition interposed through himself or another, or in > any other manner whatsoever. Nor shall I render obedience to the man elected Pontiff before he swears according to the form of the decree of the sacred Council of Basel. So help me God, to whom on the day of the dread judgment I am to render an account of this and all my works."

After these things each of them shall deliver a ballot on which he names no more than three; among them, if he names more than one, let one be outside the College of Cardinals. Only one scrutiny shall be held in a single day, and immediately after Mass. After the ballots have been read, unless the votes of two parts concur upon one man, they shall immediately be burned. Before six complete scrutinies, however, an accession may not be made to anyone.

At that time let the Cardinals reflect and consider with attentive mind how much merit or demerit they will acquire for themselves, and how much fruit or harm, good or evil, they will bring upon the Christian people by electing the Pontiff. Certainly in no other matter can they obtain more of the grace or wrath of our Lord Jesus Christ than when the matter concerns placing his Vicar over his sheep, whom he so loved that he deigned both to die for them and to suffer the torment of the cross.

§ 7. When the Pontiff has died there is an interregnum, and the Cardinals administer all things. We readily gather from a letter of Saint Cyprian that this power belonged to the Roman clergy. For in letter 29: "Both common affection and reason demand, dearest brothers, that I withhold nothing from your knowledge concerning the things which are done among us." And: "But if their rashness, not restrained by either my letters or yours, does not obey wholesome counsels, we shall act," and so forth. Yet their power is less than that of the Pontiff; for although they are the primary clergy of the Christian Church, they are not themselves the head of the Church, but can elect the head of the Church.

Once the Pontiff has been appointed, they are his counselors and Legates. Some are called Legates by birth because the right of legation is annexed to their dignity. Thus formerly the Bishop of Oxford in England, and now the Archbishop of Salzburg, is called a Legate by birth. Others are called Legates de latere, who are generally Cardinals sent to govern provinces. Those sent to kings and princes are either called Legates de latere, or Legates with the power of a Legate de latere, or simply Legates. In all of them the greatest prudence, moderation, and becoming frugality of household are required.

The distinction of Cardinals according to which some are called deacons, others presbyters, and some Bishops was instituted by reason of their titles; for even a Bishop, if he has a title which belongs to a Cardinal deacon, is called a Cardinal deacon.

§ 8. The things decreed concerning Cardinals in Book Seven of the Decretals, book 1, title 4, sufficiently explain their condition. Leo X provided there for their immunity, chapter 2. For he entirely abolished the custom by which the people plundered the house of a Cardinal whom they had heard would become Pontiff.

Pius V, from the decree of Boniface IX, pronounces guilty of treason the man who by himself or through another has injured a Cardinal. Thus chapter 3:

> Pitying the perils of an unhappy age, we cannot restrain our grief that wicked men, thirsting for the blood of the just, assail with more hostile intent the destruction even of those whom the Holy Spirit has appointed as principal members of the Church of God, which he acquired for himself by his blood. With great reason, therefore, among others, Pope Boniface VIII of happy memory, by the counsel of his brethren, sanctioned by a perpetual constitution that if anyone should pursue with hostility, strike, or capture a Cardinal of the holy Roman Church; command it to be done; be an associate of the perpetrator; ratify the deed; or give counsel or favor; or knowingly receive or defend that man, he should, as guilty of injured Majesty, be perpetually infamous, and moreover outlawed, banished, and incapable of giving testimony. All his buildings shall be subject to perpetual ruin; no one shall be bound to pay debts to him or answer him in court, all his goods being assigned to the treasury or the state. He shall likewise by the law itself be deprived of fiefs, benefices, and spiritual and temporal offices; and the pursuer himself shall incur the sentence of excommunication, which the Roman Pontiff alone, except at the point of death, may relax.

> Yet not even this constitution is found altogether sufficient to prevent such sacrileges any further, because of the hidden designs of the confederates in crime. For those who propose to inflict violence upon someone contrive it secretly and in concealment, as much as possible, as is indicated by that impious crime recently attempted against the person of our beloved son Charles Borromeo, Cardinal presbyter of the title of Saint Praxedes, who zealously forms the Church of Milan by most holy institutions. This event gravely moves and vehemently rouses us to seek every means by which the most noble parts of our body may be protected on every side. For whom shall we defend, to whom shall we bring aid, whom finally shall we protect, if we leave unavenged the foundations of the temple of God, the brightest lights of the Church, and the special sons who keep watch for the souls of the peoples, for the faith, for justice, and for unity?
> Therefore, adding to the aforesaid sanction by the like counsel of our brethren, we decree that whoever--even if altogether removed from mere counsel, simple favor, or all the other things aforesaid--has learned of any author, agent, or accomplice in a conspiracy, or in a crime committed or to be committed against the person of a Cardinal, or of their supporters, receivers, or concealers, whether through a report made to him directly, through an intermediary, or by letters, or whether from writings, an assembly, an attempt, a gathering, ambushes, or other signs and indications he has obtained any knowledge whatever, or even formed a conjecture, or has understood any of these things, however otherwise hidden the matter may be, shall hasten to reveal it as soon as possible to the Roman Pontiff if he is in the Curia; otherwise to the Ordinary of the place, or, if the Cardinal himself is the Ordinary, to the nearest Bishop; and if the crime has not yet been committed, also to the Cardinal himself.
>
> Whoever fails to do so, even if he is not a subject and is altogether a stranger, of whatever dignity he may be, shall be bound by the aforesaid chain of excommunication and shall likewise, as guilty of Majesty, incur infamy and all the aforesaid penalties by that very fact. Nevertheless, the same constitution shall endure in its force as regards its remaining parts, together with all other canonical and civil sanctions issued for the coercion of such men. Moreover, if anyone returns to soundness and discloses the matter while it is still unknown, he shall be entirely freed from every penalty.
> The local Ordinaries, however, shall secretly report the case brought to them to the aforesaid Pontiff at the first opportunity, and meanwhile investigate the entire matter through these persons; and, if necessity then requires it, they shall also employ the secular arm. Given at Rome, on the fourteenth day before the Kalends of January, 1569.

It is not without reason that the charge of injured Majesty is imposed, since Cardinals are princes of the Church, judges, counselors, and governors in the parts entrusted to them, and must offend many if they wish to perform their office. But because they possess small armed forces with which to defend themselves, their security must be provided for in every manner. Meanwhile they too must live in such a way that they do not voluntarily summon occasions for their own dangers. They will attain this especially by moderation and frugality. For those who proceed with expense and magnificence procure many envious men and many enemies for themselves, while God vindicates the rash prodigality of sacred wealth, so that while they seek princely splendor they are harried by hatreds and dangers. A Cardinal has rarely benefited the Church unless he was moderate and frugal; excessive wealth has more often harmed it. Therefore honorable and moderate expenses are more rightly distributed among many than immoderate expenses upon one.

If you desire more concerning Cardinals, see Barbatius in the treatise On the Excellence of Cardinals; Jerome Manfredi in the treatise On the Cardinalate, chapter 1; Álvaro Pelayo, book 2 of The Lament of the Church, article 26; Waldensis, book 2 of The Doctrinal of Faith, article 3, chapter 54; John of Torquemada, book 1 On the Church, chapters 81--84; Domingo de Soto, book 4 of the Sentences, distinction 24, question 2, article 4; Martin of Laon On Cardinals; Domenico Giacobazzi, book 1 On Councils, article 12; Jerome the Abbot, book On Cardinals; Onuphrius, Volaterranus, and others.

By their morals, vigilance, and moderation the Church can be stabilized and the orders of the clergy reformed, if they lead by word and example.

CHAPTER XXXVI

The Dignity of the Patriarchs Is Next to the Pontifical Dignity, Followed by That of Primates and Archbishops

§ 1. The dignity of the Cardinals in the Church was, and even now is, less than that of the Patriarchs and Primates. For the Church never placed the collateral clerics of the Roman Pope before the Patriarchs, but gave the next place to the Patriarchs themselves. Now that most of the prelates of the Patriarchal Sees have made a secession, the Cardinals have succeeded both to their office and to the estimation of their dignity. Formerly the Patriarchs were next in dignity, seating, and the other insignia.

§ 2. Patriarchs were so called as though fathers of princes, or of Archbishops, Distinction 21, chapter 1: "A Patriarch is the prince of the fathers," for ἄρχων means "prince." There is also a disputation concerning these matters by Heinrich Kalteisen, On the Punishment of Public Sinners, at the Council of Basel.

Those, however, were called Patriarchs who had Archbishops and Bishops subject to themselves, such as the Constantinopolitan, the Alexandrian, and the others. Yet the name was sometimes used more broadly. For in the Council of Mâcon, which was celebrated in the year of Christ 588 under Pelagius II, Bishop Priscus is called a Patriarch; but he was Bishop of Lyons, as is evident from the subscription, in which he is first. This name, therefore, was sometimes bestowed upon an Archbishop. For Gregory of Tours, book 5, chapter 20 of the History, calls Saint Nicetius, Archbishop of Lyons, a Patriarch. The custom of his age permitted this, but it has now been abolished. The Arians, in order to make themselves equal to the orthodox, named their principal Bishops Patriarchs, as is found in Gregory and Victor. Indeed, the schismatic Bishops of Venetia, Istria, and Liguria elected Paulinus, the prelate of Aquileia, as their supreme Patriarch, as Paul the Deacon relates in book 2 On the Affairs of the Lombards. But we speak of Patriarchs in the proper sense.

§ 3. The office of Patriarchs is to govern Archbishops and Bishops, so that cases involving more serious affairs are brought before them. Saint Anacletus gives the reason for the distinction in Epistle 3:

> The provinces were for the most part divided long before the advent of Christ, and afterward that division was renewed by the Apostles and by blessed Clement, our predecessor. In the capitals of the provinces, where formerly there were the primates of the secular king and the first judicial authority--to whom those dwelling throughout the other cities, whenever it was necessary, who could not flee to the court of the Emperor or of kings, or to whom it was not permitted, had recourse because of their oppressions or injustices, and appealed to them whenever there was need, as was commanded in their law--the divine and ecclesiastical laws likewise commanded Patriarchs or Primates, who retain one form although their names are different, to be placed and to exist in those same cities or places of ours. To them the Bishops, if necessary, might have recourse and appeal; and they themselves, and no others, were to enjoy the name of Primacy.
> The remaining metropolitan cities, which had lesser judges, although greater than counts, were to have their own Metropolitans, who should rightly obey the aforesaid Primates, just as was formerly ordained in the secular laws; and these were to enjoy the name not of Primates, but either of Metropolitans or of Archbishops. And although the metropolitan cities have their own provinces and ought to have their own Bishops as metropolitan judges, just as formerly they had secular metropolitan judges, they nevertheless were commanded, as was stated above, both then and now to have Primates, to whom the highest affairs should come after the Apostolic See, so that there the matters of those for whom it is necessary may be disclosed and rightly restored, and those who are unjustly oppressed may rightly be reformed and supported; and so that the cases of Bishops and the judgments of the highest affairs, with the authority of the Apostolic See preserved, may be most justly terminated.

> These things we have received from the ancients, these from the Apostles, these from the holy Fathers; and, as you request, we send them to you to be examined and observed in future times, and command them to be preached to the remaining brethren and handed down to all the faithful, lest those who follow become worse through the ignorance of pastors. The Lord says through the prophet, "The pastors themselves have not known understanding"; and again the Lord detests them, saying, "And those who hold the law have not known me." Therefore Truth complains that he is not known by them, and protests that he does not know the principality of the ignorant, because assuredly those who do not know the things of the Lord are not known by the Lord, as Paul attests when he says: "If anyone does not know, he shall not be known."

§ 4. It was not lawful to elect an Archbishop without the consent of the Patriarch. Hence Cyprus was endowed with the privilege that it need not refer the matter to the Antiochene, but that its people might themselves elect an Archbishop. Thus canon 37 of the Council of Nicaea:

> If the Bishop of Cyprus has ended his day, and the peoples, because of a storm at sea, have been unable to send to Antioch so that the Patriarch of Antioch may ordain for them an Archbishop in place of the dead man, they ought to write to the Patriarch and ask that some one man whom they themselves desire be made Archbishop; nor ought the Patriarch, when it has been written to him, to prevent this. For who knows whether, after the Archbishop has died, they may remain without a head because of a winter storm, or whether perhaps one of the thirteen Bishops may depart this life, and thus it may happen that they lack an Archbishop for that entire year? For this reason the Synod established this canon; the Synod excommunicates anyone who contradicts it.

The Synod of Ephesus confirmed the same canon, lest that diocese remain for an entire year without an Archbishop.

§ 5. Patriarchs have the right to convoke a Synod, and Metropolitans are compelled to obey them. Thus the Eighth Synod, canon 27:

> The holy and universal First Synod of Nicaea commands that the ancient custom be preserved throughout Egypt and the provinces subject to it, so that the Bishop of Alexandria has authority over them all, saying: "Because a custom of this kind has prevailed also in the city of the Romans." For this reason this great and holy Synod decrees that the ancient custom be preserved in all respects both in elder and new Rome and in the See of Antioch and that of Jerusalem, so that their prelates may have authority over all the Metropolitans who are promoted by them and who receive the confirmation of Episcopal dignity either through the imposition of hands or through the bestowal of the pallium: namely, authority to convoke them, when necessity presses, to a synodal assembly, or even to restrain and correct them when report has perhaps accused them of certain offenses.
>
> But because there are certain Metropolitans who, in order not to attend in accordance with the summons of the Apostolic prelate, plead without reason that they are detained by the prince of the world, it has pleased the Synod that an excuse of this kind be altogether invalid. For since a prince holds frequent assemblies for his own causes, it is impious that he should prevent the supreme prelates from celebrating Synods for ecclesiastical affairs, or prohibit certain men from attending their councils, although we have learned that such an impediment--
>
>
> --and such a prohibition are brought about in various ways at the suggestion of the Metropolitans.

The same Synod commands that a disobedient man be separated, and afterward, if he persists in contumacy, deposed.

§ 6. The Roman Pontiff confirms the other Patriarchs, chapter Scriptum, chapter 40, On Election, in Gregory. Hence they also receive the pallium from the Roman Church, as in the Lateran Council under Innocent III, chapter 5:

> Renewing the ancient privileges of the Patriarchal Sees, with the sacred universal Synod approving, we decree that after the Roman Church--which, by the Lord's disposition, possesses the primacy of ordinary power over all others, as the mother and teacher of all Christ's faithful--the Constantinopolitan Church shall obtain the first place, the Alexandrian the second, the Antiochene the third, and the Jerusalemite the fourth, the proper dignity of each being preserved; so that after their prelates have received from the Roman Pontiff the pallium, which is the insignia of the > fullness of the Pontifical office, and have rendered to him the oath of fidelity and obedience, they themselves may lawfully bestow the pallium upon their suffragans, receiving from them a canonical profession for themselves and a pledge of obedience for the Roman Church.

Here their insignia and the right to have a cross carried before them are also confirmed. That they must be obeyed was decreed in Distinction 99, from the Epistle of Anacletus.

They hear cases only upon appeal, lest the proper Archbishops and Bishops be contemned and the Patriarchs be burdened more than is fitting. Thus Gregory, book 1 of the Decretals, title 31, chapter 9, Consultationi.

§ 7. Those Patriarchal Sees which Peter founded are designated, and in the beginning there were three. Thus Anacletus, Epistle 3:

> The first See, therefore, by a heavenly benefit, is that of the Roman Church, which, as was recalled, the most blessed Peter and Paul consecrated by their martyrdom. Thus Rome, which before was, by the contrivance of the evil spirit, the mother and nurse of all errors, having shaken off the darkness and cast away the vain rites of superstitions, became, when the sun of justice had arisen, a prolific propagator of the sons of God.
>
> The second See, at Alexandria, was consecrated in the name of blessed Peter by Mark, his disciple and the Evangelist, because he, directed by Peter, first preached the word of truth in Egypt and underwent a glorious martyrdom. The venerable Abilius succeeded him.
>
> The third See, at Antioch, is held honorable in the name of the same Apostle, that is, blessed Peter, because he dwelt there before he came to Rome, and there the name of Christians first arose for the new people. The remaining things, as we have said before, we have written for you in a certain volume and sent, avoiding prolixity in this epistle. For this reason the blessed Apostles also decreed among themselves that the Bishops of the several nations should know who was first among them, so that the greater care of them might pertain to him. For among the blessed Apostles too there was a certain distinction; and although all were Apostles, it was nevertheless granted to Peter by the Lord--and they themselves willed the same thing among themselves--that he should preside over all the other Apostles and should possess the place of Cephas, that is, the head and beginning of the Apostolate. He handed down the same form to be observed by his successors, and the other Apostles handed it down to the Bishops.

Those three were founded by Peter the Apostle and therefore held honor from antiquity. Concerning them see Baronius at the year 112, number 2, and the most learned Severinus Binius in the notes to the third Epistle of Anacletus:

> The three Churches--the Roman, the Alexandrian, and the Antiochene--because they were founded by Peter, Prince of the Apostles, alone and always were held to be Patriarchal, as is evident from the Council of Nicaea, canon 6; Chalcedon, Act 16; likewise from letter 53 of Leo to Anatolius and from the letter of Gregory to Eulogius, which is book 6, chapter 37. For nearly five hundred years the Jerusalemite Church was held to be the fourth Patriarchal Church not in reality but in name, not in authority but in honor only, as is evident from the Council of Nicaea, canon 7, where it is decreed that the Jerusalemite should indeed possess the fourth place and honor of Patriarchal seating, but should not on that account be exempted from subjection to Caesarea, which was the Metropolis.

Hence blessed Jerome, in the letter to Pammachius against John, Bishop of Jerusalem, addresses him thus:

> You who seek ecclesiastical rules and employ the canons of the Council of Nicaea, answer me: what does Palestine have to do with the Bishop of Alexandria? Unless I am mistaken, this is decreed for you, that Caesarea is the Metropolis of Palestine and Antioch that of the whole East. Therefore you ought either to have referred the matter to the Archbishop of Caesarea, with whom you knew that we, after your communion had been spurned, were in communion; or, if a judgment was to be sought at a distance, letters should rather have been directed to Antioch. But I know why you did not wish to send to Caesarea or to Antioch. You preferred to cause trouble for ears already occupied rather than render the honor due to your Metropolitan.

The Patriarchate of Constantinople--because at the time of the Council of Nicaea the city of Constantinople had not yet been dedicated--was afterward added to these in the time of Justinian, after the five-hundredth year of the Lord, by the effort of the Emperor and with the permission of the Roman Pontiffs. In the First Council of Constantinople, and afterward at Chalcedon, the Constantinopolitan attempted to obtain not only a Patriarchate but also the second place; but in vain, since the Pontiff and the other Primates protested.

Why only the aforesaid three Patriarchal Sees were placed in that order was effected, as the proper and immediate cause of their honor and authority, by the prerogative, dignity, and primacy of Peter, Prince of the Apostles; although it cannot be denied that Peter, in choosing those Sees, had a certain regard for the greatness and nobility of the cities, as Saint Leo teaches in Epistle 84 to Anastasius. The Roman See possesses the first Patriarchal dignity because Peter the Apostle, in this See which he founded, as Saint Gregory says in book 6, letter 37 to Eulogius of Alexandria, deigned to rest and end his life. He adorned with a Patriarchal See the Alexandrian Church--to use Gregory's words--to which he sent his disciple Mark the Evangelist. Third, he confirmed the See in which he himself sat for seven years, namely Antioch, and adorned it with the honor of a Patriarchal See. Thus Gregory in the aforesaid letter and Saint Leo, letter 52 to Anatolius. Therefore, just as Peter the Apostle is greater than Mark the Evangelist, and Mark the Evangelist than Evodius, who was neither Apostle nor Evangelist, so also the Roman Church surpasses the Alexandrian, and the Alexandrian the Antiochene, in authority and dignity. See Bellarmine, On the Roman Pontiff, book 1, chapter 24.

The same men were called Primates, as is evident from the Epistle of Pope Stephen II:

> Let no Metropolitans or other Bishops be called Primates except those who hold the first Sees and whose cities the ancients judged to be primatial. Let the others who have obtained the remaining metropolitan cities be called not Primates, but either Archbishops or Metropolitans. For the cities and places over which Primates ought to preside were appointed not by modern men, but many ages before the advent of Christ; and the Gentiles too appealed to their Primates concerning more important affairs. In those same cities after the advent of Christ the Apostles and their successors placed Patriarchs or Primates, to whom the affairs of Bishops and the greater cases are to be referred after the Apostolic See, with Apostolic authority preserved in all things.

Canon 39 of Nicaea contains things not dissimilar:

> Let the Patriarch consider what his Archbishops and Bishops do in their provinces; and if he finds that anything has been done otherwise than it ought, let him alter it and arrange it as shall seem good to him. For he himself--
>
> --is the father of all, and they are his sons. And although the Archbishop is among the Bishops as an elder brother who has care of his brothers, and obedience is owed to him because he presides, nevertheless the Patriarch stands in the place of a father, under whose dominion and power are his sons. Thus the Patriarch presides over all those who are under his authority, just as he who holds the See of Rome is the head and prince of all the Patriarchs, since he is first, as was Peter, to whom authority over all Christian princes and all their peoples was given, so that he might be the Vicar of Christ our Lord over all peoples and the entire Christian Church. Whoever contradicts this is excommunicated by the Synod.

Augustinus Steuchus cites this canon in book 2 On the Donation of Constantine, and Francisco Torres in book 2 On Dogmatic Characters, as does Alanus Copus in the Dialogues; and it stood in Arabic in the library of Marcellus II, Roman Pontiff, number 44, in this manner:

> In accordance with the Scriptures and the determination of the canons, we venerate the most holy Bishop of the Roman and ancient Church as the first and greatest of all Bishops. Just as a Patriarch commands all the nations of his jurisdiction and imposes laws, and just as in the beginning Peter, the Vicar of Christ, was placed over religion, the Churches, and the other matters pertaining to Christ, and was lord and ruler of Christian princes, provinces, and all nations, so he whose principate is at Rome, like Peter and equal to him in authority, possesses dominion and primacy over all the Patriarchs. If anyone opposes this sanction and dares to resist it, by the decree of the whole Synod let him be subjected to anathema.

§ 8. Although the Constantinopolitan See was at last placed among the Patriarchal Sees, this was nevertheless done late, after a Council had been held at Constantinople. Thus chapter 5: "The Bishop of the city of Constantinople ought to possess the honor of primacy after the Bishop of Rome, because it is new Rome"; Distinction 23, chapter 5. The same thing was afterward decreed at the Synod under Justinian, chapter 36; Distinction 23, chapters 6 and 7.

The cities in which Patriarchs ought to be created are shown in Distinction 80, chapter 1. The canon says:

> The cities over which Primates ought to preside were appointed not by modern men, but many ages before the advent of Christ; and the Gentiles too appealed to their Primates concerning more important affairs. In those same cities after the advent of Christ the Apostles and their successors placed Patriarchs or Primates, to whom the affairs of Bishops and the greater cases are to be referred after the Apostolic See, with Apostolic authority preserved in all things.

§ 9. As the multitude of Christians increased, more Patriarchal Sees were erected. For Saint Anacletus says that, besides the first three, others also had been designated. Then, after the order had been approved according to which the Constantinopolitan See was after the Roman, then the Alexandrian, next the Antiochene, and last the Jerusalemite, more in name and honor--for it obeyed the Metropolitan of Caesarea--others too were established.

Among the canons of the Synod of Nicaea, chapters 33, 34, 35, and 36, certain Patriarchs are added. Chapter 33:

> Let there be a Patriarch in the royal city, for the honor of that city, the King, and the other presbyters together. Let the Bishop of Aelia also be honored more than the other Bishops, because he resides in the holy city whence the cross of God our Lord began and where is the place of judgment. Let the See of Seleucia, which is one of the eastern cities, likewise be honored; its prelate ought also to be called by the name of Catholicos, and he may ordain Archbishops just as the Patriarchs do, so that the eastern peoples may not suffer loss by waiting for the Patriarch of Antioch or going to him, and so that the Gentiles may find a way to meet their necessities. For in this no injury is done to the Patriarch of Antioch, since he consented after the Synod requested this of him, lest he complain of that power's having been taken away, when the Synod desired nothing other than that the faithful of that province enjoy peace and quiet, and at the same time that the man who holds the See of Seleucia be honored with the name of Catholicos.

Chapter 34:

> If it should happen that it is necessary for the Bishops of Greece to assemble, and the prelate of Seleucia of whom we have spoken is present--which Seleucia is in the province of Babylonia in the kingdom of Zabur and today is a small city--he ought to be honored greatly, esteemed highly, and exalted above all the Bishops of Greece. For he holds the place of the Patriarch in the East, and his seat in the Council ought to be sixth after the Bishop of Jerusalem. Whoever violates this constitution is excommunicated by the Synod.

Chapter 35:

> The great Synod does not permit an assembly in the province of Persia to arrange anything pertaining to the order of the Church without the consent and authority of the Patriarch of Antioch. For although the prelate of Persia stands in the place of a Patriarch and seeks nothing other than the quiet and tranquility of the Persians themselves, nevertheless he is not permitted to intrude himself into establishing the order of the Church; rather, in all things let the Metropolitans be obedient to the Patriarch. Whoever contradicts this is excommunicated by the Synod.

Chapter 36:

> The Ethiopians may not create or elect a Patriarch; rather, their prelate shall be under the authority of the man who holds the See of Alexandria. Nevertheless, he shall stand among them in the place of a Patriarch and shall be called Catholicos; yet he shall not have the right to establish Archbishops as a Patriarch has, since he does not possess the honor and authority of a Patriarch. But if it should happen that a Council is held in Greece and this prelate of the > Ethiopians is present, let him have the seventh place after the prelate of Seleucia. And when authority to establish Archbishops in his province has been granted to him, it shall not be lawful for him to establish any one of them; and whoever does not obey is excommunicated by the Synod.

This, therefore, was the order of the Churches: the Roman, the Constantinopolitan, the Alexandrian, the Antiochene, the Jerusalemite, the Seleucian, and the Ethiopian. The Greeks too consented to this order at the Council of Florence, although they were not concerned about the Seleucian and Ethiopian Sees. Thus they write:

> Περὶ τῆς ἀρχῆς δὲ πάπα, ὁμολογοῦμεν αὐτὸν ἄκρον ἀρχιερέα καὶ ἐπίτροπον, καὶ τοποτηρητὴν καὶ βικάριον τοῦ Χριστοῦ, ποιμένα τε καὶ διδάσκαλον πάντων χριστιανῶν, ἰθύνοντα καὶ κυβερνῶντα τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ Θεοῦ, σωζομένων τῶν προνομίων καὶ τῶν δικαίων τῶν πατριαρχῶν τῆς ἀνατολῆς· τὸν Κωνσταντινουπόλεως δεύτερον εἶναι μετὰ τὸν πάπαν, εἶτα τὸν Ἀλεξανδρείας, τὸν Ἀντιοχείας μετὰ τοῦτον, εἶτα τὸν Ἱεροσολύμων.
> Concerning the primacy of the Pope, we confess him to be the Supreme Pontiff and procurator, lieutenant and Vicar of Christ, pastor and teacher of all Christians, directing and governing the Church of God, with the privileges and rights of the Patriarchs of the East preserved. The Constantinopolitan is second after the Pope; then the Alexandrian; after him the Antiochene; and last the Jerusalemite.

§ 10. I have said that Patriarchs were called Primates; nevertheless, besides those whom we are accustomed properly to call Patriarchs, others too are called Primates. For there may be a Primate even under a Patriarch, to whom the cases of Archbishops are brought. In Distinction 99, chapter 1, Gratian says that Primate and Patriarch are names differing from one another but belong to the same office; he says, however, that appeals are made from Archbishops to Primates.

Those immediately under the Supreme Pontiff--the Primates of Lyons--

--Toledo, Bourges, and Aquileia--are called Primates but not Patriarchs. For they are not under any Patriarch. The same is true of the Archbishops of Germany, for they acknowledge no Patriarch besides the Roman Pontiff. Yet if it is required of a Primate that appeals from Archbishops be made to him, scarcely any of these is a Primate. The Constantinopolitan, certainly, is called a Patriarch in another sense: twenty-six Archbishoprics were subject to him in the time of Pepin and Charles. In book 2 of the Eastern law, eighty Metropolitan Churches and thirty-nine Archbishops are enumerated. The Antiochene had under him twelve, and afterward thirteen, Archbishoprics; William of Tyre, book 12 On the Holy War, chapter 12. For the Egyptian, or Alexandrian, possessed a much broader jurisdiction because Libya was added to it.

CHAPTER XXXVII

Concerning the Opinion of the Sectarians Who Either Admit or Reject the Hierarchical Order

§ 1. Nothing is more opposed to license, novelty, and sedition than an order of judgments and magistracies founded upon laws; the man who introduces new dogmas must stand against it. For this reason I said above that all sectarians rise up against ecclesiastical magistracy. They cry out that everything contrary to their lust is tyrannical, and disparage every authority as proud.

Some of these, such as the Genevans, insist upon equality among ministers: neither presbyter is to command presbyter, nor Bishop, nor Archbishop. And, so that they may remove every suspicion of tyranny, they abolish the offices themselves from their midst. Others relegate the censure of morals to political magistrates. Others retain the thing itself but reject its name; for they call them superintendents and general superintendents, not Archbishops or Patriarchs. Finally, the more prudent retain both the thing and the names, as do the Britons, who have Primates and Bishops and at the highest summit, or "supremacy," as they are accustomed to call it, the King himself is placed.

The Britons therefore make the greatest account of this matter and place in it the hinge of their Gospel. Thus Adrian Saravia in the preface to the English Bishops:

> In my treatise On the Different Ranks of the Ministers of the Gospel, whatever men may think, I had in mind not only to defend Your dignities, but also, if not to remove, at least to diminish, the offenses given in many places by our men to the Bishops of all the Churches of Christ, both in France and in Germany, and to other learned men not ignorant of the government of the ancient Church; and I endeavored to soothe the wound--which those who inflicted it will never heal--and, as far as was lawful, to remove the impediments to the propagation of evangelical doctrine.

The same author says in the prologue that the cause of so great an error was that, through hatred of tyranny, they abolished the name of Primacy, just as the Romans of old, through hatred of the Tarquins, overthrew kingship itself; yet afterward they suffered more forms of tyranny than they would have done if they had retained the royal name and authority. For these vices belong not to authority but to men.

§ 2. Philip Melanchthon judged that this authority ought to be retained. He writes thus to Luther:

> You do not believe how greatly I am hated by the men of Nuremberg and I know not what others, because jurisdiction has been restored to the Bishops. Thus our allies fight for their own kingdom, not for the Gospel. A certain friend wrote that, if I had been hired by the Roman Pontiff for as much money as I might have desired, I could not have undertaken a better method for restoring pontifical dominion than this one which we have instituted, as men may judge.

And elsewhere:

> Certain legates are wonderfully incensed against me because I seem to restore the kingdom of the Bishops. Sacranus remonstrated with me about that matter in no friendly manner, with a certain new and unaccustomed bitterness in his use of words. It is as Thucydides writes, τὰ ἐν μέσῳ ἀμφοτέρων χείρονα: "those in the middle fare worse at the hands of both sides." Would that this had happened to me long ago, so that I might not now be compelled to see these faults of the parties, and so forth.

An eminent testimony from a man who knew his own party exceedingly well. For so great a tragedy was instituted not for the sake of the Gospel but of license, and was destined to seethe with lawlessness and anarchy.

Saravia proves at length against Beza, page 236 and following, that others hold the same opinion. Hence the same author says that others, retaining the thing, changed the names, creating Superintendents in place of Bishops and

General or Provincial Superintendents in place of Archbishops, as though the dispute concerned names, not the thing; page 5.

§ 3. They therefore approve the consensus of the ancient Church. Saravia in the prologue, page 1:

> Against the unanimous and constant consensus of all the Fathers of the ancient Church, nothing is to be changed without the express word of God. For I say this freely: whoever takes all authority away from the Fathers leaves none to himself.

And:

> The custom of the people of God received by all the Churches of the whole world is a certain inviolable law. It is not probable that the universal consensus of all Churches and all times could have arisen without the word of God or Apostolic tradition.

And finally he adds: "Of old no good man disapproved Bishops and Archbishops."

This consensus, which the English value so highly, Adrian Saravia proves in chapter 20. I shall set down his words for this reason, because they may be useful in all disputed articles of faith:

> I judge that what we read was done in all Churches by the Fathers throughout the whole world from the times of the Apostles down to our own age is an immutable canon of the Apostles. It is no small matter to abrogate what was received by so great and so universal a consensus. Besides the fact that departing from it is rash, it brings upon the Church a greater disaster than many suspect, for which afterward no remedy will be possible. Among the ancient canons which because of their antiquity are called the Canons of the Apostles, we read the one which follows here.
> Τοὺς ἐπισκόπους ἑκάστου ἔθνους εἰδέναι χρὴ τὸν ἐν αὐτοῖς πρῶτον, καὶ ἡγεῖσθαι αὐτὸν ὡς κεφαλήν, καὶ μηδέν τι πράττειν περιττὸν ἄνευ ἐκείνου γνώμης, ἐκεῖνο δὲ μόνον πράττειν ἕκαστον, ὅσα τῇ αὐτοῦ παροικίᾳ ἐπιβάλλει καὶ ταῖς ὑπ' αὐτὴν χώραις. Ἀλλὰ μηδὲ ἐκεῖνον ἄνευ τῆς πάντων γνώμης ποιεῖν τι, οὕτως γὰρ ὁμόνοια ἔσται καὶ δοξασθήσεται ὁ Θεὸς διὰ Κυρίου ἐν ἁγίῳ Πνεύματι.
>
> The Bishops of the several nations ought to know who among them is first and is regarded as a head, without whose judgment they are to do nothing of greater importance; but each is to do only those things which pertain to his own parish and to the villages subject to it. Yet neither is that man to do anything without the knowledge of all; for thus there will be unanimity, and God will be glorified through the Lord in the Holy Spirit.

§ 4. The Puritans, who tear apart with abuse those names of Bishops, Archbishops, Metropolitans, and Patriarchs, gravely reprehend them. Thus Saravia, chapter 25. He says that these names are not proud and are not contrary to the canon of the Council of Carthage, which is Distinction 99: "Let the Bishop of the First See not be called Prince of the Priests, or Supreme Priest, or anything of that kind, but only Bishop of the First See." Nor, he says, is calling someone ἀρχιερέα, "high priest," contrary to the honor of Christ, for there is no greater pride in these titles--

--than when someone is named an architect or chief physician: an Archbishop does not signify simply a lord of Bishops, but one in a certain manner.

He denies that he shrinks from the name of Prince and Patriarch; indeed, for the sake of modesty, he prefers to call them Archbishops and Patriarchs rather than ἐξάρχους τῶν ἱερέων, "exarchs of the priests." Nevertheless no one ought to be offended by the name of Prince, since Ambrose, on Ephesians, chapter 4, writes: "In the Bishop are all the orders, because he is the first priest, that is, the prince of the priests, and Prophet, and Evangelist." Nor does this prevent Christ from nevertheless being ἀρχιποίμενα καὶ ἔξαρχον, "the chief shepherd and exarch." Thus far he.

As regards the name of Prince, it had an emphatic signification at that time, and thus the Emperor was generally so called, as may be seen in the histories; for that reason it was sometimes rejected by modest men. Thus the usage of names changes. Now, if when addressing Caesar or the King of Spain or France I said, "O Prince," I should offend against customary speech; their sons or prefects I would customarily call by that name. But of old the name of Prince was not readily bestowed upon the companions of the Supreme Prince. It was therefore odious at that time because "Prince" was a name of greater power and absolute dominion.

§ 5. They teach that it is a great sign of divine wrath that the name of Bishops has fallen into hatred not only among some of the common people but even among Theologians; in the preface. For the Episcopate is divine; page 4. Primacy too was formerly called Apostolate. For they teach that concord cannot be maintained without these; in the preface, and likewise pages 278 and 405. Saravia, beginning on page 397, indeed prophesies that government will not be firm nor peace lasting amid the equality of all. That this was true has been taught by the Remonstrance and Counter-Remonstrance of the Hollanders, and is taught by the very delusion of their ill-convened Synod. For what will a few men do, even if they could agree? But it is pleasing to hear the adversaries.

Saravia says on page 397:

> But come, let us suppose that in those ages there were no Bishops or Archbishops, and that the presidency was circular and the presbyterate annual, as Master Beza wishes. Can anyone experienced in human affairs and acquainted with the perversity of human nature be persuaded that affairs would then have been in a better condition? In this city and its suburbs there are a little more or less than two hundred Ministers of the word of God. The number of the clergy of the Churches of Constantinople, Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch was not less but far greater. Come, let them all have been equal and of equal authority, without a Bishop to contain this multitude by authority and gather it again into one body, as it were. What condition is it probable that this Church would have, or that those Churches would have had, while diverse heresies raged in the very bowels of these Churches? Far be it from me to agree with Master Beza. For I believe that the Churches of those times stood and were defended from destruction, according to the grace of God, by the vigor and power of the Episcopal rank and its authority above the remaining multitude of presbyters alone.

Then:

> Beza, now second after Calvin, governs the Genevan Church in a small state with few colleagues in number, namely, at most eighteen if you count the teachers with the pastors. There the προεδρία, "presidency," is weekly and circular, and the presbyters and deacons are new and annual. So long as life is passed in a tranquil condition, all things indeed go well. But if at any time dissension arises among the Ministers of the Churches who are favored by the people and the magistrate, the city will easily be divided into parties, than which no graver evil can happen. With the same ease the presbytery too will be divided; and the common people, once divided, will riot and support the parties. In this case, which certainly cannot always be avoided, what will be done? The Magistrate will interpose his authority. Well indeed; but to which party will he incline? The Roman Emperors were compelled to interpose their authority in the disputes of Bishops, but it was not always granted them to favor the better men; they protected factions and factious men. "But we have not yet experienced anything of this kind under this government." You therefore seek experience as your teacher--if only its instruction could be had without danger and irreparable harm.

And:

> Let us suppose that France, having rejected Roman superstitions, has received the pure doctrine of the Son of God and, which God forbid, has admitted that form of Church government which Master Beza judges to be divine. Does he believe that it will be free from the calamities to which all the Churches of all ages have been subject, the causes of which he imputes to Bishops? And if, at the time when Bishops contained the remaining multitude of Ministers of the word of God in their office so that they could convoke no lawful Synods, nevertheless Synods were assembled against Synods, and what one sanctioned another condemned; if Bishops then ran about this way and that, what would they not have done if all presbyters had been equal to Bishops and Bishops to Patriarchs? If a few men of equal authority could scarcely preserve peace and concord in doctrine, could six hundred, or two or three thousand Ministers of the same authority have done so in place of one?

§ 6. They also teach that the Church could in no way have been propagated if Apostolic authority had migrated into heaven with the Apostles--if Bishops, Archbishops, and Patriarchs, having the general care of the Church, had not founded and planted new Churches and appointed presbyters to water them. Saravia says on page 264:

> Once Churches had been established, whether in the East or the West, to run about, invade another's parishes and provinces, and involve oneself in their affairs was the act of a πολυπράγμονος, "busybody," and an ambitious man. No one who has bound himself to a particular Church can desert his proper station so as to transfer himself elsewhere at his own pleasure. Nevertheless, because care for propagating the Gospel belongs to the Church, it must choose men for that work whenever and wherever an opportunity for preaching the Gospel shall be offered. Master Beza wishes these to be teachers and pastors only; I, with the whole of antiquity, hold them to be Bishops such as Titus and Timothy were. For pastors are not created for a particular Church unless the Churches have already been established and founded. The man who is to found Churches ought to be superior to those presbyters and Bishops whom he will appoint. Thus the Apostles acted, and by their example the Fathers taught that it must be done thus.

Indeed, I shall concede something further: that this cannot be done otherwise. This is also the reason why heretics have not hitherto spread their faith among the nations. I add further that the Primacy of one man is proved by this argument. For the general care falls upon the man who sets out to preach the faith in new regions and appoint pastors, or he ought to be sent by the man who has the general care. But Archbishops do not possess it; for just as Bishops are bound to their Bishoprics and pastors to their parishes, so Archbishops are bound to their Archbishoprics, and one cannot invade another's province.

For as to what Beza says on page 275:

> Nor indeed do I think we must inquire curiously here whether the Apostles reached all nations; nor even now must we labor greatly over a mission to certain most remote nations, since at home and nearby we have enough and more than enough to occupy us and our posterity.

Saravia rightly judges this impious and foreign to every Christian charity. And deservedly so; for the Apostles did this, to whom the Lord had said that they should teach all nations, and he promised that the Gospel would be preached in the whole world. The Church must therefore labor so that this may be brought to its completion.

§ 7. Saravia demonstrates on pages 213 and 254 that the equality of all the prelates of the Church was nowhere sanctioned. For when Christ forbids them to exercise dominion in the manner of Gentile kings, the matter concerns tyrannical rule, or even moderate political rule, which is not granted in the Episcopate. Nevertheless, on page 211 he adds:

> In another treatise, indeed, I defend that the same man, if it is in the interest of the kingdom or of the state, can sustain a twofold capacity; and I believe that God will one day be my witness that this has been done by me, and can be done with a better conscience and more for the edification of the Church, than it is attacked by others.

§ 8. Nor are Archbishops therefore not to be appointed because the care of many Bishoprics is beyond the strength of one man, as Adrian truly demonstrates against Beza on page 413. For the High Priest of the Jews presided over all; then many kingdoms are subject to one king. The whole world was subject to the twelve Apostles. For they have helpers and fellow workers. Furthermore, the general care of great affairs pertains to them.

§ 9. Those who deny that Hierarchy are moved chiefly by this argument: that otherwise they cannot exclude the Roman Pontiff and escape his Primacy. Thus Beza, quoted by Saravia on page 408:

> Certainly, if for preserving consensus in the sacred ministry it was necessary to establish a diocesan Episcopal dominion over fellow presbyters and Chorepiscopi; a Metropolitan dominion over provincial fellow Bishops; and a fourfold Patriarchal dominion over fellow Archbishops who were Metropolitans: certainly by the same and equal > reasoning a monarchical command over fellow Patriarchs, or a Catholic dominion over the whole Catholic Church, had to be erected. The argument which you, Saravia, raise here in order to evade this reasoning is of no moment. For there is indeed a very great difference, as you rightly say, between the prefecture of one nation and region and that of the entire world, namely as regards the measure of their jurisdictions, but not as regards the thing itself, whether we posit here an order or a degree. It would not therefore follow, from the fact that these prefectures are not equal to one another in measure, that no universal prefecture should be established to which those narrower ones are subordinated.

Saravia attempts to escape this stroke, but unexpectedly runs himself upon the very sword. For Saravia denies that it follows: individual kingdoms have individual kings; therefore one king may be appointed over them all. But Beza says that this is to evade the argument, for he proceeds in this manner: if there can be a Tetrarchy of the Church, so that the Roman, Alexandrian, Constantinopolitan, and Antiochene govern the whole by equal right, why can one of these four not also command the others, or be of principal authority among them? A reason must be given why, when the antecedent has been conceded, the consequence is denied.

If he should say that one man is unequal to so great a care, he has already answered this above, when he assigned several kingdoms to one king, since that king can have fellow workers and counselors, can be content with general care, and can judge only the chief matters. Moreover, Saravia's arguments prove this. For it was necessary to settle disputes between the Patriarch of Constantinople and the Patriarch of Alexandria, and between the Patriarch of Antioch and the Patriarch of Alexandria, and to preserve unity, since each had his own particular Patriarchate, just as among other Bishops. Just as a dispute may arise among twenty-four English Bishops and be terminated by the Archbishops, may it not likewise arise between the two Bishops of Canterbury and York? Since they ought not to be sent to the royal tribunal in ecclesiastical affairs, they must therefore choose another judge for themselves.

Therefore, so that concord may be maintained, there must be one priest who directs all his brethren. Indeed, Saravia proceeds so far on page 85 as to write that Peter presided over the College of the Apostles. His words are:

> As regards the Apostles, who lived together for some time at Jerusalem, it is certain that they were not created by the Lord to remain together in the same place, whether in a single region or city; wherefore there was no necessity that someone be placed over the College. Nevertheless, so long as they lived together at Jerusalem, it is not absurd that some one man then presided over the College of the twelve Apostles. By denying this more obstinately, no good cause against the Roman Bishop is assisted. Who has ever seen a convention or assembly come together in which no one presided to propose the things to be done, ask opinions, and collect votes? Even if we say with the ancient Fathers that this was entrusted to Peter by the Apostolic College, nothing is thereby given to the cause of the Roman Bishop from which he may establish his tyranny. This too was temporary in Peter and ended when the Apostles were dispersed.

Here it must be noted: 1. It is not absurd that one man presided. 2. Indeed, it is absurd if no one presided, because no assembly is so absurd that someone does not preside in it. 3. He acknowledges that the Fathers confess that this was conferred upon Peter. These things are true and contrary to many heresies; necessity therefore extorted the truth from this man. 4. He says that this prefecture of Peter ended when the dispersion occurred. This is false. For it was given to him by Christ; furthermore, the Fathers whom he produces as witnesses of Peter's prefecture deny that it was temporary and concede that it was transmitted to his successors. Third, it was as necessary when they were dispersed as when they were assembled. For just as there is need of a president among those assembled, so there is need of a convoker among those dispersed; otherwise there would have been no one who could convoke all or some of the Apostles.

But if equality must be altogether preserved, no one can command another, nor many command few, nor few command many. For whenever an equal commands an equal, it is tyranny. For this reason the Synod which is now being attempted at Dordrecht is ridiculous; for although they elect a president, they nevertheless do not have authority, and the Synod itself can command nothing to so many thousands of their brethren, who are equal to it in every respect.

For why should a few arrogate to themselves the authority to command more numerous men? If they say that this authority was created by the political magistrate, a greater tyranny now arises than was ever approved in any Church; for the States themselves and their president will make Archbishops and Patriarchs, and then will command that some preachers command and others obey. But if they place one over all, you will be the Patriarch of Holland; if some powerful King or Emperor did the same, he would establish one Patriarch of all kingdoms. And thus, while they flee Monarchy, individual petty tyrants are discovered. But I have treated this matter elsewhere.

Now I give this admonition: Patriarchs and Archbishops should be instituted in such a manner that with the greatest authority they can inquire into and correct morals and discipline; but they should have the least authority over treasuries and riches, and should be able to do the least harm.

CHAPTER XXXVIII

The Offices of Metropolitans, Archbishops, Bishops, and Chorepiscopi Are Necessary and Useful for Morals and the State

§ 1. Metropolitans and Archbishops are ordinarily taken in law for the same persons: Cause 9, question 3; at the end of the section De Monachis; in the section Non autem, On the Non-Alienation of Ecclesiastical Property, in the Authentics; thus Rebuffus on section 1 of the Institutes, and Gregory of Toulouse. They were placed in those cities which were μητροπόλεις, "mother-cities," and principal cities, in which the governors of the provinces resided.

Heinrich Kalteisen, however, held the contrary in his oration On the Punishment of Public Crimes at the Council of Basel, and did so from Rabanus, book 1 On the Institution of Clerics, chapter 5:

> The order of Bishops is fourfold, that is, divided into Patriarchs, Archbishops, Metropolitans, and Bishops. "Patriarch" is interpreted in the Greek language as "supreme of the Fathers"; he holds the first, that is, Apostolic place, and because he performs the highest honor, he is designated by such a name, as at Rome, Antioch, and Alexandria. "Archbishop" is so called by a Greek term because he is the supreme Bishop; for he holds the Apostolic place and presides over Metropolitans as well as the other Bishops. Metropolitans, however, are named from the measure of cities, for one presides over the several provinces; the other priests are subject to their authority and teaching, and without them it is lawful for the other Bishops to do nothing, for the care of the whole province has been committed to them. All the orders designated above are named Bishops by one and the same term; but certain men use a particular name because of the distinction of the powers which they have received individually.

"Patriarch" means father of princes, for ἄρχων means "Prince"; "Archbishop" means Prince of Bishops, just as "Metropolitan" derives from the measure of cities.

He places Archbishops before Metropolitans, as though there were certain Metropolitans who are not named Archbishops. They are so named, I say, for I could scarcely believe that anyone is called a Metropolitan to whom the office of Archbishop does not belong, except that in the cited place, as also in Distinction 21, Cleros, the Archbishop is said to preside even over Metropolitans. In Germany, however, another rationale for the distinction appears. For Metropolitans are named from the principal city of one province, while Archbishops have under themselves Bishops of different provinces. For example, the Archbishop of Mainz has the Bishops of Speyer, Chur, Halberstadt, Worms, Strasbourg, Paderborn, Würzburg, Verden, Constance, Eichstätt, Hildesheim, and Augsburg. In the ancient manner Mainz was not rightly called the Metropolis in relation to these provinces, since they are different provinces and different Metropolises.

Budé regarded the origin and ancient times when he names as Metropolises those cities from which colonies were led out. This has no relevance to our Archbishoprics and Metropolitans, nor indeed even to the times of the Empire. For many colonies surpassed their Metropolises. Tyre was an ἀποικία, "colony," of Sidon, and Carthage of Tyre; yet the Archbishop of Carthage was by no means subject to the Tyrian, but the latter acknowledged the Patriarch of Antioch. Metropolises, therefore, are those which govern other Churches not by origin, but by maternal care, solicitude, authority, and power.

§ 2. An Archbishop was formerly elected by all the Bishops of his jurisdiction. Thus Pope Anicetus:

> But as the number of Bishops increases, more also ought to be added unless necessity intervenes; that is, if an Archbishop has died and another Archbishop to be ordained has been elected, all the Bishops of the same province shall assemble at the Metropolitan See so that he may be ordained by them all. For the man who ought to preside over all must be elected and ordained by all of them. The remaining Bishops of the province, however, if it should be necessary and the others consent, may at the Archbishop's command be consecrated by three Bishops; but it is better if he himself, together with all, elects the man who is worthy and all alike consecrate him as Pontiff.

And although this has been conceded under the pressure of necessity, nevertheless what was said and commanded concerning the consecration of an Archbishop--namely, that all the suffragans ordain him--may in no way be changed, because the man who presides over them must be appointed by all the Bishops over whom he presides. If anything else has been presumed, it is without doubt devoid of force, because his ordination performed otherwise will be invalid. The Archbishop himself, moreover, shall conduct nothing concerning their cases or other common matters, according to the statutes of the Apostles, without the counsel of them all; nor shall they act without his counsel except insofar as pertains to their own parishes, because the Most High rejoices in such concord and is glorified in his members.

This was renewed at the Second Council of Orléans in 536, canon 7, In ordinandis.

§ 3. He ought to do nothing without the counsel of the other Bishops. The same Anicetus:

The Archbishop himself shall conduct nothing concerning their cases or other common matters, according to the statutes of the Apostles, without the counsel of them all; nor shall they act without his counsel except insofar as pertains to their own parishes, because the Most High rejoices in such concord and is glorified in his members.

The same thing was also rightly decreed by the laws of France, book 1, chapter 8, in the time of Charlemagne. For a Bishop needs his own authority and liberty for governing; if he judges that something should prudently be altered, let him indicate it to the Metropolitan.

§ 4. They are not to be called Primates. The same Anicetus:

Let no Archbishops be called Primates except those who hold the first cities, whose Bishops the Apostles and successors of the Apostles regularly appointed to be Patriarchs and Primates, unless some nation should be converted to the faith for which, because of their multitude, it is necessary that a Primate be appointed. But let the others who have obtained other Metropolitan Sees be named not Primates but Metropolitans.

If, however, any one of the Metropolitans has become puffed up and wishes, without the presence or counsel of all the Bishops of the province, to conduct either their cases or other cases except only those which pertain to his own parish, or wishes to burden them, let him be strictly corrected by all, lest he dare to presume such things thereafter. But if he appears incorrigible and disobedient to them, let his contumacy be reported to this Apostolic See--to which it has been commanded that all the judgments of Bishops be terminated--so that vengeance may be taken upon him and the others may have fear. If, however, because of excessive distance, the inconvenience of the time, or the roughness of the journey, it should be burdensome to bring his case to this See, then let the case be brought to his Primate and judged before him by the authority of this holy See.

§ 5. They make a profession of the faith of the Roman Church and seek the pallium. Thus John to Wilibert, Bishop of Cologne, Distinction 100, chapter 4:

We cannot now confer upon you the pallium you desire, because we have found that the page containing your profession of faith contains less than it ought, since--

--in it you made no mention of any of the holy universal Synods in which the Symbol of our faith is contained, nor of the constitutions of the decretal Roman Pontiffs according to custom; neither did you fortify it with your own subscription nor send anyone who would confirm it by oath.

§ 6. Let him attempt nothing in another's jurisdiction. Thus Celestine to the Bishops of Gaul:

First, according to the decrees of the Canons, let each province be content with its own Metropolitan, as the enactments of our predecessor given to the Bishop of Narbonne contain; nor let room for usurpation be granted to any priest to the injury of another. Thus let each, content with the limits granted to him, presume nothing in another's province. Nor, to the exclusion of clerics who have served meritoriously in their own Churches, let foreigners and strangers, previously unknown, be preferred to those who deserve well by the testimony of their own citizens, lest the Episcopate appear to be some new college from which Bishops are made. Let no Bishop be given to men unwilling. The consent and desire of the clergy, people, and order are required.

Only then let one man be chosen from another Church, if among the clerics of the very city for which a Bishop is to be ordained no worthy man--which we do not believe can happen--can be found. For first those men must be rejected, so that some from foreign Churches may deservedly be preferred. Each cleric has the fruit of his own service in the Church in which he has passed his life through all the offices. Let no one steal into another's stipends, nor dare to claim for himself the reward owed to another. Let the clerics have the power to resist if they see themselves burdened, and let them not fear to reject those whom they perceive entering upon them obliquely.

And a little afterward:

The Apostle follows and supplies the rest, speaking in the same spirit, that a man of one wife ought to be consecrated Bishop. Let priests therefore be chosen according to this rule; and if any unlawful ordinations have been made, let them be removed, because they cannot stand, nor will those who arrived in such a manner be able to evade our examination, although they suppose that they lie hidden, so that no reverence for religion may be darkened by obscurity. Let there be no vain glorying among those who wear the pallium. Let those who are Bishops follow the Episcopal manner.

Let Daniel, as we have said, who believed that he could evade an accusation by Pontifical honor and reached so great a summit by hiding from his accusers, know himself meanwhile to be separated from the assembly of Your Holiness. He ought to submit himself to our judgment if he knows that he has confidence in his conscience. But the priest of the Church of Marseille, who is said--which it is impious to say--to have rejoiced so greatly in the murder of your brother that he went to meet the man who arrived stained with his blood, intending to have a share with him, we delegate to your College to be heard. Given on the seventh day before the Kalends of August, in the consulship of the most illustrious men Felix and Taurus.

§ 7. Let him celebrate a Synod every year, to which all the Bishops of the province are bound to come. Thus the Third Synod of Orléans, celebrated in 540, chapter 1:

First, every Metropolitan ought at a suitable time each year to hold a synodal Council in his province with his comprovincials. But if infirmity or some certain necessity detains him so that he cannot be present at another appointed place, let him summon his brethren to his own city. But if, within a biennium in which tranquility of the times has been divinely granted, no Synod has been convened by the Metropolitan after the provincials have been admonished, let the Metropolitan himself, because of his delay in convoking it, not presume to celebrate Masses for an entire year. If those summoned, when not detained by bodily infirmity, disdain to be present at his summons, they shall lie under a like sentence. Let them also know that this excuse has been taken away from them if they believe that their absence is to be excused by the division of their lot.

The same and more are decreed in the Council of Mérida, chapters 4, 5, and 6. That it is his office to watch over morals and correct all things through Synods was also decreed in many other Councils, including Tarragona, chapters 6 and 13. Letters of this sort are to be directed by the Metropolitan through the brethren, so that they bring to the Council not only presbyters from the Cathedral Church but also some from the diocesan Churches, and ought to bring with them some laymen of the Church.

§ 8. Bishops are bound to acknowledge the Metropolitan and do nothing without him. The Second Council of Braga renewed this:

Throughout the several provinces a Bishop ought to acknowledge the Primacy of the Metropolitan Bishop and permit him to assume the care of the Primacy; the remaining Bishops are to do nothing apart from him, according to what is contained in the canon established of old by our Fathers. For this reason the Metropolitan Bishop too shall presumptuously assume nothing for himself without the counsel of the others.

Bishops cannot establish anything new in their parish without the Metropolitan's knowledge, for the authority of Metropolitans is principal over the Bishops subject to them. Therefore the Synod of Antioch commands them to have regard to the Metropolitans.

§ 9. The abuse of Metropolitans who delegate their own duties to Bishops is reprehended and condemned in the Eighth General Synod, Act 10, canon 24:

> Divine Scripture says, "Cursed is every man who does the work of the Lord negligently." Certain Metropolitans, having fallen into extreme negligence and sloth, bring to themselves by their commands the Bishops subject to them and commit to them the divine offices of their own Church, the litanies, and altogether all the sacred ministries which pertain to themselves, so that through them they celebrate everything which they ought eagerly to perform by themselves; and through those who have merited the Episcopal dignity they in a certain manner exhibit clerics subject to themselves.
>
> Contrary to the ecclesiastical laws, however, these same men devote themselves to secular cares and arrangements, abandoning perseverance in prayers and supplications for their own offenses and the ignorance of the people--something which is found nowhere at all among any men, since it is altogether contrary to the canonical precepts. And, what is more grievous, the aforesaid Bishops are said to be commanded to perform these ministries for their stipends in distinct turns of the months, which is shown in every way to be foreign to Apostolic protection. All these things render men of this kind worthy of great, numerous, and most vehement condemnations; for by these things which they do, such men are proved also to languish under satanic vainglory and pride.
> Therefore, if any of the Metropolitans, after this determination of the holy and universal Synod, abusing the same boldness or pride and contempt, should attempt to have the ministries due in his own city performed not by himself with fear, eagerness, and a good conscience, but through his suffragan Bishops, let him pay the penalties before his own Patriarch and either be corrected or deposed.

§ 10. His principal care concerns his own ordinary diocese, which he governs; his care for other jurisdictions is secondary, yet necessary. Thus he hears controversies and supplies for the negligence of his Bishops when he himself does what the Bishop ought to have done voluntarily. Cause 9, question 3:

> Since we know that all are debtors bound to preserve the sacred rules, we ought in every way inviolably to preserve the rule which says that there ought to be stewards in every Church. If each Metropolitan has appointed a steward in his own Church, it is indeed well; but if not, the Bishop of Constantinople has authority by his own power to place stewards over his Church. Likewise the Metropolitans may do so if the Bishops subject to them have not taken care to appoint stewards in their own Churches. The same is also to be observed in monasteries.

Hence he traverses his dioceses, visits, inquires, and amends the life of the subjects; for which reason subsidies are owed to him in turn: chapter Cum ex officio, On Prescription; chapter Sopitae; canon 14; canon Cum nuper, On Censuses, in Gregory. In this visitation he can use all the Pontifical insignia, bless the people, and command that the cross be carried before him; Clementine Archiepiscopo, On Privileges.

These things established by the Fathers are altogether to be recalled into use for restoring the discipline of the Church; nor ought anyone's power to be so great that it changes this order. Unity and integrity of life cannot be preserved if every Bishop wishes to be Pope in his own diocese.

CHAPTER XXXIX

The Office of Bishops Is Supremely Necessary and Varied; Their Dignity, and So Forth

§ 1. The Pope, Patriarchs, and Archbishops are called Bishops. But although they differ in jurisdiction, otherwise their office is nearly equal and the same, and integrity of life is required of all. A few things must now be said concerning Bishops, for most have been explained above.

§ 2. Presbyters too were sometimes called by the name of Bishops. Aerius, because he was excluded from the Episcopate, denied that they were different offices; thus Epiphanius, heresy 75. Baronius discusses this copiously at the year of Christ 58, as does, from among the heretics, Saravia in On the Different Ranks of Ministers, especially from page 334. In the beginning the Apostles alone were Bishops and presbyters; finally, as the multitude of the faithful increased, they also made presbyters and Bishops, to whom they assigned διοικήσεις, or "administrations."

§ 3. From this it is established that Bishops are to be appointed not by the people or by kings, but by the successors of the Apostles: the Pontiff, Archbishops, and Bishops. For although peoples or Princes were sometimes joined in the election, the primary right nevertheless belongs to the clergy and Bishops, not only that Bishops should consecrate them, but also designate them. The people often demanded a Bishop, even to the point of sedition; Nicephorus, book 1, chapter 30 of the Ecclesiastical History. This practice nevertheless endured for a long time in the Church. See Athanasius, On the Persecution, to the orthodox. The election of Ambrose was nearly the same; Theodoret, book 7. See Distinction 23, chapter Illud, and Distinction 64, chapter 1. On the election of Bishops see volume 4 of the Councils, part 1, pages 402, 571, 749, 729, and 630. Yet the greatest care was always taken that seditious elections be avoided; volume 2 of the Councils, part 2, page 405.

§ 4. Therefore, to guard against seditions, the right of nominating the Pontiff and Bishops was sometimes granted to good and deserving Emperors, as to Charlemagne about the year of the Lord 780 in the Roman Council, Distinction 63, chapter 22:

> Pope Hadrian requested King Charles to come to Rome to defend the affairs of the Church. Charles, coming to Rome, besieged Pavia; and, leaving his army there, was honorably received at Rome by Pope Hadrian on the holy feast of the Resurrection. After the holy feast of the Resurrection he returned to Pavia and captured King Desiderius. Then, returning to Rome, he established a Synod there with Pope Hadrian in the Lateran Patriarchium, in the Church of the Holy Savior. That Synod was celebrated by 153 religious Bishops and Abbots. Pope Hadrian and the universal Synod handed over to Charles the right and authority of electing the Pontiff and ordering the Apostolic See. They also granted him the dignity of the Patriciate. Furthermore, the Synod determined that the Archbishops and Bishops throughout the several provinces should receive investiture from him; that unless a Bishop were approved and invested by the King, he should be consecrated by no one; and it bound with the chain of anathema whoever acted contrary to this decree and commanded that, unless he came to his senses, his goods be confiscated.

This too is established in many canons in which either the designation, the investiture, or the consent of the Emperor is required, such as chapters 15, 16, 17, 18, 21, 23, 24, and 28; but these were afterward abolished. Since the matter was badly administered by Emperors and Princes who regarded their own advantages rather than the good of the Church and the salvation of the people, the Church again asserted her liberty and conducted elections according to the ancient manner. For afterward there was a long dispute about this matter between the Pontificate and the Empire. Foreseeing this, the Romans in the time of Louis I elected Hadrian II without the presence of the Imperial legates, chapter 29; Louis himself approved it.

Afterward Henry IV, a most wicked trafficker in Bishoprics, extorted that authority in some manner from Paschal II while he was a captive; but the Roman Council resisted him, and the whole Empire stirred itself against the most criminal Emperor. The arrangement was no different in the East, where in 965 Phocas passed a law that Bishops should not be elected without the Emperor's consent; thus book 4, title [omitted], of Eastern law.

The wealth of the Church, for which the avaricious ambition of courtiers panted, was the cause of so many contests. Phocas certainly thrust certain of his own ministers into Churches as Bishops, assigned them a certain allowance, and converted the remainder to his own rewards. Basil abolished this robbery and restored the privileges of the Church; but as the affairs of Greece always declined toward a worse condition, Alexius Comnenus shook all these things, while the Synod did not dare to resist. In Gaul also many things were granted to kings; in 1560 these were tempered with great moderation so that all things might not be in the power of one man.

§ 5. Great honor, nearly royal and sometimes greater, was shown to Bishops, especially when holiness adorned their dignity. The Emperor not only rose for Martin but even ministered to him. It is altogether fitting that a Bishop, as the public censor of morals and teacher appointed by God, be heard by all.

§ 6. The Episcopal office and its end is that the ministers of the Churches, the clergy, and the people of the diocese be governed rightly and in due order in spiritual matters. Therefore the same care which is broader in an Archbishop and Patriarch, and extends most broadly in the Roman Pontiff, is restricted in a Bishop to the administration of his own diocese.

1. The care and solicitude of all the Churches and all the monasteries of his diocese pertain to the Bishop. 2. The instruction, government, correction, reformation, and censure of the clergy; jurisdiction in the external and internal forum; convocation of a Synod; consecration of the ornaments of a Church and dedication of the Churches themselves; preparation of chrism; confirmation; and other lesser matters, many of which are committed to others.

There are also others called Bishops, namely suffragans and Chorepiscopi. Those whom we now call suffragans are so called improperly. Antiquity called those men suffragans who administered their own dioceses under some Archbishop. Now those men are so called who properly and truly are Bishops and have Bishoprics assigned to them, but because these are held by Saracens, Turks, schismatics, or heretics, they dwell in another place and assist the Bishops of other places. For any Bishop may, with the Bishop's consent, exercise Episcopal duties in another Bishopric.

Since they are therefore truly Bishops of cities situated in Greece and Asia, if any hope of preaching the Gospel in those places should shine forth, they are altogether bound to go there and seek their sheep, and in that case not to refuse death, provided that the danger has a sufficient reward. For it does not belong to a prudent Prelate to put himself in danger without cause and hope of spiritual advantage.

The service of these Bishops has been granted especially to Archbishops and Bishops in Germany because of the breadth of their jurisdictions. In this, however, I require that the princely Bishops themselves frequently consecrate priests and do other things which show that they have chosen assistants for themselves not from weariness with spiritual affairs but under the pressure of occupation. Chorepiscopi existed in antiquity and now persist in the Archbishopric of Trier, and, I do not know, perhaps in certain other places.

Concerning them there survives a letter of Damasus to the Bishops of Numidia. In it, first, he says that he found it decreed by his predecessors: 1. That nothing should be reserved for them by way of pardon except deprivation of the sacred ministry, which they rashly assumed, because they had been prohibited both by this holy See and by the Bishops of the whole world. 2. That they can presume nothing concerning the office of the supreme priesthood. 3. That they are presbyters, not Bishops. 4. That they were appointed of old because of care for the poor. 5. That they were cast down because they presumed unlawful things and performed things belonging only to Pontiffs. 6. That the flock was committed to them by certain Bishops languishing in idleness. 7. That such sluggish Bishops are like harlots. 8. That the Chorepiscopi are in no way Bishops. 9. That certain of them were nevertheless afterward truly created Bishops in certain places; for Damasus says this in the canon Esse, and it is also in the Council of Antioch, canon 10. 10. That they are called village Bishops, for χώρα means "country"; thus they are regional Bishops, for they are named not from a choir but ἀπὸ τῆς χώρας, "from the country." 11. That if they disdain to be presbyters when they are not Bishops, they are nothing. 12. That those who confirm by their own hand that they are only presbyters can remain in their catalogue, while those who wish to be Bishops are to be deprived of every honor. 13. That it is not lawful for them to consecrate priests, deacons, or subdeacons; consecrate virgins; erect, anoint, or consecrate an altar; dedicate Churches; prepare chrism; sign the foreheads of the baptized with chrism; publicly reconcile any penitent even in the Mass; send formal letters; bless the people; enter the baptistery or sacristy before the Bishop; baptize or sign an infant in the Bishop's presence; reconcile a penitent without the command of his own Bishop; consecrate the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ in his presence unless he commands it; teach or salute the people in his presence; or exhort the congregation. You have been taught, both from the things above and from other enactments of the Fathers or sacred canons, that all these things are owed to Pontiffs alone.

Hence two things appear to be reprehended in them: first, the presumption of the Chorepiscopi; second, the negligence of Bishops who entrust their own labors to them.

§ 7. What their office was may be gathered from canon 54 of Nicaea:

> Let the Bishop elect from the good religious men who dwell in the desert someone who is learned, of the best morals, the greatest and most understanding of all who are in that entire congregation, and who knows nothing about his own election. Those who belong to that congregation ought to present him. Let one Deacon of the congregation say with a loud voice: "We elect such a man as Co-Bishop"--perhaps Chorepiscopus--"who shall have complete authority over us," so that all may know that he has been elected to that rank. The Bishop ought to recite over the man elected the customary prayer, bless him, and give him the names of all the Churches and monasteries which are under his authority, so that he himself may elect, as shall seem better to him, suitable men steadfast in their speech, whom he may place over Churches and monasteries.
>
> Let him not impose the care of monasteries upon those who have care of Churches, nor join the care of Churches to those who are placed over monasteries. Let him bind them to the places given to them, and afterward go to visit the Churches and monasteries. If he finds that something is lacking in any Church or monastery, or abounds beyond what is needed, he ought to apply what is superfluous in one place where there is a deficiency; this ought to be done with the fear of God and for the edification of those places.
>
> If there are few priests, he ought to increase their number from those who belong to that place. If there is no one among them from that town suitable to be ordained, he ought to take someone from the monasteries or Churches and take care that he be made a priest, so that prayer may be continual, the ministry of the altar may not cease, Churches may not be deprived of prayer and Mass, and Christians who have no pastor may not be like Gentiles in name and deed. Likewise, let him take care that in every town and small village there be someone who collects revenues for the Bishop according to the resources of each place and that they be brought to him. For it pertains to him to give alms to the poor and strangers and refresh needy priests, so that charity may remain among them.

§ 8. That the Chorepiscopus was less in dignity than the Archdeacon is established from canon 58:

> When the Chorepiscopus and Archdeacon sit in the Church, no priest, Deacon of the Church, or cleric of any other rank shall dare to sit above them, except the Bishop, because these are as two hands and two wings with which the Bishop flies. But when the Bishop walks, whether in the Church or outside, the Archdeacon ought to be at his right, the Chorepiscopus at his left, and the Bishop between them, like a father in the midst of his sons. Whoever does not obey is excommunicated by the Synod.

§ 9. Nevertheless the name was not immediately abolished. For although they report that Chorepiscopi were not Bishops, except for a certain few, it is certain that they were presbyters even after the decree of Damasus; indeed, they again aspired to the Episcopal rank. For about the year of the Lord 566 John III wrote thus concerning them to the Bishops of Germany and Gaul:

> It has been reported to the Apostolic See that a reprehensible and exceedingly inveterate usage, prohibited and utterly extirpated both by Saint Damasus and Saint Leo, Apostolic men, and by all the Bishops with synodal authority, has emerged and is again reviving. For certain Chorepiscopi--who were prohibited both by the aforesaid predecessors, the Fathers of the holy Apostolic men, and by the Apostolic men themselves or by us, as their decrees testify to this day--exceed their measure, convey the gift of the Holy Spirit through the imposition of hands, and unlawfully perform other things which are owed only to Pontiffs; especially since none of the seventy disciples, whose likeness they bear in the Church, is read to have conveyed the gift of the Holy Spirit through the imposition of hands. The book of the Acts of the Apostles teaches that to convey the Holy Spirit is the proper office of Apostolic men alone and of their successors.

Therefore, since these things are so clear, I have grave doubts concerning the second Epistle of Nicholas I which was brought to light through the labor of Cordesius.

§ 10. The diocesan Synod held at Dillingen in 1548 assigned to Chorepiscopi the office of Archdeacons and rural Deans; thus chapter 7; and it associates Archpriests with them. Therefore retaining the name Chorepiscopus is not contrary to the canons, provided that they do not exercise Episcopal functions, such as ordaining and similar things, but, content with their own office, keep within the prescribed limits.

But if one of those whom we now call suffragans is also employed in the government of some Bishopric, he can be called a Chorepiscopus and be a true Bishop: a Chorepiscopus in that diocese whose Bishop he assists, and a true Bishop of his own jurisdiction, access to which is denied to him.

CHAPTER XL

The Duties of Provosts, Deans, Primicerii, and Others

§ 1. In the Church there are many names not only of dignities but also of offices. Just as in an army under an emperor there are legates, tribunes, chief centurions, centurions, adjutants, and commanders of tens, so also in this sacred army of the Church there are various orders and subordinate magistracies. Therefore it is also called an army drawn up in battle order.

§ 2. Provosts held the first place; yet of old they were of two kinds, either from the body of the clergy or secular. I understand chapter 50 of the statutes of the Council of Mainz under Archbishop Richolf in the year 813 to concern the secular kind:

> We therefore command all Bishops, Abbots, and the whole clergy without exception to have good vicedomini, provosts, advocates, or defenders: not evil, cruel, covetous, perjured, or lovers of falsehood, but men who fear God and love justice in all things. Concerning judges, centenarii, tribunes, or vicars, however, we judge it fitting that, if they are found to be evil, they be cast out of their ministry.

§ 3. Since secular provosts were less faithful, zealous, prudent men, capable in action, were appointed from the clergy itself to care for the rights, possessions, and revenues of individuals and of all together; and in the monasteries themselves they were appointed from the religious. Thus it stands in the Council of Aachen under Stephen V and Louis I, chapter 139:

> Although all who preside are, as it were, called provosts, usage nevertheless has prevailed that those are called provosts who exercise a certain care of a priorship under other Prelates. Yet the men who are called provosts according to this usage must be appointed by the Prelates as men of such character and energy that they are both of approved life and faithfully and humbly fulfill the things enjoined upon them. Because they are placed over others, let them by no means esteem canonical institutes lightly; rather, the more they are involved in the cares of the brethren, the more eagerly let them obey heavenly admonitions. Provosts, therefore, ought to be useful to the entire congregation and faithfully to benefit it by the ministry committed to them. Let them provide without delay, with charity and at the proper time, the things which they ought to give to the brethren, so that from the Lord they may acquire a good degree through faithful administration. Against men of this kind who offend and do not administer well the obedience committed to them, the measure set out above must be observed.

But when many provosts, both among the clergy and in monasteries, intent upon their own affairs and neglectful of common ones, appeared useless, complaints were forced forth; and indeed the provosts of monasteries were almost reduced to order. For the Lateran Council commands that those who lived apart be recalled to the cloisters, and admonishes the Bishops to compel the Abbots to do this.

The constitution of the Council of Cologne celebrated in the year 15[?]6, part 10, chapter 11, is praiseworthy:

> Certain monasteries of nuns have costly provosts. Since the whole administration of the goods is under their power, they themselves live luxuriously from the monastic revenues; and those who ought to have been an example of monastic conduct turn back to the delights of the world, sometimes disdaining fine flour and honey, while the nuns themselves scarcely satisfy their growling stomachs with millet and coarse bread. There are also monasteries of virgins where there is no common food or table, but that practice is daily which Paul, writing to the Corinthians, condemned--although in a far more sacred banquet--namely, that each takes her own supper beforehand to eat, and one indeed is hungry while another is drunk. We judge it necessary to abolish these abuses: namely, that in place of those pampered provosts there be substituted upright stewards, to be approved by us, whose diet shall be like the monastic diet and who shall also be bound every year to render a complete account of receipts and expenditures.

Then the following Synod, held in 1549, reminds all provosts of their office:

> It is a complaint that certain provosts of colleges, to whom, by an oath given, it belongs to guard and defend the rights and statutes of the Churches, do nothing less; rather, they merely receive ample fruits, while leaving undefended the Churches for whose sake they receive them, forgetful of their oath and of the fact that a benefice is given on account of an office. Hence we decree and establish that if provosts of this kind, when requested by their colleges to defend their goods, rights, and statutes at the expense of the chapters, in a time of necessity or when danger threatens, neglect to discharge their duty, and the College or Church consequently suffers loss, they shall incur a penalty to be assessed and moderated by the Bishop or superiors according to the magnitude of the loss received and the negligence of the provost.

This decree of the Synod of Cologne pertains to all Churches, because the oath of all tends to the same end.

§ 4. No one can be elected dean unless mature in age and morals. In Distinction 60, Innovamus, the Lateran Council under Alexander III, chapter 3, decreed that no one should undertake a deanery unless he has attained his twenty-fifth year and is to be commended for learning and morals, and unless he is a presbyter; the same is in the same Distinction. If a deacon has been elected, he is deprived of the honor unless he is ordained presbyter; in the same place. In the same manner, the Lateran Council under Callistus II says: “Let no one be ordained Provost, Dean, or Archpriest unless a presbyter; let no one be ordained Archdeacon unless a deacon.” The same is in the Council of Poitiers in 1100 under Paschal II.

§ 5. It is necessary for a dean to reside in his Church. There is a golden canon of the Council of Cologne in 1549:

> We see that, when Deans are absent or discharge their office sluggishly, the insolence of all the most worthless Canons and vicars generally prevails against the better men; piety and the zeal of good men are held in mockery; the divine offices are neglected and are performed neither duly nor by all, but only rushed through; integrity of life and morals is imperiled; discipline is entirely nonexistent--in brief, every wicked man may do whatever he pleases.

> We therefore command and order that Deans reside personally at their Churches and energetically discharge their office through themselves, and that they chastise the excesses of their subjects whenever there is need, under penalty of deprivation of the fruits of the deanery in proportion to the time during which, after admonition, they have not resided without reasonable cause. These fruits are to be applied to the fabric of the Church or to the poor where another worthy penalty has not been decreed against nonresidents, unless perhaps it happens that necessity causes them to be absent. In that case let them commit their functions to some member of the chapter who can render an account of the office undertaken and whom inferiors will revere, unless the pecuniary statutes of the colleges designate such a vicar for the absent man.

In the same year the Synod of Mainz established an even more sacred rule and extended the most salutary law more broadly, chapter 71:

> Since it is established that our ancestors instituted the offices of these dignities in Churches so that there might be men who, as inspectors and moderators, preserved ecclesiastical discipline, but we now see them occupied by men who merely bear the titles of dignities and enjoy their emoluments, yet are absent from their Churches and answer to nothing less than their appellations: therefore we establish that hereafter all who now shine forth in, or shall hereafter be appointed to, the dignities of Provosts, Deans, Scholastics, Custodians, or Cantors--insofar as these belong to our disposition or that of our comprovincials--shall be present at their Churches and furnish useful service worthy of the name. Let them not be absent and merely carry away the fruits; nor shall it be lawful for anyone absent to bear any one of these dignities. Rather, each man distinguished by such a title shall serve his Church, not absent and not by the hired labor of others, but himself residing and present.

§ 6. These duties of deans are prescribed by the Councils. The Council of Cologne in 1536, chapter 2:

> Further, since collegiate Churches are secondary after cathedrals and are constituted in their likeness, so far as the orders of ministers and divine worship are concerned, in both places it shall be the care of the Deans to urge and bring back their clerics to the observance of pious rites; continually to exhort and compel them to lead a life worthy of clerics; to recall them from business and worldly tumults, lest they appear soldiers of the age rather than of Christ; to forbid banqueting, drunkenness, and all luxury; and finally to compel them to discharge their office.

The Synod of Augsburg in 1547, chapter 9:

> Let the Dean keep the clerics and household of his College, each in his own duty; let him precede others by example; let him require integrity of life and morals in dress and discipline, and what is due in the performance and ceremonies of the divine offices. Let him rebuke drunkards, gamblers, brawlers, fornicators, and men forgetful of their office; drive them from sacred rites; and fine them by the right belonging to him.

Again Cologne, chapter 9:

> In order, therefore, that the things we have spoken of may be cleansed and duly observed, together with all other things pertaining to the performance of the divine office and the discipline of the choir, the Dean shall keep diligent watch, looking about on every side lest anything be done disorderly.

And chapter 25 describes his office together with its power thus:

> If the Dean perceives any men to be rebellious, negligent of divine worship and of their office, quarrelsome, litigious, brawlers, gamblers, keepers of harlots, or entangled in other public crimes, and they refuse to hear fraternal correction, let him do in these chapters what Paul commands: “Rebuke sinners before all.” Then, if they refuse to come to their senses, let him keep them from sacred rites and forbid them to share in the fruits until they return to a better fruit of life; yet in such a way that this Apostolic rule is observed here: “Rebuke the restless, console the fainthearted, be patient toward all,” and that neither anger, hatred, nor rancor claim any part for itself. For that solicitude of Provosts is useful, that caution is praiseworthy, in which reason does everything and fury claims nothing for itself. For anger often brings even the innocent into guilt. For while we are angry beyond what is just and wish to restrain another’s sins, we commit graver ones. Nevertheless, through these provisions we prejudice nothing in the privileges and legitimate customs of ourselves and of the Churches of our province, and especially in the practice and custom which exists in some Churches--namely, that causes of discipline are adjudged by the Deacons--provided that the Deacons diligently and energetically apply themselves to, and discharge, their office. But if the Dean and chapter are negligent or entangled in the same crimes, it will be necessary to return to the disposition of the common law.

The province of Deans is therefore most weighty, since the discipline, morals, and ordering of divine worship of the whole College pertain to them. For unless the Dean is pious, prudent, vigilant, strong, and fearless in admonishing, and if he dissembles vices and abuses, the blood of all souls will be required from his hand. He rushes through the psalms in the mouth of all; he chatters with the tongues of all. For what he is bound by office and able by authority to correct, he is judged to do if he neglects it.

§ 7. Parish priests in villages, districts, and towns also have their deans or presidents, whom they call rural. The Synod of Trier in 1548 explains their duties:

> The Archpriests, who are also called rural Deans, since they have been admitted to the assembly of the Synod, are commanded to render to our Most Reverend Lord an account both of the office of the pastors and of their own. For it belongs to them to rebuke the public offenses of their subjects, provide for the cure of souls, feed all with the pure doctrine of the word of God, sustain the wretched and afflicted by consoling them, preside well over the Church in all things, and finally exhibit themselves as sound examples of living in word and deed. The Apostle judges those who do this worthy of double honor. For even the pagan judges it most shameful to commit what you teach others ought not to be committed. They must therefore answer to His Most Reverend Grace concerning these matters, as also concerning other cares worthy of a priest, so that he may know their integrity in administering their offices. On > this account, indeed, he will command that favor and praise be rendered to the good and those willing to obey; but that the evil and reprobate, of whatever condition they may be, hereafter be afflicted with disgrace and punishment by force of ecclesiastical censure.

Those who are now called deans appear formerly to have been Archpriests, for each is the chief man of his college. Principal men are also commonly called decani, and the number ten is honored, to such an extent that great things are called decumana. Yet now the Archpriest and the dean have different functions: by ordinary law the Archpriest is subject in government to the Archdeacon, while the dean is not. The Archpriest generally performs the functions of an absent Bishop. See the last constitution of Leo, On the Office of the Archpriest.

§ 8. The office of the Scholastic is either to educate the young or to take care that they are educated. He presides over those whom they call domicellarii. Unless these are educated with every care and exercised in the divine offices, the hope of good ecclesiastics is cut down in the blade. General oversight of schools, however, is judged to have been committed to the metropolitan Scholastic.

Another office is also joined to that dignity, namely, examining those to be ordained; for the Scholastic of the cathedral Church presides over the examination.

Concerning all these things the Synod of Cologne, chapter 3, speaks almost in one word:

> In these Churches there are different ranks of ministers, namely, Provosts, Deans, Archdeacons, Scholastics, Cantors--who are also Bishops of the Choir--Treasurers--who are also Sacristans or Custodians--Canons and Vicars, and other men of this kind. Let each interpret his own designation and take care to be what he is called, according to the ancient institution and rule of the Fathers. By this alone they will have brought it about that they appear in great part to have answered both our expectation and that of all the pious.

§ 9. A Primicerius is whoever is πρώτης τῆς τάξεως, first in rank, or more dignified than the others, πρωτόκηρος, "first on the wax." It was customary to write on wax. Pliny, book 2 of the Letters: "Nearby there was no hunting spear or lance, but a stylus and writing-tablet; I meditated upon and noted certain things, so that, even if I brought back empty hands, I might nevertheless bring back full wax tablets." A Primicerius, moreover, was the man who was written on the first wax, that is, first in the choir among the cantors; in Suetonius the man on the lowest wax is one among the last. His office is described in book 1 of the Decretals, title 25, chapter 1:

> Let the Primicerius know that he is under the Archdeacon, just as is the Archpriest; that it pertains especially to his care that he preside in teaching the Deacons or the remaining men placed in the ecclesiastical ranks; and that he himself apply himself to their discipline and guardianship, since he will have to render an account before God for their souls. Let him himself give the Deacons the lessons which pertain to the nocturnal offices of clerics; and let him have care for each, so that, in whatever matter he has an understanding capable of it, he may apply himself without any negligence, or that they may be instructed by the man whom he himself shall command.

And Distinction 25, chapter 1:

> To the Primicerius belong the acolytes, exorcists, psalmists, and lectors; also the signal for the office of the clerics; and, with respect to integrity of life and the careful study and performance of the office, which of the clerics ought to say the lessons, blessings, psalm, praises, offertory, and responsories. To him also belong the order and manner of singing psalms in choir according to the solemnity of the seasons, and also the arrangement for carrying the lights. If anything is necessary for the repair of the basilicas which are in the city, he reports it to the priest. He shall send the Bishop's letters concerning fast days to the parishioners through the doorkeepers. He shall himself constrain clerics whom he knows to offend; but he shall bring the excesses of those whom he is unable to correct to the Bishop's knowledge. He shall himself appoint the basilicani and arrange the matricula. When the Primicerius is absent, however, the man who is nearest to him either by law or by learning shall investigate the things aforesaid. To the Treasurer belong the ordering of the basilicas and the doorkeeper, the preparation of incense, care for making the chrism, care for arranging the baptistery, and the preparation of lights in the sacristy and at the sacrifices.

The primiceriate was a benefice and dignity. Therefore, since the Primicerius did not perform the office, the Canons of Toul abolished this office, as appears in a rescript of Innocent III.

§ 10. There are also other kinds of offices and dignities. At Toulouse and elsewhere the highest dignity after the Provost is that of the Academic Chancellor, who is himself also a Canon. At Cologne the metropolitan Provost himself is Chancellor; at Mainz the Custodian appoints the Chancellor. See concerning these matters book 5 of the Decretals, On Masters, chapter Quamvis.

Officials and Vicars of Bishops exercise jurisdiction in place of the Bishop. In Nova, 16, question 7.

The Treasurer is κειμηλιάρχης, one who guards precious things; elsewhere he is also called the Custodian.

The Sacristan has care of the sacred furnishings and the lights; book 2 of the Decretals, 26.

The Custodian is the minister of the Sacristan; in the same place, chapter 1.

The Steward is the man who administers the property of the Church, the dispenser for the poor.

The man called Vicedominus in a Bishopric is called Steward in particular Churches.

The Syndic is the man who prosecutes suits and defends the disputed rights of the Church.

The Cellarer is the man to whom the distribution of wine, and often of grain and other things, is committed.

There are also Parish Priests, Vicars, Chaplains, Pensionaries, and Orphanotrophs, all of whom ought to be appointed according to the necessity and utility of the Church. But these must be treated specifically, as must the Canons.

CHAPTER XLI

Praiseworthy Institutes of Canons in the Church, and Salutary Laws Concerning Them

§ 1. The office of Canons is to live canonically. On Consecration, Distinction 5, chapter 34:

> We have therefore decreed in all things, so far as human frailty permits, that Canon clerics live canonically, observing the teaching of divine Scripture and the precepts of the holy Fathers; and that they presume to do nothing disorderly without the permission of their Bishop or their master. In each Bishopric let them eat and sleep together where the means of doing this are available to them; or, in the place where they receive a stipend from ecclesiastical property, let them remain in their cloister. Every day, first thing in the morning, let them come to the reading and hear what is commanded them. At table likewise let them hear a reading and show obedience according to the canons to their own ministers.

Canons are the more honorable of the clerics. They are so called either because they live according to the canons of the Apostles and Councils, or because they have been entered in the canon--the Greeks say οἱ ἐν κανόνι, that is, entered in the register of the Church--so that they receive a fixed allowance and have a voice and the right of pronouncing an opinion in the chapter. Among the Pythagoreans, harmonic theorists who gave the principal parts to reason were called Κανονικοί.

The same men are called prebendaries, although a prebend extends more broadly than a canonry. Of old, the things which parish priests were bound to furnish to envoys publicly sent were called prebends. Horace, Satires 1.5:

> The little town nearest the Campanian bridge furnished a roof, > and the things which hosts owe: firewood and salt.

A prebend, therefore, is called an ecclesiastical right in the Church--for we are not treating lay prebends--of receiving certain annual revenues in the Church on account of the ministry of the divine offices performed by the man who lives from the fruits of the prebend. When the right of voting in the chapter is joined to this right, if the other things are present, it is called a canonical prebend. For although certain Canons are not in the chapter, they nevertheless have canonical prebends, but some cause prevents their being admitted.

Therefore, to receive the fruits of a prebend legitimately, it is necessary to have a title and legitimate possession, and then to engage in the divine offices to which one is assigned. For a benefice is given on account of an office. Thus all foundations and all canons declare.

§ 2. Three kinds of stipends are commonly given to Canons. Some are annual and are called the corpus; some are daily and are called presences, and are distributed only to those present. Finally, certain sums are collected by the chapters besides the corpus and the presences, which they call fruits of the table; these are distributed at the discretion of the Canons.

But since the avarice of certain men is so great, and their torpor is joined with such greed, that they hunt prebends in every place, reside in one place, and travel to the other colleges for the sake of collecting the fruits, it would be advisable, whenever and wherever it can be done, to convert the corpora into presences, or at least to diminish the corpora and increase the presences. But I shall treat these matters hereafter.

§ 3. Canonries and prebends are in general of two kinds. Some are cathedral; others belong to secondary Churches. Hence that distinction has gained force whereby the clergy who serve God in the cathedral church are called primary, and those in other collegiate Churches secondary.

Prebends and canonries are also commonly called benefices, because they are given benevolently and gratuitously by the Church, with the joy both of the recipient and of the giver. They contain two things: the right of receiving fruits and the obligation of rendering service to God. A benefice, however, is given on account of an office. Therefore, when the office ceases, the benefice is withdrawn; and when the benefice is retained after the office has been renounced, an injury is inflicted upon God and the Church. I think the whole ordering can be gathered into a few laws.

Law 1. In the collation of a benefice let the collator retain nothing for himself and expect nothing, neither service nor money. Because he appoints a minister for God, he ought not to be a moneylender in a sacred matter and claim for himself a portion from the patrimony of the Church, much less divide with God the services of God's servant.

Law 2. Let them reside in their own Churches. For this reason they were both founded and received privileges from Emperors. Title On Nonresident Clerics.

At this point I shudder as I relate the matter, when I remember the frauds by which wretched men strive to circumvent God. Long ago this evil began, whereby greed sought great revenues by doing little or nothing. How very few are present in the manner required! But let us hear our Fathers. In 1286, in the Council of Ravenna under Honorius IV, title 5, it was determined thus:

> It is fitting that those whom the ornaments of life and examples of domestic praise do not recall should at least be restrained by the medicine of correction. We have indeed learned from the report of many that in certain Churches of our province it is observed by custom, and in certain others confirmed by constitution, that besides the revenues of benefices and prebends--concerning which we wish nothing to be altered at present--those residing in the Church alone receive certain other revenues, according as they reside daily and in proportion to the residence which they make in the Church. Certain men, obeying such a custom and statute according to a perverse interpretation and thinking too little of the things of God, to the peril of their souls, usurp for themselves those revenues especially assigned in favor of residence so that God and the Church may be served and the instruments of divine praise be sung therein at every hour, provided only that they reside in their chamber, even though they enter the Church to celebrate the divine office only once in the month. From these things a great scandal is generated among their neighbors who serve the Church as they ought, and the praiseworthy purpose which they had grows cold in them.
>
> Therefore, lest we be made participants in their faults, having removed that perverse interpretation while preserving such a custom, we establish by declaring, and declare by establishing, that with respect to the aforesaid revenues which are distributed according as men reside daily--whether they are grain, wine, money, or other goods--only those shall be called resident in the Church who, in their own Church together with their other brethren, have performed at the due hours the measure of our service, namely, Matins, Lauds, Prime, Terce, Sext, None, Vespers, and Compline. Otherwise, they shall receive from those revenues only according as they have served the Church, pursuant to our ordinance noted immediately below.
> In order that this constitution be inviolably observed, we will and command under penalty of excommunication that, within two months computed from the day of the publication of the present Council, all and singular clerics of the Churches of our province where there are several ordained clerics and revenues of the kind mentioned above shall be bound to confirm this constitution by oath; and likewise all who shall be admitted hereafter, before they are admitted to the revenues. Where, however, there are no such revenues in a Church, let the local Diocesans provide in the Synods which they happen to celebrate, as best they can according to God, that the office at the canonical hours not be neglected in those Churches. If the senior of the Chapter--or, where all are equal, the man who presides immediately over those clerics--has not caused this oath to be given, he shall be subject to peril of his benefice and shall be fined by the provincial Council, by his superior, or by another who is able to do this.

Wishing, insofar as we rightly can, to ordain and declare the immediately preceding Council, we establish that within the space of two months from the day of publication of this Council it be ordained how many and how great a share the man who attends Matins, and the other canonical hours, ought to have from the revenues mentioned above in the immediately preceding Council, wherever there are such revenues. Because we cannot give a specific rule in this matter, since some Churches abound more and others less, we provide as we can in this manner: namely, that the man who has attended Matins shall have twice what the man who has attended Mass will have; that the man who has attended Terce and Sext shall have half of what was given to him at Mass; that the same be observed at None as was stated concerning Terce and Sext; and that the man who has attended Vespers and Compline shall have as much as the man who attended Mass, according to the foregoing.

To understand clearly, suppose that ten denarii are to be distributed daily to each Canon. From those ten denarii you will give four denarii to the man who attended Matins; two to the man who attended Mass; one to the man who attended Terce and Sext; one to the man who attended None; and to the man who attended Vespers and Compline you will give two denarii, as you gave at Mass.

But because even in this way, according to what has been stated, complete provision has not been made against deceitful men, who could come to the canonical hours but not at the due time, and, even if at the due time, nevertheless not remain until the office was completed, we establish against them that the man shall be said to attend Matins who has come to the Church before the Venite is sung with the hymn, when the hymn is said; otherwise, when the Venite is said with the first psalm, since the hymn is not then sung; and who has remained until Prime has been completed. The man shall be said to attend Mass who has come before the Kyrie eleison is sung and has remained until the Mass has been finished. Those attending Terce, Sext, None, Vespers, and Compline must come before the psalms begin and remain until the said hours have been completed; otherwise they shall receive nothing. Whoever acts contrary to this, besides the guilt of perjury, shall be bound to restore to the Church from which the service due has been withheld twice what he received, to be converted into ornaments of that Church.

The same matters were thereafter treated and determined far more forcefully in the Council of Ravenna in 1317.

I cannot refrain from transcribing the words of the Council of Basel, Session 21:

> Whoever has not attended the divine office until the end--at Matins before the end of the psalm Venite exsultemus, at the other hours before the end of the first psalm, and at Mass before the last Kyrie eleison--shall be judged absent for that hour, unless perhaps, compelled by necessity and having sought and obtained permission from the president of the choir, he must depart; the customs of Churches, if any stricter ones exist concerning this, remaining unimpaired. The same shall be observed concerning those who have not remained in processions from beginning to end. For the execution of this provision, let someone be deputed who has the charge of noting the individual persons who do not assemble at the appointed time, bound by oath to act faithfully and spare no one.
>
> This holy Synod also commands that in those Churches in which definite distributions have not been established for the individual hours, they be assigned absolutely, even from the gross fruits if necessary, so that each person may receive more or less emolument according to the measure of his labor. It entirely abolishes that abuse by which a man present at only one hour usurps the distributions of the whole day, and that abuse by which Provosts, Deans, or other officials receive daily distributions solely because they are officials, even though they are not actually absent for the utility of the Church.

I have already made mention above of the Council of Mainz under Sebastian in the year 1549, in which the matter is commanded in these words in chapter 72:

> Since the Apostle judges idle men who eat bread not acquired by their own labor, to the burden of others, unworthy of food and therefore of life itself, to how much graver a divine indignation must those men be thought subject who idly consume the revenues of the Church, the patrimonies of the holy Martyrs, and the gifts of the pious people bestowed for the support of the divine Ministry, but do not care to repay to those Churches the services owed for them? We, therefore, wishing to meet the peril of souls and provide for the necessity of the Churches, decree and ordain by the present statute that hereafter, in the Metropolitan, Cathedral, Collegiate, or any other Churches established throughout the whole province and subject to us, daily distributions shall not be assigned to certain very > brief moments--as, for example, to the reading of the Epistle or of one Psalm or Responsory--but to whole and complete offices and hours, and shall be given only to those who have attended from beginning to end the divine offices for which the emoluments are given.

> But those who have been accustomed to divide their departures and returns in such a way that they receive the least of the labors but the greatest of the emoluments shall hereafter, unless they take care to attend the complete offices and hours, be fined the entire fruit of that office or hour, notwithstanding any irrational or depraved customs, which must rather be judged corruptions. Yet if any are hindered by infirmity or a legitimate cause, let them excuse themselves before the Prelate or another to whom this belongs by the custom of the Church, and obtain leave for their absence. We will, however, that Canons be excused from entering the choir by capitular business for as long as they are present at Chapters, and no longer.
>
> In this matter we admonish the Deans of Churches, or those upon whom that care devolves for the time being, and command them not to appoint Chapters, except from necessity, at the hour in which the divine offices are performed, since Chapters can be held either earlier or later so that the Prelates and Canons themselves may more conveniently be able to attend the divine offices. Surely the labor of capitular acts ought not to burden those who, over and above the offices of the choir incumbent upon them in common with the vicars, also enjoy a richer emolument from their prebends over and above the common distributions.
>
> In like manner we will that the distributions received from processions be given only to those who have persevered in attending them personally from beginning to end.
>
> And lest benefices throughout the Churches be defrauded of the services owed, we enjoin upon all possessors of benefices, under loss of the benefices, that if they do not yet have the orders which their benefices require, they receive them at the next times established by law. We also will that the Canons of Churches be bound to this, each according to his order, so that, when the matter requires it, he may be able personally to furnish the Church the service which each owes according to the requirement of his office.

In the same manner the fifth Council of Milan, chapter On Residence, and the first Council of Milan, On Residence, establish many things with the greatest gravity and sanctity. On these matters see Session 6 of the Council of Trent.

Law 3. Let no one receive a benefice from a layman.

> Since, according to the Apostle, no one ought to assume honor for himself unless he has been called by God as Aaron was, those men, forgetful of their salvation, who intrude themselves into ecclesiastical dignities or benefices and procure that they be elected and intruded through the power of laymen, consider and attend to this too little. Wishing, therefore, to oppose such and similar things by the remedies we can, we establish and more strictly prohibit anyone hereafter from presuming to attempt such things, or permitting or procuring them to be attempted. If anyone acts contrary to this, let him not only not be confirmed or instituted, but let him likewise be stripped by his Diocesan of every hope of promotion throughout the province of Ravenna; and nevertheless let him be excommunicated by the deed itself and stripped of every privilege of ecclesiastical protection and defense.

Law 4. Not only must nothing be sought for a benefice, but not even what is spontaneously offered may be received; nor may it be received on the condition that the man who received it yield at the will either of the giver or of another. First Council of Milan.

Law 5. The man who has given in this manner is deprived of the right of giving, nominating, and presenting--indeed, also of electing. The man who has received does not make the fruits his own. First Council of Milan, section Those Things Which Pertain to the Collation of Benefices.

Law 6. Those about to receive a benefice shall affirm by oath that they have not acted simoniacally. Thus it stands in the first Council of Milan, section Let the Bishops Admit or Institute No One Who Has Been Presented, Nominated, Elected, or Provided by Inferiors Before They Have Required from Him the Oath Written Below:

> I, N., presented or elected, and so forth, to the benefice N., swear by the sacrosanct Gospels of God which I touch with my hands that neither I, for the sake of obtaining the benefice or of being presented or nominated to it, and so forth, nor any other person in my name or with my consent or knowledge, has promised, given, compensated, confirmed something previously given, or deposited anything with anyone, to the collator, patron, or anyone else for that reason.
>
> Nor have I given it as a loan or lease, remitted or relaxed something previously given as a loan, lent for use, leased, or owed in any manner whatsoever. Nor concerning the houses, lands, estates, revenues, fruits, tithes, or offerings of that Church, past, present, or future, have I made, promised, or entered into a gift, remission, or lease, or has another, at my command or with my consent, promised, made, or entered into one. So help me God and these holy Gospels of God.

Law 7. Let the intermediaries of simoniacs be punished: notaries, advocates, procurators and interposed persons, and sureties. In the same place.

Law 8. Let the man who seeks ambitiously be without it for two years, and likewise those who petition for benefices not yet vacant.

Law 9. Let several benefices not be given to one man. This is an ancient and frequently repeated law, but one that is frequently violated. Many possess several; few are there who do not desire several.

I shall first set forth the statutes and laws of the Church, and then my own opinion. For in title On Prebends and Dignities, chapter Iam Dudum, it was established that the first benefice is lost by the law itself if another is received. And in title On Election, chapter Dudum, it is forbidden that several be held without dispensation. Therefore two things must be established. First, plurality is most gravely prohibited, especially in benefices with cure. Second, dispensation from that law is possible.

Concerning the first, therefore, the Fathers, Councils, and Pontiffs establish as follows. The Council of Clermont in 1095 under Urban II, chapter 22: “Let it hereafter be lawful for none of the clerics to hold two prebends in two cities, since he cannot have two titles.” But now a multitude of titles is accounted an honor. And in the appendix to the Lateran Council, Alexander III writes to the man of Bordeaux that his Archdeacon should resign one of them. And the Lateran Council under Innocent III, chapter 29, De Multa--

§ 3 (continued).

By great foresight it was prohibited in the Lateran Council that no one should receive diverse ecclesiastical dignities and several parish Churches contrary to the institutes of the sacred canons. Otherwise, the recipient would lose what had thus been received, and the collator would be deprived of the power of granting. But because, on account of the presumptions and cupidities of certain men, no fruit or true benefit has thus far arisen from the aforesaid statute, we, wishing to oppose them more evidently and expressly, establish by the present decree that whoever has received a benefice to which the cure of souls is annexed, if he previously held such a benefice, shall be deprived of it by the law itself; and if perhaps he contends to retain it, let him be despoiled of the other also.

Here it treats only two benefices with cure, not simple benefices. But the Council of Salzburg under Gregory X treats all:

> Since in the province of Salzburg various secular clerics, setting no limit to avarice and not regarding their own salvation, do not fear to burden themselves with several ecclesiastical benefices, we, who desire to meet the needs and salvation of others and provide for the necessities of Churches, by the authority of the present Council firmly and strictly command that every possessor of several benefices either be content with the last one received or, at the immediately following provincial Council or Episcopal Synod--which deadline we assign to them peremptorily--demonstrate by legitimate documents that a dispensation has been made for him by the man who could do this by right. Otherwise, with respect both to benefices and persons, we shall take care to provide according to the form of the Canons handed down concerning this matter and the statute of the Lord Guido, Cardinal of good memory, formerly in our province, A.S.L.

The Synod of Augsburg in 1548, chapter 11, acted with the same intention:

Whoever, whether impelled by cupidity or even by any honorable pretext, holds several ecclesiastical benefices is commanded by this our mandate--as we command by strict precept--that, retaining the single benefice among them which he prefers, he resign the others within a year or exhibit to us, or to those deputed by us for this purpose, the privileges of his dispensations of this kind. Unless they furnish due obedience, let them know that, from our diligence to be applied in the right and true dispensation of ecclesiastical benefices, they will undergo the legitimate penalties of their disobedience or cupidity.

The Council of Mainz under Sebastian, chapter 64, treats chiefly benefices with cure:

The matter itself declares that several benefices, especially those under which the cure of souls is placed, cannot be held by one person without grave loss to the Churches, since one person cannot duly perform the offices in several Churches or devote the necessary care to their affairs. We, therefore, following the admonition of reform and opposing to this calamity of the Churches, as a salutary remedy, that decree of the Council of Lyons, admonish every possessor of benefices with cure of this kind and enjoin them by strict command that within three months after the end of this provincial Synod they exhibit to us, or to our comprovincials, the local Ordinaries, the dispensations under pretext of which they hold such benefices.

If they do not do so, such benefices, as if thereby proved to be held unlawfully, must, after the three months have elapsed, be conferred upon other suitable persons by those to whom their collation pertains. But if anyone's dispensation appears legitimate and sufficient, he shall retain the benefices without molestation. Nevertheless, by deputing suitable vicars and assigning a fitting portion of the fruits, he shall provide that the cure of souls not be neglected in these Churches and that the benefices themselves not be defrauded of the services due. Otherwise, his negligence must be supplied by the Ordinary from the fruits of the benefice, and he must moreover be punished, at the discretion of the Ordinary, by subtraction of a certain portion of the remaining fruits.

But if the dispensations appear invalid or insufficiently legitimate, and the man who under their pretext held several benefices with cure refuses, after retaining one, freely to resign the others, his case shall be referred to the Apostolic See and its judgment awaited concerning what it wishes the measure of his benefice to be. If anyone holds benefices with cure of this kind in different dioceses, he must be compelled by each Ordinary to make such an exhibition. And if he has not been fortified with a legitimate dispensation, let him retain the last benefice which he received and resign the others, since according to the disposition of the common law the benefice which he previously held is known to become vacant by the law itself through his acceptance of a subsequent benefice with cure.

In the same manner the Council of Trent, Session 7, chapters 2, 3, and 4:

Let no one, shining forth with any dignity, rank, or preeminence whatsoever, presume to receive and simultaneously retain several Metropolitan or Cathedral Churches, whether in title, in commendam, or under any other name whatsoever, contrary to the institutes of the sacred canons. For that man is to be accounted very fortunate to whom it has fallen to govern one Church well and fruitfully and with the salvation of the souls committed to him. Those, however, who now hold several Churches contrary to the tenor of the present decree shall be bound, retaining the one they prefer, to relinquish the others within six months if they belong to the free disposition of the Apostolic See, and otherwise within a year; otherwise the Churches themselves, excepting only the one last obtained, shall by that very fact be judged vacant.

Inferior ecclesiastical benefices, especially those having the cure of souls, shall be conferred upon worthy and capable persons who can reside in the place and exercise the cure personally, according to the constitution of Alexander III in the Lateran Council which begins Quia Nonnulli, and the other constitution of Gregory X issued in > the general Council of Lyons which begins Licet Canon. But a collation or provision made otherwise shall be rendered entirely void, and let the Ordinary collator know that he will incur the penalties of the constitution of the general Council which begins Grave Nimis.

>
> Whoever hereafter presumes to receive and retain simultaneously several benefices with cure or other incompatible ecclesiastical benefices, whether by way of a union for life, a perpetual commendam, or under any other name and title whatsoever, contrary to the form of the sacred canons and especially the constitution of Innocent III which begins Qui Multa, shall stand deprived of those benefices by the law itself, according to the disposition of that constitution and by force also of the present canon.

The same Council nevertheless establishes thus concerning all benefices in Session 24, chapter 17:

> Since the ecclesiastical order is perverted when one person occupies the offices of several clerics, it was provided by the sacred canons that no one ought to be enrolled in two Churches. But because many, from an affection of wicked cupidity, deceiving themselves and not God, are not ashamed to evade by various arts the things which have been well established and to hold several benefices simultaneously, the holy Synod, desiring to restore the discipline owed to the government of Churches, by the present decree--which it commands to be observed in all persons under any title whatsoever, even if they shine with the honor of the Cardinalate--establishes that hereafter only one ecclesiastical benefice be conferred upon each person.
>
> But if it is not sufficient for the honorable support of the life of the man upon whom it is conferred, it shall nevertheless be lawful for another sufficient simple benefice to be conferred upon the same man, provided that neither requires personal residence. These provisions shall pertain not only to Cathedral Churches, but also to all other benefices, both secular and regular, even those held in commendam, under whatever title and of whatever quality they may be. Those, however, who at present hold several parish Churches, or one Cathedral and another parish Church, shall be compelled absolutely, notwithstanding any dispensations and unions for life, to retain only one parish Church or the Cathedral alone and to relinquish the other parish Churches within the space of six months. Otherwise, both the parish Churches and all the benefices which they hold
>
> shall be judged vacant by the law itself, and shall be freely conferred upon other suitable persons as vacant; nor may the men who previously held them retain the fruits after the said time with a safe conscience. The holy Synod desires, however, that provision be made for the needs of those resigning by some suitable means, as shall seem good to the Supreme Pontiff.

Since, therefore, that law has been established, confirmed, and received by many Councils; since the legal authorities decide according to it; and since its end also is weighty, it follows that it binds forcefully and must be observed inviolate. Yet because it is a positive and ecclesiastical law, the supreme Pastor of the Church can dispense from it, as the laws themselves sufficiently indicate when they prohibit the possession of several benefices without a dispensation.

Therefore this dispensation must be discussed, for I think there is no one who possesses several without a pontifical dispensation. Yet whether the dispensation is legitimate must be considered with the greatest attention, for dispensations are often dispensations in word but dissipations in fact. Sometimes they are valid in the external forum because they cannot be rejected, but criminal in conscience because they do not have a just cause. Nevertheless, those who possess several are bound, by force of the Council of Trent, to exhibit their dispensations.

Cardinal Otto, Bishop of Augsburg, indeed pressed that matter forcefully and religiously in the Council of Augsburg. He requires the instruments of the dispensations and adds:

> But if any hereafter shall hold several benefices by dispensation of the Apostolic See, and it shall have become known to us that the same See--which in its letters, concessions, and privileges is accustomed to follow honorable and necessary reasons and causes according as they have been represented to it--has been deceived by the > petitioners, let them know that, when our Most Holy Lord has been better informed, we shall procure the revocation of such dispensations. Hence we establish and ordain that hereafter no one, of whatever rank or dignity he may be, shall be admitted to possession of another or of several benefices unless he first exhibits to us, as Ordinary of the place, the letters of such a dispensation for inspection in order that the dignity of the Apostolic See may be preserved, the constitutions of the Supreme Pontiffs Boniface IX and Leo X always remaining unimpaired.

> And if he appears worthy of a dispensation, we nevertheless establish that such men, or any other rectors of Churches and holders of benefices whatsoever, leave to their vicars so great a portion of the fruits as is sufficient for maintaining hospitality, paying Episcopal and Archidiaconal dues, and bearing the other burdens. Otherwise we decree that they be removed from their benefices, the right of each patron or collator nevertheless being reserved.

Deservedly so, indeed. For importunate demanders of dispensations bring it about that what they receive is no dispensation. I have seen instruments of dispensation whose openings declared that, on account of great learning, many labors endured for the Church, merits, and an exemplary life, by Apostolic kindness--which ought to bear a special affection toward such men--a dispensation was granted to the venerable lord N. But that venerable lord was an unlearned boy of depraved character and was not rightly educated by his own people. Here there was no dispensation, but an artful sacrilege by which the parents bound themselves, not the boy; for he, unknowing, was burdened with a benefice through procurators as a minor.

For this reason the Council of Cologne in 1536, part 1, chapter 31, most prudently established concerning this matter:

> The ambitious cupidity for several ecclesiastical offices was always odious among the ancients and was condemned more than once by general Councils. At Chalcedon, among other things, it was provided that a cleric ought not to be enrolled in two Churches, because it appears difficult for one man to sustain the part of two, and absurd for the duties of affairs to be confounded by indiscriminate devices. This, however, is especially harmful where several parishes or dignities are committed to one presbyter, because he alone cannot either perform the office in all the Churches or devote the necessary care to their affairs. Therefore we will that both those who have the power of disposing of ecclesiastical offices of this kind and those who, led by blind cupidity, canvass for them be admonished to submit their affections to canonical institutes. But those who wish to defend themselves against this by Apostolic dispensation must see to it that they prove before God the cause of the dispensation obtained. For we do not strip eminent and very learned persons of their privilege, provided that they use it rightly and according to God.

Chapter 35, however, teaches that dispensations must be examined:

> There is no one who does not know how shamelessly very many men abuse instruments and dispensations extorted from the Apostolic See contrary to the intention of the Supreme Pontiff, who both wills and ought to use the power granted to him not for destruction but for edification. “I do not forbid,” says a certain pious man, “dispensing, but dissipating.” A dispensation has indeed been entrusted, but now this is required among stewards: that a man be found faithful. Although the greatest share of the fault resides with those who finally elicit letters of dispensation by inserting into their supplicatory petitions either no cause, a less legitimate one, or even a fictitious one, who would call them secure before God, who searches the reins and hearts and abominates all hypocrisy and fraud? “Let no one,” says that same man whom we have just cited, “flatter you concerning an Apostolic dispensation when the divine sentence holds your conscience bound.”
>
> But because there are few in whose sight God stands, while very many everywhere abuse sacred authority according to their own desire, it comes about that we are compelled to restore to use against the insolence of men of this kind the not unwholesome decree of the Council of Lyons celebrated under Gregory X. Relying upon it, we shall impose upon all who flatter themselves with such instruments the necessity of exhibiting their letters to us, as we shall examine whether they obtained them rightly and use rightly what they obtained. And even if those dispensations are as fully valid as possible, we shall nevertheless take care that the intention of the canon and of the Supreme Pontiff be satisfied: namely, that the cure of souls not be neglected in those Churches, personates, or > dignities which they occupy under this pretext, and that the benefices themselves not be defrauded of their due services.

Having established, therefore, that dispensations, if they are to be valid, ought to have a legitimate cause--and this in a law which has been confirmed by so many canons and so many Councils, which is demanded by the consent of the world and by its outcry, and whose reason for observance remains and will always remain--we shall conclude that several benefices are rarely permitted by a true dispensation accepted in heaven.

But if anyone asks me what is a true and legitimate cause for dispensing, I answer that these are such causes.

First: the necessity of the Church. For a Church burdened with debt and situated amid dangers can petition for a powerful neighboring Bishop or another man for itself, so that it may be defended, relieved of expense, restored to its former condition, and the disobedient converted. The same must be said where there is great and evident utility to the Church.

For although advantages accrue to that Prelate, they nevertheless all redound to the utility of the Church. Yet in this matter sin is committed in two ways: 1. when there is no evident or probable danger, and provision can be made against it and it can be repelled by another; 2. when the more powerful man who has been elected does not furnish that for which he was elected, nor accepts the benefice in order that he may furnish it.

To this cause of necessity and utility I refer the case in which, through the election of one man, another who is unsuitable or less suitable is repelled. For many undertake political magistracies and Prelacies not because they desire them, but lest men unworthy of them be advanced to them. A dispensation can therefore be legitimately sought and given whereby Titius receives the benefice lest Caius--a heretic, concubinary, ignorant man, drunkard, dilapidator, and wrathful man--invade it. But these things must be done sincerely before God, not from love of self or hatred of others.

Second, I affirm that the necessity of the man who receives several benefices is a legitimate ground of dispensation. For if one is not sufficient for honorable support, it has been permitted to have two or even three. For it is just that the man who serves the altar live from the altar. I therefore restrict this to those who serve vigilantly in the Church: Cause 1, question 2, Clerici, and Distinction 86, Non Satis. Food and clothing are therefore owed to them, and honorable food and clothing: as servants of God, as presbyters, and as men given to hospitality, since they ought to give alms. Of old, benefices of the Church were not given to those whose patrimonies were wealthy. Cause 1, question 2:

> But those clerics ought to be supported by the stipends of the Church for whom no goods of parents and kinsmen provide assistance. Those who can be supported by their parents' goods and their own wealth, if they receive what belongs to the poor, assuredly commit sacrilege and, through the abuse of such things, eat and drink judgment upon themselves.

That canon and the following ones inculcate these things. Yet once the order of the Church had been established, it appeared proper that even the wealthy, if they undertake labors for the Church and vigilantly apply themselves to the divine offices, receive remuneration from the Church.

In this necessity the condition of the person, the place, and the other things pertaining to the matter must be weighed. For a benefice which suffices a citizen does not suffice a nobleman; and that upon which a nobleman is judged able to live honorably and becomingly will be too little for a count or duke. For such men can, and indeed ought to, make greater expenditures. Because the Church also needs the services of such men, she compensates their services in such a way that they are not compelled to renounce their station or be a disgrace to their kinsmen. For since Bishops, and therefore states, ought to be more liberal toward the nobler exiles, why should they not also be liberal toward priests illustrious by splendor of birth? Since one prebend does not suffice them, several can be granted so that they may be able to establish a house and household suitable to their lineage and station.

But here a broad road is now opened to an accumulation of benefices when nobility is exalted and nothing appears sufficient for dignity. Concerning this I judge as follows. These matters cannot and ought not to be pared to the quick and to the last farthing; for the Church is not a severe exactor of accounts, nor is the Pontiff a κυμινοπρίστης, "splitter of cumin," so as to cut away every smallest thing. For since Bishops support counselors and satraps with greater splendor, the Church of Christ ought not to support her nobler members as though they were hired laborers.

In general, therefore, what suffices other noble Canons to support themselves honorably and exercise hospitality will suffice a noble Canon, and he too will have to be content with it. Thus, where there are Cathedral or Collegiate Churches in which nobles live becomingly content with one benefice alone, other nobles of the same station cannot hold several, and a dispensation by reason of support will lack a cause and therefore be invalid before the tribunal of God. The same reasoning applies to barons, counts, and dukes, although scarcely is there a Church in which a single prebend suffices for their station. Therefore those who hold five or six wealthy benefices, any one of which is sufficient to support a nobleman becomingly, cannot be secure by their dispensation. For six nobles can serve the Church in place of one. But the man who serves the Church negligently, or spends that wealth upon superfluous things such as the splendor of his house, enriching his family, and building projects, offends far more gravely.

Third, the merit of the man to whom a dispensation is granted, and indeed also that of his parents, is a legitimate ground of dispensing. Within this class there are many things. If he or a parent suffered loss in defense of the Church; if he relinquished profits and advantages; if he performed embassies; if he furnished other things which brought some contribution to the spiritual or temporal utility of the Church--for it is honorable for the Church to return favor to those who have deserved well of her. Since she grants whole regions in fief to her patrons, soldiers, and commanders, why should she not also permit several benefices to ecclesiastics if they have deserved this from her? I add that in this way the spirits of very many are kindled to deserve well.

Fourth, the distinguished learning of some man can also merit that he be furnished with several emoluments of the Church. For they are given as a reward for diligence and labor and to incite others, since it is evident that the Church cannot stand without the most exact diligence in studies. Labor and studies, moreover, ought to be compensated. Therefore, if a noble Canon is a Theologian, a jurist, powerful in eloquence, or versed in various languages, although he can live sufficiently from one cathedral prebend, provided that he is a prudent man of blameless life, another cathedral benefice can even be offered him voluntarily with a dispensation--not only as a reward for youth so honorably spent and as an incitement to others, but also because men of this kind can be of the greatest benefit through counsel and work, are an ornament to the Churches, and uphold their dignity. I judge the same concerning other learned Canons of other Churches: concerning the learned, I say, not those who display bulls of doctorates before their ignorance.

Outside these cases, I deny that even a hundred skins of diplomas can render the conscience tranquil. Indeed, even in these very cases I approve the golden mean. For it cannot happen that ten rich prebends are legitimately conferred upon any one Canon, however noble, learned, or deserving; since learning ought not to be the procurer of avarice, the distinction of nobility ought to shine forth in giving rather than acquiring, and merits which burden the Church ought to be omitted. Therefore those who dispose of benefices by sevens, and those who alone receive the revenues of an entire collegiate Church, will be ensnared not only by the ordering of ecclesiastical goods but also by the fraud of an extorted dispensation. For by what right does one man receive from the Church so much that twenty men equal to him could be honorably supported?

I know that I am going to offend certain men, and great ones indeed; but truth is the same among great and small. Therefore the Council of Trent expressly comprehends all, with whatever dignity they shine, even naming the Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church. By this it shows that not even they can possess great wealth by any dispensation. For the moderate possessions and expenditures of many Bishops and Archbishops, indeed of many Cardinals, prove that certain moderate revenues suffice for the dignity of a Cardinal. But that one Cardinal should possess as much as ten others, and this from the goods of the Church, neither equity admits nor can dispensation bring about.

This matter is therefore pernicious, and the canons never speak of it without detestation. For ministers are withdrawn from the Church, the sustenance of the poor is converted into luxury, and the souls of the recipients perish.

The remedy is that all the laws enacted by the Fathers be observed, but especially that when anyone seeks a dispensation, he describe in detail his age, lineage, benefice, and the revenue both of what he has and of what he seeks. Then let him add the cause for which he seeks dispensation from so severe a law, and let him prove it. Once this has been examined, if a dispensation is given, only then let the matter be committed to Episcopal judgment, so that men may see in the place where either the benefice or the solicitor of the dispensation is whether the true cause was presented to the Pontiff. But if the Pontiff is unwilling to commit the matter to the Bishop or commissioners, nevertheless let possession not be given until the Church has fully informed the Pontiff. If the cause rendered to the Pontiff is not proved, let the solicitor of an inequitable dispensation not only be repelled from the benefice but also punished in addition.

When I expressed this opinion, someone objected to me that a different custom exists in many places and that these things would therefore be received harshly. But when I said that those who hold several could even be commanded to restore them, he denied that this could be done. Yet when I showed him title 3 of the Extravagants, On Prebends and Dignities, he approved the opinion. For that reason I shall transcribe it here:

> The execrable ambition of certain men, both religious and secular--which, always seeking more, becomes the more insatiable the more indulgence it receives--and the importunate wickedness of those petitioning us and our predecessors, the Roman Pontiffs, are known frequently not so much to have obtained as to have extorted the permission that one man, sometimes less suitable even for one ecclesiastical benefice, may by dispensation, although otherwise it would not be lawful by the common law, receive and lawfully retain simultaneously, in different Churches not only neighboring but also far distant from one another, and indeed sometimes situated in parts of different kingdoms, two, three, or several dignities, personates, offices, or Priories, or diverse ecclesiastical benefices having the cure of souls.
> From this, among other inconveniences, the things written below follow: namely, that one man who would scarcely suffice to fulfill even one modest office claims for himself the stipends of very many, which, if conferred by an equitable distribution, could abundantly suffice for many learned men, resplendent with purity of life and the testimony of a good reputation, who beg. Material for wandering is prepared for their possessors; divine worship is diminished; the hospitality owed in the benefices themselves is not observed. And since the Churches in each region do not have their own rectors, injury is done to their advantages and honor; lacking the aid of defenders, they collapse in many ways in their towns and liberties; noble buildings which the magnificence of their predecessors erected lie open to ruin; and--what is more bitterly to be lamented--the cure of souls is neglected, and dangerous nourishment is afforded to the thorns of vices.
>
> We, therefore, desiring to meet so many and such great dangers, after diligent deliberation concerning this matter with our brethren, by their counsel and from our certain knowledge, have judged that all and singular dispensations concerning the reception or retention of several dignities, personates, offices, Priories, or benefices to which the cure of souls is annexed--under whatever form or expression of words, granted by us or our aforesaid predecessors to any person, with the sole exception of Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, who, serving the universal Church around us, devote themselves to the advantages of the individual Churches, and sons of kings, who on account of their loftiness and the distinction of their lineage are to be raised by a more powerful prerogative of grace--must be moderated in the form written below, so that through our moderation we may restrain the unbridled multitude of such benefices about the same persons, yet those obtaining them may not be totally frustrated of the fruit of dispensations of this kind.

We therefore establish and, by the counsel of those brethren, ordain that those now holding by legitimate dispensation a plurality of dignities, personates, offices, Priories, or benefices of this kind which they could not otherwise hold without dispensation may lawfully retain only one of the dignities, personates, offices, Priories, Churches, or benefices of this kind upon which the cure of souls is incumbent, together with the dignity, personate, office, Priory, Church, or benefice without cure which they prefer to have, under pretext of a sufficient dispensation granted to them concerning this. They shall, however, be bound to choose these within a month reckoned from the time they learn of this constitution, having within the same time verbally and actually relinquished with effect, before the Ordinary and under public testimony, the other benefices with or without cure which they held under pretext of that dispensation and which otherwise they could not lawfully retain without dispensation. They shall not presume ever to return to those benefices without a new collation to be made by the man able to make it, or to involve themselves in their administration. Otherwise, they shall be deprived by the law itself both of these and of all other benefices which they could retain by force of our moderation of this kind, as aforesaid, and shall be altogether incapable of holding similar benefices.

Through this, however, we do not wish prejudice to be done to those who hold by dispensation--which gives them a right according to our prescribed moderation--dignities, personates, offices, or other benefices having the cure of souls, and await other similar benefices by the authority of our letters or those of the same predecessors, and with whom a dispensation has been made that when those benefices become vacant they may receive and lawfully retain them together with those already held. Rather, when they become vacant, they may within the space of the said time choose them and, having relinquished the others, receive and lawfully retain them in the form prescribed; they shall incur similar penalties if they presume to contravene this our sanction.

Further, because the vice of avaricious cupidity has so blinded the eyes of certain men that they presume simultaneously to retain very many such benefices without canonical dispensation, concerning them we establish by the present decree that they shall be bound, retaining only the one which they received last--provided that a right in it belongs to them by canonical collation--to relinquish, within the limited time prescribed, verbally and in fact, without fraud, before the Ordinary and likewise under public testimony, all and singular benefices detained. If they do not do this, let them be deprived by the law itself even of that one in which a right otherwise belonged to them and be judged altogether incapable of holding any ecclesiastical benefices whatsoever.

But those who hereafter receive a dignity, personate, office, or another benefice having the cure of souls annexed, if they previously held a similar benefice, ought in the same manner to relinquish the former into the hands of the Ordinaries--of which they are known to be deprived by the law itself, without the loss occasioned by delay, after they have obtained possession of the second, or after it has depended upon them, all deceit and fraud ceasing, that they do not obtain it. Otherwise, from that point they shall be deprived of the second also by the law itself and be judged incapable not only of receiving sacred orders but also of holding any ecclesiastical benefice whatsoever. All and singular benefices about to become vacant, as aforesaid, or relinquished, we reserve by the counsel of those brethren to the disposition of ourselves and of the Apostolic See, forbidding anyone except the Roman Pontiff, fortified by whatever authority concerning this matter, to presume to dispose of benefices of this kind, or to change anything concerning them in any manner through exchange or otherwise. For we decree anything done or attempted otherwise null and void.

Moreover, in the cases aforesaid we understand by “Ordinaries” the Bishops in whose cities or dioceses the benefices, or any one of them, which must be relinquished according to the foregoing are situated, or in whose cities or dioceses the persons who must relinquish them reside; or, when Cathedral Churches are vacant, their Chapters. Let these take care to inform us or the Apostolic See concerning benefices both relinquished and lost, as aforesaid, without delay, as soon as they conveniently can, so that we may be able to dispose of them wholesomely.

> But as concerns the modification previously made, we judge those ecclesiastical benefices alone, and no others, by whatever name they are called, to have the cure of souls which have parishes in which the cure of souls is to be exercised not through perpetual vicars, but through the rectors or ministers of the benefices themselves or their temporary vicars; and likewise those benefices to whose ministers, by reason of benefices of this kind, it belongs by custom or law to visit, inquire, receive procurations, suspend, excommunicate, or absolve from sentences of excommunication and suspension, the other laws speaking of the cure of souls remaining in their force as to the other matters.
> Therefore let it be lawful for no man whatsoever to infringe this page of our moderation, statutes, constitutions, reservation, prohibition, and wills, or to contravene it with rash daring. If anyone presumes to attempt this, let him know that he will incur the indignation of Almighty God and of His blessed Apostles Peter and Paul. Given at Avignon on the thirteenth day before the Kalends of December, in the second year.

Law 10. No one initiated with the first tonsure, or even constituted in orders, may hold a benefice before his fourteenth year. A holy law; but it is not observed. Men are made Bishops in their cradles, and by their wailing condemn their parents. See Trent, Session 23, chapter 6. It is a rule of the Chancery that provisions to Cathedrals are not valid before the fourteenth year.

Law 11. Let all profess the faith according to Trent, and let the book written concerning this matter be preserved in the Cathedral Church, as in the Council of Aquileia, On the Profession of Faith. For this corrupted Germany: that Canons were admitted to benefices without an examination of morals and religion.

Law 12. Let all men whatsoever be bound personally to exercise the offices and orders which they owe. Council of Trent, Session 22, chapter 4. For if they judge prayers, singing, and the humility of ceremonies unworthy of their majesty, why do they unworthily snatch away the fruits from others who would perform them? They wish to be splendid from the patrimony of Christ, and on account of this splendor judge it unworthy of their lordship, nobility, and distinction if they serve Christ, by whom they are fed.

Law 13. Let the decrees of the Council of Basel, Session 13, be observed; let the salutary and numerous decrees in it be read.

Law 14. Let all Cathedral prebends have a major order annexed. This has now been obtained in nearly all, since they are admitted to the council or Chapter.

Law 15. Let Cathedral Chapters be subject to the Bishop with respect to the censure of morals; otherwise let their jurisdiction and administration of goods be left intact to them. This matter was discussed above.

Law 16. Whoever--Council of Basel, Session 21, On Those Who Wander through the Church during the Divine Offices--being beneficed in a Church, especially one of the greater men, has been seen during the divine offices to wander through the Church or outside around it by walking about or conversing with others, shall by that very fact lose not only the presence for that hour but that of the whole day. If, after having once been corrected, he has not ceased, let him be without the distributions for a month, or be subjected to a graver penalty if his obstinacy requires it, so that at length he may be compelled to cease. Let it also be prohibited that the tumultuous running of any persons through the Church impede or disturb the divine offices. Regulars who in conventual Churches offend concerning the foregoing shall be chastised gravely at the discretion of the superior.

Law 17. Benefices are not to be leased out.

> Since a certain monstrous custom has gained force in certain places contrary to the constitutions of the holy Fathers, so that priests are appointed to the government of Churches for an annual price, we prohibit by every means that this be done. For when the priesthood is disposed of as venal under a payment of this kind, consideration is not given to the reward of eternal recompense.

Law 18. They are not to be burdened with annates, much less with pensions and reservations. For these diminish the fruits of benefices, so that when clerics need them most, they cannot enjoy them.

Law 19. They are not to be divided, except where the revenues for one are immense and those for the rest meager. Alexander III also admonishes on many grounds that several benefices are not to be committed to one man, nor one divided among several. In the appendix to Lateran III, part 30.

Law 20. The license of turns is to be corrected altogether, as is stated in Trent, Session 24, chapter 14. Indeed, let all Turnarii swear that they will observe the law which is in Cause 8, question 1, Moses, and that in a benefice they will regard the merit of life rather than the degree of consanguinity. Now good men frequently destroy through the vices of their kinsmen as much as they edify the Church through their own life.

Finally, these things must be directed to the glory of God. Benefices must not be regarded as gifts of Princes, as patrimonial possessions, or as though they had been founded by ancestors only for the support of youth or nobility. No: all the Fathers, Councils, canons, instruments of all foundations, oaths of Canons, statutes of Chapters, and consciences of upright men cry out the complete contrary. They testify that a benefice is given on account of an office, and that only then are its fruits retained by right if men are assiduous and frequent in divine service.

CHAPTER XLII

Great Wealth of the Churches Is Useful to Religion and the State

§ 1. God willed the priesthood to be honored in the old law. The tithes granted made it very wealthy, and so many other things were also added that, if the Jews had observed the law of God, no tribe would have been happier than the Levitical. I shall place the matter before the eyes by an easy method.

In Numbers 3 the Levites are enumerated as twenty-two thousand three hundred. For although in verse 39 they are said to be only twenty-two thousand, the individual sums--7,500, 8,600, and 6,200--nevertheless make 22,300. But three hundred are omitted because they were firstborn and could not redeem others. The number of the children of Israel, however, was six hundred and three thousand five hundred and fifty. The Levites, therefore, were approximately a twenty-sixth part in relation to all Israel. But because in Numbers 3 the Levites are counted from one month old and upward, while in chapter 2 of the other tribes only fighting men from military age are counted, it follows from this that, if the children of Israel had been counted from one month old, they would have exceeded them in a greater proportion; for the number of children was greatest in the nation which God, contending with Pharaoh, was multiplying. Therefore no one will deny that the Levites constituted a thirtieth part of Israel. Yet upon this part God conferred the greatest wealth, so that in comparison with them He left the others almost poor.

To this thirtieth part God gave not thirtieths but tenths. Since food was abundantly available to the others, certainly the tithes of an abundant people could have sufficed for a tenth part; but as it was, each of the Levites held three portions in place of one. Thus Leviticus 27:30: “All the tithes of the land, whether from the crops or from the fruits of trees, belong to the Lord and are sanctified to Him. But if anyone wishes to redeem his tithes, he shall add their fifth part.” Nor were there tithes only of crops, but also of oxen and sheep, as is contained in the same place. Thus in Numbers 18:21 He says that He gave all the tithes to the sons of Levi.

But in the matter of the tithes this also must be considered. First, the Levites were accustomed to cultivate neither fields nor vineyards, and therefore lived from the labor of the people. Hence their condition was much better than if they had received a tenth part of the fields, for labor and expense would have been necessary. Second, the Israelites had to rear the livestock; the Levites received them once weaned. Third, the tithes were not single but triple, as our Cornelius a Lapide most learnedly interprets in Deuteronomy 14:22. From this passage and from Josephus, Theodoret here, question 13, Abulensis, Oleaster, and Cajetan gather that double tithes were prescribed to the Jews each year.

The first were of all the produce of the land, the flocks, and the herds, and were given entirely to the Levites. They were not brought to Jerusalem; rather, the Levites to whom they belonged collected them through the cities near them. From these tithes the Levites in turn paid a tithe to the Pontiff and priests, as is clear in Numbers 18:26 and 28, for the first tithes are treated there.

The second tithes were those which the Hebrews separated each year after that first-mentioned tithing by taking a tenth from the nine portions remaining to them. From this, when going to the tabernacle--which had to be done three times in the year, as is clear in Exodus 23:17 and 34:23--they partly supported themselves on the journey and partly offered peace offerings, from which they ate before the Lord together with the Levites whom they invited to feast with them. What I have said concerning these tithes I say likewise concerning the firstfruits: after the firstfruits which went entirely to the Lord, each man separated something for himself as second firstfruits, which he would use when about to ascend to the Lord. I say the same concerning the firstborn of sheep and oxen: namely, that after the firstborn given to God, the Hebrews separated another animal as a peace offering. I say the same concerning vows and gifts. The law therefore speaks of these second tithes here down to verse 28; chapter 12, verse 17, also treated these.

The third tithes were tithes separated every third year and given as alms to the poor, widows, orphans, and Levites, lest they be compelled by poverty to serve Gentiles, by whom they could easily have been led into idolatry. These third tithes are treated in verse 28, where it says, “In the third year you shall separate another tithe.” Hence it is evident that this was not the same tithe as the first, as though the tithes which belonged properly to the Levites for two years were commanded in the third year to be common to the poor equally with the Levites, as certain men suppose; rather, it was another, namely the third. For thus our interpreter translates it. Thus in Tobias 1:7 it is said that in the third year he administered every tithe to proselytes and strangers. If the Jews gave triple tithes, why should Christians not give single and simple tithes to God? If the Jews fed their poor by tithes, why should Christians not do the same? I know great men in the state who give a tenth of their wealth, indeed of all their profit, to the poor and judge themselves almost bound to it by the law of charity and religion.

The first tithes, therefore, went entire to the Levites, who collected them in the cities. From the nine remaining portions the people again separated tithes and brought them or their price to Jerusalem, so that they might feast there, nevertheless inviting the Levites. Thus in chapter 14, verses 27 and 28: “And you and your household shall feast, and the Levite who is within your gates; take care that you do not abandon him.” These times were therefore times of banqueting for the Levites, yet this was not burdensome to the Israelites, since ten men, and perhaps thirty, scarcely had one Levite.

In the third year, from the portions already twice tithed, they separated another tithe at home, which they consumed with the Levites and poor. In the third year the Levites went to feast and instruct the peoples, so that in this manner they might be joined to the Lord. The effect appears in 2 Chronicles 31:8. They see the heaps, and Azariah the priest said in verse 10: “From the time the firstfruits began to be offered in the house of the Lord, we have eaten and have been filled, and very much has remained because the Lord blessed His people; and the abundance of the remnants is this which you see.” Then, therefore, granaries were made. And this concerning tithes.

§ 2. Offerings also made them wealthy. For from the sacrifices He gave the priests the breast and the shoulder which was separated by perpetual right, Leviticus 10:14. That revenue cannot appear small amid so many thousands of sacrifices which were offered three times in the year at fixed times and were slaughtered every day for various causes. Deuteronomy 18:3 assigned the shoulder and stomach. But let us see this whole class.

There were three kinds of sacrifices: burnt offerings, offerings for sin, and peace offerings. In a burnt offering all things were burned, and only the skin belonged to the priests; yet amid so many thousands of burnt offerings this was no small revenue. In a peace offering the shoulder and breast belonged to them; in the Hebrew, Chaldean, and Septuagint: the shoulder, cheeks, and stomach. Certain men interpret these as the fleshy portions around the shoulder, that is, the fourth part of the animal; but it is expressly ἔντερον, “stomach,” and σιαγών, “jaw.” However it may be, this was a great revenue; but greater when they made offerings for sin, for all the flesh of that victim belonged to the priests, so that in so great a people they appeared able to live from the victims alone. But these things were additions, as it were, to the tithes.

Further, the history of the sons of Eli demonstrates that the Israelites were not sparing toward the priests in the peace offerings, 1 Samuel 2:16: “And the man sacrificing said to him: ‘Let the fat first be burned today according to custom, and then take for yourself as much as your soul desires.’” This cannot be understood of a burnt offering, because nothing from it went to the priest, nor of an offering for sin, because the whole belonged to the priest, but of peace offerings.

To this are referred the firstfruits of all things and the firstborn of livestock and men. Concerning firstfruits: Exodus 23:19 and 34:26; Leviticus 23:10; Numbers 18:13; Deuteronomy 18:4 and 26:2, 10. Concerning the firstborn: Exodus 13 and 22:29 and 34:20; Numbers 3:13.

There were great profits from the firstfruits of all things in a most fertile region, since all things abounded in crops of every kind, wine, oil, fruits, and honey. The number of firstborn was immense. Hezekiah alone, 2 Chronicles 31:29, had innumerable flocks of sheep and oxen. Nabal had three thousand sheep and one thousand goats. Solomon slaughtered 22,000 oxen and 120,000 sheep; nor was that a great or difficult thing for so great a king, for in 1 Kings 5:6 he had forty thousand chariot horses and twelve thousand stalls--an immense number if ten horses were assigned to one stall, and even if four.

The herds of livestock in Israel were therefore exceedingly great, so that in Ezekiel 36:11 the Lord promises as it were a return of ancient felicity: “I shall fill you with men and beasts.” For there were herds of beasts even in inhabited cities or their suburbs. Let us therefore suppose that in so numerous a people one hundred thousand firstborn were born each year: they furnished five hundred thousand shekels to the priests, Numbers 3. The multitude of livestock was so great that I think there were easily one million firstborn every year.

Add to these so many sacrifices for various offenses, Leviticus 3; then, if they had touched anything unclean, a man offers a ewe-lamb or she-goat, and so forth, Leviticus 5. But how often is it probable that this occurred? In Leviticus 5:17, if a man had violated the law in ignorance, he is commanded to offer a ram. What if every individual had been guilty once every year? How many hundreds of thousands of rams would have gone to the priests? The man who denied a deposit offers a ram, Leviticus 6:6. A woman offers a year-old lamb as a burnt offering for purification, Leviticus 12. For the sin of fornication with a slave woman, after both have been beaten, a ram had to be offered, Leviticus 19.

There is also added the fact that no burnt offering was offered without a victim for an offense; and then that cakes, fine flour mixed with oil, and loaves had to be offered together with the other sacrifices, as concerning the peace offerings in Leviticus 7:12. These were great supports of life granted to the priests so that they could devote themselves to the law and the sanctuary, 2 Chronicles 31:4.

§ 3. Besides these, however, other things also were assigned. For they retained inheritances in their cities, Leviticus and Deuteronomy 6. Next, the houses of the Levites could not be alienated, Leviticus 25:31. Third, they are appointed judges, 2 Chronicles 29:13.

Indeed, the chief priest had the principal dignity in judging. For since the priests and Levites were immune from other labors, they could devote their time to the study of the law and wisdom; therefore the law was sought from their mouth.

§ 4. After the Lord had furnished them with such great wealth, because He Himself was their inheritance, He also provided for their habitation. For Joshua assigned them a place, as God had commanded in Numbers 35:1:

> The Lord also spoke these things to Moses in the plains of Moab above the Jordan opposite Jericho: “Command the children of Israel to give the Levites from their possessions cities to inhabit and their suburbs round about, so that they themselves may dwell in the towns and the suburbs may be for their livestock and beasts. From the walls of the cities outward, they shall extend round about for the space of one thousand paces. Toward the east there shall be two thousand cubits, and toward the south likewise two thousand; toward the sea also, which looks to the west, there shall be the same measure, and the northern quarter shall be bounded by an equal limit; and the cities shall be in the middle, with the suburbs outside.”

Let us therefore set down forty-eight cities for 24,000 Levites, so that there are five hundred in each. A circuit of one thousand paces for their livestock in so fertile a soil ought not to appear a small part of their support. It was also a great advantage to them that they received tithes of hay from the neighboring places, for they took tithes of everything which the earth produced. Although the Levites did not inhabit those cities alone, they had nevertheless been given to them and were under their dominion, which Scripture so often inculcates in Joshua 21. For in verse 10:

> To the sons of Aaron, by the families of Kohath of the Levitical stock--for the first lot had fallen to them--they gave Kiriath-arba, father of Anak, which is called Hebron, on the mountain of Judah, and its suburbs round about. But its > fields and villages had been given to Caleb son of Jephunneh to possess. Therefore they gave to the sons of Aaron the priest Hebron, a city of refuge, and its suburbs; and Libnah with its suburbs; and Jattir, Eshtemoh, Holon, Debir, Ain, Juttah, and Beth-shemesh, with their suburbs: nine cities from the two tribes, as was said.

Next, in the suburbs there were not only meadows within one thousand paces, but vineyards, olive groves, other cultivated places, and gardens. Third, those cities were noble and situated on fertile ground:

| | | |:---|:---| | Hebron | Kibzaim | | Libnah | Beth-horon | | Jattir | Eltekeh | | Eshtemoh | Gibbethon | | Holon | Aijalon | | Debir | Gath-rimmon | | Ain | Taanach | | Juttah | Gath-rimmon | | Beth-shemesh | Golan | | Gibeon | Bozrah | | Geba | Kishion | | Anathoth | Daberath | | Almon | Jarmuth | | Shechem on Mount Ephraim | En-gannim | | Gezer | Mashal | | Abdon | Nahalal | | Helkath | Ramoth in Gilead | | Rehob | Mahanaim | | Kedesh | Heshbon | | Hammoth-dor | Jazer | | Kartan | Bezer | | Zebulun | Mishor | | Jokneam | Jazer | | Kartah | Jahaz | | Dimnah | Mephaath |

Most of these were situated in the most advantageous, fertile, and healthy places, so that they could appear alone sufficient for supporting the multitude. Therefore, if eternal Wisdom, in instituting a state, founded it upon the best laws and most prudently and sacredly sanctioned everything pertaining to the virtue and temporal felicity of citizens and magistrates, and nevertheless conferred such great wealth upon His priests that He conferred upon nearly one more than upon five or six of the others, it does not befit human policy to think otherwise and fashion the Prelates of religion and priests into wanderers and beggars.

There is no bond between magistrate and subjects closer than the fear of God and religion, but religion cannot flourish unless its ministers and Prelates are held in honor. Since the salvation and religion of subjects depend upon the dignity of Bishops and pastors, the Lord did not will them to be despised. In the old Testament it was said, “You shall not muzzle the ox that treads out the grain”; it was said concerning the Aaronic priests; according to Paul, it was said concerning Christians also, who likewise have the right to live from the Gospel. For if we compare our state with the people of the Jews, the more we perceive their territories to be smaller, the more we shall understand the wealth of the clergy to be greater.

I am not ignorant that the number of Levites afterward increased. For in 1 Chronicles 23:3 there were counted 38,000 from thirty years old and upward; but the children of Israel had grown in a greater proportion. For David appointed twelve commanders for the twelve months, each of whom had 24,000 under his standards and ministered to the king. And in 2 Samuel 24:6 there were from Israel eighty thousand valiant men who drew the sword, and from Judah five hundred thousand, among whom

Benjamin was not counted. Nor was even that census complete, 1 Chronicles 27:24, for Joab executed the king’s command unwillingly. Here it is pleasing to consider the immense multitude. For nearly three hundred thousand were under arms and in the service of the king, and those one million three hundred thousand were valiant men, men who drew swords, and fighters. How great, therefore, was the multitude of youths, children, old men, and others who were unsuitable for war?

I indeed establish that David made up from these soldiers of his 280,000, and, adding those who served the royal fields, olive groves, vineyards, and pastures, completed so great a number that they easily supported the Levites from tithes and offerings. But let us consider the condition of the Levites in David’s time. There were one million three hundred thousand Israelites counted negligently; add the tribe of Benjamin and they will perhaps be 1,400,000; add 100,000 veterans so as to complete 1,500,000. If these give tithes to thirty thousand men, each of those receiving the tithes will have five portions by which he will surpass those who contribute the tithes. The wealth of the Levites, therefore, was always great.

In return for the wealth, the labor was slight. David instituted their orders in twenty-four courses, so that they were occupied in the Temple for a short time. Meanwhile they occupied themselves in various affairs. Indeed, David used their service, 1 Chronicles 26:29:

> Chenaniah and his sons presided over the Izharites for external works, over Israel for teaching and judging them.

And verse 30:

> Seventeen hundred Hebronites presided over Israel beyond the Jordan toward the west, in all the works of the Lord and in the ministry of the king.

And verse 32:

> And his brethren of more vigorous age, two thousand seven hundred chiefs of families. King David placed them over the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, in every ministry of God and the king.

Behold, the Levites govern those Transjordanian tribes in the time of David. The Israelites toward the west are also governed by Levites in every divine and human affair. Certainly Benaiah the priest is one of the twelve commanders. Why, however, did David, most skilled in ruling and reigning among his brethren, especially use the service of the Levites? I find several causes. First, because they were skilled in divine and human laws. In 1 Chronicles 25 there are 288 teachers among them who taught the Song of the Lord. Second, because they were holier and more tenacious of the laws. Third, because it was especially advantageous to them that the Israelites be just and devoted to religion. For if the people were possessed by avarice, first of all they would defraud the Levites of tithes and firstfruits; if they became idolaters, they would adhere to foreign sacrificers. Hence, immediately after the calves were set up at Dan and Beth-aven, the Levites fled into Judea. Fourth, because, since they cultivated neither fields nor vineyards, were immune from the other burdens, and ministered in the Temple once in the year, they could most usefully be occupied in the honorable affairs of the kingdom. This, therefore, was the judgment of the most wise David: that the state of the people of God is best administered through the priests and ministers of God.

How honorable to that tribe, and how useful, so many prefectures were--especially since they did not have a king of their own stock--no one except a man ignorant of politics can fail to know. David used their most faithful service. Benaiah was also the strongest among the thirty and was over the thirty, 1 Chronicles 27:6; and the 24,000 whom he commanded were without doubt Levites. David found Benaiah the priest more faithful than his kinsman Joab, and therefore Benaiah also succeeded him after Joab was killed.

For in truth the affairs of the kingdom and the priesthood are so conjoined that one cannot be preserved without the other. Therefore the wisdom of those who judge that the Christian priesthood must be so suppressed that those who teach all are subject to all, and that those who ought to preserve the worship of God, the holy sacrifice, and the dignity of ceremonies are contemptible, is wicked and foolish. I have proved the wealth of priests by divine authority and from sacred Scripture; I shall also adduce the opinion of holy men in the new Testament and prove it by reason itself.

§ 5. The primitive Church had sufficiently ample riches. For Christians knew that it was of divine and natural law that those who announced the Gospel live from the Gospel, and they judged it no great thing that their carnal goods be reaped by those from whom they received spiritual goods. No prudent man will believe that those most holy men who cast all things at the feet of the Apostles, who weeping fell upon the neck of Paul as he departed, and who even wished to pluck out their own eyes and give them to Paul--to whom the Teacher of the Gentiles cries, “I have all things and abound; I am filled, having received from Epaphroditus the things which you sent as an odor of sweetness, an acceptable sacrifice pleasing to God”--supplied the Apostles and their successors with sustenance avariciously and grudgingly.

For the gifts of Christians in the Church were most liberal and ample, so that not only her ministers and poor were supported, but her precious furnishings also shone amid persecutions and plunderings. From the life of Saint Lawrence we are taught that the sacred blood was received in golden cups. Augustine, Letter 265, shows that there were silver lamps; from Optatus against Parmenian, book 1, we learn that the vessels of the Church were of great price.

It is certain that the Churches had possessions from the most ancient times. Pius I, Letter 2--who was the tenth or eleventh after Peter and lived under Antoninus, and therefore, if an old man, could have known the Apostle John--admonishes that the estates of the Church not be applied to human uses:

> It has been reported to the Apostolic See that there are contentions and rivalries among you, and that certain men apply to human uses estates handed over to divine uses, and withdraw from the Lord God, to whom they were handed over, those things so that they may serve their own uses. Therefore the affront of that usurpation must be repelled by all, lest estates dedicated to the uses of the heavenly mysteries be vexed by those rushing upon them. If anyone presumes to do this, let him be accounted sacrilegious and judged as a sacrilegious man. We have heard, moreover, that those who do this persecute the clerics and priests of the Lord and defame them, so that they may add evil to evil and become worse, not understanding that the Church of the Lord consists in priests and grows into the Temple of God; and just as the man who lays waste the Church of God and plunders her estates and gifts, and so forth.

Therefore those who handed goods over to the Church act in no way contrary to the law of God. This was also practiced in the old Testament, as is established from Leviticus 27:14:

> If a man vows his house and sanctifies it to the Lord, the priest shall consider whether it is good or bad, and it shall be sold according to the price established by him. But if the man who vowed it wishes to redeem it, he shall give a fifth part above its valuation and shall have the house. If he vows a field of his possession and consecrates it to the Lord, the price shall be valued according to the measure of the seed: if the land is sown with thirty measures of barley, let it be sold for fifty shekels of silver. If he vows the field immediately from the beginning year of Jubilee, it shall be valued at as much as it can be worth; but if after some time, the priest shall calculate > the money according to the number of years which remain until the Jubilee, and it shall be deducted from the price. If the man who vowed the field wishes to redeem it, he shall add a fifth part, and so forth.

Therefore we see that Christians who despised wealth and life were vehement and almost contentious in preserving the goods of the Church, because they are the goods of Christ and the goods of the poor.

Hence Constantine and others commanded that they be restored. These are the words of the law:

> But since Christians are known to have possessed not only those places in which they are accustomed to assemble, but also others which belonged not privately to individuals but to the right of their whole community, that is, of the Christians, I wish you to command each person who possesses them to restore them all, pursuant to the law which we laid down above, without any controversy, to the Christians, that is, to their society and assembly.

And to Anullinus:

> Therefore we will that, as soon as you receive these letters from us, if there are any of those possessions which belong to the Catholic Church of the Christians in any cities or other places, and so forth.

Just as there is a perpetual succession of Bishops, so there is a perpetual succession of the goods of which the Bishops were stewards. Nor is it necessary to adduce more concerning these things, since all authorities are full of them, not only in canon law but also in civil law: those titles On Churches, On Episcopal Hearing, Code 1, title 7, On Bishops and Clerics, On Orphanotrophs, Xenodochia, Ptochotrophia, Asceteries, and Monks, On Their Privileges, and so forth, Code 1, title 6; likewise Novels 37, 46, and 131.

Concerning expenditures, see Cause 12, question 2, chapter 27:

> It is fitting that four portions be made both of the revenues and of the offering of the faithful, according as the resources of each Church permit, as was reasonably decreed long ago. Of these, let one belong to the Pontiff, another to the clerics, a third to the poor, and the fourth be applied to the fabric. Just as it will concern the priest to pay the aforesaid amount intact to the ministers of the Church, so let the clergy know that nothing beyond the sum regulated for them is insolently to be demanded. Let the evident restoration of holy places show that the things attributed to ecclesiastical buildings have truly been expended upon this work, because it is an impiety if, while sacred buildings remain destitute, the Prelate converts to his own profit the expenses assigned to them. Likewise, although he may appear about to show by divine accounts that he has distributed the portion assigned to the poor, nevertheless, according to what is written--"that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in heaven"--it ought also to be proclaimed by present testimony and not be passed over in silence by the proclamation of good fame.

§ 6. See also Augustine, volume 10, page 521, book 1, chapter 2; page 748, chapter 2; and page 173, chapter 2, of the Antwerp edition.

Possidius relates in his life that in that time there were great possessions of the Church. Augustine was always mindful of the poor and expended upon them from the same source from which provision was made for himself and for all who lived with him, that is, either from the revenues of the Church's possessions or from the offerings of the faithful. And when perhaps, as is customary, envy arose against the clerics themselves on account of the possessions, he addressed the people of God, saying that he preferred to live from the contributions of the people of God rather than endure the care or administration of those possessions, and that he was ready to relinquish them, so that all God's servants and ministers might live in the manner in which those serving the altar in the old Testament are read to have shared from the same. But the laity were never willing to undertake this.

He delegated and entrusted the entire care and substance of the Church's household by turns to the more capable clerics. He never had a key or ring in his hand; rather, all things received and expended were recorded by the same overseers of the household. At the completion of the year these were read out to him, so that it might be known how much had been received and how much expended, or whatever had not been expended or remained to be expended. In many entries he followed the fidelity of the overseer of the household rather than knowing it by tested and manifest proof.

He never wished to purchase a house, field, or estate. But if perhaps something of this kind was spontaneously given to the Church by anyone or left by title of a legacy, he did not reject it but commanded that it be received. For we also know that he refused certain inheritances, not because they could not be useful to the poor, but because he judged it just and equitable that they be possessed rather by the children, parents, or relatives of the dead, to whom those departing had been unwilling to leave them.

A certain man among the honored inhabitants of Hippo, living at Carthage, wished to give a possession to the Church of Hippo and, having executed the instruments while retaining the usufruct for himself, voluntarily sent them to Augustine of holy memory. Augustine gladly accepted his offering, congratulating him because he was mindful of his eternal salvation. But after some years, when we happened to be present personally with Augustine, behold, that donor, sending a letter through his son, requested that those instruments of gift be returned to his son; but he directed that one hundred solidi be expended upon the poor. When the holy man learned this, he groaned that the man had either feigned the gift or repented of the good work; and, with God prompting him, he said as much as he could with a sorrowful spirit to the man's heart concerning that very refusal, namely, for his rebuke and correction. He immediately returned the instruments which the man had sent voluntarily, neither desired nor exacted, and rejected the money. Writing back, he both reproved and rebuked him as was proper, admonishing him to make satisfaction to God for his dissimulation or iniquity with the humility of repentance, lest he depart from the world with so grave a sin.

He frequently said that the Church ought more securely and safely to receive legacies left by the deceased than inheritances which might be troublesome and damaging, and that the legacies themselves ought rather to be offered than exacted. He himself did not receive anything committed in trust, but did not prohibit clerics willing to receive such things. Nor was he entangled by excessive love or cupidity in the things which the Church had and possessed; rather, suspended from and cleaving to greater and more spiritual things, he scarcely ever relaxed and lowered himself from the contemplation of eternal things to these temporal ones. When he had put down and arranged these things, as though they were biting and now troublesome affairs, he made a return of his spirit to the interior things of the mind and to higher things, so that he might either think about matters to be discovered, dictate something concerning those already discovered, or certainly correct something already dictated and transcribed. He did this laboring by day and keeping vigil by night.

The possessions of the African Church were therefore great enough to provoke envy. But Augustine, to show that envy unjust, was ready to relinquish them and live together with the clergy from the offering of the people; yet the people did not judge this expedient for the state or the Church.

§ 7. The reasons are evident. In no way is it consonant with morals or religion that the principal part of the state be the most abject; yet this will happen if no regard is had for its station. Must the Prelates of the faith, must the teachers whose office is to console, teach, rebuke, and punish, be suppliants to an insolent people and to the disdain of the wealthy? Next, how very few whose life depends upon another's mercy will dare to offend the man by whom they are fed? Who has learned to be free so resolutely that, in receiving a benefice, he does not perceive his liberty to have been sold? Those, therefore, who praise needy preachers and Prelates of religion seek slaves of their own cupidities, not energetic censors of morals.

Third, Bishops and Prelates are commanded to be hospitable. But how will they be able to draw others by kindness if, like vagrants and parasites, they must gnaw another's bread? Fourth, the contempt of those who teach religion is a public disgrace to religion. "Whatever a poor man says is a lie," someone used to say, because the same words from a different mouth do not have the same force. Fifth, the poverty of the Church impels men to various devices and sometimes unlawful ones; when endured from necessity, not voluntarily, it casts down their spirits and excludes studies and zeal for souls. Sixth, this is generally the desire even of pious parents, and often their sole and excessive care: to provide for the dignity and splendor of their children. Who among thousands will make expenditures upon the studies of his sons so that the son may preach the Gospel in poverty for his whole life? Who among the wealthy will lower himself to this, that he educate his sons for poverty?

Thus this specious devotion to Evangelical poverty overturns the whole discipline of the Christian religion. To wish to introduce into the whole clergy what belongs to a few is insane; indeed, it conflicts with the divine laws that there should be nothing in the Church from which her ministers may be supported. Seventh, for this reason sales of ecclesiastical goods were prohibited by the Council of Epaon, chapter 12, and gifts in chapter 17.

Now it is pleasing to seal these things with the opinion of the most prudent Gregory of Toulouse, book 2 of the Syntagma, chapter 28:

> And therefore, when the Church's condition had changed, Christians, frequently driven by persecutions of unbelievers, learned that the worship of God could scarcely be restored without the aid of temporal things. They therefore willed that hereafter not all things offered be sold, but that they be preserved in the Church, so that, once the persecutions had been quieted, ecclesiastical estates offered and consecrated to God might assist divine worship. Nor do all basilicas or temples where divine worship is rendered have tithes, but only parish Churches. Therefore it was necessary that other goods be consecrated to God from which those who continually served God there might be supported. For this reason Constantine the Great publicly permitted inheritances to be left to the Church and shrines to be constructed. For the tithes of a prior Church must not be withdrawn on account of new Churches.

Thus it was properly established that thereafter sacred buildings not be constructed without a suitable endowment by which each could nourish its own Levites. The Emperor of the East Manuel Comnenus established by three constitutions that the immovable goods of Churches and monasteries be untouched by the hand of the treasury, whether they were possessed with title or without title, and he confirmed this by a golden bull. Alexius Comnenus II, another Emperor of the East, sanctioned the same thing.

Theodoric, King of the Goths, writing to Ibas, an illustrious man and commander, commands that the possessions of the Church of Narbonne, occupied by any invaders contrary to the command of Alaric, be restored even by military force. Writing likewise to Adilas, he says: “We especially desire that the Churches be rendered free from every injury; while equitable things are furnished to them, divine mercy is acquired.” And in the year of the Lord 1099, war was undertaken against those who had invaded the lands of priests and Churches. Near Paris, Bouchard of Montmorency; among the people of Beauvais, Dreux of Mouchy; at Reims, Ebles of Roucy; near Orléans, Léon of Meung; and in other places, were defeated and subdued by Louis, son of the King of the Franks, and Robert, Count of Flanders. And when a man, having been admonished through envoys to restore to the rectors of those venerable places the property of the Churches which was in his power and which pertained to Churches placed under the hand of King Pepin, refused, he made war; and, having gathered forces from every side and entered Aquitaine, he declared that by war he would exact the property and rights of the Churches, and thus compelled the man to do what had been commanded.

CHAPTER XLIII

Against the Objections Commonly Raised against the Wealth of Churches

§ 1. "I know," says Gregory of Toulouse, book 2 of the Syntagma, chapter 28, "that many have envied the property of the Church and preferred it for themselves rather than for God and the uses of the pious; and therefore they have also twisted certain profane examples into authority for their wickedness and presented a certain piety as a pretext."

What, therefore, do those men who suffer no one besides themselves to be wealthy say? First, that Christ Jesus our Lord was poor and that Paul labored and supported himself with his hands; all ecclesiastics ought to live by this example. Second, that luxury and pride have arisen from wealth. Third, that wealth requires care and solicitude, while clerics must be constituted free for the service of God.

§ 2. The advancement of very many in virtue through contempt for human affairs is indeed to be desired, so that they embrace not only the precepts of God but also the counsels. Yet because such great virtue belongs to few, the Lord did not command but counseled it. He went before them by example, invited them, and did not compel them. We praise chastity, yet we do not desire that there be no marriages in the Christian world; otherwise those who live chastely could not be born.

Therefore I confidently assert that, although Christ the Lord did not have a place to lay His head, He nevertheless did not prescribe the same law to His Church or her ministers. Rather, He showed the summit of perfection, which some strive to ascend, and left to the rest the use of their own property. For since He knew that that harsh road of poverty was not for all, but that the supports of wealth sustained many, He did not wish to institute His Church otherwise than was fitting among men. Therefore He wished Bishops and others to use those aids for the government of peoples, and regarded it as sufficient if in mind they were above wealth, just as riches did not hinder Abraham, Isaac, and David but were incentives and instruments for doing good and for liberality.

Otherwise the poverty of Christ the Lord and the other things which He did are proposed for imitation to all Christians, not to clerics alone. Why, therefore, do they wish only these men to be poor? Do they wish only these also to be chaste, sober, just, and truthful? Christ lived a poor life, and indeed so did the Apostles. Yet God, who chose poor food and clothing for Himself, said to His ancient ministers: "All the richest part of the oil, wine, and grain, whatever they offer as firstfruits to the Lord, I have given to you," Numbers 18:12. He also promised the same to the priests of the new Testament: that kings would be their foster-fathers. The Apostles too, if you regard the iniquity of the times, had that poverty which nevertheless permitted them to live from the Gospel. The Lord did not prohibit the use of riches which He Himself did not possess.

Yet the heretics who are most offended by the attendance and retinue of our Bishops approve the same thing among their own. Hadrian à Saravia, On the Honor Owed to Bishops and Presbyters, chapter 29:

> Furthermore, the retinue of Bishops and the bustle of attendants offend the eyes of certain men not a little, because in that matter they appear similarly to imitate the dukes and counts of the kingdom. Response: this argument is popular and deludes the minds of the simple with an empty appearance. For I dare assert that the retinue of the Lord and the Apostles was as honored as it could be in proportion to the time and the matter for which He had come into this world; it would have been more honored if God had approved another plan for saving the human race.

> For He had voluntarily taken eighty men into His household, who accompanied Him wherever He went or went before Him to the place where He was about to come.

And in the dedicatory Letter to On the Different Ranks of Ministers:

> Evangelical doctrine does not disturb civil society or anything that pertains to preserving it. Since the pastors of Churches live in that society, the Lord nowhere commanded that they be strangers to those things by which the state is either adorned or defended. Different degrees of honor, moreover, are necessarily established everywhere for the sake of preserving society. Our ancestors gave to Bishops those among them which appeared capable of being given with the utility of the Church and the state, and judged it becoming that they be reckoned among the nobles of the state. Certainly, since that honor is also granted to jurists in the toga who preside over the administration of justice in courts, all nations have always judged it equitable that the Prelates of sacred things and religion possess it. Hence it also follows that they have that retinue and attendance which by usage and custom sober and modest nobles commonly have. I do not see what there is here at which men either ignorant of human affairs or assuredly excessively morose should turn up a crooked nose.

§ 3. Wealth produces luxury, I confess, and ambition. The desire for honors is tickled by a double enticement when it observes sacred and profane power joined into one. Yet the hierarchical order and the supports of wealth are not therefore to be abolished; rather, an honorable and moderate use must be prescribed by good laws. The goods of the Church are to be expended upon the poor, the ministers of the Church, and teachers. Bishops who are not Princes use a moderate retinue; those who have a Principality joined to their Bishopric must not be denied that ornament which other Princes use in the state. I approve no one's prodigality, condemn everyone's luxury, and counsel becoming station and magnificence.

Amid these things I wonder at the censors of ecclesiastical wealth. For although they behold the insane expenditures, wantonness, and delights of so many kings and secular Princes, so many wealthy men and nobles, they nevertheless do not judge that their wealth should be taken away by force; they envy only the Prelates, whose moderation is nevertheless remarkable if they are compared with the others. Without doubt those who live luxuriously from the patrimony of Christ offend more gravely, since so many canons and reason itself command its right use; but those are the vices of men, not of wealth.

Ambition indeed appears to me to be kindled by honor, yet not abolished by the government which exists in sectarian Churches. For there is rivalry even in a small presidency, and it is the easier the more common the presidency. Is not a Consul elected with ambition even in small towns? And in villages do not the sons of praetors look proudly about themselves? Many of the heretics acknowledge the arrogance, ambition, and rivalry of their ministers; among them is Saravia, defender of Bishops, page 588: "I wonder whether Master Beza believes that today there is less ambition or less avarice among ministers of the Church who preside for only a week and whose stipends are meager and curtailed than there was formerly either among the ancient Bishops or among those who today profess Christ and have ample revenues."

They do not understand that they are censuring the divine ordinance which furnished the priests of the old Testament with so much wealth, adorned them with so many magistracies, and finally gave them the prefecture and kingdom of the nation. Indeed, King Agrippa himself professes before Gaius that the priesthood is greater than the kingdom.

If the truth must be spoken concerning morals, it must not be denied that wealth affords the evil a capacity for acting wickedly. Yet I establish that, after all things have been defined by laws in the Church, virtue is cultivated by many amid riches themselves; for poverty, although not to the same vices, nevertheless affords occasion to great vices. The splendor of riches increases arrogance, but I think that Fabricius, the exemplar of Roman virtue praised by every writer, cooked turnips with as much arrogance as Pyrrhus ascended his throne. "I prefer," he says, "to command the wealthy rather than possess wealth." Does that commander from the plow seem to you to have been little ambitious when he wished to have kings and magnates as servants?

Delights are tinder for lusts; and nevertheless those vices gained strength amid the filth of brothels, the barbarity of the Scythians, and the nakedness of the Western Indians. If the Church must be discussed, there were graver scandals in primitive times: the horrendous obscenities of the Simonians, Nicolaitans, Gnostics, and Carpocratians; indeed, those times were disturbed by more heresies altogether, when ambition and desire for wealth also afforded an occasion of secession. But in the following ages the sects were fewer and less widely dispersed, and the sincerity of the ancient religion which exists in the present age is owed to the power of the Bishops.

§ 4. It was not said without reason:

> Care follows growing money.

Yet the care is greater when money is both lacking and sought; for wealth already acquired occupies men, but while it is sought, it kills them. This, therefore, must be done: the dreadful roots of cupidities must be torn out. When these persist and are agitated by want, they grow remarkably and occupy the whole mind of the soul. For needy avarice judges nothing shameful which is profitable.

Finally, the avaricious poverty of preachers is now so despised that no honorable man canvasses for that province. Concerning this Beza and Hadrian à Saravia have a common complaint, page 8 of On the Different Ranks of Ministers. Yet solicitude and useless occupation can be relieved through stewards for all the Bishops--concerning whom canon law says many things--through administrators, concerning whom the ancients and recent authors speak, through leases, and through other abridgments of cares.

CHAPTER XLIV

That the Multitude of the Clergy Is to Be Approved

§ 1. There is another, and a most odious, complaint concerning the multitude of ecclesiastics. For after men have conceived in their mind that ecclesiastics are a useless and idle crowd, they judge that it must be reduced to a small number, and that it is not for the utility of the state that such great wealth be consumed upon those who do not labor for the community. Nor did the innovators defame ecclesiastics among the rude populace by any argument more than by the accusation of idleness.

§ 2. No Church, however, approves the idleness of her priests. Rather, whatever leisure remains from necessary affairs must all be expended upon divine honor, psalms, hymns, reading, prayer, meditation, teaching peoples, exhorting, consoling, judging, settling discords, and corporal and spiritual works of mercy. Since I have treated this matter copiously in other places, repetition is not necessary.

Charles Borromeo also established in his Synods that the visitors should inquire how the clerics passed their time. For whoever is called into the portion of the Lord--who was amid labors from His youth--is called to labors. It is unfitting to be idle and seek sustenance from another's labor; rather, diligent regard must be had for one's office. Cause 13, question 1, Ecclesias, and Distinction 5, On Consecration.

§ 3. The clergy of the new Testament is so occupied with its offices that, if the Levites in the old Testament are compared with it, they could appear altogether idle. Therefore those who blame the idleness of ecclesiastics, or complain that it is excessive--although according to the canons there is none--censure the institution of the Lord.

The offices of the Levites were to carry the tabernacle and serve in it; these are clearly and individually explained in Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. The first occupation was not great, for the tabernacle, distributed among several men, was carried easily, especially since the chiefs of the tribes offered six wagons and twelve oxen, whose assistance they used. After they entered the land of promise, the ark remained for a long time in one place, as at Shiloh; the labor of transporting it was therefore rare. Afterward, when the Temple had been built, it ceased entirely. For David said: "The Lord God of Israel has given rest to His people and a habitation in Jerusalem forever; nor is it the office of the Levites any longer to carry the tabernacle and all its vessels for ministering," 1 Chronicles 23:25.

And verse 27:

> According to the last commands of David, the number of the sons of Levi shall be reckoned from twenty years old and upward. And they shall be under the hand of the sons of Aaron for the worship of the house of the Lord, in the vestibules, chambers, place of purification, sanctuary, and all the works of the ministry of the Temple of the Lord. The priests, however, shall be over the bread of proposition, the sacrifice of fine flour, the unleavened cakes, the frying pan, roasting, and every weight and measure. The Levites shall stand in the morning to confess and sing to the Lord, and likewise in the evening, both at the offering of the Lord's burnt offerings and on Sabbaths, New Moons, and solemnities, continually before the Lord for each matter. And let them guard the observances of the tabernacle of the covenant, the rite of the sanctuary, and the observance of the sons of Aaron their brethren, so that they may minister in the house of the Lord.

They performed this office by courses, as I said above, and the courses were infrequent, for there were twenty-four. But now every day, besides every other labor, it is necessary to stand in the sight of the Lord to sing and pray. Therefore, if the old state was prudently instituted by God and had most holy laws and judgments, this must be said much more of the new, in which a much more devoted care of piety has been taken.

§ 4. The judgment of a malicious and envious populace concerning idleness and labor must not be heard. For it accounts nothing labor unless the body is worn down by it. It does not reckon cares, studies, prayers, psalmody, and writings among labors, although that labor is most severe and gradually consumes life without pain. So many hundreds of thousands of men studying the various arts and sciences, and practicing other arts--such as painters, sculptors, and others whose labor requires the power of the intellect and attention of mind rather than the arms--are not idle.

§ 5. Yet envy does not rest even here. "How greatly they would benefit the state if they cultivated the field, cut wood, and performed the other mechanical works--men whom many kingdoms now support while they sing, pray, and remain idle!" Rather, how great a loss would the state suffer if the worship of God were diminished because His ministers had been assigned to servile works? It frequently comes to my mind to wonder at and lament the ingratitude of men, to whom everything expended upon God appears excessive, although they nevertheless have everything from God.

They complain that the state is burdened by the multitude of ecclesiastics. Let us see who burdens it.

Let us examine the number and expenditures of the clergy in one region. I read in a friend's travel observations that he counted nine Archbishops in Spain.

The entire sum of the revenues of the Archbishops and Bishops is 1,350,000 ducats. Let us set down twice that amount for the clergy and monasteries; there will therefore be 4,050,000, a sum which is small if the size and wealth of the kingdoms are regarded, and yet a great part of it serves the good of the kingdom. Another observation of my friend teaches me that the sum is small, for he demonstrates that annual revenues of 3,862,000 ducats are consumed upon Dukes, Marquises, and Counts. Another sum was handed to me by others in the Coronis of Jubilees, to which I refer the reader.

Now it is necessary to show that the clergy is not burdensome to the kingdom of Spain, even if it rendered no political offices to the fatherland. For the clergy is a small part of so great a kingdom. One noble city has more men and property than the whole clergy. Let us indeed suppose that there are one hundred thousand clerics in the kingdoms of Spain; nevertheless, they will not constitute a hundredth part of the inhabitants. Toledo or Seville will surpass them by many parts. What great thing would it be if, from so many great cities, one could be constituted from the assembled clergy?

The kingdoms of Spain are Murcia, Valencia, Catalonia, Aragon, both Castiles, Navarre, Biscay, León, Galicia, and Asturias. There are eleven kingdoms, and unequal ones. If I should assign one of these to the clerics, I would give them less than formerly was given to the Levites. Let it be, for example, the kingdom of Old Castile, which with the Metropolis which they call Burgos has one hundred and eighty cities. I could not fill a tenth part of these with the clergy of all Europe. Therefore the multitude of clergy is not great if it is compared with the innumerable multitude of others. Since, therefore, amid a Catholic and pacified people where the clergy is most numerous they scarcely constitute a hundredth part, there is no reason for anyone to complain that those who serve God are excessively numerous.

But if we consider what Belgium was before the wars, it had two hundred and eight walled cities and one hundred and fifty villages like towns, besides an immense number of villages. If its clergy assembled into one place, it would not constitute one entire city out of the ten greatest. For I deny that the whole clergy of Belgium was equal in number to one such city. In Ghent, Lille, Antwerp, Utrecht, Amsterdam, Dordrecht, Haarlem, Leeuwarden, Arras, Valenciennes, and Leuven there are more inhabitants than could be constituted from the whole clergy. Thus the clergy does not constitute a two-hundredth part.

But if two hundred, or even one hundred, support one priest, it ought not to appear burdensome, since in the state of God ten, or rather five if you regard the revenue, supported one. Therefore so inequitable a complaint is impious, since, while so many things infest the state, it casts blame for so much only upon the servants of God and teachers of virtue, law, and equity, who do not burden it for this reason: because they are few and because they benefit it greatly.

§ 6. If, therefore, you ask which men are harmful to the state, I shall speak freely. First, the Jews. Their number is much greater than the whole clergy. I can name one or two cities which harbor far more of them than there are ecclesiastics in the whole Archbishopric of Mainz. But we not only support them: we support and enrich them through interest, frauds, and crimes, which oppresses the state.

Second, superfluous artisans. If you doubt it, look about at the merchandise of the fairs; you will find a great part of it which use does not require. It is shameful to say: as many city-dwellers are occupied for luxury as for necessity; pride and curiosity occupy more than life does. If they handled useful things and were occupied with agriculture, fishing, and the rest, the abundance of things necessary for living would be twice as great.

Do you desire an example? Some years ago a madness for silk trimmings invaded, so that no garment is judged becoming unless fine cords run around it, with the result that the accessories frequently exceed the material itself; and now luxury has drawn gold and silver into threads. No one doubts that this expenditure is superfluous. But you who judge it just for the good of the state that the number of the clergy be diminished, strike the counting board and make the calculation: I shall prove that in Europe more expense is bestowed upon this single kind of trifles than upon the whole clergy--the whole clergy, I say, which is in Europe. And not only this: there are more men assigned to weaving, not silk cloths, but those threads, than there are in the entire clergy.

Third, I affirm that the state is being ruined by the abuse of all the mechanical arts. For things which could be made with less labor exhaust the citizens by laborious expense. Ambition, luxury, and the zeal for novelties have increased to such an extent that a city which one hundred years ago ten tailors clothed now requires fifty: the simple use of clothing is corrupted in so many ways. How many may you see for whom nothing intact in a garment, not even in shoes, is pleasing, so greatly have the very mutilations of luxury pleased them. What, therefore, if I say that so great a wealth is expended upon the superfluous expense of tailors and shoemakers that the clergy which is now in Europe could be supported by it? It will appear marvelous to an ignorant man; but if one comes to the calculation, I shall show how much is expended upon belt-makers, border-makers, embroiderers, makers of headdresses, dyers, and clasp-makers--and, if we use knots instead of clasps, knot-makers. For if it pleased men to return to clasps and hooks, several millions would be saved in Europe. No one fails to know how much silk and time a great part of mankind expends upon the knots of garments by which they are fastened and adorned.

Fourth, all who profess disreputable, frivolous, and altogether useless arts--such as conjecturers, soothsayers, moneylenders, acrobats, actors, dancers, pipers, and this whole class which lives from the vices of others--will relieve the grain supply if they are called to useful affairs. Fifth, I refrain from speaking of cooks, confectioners, and that whole class of artisans of pleasures.

I conclude with this opinion. Let only necessary arts obtain a place in the city, and with half of what is now consumed men will live more rightly, quietly, pleasantly, and happily. The clergy could be supported by a hundredth part of this half.

§ 7. It is therefore most salutary to the state that the clergy be both wealthy and numerous. Kings and Princes have always found them most faithful; they have most securely entrusted fortresses and cities to them, following the example of David. But if many are useless and harmful, they must be corrected by suitable means. A Prince will attain this without difficulty if he finds even one good Bishop or Archbishop.

Concerning these men the constitution of Clement which is in Distinction 23, chapter 3, is pleasing:

> Let those clerics be elected to the ministry who can worthily handle the Lord's Sacraments. For it is better for the priest of the Lord to have a few ministers who can worthily perform the work of God than many useless ones who bring a heavy burden upon the ordainer.

It is plainly a heavy burden, because certain useless or depraved men defame the whole order. But the order is not to be cast away on account of the vicious; it is to be reformed by substituting better men in their places. For they do not remove magistracy from their midst because certain magistrates are vicious, but substitute suitable men in the places of those departing.

CHAPTER XLV

Parishes Are to Be Increased and Adorned
